She was married to an important man in Rajagaha, Visaka, and they had a very happy marriage, which was lucky at that time since the marriages were arranged. But one day her husband went out and he heard the Buddha teaching, and he was awakened to some degree. And when he came home, he was so absorbed in what he had heard and in his new perspective on life that instead of greeting Dhamma Dina, sitting down, eating together as they usually did, he just ignored her and kept going.

And she, of course: What did I do wrong? Oh, my Lord, are you angry at me? How can I make you happy? You know, the whole thing. And finally he said, "Okay, let's talk." He told her about the Buddha, about his realization, and that he really wanted to renounce the world and become a monk. And he said, "I'll give you all my wealth. You can stay here. You can go back to your parents. Here's all my money. What do you want to do?"

And she thought it over and said, "Well, I'll renounce too."

And he gave her a big send-off, carried in on a litter and everything, as she went to join the bhikkhuni order. So she became a nun. She practiced intensively and, of course, awakened after some time.

Then at some point after her awakening, she found herself back in Rajagaha, where she had lived with her husband. And it turned out he'd changed his mind—he hadn't actually become a monk after all. But now she was an arahant, completely awakened. She didn't care. And really, he'd done her a big favor.

She doesn't have a poem so much, but she has actually a whole sutta in the Middle-Length Sayings where her husband Visakha is asking the lady Dhammadina all these questions. It's a very subtle and profound question-and-answer sutta with this nun. And what's really special—I just read it tonight, and it's really very subtle stuff—at the end, he keeps on asking and asking and asking, and finally she says, "Enough. You're never going to come to the end of your questions. Go ask the Buddha."

So he goes to the Buddha and reports everything Dhammadina had said, and the Buddha said, "Very good. I would have answered exactly as she did. What she says, I would have said. So that's the meaning, and you should remember it."

There's a special word for this, when the Buddha says that what a nun or monk said is exactly the same as he would have said. It's called Buddhavacana—word of the Buddha. It's basically saying their understanding, their wisdom is equal to his own. And so this is the case of his saying that about the nun Dhammadina. Again, another example that once there's awakening, gender, caste, class has nothing to do with anything—that truth can exist and does exist in all of us.

So those are some who became great teachers. There are a couple others whose stories I really like, from very different levels of society. They didn't particularly become great teachers after they entered the bhikkhuni order, but their stories are wonderful.

One is a woman named Punnika, who was a slave woman. She was a slave in the household of Anathapindika. You read his name a lot—he was the main lay supporter of the Buddha. Many of these suttas take place somewhere called the Jeta Grove, and Anathapindika actually gave the Jeta Grove to the Buddha's Sangha. And yet he had slaves. I can't put it together. It's a different culture.

But anyway, Punnika was a slave woman, and even when she was a slave she heard the Buddha teach, and she became awake in the first stage of enlightenment. In the Theravada there are four stages, and she heard the teaching and was awakened to the truth. What I love about this story is the power of truth—that she knew what was true and had so much faith and courage in that knowing that she was willing to speak that truth in a place where a slave woman could have really gotten in big trouble.

Her job was to go down to the river every day and draw water, bring it back to the house. One morning she was down there when a Brahmin man came along. Now, you know in India they had this whole caste system that you were born into, and there was nothing you could do about it. The Brahmin caste was the highest caste, so a Brahmin man would be of the highest standing. I would imagine a slave woman would be among the lowest. And this Brahmin man came down to the river pursuing a Hindu custom of that time—washing himself in the river to wash away his past misconduct.

Punnika, taking her stand on what she knew was the truth, completely challenged him on it. Let me read you the poem, because I find it so moving—to be so sure of what is true and so unconcerned with what could happen.

She says, "I'm a water carrier. Even in the cold, I've always gone down to the water, frightened of punishment or the angry words of high-class women." It's a dialogue poem. She says, "So what are you afraid of, Brahmin, that makes you go down to the water? Your limbs are shaking with bitter cold."

And he says, "You know what I'm doing? I'm washing away my bad deeds."

And she says, "Whoever told you that you are freed from evil by washing?"

The blind leading the blind. In that case, all frogs and turtles would go to heaven.

And she said, thieves, executioners, other wrongdoers would be freed from their bad karma by washing in the water. If these streams carried away all your old evil, they would carry away your virtue too. You'd be separated from both.

And she says, just don't do that thing, the fear of which brings you down here to wash.

See how powerful it is just to speak the truth. And of course, he immediately realizes that she's right. He immediately sees into the truth and says, "You're right. I'm wrong. You've brought me back to the right road. Here, let me give you the robe I bathed in," as a gesture of gratitude.

And she says, "Keep your robe. I don't want it."

But she gives him a little lecture on sila. If you're afraid of pain, if you don't like it, then don't do anything evil, either openly or in secret. If you're afraid of pain, if you don't like it, then take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. Train in the precepts. This is good.

Can you imagine a slave woman saying this to a Brahmin man? And of course he completely takes refuge and goes to the Buddha. And then Anathapindika gave her her freedom, adopted her as a daughter, and she renounced and went and joined the bhikkhuni order.

I just love that story because the power of truth transcends all differences. And it took a lot of guts on her part.

Another very different story is that of Ambapali. Ambapali was the chief courtesan, not of a particular person, but of the whole town of Vesali. She was born really beautiful and all the princes were fighting over her. So they decided, in order not to have these fights, they would just make her the chief courtesan of the town. That means basically the head prostitute—any man could pay her. So she was really rich and had a very high status, and was really beautiful. She had a very good life.

She had a son by King Bimbisara—we've met him before. Her son went off and became a monk, and he would come back and talk to his mother about the Buddha's teachings. So she didn't actually meet the Buddha until she was pretty old.

But when she did, the first time she was going out in her carriage to the grove where the Buddha was teaching, he knew she was coming and had to give all his monks a warning to keep their senses guarded, because she was so stunningly beautiful and seductive. But she was really going just to hear the Buddha. And she got very excited, invited him and all the monks to come for lunch the next day. He came, and he gave them a little lecture—just eat your lunch and watch what you're doing. But nothing happened.

It's said that later in her life, after hearing her son preach, she renounced the world. What's interesting is that according to the commentaries, the thing that actually brought her to awakening, the thing she studied, was impermanence—using her own aging body as the subject, watching how her beautiful body, which had been her whole life, was breaking down. Just seeing this in herself, she came to complete awakening.

I wanted to read some of her poem because I find it has a real sense of humor about it. Remembering that this was her avenue—watching her body decay—something that's available to all of us:

My hair was black and curly, the color of black bees.
Now that I am old, it is like the hemp of trees.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

Fragrant as a scented oak, I wore flowers in my hair.
Now because of old age, it smells like dog's hair.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

My eyes flashed like jewels, long and black.
Now they don't make anyone look back.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

And she goes on and on through every part of her body:

My hands were beautiful, set off by rings, gold as the sun.
Now because of old age, they're like radishes or onions.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

My feet were beautiful, delicate, as if filled with cotton.
Now because of old age, they are cracked and rotten.

This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

And she ends with, "This is how my body was. Now it is dilapidated, a place of pain, an old house with the plaster falling off."

If you really let that in—an old house with the plaster falling off—really coming from someone who spent her whole life engrossed in the pleasures of the body and how beautiful she was, that she can look at that not with discouragement or devastation, but that that is the seed for awakening. Really, in so many of these stories, the suffering is the seed of awakening, just what we keep saying all the time. And what I know a lot of you have discovered in your practice—it's the same now as it was then. Now when you're feeling really sick, instead of it being something wrong, it becomes the avenue for awakening.

We fall apart. More and more of us in chairs, more and more of us going through all kinds of physical difficulties. It's not a mistake. Sooner or later the plaster's going to fall off of all of us. Can we use it to awaken?

Speaking of suffering, there's a whole series of poems about women who, after they became nuns, still found it really tough. And to me, that's not discouraging. That's actually supportive, because so often you hear stories like Kema's—she heard three lines and became completely enlightened. Or we read that the Buddha gave a talk and five hundred people became completely enlightened. And we think, "Five years, ten years—what am I doing wrong?"

There are quite a few women with poems that show they had the same frustrations and struggles after they became nuns and were really seriously practicing. So just so we feel some solidarity.

The first is Utama. She was one of Patacara's disciples—remember, Patacara is the one with all the suffering. But I like this poem because it describes a moment in practice of utter frustration:

"Four or five times I left my cell. I had no peace of mind, no control over my mind."

You can get the feeling—in and out of your room, in and out, the mind going wild.

"I went to a nun I thought I could trust. She taught me the Dharma, the elements of body and mind, the nature of perception, earth, water, fire, and wind. I heard what she said and sat cross-legged, seven days full of joy. When on the eighth I stretched my feet out, the great dark was torn apart."

And this is Vadesi. She was actually the nurse of Mahapajapati Gotami, the founder of the bhikkhuni order. She entered the order with Mahapajapati, but she didn't get enlightened right away. She had a long, hard struggle:

"It was twenty-five years since I left home, and I hadn't had a moment's peace."

So you think three months is long? You can just stop whining.

"Uneasy at heart, steeped in longing for pleasure, I held out my arms and cried out as I entered the monastery."

And you can really relate. It's not like some pure thing. We're just wanting pleasure—for twenty-five years.

"I went up to a nun I thought I could trust."

The commentaries say she's talking about Dhammadinna here.

"She taught me the Dharma, the elements of body and mind, the nature of perception, earth, water, fire, and wind. I heard her words and sat down beside her. I have great magic powers now and have annihilated all the obsessions of the mind. The Buddha's teaching has been done."

I love that—when they're really free, "the Buddha's teaching has been done." But it's hard work.

One other: Mitta Kali, who joined when she heard the Buddha preach the Satipatthana Sutta, the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. That teaching was so inspiring that she became a nun. But it's said that she was a very difficult person—very angry, very self-centered, very difficult to get along with. Coming into the bhikkhuni order, she had a hard time at first. But gradually, through very sincere practice, these qualities eased.

Here is her poem.

Although I left home for no home and wandered full of faith, I was still greedy for possessions and praise. I lost my way, my passions used me, and I forgot the real point of my wandering life. Then as I sat in my little cell, there was only terror.

This is another one of those moments. She thought, "This is the wrong way. A fever of longing controls me. Life is short. Age and sickness gnaw away. I have no time for carelessness before this body breaks." And as I watched the elements of mind and body rise and fall away, I saw them as they really are. I stood up. My mind was completely free. The Buddha's teaching has been done.

Again, we see that movement from feeling totally lost, filled with longing for pleasure and gripped by terror, to that willingness to come back and meet the moment. Just see what's happening. She found that sense of determination—"I have no time for carelessness"—and simply started watching the elements of mind and body rise and fall away. It just takes that moment of coming back again, no matter how hard it gets.

There are many others along similar lines. But there are also poems from women whose lives before held such suffering that joining the nunhood, renouncing the world, was actually a movement into freedom. I want to read you a few of these.

The difficulty of living in an arranged marriage with a difficult husband, where the wife is really like a slave or servant, having no freedom whatsoever—and in fact, women were not allowed to become nuns unless their husbands gave them permission. There's one poem from a woman known only as Sumangala's Mother. We don't even have her name; Sumangala was another monk. But this is her poem:

Free, I am free! How glad I am to be free from my pestle. My cooking pot seems worthless to me, and I can't even bear to look at his sun umbrella. My husband disgusts me. So I destroy greed and hate with a sizzle. And I'm the same woman who goes to the foot of a tree and says to herself, "Ah, happiness," and meditates with happiness.

Renunciation can be a great joy.

Here's another, from a woman named Muta who was in a very unhappy marriage. Her husband didn't treat her well, but she finally convinced him to let her become a nun. Again she says: Free, I am free! Free by means of the three crooked things—mortar, pestle, and my crooked husband. She doesn't say free from them; she says free by them. In other words, those very difficulties were the avenue. Seeing that suffering was itself the avenue for deliverance. "I'm free from birth and death and all that dragged me back."

And one more story of an unhappy housewife whose unhappiness led her into freedom. Another woman, an anonymous wife—we don't have her name—but her husband would not let her become a nun. So she continued to live out her obligations as a Brahmin wife, cooking and taking care of her husband. One day she was in the kitchen cooking curry, and the whole pot caught fire; all the vegetables burned up. She was so tuned in that this little mishap brought her to the third stage of enlightenment. Impermanence was just so clear. So next time you break a glass, you know...

Again, it's another example of a lay person, a lay woman, just being so present and open that a little incident really awakened her. Then she went to her husband and said, "I just can't do this anymore," and he let her go to be a nun.

Just one other group I want to mention: really old women. So many times, over the years, I've heard people of all ages say, "I wish I could have started practice earlier. Imagine if I knew about this twenty years ago, or thirty years ago, or forty years ago." But there were many women who, like these wives, could not become nuns until their husbands died. There's another woman who was taking care of her grandmother, whom she deeply loved, or her mother, and who couldn't or wouldn't ordain until she was free from her obligations. Some women were quite elderly by the time they became nuns.

And it's okay. Sometimes the feebleness of the body itself became the very point of awakening. There's one woman who actually awakened because she fell down—because she was so weak—and that's the thing that woke her up. Her name was Dhamma.

I wandered for alms. I leaned on a stick. My whole body was weak and trembled. Suddenly I fell down and could see clearly the misery of this body. My heart was freed.

Do we think of those two lines together? "I could see clearly the misery of this body. My heart was freed." I think that's amazing.

Another woman, her name is a mouthful—Bahu Pitika—had seven sons and seven daughters. Very wealthy. And she said, "Well, I'll give you children all the money now, and then you can just sort of take care of me." And they said, "Great, Ma. We'll take the money." And then they were passing her from family to family. It's sort of like a modern story. None of them wanted her. They started not treating her well. They started being sarcastic. She really felt unwanted. And finally said, "Who needs this? I'm going to go become a nun."

And this woman, quite elderly, became renowned as the nun most known for her courageous effort. Of all the nuns—not just the old nuns, of all the nuns—she was the most known for her courageous effort. She'd serve the nuns all day, and then she'd practice all night. And so, again, she became awakened. To me, that's also inspiring.

I'll just end with one story—not even a story, just a poem that I like very much from a woman named Dantika. It's another one of those moments:

As I left my daytime resting place on Vulture Peak, I saw an elephant come up on the riverbank after its bath. A man took a hook and said to the elephant, "Give me your foot." The elephant stretched out its foot, the man mounted. Seeing what was wild before gone tame under human hands, I went into the forest and concentrated my mind.

So let's sit quietly in the forest, concentrate our minds.

I have found what is vast and empty, the unborn. It is what I've longed for. I am a true daughter of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace.

CHAPTER 337

Contentment With Awareness

Carol Wilson · 51 min

> In this opening talk for a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental shift in how we approach meditation practice: moving from a gaining mindset focused on particular experiences toward a simple contentment with awareness itself. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Chah, she explores how our habitual motivation—wanting results, seeking pleasant experiences, evaluating our progress—can actually obscure our connection to what she calls our "true home."
>
> Wilson references the Sakka-pañha Sutta, where Sakka, ruler of the gods, asks the Buddha what keeps beings trapped in hostility despite good intentions. The Buddha's answer points to attachment to preferences—holding to what is dear and pushing away what is not dear—as the root of our entanglement. This teaching illuminates why the practice requires such a radical reorientation: from taking refuge in controlling our experience to taking refuge in awareness itself.
>
> Through personal stories, including a powerful observation at Ramana Maharshi's ashram and the image of mountain monkeys launching fearlessly into space, Wilson illustrates the quality of surrender that deepens practice. She encourages practitioners to notice their "safety nets"—the comfort zones, ideas about self, and familiar patterns that limit full presence. When these begin to fray, we encounter what she calls "the wall," moments requiring small deaths of who we thought we were. Rather than obstacles, these are gateways to recognizing that our true home is available only in this moment, met with fresh, kind, reverent attention.

Greetings to you all after your first full day of practice.

I suppose the first full day of a three-month retreat isn't really that different from the first full day of a nine-day or a weekend. The body still has to go through what it has to go through. The mind has to go through what it has to go through. And you've got three more months of it. Luckily, it keeps changing.

Tonight I want to talk in a general way about motivation—about developing a contentment with awareness.

In our retreat practice, our meditation practice, we bring the same mindset that we bring to our lives. What else could we bring? And just as in life, I'm sure you've heard the phrase from the Tibetan tradition that everything rests on the tip of motivation—that the heart, the core of our spiritual development, of our practice, rests in the motivation.

This is somewhat contrary to the way our normal mind and the everyday world tends to view and evaluate experience, isn't it? I know for me, I mostly evaluate whether something is useful or beneficial or whether I want to do it by whatever results I get, or the results that I think I'm going to get. It may be by whether they're pleasant, or it may be by whether it's something I want or something I value. But usually we're looking for a particular experience, a particular result.

I don't think for most of us it's so different when we come to a meditation retreat or even when approaching the whole path of our spiritual practice. I think it's very helpful for each of us from time to time to reflect a bit on what mindset we're bringing to our practice. What are you evaluating it by? What are you looking for? And to be really honest with oneself, because to highlight this can be really helpful—without judgment, of course.

Easily one can find oneself somehow looking for a particular set of experiences in your whole practice, or in the three months that you've come here. It might not be something that you've enunciated to yourself very clearly, but some particular thing should happen—whether it's deep practice, whatever that means; whether you suddenly become more compassionate; whether your anger goes away; you feel more at ease with yourself; you go through some particular set of stages; or your teacher finally tells you, "You've really got it, now you're enlightened." Whatever it is, there's often lurking back in our mind streams somewhere something that we're looking for, that we evaluate our practice by.

It's normal. It's the way we think. As Ajahn Chah says, the worldly way is to do things for a reason, to get some return. And it's normal. How many of you came here thinking, "Absolutely nothing is going to happen. I'm not going to get anything out of this. I just can't think of anything better to do for the next six weeks or three months, and I've got nowhere to go"? Probably not. I hope not, really. It's normal. That's how we think of things.

But Ajahn Chah goes on: in Buddhism we do things without any gaining idea.

So it's a shift that we slowly begin to discover over time, and I keep discovering new layers of subtlety in this shift—that the path, that awakening, isn't so much about what happens, about what experiences I have, even though experiences might arise in a way that helps me see more clearly. The path isn't about getting somewhere, achieving something. The path itself, the heart of it, is rooted in our motivation. Awakening itself flowers out of our motivation, not so much out of experience.

So when we look to our motivation, how does it shift? What I've noticed for myself is that it shifts from this idea of wanting, getting, gaining something, to a contentment with awareness—to a love, really, of the truth of life as it's showing itself right here and now, without my interference, having nothing to do with whether it's what I think should happen or I want to happen.

This comes about only through the letting go of all of our preferences, our notions, our ideas, how we evaluate things—all of them. The giving up of all our preferences is the opening into a contentment with truth, contentment with awareness. And obviously, it's not easy.

There's one sutta, one discourse of the Buddha, that I quite like, where Sakka, who was the ruler of the whole realm of the gods, came down to talk to the Buddha. One thing is interesting: here's the ruler of the whole realm of the gods, and basically they sound like they're working with the same things that we are.

He comes down, and his question really is—I'll put it in my own words—"Honored Sir, what is it that's chaining us, that's holding us? Even though we want to live a life free from hostility, free from conflict, even though we want to live with loving-kindness, basically we have all good intentions, but still, even so, we find ourselves living with hostility, not free from ill-will, getting caught up in violence. What is it that's chaining us in this way?"

To me, it's really a heart-rending question. We really want to live a life of love, compassion, and goodness, and we keep getting caught up in the opposite.

In this particular sutta, the Buddha could have answered it in different ways. In this one he said: the first fetter, the first chain that keeps you in ill-will and rivalry and hostility is envy and stinginess.

But underneath what fuels the envy and stinginess is when we hold to what is dear and push away what is not dear. In other words, when we are attached to our preferences, we get caught in all this confusion and suffering and hostility and ill-will. When we're attached to our preferences, and that's fed by desire, as he says.

So that's a strong statement. If one really looks in the heart, in the mind—did I come here to free myself from attachment to all preferences? Not intellectually. Intellectually we all go, "Yeah, yeah, right, I want to be free from attachment to preferences." I mean in the way we really live, in the way you really relate to your experience, moment to moment. How often do we find that place? "I just so love awareness. It's so much more satisfying to me than having my preferences, than having to be with something I prefer not to be with." How often is that actually the experience, actually the case?

Sometimes it is. And isn't it really a wonderfully freeing experience in that moment to see that awareness can be our refuge? We don't have to have what we want and be separated from what we don't want. But it's hard. It's not the way we normally live. It really takes some cultivation on very deep levels.

This is Ajahn Chah again. It's from the same teaching where he's saying the worldly way is to do things for a reason. But the Buddha teaches us to go above and beyond reason and evaluation. His wisdom was to go above cause, beyond effect. To go above happiness and beyond suffering. In other words, above happiness meaning getting what we want, suffering meaning being with what we don't want—to go beyond that. Think about it. In that case, there's nowhere to stay. We people live in a home. To leave home and go where there's no home, we don't know how to do it because we've always lived with becoming, with clinging, with clinging to what we want, to our preferences. If we can't cling, we don't know what to do.

It's sort of funny, but really just explore in your experience how often our reflexive or instinctual refuge in a situation is to fall back into clinging to our preferences or pushing away what we don't want. We take refuge in the belief that we're going to find happiness in controlling things, in controlling the environment and staying in our comfort zone. That's our rational, habitual mind.

But what happens—and it happens quite naturally through our mindfulness practice—is that this shift occurs. The shift from taking refuge in clinging, from taking refuge in attachment to our preferences, our ideas, our expectations, thinking we know what's what and what's going to happen. That motivation naturally begins to shift to a kind of reverence, I feel almost—a reverence for the Dhamma, meaning the truth, as Steve expressed it last night in talking about the refuges. The refuge of Dhamma is the refuge of the truth, the way things are in this moment, irrespective of my wishes and preferences. And that's not a threat—that's a refuge. That's the place of peace.

It really becomes such a sense of love of awareness that it doesn't matter what we're aware of. Our value judgment shifts from ticking off whether this is a good experience or a bad experience or the one that I want, to being able to appreciate the quality of awareness itself. And the experience is our avenue into the awareness. So this is where we begin to find the harmony, the peace that we seek. And it's in this shift of motivation, this shift of relationship.

Let me give a personal example. I hope it conveys it—I'm not sure if it does, but to me it was very powerful. I was visiting an ashram in southern India. It's an ashram where Ramana Maharshi used to live. He died fifty years ago. This ashram is very well known, very well run, a very nice place, and many, many people come from all over India as well as from all over the world. There's no particular teacher there now. People come not so much to honor Ramana Maharshi's memory as to use the place to activate this inner seeking, which is really about opening to awareness and past our own personal preferences.

One of the activities that happens there—there's a big hall bigger than this, and in it is what's called a samadhi. It's different from how we use that word. It's really the tomb.

Ramana Maharshi is buried there. And there's a large platform around his tomb. One of the things people do is come in and circumambulate this samadhi, as it's called. In the evening, people sit along the sides of the wall, and some of the residents of the ashram, including the president, line up in front of the tomb and do an hour of Vedic chanting.

It's really quite a trip, as all of India is a trip, to sometimes watch and sometimes take part in the people walking around the samadhi. Just to see all the different attitudes that are brought to this essentially very simple act of walking around the tomb. There are people who come in doing full prostrations, overflowing with a kind of love, crying, praying, bowing. There are people who come in and walk around chatting away a mile a minute to each other. And there are people, often Westerners in my experience, who are very grim, really determined to do it right or to get freedom or to somehow receive a message from Ramana. You can tell there's something very serious going on in the way they walk around the tomb.

And myself too. I'd walk around it—not wanting a new car or anything like that—but certainly, often, with some sense of wanting another glimpse of freedom, wanting somehow to see what Ramana saw.

One night I was sitting along the wall while the chanting was happening. At the end, the president of the ashram, who seems to be a very simple, friendly man—and the president of this ashram is a pretty prestigious position—got up. It was just before dinner, and at dinner you sit eating on the floor in the dining room while some of the men who live there, including the president, come around and serve the food. That's how it's done.

So he was getting up at the end of the chanting to go do his regular serving of the food, and somehow I just happened to notice him. He got up and very simply walked around this samadhi—no bowing, no posturing, no big anything—but it was just so simple and present. Then he walked out and went and served dinner.

Something about the space I was in allowed it to go right in so deeply. I felt—and who knows, of course, this is only what I felt, who knows what he was feeling—but what I felt and perceived was such a simple, direct love of the truth, of his service. He wasn't trying to get something. I didn't feel any wanting. I didn't see any need for posturing. Just a simple: here I am, walk around the samadhi, go to the next task of service. And this is not a one-time thing—every day of his life.

In that moment, I felt so much difference, although it might be quite subtle in our experience, between walking around wanting truth, wanting freedom, and simply loving the truth as it's expressing right now—without needing something else to confirm that, to confirm me, to make me feel better, to give me even some proof that I'm free or that I understand the truth. Not wanting anything.

That, to me, is the movement our motivation begins to shift into. Not wanting anything, yet with full-hearted, open presence. That's the place our deepening freedom is going to open out of—is opening out of in that very moment. Freedom of non-clinging. Even to freedom. Even to liberation itself. Just the simplicity of presence.

And that's what our practice is. Moment after moment after moment. In the first days of a retreat, no matter how much we've practiced, it's hard not to have some moments of wishing we'd get a little bit of juice going. Some moments of thinking, "Well, it's worth it because I'm going to be there later. I've been there before and I'll be there again." How hard is it to have that simple directness of heart and mind that allows us to be aware, fully content to be here right now, no matter what's happening?

Of course we're not like that every moment—that's our practice. It takes a real surrender of all that we think we know, of all that we think should happen, of all of our ideas of how things should be, even if just for a moment. It takes a lot of trust.

So practically, just in a moment, what would that mean? It could look like this: when you're walking or sitting, the attention is relatively stable, the breath is flowing, the noticing is somewhat clear, there's a sense of well-being. And then in a moment, it all just falls apart. The body gets tight like a knot, the breath gets choppy, the mind's all over the place, the energy drops through the floor, and it's struggle, struggle, struggle to just even know that you're walking.

Can we be just as content to be aware with that as we were five minutes before? Really not fooling ourselves: "Oh yeah, this is really fine, I'm content." I mean really being content. Knowing that the essence of the practice is taking refuge in the awareness itself, in the mindfulness itself—not falling into evaluating what the experience is.

Of course we can't always do that. That's why we're practicing. We're learning to shift where we take refuge: from the experience into the mindfulness, into the awareness.

And the question might arise—it arises for me, even though at times I know the answer. Other times, like when everything's a knot and it's all falling apart, the question arises: well, what really is so special about this present moment anyway? I mean, why do I need to be fully present for this? I would be much better off to take a nap and be fully present when it's more pleasant, when it's more awake.

I read somewhere that Saint Augustine said once that the reason why humans behave as they do is because they are not living in their true home. The reason we behave as we do—we're not living in our true home. And as it happens, the only place that we can reconnect with, re-recognize—because we've never really left our true home, how could we?—but the only place that we're going to recognize it is right here.

How can our true home be somewhere ten years away from now? How can our true home be only in another experience, but not here? The only place we can ever recognize our true home is right here, right now, in this moment. Whatever's happening, it's the juice, it's what we have to use. We can't be somewhere else. So can we learn to trust it enough to really be present without trying to change it, without trying to control it? And it's this trying to change, trying to control, trying to manipulate that hides the truth, that hides our true home.

Ajahn Chah again, talking about our home:

This original heart-mind shines like pure, clear water. It takes us beyond all good and bad. When we understand this, it is the teaching of every Buddha that appears in the world. This is given to us, our Buddha nature. But what is this Buddha? When we see with the eye of wisdom, we know that the Buddha is timeless, unborn, unrelated to any body or any history. Buddha is the ground of all being, the truth of the unmoving mind. And this timeless Buddha is our true home, our abiding place.

This original heart-mind shines like pure, clear water, and it's our true home, our abiding place. All of this practice is to help us learn to recognize and trust and take refuge in our true home—more than we trust and take refuge in our fears, our assumptions, our explanations, our desires, our trying to hold on, our trying to push away. Basically, our habits, our habits of mind.

So how do we shift these habits from wanting, from pushing away, from trying to control, from this constant evaluating, from this obsessive self-referencing? How does every single little experience affect me, me, me? See if you notice that arising from time to time. How do we shift that?

And it's really, I think, the miracle of the simplicity of mindfulness practice—all the instructions we're giving, all this practice laid out over the days—is to help us bring a kind, loving, clear attention to whatever's happening right here, right now.

There's a Burmese saying: to make each person we meet an object of reverence. So I like to think of mindfulness practice as making each activity an object of reverence. To make each moment of experience—whether it's a breath or a footstep, tea, hearing somebody cough, a loud car going by, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking, feeling—can we make each moment in that way an object of reverence? Wouldn't we approach it, bring such a different attitude to bear, if that's how we were meeting moment after moment of life?

And in some ways, to me, when I'm practicing just that simplicity of mindfulness, it really does feel like bringing a sense of reverence, of appreciation, to each moment of experience. So whether I'm reaching for the teacup, or feeling a breath, or folding my shawl, or washing my hands—no moment is more worthy of reverence than another. No moment is holding the secret of the universe more than another.

And that's what's the beauty of a period like this, to do a long retreat where you have days and nights, you can find your own schedule, and you can really begin to explore the possibility of meeting any moment of activity or inactivity in this way—to see that within this moment we can reconnect with our true home, this sense of awareness. This is the essence of our mindfulness practice.

And even though we say, no matter what we're doing, no matter what's going on, the essence of truth is right here in the kernel of everything—why is it necessary to come into such a secluded environment? Why is it necessary to have such a strict schedule, you might say? Why is it necessary to sit and look and walk and look?

And it's just because of the strength of our habits. The strength of our habits of avoiding, of wanting, of clinging, of taking refuge elsewhere are so strong that it takes quite some support to begin to be able to look through them. And on the other hand, even though this seems like such a renunciate, separate environment, it's all right here. We are the world. The world comes here with us.

Again from Ajahn Chah:

Let the knowing spread from within you, and you will be practicing rightly. If you want to see a train, just go to the central station. You don't have to go to the northern line and the southern line and go all over Thailand. Just go to the central station.

Now, some people say to me, "I want to practice, but I really don't have time to study. I don't know how to practice right. My memory is not so good anymore. I can't remember things." He says, I just tell them, look right here. Look in your heart. This is central station. Greed arises here, anger arises here, delusion arises here. Just sit here and you can watch all these things arise. Practice right here because right here is where you're stuck.

And as you look here, right here is where all our expectations arise, it's where our ideas about things arise, and it's also where the Dhamma is arising. Just right here.

So we have six weeks or three months to explore Central Station. It's a wonderful opportunity. The whole world really does arise as we sit, as we walk. There's nothing we're lacking. The chance to see everything. It all unfolds in this simplicity. It's amazing. It's really amazing.

So our job, no matter what's arising, is to stay really simple with it. Okay, Central Station. Can I meet this moment of experience with fresh eyes? Whether it's the breath, whether it's the pain in your knee, whether it's that same old impatient irritation that you've been sitting with year after year, hour after hour, whether it's sleepiness, whether it's ecstasy, whether it's bliss, whether it's boredom—whatever it is, our job is simply to meet it with open, kind, fresh attention. And we'll be saying a lot more about the specifics of it. This is kind of a general overview.

Can we bring that reverence to let the moment unfold itself without our jumping in and trying to evaluate, interpret, and control before we even know what's happening? This is where we get caught in our expectations if we're not aware of what they are. Where we get caught in our habit, our motivational habit of thinking experience has to mean a certain thing, go in a certain way. So when something unpleasant starts to happen—or didn't even start to happen, but there's a possibility that maybe something unpleasant is about to start to happen in your sitting—before we even get there, before we even know it, before we've even met the experience with freshness, already our habits are in there trying to fix it. Well, let me switch how I sit and make sure this doesn't happen. If I sit up straight, if I take a couple of deep breaths, maybe if I go and do some yoga in the yoga room, I can prevent this possible pain from coming.

How can we ever see what's true if that's how we're meeting our experience? The only way that we can come to take refuge in the truth is to stop trying to change everything all the time and really surrender, let go, jump in. It's hard. It's often scary. It's not what we're used to. And it's wonderful. It changes everything.

But it's important to have a sense of appreciation and respect for yourself, for how deeply ingrained is our fear of the unknown and our sense that somehow we can control things. It's actually one of the big mysteries to me why we think we can control things when it is so clear that life is completely out of our control. We can't even control what sensation will arise in the next moment or what thought's going to come into our head. But somehow we think we can control life so that we only have pleasant experience, so that unpleasant experience stops altogether, so that things go just the way we want—flying completely in the face of all the evidence of however long we've lived. Every day has proven to us that we are not in control, and completely flying in the face of that, we keep on trying.

Well, it's exhausting. You wonder why we're tired all the time, why we're stressed? We're living completely out of touch with reality. And when we stop and surrender into the moment, it really is a huge relief.

And still, it's difficult, isn't it? We'll surrender to a point, but it's so easy to have limits—up to this point. But then I need some sign that I'm going to get what I want in order to really surrender.

A friend sent me this story, a story of a man who went for a hike. While he was walking along a steep path, he slipped and started to tumble down the mountainside. At the last moment, he grabbed a branch that was growing from the side of the mountain, but he could not get a foothold to climb back up.

So he was hanging there, really frightened, and he pleaded, "Lord, please help me. If you get me out of this predicament, I'll do anything you say. Please help me."

Just then the clouds parted and a voice said, "Did you say you'll do anything?"

The man answered, "Yes, yes, Lord, I'll do anything."

The voice said, "Okay, let go."

The man said, "What, are you crazy? I'll be killed."

Up to a point. We can go along up to a point. But we will all hit that point over and over in our practice where we think, "Oh no, this is going too far. Opening to this is not what I bargained for. Letting go of this—uh-uh. If freedom means I have to give up this, I don't want any part of it." Have you ever found your mind going there? I do. And sometimes it's just wanting another muffin or something. Sometimes it's something much more intrinsic to my sense of who I am.

But I think these are very important moments. We're all going to hit those moments when it's not easy, it's not simple to keep opening into the unknown without a safety net. We want some little safety net. Even though when we really let go without one, the experience is a tremendous relief, even exhilaration, a real aliveness that's quite unlike our sense of trying to control.

A friend told me this image. I've used it before, but I love it—the mountain monkeys at the top of Mount Arunachala, which is a mountain in India at Ramana Maharshi's ashram. There are monkeys that live down in the ashram part, and they're very much what you'd expect—very greedy. They're always coming and attacking you if you dare go outside with food in your hands. You're a target.

But these monkeys up above on the mountaintop are quite different, these mountain monkeys. My friend said he was sitting up on the top of the mountain just as dawn was beginning. It's very rocky with a few little trees and shrubs and big rocks, but not much. And he said these monkeys will stand on the edge of the rock at the top of the mountain and just launch themselves out into space. They always land somewhere—on some shrub or some branch or some rock. But the feeling as they launch is just go and let go and see what happens next.

I love that image. I really feel that is how we can practice. You sit down, you open the attention and open up. What's going to happen next? We never know. You always land somewhere. It's very different from the monkey standing there thinking, "Could I reach that branch? Maybe I should hop there and then there and then there"—thinking about it for five or ten minutes before taking a little tentative step off the mountain. No. Launch into space. It's wonderful.

And of course, we can't always do it. We want a safety net, and that safety net is a really interesting place to explore in our practice. A lot of the time, we don't know what we're relying on to be our safety net until it starts to unravel a little bit. And then you know, because you either get really resistant or kind of scared or have some sense of, "No, this is really not okay. I've had enough."

The safety net can simply be our ideas about practice, our ideas about what should be happening. It can be a sense of comfort, the habits and patterns of behavior, the comfort zone that we create around how we practice. And that can be continually changing, but most of us have, consciously or unconsciously, a comfort zone—how much we can sleep, how much we can eat, how much we can sit or walk. We can have ideas about ourselves that may not even be conscious, that completely limit us, put us in a little box.

I remember the first time I sat a long retreat, about three months. I used to be able to sit cross-legged then, and I thought, "Never in my life could I ever sit an hour without moving."

It was just this idea I couldn't do it, and I wasn't going to try, because that was an impossibility for this body and this person. And I remember when it first happened that I sat an hour and a half or two hours or something. I wasn't even thinking about it anymore. It became a completely meaningless concept—sit an hour without moving or however long. It just completely went away.

But as long as I was holding on to this idea of "this is what is possible for this body, for this mind, and there's no point even looking beyond it"—I mean, that's almost a trite example, but it sets a limitation. The safety net, the comfort zone, becomes our prison. It in itself becomes what gets in the way, what obscures our recognizing our true home.

So just notice for yourself. The comfort zone, the safety net can be an ease of familiarity with your environment. It can be having a sense of needing a certain amount of pleasant experience, or a fear of something unpleasant. "There's no way I can deal with..."—fill in the blanks, you know—that noise in the hall, this coldness in the atmosphere, not having whatever it is I like to eat, having to share a room with anybody, whatever it is. It can be ideas we have about ourselves, familiarity with certain of our own personality patterns. "Who would I be without this impatience?" Even if it's a suffering personality pattern, it's comfortable. So there's a sense of "this is who I am and I don't want to look beyond it."

And then there's how we relate to our history. I've often had people talking in interviews about almost holding themselves back from giving themselves to the practice fully because—what about my relationship? If I let go of everything, that means my relationship has to go. Or my children, or my parents, or this particular situation in my life. Or if I'm no longer identified with a sense of self, what about my memories? And none of this is what actually happens, but these are the thoughts that we're comfortable with. "I don't want to lose this. Therefore, if I let go, that means it really goes away." And we hold back from practice. We don't surrender into the moment.

And this safety net, the familiarity, what we're used to, what we're afraid to feel or what we're afraid to let go of, what we're afraid to have go away even for a moment—this is what limits us, is what keeps us from really opening into and taking refuge in the truth. Because one way of describing the truth is that we can never, with our concepts, accurately describe the facts of things. So any ideas we have of what awakening would mean, or what enlightenment is, or what letting go means—you know, "my relationship ends" or whatever—our ideas, our conceptions can't accurately convey the truth. There are even places in the suttas where the Buddha says, and I'm paraphrasing, "whatever ideas you have about it can't accurately describe the fact."

So if we're letting ourselves get caught in holding to our ideas, or fearing because of our ideas, and holding back from just surrendering into this moment, we're creating a prison for ourselves, keeping ourselves in limitation. And if we're willing to just simply keep bringing kind, full, fresh awareness to whatever the moment's presenting—you don't have to figure it all out, you don't have to evaluate what that means in terms of your concepts about yourself, just meet this moment as it is—then what happens is the safety nets begin to fray.

And we all, at different times, will hit what I call the wall. I don't know what you call it. It's like a wall where either the mind says, "That's it"—what I said before—"I can't keep going if it means getting rid of this. I didn't come in for that to go away. I didn't come into practice to lose that." That's hitting the wall.

Or it can be another kind of wall where things have gotten good enough. "This is nice. This is good enough. I'm not suffering so much anymore." This is actually a very interesting wall because it can take a while before you recognize it. You think, "Well, okay, I'm a little more compassionate. I can sit more easily. Anger doesn't come up so much. That really deep suffering from the past that I was dealing with, I'm more at ease with it. Okay, good enough."

I learned—I was just teaching a retreat in Italy, and really, there are some great gestures with the hands that have meaning. And what we learned was like, ciao.

"Ciao" with the suffering, and I've done enough practice. This is another comfort zone. Can we keep looking? Never be content with less than freedom.

And these are not mistakes or bad points in practice. These are great, insightful, important times—when you feel, not just that moment of "Oh, I'm so tired, I don't want to do it anymore." We all have that. I'm talking about the moment that's a little deeper. It's got... what? Really letting go of that sense of myself? Can't do it. Don't want to do it. This whatever is more important than freedom.

I really like it if I can actually put it in that phrase in my mind—that wakes me up. Oh, I'm saying that getting to go to sleep at ten o'clock at night is more important than freedom. I'm saying that being able to still be grouchy is more important than freedom, whatever it is. Then it becomes a very interesting place where the safety net's fraying, and that's going to open us to deeper levels of trust, deeper levels of taking refuge in our true home.

In fact, for me, I would say all of my practice, all my significant moments, have been like a series of small deaths. Which, if you told me when I started that's what I was getting in for, I don't think it would have really inspired me. So I hope it doesn't have that effect on you. But a series of small deaths of who I thought I was. I didn't even know that's who I thought I was until it started to die. And I would experience it as a kind of anguish, a real sense of loss. And on the other side of that, a great relief—like a burden being lifted, a sense of aliveness more intense—until the next small death or big death.

For each of us, there might be a different story about what that death is, a personality of what I'm holding on to. I keep saying relationship—that's just a big one people hold to. But the holding is what goes. It doesn't mean the relationship goes, or whatever we're holding to. It's the holding that goes. We experience it as a loss, as a death, and then that loss of attachment opens us up to connectedness with everything. It's so wonderful. We see how limiting that attachment was, that idea of ourselves, that concept of what is possible.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "To be fully alive, fully human, and completely awake is to be continually thrown out of the nest. To live fully is to be always in no man's land, to experience each moment as completely new and fresh. To live is to be willing to die over and over again. From the awakened point of view, that's life. Death is wanting to hold on to what you have and to have every experience confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together."

If I'm really honest and I'm not feeling particularly connected, that's how I think of my idea of enlightenment. I'm going to get enlightened. I'm going to feel confirmed and congratulated and really together. But freedom is not a self-improvement project. We want to be perfect, but we just keep seeing our imperfections, and there's no room to get away from that—no exit, nowhere to run. That is when the sword turns into a flower. When we stick with what we see, when we feel what we feel, from that we begin to connect with our own wisdom mind.

That is really our practice—to stick with what's happening, to feel what we feel. There's nowhere to run and no need to run. And by not running, we really deeply connect, over and over, with our own wisdom mind. Grounded in our motivation not to get, not to be something special, but simply to love awareness. A motivation to be content with awareness, with presence, with this moment—to be fully present and accepting of it just as it is.

Even when it's really hard, when we really hate this moment, when we think, "How can my true home possibly be in this moment? I don't think so. It has to be somewhere else"—can we find in ourselves enough motivation simply to take refuge again in the possibility of this wisdom mind being present here and now?

I just want to end with the close of that poem from Ajahn Chah:

Buddha is the ground of all being, the truth of the unmoving mind. So the Buddha was not enlightened in India. In fact, he was never enlightened, never born and never died. And this timeless Buddha is our true home, our abiding place. When we take refuge in this Buddha, Dharma and Sangha, all things in the world become free for us. All things in the world become our teacher, proclaiming the true nature of life.

So can we take refuge in this Buddha, this Dharma, this Sangha, this moment?

CHAPTER 338

Benefits of Mettā Practice

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson addresses common doubts practitioners have about mettā (loving-kindness) meditation, particularly those coming from a Vipassanā background. She explains how mettā practice unexpectedly complements insight meditation by revealing the truth of non-separation from a different angle. While Vipassanā shows emptiness through observing arising and passing phenomena, mettā practice demonstrates how our habitual patterns of desire and aversion actively create the false sense of separation that causes suffering.
>
> Wilson draws on her experience practicing mettā intensively for seven to eight weeks, as well as time spent in Burma experiencing a natural field of mettā among practitioners there. She clarifies that mettā is not about creating a special emotional state but rather cultivating wise intention toward connection. The practice combines this inclination of mind with samādhi (concentration), using phrases directed toward benefactors, friends, neutral persons, and eventually all beings.
>
> The talk explores the near enemy of mettā (desire and attachment that masquerades as love) and the far enemy (ill will), showing how the practice purifies these mental habits. Wilson emphasizes that mettā does not mean blindly liking everything or approving harmful behavior—rather, it allows clearer seeing from a place of connection rather than fear. She offers practical examples for daily life, from traffic situations to supermarket lines, demonstrating how mettā is accessible in every moment of mindful awareness.

A lot of times when we have begun introducing this formal metta practice in a Vipassana retreat, a question that many people bring up—those who have been doing Vipassana and haven't really done the metta practice much—are kinds of doubts about the usefulness or validity of the loving-kindness practice.

So some questions that come up, and they came up in my own mind before I practiced loving-kindness intensively, are: Are we just saying affirmations? Is this sort of a feel-good practice? We're trying to talk our way into a nice mental state—which, in a way, you could say that. And what does that have to do with liberation? What does that have to do with freedom?

And also, another aspect is if we talk about the fact that there is no me, no self, no separate, distinct I, what's all this "I'm sending wishes of loving-kindness to you and you"? It seems that would accentuate a sense of me and other that on the one hand you're telling us doesn't exist. So sometimes people get confused.

The confusion, of course, turns out to be not in the actual practice, but as always with confusion, in our thinking about it—rather than actually just doing the practice. Which is really the way it is with all of our confusions about greed, hatred, and delusion, or not-self, or impermanence. It's only confusing when we're thinking about it. When we're actually experiencing, it's just how things are. Not much else to say.

Anyway, I was actually quite surprised, in a way, to discover experientially when I first practiced loving-kindness for a period of seven or eight weeks. It's a practice that we do intensively in the same way that we do Vipassana intensively—in other words, saying the metta phrases to the different categories through the sittings, through the walkings, from the moment you get up until the moment you go to bed. So it's an intensive practice, just as Vipassana is. And it's a different practice from Vipassana. So we're just introducing it here.

What I was really amazed to discover through my experience is that the practice of metta seemed to me to round out the wisdom of non-separation—the fact that we're not really separate. Insight comes through our Vipassana practice in many different ways, at many different times. The fact of our essential oneness, or you could say the vast emptiness—the natural expression of which in our actions, in our speech, in our mind, the natural expressions of either emptiness or non-separation, two sides of the same coin—the natural expressions are metta, friendliness, connectedness, or compassion, or empathetic joy, sympathetic joy, or equanimity. Those are the four so-called Brahmaviharas, or divine abodes of the heart, of the mind. And while they are mental states, they are varying expressions of the truth of our non-separation, so to speak.

And I was really surprised and happy to discover through my experience that while I knew that the emptiness of not a separate self, I knew that to be true, the constantly arising and passing experience—I knew that from one level. Knowing it, not just intellectually, but from our experience, from the Vipassana—there's another way that the practice of loving-kindness rounded that out, came in with that information, that experience from another angle, so to speak.

So that in the moment of experiencing just a simple sense of metta, not thinking about it but just experiencing it, in that moment—even if it was brought about by my focus on the phrase, "May you..." I think I'm sending it to a benefactor, so I have the sense that I'm sending to a benefactor these good wishes. In that moment of connection, the sense of me and other falls away, and there's just simple friendliness, kindness, however you experience it.

And over and over, I found that through the practice in my life as well, the sense, the false sense of separation, the habits of mind that are moment to moment creating the false sense of separation that we react out of so much—they start to be broken down through the practice of loving-kindness. It's really quite wonderful. And we don't notice that it's happening right away. That's a plug to keep doing it.

Metta is an expression of our essential oneness. We experience our essential completeness.

What I think the metta practice does on a practical level—this formal practice, the way we're teaching it here—is that it helps us not to deny the habits of mind that create our sense of separation, our sense of needing something to protect. The metta practice actually helps us see through these habits of mind. Because in practicing metta, we actually feel how these habits of mind—basically our old friends greed, aversion, and delusion—create separation when we're buying into them. And we feel how when we're not buying into those mental states, but rather tuning into connection, simple friendliness, that sense of separation just isn't there, because it isn't being created in the moment.

This, I think, is one of the most key, even liberating, ways of understanding the sense of separation or alienation, fragmentation, loneliness—whatever words might fit your own particular experience of it. The separation, the sense of someone separate here that I need to protect by getting what I want and keeping everything I don't want away—that's actually just a misperception of how things are. It's not something that's real, this separate me, that either vipassana or metta practice is somehow going to dismantle, leaving us frightened because something got taken apart and now how will we function? Rather, metta helps us see how the sense of fragmentation and separation is simply created in each moment by our habits of mind.

Our misery stems from the misconception that we're separate. Certainly it looks as though I am separate from other people and other phenomena. And as long as we think we are separate, we're going to suffer. We suffer because we feel that we have to defend ourselves. We feel that we have to find something in this world that will make us happy. And then the habits of mind—wanting, needing, thirsting desire, as well as the habit of ill will and aversion, keeping things away—arise. Whether these are turned outwards or inwards doesn't really matter. Those habits arise out of this sense that I can find something in the world to make me happy, and I can keep away everything that's going to make me suffer.

Certainly speaking for myself, when I'm not somewhat awake, when I'm not really paying attention—when, say, I'm hurrying around from place to place—what's the habitual response? If there's something that I want and somebody's in front of me, the sense is they're in the way of what I need to make me happy. If there's something I don't want and I see someone coming that's going to cause me trouble, the sense is they're trouble—get them away, I need to protect myself. It's just the habitual response when we're not even a little bit awake.

When we're so self-absorbed, basically referring everything that happens back to me—as I said the other night, me, me, me, my, my, my, how does this affect me, how can I be happy—when we do that, each moment that we're buying into it is a moment when the sense of separation and needing to protect feels very real.

I just want to say that non-separation doesn't mean we can't tell the difference between me and you. It doesn't mean the visual field gets all blurred together and you can't tell which is the curry and which is the rice. Sometimes people think, how am I going to function? How do I know whether I should be the one sitting in meditation or the one talking? It doesn't mean that. Useful distinctions still apply. But it means we don't have to buy into the absolute separation that our minds create around it.

So one thing the metta practice helps us do is begin to recognize more consciously what the space of simple connection feels like, and to recognize how accessible it actually is. Because metta practice is not about creating some rarefied, amazing, unitive state that is different from our daily experience. That would be nice, and sometimes a state comes that's so strong it feels really different from our regular experience. But what's most important to recognize is that metta is simply about connection, and it's part of our daily experience because it's really a truer expression of how things are than greed or fear or ill will.

The metta practice is helping us consciously learn how to recognize connection, have a bit more confidence that it's actually possible to access consciously, and begin to have some faith, some trust in the experience of metta, of friendliness, of loving-kindness itself. Then we begin to experientially—even if it doesn't go through our intellect—have more consciously the experience that we're not so separate.

It's like that question someone brought up a few mornings ago during the meditation period about noticing that sense of synchronicity as a retreat goes on. I think it's quite applicable here, because when we're not lost in greed and aversion, we actually notice how much more our energies all blend together, affect each other. Actually, no one here can really do something that doesn't have some effect on other people. That's just how it is. So we start to see that more. We start to believe it, to trust it more.

And we practice simply because we're so used to looking through the lens of separation that we need to give ourselves a little oomph to trust in the other way.

This is from Nyoshul Khen, who was a wonderful Tibetan teacher, from a chapter of his book:

The chapter is called "Basic Buddha Dharma" – just the basics. And he says the difference between the impure and the pure mind, the deluded mind and the enlightened mind, is mainly a difference of narrowness and openness. In our deluded state, our mind or heart – mind-heart is the same word in these languages – our mind is extremely narrow. For example, we live for ourselves and rarely consider the infinity of sentient beings. Conversely, the enlightened Buddha mind is one who considers the infinity of sentient beings rather than being solely concerned with her own ego and individuality. Thus, the entire path from an ordinary being to Buddhahood is the gradual opening of the mind, of the heart. The concept of growth is used here: moving from a narrow attitude focused principally on oneself to an open, loving heart whose scope instinctively encompasses the infinity of sentient beings.

But we start from where we are. We don't have to think that starting from here we should naturally and completely be able to open our heart and mind at all times, in all situations, completely considering the infinity of sentient beings. We need to be realistic and start where we are.

And that's the point of this practice, of the metta practice. Because as Guy mentioned last night, when we really look with the eyes of wisdom, we come upon quite deeply the essential basic goodness that you could say is the truest expression of who we are, of our nature. I know everyone here has touched that many times. We all do. It's not so esoteric. And because of that, I don't think anyone would be here on a spiritual path at all, practicing so intensively as this, if we didn't have some inner knowing of this truth on some level.

A lot of our knowing is intellectual, of course, but not all of it. What practice does is help us continually make that move from intellectually knowing something – which is the beginning – to knowing it from the gut, from our experience in ourselves. That's very different, because that's when we can begin to respond to ourselves and respond to life and respond to situations from the deep knowing of non-separation, from knowing that the power of friendliness, of connectedness, of compassion is much stronger than the power of fear and the power of greed.

In my own mind, I think I know that. And sometimes I really know that. But there are other times when the instinctive reaction is, "No, I don't like that, get away. That's going to keep me safe." So we don't judge that, but that's why we practice. That's why I practice anyway. You find out why you practice and see – it could be for something different.

But it's not to create something new. Metta practice, like Vipassana, is not creating something new. It's simply uncovering the most natural context, the most natural expression of the truth of who we are. And then learning to trust it enough to act from that place.

So just a little bit to describe what we mean by the mental state of metta, loving-kindness itself. I think it's really simple – just friendliness, kindness in a very natural way. Take the example: if you walk outside and under normal circumstances, no big things going on for you, and there's a couple of small children just playing and laughing and throwing a ball back and forth – under normal circumstances, if it doesn't trigger some traumatic memory or something – we just normally feel a sense of friendliness, of connection with the kids. We don't have to think about it. We don't have to dredge it up: "Oh yeah, cute little kids, isn't it nice?" Or take a puppy if you hate children. Take a puppy. Take a kitten. Baby animals have that quality – it's hard to get too judgmental.

But it's natural. That's a natural expression of metta. Simple connectedness. It doesn't have any big deal around it. You don't want something back from the children or from the puppy. You don't say, "Well, they're cute, but if they had on different colored overalls, they'd be even cuter." It's just quite a natural response of the heart – a kind of generosity. You wish them well. That's really the essence of metta.

It's more a matter of learning how we can elicit metta, how to move towards connectedness, toward the natural heart and open-hearted generosity, rather than moving towards what creates in our minds and hearts the sense of fear or wanting or separation.

Metta is also inclusiveness. It includes all aspects. It doesn't just see a part of a situation, and I'll talk more about that in a minute. It also has a real spacious quality, not narrowing down. Just to see the children playing—it's really lovely. There's a sense of connectedness, of wishing them well. You don't feel tight and closed then. It's just kind of open. And in that space, in that moment, if someone else wanders into your field of vision, it's most likely that sense of connectedness and well-wishing naturally extends to them. Just at first, before we have time to think of a reason not to. It just naturally extends. It's kind of inclusive.

I was recently in Burma, both practicing for a few weeks and also teaching up in the north. The teaching was fine—it was like a regular retreat for Westerners. But what was really a transformative experience for me was the time we spent not teaching, but hanging out with our Burmese friends: the people who were helping to run the retreat, cooking for the retreat, translating, and living in the monastery in northern Burma.

The experience was one of simple, non-judging friendliness—really metta. I felt that for the two weeks I was there, I was truly encased, surrounded in a field of metta. Just a simple friendliness that was welcoming to whoever came. It wasn't like it was specifically directed to me. I remember at one point Steve Smith, who I was teaching with and who's been there for many years, said, "Oh Carol, the people here really love you." And I said, "Yeah, well, it's my impression they really love everybody. It's got nothing specifically to do with me."

What was so nice about it is that it's just low-key, natural acceptance. Somebody comes. They're really happy to see you. And just however you are is fine. That's what's so beautiful about that friendliness. However the Burmese people were was fine. They live together. They know each other's little peccadilloes. They laugh about it. It's fine. And however you are is fine.

One man, the brother of one of the Sayadaws, one of the teachers there, was born deaf and mute, unable to speak. He must be in his fifties or sixties now. He's been living there, and his brother sort of takes care of him. But he's great because without hearing—I mean, you can see, you can get around fine—without hearing or speaking, with his hands he's like the most expressive person I ever met. He has just one little hand gesture that describes each person. If he has to talk about someone, someone has curly hair, he'll be describing the person that way. Or glasses, or if they're always frowning. Whatever it is that describes them.

And there's no sense of judgment about picking out that person. If they're really thin, if they're really fat. Whereas here, I could really imagine somehow easily getting into, "Is that what he thinks about me? Is that the main thing that he picks out about me?" All those questions. None of that there. Just this real acceptance that's actually transformative to be around—an atmosphere where it's that simple, that day-to-day and non-judging. And it feels just normal.

Like, it's, oh, this is the way we could live. This is really a possibility. And I'm not saying everyone is happy-happy. There's a lot of difficulty, a lot of suffering, a lot of problems. I'm not saying people don't have arguments. Just normal people. But there really is a deep sense of connecting, and once someone there has met you, they don't forget your name and they don't forget your face. I see how, for me, I really have to concentrate to remember names and faces. Sure, I meet a lot of names and faces, but so do they. And there's this sense of presence and connectedness that's very powerful. But it's simple. And that's the thing I want to bring out about mettā, about loving-kindness. It's just this natural, simple connectedness that we all know, that we all can begin to have more trust in.

I think I said the other day in the mettā sitting that technically, the proximate cause of mettā arising as a mental state—friendliness, connectedness, non-judging acceptance—the proximate cause, meaning the immediate preceding thing for mettā to arise, the strongest cause, is seeing the good. Seeing the wholesome or the beautiful in a being, anyone, ourselves or another.

And that's true, but it doesn't mean that we're blind, or that in seeing the good we don't see anything else—which is a lot of our intellectual or philosophical problem. We think, "Oh, this is just a diluted, mushy, soft-filter gauze on the lens, seeing the world through rose-colored glasses, and I can't trust that because there are problems, there are difficulties." Just turn it on yourself. How easy is it for us when we say, okay, sit here and really focus on the good in yourself, really let it in, do that with full commitment? It's hard, isn't it? It certainly isn't something we have a lot of practice in.

So seeing the good is the cause for this natural connectedness, this spontaneous friendliness to arise. Take the little kids again—you're just seeing their natural playfulness, the innocence of children, and boom, we're there. But it doesn't mean we can't see the whole picture. It means we actually, because of the connection, can respond more appropriately.

Say at first, the sweet kids, the innocents—we're really connected. And then we start to see that one of them is actually a major brat. One kid is really taunting the other, not actually hurting, but really being bratty. But we see that from the place of connection. It doesn't hide what's going on. From the place of connection, rather than saying, "Oh, that kid's a brat, just throw him away, forget him," we can actually, if intervention is necessary, intervene from the place of connection rather than from the place of rejection, rather than from the place of judgment.

We, if anything, see more clearly when we're connected in a non-judging way. We see more clearly the whole picture. It's in no way a one-sided blindness. Aversion is a one-sided blindness, and desire is a one-sided blindness. With desire, we only see what we want, and anything else is in the way. With aversion, we see what we don't want. And as Guy said, it can be very skillful—as someone said this morning—to actually notice that there are other things arising in the universe than what I don't like and what I don't want. It really helps to balance.

Mettā actually works in that. Mettā is brought about by tuning into the good, but it's not at all one-sided. It's very strong and very powerful. Because we don't put someone in a box. With mettā, we see the whole picture. We don't put them in a box. "Oh, they do this bad thing, that's who they are." Or, "Oh, they do this good thing, they couldn't possibly do anything bad because they're so wonderful." You see the whole picture from the place of connection rather than from the place of fear.

So the mettā practice itself, the way we're doing it here, it's not about creating and holding onto a particular emotional feeling. And this, I think, is very tricky for us to get, practice-wise, because again, we are so result- and achievement-oriented. We feel like we need a little bit of feedback that something's happening. That's fair enough, until we have some inner trust from our own experience. And if you just sat here and said these phrases from now until a month from now, and you never felt one thing ever, it would be understandable if you had some doubts about the efficacy of the practice. So I'm saying it's natural—we want some feedback.

But it isn't about that—saying these phrases and focusing so that we're going to get this one particular feeling, and then we're going to feel better and better and better, and that feeling is just going to stay stronger and stronger, and we're going to live in a cloud of metta from now on. I think you know that I'm exaggerating. But just check it out. The next time you're doing the metta practice and you're feeling frustrated, look closely. What are you looking for? What do you think ought to be happening?

In the formal practice, it doesn't matter if we have what we would call an emotional feeling at all. It really doesn't matter. Because, as I said, the essence of metta is connection. It's simply about connecting—either with ourselves, with the sense of the being that we're sending it to, the phrases, all beings, whatever. Just that connection, which means a moment without aversion, without desire, without delusion. Sounds a lot like mindfulness, doesn't it? And the two are very closely connected. Simply a moment of connection, where we are directing attention deliberately towards that connection and away from the tendencies of mind of greed and aversion that create separation.

So we're doing this deliberately. It's a deliberate direction or inclination of mind towards connection. Basically, wise intention—the second stage of the Eightfold Path, wise thought. And the Buddha, when he talks about wise thought or right thought, specifically says that the antidote or the wise thought you substitute for thoughts of ill will is thoughts of friendliness, thoughts of metta, thoughts of kindness. It's really quite useful and practical.

So what we're doing is cultivating and strengthening the inclination of mind, the intention of mind towards connection. It's not always going to feel like a lot's going on, but each time we direct it to, say, the benefactor, and we deliberately feel a sense of their good quality, offer the phrase "may you be free from inner and outer harm"—that's a sense of inclining the mind toward connection. You may feel it more or less strongly. The intention may be more or less strong. But that's not what's so important. What's so important is that cultivation of wise intention. Basically breaking the habit of seeing how we're separate.

"Oh yes, they're really so good. I could never be like them. In fact, they're so good it's almost an insult to them for me to even be offering them loving-kindness, so paltry and feeble is my loving-kindness." You can take even the good and create separation out of it. So we're just inclining towards the connection.

The way we're teaching it here also, the inclination, the cultivation of intention, is combined with a concentration or samadhi practice. Hence the focus on the image of the person and the repetition, one at a time, of each of the phrases, just coming back to that over and over. I think I mentioned last night that the samadhi aspect that begins to come in gives a real steadiness, a power, a confidence to the recognition or the intention of mind of metta, the recognition of what that connectedness feels like. It just really empowers it in a way.

So this particular form of the practice brings these two things together: the wise inclination of mind, wise intention, together with a concentration, an absorption practice. In all different aspects of Buddhism, in the different schools, there may be many different practices that also cultivate loving-kindness and compassion and the other brahmaviharas. I'm not saying one's better than another. They might bring out different aspects. This is just the way, in this Theravada tradition, we're teaching it to you as we've learned it. So it combines these two things.

Now, some of the difficulties that come up in our metta practice are the same difficulties that come up in vipassana, in terms of coming back to the breath. The mind just basically doesn't want to do it. It's like a two-year-old having a temper tantrum—it doesn't want to come back. It wants to run off and do its own thing. So we've talked about that, and it's just the same exact thing going on.

Another aspect that comes up—that we sometimes think is in the way of the metta practice but is actually part of the purification, the transformation of our confused, deluded habits into a strengthening of wise intention—is that we really deeply experience at times the habits and reactions of our mind and heart that block, that get in the way, that obstruct the experience of connectedness. Which are, guess what: desire and aversion. They basically block our experience of anything that is more deeply true.

But it's very easy to think that something's wrong because you're trying to send metta to yourself and you keep running into loathing, or anger, or just impatience with the practice. Or you're trying to send metta to a good friend and you end up fantasizing about the incredible vacation the two of you could take together when you get out of retreat. How did I get here? I'm just trying to send some kind wishes to this person.

But this is really an intrinsic aspect of the loving-kindness practice, because in cultivating, in inclining the mind towards wise intention, we will necessarily run into the habits of falling into our unwise ways of thinking—the desire, the wanting, and the ill will, the aversion. In fact, it's almost as if the purification of the metta practice highlights these habits of separation in big relief, so to speak. And instead of thinking there's something wrong with that, if we can actually recognize what's happening, then we also begin to see how these habits of mind—of desire and ill will—create suffering and separation. And this is really freeing. I'm serious.

This is really where I learned so much about freedom and non-separation through the metta practice: by seeing experientially how desire and yearning could be mistaken for metta, except that we start to suffer and feel separate, and how ill will is actually creating a separation that doesn't need to be there. So it's fascinating.

I want to say a little about those. In the classic way of teaching this practice, from the commentaries of the Theravada tradition—this isn't so much in the suttas but in the commentaries—when talking about the practice and the state of friendliness, kindness, spacious metta, they describe two mental states called the near enemy and the far enemy. Each of the Brahma Viharas has a near enemy and a far enemy. I'll just talk about metta tonight.

The far enemy is sort of obvious. We have these warrior-like terms—"enemy"—because the Buddha came from the warrior clan. And if you read the suttas, really a lot of the metaphors are very much warrior and battle prone. That was just the culture. The far enemy is the opposite, basically ill will. That makes sense. We can understand. As Guy said, if there's ill will, there's not metta, and vice versa.

The near enemy is a state that can actually be confused for metta when we're not quite paying attention. And that near enemy is sometimes called lust. I would say it's more desire—affection, but just desire in itself, a kind of yearning, craving, that oddly enough we can confuse with loving-kindness. And loving-kindness practice tends to highlight it, to bring it up.

You might notice when you're practicing, say to yourself or to a friend, and you start just connecting. You really feel the sense of their goodness, the quality about them that you can connect with. You're offering the phrases, just wishing them well. And the desire can creep in in many ways. It can creep in about wanting to feel the metta a little better, wanting to feel good, wanting them to know and feel the metta that you're sending them. Wanting the metta to somehow fix them or change them or make them happy. Have you had that? If you do it well enough, then they'll really be happy always. Sometimes people want to leave a retreat and go call up the person and say, "How are you doing the last few days? Have you noticed any difference?" This is a move from metta to wanting. It's a little subtle, but after a while, not so subtle. It feels different.

Or what's more common even is sending the wishes but suddenly you start wanting something back. I first noticed it when I was sending metta to a good friend and suddenly I started noticing how I wished she would call me a little bit more. We really ought to spend a little bit more time together. I wonder if she really feels the same for me that I'm feeling for her. And this really easily creeps in when it's family members or partners or children—the "what if" aspect. Real metta doesn't have conditions. It doesn't have that neediness that wants something back.

It doesn't have that sense of "I'll love you because you love me." It doesn't ultimately have anything to do with making ourselves feel better. In that moment, it's just an open-hearted generosity of heart. Of course, the paradox is that in that moment we feel great, but we're not doing it to feel great. That's the trick. In that moment of just really wishing someone well, it's completely spacious, non-needy, non-wanting.

Play with this. Say with someone that you're really close to—a partner is a good one—where you can subtly feel the difference when you're just wishing them well. You might see areas where they're suffering or areas that are difficult, but you really can connect to that love and wishing them well. Even when you might have something you want to tell them, it's out of a place of metta. And then notice when it subtly changes. You might be saying the same thing. You might be wanting to share with them the same insight you had about them. But suddenly, it's so that they could treat you a little bit better. Notice the difference in how that feels. You'll get a sense of the difference between metta and wanting, between metta and yearning.

Another way we get confused is when we're feeling that sense of not being enough, of insufficiency or isolation, and the thought of metta as love becomes more a sense of needing—love as needing something to complete us. But we still think of it as love, a kind of yearning. And if we're not careful, we can call that love and equate it with metta. But it's not the same at all.

This is from Mark Epstein: "When we're plagued with a sense of unworthiness, it's easy to feel deficient, not enough, and to think that the love of another person is the only possible solution to this plight. Meditation tends to work against this assumption of deficiency by restoring the capacity for connection from the inside. In doing this, it challenges the common assumption of our culture about where connection comes from. In the Buddhist view, connection is already present. We're not as separate and distinct as we think we are. Connection is our natural state. We just have to learn to permit it, to allow it."

Desire, insufficiency, neediness—the Buddha called it a "maker of limits." It constricts and narrows our heart and mind. The friendliness, the generosity of heart, of metta, of simple connection and acceptance, opens us to spaciousness, to vastness. You can almost feel this experientially.

Aversion being the far enemy of metta, ill will being the far enemy—that's not hard to see. What can be difficult for us is to really trust that the way of connection, the power of friendliness, of acceptance, of loving-kindness, is really stronger and more of a protection for us than fear and ill will and anger are. It's easy for me to think that ill will is a natural response to something unpleasant. Of course it should be kept away from me. Who wants to connect with something that's unpleasant or scary, or somebody that I don't like?

One thing to remember is that metta doesn't necessarily mean liking, and it doesn't mean approving of harmful or difficult or unpleasant behaviors. It simply means connecting with what is unpleasant rather than fearing, and seeing in that connection a way for a more appropriate response.

I remember some years ago I was teaching a retreat that had some very active environmentalists in it. I was teaching with Sharon Salzberg, and in the early days we were in a group describing the loving-kindness practice, which we would introduce in the afternoon, much as we do here. Some people in the group, not having practiced the loving-kindness yet but just hearing about it, were saying, "Well, I don't want to—it's too mushy. I don't want to practice that. I need my anger. I don't want to lose my edge." That sense of needing anger.

But I think we can confuse anger with discrimination. Actually, when Guy talked about aversive types and greed types, the so-called flip side of the aversive type is discriminating wisdom. And myself being an aversive type, one thing about being aversive is you also think you're right. You see things clearly. It just has this tinge of negativity that's completely extra. And it doesn't always see things clearly, but it really thinks it does.

But it's quite possible to have a very incisive, discriminating wisdom together with connectedness and friendliness.

It doesn't have to be fueled by aversion. But often we think the anger is our protection—we don't want to let it go.

In this retreat, I remember one person in particular who was very strong about not wanting to do the metta practice, and who had been very active for years in environmental work. At the end of the retreat, it was one of the most... I don't know, really touching experiences of my teaching life. This person was weeping, basically, and said that through the years, anger had really been fueling him in the environmental work he had done. He felt that it had served him. But he was also seeing that he couldn't just isolate the anger to when he needed it to do the work—that it was spilling over into his family, into his life, and basically eating him up from the inside.

And that's what happens, you know. And just seeing that there's another way—how to be clear, how to be strong, without making who we don't agree with or what we don't like into "the other." We take what we don't like about someone, put them in a box, and they become the other, the enemy. That thing we don't like defines them. And it's so hard sometimes to find the courage, or even how to connect, without denying the difficult—but to also see that there's something else.

As Thich Nhat Hanh talks about, bringing up seeds of joy in the difficult doesn't deny the difficult; it just sees there's something human somewhere about this person. We start from that connection, and then we can spread out and see.

Often, that person is ourselves. That's why it's very important to just find one little kind thought you had a year and a half ago. Think about that and really let it in. It doesn't take much to make a crack in that web of otherness and begin to relate.

I read a little incident in a biography of Martin Luther King that really spoke to me—how he had this deep commitment to nonviolence, and it manifested really by not making people the other. So this incident: I think he was on a plane in the early 1960s, and a Justice Department lawyer was talking to him, trying to convince Dr. King that one of his advisors, a New York attorney who was close to him, had previously had some kind of communist connections—or maybe once he went to a communist meeting, who knows. If you remember the 1960s, the government was really paranoid about anything that had anything to do with communism.

So this Justice Department lawyer was really grabbing Dr. King's ear, telling him, "This guy's a communist, he's really bad for you, you can't keep using him as an advisor, he's going to make everything you do suspect," and on and on. Dr. King was listening very politely, taking in what he said, but clearly not agreeing.

And suddenly the lawyer got it. Just like a light went off. He said, "Oh. This is a man who is so committed to nonviolence, so committed to the path of love, to not ever choosing hatred as a motive"—which I read somewhere else Dr. King once said. That even if the worst segregationist church bomber were to come up to Dr. King in a moment of sincerity, wanting to talk to him or even shake his hand, he would never shut him away. So he's not going to make someone like that the other person. How could the lawyer expect him to say he wasn't going to have anything to do with one of his friends because the guy went to some communist meeting sometime?

I just love that—that sense that you don't make anyone the other, while doing everything you can from that place of connectedness to try to change harmful, really harmful, terrible behavior. But you don't reject the person.

So that's, to me, one of the more powerful aspects of the strength, the power that can come to our own motivations, our own actions and responses in the world—to ourselves and to others—when we can consciously access connectedness rather than believing that fear and separation is our best protection.

Try it. In little ways, you know. Don't go for the biggest one. Try it when you're in line at the supermarket and the person in front of you is in the express lane with fourteen items when you're only allowed to have ten, and you're in a hurry. How many times do you count their items and think, "Don't they know? Can't they see?" Instead, just try and connect with some aspect of them. Could be me next time.

Or when you're in traffic and you're really in a hurry, and the light is just turning orange, and the car in front of you stops—and easily three more cars could have made it through that light, but that car in front of you stopped. Can you meet that? Meet that person as a person? Or are they the other, blocking traffic, a complete nincompoop?

Just practice in little ways. And it's amazing, honestly. The first time I'll connect, the first phrase will go, "May you be free from danger." Yeah, right. Give me a break.

You know, the mind is saying, "Don't even try. You're being ridiculous." Just try again. Try again. And I often find that by the second repetition of the phrases, it's really like "us" instead of "me and them." Just for a moment. It's not a huge thing, but it is a huge thing.

Just practice it in little ways here—in the food line, when the person in front of you is going through the door so mindfully and you just want to wring their neck. See if you can feel a sense of appreciation for their mindfulness rather than thinking it means something bad about you.

So with this practice, we start where we are. And mindfulness is also a place where loving-kindness, connection, and acceptance show up. Metta, as this aspect of non-judging connectedness, is actually intrinsic to a moment of sati, a moment of mindfulness, isn't it? It's not like you're only going to experience metta if you're sitting here saying, "May I be happy." We experience it often.

Notice how you meet a moment of your experience as you go through the day. Maybe just reflecting on the difficult things that came up today—how did you meet them? Boredom, discomfort, anxiety, fear, sleepiness. How did you meet the beautiful things? Compassion, gratitude, joy, calm, peace. Did we make those unpleasant things the other? Did we make ourselves somehow bad for experiencing them? Did we set up a sense of separation when those things happened? Or did we simply meet it? "Oh yes, this too. Oh yes, awareness of discomfort is like this." That's metta in that moment.

The same with the beautiful, with the lovely, with the things that we like. We just meet it. "Oh yes, calm is like this. Joy is like this." And when it goes, that's fine. Or is there that clutching, that need to hold on to it to make ourselves feel okay? To give ourselves some sense of being somebody, or at least just being okay to ourselves.

So really seeing that a moment of metta is accessible anywhere—in that sense of friendliness and clear seeing, just with whatever's arising in the moment. And we start where we are.

Again, my friend in Burma, being held in that metta field, it gave me a really powerful experience. I was having a conversation one day with one of the men who was translating. At the end of the talks, Sayadaw would talk one day, and then either Steve Smith or I would talk another day. Steve calls them "fusion retreats," where you have the really straight Burmese-Asian teaching, and then we would modify it the way we teach here. And you don't really know how much we modify it. But as Gil said, the instructions are: you sit down, you're told how to note everything that arises, you're given a half-hour instruction, and that's it. You go do it.

And the Sayadaw would say things like, "Okay, anger arises, you note two or three times and then it's gone, and you go back to the breath." So in the questions afterward, I was talking to people and they were saying, "But in the West, you describe how to be with the anger and how to feel it in the body. You don't say it just goes away in two or three notes. And in fact, it doesn't go away in two or three notes." And we're saying, "Yes, we know it doesn't." And then we explain what you actually do—you feel it in the body, the usual approach, just like I gave you this morning.

I was talking to the translator later, and he said, "Wow, that was really interesting. That was really helpful. I'd like to hear more like that."

And I said, "Why?"

He says, "Well, you know..."

it doesn't go away for us in two or three notings either."

And I said, "Oh, I always thought maybe it did."

"Oh no, it doesn't go away for us." He said, "But then..." I asked, "So what do you do?" And he said, "Well, this is very helpful, these instructions."

I explained, "We talk about it because we Westerners get really upset with ourselves. We think we're doing something wrong. We beat ourselves up. We get really negative because it didn't go away."

And he says, "Oh, we just say, 'Oh well, never mind.'"

That's the difference. It's a huge difference.

So if we could do that—okay, so there's anger. We know that it's still going to go, "Oh well, never mind." Anger's here. And just keep on noticing it without adding any other story. We're not creating some separation about it. It's amazing.

But that's metta. Ajahn Sumedho, I love the way he describes it. He says metta does not necessarily mean liking anything. It simply means an attitude of not dwelling on the unpleasantness or the faults inside or outside of oneself. With metta, one isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, in a person, or in oneself, but without creating anything around it. It's just this—without creating anything around it. In space.

That's what I consider to be metta. Just connecting and not creating anything around the unpleasant. The same with the pleasant—totally connecting and not creating anything around it. That allows for clear seeing. There's no sense of separation, and not even a sense of incredible unity either, because that's already a thought. It's just how things are in a moment.

It's so simple, and it's really very available, very accessible in our moment-to-moment experience—in formal metta practice, in our vipassana practice, just in walking around. Just notice that simple connectedness, that friendliness that doesn't need to create anything around experience.

So I'll just end with a little short quotation.

CHAPTER 339

The Tides of Conceiving

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching on 'the tides of conceiving'—the endless mental activity of 'I am,' 'I am this,' 'I shall be'—and how these conceptual waves exhaust us and create suffering. Drawing from the suttas, she explores how insight (vipassanā) works not as a different way of thinking, but as a fundamentally different way of perceiving, illustrated beautifully through the metaphor of Magic Eye images where a 3D picture suddenly emerges from what appeared to be random patterns.

Wilson delves into the Buddhist psychology of perception (saññā), explaining how this mental factor colors our experience based on whatever mental states—craving, fear, ignorance—are present in consciousness. She examines how papañca (mental proliferation) operates: 'What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates.' This proliferation of associations and interpretations creates notions that 'assail and overwhelm' us, all stemming from mistaken perception and sakkāyadiṭṭhi (personality view).

The practical heart of the talk addresses how we can find peace through simple mindfulness at the sense doors, referencing the Bāhiya Sutta's famous instruction: 'In the seen is only the seen, in the heard only the heard.' Rather than fighting thoughts or trying to dismantle our personality view, Wilson suggests we simply recognize thoughts as passing phenomena—like sounds or sensations—without solidifying them into elaborate self-stories. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Chah and the Zen master Bankei, she points toward the ever-present silence beneath our mental chatter, where true peace resides.

What I want to talk about tonight comes from a line in one of the suttas that I really love, where the Buddha speaks of "the tides of conceiving." He says, "When the tides of conceiving no longer sweep over a person, he is called a sage at peace."

When I read this, I could just feel that sense of conceiving, conceiving all the time—how exhausting it is. It really does wash over us like a tide. And when it's not clung to, one truly does feel at peace.

The Buddha defines conceiving as: "I am" is a conceiving. "I am this" is a conceiving. "I shall be" or "I shall not be," "I shall be possessed of form" or "I shall not be possessed of form"—and on and on, ad nauseum. You get the idea. That's conceiving, the tides of conceiving.

I want to pick up on a couple of topics from Sylvia's talk last night: the nature of insight, as well as how we can either stop and see, or we can sit and tell ourselves stories—which is basically the tides of conceiving.

So how do we see through, stop clinging to, these tides of conceiving? It's not about getting in a fight with thought—"I am, I am not this"—and trying to stop that. That's just more of the same. But how do we make that shift that recognizes reality in a whole different way?

This takes us into the nature of insight. Rather than a different way of thinking, it's a whole different way of perceiving. Insight is something that arises from who knows where. And the way it seems to work, or the effect it seems to have, is that we're suddenly perceiving our experience differently. It's not necessarily that the situation has changed, but the way we perceive and understand the situation may have changed radically.

The best metaphor I know for this—and I think it's really quite apt—is those Magic Eye graphic designs. You know the ones that come in books, with two or three different colors of graphics that don't have any particular design? They're kind of hard on the eye. But if you hold them and look at them long enough so that your gaze relaxes—a steady gaze, but relaxed, not looking for something—then the tendency of the eyes to grasp onto each of the graphic symbols sort of softens, and suddenly a 3D-looking image springs out from the middle of that page. Two guys playing hockey, or a rocket ship, or dinosaurs, or whatever it is. And it's really clear. It's the kind of "Oh! How could I not have seen this? It's so obviously here." And then when your eyes either get tired or you start looking too hard again, it goes away and the graphics are back.

This is, I think, a really good metaphor for how insight works, how our perception shifts. The 3D picture—it's always there, isn't it? Somehow hidden within the multicolored graphics. It's not that when your eyes relaxed, something that wasn't there sprang out. It was already there. The perception just shifted.

And it doesn't mean that the original flat graphics with no particular picture is false either. They're both true. They're both part of that particular experience. Once we've seen the two guys playing hockey, even when we're not seeing it again—when we're only seeing the flatness—we know that is also part of it. And we don't have to get upset if someone comes and says, "No, I don't believe you." We don't have to get upset about it. We know it's true. But you can't give anyone else that experience either. All you can do is say, "Well, it's really true. And if you relax, or cross your eyes, or hold it to your nose, or whatever works for you, maybe you can see it." And maybe they can and maybe they can't. We can't affect it.

It's a little like the Buddha saying, "I can show you the path, but I can't walk it for you. This is really what is possible, but you have to try and see for yourself."

To me, insight is really like that. We learn to recognize the same situation in a different way. And even though that particular new way of recognizing may not last—have you noticed that? It's not like everything is altered solidly forever—the knowing of that new way of perceiving affects the mind stream. It has an effect on how we understand and how we respond to similar situations in the future. And it also makes it a little bit easier to perceive in this other way again.

from time to time, although not totally in our control, exerts an influence.

And I know we've all had experiences like this, or we wouldn't still be here plowing along. It can be quite simple. The experience of having a really strong pain in your knee—solid and unrelenting. You hate it, you just can't bear another sitting with it. What are they talking about, that pain is just sensations? It's clearly killing you.

And suddenly there's a sitting where something in the mind or heart lets go, and it's clearly intense vibrating sensations, but the sense of it as being pain, or my pain, or a problem, or solid—it's just gone. Gone. Just vibrating intensities, points of sensation. And it's really just like that for a while.

Then it goes back. The hockey players disappear and we're back to just the solid interlocking graphics. Where did they go? I want the points of intense, non-personal sensation back. But of course, as we know, clinging makes it impossible. Yet knowing that that was an experience, that that was a different perception of the same situation, changes something. Somewhere in our mindstream, in the way we approach our physical experience, there's a knowing that it can be different. It's not only one way.

It's not that either perception is the only truth. Sometimes our bodies feel solid. And if I go around saying, "I know it's nothing but arising and passing momentary sensations, just like bubbles arising and passing in emptiness"—I mean, it's been like that sometimes. It certainly doesn't feel like that right now, not in the least. But that doesn't make the other not true, and it doesn't mean this isn't true. They're just different perceptions.

So what starts to happen in the way we understand experience—the world, our mind, our body, all the five skandhas in practice—is rather than saying "this way I'm used to, solidity of body for example, is false, and what's really true is points of sensation in the night sky," we recognize that would be just letting go of one clinging and moving into another clinging. It's going to cause just as much suffering after a while.

Rather, it's saying: Oh, sometimes the perception is like this, sometimes the perception is like that. And maybe those aren't the only ways perception can be. Maybe I have no clue, and maybe I never will.

But we hate that. We want to have a clue. We want to know what it's like. And that's where we get into trouble—wanting to know and holding on to our descriptions of reality because somehow it seems safer or more solid or more comfortable. Basically, it seems in control, right? Isn't that what it all comes down to? If I can really say and name and describe how it is, I've got it under control. Too bad it doesn't work.

So I want to remind you, to read again, a quotation from Sayadaw U Janaka that I mentioned in one of my earlier talks. Because the whole point of insight practice is these insights—which, rather than something we get or hold on to, are just shifts of perception.

U Janaka says that we practice vipassanā in order to live in happiness, to be rid of suffering. That suffering arises due to the suffering mental states we get involved in. That our suffering mental states arise because of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, because of our personality-view belief, our clinging to our idea of our personality. And that the sakkāya-diṭṭhi arises because we have a mistaken understanding of the nature of our mental and physical experience.

So again, we're back to the point—or a point—that the way mindfulness practice works is by allowing us, moment after moment, to perhaps have a little bit more accurate perception of our mental and physical experience. This can then give rise to maybe an understanding that's a little bit closer to what's really going on than the understandings and descriptions we might be operating under without even knowing it.

Let me backtrack a little and start with a discussion of the mental factor of perception itself. In Buddhist psychology, the word perception is a translation of the Pāli word saññā. It refers to a very specific experience.

We've talked about the sense doors—I think Guy was discussing this—that there's the eye, and when there's a sense object, a sight arises, and consciousness of that sight arises. When those three come together, that's called sense contact. Seeing, basically. And in a moment of sense contact, arising with it is saññā, or perception.

Perception is really based largely in memory. It's our basic, instantaneous recognition of what's going on, of what's happening. So with seeing, there might be the perception of a person, for example—a woman, or "that person I know," the person's name.

Or we hear a sound, and there's the immediate perception of the frogs croaking out there. This just pretty much arises on its own. And sometimes, of course, it's accurate. Sometimes we really don't know what the sound is, and it might be perception just of not knowing. Sometimes the perception can be completely wrong. We hear a sound and think, "That's the frogs croaking," and it's not the frogs croaking at all—it's something else.

So that's one thing: there's perception, which may or may not be accurate. And then, as we all know by now, extremely rarely does it stop at perception. There's perception, and then out of that perception, just like that, there's thoughts, there's descriptions, there's interpretations. And in a moment of a simple perception, like a simple sound of the bell, the thoughts and interpretations and associations can create our whole world. Which is useful at times.

About fifteen minutes ago, when the bell rang outside, there was just that sound—gong—immediately the perception "bell ringing," and the association of the time: it means it's time for the talk, I'm a yogi, it's Spirit Rock on retreat, it's time to go in and have the talk, I know where I sit. All of that, the whole world springs into existence with the perception of that sound as the bell before the dharma talk. I mean, luckily it works a lot of the time. We all have similar associations and interpretations. It's useful. It's not like we want to get rid of that. We'd be a bit of a mess if we didn't have it: "What's that sound? What do I do now? Who am I? Where am I? What happened?" It wouldn't work.

So it's not like we're trying to throw that out. But it's helpful to see that it's not the absolute reality and truth of what's happening. It's an agreed-upon perception and description that's useful when we all know what's happening.

With our mindfulness, what we can begin to see is, first, that perception is not always accurate. And based on that inaccurate perception, descriptions and interpretations and assumptions can get really far afield. This is where we start to wonder why we're disconnected from things as they are.

An example of perception being inaccurate, distorted: in a moment of perception, that recognition is colored by whatever mental states happen to be arising in the mind, in the consciousness at that moment. The base distortion, of course, is ignorance—just not seeing clearly, not recognizing accurately. So hearing a sound, we don't really know. Have you noticed how our tendency is to make something up? The nearest thing, the closest thing.

For me, a good metaphor for inaccurate perception due to ignorance is if I take my glasses off and go around my house. I don't see very well without my glasses, and I can observe how the inaccurate perception then gives rise to mental states, associations, how we feel, and how it affects our whole state of being—based on something that isn't even true.

So if I go around without my glasses on—I really like the house to be clean and tidy—and when I don't have my glasses on and I walk around, I think, "Oh, everything looks really clean. I don't see any dust, I don't see any dirt. The windows look really clean, which is surprising since I haven't washed them in ten months. They look really good." And then I'll be reading or something, and I'll have my glasses on and walk into the same room and go, "Oh my God. I didn't see. Look at that. Look at all those spider webs. Look at all that stuff on the floor." And then I'll get really disgruntled and unhappy, whereas before I was feeling really spacious and peaceful and in harmony.

Just based on perceptions and what we do with them. If craving is in the mind, have you noticed when you're really desiring something, it looks much more attractive than after you don't want it anymore? Not only people, but food or some idea. It really colors things. Or if there's fear.

On a retreat recently, I was in Asia, and it was mostly sunny and warm during the days, but I noticed a couple of days when it was really quite cloudy—a very different atmosphere. The first day it was like that, I had been in a space where a lot of deep fear was coming up. Then I went outside to do my walking and it was cloudy, and immediately I felt that it was sinister. It felt unsafe. It's so cloudy, it's so dark, it's so sinister. I don't feel safe walking out here. I could see, oh wow, that's just the fear completely coloring the perception.

Then the next time it was cloudy, I was in a much more peaceful place, and I went outside and thought, oh, it's kind of cozy. It feels like a blanket, you know, the higher barometric pressure, and it makes all the sounds—of which there were many—much more muffled. This is really pleasant. This is really cozy.

We do that a lot. A lot.

Now, if we're aware of how the mental states in the mind are coloring the perception, and then how the mind is taking that perception and running with it into all the associations and feelings that grow from it, then that's fine. We can just see that's what's happening. Sort of like seeing, oh yeah, there's these hockey players, or there's not. When we don't realize that's what's happening—which is when we're telling ourselves stories and our energy is caught in those stories—that's when we really start suffering. Because mostly we end up trying to fix it or manipulate things to keep it the way we like it, when it's not even that way to begin with. We're just making it up.

That's my favorite line of Joseph Goldstein's: we're making it all up. Moment after moment, really quite literally, we're making it all up. Sometimes it's quite useful. But when we're really suffering, it's helpful to know that we're making it up. Because if we can start to see through how we're making it up, we don't have to keep believing it. And then we don't have to keep suffering from a story that we're making up—based fifty percent of the time, I haven't done a research paper that it's really fifty percent, I'm making that up too—on a perception that isn't even accurate to begin with.

It's really a trip when we start to look at it this way.

There's a great word for this particular pattern in the Pali: papañca, one of my favorites. This is the definition of it: What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates. One complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas. And then this complication, this proliferation, becomes notions that assail and overwhelm a person—just based on the complications of thinking about any particular perception of sense experience.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's quite a statement. All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge.

So as I said, even having a perception and using it to describe the world doesn't have to be a problem. It's useful. Even having a perception and a description that we're not sure is accurate—that's okay. The problem is only when we're clinging to, identified with, that perception, that description, that interpretation. And mostly we don't know we're doing it. So when we think, "This is true, this is how it is," that's a clue that we're grasping or identifying with it. And that's when we start to get into conflict with ourselves, with others.

Because once we're locked into "this is what that sound is, this is what this sensation means, this is what's happening," it's as if our awareness snaps shut. We tend, out of kind of solidifying around this description of the world or ourselves, not to even notice perceptions or experiences that go against the particular description we have. It's actually amazing, I find, how the mind can do that—just completely discount perceptions that don't fit into our description, even when our description is a suffering one.

On retreats, I don't know if this has ever happened to you, it happens to me sometimes. Those of you who've been here two weeks, by now I know even in the silence, you kind of have a sense of who everyone is by the way they walk or the feel of them. You know people's routines. You always run into the same person at a certain place.

And have you ever had it happen, as I have, say in the dining room of the Insight Meditation Society—the dining room's a bit bigger—where I'll be sitting down eating, deep in retreat, and someone comes and sits near me. I don't look up. I'm just really being a good yogi. You're dying to look, but you don't look. But you know who it is anyway. You can feel it—how they sit and how they move—and so you know who it is. And from that perception of who it is, whatever associations go with it, just like that, they're there. You like the person, all those things. You don't like the person, all those things. They're eating like a slob, all those things. And you just know it.

So I remember one time I was deep in that, noting, noting, noting. But it's all going on. There's not even a flicker of a doubt that I know what's happening—until I looked up and way at the far end, the person who I knew was sitting next to me happened to walk by. And everything just comes crashing down. I watched the mind's tendency to go, "Well, that can't be them because they're here." I love that because it just makes the whole house of cards fall down. And just for a moment, I'm in that space of don't know. Just open to be present without having to know everything, without assuming already before I've even met the moment.

There's a German joke a German friend told me. Sometimes at night, if someone's out driving and has probably had a few too many beers, they can tend to get onto the Autobahn, the freeway, going the wrong way. You enter the wrong exit and you're going in the wrong direction on the freeway at night. And in Germany, that means fast in the wrong direction on the freeway. They call it, translated, a ghost driver. And when there's a ghost driver going the wrong way, sometimes it'll come on the radio: "Ghost driver at this location on the Autobahn between these two cities." And so the joke my friend told me is that the ghost driver, the person driving, is listening to the radio hearing there's a ghost driver on the Autobahn. He goes, "One ghost driver? There are many."

We so hold on to our perception, we just don't even question it. They're all going the wrong way because I'm right, no question about it.

So when we're grasping like that, it freezes perception. It really solidifies our thoughts. This is when thoughts become so solid, so real, and we're really suffering from a thought because we've really solidified our perception and our description at that point. It's basically clinging.

When there's just that shift—oh, it can't be this person because there they are—in that moment everything is open to be perceived, to be experienced in a different way. Then in that moment of not knowing, there's not really conflict. It's not a problem. It opens us up to that moment of insight where we can really just let a different way of being, of understanding, of perceiving come in. When we're so locked into how we think it is, there's no room for letting go, for that shift to come in.

So it's not that thoughts are a problem. Thoughts are really useful. Descriptions are really useful. We use them all the time. There's nothing wrong with thoughts. It's just learning to understand that they're simply tools, and they are rarely accurate descriptions of ultimate reality. And as long as we know they're tools, there's always that possibility that our description, our interpretation, isn't the only one—or even the only right, accurate one. Just that possibility that there's another way.

This is Ajahn Chah. He says, talking about how we use thoughts to construct reality, our idea of reality: "Appearances are determined into existence. Why must we determine them? Because they don't intrinsically exist. For example, suppose somebody wants to make a marker. They take a piece of wood or a rock, you place it on the ground, and you call it a marker."

Actually, it's not a marker. There isn't any marker. That's why we determine it into existence. You put it there, call it a marker, and now it's a marker.

And he says, in the same way we determine cities, we determine people, we determine cattle—we determine everything. Why must we determine these things? Because nothing originally, intrinsically exists as that. It's our way of using thought to determine it into reality, all our concepts.

Understanding that these things are simply determinations—including people, including cities—understanding that they're simply determinations, you can be at peace. It's not a problem. It's useful. But if you believe that the person, the being, the mind, the "theirs" and so on are intrinsic, self-existing realities, then you laugh and cry over them. Then there are the proliferations of conditioning factors. If we take such things to be ours, there will always be suffering. This is micchādiṭṭhi, wrong view. But when we stop clinging to them, there is peace. They don't have to go away. We just realize it's a determination. It's not how it ultimately actually is. And in that realization, there can be peace.

In my experience, personally, I've found that it's really this search of the heart, the mind, that wants some kind of resting place. Some place where it doesn't have to hang out in that "don't know," that undetermined space where "this isn't possibly the only way." The mind wants some sense of "this is how it is—I know how it is, don't tell me otherwise." And it feels secure and safe, somehow at ease, even though that very grasping is the source of so much conflict and suffering.

I want to talk a little bit about this selective perception, because it's really amazing to me how, once the mind has landed on "this is how it is"—this description, this is a marker, this marks the boundary between my property and yours—if you move it over two feet, there's big trouble. Moving that stone from here to there creates huge conflict.

How we don't notice or accept conflicting perceptions can really bring us into conflict with ourselves and with others. For example, I remember in politics years ago—way back in the seventies with Nixon. He was, you know, the worst politician ever. And I can't remember what exactly, but I remember hearing something really positive about him, something really good he'd done. I saw my mind respond: "I don't want to hear that. There can't be anything good about Nixon because he's in this category in my mind." It's too confusing to have it open—that maybe he was a real jerk in this way, but there were also these really beautiful things. The mind doesn't like hanging out like that. We hold fast. We don't want to let go of our solid worldview.

One great place to notice this, since you're here on retreat, is to observe how your perceptions of what's happening in a particular sitting or in a particular walking shape your experience. Notice the perception, how you interpret it, what emotions and reactions and self-descriptions come out of that interpretation, all colored by whatever mood happens to be in your mind at the moment. Notice how the view of what "good practice" is gets really locked in, and how much conflict we can create with our own experience just from holding to that description, that view of good practice.

Teachers are in a really fortunate position, getting to hear so many different people, because it becomes so obvious how we each just make it up—usually to our own detriment. Usually "good practice" is something other than what's happening in my experience right now.

We'll have a string of people come through. One person will say, "Well, my practice is no good because I can't stay with anything. As soon as I feel a sensation, something else happens. As soon as I notice a thought, it goes away. I have no concentration—I can't stay with the thoughts." And we'll say, "Well, could it be that things are coming and going quickly, and that's impermanence?" "No, it couldn't be. I have no concentration."

The next person comes in, and they're just with the breath, very peaceful and soft and present. But they're saying, "You've been talking about choiceless awareness, and I should be able to open to all things coming and going, and that's not happening. It's just the breath, just really peaceful, just really quiet—which just shows that I'm dull and don't really have insight into impermanence."

Then the next person wants a lot of emotions because they're too peaceful. And the person having a lot of emotions thinks that's a waste—it's not about opening to emotions, it's about being peaceful. And on and on it goes. All of it is probably stuff that's been said here, or that you've read, or offered in response to questions. All of it.

So notice how your mind will tend to pick out the one usually that will cause us the most trouble. Because we tend to have the overview of "I'm not good enough." If you have the overview of "I'm really the best," then you'll pick out the one that confirms exactly what's happening to you and ignore the others. And that happens too. "I'm having some kind of energy release and that's the most important thing." Everything else is ignored. We all do this. It's amazing.

Once I was teaching a retreat many years ago, and I was still sitting in a chair then as I do now. Well into the retreat, like the fifth or sixth day, someone came for an interview. It was her first retreat, and she said, "You know, I've been in so much agony sitting on the zafu. My body isn't used to sitting cross-legged." She was just in agony for days. That's all her sittings were about—the agony and berating herself that she couldn't do it right. And she said, just before the interview, "But you know what? Just today I looked up and I said, 'Oh, Carol's sitting in a chair. Maybe it's possible to meditate sitting in a chair.'"

Now, we had said that. Did any of us ever say you have to sit cross-legged on a zafu or you're not meditating correctly? And we didn't say it then either. Five days of not being able to let in that perception because of the mind saying the only way to do it right is to sit on the zafu cross-legged. It's amazing what we can do.

So notice how you do it with your practice. Selective perception filtered through mental state and memory—what you remember, what you don't remember, and how we suffer from trying to make our experience match or stay with a description we've basically, essentially made up.

Another place that we do this—and it's very subtle at the same time that it's so grossly obvious it's amazing we miss it, but then it's also very subtle because it's happening so fast—is in the whole realm of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, of personality view. Personality view being—it's not one solid steady-state thing—but our basic beliefs and descriptions about ourselves. Either our personality traits, the way we define ourselves, the way we relate to certain moods and habits of mind, our view of ourselves, our memories. So familiar, so unnoticed, but it's really the veil through which we filter a lot of perceptions.

A lot of people have been mentioning this in interviews, not in these words exactly, but seeing, for example, how maybe we knew it before intellectually, but noticing it more moment to moment as it's arising. How maybe somewhere way, way back in childhood or infancy, there was some perception of great neediness, or of somehow doing something that made mother's love go away and perceiving it as "I'm completely unlovable," or "Somehow it's my fault and I have to make my parents happy." You know, whatever. All our stories, which in some way are both trite when you say them but really very profound and suffering-causing in our lives.

But really seeing how, based on whatever perception—maybe back in infancy—that perception and that interpretation, "I have to do X, Y, and Z to make the world safe for me to live in, to get love from my parents," or "I have to make myself invisible not to get anger coming from my parents," whatever it is—it might be based on an accurate perception at that time. That's not the point. That particular perception and the descriptions, the interpretations, the sense of self that comes out of it, then continues to become so ingrained, really so identified with, so clung to, that through the veil of it—we don't even see it—that becomes the way that we respond to many, many situations in our life, up to and including now, when it's not really applicable at all.

Well, a lot of us know this from therapy, and we wonder, why did that perception stay so solid? It's not as if I'm carrying around something on my back that I have to chip away at. But what we start to see through the practice here is that, simply without recognizing that particular clung-to description, we're recreating those conditions moment to moment by the way we respond to situations.

So for example, if somehow I grew up feeling that people were always pulling on me, and people were always needing me, and I somehow had to protect myself—then in some really minor situation, even here, where nobody's needing anything, but we just see someone coming toward us, and instinctively we turn away. "Oh, don't let them look at me, they're needing something from me." And we go off and we've shrunk away into ourselves, and there's a sense of separation. Just something so quick as that, and relatively minor. And then we start saying, "I feel so separate, I feel so isolated, I feel so alone."

It's sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It's not that we even have to get rid of that, but simply recognizing how in that moment, that interpretation of the perception—say, I'm making this very simple—of someone coming toward me, "Oh, they're going to need something"—total interpretation. We don't know. It's based on the view we don't even recognize that we're clinging to, and we pull back.

All we have to do is be aware of that whole process without clinging to it, without assuming it's an accurate description. And hating it is also clinging to it. So saying, "This is really bad, I have to change it. I have to be open-hearted, loving, and kind. I will go toward whoever comes near me"—

I will offer them something. That's just more of the same, only turned around in the other direction.

This is what's so great about the shift of perception that insight brings. You don't have to unpack it all. We just have to see through it. Thoughts are fine. Just because a thought arises, we don't have to make it so solid. We don't have to make it a solid reality. We don't have to fight it. We can simply see: oh, this is the perception, this is the interpretation, this is sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Anxiety feels like this. Fear of being needed feels like this. Loneliness feels like this. That's all. I mean, it's a lot. But that's all. It's a shift of perception, not tearing everything apart and starting over. Just recognizing that maybe this isn't the only description of the world that's possible.

It really is quite amazing.

This is from Bankei, a Japanese Zen master in the 1600s. He's talking basically about how our problem with thoughts, our coming into conflict in regards to our thoughts, is that we have so much preference for ourselves. He says that if you didn't have this preference for yourself, there wouldn't be any illusions. If two people next to you were quarreling, you can just listen to it and be quite balanced about it. We don't get all drawn in or upset about it. But as soon as we're one of the people quarreling, it takes on a whole other level of intensity and seriousness.

So he's basically saying all of our thoughts are as if two other people are quarreling or having some great discussion. We don't have to meet them any more than that.

And he says, even when memories arise, things about your past, reflections of your past and images—those will arise. That's just normal. But these thoughts don't really have a real substance. So when they arise, just let them arise. You don't have to make them stop. But if they do stop, let them stop. And either way, you don't have to pay any attention to them.

Can we stand that? All these thoughts and memories—I'm like this and I'm like that, and this happened because of this—just don't pay any attention to them. Don't try to stop them. Don't try to keep them going. Don't pay any attention. Just leave them alone and then all these illusions don't appear.

And since there are no illusions when you don't take note of the reflecting images, while these images, these memories are reflected in the mind, it's just the same as if they weren't reflected in the mind. You get what he means? They can be there or not. It's just the same. A thousand thoughts may arise and it's just the same as though they haven't. They won't give you a bit of trouble. You don't have any thoughts that you need to clear from your mind. You don't have to cut them off. They can arise or not arise. It doesn't make any difference.

Can we imagine that? That's just a thought. It's just passing by like a sound. It just doesn't have to make any difference.

Thoughts are only so solid when there's this clutching, this grasping of interpretation, description, and identity around them. Now, I'm not saying that's easy. But that's our whole practice. How do we cut through that?

Back to the absolute simplicity of sati, of mindfulness, of what Ajahn Buddhadasa calls sati-pañña—sati is mindfulness, pañña is wisdom—at the moment of sense contact, at the sense doors. It's another way that sense restraint, which was brought up this morning, is talked about sometimes. Not the sense restraint that means you never look around or you don't go out looking for distraction. That's one meaning of it. But sense restraint in terms of bringing mindfulness-wisdom, clear seeing, the simplicity of presence to that moment of sense contact, to the moment of perception. Just noticing what's happening as it is. Sound. The perception "bell." And that's enough. Even if a thought comes—"Oh, that bell means blah-di-di-blah-blah"—thinking. You know it's a thought. You don't have to stop it. But that's all. Not having to create whole worlds around it. Not having to believe it. Not having to do anything. It's so simple. I don't know. We just can't stand it somehow.

But this is really the heart of the famous sutta called the Bāhiya Sutta, where someone came to the Buddha begging him to just quickly tell him basically what he needed to know so he could become an arahant, completely enlightened. He was begging the Buddha, and the Buddha was saying, "I'm going on alms round now, I'll tell you later. This is not the right time." But Bāhiya was very impatient. He said, "No, you've got to tell me. You've got to tell me now." And three times Bāhiya begged the Buddha. Classically, on the third time, the Buddha would acquiesce, unless it was something he would never agree to. So he said, "Okay, I'll just give you this one little stanza."

It's this famous stanza where he says: "In the seen is only the seen. In the heard there is only the heard. In the cognized there is only the cognized. In the sensed there is only the sensed. That is all." In other words, you hear the sound, that's it. All the rest is extra—papañca. The notions that assail and overwhelm a person, complications, completely extra. It's so simple, but we're so unused to it that we really have to practice. Because it's so quick, isn't it, from one sound, one thought? A thought is just another sense experience, just like a sound or a smell or a taste. It's so quick from the sense contact to getting lost in all that proliferation that we just have to learn to come back again, come back again to the simplicity of that sense contact.

And then moment after moment, the continuity is what starts to really show us that what we thought were accurate descriptions and interpretations are actually not steady state at all—constantly changing. These interpretations about ourselves, for example, the sense of the solidity of "me," which is what sakkāya-diṭṭhi is based on. If we didn't have some sense of me being here, we wouldn't be interpreting all experience in terms of what it means about my personality. But when we're willing to just stay that simple, at the point of sense contact—bringing mindfulness as the presence, wisdom as the pañña that is just not going off into interpretation, just staying here—moment after moment, the continuity between the sitting and the walking and the movements through the day, the continuity is what begins to reveal the discontinuity of all our interpretations of reality. None of it really holds up for very long if we stay steady.

Again, I'm making these very pretty simple examples, but just look in your own experience. The sense of self and our sense of personality view, who we are—we all have a kind of basic one, you know. But say you happen to be walking and you're feeling it's going really well.

You're focused. It feels good. Let's face it, that's what "going really well" usually means—it feels good. So for whatever reason, it feels good. And someone comes by that you had previously been comparing yourself to in an unfavorable way. They're going in a hurry and they go into the dorm. But it's just the beginning of the walking period. And you think, "Huh, they're goofing off. And I'm really doing it."

From that feeling good, that perception which was basically just seeing, the comparing of me and them arises, the whole story about what they're doing—when actually we don't have a clue what they're doing. And all our sense of feeling good, what comes into that through selective perception, will be all our memories of when we were great, all our projections into the future of how great we're going to be, how good we felt in the past, how good we'll feel in the future. And that feels like me, really solid.

Then it could be five minutes later, two seconds later, or the next walking period, and it doesn't feel good anymore. In fact, it feels really lousy. You're thinking a lot, and somehow you go into the dorm. And then you realize that that person who you thought was goofing off went in because they're actually sitting much longer in their room. They're sitting three hours at a time. While you're the one who's schlepping along, not even able to lift your foot and feel two feet in a row.

And then the whole thing switches. The only memories that seem at all real are all the times you screwed up. And if you remember those times you were so great from the last walking period, well, that's baloney—that was a fluke, that doesn't count. This is really the heart of who I am, this loser. And not only that, I project onto other people my loser-ness, going around making everybody else bad. That's really me. That's true. That's an accurate perception based on real memories, and it's solid, solid thought.

And neither of them is true. Yet it feels like continuous me somehow. I don't know how we overlook the fact that it's completely different stories and completely different moments. "Yeah, that's continuous me. I'm just one solid thing. This is what I'm like." And we do this all day.

What's amazing is we can take any sense contact, any sense contact, and construct this. You hear the frogs. You can make up the whole story of your life. Back to summer camp in third grade and how everyone was mean to you, those frogs croaking by the lake, and on and on. Or the reverse. Play with it.

I used to do this on retreat. I'd do it with crickets, because crickets brought up a certain nostalgic quality when I wasn't paying attention. I'd get into a whole story. The crickets. It's so sad. Fall is coming. The ending of all life. I could die in this room. No one would know for three days. And all the moods that go with it and the solid sense of me.

Really?

And I caught it one time. I said, okay, let's just change it. I thought, really tune into the sound of the crickets and think, "Isn't that beautiful? So present, so immediate." My mind's going, "Yeah, right. So present in nature."

And within about two seconds, the relevant feelings started to arise. It was amazing. A sense of happiness, a sense of oneness with nature. I'm so lucky to have this time to practice.

It was just as real as the one before. This was within a two-minute period. They were both equally real or equally unreal, equally having anything to do with who I am—which is like nothing. We're making it all up, literally.

So just notice how any sense—a sound, a smell, somebody slurping their soup next to you—can immediately become the whole story of your life. Me, me, me. What it means about me, and all the past and the future and selective perception. It's totally amazing.

If we can just watch that without having to then jump into "I'm so stupid, I'm so wrong, I'm so unenlightened"—because that's just another one. You just sit back and watch and go, wow, this is really amazing. And we move into the space of awareness rather than being gripped by the reactions and interpretations and the story, and it stops really being a problem. It really stops being a problem.

It's so simple. Oh, hearing. Slurping. That's all. Unpleasant, pleasant, whatever. We don't have to make up anything about it. We don't have to create a whole world of thought.

It's not that we have to get rid of our personality view. It's not that we have to somehow figure out a way to think about there being no intrinsic unchanging self and think our way out of it. We just have to step outside of the box. Oh, personality view is like this. Nothing changes, but our whole perception changes. It's really this sense of peace that just arises from not getting so involved in the papañca, in the proliferations. Just the silence.

The Buddha said once that the end of papañca is the end of conflict. And it's really true. On my last retreat, when I was sitting for a few weeks, that teaching kept going through my mind because I was just seeing how, when the mind was in a state of seeing impermanence and loss—like that with the weather—I would go out on a cloudy day and it would feel completely oppressive and scary. And I could see the mind creating that, although one still feels it.

And then I remember one day—you can do this with anything, right? I went outside. I was pretty focused, pretty concentrated and calm, and there were two butterflies just playing together. And it was as if I could see, without the thoughts actually arising, I could sense all the stories the mind could go into—both on the beautiful side and on the side of "everything's dying anyway." Just everywhere the mind could go with that. But it didn't. It just didn't.

And there was a sense of just seeing, seeing, and silence. Nothing else needed to arise around it. And I still remember it because it was such a tangible experience of peace. No big deal. Just the peace of not having to create a self-story about every little thing that happens. Just seeing and silence.

The silence is always here. We could pay attention to the silence instead of all the thoughts. The thoughts don't have to stop—that's what Bankei was saying. We just don't have to pay so much attention to them. When we begin to notice how we pay attention to them—because they come so loud, associated with emotion, based on believing the description and perception—when we can notice that and just allow the possibility that maybe it's not the way I think, then we can start to notice the space, or the silence. We don't have to figure the thoughts out. Just let them run out and tune into the silence. And everything changes. Everything changes.

I just want to end with a little bit from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche about thoughts:

"It is our own mind that can lead us astray into the cycle of existences. Blind to the mind's true nature, we hold fast to our thoughts, which are nothing but manifestations of that true nature. But holding fast to the thoughts freezes awareness into solid concepts such as 'I' and 'other,' desirable and detestable, and plenty of others. This is how we create samsara. But if, instead of letting our thoughts solidify, we recognize their emptiness, then each thought that arises and disappears in the mind renders the realization of emptiness ever clearer."

Not only are thoughts not a problem, watching them arise and disappear actually strengthens our recognition of emptiness.

"All phenomena of samsara and nirvana arise like a rainbow, and like a rainbow they are devoid of any tangible existence. Once you have recognized the true nature of reality, which is both empty and at the same time appears as the phenomenal world, your mind will cease to be under the power of delusion."

So in our practice we just maintain that state of simplicity.

So let us just sit quietly for a moment.

Bell

Thank you for listening. Please check the notice board this evening for tomorrow morning's interview schedule.

CHAPTER 340

Mettā & Intention

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teachings on anger, hatred, and love through the lens of wise intention (sammā saṅkappa). Drawing from the Dhammapada and various suttas, she illuminates how the Buddha's instructions on mettā were not idealistic prescriptions but practical tools for ending suffering. Wilson emphasizes that cultivating loving-kindness is not about becoming a 'good person' but about recognizing that meeting difficulty with anger causes more suffering for ourselves.

Wilson shares personal examples of how sustained mettā practice subtly transforms our habitual mental patterns. She describes noticing her mind's tendency toward aversion—latching onto the one unpleasant thing in a field of pleasant experiences—and how mettā spontaneously arose to broaden her perspective. This shift happens not through force but through the gradual cultivation of wise intention, replacing ill-will with connection and inclusivity.

The talk explores how we create separation by making others into objects, whether on the road, in the dining hall, or within our own self-judgment. Wilson offers practical guidance on 'changing the channel' from suffering-producing thoughts to mettā phrases, even when the heart feels cynical or resistant. She draws on examples from St. Francis of Assisi and a practitioner with degenerative lung disease to illustrate how opening to difficulty with clear-eyed, loving attention transforms our relationship to pain and fear. The teaching reminds us that mettā is not about grand gestures but about how we meet each moment of experience.

In both of the groups today, it came up in slightly differing ways, but to some extent the question arose of what the Buddha was really teaching about our relationship to anger, to hatred, to love.

I want to start by reading some probably quite well-known statements of the Buddha about working with anger and hatred and the power of love. Then I'll talk a little about some of the effects of working with this practice of loving-kindness in our daily life—just some very basic, modest effects.

I want to give you a few of the Buddha's words, putting them in the context of realizing that everything he taught, according to what he said, according to what we can read, was for the purpose of freeing our hearts and minds from suffering. He said over and over, "I teach one thing and one thing only: suffering and the end of suffering." What I read into that is that the motivation, the point, the guiding principle of all his different teachings is the very practical matter of how we can bring our own hearts and minds to an end of suffering.

If we take the teachings of mettā practice, of non-hatred, of meeting everything—beautiful, difficult, neutral—with clear seeing and loving-kindness, we can see this from a point of view that is not our psychological mode of thinking or our good-bad mode of thinking. You know: "I should be this loving, kind person," or "I'm bad." We make this kind of ideal, and then when we can't meet it, which so often we can't, we think, "Well, I got angry, and I shouldn't have. To be a good person, I shouldn't have gotten angry." But then we get into our whole rationalization: "How can you not be angry? How can you possibly meet these difficult things in the world and not be angry?" And anger is—well, you all know, I'm sure.

I find in myself that kind of argument. It comes partly from the difficulty of actually manifesting loving-kindness and compassion. It is difficult. Let's not kid ourselves. But it also comes from taking it as a "should"—I should do that to be a better person, to be a good person—rather than approaching it from a totally practical point of view: I'm going to suffer more if I continue to meet difficulty with anger, with fear, with craving. Not that I have to do it to prove I'm an ideal person, but because I want to suffer less.

From that practical framework, I find it gives me a lot more spaciousness of motivation to really try out and explore and listen to what the Buddha was saying with an ear for "Well, maybe it's true—let's try it," rather than immediately concluding "I can't do it and he's wrong, so forget about it." Maybe he did know something about the ending of suffering. Maybe I could keep trying.

Some of this is from the Dhammapada. As I say, I'm sure it's quite familiar to you, but just to hear his words as far as we can know them, rather than ours. This is from a new rendering of the Dhammapada by one of the monks in the Ajahn Chah tradition from Amaravati, Ajahn Munindo. I just found it in my mailbox the other day. That was nice—better than what's usually in the mailbox: bills and requests for money.

This is very famous, but it sets the tone for the whole Dhammapada, these first two verses:

"All states of being are determined by mind. It is mind that leads the way. Just as the wheel of the ox cart follows the hoof print of the animal that draws it, so suffering will surely follow when we speak or act impulsively from an impure state of mind."

"All states of being are determined by mind. It is mind that leads the way. As surely as our shadow never leaves us, so well-being will follow when we speak or act with a pure state of mind."

"When we hold fast to such thoughts as 'they abused me, mistreated me, beat me, robbed me,' we keep hatred alive. If we release ourselves from such thoughts as 'they abused me, mistreated me, beat me, robbed me,' hatred is vanquished."

"Never by hatred is hatred conquered, but by readiness to love alone. This is the eternal law."

"Those who are contentious have forgotten that we all die. For the wise who reflect on this fact, there are no quarrels."

"More than a thief, more than an enemy, a misdirected heart brings one to harm. Neither mother, father, nor any member of a family can give you the blessings generated by your own well-directed heart."

These are some of the very well-known, very basic, but quite profound statements. He's saying this not as nice little epigrams, but as absolute statements of his experience of what brings us to happiness. So then we are left with discovering how to do that, here and in our lives.

Not to be flippant, but we must not make the mistake of expecting too much too quickly, which is easy to do in our fast-paced society. Often, on leaving a retreat—or even moving from a loving-kindness retreat to a Vipassana retreat—if you've had even a few moments of either the strength of the feeling of mettā, or that sense of the barriers disappearing, or even an intimation of the possibility of power when the heart is open, when the mind is connected—that's important. As we've all talked about, as Michelle spoke about a lot last night, this gives us some inspiration, some faith, as Susan talked about, based on our own experience that yes, this is really true. The power of a connected heart does bring happiness for myself and for others.

As we leave, though, or switch practices, or just start to think about something else and lose that experience, it can be easy to think that we have to always be in that depth or that power of the heart—that emotional, mental experience of mettā—for it to be of value, or for it to even count at all.

And when, guess what, it's a little harder to access in the middle of work three weeks from now, it can be easy to think, well, what was the use? I can't always be on retreat. How can I access it? And so that, I think, is a big mistake we make.

I want to talk a lot tonight about the little ways—the moment-to-moment little ways that we can consciously bring in the sense of metta connection in our life, the little ways that we can notice when it's arising spontaneously here or in life. As well as the courage it takes, the commitment it takes to keep on looking, because a lot of what we need to do is be willing to look at the habits of mind that get in the way.

I want to give you another thing from the Buddha because it's a different kind of story. He certainly had to demonstrate often in his life how to work with anger. It's not that after he was awakened and spent forty-five years teaching, everybody who came to him was completely devoted. I mean, it was India. It sounds like India then was a lot like India now, only maybe there are a lot more people in India now. But there were many wandering ascetics, many wandering spiritual teachers, and a fair degree of contentiousness. So there are lots of examples of people coming to him and challenging him, saying "what do you know anyway?" and so forth.

So anyway, there's this one pretty well-known sutta where a Brahmin, a layman, came to the Buddha and basically was angry at him, kind of cursed him, reviled him, going on and on with rude, harsh words—basically yelling at him. And the Buddha has a famous way of responding, which first was with an example: if people come to visit you, friends or colleagues, and you serve them with delicacies and food and give them gifts and all these things, and if they don't take those, if they leave them, if they don't accept them, then who do those gifts and delicacies, the food that you offered, belong to? And the Brahmin said, "Well, then they're still mine. They stay with me." And the Buddha said, "Just so. When you offer me these anger and harsh words, if I don't accept them, then they stay with you. It's all yours."

But this wasn't the end of it, because that person actually took that as the Buddha being angry with him. And he basically said, "You're an arhat. What are you doing getting angry? An arhat isn't supposed to get angry. This proves that you're not." And the Buddha said, basically, "I'm not angry." Then he gave this little stanza on working with anger:

"You make things worse when you flare up at someone who's angry. Whoever doesn't flare up at someone who's angry wins a battle that's hard to win. You live for the good of both, your own and the other's, when, knowing that the other is provoked, you mindfully grow calm."

Very practical, really. He's not saying we're floating on a cloud and everyone will be nice to us because we're trying to practice metta. He's just saying, you know, it's for your good and the good of the other. If you see the person's angry and you can mindfully grow calm, you know. "When you work the cure of both, your own and the other's, those who think you are a fool know nothing of the Dhamma."

To me, actually, that last statement is really important because it's partly what was coming out in one of our conversations—that societally, it's not necessarily so supported that our anger is the cause of our suffering and that it's a worthy aspiration not to act from anger, to free our hearts and minds of anger. That's not always supported in this world. And often you are seen as a fool. Or we feel that we're seen as a fool or a weakling or some kind of passive person who's afraid to act, whatever. So it seems to me even in the Buddha's time, that dichotomy between what he was teaching and what some people might say to you when you try to take that stance of not returning anger for anger—seems like that was true back then as well.

So I just find that interesting. It's not that he was just saying, "Oh, be happy, be peaceful, don't get angry anymore," and he didn't have to deal with the same things. He knew. It's a difficult road. It requires from us both some verified faith—some verified faith from our own experience, which hopefully, both on and off retreat, our practice can help us recognize.

And I also find in our life, in both metta and vipassana practice, it takes a really deep commitment to ourselves, from understanding the value of cultivating loving-kindness and connection and compassion—that the value of that is worth the commitment of energy it takes to keep paying attention with care and kindness. Not only when we feel connected, but all the many times, the many, many times that we don't feel connected, or that we feel that we failed, or that we find ourselves lost in resentment again or fear again or longing again. Rather than feeling that's a failure, that's the exact place that we need to dive in with our loving-kindness, to dive in with our attention. And that's the place that we learn. That's the place that the strength of metta is developed. It's easy when everything's hunky-dory. It's when it's difficult—and a lot of the time the difficulty's in ourselves—that the strength of metta really begins to be cultivated.

So really what I've found powerful over time in my daily life is to recognize that it's just about moment to moment of experience. I think I said this the other night, but metta is very much about: how do I meet this moment of my experience?

And that's a workable piece of life—this moment. Even if I'm in the middle of a big frenzy about something, if I can remember: What's happening now? How am I meeting this moment? Even if the answer is, "I am meeting this moment with total frustration and anger and it's all your fault"—still, being able to say that already makes a shift. It's like, "Oh, that's how I'm meeting the moment. And who's suffering? Mostly me."

How we meet the moment—and what's very practical about the metta practice during all those times that we're not particularly feeling any emotion—is what I want to elaborate on tonight: the fact that we're cultivating wise intention. Intention of heart, intention of mind. Intention is what we call motivation, but it's the movement of mind and heart that can be very subtle, leading to thought, speech, and action. And intention often manifests as thought.

In terms of the way the Buddha describes and understands what really brings us suffering and what really brings us happiness in the world—what constitutes skillful action and what's unskillful action or speech—it's not so much about the result, because as we see, that's really not in our control. It's about the motivation, the intention with which we speak, with which we act.

In fact, intention was so important in his scheme of how to live an awakened life—which would be the Eightfold Noble Path, a whole talk in itself—that it comes second. The path describes our day-to-day way of living, beginning with wise understanding: how we understand ourselves, the world, what causes suffering for ourselves and others, what brings happiness. How we understand ourselves and the world leads to how we think about the world—the intentions with which we act. And the second step of the Eightfold Path is just that: wise thought or wise intention, leading to the next three steps—speech, action, and livelihood—how we manifest in the world relationally with others.

There's a sutta where the Buddha is very specific about what wise intention is. He gives three specific wise intentions: The unwise, or really the suffering intention of greed, comes to be countered with—or transforms through understanding into—renunciation, just letting go of holding on, renunciation or generosity. The unwise or suffering intention of ill will—just basic negativity, not liking, disliking, anger, hostility, the whole range—transforms with wisdom into metta. And the unwise intention of cruelty transforms into compassion, karuna.

This happens spontaneously when we understand or just naturally feel our connection with another being. You see that happen here, I'm sure. When something bugs you and you just turn your attention to the person and think, "Oh well, they're doing the best they can. They're making a lot of noise—but maybe they're really uncomfortable." You don't have to meditate for a day for that to happen. It's just natural. Or maybe you do. But it just kind of happens quite naturally from connection. Very normal.

But also, we can cultivate it—through thought to begin with. And that's what this form of the loving-kindness practice that we've been cultivating here is about, where we're repeating these thoughts over and over. As I said the first night, it's sort of like a joke: What would we be thinking about if we weren't repeating these phrases over and over and over?

But it's not really a joke, is it? What would we be thinking about? What does the mind naturally incline towards when it's untrained, when it's unaware? It either runs on drivel—which is a good deal of the time. Maybe that's only me; the rest of you are having really wise thoughts about how to save the world. It runs on drivel, or it goes to how I can get more pleasantness, how I can get rid of unpleasantness. And how often is the pleasantness or the unpleasantness concerning another human being? At that time, that person—there's no connection. They stop being a person. They become an object, really, the carrier of our pleasure or the potential carrier of our displeasure, in which case they've got to be gotten rid of or controlled in some way.

It's good to see it in little things on retreat, but follow it to its logical expansion. And it isn't funny. It's really the source of all the craziness and the pain in this world.

And so I think what we're doing here, sitting here saying these phrases—I totally understand. So many people have said, and I've been there, completely nauseated by these phrases. "I cannot summon it up one more time." But then you find a way to. That passes, and you find a way to.

Even if you're not feeling anything, even if you're just mouthing the phrases, but you're trying at least to know what you're saying—it's very important. Because on a level that we're completely unaware of, something is happening. This is really what surprised me in my life after having done some intensive metta retreats.

We're looking for some feedback pretty regularly, aren't we? I mean, it's pretty hard to go through even a day without some kind of feedback that something good is happening. And generally that means we feel good, doesn't it? Usually. I mean, some big blow-up comes and you're overwhelmed with anger, and you come into the group and go, "Oh good, the purification's happening." How many of you really go out thinking, "Oh, really good, I'm so glad"? That's good feedback? No, we want the juicies. We want it to feel good. And a lot of the time—at least in my practice—it's not particularly feeling good.

But what really surprised me on leaving retreat and just living my life, without trying to feel like the embodiment of loving-kindness and compassion everywhere I went... I mean, let's face it, I did have that ideal in mind. Somehow we become the light of the world. And you come out of a metta retreat and everyone—I think I said this in a group—people fall at your feet going, "Oh, I can't believe you are radiating so much love and compassion. Where have you been? Let me go there too." Occasionally—honestly, occasionally—that does happen. You actually might be a lot softer, radiating something that you don't even know. I'm not kidding now. Sometimes that does happen. But when we go out trying to radiate it, well, that's a whole other story. And that's not what it's about.

But what I did notice is that on some much more modest level, that moment-to-moment shifting of intention that's happening when we're repeating the phrases and actively connecting is really having an effect. And the effect that I noticed in myself was that the natural habit of mind would still spring up, and then the metta would arise spontaneously to balance it.

Let me give you just little examples. My tendency of mind tends toward the aversive. Others might tend toward greediness. I think you've got kind of a bunch of aversives up here, except for Susan. That's just how our minds go. So that doesn't mean you're angry all the time. But I noticed—this is a little example, but it's when I really got how the habit pattern of intention, the way my aversive mind works.

I was on a day ferry in Thailand one time. And it was a beautiful day—sunny, bright, lots of people on the ferry. I was just sitting up in the sun quietly, totally pleasant. And there was a bunch of people down below, and one woman, kind of very skimpily dressed, acting out, calling a lot of attention to herself. And my mind immediately could tell she was American. And I thought, "Oh, Americans"—which of course, you know, Americans are always so obnoxious—and now everyone's going to know I'm an American, and I started shrinking in my seat. And there weren't that many Americans; there were more other nationalities.

And I saw my mind doing this. Out of the whole field of experience, of sense experience—most of which was pleasant—my mind completely latched onto the one unpleasant sense experience. I mean, it wasn't even affecting me. It was way on the other deck. And I got completely absorbed in the negativity of it.

It cracked me up. And since then, I've watched. That's what the habit of my mind does. I'll go into an experience in the dining room—I noticed this on retreat—and there'd be one person that somehow triggered something negative. They just looked unpleasant, or they were making a noise, or they were in front of me in line and slopped some food on the counter.

Doesn't mean I wouldn't slop food myself, but never mind.

My mind would just go to that one thing. What I noticed starting to happen with the metta, completely spontaneously both in retreat and out of retreat, was that the mind would do its usual habitual movement toward the negative, but then rather than sticking there, what would come in automatically was the connecting and inclusive energy of metta. This wouldn't limit the person to that one thing, but would connect with and see the whole person. "Oh, so they're a bit of a slob, but they look like a really nice person." That's the best an aversive mind can do—you don't really get a new personality. It just broadens out, becomes more inclusive. Still cynical, but it doesn't really mean it.

Another example: I would go home to the cottage where I live, which is really lovely. I like it a lot. And my mind would walk in, and if it's kind of dirty, right away the mind just starts grousing. It sees this one speck of dirt on the floor. Everything else is beautiful, the sunlight's streaming in the window, and I'm going, "Oh my God, the dirt on the floor." But then with the metta, just automatically the mind would see the rest and look around. "Oh yeah, it's really beautiful here. I'm really lucky to live here." And that wasn't a forced "I should do that"—it begins to happen spontaneously.

For someone who has more tendency toward attachment, toward wanting, who sees the good in what they don't have, the metta could do the same thing. It expands around, includes the whole picture. "I don't have this, but I do have this—this beautiful day, this quiet moment, this soft, gentle rain." A sense of appreciation. Sure, we can do that consciously, but what you might begin to notice is how it starts to show itself spontaneously, how the habits of mind and heart are indeed beginning to change. The connection becomes a little stronger. We begin to trust it unconsciously, a little more, through the power of our loving-kindness practice.

And of course we can consciously work in this way, which is one of the ways of bringing the intention of working with metta into our daily life. We don't just have to leave it at "well, okay, that's good, and maybe when I get back to the next metta retreat I can work harder and then it'll happen some more." We can also continue to pay attention in our daily life, bringing in this spaciousness, this more inclusive quality of connection.

Thich Nhat Hanh likes to say that most of us ask the question, "What is wrong?" We forget to ask what is right. Both are useful. He says, "There are many things that are not wrong. When you focus your attention only on what is wrong, you can make the situation worse. Therefore, it is wise to meditate on your capacity to enjoy peace, happiness, and joy—your capacity to be in touch with what is refreshing and healing in the present moment."

And the example he gives shows this isn't just about something small, like being annoyed at a speck of dirt on the floor and then noticing the nice light coming in the window. That's an easy one. He's talking about being in the midst of really difficult, atrocious suffering. During the Vietnam War, when he was an activist, he writes, "We were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country, but we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage, so I would mention these to the social workers and peace workers so they would be in touch with them."

It doesn't sound like much, I grant you—in the midst of helping the wounded during a horrific war, to stop and smell the flowers. It sounds almost like a cliché. I know in my mind I can tend to evaluate that the depth of suffering is so strong that the sense of appreciating what is right has to be equally powerful. But it's not true. It's really about opening our intention from fear, hatred, and holding away, toward connection, toward inclusivity, toward not feeding that fear and hatred and longing in ourselves. That's what we're working with—not on the outer level, but on the inner level of our intention.

Often, in the midst of really strong suffering, if I can stop and get out of that mind state that's completely absorbed, long enough just to hear the birds singing outside the window, it moves into a much more spacious quality of connectedness to life rather than this complete absorption in all my troubles. The troubles come back, they don't go away, but the intention that relates to them can really change.

One of the aspects of non-metta—ill will or wanting—that I want to talk about more is how, when there's this non-inclusive, non-connected quality opposite to metta, our habits of mind, our unwise intentions, create either an experience or a person into being "the other." Really, this sense of "there's me and there's the other."

And I maybe want the other to make me happy or make it go away, but that distancing, that separation, is really the source of our own internal suffering, and then of the speech and actions from unwise intention that continue suffering on into the world.

A little example I noticed last fall—I think I talked about it in the retreat—of how wanting, in just a little amount of time, just a little thing, can create someone into such an object. I was driving up here from the study center for a sitting or something, but I wasn't late. And I was driving down the driveway of the study center, which, as you know, is just down the road about two minutes away. They had a retreat going on there, so it was a walking period or something. And one of the people on retreat was doing very mindful, slow walking meditation right in the middle of the driveway—the exact middle of the driveway. You couldn't really get by on either side.

So I was driving down and saw this and had a little sense of wanting to get up here in a hurry, even though I wasn't late. And that wanting to get up here in a hurry—I saw that person there and immediately was like, "What's the matter with them? They're in my way." And they could, of course, hear the car. You can hear the car. So they moved over like two inches. Like, "I'll make a gesture, you know, I hear you"—but I still couldn't get by. So I had to stop and just wait until they kind of slowly, slowly, being a good yogi, you know, slowly, slowly...

And in that moment, I saw—really in the space of a finger snap—how I went from just a little thing of wanting to get up here in a hurry to this little burst of negativity. And that person became a total object in my way to be gotten rid of. It was scary. Then I noticed it immediately. And this is the power of simply kind noticing of the habits of mind that cause the separation. We don't have to hate them. We just have to notice them.

As soon as I noticed it, I was like, "Oh, wow, look at that. That's really painful." That's a moment of metta, mindfulness to oneself. And this is really how we confront the difficult, separating, painful, suffering-producing habits of our mind and heart. Not with hatred, not with blame, but with clear-eyed metta, clear seeing. "Oh, wow. That's painful. It's scary." And look, if I could do something, if I wasn't a little bit more restrained, I'd open the window and say, "What's the matter with you? Move over! What's the matter with you?" And it could escalate from there, as we all know. It could escalate.

And so seeing it—the moment I saw it with that kindness—the whole thing just evaporated. You really see, oh, there's nothing to hold on to here. This is just suffering. And it goes. The power of clear-hearted, clear-seeing connection of metta and of mindfulness is so much stronger really than our suffering habits of mind. It's just that we have spent so much time habituating, cultivating really, our suffering habits of mind. So much more time cultivating them than we have cultivating metta or clear seeing. And we get impatient that the metta isn't working all the time. But if you really look at the ratio of how much time we spend cultivating the suffering and how much time we spend cultivating the metta, well, actually, you see how much stronger the truth really is.

So that sense of how quickly we can go to make someone the other. I read a newspaper article a couple of years ago about aggressive driving, road rage. And I was really struck by it because it was talking about a survey made by the AAA Foundation about aggressive driving. This survey was finding that there's a huge increase in the percentage of aggressive drivers. And they say what that includes, just in case you don't know: weaving in and out of traffic, excessive horn honking, running red lights, tailgating, passing on the right, making obscene gestures, screaming, and headlight flashing. Plus, I have a friend who, I think he performed one of those acts in Texas where he used to live, and the guy behind him kind of pulled him off on the side of the road with a gun. So I mean, it gets out there, right?

But the point of this article is that they go on describing, in this regular newspaper, how this manifests, how aggressive driving can be on the increase and how we engage in it. And the person writing, who is a psychologist, says that if someone on the road upsets you while you're in a car, that individual's whole identity becomes encapsulated in this bad thing they did. They're not someone with kids and a sick dog, hurrying to get to the vet. They're just that bad person who cut you off. He's not seen as a whole person, and there's an urge to express your aggression on this anonymous other—to think, "I can't let him get away with this." The thin veneer of civilization is removed because the car offers anonymity. You feel invincible. The car provides a buffer zone that makes it easier to dehumanize the other driver, much easier than if you were walking together in a hallway, seeing each other face to face. We'll do things and say things to someone in a car that we'd never do face to face.

And so the advice he gives his patients who have come to him because of their road rage is to practice compassion for other drivers by thinking of your own mistakes, and to visualize non-aggressive responses without acting out your aggression. It's actually so true that when people begin to study these things scientifically—as if that's what's needed for us to believe it—it turns out to be the same thing the Buddha was talking about. Lately, people keep sending me articles, and I keep picking them up myself, about various studies on the power of forgiveness, the healing power of forgiveness in one's own mind and body, of letting go of resentment even for horrific things that have happened. Not as a should, just scientific studies on what is more physically and psychically healthy.

So we can work on the level of aggressive driving, just looking at our mind and how it creates that sense of separation, that sense of the other. We can also consciously work in more active ways to bring our loving attention to meet head-on those aspects of ourselves that keep us locked in suffering, in separation, in negativity.

This is an example—I'm not saying we should do this, but it really struck me. It comes from St. Francis of Assisi, about whom I recently read a biography. I didn't really know much about him, except of course the common things: that he was really loving and saw all beings as his brother and sister, even speaking of death as his sister. That's all I knew about him.

But his life is quite interesting because he was born to a wealthy family in Assisi and basically spent his youth and young manhood as a kind of rowdy leader of the debauched section of young rich men in Assisian society. Apparently, somewhat secretly for a while before he actually came out as a renunciate monk, he was doing things of generosity. But the thing that struck me was that one of the first things he did was confront one of his deepest loathings and fears, one of the deepest kinds of separation he created in his mind with other people. And that was with people who had leprosy, which is now called Hansen's disease.

Apparently there were many people at that time in the Middle Ages in Assisi with leprosy. And as was the common practice, they would be removed from their family situation once diagnosed to stay in hospitals and homes for people with this disease. There were a few just below Assisi. Of course, anyone who lived in the town would constantly encounter people with leprosy begging on the roads. And Francis had an abhorrence of it. It scared him. It disgusted him. He couldn't stand to see or be around anyone who had this disease.

As the biographer explains, Francis was convinced at this point—even though he was still acting like the debauched young man—that his meditations on Christ had shown him there was really only one way of radically reducing misery in the world, and that was by persuading people to love God and their neighbors without reservation. He intuitively understood that he needed to dismantle his own selfishness before he could move into a deeper, more profound level of love and connectedness.

And so he started where he was, confronting his own disgust and fear of people with leprosy. What he did first was simply go out on the road to give alms to someone with the disease, to meet the person face to face, hand him the food or money, kiss the person's hand—to really be there open-heartedly. And in that knowing, he understood it was nothing to do with that person that was disgusting. It was his own fear, his own not wanting to be with what caused fear or unpleasantness.

After that, he saw the power of it, and then he went to the whole hospital for people with leprosy, distributing alms and spending time there. Over his life, he became one of the people who worked in these hospitals and did many loving things for people with this disease. They weren't certain, but they thought perhaps when he died, one of the causes of his death was that he had actually contracted leprosy to some extent, which affected his lungs.

But anyway, it's a powerful image to me—going right to the source of one's creation of distance, which isn't the person with leprosy but his own fear, and meeting that with love. That's really stayed with me as a powerful possibility.

It doesn't mean, and I don't mean, that we should get ourselves back into some idealism of "Now I have to go confront the person who's hurt me the most, or the scariest thing in my life." We can start with the aspects inside ourselves that we're making into the other, that we're holding away, that we can't meet with acceptance.

It might be just the patterns of mind—of self-hatred, of self-judgment, of worthlessness, of negativity. I found, again, the conscious practice of this form of metta practice really helps me with that on a daily basis.

Like many people, I had a deeply ingrained pattern of self-judgment. And when it really gets rolling—which of course it isn't always rolling, and you need to notice that if that's a strong pattern of yours—it might not take much to get it going, but it isn't always rolling. Once it is rolling nice and strong, though, you could do anything, right? And it'll go, "Yeah, right, well, you're just doing that to try and make people think well of you. You're just doing that." It's endless.

It's important to recognize that pattern with mindfulness as judgment or self-negativity, to feel the pain of it. I don't mean to push it away or deny it. But once we're familiar with it and it starts rolling, you can actually consciously decide where to let the mind dwell. Do I want to cultivate aggression, aversion, and negativity towards myself? It's the same aggression as towards another. Or do I want to switch the channel to metta? And that's what you've been developing. You're developing a metta channel. You can really change the channel.

You start by simply saying the phrases to yourself. And if you have a cynical turn of mind, the first few times you repeat the phrases, there'll be a little punctuation after each one. "Yeah, right, metta, give me a break. You're making me sick. May I be happy—forget it." It keeps going like that. But what I found, much to my amazement, by the second or third or fourth repetition, that started to drop away. And actually, suddenly, the tune—I can't do metta without it being to a tune. It just sings in my mind, always the same tune. It starts to come in, and pretty soon the heart is meaning it. It's just a made-up tune; I wouldn't inflict it on you. But it really has changed the channel. Those self-judging thoughts aren't running, and the metta thoughts are. It's really very powerful. It's not like, "Oh, the beauty of the universe," but it's quite a difference.

So don't be afraid to change the channel when you see we're going down a road that leads to suffering. You may not feel the emotion, but stick with it. It really does make a difference.

And then we can turn that same quality onto more difficult and painful aspects of our own experience—physical pain or physical illness, grief, loss, really strong pains that we've been living with. Not to make them go away, but simply to include this aspect of experience without making it the other.

Someone said today in a group that she'd been dealing with a lot of physical pain and suddenly got it that happiness is presence. It doesn't mean happiness means the pain goes away. But in total presence, which is metta, there's peace, there's ease. It doesn't mean we have to make the pain go away.

I'll just read a short piece. Susan reminded me of this. It's a long article; I just want to read a little bit. It was written by a man who had a degenerative lung disease. He was in the seventh year of it, a Buddhist practitioner, a student of Chögyam Trungpa's. And he was describing in this article the many different ways he was learning to open to, to come to terms with, to include the disease and the effects of it in an open heart and mind.

He says, you know, it implies a battle—that illness and death are assumed to be very bad news, perhaps a punishment of some kind. And I know personally it's easy to internalize that with illness, with sickness. That it is a punishment. It's a sign that I'm bad. I've done something wrong. So already, the other, and I'm bad.

And he said, "I would rather not have a knee-jerk reflex towards battle. Something's happening in my body. Do I have to go to war about it? Paraphrasing the words of Dylan Thomas, do I have to burn and rave and rage? Can I make another kind of response?"

And the response he chooses to make is to simply bring full, kind attention to what's happening and to the effects of what's happening, and to see.

This is another example: "Walking anywhere with friends, especially uphill, is an occasion for silence because I cannot walk, talk, and breathe at the same time. Every gram of oxygen must be used for locomotion. There's nothing left over. Superfluity must go."

This becomes an amazing metaphor. In my life, in my mind, what is superfluous? Anger that freezes into resentment. Jealousy, greed, gossip, ego clinging, pretense, embarrassment, running after pleasure, the discursive thought that maintains the storyline of me. These things are very costly in terms of the life energy that it takes to keep them going. They're what conversation is mostly about.

"I can't take in enough oxygen to support them anymore, except by holding completely still and doing nothing else. When the oxygen diminishes below a certain point, you must choose absolutely between feeding all your mental bloodsuckers and taking care of your true business. You can't afford to keep them around as pets."

So what an opening, what a discovery follows from that simple realization. Could I ever afford it? Can anyone? What made me think that I could not let go of this expensive baggage before now?

And he just goes on—not in a mushy way at all, but really seeing how by opening to and including the disease in his full connected attention, a whole other world of understanding opened up for him. He said, "How could I call this an enemy? How could I call this something to battle? It's simply what is."

Internally, externally, we can bring that quality of clear-eyed attention—which is mettā, which is also mindfulness—to whatever's arising that's painful, that's difficult, that's wanting, that's causing suffering and separation. It doesn't mean we can't act or respond appropriately. Not at all. In fact, as I said the other night, we can see so much more clearly that it's not that we even think, "Oh, I'm going to do a big mettā action." It's just what I heard one teacher call "doing the obvious." You just do what's the obvious thing to do in a situation for the benefit of beings.

My favorite story that demonstrates this I heard on NPR a couple of years ago—an interview with a basketball player. It was his first year in the NBA, his rookie year, which I would imagine would be the culmination of what would be possible for a young man—to make it to the NBA. They were interviewing him because his sister had kidney failure and needed a transplant. He was a match and was planning to donate a kidney to her. That meant the end of his career in the NBA.

The interviewer was like, "Oh God, you're so amazing, giving up your career to give a kidney to your sister." And the guy was just so... "What are you talking about? I have two kidneys. It's my sister. She needs a kidney. I can give it to her." He didn't say this, but what I'm saying is: it's the obvious thing to do.

That's really metta. Not "I am giving such a loving thing." There's no separation. There's just connection. One does what's obvious.

I'll end with this short passage from Shantideva, the great Buddhist teacher from the ninth century: "Even when I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises, because it is like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return."

So let's feed ourselves for a little while.

Thank you for your attention. Please stay gently but sincerely with your practice tonight, through the night, through tomorrow morning. Even if you think nothing is happening, there's a lot going on that we're not able to intellectually realize at the moment.

CHAPTER 341

Awareness Is Our Refuge

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this opening retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the fundamental question of why we practice meditation and what we're actually seeking. Drawing on the Buddha's core teaching of dukkha and its cessation, she challenges the common assumption that happiness comes from arranging pleasant experiences and avoiding unpleasant ones. Instead, she points to awareness itself as our true refuge—something always available, utterly ordinary, yet profoundly liberating when recognized.
>
> Wilson introduces the concept of "contentment with awareness" from Ajahn Buddhadāsa, explaining how the practice involves a subtle foreground-background shift from being immersed in experience to resting in the awareness of experience. She uses the Buddha's teaching on the two arrows to illustrate how we compound our suffering through reactivity—the first arrow being unavoidable unpleasant experience, the second being all our mental elaboration, complaint, and resistance. The awakened person, she notes, experiences the first arrow but doesn't shoot themselves with the second.
>
> The talk weaves together practical guidance with deeper wisdom, emphasizing beginner's mind, reverence for each moment, and the counter-intuitive discovery that willingness to be present with difficulty opens into compassion. Wilson concludes with teachings from Pema Chödrön on bodhicitta, showing how refuge in awareness and tenderness for all beings are two sides of the same coin—our true home that we've simply forgotten.

So we come to the latter part of the first hot day together. Sometimes this is a real valley period in the retreat. Sometimes the first day is really a struggle. If that's been the case for you, just know that everything's changing and it doesn't stay like this for eight days. If this has been a sublime day, unfortunately the same holds true. Things are always changing.

What I want to try to do tonight is give a context for what we're doing here. I can imagine some of you might well be thinking, "Please give me a good reason to stay here for another day." That's common, and not just on your first retreat. At the end of a long, hot day—and I've been doing this for thirty years—the mind will still think, "I need a really good reason to do this for one more day. I'm out of here."

So what I want to try and do is give the context that keeps me there. Because I stay for a good reason, not to prove something, not because I'm ashamed to leave. I mean, all those things come up because I'm recognizable, right? If I leave a retreat, there's enough people who know me—can't get away with it. But I want to put this in the context of the bigger picture, why we're doing it.

As most of you know, if you've read anything about Buddhism or what the Buddha taught, the purpose of his teaching is really very pragmatic and mundane. He says it over and over in the different texts: he's teaching suffering and the end of suffering. Basically the whole reason he devoted the last forty-five years of his life to trying to help people understand what he had discovered was simply to help us live a fuller, happier, more contented life. That's all, really basic. And at the heart of that, I would imagine that whatever specific reasons each of us might put on it, that basic wish to be happy is what draws us—not only to this, but to actually almost everything we do.

The context of our particular meditation practice, of the understanding that begins to come through from this practice, even if you don't understand it, is that for most of us, in the common way of the world, we actually misunderstand what it means to be happy and why we're suffering. So all the different things we'll talk about in this retreat are trying to come at this basic misperception, this misapprehension of who we are and what allows us to be happy, what keeps us in struggle, what keeps us suffering. We come at this misapprehension from different angles.

Of course, basically, I would say suffering is having to be with experiences that we don't like, that are unpleasant. I mean, that's a no-brainer. And happiness is not having to do that and getting to be with things we like. Makes sense. Not hurting, not being sick, having our friends and loved ones be happy, not being hot when we want to be cold, whatever it is. And because on some level that's our belief system, we can spend our whole life trying to organize and make that happen.

I would imagine many of us have devoted a great deal of our life to that pursuit. If we could arrange and manipulate and control external experience so that everything's the way we like it, then we'd be happy. And then we turn that around and do the same with internal experience—how the body feels, what emotions come up, how we react to situations. This is normal and natural. It's certainly what I learned. It's what we're taught.

So what I want to talk about tonight is that our practice isn't so much about creating a certain state or set of conditions that are going to do it for us finally, and make us happy. And then we can live happily in that state for the rest of our lives. I thought this, really. It sounds rather obviously stupid when I say it, but check out underneath what you sort of unconsciously believe.

I will just shamelessly say that for myself, I even now keep finding myself coming back to some subtle way of believing that if I do this practice or any other spiritual practice long enough and finally figure out the correct way to do it, then suddenly the world, the inner and outer world, are going to finally fall into line and I'm going to reach that final understanding, that bliss of enlightenment, that lasting peace—which I visualize as a particular state that I've created through my efforts at practice.

What we're doing here is actually not that at all, which might seem discouraging, but actually as we begin to understand it, it's a huge relief. Because what this practice is about is not so much about trying to achieve any particular state. The practice is all about attitude, about our motivation, about how we understand and relate to whatever it is that's arising—so-called internally or externally—in a moment. It's not about getting to a place where we can actually control what's arising internally or externally.

In Buddhism, the way we see things... although I'm quoting Buddhism, really whatever I'm saying comes from having discovered it's true in my own experience, or I wouldn't say it.

Everything rests on the tip of motivation.

If you look at how we tend to evaluate our successes, our failures, whether what we're doing is worthwhile, what we're trying to achieve—just keeping it to this meditation retreat—we tend to be rather result-oriented, don't we? We evaluate whether something's any good by whether we get the results we want. I evaluate my own worth, whether I'm doing well, my sense of who I am, often by the results that particular actions achieve. We evaluate ourselves by the experiences that we have.

So, for example, to stay within the meditation retreat, a sense of success might be—and look in yourselves for which ones your mind is attaching to—it could be finally getting calm, the body stops hurting, or you're able to be with ten breaths in a row. Or if you're being really unrealistic, your idea of success is that you'll be completely present with the breath for the whole sitting without your mind wandering. I just want to put out: for the first few days, completely, totally unrealistic. You could drop it and you'd be a lot freer. Or maybe you came here to open your heart, to be more compassionate, to work on your sadness—you make the list. All of which are very fine aspirations. It's not that there's something wrong about having a higher aspiration. Of course, if we didn't, why would we be here anyway? If we thought absolutely nothing whatsoever would happen or change from being here, how many people would still be here? Certainly if it's all the same, well, let's go to the beach.

So there's nothing wrong with having a goal, an aspiration. But what's tricky, what we learn from the moment-to-momentariness of being present in this practice, is that once we have the aspiration, we let it set our path and then we really just let go of it. All of our understanding, the place of peace, the place of freedom and ease that the Buddha spoke of—that we do discover over and over and over, not a one-time thing, over and over and over in our experience on or off retreat—a place of ease actually opens up from within our attitude. The place of ease comes about from a shift in how we're relating to experience, not from making a particular experience happen.

This is so counter to our normal way of relating that it's really hard for us to get it. I never mean believing it. It's not about believing me. It's about seeing in our own experience. Because what this path is about is a shift of motivation, a shift of intention. And it comes about naturally through the mindfulness—from our motivation of trying to get something, however noble the thing we're trying to get may be, or ignoble, whatever it is. But when you come in and you sit down and in your mind is, "This time I am going to be with the breath for fifteen minutes or else," what does that set up? How is peace possible in a mind that's on that track? "I either do this or I'm a failure." That's suffering. That is the suffering. Whether you're with the breath or not is immaterial. The suffering is that setting up of leaning into, striving, trying to make something happen, looking away with all our energy from right here and now, this moment, whatever it may be that's happening.

The shift of motivation is from this comparing, striving, wanting, yearning, leaning forward—and then hating and judging and comparing and blaming when it doesn't happen. The shift is to a sense of really loving and appreciating awareness for itself. So that what begins to be generated is what Ajahn Buddhadasa—who was a wonderful Thai monk, a meditation master who ran a forest monastery for many years before he died—talked about: what we're learning is to generate a contentment with awareness.

I keep talking about it because at first I don't know if it even makes sense to us. We're so used to involving ourselves in the experience—I like this, I don't like this, what does this mean about me, how can I get this to be different, this is so difficult, how can I stand it—rather than resting in a contentment with the awareness itself. And awareness is here and can be with us no matter what the experience is. This contentment with awareness manifests as a kind of love, a devotion almost, a reverence for wakefulness, for really being wholeheartedly present here and now.

Our mindfulness practice is what leads us into it, but it manifests really with a kind of reverence for life. Rather than feeling in struggle so often with whatever it is that's going on, this sense of contentment with awareness, with wakefulness here and now—it's a sense really that we've come home. There's not really another way to say it. It's not some flashy, firecrackers-going-off kind of experience. It's so normal, so everyday. It's not something we have to create. I mean, awareness—do you have to do anything to hear me talking? Other than not be in a coma.

But to really hear me, you don't have to do much. To feel your hands touching each other, it's not a huge effort. That's awareness. It's so much who we are. It's so normal, really, that mostly we don't even notice it.

And that's what's such a mystery, such a wonder to me about our whole spiritual path and about all the difficulties that we go through in meditation—because God knows, I know, it isn't easy. We talk about how normal and natural awareness is, then we sit down and just go through torment, trying to feel the breath, trying to feel the footsteps. Why the heck do we do that if it's so normal and natural and with us all the time? There's some disconnect going on here.

And that's exactly right. There is a disconnect going on here. We basically overlook awareness itself. We overlook the really freeing, easeful, happy potential of having confidence, of taking refuge in awareness itself. When Guy was speaking about the three refuges last night—we took refuge in Buddha and Dharma and Sangha—they're all different aspects of this pure awareness, which is really who we are. You're not going to find yourself ever separated from that. But what we do is ignore it. In fact, the very word ignorance, when we speak about the suffering and confusion that we go through around experience, we always say that at the root of it is ignorance. And ignorance is really this ignoring of the freeing potential of taking refuge in awareness.

So that's what I want to talk more about, because I know it might not make really any sense yet what I'm saying. And all I'm trying to do in this whole talk is point you back to your own experience over these next few days, to play with this, to explore.

This awareness that is our refuge, that is always available when we can remember to notice it—it's like the big open secret of spiritual life, of our whole life, not to separate spiritual out. It's not somewhere else we have to go. It's discoverable, and we build up confidence in it only and always by bringing ourselves fully here right now. Because it can only be here right now. Where else are we going to discover our true home?

And so all of our practices—being with the breath, coming back from thinking and whatever's going on, using the breath and the sensations of the foot and leg in walking—we're using those as tools. Not that the breath is some fantastic thing. I mean, breath is great. Yeah, we'd be really in trouble if we didn't have breath, so in that case, yes, it's fantastic. So also is being able to walk—it's wonderful. But we're using those specific experiences as tools, so that when we feel a breath, when we feel a footstep, the victory, you could say, the point of practice isn't the quality of the breath or footstep. It's that we're awake again. That again we can notice that awareness. Only when we're aware can we feel the breath, can we know if it's an in or an out breath, can we feel the footstep.

I talk about this in the beginning of retreat to set the attitude with which we actually embrace all techniques of spiritual practice. The technique is embedded within the attitude or motivation of contentment, of reverence for the sense of being present itself. And we're using all our techniques to help us reconnect with that over and over. Without that understanding, we really get easily caught in our habits of doing activity for result. Breathing in order to have more breaths, or to get more quiet, or to stop thinking, or to have the breath be finer, or to get to some juicy emotion—whatever the thing is you want to happen.

It's paradoxical to us, because mostly, certainly for me, I was trained to put out tremendous effort in order to make something specific happen or to get something. I didn't really know how to be really totally present, wholeheartedly committed to being present. Not to be somewhere else, but just to be here. Just to be with this breath. Just to feel this sadness, just to feel the sensation as my foot touches the ground, or this niggling pain in my back. It's antithetical to what we're used to doing.

And the reason we practice so much is because each moment that we wake up—ah, thinking is happening—you're here, right here.

You don't have to go anywhere else for awareness. It's right here. The breath—it's right here. Each moment. You don't even have to consciously or intellectually recognize, "Oh, this is what's happening. I'm countering the habit of striving to make something happen by being present in the moment." You don't need to think that every moment. Please don't think it every moment. It happens by itself, which is what's so nice.

So all of our practice is to help us recognize and trust and have confidence in the power of awareness itself.

The Buddha, right after he awoke, after his awakening, his enlightenment, was sitting around for seven weeks, really happy, basically, seeing how he'd really freed his mind from getting caught in reactivity and suffering. And he wasn't too motivated to teach, actually. He thought, you know, the truth is so subtle and it would be hard for people to see. I don't know if I should bother. That's basically what they say he was thinking. And then a divine being, so to speak, came down and said, "No, no, there are people who can really see. Please, teach."

And there's a line he said afterwards when he decided to teach, which I really love. He said, "Okay, the doors to the deathless are open for those who hear, for those who see." The doors to the deathless. It doesn't mean this body isn't going to die. It's really speaking about the deathless quality of awareness itself. And not that we have to go somewhere else to go through those doors and be home. They're open now. We just need to see, to hear in a different way—to see what's really happening in this moment, as opposed to our habits of mind, which tend to concoct a whole lot of extra stuff on top of what's actually happening.

So having confidence in awareness—to me that's like this amazing gift that somehow has been opened up in my life. Having confidence in awareness, what does that mean? It hinges on the fact, and again, please explore this in your experience, that whatever is happening—whether it's as mundane as your breath, or lifting your foot, or a difficult emotion coming up, or you're caught in a stream of planning thoughts, or you're just feeling incredibly reactive and hot and restless and your back hurts and you just want to get the heck out of here—whatever it is that's happening, there are the physical sensations or the emotional mood or the thought in your mind. It's pleasant or it's unpleasant or it's neutral. And there can be awareness of it, can't there? You can be really angry and you can know that you're angry. You can know that anger's happening. You can be aware of what anger feels like. That makes sense?

And because that's possible, you can see that awareness, while it comes out of the anger—it's not like it's over there and the anger's over here, you're really feeling anger or tiredness or restlessness—but the awareness is not the same thing as the anger. They come together.

Mostly we look through the awareness and just get involved in the anger, or what we think about ourselves because we're angry, or how justified we are because we're angry, or how it makes us feel. We completely get involved in what that other person did that made us angry and what's the matter with them. We get completely involved in all of that, almost entranced, so that a lot of the time all we recognize that's happening is that particular thing—the anger, the story about it, how we feel about it. We project it into the future. We go back to our third grade class. This person's just like my teacher. I can't believe it. What's my karma? She sounds just like my third grade teacher, Mrs. Jubinville. See, she just popped into my mind. She had blue hair, Mrs. Jubinville.

She sounds just like my third grade teacher. And we're like, is any of that happening? Really? Other than as a thought in the mind? But we get so involved in all of that, we don't notice the awareness.

What this practice helps us do is make a subtle foreground-background shift—from being completely submerged, immersed in whatever's going on, to coming home and relaxing into the awareness of what's going on. I know it's subtle to talk about. Play with it. It's not some fancy thing. It's simply recognizing that awareness is actually stronger, ultimately, than any experience that comes and goes.

Not always. There are moments, of course, when we really are submerged in experience and you think, "What the heck is she talking about? This is what it is and I'm really in it." But there will be other moments, and that's why we pick relatively neutral things—like breath, like walking—to start with. We don't say, "Sit down, think of the worst trauma in your life, and now notice awareness of it." That would be hard. We start where it's easy, practicing over and over and over until we start to notice: there's breath, there's sensations, there's the awareness of it. They're right like this, intimate. But we can begin to generate a sense of coming home.

Being in the awareness, trusting that, taking refuge in it—this actually allows us to be fully present with just about anything. I read somewhere that St. Augustine said the reason humans behave as we do is because we're not living in our true home. That completely resonates with me. And our true home isn't the house we're hoping to build on Maui. Our true home is awareness. It's already here. We don't have to go somewhere else. We just have to turn around our field of attention and come back into what's seeing, what's hearing, what's knowing, what's wishing it could get the heck out of here. Turn back around and notice that.

This brings, over time—recognizing over and over and over—a sense of real freedom and confidence. Confidence. One of my teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, a Burmese meditation teacher, really tough, from the school of heroic, courageous effort. That's the good way to put it. From the school of "you sit and you don't move, and if you die while practicing, well, that's a good way to die." He's not exaggerating. That's the school. But he said this to me once in an interview, and it was really helpful: when you can truly contact awareness with confidence, you don't have to be afraid of anything.

And I've really felt that. The whole show keeps coming and going. It's the internal show that actually traps us, often much more than the external one. But we don't have to be afraid of it when awareness becomes our refuge. Our practice is learning how to trust that—learning how to recognize it first, and then trust it.

So let's try a little experiment. If you would be willing, put your hand out and just move it back and forth. Don't pay any attention to it. Think about something else. Think about what you want to have for lunch tomorrow. Think about that house on Maui. Think about how hot it was. Okay, now stop a minute. Do the same thing again, but this time really let yourself wholeheartedly feel the movement. That's all.

Now first, the second one—was that hard to do? To just for that little short time feel the movement? If I kept on doing it, I know the mind would go off because that's its habituated pattern. But just in that moment of feeling it, was that too hard? Nothing really esoteric, was it? In the moment. And even in that short time, I know it could well be that your mind went off a few times. But during that time of just feeling it, was there really any big problem? Just in that moment. And it's just a little brief moment, I know. It doesn't seem like much.

But what I'd like to suggest is that you keep noticing moments like that throughout your time here—in the being with the breath, being with the walking, when you're eating, when you're taking a shower. A friend of mine calls it, and it's her word, the place of no problem. It's not really a place. But it's when we're just for that moment singleheartedly with awareness. Whatever it is that's happening is happening. It's pleasant or it's unpleasant. It's intense or it's mild. But the awareness gives us a spaciousness and a wholeheartedness of attention that ultimately, within any experience, we really can find a peace, an ease, a way of being in that moment, in that experience, where we're not in struggle or self-hatred or other-hatred or fear.

And we tend to want to project that long term and say, "I can't do that, you know. I experienced it for a second but that's meaningless. I need it for my whole life." Come back. Just be in this moment. All of our life is moment, moment, moment. As hard as we try, you can't be anywhere other than this moment. Even when all this stuff about the future and how hard it is—that's just thoughts happening right now.

So this is a second huge relief. It's been like an incredible burden lifted from me in my life. When through my practice I realized: Oh, it's always only this moment. And even when I've been in really paralyzing grief and fear, if I can get to, "Okay, can I be with it this moment?"—in this moment, I always can.

True, we forget that the next moment. We think, "I can't bear this another moment. I can't bear it." And sometimes the awareness of awareness, the mindfulness, just isn't strong enough. The energy of that isn't as strong as the energy of the difficult state or our fear or our sadness. And that's okay. So at that time we feel like we're drowning a little bit. You need a break. That's when we'd say, go take a walk. But then there's the next moment. And again, we don't say, "I couldn't be with it the last moment, so forget about it." No, now there's this moment. Again, awareness is here. Can we remember? So that's our practice, moment by moment by moment, relaxing into awareness and finding that it really is a refuge. It's a home, the place of no problem.

But our habits of looking to experience, looking to make something happen, looking basically to have things be pleasant and to get rid of what's painful and difficult—these are so strong. Our habits of interpreting almost every experience in terms of what it means about me. This can be really fun, actually. It can be amusing if you would just put that flavor on it. Notice as you go through the day how much of what happens—sound, or it's hot, or somebody burps sitting near you in the hall—how much becomes about what does that mean for me? That makes me feel like this. That makes me feel like that. It's like me, me, me, the little center of the universe. It is exhausting. It's the most exhausting, limiting thing.

Just to notice it and laugh at it is helpful. But the habit of extrapolating on experience from this point of view—how can I organize experience to make me feel better, basically—is so strong that we're gone from present moment experience just like that, without even noticing it.

So our practice is about shifting those habits. Mindfulness, this quality of just being present with experience as it is, very simply—feeling the sensations of the breath, the sensations of walking, a feeling of sadness, very simply. That's really what cuts through, what helps us recognize there's another way to be with experience: the simple presence, mindful presence.

There's a Burmese saying that brings home to me the sense of mindfulness. The saying is: make each person we meet an object of reverence. From mindfulness I extrapolate to that—can we just make each activity we meet, can we make each experience that arises in our mind, in our heart, in hearing and seeing, just for that moment an object of reverence, an object of respect? What that does isn't so much to make that experience be something special as to bring the attitude of being willing to just be fully here for it.

Someone asked about the bowing—what's the bowing about? That's not anything you need to take on, but it comes from the Asian tradition: Thailand and Cambodia, Sri Lanka, Burma, where these particular forms of practice have been passed down, and where we've all practiced at different times. It's just an expression of reverence. When I bow to the Buddha statue, I know it's a statue—I mean, I know it's just a statue. But what I'm bowing to is the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. What I'm bowing to is really the power of awareness in me and all of us. And when I do this, I'm kind of just bowing as a sense of reverence to all of you.

Bringing that sense of reverence to whatever we do—to drinking your tea, to washing the dishes when you're finished with your meal. Reverence to just do it with our full attention, wholeheartedly, not split off in ten different places, not hurrying up to get through this in order to go meditate. It doesn't matter what you're doing. Making an object of reverence is to just be wholeheartedly present without preconceptions, without a lot of assumptions. What does this mean? What's going to happen? Just wholeheartedly here. Play with this. This is really the essence of our practice.

In this wholeheartedness, this bringing a sense of reverence to whatever we're doing, that's the place where awareness becomes accessible to us, where we begin to recognize—and not only recognize, but cherish, really—to see that our refuge is this total presence, rather than feeling our refuge is somewhere out there, getting away from something unpleasant, holding onto what's pleasant.

This essence of mindfulness, sati—often we use Suzuki Roshi's phrase. He was the famous Zen master in San Francisco from Japan. He has a wonderful book, if you haven't read it: Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind. It's just very pithy, to the point, just brings up this sense of presence and acceptance of things as they are in this moment, simply because in this moment that's how they are. Out of this total presence, intelligent response is possible, and it actually arises quite spontaneously.

Bringing beginner's mind—that's Suzuki Roshi's phrase—can we meet this sensation in the back, this feeling of sadness, this next breath, with beginner's mind? That means not, "Oh no, this cramp again. It's another forty-five minutes of hell I'm going to have to go through." There's no freshness in there. There's no beginner's mind. You don't even know what that feels like once we've met it like that. "Oh, this anger. I can't believe it. I'm going to be in this for the rest of the ten days." Be in what? Do we even know? We're not even touching what's happening. We're off in our reactions.

So beginner's mind is, can we just bring a freshness, here and now, meet it without bringing in all of our cultural and personal overlays? They can be there, but they're different from the experience.

My favorite example of this—I've used it before, but it fits, so I'll use it again. It's from a documentary I saw on German TV. I don't speak German, but friends were translating. It was about Yo-Yo Ma, the classical cellist. He seems like a really open, lovely guy, at least through this documentary. In the film, he was going around to different cultures just to compare music—not even compare, just to play musically with cultures that were very different. In the part that I saw, he was flying to the Kalahari Desert in southern Africa, to a tribe of what they called themselves bush people.

So they show him getting out of this little helicopter with his beautiful cello. I read later that he has a cello worth about two million dollars, so I'm thinking maybe he brought his second-string cello—but it looked really nice.

He gets down and he's meeting with the headman of the group and their head musician. The musician brought out his instrument and was singing and playing, and then Yo-Yo Ma would play on his cello. Then they showed us up close the instrument that the head musician was using, and it was literally a big oil tin. It had been a large oil can, like motor oil or something, with a strut—a pole in it—and a couple of strings. And then Yo-Yo Ma had his cello.

I saw my mind completely making comparisons, you know, evaluating what really sounds good. And then we heard them both. I could see that just because I'm attuned to that Western style of music, that's what I'm used to thinking is beautiful.

But Yo-Yo Ma was completely open. He's going, "Wow, you really—that's great! Let's trade instruments." So he gives the head musician his cello, and the musician is playing around on that. And Yo-Yo Ma is plunking on the other one, saying, "Man, I can't play this nearly as good as you can." He gives it back and was just so into it.

And I could see my mind going, "Oh, that's an oil can with a pole and some strings." My mind couldn't get past that. But Yo-Yo Ma was really seeing it for what it was—an instrument of music, and the person playing it was a master of it. Yo-Yo Ma wasn't a master of it. And he was so enthusiastic, so open, so present.

That was a huge lesson to me about the power of my preconceptions, the power of conditioning that keeps me from just meeting an experience freshly.

What our practice here is doing, and the reason the schedule is a bit stringent—sit for forty-five minutes, walk for forty-five minutes—is because all of our experience is going to come up. It's not going to be nicey-nice all the time. That's important, that it's not always nice, so we can bring a freshness and see what's really the point of difficulty, the point of real suffering here. Can I meet this experience freshly without all my preconceptions?

And maybe for a moment we can. You might discover in that moment that there's a huge shift in how difficult it is to be with something that we thought was just unbearable. Or how it's really okay that something we love changes and goes away—that that's okay too. This is really what we see: to bring a freshness rather than our overlay.

When we have our overlay, if we don't know it—and often we don't know it—we're seeing everything through that filter.

A Zen story a friend told me: A really fierce samurai warrior went to see a Zen master in ancient Japan. Really fierce, really angry. He went wanting teachings, but he was just cussing the Zen master out, calling him a pig. "You're just a pig. And everybody here is a pig." Just really out there.

The Zen master just let him go on. Then he looked at him and said, "And you, sir, are a Buddha."

That stopped even the samurai for a moment. He said, "I? A Buddha?"

And the Zen master said, "Well, a pig sees a pig. A Buddha sees a Buddha."

So part of what we see in the practice is: what veils are we looking through? And as soon as you see the veil, you don't have to go anywhere. As soon as you see, "Ah, I've got pig veil on"—in that moment, we're in awareness. You're not caught in it anymore. You don't have to go somewhere else. We just have to see it.

The Buddha gave a lovely teaching that I'll share very quickly because I think it really helps us see the difference between just what's happening and all the extra reactivity and story and wanting we put on top of it. Very simple. Someone came to him and said, "Hey, listen—what's the difference between someone who's really awakened, what you call free from suffering, and a normal, ordinary person?"

The Buddha said, "Well, a normal person experiences pleasant feelings in body and mind, unpleasant feelings in body and mind, and neutral ones." We don't often think in those terms, but if you consider it, that's what we have: things that are nice, things that aren't, and neutral. And so does an awakened person. That doesn't change.

For years, somewhere in my subconscious, I thought that if I could finally get enlightened, I wouldn't have anything unpleasant happen anymore. You don't get sick. Nobody you love gets sick. Things you don't like simply don't occur. I'm sorry to tell you, it isn't like that. Even the Buddha went through lots of grief in his life. Stuff happens. That's not what changes. That happens to an awakened person too.

But normal, ordinary people like most of us, when we experience an unpleasant physical or mental thing—an emotion we don't like, or you're sitting here and your knee hurts, your back hurts, it's way too hot—the Buddha's words are that we then "lament, we cry, we moan, we beat our breast, we complain, and we fall into despair."

Does that sound familiar? Does it sound exaggerated? No, it really isn't. What we don't do is see that we're doing this.

So he says it's like that first physical thing—your knee has a little twinge, it doesn't even hurt badly yet, just a little twinge—that's like getting shot with an arrow. But then what we do on top of it: "Oh my God, it's only ten minutes into the sitting. It's only the 2:15 sitting. This is unbearable. I can't believe they expect us to sit here for this long in this heat and they're not turning on the air conditioning. What the heck is the matter with them? I'm going to just stand up. I'm going to tell them what for. I'm going to write a note. As soon as I get out of here, I'm writing a note." Then you spend ten minutes composing the note. Then you spend the next ten minutes wondering where the closest hospital is because you're going to need arthroscopic surgery if this keeps up. "I thought I came here for freedom and instead I'm hurting myself. I'm going to get up. I'm not going to let them intimidate me. I'm getting up and leaving." Then you spend ten minutes hating yourself because you're such a wuss, so intimidated that you won't get up and leave until they ring the bell. Then you hate James, who's here for the 2:15 sitting—I'm sure he's not paying attention.

That's the beating. That's what the Buddha said: we shoot ourselves with a second arrow. Or in this case, a whole quiver of arrows. And he says that's completely extra. We really don't need to do that.

What's the difference with an awakened person? They experience an unpleasant physical or mental experience. And that's all that happens. They experience it and leave it there.

Ajahn Sumedho, a Thai-American monk, has a wonderful description of loving-kindness. He says you experience something unpleasant and you don't create anything around it. You just give it space to be. That's what we're actually cultivating with mindfulness. There's a twinge in the knee. Can you meet that with fresh eyes? Twinge in the knee. What does it feel like?

And when the second arrow comes—oh my god—then we notice that. Ah, okay, fear, aversion. And that's like a new first arrow, but you don't have to create anything around that. Awareness can know fear. Awareness can know pain. Awareness can know self-hatred. Awareness can know anger. The awareness is always available to us, and we don't have to get so engrossed in this second arrow, in this story about basically me, me, me, me, me.

We feel that this is going to help us out of our suffering, but really, it increases our suffering. I don't think I'm exaggerating to say a hundredfold sometimes.

And this is what you'll discover from time to time, not always. That twinge in the knee—you can come back and meet it fresh. Just for a moment, it's like moving your hand. It's just twinge. And it's like, oh, what was all that about? And then we forget. We get caught again. That's okay. We can notice again.

The habit of really getting entranced, seduced by all our reactions and our stories is so, so strong that we can only have compassion and patience for ourselves—and for everyone else—when we see ourselves shooting ourselves with the arrow over and over again. But that recognition, and it really helps a lot of people, oh, second arrow—it changes the whole dynamic. Just notice that in yourself. With that tone of voice. Not "Second arrow, you stupid jerk!" No. Ah, second arrow. All right, that's what's happening. And in that moment, you're not in the second arrow anymore. Awareness is here. Awareness is our refuge. That's what we really learn to trust.

Just one more point I want to make, a short one. When I say awareness is our refuge and we can really bring this freshness, this beginner's mind, to whatever's happening and find whatever's arising in that moment—because it's our avenue to awareness—you could say whatever's happening can be a doorway to the deathless. Really.

But—and this is going to happen over and over on retreat and in our life—sometimes what's coming up, whether it's the twinge in the knee or deep sadness or aversion or just sleepiness... sleepiness can be a real torment, can't it? There are times when we think, take refuge in being present in this moment? This is my true home? I don't think so. And it's just beyond the imagination. Why would I want to be wholeheartedly present for this, you know, if I have an option?

Well, that's basically what we've spent our life doing. If we have an option to be present or not for something unpleasant, we will take that option. One of the things we're doing here is taking away some of your options, you may have noticed. That's one of the reasons the first day can be really tough. Whatever our particular options are, our multiple distractions, a lot of them we don't have. Just by dint of sitting for forty-five minutes, stuff's going to come up. By dint of walking. By dint of not talking.

What becomes hard to remember and to trust is that it's not the experience we're taking refuge in—the unpleasant or difficult experience. It's the awareness. But the awareness—we can only see it, recognize it, when we're willing to be fully here. We can't be in awareness if we're zoning out, spacing out, turning on the TV just not to know what's going on. Sure, sometimes those will work. But sooner or later in all of our lives, we're going to hit the thing—not necessarily here, but in our regular life—that we can't move away from. The distractions don't work. Other, again, than being in a coma, self-induced or otherwise. But even that you're going to have to come out of.

So what we're practicing here is to cultivate trust in awareness, the confidence that awareness really can be a refuge. And to do that, we have to do the counter-intuitive thing of being willing to bring beginner's mind open into the feeling, the difficult thing that's arising.

Pick your battles. Start with the little difficult thing, not the most overwhelming one, because we won't have strong enough trust at first. But what we discover—and this is the point I want to make—is that when we begin to, just for a moment, bring this openness, this freshness to our difficulty, whether it's knee pain, back pain, sadness, or fear, we find that this refuge in awareness manifests in its other form, its two-sides-of-a-coin form. The other form is compassion, connectedness.

Really seeing that in this, through this willingness to be present for this difficult thing—and it can be a minor difficult thing—we are somehow contacting the fact of our connection with all life, with all beings. Even in this silence, in this lovely protected space, in this seeming introspection and self-involvement, which meditation can certainly seem like at times—we can even get down on ourselves for being so reactive to some little pain when there's so much suffering in the world—but the amazing thing is we begin to notice that the other side of refuge in awareness is this compassion, this tenderness for life, starting with tenderness for ourselves in this moment.

I want to end by reading a few statements about this from Pema Chödrön, who's a nun in the Tibetan tradition. In the Tibetan tradition, they talk about the heart of bodhicitta, the heart of compassion, the noble or awakened heart, the heart that's really the manifestation of this tenderness for life, this connection with beings. And again, it's simply a manifestation of our basic pure awareness of who we are. It's not that we have to create this in some intellectual way. When we're willing to just open into presence, this begins to show itself, as if the obscurations that keep us from noticing it begin to be seen through.

So she says: "We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of our existence." In the words of the 16th Karmapa, "You take it all in. You let the pain of the world, the pain of yourself, touch your heart, and it turns into compassion."

"We think that by protecting ourselves from suffering, we're being kind to ourselves. But the truth is, we become more fearful that way, more hardened, more alienated. We experience ourselves as being separate from the whole. And that separateness becomes like a prison for us, a prison that restricts us so that we're just involved in our personal hopes and fears and caring only for the people nearest to us. It's a narrow, limited kind of consciousness, kind of existence. Yet when we don't close off and we let our hearts break, we discover our kinship with all beings."

"Awakened heart is discovered by going into our own pain. It manifests as basic tenderness, basic compassionate warmth. When we walk around like we're expecting to be attacked, we block it." And remember, we walk around expecting to be attacked. Sometimes we're expecting to be attacked from inside. It's not always from outside, right? Just let that thing not arise. We block it.

"When we release this tension between this and that, between me and other, the struggle between us and them, that's when bodhicitta will emerge. On our relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. On the absolute level, we experience it as openness, as awareness, as groundless space." Two sides of the same coin.

"Experiencing the soft spot of bodhicitta is like returning home, as if we had had amnesia for a very long time and we awaken to remember who we really are."

The poet Rumi writes of night travelers who search the darkness instead of running from it, a companionship of people willing to know their own fear, pain, and sadness.

Bodhicitta is also available in moments of caring for things, that kind of reverence for experience I was talking about—like when we clean our glasses or brush our hair. It's available in moments of appreciation, when we notice the blue sky or pause and listen to the rain. It's available in moments of gratitude, when we recall a kindness or recognize another person's courage, another person's beauty. It's available in music and dance, in art, in poetry.

Whenever we let go of holding onto ourselves and our views and look at the world around us, whenever we connect with sorrow, whenever we connect with joy, whenever we drop our resentment and complaint—in those moments, bodhicitta is here.

So that's really the essence of our practice. Can we meet each moment of our life with reverence?

Thank you all for your attention on this long, hot night.

CHAPTER 342

Not Fearing Freedom

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a fascinating phenomenon that arises in dedicated practice: the moments when practitioners discover they may not actually want the freedom they're seeking. Using the Four Noble Truths as her framework, she explores the various ways we resist liberation—whether through subtle attachment to pleasure, fear of losing our familiar sense of identity, or the daunting prospect of opening fully to suffering.
>
> Wilson draws on multiple teachers and traditions to illuminate the nature of nibbāna, sharing the Buddha's descriptions of this "unborn, uncreated, unconditioned" reality alongside Ajahn Buddhadāsa's accessible teaching that nibbāna is simply "the cool state of mind without any kilesa." She emphasizes that freedom isn't reserved for future lifetimes or special practitioners—it's available in every moment of pure mindfulness when greed, hatred, and delusion are absent.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for those moments when motivation collapses and practice feels impossible. Wilson suggests widening our perspective beyond personal suffering to recognize our experience as part of the universal human condition described in the First Noble Truth. This shift naturally opens the heart to compassion and transforms self-centered practice into bodhicitta—the aspiration for awakening that benefits all beings. Drawing on Paṭrul Rinpoche's teaching on transcendent patience, she encourages practitioners to develop "the patience to face the profound truth without fear," reminding us that this holy life has "unshakable deliverance of mind" as its ultimate goal.

The subject tonight is Undaunted Courage, or Not Fearing Freedom.

I want to frame this talk, and also frame your experience—each of our experiences—using the framework of the Four Noble Truths. This isn't exactly a Four Noble Truths talk, but I want to hold what I'm discussing within that framework as a conceptual way of understanding our experience.

I'm assuming you're familiar with the Four Noble Truths. Joseph spoke about the first one last night: that painful, difficult things happen. Old age, sickness, disease, death, loss—all of that. Impermanence, the unsatisfactory nature of experience. If we try to hold on to anything to make us happy, there's the no-self of it all. But basically, it's simply getting it—that this is part of the human condition. It's not a mistake, and it's not something that's specifically only happening to you because you messed up. The first noble truth is the framework to hold what's happening.

The second truth, of course, is the cause of suffering. Not the cause of pain, but the cause of our suffering, our confusion—that we relate to experience with clinging and aversion out of not understanding experience accurately. In other words, if we really understood the first noble truth, we would stop clinging, because it just doesn't make sense. The second noble truth tells us that the cause of our suffering, our anguish, is our clinging, our confused response or reaction to situations. It's really ignorance.

The third truth is that there is an ending of clinging, an ending of suffering. This is where I want to start broadening out a little bit tonight, because this is where it gets interesting. I mean, if there were no third truth, the first two would be a little dismal.

So the third truth—what does it mean for us? What does it mean for you experientially, not just conceptually? Do you even go there in your mind? Other than "Oh no, that's impossible for me." Other than that, or "I've got to get enlightened or I'm going to die." Other than those two extremes, how do you hold or even think about or relate to this third truth?

I want to read you a few descriptions from the Buddha, from various places—his definitions of nibbāna.

"That which is the exhaustion of greed, of hate, and of delusion is called nibbāna." The exhaustion of greed, of hate, of delusion.

"It's hard to see this truth, namely, the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbāna."

And then one other, a different way he defines it: "There is an ultimate reality, unborn, uncreated, unconditioned, and unformed. If there were not, there would be no escape possible here for one who is born, created, conditioned, and formed. But since there is this ultimate reality, unborn, uncreated, unconditioned, and unformed, escape is possible for one who is born, created, conditioned, and formed."

These are different ways the Buddha described nibbāna.

There are two other ways we could think about it, describe it, or experience nibbāna. One is the idea of a moment of freedom, or momentary freedom. Sayadaw U Pandita often describes it this way: a moment of pure mindfulness, a moment of sati, is a moment of freedom. Because in that moment of pure attention, there is no kilesa present. There is no greed, hatred, or delusion arising or being held to in a moment of mindfulness. So this is one way of describing what you could call temporary nirvana.

And then there's the arahat model, which is when the roots of greed, hatred, and delusion are completely abandoned, cut off at the root like a dead stump.

I'm not trying to feed your conceptual mind here. I just want to frame what we're talking about in terms of the Four Noble Truths without stopping at the first two. I'm not trying to get your greed going or stimulate thinking, but rather to challenge you to be conscious of what ideas or attitudes you may or may not be holding to—what expectations or descriptions you may consciously or unconsciously be trying to get to about your ideas of what freedom is. Sometimes that can get in the way.

This idea of momentary and more permanent freedom—a very famous quotation from the Buddha speaks to both, I think. You've probably heard it already ten times just this retreat; everyone always reads it, it's the favorite one: "The mind is naturally radiant and pure, but it is colored or obscured by the kilesas that visit it. The mind is radiant and free of the kilesas that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really understands. And so, for the noble follower, there is cultivation of the mind." Understanding that the mind is naturally radiant and pure, and that this radiance, this purity, is obscured.

It's obscured, it's colored by the defilements that visit. And when we understand that, that's why we then cultivate development of the mind. That's the fourth noble truth, right? The eightfold noble path.

And so, in a way, it's saying that because of the natural radiance—and this is my interpretation now—and our ability to touch that, to recognize it just for a moment, that is what allows us to set out on the path and to continue to cultivate awareness.

So however you're holding freedom for yourself, whether that's a deep motivation for you, whether that's your inspiration, if that's what keeps you going, it really does require of us total commitment to this path. It's not a half-hearted thing.

And at the same time—as it's not half-hearted, I'm going to be going back and forth with two sides the whole night, probably—as Ajahn Buddhadasa wrote in a great article, a talk called "Nibbana for Everyone": at the same time that the cultivation of our heart and mind to really recognize and trust that recognition of the innate purity of heart and mind, at the same time that that requires total commitment, it is the natural possibility for everyone. Nibbana for everyone.

It's a long talk, so I'll just say a little bit of what he's talking about. Ajahn Buddhadasa was very famous in Thailand. He died not quite ten years ago—a very well-respected Theravada forest monk. But at the same time, he was, for Theravada in Thailand, quite radical. Now, that's not radical by our standards, maybe, but for Theravada in Thailand, he was quite radical.

In this talk, "Nibbana for Everyone," he starts out by talking about how basically in Thailand in these days, nibbana is something, the idea of it, that's been shoved aside. And he gives a bunch of examples. He says, you know, laypeople in general have been informed that nibbana is some special place without suffering, where you can just be happy and have everything you want, and you usually get there after death. The developers of the generation view nibbana as a hindrance to economic and social development, something that should not be studied or even mentioned. Students generally put nibbana in a category for old, devout Buddhists, so they don't need to pay attention to it themselves. Young people see nibbana as something bland, with no taste, something truly awful and undesirable. And he just keeps going with different examples.

But then he goes on to say: nibbana is a natural condition. And he's very straightforward and simple sometimes in the way he describes things. He says nibbana is the cool state of mind without any kilesa. The cool state of mind without defilements present in that moment.

He goes on to differentiate between the sense of momentary or temporary coolness, which we all experience a great deal of the time, and what he calls a more permanent nibbana—when the defilements are really uprooted, when the underlying tendencies for them to arise aren't there. The permanent coolness. But he talks a lot about really recognizing that there are many moments of this natural state of coolness when defilements are not occurring.

Coolness is almost a literal translation of the word nibbana. That's what it means: cool. They use the word in Thai to say when rice, for example, has cooled. The rice has nibbana-ed, so to speak. It's just the fire going out. So it doesn't have to be something so incredibly esoteric that you can reach after ten thousand eons and not before.

I like this—he's saying anyone can see that if defilements were with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could stand them? I know some of you are thinking that's how it is, every second without ceasing. But he's saying, really look: under such conditions, living things would either die or become insane and then die anyway. So let us consider well the fact that we survive because there are periods when the fires of defilement are not burning. Why can't we notice and appreciate these times? We're all surviving because of the nourishment from this type of nibbana.

I just like that. It's so down to earth and straightforward.

But if you think of it another way, the fact of the essential radiance and purity of mind-heart is a fact. And that is true—not ten thousand eons from now when we wake up, but it's true now. That's what nourishes us. That's what can keep us practicing. That's what allows for escape from the born and the conditioned and suffering, as the Buddha said. If there were no unborn, escape would not be possible. Now, unborn is true now, not in some other reality in some other lifetime.

So nibbana for everyone—including you, including me.

So that's the preamble.

What I want to talk about is a point that has been at times a fascination for me in my own practice and in talking with people—with some of you and with people on other retreats as well. It's how we can reach, at various times, certain points in our practice. We may reach them again and again, different points on our individual journey, where perhaps we've come up against something. It may be a point of difficulty, but it's not necessarily so.

We've come up against possibly some idea we didn't even know we had—an idea of what freedom or liberation is or should be. Or we run into some notion of what it might entail. Or we encounter something we hadn't really thought about that it does seem to entail.

And people will come in and say, with a sort of surprised or rueful or self-judging quality, on some level they say, "Oh, I'm thinking maybe I don't really want liberation. Maybe I'm not really quite practicing for that uncompromising, radical freedom from clinging. So far, and maybe that's far enough for now."

Have you ever noticed feeling like that?

That, I think, is a really fascinating and juicy and important point when we reach it in practice. There can be various reasons, and I want to talk about some of them, and about ways of reconnecting with our inspiration. Where can we find that undaunted courage that keeps us going when we've hit a place where, for any of various reasons, we're saying, "Okay, good enough. I'm out of here now." Or, "More than enough." Or, "I know this isn't freedom, but if freedom means X, Y, Z, I don't want it."

So really looking and seeing what that's about.

I think it's a rare person who doesn't come up against this. Because being the analyzing, thinking, conceptual beings that we are, you'd be pretty rare if you didn't have some conceptualization of what freedom is, or what our path is, or what it's going to feel like. And when we suddenly run into the sense, the experience—"Oh, freedom from clinging also means that"—I'll give some examples of what I mean—that didn't fit into our ideas of what freedom is. Or freedom from suffering means opening to some of the things Joseph talked about last night. It means really facing this stuff, not avoiding it permanently. "That's what I thought freedom was—that this stuff didn't come up anymore. Not that I have to open to it and feel it more than before I came here."

So I think it's normal that this comes up. With the best intentions and with all that we read and study and all that we've practiced, whatever we think freedom's going to be, it can't be what we think. We can only think what we know.

Krishnamurti's famous saying, "freedom from the known"—that's a really profound statement, in my humble opinion. And there's a saying from the Buddha: "In whatever way people conceive, the fact is ever other than that." Do you get that? That's one of his radical statements. Give it up. Whatever you're thinking, the fact is other than that. It just cuts through.

And now I'm going to blab all night about...

So partly we run up against this wall of, "No, either it's not what I want, or I can't do it"—which is really a common wall for us here. "It's too big a task. Me, with my particular impurities and defilements, whatever they are—I can't liberate myself. Even if there's another ten thousand incalculables and eons, I could never do it. Maybe these other people, everyone else here, but not me. Enlightenment's not for me."

How do we find the total commitment to keep practicing and not have our motivation completely deflated and ebb away in the face of this?

And by the way, this thing about "I couldn't do it with my defilements"—as if it's me that's getting enlightened, as if enlightenment is some kind of self-improvement project that makes me better. As if I needed a better sense of "me" that could get enlightened—when it's the whole standpoint of "me" that we see through in the first place. So your crummy, caught up, kilesa-ridden "me" is as good a one to see through as a purer one. That excuse doesn't wash. You have to keep practicing.

Joseph talked a lot last night about running up against the place of fear when we're coming into the uncomfortable, the difficult, the painful. And I'll again talk about the difficult and how that can make us think, "I can't do this. Enlightenment's not for me."

But first I want to talk about how sometimes it's not always confronting the difficult or the painful that brings us to one of these crises of motivation, one of these places where our willingness just ebbs away.

Fear of freedom—sometimes it's seeing really how subtly we delight in the pleasant, how subtly we really like craving. We really like pleasure. People talk about this often, and there's a kind of fear.

This is what Ajahn Buddhadasa was talking about—the young people say it's just this drab, gray, really boring thing. I can't tell you how many times people have said, "Who wants to give up wanting and fear?" Someone said to me once, "What am I going to do, just sit in my room all day?" As if these are the only options open to us: wanting, fear, or sitting in our room doing nothing.

But the mind can really get caught on that. One person—I hope you don't mind my using this example, it's a perfect very small example—but you can really see how if we're not paying attention, we can just hit that wall and not look more carefully.

She was talking about a bagel day, which I understand again today was a bagel day. It's a big day in the yogi world, I understand that. She was talking about seeing just how much she was loving the bagels and the taste of bagels. And then she started noting "pleasant, pleasant." And it was as if the whole taste of the bagel just turned to sawdust. Isn't that the fear? It says, "Oh..."

I remember one time I was deep in retreat and something very pleasant was going on in the walking, and Sharon said, "Well, you know you've got to know pleasant." And I went back, and the mind had a little temper tantrum. Because I knew very well—not that it would turn to sawdust, but what goes away when we're noting, just noting "pleasant, pleasant," is that subtle identification with the gratification of the pleasure. Gratification meaning "I'm really liking this bagel." And I'm even exaggerating. There's not even maybe the word "I," but the awareness or the energy is kind of coming back to me. Nice taste, mmm. Swallowing, mmm. Do you know what I mean?

The Buddha even said that unwise attention to the gratification of the pleasant is what leads to the hindrance of sense desire. So noticing pleasant—fine. What goes away is that extra "mmm, I'm liking this taste."

Now, it doesn't necessarily follow that if we notice pleasant, the actual experience of pleasant goes away. That's not necessarily true. Maybe that taste of bagel turned to sawdust, but it doesn't mean everything's just bland gray. But seeing how subtly attached we can be to that gratification of pleasure, and thinking, "No. I didn't sign up for this. I want to fill in the blanks..."

And it goes from something as simple as enjoying the taste of a bagel to my relationship. I have to give up my family. I have to give up my home. I have to give up everyone I've ever loved. I have to give up whatever. And then the mind really can go into aversion, fear, a pulling back. "No. If it means this, I don't want freedom."

And again, it's as if in that way the mind is projecting what it can't know. It's giving up the attachment. It doesn't mean we have to go out and throw away everything.

I remember for years when I'd be on long retreats, a long time ago—I don't like to say how long ago, longer ago than I wish—but at one period when I was in a relationship for a few years with someone, we were doing a lot of sitting together, and I could see the place where my mind would, just in the stillness, very quiet, there would just be a little movement of attachment towards the image or thought of that person. I mean, I wasn't talking to the person. Just this little movement of attachment. And as if, "But that's not so big. It's not really disturbing my samādhi. I don't need to really look at it. It doesn't count."

It counts.

And I could see that the fear was this: if I were to look at the attachment, that means the whole relationship has to end. You see what I mean? If I see the attachment—and often people will talk about this—"I'm so attached to my children, how can I not be?" As if by even looking at the suffering of attachment, we're somehow disowning our children, or our partner, or our family. As if we're somehow throwing these things out. And we don't even get close to simply looking at that moment of attachment to pleasure, to wanting in the mind.

That's where Munindra's famous line becomes so important: a thought of your mother is not your mother. You're sitting here feeling attached to your partner or your children, and for most of you, they're not here. It's a thought arising in the mind. And we can be afraid to even feel and look at the attachment to a thought—which is what? Nothing. The thought is gone.

So it's just finding that willingness to look without buying into our idea that it means everything goes, but also the willingness to look without trying to hold on, thinking, "Oh, but Carol said I can look and still have it all too." Just really look. Not think "this doesn't count."

Another aspect that can often bring us to that place of "not this too"—because I've seen it in myself a lot—is a feeling of familiarity with our habits. Our habits of personality, our habits of relating to life, our comfortable ways of inhabiting a sense of who I am—or uncomfortable, they're not even always comfortable, but our familiar ways. It's like, "I like life this way. I don't want to change it."

Really, what I'm talking about here is personality beliefs, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Even our suffering, uncomfortable personality beliefs—sometimes we can just run up against a point: well, who would I be if I didn't think of myself as low energy? I'm picking really simple examples here. "I'm a person who has to go to bed at ten and get up at five, otherwise I wouldn't be able to practice. It's always been that way. That's just who I am. That's just acceptance. I'm just accepting myself."

Who would I be without impatience? Who would I be if I didn't have a snippy, aversive mind? That moment of compassion—well, that wasn't me. That was just a momentary fluke coming through.

The idea of what's possible for us, our creativity, our personal memories, our whole felt sense of familiar physical, energetic, psychological presence—just noticing that sometimes a moment of experience can directly challenge that. And even the suffering ones, we tend to just stay with them because it's more comfortable, it's easier. There's a kind of fear of freedom from that, even though intellectually we all know that putting that stuff down is nothing but a relief. But that's just thinking about the thought of putting it down, the thought of even looking.

Who would I be without these precious memories of whatever happened? Without knowing my energy system? I know what I'm capable of. And that's the end of it.

Entering into, moment after moment after moment, the sense of real unknowing. Instead of coagulating a sense of mental, physical, psychic identity—a real unknowing. Okay, yesterday I fell asleep at nine o'clock p.m., just as I have every night I've ever been on retreat in twenty years. But tonight, maybe it's different. I don't know. Can I meet it fresh without holding on to the ideas of the past?

This is from Pema Chödrön: "To be fully alive, fully human, and completely awake is to be continually thrown out of the nest. To live fully is to be always in no man's land, to experience each moment as completely new and fresh. To live is to be willing to die over and over again. From the awakened point of view, that's life. Death is wanting to hold on to what you have and to have every experience confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together."

Sound familiar?

So even though we say the yama mara is fear of death, it's actually fear of life. That's just so familiar to me, that sense of wanting every experience to confirm, congratulate, and make you feel completely together. And somehow, at times, it's quite easy to have translated our sense of practicing for freedom into: we're practicing to get to that point where we feel totally and finally completely together. Right?

Instead, it's just the reverse. There's no us here to feel completely anything. Always new, radical non-clinging. The actual dissolving of this holding to experience to confirm us—it's freedom. It's a huge relief.

But the process that we can go through, that we do go through, of coming up to these moments over and over again—in myself it's really felt over the years that practice is a series of small deaths. Psychological deaths, emotional deaths. Just kind of dying. And with all the sense of loss and grief and sadness and clinging that goes along with a sense of death.

I don't mean, "Oh yes, death of that person—isn't that freeing?" No. I mean really the sense of grieving that goes along with that. Even if I had to put it in words, it would sound really stupid, because I'm grieving some really unhelpful, limiting idea I've had about who Carol is anyway. What's to grieve? But it doesn't make sense on that level. It's really a sense of grieving some sense of who I am. And it just keeps on going like that.

But it's always moving through to a broader, more alive, more connected and vibrant place of being. Along with it also goes—I feel like I'm losing more and more a sense of what freedom could actually mean, which seems to be a good thing. Because as soon as I have some idea of freedom, it's a box. It's a limitation. One starts trying for that, and already everything freezes.

So that's on the side of where we run up against this—where we really don't want to be liberated from our attachments to pleasure, to our ideas of happiness, our sense of ourselves. And I want to talk a little more on the side of the more difficult aspects as well.

There are a few different ways that I've noticed—and I'm sure you'll notice your own ways—particular experiences where we come to a place where the motivation just drops through the floor. I don't mean just for a moment. We all have these moments of "I'm out of here, this isn't for me, I can't do this." I don't mean the passing thought that comes and goes, even if not so quickly. I mean a much more pervasive sense that I've really hit a place where I don't know any more reason to keep doing this.

Sometimes it's a little humbling when we get to where we see what's been our driving motivation and we see how limited or self-serving it was. But I think for most of us, we're going to start with some kind of limited motivation. We want to suffer less. Nothing wrong with that.

Often what can happen is there's a particular suffering—maybe a personality pattern, or a knot of physical pain, or a critical mind, or so much anger—that you really are practicing to alleviate, to see through. And I have friends, I know plenty of people who, after very sincere practice over years, get to a place of more equanimity, or that particular pattern becomes much less troublesome. And actually, their motivation to practice kind of disintegrates.

I'm thinking of one very good friend at the moment. It was really a revelation to him—it was the middle of a three-month course, and suddenly the reason he'd been practicing, this particular suffering, just went away. He's going, "Well, now what do I do? Here I am on this three-month course—now what do I do?" And he kept on practicing. Of course, if you can keep on practicing in these times, our understanding opens and broadens and we find other motivations, so our motivation keeps changing. But this can be a very confusing and trying phase of practice when our limited aspiration is fulfilled. And you go, "Oh no."

I think that's one of the reasons there are a lot of people who begin practice—in this form of practice or any—but there are far, far fewer who show up at a retreat like this for three months. That's already a very deep commitment, rare in this world. Partly it's because of limited aspiration: "Okay, I'm feeling better. That's good enough."

Or—and this is what Joseph was more talking about last night—there are the times when it's just too much pain, physical or mental. You all know that. Just a grind. It's just too much. You think, "I can't face this anymore." Or it hasn't even come up yet, but there's the intimation. You have this lurking sense of something really big and unbearable that's going to come. You can just feel it's going to come, and suddenly it's enough—I'm out of here. I don't mean just the moment of "I cannot bear it anymore." Freedom from suffering is opening to this? I don't think so.

These are profound moments. I mean, we're laughing a little.

It's nothing to judge oneself about or get critical about or think there's something wrong with us. But it is important to treat these moments as very important times in practice. Because, as Joseph was talking about with fear, these places where motivation drops out are bringing us right up to the edge of our understanding of what's possible, of freedom. And that's our limitation—our understanding of what's possible. That's what we don't know beyond. And that's where we have to find the place of trust and faith that simply keeps us looking. I don't mean striving or pushing. I don't even mean that we're staying steady in any particular form. I'm not talking about technique or skillful means here. Just that willingness to keep showing up. Whether the showing up means a skillful backing off—that's still showing up. It's finding what helps us be present.

But I think because this is the first noble truth—opening to how things are and discovering that heart and mind, that radiant peace that is possible for us no matter what's happening—it necessitates our being willing and able to be there no matter what's happening. And it seems like on this planet there are relatively few people who somehow have that faith, or the courage, and the time and the conditions to do what you're all doing, which means to keep showing up. And not, when it's a really nice day, think, "Well, okay, but today's nice. It would be better if I went off on a picnic."

I remember Myoshin telling me once, a few years ago, she was invited to teach at a daylong somewhere in Connecticut. The kind of thing where they beg you to come, they set it up long ahead—"Oh, we really want you to come." And then she went and it was this beautiful day, and hardly anyone showed up. They really wanted her to come, but it should rain, otherwise they'd miss something. And so where's the real commitment?

Ultimately, awakening—freedom and the compassion that comes with it—becomes more important to us than any particular aspect of our experience. More important than any aspect of our experience: pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral; terrifying, ecstatic, or boring. Simply the love of awakening, of freedom itself, becomes the compelling force. And we stop being so drawn and fascinated by experience itself.

So what can help us when we hit these moments of non-negotiable experience? Non-negotiable—this attachment is not negotiated, I don't give it up. Or this particular pain, this particular fear, this particular thing—it's not negotiable, I'm not going there. How can we keep going?

The suggestions I want to offer—and there are many—this is what I want to offer tonight. When we are really struggling—and again, I'm not talking about moments when it's just a little hard. I'm talking about when we've really hit that wall and we think, "I just can't muster it up again. I can't, I don't want to, and I won't." And as we know, this can last longer than a whole retreat. It can last years. But the staying with it—it changes, as does everything.

So what I want to offer: if it helps you on this retreat, use it. If not, let it go.

Generally, when we're hitting these places, as with everything, when we're really suffering, we tend to be drawn into our particulars—our particular story, our particular suffering, the particular attachment we don't want to let go, our particular feebleness and inability to ever be awakened, whatever. But it's our story, usually.

So here are a couple of ways of expanding the frame. And this is where thinking of your experience as part of the Dhamma, part of the Four Noble Truths, can really help.

First, when you realize it's hard—I mean really hard, not just a little hard, really hard, the hard of "I can never do this," and you really believe that—expand the picture beyond yourself and realize it's hard for everyone. It's not just you it's hard for. Yeah, it is hard. That's part of it, because of attachments. Even though Ajahn Buddhadasa says nibbāna is for everyone, he didn't say it's easy for everyone. It's still hard.

And even teachers like Thich Nhat Hanh, who often gives a message of "peace is every step," just open to peace, notice peace even in suffering—he's not a mushy softy. He said at one point, "We're not determined enough to liberate ourselves from our deepest suffering. It takes huge determination."

Or—I've been waiting ages to use this one—from Suzuki Roshi. This is typical of how you often read Suzuki Roshi, where he's talking about zazen: "Leave your front door and your back door open. Let thoughts come and go, just don't serve them tea." That's great, isn't it? That's nice.

And you feel, yes, it's easy. It's heartwarming. Plus, I like the reference to tea. It's very gemütlich, very homey.

But this is also Suzuki Roshi—this comes from the biography Crooked Cucumber. He just suddenly seems like he lost it in this quotation. He starts saying to all his long-term followers: "Spineless! You only want a sweet pill. You never want the bitter pill. Spineless! You say you want the truth. None of you want the truth. If I told you the truth, I'd be left sitting here alone, listening to the sounds of your cars driving up the road."

I love that. You just get a sense—there are moments where that's so true for me. I see it. I sort of want the truth, to some extent. I like the tea and the open door. But that's not always how it is. So it's hard for everyone. Don't take it so personally when it's hard for you. Don't get so wrapped up in the story, and don't take it as the finality of things. It is, of course, another mental state. Maybe it seems to last for two years, but it's still a mental state.

And again, whether it's the suffering aspect that's putting us off—where we're just feeling lost in too much suffering—or we've hit that really comfortable plateau where we think, "Well, this is good enough. This must be equanimity. Great. I'm going to live the rest of my life like this"—either way, this wretched lifting, moving, placing, dragging through the day, reaching, intention to turn, touching... it's like, "Okay, enough of that." We just want to go back to the pleasure garden.

Like in the story of the Buddha before he left home as the Bodhisattva, where his father kept everything so perfect so he should never see even a dead flower. Every night he'd have servants go out and cut all the wilted flowers so the Buddha-to-be should never even see wilting, never mind old age, disease, and death. Some part of us hits a place—either from too much pain or from "okay, no pain, good enough"—where we think we can go back to the pleasure garden and just hang out there.

But there never was a pleasure garden. Even in that story—was it Joseph or Myoshin who told about Dipa Ma saying that as beautiful as the fall colors are on the lake, it's nothing compared to the deva realms? But even there, they don't get to hang out forever. They die out of there too. There is no permanent pleasure garden anywhere.

One of my very first teachers used to say—he was a little rough—"Once you've really started seeing, you can't just shut down and go back to ignorance." Even if you wanted to, we have moments, but we don't really. The teacher would say, "The velvet-gloved iron fist of the Dhamma has got you." You can't really just shut down and go back to the pleasure garden.

But what can help when you're really feeling like this pain of mine—emotional, psychic, memories, physical, or just the angst of moment after moment of samsara—is just unbearable? What I find really helpful is to move from the particular feeling to the general, to see that this isn't just my pain. This is the condition of the world. This is the Four Noble Truths. Widen the scope. Widen the lens.

You might be saying, "You mean I can't bear my own pain and I should widen the lens to see that this is part of all the suffering in the world?" But actually, that makes a huge difference, because it's the mine of my pain that actually makes it more unbearable.

When we see that our particular suffering—whether it's a sore toe or hunger or grief or illness or fear or trauma—whatever our suffering is, it's a representative of the suffering of the world. We are the Dhamma. We're part of it. It's not that somehow we have to try and connect ourselves. This is an example of the Four Noble Truths. This is the condition of beings in this realm, on this world.

So not only is it something we can't bypass, but also by widening the scope, what happens for me at times is it kind of busts me out of my "Oh, poor Carol," or whatever the particular way you say it to yourself is. And it's quite natural, not even looking for it. What naturally happens is it becomes this expansive link of compassion to the state of beings.

I remember one time—I think I've told this before—I was in a hospital. You can definitely get into that "oh, poor me" state. But I looked around. I was in a room with three other women. Somehow I'd been placed on the elderly women's orthopedic floor—that was the only place they had a bed. So it was really elderly women with two broken legs and arms up in traction, and I just looked around. I thought, "Oh, that's really suffering."

And it just expanded out. I wasn't trying to do a thing. It just happened. Wow, everybody—this hospital has five, six floors. There's people in all these rooms. There's so much suffering here. And all the hospitals just in this area. And you just keep going. It's unthinkable.

But it's also completely connecting, unseparating. I am the Dhamma. All of these people, all of these women are the Dhamma. And as much as it's poignant and painful and at times unbearable, there's also right with it the immense beauty of compassion—compassion that's not only just for ourselves, but that turns into the really ennobling state of heart and mind of bodhicitta, the motivation of awakening not just for myself, but for all beings.

And I find that whenever I can expand the lens, widen the focus, take the highlighting off of my own suffering—not denying or belittling one's suffering at all. It's not a matter of "oh, there's so much suffering, so I have no right to complain." That's also a denial. It's more like, "Oh, yes, this illness is a representative of all the illness in the world. We're all in this together. This is the first noble truth." And the suffering of it is about the relationship to it. It's not about somehow going back to the pleasure garden and not experiencing this anymore. This particular difficulty I might get rid of, but something else is going to come.

I remember once I was invited to talk with some women in a prison, a minimum security prison. It was just an informal talk in a room. And one of the women said something that's really stuck with me. She was talking about how in this prison it was fairly comfortable. They had a fair amount of freedom—they could do things and had activities. And she said it was easy to forget sometimes that she was in prison. She would get so comfortable that she would forget. But then always she'd bump up against some regulation or some restriction or some painful thing, and that would remind her, "Oh yeah, I'm in prison."

That getting so comfortable we forget—she was saying that's not something she ever really wanted to do. And I think it's the same for us. That prison door is really always open. Seeing the freedom from bondage is always accessible, but we have to be willing to recognize the bondage. And the bondage isn't the fact that we're experiencing the first noble truth. That's part of our common humanity. Our bondage is thinking we can jump out of it and get back to the pleasure garden and stay there.

And so I actually find—I know this is a real Vipassana thing, and it would sound totally weird in the world—but I actually find it really deepens and inspires my motivation. It strengthens my motivation when I'm face-to-face with suffering I feel like I can't bear, to widen the scope, widen the lens, and really see, really hear, open one's heart.

The first noble truth and the second are all around us all the time. Life is always showing us difficulty, pain, loss. It's always showing us beauty, love, and happiness. Every day, every minute, just sitting here in this room—even without talking to each other. I know from things people have said, you can sense the suffering of someone else or the peace and happiness of someone else.

Just walk outside and look at the fall, which to me is such a poignant time, because there's this incredible beauty and crispness and freshness and vitality, while meanwhile everything's dying.

And the chipmunks are going wild this year—there's so many of them. I was walking down the road and could see them running on both sides, so full of life. And you know how many will make it through the winter? How many will even make it across the road? That's another question.

I make it a part of my daily practice, a few times a week, to listen to the BBC news, because it really tunes me in—not just to the big news that we all hear everywhere, but to all kinds of little pieces of news, usually of suffering but not always, from all different parts of the world. Places I just hadn't even thought about. Or just in the last two days—a man was here yesterday from Africa, describing the starvation happening right now in Zimbabwe. Just a couple of hours ago, talking with a friend who has MS. Or just going outside and hearing the stillness and the silence and the beauty of simply being awake, of being alive on this earth. Coming here to this room of people so dedicated to awakening, to goodness, to non-harming. It's a palpable force when you walk in this building.

It's all around us, all the time. If we open our eyes and our ears and our hearts, right there we're connected. And I find what happens right then is that the motivation just to stay with it—it's not just for my own sake anymore. It's awakening really for the benefit of beings. It's a much more strengthening motivation. And it's not something you have to think about. It just happens when we broaden the scope. It gives us stability. Moments of beauty, of coolness, moments of suffering, and the connectedness of all of us in this.

The Four Noble Truths are how things are. And we are the Dhamma, you know. We don't have to practice it. We are it. We're just trying to recognize what's already happening by itself.

I want to offer one other thing that has personally helped me in this same way, when the sense of suffering seems unbearable. I was doing a retreat this past winter, several weeks, and it was just one of those Maha Dukkha retreats. Some retreats are simply like that. This is something from Patrul Rinpoche, talking about cultivating patience—which Susan spoke about—patience as an enormous support for being able to come back and stay with what is, in the face of seeming unbearableness. He's talking about patience as arousing bodhicitta. Three types of transcendent patience. And this would go through my mind and give me such fortitude, such courage, really.

The first is patience when wronged. But the second is the patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma—internal hardships and external hardships. So one might say, "Grant me the patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma." And the third is granting the patience to face the profound truth without fear. I would say that over and over, and each time I'd say it, something would just stop. Just grant me the patience to face the profound truth without fear. And let it go.

I want to end with this from the Buddha—just not to be satisfied with less. He says:

"So this holy life, bhikkhus, does not have gain, honor, and renown for its benefit, nor the attainment of virtue for its benefit, nor the attainment of concentration for its benefit, nor knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its essence and its end."

Let's just sit quietly.

CHAPTER 343

Self-Judgement and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this intimate dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines one of our most persistent strategies for creating suffering: self-judgment. Beginning with a moment of pure presence while watching the moon rise over Mount Wachusett, she contrasts this natural ease with our habitual patterns of aversion and self-criticism.
>
> Wilson traces self-judgment back to a fundamental resistance to the first noble truth (dukkha). She explains how our biological reflex to pull away from unpleasant experience creates a gap where aversion rushes in, manifesting as blame, anger, or fear directed at ourselves. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the two darts from the Sallatha Sutta, she illustrates how we compound our suffering by adding judgment to already difficult experiences. The talk explores how our ideals of perfection—whether in meditation practice or daily life—set us up for inevitable self-criticism when reality doesn't match our expectations.
>
> Practically, Wilson offers a liberating insight: when caught in self-judgment, we cannot trust our perceptions about ourselves or our practice. Rather than trying to fix or manipulate our experience, she suggests bearing witness to suffering with what Ajahn Sumedho calls mettā—simply being present without creating anything around the experience. She shares a Burmese teaching of responding to difficulty with "never mind," pointing to the spaciousness available when we stop fighting what is. The talk culminates in recognizing how comparing mind (māna) underlies self-judgment, and how moments of pure presence—free from comparison—reveal the natural peace of simply being with what is.

There's a beautiful view of Mount Wachusett, and the moon, which looked full, was rising. It just rested me for a moment. In that moment of standing there looking at the moon and the view, which was beautiful, there was a sense of silence—though it wasn't really silence. A plane was going overhead. My body felt cold, a little tired. I was still in talk bardo. It was both beautiful and just stuff happening. But such a sense of the isness of things. Now that's a moment of perfection—not that anything in particular happening is perfect, but the perfection of total presence, total isness. A "what's the problem?" kind of moment.

So the question, of course, is how do we get so far from that so fast? That's what we're exploring together all these weeks and in all these talks. What I want to talk about tonight is one of our strategies for causing ourselves immense suffering, which is aversion—in particular, a form it takes occasionally of judging, especially self-judging. I know for some of you this is a foreign concept. But to others of you, there might be moments when you can relate.

Really, it's similar to how I started my talk last week. Personally, I feel that the dilemma of aversion itself, of understanding how we get into aversion, is basically that we get into aversion by not deeply, cellularly knowing the first noble truth.

You remember the first noble truth? Just in case, this is from the Buddha:

"Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of dukkha." I'm going to say dukkha instead of suffering. "Birth is dukkha. Aging is dukkha. Illness is dukkha. Death is dukkha. Sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair are dukkha. Separation from what is pleasing is dukkha. Union with what is displeasing is dukkha. Not to get what one wants is dukkha." He's very precise—really quite precise. "And then in brief, the five aggregates when subject to clinging, the five khandas when subject to clinging, are dukkha."

It covers a broad range. He doesn't say some people get out of here without experiencing that. It's a noble truth, the understanding of which, the clear seeing of which, is the beginning of the road to liberation. That's the whole point of it.

I really feel personally that the struggle with aversion—and self-judging being a subset of aversion—is, on a very deep level, not getting it. That this stuff happens. And there's no way in this mind and body on this planet we're going to have a life where it doesn't happen. And it's not your fault. Get it? That's the basic drift. At least in the beginning, it's not your fault. But we add in quite a little dash of extra along with that.

We've talked often about how the first noble truth seems obvious. We've talked about impermanence as one aspect of this first truth, and I don't want to belabor this point—although I actually think it couldn't be belabored too much, because our habit, our tendency, our deep-rooted habits of somehow thinking we can figure it out, how to avoid, deny, or get away from the first noble truth. It's not really a conscious thought, but that's why I think it can't be talked about enough. Because somewhere deep down we keep hitting that place where, "If I can just somehow get around it, I'm not going to have to go through this. If I can just somehow hold myself separate from this unpleasant experience, then I should be able to." That's sort of where aversion and self-judging comes from.

I don't want to belabor it, but you can see that it's not only our personal tendency—it's in our whole society, the way that we keep the really suffering elements of society, if we can, segregated in their little private place. Nursing homes, hospitals, insane asylums, places for people who are really sick. Keep all the really poor people in the inner city or way out in the mountains, so you don't have to run into them in the nice sections. The effects of famine or war or poverty or earthquakes—we look at it for a little while, if it's not immediately affecting us, on the news, and that's good. We need to open to it. But I can see, I've been watching in my own mind lately, because there's always something new on the news to open to, how my mind can really be with it for a minute.

And then if it feels like it might be getting too close to home—in other words, an earthquake in Gujarat, that's really intense. But after all, it is in Gujarat, and after a day or two, it can kind of recede into the background, except for the people who live in Gujarat, where it's still going on even years later.

But when it feels like something might be happening that might actually be coming too close to home, that I can't just dismiss—well, you know, it's a natural thing. We get caught up in our day-to-day. I was noticing the other day how my mind would be right with some fear of suffering. Nothing horrible is happening yet. Nothing horrible is happening. Just the day-to-day stuff, okay? So don't worry—I just thought I should reassure you. Just the Congress is bad enough.

So seeing how my mind could get caught up in things of the future—this is affecting me, what can I do—and then watching how it would hit a place where: but it's really a beautiful fall, and it's not happening now, so let's just be here now. You see what I mean? It's not exactly "be here now." It's "let's be here now and not think about that." It was actually a very interesting moment. It's the first time I could really feel how it happens, how I was projecting, how one could be in the midst of something really terrible.

I've been reading a biography of Anna Akhmatova, a Russian poet who lived from the early 1900s to the 1960s, through all those phases of tremendous suffering in Russia and the Soviet Union—the times of Stalinist terror—and how it affected so many people, and how the people it doesn't affect carry on. I really saw in that moment how it's possible to just keep going with your day-to-day life, not really letting in what's going on around you, because it just feels too unbearable. It was an interesting moment to see how the mind can do that.

In some ways, that's a protection. I'm not trying to put that down or criticize it. I just think it's interesting to see the powers of denial and avoidance, the patterns that are deeply ingrained in us—on a societal level, and on a personal level.

And that's what we can explore here together in our practice. Our practice is a microcosm of our whole life, of the whole society's life. So the stuff that goes on here in our mind is a great place to explore the nature of aversion—and particularly self-judgment.

Even when intellectually we agree, "Oh yeah, we know that difficult stuff happens," and we see there's a tendency to avoid and deny, and that's not so helpful—still, I think it's a deeply ingrained habit. When I look at it, it seems almost biological in its source. For example, if we don't know the stove is on and we put our hand on the burner and burn it, we don't have to think, "Unpleasant, unpleasant, the wise thing would be to remove my hand." It's just away. And if we're mindful, we just do that. It's a natural, intelligent response—a reflex really—and that's the end of it.

So that's what I mean by biological. We pull back from pain, from suffering, and that's quite useful. But what I've noticed in my own mind is that this reflex can come into play whenever attention or consciousness comes into contact with any unpleasant sense experience. And in that pulling back—which often doesn't particularly solve anything, because often the unpleasant experience just keeps on going. It's an unpleasant sound, or you're feeling physically ill, or you're feeling pain or hopelessness or boredom or whatever.

When we pull back with just that reflex action, instead of everything going away and being hunky-dory again, which is what we would like to have happen, what tends to happen is a gap—a disconnect. It's a moment when consciousness and attention are not connecting with what's happening. And in that moment, rushing in come our old friends, the kilesas of dosa, aversion. Just boom, it comes springing up. It can manifest, as Myoshin was talking about last night, as blame, as anger.

If it was with the stove, for example—because that makes it so obvious—it would be: "That stupid stove, I can't believe it! Who left that stove on?" And it gets going and going. Or it can manifest as anger turned toward ourselves: "You stupid jerk. What are you putting your hand on the stove for? Don't you know any better?"

Or it can turn into fear, spiraling into: the stove's on now, and what if the stove was left on for a long time? The whole house could have caught on fire. What if I'm beginning to get Alzheimer's and I'm leaving the stove on? And it goes on and on and on.

But that becomes a habit. And in that pulling back, that moment of aversion, when we're not mindful, when we don't notice it, the reaction spirals out of control. It has a life of its own, whether it's aversion, blaming—inner or outer—or fear. To the point that the fear or the aversion takes over. And it in itself is so unpleasant that it gives rise to more of the same, until we're kind of lost in either a hysterical state of fear or aversion, but in either case almost afraid to look at what's actually happening.

For example, you know the feeling—and this is a little bit exaggerated, though I know it happens to people—where all of a sudden you feel some lump somewhere on your body, and this is a really yogi mind thing. Immediately the mind jumps to cancer or melanoma or something, and then it starts getting more and more afraid to the point where people will say, "Well, I don't want to go to the doctor because what if I find out it's cancer?" So rather than looking... and the fear just keeps on spiraling and spiraling. But when we're looking, just meeting what's happening, a wise response is possible. Plus, all that extra fear is gone. You see what I mean?

Mark Epstein puts it that it's our fear of experiencing ourselves directly—our fear of experiencing the moment directly—that actually creates the suffering. We get lost in the reaction and forget that we actually have the capability to look at the moment directly. And that's really what our practice is about. Recognizing that opening to truth, to things as they are—that's what I mean by truth, just the simple things as they are in this moment—this opening is what frees our heart from fear and selfishness.

Just like looking at the moon, it's not like it has to be some transcendent experience. It's just that moment of opening to what is, without comparison, without judgment. In that moment, the heart is freed from fear, from selfishness, from judgment, from separation. Resting at ease in whatever arises.

And so, in some ways, with aversion—and I'll get to the self-judging part—our task, if you could put it that way, that comes to us through the practice, through our devotion to wakefulness, to our devotion to presence, is to find that capacity of what you could call bearing witness to suffering. Bearing witness to dukkha in whatever aspect it's presenting itself, in the moment it's presenting itself.

I'm talking about aversion. There are many moments when dukkha is not the main thing presenting itself. Notice those too, right? That's not what I'm talking about tonight, but I just need to put it in. Dukkha, the unpleasant, arises a lot of the time. Pleasant arises a lot of the time, as does neutral. I'm just talking about aversion and self-judging tonight. It's not the whole picture, okay? Just remember that when you start to sink into a slough of despair. It's just one side of the picture.

But really that capacity, the greatness of heart that is displayed when we, or anyone, is willing—just for a moment, for a period of time—to bear witness to whatever aspect of suffering is arising, to me is, I find over history, incredibly inspiring.

The reason I'm reading that biography of Anna Akhmatova is because some of her poems have touched me very deeply, and there's this sense—she's very famous in Russia, really for being a person who was willing to stay through all the suffering and starvation and war and purges. Husbands and sons and friends were arrested and shot and starved to death and committed suicide. She could have left, along with many of the intelligentsia and the literary people at the time of the revolution or the Civil War in the late teens or early twenties. And she always chose to stay out of love for Russia, love for the Russian people, and a sense that this was her calling—to bear witness. Her life was hell in many ways. But that power, that purity of presence that lights us up to a possibility of freedom, a greatness, an ennobling aspect of heart and mind, also can shine through.

I've found that those are the people who always inspire me—in literature, in history. Things I've read about Dr. Martin Luther King. I remember one place I read a statement he made after one of the times in Birmingham when a church was bombed, if you remember that, and four young girls were killed in the bombing. It was pretty horrible. And he said—let me get this right—in the face of this, he said, "I refuse to become bitter. Hatred must never be our motive." And then with that ability to keep meeting the suffering day after day.

It doesn't necessarily mean being an activist. It might mean being a poet. It might mean just being a silent witness. And it doesn't mean we have to be the witness of the great historical movements of an age. Bearing witness to your own suffering here on this retreat, with that quality of steadfast presence, is just as ennobling, is just as freeing, because it frees us from the limitations of our small sense of separate self—holding myself separate, me, me, me. And it opens us again to the vastness of things as they are, of non-distinction, of equanimity, really.

Equanimity being that quality of mind that can simply be with, touch, not having to pull away from the unpleasant, the pleasant, the neutral, and see it clearly. It's like Myoshin was saying last night: not the deluded equanimity that's touching but doesn't really have a clue what it's touching, but one that's really there, seeing clearly, and can just hold it. A steadfastness. It really inspires me.

And I see, when I look to the people I read about, or that you meet or hear of, or the people you know in your own life, or yourself—I see that the quality we can really explore here that allows for this bearing witness, this steadfastness of heart and mind, is that we also have to be able to turn that same kind, steadfast presence back onto ourselves. Because the suffering we can't bear out there, so to speak—it's really what we're feeling in here that's so hard. So it's always bearing witness to ourselves.

And I've noticed in myself, over and over—as long as it takes me to remember—that whenever I'm going through a period in daily life, not just on retreat, where I'm feeling more alienated or dissociated somehow, disconnected, dissatisfied, that sense of something's off, something's wrong—it can be minor, it can be really major—I've always found, finally, that what's going on really deeply is that on some level I'm trying to avoid or deny or get away from something painful or something unpleasant.

It might be some difficult situation in my family that keeps coming up in my mind, and I wake up in the middle of the night anxious and worried, and the mind says, "Can't they just sort themselves out and quit bothering me?" They're fine. They're doing their thing. I'm the one waking up in the middle of the night. Where's the suffering?

And whenever I come home to, "Oh yeah, this is anxiety, this is fear, this is guilt," whatever it is, there's a sense really of coming home. I've found the refuge of the Dharma again. Because, as I said the other night, we are the Dharma. Unpleasant suffering, birth, loss, death—it all occurs in us and outside of us, no difference. So when I can come and open into it, sure I feel the sadness or the fear, whatever it is, more fully. But in that moment, there's a sense of the vitality, the beauty, the intensity of life again. There's not that separation anymore. It's just the isness. In this moment, isness happens to be grief. But there's no problem with that, really, in the moment.

And I know a lot of you have experienced this because you talk about it in the interviews. We fight, we fight, we struggle, we hit our head against the wall, and finally, because there's no other option, we surrender. "All right, I'll just feel it." And it's like, "Oh. Oh yeah." Somehow it's a relief. How could that be? Because we're so deeply ingrained to do otherwise. But opening to how it is, it ennobles us.

But the habits, the denial systems—it feels to me almost biological. It's strong. We each have our own particular flavor, our own particular personality view and personality structure, our own way of denying and avoiding dukkha. The one I want to point to tonight is this one of judging, or self-judging. It's a very prevalent system, at least in this Western culture.

You might ask, "That's a denial system? To avoid unpleasantness, to avoid suffering? It seems to create more." Well, yes, it does. It's a rather flawed denial system. Which is all the more amazing that we so stubbornly keep holding on to it, giving it so much belief and so much energy. At least I do. I speak for myself.

So one thing I've seen—there are lots of different things one could say about judging and how we get caught in it, particularly self-judging. One thing I've been noticing a lot in recent years in my own experience is that coming from the unconscious belief or ideal, basically the denial of the validity in some way of the first noble truth, there arises this sense that sorrow, suffering, grief, loss is wrong. Wrong in the sense that it should not be happening.

I'm not here to say that we're in favor of famine or war or anything like that. Of course not. And we're here trying to purify ourselves of greed and hatred and confusion. We don't want to be a party to creating suffering in ourselves or in others. Absolutely. We're not talking moralistically here of good or bad, right or wrong. We're talking about what arises in experience. That's all.

And so if somehow we hold the belief that in the world none of this stuff should or is going to arise, then it's as if in ourselves, whenever some aspect of things that "shouldn't be out there" arises in ourselves, it also shouldn't be happening, should it? And either we should be able to control it, manipulate it, make it go away, or hold on to the right conditions so it doesn't come up anymore. Or we should just hold ourselves separate from it, not feel it.

What I've noticed this coming from a lot is the sense we can get into of the ideal of perfection. Not the perfection of just the isness of things, but our ideals of how something should be to be perfect. You know what I mean. You all do that about practice all the time. There's some idea of perfect practice. Just what Myoshin said today in the questions and answers—that someone had said to her they felt funny standing up in the hall when they were sleepy because somehow that was an admission they weren't a good yogi. If you follow that through, somewhere in there is the thread that there's such a thing as a perfect kind of yogi who either never gets sleepy or whose mindfulness is always stronger than the sleepiness. As if sleepiness shouldn't exist in the yogi universe. It's a simple example, but notice how often we're caught in that, and what's the response? Self-judging. "I am not a good yogi because some aspect of dukkha has visited my experience, and I should be able to be perfect." As if there were such a thing.

So how we get into this belief, this unconscious holding to an ideal of perfection—and then you notice, I know this is something that's often talked about, something should be perfect, and as soon as there's one flaw, the whole thing's thrown out. That's why we have that expression, "Don't throw the baby out with the bathwater." But that's what we do.

I read quite some years ago an article I cut out of USA Today, some not particularly literary newspaper, but it was about the prevalence of road rage. For those people from overseas—because I talked about this in Switzerland and they were saying "road rage?" Not that they don't have it there; they have it there, just not that phrase. Just that getting so angry. You know what road rage is. Losing it, basically.

It was a whole long article about the psychology of it, and this is the part I wanted to quote. That if someone on the road upsets you, that individual's whole identity is encapsulated in this bad thing he did. He's not seen as a whole person. He just becomes all of it—that bad person who cut in front of you. That encapsulates their whole identity. And then there's an urge to express your aggression on this anonymous other, to think "I can't let him get away with this." The thin veneer of civilization is removed.

With self-judging, we're doing that same thing to ourselves. "I wasn't mindful in that whole lap of walking. I can't let myself get away with this."

And then the psychologist goes on to say that in a car you feel like you're invincible because in a way you're separated. It provides a buffer zone that makes it easier to dehumanize the other driver, easier than it would be, for instance, if you were walking down a crowded hallway. Face-to-face contact with others acts as a restraint, and people are much more polite.

I read that part because Sayadaw U Pandita likes to describe mindfulness as coming face to face with the moment of experience. So in a way, when there's something in your experience arising that you don't like—that suffering—there's that immediate sense of pulling back. You're not meeting it face to face at all. And in that pulling back, it's like on the road: the thin veneer of civilization—or moment-to-moment mindfulness—is removed, and all the aggression and the fear or the aversion, the judging, can come out in response to that unpleasant experience. But the only person you have to take it out on is guess who.

So it just comes right back at yourself as further proof that you're not perfect. And guess what? You're not. It's really amazing how we do this to ourselves. We do it to ourselves, to spiritual scenes, to perfect practice, to other people, to teachers, to you name it. So just beginning to notice this idea of "it should be perfect" and how judging arises when we notice that ideal isn't being met, when it's crumbling.

This denial system of whatever forms of aversion—but in particular judgment, self-judgment—will tend to arise most strongly in us when what isn't deeply accepted, either as being part of the world, arises in us. Whether it's unreliability, uncontrollability, the flux and unstoppability of constant change, or when particular aspects of our mind-body patterns arise that are most deeply painful and unacceptable to us. Sort of like the inner corollary to famine or war, you could say. On the level of mentally thinking, "It's totally unacceptable that I could be feeling this." When that level of dukkha arises, that's when our denial systems kick in most strongly.

Just noticing—probably you already have quite a list—but just noticing what those particular experiences are in you, because it can help you be aware. It can be a little flag to notice what reaction is going on.

It can be in the body. If the body is sick, or tired, or old, or painful, or weak. Or you have some mental image of the unacceptability of how you look—that's really painful. Or emotions. It could be that your emotions are volatile, or you're feeling vulnerable, or you're not feeling any emotions, or you're feeling sadness, or you're feeling self-hatred. Whatever emotions are coming are not just mentally unacceptable, but it's so deeply ingrained that it's unacceptable that somehow your attention can't even quite go there. Remorse over past actions—sometimes you get floods of memories of things you've done that were unskillful, and it can be so hard to be with it. Self-hatred, feelings of helplessness, feelings of worthlessness. The list could go on and on, whatever your particular flavor is.

And seeing that we can't control this—when our deepest, most unacceptable aspects arise in our experience, that habit, that knee-jerk reaction of pulling back, it tends to happen so quickly and feel so natural that often we don't even recognize that that's what's happened. And then the denial system, in this case the self-judging, comes in right away.

Say there's a feeling of helplessness or a feeling of self-hatred, not even quite consciously noticed, but suddenly you notice that as you're walking or eating or sitting, everything you do is followed by a vitriolic kind of self-judgment. And you may not even notice that for a while because that's also so familiar, but it keeps feeding on itself and spiraling.

In a weird way, these self-judgments—or if you're a different type, then the judgments go outward, like Joseph sitting there judging everybody else—but either way, there's judging coming. It's detracting, distracting from whatever the particular suffering was. As I said, it's a weird denial system because it's a suffering one, but the function it's serving is keeping our face-to-face attention well away from just dropping into the self-hatred or the helplessness or the sense of being a total klutz or whatever your particular thing is at that time.

Usually I've found that when it's some particular personal suffering arising on that level, that depth, the thought is "as if I would die if I had to feel this." It has that quality of intensity. And so rather than feel this, I'll just sit here and tell myself: you're lifting your fork wrong, you're chewing too noisily, you're taking too much food, you're breathing too loud, you're sitting like a schlump, you're standing up too quickly, you made a noise with your chair, you bumped into—and that's in two seconds. By the time you get to your room after lunch, no wonder it's unbearable. And that's our way of not just feeling uncomfortable, hopeless. It's a lot easier, I tell you, to just feel totally worthless and land in the middle of it than to go through even half an hour of all that judgment. Or just to feel the judgment.

So let me suggest another alternative. I don't know if it's possible for us, but it's another way of viewing our non-perfection, even just in the meditation, even just that you didn't get up from lunch perfectly and mindfully.

I was teaching in Burma, in Chazwa, this last year. It's a retreat for Westerners with Sayadaw Lakhanah. Sayadaw Lakhanah would give a talk one day, and then Michelle or Stephen Smith usually teach it—I was teaching it with Stephen this last year—and one of us would talk the next day. When Sayadaw talks, after he gives a talk, very much a straight Burmese talk, he'll leave and we'll just take any questions or confusions or clarifications.

He'd been talking about very strict noting practice—noting if anger arises, noting "anger, anger," and then it goes away and then you come back to the breath. Someone raised his hand later and said, "I note it two or three times. It doesn't go away. I can't... I don't know what to do. What do you do?" And then we just gave the whole instructions we give here—feel it in your body and notice the sensations and how to be with it further.

After that, one of the men who was translating, a good friend, a very well-educated Burmese man, was talking to me and he said, "I never heard instructions like that. It was really so helpful." I said, "Oh, really?" He said, "Well, you know, for us, it doesn't go away in two notes either." Which actually surprised me. I said, "Oh, really? So then what?"

He said, "Well, then we say... oh, well, never mind."

I would like to suggest that as a possibility. When it doesn't go away, when the difficult experience persists, and the mind starts in: "I can't do it right. I'm not the perfect yogi. I am so riddled with anger. I am so..." — on and on it goes. And then simply: "Oh, well, never mind."

Just try to imagine how that might feel the next time you catch yourself in heavy self-judging, because of whatever it is. "Oh, this is arising. Never mind." See how much space that leaves.

Ajahn Sumedho says that one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, in a person, or in oneself without creating anything around it. This is what he calls metta. Just witnessing, feeling, being with it — not from ten miles away, but face to face — without creating anything around it. You can call it metta, you can call it compassion, you can call it mindfulness, pure awareness, whichever flavor it has.

It's very much like the two darts that I read the other night, where the Buddha talks about the difference between an awakened and an unawakened person. The unawakened person feels an unpleasant physical sensation and then berates and laments and carries on and shoots themselves with a second arrow. An awakened person feels the first arrow and doesn't create anything around it. This is really the shifting of our patterns.

So whatever arises in our experience — whatever it is you're lost in judgment or self-judgment about, or not lost in but noting, "judging, judging, judging," 7,312 times — noticing it, feeling it, what's arising? Our personality patterns, the physical sensations, our loneliness, whatever it is — the self-hatred, the anger, the sleepiness. In this moment, what's arising is simply arising due to previous conditions. It's the vipaka, the result of previous kamma. It's not in our control. It's not our fault in the sense that if we could do something right, this shouldn't have happened. It is happening, and nothing can change that fact. Nothing needs to.

The question is: how is consciousness, how is awareness meeting this moment of arising experience? That's the creation of new kamma in the moment, and that's what really is changing everything. That's what's reconditioning our patterns, our habits of mind, so to speak.

So anger is arising. We're really feeling it, but we can just be there without creating anything around it. That's developing compassion. That's developing mindfulness. That's shifting the pattern from aversion and judgment to freedom. It doesn't necessarily feel good, because the thing you're feeling is still anger or unpleasantness or sorrow. And we tend to be so focused on the thing that we don't notice the response. But notice the space around it, the not creating anything around it. That's key. That's really important.

One of my favorite lines from the Buddha is: "Where the mind dwells frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." So if self-judging comes up a lot in our experience, it's because in the past our mind has dwelt there frequently. Hating it — well, somehow you think that helps. But hating it doesn't make the mind have dwelt less there in the past, does it? All it does is keep that going into the future.

Seeing it: "Oh, self-judging feels like this. Oh, worthlessness feels like this. I can't do this right. I'll never be able to do this right. I can't even feel this worthlessness. I can't do it." It feels like this. Just move into the space around it. You don't have to fix or manipulate or stop or change. Just that switch — from aversive reactivity, avoiding, denying, to being there — that is the switch. And that is actually the cultivation of compassion, or freedom.

Joko Beck asks, can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and the unpleasantness? Well, sometimes we can, and sometimes we can't, and that's okay. But just to have that possibility—oh, can I find the willingness, just for this moment, not into the endless future, just for this moment, can I find the willingness to rest in the confusion and the uncertainty? That's the dhamma. That's peace.

And it's also a crack up sometimes to see how much trouble we'll go to in order to avoid even the projected idea of how suffering something might be. We'll go to endless trouble to avoid just turning around and facing it. Have you ever noticed that?

I remember one time a friend was wanting me to go teach a retreat with them. We had to organize our schedules—I know it's in the moment, we're organizing in the moment, but for two years ahead. So you have to imagine how you're going to feel in two years. I mean, who knows? Anyway, this friend wanted me to teach this retreat with them. It would have been very crowded, really crowded my schedule. I knew physically it was too much, and there was a lot of traveling. But it was someone I hadn't taught with much, a good friend. And I could feel the fear come up that in saying no, it would be so unpleasant. They would be hurt. I would feel bad. I'd lose the friendship and all this stuff.

I went through weeks of trying to talk myself into going to do this retreat, which would have been endless suffering. And the weeks when I was trying to talk myself into it, when I was afraid to make the phone call to say no—that was also a huge amount of suffering because of imagining how unpleasant it would be to make the phone call. Which in the event, when I did it, of course it was fine. The person understood, it was no problem. To go to all these machinations not to feel something, instead of just: Oh, okay, I can't do it. I'm disappointing you. It feels like this. Nothing created around it. It's so much simpler.

That's kind of the perfection of isness—just what is. But when we're caught in the aversion, the self-judgment, the fear, we can't see clearly. We can't evaluate clearly. In fact, our whole perception is distorted.

When Joseph was talking about perception the other night, some of you even mentioned perception. A good place to observe this is with the radiator sounds here, and quite a few people have mentioned noticing the overlay—the mood the mind puts on the perception of the radiator sounds. I've noticed this. When there's real aversion in the mind, fear, and the radiator starts, someone once told me it feels like explosions going off, little harsh things. Other times I'm in some kind of peaceful place and it sounds like Russian choral music. It's really funny to watch how the mind does that.

But when we're in self-judgment, you cannot evaluate clearly. And if you hear nothing else in this talk, get this: if you recognize self-judging is happening, really not just a thought but you can tell you're really in it—you're mindful of it but you're really in it—you cannot trust any perception or evaluation that you make of your practice. Because it won't be based on seeing clearly, believe me. "I'm really in self-judging, but I can tell I'm just being lazy and I need to push a little harder"—that's the classical one. You just don't know. You have no clue.

If you can just know that, it's been a huge relief to me. I recognize self-judging coming in. I feel it as a certain physical feeling. And I say, "Okay, now I know I can't trust any of my perceptions about myself." That's a huge relief. I'll still have them: "They're angry at me. Look at how they're looking at me. I'm doing my practice wrong. What did they say? They're directing it at me."

Forget it. You just don't have a clue. Can you just be willing to rest in not knowing, as Joko Beck said? It will come and go like a cloud, as all states of mind do.

When we're in that reaction, that disconnect of aversion and self-judgment, we can't make clear decisions because we can't see clearly. So coming back and just meeting the experience—it's not about passive submission. It's about this: when we meet experience face to face—worthlessness, physical pain, sleepiness, whatever it is—we see it clearly. And when we see clearly, we can respond with discriminating wisdom. It becomes much more obvious then.

An example I often use is from quite some years ago, when I was developing what turned into an autoimmune disease that affected my joints and tissues. It was much worse years ago—that's still why I don't sit cross-legged. But when it was coming on and the doctors didn't know what it was, there was a lot more physical pain and discomfort and all kinds of weird symptoms. I could see my mind getting into all kinds of fear of the future: I'll never be able to do this again, I'll never be able to do that. At that point, I was so grateful for practice, because I could see the mind going into the future very clearly and say, "But that's not happening. Just come back." That I could do. I noticed it right away.

But for quite some time, I didn't notice a certain quality of self-blame or self-judgment—the kind of thing we can thank New Age spirituality for, which is: if you really had the proper thoughts and you were really spiritual, you wouldn't get sick. Now I can think, well, Ramana Maharshi died of cancer. I really don't aspire to be more spiritual than he was. But at the time, I didn't really notice how that belief would creep in. There was this sense—subtle, or actually not so subtle, to tell you the truth—that somehow I was a failure. I'd been meditating all my life, and now I was even teaching, and here I was sick. Pathetic. A real failure.

This stuff caused quite a lot of suffering, a heaviness, until finally I noticed—sitting, sitting, sitting—what was going on. Whenever I would touch and just feel my body, the physical pain or the tightness, it was all bound up with judgment. As soon as I felt the uncomfortableness, right away would come this judgment of spiritual failure. Never mind "what if I die from it"—just the spiritual failure. This whole spiral of negativity and self-judgment. And as a result, the attention was just never connecting with the body.

Meanwhile, people were saying, "You should just go somewhere else." Cold affects me, and this climate isn't great for that. So people were saying, "You should just go live in Arizona. Take it easy. Live a quiet life. Don't teach. Take care of yourself." I also tried a really severe diet—no wheat, no dairy, no sugar, no caffeine. That really cheered me up for a few months.

And then finally, sometime during a sitting—I remember I was over there—suddenly, for whatever reason, I just saw: Oh, I'm hating this body as if it failed me, as if it betrayed me. Let me just feel it. And there was a whole sense of compassion, as if cradling this body. It wasn't personal at all. Just: Wow, you're really suffering, and I'm sitting here hating you. That's really useful. And it didn't even have a cynical edge. It was just, "Oh wow. That hurts. May you be happy. May you be peaceful."

And then healing had nothing to do anymore with getting better or not dying or anything. It was just being with what is, and the whole dynamic changed. Out of that, I found I made much more intelligent decisions—to me, intelligent—about how to live my life, rather than acting out of fear. They may not have looked intelligent to the world at large, because the first thing I did was this: some friends were going to India, and they said, "Why don't you come?"

I said, "Oh, great. I'll go to India." And instead of a diet, I started drinking a lot of chai and eating a lot of chapatis and a lot of dairy and yogurt. And I got really happy again. And I felt better, too, to tell you the truth.

But it was really a sense of just saying, "Oh, yeah, this is possible. I can do this." I don't really know what's going to happen in the future, but I don't have to live as if three feet away from my body, in fear and self-blame. And that whole thing kind of cut. Really, it's that willingness to just dive into the wave instead of running from it—not in order to make something happen, but just to see what's what. That's the place of peace, of ease. Being with the dukkha without creating anything around it is not at all passive submission. It's the place from which discriminating wisdom and appropriate compassionate response arises.

Just one more thing I want to point out about judging, and particularly self-judging. We've talked about it before, so you know it, but I want to point to it in these terms. That's the deeply ingrained habit of comparing—mana in Pali, often translated as conceit. I know you all know it because you all talk about it a lot: that endless comparing. They're better than me, they're worse than me, they're the same as me. Or comparing to yourself in the past: I'm worse now than I was last year, I'm doing better now than I did three days ago. Or comparing ourselves to some made-up ideal about the future—back to that comparison. And that's never a good comparison. Or even "I'm doing the same." It's very deeply ingrained and subtle.

Of the ten fetters, the different shackles that are abandoned through the four stages of awakening, conceit is the last one to go. So you can drop judging yourself because you notice it's arising. You know, you're not an arahant. Can you live with that? And drop judging yourself about it. But notice how suffering comes whenever there's comparing. Besides the fact that it's so exhausting, isn't it? You can't just walk from here to the dining room. You've got to assess every pair of feet that goes by. And if you're trying not to look, you can't even bear not to look. You want to look so you can compare, so you can feel crappy about yourself—or good about yourself because you're better, and then you feel crappy because you were feeling like you were better and you were being conceited. There's no way out. It's a suffering state.

And the real suffering about it, if you look at it, is that it's all about me, isn't it? The root delusion of all self-judgment, of all aversion and comparing, is this incessant referencing of every single experience back to me. Even if you're judging yourself negatively—you're the worst being here—it's completely self-centered, isn't it? Totally self-cherishing in a weird kind of way.

It's also like an upside-down way of experiencing interconnectedness. It is. Every single thing that happens somehow refers back to you. So you're connected to everything. You're the center of everything. Everything everybody does is either to make you feel bad about yourself or annoy you. But the interconnectedness is there. Nothing doesn't affect us.

So you might just notice that. You can't get away from being part of everything. But just to notice how often comparing arises, how often it leads to self-judging. And then rather than get into trying to stop it, bring your attention back to just feel the suffering aspect of that. Oh, comparing feels like this. Judging feels like this.

Just with that compassionate attention that doesn't have to create anything else around it.

And then maybe, even from a moment of being totally caught in it, it can switch to a moment like when I was looking at the moon tonight. Because it could be anything. Just that there's a moment where there's no comparing whatsoever, but real presence. You're not comparing to your past. You're not comparing yourself to someone outside. You're not comparing this moment to any other moment or thought that's ever been. In fact, it's timeless.

And in that not reaching out to anything else—for good or bad, comparing or judging—there's no self, because there's no creation of other. It just doesn't apply. There's no self to get rid of. There's no special experience you have to have. It's just what it is. Simply the mind released into fullness of presence, without needing to compare to anything else.

That's all. Just that piece of is-ness.

Just for a moment, can that be enough?

CHAPTER 344

Awareness & Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential connection between emptiness (suññatā) and compassion (karuṇā), showing how these qualities are not separate but naturally co-arise in undistracted awareness. Drawing on Tibetan teachings that describe awareness as "ceaselessly responsive," she explains that the non-clinging of wisdom doesn't lead to cold indifference but rather opens into a natural tenderness for life and all beings.
>
> Wilson shares personal examples from retreat and travel that demonstrate how the simple letting go of self-referential clinging spontaneously transforms fear and greed into inclusive compassion. She explores the Buddha's teaching on intention (cetanā) as the crucial link between understanding emptiness and compassionate response, noting that the seed of karma rests not in the results of action but in the intention that gives rise to it. Through the Eightfold Path's progression from wise understanding (sammā-diṭṭhi) to wise intention (sammā-saṅkappa), she shows how our habitual mental patterns naturally transform in the light of ongoing mindfulness.
>
> The talk emphasizes that every moment of awareness—even meeting difficult experiences like self-judgment—is actively transforming our habits of mind. Wilson draws on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, and Pema Chödrön to illustrate how aspiration guides our moment-to-moment intentions, and how bodhicitta naturally develops from deep insight into suffering. She concludes with the beautiful simplicity that compassion becomes "doing the obvious"—a natural, effortless response that arises when we are truly present.

Tonight I want to talk about emptiness and compassion.

As we've been exploring the wisdom of non-clinging, or as Joseph has been calling it, undistracted awareness, certain qualities emerge. It's difficult to talk about qualities of something that doesn't have qualities, but we have to use words.

For example, undistracted awareness has the quality of emptiness. In the simple hearing of a bell, if you're completely undistracted with that hearing, you couldn't really say what was the ear canal, what's the bell, what's the consciousness, what was me ringing it, what was the action. There's just the purity of the experience. It all comes together. You can't say anything is self-existent in that.

Emptiness also has the quality of spontaneous knowing, of cognizance, in that the sound was heard spontaneously. You don't plan ahead. You don't have to figure out that in three minutes there's going to be a sound and you need to organize and control undistracted awareness so you'll be able to hear it and not confuse it with seeing. And it always works, doesn't it? When we're undistracted, it's perfectly known. That's the quality—emptiness and cognizance, spontaneous knowing. These are two qualities.

But the third quality, when we're conceptualizing, that rounds out and really makes undistracted awareness complete, is what the Tibetans describe as ceaselessly responsive. You could also call this compassion or natural tenderness for life. That is the natural manifestation of empty and spontaneous knowing, of undistracted awareness.

Sometimes we have this idea of emptiness or anattā or no-self as being unattractive or a cold void, indifferent or even scary, a kind of annihilation. Or there's that sense of "Who wants it if it's just seeing?" In the seeing, there's only the seeing. So you go outside and there's a beautiful sunset and it's just seeing, seeing—a kind of disconnection from everything. And we think, "Well, who wants that?"

But that's missing the piece of the natural non-separation, a tenderness, the spontaneous response—ceaselessly responsive to whatever's appropriate. There's this natural response of awareness because of the fact of emptiness, not in spite of it.

In other words, non-clinging doesn't open into a cold, indifferent void. Non-clinging, instead of being the constriction of mind, of heart, of consciousness around me and mine—making you an other, leading to reactive responses—is ceaselessly responsive also. The difference is that when there's clinging, the ceaseless responses happen to be fear and greed.

The heart of non-clinging actually opens into something else. It releases energy; it encompasses everything. Non-clinging opens us from contraction into spaciousness. Ajahn Sumedho—I've heard him refer to awareness as "the point that includes." A spaciousness that encompasses everything, and in that, our constricted self-referencing releases into a natural tenderness for life, for beings, for the situation. A point that includes everything.

Let me give you two very simple examples from my own experience of how just the letting go of clinging moves from fear or greed to the natural, inclusive tenderness that's also empty of self-referencing.

One is a retreat example, very simple. I was walking on a retreat here some years ago, in the gym very early in the morning, which I loved to do before anybody was up. Deep into the retreat, in that silence, in some nice samādhi state—walking, walking, lifting, moving, placing. And then at some point, deep in the walking, somebody came out of their room, slammed the door, went into the bathroom, flushed the toilet, ran the water, came out, slammed the door.

The thought was, "They are ruining my samādhi." A little bit of aversion, and it was really that immediate self-referencing. Everything's about me, the sense of separation, me and other, my samādhi down the toilet. That all happened pretty quickly.

And in the next moment, there was an "Oh." I'm putting thoughts on it later, but it wasn't really a thought at that time. It was the sense that this is just a concept. Me walking, they slamming, my samādhi being disturbed—these are just experiences arising in the space of awareness. Walking, thinking, hearing, sensing, samādhi, no samādhi—whatever is happening is just experience. There's nothing to separate out as me or my samādhi or how it should be or how it got wrecked.

That's all concepts. And just in that moment of letting go—basically of clinging to me and my samadhi—there's no problem. And that tenderness for beings... it's not that I wanted to run up and kiss the foot of the person who made the noise or something. It's just that the whole sense of problem, of separation, of aversion, or even me and other, goes away. There was no other response that needed to be made. But had there been one needed in that moment—if the person, say, needed help or something—that would have been the natural response without thought, without a sense of me doing something.

Another non-retreat example: some years ago I was traveling on an overnight Indian train in India. I was in a sleeping compartment, second class, which is like four little benches against the two walls of the compartment with a curtain pulled over it. Somehow I was in a compartment with three Indian men. I don't know why, but that's how it was.

So we're lying there on our little respective shelves trying to sleep. They weren't doing anything—they were just lying there. But I felt completely unsafe. What are they doing in my compartment? They're bothering me. Because they were just lying there staring at me. That's not rude in India; it's just normal. You can't even consider it rude. I mean, I considered it rude because I didn't want it, but they were just lying there. So I spent the whole night turned with my face to the wall, thinking, "These guys are bothering me."

Then at some point just before daylight, it suddenly occurred to me—the obvious, you know—oh, this is not my compartment. This is our compartment. That's all it was. I didn't leap up and have a group hug and say, "I'm so glad you're here." Just that shift in my mind is all that happened. I didn't actually act in any other way.

But when daylight came and we all got up—you close the top bunks and sit down on the bottom ones—they brought in, of course, their whole families and cousins and kids and wives. There were now twenty of us in the compartment. You could feel the whole energy change. They became really friendly. They were getting off at the stops and bringing me little snacks. "Oh, please taste these special treats from our country. Please try our specialty." It was really lovely. It completely changed. And all that shifted was that clinging in my mind of separation. It's really quite powerful.

Nyoshul Khen talked about describing the difference between the impure and the pure mind, the deluded mind and the enlightened mind, as being a difference of narrowness and openness. In a deluded state, our mind is extremely narrow. The more constricted and narrow the mind, the more it thinks only of itself, disregarding the well-being, happiness, and suffering of others. Conversely, the enlightened Buddha is one who considers the infinity of sentient beings rather than merely being concerned with his own ego and individuality. Thus, the entire path from an ordinary being to Buddhahood is the gradual opening of the mind.

And so undistracted awareness, you could say in that way of talking, is the mind, the heart, that in that moment is completely open, free from self-referential clinging, naturally cognizant, naturally knowing, and ceaselessly responsive. Compassion, tenderness for beings.

Now on a retreat like this, where a great deal of our time is spent in the sitting, in the walking, even in moving around—noticing very carefully all the arising and passing experiences, the mental states and thoughts in particular, sensations and body—a great deal of our formal training, so to speak, is simply to watch everything come and go. It's really an emphasis on the emptiness aspect. Whatever comes, we just notice it. It goes. It doesn't matter how horrible the thought. It doesn't matter how beautiful. Horrible emotions, beautiful emotions.

Sometimes by really focusing so much on that aspect, that's how we could form a mistaken conception that emptiness means basically nothing matters. And that's how we can come out of a retreat thinking, well...

If everything's empty, you know, either on the indifferent side—who cares about anything?—or I can do whatever I want because it's all empty. Both of which are missing or lacking the tenderness, the compassion, the metta aspect of non-separation.

So how does the Buddha talk about this movement from the view, this experience of all phenomena as being intrinsically empty, nothing really of more significance than another in the light of mindfulness, to actually responding with word or action? This ceaseless responsiveness—how does nothingness, emptiness, move into a connected response or action in life?

And that's where this aspect of intention comes in. This is where, on the conceptual level, the Buddha just... he must have been so brilliant. I mean, how he could ever break all this stuff down and make his lists—it's really amazing. So the Eightfold Path, the basic path of practice: the first stage being wise understanding, really understanding the three characteristics, the Four Noble Truths, things as they are. From that understanding, the next step is variously translated as wise thought or wise intention, sometimes aspiration.

As we know, intention is just that subtle, collected movement of mind, that direction or inclination of mind that leads to action. And so that link—intention—is the link between understanding emptiness and compassionate response of word or body. This experience, this recognition and understanding in ourselves of intention, is so important.

Just as you know, intention is like the collection of mental energy in a certain direction that gives rise to action. It's not us, of course. It's simply conditioned by causes. The body hurts. There's unpleasantness. There's aversion in the mind that focuses the energy to move the arm. That's the intention.

And again, the seed of karma, of action—the seed of wholesomeness or unwholesomeness, skillfulness or unskillfulness in an action, as the Buddha spoke of it—rests not in the result of the action, not in how it looks, never mind how other people perceive it. The seed of karma is in the intention that gives rise to that action.

That's always been so fascinating to me, given how much in the world we evaluate what we've done and what other people have done, their goodness or badness or skillfulness, by the results of the action. But that's the thing that's so out of our control, isn't it? The results of action. Now I'm not going to claim that intentions are all in our control either, but we can at least affect them through cultivation of mind.

When we talk about skillful means on retreat, the whole crux, the whole kernel of skillful means is really about what are the mental factors, the mental states that give rise to the intention, that give rise to the action. That's what really determines whether it's skillful means or not.

The same action that looks the same from the outside could actually be motivated by various intentions in different people, or different intentions in you on different days. For example, taking a walk instead of going to a sitting. You all know—I don't have to tell you—the range of possible motivations for that particular action. And probably many of you have acted on that from a range of motivations.

Sometimes we'll beg somebody in an interview to not sit so much and take a walk, and the next person who walks in, we'll say stop taking so many walks, sit more. It's really about what are the conditions at the time, what would be skillful.

For you, it's about what's the motivation. You're just a little bit bored, you want some entertainment, and it's basically craving. So you go for a walk. What that's doing is cultivating craving—wouldn't call it skillful means particularly. Other times, all you want to do is sit, but in the sitting you're just forcing with willpower, getting tighter and tighter, and you're afraid not to sit. It's basically self-hatred taking you into the sitting. And in order not to sit and take a walk, it's really a letting go of some ideas you have about yourself or perfection, just a willingness to be present in the moment, seeing conditions as they are. Very different, yet the action can look the same. And it could be one way one day for you and completely different the next day.

That's why when people say they want to plan out how much to sleep, what time of every day they're going to take their walk—you can, but it's not looking at the fact that things are changing every day. Conditions are different every day. It's the motivation arising in the moment, the mental factors giving rise to that particular intention. You can't hold on to yesterday's intention. It's what's happening now.

So intention on that level of a momentary arising. And the good news—what I want to talk about for the rest of the talk—the good news is that even if all you did was mindfulness practice, never mind metta or karuna practice, through wisdom, through clear seeing, through our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice, the habits of our mind, the intentions that lead to speech and action, that just naturally spring up when you're not sitting there trying to force it, they actually transform in the light of awareness over our life of practice.

This is really one of the ways that the purification we talk about can actually be noticed. Those bad habits, just to use local language, of greed and ill will, hatred, cruelty in response to pleasant and unpleasant—those natural bad habits do begin to transform in the light of our ongoing steady awareness. The Buddha talked about three wise intentions. He has whole suttas about this. Greed naturally begins to transform to renunciation, to non-clinging, to generosity. Ill will naturally begins to transform to friendliness, connectedness, metta. And cruelty, real hatred, naturally transforms to compassion.

I'll give you a very simple example before you start down that road of, "Yeah, right." I know this wouldn't happen here because everyone is so mindful and polite, but say you're standing in the food line. Say it's bagel day, which I'm really getting the drift is a very confused and stressful time. So it's bagel day breakfast and there's the hubbub and the lines and all these decisions you have to make in the cafeteria. You're in line and someone in a wave of confusion gets in line in front of you, doesn't even notice, and goes. They not only get in line in front of you—they get the last sesame bagel that you wanted.

Now, our natural bad habit might be one of a range. If you're the greed type, you could really feel, "How could they take that away from me?" If you're the aversive type, it's more lashing out. But you get the drift—some kind of judgment, anger, upset, blame, and then blaming yourself for feeling any of those things.

But you might find this could really happen. I know it has happened in similar situations here, where you're just standing and the whole thing happens. Maybe your mind starts with a judgment, maybe it doesn't even go there. But instead, the mindfulness—you just really see the person. That spontaneous knowing without all the concepts in between. And in that seeing, you can feel either their confusion, or they're just lost in a craving moment, or their fear, or whatever. In that feeling, seeing their pain, there's the natural response of tenderness. Either renunciation—they need it more than I do today—or a kind of compassion: wow, that really must be a suffering state, needing that bagel so much, or to be so confused. And there's no patting yourself on the back, "Aren't I doing great?" It's just a natural moment of purified intention.

I know you'll notice lots of these small moments as you go through the days here, just springing up spontaneously. Of course, we can also practice it deliberately, but I just want you to notice that this transformation does begin to happen naturally through mindfulness, through presence. When awareness is undistracted, this is the natural response. It's not something we have to plan or think about.

The second step of the Eightfold Path, Sama Sankappa, is sometimes translated as broader aspiration, which we talked about quite a bit in the first weeks of the retreat—the sense of aspiration. It's intention, but it's a more broad-based intention, the overarching sense of what's really important to us, or the direction we want to go in our practice, in our life, in a day.

This sense of aspiration, which is often referred to as right intention as well, can be on the small scale, like at the beginning of a walking period. You simply have the aspiration to really be as present as possible in this walking period. Have you noticed when you do something like that? Of course you can't control that you'll be present every moment, but it brings a certain resolution, which is one of the paramis—a certain focusing of dispersed energy, a sense of more energetic commitment.

So it could be as simple as the beginning of a sitting or a walking period, or coming to a retreat, or the overarching intention for what's really important to us in our life. Or if you have the view of eons and eons and endless lifetimes, as the Bodhisatta who eventually became the Buddha did—he made the aspiration eons and countless ages ago, when he was an ascetic at the feet of the previous Buddha, to become a Buddha, to go through all these countless lifetimes of perfecting the paramis. Now that's a vast aspiration, a vast overarching intention.

But it can be very helpful to us to have a sense of how to use this broader aspiration in our practice, in our retreat, and in our life. Having the consciousness, the awareness in our heart and mind of what's really important to us as an aspiration can serve the purpose on the moment-to-moment level of collecting our dispersed energy, of giving us strength and focus and a capacity to do things we wouldn't otherwise have thought possible. You know what I mean? You may have noticed that.

I think probably you all have. You're still here, right? You've been through a lot. If you were just at home or didn't have a broader sense of purpose—whether it's freedom or whether it's just to get through the retreat, I don't know—but some broader sense keeps you here, even in the difficult times. If it was just day to day, "Do I like it or not?"—you'd almost all be out of here by now.

I read a book quite some years ago called Life and Death in Shanghai—maybe some of you have read it—about a Chinese woman, a middle-class woman who lived in Shanghai during the Cultural Revolution in the seventies, when the whole culture was turned upside down and young people called the Red Guards were terrorizing the population. Anyone who had any money or connection with Westerners, or was too bourgeois, or part of the intelligentsia—many of them were simply taken and put in jail and accused of all kinds of things.

So this woman was basically a middle-class housewife, Chinese style, with no training for any of this, and she was thrown into jail. They told her that if she would just implicate different people whose names she was given and sign a confession, she would be released. But for some reason, her very deep commitment in life was to honesty. And she refused to sign a confession because she said, "I didn't do anything. I'm not going to confess to something I didn't do." And when they wanted her to implicate other people, even in very mild ways, she would refuse for the same reason. "This isn't true."

They kept her in prison for five or six years, interrogated her frequently, treated her quite brutally—even some forms of physical torture—always giving her the opportunity to sign these confessions and get out. And she just wouldn't do it because of her commitment to honesty, which was simply more important to her than anything.

You would think that the life she had led would have given her no preparation to go through what she went through. And yet, at least as she wrote the book, she was really gutsy. She would stand up to the guards. She didn't let herself get pushed around. Really quite amazing.

Finally, she developed cancer, I think, and they were going to let her out because she was sick. They were leading her out, about to release her, and just before they got to the final door, they said, "Just come in this room a minute. On your way out, just sign this. It doesn't mean much." And she wouldn't do it. She wouldn't do it. And they let her out anyway. She was writing this book from the States, where she was living by then.

I read that years ago, and I've carried it with me ever since—really from the sense of how a deeply held value or aspiration, really an intention, can give us a strength of purpose that guides our actions and decisions. It guides the motivation in the moment of our actions and decisions. It's not that we know what's going to come. But for her, honesty was so important that it would guide her decisions. It would become her motivation for action.

So notice that in your dharma practice—how sometimes a strength comes, a sense of motivation that we're not even consciously aware of. Suddenly you think it's time to go to bed, but something else, like the Dharma, takes over and says, "I don't think so." And you start doing walking meditation. You think, "Well, I was going to bed now." And you get to the end of the row.

This happens to me all the time. I get to the end of the row and think, "I'm just going to keep walking until I get to my room." Then I get to the end of the row and the body stops and turns around and goes back again. Nope. It's almost impersonal, but the sense of commitment to simply being awake becomes stronger. So notice that for yourself.

Both here and in daily life, if a sense of what for you is a broader aspiration is either readily accessible—you already know it—or through a little reflection you can find that deep motivation, that aspiration for yourself... Personally, I find that really useful in difficult times or confusing times. On retreat, those times you just can't imagine how you're going to get through another day or why you would want to. Or at home. To recall, even if it's just in thought at first, and then let it settle into your heart—your deepest aspiration. It can be a great source of strength and also of clarity, of collecting our dispersed energy.

So we don't just go through life like a robot, like an automaton. I feel like when I'm not paying attention, greed, hatred, and delusion are running the show. It's just like a robot, responding out of habit. But when I can tune into a deep aspiration, it can redirect things. It really gives you strength and purpose.

It doesn't mean we have a clue how it's going to look or how our life is going to look. I'm sure that woman in China never had any clue where her commitment to honesty would take her. When you read about Aung San Suu Kyi, the leader of the Burmese democracy movement—you all know who she is, right? Her path of becoming this symbol, the rallying point for all the democratic people in Burma, all the Burmese people wanting to liberate themselves from the horrific violence of a really cruel military government—it was never her plan.

She went back to Burma in 1988 to take care of her mother, who was dying. And it just happened to be at the time that these vast pro-democracy riots broke out. Because of who she is—she's the daughter of a man who was the leader of the Burmese movement to free themselves from the British after World War II, a true martyr who was killed right after they got their freedom—because she was his daughter, she became the natural rallying point. And then through her own grace and wisdom and purity, she's been able to carry that.

But she just happened to be there then. And because she became the focal point, she didn't feel she could leave. She was put under house arrest. All these years, she's always been told she could leave at any time, but she knew she could never come back. By being there, she didn't get to see her children very much at all. In the ten years they've grown up, occasionally they could visit. Occasionally her husband could visit, but not much. And he died of prostate cancer maybe two or three years ago, early, in his fifties. The Burmese government didn't allow him to come visit after he was diagnosed. She knew he was going to die. She didn't leave. She's been through so much—health problems and more—and she just stays because she knows it's her commitment.

But this is what she says. She said it was never her life purpose to be the leader of the Burmese democracy movement. That wasn't her motivation. She said, "I suppose people think I'm extraordinary because I'm so simple they can't believe it. I have very ordinary attitudes towards life." I wish they were ordinary. But she said, "If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I'll do it. The motivation is its own reward."

That's really, to me, so beautiful—this sense of how powerful our aspiration is, and how the aspiration really centers on our motivation moment to moment rather than on "I'm going to get here and it's going to look like that."

So even if your aspiration is for full awakening—and that's a beautiful aspiration—I just want to say, if you feel that you have some deep aspiration like that and it comes up, honor it. Don't buy into that little personal identified mind that says, "Not possible for me." That really dishonors an aspiration that comes from the depth of truth, from our true nature.

But whatever the aspiration, it functions by informing our moment-to-moment intention. It doesn't mean we know where it's going to go. Just like in practice, our aspiration may be to get enlightened, but if you're sitting here every moment thinking, "Now am I enlightened? How close am I to being enlightened?"—it doesn't really work too well, does it? I'm sure you've all tried that. It's like, okay, come back. The motivation is to be awake in this moment, to what's happening in this moment. So the aspiration helps us align our intentions here and now.

And of course, what we discover in aligning or just noticing our motivations here and now is, yes, they do naturally transform. But I know what a lot of you are noticing at this point is what they're like prior to having naturally transformed—how much of the seemingly automatic intentions or responses that arise are those of confusion and greed and ill will and hatred. And that's okay to notice. Don't let that discourage you, because they do naturally transform in the noticing, just in the noticing.

Remember that line I read you before—it's one of my favorites from the suttas because I think it's so rich—where the Buddha said, "Whatever one frequently thinks about, whatever one frequently dwells upon in the mind or the heart, that will become the inclination of the mind."

So rather than getting discouraged because you're noticing how much your mind has been dwelling upon greed or hatred or delusion or pride or whatever the long list is—if you get discouraged, you're just still dwelling in the negative. Rather than that, notice that when we are with mindfulness aware of the habit of mind of ill will, say, or greed, in that moment of sati, of mindfulness, of awareness, actually that unskillful habit of mind is not being reinforced. It's not being fed. In that mindfulness, we're basically disengaging from clinging to the greed or the aversion or the fear. And the mindfulness then is shifting the habit. It's shifting the inclination of mind to that of letting go, to that of seeing clearly, to that of non-hatred.

And this is really important. Every single moment of mindfulness is having that effect of transforming the habitual inclinations or intentions that arise in the mind.

These habits of how we've spent our life—it's both beautiful and a little scary to see how they can manifest as we get older, if we really have lived a very deluded life, if that's where we've taken refuge. If we've taken refuge in our life in ill will, well, what's going to come out at the end? Chögyam Trungpa's line when he's asked, "What's reborn?" And he says, "Your bad habits."

Ajahn Sumedho—I don't know if it was on one of the tapes, it's tricky to tell a story Ajahn Sumedho told because I'm not sure which tapes were playing here—but at a retreat I was sitting with him, he was talking about visiting a nursing home in England. And as you know, there's a whole range of people in nursing homes. He talked to a couple of elderly women who weren't really quite there—I don't know if they had Alzheimer's or just some kind of dementia—but not really quite there. But two of them, what was left really was their bad habits. And one woman, whatever you say to her, she'd just say, "You're not going to get my money. You're not going to get my money." And the other one—excuse my language, but this is what he said—whatever you say to her, she'd just go, "Shit. Just shit."

I thought, whoa. One does not want to discover that that's where one's taken refuge throughout one's life. All scary.

On the other hand, maybe two, two and a half years ago at a large Buddhist teachers conference—Buddhist teachers Asian and Western, all the different traditions, and the Dalai Lama was the main speaker—the thing that has stayed with me the most, I actually don't remember hardly anything the Dalai Lama said. I mean, he's far out and all. But what really moved me was Maha Ghosananda, the Cambodian monk who's been a peace activist for many years, worked in the Cambodian refugee camps after the genocide, and came back and taught metta, and has taught all over the world, led peace marches in Cambodia.

I actually don't know how he is now, but he was basically becoming senile at that point. And he was at the conference, and someone was designated part of each day to stay with him, just to make sure he stayed with us all and didn't wander off. But what was so inspiring to me was that he would just be sitting there, and anyone who approached him out of two or three hundred people, as soon as you would get face-to-face with him, he would connect with you and just beam with metta. Talk to you, bow to you, bless you with metta. And it wasn't a disconnected sense. It was totally connected. This man just beaming metta—that's where he took his refuge in life.

It was deeply, deeply inspiring to me to think about what's going to be left when we go. Nothing we have, none of our actions in the world—really it's about who we've been, where our mind and heart has dwelt, where we've taken refuge.

And I want to emphasize again: yes, practicing metta and compassion, that is a very powerful way of transforming our habits, our intentions. But also simple, clear, direct connection of mindfulness brings out the natural response of inclusion and compassion.

I have to read this poem because I haven't read a Mary Oliver poem, and you have to read one before you're allowed to leave. But actually this is exactly what I'm saying about how simple, direct connection of awareness is all-inclusive.

In Singapore, in the airport,
A darkness was ripped from my eyes.
In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open.
A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it.
Kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.
Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees.
A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling.
A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face.
Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together and neither could win.
She smiled and I smiled.
What kind of nonsense is this?
Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem, but first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough.

She is washing the tops of airport ashtrays as big as hubcaps with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird. I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life. And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen. But maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. And neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

And so, simply by our willingness to be totally present, to pay attention without withholding, without judging, without prior concept, this transformation of habits of heart and mind takes place. From a simple moment of tenderness, through our continuing practice, something we can cultivate begins to grow. Even naturally, our aspiration and our sense of compassion really begin to move in the direction of the vastness of bodhicitta. The vastness of our practice at some point truly does stop being just for ourselves and becomes a sense of wanting to awaken in order to help awaken all beings.

According to a talk I heard from the Dalai Lama, how does this bodhicitta develop? Just as I was saying—from deep insight into what suffering is. And how does that arise? By focusing on our own experience. As we focus on our own experience of suffering, compassion strengthens with the sense of empathy and connectedness with all beings. This happens naturally, really. We can help it along, I'll admit, but we start where we are.

That's why the difficult times in a retreat are so important. We say this over and over, and in the middle of it you can't really get a sense of it because you're struggling so much. But the difficult times in retreat are really the places where we're gaining that deep insight into suffering and that sense of empathy with all beings. It's so important to start where we are and to honor, to see how even the most seemingly trivial experience is transforming where we take refuge, how we live our life.

In one retreat that I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, I went into an interview with him while caught in an extremely heavy bout of self-judging—very negative—which I didn't tell him. You don't go in and give him the content of your thoughts. He's not interested. You just go in and report what happens in the sitting: I noticed rising and falling, I felt these sensations, thought arose, I would note it.

But he knows what's happening. It's really quite interesting—he's such a master. So he could tell that I was in this really vicious bout of self-judging and a lot of thinking. And he said to me, "Some people talk to themselves on retreat. Have you ever noticed that?"

I said, "Yeah, yeah, I think I've noticed that."

He said, "Well, it's supposed to be a silent retreat."

People think he's not funny, but he can be really quite funny.

I said, "Yeah, I know."

He said, "Well, which do you think is better—to talk to yourself or to talk to other yogis?"

And I said, "Well, that's true. Given the way I'm talking to myself, it would probably be better to talk to other yogis. They would never be so cruel."

It was very helpful, just pointing that out. Start where you are. How we meet the difficult experiences—and I know I said this in a previous talk, so I'll just remind you again—how we meet the difficulty is what creates the transformation of intentions. All that vicious self-judging, that's the previous habit of my mind. That's old karma, results coming up. When I can meet that with simple awareness, that's the transformation. That's the cultivation of compassion and wisdom.

It doesn't even mean that vicious self-judging stops. But that ability to recognize it is very different from agreeing with it—"Oh yeah, you're right, you are the worst person that ever walked the earth"—or believing "I should be past this by now. I shouldn't be having these thoughts. This just shows what a bad..." and then spiraling into the next round. Instead, there's simply: "Ah, self-judging is like this."

I know when you come into interviews and we say that, you kind of walk out thinking, "Well, that was really helpful"—perhaps a bit skeptically. But it's huge. Every moment of awareness like that is transforming the habits of mind. We just want too much too soon. How long have we been cultivating these bad habits? And just in this life, one pales to think of it. Three months of cultivating wise intention—that's good. That's great. Luckily, wise intention, I think, is really stronger than our bad habits. I don't think we have to cultivate one moment of wisdom for every one moment of confusion. But we do need to acknowledge it.

There's a quotation from Gandhi I really like where he said, "Almost everything you do will seem insignificant, but it is very important that you do it." I think that's a great description of our practice here in the hall, but also in our life. Every moment of awareness, every moment of kindness, every moment of clear seeing may seem insignificant if we're looking to results, if we're looking to goals. But if we're just willing to be there in that moment for it, it's very important that we do it.

And so we don't have to think that we're cultivating bodhicitta, that we're transforming the habits of mind from confusion to non-clinging and compassion. We don't have to be the Dalai Lama or Gandhi. Just be willing to do each insignificant moment of attention. Start where we are.

And then that ceaselessly responsive aspect of emptiness manifests itself effortlessly. It's not that in life we then have to think, "What would be the appropriate compassionate response here?" It just comes. One teacher I met once called it "doing the obvious." You just do it because it's the obvious thing to do.

Once I heard an interview on public radio with a professional basketball player, a young man in his first year. To make the pros—that's got to be really the high point of a young athlete's life. And he was having a good year. They were interviewing him because his sister needed a kidney transplant, and if his blood type matched, he was going to give her his kidney. The interviewer was rather breathlessly questioning him because that would mean the end of his professional basketball career, which I'm not sure why, but it would. And the interviewer kept going, "This is so amazing! You're willing to give up your basketball career!" On and on.

And this young man was so cool. He would just say, "What are you talking about? My sister? She'll need a kidney or she'll die. I have two kidneys. It's a no-brainer." Just doing the obvious. And he just wouldn't go there about how amazing he was or that there was even another choice to make. It was really quite something. I wish I'd caught his name. It was really a beautiful thing.

Doing the obvious. And whether it's just picking up our foot and putting down the foot again, or giving a kidney, or just letting the person cut in line in front of you and have that sesame bagel and wishing them well—doing the obvious.

I want to end with something from Pema Chödrön talking about bodhicitta. At the relative level, she calls it noble heart bodhicitta: "At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings."

At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness or open space.

When we experience the soft spot of bodhicitta, it's like returning home. It's as if we had amnesia for a very long time and awakened to remember who we really are.

The poet Rumi writes of night travelers who search the darkness instead of running from it—a companionship of people willing to know their own fear. Whether it's in the small fears of a job interview or the unnameable terrors imposed by war, prejudice, and hatred, in the tenderness of the pain itself, night travelers discover the light of bodhicitta.

And then just the simplicity of it. She says bodhicitta is available in moments of caring for things, when we clean our glasses or brush our hair. It's available in moments of appreciation, when we notice the blue sky or pause and listen to the rain. It is available in moments of gratitude, when we recall a kindness or recognize another person's courage.

Whenever we let go of holding on to ourselves and look at the world around us, whenever we connect with sorrow, whenever we connect with joy, whenever we drop our resentment and complaint—in those moments bodhicitta is here.

Just doing the obvious.

CHAPTER 345

Wise Attention 1 of 3

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this first of three talks on wise attention, Carol Wilson offers an in-depth exploration of yoniso manasikāra—the Pāli term for appropriate or wise attention—which she considers a key tool for liberation both in meditation practice and daily life. Drawing primarily from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she explains how the Buddha identified wise attention as the essential factor that determines whether our experience leads toward awakening or continues the rounds of confusion and suffering.

Carol unpacks the meaning of yoniso manasikāra itself: yoni (womb) suggesting a nurturing, protective quality, and manasikāra (attention) indicating active mental engagement. This gives the felt sense of holding experience with accepting awareness while remaining totally present. She explains the āsavas—the deep underlying tendencies toward craving for sense pleasure, craving for becoming, and ignorance—that keep us bound in saṃsāra. These manifest on three levels: transgression (speech and action), obsessive defilements (repetitive mental patterns), and the latent level where seeds remain dormant until conditions ripen.

The teaching emphasizes that wise attention isn't about what objects we attend to, but how we attend. The same experience—whether anger, breath sensations, or pleasant sights—can be met with wise or unwise attention depending on whether we add clinging, aversion, or identification. Carol introduces the seven methods the Buddha taught for abandoning the āsavas, beginning with 'seeing'—total attention without adding anything extra, without past or future, without clinging to present experience.

Tonight I want to talk about the subject of wise attention, sometimes also translated as appropriate attention. It's the translation of the Pali phrase yoniso manasikara. I have a lot to say about this, and I'm going to indulge myself—this will be at least two talks, part tonight and part next week. I indulge myself because I'm always cutting things out when I talk about this subject.

In my opinion, wise attention, yoniso manasikara, is a key concept and a key tool, both in our bhavana practice, our meditation practice, and throughout our whole life. It's a key tool for how we can relate to our moment-to-moment experience in a way that's liberating. We can basically be in the same situation and, with wise attention, that situation can bring us to wakefulness, to waking up. Or the same situation can lead us into continuing the rounds of confusion. The key difference is the understanding, the actualizing in our own experience, of what wise attention and appropriate attention really is.

I want to be referring at various points to one of the suttas of the Buddha, which is really the one where he talks the most about wise attention, although he mentions it in quite some other places. This sutta is the second one in the Middle Length Sayings, the Majjhima Nikaya. It's called the Sutta on All the Taints, or all the āsavas. There's no good translation in English. "Taints" is kind of old-fashioned. "Stains," "cankers," "defilements"—we already get negative connotations. But the sutta is talking about how to basically uproot all our tendencies of mind towards suffering. And the key that the Buddha talks about in the sutta is this wise attention, yoniso manasikara.

So what is it? Appropriate attention is probably the better translation, but I'm so used to saying wise attention that I'm going to keep slipping into saying that, and also to avoid constantly inflicting the Pali on you.

The basic definition the Buddha gives is extremely pragmatic, as pretty much everything he said was. He's talking about these āsavas, these subtle roots of suffering, which I'll explain more in a moment. But he says—"bhikkhus" means monks—"I say to you that there is an exhaustion of these āsavas, an ending of these āsavas, in one who knows and sees, not in one who does not know and see. Who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention."

Now that's a very bold statement, as he was wont to make. He's basically saying that one who knows and understands wise attention and unwise attention comes to the end of defilements, of āsavas. And he defines it experientially: when a person attends unwisely, both unarisen āsavas arise—unarisen suffering states arise—and arisen suffering states increase. So it's a very practical definition. When one attends wisely, both unarisen suffering states do not arise, and arisen ones are abandoned.

Then one other line I want to begin with: he says that one who knows understands what is fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Now to us, this "fit for attention" and "unfit for attention" comes through our minds in a very judgmental way. You turn it into your practice: "This anger is unfit for attention. This pain in my knee is unfit for attention. This personality pattern of pride and blame is unfit for attention. Something else should be happening." That is not what we're talking about. That is not wise attention, as I will hopefully make abundantly clear.

Just to define this word āsava, "taint," to describe what the Buddha is talking about: āsava is a word that means an influx or an outflux. It's like a pouring into our mental experience of the defilements or habits, the suffering habits of mind, from the very deepest or most subtle level. So it's the deepest habits of mind, the tendency for these deep habits to arise given the supportive conditions. These āsavas are what keep us spinning in the rounds of samsara, as I described how pleasant that is last week.

When the Buddha in the sutta speaks about the āsavas, he's actually fairly specific. Usually there are three, and in this sutta he names three specific, very subtle, pervasive, underlying habits that keep us spinning. One is the craving for sense pleasure. The second is the craving for being, the craving for becoming. And the third āsava is ignorance, which basically covers everything else. Ignorance, and sometimes wrong view, is also spoken about.

So wise attention—how we pay attention and what we pay attention to—means that we learn to pay attention in such a way that when we're present, paying attention, these tendencies for craving, for wanting to become something, for ignorance, for not knowing what's going on, these decrease with wise attention.

When our attention is unwise, when we're paying attention to the wrong thing in the wrong way—in the inappropriate way, better than wrong—then actually the feedback is pretty clear, because these asavas, these habits, get stronger. And we can experience this; we do experience this moment to moment. You don't have to be deep in meditation for four months to pick up on this. It does occur from time to time in all of our experience, no matter what we're doing. But the quiet and the subtleness of meditation, and for some of you who've been here quite some time, your minds are definitely noticing on this subtle level.

So the Buddha says, what's fit and unfit. But it's not that what is fit or unfit has a fixed determination—that a particular object or subject or sense experience or mind experience is in itself unfit. Take, for example, anger. It's not that anger is always unfit and that paying attention to anger is going to lead to an increase in the asavas, that it's unwise attention. No. It's indeterminate, because it's not so much what we pay attention to, but how we pay attention. And these two are, I think, the seeds of all our mindfulness and concentration practice, the seeds of all the skillful means that we employ to help us keep aware.

So how we pay attention. I want to now refer to, in terms of giving a feeling of this "how," the word that we're translating as appropriate or wise attention itself: yoniso manasikara. This is the way Andy Olenski, the director of the Study Center, glosses this word, how he breaks down its different meanings. And while it's not exact as to what appropriate attention really is in our experience, I love this because it gives to me the felt sense of the quality of appropriate attention—of mindfulness, basically. What else are we ever talking about? What do you think appropriate attention is going to come down to? Mindfulness. But the quality of it.

Yoniso, he says, is from the word yoni, which is womb. And if you think of womb-like, he says, yoniso—nurturing, held in protection. You can think of sati, the word for mindfulness, being our protection from the arising of and getting lost in these suffering, unwholesome tendencies. So womb-like, yoniso, held in protection.

Manasikara is usually translated as attention. Mana means mind. Kara is from the verb meaning action—kamma, or karma in the Sanskrit, comes from the same word, meaning doing. So kara means doing or making. He puts that together as an active quality of mind, a mind that's doing something, that's action, that is present and nurturing—actively present and nurturing.

I get a sense from that, not like some driving force of mind: "Yes, it will be what I want it to be. Yes, this unpleasant thing should go away." But womb-like. Maybe it's because I'm a woman—although Andy did tell me this, I have to acknowledge. But it's a sense of holding experience with that accepting quality of attention, while being absolutely, totally present with the experience just as it is. Mindfulness.

So that's the quality of appropriate attention. And this is what we bring into our practice with that understanding, really looking in our experience. It's what we're always encouraging you to do around skillful means, so that it's not only what we pay attention to, but how.

Simple, obvious examples: the four foundations of mindfulness that Myoshin talked about last week. Bare attention to any arising experience. So take anger, since I've been using that—that's the quality of mind, the third foundation of mindfulness. In itself, it's indeterminate whether it's wise or unwise attention, appropriate or not, to really be present with the mind, with the anger, with the ill will. If the attention has this quality, this yoniso manasikara of sort of surrounding, seeing clearly, not feeding any other reaction or state of mind to it, just meeting that ill will with mindfulness, you can see in that moment it is wise attention. The ill will does not increase. It doesn't mean that it magically goes away either, which is what some people are looking for, or use that—"It went away, so I did it right." It's not that. Sometimes the ill will or the pain in the knee can last a long time.

But you can tell it might rise and fall within some moments. Yet overall, the sense of ill will or grasping or craving, the sense of being "I am such a horrible, angry person," or the total ignorance of getting really lost in the whole story—those do not increase. You can just be with ill will, rising and falling, a little bit caught, it lets go. And then when it ends, you really have that sense of being awake, being present. That was wise attention.

And of course, as we all know, unwise attention is either somehow meeting that ill will when there's already in the mind not that clear meeting—there's some other ill will, or there's some sense of identification, or there's some wanting, or there's just the ignorance of getting completely lost in the story about, "Yeah, well, that person is a jerk, and I should be angry," and then spiraling into "What's going to happen?" And what's the result of that? What's the effect? When we wake up from that, are we feeling really balanced and present and mindful? Probably not. Probably the tendency is that the next unpleasant thing that arises, the mind is just more ready to grab at it.

Similarly, take something like simple shamatha, just being with the sensations of breath. Rarely would we say, "Well, sensations of breath—that's got to be wise attention." It can be or not. Even that is indeterminate. So when there's this simple, full attention of mindfulness with the sensation of breath, and you see what's being strengthened, what's being cultivated is non-clinging, non-hatred, non-delusion. Any moment of mindfulness, those three are present: non-clinging, non-hatred, non-delusion. Just one moment. That's why it's so powerful.

Also, you'll notice that over time of simple attention to one breath at a time, qualities of mindfulness, of samadhi, of tranquility, of equanimity are all being cultivated. And I would venture that most, if not all of you, have had the alternate experience of being really quite closely paying attention to the breath, but with what attitude? Not so much. There can be huge clinging in the way the attention is connecting with the breath—huge clinging. Wanting to stay there, wanting to get more concentrated, or aversion: "Let me feel this breath, please God, so I don't have to get caught in that obsessive thought again." Or trying to make it meet some idea, whatever.

But again, the feedback loop—whether it's immediately or five or ten minutes or half an hour or a day down the road—is that what begins to manifest? Frustration, craving, craving for sense pleasures, craving for becoming. "I want to become a more concentrated person." That's craving for becoming. Or just ignorance: "I'm trying as hard as I can and it just keeps getting worse, so I've got to try harder."

So you get a sense. Where we're working here, this yoniso manasikara, appropriate attention, is really the key, the tool, underlying all of our skillful means. That's why, on a retreat where we're giving instructions, or answering questions, we give an instruction and then someone asks a question and we give them a totally opposite instruction from what we just said in the morning talk. And then someone else comes into an interview and they're breaking themselves trying to meet that instruction, and we say, "Oh no, no, you shouldn't do that. You should do exactly the opposite." And then three days later when they come in and say, "Well, I'm doing what you said," we say, "No, no, no, now you shouldn't do that anymore. Now you should do this." Because the conditions are always changing. Nothing's steady state.

And so, remembering that our guideline isn't "Does it feel good?" or "This just feels so right, this just feels like what I need to be doing now"—you know, staying with the breath or noticing emotions or whatever—because sometimes that's just the path of least resistance. It's not about it being pleasant or feeling good right now. It's really about keeping your kind of background attention, your sense of cause and effect, attuned to the subtle habits and inclinations of our mind. That's the level we're working on with wise attention.

So if you think you're practicing really clearly and over days you're just getting more and more and more lost and craving—I mean, we all have periods where craving comes up, that's part of practice—but I mean, over time, you see something seems to be going in the wrong direction. That's the time to look and see: Is there something I'm doing that's feeding this?

That's not wise attention. That's not skillfully inclining the mind.

Let me give a grosser example of these habits. It's gross, but it's also not. Sometimes when we talk about the āsavas on the level I'm describing—the habit of clinging, the habit of wanting to become, the habit of ignorance—it feels so subtle that we don't quite grasp what I mean. But let me offer one way it's talked about that illuminates the different levels.

There's a teaching about the three vaṭṭas, or the three rounds of saṃsāra. I got this from Beelin Sayadaw. They describe the three different levels at which these deep habits of mind manifest in our lives, and what protects us at each level.

The first level is called the level of transgression. This is where these deep habits of mind manifest in speech and action—basically, out of control. What protects us on this level is sīla, our commitment to ethical conduct. Even just the five precepts really protect us from speaking and acting out of these suffering states.

The second vaṭṭa is called the level of the obsessive defilements, the obsessive kilesas, which speaks for itself. Your mind gets really caught in obsessive thought, emotion, going over and over, and you're truly caught. What protects us there is samādhi. That's why, when we first begin to touch into it, samādhi feels so wonderful—all that stuff is suddenly at a distance. It's like, "Oh my gosh, I didn't know." It's like having such a nice bath of peace. The mind is just shutting up, even for five minutes, and you see how totally exhausting this obsessive level is.

The third level—and this is the āsava level—is called the latent level. Latent means underlying. It hasn't yet come to flower, but the potential is there. If appropriate conditions come together, then from this latent, underlying level, that kilesa will spring up. What protects us there is paññā, wisdom. They say greed, hatred, and delusion are not fully abandoned by acts, but by wise seeing.

Let me give you a simple example to hammer this in. Say you're doing your walking meditation very quietly, and someone just comes along, cuts in front of you, and bumps you into the wall—which of course would never happen here, because everyone is so sublimely aware. But in crowded retreats, it can happen.

Deeds or speech at the transgression level? Well, that's obvious. "You stupid jerk." Or even if you just said, "Excuse me," with all the venom you could summon up—that would be acting on the level of transgression. Our sīla protects us from this, never mind moving to acts stronger than speech.

The obsessive level? We don't say anything. You look like the perfect yogi. You didn't even notice them. But for the rest of the walking: "I can't believe it. I cannot believe that that person just walked in front of me. They don't respect me at all. Nobody respects me. And that really shows how nobody respects me. I'm not standing for it. I tell you, I'm not standing for it." You can take it from there—either it goes out into a long story of more suffering, or you repeat the same three thoughts over and over, which isn't nearly as interesting. You can't kid yourself that it's going somewhere. But it has that same depth of suffering.

Now, in both of these cases, if you have any awareness at all, you know you're suffering. It's scary, because sometimes you don't. Sometimes you think, "Yes, it's really right that I tell off this person."

That's appropriate.

But anyway, the latent level is really much more refined. You're walking and you're not spaced out at all. You're very present. And there could just be a moment of not quite mindful, not gross, but the person walks in front of you and the mindfulness just was away at that moment. And that latent tendency—even though you haven't had any aversion or desire going on for quite some time, you've been really mindful—all of a sudden it comes rushing up. Have you had that experience where you go, "Wow, where did that come from? I've really been very present. Where did that come from?" That's the "give me a break" level.

But that's the level of āsava that we're talking about here, where just the seed, the potential is there, the habit of mind, given the right conditions. It's like a seed that's been under the earth forever, and when it's watered and has the right sun, it can sprout. That's the āsavas the Buddha's talking about—just that subtle tendency. Not the state itself, but the potential for it to arise. So you see we're talking on a subtle level here. And I personally think it's the genius of the Buddha that he could not only experience this level, but make it so clear, talk about it.

You know how when you've been going in life and you've seen so clearly in practice, in your daily life, you've seen so clearly the suffering of clinging, or the impermanence, or a particular personality pattern—it's really clear how empty that is. "I don't need that anymore. I'm done with that," right? Famous last words. But you really have seen through it. It's not an illusion. And then we turn around in retreat or in life, five minutes later or five months later, and there it is, pops up in all its strong glory. And you think, "How? How can this keep happening?" I would be surprised if there's someone here who hasn't had that experience. Maybe I'm the only one.

Or when you think, "I've been practicing, I've been understanding a lot in practice, but in my life I seem to be getting worse. It seems like these patterns are coming up more and more."

On a little less subtle level—because most of us don't go through thinking, "Oh, I see the potential for the habit of becoming arising now," right? That's really not so much the way you're going to think about it. Clinging to sense pleasure is okay to name. But the habit of becoming, putting it that way, maybe we don't notice it. Let me put it in a grosser way. If you want to call it sakkāya-diṭṭhi, right? Personality view.

What is our personality view but simply our clinging to or aversion towards any or all of the particular habits of our thoughts about ourself, of our memory, the habits of our emotions, the particular personality traits or habits of response, reaction in particular situations? What is the sakkāya-diṭṭhi but a kind of solidifying, a clinging to, a making permanent in our mind any sum of these patterns? And suffering from that—suffering not from the patterns, but from unwise attention.

So whether your pattern is in times of difficulty strong self-pity, or feelings of worthlessness, or feelings when things aren't going your way of blame thrown out on other people, or just being really cranky and aversive when you're tired. You know you get tired and up comes aversion when you've been so present and kind all day. Or just really getting so high when there's a lot of sense pleasure, just loving the sense pleasures and at some point getting really lost in that until you see how you're putting your whole life around having more and more. Or "I'm an athlete" or "I'm an introvert" or "this is what happens to me in this situation"—whatever. We all have our own. We all have many, many particular habits of emotion, of the descriptions of thought that we buy into and have repetitively about ourselves, particular responses.

The thing is, none of them are steady state. They're all different habits and patterns coming and going, coming and going. Have you had anyone that stayed steady all day? I mean really. Don't just say, "Oh yeah, right, it did." I mean really stayed steady all day. No breaks, no gaps, no fluctuation. I doubt it.

We actually compound our suffering through what the Flight of the Garuda, a Tibetan text, describes as "our pernicious habitual pattern of solidifying reality." We take thoughts about ourselves, patterns of emotion, habits of reaction, and completely solidify them: "Yes, this is me. This is who I am. This is what always happens in this situation."

Well, it does happen often. That's really a manifestation of this level of asava—a very deep and subtle inclination or habit of mind.

Give me a particular circumstance where I'm not very aware. I'm a cranky-at-night person when I'm tired. Give me a particular evening when I'm tired and not aware at all, and anything just mildly approaching unpleasant, and crankiness will arise. Now, for years I didn't really understand that. The crankiness would arise and I'd act on it. I'd say something unpleasant, or just feel really unpleasant and get restless and do more things, punch out more action to get away from it—which, when you're cranky, just makes everything worse.

Now that I know it much more clearly, if that situation arises—because that inclination, in the right circumstances of no mindfulness, is still there—it can still arise. But as soon as the crankiness arises, I meet it with wise attention. "Oh, crankiness. It feels like this."

At that point, it's not sakkāya-diṭṭhi anymore. There's not a sense of grasping, of making it me, of identifying with it, of turning it into becoming. "I am becoming a cranky person. I am becoming a worthless person, an athlete, an introvert"—or whatever. A good meditator, a concentrated person, whatever your sakkāya-diṭṭhi has been in the last half hour. It can come and go just like anything else.

We don't have to stop those thoughts, those emotions, those patterns. Simply the solidifying, the grasping around them—that's unwise attention. We notice it, but lightly. "Oh, crankiness feels like that." That's wise attention. That seed doesn't go any further.

So what's really inspiring to me—and I know people use this quotation from the Buddha a lot—is that he often describes or defines full awakening, or an arahant in the Theravada model, as someone who is free from all the asavas. Meaning that in such a person, even in any condition, those tendencies have been erased, basically. They've been exhausted—I think "worn out" is the better expression. So that even if I was incredibly tired and incredibly busy and something really unpleasant happened, crankiness just wouldn't arise. It couldn't arise. You see why that's the definition of an arahant.

But the inspiring thing is how often the Buddha says—and he says it in terms of this—"If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so": to apply wise attention.

I say that first because now I want to go back to the subtle level of asava, where we can really begin to play with how it works. Not getting down on ourselves or discouraged, but just playing with how strong and sudden this uprushing is. Asava really means something like "influx." And sometimes it really feels like this—just this uprushing of kilesa out of nowhere. But also, how in a moment of mindfulness, it can be gone.

An example: On one retreat I was sitting—I'd been practicing, I don't know, a couple of months. I was very deep in. Mindfulness was really pretty steady and strong. It was in between sittings, and I remember I was in my room, looking outside at a tree leaf. I was just right there noticing it. Seeing, seeing leaf. Vibrant color. Seeing pleasant. Seeing pleasant. Because by that time, the mind was just noting every moment—that was simply what it was doing. And it was so alive, you know, very connected.

And in just a moment, there was this slight—so slight—backing off of connected attention. You know, where you're going "seeing, seeing, pleasant, vibrant, seeing, pleasant..." and then just... "ahh." A kind of settling back. Delusion, for a moment.

You don't even look around, but you just kind of disconnect. You don't even have time to space out, but there's this disconnection. And it was as if—I don't want to be discouraging, it's just how I saw it happen—in this moment, it really was like this huge influx of craving. Just wanting. "Oh, it's so beautiful! How can I have more?" And it just started going down the road of papañca, of proliferation, in that amount of time. It was really amazing. Memories, pleasant memories, desire—my whole life in about a tenth of a second. At which point I just noticed: "Oh my god. Pleasant. Memory. Seeing." And then it was gone.

But I remember that moment so vividly because it was visceral, a feeling sense of really how powerful the underlying tendency can be at certain times. Not always—but at certain times.

It's also a good example of how yoniso manasikara, appropriate attention, totally connected and non-judging and not adding anything extra—in that moment of sati, of mindfulness, with non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion present—the whole kilesa, the whole āsava of sense desire just stopped. And in that moment, it's gone.

We're talking about a habit of mind, an underlying tendency. But it's not like there's some big glob of āsava sitting there, this mass of sense desire that you have to chip away at until suddenly it's all gone. We tend to think, "I'm working on my conditioning. I have this much left to go." It's like if you have the habit of smoking. When you're not smoking, you're really not smoking, right? There's not some little smoker in there puffing away that's just going to suddenly come out and you notice it. You're either smoking or you're not. So it's the same—you're craving or you're not.

Working on these two levels of practice, obviously in daily life and at retreat, means working a lot on the level of acting and speaking and the obsessive patterns. But it's also working very much on the latent level. It's just something we don't notice or think about or pay attention to as much. But every moment of mindfulness is not only not watering—the double negative, you know what I mean? In a moment of mindfulness, we're not watering the seed of the latent tendency. It doesn't have a chance to sprout. And also, what we are doing is planting the other seeds—the seeds of the habit of non-greed, non-hatred, full attention, non-delusion. And that then becomes the stronger tendency.

Until finally, the āsavas—those little seeds of unwholesome tendency—wither away from lack of being fed, from deep seeing, understanding, insight. They stop being fed and finally wither away altogether.

And it's important, I think, to really understand and trust this. Because as your practice, not only here but in life, as your dedication to paying attention to what you're doing here and off the cushion gets stronger, you're going to start to notice—you already are—the subtle levels where these āsavas are manifesting in a much more subtle way than we would normally have noticed.

And so it seems like we're not getting any better and maybe even getting worse. We fail sometimes to notice that we're not screaming and yelling and hitting and blaming. We're just walking very peacefully and having a little spurt of, "Oh my god, I can't believe it." And then it goes away and we're back to being mindful. It feels just as jarring. We don't really realize, because we're so in it, how much more subtle a level we're working on, and how the noticing of it and the immediate bringing in of yoniso manasikara eradicates it in that moment. How really powerful that is. It's important to really give that credit.

Here, one way you might notice from time to time—because this does also happen—is that when you walk into a situation or a condition arises that is absolutely ripe, all the conditions present for your prime tendencies to emerge—blame, self-judgment, comparing, worthlessness, desire, whatever it is—and you're not trying not to have it happen. You just walk in, and the person who so far has never been able to walk across your field of vision without some nasty judging thought arising in your mind—suddenly they walk across and, without any premeditation, mettā arises. They walk across and you think, "Oh, they must be really suffering. May they be happy." Where did that come from? It must be that deva behind me saying it, because it sure didn't come from this mind and body!

Or you walk in and somebody does something that would normally send aversion flying, and there's just space. Nothing happens.

I don't know, years ago. I think it was the first three-month retreat I ever sat. I'd sat a lot before, but not in that form with these people. I didn't know who anybody was. So I was kind of just checking it out and making up my stories about people. And there was one guy who I somehow decided was some really enlightened guy. I didn't even know who he was. The reason I had this story is because he would always come to lunch really late, like twenty minutes late, and just come in and take whatever and sit down and eat. And I thought, wow, he must be so free. He must be this amazing guy. How can you come to lunch late when it's the only thing going on in the day and the food might run out? You know all the riffs.

And I remember one retreat, I don't know when, sometime later, I didn't even notice it. Halfway through the retreat, I suddenly became aware that I wasn't even thinking about the food. And I myself was coming twenty or thirty minutes late. Something would be run out. I didn't care. It wasn't any big renunciation. I really didn't care. And that was the sense of, just in that particular moment, the particular asava not arising, not being there in that moment. I'm not saying it doesn't come up other times, but you can see those conditions that just couldn't bring it up anymore. And that, for the most part, has stayed steady around that on retreats unless I'm having a really bad day.

But just to see how it's nothing to take credit for because it's so clearly not you. You can feel how that particular tendency just gets exhausted from not being fed and from insight, from understanding. So it's important to notice that in yourselves as well.

So the Buddha talked about in this particular sutta—that's why I said it might be three talks; I didn't even get to the sutta yet—he talks about seven different ways to cultivate wise attention, yoniso manasikara, and to extinguish, to uproot the asavas in our life. What I love about this sutta is that some of the seven are really fairly specific to bhavana, to meditation on the cushion like we're doing, but not all of them. Some of them are quite applicable to how we relate to situations in our life. So it's both a very precise view, but also stepping back and looking at our relationship to experience in our life, our relationship to food, our relationship to environment, our relationship to mental states—as well as in the meditation.

So that's the next thing I want to talk about. Obviously, I'm only going to talk about the first one tonight. I might not even finish the first one. But just again, to lead into that, to emphasize again that unwise attention is at the root of our spinning in the rounds of samsara. That, you could say, is the proximate cause, the reason that we keep getting catapulted into the rounds of samsara. It causes craving and ignorance and becoming to increase. Wise, appropriate attention is at the root of liberation. Unarisen asavas do not arise and arisen ones are abandoned. That's very interesting—unarisen ones don't arise and arisen ones are abandoned. That's what the Buddha talks about in this sutta.

I'll just read you the seven ways and then say a little bit about the first one for tonight. These are the seven ways. Asavas can be abandoned by seeing, by insight. The second one is asavas are abandoned by restraining, restraint at the sense doors. They are abandoned by using, by attention to how we use things, use our requisites. They're abandoned by patience, or enduring in this translation. They're abandoned by avoiding things that are harmful. They're abandoned by removing—in other words, not allowing unskillful, harmful states to continue. And they're abandoned by developing, specifically developing the seven factors of enlightenment, the seven bojjhangas.

So those are the seven areas that he talks about that I'll go into a little tonight and the rest next week. Abandoned by seeing—I want to read you some of what he says. This is what he goes into in quite some depth in this sutta. He starts by saying that an untaught, ordinary person—is that puthujjana? Yeah, puthujjana—who has no regard for noble ones and doesn't understand the Dhamma and is undisciplined in it.

This person does not understand what dhammas—what things—are fit for attention and what are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he does not attend to the things that are fit for attention, and he attends to dhammas that are unfit for attention.

Now let me give you an example of how the Buddha speaks in this sutta. This is how one attends unwisely—and I like this because it cracks me up. He puts it in quotations: "Was I in past time, or was I not in past time? What was I before? How was I before?" Past time could be another life, or it could be the last sitting, right? "Shall I be in the future or not? How shall I be in the future? What shall I be? Having been what in the past, what shall I be in the future?" Or else he is perplexed about the presently existing time: "Am I, or am I not? How am I? How did I come to be here? Where will I be going?"

Can you relate?

When he attends unwisely in this way—and this is quite bare, but it can be anything—how was I so angry before? Am I going to be angry like this in the future? How could I have done that in the past? I can't believe I acted like that. I wonder if I'll do that again. But now that I've practiced so much, I'll probably be in the situation very differently. And we make the whole thing up. This is what the Buddha is talking about right here.

When one attends in this way, one of six kinds of view arises, and they're all different views of self. The view "Self exists in me, for me" arises as true. Or the view "No self exists for me" arises as true. Or the view "I perceive self with self" arises as true and established. Or the view "I perceive not-self with self" arises as true and established. Or the view "I perceive self with not-self" arises as true and established. Or he has some such view as "This is myself that speaks and feels, that experiences now here and now there, good and bad, the ripening of kamma," and it goes on and on.

"Now this view is called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views, the contortion of views, the vacillation of views, the fetter of views. No untaught ordinary person bound by this fetter of views is freed from aging and death, from sorrows and lamentations. He is not freed from suffering, I say."

Do you get a sense? Unwise attention leads us into the thicket of views. The thicket of views is not always quite so baldly stated as that in our minds. But just that—even if it's not put into discursive thought—the sense: "I am like this." Or "Oh, now I'm really having a good sit." Or "This is how I've always been and this is how I always will be." Or "Oh, it's like that, but now I'm going to be like this. When I leave retreat and I'm just a walking bodhisattva, it's going to feel like this."

Any of this stuff—the thicket of views, the wilderness of views, unwise attention. It doesn't mean we're bad. It just means we suffer. And the more we pay attention to that with clinging, with belief, the more we're feeding that habit, those asavas.

All we need to do is turn around. How do we pay attention wisely? How do we uproot the asavas by seeing, in this first example? You can probably guess. Mindfulness. Sati. Bare attention—in other words, paying attention to what's arising totally without adding anything extra. Nothing. Just totally present, without creating a story, without mistaking perception for something else. Just being here.

An example from Krishnamurti—I just thought I'd move out of Theravada for a minute.

This is Krishnamurti: "When you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment, and then there is no room for fear, no room for contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

When you attend totally, there's no room for asava to arise. There's no room for confusion.

This simple example I use a lot: someone told me in a long retreat there was a repetitive sound in the meditation hall. I think it was like a clock up at the teacher's place ticking. And they said, "I was really experiencing deep samadhi, long sittings, and this sound just ruined it. I got completely lost for sittings after sittings, for days, in aversion. It ruined my samadhi. I was thinking, I can't believe they let that be here in such a deep retreat." It must have been a three-month retreat.

And finally—like, duh—they thought, "Oh, what's happening? Hearing, hearing." Even that clock's ticking and making such a lot of noise—unwise attention. Total attention is not just "hearing over there, it's unpleasant." Total self-abandonment into hearing, just as it is. And then if it's unpleasant, total self-abandonment to that. If aversion arises, a thought—"I can't believe it"—total self-abandonment to that.

And then she said, "The sound wasn't ruining my samadhi. My attachment was ruining my samadhi. My mind."

This is from the Buddha, from the Sutta Nipata. Someone asked the Buddha, "What is the state of peace?" He says, "Dry up the remains of your past and have nothing for your future. If you do not then cling to the present, then you go from place to place in peace."

Total presence. Don't bring in the past, don't bring in the future, don't cling to present. And that can just be in a moment. That's not something we have to hope for down the line—just that moment of wise attention. Yoniso manasikara.

Then he goes on, kind of to the arhat level: "There is a greed that fixes on the individual body-mind"—that sense of me, sakkaya ditthi. "When that greed has completely gone, then, Brahman, there will be no more inner poison drives. And without these you are immune from death."

So we just start in the moment. Just this moment of total attention. No past, no future. No clinging to present. No descriptions of present. No interpreting present. Just this moment. Yoniso manasikara. Then you can go from place to place in peace.

So I'll stop there for tonight and continue here next week.

Dry up the remains of your past and have nothing for your future. If you do not cling to the present, then you can go from place to place in peace. That is the state of peace.

CHAPTER 346

Wise Attention III

Carol Wilson · 1h07

In this final talk of her series on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), Carol Wilson explores the remaining practical methods the Buddha taught for abandoning the āsavas—the deep tendencies toward craving, aversion, and delusion. She begins with patience (khanti), distinguishing it from grim endurance and connecting it to mettā, offering Patrul Rinpoche's three aspects: patience when wronged, patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma, and patience to face profound truth without fear.

Wilson then examines wise avoidance, using the Buddha's parable of the quail and falcon to illustrate staying within one's appropriate territory—the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). She addresses the skillful removal of distracting thoughts, referencing the Vitakkasaṇṭhāna Sutta's five methods: substituting wholesome thoughts, examining dangers, redirecting attention, investigating causes, and applying firm resolution.

The talk culminates with the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga): mindfulness (sati), investigation (dhammavicaya), energy (vīriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). Wilson emphasizes that these factors arise naturally through wise attention and are grounded in virtue (sīla) and good friendship (kalyāṇamittatā). She offers practical guidance for recognizing when factors are out of balance and how to cultivate each through inclining the mind with resolution and interest.

Tonight I want to continue and hopefully finish talking about the understanding and cultivation of wise or appropriate attention—really a key cultivation that the Buddha says takes us to Nibbana.

I want to point out again that wise attention, the whole concept, is rooted in the fact that we can train our minds and hearts. I know sometimes it can feel like we're the helpless victims of the waves of mental states and physical experience that go on in a retreat. Even when we've been practicing a while, suddenly out of nowhere things arise. Training doesn't mean you just want to say "okay, back" and it goes away, as we know. But it does mean that we can cultivate where we choose to let the attention dwell. And where we choose to allow the attention, the mind, mana, to dwell—that becomes the inclination, the habit of mind.

We've spent all our lives, or many of us have spent a great part of our lives—what have we been cultivating? Where has the mind been dwelling, left to its own devices? I'll just leave that question for you to look at.

So we can train the mind. And as I talked about in previous sessions, when the Buddha is speaking about this concept of appropriate attention in the sutta that we've been using as our base, it's in terms of starving to the point of the absolute uprooting of the deepest, most subtle tendencies or inclinations of our mindstream to move in the direction of craving for sensuality, of craving for becoming, for being, for ignorance. This is, by definition, the way the Buddha often describes the arhat—one in whom all these tendencies have withered away.

I'm just reminding you, in this review section, of a sense of how this moment of āsava, or this tendency, can suddenly spring up in experience. I've gotten to where I love to see it on retreat where it's relatively harmless and you don't get yourself into too much trouble.

One yogi was describing to me during a three-month retreat how she was very deep into the practice and felt that she was really quite mindful. The mind was fairly equanimous. One day after breakfast was over, she was walking past the food table at the retreat center on the way to wash her dishes. At the end of the food table was a bowl of fruit. She was completely full—not hungry, not worried about later, thought she was quite mindful. But there was this moment of just seeing the orange in the bowl. And the next thing she knew, her hand just reached out and grabbed it. Where did that come from? That's the level of āsava. It's subtle, but it can manifest not so subtly, even when it seems that we're really pretty together.

Or the aversive one—I think Sarah mentioned this in her talk, or someone did—in terms of not killing. We can very deeply intend not to kill, but when you're just on that point of sleep and there's a mosquito buzzing around, and you kind of start, and there isn't a moment to consciously think "oh yes, I'm committed to not killing," and the hand just swats. And you feel terrible, but in that moment of swatting, that was the āsava, the tendency, just shooting up.

I say I love seeing this because if we're living or practicing under the sort of delusion that quite soon and quite easily everything's going to get calm and copacetic and this stuff isn't going to arise anymore, and then this happens, we get really discouraged. No, it's like, let's get real. Let's really see how subtle the tendencies are. Then, actually, I find much more appreciation—one, for why practice can be so hard. And that gives me more courage and more energy and more willingness to keep going. If I think it's just around the corner and one more experience and I've got it, then when what's just around the corner is a wave of greed or lust or self-hatred, we're ready to pack it in. But if we really see, oh yeah, it's just working on deeper and deeper levels—can I summon up the mindfulness, the wise attention, the energy to be here? That's how the mind is trainable. That's what we're doing.

Every moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom from cultivating or strengthening greed, hatred, and confusion. And it is a moment of cultivating and developing wise attention, the factors of awakening.

As you remember, in this sutta about the exhaustion of all these tendencies, the Buddha spoke of seven different, very practical means in our experience—not just in deep meditation—that we can use wise attention, attention in relationship to what's happening, to retrain and redevelop the heart.

We talked about how the tendencies are abandoned by seeing, by insight, by that pure entry into emptiness of just perceiving what's here with nothing extra. We talked about how these tendencies are abandoned by restraint—satipaññā, mindfulness-wisdom at the sense doors. Not fearfulness of sense contact. Not walking around with your head in a bag, although you can try that. But just that moment of pure presence where the consciousness doesn't have to expand into proliferation and papañca and feeding, basically, the hindrances. That satipaññā starves the hindrances at that moment of sense contact.

And the third was how the āsavas can be abandoned by our wise attention to the attitude with which we use things. Remember how we relate to the way we use food, clothing, shelter, medicine—and for us as lay people, for some of us, how we relate to entertainment, going out, whatever. Remember, this is all in terms of not the outer appearance, but the intention with which we meet things. How we relate to these things—what relationship increases craving, hostility, confusion in our mind? What relationship decreases those things?

So you can't just say, "I know if I use less, I'll decrease craving." You might be increasing craving or decreasing craving, but making yourself totally crazed, increasing delusion. You can't just have a list and go—as I'm sure our venerable ordained sangha can tell us. Just having a list of precepts doesn't simply clean the mind of greed and craving, does it? Or does it? But it's a formidable list to use as a guideline to see how the mind is relating when it comes up against any of the precepts. We have our five, they have their eight or ten, he has his 227. It's something to be respected, taking that on.

So those are the first three. The fourth one is how these tendencies of mind, the habits, can be abandoned by endurance. Endurance is the common translation at this point, but I prefer patience because for me in English, endurance takes on the quality of something kind of grim, aversive—"I'll get through it"—but aren't your teeth kind of clenched when you're enduring? Whereas patience is an aspect of metta.

This is the way the Buddha described it: "Here a bhikkhu"—or anyone practicing, that's you—"reflecting wisely. There's cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with flies, bugs, wind, burning and creeping things, rain, unwelcome words, and arisen bodily feelings that are painful, wracking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life." He's moving way beyond that little knee pain.

Endurance or patience is that quality of open-hearted presence within whatever the experience is—just being there with mindfulness without adding anything extra. "Unwelcome words" doesn't lead to "I can't believe this" and on down the road. Instead: "Oh, unwelcome words feels like this." Racking, piercing, distressing, menacing to life—physical sensation feels like this.

Endurance also means connectedness of attention. Otherwise, it moves into that passive aversive avoidance: "Okay, I'll put up with this. In, out, in, out. Rising, falling, rising, falling. I'm being really mindful until it goes away." And then—ah—then you really open the field of attention.

Next time that really unpleasant noise arises or pain in your body, when it first arises—not when you're already beaten down and the mindfulness is very low, but when it first arises and you notice that "oh no, another hour of this"—just notice: it feels like this. Relax. Open your attention, open your energy field, open your cells and meet with totality of attention whatever that arising experience is. Not in order to achieve anything. Simply because that's what's arising. That's life. That's truth. That's the gateway to liberation in this present moment. It can't be anywhere else.

If you're waiting for this to go away before you pay attention, that is what you are strengthening in the habit of mind—waiting till it gets better. Well, as we all know, none of us are spring chickens here. We can really wait our whole life for it to get better before we truly commit to practice. And I don't think it just keeps getting better. I hate to tell you, especially body-wise, it just doesn't keep on getting better. So where are we going to wake up?

Patience can bring in a kind of resolve simply to be here. But the being here is just to open into the midst. We all know what that is; I don't need to talk about it much more. But the patience applies to both so-called external and internal phenomena. Some person acting a way we don't like. Our body-mind acting a way we don't like. Of course, who doesn't like it—that's the other question.

I do want to read you this from Patrul Rinpoche's The Words of My Perfect Teacher. He's talking about arousing bodhicitta, but he mentions three aspects of patience. These three lines have stayed with me when I'm in really difficult retreat. They would come to me—not just like "okay, I can keep going," but they would totally open my heart and mind.

The first is transcendent patience, to have patience when wronged by others. The second is the patience to bear hardships for the Dharma, all the things that happen. And the third is the patience to face the profound truth without fear. Just calling up those lines when anything is going on that you don't like.

And just when you're thinking, "Oh yes, I can find the patience to bear hardships for the Dharma," and you're just there, moment to moment—in that moment of cultivating patience, what's withering? The tendency to aversion, the tendency to greed. What's strengthening? Metta, mindfulness, clear seeing, all the factors of awakening.

Now, the next one—you would think, why didn't he put this first?—is the tendencies that are abandoned by avoiding difficult situations. Of course there's an obvious reason why this isn't first: because we'd much prefer to avoid than to endure. And sometimes I think it's tricky both ways to know what's avoidable.

The Buddha says, "Reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu avoids a savage elephant, a savage bull, a savage dog, a snake, a stump, a cliff, a cesspool, a sewer. He avoids sitting on unsuitable seats, frequenting unsuitable friends"—so that wise companions in the life might believe that he would be more drawn into unwise action.

So what can be abandoned by avoiding really means using our wise discrimination to see what experiences are just plain dangerous, and what others—these are my words now, not the Buddha's—are just plain stupid, experiences we don't need to keep going back to over and over and over.

Say, for example, you're trying to sit outside because you think, "I need to be with nature," and it's lightning, and the mosquitoes are biting you, and you are filled with aversion, just filled with aversion. No mindfulness. It's getting stronger and stronger. Do you think this is helpful in that moment? What is being cultivated? We're not talking about a moment of aversion, but just feeding, feeding, feeding. There can be other times when being outside could be totally appropriate because you're just looking at fear, and by being there and noticing the mental state, calm and acceptance and equanimity are growing. It's really about looking at what's being fed.

There's another sutta that I like very much that to me expresses this—knowing what's appropriate for deepening our understanding and practice, and what is more useful to avoid. It's a parable, really a simile, where the Buddha talks about a falcon who suddenly swooped down and caught a quail in the air. While she was carrying the quail away, the quail started moaning and saying, "Oh, stupid me, it serves me right. If I had kept to my own natural territory, the territory of my kind, today I would have been safe. But I went outside of my natural territory, and you caught me."

The falcon said—she was not particularly proud—"Well, what's your natural territory?" And the quail said, "It's a field that's been all turned up by the plow"—a bare field with many clods of earth, really bumpy and uneven. So the falcon, not out of pride or anything, let the quail go and said, "Go ahead, go to your natural territory, but I'll still be able to catch you." It wasn't boastful, just saying, "I know I can still do it."

She let the quail out. The quail went into this field and stood by a clod of earth. The falcon dove down toward the quail, but just before she got there, the quail jumped into the clod of earth and the falcon missed her, hit the ground, and killed herself.

What the Buddha is saying is: stay within your own reach, stay within appropriate territory. And of course he says that for monks or for those practicing, roaming outside of one's own pasture, one's own territory, means getting really caught in sense desire. What's staying within our territory is the four foundations of mindfulness—sati at the sense doors, rather than just spinning our gears on wanting and reacting to sense pleasures.

But I think that can actually be expanded a lot in the ways that we practice. There's a reason we come on intensive retreat to such a conducive environment. It's a choice not to have CNN going in the corner of the meditation hall. There's a reason we don't have internet access data ports in each of your rooms. What's really helpful for practice?

Sometimes I know people—all of us—can be confronted with something quite difficult in practice, internally or externally, or when we go home again, and think, "Well, I should be able to be purely mindful no matter what the conditions. It's okay, I can do whatever I want when I go home, because if I really could practice, I could be mindful in any conditions whatsoever." Completely unrealistic.

And sometimes on retreat—the Buddha doesn't so specifically speak of this, but I want to bring it up—there can be times when what we need to avoid isn't so much an outer savage elephant or a cesspool, but something that's arising internally. For example, a sudden release of old traumatic memory that we weren't familiar with. Sometimes that happens, and it comes up so sudden and so strong that basically the mindfulness does not have equal strength to the intensity of the terror, for example, that might come up with that memory.

Of course we attempt to be mindful, to be present, but what starts happening is it spirals way out of control. And by out of control—first it feels out of control, that's okay. Way out of control is really where you've lost any mindfulness, except there's a thing in the back of your mind: "I should be able to get through this."

So it's push, push, push, and the whole thing is just getting more and more into the realm of feeding fear. Usually way before that time, the teacher is begging you—begging you on hands and knees—to sit less, not to push so much. And you're thinking, "That's because they think I'm a wimp, but I'll show them. I'll just really get through this." Right?

There are times when wise avoidance really means turning your attention elsewhere. Because in the moment, what's really being strengthened by the way you're practicing is willpower, terror, anger, or fear. And you need to turn the attention elsewhere to rebalance, reconnect with mindfulness, reconnect with calm, reconnect with the wholesome energies, and then again come back and meet.

The whole field of skillful means is in many ways, I think, contained in this learning of when it's appropriate to avoid. But again, it's in the intention. You come in here and it's hotter than you like, and you think, "I can't turn on the AC, but I don't like to be with the heat, so I'm getting out of here." And the intention, if you tune in, is completely aversive. That's not skillful means. That is not abandoning the tendencies. The tendencies are running the show. That's the time to sit here and sweat.

As Ajahn Sumedho said when he talks about patience—if you listen to his talks—practicing in Asia is wonderful because you get endless talks about patience and avoidance. He was giving one talk about the endless heat in the hot season in Thailand, or the rainy season where it rains constantly but it's about twenty degrees hotter and more humid. He said he's just sweating through the robes day after day, just sweating through these thick robes. And then he said he'd finally think, "I just can't bear this. I just can't bear it." And then the next moment you'd find, well, you could really bear it a little longer.

Have you ever come up to that? "I just can't bear this." And then you go, "Oh, can't bear it. It feels like this." And then you're just there again. So patience would be the first line. Avoidance is later. But we must see what really does not contribute to practice. And of course, living much more simply, avoiding having sense pleasures hit you in the face every time you turn around—because craving is just so strong that we shouldn't expect we're suddenly going to be free of it.

Remember what Shankara said: that craving is intensified if we let our thoughts dwell upon sense objects and seek temporary satisfaction in the objective world. As Thich Nhat Hanh describes it, sometimes he would come into his house and find he had left all his windows open. The wind had come and just blown everything all over the place, topsy-turvy. Come in, close the windows, straighten up. He says we're like that. It's as if all our sense doors are the windows and we just walk around with them wide open saying, "Yes, everything, just come on in." "I should be able to be mindful of all of it." Or maybe we're not even trying to be mindful, but we just let ourselves be bombarded.

He says—and I was just reading this little section from him—that at that time in France, workers were demonstrating to have five hours less a week of work. He asks, but what are people going to do with that five hours? Go home and watch something stupid on TV that just increases agitation or boredom because we're so afraid to be alone.

So when the mindfulness isn't that strong, when the energy is low, when the mind is agitated, then we shut the windows. We come to somewhere like this where we're not continually bombarded, to cultivate the wholesome factors, to learn how to do that. And then when we go out, why is it so agitating? One of the reasons, when you leave a retreat—sure, partly it's the concentration—but partly our sense doors have gotten so cleansed, so much more purified. We're so much more sensitized to what's actually coming in. And it's appalling, the experience internally.

Once I left a retreat and stopped off in Walmart. I tell you, it was like a vortex of suffering walking into Walmart trying to buy some stupid thing. Oh, wow. Now, I'm not saying we're practicing to be unable to function in the world. No. But it's to learn how to use wise attention, to make our choices about when to open the windows—or when we have no choice but they're open, how to be mindful, how not to just let that sweep us away. And so for practice, we need to have some more protected environment, some way of avoiding, so we can learn how the mind works.

The sixth one the Buddha speaks about is tendencies, āsavas, habits of mind that can be abandoned by removing. He's speaking particularly about thought here. And again, it's interesting because we sometimes take this in an inaccurate way, one based in aversion. He says, "Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, does not endure a thought arisen that's affected by sensual desire, by ill will, or by cruelty. He abandons it." Now, this language is why we tend to take this a little unhelpfully. "He abandons it, removes it, does away with it, and annihilates it."

So that language can certainly feed all too easily into "get out the hammer and whack that thought." Bad thought, bad thought, bad me, shouldn't have it.

Now, I don't need to tell you that this is not what the Buddha is talking about. But it's very interesting, because what he is pointing to, in my understanding, is on a more subtle level of wise attention. On the level of thought, we certainly are not always so balanced in our mindfulness and concentration that we are able to see each thought just as it arises when it has no energy. There are times like that, right, where even a thought that might be the most cruel or lustful or aversive just comes up with nothing behind it. Poof. Like Joseph says, "And the sky is blue, you know, I really hate everybody and everything, and the sky is blue"—and they're equally empty. Nothing to do about that. No need to do anything.

But there are times when a thought comes laden with the intention, the motivation of ill will, cruelty, self-hatred, confusion. We may not notice it at the beginning, but whenever we notice it, this is where he's talking about wise attention. Not to endure it, not to be—what comes to mind is Larry Rosenberg, who is hysterical, mimicking a kind of New Age way of dealing with kilesas: "We must massage our kilesas. We must be kind to our kilesas." No, no, the Buddha is not saying, "Oh yes, nice ill will, you know."

There's a point where, with a balance of wisdom mind, again as satipaññā, we can summon up resolution and clear seeing in relationship to these really harmful—harmful to us—unskillful trains of thought that, left alone, are the patterns feeding the tendencies of greed, hatred, and delusion. And it's really talking about resolution. We really can see that thought and go, "No, not now." Not in the beginning of a retreat when we're bombarded, no. But when there's a certain degree of mindfulness and balance—and this comes and goes, as you know—we often just sit back and wait a little more than we need to. Because we can have such a tendency to get into self-judging, sometimes I think we're a little leery of calling on resolution. And we just turn into mushy meditation.

Resolution is a powerful force in the mind. "No, not now." Like if you get into some kind of VR—Vipassana Romance or Vendetta—where every time you think of or see the person, there's craving or aversion. Or you don't even see them, you just think about them. It's so unpleasant. And it's so draining. People do often feel quite victimized by that, or fall into hatred of it. But you can really say, as soon as you notice it, at whatever point, "No, not going there." It's not "bad me, ugly me." Not going there, no.

A very clear example of this in my life: quite some years ago I came down with some autoimmune disease that was going in not a good direction. One of these things where nobody really knew how it would go or how bad it could be. It could have gotten really quite crippling. In the early days of it, when the mind would start going, "I'll never be able to take a walk again"—at that point I couldn't walk very well—"I'll never be able to blah, blah..." Fear and distress and grief. These thoughts always projecting what was going to happen or could be.

That went on a week or two, seeing all the doctors—and it doesn't help, that train of thought. Really, because they give you a list starting with the worst possibility and then going down from there. But after a while, I saw the mind doing this, and I thought, "I don't know. I have no clue." And as soon as my mind started going, "It's going to be..."—I don't know. Stay right here.

I remember once leaning down to wash out a bathtub. It was really hard to lean down, hard to reach, painful. And the mind started... No. Don't know. Right here. Just feel stiffness and patience.

That was a lifesaver. I mean, that was absolute—just this resolution. You don't need to endure or allow those thoughts to keep going when you have sufficient mindfulness to see it. But it takes that willingness to, just every single time you notice, say, "Okay, no, not now. I've got to have that orange? No, not now."

Wanting feels like this. It's not saying I don't feel wanting—it's just not going into those thoughts.

Play with it. When you notice it starting to move from balanced resolution to aversion, you may notice it right away if you're really present. It has a whole different contextual feel. If you don't notice it right away, believe me, you'll notice it soon enough, because you're feeding the aversion and you'll end up frustrated or in self-judgment or angry or lustful or whatever. Rather than judge that, you start right then: "Ah, lust feels like this." Each moment's a new moment.

But this is extremely powerful. And there's a whole sutta, a different sutta, that I wanted to talk about, but I'll never get through the factors of enlightenment, so I'm just going to mention it. It deals directly with the tendencies abandoned by removing, which is called the Removal of Distracting Thoughts. I'm sure a lot of you know it, where the Buddha lists five different methods for dealing with basically distracting thoughts—thoughts that are coming in and taking you away from meditation. And again, it's so practical. He realizes everyone isn't sitting in such sublime mindfulness that you barely have to advert attention to the thought and it goes.

I'm just going to mention the five without elaborating, in case something hits you. The first one—all of these are for when just sati, mindfulness of the thought, isn't enough. When you say, "Oh, ill will arising. Ill will arising. Ugh. Ill will arising. Ugh." And finally you really have to do something else or it's taking over.

The first is to simply move the attention away from the unwholesome by substituting a wholesome thought—in this way, substituting metta for ill will. Not the phony "yes, I pretend, I accept," but if you're in ill will, I find metta not to the person I'm feeling ill will for, but metta to myself feeling the ill will. Or if it's cruelty, compassion. Or if it's delusion, then actually reflecting on some inspiring dhammic theme can switch the train of thought. It goes into a lot of detail. So one is changing the attention, substituting the wholesome for the unwholesome. I call it changing the channel.

The second one would be with discerning wisdom—not so much thinking about, but by looking, noticing, and examining the danger in that unwholesome train of thought. So for example, anger or ill will. I remember one retreat I was sitting where somebody called me out of retreat when I was on staff at IMS to discuss some business that could definitely have waited three days. And that person definitely knew better than to do that but was just in his own little world. And it just got all this anger going, and self-righteousness, and the whole yada yada. And I kept practicing with it, tuning into the anger, until I really saw how just letting this run like this is feeding it. And it's so much suffering. And it's dangerous, because what's happening is feeding my belief in my righteousness, feeding the tendency for anger to take over, feeding all these unwholesome thoughts about a really good person. It was nothing wholesome. And whether I was right or not, who cared? What difference did it make? And in the scheme of things, it was such a little thing.

So having some reflection through experientially tuning into the dangers of just going after that pleasant fantasy every time it comes up—not the dangers of being a bad person, but actually what's being fed by doing that. And what's the ultimate outcome of feeding that craving, that ill will? That's how we're going to be in life.

The third, when these two don't work, is to just try to forget those thoughts altogether—not even substituting something wholesome that's relational, but just going to something neutral. When we say "steady the mind," just come back to the breath. Just forget it and come back to the breath, or go to hearing, or go to body sensations. Just advert your attention elsewhere.

The fourth is to give, again, some dhamma vicaya, some investigation to looking at and stilling the cause of these thoughts. So for example, you keep getting into pleasant fantasy, pleasant fantasy. You notice it and are present, but you don't see how you're getting into it. And you look a little closer with investigation and see—oh, an image.

It's pleasant. You didn't notice pleasant, and you're off. Noticing that cause with mindfulness right there—that just stills the whole thing.

Or for me, I notice with anger, when I really get to feeling it, underneath it there's some hurt. When I'm able to just feel the hurt with mindfulness, that whole train of angry thoughts just is stilled, is stopped.

And the fifth, which everyone always likes the most: "If there's still unwholesome thoughts connected with desire, with hate, and with delusion, then with the teeth clenched and the tongue pressed against the roof of the mouth, he should beat down, constrain, and crush the unwholesome state of mind with a wholesome state of mind."

But what he's basically saying is you never give up. You never just go, "Okay, take me." You keep on trying—but with a wholesome state of mind. I will leave you to explore how that's possible.

And I will just end this section. This is how he ends the sutta: "This bhikkhu then is called a master of the courses of thought. He will think whatever thought he wishes to think, and he will not think any thought he does not wish to think."

Can you imagine? Wouldn't that be something? "He has severed craving, flung off the fetters, and with complete penetration of conceit he has made an end of suffering." So that's a definition of arhat. Wouldn't that be nice? Just that possibility—a master of the courses of thought. And remember, everything he says: if it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so.

The last one, which is of course four talks in itself, so I can only just highlight—and I know this is a lot of information. Please don't try to remember it all. I'm just hopeful that any particular piece that is concurrent with something happening in your practice right now or in the next days has a way of going in and popping up in our mind at the right time. So trust that. Please don't try to remember all of this, because that actually just blocks the whole process of mindfulness and the surrender into the process.

So the seventh way is the asavas, or tendencies, that can be abandoned by developing. And what he's talking about developing are the seven factors of awakening, the bojjhangas, the factors of enlightenment.

These factors of enlightenment, on one level, are spoken of as coming to full perfection in a completely awakened person. But the Buddha is also quite clear that as we practice and develop the four foundations of mindfulness, simply by steadily cultivating the four foundations of mindfulness, we cultivate and bring to perfection the seven factors of enlightenment.

These are seven factors of mind that all of you are experiencing from time to time—not just from time to time, but a lot. They can come and go in strength and in balance relative to each other. And it's a very useful kind of self-guidance in terms of your practice. If you're feeling off, just run through the seven and see if one is really low or if some are really out of balance.

So these seven are: mindfulness, of course, the balancing factor of all. And then there are three energizing factors: dhamma vicaya, or investigation of dhammas (this is not analyzing, and I'll explain each one); energy, viriya; and rapture, piti. Those are the energizing three.

And then there are three that are tranquilizing: samadhi, tranquility itself, and equanimity, upekkha.

And for those who get stuck in always evaluating your practice by samadhi, you may notice it's one of seven. All seven are equally important, and really when our practice deepens and develops is when all seven are coming into balance and strengthening together.

As the Buddha said, the proximate or immediate cause for each of these seven is wise attention, appropriate attention. And that's what's so fascinating. I want to read you a couple of things about wise attention, what all seven are based on.

He says, "Bhikkhus, whatever beings there are which assume the four postures"—in other words, whatever beings stand, walk, sit, and lie down from time to time, they're all assuming those four postures based upon the earth, established upon the earth, right? Couldn't do it without the earth.

"So just as the postures are based upon earth, a bhikkhu cultivates and develops the seven factors of enlightenment based upon virtue, established upon sila." So the very first requisite is virtue, morality, purity of action and speech.

It doesn't mean you never did anything bad, but really reflecting on this when you're practicing is the foundation for the cultivation of the seven factors.

More specifically, the Buddha speaks about wise attention as an internal factor. He says: "As to internal factors, I do not see any other factor that is so helpful for the arising of the seven factors of enlightenment as this—careful attention." No other internal factor is as important for the arising of all seven as careful attention. When a bhikkhu is accomplished in careful attention, in all the ways we're talking about, it is expected that he will develop and cultivate the seven factors of enlightenment. It just follows.

And this is also very interesting. "Bhikkhus, as to external factors, I do not see any other factor that is so helpful for the arising of the seven factors of enlightenment as this—good friendship." When a bhikkhu has a good friend, it is expected that he will develop and cultivate the seven factors. By good friend, he basically means someone wise.

For each of the seven factors, there are also lists of supporting factors in the commentaries that we need to give wise attention to in order to develop and increase each quality. In each case, one supporting factor is to avoid certain kinds of association. For concentration, for example, we avoid the company of unconcentrated, scattered, rough people and cultivate being friends with wise, calm, concentrated people. This applies to each of the seven factors. So externally he sees no other factor so helpful.

Being here, when we talk about Sangha as a refuge, we mean not only the Sangha of awakened noble ones but our friends, our colleagues on the Dhamma path. It's not good friendship like the person you call up and pour your heart out to. It's association with the wise, association with the mindful, association with the virtuous.

How fortunate are we in this world. Given the world as it is—it's the same as when you came here, not much better, not much worse, about the same—to be able to associate for such protracted periods of time with good friends is incredibly fortunate. Use that. It's the base. That and virtue is the base from which we can cultivate wise attention, from which the seven factors of awakening develop.

So I will briefly name the factors and some of the additional supporting conditions.

Mindfulness, of course, is the overbalancing factor. You can't really have too much mindfulness. Whenever you're out of balance and you don't know what's going on, you're always safe to come back to mindfulness. As you know, that's the quality of clear seeing—knowing what's happening, not superficially. There's an image of throwing a cork on a river and it bounces around on the top. You throw a rock in and it sinks. That's mindfulness. You all know mindfulness; we've talked about it a lot.

Remember when we talked about feeding and starving the hindrances with wise attention? It's just the same with the seven factors. So feeding each of these seven factors —what do we give wise attention to? The first cause for mindfulness is mindfulness itself. One moment of mindfulness is really the immediate cause for the next moment of mindfulness to arise. We give wise attention to one moment of mindfulness meeting what's happening right here, always the fallback, the most important.

Additionally, we avoid the unmindful and associate with the mindful, developing mindfulness in the broader areas. Each of the seven factors ends with this instruction: give wise attention to inclining the mind towards that quality. This really shows us that we can cultivate and train the mind. You don't just sit here and think, "Someday, some moment, I know mindfulness will arise. If I sit and walk long enough, from somewhere it will come." Inclining the mind means making mindfulness a priority. You do little things like saying, "I'm really going to try to be so mindful just this one stretch of walking," or "I'm going to be as mindful as possible as I get up from sitting and move out of the hall." Inclining the mind with that resolution and interest toward mindfulness is enormously powerful wise intention.

The second factor is Dhamma-vicaya, or investigation. This is not thinking about things. It's described as the quality where, when it's present, the mind lights up the field of awareness. It's like walking into a dark room and turning on a flashlight, and you can suddenly see what's there. It has, to me, a quality of interest that's not thinking about things, but in shining that light of mindfulness, it really allows discerning insight to arise.

For example, there's a sensation, you're struggling, you're mindful, and in that next moment—oh, tingling, coming and going, it's impermanent. That light of Dhamma-vicaya, of investigation, lets you see clearly, lights up the field of awareness, illuminates so that you can see the true nature of experience in that moment. It dissipates confusion.

It's an energizing factor. I find for myself it's one I often forget to look for, but when things are feeling flat and I think, "Well, everything's going okay, but it's so... what's the matter?" I'll look and see there's not that investigation. I'm kind of meeting experience with mindfulness, but just like, "Oh yeah, oh yeah." And you can just bring a little interest and it lights up the field in that moment.

The first cause of investigation is, guess what, mindfulness—active mindfulness that connects with the moment of experience so that there is direct perception. And this, again, requires wise attention directed towards mindfulness. So really, you see, if you're having wise attention towards mindfulness, there will be mindfulness, which will also naturally lead to dhammavicaya, investigation of states. It happens by itself.

And again, there are additional supports to which we can direct wise attention. I cannot list them all, but among them is avoiding foolish people, being with wise people, cleanliness—keeping the internal sense bases, keeping yourself clean and orderly, and keeping your environment clean and orderly. Very interesting, but it tends to help the mind light up. And again, a total commitment, inclining the mind in the direction of interest.

The third is virya, courageous effort, which has the characteristic of supporting us. Its function is to support us and give us a kind of refreshment of mind that helps us be with the difficult. Difficult pain or emotional material wears us down. Sayadaw U Pandita gives the example of a house, an old shack that's falling apart, and you prop it up with strong boards so it comes back erect and is strong again. That is how virya works. It's not just that we're a whirlwind of energy. But to bring in energy refreshes the mind so—ah yes, it's been withered, but you come back up again and can be with what is difficult.

When the energy is low, or when we're really feeling worn down and the mind is withering away, he gives a whole series of additional supports. Of course, wise attention and commitment to energy is the first cause, but he gives a series of actual reflections that can help arouse the energy that gives the mind the freshness to be with what's difficult.

Such reflections include contemplating our precious opportunity, saying how fortunate we are. Reflecting on states of misery—it's like, "Oh, this is just too hard. I don't want to do it. I just can't be with it anymore." And then you think about what the alternative is. Sometimes it's, "Okay, I think I'll pay attention now." Reflecting on noble ones, teachers, awakened ones, people that really inspire you. Reflecting on appreciation for the support that allows us to practice—the support of staff, the support of dana.

This isn't just for ordained Sangha, but for all of us. When I was a nun, I reflected on how I was fed and clothed and housed by people who loved the Dhamma and wanted me to be able to practice. We can turn that into a guilt trip in the West. It's not a guilt trip. It's a profound, energizing reflection. Like, "Yes, what an opportunity. It's so beautiful, this dana." And that brings a natural energy. Not a should, but you become filled with energy. "Okay, I can sit with this knee pain, this self-hatred, another couple of minutes"—whatever.

So there's much reflection: remembering the greatness of the Buddha, of teachers, appreciating the people we're practicing with. And again, inclining the mind towards resolution. Not just, "I can't do it. It's too hard." But really saying, "Okay, just one more step." That's all we need. One more breath. One more moment. Not the whole day. I don't know if I can ever think of a time when I couldn't have really honestly said, "I can be with this one more breath, one more step"—if I'm just willing.

And then there's piti, or rapture. Rapture is a funny word in English. Piti is a mental state. It has the characteristic of happiness, delight, satisfaction. When piti is there in your experience, you're really into it. You're interested in what's happening. There's a lot of energy. Piti actually manifests a lot as energy.

The mind feels very light and energized. The body becomes very light and agile. There was all this pain, everything felt heavy and cramped—and then all of a sudden you're just sitting there and you go, "What happened?" Same position. You can even find that same sensation that was just driving you nuts, but it just doesn't matter anymore. The body is very light.

Often piti, besides this joyous interest, manifests as physical sensations—lightness, floating, sometimes really quite bizarre physical sensations. It can be like way too much energy, out of balance. You might find yourself literally flipping all around the room. And you come to the teacher and they say, "Oh yeah, that's piti." And you think, "This is piti? Enough already!" It's out of balance, but it has a lot of physical, energetic manifestation. If you really look closely, you might initially think it's unpleasant, but when it's truly piti, it's not unpleasant. Your mind might be reacting, but if you really look, it's not unpleasant.

The proximate cause is—can you guess? Wise attention. Wise attention to wholesome feelings, wholesome thoughts associated with Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Actually, this is one of the definitions of right effort. If you read or hear the way the Buddha defines right effort, it's actually exactly the same as wise attention.

The four right efforts are: zeal or energy for the abandoning of arisen unwholesome states; zeal for the non-arising of unarisen unwholesome states—meaning an unwholesome state has not arisen, and there's a zeal to keep it that way; zeal for the arising of unarisen wholesome states; and zeal for the continuance and strengthening of arisen wholesome states.

So wise effort and wise attention isn't just about getting rid of what's unwholesome. It's about recognizing the wholesome and giving that attention. That's also wise attention. Giving attention to the wholesome when it's arising is one of the things that leads us into piti, into rapture.

Again, there are many possibilities. If you want to look up all these different supportive areas to pay wise attention to for each of the factors, Sayadaw U Pandita's book In This Very Life is a great resource because it's all collated there in the chapter on the seven factors of enlightenment. Trying to remember it all isn't helpful, but if you're exploring a particular factor or feeling you can't really sense a particular one in yourself, it might be helpful to read what the supporting factors are—between five and eleven for each of them—and explore those in your practice, seeing how wise attention can help cultivate them. It's really quite scientific and accessible.

So again, as with all the factors, inclining the mind towards piti—which provides the energy to be mindful, which leads to concentration. When there's some concentration and mindfulness, when the mind has to be relatively clear of kilesa, that's when piti can arise. There won't be strong piti if the mind is also wracked with greed or aversion or delusion. They just don't go together.

So those are the three energizing factors, and you can see how all of them—piti is hugely energizing, energy of course, and investigation is also energizing. They need to be balanced with the three calming factors.

I'm going to go a little bit over tonight. I won't go too much over. But if you're really hurting and can't sit anymore and want to leave, it's okay—it won't hurt my feelings. Let me briefly name the other three, since I won't be here next week to finish.

The three calming factors are tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. Tranquility is very important. We often don't recognize it. It has the quality of non-agitation of body and mind, of coolness. It takes the heat out of the restlessness of mind. I think perhaps we don't quite recognize the power of restlessness. The way Sayadaw U Pandita described it—I didn't realize this, but as soon as I read it, it made total sense—restlessness, the scattered mind, is a very powerful state. It has the quality of being able to infect other mental states that arise at the same time. He gives a specific example of samadhi, of concentration. You could be quite restless and there's samadhi, but it's infected with that restlessness. So it's not really wise samadhi. The mind can be very focused on something but jumping all over the place.

When there's this restless quality that infects other mental states, that's when we don't really quite have control of our speech and actions. This is how, as a yogi, you think you're being mindful and suddenly you say something or do something that just flirts out. Or you suddenly do something and later you wonder, "How could I have done that? I knew better." We all do that. Or you're just acting out in unskillful ways, even though it's very subtle. This is a manifestation of restlessness.

Tranquility—that cool calmness, non-agitation of mind and body—cools this out. Again, wise attention is the proximate cause: wise attention to wholesome mental states, wise effort. When you notice the mind is restless, you can give attention more to singularity of experience rather than running after the restlessness. Give attention to calmness. Just be with the breath, for example. Just feel the stillness of your body and don't let yourself move. Let that stillness of body bring in stillness of mind. Incline the mind towards peacefulness. We often don't recognize the restlessness and let it run the show.

Samadhi, which is not necessarily extended in time, has the quality of non-scatteredness—that factor of mind, of attention, which really stands on whatever is arising, just right there with that sensation of breath, that emotion, that image. It's just right there without wavering at all, even if it's just for a moment. It sinks into it, still, calm, stays there.

Samadhi can be on changing objects, so it doesn't have that sense of absorption in one thing, which is also samadhi on an unchanging object. But when there's samadhi, even though the arising and passing objects are changing, each moment of mindfulness has that steadiness, that immovable quality, that really connecting and sinking in.

One other interesting aspect of samadhi—it's sort of like restlessness in reverse—is that when samadhi is present in the mind, it has the function of collecting together whatever other mental states are arising simultaneously. When we talk about the collection of mind, the unification of mind, it's a real power of mind. This is a function of samadhi.

CHAPTER 347

Wise Attention 3 of 3

Carol Wilson · 1h12

> In this concluding talk on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), Carol Wilson examines the final methods the Buddha taught for abandoning the āsavas—the deep tendencies toward craving and delusion. She explores patience (khanti) as an aspect of mettā rather than grim endurance, skillful avoidance of situations that feed unwholesome states, and the active removal of distracting thoughts through resolution and wise discrimination.
>
> The heart of this teaching centers on developing the seven factors of awakening (satta bojjhaṅgā): mindfulness (sati), investigation of dhammas (dhamma-vicaya), energy (vīriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). Wilson explains how these factors naturally arise through the cultivation of the four foundations of mindfulness, and how wise attention serves as the proximate cause for each. She emphasizes the importance of balancing the three energizing factors with the three calming factors, using mindfulness as the central balancing element.
>
> Drawing from the Vitakkasaṇṭhāna Sutta on removing distracting thoughts and Paṭrul Rinpoche's teachings on three types of patience, Wilson offers practical guidance for working with difficult mental states. She highlights how virtue (sīla) and good friendship (kalyāṇa-mittatā) form the essential foundation for this cultivation, and how inclining the mind toward wholesome qualities actively trains the heart toward liberation.

Tonight I want to continue and hopefully finish talking about the understanding and cultivation of wise or appropriate attention—really a key cultivation that the Buddha says takes us to Nibbana.

I want to point out again that wise attention, the whole concept, is rooted in the fact that we can train our minds and hearts. I know sometimes it can feel like we're the helpless victims of the waves of mental states and physical experience that arise on retreat. Even when we've been practicing a while, things can suddenly appear out of nowhere. Training doesn't mean you just once say, "Okay, back," and it goes away, as we know. But it does mean that we can cultivate where we choose to let the attention dwell. And where we choose to allow the attention—the mind, mana—to dwell, that becomes the inclination, the habit of mind.

We've spent all our lives, well, many of us have spent a great part of our lives... what have we been cultivating? Where has the mind been dwelling, left to its own devices? I'll just leave that question for you to look at.

We can train the mind. As I talked about in previous sessions, when the Buddha speaks about this concept of appropriate attention in the sutta we've been using as our base, it's in terms of starving to the point of absolute uprooting the deepest, most subtle tendencies or inclinations of our mindstream to move in the direction of craving for sensuality, craving for becoming, craving for being, and ignorance. This is, by definition, how the Buddha often describes the arhat: one in whom all these tendencies have withered away.

I'm reminding you—this is the review section—of how this moment of asava, this tendency, can suddenly spring up in experience. I've gotten to where I love to see it on retreat, where it's relatively harmless and you don't get yourself into too much trouble. One yogi described to me during a three-month retreat how she was very deep into the practice and felt she was really quite mindful. The mind was fairly equanimous. She watched herself one day after breakfast was over, walking past the food table to get to where you wash your dishes. At the end of the food table was the bowl of fruit. She was completely full—not hungry, not worried about later, thought she was quite mindful. But there was this moment of just seeing the orange in the bowl, and the next thing she knew, her hand just reached out and grabbed it. Where did that come from? That's the level of asava. It's subtle, but it can manifest not so subtly, even when it seems that we're really quite together.

Or the aversive one—how in terms of not killing, we can very deeply intend not to kill. But when you're just on that point of sleep and there's the mosquito buzzing around, and you kind of startle, there isn't a moment to consciously think, "Oh yes, I'm committed to not killing." The hand just swats, and you feel terrible. But in that moment of swatting, that was the asava, the tendency just shooting up.

I say I love seeing it because if we're living or practicing under the delusion that quite soon and quite easily everything's going to get calm and copacetic and this stuff isn't going to arise anymore, then when this happens, we get really discouraged. No, it's like—let's get real. Let's really see how subtle the tendencies are. Actually, I find much more appreciation in myself, first, for why practice can be so hard, and that gives me more courage and more energy and more willingness to keep going. If I think, "Well, it's just around the corner, one more experience and I've got it," then when what's just around the corner is a wave of greed or lust or self-hatred, we're ready to pack it in. But if we really see, "Oh yes, it's working on deeper and deeper levels—can I summon up the mindfulness, the wise attention, the energy to be here?" That's how the mind is trainable. That's what we're doing.

Every moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom from cultivating or strengthening greed, hatred, and confusion. And it is a moment of cultivating and developing wise attention, the factors of awakening.

As you remember in this sutta about the exhaustion of all these tendencies, the Buddha spoke of seven different, very practical means—in our experience, not just in deep meditation—that we can use wise attention in relationship to what's happening to retrain and redevelop the heart.

We talked about how the tendencies are abandoned by seeing, by insight, by that pure entry into emptiness of just perceiving what's here with nothing extra. We talked about how these tendencies are abandoned by restraint—satipañña, mindfulness and wisdom at the sense doors. Not fearfulness of sense contact, not walking around with your head in a bag (although you can try that), but just that moment of pure presence. Then consciousness doesn't have to expand into proliferation and papañca and feeding, basically, the hindrances. That satipañña starves the hindrances at that moment of sense contact.

The third was how the asavas can be abandoned by our wise attention to the attitude with which we use things. Remember how we relate to the way we use food, clothing, shelter, medicine. And for us as laypeople, how we relate to entertainment, going out, whatever. Remember, this is all in terms of not the outer appearance but the intention with which we meet things. How we relate to these things—what relationship increases craving, hostility, confusion in our mind? What relationship decreases those things?

You can't just say, "I know if I use less, I'll decrease craving." You might be increasing craving or decreasing craving but making yourself totally crazed, increasing delusion. You can't just have a list and go through it, as I'm sure our venerable ordained sangha can tell us. Just having a list of precepts doesn't clean the mind out of greed and craving, does it? But it's a formidable list to use as a guideline, to see how the mind is relating when it comes up against any of the precepts.

We have our five precepts, they have their eight or ten, he has his 227. It's something to be respected, taking that on.

So those are the first three. I really think I'm going to get through four tonight, so I'll be a little more brief with the first three.

The fourth one is how these tendencies of mine, these habits, can be abandoned by endurance—that's the common translation at this point. But I prefer patience, because for me in English, endurance takes on the quality of something grim, aversive, "I'll get through it." Aren't your teeth kind of clenched when you're enduring? Whereas patience is an aspect of mettā.

When we talk about endurance, this is how the Buddha described it: "Here a bhikkhu"—or anyone practicing, that's you—"reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with flies, bugs, wind, burning and creeping things, rain, unwelcome words, and arisen bodily feelings that are painful, wracking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life." He's moving way beyond that little knee pain.

I don't want to spend a lot of time on this because we talk about it often when we discuss mindfulness. It's that quality of open-hearted presence within whatever the experience is—just being there with mindfulness without adding anything extra. Unwelcome words? Oh, unwelcome words feels like this. Racking, piercing, distressing, menacing to life, physical sensation? It feels like this.

Endurance also means connectedness of attention. Otherwise it moves into that passive aversive avoidance: "Okay, I'll put up with this. In, out, in, out, rising, falling, rising, falling. I'm being really mindful until it goes away." And then—ah—then you really open the field of attention.

Next time a really unpleasant noise arises, or pain in your body, when it first arises—not when you're already beaten down and the mindfulness is very low, but when it first arises and you notice that "oh no, another hour of this"—just notice: it feels like this. Relax. Open your attention. Open your energy field. Open yourself and meet with the totality of attention whatever that arising experience is. Not in order to accomplish anything. Simply because that's what's arising. That's life. That's truth. That's the gateway to liberation in this present moment.

It can't be anywhere else. If you're waiting for this to go away before you pay attention, that is what you are strengthening in the habit of mind—waiting till it gets better. As we all know, none of us are spring chickens here. We can really wait our whole life for it to get better before we really commit to practice. And I don't think it just keeps getting better. I hate to tell you, especially body-wise, it just doesn't keep on getting better. Where are we going to wake up?

So patience can bring in a kind of resolve simply to be here. But the being here is just to open into the midst. We all know what that is; I don't need to talk about it a lot more. But the patience regards both so-called external and internal phenomena—some person acting a way we don't like, our body-mind acting a way we don't like. Of course, who doesn't like it is the other question.

I do want to read you this from Patrul Rinpoche, The Words of My Perfect Teacher. He's talking about arousing bodhicitta, but he mentions three aspects of patience. These three lines have stayed with me. When I'm in a really difficult retreat, like I was a couple of years ago, these lines would come. It's not just like, "Oh, okay, I can keep going." It would totally open my heart and mind.

This is transcendent patience: to have patience when wronged by others. The second type is the patience to bear hardships for the Dharma, all the things that happen.

And the third is the patience to face the profound truth without fear.

Just calling up those lines, one of them fits anything that's going on that you don't like. And just when you're thinking, "Oh yes, I can find the patience to bear hardships for the Dharma," you're just there, moment to moment. And in that moment of cultivating that patience, what's withering? The tendency to aversion, the tendency to greed. What's strengthening? Metta, mindfulness, clear seeing, all the factors of awakening.

Now, the next one—you would think, why didn't he put this one first?—is the tendencies that are abandoned by avoiding difficult situations. Of course, there's an obvious reason why this isn't first: because we'd much prefer to avoid than to endure. And sometimes I think it's tricky both ways to know what's actually avoidable.

The Buddha says, "Reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu avoids a savage elephant, a savage bull, a savage dog, a snake, a stump, a cliff, a cesspool, a sewer. He avoids sitting on unsuitable seats, frequenting unsuitable friends, so that wise companions in the life might believe that he would be drawn into unwise action."

So what can be abandoned by avoiding really means using our wise discrimination to see what experiences are just plain dangerous and what others—now these are my words, not the Buddha's—are just plain stupid, that we don't need to keep going back to over and over again.

Say, for example, you're trying to sit outside because you think, "I need to be with nature," and it's lightning, and the mosquitoes are biting you, and you are filled with aversion, just filled with aversion. No mindfulness. It's getting stronger and stronger. Do you think this is helpful in that moment? What is being cultivated? We're not talking about a moment of aversion, but just feeding, feeding, feeding.

There can be other times when being in difficult conditions could be totally appropriate, because you're just looking at the fear, and by being there and noticing the mental state, calm and acceptance and equanimity are growing. It's really about looking at what's being fed.

There's another sutta that I like very much that expresses this—knowing what's appropriate for deepening our understanding and practice, and what is more useful to avoid. It's really a parable, a simile, where the Buddha talks about a falcon who suddenly swooped down and caught a quail in the air. While she was carrying the quail away, the quail started moaning and saying, "Oh, stupid me, it serves me right. If I had kept to my own natural territory, the territory of my kind, today I would have been safe. But I went outside of my natural territory, and you caught me."

And the falcon said—not particularly proud—"Well, what's your natural territory?"

The quail said, "It's a field that's been all turned up by the plow, a bare field with many clods of earth, really bumpy and uneven."

So the falcon, not boastful but simply confident, let the quail go and said, "Go ahead, go to your natural territory, but I'll still be able to catch you."

The quail flew to this field and was standing by a clod of earth. The falcon went diving down toward the quail. But just before the falcon reached her, the quail jumped into the clod of earth, the falcon missed her and just hit the ground—and killed herself.

So what the Buddha is saying is: stay within your own reach, stay within appropriate territory. And he says that for monks, for those practicing, roaming outside of one's own pasture is getting really caught in sense desire. Staying within our territory is the four foundations of mindfulness, sati at the sense doors, rather than just spinning our gears on wanting and reacting to sense pleasures.

But I think this can actually be expanded in many ways we practice. There's a reason we come on intensive retreat to such a conducive environment. It's a choice not to have CNN going in the corner of the meditation hall. There's a reason we don't have internet access in each of your rooms. What's really helpful for practice?

Sometimes, I know, people can be confronted with something quite difficult in practice, internally or externally. Or when we go home again, we think, "Well, I should be able to be purely mindful no matter what the conditions are. It's okay—I can do whatever I want when I go home, because if I really could practice, I could be mindful in any conditions whatsoever." Completely unrealistic.

And sometimes on retreat—the Buddha doesn't speak of this specifically, but I want to bring it up—there can be times when what we need to avoid isn't so much an outer savage elephant or a cesspool, but something arising internally. For example, a sudden release of old traumatic memory that we weren't familiar with. Sometimes that happens, and it comes up so suddenly and so strongly that the mindfulness simply does not have equal strength to the intensity of the terror that might arise with that memory.

And of course we attempt to be mindful, to be present, but what starts happening is it just begins spiraling way out of control. And by out of control—first it feels out of control, that's okay. Way out of control is really where you've lost any mindfulness, except there's a thing in the back of your mind: "I should be able to get through this." So it's push, push, push, and the whole thing is just getting more and more into the realm of feeding fear.

Usually way before that time, the teacher is begging you—begging you on hands and knees—to sit less, not to push so much. And you're thinking, "That's because they think I'm a wimp, but I'll show them. I'll just really get through this," right?

There are times when wise avoidance really means turning your attention elsewhere. Because in the moment, what's really being strengthened by the way you're practicing is willpower, terror, anger or fear. And you need to turn the attention elsewhere to rebalance, reconnect with mindfulness, reconnect with calm, reconnect with the wholesome energies. And then again, come back and meet.

The whole field of skillful means is, in many ways, I think, contained in this learning when it's appropriate to avoid. But again, it's in the intention. You come in here and it's hotter than you like, and you think, "I can't turn on the AC but I don't like the heat, so I'm getting out of here." And the intention, if you tune in, is completely aversive. That's not skillful means. That is not abandoning the tendencies—that's the tendencies running the show. That's the time to sit here and sweat, you know?

As Ajahn Sumedho said when he talks about patience—if you listen to his talks, practicing in Asia is great because you get endless, endless teachings about patience and avoidance. He was giving one talk about the endless heat in the hot season in Thailand, or the rainy season where it rains like this but about twenty degrees hotter and more humid. He said he was just sweating through the robes day after day, just sweating through these thick robes. And then he said he'd finally think, "I just can't bear this. I just can't bear it." And then the next moment you'd find, well, you could really bear it a little longer.

Have you ever come up to that? "I just can't bear this." And then, "Oh, 'can't bear it' feels like this," and then you're just there again.

So patience would be the first line. Avoidance is later. But seeing what really does not contribute to practice—living much more simply, avoiding having sense pleasures hit you in the face every time you turn around—because craving is just so strong that we shouldn't expect we're suddenly going to be free of it.

Remember what Shankara said: that craving is intensified if we let our thoughts dwell upon sense objects and seek temporary satisfaction in the objective world. As Thich Nhat Hanh describes it, sometimes he would come into his house and find he had left all his windows open, and the wind had come and just blown everything all over the place, topsy-turvy. Come in, close the windows, straighten up. And he says we're like that. It's as if all our sense doors are the windows and we just walk around with them wide open saying, "Yes, everything, just come on in! I should be able to be mindful of all of it." Or maybe we're not even trying to be mindful—we just let ourselves be bombarded.

I was reading this little section from him where he said that at that time in France, workers were demonstrating to have five fewer hours a week of work. He said, "But what are people going to do with those five hours? Go home and watch something stupid on TV that just increases agitation or boredom because we're so afraid to be alone?"

So when mindfulness isn't that strong, when the energy is low, when the mind is agitated—then we shut the windows. We come to somewhere like this, where we're not continually bombarded, to cultivate the wholesome factors, to learn how to do that.

And then when we go out, why is it so agitating? One of the reasons, when you leave a retreat—sure, partly it's the concentration, but partly our sense doors have gotten so cleansed, so much more purified. We're so much more sensitized to what's actually coming in. And it's appalling, you know, the experience internally. Once I left a retreat and stopped off in Walmart. I tell you, it was like a vortex of suffering walking into Walmart trying to buy some stupid thing. Oh, wow.

Now, I'm not saying we're practicing to be unable to function in the world. No. But it's to learn how to use wise attention, to make our choices—when to open the windows, or when we have no choice but they're open, how to be mindful, how not to just let that sweep us away. And so for practice, we need to have some more protected space, some way of avoiding, so we can learn how the mind works.

The sixth one the Buddha speaks about is tendencies, āsavas, habits of mind that can be abandoned by removing. He's speaking particularly about thought here. And again, it's interesting because we sometimes take this in an inaccurate way, one based in aversion.

does not endure a thought that is affected by sensual desire, by ill will, or by cruelty. He abandons it, removes it, does away with it, and annihilates it.

Now this language is why we tend to take this a little unhelpfully. "He abandons it, removes it, does away with it, and annihilates it." That language can certainly feed all too easily into getting out the hammer and whacking that thought—bad thought, bad thought, bad me, shouldn't have it.

I don't need to tell you that this is not what the Buddha is talking about. But it's very interesting, because what he is pointing to, in my understanding, is a more subtle level of wise attention on the level of thought. We certainly are not always so balanced in our mindfulness and concentration that we are able to see each thought just as it arises when it has no energy. There are times like that, right? A thought that might be the most cruel or lustful or aversive just comes up with nothing behind it—poof—and as Joseph says, "The sky is blue... I really hate everybody and everything... and the sky is blue," and they're equally empty. Nothing to do about that, no need to do anything.

But there are times when a thought comes laden with the intention, the motivation, of ill will, cruelty, self-hatred, confusion. We may not notice it at the beginning, but whenever we notice it, this is where he's talking about wise attention. Not to endure it, not to—what comes to my mind is Larry Rosenberg, who is hysterical, mimicking a kind of new age way of dealing with kilesas: "We must massage our kilesas. We must be kind to our kilesas." No, no, the Buddha is not saying, "Oh yes, nice ill will."

There's a point where, with a balance of wisdom mind, again as satipaññā, we can summon up resolution and clear seeing in relationship to these really harmful—harmful to us—unskillful trains of thought that, left alone, are the patterns feeding the tendencies of greed, hatred, and delusion. It's really talking about resolution. We really can see that thought and go, "No, not now." Not in the beginning of a retreat when we're bombarded, no. But when there's a certain degree of mindfulness and balance—and this comes and goes, as you know—we often just kind of sit back and wait a little more than we need to. Because we can have such a tendency to get into self-judging, sometimes I think we're a little leery of calling on resolution, and we just turn into mushy meditation.

Resolution is a powerful force in the mind. No, not now.

Like if you get into some kind of Vipassana romance or vendetta, where every time you think of or see the person, there's craving or aversion. Or you don't even see them, you just think about them. It's so unpleasant, and it's so draining. People do often feel quite victimized by that, or fall into hatred of it. But you can really say, as soon as you notice it, at whatever point: No, not going there. It's not bad me, ugly me. It's not going there, no.

A very clear example of this in my life was quite some years ago when I came down with an autoimmune disease that was going in a not good direction—one of those things that nobody really knew how it would go or how bad it could be. It could have gotten really quite crippling. In the early days of it, the mind would start going: "I'll never be able to take a walk again." At that point, I couldn't walk very well. "I'll never be able to..." Fear and distress and grief. These thoughts, always projecting what was going to happen or could be.

That went on for a week or two, seeing all the doctors. It doesn't help, that train of thought, really, because they give you a list starting with the worst possibility and then going down from there. But after a while, I saw the mind doing this. I thought, "I don't know. I have no clue." And as soon as my mind was going, "It's going to be..."—don't know. Stay right here.

I remember leaning down to wash out a bathtub. It was really hard to lean down, hard to reach, painful, and the mind started... No, don't know, right here. Just feel stiffness and impatience. And that was a lifesaver. That was absolute—just this resolution. You don't need to endure or allow those thoughts to keep going when you have sufficient mindfulness to see it. But it takes that willingness to, every single time you notice, say, "Okay, no, not now." "I've got to have that orange." No, not now.

Wanting feels like this. It's not saying I don't feel wanting. It's just not going into those thoughts.

Play with it. When you notice it starting to move from balanced resolution into aversion, you may notice it right away if you're present. It has a whole different contextual feel. If you don't notice it right away, believe me, you'll notice it soon enough because you're feeding the aversion and you'll end up frustrated or in self-judgment or angry or lustful or whatever. Rather than judge that, you start right then. Ah, lust feels like this. Each moment's a new moment.

This is extremely powerful. And there's a whole sutta, a different one, that I wanted to talk about, but I'll never get through the factors of enlightenment, so I'm just going to mention it. It deals directly with the tendencies abandoned by removing, and it's called The Removal of Distracting Thoughts. I'm sure a lot of you know it. The Buddha lists five different methods for dealing with basically distracting thoughts—thoughts that are coming in and taking you away from meditation. And again, it's so practical. He realizes everyone isn't sitting in such sublime mindfulness that you barely have to advert attention to the thought and it goes.

I'm just going to mention the five without elaborating, in case something hits you.

All of these are for when just sati, mindfulness of the thought, isn't enough. When you say, "Oh, ill will arising, ill will arising, ooh, ill will arising," and finally you really have to do something else or it's taking over.

The first is to simply move the attention away from the unwholesome by substituting a wholesome thought—in this way, substituting mettā for ill will. Not the phony, "Yes, I pretend, I accept." But if you're in ill will, I find mettā not to the person I'm feeling ill will for, but mettā to myself, feeling the ill will. Or if it's cruelty, compassion. Or if it's delusion, then actually reflecting on some inspiring dharmic theme can switch the train of thought. So one is changing the attention, substituting the wholesome for the unwholesome. I call it changing the channel.

The second would be with discerning wisdom—not so much thinking about, but by looking, noticing, and examining the danger in that unwholesome train of thought. For example, anger or ill will. I remember one retreat I was sitting where somebody called me out of retreat when I was on staff at IMS to discuss some business that could definitely have waited three days. And that person definitely knew better than to do that, but was just in his own little world. It got all this anger going, and self-righteousness, the whole thing. I kept practicing with it, tuning into the anger, until I really saw how just letting this run was feeding it. And it's so much suffering. It's dangerous because what's happening is feeding my belief in my righteousness, feeding the tendency for anger to take over, feeding all these unwholesome thoughts about a really good person. There was nothing wholesome. And whether I was right or not, who cared? What difference did it make? In the scheme of things, it was such a little thing. So having some reflection through experientially tuning into the dangers of just going after that pleasant fantasy every time it comes up—not the dangers of being a bad person, but what's actually being fed by doing that, what's the ultimate outcome of feeding that craving, that ill will. That's how we're going to be in life.

The third, when these two don't work, is to just try to forget those thoughts altogether. Not even substituting something wholesome that's relational, but just going to something neutral. When we say steady the mind, just come back to the breath. Just forget it and come back to the breath. Or go to hearing. Or go to body sensations. Just advert your attention elsewhere.

The fourth is to give some dhamma vicaya, some investigation, to looking at and stilling the cause of these thoughts. For example, you keep getting into pleasant fantasy, pleasant fantasy. You notice it and are present, but you don't see how you're getting into it. You look a little closer with investigation and see, oh, an image. It's pleasant. You didn't notice pleasant, and you're off. Noticing that cause with mindfulness right there—that just stills the whole thing. Or for me, I notice with anger, when I really get to feeling it, underneath it there's some hurt.

When I'm able to just feel the hurt with mindfulness, that whole train of angry thoughts is simply stilled, stopped.

And the fifth approach, which everyone always likes the most: if there are still unwholesome thoughts connected with desire, with hate, and with delusion, then "with the teeth clenched and the tongue pressed against the roof of the mouth, he should beat down, constrain, and crush the unwholesome state of mind with a wholesome state of mind." The Buddha is basically saying you never give up. You never just surrender and say, "Okay, take me." You keep on trying—but with a wholesome state of mind. I will leave you to explore how that's possible.

I will end this section with how the Buddha concludes the sutta: "This bhikkhu then is called a master of the courses of thought. He will think whatever thought he wishes to think, and he will not think any thought he does not wish to think." Can you imagine? Wouldn't that be something? "Having severed craving, flung off the fetters, and with complete penetration of conceit, he has made an end of suffering." So that's a definition of an arahat. Wouldn't that be nice? Just that possibility—a master of the courses of thought. And remember, everything the Buddha says, "If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so."

The seventh way—which is of course four talks in itself, so I can only highlight the main points. I know this is a lot of information. Please don't try to remember it all. I'm just hopeful that any particular piece that is concurrent with something happening in your practice right now or in the next days will have a way of going in and popping up in your mind at the right time. So trust that. Please don't try to remember all of this, because that actually blocks the whole process of mindfulness and the surrender into the process.

So the seventh way is the āsavas or tendencies that can be abandoned by developing. What the Buddha is talking about developing are the seven factors of awakening, the bojjhaṅgas, the factors of enlightenment. On one level, these are spoken of as coming to full perfection in a completely awakened person. But the Buddha is also quite clear that as we practice and develop the four foundations of mindfulness, simply by steadily cultivating the four foundations of mindfulness, we cultivate and bring to perfection the seven factors of enlightenment.

These are seven factors of mind that all of you are experiencing from time to time—not just from time to time, but quite a lot. However, they can come and go in strength and in balance relative to each other. It's a very useful kind of self-guidance in terms of your practice. If you're feeling off, just run through the seven and see: Is one really low? Are some really out of balance?

These seven are: mindfulness, of course, which balances all the others. Then there are three energizing factors: dhamma vicaya, or investigation of dhammas (this is not analyzing, and I'll explain each one); viriya, or energy; and pīti, or rapture. Those are the energizing three. Then there are three that are tranquilizing: samādhi; tranquility itself; and upekkhā, or equanimity. For those who get stuck always evaluating your practice by samādhi, you may notice it's one of seven. All seven are equally important, and really, when our practice deepens and develops, it's when all seven are coming into balance and strengthening together.

As the Buddha said, for each of these seven, the proximate or immediate cause is wise attention, appropriate attention. And that's what's so fascinating. I want to read you a couple of things about wise attention, which is what all seven are based upon.

He says: "Bhikkhus, whatever beings there are which assume the four postures"—in other words, whatever beings stand, walk, sit, or lie down from time to time—"they are all assuming those four postures based upon the earth, established upon the earth." They couldn't do it without the earth. "So, just as the postures are based upon earth, a bhikkhu cultivates and develops the seven factors of enlightenment based upon virtue, established upon sīla."

So the very first requisite is virtue, morality, purity of action and speech. It doesn't mean you never did anything bad, but really reflecting on this when you're practicing is the foundation for the cultivation of the seven factors.

Then, more specifically, the Buddha describes how wise attention works. He says: "As to internal factors, I do not see any other factor that is so helpful for the arising of the seven factors of enlightenment as careful attention." No other internal factor is as important for the arising of all seven as careful attention. "When a bhikkhu is accomplished in careful attention"—in all the ways we're talking about—"it is expected that he will develop and cultivate the seven factors of enlightenment." It just follows.

Now, this is also very interesting. The bhikkhus ask about external factors.

I do not see any other factor that is so helpful for the arising of the seven factors of enlightenment as this: good friendship. When a bhikkhu has a good friend, it is expected that he will develop and cultivate the seven factors.

By "good friend," he basically means someone wise. And for each of the seven factors, as we'll briefly discuss, he gives not only descriptions but also, in the commentaries, lists of supporting factors that we need to give wise attention to in order to develop and increase each one. For every single factor, a key supporting condition is to avoid certain kinds of company and cultivate others. For concentration, for example, one avoids the company of unconcentrated, scattered, rough people, and cultivates being friends with wise, calm, concentrated people. This pattern holds for each of the seven factors.

So externally, the Buddha sees no other factor so helpful as good friendship. When we talk about Sangha as a refuge, we mean not only the Sangha of awakened noble ones, but our friends, our colleagues on the Dhamma path. This isn't good friendship in the sense of someone you call up to pour your heart out to. It's association with the wise, association with the mindful, association with the virtuous.

How fortunate are we in this world? Given the world as it is—it's the same as when you came here, not much better, not much worse, about the same—to be able to associate for such protracted periods of time with good friends is incredibly fortunate. Use that. It's the base. That and virtue form the foundation from which we can cultivate wise attention, from which the seven factors of awakening develop.

So let me briefly name the factors and some of the additional supporting conditions, though not all of them.

Mindfulness, of course, is the overbalancing factor. You can't really have too much mindfulness. And whenever you're out of balance and you don't know or can't tell what's going on, you're always safe to come back to mindfulness. As you know, that's the quality of clear seeing—knowing what's happening, not superficially. There's that image: you throw a cork on a river and it bounces around on the top; you throw a rock in and it sinks down deep. That's mindfulness. You all know mindfulness; we've talked about it a lot.

Remember when we talked about feeding and starving the hindrances with wise attention? It's just the same with the seven factors. So what do we give wise attention to in order to feed each of these seven factors?

Well, the first cause for mindfulness is mindfulness itself. One moment of mindfulness is really the immediate cause for the next moment of mindfulness to arise. So we give wise attention to one moment of mindfulness, meeting what's happening right here—always the fallback, the most important. That's really one of the main wise attentions for mindfulness.

Beyond that, avoiding the unmindful and associating with the mindful supports mindfulness in the broader sense. And this applies to each of the seven factors: we give wise attention to inclining the mind towards that quality. For mindfulness, we incline the mind towards being mindful. Again, this points to seeing that we can cultivate and train the mind. You don't just sit here thinking, "Someday, some moment, I know mindfulness will arise. If I sit and walk long enough, somehow it'll come." Inclining the mind is really saying, "I'm making mindfulness a priority." You do little things like resolving, "I'm going to be so mindful just this one stretch of walking," or "I'm going to be as mindful as possible as I get up from sitting and move out of the hall." Inclining the mind with that resolution and interest towards mindfulness is enormously powerful wise intention.

The second factor is dhamma vicaya, or investigation. This is not thinking about things. It's described as the quality whereby, when present, the mind lights up the field of awareness. It's like walking into a dark room, turning on a flashlight, and suddenly being able to see what's there. For me, it has a quality of interest that's not thinking about things, but in shining that light of mindfulness, it really allows discerning insight to arise.

For example, you suddenly notice a sensation. You're struggling, struggling, being mindful, and in that next moment—oh, tingling, coming and going, it's impermanent. That light of dhamma vicaya, of investigation, just lets you see clearly. It lights up the field of awareness, illuminates experience so that you can see its true nature in that moment. It dissipates confusion. It's an energizing factor.

I find for myself it's one I often forget to look for, but when things are feeling flat—when I think, "Well, everything's going okay, but it's so... what's the matter?"—I'll look and see there's not that investigation. I'm kind of meeting experience with mindfulness, but it's just like, "Oh yeah, oh yeah."

And you can just bring a little interest and it lights up the field in that moment.

The first cause of investigation is, guess what, mindfulness—active mindfulness that connects with the moment of experience so that there is direct perception. And this again requires wise attention directed towards mindfulness. So really, you see, if you're having wise attention towards mindfulness, there will be mindfulness, which will also naturally lead to dhammavicaya, investigation of states. It happens by itself.

And again, there are additional supports to which we can direct wise attention. There's no way I can name them all, but again: avoiding foolish people, being with wise people, cleanliness—keeping the internal sense bases clear, keeping yourself clean and orderly, and keeping your environment clean and orderly. Very interesting, but it tends to help the mind light up. And again, a total commitment, inclining the mind in the direction of interest.

The third is virya, courageous effort, which has the characteristic of supporting us. Its function is to support us and give us a kind of refreshment of mind that helps us be with the difficult. Difficult pain or emotional struggle wears us down. Sayadaw U Pandita gives the example of an old shack that's falling apart, and you prop it up with strong boards so it comes back erect and is strong again. That is how virya works. It's not just that we're a whirlwind of energy, but bringing in energy refreshes the mind so that—ah yes, it's been all withered, but you come back up again and can be with what is difficult.

When the energy is low, or when we're really feeling worn down, when the mind is withering away, he gives a whole series of additional supports. Of course, wise attention and commitment to energy is the first cause, but he gives a whole series of actual reflections that can help arouse the energy that gives the mind the freshness to be with what's difficult.

Such as reflecting on precious opportunity, sort of recognizing how fortunate we are. Reflecting on states of misery—when it's like, "Oh, this is just too hard. I don't want to do it. I just can't be with it anymore"—thinking about what the alternative is. Sometimes it's, "Okay, I think I'll pay attention now." Reflecting on noble ones, teachers, awakened ones, people that really inspire you. Reflecting on appreciation for the support that allows us to practice—the support of staff, the support of dana. This isn't just for ordained sangha, but for all of us.

When I was a nun, reflecting on how I was fed and clothed and housed by people who loved the Dhamma and wanted me to be able to practice—we can turn that into a guilt trip in the West. It's not a guilt trip. It's a profound, energizing reflection. Like, "Yes, what an opportunity." It's so beautiful, this dana, and that brings a natural energy. Not a "should," but you become filled with energy. "Okay, I can sit with this knee pain, this self-hatred, another couple of minutes"—whatever.

So there's a lot of reflection: remembering the greatness of the Buddha, of teachers, appreciating the people that we're practicing with. And again, inclining the mind towards resolution. Not just, "Ah, I can't do it. It's too hard." But really saying, "Okay, just one more step." That's all we need. One more breath. One more moment. Not the whole day. There's rarely—I don't know if I can ever think of a time when I couldn't have really honestly said, "I can be with this one more breath, one more step," if I'm just willing.

And then there's piti, or rapture. Rapture is a funny word in English. Piti is a mental state. It has the characteristic of happiness, delight, satisfaction. When piti is there in your experience, you're really into it. You're interested in what's happening. There's a lot of energy. Piti actually manifests a lot as energy. The mind feels very light and energized. The body is very light and agile. It was all this pain, and it was heavy and cramped, and then all of a sudden you're just sitting there and you go, "What happened?" Same position. You can even find that same sensation that was just driving you nuts, but it just doesn't matter.

The body becomes very light. Often, besides this joyous interest, piti manifests as physical sensations—lightness, floating, and sometimes, I have to say, quite bizarre physical experiences. It can feel like way too much energy, completely out of bounds. You might literally be flipping all around the room. And you come in to see the teacher and they go, "Oh yeah, that's piti." This is piti, you know—enough already, it's out of balance. But it has a lot of physical, energetic manifestation. If you really look, you might think it's unpleasant, but when it's truly piti, it's not unpleasant. Your mind might be reacting, but if you look carefully, it's not unpleasant.

The proximate cause is—guess what?—wise attention. Wise attention to wholesome feelings, wholesome thoughts associated with Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Actually, this is one of the definitions of right effort. If you read or hear the way the Buddha defines right effort, it's actually exactly the same as wise attention.

Right effort is defined as zeal or energy for the abandoning of arisen unwholesome states, zeal for the non-arising of un-arisen unwholesome states—was that too many "uns"? An unwholesome state has not arisen, and there's a zeal to keep it that way, basically. But the others are zeal for the arising of un-arisen wholesome states and for the continuance and strengthening of arisen wholesome states.

So wise effort and wise attention isn't just about getting rid of what's unwholesome. It's about recognizing the wholesome and giving that attention. That's also wise attention. Giving attention to the wholesome when it's arising is one of the things that leads us into piti, into rapture.

And again, there are many possibilities. If you want to look up all these different supportive areas to pay wise attention to for each factor, Sayadaw U Pandita's book In This Very Life is a great resource because it's all collated there in the chapter on the seven factors of enlightenment. Trying to remember it all isn't helpful. But if you're exploring a particular one, or feeling like you can't really sense a particular factor in yourself, it might be helpful to read what the five to eleven supporting factors are for each of them and explore those in your practice. See how wise attention can help to cultivate them. It's really quite scientific and accessible.

So again, as with all the factors, there's the inclining of the mind towards piti, which is the energy to be mindful, which leads to concentration. And when there's some concentration and mindfulness, when the mind has to be relatively clear of kilesas, that's when piti can arise. There won't be strong piti if the mind is also wracked with greed or aversion or delusion. They just don't go together.

So those are the three energizing factors. You can see how all of them—piti is hugely energizing, energy itself, and investigation as well—they need to be balanced with the three calming factors.

The three calming ones are tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. Tranquility is very important. We often don't recognize it. It has the quality of non-agitation of body and mind, of coolness. It takes the heat out of the restlessness of mind.

I think perhaps we don't quite recognize the power of restlessness. Something the way Sayadaw U Pandita described it—I didn't realize this, but as soon as I read it, it makes total sense—restlessness, the scattered mind, is a very powerful state. It has the quality of being able to infect other mental states that arise at the same time. He gives a specific example of samadhi, of concentration. You could be quite restless and there's samadhi, but it's infected with that restlessness. So it's not really wise samadhi. The mind can be very absorbed in something but jumping all over the place.

When there's this restless quality that infects other mental states, that's when we don't really have control of our speech and actions. It's how here as a yogi you think you're being mindful, and suddenly you say something or do something and it just blurts out.

Or you just suddenly do something, and later you think, "How could I have done that? I knew better." We all do that. Or you find yourself acting out in unskillful ways, even when it's very subtle. This is a manifestation of restlessness. And tranquility—a cool calmness, non-agitation of mind and body—cools this out.

Again, wise attention is the proximate cause. Wise attention to wholesome mental states. Wise effort. You can also, when you notice the mind is restless, give attention more to singularity of experience rather than running after the restlessness. Give attention to calmness. Just be with the breath, for example. Just feel the stillness of your body and don't let yourself move. Let that stillness of body bring in stillness of mind. Incline the mind towards peacefulness. We often don't recognize the restlessness and let it run the show.

Samadhi, which is not necessarily extended in time, has the quality of non-scatteredness—the factor of mind, of attention, which really stands on whatever is arising. Just right with that sensation of breath, that emotion, that image. It's just right there without wavering at all, even if it's just for a moment. It sinks into it, still, calm, stays there. Samadhi could be on changing objects, so it doesn't have that sense of absorption in one thing, which is also samadhi on an unchanging object. But when there's samadhi, even though the arising and passing objects are changing, each moment of mindfulness has that steadiness, that immovable quality, that really connecting and sinking in.

One other interesting aspect of samadhi is sort of like restlessness in reverse: when samadhi is in the mind, it has the function of collecting together whatever other mental states are arising simultaneously. When we talk about the collection of mind, the unification of mind—this is a real power of mind. This is a function of samadhi. It's one of the reasons why, when there's samadhi to whatever extent, there's such a sense of peace. We actually don't realize how distracted and scattered the mind is. Even as our practice is being developed, as mindfulness is being cultivated, the mind is still scattered, more and more subtly. With samadhi, all of a sudden, all that's brought together just in that one moment. It's peaceful. That's why tranquility and samadhi so go together.

And the last is, of course, equanimity—the mind that isn't pulled to and fro by either clinging or aversion. Again, I like the way Sayadawji describes it. He says it's actually a state of mind in the center, a balancing of energy. It's an energetic state where it's quite alert, but the energy isn't tipping towards and away, towards and away. You know how that is—just really balanced in the center. That's the state of equanimity. And wise attention to the continuity of mindfulness is what cultivates equanimity, because the continuity is what leads to the wisdom of really seeing pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, unpleasant—give it up—and the mind balances in the middle.

Obviously much more could be said about them all, but those are the seven. The Buddha himself talks about when it is useful to cultivate the arousing ones and when it is not useful.

For example—and I'm picking concentration because people really seem to get a bugaboo about it—they always think they need to cultivate concentration. Once in a while it happens, but rarely does someone come in and say, "I'm too concentrated, I need to cultivate investigation." Once in a while someone who's been practicing a lot does. But usually, no matter what's going on, we just want more concentration.

But if you're sluggish, if you're dull, if the energy's low, you might be really calm, and we'll say, "Get up, quit sitting, go walk." And you respond, "No, I'm calm, I'm peaceful, I'm concentrated." But there's absolutely no interest or clarity about what's happening. You need to really consciously bring wise attention to the energizing factors. You don't need to cultivate more calm. You don't want to get rid of the calm, but you need to bring up the energy.

And just the reverse. When you're really filled with pīti and rapture, and you're just going into rhapsodies in your mind about the beauty of the Dhamma and how exquisite it is and every new insight—guess what? When you come in and want to tell us all your insights, that's nice. But did you notice the sensation in your body? We won't go down that road with you.

It's because you need to cultivate calmness, steadiness, concentration, and equanimity. That was a nice insight. It's over. Back with Cleopatra. What's happening now? Equanimity.

And as I said, if you're ever in doubt, mindfulness is always cultivatable and useful as a balance. As you strengthen mindfulness with wise attention, you'll see more clearly how the others are out of balance.

I'll end with this one quotation from the Buddha about the seven factors, though this could be said about all of our wise attention—the image of the peaked house:

"Bhikkhus, just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline towards the roof peak, so too when a bhikkhu develops and cultivates the seven factors of enlightenment, he slants, slopes, and inclines towards nibbana."

And one who cultivates the four foundations of mindfulness slants, slopes, and inclines towards cultivating the seven factors of awakening.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for your patient attention.

CHAPTER 348

Dukkha

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching on dukkha and why, despite our best intentions to live peacefully, we remain fettered by envy, stinginess, and our tight grip on preferences. Drawing from a discourse where Sakka asks the Buddha what chains beings to hostility and ill will, Wilson illuminates how our habitual reactions to pleasant and unpleasant experiences—not the experiences themselves—create our suffering.
>
> Wilson references contemporary psychological research showing that humans consistently misjudge what will make them happy, overestimating both the intensity and duration of pleasure and pain. This scientific finding mirrors the Buddha's ancient insight: we base our life decisions on fundamentally flawed assumptions about happiness. She guides practitioners to examine the Four Noble Truths not as intellectual concepts but as invitations to investigate moment-to-moment experience directly.
>
> The talk offers practical wisdom for working with dukkha at all levels of practice—from overwhelming grief about world suffering, to difficult emotions arising in meditation, to the subtle dissatisfaction when concentration wavers. Wilson emphasizes that liberation doesn't require escaping sense experience but rather finding the courage to stop running from unpleasantness and turn toward it with clear awareness. When we take refuge in knowing itself rather than in pleasant experiences, any moment becomes a gateway to peace. As she notes from the suttas, the Buddha himself had an eye and saw forms, yet remained well released in mind because no craving arose at contact.

I'm Carol Wilson, and it's nice to be back. A couple of you I know have come quite recently. Some of you have been here for months. Some of you have been here a few weeks. You probably hear this sometimes, but it's really remarkable walking into here. I go to lots of retreats and I'm rather blasé about walking into retreat environments because I do it all the time. But this is lovely. It feels like you are really doing it. It's palpable and very inspiring. Thank you all for being here.

And I know that as pleasant and comfortable a place as this has been created to be, there is no escape. Coming out of the interviews today and also an article that a friend sent me yesterday brought up what I want to talk about. It's really basic Dharma 101, but as far as I can see, it never stops being relevant.

This article that a friend sent was a long piece in the New York Times called "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness." Hopefully we're not going to agree in the end that our pursuit of happiness is futile. But in terms of how we usually pursue happiness, the way of the world of pursuing happiness—that is futile, useless, leading onward to more suffering and more confusion. So that's a bit what I want to talk about.

There are a couple of different suttas or discourses of the Buddha I'll quote from. The beginning of one of them really speaks to the fact that with our best intentions we want to live in this world. Not only do we want to be happy, of course, but I'm assuming that those of us here would agree that we really want to live in a way that's harmless, in a way that brings about more peace, more connectedness. We don't want to create more suffering and hostility in the world or in ourselves. I could safely say that for people here, right?

But even with our best intentions—even if we just don't want to create more conflict in ourselves, even going around here with your mouths closed and hardly even interacting with people—still hostility, aversion, and conflict arise in the mind. At least, please God, you don't act it out. But it does arise with our best intentions.

In this discourse, Sakka, the deva king, came down and was talking with the Buddha. He asked the Buddha: What are we fettered with? What are we chained with? Even though we humans, as well as devas, think, "May we live free from hostility. May we live free from violence, free from rivalry, free from ill will, free from those who are hostile or from being hostile ourselves"—even though we deeply think this, why is it that we keep ending up living in hostility, with violence, with rivalry, with ill will? What is it that fetters us? What is it that chains us?

It's just one of the ways the Buddha outlines things, nothing you haven't heard before. But he begins by saying that beings are fettered by the bonds of envy and stinginess—envy wanting what others have and stinginess trying to hold on to what we have, not wanting to share. And that this is caused by holding tight to preferences, by creating in our minds and our hearts what is dear to us and what is not dear to us, and then holding tightly to that.

He doesn't stop here, and I'll go on. But I find this particular description both very useful and also unsettling. It shakes up the not-so-comfortable but we-think-it's-comfortable world or way of being that we have. How can we not have preferences? How can we live without preferences? Right away the mind can start to jump into reaction. Even the Buddha had preferences. Even the Buddha chose how he wanted to live. Can't you just hear how the mind is kind of justifying ourselves somehow?

But he says it is caused by holding to preferences, creating what is dear and not dear and holding on to that, which of course is caused by desire, which is fed and increased by thinking about our preferences and by the ensuing papañca—the proliferation that comes around that.

So I want to talk a bit about this holding to preferences, this dear and not dear. Why does that create this ongoing inability to live in a way that brings happiness and peace to ourselves and others, even though that's what we want?

I would think, at least in my own experience, that holding onto preferences—of course we have preferences—holding onto what is dear, trying to get rid of what is not dear, likes and dislikes you could say, really arises from our deep, really deep yearning to be happy. As you know, the Buddha often said that everyone wants to be happy. We just—he didn't put it quite this way—but we just don't really get how to do it.

We're just lost in delusion and not seeing clearly. Our holding to our preferences arises from our misguided attempts to find some way to really be happy in this life, to find some way to bring happiness to others. But what it comes down to is that we really don't know what true happiness is. We not only don't know how to go about living in happiness, but we don't really know what it is.

And that brings me to this article, "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness," which is really very fascinating. I'll spare you—it's quite long—I'll spare you all of it. But it's an article about some very serious scientific research that's been going on in recent years. A group of four professors: one who's a professor of psychology at Harvard, one's a psychologist at the University of Virginia, one's an economist at Carnegie Mellon, and one's a psychologist and Nobel laureate in economics at Princeton. So we're talking serious research, not some loopy fringe thing.

And these researchers, especially the lead one, Gilbert, started basically looking at what it is that we do to be happy—studying the question of what it takes to be happy and the decisions we make trying to bring about happiness in our lives. All very scientific with scientific method and lots of tests and lots of studies.

In a series of studies, they made a slew of observations and conclusions that undermine a number of fundamental assumptions. The assumption it undermines is namely that we humans understand what we want and are any good at improving our well-being. The studies undermine that assumption. Gilbert says that basically, as he termed it, the research leads one to wonder if everything you have ever thought about life choices and about happiness has been at the least somewhat naive and at worst greatly mistaken.

Now, this is scientific study, and they're basically saying that we base our decisions on what will make us happy, on how we think we'll feel when a certain event happens, when we get a certain thing. And he goes on to show that basically we have no clue. We completely underestimate and overestimate how happy something will make us and how unhappy something will make us. And then we make our life decisions based on these assumptions, which turn out often—usually—to be not accurate at all.

I'll read you another quotation in a minute, but he gives an example: most people, if given the choice, which would you rather have, a broken leg or a trick knee? And people think a broken leg causes much more suffering—I'd rather have a trick knee. But over time, it turns out that a trick knee, a bad knee, although the immediate suffering in each moment is less, the amount of suffering over time is much, much more than a one-time intense experience like a broken leg.

And so he says that in general, we overestimate both how happy having something pleasant will make us and how long it will last. It doesn't make us as happy as we think, and it doesn't last very long. This isn't news to us, right? And the same for difficult things. We overestimate how horrible something will be and how much it's going to ruin our life. And it also isn't nearly as intense as we imagine and it doesn't last as long as we imagine. Sure, it still hurts. It's still sad. But it doesn't have the effect we think. And this is what we base our life choices on.

So that's just a real short little beginning of what they're talking about. And essentially, I think that's what the Buddha's talking about. We base our sense of preference, of liking and disliking, of dear and not dear, on what makes us feel good in the moment—generally, what's pleasant. And what we think is going to make us feel bad, or it does make us feel bad, or even getting in the neighborhood of it makes us feel bad, and we run in the other direction. And we keep cycling our life like this.

I know I've said this often, and I keep finding it in my practice, on more and more subtle levels. And talking to people today, I can see how on really subtle levels it keeps coming in—this misunderstanding of what the happiness and peace the Buddha is talking about is, of what the happiness that's really available to us right now is. Our misunderstanding of that, based on our not seeing ourselves and the nature of life clearly, keeps us looking in practice, in life, ultimately for things to finally get okay.

And it gets more and more subtle. But it's so easy that it creeps in—somehow what we're practicing for, what we're living for, or the unspoken idea of enlightenment somehow carries the flavor of pleasantness, of happiness in the sense that we have what we like and what we don't like goes away. Or of somehow finally being in control and not being the so-called victim of all these unexpected, unpleasant, really crazy things that happen. Or at least, at least, even if a lot of unpleasant stuff happens, we're going to really understand it all. And so in that way we're in control.

That one—I still fall into that one—but that one had me for a long time. It's okay, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, but I'm going to really understand what's going on. A sense of control, a sense of knowing, a sense of having.

And to really turn around and look at what the Buddha was talking about—when he says, "I teach the suffering and the end of suffering," the enlightened one, the peaceful one, he says, does not suffer.

And it took me years to really consciously look at his life after he was enlightened and think, oh. His life actually doesn't sound like it was any more pleasant in the experiencing of it than most of our lives. He didn't particularly have good health. He had backaches. He had headaches. As you know, he had all kinds of sorrows and aggravations and the loss of people close to him, both family and his chief disciples. He spent forty-five years of his life in tireless service to other beings. His sangha of monks was split. One of his cousins tried to kill him. His clansmen on his mother's and father's side went to war over water rights and killed a lot of each other, and he had to go and mediate. He chose a very simple life, so he certainly didn't have much physical comfort. And yet, and yet, he made it very clear to us that he no longer suffered.

When I need to keep coming back and reminding myself about having no preferences, you can look at it another way and say, well, of course he had preferences. He also had preferences, didn't he? The Buddha chose to live as a monk. He chose to live a renunciate wandering life. He's always talking about, as Marcia mentioned in her talk, choose wisely the people that you spend time with. He's not saying, do whatever you want, it doesn't make any difference. He laid out a very strict, very comprehensive path of how to live.

So having no preferences doesn't mean, ah, what the hell? I don't know the difference. Liking, disliking, pleasant, unpleasant, who knows? Not that at all. It means paying very careful attention, being fully present for all of it, the whole show. And within the field of experiencing really difficult life stuff, as the Buddha did, within the field of choosing to live as a renunciate, having no preferences means not being attached to having it any particular way.

So when there was suffering going on in his life, how was the Buddha different from us in that way? I can only project, right? I'm certainly not speaking from my own personal experience, so I don't know what the Buddha's mind was like. But it seems to me that the difference, based on his talking about not clinging to preferences, would be that he could flow with, be with, wide awake in the midst of all of it. The difficulty, the beauty, the frustration, the exhaustion, the discomfort of the way he lived—because he could just be in harmony with whatever is arising.

Not holding to preferences means ultimately that in this moment, whatever's arising is arising, and I don't need to make it different. I can't anyway. You can't change this moment, can you? I know we try. We spend a lot of our practice, really a lot, trying to change this moment. And it's such a ridiculous and impossible thing to even try to do, because the moment's already over before we've even been able to notice what it is. And then we get engaged in throwing it into the future and trying to change it, but it's long gone. That's just a little aside.

But not clinging to preferences—the Buddha didn't awaken into some other life somewhere else. He lived a very engaged, connected, awakened life in this world as it is. And as he often said, without suffering. The suffering isn't about being able to change the external world. It's not about being able to have a better body. It's not about being able to manipulate and control our friends or the people that we're teaching. Liberation is really awakening fully into this moment without clinging to any preference whatsoever.

And I feel our whole practice is around allowing us to see and understand our moment-to-moment experience so accurately, so clearly, that our habitual, almost unconscious need to keep trying to manipulate and control and get it how we like it and avoid what scares us—that this drops away. Not because it should, not with the thought that I should get rid of this so I can finally be happy, but because it doesn't make sense anymore.

When we really experience with sati-paññā, with mindfulness-wisdom, at a moment of sense contact, when we experience in that moment things just as they are, then the need—even just for a moment—the need for our ongoing construction of self and other, of trying to explain and assess and compare and give meaning to every sense contact that comes in a way of trying to figure things out and control the world, that just falls away. The need to grasp at pleasant, the need to push away the unpleasant, the tendency to just space out and get deluded and ignore something if it isn't sufficiently intense to pull us in and say, hey, pay attention.

That drops away. We don't have to think about how we should be. It happens naturally, spontaneously, out of clear seeing.

The Buddha talked about cultivating unshakable deliverance of mind. That phrase really inspires me because I feel that all of us here—certainly everyone I've talked to at some point or other, which is almost everyone—we all know the taste of freedom of mind. Because really, it's moment to moment. It's not like we have to experience either no freedom of mind at all or total absolute arahantship, with nothing in between.

We all know a moment of freedom of mind where there's just being fully present, knowing a sight, a sound, a taste, a smell, and the knowing of it. There's no adding of story onto it. There's no referencing it back to me. There's no clinging or pushing away. There's just this. There's no mind going, "Oh, now I'm experiencing a moment of freedom of mind." It's just this. It's so natural. It's so simple.

In that moment, the need to cling, to make dear or not dear, to manipulate—it just doesn't arise, does it? It doesn't make any sense. You don't even think about it. And it's so normal and natural that we often don't even notice it. Just, "Oh yeah, this is going on fine, fine, fine"—but then this thing happened, and now I've got to fix it. And it's as if all that other stuff doesn't matter, because we get so caught, so entranced with our reactions to particular experience.

This, of course, is where the Buddha was so brilliant and so clear in his precision in the way of talking about it. Here we have to mention the Four Noble Truths, which I'm not going to go into in depth, but these were what the Buddha thought we needed to free our hearts and minds—not to know everything he knew, but just to free us from our propensity to create suffering where it's unnecessary.

The first thing he thought he needed to tell us was these facts of life. The first being, of course, dukkha: the fact that difficult, unpleasant things happen. That everything we experience is impermanent, is fleeting—and not just that it's going to go away at some point, but that it's even now, in this moment, dissolving and changing. That there's nothing reliable we can hold to. That's dukkha.

The second truth is that the cause of our anguish, of our ongoing suffering in our life, is not the dukkha itself, but the habituated reactions and responses of our mind and heart to moment-to-moment experience—the clinging and the aversion to the fact that things are constantly changing, unreliable, and sometimes pleasant, sometimes unpleasant.

The third truth is that when we really, even just for a moment, clearly recognize things as they are, there is both momentary and, at some point altogether, a real liberation of heart and mind. A cessation of the clinging, a cessation of the aversion, a cessation of this creation of unnecessary anguish and suffering. And that can be touched by us here and now, in any moment, no matter what the particular experience is.

Our practice here is one aspect of the fourth truth—the path that the Buddha laid out of purification of heart, of mind, of cultivation of clear seeing, of insight. A heart and mind that in a moment is free of clinging, and that allows us to see clearly. And then that further frees the heart and mind from the tendency to cling.

I mention these not as an intellectual concept—not "oh yeah, the Four Noble Truths, yada yada"—but as a call to really inquire into your own experience moment by moment.

I was struck today in talking with people. I talked to ten or eleven people, and in very different ways each person is in his or her own practice, going on its own trajectory, which is appropriate for that person. There's nothing to compare with somebody else. But I was struck by how this theme of dukkha, of difficulty, of unpleasantness, and of our reactions to it, continues to be a significant thread through all levels, all aspects of our practice.

And not a thread like a mistake. Not thinking, "Oh yeah, even though I'm doing subtle practice I still have dukkha—what's wrong?" That's exactly why it's a theme. Nothing's wrong. The first truth is dukkha happens. If you think something's wrong because there's something unpleasant or difficult in your practice—well, as we were teaching Bhante the American slang, he's picked this one up: "Duh!" He said this the other day. "Duh!" Oh, what's wrong? Dukkha's coming up. Nothing's wrong. It's part of life in this body on this planet.

The difficulty is that reaction—what's wrong? It's so instinctive to somehow flinch back.

On all the levels that we experience the unsatisfactoriness and suffering of this world on retreat, on all different levels—talking to people today, there's the macro level, you could say, of the vastness and the unbearableness of how much suffering and cruelty and pain there is in this world. To start thinking about it is unbearable. To say, "Well, I'm just thinking, that's a thought arising now"—the mind comes in and goes, "Well, you selfish..." and then you want to get lost in it again.

Then there's the sort of mid-level: something coming up in our practice, in our personality pattern, in our deep emotional and physical pain body—whether it's deep feelings of worthlessness or old traumatic memories or some deep loneliness or anger. Not just passing through, but the times when it comes up on retreat viscerally, in your cells and in your practice. The mind says, "Why can't I just be back with lifting, moving, placing like it was yesterday? What's going wrong now? I've got to be with these waves of unpleasant emotion. I blew it." It's like—no. What's happening? What's happening now? No holding to preferences. That's another aspect of dukkha.

And then on seemingly very subtle levels, where there's no big thing going on, but just in a moment where the steadiness of awareness disconnects, so to speak, from present moment experience. You're just there, there, there, and it just disconnects. And in that can come aversion or a kind of subtle restlessness, a subtle dissatisfaction—really the subtle element of samsaric unreliability. And you connect, and it's gone again.

When it's gone, it's important to notice it's really gone. Because another thing we do is hate the dukkha, and then when the unpleasantness is gone, we carry it around with us. As one of my teachers used to say, it's like dragging a corpse around with you. "This was there when I wasn't paying attention, and as soon as I don't pay attention, it's going to come back..." And then—what's happening now?

So the thread of how our heart and mind relates to both unpleasant and pleasant, but particularly the dukkha, because it's so ingrained to flinch away, to turn away, to think something else should be happening. It's really rare—really rare—when things have been going the way you like them, which is "oh, good practice," and suddenly it changes and it gets really difficult in whatever way, gross or subtle, it doesn't matter. It's really rare for the mind to just not have any quiver of preference, not have any quiver of "what did I do wrong and how can I get it back?"

And of course, everything we say, any instructions that are given, always tend in the direction of what seems like good practice. And by the way, there'll be fear and there'll be aversion and you'll get caught. But when it's really going well, it's just note, note, note, note, note. Everything goes away really quickly. And then we think, "Yeah, that's what I'm heading towards—a world of no suffering, things just the way I want them."

But the second truth—again, it's not that the difficult stuff happens or that things change or that the way we think it should be isn't the way it is. I mean, really, how often in your life is the way you think it should be? How often does that actually happen at the same time that you still think it's the way it should be? Not very often, and it doesn't last very long. Then finally it gets to the way you thought it should be three years ago, but now you know it shouldn't be that way anymore—it should be some other way. It's hopeless. That is the futile pursuit of happiness. That's what they're talking about.

But we can only recognize the truth of this—of the fact that the freedom, the peace, the happiness the Buddha is talking about is completely not dependent on having any particular experience be present or absent. It's absolutely about the relationship, about the clear seeing and the openheartedness that lets this mind and body just be completely open, awake, non-judging, non-resistant, non-clinging, in the midst of whatever experience arises.

That's not something we can arrive at experientially by thinking about it or by listening to it or by reading about it. All of that can help us begin to look. But we only recognize the truth of this for ourselves when we, even for a moment or so, stop our habit of running from the unpleasant and towards the pleasant. When we stop our habit of averting our attention and pretending to be here with this unpleasant thing, but really waiting for it to go away and for practice to start up again and get better. And I'm talking about practice, but I mean, this is the way we live our lives.

When we are able to be as open and present in the midst of the beautiful, in the midst of the boring—the unbearably boring—in the midst of the painful. And this arises by our simple willingness to look, to just stop our habit of running and turn around and look and see what's actually going on.

And this, of course, as you know, is the whole thrust, the whole point of mindfulness and samādhi, the whole point of our practice: to give us the tools of how to look, how to stop and look, and also to help us recognize what's actually happening. Because as you know, we're so entranced by our reactions to present moment experience—liking the pleasant, disliking the unpleasant, ignoring the neutral. And then building—I don't know if you've noticed this, I hope you have—building incredible stories about ourselves around any stupid little pleasant or unpleasant or neutral sense contact. It's really quite astounding, the creativity and fertility of the mind, of thought process, of papañca, to be able to create a whole world.

Just hearing a sound and having a moment of aversion can lead you, in no time at all, to a complete assessment of what a rotten, negative, hostile person you are—totally believed. No clue in awareness of seeing that what actually happened was simply hearing and the knowing of it, unpleasantness and the knowing of it. Well, we weren't aware of the knowing of it, were we? We were just aware of—boom—down the road.

Pleasantness works the same way. We're so entranced by these reactions and the stories we tell ourselves about them. What this means about me. What this means about practice. This unpleasant feeling in the breath means X, Y, and Z about my practice, so I have to do this and change that and make this happen so that my practice can get back on an even keel heading in the direction of nibbāna—which God knows isn't here and can't ever be in that direction as long as my breath has this heavy tightness in it. So let's fix that, and then the goal is just around the corner.

And we believe this crap over and over and over. Sense contact after sense contact after sense contact. And we wonder: Why are we so exhausted? Why are we so lost? Why is practice so hard? Why is life so hard? We just really don't have a clue. We don't even know what's really happening.

From that article again, Gilbert, the main researcher doing this investigation, says we don't even know what makes us happy. And if it's difficult to figure out what makes us happy in this moment, how can we predict what will make us happy in the future? But how much of our practice, how much of our life, is about trying to figure out what's going to make us happy or free or liberated? And how often is "liberation" just another way of saying happy—getting what I want?

So it's learning to see how we get so involved in our interpretations, our assessments of moment-to-moment simple experience. How so often the biggest enticement, the most seductive entrancement of all—and watch this in your practice, maybe I'm the only one—is that most of those assessments and interpretations somehow make every sense experience come back to revolving around me. Me, me, me. What it means about me. What my reaction to it means about me. What it's going to feel like for me in the future. How it's always been like this for me in the past. We're just the center of everything, the center of the whole world. Every sense experience is just happening to show us something about ourselves.

And because we get so enticed, it's hard to just see clearly enough to recognize: oh, that's just hearing and the knowing of it. That's just smelling and smelling consciousness. It's not quite juicy enough. If it's smelling and smelling consciousness, then yeah, that really makes me hungry. Then I can really get down on myself for being hungry because I had enough to eat and I'm on eight precepts and I shouldn't be hungry. Then I can get into a whole thing about how I can't even practice renunciation. That creates much more suffering, but in a very weird way, we find it more satisfying—because we're not looking carefully enough.

I think we don't look carefully enough partly because we need some concentration and some mindfulness, and partly because of this ingrained, instinctive pulling away from dukkha, from the unpleasant, from suffering. Because looking carefully—the part that's so hard, the reason I think dukkha runs as a thread through all of our practice—is that to really open, to see things as they are, means finding that vision, the courage, even the interest, the resolution to stay here with as calm a mind and heart as possible in the midst of difficulty, as well as in the midst of what is beautiful.

It's hard at first because we don't know any other way. The Buddha said—and I know this one by heart—when he was talking about our habit, he says: "An untaught worldling, O monks, does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness."

That's basic. That's, I find, very profound actually. The basic untaught person not exposed to the Dhamma—the only escape they know from unpleasant experience, from painful feelings, is the enjoyment of sense happiness. So then in that person it becomes the underlying tendency, that subtle bias, that habit of mind to lust after sense pleasure. A lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind. And that's where we spend so much of our life: in an underlying subtle tendency to lust for pleasant feelings.

When we turn around and look at the essence of a pleasant feeling when it's here, it's like so nothing, isn't it? Mostly in the world we never even hear about looking at pleasant or unpleasant or neutral feelings. And so mostly, as the Buddha said, we spend our lives trying to avoid the unpleasant ones and cultivating this lust for the pleasant and this fear of the unpleasant. Just feelings.

So when we start—and continue here—to have the steadiness of mindfulness, but also the resolution and the courage to just stop running and turn around and really bring awareness to a pleasant feeling, to an unpleasant feeling, to a neutral feeling should you ever notice one—what is a pleasant feeling? It's like nothing. It's so short. It's so amazing that we spend our lives in driven pursuit of more of these. I remember reading Ajahn Buddhadasa where he says, look at your life and see how—in his opinion—ninety percent of all the decisions you've ever made have been in pursuit of pleasant feeling.

And when you really look at pleasant feeling, it's just so short. It's so ephemeral. It just comes and goes like a wave.

But when we stop and really look at this, the first moments of seeing it, there might be a moment of ease, but somehow it's not like, "Oh great, thank God, now I'm done with that, let's move on." There's some way it shakes up our world. Because we're basing our life, we're basing our understanding of happiness, we're basing our explanations of who we are and what's valuable so much—when we don't pay attention—on this pursuit of pleasant and avoidance of unpleasant, really unconsciously.

And to turn around and just open to, "Okay, I can just be here with this fearful, unpleasant thing"—it's hard sometimes because it really means finding the stability and the greatness of heart to be present when all the suffering of the world is flashing before our eyes. Or when really strong, painful, grief-stricken memories are coming up and we're experiencing it with the intensity we felt when we were six months old. Or even the really subtle, seemingly subtle suffering of just that not-fitting discontent. Sometimes that's the worst of all because you can't even have the satisfaction in your mind of saying, "Yeah, that's really wrong. There's something horrible." It's just like, "Oh, where do I go to get away from this?"

And the untaught worldling, as the Buddha talks about, doesn't know any other way. We're so fortunate that we have a path, that we have a refuge, because without that there is nowhere else to go.

This is what this man Gilbert is saying at the end, and he's light about it. He's saying from all his studying, he really knows intellectually that what he thinks is going to make him happy isn't going to deliver in any way the way he thinks it can. But he's laughing as he says it. He says, "But I really should have learned more than I have. For instance, I'm getting married in the spring because this woman is going to make me happy forever and I know it." And he really laughs, and you can laugh at it. It's good. He says he finds it funny not because it's untrue, but because nothing could be more true. That is really how he feels. "She's going to make me happy forever and I know it." And so he says, "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations."

So something about the belief that there's the good and there's the bad and that this is a contest to try to get one and avoid the other—"I don't think I want to learn too much from my research in that sense." Isn't that amazing? He's been doing this for years. This isn't like a one-off test. He sounds like it's actually made him really very honest in looking at himself. But without a sense of the peace of the Buddha, of a path and a refuge in awareness, without a sense that real happiness expands beyond and doesn't depend on nāma-rūpa, on sense experience, on mental experience at all—without that, when we're just caught in the world of sense pleasures and experience, there's nowhere else to go for happiness. Of course people don't want to stop and turn around and look and see that it all just vanishes the moment you touch it. Because the mind thinks, "How can I bear that?" And if there was no other happiness, how could we bear it?

And why I say it takes courage—talking to all of you and seeing it in myself, it's easier for me to see courage in others than in myself, of course—but it takes enormous courage because it's not like we just get to look once and go, "Oh yeah, that's right. Pleasant feeling vanishes. Unpleasant feeling vanishes. So no problem. I can be with this. I can just tune into the refuge in awareness and no problem." No. It takes us at times into really deep experiences of grief, of fear, of all the deep and strongly habituated defenses of the mind against having to feel certain depths of suffering—mental, physical, emotional—because we think we'll die, because we think there's nothing else there if I feel this. How can I keep going?

And of course, you all know, you've all experienced, but we have to keep learning it more and more, that the actual opening to the suffering in the particular moment is the way into that release, that peace, that refuge in awareness. Because awareness is unaffected, unbothered, by whether it's a wonderful, incredible experience, by whether it's painful, by whether it's mundane. When we can take refuge in the knowing, in the awareness, it allows anything—whatever sense experience is arising, internal, external, mental or physical—it allows that in that moment to be a gateway to liberation, a gateway to peace, a gateway to waking up. When we can just notice what's arising and the awareness of it. When we become more interested in the awareness rather than assessing and trying to take refuge in the experience.

And how often are we trying to take refuge in the experience of "Finally that horrible thing stopped and I can just relax into this peaceful breath"? And ever so subtly—ah yes—we're taking refuge, we think, "Now I've found the peace." But it's not, you know? You're still ever so subtly holding on to experience.

But we don't have to flee from pleasant either. Ah yes, now there's calm, and there's the knowing of it. Now, out of nowhere comes this surge of energy and the mind's talking a mile a minute.

What's going on? I have to figure it out. No, I don't. There's just the mind going a mile a minute and the knowing of it. We don't need to refer it back to me and make up an assessment of what it means or an evaluation. Just in that moment—what's happening and the knowing of it.

But it takes a great deal of courage, because this real letting go of clinging, the trying to use experience for refuge, for safety, for something comfortable, for something familiar—the real liberation from clinging of heart and mind comes about when we understand, not intellectually but in ourselves, when we've seen so clearly, so thoroughly, the ephemeral, unreliable nature of the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Of any sense experience. Of the fact that there's just sense experience and contact and the knowing of it, and nothing else there. When we really get that, more and more and more, then quite naturally the tendency to clinging, the tendency to aversion, the holding to preferences doesn't arise. It falls away.

But this takes a willingness, an ability, the courage to let down our defenses against the fearsomeness and the unreliability of the world. This is the way Pema Chödrön describes it: "When we protect ourselves so we won't feel pain, that protection becomes like armor—armor that imprisons the softness of the heart. We do everything we can think of not to feel anything threatening." And I actually think—I know for me—a lot of my early years of practice was about that: somehow finding a way in practice not to feel anything threatening.

"We try to prolong feeling good about ourselves. Looking at color pictures in magazines of people having fun on the beach, many of us wish that life could be that good. When we breathe in pain, somehow it penetrates that armor. The way we guard ourselves is being softened up. This heavy, rusty, creaking armor begins to seem not so solid after all. With the in-breath, the armor begins to fall apart, and we find we can breathe deeply and relax. Kindness and tenderness begin to emerge. We don't have to tense up as if our whole life were being spent in the dentist's chair."

I can quite relate to that at times—that sense of just keeping the suffering a little bit at bay. And this tensing up, psychically tensing up, takes a huge amount of energy, psychic and even physical energy. We don't even know we're walking around so exhausted. There's so much energy available. People wonder why sometimes in concentration and mindfulness, as your practice deepens, there's so much energy that becomes available. Maybe not this time of night—it's not steady state—but it does come. It's because the armor, that walking around tensed up like we're in a dentist's chair, starts to dissolve. And the energy is available for this simplicity of total presence, of pure seeing, of pure being—of simply allowing the mystery of life to present itself without having to know ahead of time, or assess, or refer it back, or somehow control, or be ready for it before it happens.

When we can just open fully into the mystery of this next moment, of this moment, without any reference point at all—not referencing it to good practice, not referencing it to what happened yesterday or what I think should happen or what this might mean, not referencing it even back to a sense of self, not making any assessment whatsoever, but just total open presence with sati and samādhi, with concentration, just the unification of mind in that moment, and mindfulness—that's really taking refuge in awareness.

And in that moment, just for that moment, we're getting an inkling, we're getting a doorway into the peace of the Buddha, into the peace that's accessible to us all the time. We are so fortunate to even have a path laid out for us and a sense that this is true and possible and available. It gives us the courage and the faith not to cling so desperately to our search for fulfillment and sense of self in pleasant feeling—our desperate fear of the unpleasant as a sign that we're failing, as a sign that something is inherently and desperately wrong with us or the world.

We are as we are. The world is as it is. And actually, when we give up needing to understand how that is, much less explaining it to ourselves, and we give up needing to protect ourselves against how it is, but just have this trust, this willingness to just be here totally for this arising moment—no more, no less—then we begin to really touch the peace of the Buddha. To understand what he means when he says the doors of the deathless are open for those who see, for those who hear, now, in this moment.

And it doesn't mean we're fleeing from the world of the senses. It doesn't mean we want to hate sense pleasure, or say, "Yes, let's have some more suffering because that's my way to freedom." It doesn't mean we're trying to surmount living in a mind and body. It just means understanding more accurately where the chains are.

I just want to end by reading two things about this—one from the Buddha, one from a kind of New Age guy. Eckhart Tolle, the New Age guy, is saying: "It's not saying that we should no longer appreciate pleasant or beautiful things or conditions. Of course we do. But to seek something through these beautiful conditions that they cannot give—an identity, a sense of permanency and fulfillment—this is a recipe for frustration and suffering."

And from the Buddha: "The 'I' is not the fetter of forms. Forms are not the fetter of the 'I.'" In other words, the I isn't the problem; forms aren't the problem.

But whatever desire and passion arise in dependence on the two of them—on the eye, forms, and contact—whatever desire or passion or aversion arises in dependence on that contact, this is the fetter.

If the sense door or the sense object, the eye or the form, were the fetter—if those things were inherently what was keeping us in suffering—then the Buddha said, this holy life for the ending of dukkha would not be proclaimed. In other words, if the eye and forms were the problem, there's nothing you could do about it. So the holy life would not be proclaimed.

There is an eye in the Blessed One. The Blessed One sees forms with the eye. Yet no desire or passion is in the Blessed One. So the Blessed One is well released in mind.

I really like that. We don't want to hate the eye. We don't need to get rid of forms. We don't have to run from contact. There is an eye in the Blessed One. He sees forms with the eye. But no passion or desire arises, and he is well released in mind.

Just opening to the mystery of whatever this next moment brings, without needing to run from it, hold on to it, or make up a story about it. Just there is the door to the deathless.

So let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 349

Sakkāyadiṭṭhi: Identity View

Carol Wilson · 1h06

> In this detailed exploration of sakkāyadiṭṭhi (identity view or personality view), Carol Wilson draws extensively from the suttas to illuminate one of Buddhism's most fundamental teachings on the nature of self. She presents the Buddha's precise definition of identity view: the twenty ways we mistakenly regard form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness as self—seeing them as identical to self, possessed by self, contained within self, or containing self.
>
> Wilson examines how identity view serves as the root of the sixty-two speculative views described in the Brahmajāla Sutta, and how its presence leads to agitation through clinging. Drawing from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, she explains the Buddha's teaching that when any aggregate changes—as they inevitably do—consciousness becomes preoccupied with that change, giving rise to fear, distress, anxiety, and further clinging. She shares her own practice observations about the subtle hooks that maintain self-referencing even when we intellectually see through our patterns.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with sakkāyadiṭṭhi through careful attention to the six sense doors, sense contact, and vedanā (feeling tone). Wilson emphasizes how continuity of mindfulness reveals the moment-to-moment impermanence that naturally undercuts identity view. She concludes with the touching story of Anāthapiṇḍika weeping upon hearing such profound teachings, reminding practitioners of their good fortune in having access to these liberating instructions.

Tonight I want to talk about sakkāyadiṭṭhi, which is translated variously as personality view or identity view. Identity view is how Bhikkhu Bodhi likes to translate it. I'll be drawing on a lot of information from the discourses, from the suttas. I got in a mood and got really absorbed in reading many different suttas, so I hope I don't get too detailed about it, but I was having fun with it.

Once I went to some teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and these are some notes I took. He said at one point that there are two attitudes at the core of our suffering, like twin forces at the core of our being: grasping at self-existence and the self-cherishing attitude—basically, the meanness of things. He said we've entrusted our entire well-being to the self-cherishing attitude, and so we find ourselves caught in a perpetual cycle of suffering due to this erroneous total belief in self-grasping to make us happy. Later on he remarked that if this really worked, if self-interested thought and activity could make us truly happy, we should all have succeeded by now, because we've certainly perfected that quality of activity.

So what is this sakkāyadiṭṭhi? There's one sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya where it's said that all sixty-two speculative views—there's one whole sutta describing all the different views and all the ways we get lost in past and future, in "is that" or "isn't that"—arise from one source. Someone asks: what causes these views to come into existence, and the absence of what prevents them from arising? The key is identity view. When identity view is present, then all of these sixty-two speculative views can come to be. When there is no identity view, no personality belief, no sakkāyadiṭṭhi, then these views don't come to be. They don't arise.

Sakkāyadiṭṭhi is definitely a seed of enormous confusion and suffering. And basically, after we've been practicing for a while—to move away from such high language—we hate it. We want it to go away. But not really. We'd like the suffering part of it to go away, but other parts of it we're so familiar with. It just feels so much like me. How could it go away?

Back to the suttas. What is sakkāyadiṭṭhi? The Buddha actually describes it very precisely. He has very different words and phrases for different aspects of how the sense of self is created in a moment. Sakkāyadiṭṭhi, in some ways, is the grossest form of how we get caught in creating a sense of self, but it's also the place to start. He gives a very specific definition of what it is.

Now experientially, before I read you that definition, we all know very well the experience of being caught in the sense of identification—both the experience of being caught and also the mystery of it. When you're caught in some particular internal formation, a particular pattern of your mind, an emotional train, some reaction, or maybe just striving in meditation—something you're caught in—and you're mindful to the extent that you can actually name what's going on. You can say, "Oh, this is striving," or "This is my sense of worthlessness." You can note the sensations. You can name the emotions. It's not like you're lost on another planet or completely believing the content. And still, somewhere, you're totally identified. You sort of know that in the back of your mind, but you just can't see how.

And then it switches. Something lets go, and suddenly there's no identification anymore. The whole saṅkhāra, the whole formation, might still be there, might still be exactly the same. But somehow you're free within it. There's just not that sense of suffering from it anymore. It's a mystery, isn't it? You wonder, how did that happen? What let go? Can I do that again? Just that sense of something huge having shifted, and at the same time, you're still in the same story, but it just isn't me anymore.

We know that, don't we? That experience.

But what does the Buddha describe sakkāya-diṭṭhi as? What is it? How does the presence of sakkāya-diṭṭhi serve to create further views, further getting lost in a sense of self? How do we practice sakkāya-diṭṭhi—because we do, often. And what is the path of practice leading to the cessation of self-identification?

I want to touch on some different suttas, some different things the Buddha has said about each of these. There is one very set definition of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, and in the past, I would read it and kind of not dismiss it, but try to simplify it and think, "Oh, that's too complicated and boring." But I'm afraid I don't think that at the moment, so you're going to get the whole thing.

This is Sāriputta speaking, but that's also pretty good. And this is repeated over and over in the suttas—it's not just a one-time thing. He says: What is sakkāya-diṭṭhi? An uninstructed worldling, someone who's not completely awakened, regards form as self. Or he regards self as possessing form, or he regards form as within self, or he regards self as within form.

A metaphor is given for each of these, because I know the mind just goes, "Huh?" Regarding form as self—the metaphor is that in that moment, they're indistinguishable, the way that if you have an oil lamp, you can't tell the difference between the flame and its color. They're indistinguishable. So in that moment, we're thinking of form as self.

At other times, one might regard self as possessing form, which would mean the mind, or the formless aspects of experience, feels as though it possesses form the way that a tree has a shadow. So it's as if the mind is possessing form as self.

Form as in self means that in that moment we're positing or thinking of the formless—which could be mind experience—as a self within which the form is situated. This is like the way a scent is in the flower. So it's as if we're thinking in that moment of self as vast mental activity, and form is within it.

And self as in form means that you're thinking of form, and the self—the sense of the formless, the mind, consciousness—is within the form, the way a jewel might be in a basket.

Don't try to remember these, but it's just different ways that in a particular moment we're positing the sense of self. So that's in relation to form. Then these same four are in relation to all the other four aggregates: feeling, perception, volitional formations—actions of mind, internal formations—and consciousness.

So at any particular time, we might be regarding feeling as self, or perception as self, or some volitional internal formation as self, or consciousness as self, and each of those in any of those four ways. It's very subtle. We might think, "Well, I know this body isn't me." But there could be more subtle ways that we're relating to the body as being within a sense of self, which is consciousness, for example.

So our view—sakkāya-diṭṭhi is just a view. It's not a steady state. It's arising in relationship to experience frequently. And because it can arise in any of these twenty different ways, we don't always recognize it. We might be really familiar with two or three of those ways and we don't get caught in them anymore. But there are seventeen others that we just don't quite see.

Sāriputta goes on, taking form just as the example: The person then lives obsessed by the notions "I am form, form is mine." As he lives obsessed by these notions, that form of his changes and alters—heck of a nerve, but it does—and with the change of form there arises in him, guess what? Sorrow, lamentation, pain, displeasure, and despair. The same for all of these. The form alters, the feeling alters, the perception, the volitional formations, any of our internal experience, and consciousness.

So this is the basic definition of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It's clear and it's not—it's actually very subtle. Now, when Sāriputta says we think of form as me, that form changes and alters, and we get really lost in displeasure, in despair, in sorrow—that's not rocket science to see how we do that, right? I mean, that's pretty obvious to see.

The body changes—where it didn't hurt, suddenly there is pain. Vedana changes—where you had a nice, pleasant, calm breath, suddenly the whole sitting gets tight and hard, strong sensations arise, and you feel like needles are sticking into you. It's unpleasant. It's changed, you know.

Our perceptions shift and change. Sometimes, just in deep states of concentration, our perceptions of what's going on in our body, in the world, get really weird. It can be scary. It certainly is unfamiliar. That change in perception, the change in vedana, the change in form gives rise to all kinds of thoughts and conclusions and comparing—and more vedana and more thoughts and more sense of self and enormous suffering. "What does it mean about me?" Or our perceptions can shift in how we think others here are looking at us, or thinking about us, or speaking to us—or just how they look, what's going on with them. Perceptions are unreliable, but they shift and we get really upset.

God knows our internal formations are changing all the time. From talking to people and from my own experience, that's often one of the biggest areas where, when they change, we really get lost in obsessive suffering about it, in confusion—me, me, me. Or we resist. Or we blame.

All of that, in some way, involves positing a personality belief, an identity belief, around any of these aspects of experience, or around our resistance to it, or around the conclusion: "What does this mean about me?" In that, we are practicing the path of self-identification. We're practicing the cultivation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Which isn't to then start blaming ourselves, because you can't even claim sakkāya-diṭṭhi as yours. It's just another conditioned arising. If we hate when personality view arises, we're practicing the path of cultivating personality view again, right? But if we can just see it as another arising appearance—"Oh yeah, here's personality view. I'm totally and completely identified with this and I want it to go away. Oh yeah, that's personality view. It feels like this"—then we're not cultivating it in that moment.

Now, the Buddha elaborated in another sutta a little bit more on what Sariputta said about how we create suffering from sakkāya-diṭṭhi. He started this sutta by saying, "I will teach you agitation through clinging." You might think we don't need to be taught agitation through clinging! I think what he means is, "I will explain to you how that happens." And then he follows it with, "And I will teach you non-agitation through non-clinging."

He begins with the same set of explanations—what is an uninstructed worldling, one who regards self as form, and that whole thing. And then he says, with the change and alteration of form, of feeling, of perception, of formations, of consciousness—and I like this, it's a little subtler, it's really how it seems to happen in my experience—with the alteration of this sense of experience we're calling self, his consciousness becomes preoccupied with that change.

Even if it's a change for the so-called better, it's easy to get preoccupied with it. "Oh, now the sitting's really going well. How did I get there? How can I keep it going? What does this mean about my practice? What stage might I be at?" We become preoccupied with the change. And then agitation—even if it's a change that we like, that preoccupation leads to agitation in the mind, agitation in the energy body. Agitation and a constellation of mental states, born of preoccupation with the change of form, remain obsessing his mind, or her mind.

This can be extremely gross, where we really know it, and it can operate on very subtle levels. But the agitation can be the kind where you just have to run around in the woods for an hour because you're so preoccupied with the alteration and the constellation of mental states that have arisen. Or it can be an agitation arising from a state of quite deep tranquility—as Marcia talked about in her last talk, the tranquility in samādhi—but there's a change and some "me-ness." "Oh yeah, my consciousness is getting tranquil. What does that mean?" The agitation is on a subtler level, but it's agitation nonetheless, obsessing in the mind, a constellation of mental states. It's the same pattern.

And I think this is interesting. Because his or her mind is obsessed, he is frightened, distressed, and anxious. And through clinging, he becomes more agitated. This is really, to me, the way it happens. Gross or subtle, never mind—it's the same pattern.

It's the same way it works. Because the mind at that moment is obsessed—really from grasping to the sense of self in the change, the alteration of form or perception or consciousness or vedana, or internal formations. Because the mind is obsessed with that change, in any way you know, all these thoughts start, and in the agitation out of that obsession, fear arises, some form of distress and anxiety, and then there's more clinging and more agitation.

And this is the ongoing arising, moment after moment, of the experience of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, sense of self. Obviously, as the Buddha goes on to teach non-agitation through non-clinging, it's simply that when there is no sakkāya-diṭṭhi arising in the moment around the alteration of experience, then there's no agitation. There's no clinging to the experience and there's no agitation. So that's non-agitation through non-clinging.

The only difference is that subtle arising in the moment of some aspect of experience subtly being held as self, and then all the reactions that come from that. And sometimes it's so obvious, but sometimes it's so subtle. It does sometimes seem like—God, you know, we practice so diligently and for so many years, and we're paying such close attention, and we've seen so often how any of these particular experiences comes and goes, isn't self. I mean, we know that in some way, but then we don't. If we really knew it, we'd be arahants.

So not to get frustrated or discouraged—because that is merely obsessing, identifying with some internal formation and getting agitated and clinging—but to have a healthy respect. What I think is a healthy respect for really how deeply, how well, we have practiced in at least this lifetime sakkāya-diṭṭhi. We've really practiced it many, many mind moments, to the point that it's so familiar, so often, that we don't even notice it. That's why we have to really sharpen our mindfulness, our continuity, our samādhi, to be able to see more clearly, to see through it.

So what does it mean? I'll move away from the suttas for a moment. Practically, in our experience, I just want to share something I was noticing. I think it was the last retreat I sat. I sat here for the month of April, really exploring and experiencing the difference between being caught and identified in a particular train of internal formation, of sankhara really, and when the sakkāya-diṭṭhi—when that sense of clinging to, identifying with, any aspect of experience—is gone. Really experientially, what does that mean to us? And as I said, I know you all know it, but just to look carefully: what is it that's the hook for me? And it might be different for all of us at different times. What is the place where the sense of self is hooking on that's keeping me in this experience?

And even when we know this happens—just before I came up, I was closing the Saṃyutta Nikāya, and there was a sutta there that just popped out at me, of a monk who was very sick and had been practicing for years, a long time. And he was really upset. He went to the Buddha because he was really sick, and he said, basically—you can hear any of us saying it—"I'm used to practicing and having this real depth of samādhi and abiding in tranquility. I always could get there, and now I can't do it. Now I can't get my samādhi—what happened?" Basically. I mean, it was in slightly different language, but that was basically it.

And you can just hear the Buddha. He's kind of like, "Haven't I told you things change?" It really sounded like that. "Let me see, have I ever said anything to you about mental states being impermanent? Feeling is impermanent, conditions are impermanent..." And he runs through the whole thing. He didn't kind of say, "Don't worry, you'll get your samādhi back, it's okay." He just said, "Wake up. Everything's changing. Let it go." Okay, this is my inflection a little bit, but that was basically what he said.

And we all know that, don't we?

So what I was exploring—I mean, not consciously, but I just really started noticing it this spring when I was sitting. At times it'd be pretty clear, going along. There wasn't a lot of emotional stuff. But I noticed, I remember, it was early in the morning. I'd get up, and when I first get up early, I'd go down and get a cup of tea, and then I'd start practicing, like 2:30 or 3 or something. And a good friend of mine, who was also sitting, would usually be down there walking.

And I've noticed for myself that when I first get up, before I've just had a moment to settle in, it's like my mind is not quite aware, and I'm more prey to identification with whatever particular patterns I have. They just kind of creep in for a moment. So between my room upstairs and walking down to the tea, even though I was noticing—it's that kind of space where you're noticing what's happening, but that kind of grip is coming along with what's happening.

I would notice that sense of comparing. "I wonder if..." And this is from way back. This is from my first years of practice. I can't believe this is still here, I was also thinking. "I wonder if I got up before her today." Who cares? But every morning: "I wonder if I'm going to get down there before her, or is she already walking?"

And I would have to watch my mind go through this as I'm going down the stairs. And some days it was just laughing. But every now and then, it would really grip me. And I'd notice the comparing and the sense of, "Oh, there she is. She's a better yogi than me." And I'd watch this whole thing going.

And it's that point where you're really, as if you're standing on the side going, "I don't believe this is still running." But there's some little hook, you know, it's not completely unidentified.

And so I was looking one morning, I was just really exploring it. And I said, "Oh, the hook isn't so much what I thought it was." We think, "Well, I really want to be free from suffering," which at that moment translates into, "I want to be free from this really stupid pattern." And so I want to see through it so it can go away.

But it just popped into my mind: the hook actually was, "Am I willing to be without self-referencing?" That the hook into the story—and I've been seeing it more and more—it's not always the hook, but the times when I'm seeing what's happening quite clearly, I can label the whole thing, I'm not a hundred percent buying in, but there's some hook. It's not about, for me at that point, believing the story at all, or having to fix it, or having to say, "No, it really doesn't matter if she's there before you. It doesn't mean you're a worthless yogi." You know how you try and pretend, "I'm really above all of this." I saw the hook was: to be completely without self-referencing. So this stuff comes, and the referencing back to "me" was actually the hook, even though it was a suffering story. There's still a familiar sense of "me" about it. And that was actually the point of identification—just a subtle, very subtle feeling of "me who needs to see through this really stupid story." Or "me."

It's hard, I don't know if I can explain it any better, but I'm just saying explore this in yourself. It's not just the habit of mind, the times when you can really see through it, but there's a subtle sense of trying to understand it, trying to see how it comes to be in the moment. "Why is this pattern arising? It's arising out of this and this and this and that." But there's a subtle sense of "me" behind it.

If I just turn around and look at that, there's just pure awareness in that moment. You just notice thought arising, sensation arising, feeling arising, mood arising, and no referring back to "me" at all. There's no "me" in that moment who's caught in this pattern or not caught in this pattern, or walking down the stairs, or anything. It's just awareness receiving sensations, vedana, thoughts, without any constellation of "me" in it. It's all just empty space.

And in that, a feeling would suddenly come up—the subtle sense of, "I don't know if I want to be without self-referencing." Even if it's a slightly suffering story, that sense of "me" is so familiar, like a comfortable old coat that you just want to slip into, even though it's hot and you really don't need it and it's just dragging you down and making you sweat. But still, you know, like that kid in the Peanuts cartoon who used to drag around his blanket all the time because it was comfortable.

Anyway, I don't know if I'm making any sense at all, but explore that. When there's the immediacy of wakeful presence, just noticing form arising, feeling arising, sensation arising, mood arising, thoughts arising—just arising without referring back to anything—there's no problem. There's no agitation. There's nothing one has to do to change that formation, to get rid of it. It really doesn't matter if thoughts are arising: "I wonder if I got up ahead of her, or she got up ahead of me, or why is this happening?" It doesn't matter. Those thoughts are arising in empty space. Awareness is just receiving thoughts, and there's nothing to do with them. It's not a problem. Nothing needs to be fixed. One doesn't have to suddenly think, "I've got to move into awareness, I better do metta, I better..." There's just no sense of sakkaya-ditthi, no sense of self, and hence no problem.

You know that way Ajahn Sumedho talks about sakkaya-ditthi—the difference between "my sadness" and "oh, sadness is like this." Me walking down the stairs knowing "comparing, being a bad yogi, that's my pattern." Or simply, "Comparing feels like this." Just what it is. It doesn't matter if it's comparing or it's incredible bliss. It really doesn't make any difference. It's just like this.

And then for me, just to notice that more and more, I could see the hook into the sakkaya-ditthi wasn't the suffering nature of the pattern, but: am I really willing in that moment to be without self-referencing altogether?

And just a word for those of you practicing metta. In a different way, it brings us to the same place, the same experience. You may not be turning into arising sensation, arising thought, arising vedana, because it's just getting absorbed into the metta feeling, absorbed into the phrases and the image. But in that, as the absorption and the metta grows, there also stops being any sense of self-referencing. It stops being "me having metta for me or you or anyone." There's just metta. There's not the sense of me and other. And in that all-inclusive space, it doesn't feel exactly the same as emptiness, but it works the same way in which there stops being a sense of sakkaya-ditthi, no more sense of self-referencing. It's just the metta, and that's all.

Notice in those times how freeing it is. It's just like this. And how—and I'm sure you've noticed this—how easily, how tricky, especially with internal formations like these, our mind or our awareness, whatever you want to say, gets subtly seduced back into identifying in some way with the particular, especially when it's a repetitive pattern, an internal formation, a repetitive pattern or personality pattern that you get caught up and identified with.

So that ability to just go, "Oh, sadness is like this. Worthlessness is like this. Comparing is like this."

It might really be just empty space like that for a moment—just pure awareness receiving sensations. And then suddenly, it's very "me" again.

I noticed, and I'm sure there are many more, but I noticed a few ways that the attention gets tricked back into identifying again. I'll just share my ways; I'm sure you've got your own.

One, of course, is if it's a difficult or unpleasant mental formation—comparing or fear or worthlessness or blame or jealousy or you name it—we get tricked back into personality view about it, relating to it out of aversion, out of wanting it to go away, out of thinking we need to fix it.

Another way we get tricked in is out of fascination with it, which is what was happening to me walking down the stairs that morning. And it can really seem like we're being dharmic about it, trying to figure out how this is arising in the moment. What arising experience is giving rise to this comparing? We're sort of being dharmic, but there's a way we're really clinging to the fascination of wanting to understand it so I can understand how I, great as I am, keep getting tricked back into believing comparing. How does it rise? How does it go? But there's an identification in that moment, a sakkaya-ditthi around the formation, grasping of wanting to understand.

And of course, the obvious: getting caught up over and over in any particular thought form or aspect of the story. So I'm walking down the stairs and just when I think I've got it all figured out and I'm not really identified—but this is thinking about it, trying not to identify—and you think, "Yes, it's just comparing arising due to my old patterns from when I was a child," and you think you've got it all nicely manipulated, and some new thought comes up: "But it's because it's that particular friend, and that really triggers me because..." And then you're really back in it again. Me, me, me.

Can you just let the pattern be there? No me at all.

It's very tricky. It's very tricky.

So exploring where we get caught and how the mind gets tricked back into relating to any aspect of experience as sakkaya-ditthi—those moments when there's just the pattern, just the formation, the sensations, the thoughts, the contact arising and passing, and there's no holding it together in our consciousness as a sense of me, just awareness receiving experience—that's really anatta, right? That's a moment of perceiving anatta.

And I just want to say that while in the moment anatta is really the falling away of the sense of me, of any self-referencing, anatta is not annihilation. It's liberation from a false sense of self, and it's really a moment of freedom, but anatta is not a path of annihilation. It's not that we are looking to experience anatta out of hatred, self-hatred, aversion to our experience. "Let me please just see the emptiness of this because I really hate what's happening," as if we're looking to let it just be—experience being received in awareness—because "I've got to get out of this." And sometimes that becomes, "I've got to get out of this transition. I've got to get out of this whole life. I've got to get out of this whole body-mind experience" in a negative way, in a way that's actually more identification. That's sakkaya-ditthi too—clinging to non-being.

But when there's that just seeing, really being with all the arising experience without referring any aspect of it, without making sakkaya-ditthi out of any of it—in that moment it really is the dissolving of the whole issue. The whole issue just goes away, and nothing needs to change. You don't have to get out of comparing. Whether it's a problem or not just falls away. But not if we're looking for anatta out of a sense of self-hatred or aversion to any experience. That's just more sakkaya-ditthi. That's just having ourself in reference to, reacting to a particular experience with sense of self.

So just exploring how the sense of sakkaya-ditthi—of relating to any aspect of experience as "this is mine," or "this experience is within me," or "I am within that experience"—notice how that arises. Notice the liberation from that, the freedom from that. Both are happening all the time. Just as I said, we're practicing sakkaya-ditthi a lot. But I don't want to leave it on that kind of downbeat. We also here are cultivating the path of practicing freedom from identity view, freedom from creating sense of self.

So back to the suttas. There's one sutta where someone asked the Buddha, "How should one know, how should one see, for identity view to be abandoned?" And this is really one very succinct description of our path of practice. His answer: "When one knows and sees the eye as impermanent, identity view is abandoned in that moment." But he goes on. "When one knows and sees form"—so there's the eye and there's forms, what the eye sees—"when one then knows and sees forms as impermanent, in that moment identity view is abandoned." And then eye consciousness—the eye and forms give rise to eye consciousness when knowing turns to that. "When one sees eye consciousness as impermanent, identity view is abandoned."

When those all come together—there's your eye, there's a form, there's knowing, there's consciousness in that moment—that moment of actual seeing is called contact, sense contact. So he says then, "When one knows and sees eye contact as impermanent, identity view is abandoned." And "when one knows and sees whatever feeling, whatever vedana, arises with eye contact as the condition"—so there's the seeing, it's impermanent, you don't notice that, but it's really pleasant, and you notice that that pleasantness is impermanent—"then identity view is abandoned."

And he goes, of course, through all the six sense doors: ear and sounds, ear consciousness, ear contact, the actual hearing, whatever feeling arises due to ear contact, hearing contact; smell; taste; body, body and tactile phenomena, body consciousness, the contact when you're actually aware of feeling and whatever feeling arises.

And the mind, the mind as a sense door, whatever mental phenomena arise. Subtle mental phenomena are really gross—thoughts, feelings, emotions—or subtle perceptions, whatever mental phenomena arise. The consciousness, the mental consciousness, and mind contact, which I think is really interesting, and whatever feeling arises.

I go through all those because I think this points to a very subtle and very precise way that we can bring mindfulness into our practice here. It gives us a lot of choices—whatever in a moment is particularly obvious in our experience. So say there's a loud sound. It might not be that you notice the ear first and think, "Oh yes, the ear is impermanent." You may not have even noticed the consciousness of hearing, but you could be aware of contact right at that point of hearing contact and notice that that contact is impermanent. It's gone already. Maybe you don't notice the contact, but you notice, "Oh, that's an unpleasant sound." Unpleasant—it's gone already. Unpleasant is impermanent. This applies to all the five physical senses.

Personally, I think to really bring this sense of noticing impermanence in at the mind door takes particular attention. I was noticing just while walking today, paying attention to that moment of contact at the mind door—mental phenomena and the point of contact. Say a little mood arises, no big deal. Can I just notice that point of contact when there's knowing of sadness, that first moment of really connecting? Oh, contact. And as soon as you notice, it's impermanent. As soon as you notice that contact, it's already changed. It doesn't mean the mood is gone, but it shifts slightly, and there's another contact. Or the vedana that comes from it—you notice, "Oh, that's slightly unpleasant." And as soon as you're noticing unpleasant, it shifted and became neutral in that moment. You notice neutral, it shifts and goes back to unpleasant.

This, of course, takes some mindfulness. It takes some continuity of mindfulness leading into samadhi. It's hard to see and notice on this level, especially of contact and vedana and impermanence, when we're so busy in daily life and so much stuff is coming in. If I were to go talk at CIMC in a couple of weeks in Cambridge, where people just come in from their daily lives, and I start talking about noticing the moment of mental contact and how it's impermanent—people are running around crazy busy. What are you talking about? They're lucky if they can notice they're furious, never mind the moment of mental contact, the moment of vedana.

But here we are able to really cultivate the mind, to use our sati, our mindfulness, and the continuity of mindfulness to begin to see through our inverted perceptions, to begin to see more clearly. When we really bring our mindfulness to the point of the sense door, to the point of sense contact or the vedana—not to change it, but just to notice its impermanence—this really begins to deeply undercut the whole habit of sakkaya-ditthi.

Because when we're really cellularly experiencing impermanence on this quick-changing level, you just can't make too much of anything. Even the strongest, most habitual story about yourself, or moods that you have, or feelings in your body—when you are noticing on that point of contact, tactile sensation and contact with awareness changing, the sense of "it's me, this form is mine, this contact is mine"—by the time you've even gotten that formed, it's already changed. And it all just starts to become so much more ephemeral, so much less solid, so much more free.

And yet, as the Buddha said, we have a tendency not to notice the impermanence of things. We know it intellectually, but he talks about the inverted perceptions, the perversions of perception, where we tend to perceive what is impermanent and changing as permanent, what is unsatisfactory and unreliable as satisfactory, what is not self as self.

On the level of anicca, impermanence—which is really what he keeps talking about in terms of seeing through sakkaya-ditthi, what I just read—to really cellularly see through our habit of assuming permanence takes continuity of mindfulness. I feel personally that it's the lack of continuity of mindfulness that hides impermanence. We all know everything's changing, but cellularly, we don't necessarily quite get it.

This is something the Dalai Lama said, I think at that same teaching. He said we think we understand long-term anicca. On some level, we all really know, sort of, that we're going to die. We know that people are born, that they get sick and they die. They. When we get sick, well, we have to go through some dharma work to say, "Oh, you're right, I know that really happens." But to me? Now?

But we all know that happens. However, he says the tendency is to think—and even with moods or even with something quicker—we think, "Well, this sensation, this unpleasant sensation, I know it's impermanent. It's going to go away." When? We tend to think it arises, it persists for a while, and then it goes away, it changes.

This is what is inaccurate. That's assuming permanence right there—in that "persists for a while." Nothing persists for a while, even that much. Nothing. He said impermanence means constant flux, and when we're thinking, "This is arising, my life is persisting for a while, and then it's going away"—we do that, right?

And when we turn in here and look: What is persisting for a while? What has persisted just exactly the same for any two mind moments in a row, if we're really looking? That's one of the distortions of perception that can happen in deep practice, one of the things that can really flip us out for a while. There's nowhere to take a stand. There's nothing staying the same. And I need something—back to even if it's a suffering sense of me, at least it's familiar. I can land there.

When we really have a continuity of mindfulness, moment after moment after moment, you really start to see—and don't believe me, you can't, it really has to come from your own experience—but there isn't anything persisting. And at first, second, and third, we might hate that. "No, I need something." But once that sense of me wanting something—that's also not persisting. It goes away. It's just how it is. No problem.

This is why the continuity of sati is so important. Because otherwise we see this pain, we pay attention to something else, we space out for a while, we go off into a daydream, and then we come back and, "Oh, there's the pain," and it's been the same. So we're assuming permanence. We don't notice that ten million things happened in there, and while you were lost in the daydream, you can't actually prove that that pain was there. You weren't aware of it. Like the tree that falls in the forest and nobody's there—do you hear it? Don't think about that. But in your experience, the experience was not pain. The experience was you were off in Sumatra somewhere, hunting orangutans. And then you come back and think, "Oh, this pain has been the same all day." But it changed in the night. "Oh, I see. There really is change. The pain went away."

That's why when we talk about continuity of mindfulness, it doesn't mean you don't space out, but it's that willingness to just notice this moment, then this moment, then this moment. That's why noting as a tool is so immensely useful, because when we're just noting, very quietly labeling—whether it's "rising and falling," or "vibrating," "thinking," "unpleasant," "contact," "vibrating," "tingling," "color"—you see that it's something different every moment. And then you realize you didn't note for a while and you come back and start noting again. It brings you in much more moment to moment.

It's possible to be that aware without noting, for sure. But it's also easy to be saying, "Oh yes, I'm really aware of this pain. I'm aware of the body. I'm aware of awareness. And I'm receiving sensations in awareness, like Carol said. And I'm just feeling the pain." And it's all the same. It's a crock. It's pleasant maybe. We're half experiencing stuff and half making it up—which is why we don't know what's going on so often. When we're making it up, we're assuming, often in that, permanence or some subtle sense of self. We're assuming something and we don't even know what.

Just noticing, noting or not, but just connecting your awareness with each moment, each experience, whatever it is—that gives the space. You might say, "What do you mean space? Noting every moment, there's no space. That's why I hate it and I don't want to do it." But it actually gives the space for us to notice what's actually happening rather than what we subtly think might be happening, or want to be happening, or how we analyze what's happening, or think it could be. We don't have a clue if we could just notice the arising experience. And this moment after moment—it actually gives huge space.

Because when that happens—when there's a sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi coming—we notice it. It's really obvious, that sense of contraction, that sense of self. And through the steadiness of mindfulness is how samādhi, how concentration, develops. That stillness, that depth of observing power, really supports and strengthens and allows the observing power to get more and more subtle, to actually notice the moments of mind contact and how that changes as soon as you notice it.

That's why we're so fortunate, really, to have the opportunity to practice like this. It doesn't mean anyone's practice should look any particular way, but we have the opportunity to truly cultivate the stillness and the observing power, to begin noticing the changing nature of all our sense experience—the sense contact, the sense consciousness, and the vedanā that goes along with it.

I have other great stories to share. Let me offer two more.

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, in the form of the definition I gave you with those twenty ways, is said in the Theravāda tradition to be dissipated at the first stage of enlightenment—personality view falls away. And of course the question then arises: how come it seems to keep going? It doesn't seem complete. It seems like if all that were gone, one would be a complete arahant.

There's a sutta I've known about for years that I find really fascinating, because even though those twenty ways of positing self or thinking some aspect of the aggregates is me can be seen through, it's still so subtle. The tendency, the residual tendency to conceit, to the sense of comparing with others—that doesn't go until one is an arahant. The tendency, the subtle sense to grasp at any aspect of experience. The underlying tendency just to have the feeling of "I am." These are so subtle and so deeply rooted that even when you're seeing clearly the impermanence of all these things we've mentioned, there can still arise some subtle sense of "I am" that you can't quite pin down.

So if that's happening to you, and you think, "But I should be past that by now"—don't lose heart.

There's this sutta where one monk, Khemaka is his name, and some other monks come to him. He's very sick—I don't know why so many of these monks were sick and old. The other monks were asking him about his experience, and he said, "I do not grasp at any of the aggregates as me or mine. I know I'm not form. I know I'm not perception. I know I'm not consciousness." He goes through all of them.

So the monks go back, saying, "Oh, he's an arahant, he's an arahant!" Then they return to him.

And he said, "No, I'm not. I'm not."

He said he still has—and this is very interesting—he said, "Even though I do not speak of feeling as 'I am' or perception as 'I am,' I don't grasp any of these as 'I am,' there still lingers in me, there is still a residual feeling of 'I am' that arises. The notion 'I am' has not vanished in my experience. The feeling, the tendency, the notion 'I am' does arise—as if this 'I am,' even though I don't say I am perception, I am form. There's still the habit of this feeling of 'I am' arising."

And he gives this example. He says, "Suppose there's the scent of a blue, red, or white lotus. Would one be speaking correctly if one said the scent of the flower belongs only to the petals? Or the scent only belongs to the stalk? Or it belongs only to the pistils?"

And the monks say, "No. You'd have to say the scent is part of the whole flower."

And he said, "It's exactly like that. I don't speak of form as 'I am,' but I can't say 'I am' is completely separate from form. I don't speak of perceptions or feeling as 'I am,' but somehow the notion of 'I am,' the underlying tendency to conceit, still tends to arise somehow within this field of mental-physical experience."

He couldn't really be clearer than that. I find that kind of heartening, actually. Because it explains why I think at times we've all practiced a lot, we've really seen deeply the impermanence of these things, and there are times when you really know, "I'm not identifying with this body. I'm not identifying with this emotion. I don't think I'm this perception." You really know it. But there's that whiff of I-ness hanging around. You really can't put your finger on it, but you can say, "Okay, I-ness is here. It feels like this."

And the practice isn't any different. It's not that we have to do something different. And again, Khemaka says: you just keep on dwelling, contemplating the rise and fall of the five aggregates subject to clinging.

Just keep on noticing the impermanence of all that we've discussed—the five aggregates, the six senses, the sense doors, the sense objects, contact and feeling. Just keep noticing. That's all.

With saddha, with trust, with faith that as our perception becomes clearer and clearer, we will no longer be sucked back, deluded back into believing sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And that whiff—that indefinable whiff of self that can drag us back into so much confusion and suffering—will finally dissipate completely.

I want to close with one sutta about how fortunate we are to have these teachings and this practice, to have this time.

This is a sutta to Anāthapiṇḍika. Anāthapiṇḍika was perhaps the biggest lay supporter, the most generous lay supporter of the Buddha in his lifetime—totally devoted, a layman married with family. But he was said to have attained the first stage of awakening, incredibly generous. In this sutta, he's very sick and basically dying. He asks for Sāriputta and Ānanda to come to him and give him teachings. They come and ask how he's doing, and he's in incredible pain in his body, in his head.

So Sāriputta starts teaching him. It's a long teaching—I won't give you all of it—but it's very much in line with what we've been talking about tonight. He starts out by saying, "You should train yourself: I will not cling to the ear. I will not cling to the nose. I will not cling to the eye. I will not cling to the mind." He goes through all the sense doors: "I will not cling to forms. I will not cling to eye consciousness. I will not cling to eye contact"—going through all these same things we just talked about. "I will not cling to material form, to feeling"—all the aggregates. The kind of teachings I was just sharing that we all can explore every day in our practice.

And Sāriputta ends it with: "I will not cling to what is seen, to what is heard, to what is sensed, to what is cognized, to what is encountered. I will not cling to what is sought after. I will not cling to what is examined by the mind. And my consciousness will not be dependent on that."

At this point, Anāthapiṇḍika started weeping, just weeping. Sāriputta and Ānanda actually said, "What's the matter? Are you sinking? Are you dying?"

And he says, "No." He said, "I have been waiting on the teacher and the bhikkhus for so long, for my whole life, and never have I heard such a teaching on the Dhamma as this, with such depth. It's so profound."

And Sāriputta says, "Yes, we don't give such deep talk on Dhamma to lay people"—in a way implying it's too hard for them to see. "We give it to those who have gone forth."

And Anāthapiṇḍika says, "Well, please, let such talk on Dhamma be given to lay people. There are those who can see, those who can understand." It's so profound and beautiful.

Then they leave, and he died and was reborn as a deva and came and sang praises to Sāriputta, to the Buddha.

I get chills when I think of that—his weeping at the power of that teaching, saying, "Please let it be shared with lay people."

And now, yes, almost all of us here are lay people, and we have the opportunity not just to hear the teachings but to put them into practice—at the eye door, the ear door, the nose door, the mind door, the body door, the mouth door. See the impermanence. See where we're caught. See sakkāya-diṭṭhi arise and pass without needing to change it, without needing to do anything.

And just appreciate—appreciating our great good fortune in this life.

May the beneficial energies of our practice be shared with all beings in all realms, in all conditions. May our practice be the cause for their happiness and liberation from suffering.

CHAPTER 350

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi: Identity View

Carol Wilson · 1h05

In this comprehensive exploration of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (identity view or personality view), Carol Wilson draws deeply from the Pāli suttas to illuminate one of Buddhism's most fundamental teachings on the nature of self and suffering. She presents the Buddha's precise definition of how we create identity view through twenty different ways of relating to the five aggregates (khandhas)—regarding form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness as self, as possessing self, as within self, or as containing self.

Wilson shares personal practice insights about the subtle hooks that maintain self-identification, even when we can clearly observe our patterns. She identifies a crucial discovery: the resistance isn't always to the suffering itself, but to being without self-referencing altogether. Drawing from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, she explains how consciousness becomes preoccupied with change, leading to agitation, fear, and clinging—the pattern of "agitation through clinging" that the Buddha taught.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with sakkāya-diṭṭhi through careful attention to the six sense doors, sense contact, and vedanā (feeling tone), emphasizing that continuity of mindfulness (sati) is essential for perceiving the moment-to-moment impermanence that undercuts identity view. Wilson concludes with the touching story of Anāthapiṇḍika receiving profound teachings on non-clinging at his deathbed, reminding practitioners of the precious opportunity to receive and practice these liberating instructions.

I want to talk about Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which is translated variously as personality view or identity view. That's how Bhikkhu Bodhi likes to translate it. Using a lot of information from the discourses, from the suttas, I found myself completely absorbed in reading many different texts—I hope I don't get too detailed about it, but I was having fun with the exploration.

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, is essentially getting caught in that sense of self. Once I went to some teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and in my notes I recorded him saying that there are two attitudes at the core of our suffering, like twin forces at the core of our being. These attitudes are grasping at self-existence and the self-cherishing attitude—basically, the meanness of things. He said we've entrusted our entire well-being to the self-cherishing attitude, and so we find ourselves caught in a perpetual cycle of suffering due to this erroneous total belief that self-grasping can make us happy. Later he observed that if this really worked, if self-interested thought and activity could make us truly happy, we should all have succeeded by now, because we've certainly perfected that quality of activity.

So what is this Sakkāya-diṭṭhi? There's one sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya where it's said that all the sixty-two speculative views—there's an entire sutta outlining the different views and all the ways we get lost in past and future and questions of existence—arise from a single source. Someone asks what causes these views to come into existence, and in the absence of what do they not arise. The key, of course, is identity view. When identity view is present, then all of these sixty-two speculative views can come to be. When there is no identity view, no personality belief, no Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, then these views don't come to be. They don't arise.

This Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is definitely a seed of enormous confusion and suffering. After we've been practicing for a while, to move away from such elevated language, we hate it. We want it to go away—but not really. We'd like the suffering part of it to go away, but other parts of it we're so familiar with. It just feels so much like me. How could it go away?

Back to the suttas. What is this Sakkāya-diṭṭhi? The Buddha actually describes it very precisely. He has very different words and phrases for different aspects of how the sense of self is created in a moment. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is, in some ways, the grossest form of how we get caught in creating a sense of self, but it's also the place to start. He gives a very specific definition of what Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is.

Now experientially, before I share that definition, we all know very well the experience of being caught in identification. Both the experience of being caught and the mystery of it. When you're caught in some particular internal formation, a particular pattern of your mind, an emotional train, some reaction, or maybe just striving in meditation—something you're caught in—and you're mindful to the extent that you can actually name what's going on. You can say, "Oh, this is striving," or "This is my sense of worthlessness." You can note the sensations, identify the emotions. It's not like you're lost on another planet or completely believing the content. And still, somewhere, you're totally identified. You sort of know that in the back of your mind, but you just can't see how.

And then it switches. Something lets go and suddenly there's no identification anymore. The whole saṅkhāra, the whole formation might still be there, might still be exactly the same, but somehow you're free within it. There's just not that sense of suffering from it anymore. And it's a mystery, isn't it? You wonder, "How did that happen?

What let go? Can I do that again?" Just that sense of something huge having shifted, and at the same time, you're still in the same story, but it just isn't me anymore. We know that experience.

You know that experience.

But what does the Buddha describe sakkāya-diṭṭhi as? What is it? How does the presence of sakkāya-diṭṭhi serve to create further views, further getting lost in a sense of self? How do we practice sakkāya-diṭṭhi? Because we do, often. And what is the path of practice leading to the cessation of self-identification?

I just want to touch on some different suttas, some different things the Buddha has said about each of these.

There is one very set definition of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. In the past, I would read it and kind of not dismiss it, but just try to simplify it and think, "Oh, that's too complicated and boring." But I'm afraid I don't think that at the moment, so you're going to get it—the whole thing.

This is Sāriputta speaking, but that's also pretty good. And this is repeated over and over in the suttas; it's not just a one-time thing.

He says: What is sakkāya-diṭṭhi? An uninstructed worldling—someone who's not completely awakened—regards form as self, or regards self as possessing form, or regards form as within self, or regards self as within form.

A metaphor is given for each of these, because I know the mind just goes, "Huh?"

Regarding form as self: the metaphor is that in that moment, they're indistinguishable, the way that if you have an oil lamp, you can't tell the difference between the flame and its color. They're indistinguishable. So in that moment, we're thinking of form as self.

At other times, one might regard self as possessing form, which would mean the mind or the formless aspects of experience feels as though it possesses form the way a tree has a shadow. So it's as if the mind is possessing form as self.

Form as in self means that in that moment, we're positing or thinking of the formless—which could be mind experience—as a self within which the form is situated. This is like the way a scent is in the flower. So it's as if we're thinking in that moment of self as vast mental activity, and form is within it.

And self as in form means that you're thinking of form, and the self—the sense of the formless, the mind, the consciousness—is within the form the way a jewel might be in a basket.

Don't try to remember these, but they're just different ways that in a particular moment we're positing a sense of self. So that's in relation to form.

And then these same four are applied in relation to all the other four aggregates: feeling, perception, volitional formations—you know, actions of mind, internal formations—and consciousness.

So at any particular time, we might be regarding feeling as self, or perception as self, or some volitional internal formation as self, or consciousness as self, and each of those in any of those four ways.

You see, it's very subtle. We might think, "Well, I know this body isn't me." But there could be more subtle ways that we're relating to the body as being within a sense of self, which is consciousness, for example.

So our view—sakkāya-diṭṭhi is just a view, it's not a steady state. It's arising in relationship to experience frequently, and because it can arise in any of these twenty different ways, we don't always recognize it. We might be really familiar with two or three of those ways and we don't get caught in them anymore. But there are seventeen others that we just don't quite see.

So then Sāriputta goes on, taking form just as the example. The person then lives obsessed by the notions: "I am form, form is mine." As he lives obsessed by these notions, that form of his changes and alters. Heck of a nerve, but it does. With the change of form, there arises in him—guess what—sorrow, lamentation, pain, displeasure, and despair. The same for all of these: the form alters, the feeling alters, the perception, the volitional formations, any of our internal experience and consciousness.

So this is the basic definition of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. You see, I wanted to go through it all. It's clear and it's not. It's actually very subtle.

Now, when Sāriputta says we think of form as me, that form changes and alters, and we get really lost in displeasure, in despair, in sorrow—that's not rocket science to see how we do that, right?

Am I right? I mean, that's pretty obvious to see. The body changes—where it didn't hurt, suddenly there is pain. Vedana changes—where you had a nice pleasant calm breath, suddenly the whole sitting gets tight and hard, strong sensations are coming, and you're getting like needles sticking in you, and it's unpleasant vedana. It's changed. Our perceptions shift and change. Sometimes just in deep states of concentration, our perceptions of what's going on in our body, in the world, get really weird. It can be scary. It certainly is unfamiliar.

That change in perception, the change in vedana, the change in form gives rise to all kinds of thoughts and conclusions and comparing—and more vedana and more thoughts and more sense of self and enormous suffering. What does it mean about me? Or our perceptions can shift in how we think others here are looking at us, or thinking about us, or speaking to us, or just how they look, what's going on with them. Perceptions are unreliable, but they shift and we get really upset. God knows our internal formations are changing all the time. From talking to people and from my own experience, that's often one of the biggest areas where, when they change, we really get lost in obsessive suffering about it, confusion—me, me, me. Or we resist, or we blame.

And all of that, in some way, we are depositing a personality belief, identity belief, around any of these aspects of experience, or around our resistance to it, or around the conclusion: what does this mean about me? In that, we are practicing the path of self-identification. We're practicing the cultivation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—which isn't to then start blaming, because you can't even claim sakkāya-diṭṭhi as yours. It's just another conditioned arising. If we hate when personality view arises, we're practicing the path of cultivating personality view again.

But if we can just see it as another arising appearance—oh yeah, here's personality view, I'm totally and completely identified with this and I want it to go away—oh yeah, that's personality view, it feels like this—then we're not cultivating it in that moment.

So the Buddha elaborated in another sutta a little bit more on what Sariputta said, how we create suffering from sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And he started this sutta by saying, "I will teach you agitation through clinging." You might think we don't need to be taught agitation through clinging. I think what he means is: I will explain to you how that happens. And then he follows it with, "And I will teach you non-agitation through non-clinging."

So he begins with the same set of explanations of what sakkāya-diṭṭhi is—you know, an uninstructed worldling regards self as form, and through that whole thing. And then he says, with the change and alteration of the form, the feeling, the perception, the formations, the consciousness—I like this, it's a little subtler, but it's really how it seems to happen in my experience—with the alteration of this sense of experience we're calling self, his consciousness becomes preoccupied with that change.

Even if it's a change for the so-called better, it's easy to get preoccupied with it. Ah, now the sitting's really going good. How did I get there? How can I keep it going? What does this mean about my practice? What stage might I be at? We become preoccupied with the change, and then—agitation. See, even if it's a change that we like, that preoccupation leads to agitation in the mind, agitation in the energy body.

Agitation and a constellation of mental states, born of preoccupation with the change of form, remain obsessing his mind or her mind. And this can be extremely gross, where we really know it. And it can be on very subtle levels. Agitation can be the kind of agitation where you just have to run around in the woods for an hour because you're so preoccupied with the alteration and the constellation of mental states that have arisen. Or it can be an agitation arising from a state of quite a bit of tranquility—as Marcia talked about in her last talk, the tranquility in samādhi—but there's a change and some me-ness. Oh, yeah. My consciousness is getting tranquil. What does that mean? And the agitation is on a subtler level, but it's agitation nonetheless, obsessing in the mind, a constellation of mental states. It's the same pattern.

And I think this is interesting. Because his or her mind is obsessed, he is frightened, distressed and anxious, and through clinging he becomes more agitated. And this is really, to me, the way it happens—gross or subtle, never mind.

It's the same pattern, it's the same way it works. Because the mind at that moment is obsessed—really from grasping to the sense of self in the change, the alteration of form or perception or consciousness or vedana, or internal formations—because the mind is obsessed with that change in any way, all these thoughts start in the agitation. Out of that obsession, fear arises, some form of distress and anxiety, and then there's more clinging and more agitation. This is the ongoing arising, moment after moment, of the experience of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, sense of self.

Obviously, as he goes on to teach non-agitation through non-clinging, it's simply that when there is no sakkāya-diṭṭhi arising in the moment around the alteration of experience, then there's no agitation. There's no clinging to the experience and there's no agitation. That's non-agitation through non-clinging.

The only difference is that subtle arising in the moment of some aspect of experience being held as self, and then all the reactions that come from that. Sometimes it's so obvious, but sometimes it's so subtle. It does sometimes seem like we practice so diligently, for so many years, paying such close attention, having seen so often that any of these particular experiences comes and goes, isn't self. We know that in some way, but then we don't. If we really knew it, it would be our hoots.

So, not to get frustrated or discouraged—because that is merely obsessing, identifying with some internal formation and getting agitated and clinging. But to have a healthy respect for how deeply, how well we have practiced, in at least this lifetime, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. We've really practiced it many, many mind moments, to the point that it's so familiar, so often, that we don't even notice it. That's why we have to really sharpen our mindfulness, our continuity, our samādhi, to be able to see more clearly, to see through it.

So what does it mean? I'll move away from the suttas for a moment. Practically, in our experience, I just want to share something I was noticing. I think it was the last retreat I sat. I sat here for the month of April, really exploring and experiencing the difference between being caught and identified in a particular train of internal formation, of saṅkhāra, and when that sense of clinging to, identifying with any aspect of experience is gone.

Really experientially, what does that mean to us? And as I said, I know you all know it, but just to look carefully: what is it? That's the hook for me. And it might be different for all of us at different times. What is the place where the sense of self is hooking on that's keeping me in this experience?

Even when we know this happens—just before I came up, I was closing the Saṃyutta Nikāya, and there was a sutta there that popped out at me about a monk who was very sick and had been practicing for years, a long time, and he was really upset. He went to the Buddha because he was really sick, and he said basically what any of us might say: "I'm used to practicing and having this real depth of samādhi and abiding in tranquility, and I always could get there, and now I can't do it. Now I can't get my samādhi. What happened?"

And you can just hear the Buddha—he's kind of like, "Haven't I told you things change?" It really sounded like that. "Let me see, have I ever said anything to you about mental states being impermanent? Feeling is impermanent, conditions are impermanent..." He runs through the whole thing. He didn't say, "Don't worry, you'll get your samādhi back, it's okay." He just said, "Wake up. Everything's changing. Let it go." That's my inflection a little bit, but that was basically what he said. And we all know that, don't we?

So what I was exploring—not consciously, but I just really started noticing it this spring when I was sitting—at times it would be pretty clear going along, not a lot of emotional stuff. But I noticed, I remember, it was early in the morning. I'd get up and go down to get a cup of tea, then I'd start practicing around 2:30 or 3:00. A good friend of mine, who was also sitting, would usually be down there walking.

I've noticed for myself when I first get up, before I've had a moment to settle in, my mind is not quite aware, and I'm more prey to identification with whatever particular patterns I have. They just creep in for a moment. So between my room upstairs and walking down to the tea, even though I was noticing what's happening, that kind of grip of self is coming along with what's happening. I would notice that sense of comparing. I wonder if this is from way back, from my first years of practice. I can't believe this is still here. I'd think, "I wonder if I got up before her today." Who cares? But every morning I'd wonder if I was going to get down there before her or if she was already walking. I would have to watch my mind go through this as I was going down the stairs.

Some days it was just laughing. But every now and then, it would really grip me. I'd notice the comparing and the sense of, "Oh, there she is. She's a better yogi than me." I'd watch this whole thing going. And it's that point where you're really standing on the side, as if saying, "I don't believe this is still running." But there's some little hook—it's not completely unidentified.

So I was looking one morning, really exploring it, and I saw: oh, the hook isn't so much what I thought it was. You think, "Well, I really want to be free from suffering," which at that moment translates into "I want to be free from this really stupid pattern," and so "I want to see through it so it can go away."

But a thought just popped into my mind: oh, the hook actually was, am I willing to be without self-referencing?

The hook into the story—and I've been seeing it more and more—isn't always present, but the times when I really am seeing what's happening quite clearly, when I can label the whole thing, when I'm not 100% buying in but there's still some hook... it's not about, for me at that point, believing the story at all, or having to fix it, or having to say, "No, it really doesn't matter if she's there before you, it doesn't mean you're a worthless yogi," trying to pretend I'm really above all of this. I saw the hook was: to be completely without self-referencing.

So this stuff comes—so what? The referencing back to me was actually the hook, even though it was a suffering story. There's still a familiar sense of "me" about it. And that was actually the sense of identification. Just a subtle, very subtle feeling of me who needs to see through this really stupid story. Or me... I don't know if I can explain it any better.

But I'm just saying: explore this in yourself. It's not just the habit of mind. The times when you can really see through it, but there's a subtle sense of trying to understand it, trying to see how it comes to be in the moment—why is this pattern arising? It's arising out of this and this and that. But there's a subtle sense of "me" behind it. If I just turn around and look at that, and there's just pure awareness in that moment, you notice thought arising, sensation arising, feeling arising, mood arising, and no referring back to me at all. There's no "me" in that moment who's caught in this pattern, or not caught in this pattern, or walking down the stairs, or anything. It's just awareness receiving sensations, vedana, thoughts, without any constellation of "me" in it. It's all just empty space.

And in that, a feeling would suddenly come up—a subtle sense of: I don't know if I want to be without self-referencing. Even if it's a slightly suffering story, that sense of "me" is so familiar, like a comfortable old coat that you want to slip into even though it's hot and you really don't need it and it's just dragging you down and making you sweat. Still, you know—like that kid in the Peanuts cartoon who had to drag around his blanket all the time because it was comfortable. Anyway, I don't know if I'm making any sense at all, but explore that.

When there's the immediacy of wakeful presence, just noticing form arising, feeling arising, sensation arising, mood arising, thoughts arising, just arising without referring back to anything—there's no problem. There's no agitation. There's nothing one has to do to change that formation, to get rid of it. It really doesn't matter if thoughts are arising like, "I wonder if I got up ahead of her, or she got up ahead of me, or why is this happening?" It doesn't matter. Those thoughts are arising in empty space. Awareness is just receiving thoughts, and there's nothing to do with them. It's not a problem. Nothing needs to be fixed. One doesn't have to suddenly think, "I've got to move into awareness, I'd better do metta, I'd better..."

There's just no sense of sakkaya-ditthi, no sense of self, and hence no problem. You know that way Ajahn Sumedho talks about sakkaya-ditthi—the difference between "my sadness" and "oh, sadness is like this." Me walking down the stairs knowing, "oh, comparing, being a bad yogi, that's my pattern"—or simply: "oh, comparing feels like this." Just what it is. It doesn't matter if it's comparing or it's incredible bliss. It really doesn't make any difference. It's just like this.

And then for me, just to notice that more and more, I could see the hook into the sakkaya-ditthi wasn't the suffering nature of the pattern, but: am I really willing in that moment to be without self-referencing altogether?

Just a word for those of you practicing metta: in a different way it brings us to the same place, the same experience. You may not be turning into arising sensation, arising thought, arising vedana, because you're just getting absorbed into the metta feeling, absorbed into the phrases and the image. But in that, as the absorption and the metta grows, there also stops being any sense of self-referencing. It stops being me having metta for me, or you, or anyone. There's just metta. There's not this sense of me and other. And in that all-inclusive space, it doesn't feel exactly the same as emptiness, but it works the same way in which there stops being a sense of sakkaya-ditthi. No more sense of self-referencing. It's just metta and that's all.

Notice in those times how freeing it is. It's just like this. And how easily, how tricky—especially with internal formations like this, our mind or our awareness, whatever you want to call it, gets subtly seduced back into identifying in some way with the particular. Especially when it's a repetitive pattern, an internal formation, a repetitive personality pattern—you get caught up and identified with it.

So that ability to just recognize, "Oh, sadness is like this. Worthlessness is like this. Comparing is like this"—it might really be just empty space like that for a moment, just pure awareness receiving sensations. And then suddenly, it's very "me" again.

I noticed—and I'm sure there are many more—but I noticed a few ways that the attention gets tricked back into identifying again. I'll share my ways; I'm sure you've got your own.

One, of course, is when it's a difficult or unpleasant mental formation—comparing or fear or worthlessness or blame or jealousy, you name it. Of course we get tricked back into a personality view about it, relating to it out of aversion, out of wanting it to go away, out of thinking we need to fix it.

Another way we get tricked in is out of fascination with it. This is what was happening to me walking down the stairs that morning. And it can really seem like we're being dharmic about it—trying to figure out how this is arising in the moment, what arising experience is giving rise to this comparing. We're sort of being dharmic, but there's a way we're really clinging to the fascination of wanting to understand it so that I can understand how "I," great as I am, keep getting tricked back into believing in comparing. How does it arise? How does it go? But there's an identification in that moment, a sakaya-ditti around the formation, and grasping of wanting to understand.

And of course, the obvious one: getting caught up over and over in any particular thought form or aspect of the story. So I'm walking down the stairs, and just when I think I've got it all figured out and I'm not really identified—but this is just thinking about it, trying not to identify—and you think, "Yes, it's just comparing arising due to my old patterns from when I was a child," and you think you've got it all nicely managed, some new thought comes up: "But it's because it's that particular friend, and that really triggers me because..." And then you're really back in it again. Me, me, me. When can you just let the pattern be there, not about you at all? It's very tricky, very tricky.

So we explore where we get caught and how the mind gets tricked back into relating to any aspect of experience as sakaya-ditti. Those moments when there's just the pattern, just the formation, the sensations, the thoughts, the contact arising and passing, and there's no holding it together in our consciousness as a sense of me—just awareness receiving experience—that's really anatta. That's a moment of perceiving anatta.

And I just want to say this: in the moment that anatta is really the falling away of the sense of me, of any self-referencing, anatta is liberation from a false sense of self. It's really a moment of freedom.

But anatta is not a path of annihilation. It's not that we are looking to experience anatta out of hatred, self-hatred, or aversion to our experience—"Let me please just see the emptiness of this because I really hate what's happening." As if we're looking to let it just be experience being received in awareness because "I've got to get out of this." And sometimes that "I've got to get out of this" transfers into "I've got to get out of this whole life," this whole body-mind experience, in a negative way, in a way that's actually more identification. That's sakaya-ditti too—clinging to non-being.

But when there's that just seeing, really being with all the arising experience without referring any aspect of it, without making sakaya-ditti out of any of it—in that moment it really is the dissolving of the whole issue. The whole issue just goes away, and nothing needs to change. You don't have to get out of comparing. Whether it's a problem or not simply falls away.

But not if we're looking for anatta out of a sense of self-hatred or aversion to any experience. That's just more sakaya-ditti—having ourselves in reference to reacting to a particular experience with a sense of self.

So just exploring, just exploring how the sense of sakaya-ditti—relating to any aspect of experience as "this is mine," or "this experience is within me," or "I am within that experience"—notice how that arises. Notice the liberation from that, the freedom from that. Both are happening all the time. Just as I said, we're practicing sakaya-ditti a lot. But I don't want to leave it on that kind of downbeat. We also here are cultivating the path of practicing freedom from identity view, freedom from creating a sense of self.

So back to the suttas. There's one sutta where someone asked the Buddha, "How should one know, how should one see, for identity view to be abandoned?" And this is really one very succinct description of our path of practice. His answer: "Bhikkhu, when one knows and sees the eye as impermanent, in that moment identity view is abandoned." But he goes on: "When one then knows and sees forms—so there's the eye and there's forms, what the eye sees—when one knows and sees forms as impermanent, in that moment identity view is abandoned." And then eye consciousness: the eye and forms give rise to eye consciousness. When knowing turns to that...

When one sees eye consciousness is impermanent, identity view is abandoned. When all of these come together—there's your eye, there's a form, there's knowing, there's consciousness in that moment—that moment of actual seeing is called contact, sense contact. So he says then, when one knows and sees eye contact as impermanent, identity view is abandoned. And when one knows and sees whatever feeling, whatever vedana arises with eye contact as the condition—so there's the seeing, it's impermanent, you don't notice that, but it's really pleasant, and you notice that that pleasantness is impermanent—then identity view is abandoned.

And he goes, of course, through all the six sense doors: ear, sounds, ear consciousness, ear contact, the actual hearing, whatever feeling arises due to ear contact, hearing contact. Smell, taste, body—body and tactile phenomena, body consciousness, the contact when you're actually aware of feeling and whatever feeling arises. And the mind, the mind as a sense door, whatever mental phenomena arise—subtle mental phenomena or really gross thoughts, feelings, emotions, or subtle perceptions, whatever mental phenomena arise. The consciousness, the mental consciousness, and mind contact, which I think is really interesting, and whatever feeling arises.

I go through all of those because I think this points to a very subtle and very precise way that we can bring mindfulness into our practice here. It gives us a lot of choices, whatever in a moment is particularly obvious in our experience. So say there's a loud sound. It might not be that you notice the ear first and think, "Oh yes, the ear is impermanent." You may not have even noticed the consciousness of hearing, but you could be aware of contact. Right at that point of hearing, contact. And notice that that contact is impermanent. It's gone already. Maybe you don't notice the contact, but you notice, "Oh, that's an unpleasant sound, unpleasant." It's gone already. Unpleasant is impermanent.

With all the five physical senses—and personally I think to really bring the sense of noticing the impermanence in at the mind door is especially powerful. I was noticing just walking today, taking a walk, and paying attention to that moment of contact at the mind door, mental phenomena, and the point of contact. So say a little mood arises, no big deal. Can I just notice that point of contact when there's knowing of sadness, that first moment of really connecting? Oh, contact. And as soon as you notice, it's impermanent. As soon as you notice that contact, it's already changed. It doesn't mean the mood is gone, but it shifts slightly and there's another contact. Or the vedana that comes from it—you notice, "Oh, that's slightly unpleasant," and as soon as you're noticing unpleasant, it shifted and became neutral in that moment. You notice neutral, it shifts and went back to unpleasant.

This, of course, takes some mindfulness. It takes some continuity of mindfulness leading into samadhi. It's hard to see and notice on this level, especially of contact and vedana and impermanence, when we're so busy in daily life and so much stuff is coming in. If I were to go talk at CIMC in a couple of weeks in Cambridge, where people just come in from their daily life, and I start talking about noticing the moment of mental contact and how it's impermanent—people are running around crazy busy. What are you talking about? I'm lucky if I can notice I'm furious, never mind the moment of mental contact, the moment of vedana.

But here we are able to really cultivate the mind, to use our sati, our mindfulness, and the continuity of mindfulness to begin to see through our inverted perceptions, to begin to see more clearly. When we really bring in our mindfulness to the point of the sense door, to the point of the sense contact or the vedana, not to change it but just to notice its impermanence, this really begins to and deeply undercuts the whole habit of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Because when we're really cellularly experiencing the impermanence on this quick-changing level, you really just can't make too much of anything. Even the strongest, most habitual story about yourself or mood that you have or feeling in your body—when you are noticing on that point of contact, tactile sensation and contact with awareness changing, the sense of "it's me, this form is mine, this contact is mine"... by the time you've even gotten that formed, it's already changed. And it all just starts to become so much more ephemeral, so much less solid, so much more free.

As the Buddha said though, we have a tendency not to notice the impermanence of things. We know it intellectually. He talks about the inverted perceptions, the perversions of perception, where we tend to perceive what is impermanent and changing as permanent, what is unsatisfactory, what is unreliable, as happiness, as satisfactory.

What is not self, we perceive as self.

And on the level of anicca, impermanence—which is really what the Buddha keeps talking about in terms of seeing through sakkāya-diṭṭhi, what I just read—to really cellularly see through our habit of assuming permanence truly does take continuity of mindfulness. I feel personally that it's the lack of continuity of mindfulness that hides impermanence.

We all know everything's changing. But cellularly, we don't necessarily quite get it. Again, this is something the Dalai Lama said—I think it was at that same teaching. He said we think we understand long-term anicca. On some level we all really know, sort of, that we're going to die. We know that people are born, that they get sick and they die. They. When we get sick, well, we have to go through some dharma work to say, "Oh, you're right, I know that really happens. But to me, now?" But we all know that happens.

He says the tendency is to think—even with moods, even with something quicker—we think, "Well, this sensation, this unpleasant sensation, I know it's impermanent. It's going to go away." When? We tend to think it arises, it persists for a while, and then it goes away. It changes. That is inaccurate. That's assuming permanence. Where? In that "persists for a while." Nothing persists for a while, even that much. Nothing. He said impermanence means constant flux.

When we're thinking, "This is arising, my life is persisting for a while, and then it's going away"—and we do that—when we turn in here and look, what is persisting for a while? What has persisted just exactly the same for any two mind moments in a row, if we're really looking?

That's one of the distortions of perception that can happen in deep practice—one that can really flip us out for a while. There's nowhere to take a stand. There's nothing staying the same. And I need something, back to even if it's a suffering sense of me, at least it's familiar. I can land there.

When we really have a continuity of mindfulness, moment after moment after moment, you really start to see—and don't believe me, you can't, it really has to be from our own experience—but there isn't anything persisting. And at first, second, and third, we might hate that. No, I need something. But once that sense of me wanting something—that's also not persisting—goes away, it's just how it is. No problem.

This is why the continuity of sati is so important. Otherwise we see this pain, we pay attention to something else, we space out for a while, we go off into a daydream, and then we come back and, oh, there's the pain, and it's been the same. So we're assuming permanence. We don't notice that ten million things happened in there, and while you were lost in the daydream, you can't actually prove that that pain was there—you weren't aware of it. Like that question: if the tree falls in the forest and nobody's there, do you hear it? Don't think about that. But in your experience, the experience was not pain. The experience was you were off in Sumatra somewhere, hunting orangutans. And then you come back and, "Oh, this pain, it's been the same all day." You know, it changed in the night. "Oh, I see, there really is change. The pain went away."

That's why when we talk about continuity of mindfulness, it doesn't mean you don't space out. It's that willingness to just notice this moment, then this moment, then this moment. That's why noting as a tool is so immensely useful. When we're just noting—very quietly labeling whether it's rising and falling, or vibrating, thinking, unpleasant, contact, vibrating, tingling, color—you see that it's something different every moment. And then you realize you didn't note for a while, and you come back and start noting again. It brings you in much more moment to moment. It's possible to be that aware without noting, for sure.

But it's also easy to be saying, "Oh yes, I'm really aware of this pain. I'm aware of the body. I'm aware of awareness. And I'm receiving sensations in awareness. And I'm just feeling the pain." And it's all the same. It's a crock. It's pleasant, maybe. We're half experiencing stuff and half making it up. Which is why we don't know what's going on so often. When we're making it up, we're assuming—often in that assuming—permanence or some subtle sense of self. We're assuming something and we don't even know what.

We're just noticing, noting or not, but just connecting your awareness with each moment, each experience, whatever it is. That gives the space. You might say, "What do you mean space? Noting every moment, there's no space—that's why I hate it and I don't want to do it." But it actually gives the space for us to notice what's actually happening, rather than what we subtly think might be happening, or want to be happening, or how we analyze what's happening. We don't have a clue. If we could just notice the arising experience, moment after moment, it actually gives huge space. Because when that happens and when there's a sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi coming, we notice it. It's really obvious—that sense of contraction, that sense of self.

And through the steadiness of mindfulness is how samādhi, how concentration, develops. That stillness, that depth of observing power, really supports and strengthens and allows the observing power to get more and more subtle, to actually notice the moments of mind contact and how that changes as soon as you notice it. That's why we're so fortunate, really, to have the opportunity to practice like this. It doesn't mean anyone's practice should look any particular way, but we just have the opportunity to really cultivate the stillness and the observing power to begin to notice the changing nature of all our sense experience—the sense contact, the sense consciousness, and the vedanā that goes along with it.

Well, I have all these other great stories. Okay, two more.

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, in the form of the definition that I gave you—those twenty ways—is said in the Theravāda tradition to be dissipated at the first stage of enlightenment, personality view. And of course the question then arises: how come it seems to keep going? It doesn't seem to disappear. It seems like if that's all gone, one would be a complete arahant.

There's a sutta I've known about for years that's really fascinating, because even though those twenty ways of positing self or thinking some aspect of the aggregates is me—that can be seen through—and still it's so subtle. The tendency, the residual tendency to conceit, to the sense of comparing with others, that doesn't go until one's an arahant. The tendency, the subtle sense to grasp at any aspect of experience. The underlying tendency just to have the feeling of "I am." These are so subtle and so deeply rooted that even when you're seeing clearly the impermanence of all these things we mentioned, there can still arise some subtle sense of "I am" that you can't quite pin down.

So if that's happening to you, and you think, "But I'm past that by now"—don't lose heart.

There's this sutta where one monk, Khemaka is his name, and some other monks... he's very sick. I don't know why a lot of these monks were sick and old. Other monks came to him and they were asking him, "What's your experience?" And he said, "You know, I do not grasp at any of the aggregates as me or mine. I know I'm not form. I know I'm not perception. I know I'm not consciousness." He goes through all of them. And so they go back saying, "Oh, he's an arahant, he's an arahant." And then they come back to him. And he said, "No, I'm not."

He said, "I still have..." And this is very interesting. He said, "Even though I do not speak of feeling as 'I am,' or perception as 'I am,' I don't grasp any of these as 'I am'—there still lingers in me, there still is a residual feeling of 'I am' that arises. The notion 'I am' has not vanished in my experience. The feeling, the tendency, the notion 'I am' does arise as if this 'I am,' even though I don't say I am perception, I am form. There's still the habit of this feeling of 'I am' arising."

And as an example, he says, "Suppose there's the scent of a blue, red, or white lotus. Would one be speaking correctly if one would say the scent of the flower belongs to the petals, or the scent only belongs to the stalk, or it belongs only to the pistils?" And the monks say, "No, you'd have to say the scent is part of the whole flower."

And he said, it's exactly like that. I don't speak of form as I am, but I can't say I am is completely separate from form. I don't speak of perceptions or feeling as I am, but somehow the notion of I am, the underlying tendency to conceit, still tends to arise somehow within this field of mental and physical experience.

He couldn't really be more clear than that. I found that kind of heartening, because it explains why, I think, at times we've all practiced a lot and we've really seen deeply the impermanence of these things. There are times when you really know, I'm not identifying with this body, I'm not identifying with this emotion, I don't think I'm this perception. You really know it, but there's that whiff of I-ness hanging around. You really can't put your finger on it, but you can say, okay, I-ness is here. It feels like this.

And the practice isn't any different. It's not that we have to do something different. Again, Khemaka says, you just keep on dwelling, contemplating the rise and fall of the five aggregates subject to clinging. Just keep on noticing the impermanence of the things I mentioned—the five aggregates, the six senses, the sense doors, the sense objects, contact and feeling. Just keep noticing. That's all.

With saddhā, with trust, with faith, that as our perception gets clearer and clearer, we will no longer be sucked back, deluded back, into believing sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And that indefinable whiff of self that can drag us back into so much confusion and suffering will finally dissipate completely.

I want to close with one sutta about how fortunate we are to have these teachings and this practice, to have this time. This is a sutta to Anāthapiṇḍika. Anāthapiṇḍika was perhaps the biggest lay supporter, the most generous lay supporter of the Buddha in his lifetime, totally devoted—a layman, married with family. But he was said to have attained the first stage of awakening, and was incredibly generous.

In this sutta, he's very sick and basically dying. He asks for Sāriputta and Ānanda to come to him and give him teachings. They come and ask how he's doing, and he's in incredible pain in his body, in his head. So Sāriputta starts teaching him. It's a long teaching, I won't give you all of it, but it's very much in line with what we've been talking about tonight.

He starts out by saying, you should train yourself: I will not cling to the ear, I will not cling to the nose, I will not cling to the eye, I will not cling to the mind. He goes through all the sense doors. I will not cling to forms. I will not cling to eye consciousness. I will not cling to eye contact. Going through all these same things we just talked about. I will not cling to material form, to feeling, to all the aggregates—the kind of teachings that I was just sharing, that we all can explore every day in our practice.

And Sāriputta ends it with: I will not cling to what is seen, to what is heard, to what is sensed, to what is cognized, to what is encountered. I will not cling to what is sought after. I will not cling to what is examined by the mind. And my consciousness will not be dependent on that.

At this point, Anāthapiṇḍika started weeping. Sāriputta and Ānanda actually said, what's the matter? Are you sinking? Are you dying?

And he says, no. I have been waiting on the teacher and the bhikkhus for so long, for my whole life, and never have I heard such a teaching on the Dhamma as this, with such depth. It's so profound.

And Sāriputta says, yes, we don't give such deep talk on Dhamma to lay people, implying in a way that it's too hard for them to see. We give it to those who have gone forth.

And Anāthapiṇḍika says, well, please, let such talk on Dhamma be given to lay people. There are those who can see, those who can understand.

So profound and beautiful. And then they leave and he died, and of course was reborn as a deva and came and sang praises to Sāriputta and to the Buddha.

I get chills when I think of that—his weeping at the power of that teaching, saying, please let it be shared with lay people. And now, yes, almost all of us here are lay people and we have the opportunity not just to

You know, at the eye door, the ear door, the nose door, the mind door, the body door, the mouth door. See the impermanence. See where we're caught. See sakkāya-diṭṭhi arise and pass without needing to change it, without needing to do anything.

And just appreciate—appreciating our great good fortune in this life.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

May the beneficial energies of our practice be shared with all beings, in all realms, in all conditions. May our practice be the cause for their happiness and liberation from suffering.

CHAPTER 351

Using All Experience As The Path

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this intimate closing talk from a retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the crucial transition from intensive practice to daily life, exploring how the barrier between meditation and non-meditation can be dissolved. Drawing on teachings from Thich Nhat Hanh and the Dalai Lama, she examines sammā saṅkappa (right intention/right attitude) as a practical framework for bringing the dharma fully into our lives.

Wilson unpacks the three aspects of right intention taught by the Buddha: renunciation (non-greed), goodwill (mettā), and harmlessness (karuṇā/compassion). She explains how renunciation isn't about enforced asceticism but about cultivating inner contentment and freedom from the craving that colors all our perceptions. She explores how mettā practice allows us to meet whatever arises—internal or external—with friendliness rather than resistance, transforming obstacles into stepping stones for growth.

The talk offers profound insight into how suffering itself becomes a gateway to compassion. When we stop resisting our pain and truly allow ourselves to feel it, we naturally connect with the suffering of all beings. Wilson emphasizes that this is ongoing practice requiring the same commitment in daily life as on retreat—moment by moment, we have the choice to incline the mind toward wholesome states. As the Buddha taught, whatever the mind frequently reflects upon becomes its inclination, gradually transforming not just our inner life but our actions in the world.

I actually never thought during tea time that any of you would make it back into the hall again tonight. I'm really quite impressed.

We say this all the time, but I really mean it. This, in my mind, is one of the most valuable and important times of the retreat. It's the time that we tend to lose it, that we tend to start to notice—or maybe not notice—the barriers that come down and now retreat is over. We're getting on with our life, and it's just in this integration period that we can really start to examine and see how it is that we make these divisions in our mind. Not consciously, of course, but divisions between what's worth paying attention to and what isn't worth paying attention to, where we'll give our effort and where we don't think to give our effort, where it doesn't even occur to us to give our attention.

I personally find this moving from retreat to daily life, this particular coming out and beginning to talk, to be the most excruciatingly painful part of any retreat I've ever done. And that includes a lot of really painful, unpleasant stuff on retreat. I'm not saying this as, "Oh, you should expect horrendous stuff," but just that as excruciatingly painful as it is, over the years I'm finding it to be so rich with learning. A lot of the learning is that I don't even remember to pay attention and forty-five minutes later I wake up and think, "Oh, I've been talking for forty-five minutes, what have I said?" But I just want to say it's really a rich time.

So that's the message that we're always putting out. Meditation and life aren't separate. Meditation is about how we live our life. And the question then always comes up: well, how? I'm not going to give you the how and then you can go home and do it, because there is no one answer. But I want to talk some about that tonight.

Thich Nhat Hanh is great for talking about mindfulness in daily life in very simple terms. He says: "While sitting we practice intensively, and while we are not sitting we do not practice intensively. In fact, we practice non-practice intensively. There is a wall which separates the practice period and the non-practice period. How can we mix the two together? We must practice in a way that removes the barrier between practice and non-practice. When we walk in the meditation hall, we make careful steps very slowly. But when we go to the airport, we are quite another person. We walk very differently, less mindfully. So how can we practice at the airport and in the market? This is engaged Buddhism. Engaged Buddhism does not only mean to use Buddhism to solve social and political problems, protesting against the bombs and protesting against social injustice. First of all, we have to bring Buddhism into our daily lives."

I want to talk tonight about one aspect of our practice that I find very helpful in bringing practice, or Buddhism, into daily life. Just one aspect of many. And that is what is variously translated as right attitude, right intention, right thought, or right aspiration. Basically, it refers to a way of relating to our experience. As this way of relating to our experience becomes more infused into our being through attention to it, through working with it, we start to change our habit patterns and to act more from this way of being, from this relationship to our experience. We start to understand more what it means when we say that our life is becoming one with our spiritual practice. Or in other words, our life is our spiritual practice.

In and out of retreat, retreat is just, as you know, a microcosm of our daily life. It's the same mind. It's the same tendencies of grasping, the same tendencies of pushing away the unpleasant, the same tendencies of spacing out, getting confused. When we leave the protected retreat situation and go into our life, the situations are more complex, but the principles are the same.

Right attitude, right thought, can be looked at in the specific way of what that energy means in a meditation sitting on the pillow, and also in the larger context of our daily life. The Buddha talked about in his teachings an eightfold path that if we follow it will lead us to understanding, to liberation. Three steps of this path deal with our actions: right speech, right action, right livelihood. Three steps of the path deal with the actual cultivation of the mind, or meditation practice: right concentration, right effort, right mindfulness. And then two parts of the path deal with understanding: right understanding and right attitude. So that's where this concept of right attitude comes from.

When we talk about it here, it takes the form of right aim. This quality we've been talking about—of aiming the mind, the willingness to aim your attention directly at whatever arises in a moment—this is right thought, right intention, right aim. What it implies is a willingness to aim the attention directly without hesitation, without preferences. A willingness to fully meet whatever arises. Also a constancy—not, "Well, maybe I'll pay attention to this one, maybe I'll skip this one"—not giving in to preferences. Not a half-hearted kind of energy or attention, but a full meeting of whatever arises.

The implication in a larger situation, say a daily life situation, is the willingness to meet, to greet, whatever situation comes up in our life as practice, as an opportunity to learn and grow. In other words, not picking which situations we want to pay attention to and which ones we want to just try and get rid of.

A further implication of this willingness to use anything that comes our way—and everything that comes our way—as fodder for growth is a growing understanding, a really seeing, that happiness in one's life is not dependent on having a happy external situation. We're not waiting until everything around us is going smoothly and then we can be happy. Rather, happiness lies in our relationship to the situation. This is what we learn from working with right attitude.

I would imagine that almost everyone here, just during this period of practice, has had a time when you've been able to use a difficult situation as a teacher. It sounds strange when I say it, but so many times—and it never ceases to amaze me—people will come in and talk about some very unpleasant situation that's going on, either an internal emotional process, a series of memories, physical pain, or somebody that's driving them crazy, some noise that's going on, and they're really suffering from it. And either at that interview or the next one, they say with deep, heartfelt sincerity, "I've learned so much from this situation. I'm really glad that it happened"—even from incredibly difficult and painful situations in our lives.

This is one manifestation of right attitude. Not that we only want painful situations to learn from and we're trying to get rid of the pleasant. We can learn from the pleasant as well. But we don't need pleasant situations in order to be happy. In fact, we begin to see that you can be in the most idyllic situation possible and be miserable if the mind is caught in craving or aversion or simple confusion.

I remember one summer I spent in the most idyllic setting in England that one could imagine—a boathouse on a beautiful river on an incredible fairy-tale estate with swans gliding past. I was miserable. Something in me couldn't open to being there, and I couldn't acknowledge that I couldn't open to being there. What could have been the most beautiful setting one could imagine was just... I don't want to be here, this is boring, I feel like I'm in prison. It's got nothing to do with our external surroundings. This understanding is one manifestation of right attitude.

Another development as right attitude begins to unfold in our life is that it becomes a process through which we begin to grow clear about the real values in our life—our own real internal values. What's important to us on a very deep level? What is our life about?

Rather than going through life just reacting to situations that come to us, positive or negative, reacting out of the impulse of the moment—which is often an impulse of greed or aversion or delusion if we're not really paying much attention—rather than that, we get in touch with what our life is really about for us and what's important. That clarity, that commitment, begins to shine through in our actions, in the way we relate to life. It affects the choices we make. We begin to see that actually we do have choices—choices in what we do, in how we react to certain situations.

I see this at the end of retreats, even in the go-rounds like we have today. There are always a few people who are in the middle of a major life transition. This kind of transition can be one manifestation of a person coming to really grapple with what is truly important in their life. Sometimes that leads to major changes. It doesn't have to. What we're doing right now might be absolutely appropriate. But then we come to do it with more awareness, with more commitment, rather than a feeling of just having fallen into something because that's what came our way.

This leads to a great strength of purpose in our life. It gives us the opportunity and the willingness to use situations that come our way much more consciously—as manure to grow, rather than as something to just be gotten through.

Without this strength of attitude, this growing sense of clarity in ourselves, this beginning to align with what we really feel is important in our lives, difficult situations can drag us down much more easily. We stay lost for longer periods of time. The reactions of grasping, of pushing away, of delusion—they take over, and we identify much more easily in a difficult situation with our reactions.

Consider a simple situation: someone here who's making noise in the hall. Without that interest to just look at the suffering and see what this suffering is about—why am I suffering in this situation?—without that, it's much easier to identify with the reaction. Either the anger at the person, or the self-blame for feeling angry when we want to be filled with mettā, or self-pity, or spending energy in resistance to the situation altogether, or denial of one's feelings because we don't like them. If it's an unpleasant memory, how much energy can we spend just trying to rework that memory until we get it to come around so it's not quite so painful?

With right attitude, we take that energy and use it to meet the situation constructively. Not denying or moving away from the situation, but using that quality of right aim—meeting the reaction, the situation, just as it is, full on, with full attention. With this attitude of interested investigation, that's where we begin to see where the hooks are. What's going on in this situation that I'm getting so hooked into, that I'm suffering so much from?

Right attitude is often translated as right intention—intention meaning the aim of the mind, the inclination of the mind, what the mind inclines towards. It's considered a crucial link because intention is the forerunner of action. That's one of the reasons we emphasize it in the instructions. As our understanding deepens, it informs the way the mind inclines, and this then affects our actions. The quality of our actions actually begins to change as we give attention to the inclination of the mind, to right attitude. As our understanding deepens, it's reflected in a change in the way we act, in the way we live.

The Buddha, as I've said before, was very practical. While he repeatedly said that freedom comes when the tendencies to greed, hatred, and delusion are uprooted altogether through liberating insight, through deep seeing into the nature of reality, we also don't have to just sit and wait for this to happen. We don't have to say, "Oh well, I just have to be with greed, hatred, and delusion until they're uprooted altogether, and there's nothing I can do about it." He also recognized that we can work on the level of intention, on the level of thought. These seeds of greed, of hatred, of delusion—they surface in the inclination of mind.

They surface in the kinds of thoughts we have that then often lead to action—thoughts of really wanting something that then drive what we go to do, thoughts of anger or self-anger, thoughts of just spacing out.

At the same time that we continue to meet these thoughts with mindfulness, this is not at all a matter of saying, "These are bad, they've got to go." We meet them with clarity, with mindfulness, with acceptance. But at the same time that mindfulness is working to purify, we can also work to cultivate the wholesome counterpart of these unwholesome thoughts. And this is a very deliberate, conscious sort of practice. It's one that we can do sitting here, and it's one that is really quite helpful and strong in our daily life.

So first there's the mindfulness—being aware that, say, there's a lot of angry thoughts, and just being aware of that. Not "I'm bad, I'm angry, they've got to go." But then realizing that once there's that awareness, and the beginning of the purification that comes when there's awareness, we do often have a choice. At that moment when there's a lot of angry thoughts, we don't have to say, "Oh God, this is bad, it's got to go." Instead, we can deliberately work to cultivate the wholesome counterparts of those thoughts. And this is done with an attitude of acceptance and metta, of love—not an attitude of self-blame.

That we do have a choice is, I feel, a very powerful point of change, and one that we often don't recognize. Sometimes it feels like we don't have a choice. We're locked in the anger and that's it. But if we can acknowledge to ourselves that there is a possibility of transforming, of replacing this energy, we might find that there's much more capacity to do this, much more possibility, than we might expect.

The Buddha talked about three different ways to work with this, three specific types of right intention to cultivate. First is the intention of renunciation—cultivating thoughts of non-greed, which is basically to weaken intentions or inclinations of the mind towards greed, towards grasping. The second is intentions of goodwill, or metta, thoughts of metta. The third is intentions of harmlessness, cultivating thoughts of compassion. Both of these latter two—intentions of goodwill and harmlessness—work as antidotes to the energy of aversion or hatred. The energy of delusion is seen through more by understanding than by deliberately cultivating a different energy.

This is very practical, working on the principle that, as the Buddha said, whatever one reflects upon frequently becomes the inclination of the mind. It's very simple. If there's a lot of thoughts of anger, the more anger there is, the more that becomes the inclination of the mind. When we begin to work in ways that allow thoughts of metta or compassion to be present, the mind will begin to incline more in that direction. Just very simple and practical and direct.

I want to talk a little bit about each of these three intentions, and offer some suggestions for how to incline the mind in each direction. And I'm sure there are many other ways as well.

Renunciation—in other words, thoughts guided by non-greed. Non-greed is a positive quality, a quality of generosity, of freedom from clinging. Renunciation here does not mean enforced asceticism or being a monk. Renunciation is a word that has very strong associations in our culture. But it includes also, in this sense, a sense of inner contentment. Not necessarily that one has to live like a hermit, getting rid of everything, but more cultivating a sense of inner contentment. When we're not needing so much, when we're not so caught up in acquiring—which seems to lead only to more wanting and needing—there's space in the mind to appreciate what's present right here and now. A great ease, a great sense of happiness can come from that, a real kind of peace in the mind.

I feel it's really hard in this culture to begin to cultivate in ourselves a sense of renunciation, of non-greed, just because our culture is so geared in the other direction. It's so oriented towards having and acquiring and being something. But it was the same in the Buddha's time. He described his teaching as running contrary to the way of the world, because desire is the way of the world. Our world is organized to enhance desire.

Just look at a Sunday New York Times magazine section sometime. The first twenty pages are these incredible advertisements—in case you haven't seen them—incredible ads. I shudder to think how much they cost, these pages of ads for gold jewelry and lipstick and perfume and underwear and fur coats. I'm not particularly inclined toward any of that, but by the time I finish reading one of these sections, I'm going, "Wow, look at that dress! It's only $750 for the skirt." Oh, that's just the skirt. Well, you know, it looks really nice. The mind is easily swayed.

It's not in our culture to say, "Oh, I don't need that. That's okay, last year's skirt will do." When we talk about giving up things or working with non-greed, we tend to think of it as a form of suffering, as a kind of self-mortification. But that's not what I'm talking about at all.

This is a quotation from Lama Yeshe, a Tibetan lama who died several years ago: "Renunciation does not mean that we must give up happiness or that it is desirable to suffer. On the contrary, our aim is to achieve a state beyond suffering. But the aim of most of our daily lives is to try to satisfy each physical desire as it arises, day after day, month after month, year after year. We try to achieve happiness by perpetuating something that is essentially transitory. This expectation, stemming from a misconception, can never be fulfilled and is therefore totally irrational."

Renunciation isn't about getting rid of things so much, or withdrawing from the world and being a hermit. It's a turning away from the craving itself, not so much the objects—a turning away from the desire for gratification. And this beginning to turn away from the movement of craving can be tremendously aided by outer simplification, simply because the simplification gives us the space to see the craving.

That's exactly what is going on here in the retreat situation. You're in this situation of enforced outer simplicity. We've really taken away as much as we could possibly take away and not have a revolt on our hands. And so, look how much—a couple of people said they've been dealing so much with craving and desire in this retreat. That's great. That's part of what the setup is for, to have a chance to see it.

Working with this, the renunciation is outer and enforced, but not really, because you chose it. And that outer simplification then gives the space to look at the process of craving itself. Often one finds—I know it's my experience in retreat—at some point during the retreat, not the whole retreat, but at some point, in this simplified situation with so few things, I begin to see the craving. I begin to give up the wanting for many of the things I could have. I might quit eating so much, or say, "Well, I don't really need to go have tea today. It doesn't really matter."

And the space that opens up in the mind! I'm so much happier in this space of inner simplicity than I am when things are going fine in my life but I'm really caught up in the process of doing and having and wanting. The difference between being here, where you wear the same sweatpants for four days and finally laundry comes and then you can put them back on and no one cares and you don't care—there's just this real freedom in it. Compare that to going out where this doesn't look so nice and you need to buy something else to match with that, and what about these socks, and maybe if you had that color... It just breeds more wanting, more suffering.

So the simplicity, the renunciation of outer things, is helpful simply because it allows us to see that place inside of us where we can begin to renounce the craving itself. And this allows for appreciation of whatever is here right now to arise. This is such a powerful space—appreciation of what's here now. From Suzuki Roshi: "Renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of this world, but in accepting that they go away."

A couple of things have helped me in allowing the mind to begin to incline towards accepting that things of this world go away. One, of course, and always, is just this watching, this paying attention. When we pay attention to the wanting, to the things that we want, to the results of whether we get what we want or we don't get what we want, the unsatisfactoriness inherent in desire, in the wanting process, just becomes more and more clear. When you start really looking, it's almost impossible to avoid seeing this.

We see how wanting completely influences what we see, influences our relationship to the world, skews our perception completely. If you walk down a street and you're hungry, all you're going to see is pizza parlors. If you want a haircut, all you're going to see is beauty parlors. If you're feeling lonely and your relationship just ended and you go out, all you see is couples—because that's what you want. And the suffering from that is tremendous. If you go out and you're in a relationship and you're feeling really tied down, all you see is single people having a lot of fun. Two people in those situations could see the same crowd of people completely differently, colored by wanting.

When we are beginning to get more in touch with what it is that's really important in our life, what it is that we want to direct our energy and attention to, it helps us begin to sift through this maze of desire that our life often seems to be made up of—these objects of desire that arise constantly in our world. Because we're not just reacting spontaneously, going out there to desire, either getting it or not getting it, and suffering. We actually have the space in our mind to make a choice. "Well, yeah, there's that desire, but is that really where I want to spend my energy?" And we have the power of the mindfulness from the meditation practice to know that we can be with that desire without having to go crazy because we don't have to go out and get it. We can sit with it, it's unpleasant, and it will go away. We don't have to spend all our energy and all our vital force in madly satisfying desires. We don't get so sidetracked.

Working with this attitude of non-greed, this knowing that we have the space to make a choice, helps us move not just from making knee-jerk reactions, but to come out of a kind of comfort of dullness—the dullness of habit that we fall into so easily and don't even recognize we're in. It wakes us up. In each situation we can meet it on its own terms rather than just reacting from habit. But the force of habit is very strong, so without this interest to pay attention and this commitment to our intention in life, we might not even stop to realize that we're acting out of habit.

This is my favorite little comic—I got it off a friend's refrigerator. It's called "What's Your Philosophical Outlook?"

But I call it a right attitude quiz. So, you wander alone down a crowded city street, jostled in the bustle. Solitary yet surrounded, you think, "These people are..." and then this is the quiz. These people are: A, my brothers, my sisters; B, perverts, probably pickaxe murderers; C, I sure could go for a chili dog.

Two: Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse: A, I know what he feels—he feels hope, he feels fear; B, why is that pervert looking at me?; C, maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

And then it goes on and on through various situations. The last one being: Further down, construction workers are tearing the street to rubble. How symbolic, you marvel. It reminds me of: A, the path of life; B, the highway to hell; C, rocky road, my favorite flavor.

This is the force of habit in the mind. But when we're looking at it and willing to work, we have a choice. We can see these inclinations.

Another thing that's immensely helpful in working with this aspect of inclining the mind towards non-greed—and really in all the aspects of Right Attitude—is so obvious, but the power and depth of it has just been increasing in my sense of things through the years. That's this retreat versus non-retreat attitude, looking at the commitment that we bring in retreat to be present, to pay attention, to investigate what's happening, to open to what's happening, to use what's happening to learn. It's an immense amount of effort you've all been putting in here, an immense amount of commitment.

And somehow we all want to continue to grow in the same way in our lives. Of course it's incredibly difficult to put in that type of commitment. But over the years it keeps sinking into me—oh, but that's just as necessary in daily life. It doesn't matter what wonderful insights I've had on retreat. They do open and carry over. But five months later, in the middle of a difficult situation, I have to marshal my commitment, my interest, my energy to look, to pay attention right now. The energy I put in five months ago has some fruit in that I even want to pay attention right now and have the ability and the willingness to look—but I still have to look. I still have to bring the energy to pay attention now, in this situation, because now, this situation, is where the truth is to be seen and nowhere else.

It's a deep, powerful commitment that we all share, and I just find it deepening over the years, this willingness to bring the same energy into looking in our daily life. There are so many ways that once we're making this commitment and we are just open to seeing what's happening right now, all kinds of little ordinary events can wake us up and re-inspire us to pay attention, to use the situation to learn from rather than just drown in it.

You find when you start looking around like this that the fact of impermanence, the fact of not-self, the fact of unsatisfactoriness in things, in outer situations—these just seem to pop up everywhere when our eyes are opened and looking in that way. Just noticing the seasons change, noticing winter turning to spring, noticing fall turning to winter, and knowing inherent in the fall is the coming of spring, inherent in the coming of spring is the death of fall. Seeing dead animals on the road. Seeing a baby being born. A friend just brought a little puppy over next door, and just seeing that innocence, and seeing inherent in that the whole puppy growing and dying. It's amazing, the whole dance of life. And it's everywhere that we look.

When we start to see in this way, it re-inspires us with what our purpose is and that willingness to continue to use situations. It renews our energy and interest for investigation.

So, the second type of Right Attitude: freedom from ill will, or thoughts guided by mettā. Again, it's this openness to whatever situation is happening—being more able and willing to greet it with friendliness, with openness, rather than resistance or pushing it away. Both internal, which is a lot of what our practice here is about—just can we open to the experience that's happening right now?—as well as external.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh on how to deal with thoughts of mettā with our internal experience:

"I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with non-violence. We do not need to consider anger or hatred as enemies that we have to fight, to destroy or to annihilate. Dealing with anger in that way would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield, tearing yourself into parts. If you struggle in that way, you do violence to yourself. If you cannot be compassionate to yourself, you will not be able to be compassionate towards others."

So meeting whatever situation arises, not with judging or ill will, but with this open, friendly, caring attitude. A quality of mettā towards whatever arises in our experience. That's when different situations are no longer in our way—when something difficult happens, it's not just something to bear through until life can open up again. They are literally stepping stones for growth, opportunities to learn.

Namkhai Norbu, a Tibetan teacher, says that whatever arises in life as one's karmic vision is used as the path. Whatever arises, no exceptions. If you really think about that, that's a really powerful statement. No exceptions.

Whatever happens in our life is used as the path of understanding and freedom.

When I look back over my life—in retreat, out of retreat, it doesn't matter—I have to really honestly say that in the difficult times, the really difficult times, I've learned so much more because it inspires me to really pay attention, to really look. It hurts too much not to.

And I'm not saying that when the difficult time is there, I think, "Oh, I'm so glad this is here, now I can really learn." No, I mean it's difficult, it's suffering, it feels like one is lost. It just feels like being in the muck, and we can't wait until it's over. But when we have the willingness to look, it still feels like you're lost in the muck and can't wait until it's over—but the learning is still going on because of that commitment, that willingness to work with it as something to learn from, as our karmic vision at that time. And we can do this with anything, however minor, however seemingly overwhelming a situation we face in life.

I cut this clipping out of a local paper last year. It's a beautiful example of this. It says, "In Triumphant Return, Ex-Patient Takes Post at Mental Hospital. Forgiveness Paves Way After Misdiagnosis." It's a long article, so I'll just read a few things. Marie Balter was seventeen and clinically depressed when she was misdiagnosed as schizophrenic and placed in a state mental hospital, where she remained for another seventeen years. Since her release, Balter has earned a master's degree from Harvard, worked with psychiatric patients, lectured nationwide, and written an autobiography. Now, fittingly for a woman whose antidotes to adversity are perseverance and forgiveness, Balter has returned as a full-time administrator at the same hospital.

Some of her quotes: "I wouldn't have grown one bit if I didn't learn to forgive. If you don't forgive your parents or your children or yourself, you don't get beyond that anger. Forgiving is a way of reaching out from a bad past and heading out to a more positive future." She says she doesn't bear any resentment or anger over her misdiagnosis and seventeen-year hospitalization. She says it wasn't deliberate on the part of the doctors in the hospital—not much was known about panic disorders back then.

She had a long, slow recovery, but this power of forgiveness—and not just a kind of "I'll forgive and let myself be walked on." You can see from what she's done, it's a huge strength of moving through the situation, not getting stuck there, but being willing to use it as a springboard to learn. The power comes from this working with, inclining the mind towards thoughts of mettā, thoughts of forgiveness, thoughts of love, rather than dwelling in anger and hatred.

It's not about perfection. We're not talking about expecting that now we all have to go out and forgive the most horrible thing that ever happened to us. No, that's unrealistic. It's just about this willingness to see that in a moment when there's a really painful, angry thought, we might have the choice in that moment to generate some mettā. In the next moment there might be more deep pain and anger, and that's okay—we meet that. And then again, can we generate mettā in that moment? This is a powerful force for change in our lives.

It's like Don Juan—the Carlos Castañeda Don Juan—the differentiation he makes between a warrior and an ordinary person: a warrior sees everything as a challenge, and an ordinary person sees everything as a blessing or a curse. A real difference in inner attitude, a real difference in our life.

The third form of working with intentions, right attitude, are intentions of non-harming—in other words, thoughts that are guided by compassion. The contemplation, when we contemplate compassion from an intellectual point of view, is seeing how all beings wish to be free from suffering, and yet all beings still suffer in one way or another. This deepens in our lives to a real experience of compassion, partly through our own experiences of suffering—through the suffering that we are able to open to—and then that allows us to open to that same suffering in other people.

The Dalai Lama, who is considered the embodiment of compassion, said last fall that for the development of compassion, what is necessary is deep seeing into the pervasive suffering nature of existence and feeling the unbearableness of it. Otherwise, compassion is somewhat hypocritical.

That's a heavy statement, but actually I find it quite inspiring, because when we begin to open up—I mean, what's been going on here, you're all seeing deeply into the pervasive suffering that's inherent in existence. When we open to that, that's what opens us to compassion for others.

It's also very inspiring for me to remember this in the painful times, when you think you're just sitting with this unbearable knee pain and wonder, "What's the point of that?" You can always think, "Well, I'm seeing into the pervasive suffering nature of existence." And really, we are—when we're opening to it, when we're actually allowing ourselves to be with that pain. When we're fighting it, then we're closing ourselves to the pervasive suffering nature of existence.

How do we generate this sense of compassion, this ability to exchange oneself for others? Briefly, one thing I find helpful is beginning to notice how I relate to situations. The same situation—I can relate to it in a way that evokes a sense of interrelatedness between me and the whole situation, or I can relate to it in a way that's completely separating and alienating. And you can really do this with any situation. I'll take a difficult one, but not too difficult.

There's someone here who drives you crazy, what we call a "Vipassana Vendetta"—no matter what they do, it just rubs you the wrong way. The way they walk, the way they sit, where they eat, how they eat, what they wear—anything, you know, it just somehow drives you crazy.

There are two ways you can relate to this, and I can watch in a retreat how the mode of relating shifts back and forth. There's just a sense of "that person is driving me crazy, what are they doing here, why are they doing that, I wish they'd leave." Or "I'm such a horrible person—they're just trying the best they can and here I am sending all these hateful thoughts and probably really ruining their retreat." Either way, there's this sense of real separation—me and them and this situation that's intolerable and has to change.

It's very painful. Basically, it's an attitude of resistance.

When we can actually stop resisting the situation and allow ourselves to just feel the pain of it—not trying to figure out whose pain or who's right or who's wrong, but just feel the pain of it—in that moment, that's when the shift can come. Because often for me, allowing and feeling my own pain and no longer resisting moves into being in touch with and feeling the pain of the other person. Suddenly there's not this sense of me and them and something that's got to be done or gotten rid of, but the situation as a whole, a complete gestalt. And in that there's a sense of our interrelatedness, and the thoughts naturally become ones of compassion—for the pain in this part, the pain in that part. It's not really even two separate pains.

How often has it happened for people that a particular pain you have—say a knee pain or an emotional pain—has seemed very personal and very separating, so that the one in pain feels so alone and so apart from other people, whether it's grief or physical pain or illness? And suddenly there's an opening to allowing and being with that pain rather than resisting it. So often it then moves through into something larger—a feeling where personal suffering becomes a gateway, a key into the suffering of the world. A kind of knowing on a visceral level that we're all sharing in this suffering.

Often people will come in saying, "I'm just having this memory, it doesn't seem that intense, but I feel like I'm experiencing the suffering of the world." Suffering in this way, when we open to it, is a gateway into interrelatedness, into compassion. Beginning to observe our experiences in this way—noticing when we're separated, when we're seeing it more as a whole gestalt—really helps the mind begin to incline towards thoughts of non-harming, thoughts of compassion. Because when we're all connected, the thought of harming just doesn't make any sense. It doesn't even arise.

I went on a little. I could say more about non-harming, but I'll leave it for another time.

Just to emphasize: as with everything, working with right intention, right attitude, is a very rich and full practice. We can do it no matter what the situation, and it imbues our life with a whole other way of being, a richness that it doesn't have when we're just fighting with situations and wanting them to be different.

But it is a practice. We're not going to suddenly—or even not so suddenly—be perfect at it, become beings filled with nothing but mettā and compassion. The habits of the mind to incline towards greed, towards hatred, towards confusion are very deep. The power of conditioning is very deep. We don't just dislodge a thought of anger once and have it never come back, as we all know.

But as the Buddha said, what the mind thinks about, that's what it inclines towards. So the more often we open to working with right intention, the more we realize that there is that space of choice—and that space of choice is coming up moment by moment. In one moment we don't make the choice? That's okay. The next moment we have another choice. It's endless, really.

We begin to find that the mind does actually start to incline in different ways. Where one would have just been caught in resentment, suddenly there'll be a thought of, "Oh well, they can't help it. That's just their own confusion." You kind of go, "Where did that thought come from?" And then back in the resentment. But spaces begin to open up, and the mind really does start to change its propensity. This does begin to affect our actions.

It's hard work. It takes commitment. But what else is there to do with our life? And it's so rewarding.

The other thing one finds is that quite naturally we begin to discover we're not only working to purify and liberate our own separate being, our own separate mind. Because the more we're aware of the possibilities of working with our attitude and intention, the more we're aware that we aren't really a separate being and a separate mind. In working to liberate this being from suffering, that intention spreads more and more to all beings. We begin to touch more and more all beings with intentions of love and compassion.

I want to end with a quotation from the Dalai Lama:

"The question of real, lasting world peace concerns human beings, so basic human feelings are also at its root. Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. An atmosphere of peace must first be created within ourselves, then gradually expanded to include our families, our communities, and ultimately the whole planet."

And so this is what happens naturally when we're willing to give this attention and commitment to our lives.

CHAPTER 352

Spiritual Friendships

Carol Wilson · 1h01

In this talk from a long retreat at Insight Meditation Society, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that spiritual friendship (kalyāṇamittatā) is the most important external factor supporting awakening. Drawing from the Meghiya Sutta and other discourses, she demonstrates how the Buddha emphasized that association with admirable people naturally leads to the development of virtue (sīla), generosity, wise speech, persistent effort, and discerning wisdom into impermanence (aniccā).

Wilson explores the qualities that define a true spiritual friend: giving what is difficult to give, doing what is difficult to do, patiently enduring hardship, being open-hearted while keeping confidences, and remaining loyal in times of misfortune. She contrasts the corruption exemplified by the Enron executives with the selfless compassion of a Chechen surgeon who treated all patients regardless of affiliation, illustrating how we are deeply affected by those we spend time with—and equally important, how we affect others.

The talk addresses the practical challenge of maintaining wise association after intensive retreat, including the Buddha's teaching from the Quarrel at Kosambī about six memorable qualities that create harmony: bodily, verbal, and mental acts of loving-kindness, generosity, shared virtue, and right view. Wilson emphasizes that right view includes the willingness to examine whether our own minds are obsessed by self-partiality. Drawing on the Zen master Bankei, she points to how we create our own suffering through attachment to the 'me fantasy,' and encourages practitioners to recognize themselves as sources of light and wise friendship in a world desperately in need of such qualities.

So tonight I want to talk some about wise friendship, spiritual friendship—having wise friends and also being a wise friend. I'll mostly use things that the Buddha said and some stories from the time of the Buddha to show how important this is in our path of awakening.

"This was said by the Blessed One, so I have heard. With regard to external factors, I don't envision any other single factor like friendship with admirable people as doing so much for a bhikkhu in training who has not attained the goal but remains intent on the unsurpassed safety from bondage. A bhikkhu who is a friend with admirable people abandons what is unskillful and develops what is skillful."

That's quite a statement. I don't see any other external factor so important as friendship with the wise, friendship with the lovely. This is a theme that runs through the suttas quite a bit, and I want to expand on it.

Partly, I bring this up tonight because as we move from the world of intensive retreat and the depth and subtlety of our intensive practice, it's all about to change. We all know intensive practice isn't the whole ball of wax, but still, it can be quite delightful, quite subtle, and we can get caught trying to think of our life in the world in terms of intensive practice. I think that all of our path really is intensive practice.

I fell into this mistake for some years in my early years of practice—thinking that the life in between retreats was just coasting on the intensive retreat until the high ultimately crashed. And I hate to tell you, it will. Then I began suffering enough to go back to a retreat to get it again. It took a while—I'm a little slow—to figure out: oh, I have to pay attention in my life. My life is also practice.

But that doesn't mean noting your way through every moment of your life. Sometimes we think that's what we mean when we say, "My life is my practice." People seriously ask, "Do you note all day, every day?" No. There are many factors that we need to bring in to widen our myopic sense of what the path of awakening is about. Kamala talked about the perfections of heart and mind the other night. Tonight I want to focus on this area of spiritual friendship.

I think it really highlights the Buddha pointing to the fact that we are not separate. We can't live, we can't practice in isolation, really. We are so affected by everyone around us, the people we spend time with, the choices we make. And what's really important is that we also affect everyone around us.

In reading different things the Buddha said about the importance of this essential quality—seeking out and paying attention to who we choose to spend time with—it doesn't mean that we get rid of everybody who isn't perfect or something like that. It's more about the choices we make. If we have a choice to go hang out with people who aren't wise or to hang out with wise people, we pick the wise choice.

But even more, I want to emphasize what I feel so deeply myself: how desperately this world is in need of lovely friends, wise people, spiritual friends—kalyāṇamittas. I think it's part of our job to really become that for our friends, for the world. Not just waiting for the good friends to come and save us, but being part of that for others. That's really what we are becoming, what you are becoming. And so I also want to point out that you should appreciate this about yourselves.

No, we're not perfect. We still need to pay attention to what we're doing, to what arises in our minds and hearts, to how we act. But we shouldn't fall into a distorted perception of ourselves. Having spent all this time looking at greed, hatred, and delusion arising, looking at conceit arising, we're really quite tuned in to how much of that keeps arising. It's so easy to think, "Oh my God, three months, and I'm more deluded. I'm more filled with greed, more filled with craving than ever before. I see sakkāya-diṭṭhi all over the place." And wait until you start talking tomorrow—you'll really see it all over the place, personality view, that is. Yours.

And then we think, "How could I possibly be a wise friend to anybody? It's hopeless." That's an inverted, distorted perception. Appreciate the qualities that have naturally been cultivated in your wisdom and purification.

With that context in mind, I want to read you a sutta from the Buddha—really a story about the importance of wise friends in our life and in our spiritual practice.

This is a sutta where a young monk named Meghiya was coming back from alms round one day, and he saw a beautiful mango grove by the river. He thought, "What a charming spot. This would be a perfect place to go and meditate"—or the way he put it, "to exert myself in meditation." So he decided to go ask the Blessed One if he might do that.

He went to the Buddha, described how he saw this beautiful spot, and said, "It occurred to me how charming it is, the perfect place. So please, if the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to go and exert myself in meditation in the mango grove."

The Buddha said, "It would be better to stay here until there's another monk to go with you. Better not to go alone."

Meghiya asked him a second time and received the same answer. A third time he said, "Lord, you, the Blessed One, have nothing further to do, nothing further to add to what has been done. But I have something further to do, so please give me permission to go and exert myself in meditation in the mango grove."

Finally the Buddha said, "Well, if you talk about exertion, and if you talk about things to do, what can I say? Go."

So he goes, and as he's sitting there, he says that for the most part he was assailed by three kinds of unskillful thoughts: sensual thoughts, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of doing harm. The thought occurred to him, "How amazing, how awesome—even though I came here through faith, still I'm overpowered by these three kinds of unskillful thoughts."

It's really very human, isn't it? That's what I like about many of these stories—they quite humanize things.

So he got up, emerged from his seclusion, went back to the Buddha and said, "How amazing. I went with all this sincere intention and I was overwhelmed by thoughts of lust, thoughts of ill will, thoughts of cruelty."

The Buddha says, "Meghiya, in one whose mind still lacks maturity for liberation, five qualities can bring it to maturity. Which five? This is the case where a bhikkhu has admirable people as friends, as companions, as colleagues."

So in one whose mind is still lacking maturity for liberation, the first quality that brings it to maturity is having admirable or wholesome friends as colleagues, as companions. And then he says that when one has admirable people as friends, companions, and colleagues, it is to be expected that the other four qualities will be developed.

I'll mention them briefly. The salient point here is that having and spending time with other wholesome friends would naturally—one would expect it—bring out these skillful qualities in us.

The first of these qualities is to be virtuous, to dwell with wholesome virtue. The second is that it's expected we'll get to hear at will, easily and without difficulty, talk that is truly conducive to the opening of awareness. That is, talk on having few wants, on contentment, on seclusion, on non-entanglement, on arousing persistence, on virtue, on concentration, on discernment, on freedom. There's quite a few things one can talk about other than trivialities. It's not like there's nothing else to discuss but who's going to star in the movie. There's a lot, but we just have to find other people who are interested in these same things. And sometimes we can be that person who starts the conversation.

Also, when a bhikkhu has admirable people as friends, companions, and colleagues, the other quality that is expected to be developed is that persistence will be aroused for abandoning unskillful qualities and for taking on skillful qualities. It's really this sense that we're contagious. When we're with someone who really has a lot of skillful qualities, who manifests compassion, who manifests caring, who manifests non-greed, it inspires those qualities in us. It reminds us of them.

The last he mentions is that when a monk has admirable people as friends, it is to be expected that he will become discerning—endowed with a discernment of impermanence, of arising and passing away.

In all the different suttas I've read, where the Buddha is talking about wise friendship in one who's on the path of awakening, it's not only that it's nice or good for us. It always takes us all the way to freedom. It always starts with friendship and ends up in one form or another with discerning wisdom, with freedom. So it's really a powerful thing. It's not just about how to have a nice life. It's really about what's onward leading in our life to the path of awakening.

Then he briefly talks about ways that a person who's established with friends and with these five qualities cultivates different forms of meditation and contemplation: contemplation of the unattractive to abandon lust, goodwill to abandon ill will—that's basically metta—mindfulness of in and out breathing to cut off distractive thought, and the perception of impermanence, which uproots the conceit, the māna of "I am."

So just in this short sutta, he moves from "don't think you can just go off and do it alone, but find some wise friends to support you" all the way to liberation.

What really inspired me to talk about this—I first talked about it a few weeks ago at the Forest Refuge—was more the sense of urgency for this world. For us to really go out and share with the world who we are, who you are: the discerning wisdom, the skillful virtue, the hearts of metta and generosity, the deep faith and confidence that these are ways of being in life. Not perfectly, not one hundred percent, but really having seen the power of metta, of generosity, of wisdom, so that we don't have to automatically fall back into the train of the common day-to-day way of thinking.

What motivated me to talk about this was that I often listen to NPR in the morning, and in the space of a week I heard interviews with the authors of two different books. It really made me reflect on what makes people so different from one another.

The first was the authors of a book called The Smartest Guys in the Room, which is about the main people involved in Enron—the executive directors and the high-up people. This book charted how they did the whole scam. "The smartest guys in the room" refers to these people so drunk on their own success, so ambitious, so certain of their own brilliance, that they basically felt they could get away with anything. And for many years, apparently, they did—by changing the books, cooking the books, getting banks to support them. This sense of real creativity, real energy, real brilliance, completely in the service of greed and self-interest and conceit. "Everyone else is too stupid to catch on to what we're doing."

How often in the world that kind of brilliance is seen as intelligence that leads to power worth having.

And really I thought, "God, these guys had no clue of generosity or virtue, of sila, of morality, of kindness, of metta, of karma." I mean, really clueless. And if they hadn't gotten caught, they would still be thinking they were the smartest guys in the room, and everyone around agreeing with them.

And then a couple of days later, I heard the interview with the surgeon I mentioned—I think it was last week—Hassan Bayev, the Chechen surgeon who went from Moscow to work in the hospital in Chechnya for six years for nothing, the only surgeon in the city. As I said, he treated everybody—Russians, Chechens, civilians, military—even at very great risk to his own life. He was attacked and everything.

The interview was actually with him, and he just had that simplicity of a really pure heart. He tended to say, "Well, what else could one do? I took an oath as a surgeon. Of course I had to treat everybody." People would challenge him—"Yeah, people kill, but..." And he would say, "It's really important. I'm a doctor. No, you can't refuse."

And you know how it is when you're in the company of, or just hearing, somebody speaking from that level of compassion, that level of sila really in their life, that level of commitment and courage. It's incredibly inspiring. Why is it inspiring? Because it touches those qualities in ourselves. Otherwise, it wouldn't be inspiring. I don't know how these Enron guys would really think, but maybe they'd hear about him and say, "God, what a jerk. He could have kept making a lot of money in his plastic surgery practice in Moscow, and instead he goes there."

But when the qualities of compassion, of wisdom, of courageous effort, of sila, of generosity—when they're awake in us, when they're there to be touched, then it doesn't take much to touch them, to open them up, to bring them out in us. That's what's beautiful about being around, or even just reading about, or hearing about such people. We may live somewhere where we don't know anybody that is really inspiring, but we have so much available to us. We don't have to know people personally. I get tons of inspiration from books, from reading articles, from hearing on the radio—all kinds of people, so-called ordinary people. It doesn't have to be some famous person. Just the essential goodness of people brings that out in us.

That's really why I thought of talking about this. I want to share now a few different ways the Buddha talks about what a good friend is, so we can pay attention to that in others but also cultivate it in ourselves. Because surely, these qualities are here and deep in all of you, in all of us. And like everything, we have to keep paying attention. We have to keep making choices. We still have to feel drawn to virtue rather than greed. We have to feel drawn to appreciate the discernment that comes with really knowing impermanence, rather than saying, "Ah, it's just too painful to stay open to this dharma. I wish I could just go back to delusion." Some days it's like that.

But to make the choice—anyway, you can't forget about it. It's too late; there's no point even trying. But to consciously make the choice not to is much more empowering.

Another way the Buddha describes what friendship with the lovely does is this: "I know of no one single thing of such power to cause the arising of good states not arisen, or the waning of evil states already arisen, as friendship with the lovely." That's in his very practical way of speaking about things. And of course, much of who he's talking to is monks, and often when he's talking about sila or morality, he's talking about the whole set of monks' and nuns' rules. But it's not only in that relatively rarefied realm that he's speaking.

Here's a lovely list I came across, of seven qualities of a friend: "A friend should be followed when she possesses seven factors. What seven? She gives what is difficult to give. She does what is difficult to do. She patiently endures what is difficult to endure. She reveals her own secrets—is open-hearted. She keeps one's secrets—so is trustworthy. She does not abandon one when one is in misfortune, and does not despise one because of one's loss. A friend should be followed when she possesses these seven qualities."

And those are qualities of a really good friend, aren't they? Nothing esoteric, nothing that you have to be in robes to appreciate—just very much based on kindness, friendliness, morality, and simple caring, heart-to-heart caring. That's really what the Buddha's talking about.

One other place where he's talking specifically to householders: Sometimes he would give specific discourses to householders who would come and say, "We have no interest in ordaining. We want to live a happy and wholesome household life"—basically asking him to tone it down.

And he often did. So in this particular one, he's talking about four things that lead to the welfare and happiness of a family person. And the first one, guess what? Good friendship. And then he says what entails good friendship is finding a friend who has accomplishments in faith, virtue, morality, generosity, and wisdom. So it's these basic qualities he talks about over and over.

Faith—he really means faith in Buddhadharma, but we could expand it to faith in the wholesome, faith in awakening, faith in the potential for purification of our hearts and minds from greed and hatred and delusion. Virtue, obvious. Generosity, we've talked about a lot. And wisdom, again. When he talks about wisdom, even in household ways, the level of wisdom he talks about always reaches up to the point of seeing into and understanding the arising and passing away of things. So basically, if we come to really understand in our own experience the truth of anicca, the truth of impermanence—and sure, that can go deeper and deeper and deeper, don't start thinking, "I've got to have some state of seeing into anicca and that's it"—but just more and more seeing and understanding that truth, it will naturally continue to lead us into deeper and deeper wisdom.

So these qualities of friendship are both quite natural, and they also can be cultivated and developed to great depth. And that's, I really feel, a great part of the practice that we're called to in our daily life. Of course we continue with our formal meditation practice, and we'll talk a lot about that. But this sense of really honoring our potential as a source of light in the world, as a spiritual friend in the world, and consciously seeking out others because that supports us in the same way—it takes commitment. It takes dedication. It takes resolve. Because as the Buddha said, his way of teaching, the way of his path, runs upstream to the stream of common society. That was true then, and it's true now. It's not a judgment. It's just a statement of how things are.

Someone expressed this to me at the Forest Refuge last month, a friend who had been just coming to the end of five months of retreat at that time. She was, you know, as you all are two months in, in a very refined and pure state. And she came in one day saying how she saw so deeply how important our effect on one another is, how important who we spend time with is. She said, "I really see that there really is some purity in my mind stream, in my heart. And I can feel so deeply how much it's affected by the people I choose to be around." She said, "If I hang out with wise people, with good companions—we don't have to be arahants, just basically good people—I really see that they call out the skillful qualities in me that maybe are dormant or near the surface, but they call them out by inspiration, and I call it out in them."

But she also noticed that if she tends to, just out of inertia really, choose to go hang out with unwise companions, then not only does it not encourage the wholesome, the skillful qualities in her, but she finds that she starts to kind of fall into their train and starts—not talking about really bad stuff, but we just get more careless. We get more lazy. We start following with inertia and do things that just aren't really so helpful.

And again, remembering in this context, this isn't about judging. It's not to say if you go to work and the people you work with aren't so wise or aren't so good, you should say, "I'm quitting." It's not that. That's the place where we have to really call on our commitment to awakening, our commitment to metta, our commitment to generosity and openheartedness to be the lovely friend at that point, rather than just abandon it and say, "Well, it's easier to go with the flow."

I remember when, after my first retreat years ago, a long time ago, I didn't really understand much about Buddhadharma. I was only nineteen. But it really changed my life. And I felt just spontaneously when I came home—I just lost all interest. I was nineteen, remember. I lost all interest in hanging out and going to bars and things like that. And it wasn't a judgment trip. It wasn't that I thought, "Oh, these are the precepts and I have to follow them to be a good Buddhist." It was nothing like that. It was just that that sense of enjoyment from that kind of activity had fallen away, and I was awake enough to be aware of that. It also meant at times I didn't hang out with my friends because that's what they wanted to do. So there were plenty of times of choice. I'd just want to sit home alone. And sometimes, yeah.

And that was actually quite peaceful and fine. It was actually a very happy year, as I remember it back in that haze of memory.

And sometimes not. Sometimes I'd think, "Oh, but I'm being stuck up or I'm being too standoffish—I'll just go out tonight." And if I paid attention—and this is the key, the reference point the Buddha gives us over and over and over—there are actions to be performed and actions to be avoided, speech to be performed and speech to be avoided, thoughts to think and thoughts to be avoided.

And what's the reference? That which increases skillful states already arisen or brings about skillful states not yet arisen—that's to be followed. Actions and speech that bring about an increase in unwholesome states or bring up unwholesome states that weren't there before—well, that's to be avoided.

It's not rocket science. It's not about adhering to some set of rules or pleasing someone else. It's very specifically and experientially tuned into what creates more peace and happiness and harmony in my heart and in my surroundings, and what creates more suffering. Here and now.

And it doesn't mean the activity is intrinsically bad. If it brings up more confusion, more greed, more anger, then it's something we have a choice about. Don't do it. That's all.

And so I would find I'd go out with my friends and go to some bar, and halfway through I'd be like, "What am I doing here?" Have you ever been in that situation? What am I doing here? And it's not their fault. They're having fun. Fine. Let them have fun.

That took a while to learn. I remember, actually, I was on staff here—I forget which time, I think it was in '78—and sometimes we as staff used to get together and go out to movies. It's like an hour drive to any movie from here. And we'd always go six in the car, the pack mentality, because we didn't have many cars then, and it was a big deal.

I remember I'd go just to be with everybody, and I liked movies. But I found that if I went out more than one night a week, I was just exhausted. I couldn't do it. And then I stopped even enjoying all that. It was just so much effort to go to some stupid movie.

And I remember when I really got it—that I could tune into what was true for me more than going with the pack. We were starting out in the car, got to the end of the driveway, and I said, "Wait a minute, stop, let me out!" I finally realized it before I got all the way to Northampton and asked, "What am I doing here?" Oh, yeah—I don't need to do this.

And it was so freeing, because nobody cared. It didn't hurt anybody's feelings. And it was a really positive commitment to what's really true—what's liberating, what's bringing about more skillfulness in my own experience, more wholesomeness. So it can just be little things.

And in little ways, we're all models for each other. But we have to commit ourselves. Really. And it's over and over and over.

I know sometimes it's a hard teaching, saying that who we choose to spend time with has such an effect on us, just as we have such an effect on others. We can so easily fall into this better-or-worse judgment, good and bad kind of thing about people. And it isn't that.

We all know in ourselves there are times when we're the deluded, aversive person and we really need a lovely friend to remind us there's another way. There are times when we might be the lovely friend and someone else is deluded and aversive. But to notice the fact that we are completely not separate, and we do have a huge effect on one another—

This is a little poem from the Buddha:

Even if you do no harm, but seek out one who does, you're suspected of harm. Your bad reputation grows. The sort of person you make a friend, the sort you seek out, that's the sort you yourself become. Where you're living together is like that.

The one associated with, the one who associates, the one who's touched, the one who touches another—like an arrow smeared with poison contaminates the quiver.

A man who wraps rotting fish in a blade of kusa grass makes the grass smelly. So it is if you seek out fools. But a person who wraps powdered incense in the leaf of a tree makes the leaf fragrant. So it is if you seek out the wise.

The Buddha goes on to say simply: seek out wise people, seek out lovely people. That sense of conditioning is so strong—we need a healthy respect for it. I think more than anything in these thirty years, every year my respect for the power of our habits of mind and heart grows. That's not meant to be discouraging. It's simply to have a healthy respect and to pay attention to all the different ways of training the Buddha offers, and to use them all in our life.

There are a couple of incidents where the Buddha gave other examples of qualities to cultivate in being a wise friend. There's one story I particularly like—another one that makes it all very human—called "The Quarrel at Kosambi."

At Kosambi, there was a large group of monks living together. What started as a very minor disagreement between two of them grew into a huge quarrel that caused a schism in the sangha, and then the whole lay community began to get involved and take sides.

I find it amusing, just because human nature often amuses me, and also because it's so recognizable. You can just hear any of us getting this petty—well, maybe I'm projecting. It was two bhikkhus, one of whom was an expert in the discipline, in the Vinaya, and the other was a teacher of the discourses. These weren't slacker bhikkhus. These were serious practicing monks.

What started the quarrel was this: the teacher of the discourses committed some very minor offense—of all the rules, some minor infraction. The scholar of discipline pointed it out, saying, "That's an offense you committed." And the second one said, "Oh, I didn't know it. Okay, I'll go and say the confession, ask forgiveness right away." No problem. But then the scholar of discipline said to him, "Well, if you didn't know it was an offense, then it's okay—it's not an offense." So the second monk went away thinking he hadn't committed an offense after all.

Very complicated, right? Basically, it's this very nitpicky thing. But then the discipline scholar went around saying, "He committed an offense and he doesn't even know when he commits offenses. He's a no-good monk." And the second monk said, "No, he told me it wasn't an offense, and now he's saying it is. He's a liar."

You see how it started from such a little thing, and it grew and grew until it was this huge argument, this fight going on, and the laypeople were getting involved, saying, "We can't respect these bhikkhus if they fight and squabble like this."

Finally the Buddha came to try to talk to these monks. At some point—I'm just picking the pithy parts—he says:

"Bhikkhus, when you take to quarreling and brawling and are deep in disputes, stabbing each other with verbal daggers, on that occasion you do not maintain acts of loving-kindness by body, speech, and mind. Misguided men, what can you possibly know? What can you see that you take to quarreling and brawling, stabbing each other with verbal daggers? You can neither convince each other nor be convinced by others. You can neither persuade each other nor be persuaded by others. Misguided men, this will lead to your harm and suffering for a long time."

He's basically saying: What are you thinking? What do you see that takes you to that?

Then he gave them a list of six memorable qualities, which I'll go into in a minute. But I just want to say how this ended. It says in some of the discourses that at first these bhikkhus heard him out, and then they said, "You know, Blessed One, don't bother yourself with this. You go off and we'll deal with it."

They didn't want to hear him. Can you imagine? We're so into our views and opinions that the Buddha comes and says, "This is the way to live in concord," and they say, "Blessed One, don't bother yourself." It's said that he went off and remarked, "It's impossible to make them see. These misguided men seem obsessed." And he went away and came back another time.

So just so you know, it wasn't always easy then, and they even had a Buddha to talk to. It's no wonder we get obsessed and caught up. We do.

So: six memorable qualities that create love and respect and conduce to helpfulness, to non-dispute, to concord, and to unity. They're nothing we haven't heard a million times, but these are the six the Buddha picked, so I want to emphasize them again.

One maintains bodily acts of loving kindness, both in public and in private, towards one's companions in the holy life. One maintains verbal acts of loving kindness, both in public and in private, towards one's companions. And one maintains mental acts of loving kindness, both in public and in private. Already that's huge, right? It's not that we're going to be perfect in that, but to really take it as a practice—this is truly a way one can aspire to live.

The next quality is basically generosity: that one uses things in common with one's companions in the holy life, with friends, without reserving things for me. One shares any kind of gain that comes to one that's in accord with the Dhamma. Just sharing freely with our friends, with our companions, with our family, with whoever in the holy life.

The next one is basically sila. The Buddha says—and this is speaking to bhikkhus, but it also applies to us—one dwells both in public and in private, possessing in common with companions in the life virtues that are unbroken, unblemished, commended by the wise, not misunderstood. In other words, a commitment to sila, to non-harming.

And the sixth is dwelling both in public and in private, possessing in common with one's companions in the holy life a view that is emancipating, that leads one to practice in accordance with that view, that one will continue to practice to the destruction of suffering. This is a memorable quality.

Of course, the Buddha goes on to say that of these six qualities, the most comprehensive, the most conclusive is this quality of wise view, right view. Even here, where he's talking about the qualities that allow us to live together in unity, in concord, in helpfulness, in non-dispute—it comes to right view. Again, the view of understanding arising and passing away, of understanding that things are impermanent.

And this is the thing I love most about this sutta: he goes on to say, how does this view that is noble and emancipating lead the one who practices in accordance with it to the complete destruction of suffering?

Imagine he's talking to some people that are totally locked in recrimination and anger with each other about their conflicting views. They are sure they're right. They can't hear each other. They don't want to hear each other. And this is how the Buddha says we use wise view in this case—and this is so applicable to any of us in our lives.

One uses this view: one goes to the forest or to the root of a tree or to an empty hut—or to the little corner of your room, or if you're at work and really busy, go to the toilet. Just go somewhere for a few minutes and be quiet and consider thus: Is there some obsession unabandoned in myself that might so obsess my mind that I cannot know or see things as they actually are?

Is this what we tend to do when we're really locked in anger and sure the other person's wrong and we're right? Do we go off and sit and say, "Is there an obsession unabandoned in my mind that's preventing me from seeing things as they actually are?"

This is powerful stuff, and this is possible for us. Not so much telling the other person to go look and see what obsession is keeping their mind from seeing things as they actually are—that's more what we'd like to do. But really go and look and see for ourselves.

The Buddha gives a list of some of the things that obsess our mind. If one is obsessed by sensual lust, just wanting, the mind is obsessed. If one is obsessed by sloth and torpor, the mind is obsessed. By restlessness and remorse, by doubt. If one is absorbed in speculation about this world, the mind is obsessed. If one is absorbed in speculation about the other world, the mind is obsessed. And this encompasses quite a bit. If one takes to quarreling and brawling and is deep in disputes, stabbing others with verbal daggers, then the mind is obsessed. He didn't really give the option that maybe you're right and the other person's obsessed—not if we're that locked in.

Simply having a commitment to this wise view, we take ourselves off and go look. This is so inspiring to me. It's not about expecting to be perfect. It's about that commitment to practice, to honesty, to sincerity of intention—to really looking at what's present and what's absent in the mind stream, in the heart, right now. Is it possible that there's some obsession present that's really preventing my seeing and understanding clearly in this situation?

What's amazing is how hard it can be to notice. You all know that. And then we notice it, and it's like, "Oh my God, the elephant in the room. Oh yeah—total self-righteousness." It's possible that might slightly skew my perception in the present moment experience. It's a really powerful practice. Our mind does get obsessed so easily.

I want to read a couple of lines from Bankei, who was a Zen master in Japan in the 1600s—about how easily our mind gets obsessed in thought, in emotions. He cuts right through.

He says, "Your self-partiality is at the root of all your illusions. There aren't any illusions when you don't have this preference for yourself."

"If the men sitting next to you start quarreling, it may be quite easy for you to tell which of the disputants is in the right and which is in the wrong, because you're not involved yourself. You're a bystander, so you can keep a cool head. But what if you do have a part in it? Then you take your own side and oppose the other fellow. As you fight with each other, you transform your Buddha minds into fighting spirits."

This is when our mind and heart gets obsessed.

And then here's another, more specific example. He's talking to a monk who comes to Bankei and says, "I was born with a short temper. It's always flaring up. My master at home has told me time and again to get rid of it, but it hasn't done any good. I'm born with a bad temper. No matter how hard I try, I can't get rid of it. So I've come to you hoping that you'll cure me with your teaching, and then I can go back."

Bankei is very straightforward. He says, "That's an interesting inheritance you have. Is your temper here now? Bring it out and I'll cure it for you."

The monk says, "Well, I'm not angry now. My temper comes out unexpectedly when something provokes me."

Bankei says, "Well, then you weren't born with it, were you? You create it yourself when some pretext or other appears to happen. You work yourself into a temper because of your partiality for yourself, opposing others in order to have your own way." And he says, "Each person receives Buddha mind from his parents when he's born. His illusion is something he produces all alone by being partial to himself."

Now, this is moment to moment. It's foolish to think that it's inherent—and that's what's freeing. Not to think that our delusion, our illusion is inherent and we're stuck with it. The fact that it's being produced every moment, or many moments, means there are also moments when it's not being produced.

He says, "When you don't produce your temper, where is it? All illusions are the same. As long as you don't produce them, they don't exist. That's what everyone fails to realize."

"You create your outbursts of temper," he's now talking to this monk again, "when the organs of your six senses—vision, hearing, smell, taste, touch, and faculty of mind—are stimulated by some external condition and incite you to oppose other people because you desire to assert your own preciously held ideas. When you have no attachment to self, there are no illusions."

Not that we're living in the perfection of this—and not to grasp that as another idea of how it should be—but as a pointer, a direction of practice. Just to hold the possibility: when we're in conflict internally, externally, or both, to check in, to look really honestly, to trust our sincerity of attention and see—is the heart obsessed? Is the mind obsessed? Is there a partiality to myself creating illusion right now? Not something we can think through, of course, but something we can tune into.

Another statement from Bankei: "Don't set yourself into confrontation with things." So it's not even argument with another person, but that sense of—can I just be so present with things as they are in this moment, without moving to-ing or fro-ing? Then, without that illusion, that partiality of self, perhaps one can see more clearly, perceive more clearly, be more present to what's really going on.

Someone shared with me this saying from Shantideva that she was using as a kind of daily practice on retreat: "Since all fear, stress, and harm are consequences of the commitment to the me fantasy, can I afford to entertain this fantasy even for a moment?"

It's not a should. It's a sense of really seeing. Since all fear, stress, and harm are consequences of the commitment to the me fantasy in any moment, can I really afford to entertain this fantasy even for a moment?

Just explore that in these days here—not as a judgment, but noticing: when I'm really entertaining the me fantasy, is that conducive to wholesome states arising, or is it conducive to suffering states arising? And if you find it's conducive to wholesome states arising, then go for it by all means. If you find it's conducive to suffering states arising, don't get into judging it. But when we see that clearly, that's when the heart and mind begins to naturally let go.

Because we're really not stupid. We don't really want to suffer. We just need to commit, to have that sincerity of intention, that resolution to explore, to use that guideline of the Buddha: whatever thought, speech, or action leads to more suffering, to unwholesome states arising, these are to be avoided. Whatever thought, speech, or action leads to more wholesome states—

Non-greed, metta, compassion, generosity, sila, discerning wisdom—then by all means, that's to be followed. Simply a guideline. Not to judge ourselves about perfection, not to try and get upset every time we fall short.

I remember the Dalai Lama saying that when we look at whether to have faith in our practice, we can trust the sincerity of our intentions. And that sincerity of intention—we can renew that, commit to that in each new moment. "Okay, so last time I made the choice that increased my suffering." Seeing that with the mind and heart not obsessed, not partial to myself, it's like, "Oh yeah, that really didn't work, did it?" It allows for something new to emerge, for a movement towards wholesomeness, towards happiness, towards compassion, towards metta in the next moment. And that's always a possibility. We're not locked in. The habits are strong, yes, but mindfulness, generosity, sila, wisdom—it's much stronger. Much stronger.

A teacher of mine used to say, "One spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies." And you'll see that. You struggle and struggle and struggle, and then you have that one good sitting, or just one moment—a flash of insight. Have you noticed how that keeps you going for days, for weeks? It's a good thing that a spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies. It's so much stronger than conditioning that it doesn't take as many moments—thank the good Lord—but it takes recommitting over and over to free our hearts and minds from obsessive sufferings.

There's just time for one other story. On a more positive note, it's said in some of the commentaries for the Vinaya that actually, when the Buddha left those recalcitrant monks in Kosambi—saying, "These poor guys are obsessed, I'm out of here"—he wandered off and came to the park of the Gosinga Sala tree wood, where three very well-known monks were living together. I think these monks were Arahats at this time: Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbilla. And they were living together in great harmony, in great peace. So it's like the other side, the photographic negative of the story before.

The Buddha comes and says to them, "Oh, you're living together, living in concord with mutual appreciation, blending like milk and water, viewing each other with kindly eyes. How do you do it, Anuruddha?"

I'll just share a few things they say. Anuruddha responds, "I think it's a gain for me, it's a great gain for me, that I am living with such companions in the holy life." So he maintains bodily, verbal, and mental acts of loving-kindness towards them, openly and privately. He says, "I consider, why should I not set aside what I wish to do and do what these venerable ones wish to do? And so then I set aside what I wish to do and I do what these ones wish to do." And then the other two say the same thing.

There's this lovely little paragraph where they're describing their daily rounds together, their life in community. I was reading this at the refuge, and a friend who was a monk—he just disrobed, had been there for some time, but had also been in Asia as a monk—he loved it because it just brought back the flavor of what life in a monastery in Asia is actually like.

So the Buddha says, "How do you abide?" And Anuruddha says, "We abide diligent, ardent, and resolute." The Buddha asks, "But Anuruddha, how do you abide thus?" And he explains: "Venerable sir, as to that, whichever of us returns first from the village with alms food prepares the seats, sets out the water for drinking and for washing, and puts the refuse bucket in its place. Whichever of us returns last eats any food left over if he wishes; otherwise, he throws it away where there is no greenery or drops it into water where there is no life. He puts away the seats and the water for drinking and for washing. He puts away the refuse bucket after washing it and he sweeps out the refectory.

Whoever notices that the pots of water for drinking, washing, or the latrine are low or empty takes care of them. If they're too heavy for him, he calls someone else by a signal of the hand and they move it by joining hands. But because of this, we do not break out into speech. But every five days, we sit together all night discussing the Dhamma. That is how we abide, diligent, ardent, and resolute."

It's lovely, isn't it?

And then there are many other things, but right at the end—and this is the point I want to close with—the Buddha goes on to draw from their example how this is a great benefit to all in the world. I want to emphasize this: really take it in that our practice and our commitment to live an awakened life, our commitment to really keep on trucking on this path, is so important. Whatever particular way we end up interacting and living in the world—whether we go off to be hermits, whether we're very socially active, whether we're having a family life—it's not so much the outer form. It's the inner qualities of wholesomeness, of goodness, of commitment to awakening that you bring. And it's of great benefit for all you come in contact with in the world.

The Buddha's words are quite long, so I'll just read the end of it. He starts by saying, "If the clan from which those three clansmen went forth from home into homelessness should remember them with confident heart, that would lead to the welfare and happiness of that clan for a long time." And he goes through, getting bigger and bigger and bigger, until he ends with: "If the world with its gods, its Maras, and its Brahmas, this generation with its recluses and Brahmins, its princes and its people, should remember those three clansmen with confident heart, that would lead to the welfare and happiness of the world for a long time. See how those three clansmen are practicing for the welfare and happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, welfare, and happiness of gods and humans."

And really, that's what we're practicing for: for the welfare and happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, welfare, and happiness of gods and humans.

So may it be so in all of your lives.

And he goes through getting bigger and bigger and bigger. And he ends with: "If the world with its gods, its Maras, and its Brahmas, this generation with its recluses and Brahmins, its princes and its people, should remember those three clansmen with confident heart, that would lead to the welfare and happiness of the world for a long time.

See how those three clansmen are practicing for the welfare and happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, welfare, and happiness of gods and humans."

And really, that's what we're practicing for—for the welfare and happiness of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, welfare, and happiness of gods and humans.

May it be so in all of your lives.

CHAPTER 353

Compassionate Intention

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this deeply personal and practical talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential balance between wisdom and compassion in Buddhist practice—the two wings that allow the bird of dharma to fly. Drawing from Robert Thurman's teachings, she explains how the wisdom of emptiness can seem cool and removed, while compassion arises from connectedness, and how these qualities naturally support and complete one another.
>
> Wilson places particular emphasis on cetanā (intention) as the crucial seed of all karma, referencing the Buddha's teaching that "mind is the forerunner of all action." She shares the sutta story of the blind arahant who unknowingly stepped on ants, illustrating how intention—not outcome—determines the ethical quality of action. Within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path, she highlights how sammā saṅkappa (wise intention) bridges understanding and ethical conduct.
>
> The talk offers profound reflections on opening to pain as a doorway to compassion, with Wilson sharing personal experiences of physical illness, emotional grief, and encountering suffering while traveling in India. She draws extensively from the autobiography of Sister Chân Không, demonstrating how even after thirty years of activism, conscious cultivation of compassionate intention remains essential. Wilson concludes with practical guidance on mettā meditation, the cultivation of bodhicitta, and working skillfully with self-judgment—reminding practitioners that true compassion must include oneself and that seeing and loving naturally arise together.

When I was walking around outside just now, and we get into those states of just that open awareness—not really any thought or any sense of differentiation from the environment—it's just so peaceful. There's just no problem. I'm pointing to that state of open awareness. In that state there's no problem and there's nothing to say, nothing to talk about. It's sort of hard to talk from that state, which is why I have seven thousand notes.

But in a way that leads into what I do want to talk about. In the way that the Buddhist teachings are described, they are said to have two wings, like a bird has to have two wings to fly. The two wings of the Buddha's teaching are the wings of great wisdom and great compassion. So mostly tonight I want to talk about compassion—how it manifests, how we can work with it, and how we notice it becoming stronger through our practice in the force of intention.

I heard a talk by Robert Thurman once, who is quite a Tibetan scholar and practitioner, and he was talking about the balance of wisdom and compassion. It really struck home with me when he talked about how the wisdom of emptiness, of non-self, of impermanence, can seem by itself kind of cool and removed. We touch it in silence, in samadhi, or like when I'm ambling around outside and it's just what it is—there's nothing else to say or do. But it can seem quite removed. Whereas compassion is a movement of the heart and it arises from connectedness: connectedness with others, connectedness with ourselves, connectedness with the world.

They really balance one another. Because just as the wisdom of emptiness can seem kind of off on its own somehow, compassion without the balancing force of wisdom, of understanding, can lead us into overwhelm. As some of you probably know, you can turn from compassion to frustration—you can drown in suffering. But compassion is said to be the link between Buddhas and beings. The wisdom awareness of emptiness finds its natural expression in the actions of compassion, so that in a way the two naturally go together anyway.

It is said that compassion is the link between Buddhas and beings. Think about it: the historical Buddha, what we know about him when he was about thirty-five is when he came to his great opening and understanding, complete enlightenment. He could very well have just spent the rest of his life sitting off in the bliss of Nibbana and been very happy. He didn't have any more problems. But instead, he spent the next forty-five years tirelessly walking all around India, teaching. It's the natural expression.

How we can begin to see this manifest in our practice here—and that's really what I want to talk about tonight, our practice here—is in the expression of intention, which we've talked about a little before. When we're sitting, walking, just being, in the understanding of how things truly are, everything comes and goes. As Joseph was saying this morning, it just kind of moves through: happiness, sadness, compassion, hatred, boredom, pain, joy. It comes, it's there, it moves through. Nothing is more important than anything else.

But where what is arising does begin to have impact or effect is when it functions as the intention that leads to thought, speech, or action, which is arising all the time. That's how we live and move. What's really wonderful about this practice is, one, there are many specific things we do, many ways to work with consciously purifying our intentions. But what also happens is simply by seeing, simply by being connected, simply by letting awareness do its thing, intentions from which we speak and act naturally purify themselves. Lucky thing. And it does happen.

I know we've spoken some about intention. I just want to again describe it because it really is so key. We know that our tendency, for many of us, is to evaluate our actions or others' actions by the results or by how it appears to us, often forgetting to tune in to what the intention is, or imputing from someone else's action. It's easy to impute what we think their intention is, but we can't know.

In the Buddhist understanding of karma, of cause and effect, the seed of all effect—of all thought, speech, and action—is in the intention. It is so key, so powerful. I've personally been finding awareness of intention, the willingness, the remembering to tune into that over and over and over, to be a fantastic support in my daily life of really exploring what I'm doing and why, and effecting change in what I do and why.

This intention is like the volition, the subtle impulse that arises before a thought—well, that one's pretty hard to notice—before speech, before action. That particular volition in any moment can be accompanied by or driven by any of the whole range of mental experience.

It can be accompanied by love, by greed, by delusion, by generosity, by compassion, by hatred, by whatever.

There's a story told in the Buddhist suttas that shows the importance of intention and how we can't tell from the outside. It seems there was a monk who was practicing very diligently, doing his walking meditation, and he was blind. So he was walking in the forest, and as he walked, he was stepping on ants without knowing it and killing them. Now, he was supposed to be an arhat, which in this terminology means completely enlightened—which means delusion or hatred or greed would not be able to arise in him as an intention to action.

Some of the other monks saw this and went running to the Buddha. This actually happens a lot in the suttas; it kind of amuses me. They went running to the Buddha and said, "Well, he's supposed to be an arhat, but he's stepping on ants and killing them." There are many stories where things came out like that. And the Buddha—who supposedly had the power to see into the mind of all beings—said, "No, he is an arhat. And because he doesn't know that he's killing the ants, and there's absolutely no intention, it's not an unskillful act." Which is very interesting. Now, once the bhikkhu knows there are ants there, if he were to keep walking anyway, it's a whole different story.

That's the crux of intention, from the way the Buddha described it. It's extremely powerful, and it's not the way we sometimes tend to look at or evaluate action.

The Buddha described a path of practice, of development, that we can cultivate in our daily life and our meditative life, called the Eightfold Noble Path—kind of eight different aspects. It starts at the beginning, one to eight, but it's really more like a circle, like a mandala. The first step or path is wise understanding. We wouldn't even begin a path of purification, a path of awakening, without some degree of wise understanding—just knowing somehow that things are other than they might superficially seem.

Each of these stages informs the next. The next stage is wise aspiration or wise intention, leading to the next three, which have to do with speech and action in the world: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. Out of those eight aspects, one of them is wise intention, wise aspiration—extremely important. What this says, at least to me, is that how we understand the world informs our intentions, how we think, which then leads to our speech and actions.

For example, if we're a psychopath and the way we understand the world is that it doesn't matter what I do to anybody, that it has no effect, then we do whatever we want. If we understand the sense of cause and effect, then we'll be much more careful with our speech and actions. Or if we understood as a small child that asking questions or questioning authority would get us a slap upside the head, then that's going to affect many of the ways we speak and act later in life—until we understand that it wasn't an accurate understanding.

The Buddha says that the mind is the forerunner of all action. Incredibly powerful. But so subtle. The movement of intention and the movements of our mind are so subtle and so quick that I think that's the beauty of taking a time like this—ten days—where it seems like we're not doing much, but we're really exploring these movements and actions of the mind and how they affect our actions in our life and how we deal with ourselves. We really need to give ourselves this deep inquiry in order to begin to understand on another level.

It's said—and it's my experience and also what I deeply have faith in—that the natural expression of our understanding is compassion: intentions of compassion in our thought, speech, and action. There are many levels of this. On the biggest, vast level, of course, is that sense of the intimation, or just the brief recognition, of the ultimate truth, of our true nature. Or as Sogyal Rinpoche puts it—no description is really accurate, so this is just one I picked—"that which we really are: unchanging, pure awareness, which underlies the whole of life and death."

Just touching that, in that moment when we come upon it, the sense of no separate self, of constant change, of no lasting phenomenon to rely on—that can scare us to death. The fear of change, the fear of nothingness, the fear of emptiness: you can just start to come close to it, in or out of practice, and the mind goes, "No way, thank you, I'm checking out of here."

But what's so wonderful is the flip side of that. Just the barest instant of touching this ground of pure awareness, the knowing of no separation, of total connectedness—in that moment there's no sense of separation, and therefore nothing is lacking and nothing needs to be pushed away. The idea of wanting something or fearing something or needing something just isn't relevant. It doesn't have anything to do with what we truly are.

As Thich Nhat Hanh said, "You recognize there is no need to put something in front of you and chase after it, because you see that everything is already here in yourself." Total completeness. And the natural expression of that completeness is that it manifests as the movement of connectedness to all other beings and things, because there is no "me and them"—there is just "we are." The touching of others' pain and the natural response of compassion to it shines forth spontaneously in these moments.

And then on the other levels—and that's what I want to talk about for the rest of this talk—are other levels of practice. When we might have moments when we're not quite resting in the vast space of completeness. And as clear as our overall intentions might be, these old habits somehow tend to creep in. They tend to slip up on us. The habits of greed, of anger, of confusion.

And that's really, to me, why I practice. To keep rediscovering what is true and to keep discovering how the habits come in, to recognize them again for being as empty as they are, and to allow the natural purification of understanding and intention to again take place.

So I want to talk now on the level of working in different ways—how this practice, for me, helps with these habits in the area of intention and compassion.

To begin with, when I think about it, or in talking to people—and I teach a lot of retreats, so I talk to a lot of people in this particular mode—what's really painful and almost shocking to me, although I don't know why it should be shocking, is something I encounter often. If you look around at the world, it's kind of obvious. It's almost the way of the world. It's sort of expected, it seems to me in some ways, that the motivations for action of anger, of craving or greed, are perfectly fine motivations. I mean, they definitely get a lot done.

And sometimes people in talking to me on retreat will say, "Well, but if I don't act from craving, if I don't act from anger, what am I going to do? Just sit in my room for the rest of my life?" And that makes me so sad, because there's the underlying assumption that those are the only motivations for activity. And it's so powerful that I find myself, if I'm not paying attention, easily drawn into that myself.

But again, as intention is the crux, even though we can't judge from the outcome or the result, what I feel quite deeply and what I also notice when I look around is that at some point, when our intentions—or the intentions of the bigger picture—change somehow and do begin to come from hatred or from confusion or from greed, something that might have very powerful and significant effects begins to get a little twisted somehow. It can't quite maintain the power.

And this is really big-picture examples. Remember when the Berlin Wall went down a few years ago? I think it was in the middle of a full three-month course. We were watching it on TV, and I remember just feeling such a thrill, this feeling of, "Oh, community and love and kindness is really triumphing."

I have some friends who live in Berlin, before and after, and they told me a couple of things about it. One, that big party that it looked like they were having on top of the wall that seemed so loving and ecstatic—a woman friend of mine was there, and she said it started out nice, but it turned into this kind of drunken revelry that was really scary and unpleasant. I said, "Oh, you know, another illusion I had destroyed."

And that, again—Germany, or we can see the same thing in some ways in all of Eastern Europe and the old Soviet Union—what looked like this great moment, this regime built on fear and oppression has fallen, and now there'll be this really good-hearted sense of working together. Some of the people, West Berliners—and I have really good German friends, and they make the distinction. They can tell right away if someone was from East Germany or West Germany, even though there's not supposed to be East or West anymore. And my friend Franz told me that there's this T-shirt that says, "Bring back our wall." Because they liked it better that way.

And of course I don't even need to talk about what's going on in the former Yugoslavia and Romania and all those countries where the one fearful oppression going away just made room for other hatreds and fears and greeds to arise—the hatred of the other. And it's so painful.

And I'm not trying to be naive and say, "Oh, if we just all have loving-kindness, everything will be okay." But I'm just trying to, in this context, say that what we can work with in the context of this meditation retreat is being very honest and very clear with our own intentions and what effect that has, and how easily we can be deluded about our own intentions. But also to begin to appreciate—which I'm sure all of you must. I mean, of course, I don't know specifically what you each do. But again, I'm convinced that the work that you do springs from compassion and real caring and interconnectedness. Or what would any of us be doing here?

So it's not to say that isn't so, but within it, to really continue to investigate on a moment-to-moment level and see how that can change. I know, looking at how compassion can be our prime motivation for something, but it can so easily—the other old habits can slip in. It can become mixed. Like, if we don't have the balance of wisdom, the equanimity of wisdom, seeing that with all our good intentions we can't control the results. And that, I know, over time can so easily lead to a shift from real open-hearted compassion to a kind of frustration, or a hardness, or a despair.

There's a story in the autobiography of Sister Phượng, or Chan Khong as she's called now, which I've just been reading, and it's inspired me a lot. Because I met her, I don't know, in 1986, spent a few weeks with her and Thich Nhat Hanh. And at the time, not knowing too much of her history, knowing they'd worked a lot in Vietnam during the war and seen enormous suffering, but just meeting her and spending time, I was so impressed by—she's a dynamo—the enormous amount of energy that she had at that time, and seems like she still has.

And at Plum Village, she was constantly doing things to help people. Everything from spraying bug spray in somebody's room who was complaining about spiders, to working with all the children, to using her free time to send parcels back to Vietnam, to trying to raise money, to giving dharma talks. Just one thing after the other.

And I really felt—and again, I can only project a little—but I really felt the sense of the power of compassion as a motivation. It is ultimately so much stronger than anger or greed or confusion. It just seems to lend so much energy. I remember thinking, I'd be sitting there: "May all beings be happy. Wouldn't it be nice to do something?" And she would have run around and done thirty-five things in the time I was just sitting there going, "Oh, you know, it's great." There's something to be said for someone really grounded in compassion.

Reading her book, I find myself learning a lot. Here is someone who's clearly constantly working with cultivating the intention of compassion—not just assuming it's going to be there, but constantly working with it.

In this field of not being able to control the outcome, can we still come back to love and compassion? She told a story from 1967 when she was in jail in Vietnam for carrying one of Thich Nhat Hanh's books. The conditions were quite wretched. After some weeks, a high-powered person interceded and she was released. She had been in a cell with many people, and among them were two twelve-year-old girls who hadn't done anything. They were simply in the wrong place at the wrong time and got swept up with a bunch of other so-called guerrillas.

As she was being released, she spoke to the commandant and said, "About these two girls—prison is not a good place for twelve-year-old girls, and they've done nothing. Couldn't you release them?" A totally courageous and compassionate thing to do. And the response of the commandant was, "Oh, these prisoners have been talking to each other. That isn't good." And he made the conditions harsher.

It's horrible. And you can't know in advance. Just reading it, I tighten up, I get indignant—or I could move into a space of passivity, thinking it's better not to say or do anything because it might make things worse.

So how do we continue to open, continue to cultivate compassion—which is a soft and connecting quality—in the face of all kinds of harshness and ignorance? How do we maintain the openness, the motivation to continue to act from compassion when other people, even if they think they're acting from compassion, don't do the things we think are the compassionate thing to do? How do we balance the motivation of compassion with the equanimity of wisdom—recognizing that our views, as right as we think they are, are still views? Other people will act as compassionately as they can, but from their own understanding, which might be different from ours. That might really be off—but who's to say?

I'll give an example. Once I mentioned Mother Teresa while talking about the amazing energy of compassion. Afterward, a man came up quite incensed and said, "How could you talk about her being compassionate when she must be homophobic given the way she treats AIDS patients? Not to mention her attitude on birth control in countries like India." These are valid points in a way.

Then, quite interestingly and having absolutely nothing to do with this, the next day an old friend came to visit me at the retreat. Apropos of nothing, she started talking about how she happened to be in Calcutta a few months before and had spent a day volunteering in Mother Teresa's main hospital. She described the unbelievable suffering there—something her mind and my mind in this culture can hardly take in. She gave vivid descriptions of the sick children, the undernourished children, all the suffering. And she spoke of the beautiful, serene quality of all the nuns—not the famous Mother Teresa, but all the anonymous nuns who have devoted their lives to serving.

I thought, that's just a really interesting balance. And who's to say? Who's to say what's right?

I myself often find that when I have some idea of what compassionate action should look like, and when it doesn't happen that way, my own intentions and responses begin to harden. They turn judgmental, or angry, or despairing. And so my work is to come back to my own intention—to act as clearly as possible.

One last area I think is really most important: when we're working, especially on the front lines as you all are—working so hard, trying to do so much for the environment, for people—sometimes we forget that compassion is undiscriminating. It has a boundless aspect, which means that it includes ourselves. Sometimes we forget that.

I'm going to read this from Thomas Merton:

"There is a pervasive form of contemporary violence to which the idealist fighting for peace by nonviolent means most easily succumbs: activism and overwork. The rush and pressure of modern life are a form, perhaps the most common form, of its innate violence. To allow oneself to be carried away by a multitude of conflicting concerns, to surrender to too many demands, to commit oneself to too many projects, to want to help everyone and everything, is to succumb to violence."

The frenzy of the activist neutralizes her work for peace. It destroys the fruitfulness of her own work because it can kill the root of inner wisdom that makes the work fruitful.

Again, an opinion—a powerful one. Something to keep looking at.

So in all things, and this is where we come back to this practice, which gives us, hopefully, the capacity to remember, to continue to bring mindful awareness to this aspect of intention. Without it, the old habits begin to creep in. With it, it takes a real commitment to inquiry, a commitment to awareness, and a real kind of determination to stick with it. It's not like I can make the intention, "Okay, I'm really going to be aware of intentions from now on," and have it happen. It really takes being willing to keep waking up.

From Sister Chân Không again—now she's talking about more current times, where monks and nuns and artists and intellectuals are being arrested and tortured and killed in Vietnam:

"Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry, and I knew that I had to do walking meditation. Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities have acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

She gives lots of other examples of times that she didn't do that—where she lost her calm and basically considers that she blew it, that things didn't work and people just resisted her. Very impressive. And this is after thirty years of consistent activism and consistent commitment to the path of compassion and understanding. It never just gets so automatic that we don't take responsibility for inquiring into our own intentions.

One teacher said once that our old habits of confusion don't just vanish, but they wear out slowly, like an old piece of cloth. They get thinner and thinner, and you can sort of see through them. There are some little holes. Maybe one day it's gone altogether. It's little by little.

So we do find that the intentions will begin to purify naturally. You might notice it even on retreat, in little things. And I think it's helpful just to look at little things—don't go for the biggest, most difficult situation.

I don't know, it doesn't feel like that's happening at this retreat, but at some retreats, food is like a major issue. Lunchtime becomes a very significant time of day. So, for example, someone might find that there's fear of not getting enough food. All that has to happen, say in a three-month course, is that one day there's not enough food and the last few people come and the casseroles run out. That's all that has to happen to set up this kind of mindfully quiet stampede. Everyone's trying to look nonchalant. There's this intensity five minutes before the bell rings for food.

People will often notice—and you can notice yourself—this particular example might not apply, but any other little thing—where one day you notice it come up: "Oh no, there's only five muffins and there's seven people in front of me. What's going to happen?" And then the thought arises: "That's okay. I'm glad they're getting the muffins, and I'll live." You kind of go, "Where did that come from? That doesn't sound like me." But it is. It's a little thing, but it's a natural purification of intention. It's an intention of generosity, or letting go.

Notice the little things. Sometimes we're so hard on ourselves—we want to be like this perfect, compassionate bodhisattva—and we'll just put down these small shifts: "It's about time you gave up your greed." Honor the little things. Appreciate them.

So I want to talk about a couple of ways that we consciously, in our practice, cultivate and see how our intentions begin to change—from greed, from hatred, to compassion and kindness, to love. One big one is something Joseph spoke about last night.

And that's opening to pain. Simply the willingness to be fully present for pain has the effect of opening into understanding and compassion.

I want to give three simple examples of different kinds of pain from my own experience. One is physical pain. One time I was in the hospital, quite acutely ill and in a lot of pain. As you probably know, intense pain can have the effect of being very isolating. There's this sense—however painful it is and however nice people might be—it's really clear that I'm the one in pain, not them. It somehow isn't quite shared.

I was like that for a few days and also pretty out of it, not really knowing what was going on. At some point I sort of came to and realized I was in a room with three other women, really elderly women in their eighties or so. For some reason it was an orthopedic ward, which wasn't what was wrong with me, and I saw these really old, frail women all up in casts, their arms up and their legs up, unable to move. They were moaning and crying, and it was really sad.

I came to and saw that, and it just started opening up into this sense of not just me and my pain, but all of us here. What was going on with them was really intense, much more than me. And somehow this sense spread out where I thought: How many rooms are there just in this hospital? How many hospitals just in this little area, in this state, just in this country? It just kept going and going.

Out of that came such a sense of the interconnectedness of all of us in our pain. Even the people who weren't in pain at that time will be in pain at another time. This sense of compassion is a real active sense of connectedness to pain—sometimes defined as a quivering of the heart in response to suffering. It's active and connected. It has nothing to do with pity or sympathy or "that poor person over there." It's really a sense of togetherness, of sharing. And that grew for me very strongly out of that physical pain.

Another example is our willingness to open to emotional pain. This was ten or twelve years ago. I'd been in a relationship for about five years, and it broke up. For some reason, particular relationships can somehow trigger this enormity of grief and loss and despair, and this one did.

Before we broke up there had been this huge fear and denial—I had this image that we were in this perfect relationship. As soon as we broke up, the fear went, because what I had been afraid of was already happening. I began to see how much I'd been denying. This wasn't perfect. What are you kidding? This wasn't even that hot. And even seeing that, though—no longer living in this delusion of perfection—I went into such a state of grief and despair. The kind where I would wake up in the morning with this heaviness: I just can't believe I have to live through another day.

Of course there's a lot of resistance at first, fighting and wanting to make it go away. Well, the fact is it went on for two years. At some point, really within a couple of months—I was living my life, I wasn't just doing nothing. During this period of grief, I was in England and I came back and began a two-year stint of managing our meditation center, IMS. I was actually quite busy, and also felt like I was a basket case because I was really in deep emotional pain.

One time I was talking to Joseph about it. I said I was such a basket case, that I shouldn't be managing, shouldn't be in such a position of responsibility. And his immortal advice was: "So what else are you going to do? Go sit around and mope?" It was helpful.

Anyway, the point I'm trying to get to is that somewhere within a couple of months, I really accepted that this was a process that I had to go through. I didn't like it, but I felt—and in retrospect, I feel this even more strongly—that I really deeply opened to and accepted this depth of grief and sadness.

It's not like the minute you accept something, it goes away. It doesn't always work like that. And I could see early on that this was a grief that had to do with—I don't know—lifetimes. It wasn't just about this one incident.

The process went in phases, like peeling away layers of an onion. There would be real deep grief, and I would allow it, sit with it, and then it would open up into this sense of love and connection with all beings that was amazing—certainly not something I was looking for. I was just trying to let the grief be there.

Over the period of two years, my friends got really sick of it. They said, "Okay, it's time to move on now, Carol." I wasn't going around talking about it all the time, but they knew it was there. And then there was a point where it just went. It was gone, really, really gone, and I knew it.

Looking back, I feel that was an incredibly valuable period of my life, because the outcome was both a sense of strong love and compassion. That man and the woman he got involved with—just two weeks after we split up—they're actually two of my closest friends now. I live with them for weeks at a time when I'm in California. And when I look, there's just no trace of that old pain. It's like a whole other lifetime we're in now. I really credit that opening to suffering, which allowed everything to purify in that way.

I've also found that by really allowing myself to know how heavy grief can be, without judging it too harshly or telling myself that it wasn't really so horrible compared to what others experience—that this has led me to true compassion for the grief and pain of other people in whatever circumstances they find themselves.

I really value that time as a gift.

A third way that I consciously work with opening to pain—and this isn't such a success story—is through what's called the pain of other people. Though in my experience, it actually isn't other people; it's my own experience. I work with this consciously, often when I go to India, where we're simply confronted by so much suffering, so many beggars. Or New York City, or any of the big cities in this country nowadays—it's actually not as different as it used to be.

I just watch. How long am I able to stay really connected and compassionate? It's not really about whether I give or don't give, but more about the compassion—that touching of suffering, that touching of hearts. When I'm open, there's a connection. I can look at the person, smile, revere them.

And it's so painful, because I know I could empty my whole wallet, empty all the money I brought with me, and I wouldn't make a dent. So I observe: How long can I really stay open? And then I see myself start to shut down. If I look closely, the shutting down comes about because I don't want to feel the pain I'm feeling anymore. So I shut down.

The effect is a real separation. I'm not really able to have that eye-to-eye contact anymore. I'm looking away. I want to just get back to my hotel. And if I'm really honest, that's actually more painful.

So this is just something I work with. It's true that the suffering in this world is overwhelming, and we can definitely drown in it. In cultivating an openness to our own pain and suffering, and to the suffering in the world, it's very important to find skillful boundaries.

Whether you're on retreat here, whether you're in your work, whether you're traveling—don't expect that you have to be open all the time. If you're dealing with some painful experience here, whether it's a pain in your knee, a really difficult emotional experience, anger, grief, or just self-judgment that you're not concentrated enough—or some story you create about being sleepy—it doesn't really matter what the experience is.

This is where we come back to intention. How do we relate, moment to moment, to this difficult experience? And this is where we can consciously cultivate compassion toward ourselves.

As Thich Nhat Hanh writes: "I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with nonviolence. We do not need to consider anger, hatred, or any other experience as enemies we have to fight or destroy. That would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield."

If you cannot be compassionate to yourself, you cannot be compassionate to others. And so our whole practice here is: can we work with deep compassion toward ourselves, just in these little mundane moment-to-moment experiences? Notice how you meet that self-judgment. How do you meet that sleepiness? How do you meet that agony, or that wishing that you could experience something deeper than what is actually happening? Do you meet it with resistance? Can we just gently allow it? Feel the emotion in your body. Let it be just as it is. We don't need to make up a story about it. We can almost cradle it in the gentle, loving field of awareness.

In some ways, the practice of metta, the energy of compassion, is actually the energy of open, accepting awareness. They're really two aspects of the same thing.

Another way you can notice how you're greeting your experience is that intention often manifests as thought. Sometimes I know I'll think I'm just being with what's happening, but the little commentary—that little running commentary that comes up once in a while—can be incredibly vicious. I think I'm just being quiet, but the commentary is just one nasty comment after another.

Once I was sitting with a Burmese teacher, Sayadaw U Pandita, the one Joseph was talking about, who could be quite stern. He's actually been quite kind with me, quite compassionate. And he can really tell what's going on; you don't have to tell him much. I went in one time, and I wasn't even aware that I was having this really atrociously vicious running commentary. He just looked at me and said, "Some people talk to themselves. Have you ever noticed that?"

I said, "Yeah."

He said, "Well, it's supposed to be a silent retreat." Then he asked, "Which do you think is better, to talk to yourself or to talk to somebody else?"

I said, "Well, the way it's going, somebody else would probably feel a lot nicer."

It was very helpful. And that's where Joseph's mantra of "it's okay"—it might seem a little forced, but actually a deliberate thought substitution from "you stupid jerk, are you still getting lost in thought?" to "it's okay" is a huge difference. In that moment, you're developing the intention of compassion. It's just in these little things that it happens.

Again, I want to say that in very difficult experiences, compassion sometimes means backing off. That's a skillful means you learn to discern for yourself. It doesn't mean pushing relentlessly. For example, when I was going through that grief, it wouldn't have been wise to say, "I'm going to get to the bottom of it, I'm sitting here until it's gone," and push, push, push until you're just a basket case. Sometimes it means backing off, opening up, moving to hearing, going outside, refreshing your heart, refreshing your mind.

And then other times we make the mistake of saying, "Well, I'm really going to take care of myself. I'm just going to be kind to myself, so I won't look at this now." I think it was Chögyam Trungpa who talked about idiot compassion, where we say, "Just take it easy. I'm not going to push too hard." And basically what we're doing is avoiding. So I have something I say to myself often. When Joseph was talking about wanting to be comfortable last night, I really resonated, because it's one of the challenges I give myself. When I feel I'm falling into idiot compassion, I ask myself, "Do I want to be comfortable, or do I want to be free?" Sometimes you know. Not to be too hard on yourself when you choose comfort, but know what we're doing. That's all.

There are many other ways, which I want to mention briefly. Working with loving-kindness meditation, with the metta—that's actually a practice, a cultivation of intention. As we sit and bring up the wish, "May I be happy, may I be free from danger," whatever the phrases are, it's not that we somehow have this naive idea that if I say it enough, everything's going to change, or that if I wish this person happiness, then all their suffering will go away. It's not that.

It's more that we are cultivating and strengthening the power of that intention in ourselves. And it's very interesting and quite powerful how it begins to surface spontaneously in our lives.

I used to think that in practicing metta meditation, if it worked, that meant we'd be kind of bounding around, filled with this boundless ecstatic love for all beings—that kind of outpouring. And sometimes it does feel like that. But actually, the way I've experienced it is as a broadening, a real expansive quality of meeting the world. What I've found happening more and more, quite spontaneously, is that I'll enter a situation where there's something difficult, I see that quite clearly, and where the first response is aversion—it's there—but then quite spontaneously comes up, "Oh, and there's this beautiful aspect of the situation as well." And it changes everything. There's a real appreciation and a broad acceptance of things as they are that allows for much more positive and clear action. It's been very amazing to me, actually, watching this effect in my life.

I use loving-kindness or metta a lot. I use it on planes. I use it in supermarkets when I'm just standing and starting to get impatient in line. It's me and them, and I wish they would hurry up and get out of the way. And I just start to send a little metta—just those simple phrases, not trying to make anything happen. And it's amazing. Within a minute or two, there's just this sense of us doing our thing, and there's not a problem. Very, very powerful.

Working with the bodhicitta that Joseph mentioned the other night, consciously reflecting on the fact of interdependence—sometimes this can be intellectual, but it can lead, again, into a real sense of "we" in a situation together, not "me and them."

I'll just give one example of that and then close. Once I was traveling on an Indian train in a four-tier sleeper, which is just four little platforms and a curtain that sort of closes it from the rest of the train, but not really. I was traveling by myself, and I got up to my little bench, and there were three other Indian men sharing this sleeper with me. I was quite uncomfortable. The men didn't do anything. It's just that being Indian, where our tendency as Westerners would be to give someone their privacy and turn away and not look, the guy lying on the bench opposite me just lay there staring at me all night. And that's just Indian—there's nothing unusual about that. But I was, of course, acutely uncomfortable and really negative. I wish these guys would leave.

Then in the morning they brought in their whole families, and there were like fifteen of us in this little compartment meant for four people. And I was just in this space of fear and separation—me and them. I wish they'd leave me alone. I wish they'd get out of here. I wish I could have my space.

And somehow I just flipped it. I didn't do anything, but I flipped it into, "Oh, this is our compartment. This is us here in this compartment. It's not me and them." That's all I did. I didn't make any overt movement. I didn't open conversation. Just that flipped in my mind and intention.

And the whole thing changed. Whereas they hadn't been speaking to me at all, they suddenly became very friendly—not in a pushy way, just really sincerely friendly. They went out on the platform at the station, came back with little pakoras and chai, and said, "Oh, you must taste these Indian treats." And their wives were very friendly, and it was really just this sense of our little family there traveling in the compartment.

Very interesting, the sense of how the mind is the forerunner of all action—much more powerful than we might believe.

I'd like to close by reading from Thich Nhat Hanh about this: "The interdependence of all beings is not a philosophical game removed from spiritual and practical life. In bringing to light the interdependence of all phenomena, the meditator comes to see that the lives of all beings are one, and he or she is overcome with compassion for all. Seeing and loving go together. Great understanding goes with great compassion."

Let us sit together for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 354

Bias of Mind

Carol Wilson · 1h08

In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson examines a sutta in which the Buddha addresses both the subtle nature of our deepest mental conditioning and the practical methods for its abandonment. She introduces the concept of āsavas—the underlying biases or latent tendencies of mind toward sense desire, becoming (the sense of self), and ignorance—explaining how these potentials arise when conditions are suitable, even in moments of brief inattention.

Wilson presents the three levels at which unwholesome habits manifest: the level of transgression (protected by sīla), the obsessive level (protected by samādhi), and the latent level (protected by paññā). She then details the Buddha's seven methods for abandoning these tendencies: wise seeing (yoniso manasikāra), restraint at the sense doors, wise use of requisites, patient endurance, skillful avoidance, removal of arisen unwholesome states, and cultivation of the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā).

Particularly valuable is her exploration of wise attention—knowing what is fit and unfit for attention based not on the object itself but on the mode of attending. She discusses the four inverted perceptions (seeing impermanent as permanent, painful as pleasurable, not-self as self, and foul as beautiful) and how perceiving through these veils feeds ignorance. The talk offers practical guidance for daily life, from how we relate to food and possessions to skillfully working with difficult emotions, emphasizing that every moment of mindfulness conditions wholesome tendencies while cutting through unwholesome ones.

I know there are times during the practice, or when we're talking, when we speak about just resting in awareness, or as with Joseph's talk the other night, just opening to the nature of awareness. It can seem so natural and simple. It can.

Or at times when you have an insight, really understanding deeply the pain of clinging, for example, and the heart and mind let go. It seems so obvious, really. It's not nearly as mysterious as we had thought.

And then what's also so easy and simple is how quickly that's gone. How quickly it can seem a distant memory. Or if not yet, the mind projects into the future. Some of the questions today reflected this a little bit: How can I maximize the potential to remember, to rediscover, to continue to understand selflessness or the nature of awareness?

So tonight I want to talk about a specific sutta of the Buddha's where he addresses both of these aspects. He speaks about the really subtlest, most subtle aspect of ignorance—the tendency, the potential for greed, for desire for being, for ignorance to arise in the mind. We're talking on very subtle levels, which is what you see in the practice. And he gives in this sutta seven different methods, all of which will be familiar to you, for the abandoning of these most subtle tendencies.

I like this sutta. It has a lot of information in it, and this talk is going to have a lot of information. Don't try to remember it all, please. Just sit back, let it come in. Most of it will be familiar, maybe just in a different framework, and use what is useful.

Talking about these subtle tendencies, it has come for me to mean recognizing that I must view the power of conditioning with deep respect. We may think if we see through greed 150 times, we get impatient if we have to see it again. But the power of conditioning is vast.

There's one conceptual framework I have found helpful in trying to describe what I'm talking about as these subtle tendencies, this possibility, this potential for delusion to arise. It's called the three levels or the three rounds of samsara.

There are three levels at which the habits of mind manifest. The first level, where unwholesome habits—we'll talk about unwholesome here—habits of greed, hatred, and delusion manifest, the grossest level is on the level of action and speech, quite obviously. What protects us at this biggest level from acting these out is sīla, is morality. This is really the place that sīla comes in, when we're really in the grip of greed or of anger. Just remembering: I really want that last cookie, but there's someone in line behind me and I've already had two. Just remembering sīla, and you can put it down. So that's called the level of transgression—actually moving out and acting in an unwholesome way—protected by sīla.

The second level is when we don't actually act out. Say you want that cookie, you don't take it, sīla protects us. But the second level is called the obsessive level. I don't have to say any more, do I? Just caught up for the next three days in thoughts about that cookie and all the ways it goes. The protection on the obsessive level is said to be samādhi, where you can really see: okay, come back, come back, come back. The power of samādhi really cuts through that. Or when samādhi is really strong, this obsessive level doesn't arise at all.

Now the third, and this is what we're talking about tonight, could be called the latent level, the underlying level. We have to listen to this without getting discouraged. This is the level where there is the underlying potential for greed or for hatred, for a sense of self to arise when the conditions are suitable. It's like if a seed has been planted: if the conditions are suitable—the right amount of water and sunlight, the proper soil—it will sprout. So these latent underlying tendencies will arise given the proper conditions.

Now, what we're learning is the conditions aren't too esoteric. For greed to arise, we really only need a pleasant sense object and consciousness and lack of mindfulness and—boom—there you have it. I think part of why retreats can, at times, get discouraging is because we're seeing this. In our daily life we're so busy, we don't often perceive on this level. So it's actually really good that we're seeing it, but it is important not to get discouraged.

This level, the latent level, is protected by wisdom, by paññā. The Buddha often said that greed, hatred, and delusion—especially delusion—is abandoned not by actions but by wisely seeing. Seeing these conditions, seeing how when there's not awareness greed arises given something pleasant, aversion arises given something unpleasant—seeing that is the beginning of our protection, of our uprooting it.

The Buddha spoke often about these underlying potentials. The word I'm using tonight from this particular sutta is āsava in Pali, often translated as "canker," which is like a sore, or "taint," or "dye."

I'm just going to call it underlying potential or bias of the mind. And the three primary ones are those I mentioned: the tendency of the mind to move into sense desire, or being—becoming, desire for being—and ignorance, which covers everything else. These tendencies are not the states themselves. It's not the state of sense desire, the state of self-identification, so much as the underlying possibility. So that's what we're talking about—that potential.

There are many places where the Buddha, giving a definition of a fully enlightened person, describes them as one in whom these āsavas, these potentials, no longer exist. That's really quite interesting to me—also to even try and imagine what that could be like. No possibility of that state arising.

That's when it's helpful to remember the statement that I know has been said before, where the Buddha often said, "If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so." It's important to remember that. He's not just talking through his hat. If it were not possible.

So to begin with, it's just noticing how these tendencies can arise—with humor, without taking it personally. Someone today gave me a great example. It happens all the time. He just got up from a rest, saw an orange sitting on his bureau. A moment of a couple of thoughts, not quite mindfulness, the hand reaches out and grabs the orange—

I'm going to eat it. And as soon as he became mindful, which was like four thoughts later, he realized, "Oh, I'm not hungry. I don't want this." He just put it down. But in the moment of pleasant sight, not much mindfulness—yeah, I want that. It happens all the time.

What's also really important to notice is that however far along it is—right at that moment or many mind moments and manifestations later—the power of presence, the power of mindfulness, cuts right through that tendency. So as pervasive as these underlying potentials may seem, it's like, "Give me a break. You mean I let up mindfulness for two seconds and greed arises, sense of self arises?" There are times on retreat where I've just felt like I can't bear it. What's the point?

But it's important to also notice that the power of simple mindfulness can just cut right through it at any point. Truth, clear seeing, is always stronger than ignorance, stronger than confusion. It's learning to trust that, learning that it really is our protection—whether it's in the acting out, the obsessive quality of mind, or just in these simple underlying tendencies.

And to recognize also that every moment of mindfulness is conditioning other tendencies as well. It's not just that in that moment of mindfulness there's no room for greed to arise, but that moment of mindfulness is also strengthening wisdom, equanimity, concentration, clear seeing—all the wholesome qualities. So every moment of mindfulness really is, on many levels that we may not be aware of at that moment, deeply changing our conditioning. Thank God.

But the conditioning is deep. The tendencies are subtle. And we won't necessarily notice the effects at once. It can take who knows how long for these seeds to sprout.

I remember, a few years ago, I got a letter from a woman who had been here quite some years earlier on a special work retreat. She'd never, to my knowledge, done Vipassana practice before. And while she was very enthusiastic, I had this sense—could be projected—that she really didn't know what she was coming to or what she'd landed in, didn't really seem to get it, in my esteemed opinion, while she was here. And I didn't really think about her again.

Years later, out of nowhere, I got a letter from her—really a beautiful letter—just thanking me for being her first teacher, and that that experience of that work retreat had really resonated in her, had changed her life, had deeply connected her to the Dharma. I was just thinking, you never know. It was very beautiful to me to see that.

And it was also a help for the judging mind. We just don't know what's going on with anybody. We don't know how the seeds are going in. Who are we to judge? The Dharma is growing in its own time.

If you could remember that about yourself, it would really help. A moment of mindfulness is very powerful. And you don't have to wait for the day when these tendencies are completely eradicated before you begin to feel some confidence. You can notice—I'm sure each of you has had at least one moment when, without thinking about it, you walk into a situation or you sit into a situation where normally all the conditions are there for aversion to arise. You know it normally would, or for greed to arise. And you don't have to talk yourself out of it. You don't have to pretend you're really being mindful and filled with mettā. The unwholesome factor just doesn't come.

You walk up, there's only two cookies left, there's four people in line behind you, you don't even think—you just walk past it. Greed does not arise. It can seem so insignificant that we don't recognize that what's happening in that moment was a prime condition for one of these underlying āsavas to emerge into the light of day, and it wasn't there. Ignorance was not present in that moment. That's very powerful. Notice those little moments.

If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so. And we don't start from being totally deluded and jump to being totally free from delusion. It's a whole process. So appreciating it.

That's just a little synopsis of what we're talking about with these underlying tendencies. The three specific ones that the Buddha names again are sense desire, desire for being or becoming—really the sense of "I"—and the last one being ignorance, flat-out ignorance.

In this sutta, besides describing these tendencies, he talks about seven different methods, all of which I think we've touched on in the retreat. They're all part of practice, but not just the specifics of very intense silent mindfulness practice. It's also a way of stepping back and looking at the bigger picture. Some of these methods are very practical, things that we can use in our daily life, not only on retreats.

All seven methods for abandoning these tendencies are founded on the basis of wise attention. I gave a whole talk on that however many weeks ago, and I'm not going to obviously go into it in that much detail. But for those who weren't here—because I know all the rest of you remember it so completely clearly—wise attention can be spoken of in two ways. The Buddha speaks of it as knowing what is fit for attention and what is not fit for attention.

Now, to our minds, that implies some things are worth paying attention to—the things we like and that make us feel good—and some things are not worth paying attention to, such as all the unwholesome states and the ones that make us feel bad. That's not what he means. What is fit and not fit for attention is nothing intrinsic to the arising experience itself; it's in the mode of how we pay attention to what's arising.

For example, if anger is arising and we pay attention to it in the way of, "I am so angry. I am really such a bad person for being so angry. This anger is really unacceptable," on and on, really identified—that's unwise attention. Whereas if we bring attention to the experience of the anger itself, just what we've been saying with mindfulness the whole time, noticing it as it is arising in the moment—the experience, the thoughts, the sensations, the associations—but without identifying and without feeding it, that's wise attention. It's not that anger is intrinsically fit or unfit for attention.

Wise attention has been, I think, in some ways underrated, because the Buddha says that unwise attention is at the root of our being caught in all these rounds of saṃsāra. It's really not paying attention in the right way to what's going on that keeps us caught, whereas wise attention is really what frees us. With wise attention, these underlying tendencies do not arise. The risen ones are abandoned.

All seven of these methods require wise attention. In a way, you could think of mindfulness as wise attention. That makes it simpler. And obviously, without mindfulness, we're not even paying attention to what we're doing, so any of these methods don't work because you don't even think to use them.

Wise attention is underlying, and the first method itself is actually abandoning these tendencies by wise seeing, wise attention again. So I want to say a bit more about it to give another example of how to pay attention in a wise way. And again, this is nothing new. If you can pay attention at the bare sense experience—sound, unpleasant—as opposed to all the stories and associations and judgments about the sound, that's wise attention.

A handy way to check, if you're not really sure—if you think you're paying attention wisely to all the stories about the sound and this and that, you think it's wise—

But another way the Buddha gave to tell whether attention is wise or unwise—and this is so practical—is that wise attention means if you're paying attention to what's happening in the appropriate way, to the appropriate thing, then any unwholesome states that are arising will diminish, and other unwholesome states will not come. So if you're paying attention to something and getting more and more and more aggravated, frustrated, angry, resistant—there's something you're not seeing wisely. You're somehow paying attention in the wrong way, or there's identification. That's unwise attention. You're paying attention, you might be really trying your best, but you're just getting more and more out of control. Either you're paying attention in the wrong way or to the wrong thing.

A lot of our advice as teachers, when we say, "Okay, you're really caught in the anger—it's time to move the attention away," that's looking at wise attention. The mindfulness isn't strong enough to be with the anger as it is, so you need to advert the attention elsewhere. This is an example of wise attention in action.

Now I'm taking a whole hour talk and putting it into five minutes here, so I'm just saying this as a reminder. But there are a couple of other things I want to say about wise attention, again from the suttas, that I didn't mention exactly in this way before—specifically how we attend in the wrong way with these three tendencies, these āsavas.

The Buddha says that what helps sense desire arise is this: when there's sense pleasure, it's not just noticing the pleasant, but your attention is really getting sucked into the gratification of that sense pleasure. This is subtle. It's not just noticing pleasantness. You might be thinking, "Oh, this is really nice, it's really pleasant, I really like it." You could even be noting that, but not quite aware of the personal gratification. That's what really allows sense desire to keep blooming up—it keeps getting bigger.

The second one is very interesting: what helps the desire for being arise and increase. I think this is a limited explanation, but it's interesting. It's when we attend to the gratification in meditative states—and that's a very subtle one. Not just that they're pleasant, but that gratification, that sense of me having this exalted meditative state. And that's even gross; it wouldn't usually be that obvious. But attending to the gratification rather than just what's happening—that's what feeds this tendency.

The last one is if we attend or pay attention to anything arising through one of what are called the four perversions of perception, the four upside-down, incorrect perceptions. When we attend looking through one of these four inverted perceptions, ignorance arises and increases.

So the four inverted perceptions are: seeing what is impermanent as permanent; seeing what is painful as pleasurable (yes, you can relate to that—the first one is obvious, and the second one, is that obvious too?); the third, seeing what is not-self as self (clearly we do this all the time); and the fourth, perceiving what is—this is our very Victorian language—perceiving what is foul as beautiful.

That last one I personally have a harder time with than the others. The others, no question, I do them all the time. But "foul" isn't a word we'd use today. I'm sure they're referring to our lovely bodies, for one thing, and really seeing them as beautiful in a way that leads to attachment.

Let me give you an example of how subtle this can be. It's really interesting. When I was sitting on retreat, I think it was last fall, I thought maybe the first three or perhaps all four of these inverted perceptions were present. But it can be very subtle. I was on retreat and at a point where I was quite mindful.

And eating, and in that state where I was really noting pretty much everything that was going on, I would notice a series of thoughts—a quick thought, a quick image, a quick story—and there would be maybe four to six really quick thoughts before I would really see it and start noting again. As soon as I saw it and noted, it would fall away. There was no real clinging, and when I looked at the thoughts themselves, there was nothing particularly in them that seemed attractive or worthy of clinging. I got really interested. I said, so what's the hook here? I'm clearly aware there is some hook that's drawing me into these little thought stories that in themselves are nothing.

And when I really looked, I saw that with each thought, starting with the first one that came—because this kept happening—there was a very subtle sense of "I." That clutching, that contraction of me, just subtly identifying with the thought. And that was pleasant. I experienced that little "me" as pleasant. Of course, I wasn't even noticing the little contraction of me, never mind that there was some kind of pleasant feeling to it, or comfortable feeling, or something. That's almost going too far. And in not seeing that, the clinging, the sense of being, would build, and it would start going into one thought, the next, the next, the next. Again, as soon as I saw it, the whole thing would vanish.

So if you can get it, it's quite subtle. But somehow there's the permanent, because there's no "me" if it's not permanent. There's really perceiving what is totally painful—the sense of me is nothing but a burden—and I was perceiving it as pleasant. "Oh yeah, nice. This nice sense of me, so comfortable with this." And not-self is self. What is foul is beautiful—I wasn't as aware of that one, but whenever we're looking, perceiving experience through the veil of one of these four inverted, upside-down perceptions, that's a moment when ignorance arises and increases.

Remembering that why seeing cuts right through. You don't have to think about it. It's like if in that moment I had stopped and said, "Well, which of the four inverted perceptions am I looking at right now?"—off into another unwise attention, which is thinking and analyzing and wondering, in the past, in the future, and at least skeptical doubt, or what the Buddha called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views. Stay out of the wilderness of views and just bring your attention back to what's actually happening right now.

Okay, that's enough about wise attention. So, wise attention: abandoning these underlying potentials through seeing. The second way is abandoning through restraint at the sense doors.

Now again, we've spoken about that a lot. I just want to refresh your memories about how that works in terms of not allowing these underlying tendencies to flower. Obviously, restraint doesn't mean we don't look, we don't see, we don't smell, we don't touch, we don't think. But it means, using Buddhadasa's term, to bring sati-pañña—mindfulness and wisdom—into the mind at the point of sense contact. So we know what's what. So that at the level of perception, there's clear awareness. You smell a pleasant smell, there's the perception "it's pizza," and it ends there. It doesn't go into whatever your whole field of proliferation in papañca is about pizza. You end up in Sicily, you're watching The Godfather. I don't know what your particular things are about pizza. It doesn't have to go that way.

Papañca is the word, and proliferation is the best definition of it. One of the commentaries describes it as the proliferations of mind that assail a person, that obsess a person, that torment a person. If we can bring mindfulness and wisdom in at the point of "pleasant smell, that's a pizza"—release. That's what we mean by restraint at the sense door. Just being right there, as Ajahn Chah says: when you smell a pleasant smell, leave it at the nose. Could we only do that?

There's one other point I find interesting. I don't know if I'm getting too detailed with this tonight, but I thought this is very interesting. As a help for understanding when we're present with our perception at the sense door, how to not let the proliferation grab hold and take over. The Buddha is talking about restraint. He says, "On seeing a form with the eye, one who is practicing restraint does not grasp at the signs and features." These are the particular words he uses, and I'll explain them. So then either desire or aversion doesn't take over.

Now what they mean by not grasping at the signs and features: say there's a form, a person that you've previously thought of as beautiful or attractive. The sign would be the most distinctive, apparent perception that one sees about that person. So, for example, there's just visual form seeing, and immediately there's the shape of that person. Maybe that's the sign, the first distinctive thing that hits your eye, your perception. The unmindful, unrestrained sense door would be this grasping.

"Oh, that's such a beautiful form." Grasping right then. And that's where the whole proliferation begins—either going into desire, if that's the particular bent, or aversion, either at them or at yourself for not being as beautiful, or whatever comparing gets going. That's the sign.

And then the features would be, once that sign is grasped unmindfully, all the other little facets that feed it. So you start with the form, and then you go, "Yeah, they're so beautiful, and look at their hair, and the way that they dress, and they walk so gracefully," and yada, yada, yada. The whole proliferation gets grasped at and going—the details that catch the attention.

But when that first perception is met with mindfulness at the sense door, that's restraint. You're not saying, "No, make craving not arise." You're just seeing form, form, pleasant. It doesn't have to go any farther.

So the first is abandoning these tendencies through wise seeing. And again, it's not "I am going to rip out this tendency, root it up, extirpate it." It's not a sense of "I'm abandoning." It's just that they lose their potency through wise seeing, through restraint at the sense doors.

The third one I find quite interesting, and we're moving into the bigger picture here. This is wise attention to the attitude with which we use things, with which we use the requisites for our life. Now, the Buddha was talking to monks and nuns, but it's the same for us. What's the attitude with which we use food, with which we use clothing, with which we relate to shelter?

We can use whatever we need with care, with simplicity, taking just what we need for comfort—not having to be some kind of harsh ascetic, taking what we need, but not out of a kind of greed: "I better take extra in case there's not more later." Not out of fear, not out of a sense of "I need more now because there's not enough to go around, too bad for you."

You can see on this planet what's happening to the environment. If we all just related to using what we need with this wise attention, with a sense of paying attention to the attitude with which we use what we need, this planet would be a vastly different place. I don't think we'd be having all the environmental problems that we're having.

But not even looking at the really big scale—just beginning to explore here in our lives—we can see in little ways: How are we relating to the food? And this is not to get into judgment, thinking "I'm taking more than I need" when you're really in the grip of craving and you can't stop it. Pay attention. Just pay attention to that. But there are plenty of times when we're really not paying attention, and we could, to the attitude with which we use things.

When we do pay attention and just take what we need, when we don't let ourselves be run by fear and greed, it brings such an ease and simplicity into the way one relates to one's life, to the environment, to our requisites.

A little example: when I'm on retreat, usually I just take what food is there. Somehow over the years it's gotten to be not such a big deal. Every now and then I'll think, "I better take an extra banana because some mornings there's not a banana and I really like bananas better than oranges." And I'll take that banana. It's never anything but trouble. It sits in my room. I don't remember to bring it up to breakfast, or there are bananas for the next ten days, or I don't actually want the banana anyway. And then the next day I save extra peanut butter. I have to figure out what to put it in and where to keep it and should I bring it up and then what will people think of me? It balloons into so much grief. It's so much trouble.

If I just forget the banana and take what's there, there's just space. There's ease. There's going to be something to eat tomorrow. So what if it's not a banana? It's so much easier. Or saving five blankets because I know I'm sensitive to cold and it might get cold. And after three months, I haven't used four of them, but I might need one.

Shuffling them around the room and figuring out what to do with them and feeling guilty—just looking at how we use stuff.

And it might be that you have low blood sugar and you do have to save something from tea because you need a little snack at ten at night. That's fine. The Buddha, talking about the different requisites, speaks about reflecting wisely on using food—not for amusement or for vanity. That could mean not eating to look good, but also not not eating to look good. Not for embellishment, but for the endurance and continuing of this body, for ending discomfort, and for support of the holy life. And he says then, the person is considering, "Thus shall I terminate old, unwholesome feelings without arousing new ones"—in other words, without getting into massive craving—"and shall live in comfort and health."

There's nothing wrong with a level of basic comfort, using what we need to maintain a level of comfort and health that supports us in our path of awakening. That's useful. And whatever is true, we need wise attention to see what's true for us. What's true for me and what's true for you of what we need to eat can be vastly different, and it doesn't matter. That's why comparing is such a useless waste of time. Not that we can drop it, but it is.

Really looking at the attitude with which you use things—this wise discernment, this looking at what really supports my ease and comfort and my path of awakening—that brings such a simplicity, such a sense of trust. I don't have to save the banana. I don't need ten rice cakes back on those back shelves. There'll be something. I can let go into the Dharma and trust the arising moment. It's a very powerful way of paying attention.

When we're operating in that way, when we're paying attention to the attitude, then the underlying tendencies of greed, holding on to sense of self, the fear that comes with ignorance—they just don't have the chance to arise. Whereas saving the thing with the idea of "I won't get hungry later" is actually setting the conditions for all these unwholesome potentials to arise. So explore that while you're here. But obviously, it's the same in our life. And this is a way that we can really use our daily life to support the purification of our heart and mind—paying attention to how we use things.

The next two we've talked about quite a bit. I'll just say a little. The next one is removing these underlying tendencies through what the translation calls "enduring." I'll use patience as an aspect of mettā. But we've talked ad nauseam about this. It's basically that the patient heart and mind is the one that is present and spacious and able to be here without reacting when we don't like what's happening.

The Buddha gives examples—and you can really hear how they lived, the forest life. He gives the examples of what can be abandoned by enduring: "Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with flies, wind, burning and creeping things. He endures ill-spoken, unwelcome words, and bodily feelings that are painful, racking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life."

Enduring is not gritting our teeth with low-level aversion and saying, "I'm sitting here until the bell rings and I can move." Enduring, as we know, is really the patient quality of mind that's open, present, non-reactive. And we've talked a lot about that.

But notice the next one, and these two kind of pair together in my mind—it needs wise discernment to tell which is which. Because the next one is removal by avoiding. First there's enduring, but then there's avoiding. And this is where we need to use wise discernment—that those things which are really unsupportive, unskillful, or downright dangerous to our practice or our life, if one can, one avoids them. This is a way of helping us to abandon the tendency for these difficult states to arise.

Now again, his examples: "Reflecting wisely, one avoids a savage elephant, a savage bull, a savage dog, a snake." We're talking a different culture here.

A stump. A chasm. A cliff. A cesspool. A sewer. Frequenting bad friends or unwholesome companions.

Here, sometimes the savage elephant might be something in your mind. It might be a person. Say, sometimes you know a little thing gets going with someone—not just that you get on each other's nerves, that happens—but sometimes you get a nice little thing going with someone here. You start kind of looking at each other, or you start joking in a silent way, something that feels good, but actually, if you pay attention, it's taking you away from being present. It's not that the person or you are bad, but that's something to avoid.

When we talk about avoidance as a skillful means to help abandon the tendency toward ignorance and greed, we can get into such a macho attitude: "I should be able to be mindful in the middle of everything. I should be able to be with the most difficult circumstances. And if I'm not, it's because I'm not good enough. I'm wimping out."

But look at the environment we've set up here. We're begging you not to get your mail, not to make phone calls, not to talk to each other. We don't have news bulletins or the BBC set up in the lobby telling you what's going on every night. It's a really protected environment. Does that mean you're all a bunch of wimps because you can't do this in the middle of Fifth Avenue in New York City? We really need to look at what supports our awareness. With wise discernment, when we can make a decision to avoid something, please do so. There will be plenty that we can't avoid, and that's when we use patience or endurance.

When I was in Thailand for about a year as a nun, these two were a really rich area of exploration—finding the wise discernment to walk the difference between what I really could avoid and what I couldn't avoid but wished I could. At first I saw that I really had to learn patience, because there's so much that's difficult. You go to Asia thinking, "I'm going to have this silent retreat in nature." Forget it. Half the time I was in Bangkok in the middle of the hot season—extremely unpleasant. Take my word for it. And I like hot weather.

When I finally got out of Bangkok, the food was really difficult for me to eat. I hadn't eaten meat in probably fifteen years, and all the food had greasy meat in it. And when I finally got to a lovely little temple in the jungle—you think the jungle is silent. Go sit in a jungle. It is so noisy. Snakes all over the place, poisonous snakes just flopping down on the roof. Incredible insect life. Not to mention the tourists who come to the temples for picnics. You're just doing walking meditation, you turn around, and there's someone with a camera right in your face the second you turn around. "Oh, let me take a picture of the cute nun." How to develop patience! I spent months cultivating aversion until I finally noticed: I think maybe I have a choice here. Did I come to cultivate aversion? No, I don't think so.

Patience—a mind like the earth that doesn't react no matter what's thrown on it—that's the way of peace. And once there is that patience, then wise discernment arises about what actually could be avoided.

For example, I didn't particularly like any of the food, but some of it really made me ill. That's appropriate to avoid if you have the choice, without making trouble. As a nun, you can't ask for something special. Or I found that I could put a sheet over the door of my kuti so tourists didn't come and just stand there staring in to see what the cute nun looked like when she was meditating. That's quite okay—avoiding something that's just going to bring up the tendencies. But when you can't avoid, there's patience. Both are very skillful and very helpful.

So we look at that here, and again, with wise seeing and skillful means, it's always arising from the intention.

Avoiding is not from the intention of hatred. It's from the intention of clear seeing. Oh, when I keep going into this situation, I get lost in anger. I go to this walking place, somebody else is there, I get lost in anger. You do that ten days in a row and you think, maybe I'll go to a different walking place. That's skillful avoidance. It's not from aversion.

So let's see if I can name these: wise seeing, restraint at the sense doors, how we use things, patience, wise avoidance. The sixth method is called removing. Again, I think we need to use different words for this. But it's when restraint at the sense door didn't quite happen and a strong, unwholesome state of mind and heart has taken hold, has taken root. It could be a strong, greedy series of thoughts, a really self-centered series of thoughts, aversive, fearful—whatever it is—that we can actually abandon continuing to feed the habit of these tendencies arising by, quote, removing the unwholesome emotion or train of thought.

Now that's not what we think about when we first start practice, which is literally removing, done with a lot of aversion. It's the basic mindfulness we've talked about all along.

I'll take anger again since we've talked about it. Bringing awareness to the anger itself, to the thoughts that are feeding it—but I am right. Isn't that one of the biggest hooks to keeping anger going? They are acting like a jerk. It isn't appropriate in this environment. Somebody really does need to do something. And no one but me is noticing, so I need to do something. The practice is to bring awareness in at the point of what is allowing these tendencies already arisen to increase.

Joseph calls this the sword of wisdom, where you can really bring in the mindfulness right at the point of those thoughts and go, okay, that's enough. Not "that's enough, I hate it," but that's enough—with great determination you just bring your mindfulness in at the point of that thought the second you notice it, and again and again. I call it in my mind, when I have some strong thought like that going or strong emotion, being really ruthless with awareness. Ruthless in that that thought, the little tendrils of it, do not get to slip by.

An image that's sometimes given, although it's slightly unwise because there's a little aversion in it, is the cat waiting at the hole for the mouse to come out. If you take away the wanting to pounce and kill, take that part away, and just have that clear attention—not hating the thought, but it's not going to slip by—the sword of wisdom, that quality of resolution, of clear mindfulness, that's removal at that point. It just doesn't keep expanding.

Now, as we all know, that takes great delicacy. And again, the intention cannot be coming from fear or hatred or self-judgment. Because first, it won't work. The fear, the hatred, the self-judgment just gets stronger. If you pay attention, you'll notice that. But every moment that we're mindful, even though it seems the thoughts or the emotion keeps going, that moment of clear recognition is actually cutting the increasing of that underlying tendency. Again, you don't always notice it right away. If we're not mindful, then it's just like a snowball getting bigger and bigger and bigger.

So that's one way of removal: not giving room to expand the unwholesome thoughts, the unwholesome mental states.

There are other ways. One approach—and this a lot of people have been asking about in interviews lately, just trying to get clear on when this is skillful—is almost like thought substitution. It's one of the ways that we can use our training in the brahma-viharas. Take metta. Metta really is the wise intention, the second step of the Eightfold Path, that counteracts the unwise thought of ill will. And applied skillfully, it's really a way of, quote, removal.

Let me give you an example from my experience of skillful and unskillful application. Take ill will—the turning in on yourself kind, worthlessness, self-judging, I'm no good, the whole pattern, if you should happen to have that, however it particularly goes for you. So I see that arising in me, and using metta skillfully means first recognizing that pattern, letting myself feel it, really acknowledging it. I have been watching this pattern for close to thirty years now.

I'm really familiar with it now. I haven't had a surprise in how it works for quite a while. So when I notice it, I really acknowledge its presence, feel it fully. And then it's like saying, "You know, I really don't need to dwell here." In a very clear way, I really don't need to dwell in this pattern, this state of mind. It's like changing the channels—I think I'll change to the metta channel—and I start doing some metta.

Now, I'm not really in aversion to the state, to the self-hatred, and that's what's important. I'm just seeing it. It's what it is. I don't need to go there. And I start doing metta, and usually by about the second set of phrases, I'm really then on the metta channel. The first set of phrases feels, you know, not really true, a bit phony. But by the second set of phrases, the unworthiness isn't there, and the metta is present for that moment.

We can really do this with all the Brahma-viharas, but the key to the skillfulness is that you're not doing the metta out of a fear or hatred of the other state. And you'll know if that's the case because it won't work. If I'm really in self-hatred and it's like, "Oh God, I can't bear this, I don't want to feel this anymore—may I be happy?"—that's not going to work. Or when you're really angry at someone and you say, "Oh, may I send them metta, may they live in peace"—you know it's phony. You have to acknowledge what's really happening first. But you don't have to indulge in it. You don't have to dwell there.

I love that one line of the Buddha's: "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." And we have a choice a lot of the time where the mind will dwell. So this is a way of removal of unwholesome thoughts that is really very skillful if you can do it without the aversion or without greed—switching the channel to the Brahma-viharas.

There's a whole sutta actually, a different one from what I've been discussing, called the Removal of Distracting Thoughts. The Buddha gives five ways, and all of them assume that just being mindful and noticing the thought, it didn't poof away. We're assuming that to begin with.

The first one is just what I was describing—changing the channel. The second is for when that still doesn't work. You switch to metta, and you're still caught in "I hate myself, I hate everybody, I hate myself, I hate everybody." So you can examine the danger and the suffering of those thoughts. Or if it's clinging and you're really caught in wanting something, examining the danger and the suffering in that. Sometimes that will remove it.

The third, if the first two don't work, is to try to forget those thoughts and give your attention to something else. This is a bit like what I said under avoidance. You're really caught in desire, in lust, and you can't get away from it. Looking at it, you're just getting lost. So you move your attention elsewhere. Go back to the breath. Count the breaths. Do walking meditation and just feel the feet. Get connected to something else.

If that doesn't work, the Buddha says, then try to give attention to looking at what's causing those thoughts. This might take a little bit of active investigation, but sometimes when you get to the root of what's causing it, that causes the thought to cease—the removal of it, so to speak. For example, I know that if I'm caught in an anger loop and I'm really noting the anger, I come back, I know the sensations, I'm really there, but it keeps zooming up—I know I'm not really seeing what's at the root of it. And sometimes if I really go in, I'll find, for example, hurt.

And once I see the hurt, oh, that's at the root of it. The other story goes away. I can be with the hurt. That's an example.

And then the fifth—I'm just including this because I want you to know it wasn't easy then either. If none of these other methods work, and mindfulness of course didn't work, if there still arise unwholesome thoughts connected with desire, with hate, and with delusion, then—and I'm quoting—"with the teeth clenched and the tongue pressed against the roof of the mouth, one should beat down, constrain, and crush the unwholesome state of mind with a wholesome state of mind."

You can tell he was from a warrior class. But I'm sure we've all been there. May a wholesome state arise. So that's removal.

And the last approach, coming full circle again back to meditation and wise attention, is developing and cultivating the seven factors of enlightenment. If you've been attending the talks by Sayadaw U Pandita, that's what his teachings have been about throughout this retreat. Obviously I can only mention them briefly, but I will mention them.

The seven factors of enlightenment, which all have to come into balance, are: mindfulness, and then the three energizing factors—investigation of dhammas, energy or courageous effort, and rapture. The three calming ones are concentration, tranquility, and equanimity.

Mindfulness you can never have too much of. It doesn't ever go out of balance. And that's the first. The proximate cause, the immediate cause for mindfulness to arise—guess what? Mindfulness. One moment of mindfulness, however weak, helps the next moment of mindfulness to arise and be a little stronger. So we just start with mindfulness.

I want to give a very brief description of each of the other six.

Investigation, dhamma vicaya, is not thinking about things. It has nothing to do with thought. It's a quality, a mental factor, that lights up the field of awareness so that whatever's arising can be seen clearly. It dissipates confusion. It illuminates whatever's arising. Sometimes actually literally as if a light, but not necessarily—it's as if everything is a fog and suddenly, ah, that's wanting. A moment of investigation. For all the other six besides mindfulness, the direct cause for their arising is wise attention. Wise attention is very powerful.

The next is viriya, or courageous effort. If you think of it in the way Joseph talked about it—as courage rather than huge energy—we can find the courage to just meet what's happening. That's courageous effort. The amount, the degree of it goes up and down. But the courage to come face to face with what is. Persistence or endurance.

And the third energizing factor is pīti, rapture. It's a mental state that has the characteristics of happiness, of a real delight in what is happening. It manifests as a genuine interest, that kind of delight. Wow, my feet are killing me—how fascinating, you know? It doesn't really matter what's going on. Delight and satisfaction. Those times when you're just really interested. There's a lightness in the mind and a lightness in the body. And it doesn't really matter what's happening if you're satisfied with it. That's part of rapture. Rapture can also color other mental states that are happening so they feel very satisfying. Oh, this sense of ease is so great. It just colors everything.

And it has a real bodily quality that goes along with it. When there's rapture in the mind, this delight, this satisfaction, the body also feels light, kind of agile, supple. It's not a problem. You don't feel like you're dragging the factors around with you. It feels like the body can do whatever it needs to do. It's not troubling you too much. And often there are a lot of physical sensations with rapture, often weird ones that you would never think of as having anything to do with rapture.

Shaking, floors undulating, or just a kind of whiteness, or bugs crawling all over—so many weird things can arise. But the mental state of rapture is this suppleness, this delight, this interest in what is happening.

Rapture then leads directly to the beginning of the calming factors, the first of which is tranquility. Tranquility or calm—cool calmness, it could be said. It really means non-agitation of mind and body. The heat that comes from restlessness and anxiety and suffering and all of that energy—tranquility takes that away. It's that state when the mind and body are just really calm and not agitated. That's all, really. It's very cool, obviously pleasant, a sense of ease.

The next calming factor is concentration, which we've talked about a lot. Again, its quality is collectedness of mind and attention, steadiness on whatever's arising. It doesn't have to be long-term concentration. If you're doing absorption practice, it stays steady on one object. In vipassanā, that steadiness is on changing objects. So there's a moment of steady concentration, attention sinking into what's happening. The next moment is a different arising appearance, but there's that same steadiness—concentration arising moment to moment to moment. It's not one continuous thing; it's arising moment to moment. But even though the objects are changing, concentration can arise steadily without a break. Steadiness of mindfulness is what leads to this steadiness of concentration.

The last of the calming factors is equanimity, or upekkhā, which we know is the non-reactive quality of mind—very connected, very non-reactive. But there's another way of thinking about it in relationship to these factors of enlightenment: it's a balance of mind that actually balances all the other energies. For example, when wisdom and faith are out of balance—this has been talked about—there's a lot of energy when faith is out of balance, but you can be so energized you don't know what's happening. When there's too much wisdom, you're thinking and analyzing and thinking about the Dharma, but you're not actually present. When they're balanced, equanimity is there—this energy that's in the middle and balances all the other factors.

What it feels like is a sense, a state of ease, when the mindfulness is just going on by itself. Everything feels balanced and easy. The mind isn't getting caught up, going to one side or the other. That's another aspect of equanimity.

So I name these factors so you recognize them. They all need to be balanced, which happens naturally through our mindfulness practice. But knowing what they are can be helpful. Occasionally, when you're feeling really out of balance and can't figure out what's going on, sometimes it helps to just mentally go through a checklist of the seven factors of enlightenment in a very calm way. Sometimes you realize, "Oh, there's no calm going on right now. There's no tranquility. I'm really alert, things are really interesting, but I'm totally agitated with it." Oh, that's interesting—and then the equanimity begins to kick in, begins to balance.

So that's the seventh method.

As for how to cultivate the seven factors, I'll close with this quote from the Buddha on how it all works together:

Mindfulness of breathing, when developed and repeatedly practiced, fulfills the four foundations of mindfulness. The four foundations of mindfulness, when developed and repeatedly practiced, perfect the seven factors of enlightenment.

It happens by itself.

The seven factors of enlightenment, when developed and cultivated, fulfill true knowledge and deliverance.

It all starts with awareness of breathing, with wise attention.

CHAPTER 355

Pursuit of Happiness

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson examines one of the most fundamental misunderstandings in spiritual practice: confusing pleasant experiences with true happiness. Drawing from her own early practice, she describes how even transcendent meditative states can become just another form of seeking pleasure, keeping us trapped in the same cycles of grasping and aversion.
>
> Wilson illuminates the Buddha's teaching on the three unwholesome roots—greed, hatred, and delusion—showing how they arise moment by moment through our reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences. She explains how mindfulness practice allows us to see these deeply conditioned habits clearly, creating space to respond rather than react. Through personal examples and practical guidance, she demonstrates how bare attention held with kindness can transform our relationship to difficult experiences, opening us to unexpected joy and connection.
>
> The talk deepens into contemplation of impermanence as the gateway to genuine peace. Wilson shares poetry and stories that illuminate how truly accepting change—not just intellectually but in our bones—liberates the heart from its constant struggle to control experience. She emphasizes that this acceptance is not resignation but rather the foundation for compassionate action, freeing tremendous energy previously consumed by resistance and fear. The teaching points toward a happiness that is independent of conditions, available in any moment through awakened presence to things exactly as they are.

The attraction for me in the early days of my practice to Buddhism and meditation specifically was the philosophy of what the Buddha spoke of. He was always so clear that what he was teaching was the highest happiness—the ending of suffering, the sure heart's release.

In a way, and this sounds kind of crass, I didn't put it to myself that way at the time, but the sense was: well, that's what to go for in life, the highest sense of happiness, whatever will make me truly, lastingly happy. And I feel, talking to people who come on retreat, that in one way or another, this tends to be what draws us to go through this rather difficult and sometimes strange process—a kind of hope or faith, or whatever word is suitable for you, of some higher happiness, some greater sense of serenity or ease in one's life.

In first practicing, in my first retreat, and in many people's, you might touch moments of what seems like a higher happiness, or a sense that we're somehow heading in the right direction. It could be the momentary peace of concentration, that bliss of a unified mind. It might be an ecstatic sense of interconnection. It might just be the simplicity of peace, of being fully present. There's a whole range of things it can be.

For some time in my practice, it was experiences like that which kept me coming back, thinking, "Oh yes, this shows I'm heading in the right direction." And it really took a while before I began to get it on some deep level that all this was is a continuation of the search for pleasure. I was taking pleasant experience—maybe a little more transcendent, maybe a little more subtle than I experienced in my daily life—and equating that with true happiness.

What the Buddha is talking about, and what our meditation practice here is about, is finding that the true happiness the Buddha was speaking about is of a whole other order. What most of us think of as happiness is not what the Buddha was speaking about as the true source of happiness, the true heart's release. We mostly don't know what true happiness is.

A lot of what I think our practice here is about is finding out what we're doing wrong, so to speak—how we're relating to our lives and the world in a way that rather than furthering our happiness, keeps us spinning in confusion. What is it that the Buddha is talking about? What is it we're doing here that can open us into experience of real happiness?

It's a common misconception, and I find myself, when I'm not really being aware, falling into it often, that meditation practice or this process of purification is somehow going to create in ourselves or in our minds a subtler, more eternal kind of state. We're going to create some transcendent other reality in which we will live, from which we will relate to this mundane world of affairs and somehow float on a cloud somewhere, or be the serene Buddha in the midst of it. We think we've got to create something different, get away from who we are, from what we are, from what's happening now.

What we begin to awaken to—and this is a practice of awakening, Buddha really means one who is awakened—is that this is a much more radical proposition. We're not trying to get out of this reality or create some other reality from which we look back. We discover that that which we're seeking, whatever way you describe it to yourself, maybe you don't even describe it to yourself, but somehow there's an impulse for happiness or unity or completion or something that drives us on. And what's so radical about this practice of awareness is that it allows us to begin to awaken to the fact that that which we seek is always and only accessible in the immediacy of the here and now—whatever experience happens to be represented as here and now.

We're awakening into fullness of presence, to full aliveness, connection, and acceptance of this moment. Fully, totally this moment—and in that is where true peace and happiness can be found. Never by looking to something else to somehow create another reality.

So whether it's an itch that's arising, sadness, total boredom or doubt, just the pure breath or ecstasy, pain, a footstep—it doesn't matter what. Each experience, as it arises, is like a messenger. It's like a calling to say: awaken now. I'm your gateway in this moment to the possibility to awaken to my essential inner completion. In moving away from this pain, in moving away from this happiness, in any way trying to construct something other, we're effectively bringing down the blinders and not noticing what is always accessible to us.

And that's the paradox of spiritual practice: if our truest nature, this pure awareness—as Joseph spoke about last night—a pure awareness that is absolutely untouched by any arising experience, if this pure awareness is always present and accessible to us, why don't we notice it? If it's so obvious—and this is the paradox of practice—it's said this way in one Tibetan text. I just love this little poem:

Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few of us see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that this Buddha mind is never impaired or improved on in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease in whatever happens.

Just resting at ease in whatever happens. It's so simple. Why do we have so much trouble doing this? Just resting at ease with awake intelligence and quite accepting open awareness within whatever happens. Not our natural inclination, is it?

Yet we all have moments of it. Joseph referred to a moment like that in his talk last night, and someone mentioned it to me today—a moment where there's just a sense of ease, of presence. It might be, as Joseph was talking about, when you feel so vividly awake and connected, and somehow the shimmering leaves of the tree seem so exquisite. Or someone mentioned today just really being present for eating, being with one's meal, maybe for the first time. Or it can happen just taking a footstep—there's just this sense of such peace, such ease, such presence. It can happen no matter what we're doing. And if you're paying attention, we all experience moments of this, more or less frequently.

What these moments are pointing to is that it has nothing to do with what's actually happening in that moment. The leaves of the tree aren't suddenly more vivid. The breakfast wasn't suddenly a superior breakfast to any we've ever had in our life. That footstep wasn't somehow different from other footsteps. But we tend to take that moment, and instead of noticing just that ease, that awakeness, that vivid awareness that has nothing to do with what's happening but knows what's happening, we instead fixate on the wrong thing. We tend to keep looking to changing conditions.

So if the leaves were beautiful and it was two in the afternoon, we'll try again at two in the afternoon when the sun's a certain way, and we've had a cup of tea, to go look and see if we can hit that space again—without realizing that it's got nothing to do with those external or internal conditions. It's only that in that moment there was an awakeness, a heart and mind that was free of resistance, free of grasping or clinging, that was in no way reacting or trying to change or resist what was happening. Just total awakeness and presence. That's really what allows us to rest at ease in what is happening and to notice the potential for serenity and peace within whatever is happening.

So if you have a moment like that, see if you can just notice the whole show and not fixate on the changing conditions. Because that's our tendency, whether it's so-called external conditions—the weather, the way we're sitting, the clothes we brought, the way other people behave, the food we're eating, the schedule, whatever. We tend to focus on those conditions as what can make ease and peace possible or not. They might be more or less pleasant, and again we're confusing pleasant with true happiness, with peace. We do the same with internal conditions: our state of mind, our thoughts, the absence or presence of physical discomfort. We try to somehow arrange and manipulate these conditions, and if we can get them in the right order, in the right coming together, then—ah, this is peace, this is happiness.

And all the while we're not noticing, although it's so obvious we would all agree when it's pointed out, that there is no condition, so-called external or internal, that lasts. Everything is changing. If we're positing any sense of happiness, any sense of true peace on any changing condition whatsoever, we're in trouble. But because things change so fast, it's always easy to say, "Well, this one didn't do it," and somehow our mind leaps to the next one, or thinks we can get this one back again when it changes. We somehow don't stop and look at what's really going on.

And that's the whole purpose of our meditation. It gives us the clarity, the focus, and the tools to actually begin to look inward and see what's going on. It's said that the Buddha said upon his enlightenment that he felt so much compassion for all of us in our human state because he could feel, he could see, that most deeply at the core, every person, every one of us—and this sounds simplistic, but I really believe it's true—at our deepest core each of us truly wants to be happy. But through our not seeing what is so about ourselves, about the nature of the world, through not really understanding what is so, many of our efforts to bring happiness to ourselves and others actually only succeed in increasing our confusion, in increasing our sense of struggle, because we don't know what true happiness is.

Mark Epstein is a psychiatrist who has also been a practicing Buddhist meditator for a long time, and he writes about happiness: "My experience as a psychiatrist trained in Western medicine and in the philosophy and practice of Buddhism has given me a unique perspective. I have come to see that our problem is that we don't know what happiness is. We confuse happiness with a life uncluttered by feelings of anxiety, rage, doubt, and sadness. But happiness is something entirely different. It's the ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning."

He's saying happiness is the ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning. And I would actually go a step further: that non-reactivity of mind—in any one moment, we're not talking about every moment of life, just take one moment—when there's this total receptivity, non-reactivity of mind to whatever's arising, in that moment of alertness and stillness, that gives the potential, the possibility to recognize something much more true than our passing reactions. A place of awareness from which whatever arises is not a problem.

So I want to talk a little bit about this habit of grasping at the pleasant and condemning the unpleasant—a very strong and subtle habit of our mind. What we can begin to notice, using our tools of mindfulness and concentration, is how these habits of conditioning are working on a moment-to-moment basis. We can see how they arise, how they lead us to certain forms of mental, physical, and vocal behavior.

And by paying attention, we can see how those behaviors don't really work, how these habits of mind aren't actually serving us. So a great deal of our practice is beginning to observe this.

Taking it on a real moment-to-moment basis—not theoretically—you can begin to notice how this happens. When we pay attention to what we're experiencing on the basic level of bare attention, Buddhist psychology reveals six different types of experience that arise over and over: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical sensation, and then the whole field of mental experience—thinking, emotions, mental images. These are what Buddhist terminology calls the six senses, with mind being the sixth sense. All that's really happening is these six things arising over and over and over. And then we make up story, which is just another mental experience arising.

As each experience comes—say a sight arises—we experience it as being either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. But when we're not really looking, this seems somehow intrinsic to the experience itself. I look out and there's seeing, and it's just this pleasant feeling. Without paying attention, the habit of mind moves to "Oh, that's nice, I like it." And it could stop there, or it could become "I really like it, I'd like to go out and really be with it and see it more"—this grasping at the pleasant. If it's unpleasant, the rain comes and it's cold, the body shrinks away, the mind contracts: "I don't like that, I don't want to feel this, let's do something to change it." And when it's neutral, most of the time we tend not to even notice it. We ignore it. And often—notice this in your own experience—we almost experience the neutral as unpleasant, and our mind will create something more stimulating to wake us up.

These are what the Buddha called the three unwholesome roots of mind that lead to suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion or confusion—based on reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. This is so important because it's happening almost every moment, and we're so accustomed to it, and it happens so fast, that we don't notice it's a habit of mind. The reactivity to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral becomes like a filter through which we judge and evaluate experience. Without paying attention, when you're sitting here and you have a pleasant sitting or pleasant conversation, it translates almost as: "This is right, this is good, this is how it's supposed to be. I've got to make it happen more." When it's unpleasant—we're restless, there's pain in the knee—it's not only unpleasant, it's wrong. It's a mistake. Something isn't happening the right way and we've got to do something to change it. And when it's neutral, forget it. We go off into daydreams. Sometimes we'll actually find our mind creating whole scenarios that are quite unpleasant, as a reaction to hanging out with neutral.

In fact, often on retreats people come in to talk about their experience and they'll say, "Oh, nothing's happening and I don't like it." "So there's calmness?" "Oh yeah," they'll say, "I guess that's calm. I don't know what to do with calm." The mind starts creating suffering scenarios. We don't know how to be with neutral. And in a way, neutral can be so pleasant, so wonderful.

Thich Nhat Hanh talks a lot about this. One example he gives: when we have a toothache, it's so painful, so unpleasant. When it stops, it's like, "Ah, how wonderful—no toothache!" But when we don't have a toothache—and most of the time we don't—do we even notice? Tune into your teeth right now. It's really quite nice if they're just neutral. It's actually quite pleasant, quite peaceful. But we don't notice that.

I was at a movie a few weeks ago—I don't even remember which one—but the coming attraction was for Die Hard with a Vengeance. It starts with this humongous explosion that practically blows you three feet back in your seat, and it just gets worse from there, so intense. I was thinking, "My God, that's our culture." No wonder we don't know what to do with calmness or neutral experience. We're so hyped up in this culture that everything has to keep getting more and more intense just to get our attention. That's a little aside.

But anyway, really begin noticing your experience. Have you found that this sense of pleasant becomes a basis for your whole evaluation of how your practice is going? Does it become a filter for your self-judgment? You have a really "good" sitting, meaning basically it's pleasant. How many of you have had a sitting where you were restless, where there was pain in your knee, where your mind was wandering, and you came away saying, "That was a really good sitting"? But we have to have sittings like that. There's no such thing as only pleasant. I don't know if you've noticed this in life, but there's no such thing as only pleasant. Yet somehow we tend to operate from the assumption that unpleasantness is a mistake, and we're going to fix it.

Well, a retreat is just the same way. There's no such thing as only pleasant.

When you have a sitting like the unpleasant one I described, the evaluation is so common: "This is wrong, I'm not doing it right, I'm a bad meditator." Or we reverse it outward: "This is the stupidest practice I ever heard of, and clearly they don't know what they're talking about. It's a waste of time." Either way, there's no sense of equanimity. There's no sense of peace, of spaciousness. We're making our happiness, we're making our rightness, we're making truth dependent on things being pleasant, meeting our expectations, being how we want them. That's a setup, definitely, for deep suffering.

Our practice lets us begin to see these patterns. Without the awareness, it's like we're living blindly, following these habits of mind. It's like we're in the ruts on the road here.

It makes me think of when we drove in. Joseph and I and Grove and some friends drove in two cars on Friday. It was really raining that day, and the roads were muddy and soupy. Franz and I were in a car with two friends—just a rental car, some Ford. It wasn't four-wheel drive, and it had very low clearance. We're driving behind Grove's big Suburban, sliding all over, really muddy. The friend who was driving was really good, but he was going all over. It was tough. Each corner we'd come around would be harder than the next. And Grove kept calling back, "Get in the ruts, get in the ruts, you've got to get in the ruts!" He finally stopped us and came back and said, "Wes, you've got to get in the ruts."

So it was really funny—Wes was going, "Get in the ruts, get in the ruts, get in the ruts," and finally, bang, in the ruts. And then you're really stuck in them.

I felt like that's how we are when we're blindly following these tendencies. Because for our car, the ruts didn't necessarily work. They'd work for a little while, and then suddenly there'd be this huge hump and the whole bottom of the car felt like it was scraping off. "Oh no, the oil pan, the oil pan! Get out of the ruts, get out of the ruts!" The whole thing was just this dance. And once you're in the ruts, you can't get out of them anymore.

What our practice really lets us do is begin to see the ruts and how they're working—this rut of blindly following pleasure, of blindly moving away from the unpleasant, of totally spacing out when it's neutral. When you can see the rut, sometimes it works. As Joseph said, if your hand's in a fire, it's a good idea to follow the moving away from the unpleasant. But there are plenty of times that it just doesn't work. There are plenty of unpleasant experiences that we're not going to be able to move away from.

When we can see how those ruts work, we can also see when it's helpful to move out of the ruts. Then we have the whole field of experience available, and we can act and respond appropriately—not out of blind reactivity.

If you reflect on it, watch over these days: how much of our physical and mental activity is just to forget ourselves? How much of the time are we physically or mentally just blindly trying to move away from discomfort, trying to get away from something unpleasant?

There's a whole little practice in Vipassana that one teacher in Thailand used to teach, which is just this: every time you move throughout the day, watch why you move. Notice how much of our movement happens as a slight discomfort comes up and we move. Not that we have to stay and hurt—I'm not saying that—but just begin to see how much of our activity is a mask for slight discomfort, how much is trying to move towards pleasure.

If this scenario worked—if chasing pleasure and avoiding pain actually led to lasting happiness—none of us would be here. So it's about finding, within all of that, how we don't have to be so driven, how we don't have to be caught by this dualism.

This is where our mindfulness and concentration begin to serve us, begin to help us learn how to see through this conditioning over and over. And that seeing through gives us the space to respond appropriately.

Regarding mindfulness, there are a couple of aspects I want to emphasize. The first is this quality of attention—bringing the attention into the actual experience that's arising, whether it's a physical sensation or a sound or a sight or a thought or an emotion. Bringing the attention into the actual experience rather than confusing the interpretation with the experience. The only way we can come into the experience is when the mindfulness is held in an air of kindness, of softness, of loving-kindness and acceptance toward whatever is arising.

An experience comes up—say it's a physical sensation of pain in the knee, as Joseph was talking about in the instructions today. Mindfulness is non-discriminating. It doesn't say, "Hmm, should I pay attention to this? Should I pay attention to that?" As soon as something arises, the mindfulness moves directly to it in a non-discriminating way, meeting it with an attitude of real softness and openness.

You could say an affectionate curiosity. Just feeling: what is this? Just being with it without any preconceived notions.

And the concentration gives us the focus to stay with the actual experience—the twinging or the burning or the twisting—as distinct from, "Oh my God, I don't know how I'm going to get to a hospital in time, and what if it rains? It takes hours to get out of here." That's not the experience. It's just a twinge. It's amazing, the transformation that can happen when we use our mindfulness to be with the experience itself. It changes our whole relationship, not only to it, but to everything else.

I'll give you a little example. A couple of weeks ago I was teaching a retreat in Barre. And for some reason I was very physically tired and heavy, quite exhausted, but I couldn't find any reason for it. I wasn't particularly overworked or anything. And I lived just about two minutes down the road by car, so I was driving home. I was aware of being tired and feeling the physical heaviness, but it wasn't mindfulness. The difference being: "Oh, I'm so tired, I'm so heavy. I wonder what's going on. Maybe I must be getting sick. There must be some resurgence of disease. There's something really serious going on. I really hate it. I feel so horrible. There's eight more days of teaching. I'm so heavy." This is not mindfulness. This is really aversion and resistance.

But often we can fool ourselves, because there was also a knowing of the fact that I was heavy and I was feeling the heaviness—but not with the bare attention that just feels the heaviness alone, and not with the attitude of affectionate caring, of open patience and acceptance of what is. It's a total interpretation.

And I caught it, what I was doing. All it took was just a minute, just to say, "Oh, be with heaviness." I mean, that wasn't like, "You stupid jerk, be with heaviness." That's also not mindfulness. It was just, "Oh, right, I'm thinking about it." And it was as if I let my attention just gently drop into feeling heavy and tired in my body. That's all. I just kept driving.

And I saw that in that moment, although before I knew there was heaviness, the aversion—the way aversion works in the mind is it will keep your attention a little bit away from the experience. Like, I know it's heavy, but let's just hold it over there and not quite really sink into it. Notice that when you have a pain, you kind of hover around it. We sort of look at it, but we don't want to quite go there.

So I just dropped into it. Full surrender. Just feeling heavy and aversive and tired and fearful. No expectation of anything. It's amazing—the whole response to that changed. I just thought, "Oh yeah, heaviness, tiredness, that's okay." It was really okay. It didn't feel any different, but it was really okay, and all the other story went away. I was just being heavy and tired.

And all of a sudden, without any kind of conscious volition—and this is what happens when you really are mindfully open to what's happening, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant—the whole field opened up. My heart just opened up. It was such a beautiful day. The spring was coming out, the trees were budding, and I suddenly had this burst of joy and connection with the environment, with what else was going on. That's really what happens when we open fully to whatever's presenting itself as truth in that moment.

It's just the opposite of what we might think if we don't pay attention. It seems that if I don't really let myself feel the aversion or feel the pain, if I can just a little bit keep it in the background, then things will be okay and I can kind of appreciate life more. And it's just the reverse. If we try to hold away the unpleasant, we can't open selectively. We can't ignore the unpleasant and open to beauty and connection. We need to be connected with whatever's happening. And when we soften into—"Oh yeah, unpleasantness, tiredness"—boom, the beautiful day is also suddenly apparent. A sense of self-acceptance can also be there.

It's just a moment. It's just a little thing. But that's what our life is made up of—just these little moments. And that's really what we're learning how to do: hold our attention in this attitude of open-hearted acceptance. It cuts through these deeply conditioned habits of running away from the unpleasant and our ceaseless pursuit of happiness through pleasure, which ultimately doesn't work.

So the patience, the kindness, the acceptance is what lets us come back over and over when there's a difficult experience. We also come back over and over when there's a pleasant experience too. We're not only going to the difficult. But it's important, and one of the reasons we tend to emphasize the difficult more is because our habit is much more ingrained to try to avoid it. And it's this avoidance that keeps us closed to truth, that keeps us closed to true connection with our own self, with our own hearts, and with that of all others.

There's a saying from Rumi: "Paradise is surrounded by what we dislike, and the fires of hell are surrounded by what we desire." So we tend to go towards what we desire and land in hell. And if we can just open to what we dislike, we land in paradise. It's somehow the opposite of the way we might think it is.

The more we can practice this, it's not like all of a sudden everything changes. But even one moment of coming out of the rut of following habit and just opening into what is—you can begin to see how transforming it is. It opens us into another possibility altogether for how we relate to ourselves and to life. And this is really the intimation of the potential for true serenity and peace: the possibility to be with things just as they are, to meet ourselves and our experience and others with a true kindness. Not the kindness of a kind of idiocy—idiot compassion—but the true kindness that, by being with things in totality as they are, opens our hearts and our minds to the potential for liberating understanding.

It absolutely transforms our life because we meet things with a peace that is not dependent on having a situation be a certain way—because there's no way we can control that. And it might seem like a long way to come from just noticing our reactions to pleasant and unpleasant, but this is very profound, as subtle as it is.

This is from the Buddha. It might sound a little archaic, but see if it makes sense. He says: "Someone seeing objects with the eye"—and then he goes through all the different senses, so we'll just talk about seeing—"someone who is attracted to things that are pleasing and repelled by things that are unpleasing," stuck in these ruts, "that person dwells without mindfulness and her mind is restricted. She does not experience the emancipation of heart through wisdom. But another person, seeing objects with the eye, is not attracted to things that are pleasant and is not repelled by things that are unpleasing. So she dwells with mindfulness present and her mind is unbounded. Thus she experiences the emancipation of heart through wisdom."

Simply by being able to be so equanimous that we're not drawn helplessly into the pleasant and repelled by the unpleasant, our mind is unbounded and we experience emancipation of heart through wisdom. To me that's a really profound statement. And it's also very immediate. It's not like some impossible ideal a million years down the road. In any one moment, it's possible to see the difference between the restrictedness of heart and mind by being caught in desire and aversion, and a moment of that boundlessness of heart and mind when we're just present without needing things to change, really awake.

This is not a kind of equanimity of indifference, a kind of gray "who can tell the difference, it's pleasant, it's unpleasant, who cares, I'll take whatever comes, I can't change what happens in life, this person's mistreating me, that's okay because it's all the same anyway, there's nothing I can do." I'm not talking about a kind of acceptance of resignation or defeatism or fear, but really that sense of unbounded serenity that arises from seeing things as they are.

Actually, acceptance and patience—clearly meeting what happens—arises because of seeing things as they are. And so when we're seeing something clearly, if something is abusive or needs to change and it can be changed, there's the spaciousness in that clear seeing to know what can be done and the energy to do it. But it can come out of the intention of clarity and of caring about the whole situation, not out of just some knee-jerk reaction of fear or aversion.

So this unboundedness of heart is not just some mishmash of grayness, of dullness, of who cares. It's so connected. It's much more alive and connected in life.

The mindfulness allows us to see things as they are. On a moment-to-moment level—like, for example, seeing the way I saw the tiredness, rather than seeing this whole immensity of some horrible illness coming on that I didn't know what to do about. It's simply heaviness and aversion. And that's okay. It's just what it is. Seeing things as they are on that level, you can see how that loosens the restrictions of heart and mind.

But it's also seeing things as they are on a much deeper level: the sense of the nature of how things are in this world, of what we really are, the nature of existence. The Buddha often referred to it as the three marks of existence. But basically it can come down to the uncontrollability of things in our life, the uncontrollability of experience, the fact that everything is constantly changing.

As long as something is pleasant—something we're happy with—it's going to go away. The unpleasant is going to come, and we can't change that. We keep trying to keep things the same, and it's all totally out of our control. As long as we're not really deeply living from that understanding, as long as we're caught in some sense of trying to keep things from changing, of trying to have some kind of control, of this almost obsessive self-referencing where every experience somehow refers back to me and how it affects me—as long as we're not living from understanding the uncontrollability, we're going to be caught in suffering, in confusion.

But true acceptance comes as we begin to see this. The easiest one to talk about, and the only aspect I want to address tonight, is this fact of constant change. Which, again, we all say is obvious. I know things are changing. But looking at our experiences, do we deeply, genuinely live and respond from that knowledge? And much of the time, for many of us, probably not.

Because if you look, this wanting pleasant experience, the shying away from the unpleasant, in any way trying to manipulate and control experience—it basically arises from not deeply recognizing impermanence. When we really, really know that however wonderful this is, at some point conditions will change and it will go away, that doesn't decrease our appreciation. In fact, the appreciation is all the more poignant. We can be all the more present with it because we're not somehow grasping, trying to make it stay.

When really unpleasant, painful, sad, grief-stricken experiences arise, no matter how hard they are, often somewhere in there is the feeling that this is never going to change and I can't bear to be with this for the next forty minutes, for the next year, for the rest of my life. Again, that's not being with bare experience, but it's also not really moving from the fact that everything is changing and it's all out of our control. And we take it personally—we refer it all back to ourselves.

So, for example, the weather. Obvious. And in a place like this, it's so wonderful because the scope is so vast. Just the other day, I think it was the day before you all came, it was a pretty day, really bright and beautiful. Then suddenly, like this afternoon, rain clouds came just in a moment. It started pouring. And then just like that, it turned to hail. There was this really vicious, wild hailstorm for a while, and then just like that it stopped, the clouds cleared, and it was so silent. It was amazing. There are moments like that where you go, "Gosh, totally out of control, always changing—that's so obvious." We can just see that's how things are, and it seems absurd to try and change the weather.

But as a friend said to me last year—she's been really looking at this for years and years—she said, "You know, it's just coming as a revelation to me. All this time I'm watching everything in the world changing. The whole world is changing. And suddenly I realized: oh, it's happening to me too. It's not me here watching everything else change. What I'm calling 'me' is also a process of constant change."

And that somehow, for many of us, is the sticking point where we don't really quite open to this fact. Even with other meditation teachers who've been doing this stuff for twenty, thirty years—we sit around going, "Oh my God, my hair is getting gray! Look at my wrinkles! I have to wear reading glasses." Big surprise. You go into your forties and fifties and your body starts to decay. What else did you expect? But somehow it's amazing—it's a surprise. All of a sudden our parents are getting older and they're dying, and somehow we're the first generation this ever happened to. It's totally amazing how hard it is to really take this in.

I heard this interview on the BBC last year, very serious. They were interviewing a man who had invested, I think, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in a company in Greece that will freeze you when you die and then hold your body until they can cure whatever you died from and bring you back to life. You have the option of either freezing your whole body, or you can just have your brain frozen—that's cheaper. This is very serious. People do this. They were interviewing an English man who had done it, very serious.

But I wrote this down. This is what he said: "It seems quite a sensible idea. There's no guarantee, of course, but there's a reasonable expectation."

It's amazing. A reasonable expectation of what? You know, living forever. And it's our culture, but it's not just this time. It's the world.

In opening to the constant changing, there are times—both in formal practice and also as it goes into our lives—where as we open to it more and more, it's hard sometimes. You see why there's a resistance in our hearts and minds to really live from that, because then there really is this sense of things ending so much. And you can go through what's sort of like a phase of practice that can last a more or less amount of time, where there's a real sadness about it, a real sense of loss. And in a way that's true, but it's not the whole picture. But I see why, when I go through those times, why there's this resistance. It's because it's the not wanting to feel sadness. It's just back to the same not wanting to be with what's unpleasant, being afraid of it.

So there are times it's sad. But I know for myself that what's even more sad and more fearful is to live in that denial. Because again, we're denying ourselves the opportunity for a much deeper connection with ourselves and with all life. Because even knowing something's changing, well then I'm so much more present for it. And the opening to change is our opening to connection and real tenderness and caring for other beings too. Sometimes it's our tenderness that opens us to the truth of change.

I just want to read you part of one poem. It's by Galway Kinnell, called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down."
I've stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old, don't die," little Maude.
And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

Forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

But it doesn't just have to be sad and scary, because when we truly, truly see this—moment to moment in meditation practice, moment to moment in our life—when we truly see it, the clinging, the aversion to unpleasant, the trying to keep things, is so patently useless and so obviously increasing our suffering that it's not like we have to talk ourselves out of it. It just stops making sense. It opens up.

Again, this is the boundlessness of heart, the boundlessness of mind that can really be fully present for what is and can still be fully present when that changes. It gives us such a serenity and a sense of happiness and peace, and also a much deeper connection. So opening to impermanence can also be opening into great joy, a great kind of dancing, a playing in life.

There's a story—maybe you've heard it—of a Hasidic rabbi in Eastern Europe, early in the century, who was very renowned for his scholarship and his wisdom. A young student from another country came to visit him, and they were sitting in the rabbi's house talking. The student was quite astounded by how simply the rabbi was living. He was looking around and saying, "But you've lived here so long, and you're so renowned. Where are all your things? Where are your books? Where's your furniture? Where are your clothes?"

And the rabbi said to the student, "Well, where are all yours?"

The student said, "Well, I'm just passing through."

And the rabbi said, "Well, so am I."

That kind of lightness with life.

Our practice here—even the little nudgy stuff that happens, the little twinges, the boredom, the restlessness, not to mention the obvious sadnesses and pains and difficulties we go through, or the happiness, or the boredom—it's all microcosm for what's happening in life. It is our life.

And the way our heart and mind is relating to these little things is exactly the way we're relating to the bigger, more complex issues in our life. This kind of tears it down and lets us begin to cut through the complexity and come into the bare experience and see the conditioning, and to give us moments of potential to move out of that conditioning, to respond in another way altogether.

So even when you think your practice is so-called bad, because nothing that you want to happen is what's happening, not only is that good practice—sometimes we say that's the best practice—because that's where we're going to be able to break these chains of getting lost in pleasant and unpleasant and constructing a sense of who we are out of that.

In a way, each time that you just open for a moment into a pain in your knee—you get too intense and you move, fine—but in the moment that you're just with it as it is, that's the moment where we're coming out of confusion, where we're learning not to be deluded by changing conditions, where we're learning that even for that moment, oh, there's a possibility of real ease and freedom even when something unpleasant is happening, even when something pleasant is happening, even when nothing particular is happening.

And again, this acceptance is not that of blind dullness.

It comes from clear seeing, and it gives such courage, such strength of understanding. You'll find even here that it gives us not only the courage of clear seeing but also the compassionate heart to soften into what is—not to be hard about it, not to try and push it away. It gives us the energy of compassion to respond in a way that's appropriate.

And whether it's a pain in the knee or whether it's later in our lives, some situation that comes up that we can't change, that seems beyond the bounds of endurance—whatever that is for each one of us—there might be a moment where, with the courage of clear seeing and the kindness of compassion, we'll find that even the unendurable is possible. Not only possible to endure, but to have some moment, maybe, of serenity within it. We discover that ultimately our true happiness and peace has absolutely nothing to do with what is happening internally or externally.

And all our efforts to change things—they can be useful in the world of cause and effect. They can be useful in the functional world. I'm not saying give up our work, but understand where it's coming from. It can come from the compassion that arises out of knowing that as much as we do to help people, to help the earth, to make things better—and we can have some real effect—at bottom, the true peace is going to come from being able to rest at ease in how things are. So that when we can't make a difference, when we can't change things, we don't have to give in to despair. We don't have to give in to frustration and come back to anger and confusion and pain.

When we can meet life with the serenity that that rabbi was meeting it with, then all the energy that previously goes into struggle and fear and confusion and rage—all that energy can go into action, into relating to the world, into relating to ourselves, into really dancing with whatever's happening. So much more energy is available to us from the space of wisdom and compassion.

So hang with it when your knee hurts and you're bored and you're sleepy. It's not really just a stupid, boring exercise. It has much more impact than might be apparent.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 356

Explanation of the Eight Precepts

Carol Wilson · 18 min

> In this practical talk, Carol Wilson provides a clear explanation of the eight precepts (aṭṭha sīla) commonly observed during intensive meditation retreats and on uposatha days in Asian Buddhist countries. She distinguishes between the five lay precepts used in daily life—where the third precept addresses sexual misconduct—and the eight precepts taken for retreat practice, where this precept becomes brahmacariya (celibacy).
>
> Wilson carefully details the additional three precepts: refraining from eating after noon (vikālabhojana), abstaining from entertainment and self-adornment (including jewelry, perfumes, and excessive attention to appearance), and avoiding high or luxurious beds. She emphasizes that these guidelines are not meant as punishment or deprivation, but as supports for cultivating sense restraint, simplicity, and the energy (viriya) needed for awakening. Drawing from her own experience as a former nun, she shares how not eating in the evening can create lightness and alertness, and how letting go of beautification reveals subtle patterns of suffering around wanting to look good.
>
> The talk offers wise counsel on working with these precepts skillfully—committing to a defined period rather than deliberating daily, recognizing when the motivation might be unhelpful self-punishment, and understanding that medical needs can be accommodated. Wilson reminds practitioners that these trainings are pointers back to intention and sincerity, inviting exploration of what we feed or starve with our attention in each moment. The session concludes with a formal chanting of the refuges and precepts.

Some people have been asking us to speak a bit or clarify the idea of the eight precepts and what they are. I know we just mentioned it briefly in the opening of the retreat, and some of you have been sitting and practicing with eight precepts, and we really had meant to speak about it more formally. Time just slipped by, so I'm glad a few people asked. I want to describe what the other three precepts are, share a little bit about some ways it might be helpful if you're interested, and then formally offer eight precepts if there's anyone who wants to take them.

The five lay precepts that we took at the beginning of this retreat come from the five precepts that are classically taught by the Buddha and practiced in Asian Buddhist countries, with one exception. If you're a lay person just living your life and you come to a monastery, you take the five precepts. The fifth precept is actually not brah-macharya—it's not celibacy in one's daily life. The fifth precept is really refraining from sexual misconduct. So if you hear references to the five precepts, know that the third precept addresses sexual misconduct, not brahmacharya.

When we talk about eight precepts, in Asia people will often come to the monasteries or nunneries once a week on the moon days—the quarter moon days, the full moon and new moon days—sort of like in this country one might go to synagogue or church. Often on those days, they take the eight precepts for the day. When you take eight precepts, the third precept becomes brahmacharya, celibacy. We borrow that even when we do five precepts for a retreat because it's so essential to stay with ourselves.

The other three precepts are often something that people in Asia will come and take for the day, so just know it's not a lifetime commitment you're making if you're a lay person. But you also need to make some commitment rather than going back and forth every day—should I, shouldn't I—especially with the big one, which of course is not eating after noon.

Let me go through what they are. The sixth precept is to refrain from eating at the wrong times. Classically, that means after the noon meal we don't eat solid food. The purpose of all of these is to cultivate sense restraint, to cultivate simplicity. It's not about suffering. It's about actually opening up a space of simplicity, of more time and energy for practice, of less complication. It's really worth exploring if you're interested, to see for yourself. It's not that eating is bad somehow, obviously. But two meals a day for most people with normal health is plenty. In fact, often ordained sangha live on one meal a day. I lived like that for quite a while when I was a nun, and it's fine. Especially if you're in intensive practice, we really don't need as much food.

I often find on eight precepts there's a lightness in the evening. I get tired in the evening—I don't have good night energy—but not eating in the evening actually helps me stay more awake. You have to explore for yourself. Also, there's so much more time. All that energy going into the dining room, even if you're just going to have tea, can be a distraction. So you can just stay out of there and practice. It's so much more simple, so much more pleasant.

What is allowed in the evenings is interesting. There's a range in Buddhist countries and in the Theravada ordained sanghas of what is actually permitted. In Burma, which seems to be the most strict, what's allowed is clear juice without pulp, fruit juice, clear broth or herbal tea—not caffeinated drinks or soda—sugar, honey, molasses, and oil. So you could have herbal tea with honey, or sometimes the kitchen would serve a clear fruit juice. Sometimes in Burma they'll serve little pieces of palm sugar or date sugar. Personally, if I eat that at five in the evening, I'm done for the day, but some people find it helpful. Little hard candies are also permitted. Some places in Thailand—the monks in the Amaravati tradition, up until recently, could eat cheese and chocolate, the cheese allowance due to some translation of a particular word in Pali. But we're not going to offer that here.

Some places in Thailand where I've practiced, soy milk or regular milk was allowed. Other places, absolutely not. In Burma, that would definitely not be acceptable. So just to give you a sense, there's a range of interpretation. Here, it may be that once in a while soy milk is served—I'm not sure what the kitchen will do. And you can really choose your own interpretation. Don't beat yourself up about it, but choose your own and realize that with all of these precepts and guidelines, the guidelines are pointers back to our own intention, our own sincerity of practice, and really looking at what comes up. They're not meant as punishments, or another way to feel bad about yourself. Renunciation is not meant to be a suffering experience. It actually opens up a place of freedom in our energy, in our heart.

The seventh precept is one that, for the most part, you're already observing, which is refraining from entertainment—dancing, singing, card playing, going to shows. Hopefully that part isn't too hard. You never really know what's going on out there, but we hear stories. Not yet about this retreat, but it gets back to us sooner or later.

The other part, though, can be interesting, which is refraining from beautification, adornment, perfumes and such. It's about not wearing jewelry, not wearing things that smell good, which already we're not doing here, hopefully. It doesn't mean you don't keep yourself clean or take care of your body, of course. So mostly that's not a hard one, but sometimes on retreat it can bring up interesting things that we notice about ourselves.

Without judgment, but just to see the suffering in this—just wanting to look a little better. Seeing that you spend a little extra time fixing your hair. Or your beard, if you're a guy—trimming your beard very neatly. That's just the same thing. Or wearing earrings or little jewelry. Or you get dressed in the morning and your sweatshirt doesn't quite match your sweatpants, so you change it. This is stuff no one else is going to notice, but you notice. And just notice the energy that's going into that. It's suffering.

So with taking the seventh precept, we just let go of that needing to look good, trying to adorn our bodies, and notice what comes from that.

The eighth precept is to refrain from lying on high or luxurious beds. That's basically taken care of here, though compared to a few years ago, the beds here are high and luxurious. If you used to come and sleep on those dreadful twenty-five-year-old foam pads that used to be here, that was something else.

But this precept could also include not luxuriating in bed. The bell rings, or it doesn't ring, and you wake up wide awake, and there's that thought: "But the bell didn't ring yet, there's twenty-five more minutes." And you lie there, really wide awake, and you're just kind of... ahh. Notice what that's feeding in the mind stream. It's feeding desire, wanting to luxuriate more. It feeds a kind of dullness. I'm speaking from experience. When you finally get up, it's like, ugh.

When you wake up and get up right away, it's just a moment. You get up and you're much more present, more there. That's feeding virya, feeding the energy that Rebecca spoke about last night.

So really, wise attention is seeing what we're feeding with our attention in the moment. What are we starving? When we luxuriate in bed, what are we starving? Virya. We're feeding luxuriation. When we get up the moment we wake up, we're feeding virya. We're starving laziness and torpor.

Exploring that is really what these precepts are meant to do—bring us back to look at what's helpful for waking up in our experience.

As I mentioned, in Asia often people will come, take the precepts for one day, maybe just that day—not even that night—then go home. When you're done with it, you return to the five precepts.

No blame, no shame, no problem. So here, if you have been practicing the eight precepts and you feel it's enough, you can simply take the five precepts the next morning—no problem at all. Or if you want to experiment with the eight precepts, it doesn't mean you have to commit to them for the entire retreat.

But I would suggest that if you want to experiment, do pick a defined period—perhaps a week—so that you're not in that place I started to describe earlier, where every evening at five o'clock you're caught in "Should I? Shouldn't I? Should I? Shouldn't I?" That is really dukkha, and quite unnecessary. You're just feeding doubt and wanting and judgment. Simply say, "I'm going to do it for a week and see what happens." That's the only way we really discover, really explore.

If it doesn't feel appropriate for you, it can become—in working with balanced effort—a kind of pushing that isn't helpful. Or if your intention in taking the eight precepts is because you feel you're so bad and rotten that you need to punish yourself... no. That's not a good reason. That's not a helpful motivation. So explore your intentions, and then just see how it goes.

Most retreats in Asia are conducted under the eight precepts. If you go to sit with one of the Sayadaws or visit any wat in Thailand, it's assumed that you are practicing under eight precepts. So it's quite a common thing.

There are people for whom, medically, not eating in the evening simply doesn't work. If you have hypoglycemia or something similar, you just need a little something. If that's the case, you can still take the other two precepts, and for medical reasons it's accepted that you can eat a little something in the evening.

So have a good day.

CHAPTER 357

Faith and the Illusion of Self

Carol Wilson · 1h07

> In this profound exploration of anattā (not-self), Carol Wilson guides practitioners through the delicate territory of investigating our most fundamental assumption—the sense of a permanent, unchanging self. She begins by addressing how doubt often masquerades as analytical thinking when we encounter teachings on selflessness, and offers sustained attention as the practical antidote.
>
> Wilson distinguishes between blind belief and what she calls 'verified faith'—confidence based on our own direct experience. This quality of trust allows us to meet each moment without needing to know what will happen, surrendering our usual reliance on knowledge and reasoning. She explores how we unconsciously use knowledge as a bastion against the fundamental insecurity of existence, clinging to the sense of self as our deepest resting place.
>
> Drawing from classical Buddhist psychology, Wilson examines the five aggregates (khandhas)—body, feeling tone, consciousness, perception, and mental formations—as the areas where we habitually grasp at selfhood. She offers practical guidance for turning attention directly toward the experience of 'I' or 'mine' in each moment, discovering that what seems so solid is actually arising and passing phenomena with no continuity. Through both precise investigation and spacious awareness of emptiness (suññatā), practitioners can begin to see through the illusion of self, finding not loss but profound ease and freedom in this understanding.

So now we're back from the world of just pure presence in nature to the world of concepts and ideas. Even though we sit here talking about no concepts, the whole fact of sitting here making noise and exchanging words—and it means something, hopefully—it's so amazing, but it's so conceptual.

I want to go on a little bit more from what Joseph was talking about last night, about the experience of no lasting self. I want to talk about it in a very experiential way, pointing our practice, our moment-to-moment awareness, back to this sense of self as it seems to arise and exploring what it is.

But first, I want to take a little diversion. Because when we begin to talk about concepts and what's the reality underneath the concepts—almost without fail, especially for people whose first retreat it is—if Joseph had done a question period this afternoon, he would have been bombarded with questions about "if there's no self, fill in the blanks." Because the concept of it, in itself, in hearing about it, until it's our actual experience, until it's experiential, intuitive understanding, true or not, it's just another concept.

And what that tends to do for us—certainly I spent years in this—is we take that concept, and the concept alone isn't enough to blast through, to help us see through the inaccurate perceptions or the inaccurate concepts we've been living with all our life. And in fact, there's no real reason to believe that the idea of selflessness is any more true than what seems like our experience of being a pretty ongoing identifiable self.

What often tends to happen in this experience—it certainly happened to me often and for years—is that it sets up a sense of the mind just starting to spin. You start to think about it, try to bring it into experience, you try to analyze it, and you really can get into quite an energy, a mental energy of thinking about, analyzing, figuring out, comparing. What is this sense of no-self? Trying to figure it out with our minds, with our reason, with our logic.

And I wish my saying this would be enough. I know it won't be, but I'll say it anyway: it won't work. It will never work. We can never figure out with thinking, with our mind, with opinion, with logic—we can never somehow figure out or make sense of this idea of no-self because it can only be understood experientially. It can only be something we touch with our awareness free of previous concept.

What can start to happen is that we take really fascinating ideas like no-self, and analyzing and thinking about them can be really interesting. It can feel like we're really practicing, we're really grabbing hold of something juicy here. But what it actually can turn into is doubt.

Doubt is somewhat obvious when it manifests as a thought of "I can't do this," or "this is stupid," or "I don't think they know what they're talking about," or whatever. But another way that doubt arises in our experience is that it masquerades as analytical thinking. So we're sitting there, and we start to pay attention. "But that's not me. That can't be me. Is that pain me? Now, if there's no me, how come I feel that pain? How come I have an opinion?" And the mind just starts going and going and going.

The way doubt manifests as a hindrance—when Joseph spoke of the hindrances the other day—the way doubt manifests is just this: the mind is spinning and spinning, thoughts are going, and there is a complete inability, when doubt is present, for the attention, for the mind to just land on anything. It'll keep just landing and skittering off. And when it's masquerading as analytical thought, each experience will just trigger off a whole other set of ways to think about it.

And believe me, I've spent a lot of time doing this. At first it seems somewhat fulfilling. It's a lot more interesting than all the other stupid thoughts I was sitting with for days before. "This is Dharma thoughts, so this is okay to hang out with." Just notice: if it's this sense of spinning, spinning, not able to touch anything, it's doubt, no matter what the content is.

On a level of moment-to-moment practice experience as you're sitting or walking and you notice this, the antidote to doubt is sustained attention. So, for example, you're thinking about whatever—I'm using no-self as the example since that's what I'm talking about—but you're thinking, you're analyzing, "What about this?" And you notice that. Okay, label "doubt." It's a hindrance. Simply noticing it. And then bring your attention just to something that's happening. It doesn't matter what, but hopefully not the thought because you'll get too sucked in. Come back to the breath.

If that's too subtle, come back to a sense of your body sitting, a sense of your butt on the pillow, your hands touching, any physical sensation. Sound, if that's a clear one for you. But if it's a little vague, you might get sucked back into the thought—so come back to your feet walking.

If you can get the attention just to land on something, and as soon as the thoughts start to come back again, sustain the attention, what happens is the attention deepens, lands in the present moment, and those thoughts just start to fade. You don't have to resolve them one way or the other. You're just coming out and landing in the moment. That's sustained attention. That is the momentary kind of practice-model antidote to doubt.

Of course, the big trick is recognizing it as doubt.

What gives us the energy to do that, on a bigger moment-to-moment level of practice, is that we have to come out of our usual way of trying to figure things out. And this is beyond just doubt. It's the willingness to move from our reliance on knowledge, from our reliance on reasoning, to surrender into whatever is happening without prior expectations.

In a way, you could call this faith. Faith is another strategy for being with our experience that's different from knowledge.

I'm going to give you two definitions of faith. I don't know how you all relate to the word. It depends on your different backgrounds and conditioning. For me, I didn't really have much of a religious upbringing—we were Protestant and we went to church and all, but somehow it didn't seem to stick or really have much of anything. So my associations with the word faith were secondhand. It was more of a sense of belief on demand—belief in what somebody told me, belief in a particular set of doctrines or in a particular person, without any kind of proof. Of course, my logical mind would want proof, but this was a demand to follow and believe without anything to rely on.

The faith that I'm talking about in our context of practice here is not that at all. It's not blind belief. It is definitely not anything that demands an abandoning of our own intuitive sense of wisdom or understanding. It's not like the Jim Jones kind of thing, where you follow the leader and drink poison Kool-Aid and everybody dies. That's the worst connotation of faith, and I'm not talking about anything like that.

Here are two definitions I've read in different commentaries. One is: the drive towards that which cannot be described—that kind of yearning, the drive towards truth, towards whatever you want to call it. The second one is: confidence based on verified knowledge. I might call it verified faith. And this is really where this Vipassana practice takes us.

Faith is a kind of combination of confidence and trust. Trust that lets us be willing to be with our experience without expectation, without need for payoff or justification, without knowing anything that's going to happen or having a preset idea. And confidence is the strength or the willingness, the fearlessness that lets us meet experience without any kind of promise.

It's what lets you sit here and be with an unbearable pain in your knee. There's no promise that anything wonderful is going to happen from that. But there's some confidence and some trust that allows one to do that. Hopefully it's not blind faith. Hopefully it really begins to come from our own verified experience—confidence based on verified knowledge. But again, intuitive knowledge, not the kind of knowledge that I grew up valuing as the highest truth, as the point of safety and place of finding self-worth.

I don't know about you, although I imagine many of you, given the training you've had and the jobs you do, have had to spend a lot of your life acquiring certain sets of knowledge—even just going through regular school. And I was really very good at it. I could take in whatever things I was supposed to know—reasons, facts, ways to do things, explanations for what the universe was—take it in, memorize it, internalize it, spit it out. But I was also unknowingly taking that knowledge as a view of the world, and even more, in some way, as a sort of security. It's like a resting place. If I have knowledge, a way to describe a certain event or experience, if I can go out in the woods and name the animals and name the trees and the weather patterns and what kind of clouds and what's going on, then I feel like I have a certain kind of safety, a certain kind of security, some place to rest.

In some way, this sense of knowledge, this body of knowledge, can certainly be very useful. I'm not saying we throw out all knowledge. But it's important to see it for what it is. We can take this body of knowledge and treat it as a bastion against insecurity, against having to live and dance in what's actually true—the constancy of unknowing, the fact that we never know what's going to happen, even in the next moment.

For me, and I'm probably not the only one, certain sets of knowledge can really serve as a comfort. But it's a way to hide. And even without wanting to use it as a way to hide, with that sense of security, we can really identify with whatever the knowledge is, and it blocks our potential or our willingness to perceive other possibilities—to open to another possibility at all.

There's a story the Buddha told that illustrates this. A widower, a poor peasant, had a young son. They lived in a small village of huts. One day, the father had gone away. While he was gone, some bandits came and basically destroyed the village, burned all the huts and killed the people. But they kidnapped his son and took him away.

So the father comes back, finds everything destroyed, finds some bones he thinks are his son's. He weeps, so distraught, so upset—believing completely that this is what happened. He took the ashes and wore them in a little bag around his neck, totally unable to recover. He rebuilt his house and continued living, but was completely miserable. He had totally bought the story: this is what happened. That became knowledge. These bandits came, destroyed the village, killed my son.

At some point, his son escaped, and late at night came back to the village. He found the hut and was banging on it, calling, "Father, father, let me in!" But the father was so caught in his description of what had happened as being truth that he yelled down, "Don't mock me! My son is dead! This is so painful!" The child kept calling out, "Father, let me in!" But the father couldn't open to the possibility that maybe he was wrong—to the point that he never went down, shooed his son away, and they never saw each other again.

It's a heart-wrenching, exaggerated story, but it makes the point of how locked we can get in knowledge, in what we think is a true description. It blinds us to being able to even explore—I mean, to even stick his head out the window and say, "Oh yeah, maybe it could be my son. Let me check it out." That's what we're doing all the time with our assumptions of who we are, what Joseph was talking about last night with our assumptions of time, our assumptions of past and future, our assumptions of body. All of that keeps us locked in.

This quality of faith—the confidence to meet what's happening with a trust to enter it unknowing, really fully—lets us meet data freshly. What I've found in my practice, and in talking with other people I know I'm not alone, is that I've approached practice wanting to find the answer, wanting to find the truth. I'm basically looking for another explanation, another set of knowledge, because that's what the mind knows how to do. I think, "Well, okay, maybe this one isn't right, but if I find another perfect explanation, then I can rest in that." But the more I look, just with the simplicity of mindfulness, looking into the knowledge we have, it seems to break apart. Instead of more answers, we find more mystery.

This is from the New York Times a couple of years ago—although I just saw an update on it recently and it hasn't changed that much—from the science section. It's talking about the largest galaxy ever detected, whose discovery was announced last week, which includes more than 100 trillion stars and measures more than 6 million light years in diameter. The galaxy is 60 times the size of Earth's galaxy, the Milky Way. Big, big.

This newfound galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump of galaxies, a cluster of some 1,000 galaxies called Abel 2029. They've had to name it. What is naming a clump of a thousand galaxies? What does that do? Do we somehow own it? Do we have it under control or something?

Anyway, this is just leading up to the point. The astronomers hope that further study will provide clues to the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter, since there doesn't appear to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the huge gravitational forces that would seem necessary to cause all this clumping of galaxies. Scientists propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that eludes detection because it emits no radiation. According to their prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe consists of this missing mass.

It's like us. It's the same, actually. What did Joseph say? All our matter is not the size of a particle of dust. But we can't just take that at face value. I mean, it's interesting, but it doesn't mean anything until we verify it ourselves. What we need is the faith, the willingness to try, that will keep bringing our attention into our experience to really look, to really meet it, to really be willing to open into the possibility of the unknown.

Of course, since this faith is based on our verified experience, when you first come to a retreat like this—your first retreat—you can't have that kind of verified experience. The question often comes up: what got you here the first time? It comes up in my mind for anybody who comes on a first retreat. But there's a quality that's talked about before there can be verified faith, a quality of mind called bright faith.

In some way, something in us is lit up by a quality we experience in someone else. It might be someone you talk to, and either something they said or some quality in the person lights up something indefinable, indescribable in us that gets us to say, "Well, maybe that's worth a try." Or something you read, or something you observe in how certain people behave. Whatever it is, something got each one of you here.

When there's this quality of bright faith, it's like a brightness, an energetic quality of mind and a willingness to look. If you came without that, it would really be hell, because it would be so hard, especially the first few days, without something inside of us—that yearning towards what cannot be described—that keeps us looking, that keeps us coming back to the practice, beyond the reasoning intellect.

But this kind of bright faith is not sustainable. It's really based on looking outside of ourselves for verification, for strength, for confidence.

And that can't be sustained when we hit a really difficult patch. When you start a retreat and your first really difficult patch comes before any kind of bright patch has arrived, it's really hard, because there's no personal experience to give us the confidence with which to meet this—that sense that it's somehow worthwhile.

So this bright faith is going to shift. It's not sustainable. It's going to waver. It's going to fade away. When you hit that space of, "Why did I come here? It's so dreary. It's so controlled. There's so much suffering." That bright faith is really fading, and it fades fast sometimes.

But luckily—and I say luckily because I have so much real trust in just the truth of things—if we simply have enough willingness to keep meeting our experience with a freshness, it begins to open up. And in some way, we begin to experience for ourselves various aspects, not just of what we've been talking about, but of the truth of how things actually are.

So just one little experience of sitting with pain and then seeing that you can simply be with it—and all the fear and all the aversion either fades, or you see the difference between the aversion and the pain, and you see that the pain itself is not suffering. Even if it's just for a second, that is an insight, a sense that things are different from how they seem on the surface.

Even such a moment can somehow energize us for days, which is lucky because sometimes we just get a couple of little moments of insight like that, and a lot more moments of being caught in the seemingly ordinary way our mind has of relating to experience—because that seemingly ordinary, normal way has been conditioned throughout our entire lives.

What I have deep trust in is that the power of truth is so recognizable when we touch it, in whatever form. It's just so obvious somewhere in our hearts, in our beings, that that is what's true—that it's truer than our ordinary ways of relating. One moment of truth is more than enough to really light up days of seeming to struggle in the mire.

One of my teachers said that a spark of truth can burn up a mountain of lies. It's not like we have to have equal time somehow.

So what begins to happen—and it will happen uniquely to each person—is that you begin to have experiences that somehow show us our ordinary assumptions, assumptions we might not have even known we had, aren't exactly accurate. And this gives us the strength and the courage and the trust to keep going, to meet each new experience with a faith that doesn't need to know what's going to happen.

Gradually, this quality of faith I'm trying to describe enables us, or opens us, to much more consciously enter into each moment knowing that we're entering totally into the unknown. Maybe when you came on this retreat there was some sense of that. I try to find out from everyone what really goes on, but somewhere you knew, "I don't have a clue what's really going to happen here. It's something I've never done."

But what's actually the case is that every moment of our life, we think we know. It's funny—I'm talking about opening to the unknown when in every moment we don't know, and yet we have this incredibly rigid schedule where almost every moment of the day is planned. I could ask, "2:35, where are you going to be?" And you'd say, "Oh, I'll be in the meditation hall, sitting on my pillow." Maybe. Probably.

It actually blows me away when I come back from India, which is a wonderful place for much more consciously experiencing the fact that you never really know what's going to happen. No matter what I get up in the day and plan to do, the one thing you could be sure of is that's what wasn't going to happen that day. It's great for that. It keeps us off balance, but it's much truer to how things actually are.

What amazes me is coming home, and after a couple of weeks I have my day book with my hours all planned, and I look at it and mostly that's what happens. That's what really amazes me. I can tell you where I'm supposed to be on August 15th of next year, and probably there's a good chance that might happen—which is amazing. It's really amazing.

But it sustains the illusion that things are under control. Sure, we have to make plans to live in a relative reality, but it sustains the illusion that just because we make plans, they're going to happen, that somehow we can control that—when actually we don't have a clue what will happen in the next minute.

When you sit down in a sitting, you might have an idea, but actually there's no clue what's going to be the first experience that arises. A sensation in the body? A sound? A pain? The breath? An emotion? Who knows?

When we get down to that level of moment-to-moment experience through mindfulness and concentration, where we're really breaking things down and just seeing them arising and passing, we experience that much more vividly. I'll sit down and it's sort of like opening up the doors—who knows what's going to happen? It's all a show.

And really, our life is like that. How often in your work, no matter how much we have to plan and carry out specific projects, and we have a real sense of what we want to happen and a projected sense of what we really think will happen—but we don't know. It's completely out of control. And if we're so solidified around "this is what I think, this is what's going to happen," and we can't think of alternatives, we get really thrown off when something totally other happens.

Or it should be so still and silent here—and then how about when out of nowhere came that jet yesterday?

What's this doing here? It's not allowed in the wilderness. Who knows?

I used to go through phases of thinking, how long do I think I'm going to live in a country that's relatively peaceful and not at war? I mean, I just assume I'm not going to wake up to machine gun fire. And this might seem kind of crazy, but actually, I don't know. We never really know. We never really know—we could have an aneurysm and just drop dead. We never really know. And that's the truth of things.

Some part of our psyche really hates that, really doesn't want to live in this ever-present insecurity, this sense of not knowing. And I think the kind of bottom-line place that our psyche comes to rest, looking for some place of security, is this sense of self. It's the one thing that, if we don't look too closely, feels like it's always here. I know I'm me.

I mean, everything's changing—I look really different than I did when I was eight—but I know I'm me. And I feel the same. I relate from my memories. I recognize people when I see them again, usually. It's this sense of a place to rest.

There's something that can be really scary to our conditioned mind, to think that there is no place to rest, that really ultimately we don't ever know. We want to have some solidity. And when one thing falls away, immediately we fall back onto another. Watch that in your practice. If there's something that you felt was really solid—the sense of the body—and you begin to sit and experience it as just shifting energies and nothing solid, it might be far out, but watch. The mind will create another view or another description or opinion. Okay, this is how it is. I'm a sense of shifting energy, moving around. That's me. And we've just fallen back into another level—somewhere to find security, somewhere to take a rest.

When I was helping teach a retreat in Yucca Valley in the desert of Southern California, outside of Palm Springs, a few years ago—and if you live in L.A., you know this experience—while we were there on the retreat, we had a couple of earthquakes. One kind of medium in the middle of a talk, and then a stronger one a couple of hours later, like a six-point-something earthquake.

Well, the earthquake itself, since I had never been in one, was actually kind of interesting. Franz and I were standing outside and you could kind of see the ground roll—explosions in the distance and the sound. It was like, wow, scary. It does something definitely to the body, but it's sort of far out. And then it stopped. It's okay. Well, that was neat. That's fine.

But what didn't stop was a series of aftershocks, like every three minutes, every five minutes for the next—at least twenty-four hours—and then with decreasing frequency for the rest of the retreat. And where I had felt like I really handled it with great equanimity, very present, seeing things change, no attachment—by the end of the night of aftershocks every three minutes, and of course the radio always says, "Twenty-five percent chance of the big one coming in the next three days"—so that just puts that in your mind. Is this an aftershock or is this the big one? You can't just say aftershock. By the end of like twelve hours of that, my nerves were a wreck. Every time the shock would start, our heater would start really rattling, so it couldn't just kind of pass unnoticed. We'd hear rattle, rattle, rattle every two minutes.

And I came out of it really deeply feeling this sense of how unquestioningly I had relied on the earth to be there for me—to be solid, to be someplace I could just rest. The worst that can happen, you can just fall on the earth. And to viscerally get it over and over—sorry, not that one either.

It really touches into this sense of anattā, of not-self, and the fear that comes from this ongoing insecurity. Kind of, not franticness, but that the mind wants to find somewhere. It's not okay hanging out in nowhere, needing to take a stand.

But actually it's not even the movement. It's not the not being able to take a stand that's the problem.

It's not the never knowing or the unknown that creates difficulty. The problem is that sense of "I" that's there in the midst of the unknown—that I which arises, clinging to whatever it can find, positing a need for security. The aftershocks weren't the problem. What they were doing to me was the problem. "Where am I going to find security?" was the problem.

When we're just opening into the moment as it is, there's no problem. When you were out today, if you had even one moment where it was just pure beingness—maybe it was hearing, maybe it was smelling, maybe it was warmth—where there was no discursive description, no trying to figure anything out, no attempting to name the species of birds, just simple being... in that moment, where's the problem? There's no needing to know what's going to happen next. There's no referring back to someone it's happening to. There's no needing to know what happened before. It's just this moment.

Without this obsessive, ongoing referring back of every sense experience to a sense of self—with just the pure experience—there isn't any problem. And whatever needs to occur in the next moment, the next moment occurs. If there's some response that needs to happen, that also occurs. We don't need to figure it all out ahead of time.

This doesn't mean that pure being prevents action, which is one of the questions that comes up often: "If there's no self, then how am I ever going to do anything? Who's going to do things?" We can talk about this sense of pure being and someone will ask, "Well, that's really nice, but what about if it starts to rain and there's lightning and you have to get up and go inside?"

Actually, the two have nothing to do with each other. There's a sense of being, and then there's a sense of being with lightning, and then there's a sense of a thought arising: "It could kill me. I think I'll go inside." That can be done with or without clinging to a sense of self. It can just be clear seeing.

This sense of self... faith is what can over and over give us the confidence and the trust to be willing to meet experience with this quality of not knowing. And the quality of not knowing will let us investigate—not with thinking, but with presence—in a much more open way. We look at the data freshly, so to speak, without having interpreted it before we've even perceived it.

When we begin to explore the sense of I, of mine—even the thought of not clinging to something as a sense of I or mine—it can really shake up that deepest resting place. I think that's why often, in or out of formal practice, when in a space of awareness you touch a deep place where there's viscerally, intuitively getting it—"Oh, there really isn't any need"—what often comes up is fear. It's a natural response to losing something we've actually never had in the first place, but something that we think we had. A sense of fear and even terror can arise.

And that's fine. We don't like fear very much, but the fear itself doesn't mean that something's wrong. Often fear, as we touch it in our practice, is really more like a messenger saying, "Oh, we're moving into unknown territory." Rather than being afraid of the fear, with some confidence and clarity of practice, we can just meet the fear as another arising emotion, be with it, see it come, see it go. We don't have to take it as a messenger of doom. We don't have to interpret it as something going wrong.

Fear often means something is going really right. We're hitting the place of our unquestioned assumptions and they're beginning to break down. We don't always understand that rationally, but that's what's going on.

I find it fascinating to use our practice in this way. It's one of the explorations I really love on retreat: to consciously use mindfulness to explore the actual sense of me or mine when it's arising in a moment. Everything I'm about to say comes from what I've discovered in my own exploration and from others, but I'm not offering it as another explanation. Hopefully it might spark some interest for you to look and explore on your own.

Never take any answer your mind arrives at—"This is what the self is" or "This isn't"—as the final resting place. If you can keep that interest alive, keep that childlike innocence, that trust, keep meeting the data, keep exploring without stopping in any assumption that now you know what the self is or isn't, you can really begin to look.

What we begin to see—what I begin to see—is that what seems so solid and unquestioned is actually nothing. We're not destroying the ego through our practice, not getting rid of the sense of self to substitute something else. We begin to see that what seemed so solid is nothing solid at all.

In touching a sense of anattā—the Pali word for no separate self—if we lose the sense of self, we don't lose anything. It's not that something changes and we can't function, because it's not there in the first place.

This is from a man named Nisargadatta Maharaj. He was an Indian wise man, a saint who died in the last decade. He said, "My actual experience is not different from yours, but it is my evaluation and attitude that differ. I see the same world as you, but not the same way." Everybody sees the world differently, through the idea she or he has of herself. As you think yourself to be, so you think the world to be. If you imagine yourself as separate from the world, the world will appear separate from you, and you will experience desire and fear.

It really is all our perceptions, our descriptions, and our imaginings—which is so hard to believe. And when we begin to really look and see this over and over, then what's really hard to believe is how powerful these inaccurate perceptions and imaginings and descriptions are. So amazingly powerful. It really takes this willingness to keep looking.

So we look, and we see that when you have this feeling of "I," of "mine"—however it manifests—it might just be the thought "I'm really hungry," or "I'm bored now," "I wish this talk would end," "I wonder what I'm going to do tomorrow," "My knee hurts." It doesn't matter how. But when we have that sense, when you notice it there, rather than focusing on the object, see if you can—and your mind needs to be a little quiet for this, obviously—see if you can turn your attention back on that "I" or "mine." The actual experiential feeling or thought or emotion, whatever it is.

What in that moment are you calling "mine"? We might be focused on "I'm hungry." We might actually be focused on the feeling of hunger or wanting food, but that might not be the actual sense of "I who am hungry." And sometimes we're so used to that "I" feeling, it just feels like it's always there, so we overlook it.

When your mind's a little quiet, it can be really wonderful—I really love it—turning around the attention and seeing, well, what's the "I"? Who's "I"? I don't mean investigating with thought, but with this sati, this mindfulness that just lands right on that feeling of "I" to see what it is.

We begin to see that the sense of "I" or "mine," the birth of self, is arising and passing moment to moment. There isn't anything that lasts—this thing we thought was unchanging. Buddhadasa, who was quite a remarkable Thai meditation master, says the self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind. That's all it is. And in my experience so far—which I've not come to the end of—so far that's really true.

So when there's that sense of "I"—I'm hungry, I want this, this hurts, I want this to go away—turn around and see what's the experience that's being grasped and clung to. And don't even assume it's being grasped and clung to because I say it. Turn around and feel and see.

Every time that sense of "I" arises, there's a moment of sense contact. Maybe there's a smell happening. There could be a grasping at that smell. There could be a thought: "Mmm, smells like pizza." And then there could be a thought: "Oh, I'm really hungry." So there's grasping arising with that sense contact. Turn the attention not to the thought of the pizza, but to "I," and see what it's landing on.

What I find is that each time I do that, it's a different actual momentary experience that is somehow being interpreted as "I." For example, when I say "I'm talking right now," there's this sense of "I." I turn toward my experience, and it's a sort of very vague physical sensation that I can't even quite locate. Sometimes it could be an image. Sometimes it could be an actual sensation of pain. Sometimes it could be a thought. I have a friend who said—not every time, but often—when he turned toward the sense of "I," it was as if he had this very subtle mental image of his face. And that was the "I," as if experience was coming out of that. I'm just giving examples. It could be anything.

But turning and looking—what's been really liberating for me is that each time, it's something different. There isn't, so far, some thing there, or some emotion, or some experience, or some anything that's "I."

And that's what gets really fascinating to begin to see. If you can sort of see it, if it's something that one can experience right away, it's an arising and passing phenomenon. There's no continuity to it. There's no ultimate validity. It's clearly not self. So just beginning to explore in this way.

Classically, and Joseph spoke about some of these last night so I just want to mention them briefly, in Buddhist psychology they talk about what makes up a person, so to speak—the different aspects of experience around which there tends to be this clutching, this identification, which is really just a contraction of grasping around an experience. There are five aspects that make up all our experience, any of which we might land on as saying "I" in a given moment.

There's the body, which Joseph said last night is obvious—sensations in the body, the whole sense of our body as a whole. What I found more subtle, which isn't actually body but if I don't look carefully I think of it as body, is the image of the body. So there might be a sensation, and over that, subtly, there's an image of me. And there's a sense of identification, of grasping—me, my, mine. And that's "I" in that moment. It can be very subtle.

I find often as I'm sitting, there's just sensation. And there would be no sense of self, no sense of body. It's as if sensations are coming and going in a vast space of awareness. And then there's this subtle background image of my body sitting here—just an image of this body. Not seeing that, in that moment for me, becomes a sense of Carol, a sense of self. It's as if it's a container placed over an experience that has no containment and has no location, but it gives a false sense of container. Anyway, that's just something to look at.

The second aspect of experience around which we often grasp a sense of self is what's called feeling tone. I spoke the other night about how each sense experience we experience as either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, which can come in quite subtly. Usually with pleasant, we move right away to wanting. With unpleasant, we move to aversion. With neutral, we tend toward spacing out. But often we don't notice that feeling tone because it's quite subtle.

This is one of the five aggregates that make up what a human is, and we easily fail to notice it yet identify with it, cling to it. Say there's a pain in the knee, and it's unpleasant. You might really be mindful of the sensations, really seeing the sensation, and there's not a sense of "I am that sensation," but somehow there's a real sense of involvement and self-identification there. You can't quite figure out where. You're clear you're not the pain, but often the clutching is around that subtle feeling of unpleasantness, of pleasantness, of neutrality. I just mention that as something else to notice—it creates that real sense of separation. Sometimes we don't notice that feeling.

The third aggregate, which Joseph mentioned last night, is consciousness—the knowing faculty, which seems ever-present and very subtle. That is easy to identify with. I think in some ways it's the last one we identify with because it's the most subtle and the most difficult to see as separate from me. I know hearing. I know that I'm paying attention. I know that there's unpleasant feeling. I know that there's awareness. It's easy to think of that as "I." So without saying whether it is or isn't, just notice if that's where this sense of I or me or mine is landing.

The fourth area is perception, which Joseph also talked about last night, and which is another really fascinating area to explore. We can really begin to see, sometimes in simple ways, how easily we identify with our perception, take it as true. And then something else can come in and we realize our perception was totally whacked out—it had nothing to do with what was actually going on. But we would have defended it to the death.

"Yes, this is how it is."

Just a little example. The other night, about two nights ago, I was sleeping with the window open for the first time. And I woke up in the middle of the night with some weird stuff going on in my body—you know, that kind of weird, vulnerable, not-quite-put-all-the-pieces-together-yet state when you wake up in the middle of the night like that.

So I was just lying there, and I gradually became aware of this really loud roaring noise, just so loud coming in. My first thought was, "Well, that must be the river." But I didn't really have too much confidence in that thought or that perception. And it just seemed to get louder and louder with all these undertones and currents. And I thought, "I've been here for five days, and this is the third year I've been here. I never heard the river sounding like that. There's no way that can be the river."

Then I remembered when I was a nun for a while in Thailand. I was staying at one place that was in the forest, on a little small river deep down in a gorge. And one night, all of a sudden, just like that, this tiny little river got huge. It came all the way to the top of the gorge. It flooded our whole area and it made so much noise—it was unbelievable. So lying there that night, I thought, "Either there's some weird mechanical kind of plane or tank coming in here, or this river is flooding and it must be totally up to the porch by now." I was absolutely convinced of that because my perception was: I have never heard the river be that loud. Impossible.

So I finally went back to sleep, checked it out in the morning, walked out. Of course, the river's really loud. I mean, it's been there all along, really loud. I just never noticed it before. Now I can't walk down the road without hearing the river babbling. It's really there. It's really loud. I would have sworn on a stack of Bibles that that river never made a noise like that before.

So just that willingness to check our perceptions—to see where we can be so sure and so identified, and yet so wrong. That's what we're doing.

And the last area is everything else. I sometimes think that's kind of how the Buddha did it—all these categories, and then there's one that sort of lumps in so much. It's called mental formations. It includes what we're doing today in the instruction: intention, which is a really interesting one because you can see how subtle intention is. Intention to move, intention to do something, intention to direct the mind in a certain way, intention to come back to the breath, intention to move to hearing. And it's so easy to feel like that's me. Well, who's meditating? Who's paying attention to the breath? Where does this intention come from, if not from me? It's a very subtle place of investigation.

So again, just look and see when you identify with the intention. If that's you, then where are you when the intention goes away? Sit there and notice the intention to scratch your eyes, like Fred was saying. If that was you, then during those ten breaths when you didn't scratch, you were gone, right? And then you come back again, if that's how intention is us. But explore it.

This is where I mean don't stop. Return to intention. It feels so much like us, and there can be a tendency to stop really looking. We move into "Of course it's me. What else could it be? And where could this intention come from?" And we're back into that spinning mind of doubt again.

So exploring intention. And the other aspect I just want to mention of mental formations is, of course, our old friend thought. And thought is a really...

Sometimes we can see thought, obviously. It's a lot of what our practice is. But because thought can come so often and we get so used to it, we sometimes don't notice that the thoughts can turn into an ongoing commentary that is actually making up our sense of self. We're kind of describing ourselves to ourselves as we go through the day, telling ourselves different stories. If you stop and look, you might be telling yourself a lot of different stories about yourself. In a way, we're making it up as we go along.

But if we don't notice thought, there's this identification with certain ones. For instance, some might go through—"Wow, I'm really doing good. I'm really a far-out person"—and those kind of go by. Maybe we don't really identify with them too much. Then another one comes up: "I am such a schlump. I'll never be able to do this right. I'm too tight. I'm too this. I'm too that. I'm a failure." Those ones we might really buy into and believe and carry around with us through everything we do. "I don't wash the dishes right. I made a big clanging noise when I was serving myself. Everybody was looking at me. I'm not working mindfully enough. I'm moving too much in the hall." Not noticing all the times in between when these thoughts aren't happening, when there's no sense of self at all, but stringing them together and telling ourselves this self-story until it gets really solid.

One time, a couple years ago, I was on a two-month retreat, and something got really clear to me. I had just seen a movie right before the retreat—and if you can avoid that, or listening to music just before a retreat, I'd advise avoiding it unless you want to really watch the replays for a long time. So I had seen The Fugitive. At least it wasn't too bad of a movie; it could have been worse. But I'd be sitting there and I'd be getting flashes of scenes and dialogue from The Fugitive—not in order, of course, jumping forward and back in time. Then after a while it would switch and the Carol movie would come on. It would be flashes of memory and future planning and images of myself, things that happened, forward and back in time.

At some point it hit me. It wasn't like there was a correlation, like a simile. They were exactly the same. There wasn't any difference. It wasn't that the Carol story was more real at that moment than the flashes of memory from The Fugitive—not at all. It was just images coming up and thoughts. But there were particular ones where there was a sense of grasping, a sense of identification around them. And so I made that Carol. I didn't think I was—I can't remember his name—but I didn't think that character was who I was. I knew that was a movie. Well, guess what? So is the other. It doesn't mean that I don't know what happened in the past or that I can't relate, but in that moment, what was really happening was just images arising, thoughts arising, emotions arising and passing. And whether it was about Carol or what's-his-name, it really wasn't any different.

And that's what we're doing all the time. We're telling ourselves stories. There's thoughts. We don't notice which ones we clutch at and make a story of and which ones go by. So pay attention. See which ones there's this grasping of self around and which ones go by. Just because there's a grasping sense of self around some thoughts, that doesn't necessarily make them true. I want to point that out. In fact, often—not with everybody, but for a lot of people I talk to in retreats—the tendency can be to really identify with the negative ones, the negative self-images, the ways we're not good enough, our failings.

And if something beautiful happens or we have some beautiful experience—"I'm really a very kind person"—don't get too carried away with yourself. The "mine" will come in right away: "Remember when you did this and you didn't give that." And "Oh yeah, that's right. Thank you for bringing me back to truth." Because we're buying into a particular story. It's all just thoughts. Imagine the freedom, the spaciousness of not having to grasp and solidify around any of them.

This is another way we can come at this exploration of the sense of self. The way I've been talking is really the way of precision—being with the breath with precision, bringing your attention into the experience of "I" or "mine" with precision. We can also approach it from the way of spaciousness, sort of like being with hearing. At times we tune into whatever word you want to use—spaciousness, or awareness, or emptiness, which is really the more classic term. Just emptiness. Things arise and pass. Emptiness doesn't mean nothing happening, but it's empty of clinging, empty of aversion and grasping, empty of self.

And in that, without looking for anything—sort of like Joseph was saying with the cars going by, you're not looking for anything—but when this sudden sense of grasping, the sense of clinging, the emergence of self arises, you really can't help but notice it when you're tuning into the emptiness.

I'll give an example. One time I was on a self-retreat in a really lovely spot in California. I was sitting high up on a hill, sort of like you were doing today, hopefully—just sitting and being really aware with my eyes open. Just spaciousness and peace, everything coming and going, really beautiful, no thoughts of me, just presence. And some turkey vultures came flying out really close because I was high up. Just another arising experience—spaciousness, peace. Of course, somewhere in it, a thought arose: "This is really far out. I'm so empty. I'm so spacious." But that came and went too.

And more turkey vultures came, and they were circling. All of a sudden, they were circling right over me and getting closer and closer. And suddenly the thought arose: "I'm the thing they're circling. They think I'm dead." I had this moment of genuine panic. It only lasted a moment, but it was really—everything I could do, I almost stood up and screamed, "I'm alive! I'm alive!"

It was really interesting. In that moment, emptiness, spaciousness, no sense of self, real freedom and ease—it vanished, just like that. Total contraction. Solid sense of me and other, fear, something to do.

That's how it is. When we're letting ourselves attune to the emptiness, when it's present, we can notice it. Sometimes we can't notice it—there's just too much going on, or there's too much clinging, too much stuff. But other times, when it's a little more quiet or there's not a particular identification with anything, just open up and let yourself tune in to the emptiness. Get comfortable with it.

Buddhadasa talks about this often as a way of practice. It's not like we're in total cessation of all suffering—I'm not talking about ultimate enlightenment—but just inclining to emptiness. As he says, we experience in our ordinary day-to-day life many, many moments of this emptiness. Often we just don't notice them, but we can begin to incline the awareness to them. Not to do anything, not to be "me," not to grasp it—just to get more comfortable and more content with that ease, with that emptiness.

And in that, when the sense of grasping at some experience arises, when the sense of self is born in a moment, it's really pretty obvious. It's not something we have to fight. It's just really interesting to see how it can go from a moment of total ease to a moment of complete panic and fear that I'm going to be attacked by turkey vultures. And the next moment, it can all go again.

So really seeing the arising and passing of this sense of self, not being content to stop anywhere, but continuing to explore, watching it come, watching it go. And in each experience of that, the old conditioning, the old assumptions begin to weaken. Without logically knowing it, we begin to experience much more ease with what comes and goes in our life, with what comes and goes in our emotions, with what comes and goes as experience. Just an ease and a dancing with things.

It's not that stuff disappears. But it's that sense of "I," that constant self-referencing, that begins to ease—that we don't take so seriously, that we see through altogether. And in that comes a real sense of joy and dancing with life.

I want to end with this from a Tibetan Lama:

Happiness cannot be found through great effort and willpower, but is already there in relaxation and letting go. Don't strain yourself. There's nothing to do. Whatever arises in the mind has no importance at all because it has no reality whatsoever. Don't become attached to it. Don't pass judgment. Let the game happen on its own, springing up and falling back without changing anything, and all will vanish and reappear without end. Wanting to grasp the ungraspable, you exhaust yourself in vain. As soon as you relax this grasping, space is there—open, inviting, and comfortable. Nothing to do, nothing to force, nothing to want, and everything happens by itself.

So let's just do nothing quietly for a few moments.

CHAPTER 358

Anattā Or How The Sense Of Self Is Created

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson demystifies the Buddhist teaching of anattā (non-self), drawing extensively on the insights of Ajahn Buddhadasa and his book 'Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree.' Rather than presenting anattā as an esoteric philosophical concept, she offers it as a practical investigation we can conduct in any moment of experience.
>
> Wilson explains how the sense of self is not a solid, continuous entity but rather a condition that arises whenever there is grasping and clinging in the mind. Using vivid personal examples—from attachment to a favorite mug to reactions to cold weather and physical illness—she illustrates how we can observe the birth and death of the sense of self in ordinary experience. She explores how clinging manifests around the body (kāya), feeling tone (vedanā), thoughts, emotions, intentions, and even awareness itself.
>
> The talk emphasizes that emptiness (suññatā) is not an otherworldly state but something we experience naturally in countless moments each day—we simply don't notice it. Wilson guides practitioners to turn attention back onto the experience of 'I' or 'mine' whenever it arises, discovering that what we call self is always just momentary appearances: sensations, mental images, thoughts, and feelings arising and passing. This investigation, practiced both on and off retreat, gradually reveals that the perception of a continuous, solid self is an illusion. True emptiness, she concludes, doesn't lead to disconnection but naturally gives rise to compassion and complete engagement with life.

Tonight I'd like to talk about demystifying the sense of self, investigating the sense of self.

I was reminded of a poem. I'm not sure I remember it exactly correctly, but the day reminded me of it: "The winds of change blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

That's really how I felt today. The difference between the sense of self and no sense of self—which can both be present from moment to moment, either one—is this: when I was resistant and cold and pulled in and aversive, there was self, clinging, identified. And when the winds were just blowing across emptiness, there was no problem. That could change from moment to moment.

When James directed us to notice clinging, the movement of clinging or grasping, and the moments of non-clinging, of non-grasping—this is so key to our coming to live in freedom, because the ultimate clinging, the kind of core grasping if you want to think about it that way, is clinging to the sense of I and mine.

I want to talk about this not in an intellectual or philosophical way, but in a way of really directing our investigative attention into what we're calling "me," "I," or "mine" in any particular moment of experience. Just to meet that with attention rather than living in assumptions.

I want to use as a framework the way that Ajahn Buddhadasa talked about this particular issue of emptiness. In one of the suttas, someone asked the Buddha to just tell him, basically in one phrase, what is it that liberated ones know that I don't know? Just lay it out. And he said, okay, what they know is that nothing is worth clinging to. Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to as I or mine. That's what they know and what we don't quite totally get yet.

But talking about anattā or no-self or emptiness—the usual translation of the word suññatā—doesn't have to be an esoteric philosophical experience. As a friend of mine often reminds us, the Buddha did not teach anattā or anything to create another philosophy or to make occasions for more philosophical discussions. He taught it for our freedom from suffering and confusion.

I hope that what we can do is take the fear out of the concept of anattā, out of no-self or self. Take the hatred out of the idea of self as something we have to destroy, and just bring our attention to what's actually happening. We find out it's really not such a big deal. We can explore this on a moment-to-moment basis.

I want to say a little bit about Ajahn Buddhadasa because I found him quite inspiring. He died in 1993. He was one of the most famous Thai forest monks, meditation teachers, and scholars. He founded a forest monastery in southeastern Thailand. He was really quite radical, even up until the time he died—radical for Thai Theravada Buddhism.

For example, he had in his monastery what was called a spiritual theater, sort of like a museum, and it had all different kinds of paintings and artwork. It had the ten Zen ox-herding pictures in it. I think you have to have been in Thailand and know how provincial Thai Theravada Buddhism can sometimes be to see that it was really quite unusual for a renowned abbot to have Zen material in his monastery.

In his book Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree—which is a really good book, and I recommend it if you want to read more about recognizing the sense of self and emptiness—he talks about how in the 1930s, when he first began his teachings, emptiness or anattā was considered among the sangha, among the monks and nuns, something you didn't really teach to laypeople because they couldn't get it. It was sort of saved for people who were really committed and had all the time to look at it.

And he said, you know, that's baloney. Okay, maybe he didn't use the word baloney, but something to that effect. That's ridiculous.

I can see in us teaching here subtle remnants of that attitude. We kept discussing: Should I give this talk on anattā tonight, or what's the right night of the retreat? Is this too late because soon it will be over and people might get disturbed? And it's like—hey, this is the core of freedom in this teaching, and we're worried that you might get a little bit disturbed or something if you hear it? What's going on?

So I really want to talk about this, because for me this is the core point of freedom. You don't have to wait for some profound dissolution experience in meditation to begin to develop, and to continue to develop, a deep understanding that is not just of the intellect—to really experience emptiness, to experience the birth and death of the sense of self in any moment. This can be our practice on retreat, off retreat, as long as we're willing to pay attention.

That's what I want to talk about tonight.

I'm going to stick with "emptiness." Emptiness meaning that any particular moment of experience is empty of self, empty of me and mine. This is not an esoteric, out-of-body, incredibly out-there experience necessarily. It's truly natural and normal. In fact, all of us experience many, many moments of this every day. We just don't notice it most of the time.

The nature of mind—big mind, you could say, though "mind" is a hard word to use—the nature of who we are is sometimes referred to as awareness. There's no one word that can really describe or encapsulate it. But when we're not distracted, when we're not becoming involved in arising appearances with our ideas and reactions, when we're not basically clinging to whatever is happening, getting fixated on and involved in whatever is happening—when we're not distracted in that way, when we're just awake and present, there's no feeling in that moment of I or mine. It's just this. Those moments when things are just so peaceful—that is a moment like that.

And we can recognize this over and over. More often, what we recognize is the ways that we get distracted from this emptiness, if you want to call it that. Some sense experience arises and we get all involved in some concoction of liking and disliking, what it means, how I was when I was five, what's going to happen next—and it's just a sound. We get all involved in that. Or we think, "Why am I doing this? Why does this have to happen? Why can't I just be with the sound? It's so simple. It's just a sound." We notice that, but quite often we don't notice when that's not happening.

The root of all this distraction, the clinging and the pushing away (which is really the flip side of clinging), is this false view of self—this clinging to any experience as I or mine. Buddhadasa calls it "I-ing and my-ing," which I really like because it's not a solid thing. It's an arising experience in any moment. Something arises and there's I-ing it or my-ing it. I like that.

Unexamined, if we don't really look, doesn't it feel like the sense of I is pretty much usually here? And it seems pretty steady. It seems like often the one thing that does not abide by the law of impermanence. It feels pretty solid—if we don't look.

So what we can do in this practice is take our mindfulness, our wise attention, our wisdom eye, and turn it back onto the experience of I or mine itself when we notice that it's present. That's what I want to talk about tonight, hopefully in a practical way.

One way of describing the sense of I, the way Ajahn Buddhadasa speaks of it, is so simple. He says the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind. That's all. Grasping and clinging arises, sense of self arises. It's a condition that arises, and if it arises, you know what that means—it also passes, as soon as there isn't grasping and clinging in the mind. Or as a friend of mine puts it, describing his experience, "I want, I need, therefore I am." Very succinct.

So with mindfulness-wisdom, satipañña, truth-discerning awareness, we can begin and continue to recognize the arising and passing of this condition we call self. It's a different condition each time. There's nothing permanent. But we can begin to explore how it arises, how it is experienced when it's present, and how it passes. It really takes a lot of the oomph out of it. It takes a lot of the fear, a lot of the solidity out of this so-called sense of self to begin to explore it, because it's just like any other arising appearance. It's just like some thought arising, some emotion arising. It just comes and goes. It's nothing in particular.

So, just an example of the birth of the sense of self in a moment. I was on retreat last year—and this is not particularly a retreat experience; this is how it happens all the time. It was at IMS in Barre, and the way the mealtimes work there is much like here.

You walk in, get your plates, and there's a whole big shelf of mugs that have been collected from all the people who leave mugs, so they're all different. For weeks I would just come in, take a mug, get my tea. But for some reason, this particular morning, the mug I picked was just really nice. It was this lovely color green, and it fit so nicely in my hand.

And in short, somewhere as I was drinking my tea and feeling, "Oh, this is really pleasant, this is really pleasant," boom—a real sense of attachment to that pleasant feeling, and then to that mug, came in. It's just this mundane. And in that was the birth of me—me and my mug. That's it. I-ing and my-ing right there.

It wasn't too much suffering at the moment. We don't really notice it then; we're just noticing the pleasure at that point. But that was the birth of the self with the birth of clinging.

This is the dependent origination that the Buddha talked about, and I'm not going to go into it fully—it's really the core of his teaching of how, with ignorance and the arising of experience, we end up in suffering in a moment. There's ignorance, and then with sense contact there's a sense door, eye. There's a sense object, the mug. There's consciousness, awareness of that. Those come together. There's contact—I'm seeing the nice green mug. There's pleasant feeling. There's craving first—I like it. There's clinging—I want it. In fact, I want it in the next meal that I have. And that leads to, boom, birth of self. Suffering. Death, because what's born has to die. That's the dependent origination. That's the birth of self in any particular moment.

Next time it happens to you—of course it's not happening to you, is it? It's just happening out of emptiness. Next time there's that birth of that feeling of self, turn your attention on and feel it. Just be with the experience. I can describe how it is in this mind and body; don't then transplant that onto you.

For example, that "me and my mug"—a sense of contraction, a sense of grasping and clinging that is a tightness, a kind of limitation. It narrows the consciousness. What had been just relaxed, open, and free was now this mug. Everything else is sort of blotted out. Other people are in the way of my getting this mug the next time I come in to the meal. And in fact, when I finished the meal, I really started thinking, "Okay, maybe I should save it." Some people save mugs, and they're all hidden behind the plants and behind the curtains and everything. And I did have the grace to say, "Okay, forget that, Carol," and I put it back.

But then you see, birth of self leads to more wanting, more activity, more plotting and scheming. And I managed to—next time I came, I really looked. And there it was, my mug, and I grabbed it. I said, "Oh good, I have it." But it wasn't really so pleasant. In fact, the narrowness, the constriction of this sense of me, the sense of mine, was actually quite unpleasant. And I saw, "You know what? I don't need this." And I just put it down. In that moment was the death of self. And again, there was expansiveness, ease, just what is.

That's a simple example, but it happens hundreds and hundreds of times in any day. And instead of just feeling victimized, or not noticing it, or getting involved in what we can do to continue with the pleasantness, we can simply notice that process—that contact, that wanting, the birth of self, I-ing and my-ing. And when the clinging ends, as it will for that particular time—it will definitely end, it will disappear—it's really important to notice that as well, because then we begin to realize that the perception of continuity of self is an illusion.

So in that moment of putting down the mug, there's just sitting or hearing, sensation, no particular sense of self. There's just that shunyata, that emptiness at that moment. Notice that. Often we don't. Often we just kind of say, "Okay," and almost as if we dull out—

The ignorance comes in until the next birth of self arises—something else to react against or into, something to do or create, some intensity to grasp. But this emptiness is often just that. And it's easy to not really be awake there. There's no grasping in that moment. There's no aversion in that moment. But there also needs to be no delusion in that moment—delusion in the form of just dulling out and not noticing. Ah, just this. And it doesn't really matter what "this" is.

I want to talk some more about exploring this. I'm using the word "sense," but the sense or the feeling—when there comes an awareness that "I" or "mine" is being born or is present in a particular moment of experience, we can turn the awareness back onto that experience itself. Not thinking about it, not trying to analyze "what is this," but really turning the attention around: What is this "I"? What am I calling "I" in this moment? What is being clung to in this moment?

Because clinging is just a habit of mind. And with truth-discerning awareness, with mindfulness-wisdom, when we notice it—as I think was mentioned either this morning or last night—when you're aware of clinging, in that moment of mindfulness, actually clinging isn't happening. It's almost like we're observing the moment before, it's so fast. But in that moment, clinging is not being perpetuated. "I" is not being perpetuated. Turn around and see that. The habit can be seen through.

So I just want to give examples of some of the basic experiences we cling to. It's not a comprehensive list, and I hope I don't get too detailed. Some of it we can see in all times of our life, on retreat and off retreat. Some of it is a little more subtle, and the mind needs to be a little quiet to notice.

The obvious first experience we cling to in a large way is what we would call the body. But to take it into our actual experience, out of the realm of idea—when we're clinging to "my body," what is actually the experience of clinging, of what is being clung to? When you turn and look at it, it kind of deconstructs the sense of self.

Let me give you a couple of examples. You're sitting with your eyes closed and there's a pain in your knee. The attention might go there, and it's like, "a twinging pain in my knee." That's the experience. And there might be some clinging to wanting it to be better, or to the sense of "my knee." Certainly it feels like my body—whether it's "my body" or "I am the body," either one. There's some sense of I-ing and my-ing in that.

But really look: What is being called "my body," "my knee" at that moment when I turn my attention? Remember, you're sitting with your eyes closed and there's a twinge. How do you even know where it is in space? Never mind that it's a knee—what is giving you that information?

When I look at my experience, there's a twinge. And this is how it is for me; it might be different for you. I'm just inviting you to look with attention. There's a twinge, and then it's almost as if there's a mental image of my body, you know, with a little emphasis on the area of the knee. Although it's actually not here—it's like a little image placed somewhere, located down there. But it's all just mental image. It's actually nothing to do with body at all. It's mentality. And then there's a physical sensation, twinge. It might be pleasant, it might be unpleasant.

I don't know if this is too complicated, but just look the next time you're saying, "My back hurts," or "I have a headache." Even if your eyes are open, you can't see your back. You can feel a sensation, and there might be a sense of where it is. You might feel parts of your whole body, but really it's like that Big Mind meditation we did the other morning.

If you really tune in, the sensations are just floating in the space of awareness, and then there's this concept of "my body" put on top of it. There's nothing wrong with that. It's just that when we cling to that concept and don't see it, we're in this identification of "this is me, this is my body." And what's actually happening is sensation, mental image, pleasant or unpleasant, and clinging to one or all of the above.

Don't think about it. Really don't think about it. I'm just saying these things to point you back to your experience. Thinking about it completely takes you away. So as soon as you feel confused by something I'm saying, forget it. I'm serious. Let your attention come back to your actual experience. Because what keeps this sense of me and mine going is thinking about it and not realizing it's just thoughts. So just come back.

Like the wind today. When I feel, "Oh, I'm so cold. My hands are cold." I look down and my fingers have gone bone white. My body feels so contracted. I can't deal well with the cold. I'm so miserable. I'm so cold. But when I would just stop and open my attention and simply be with sensations—there was just sensations arising and passing, hearing arising and passing. That was it. Some of the sensations were pleasant. Some of them were unpleasant. And they change really rapidly. That was it. All the rest was thoughts, images, story concocted that I didn't see as thoughts and images, and there was clinging to it. That's largely how the sense of self is created moment to moment and carried on in time through thoughts and stories about it. And I'll say more about that in a minute.

Another aspect of experience that is often clung to, that feels like self and that we often don't notice because we don't look, is that quality of every sense experience that it's either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. It's called vedanā in Pali, sometimes translated as feeling tone. It's what the Buddha called the second foundation of mindfulness.

So, for instance, I was talking about the cold sensations—experiencing them as unpleasant. Or perhaps there's a really nice pleasant sensation. You have a sitting and the breath is really smooth and deep and it's pleasant. And you're sort of aware of liking it. And you're aware, you're really saying, "I know this is going to change. I'm really not attached." And we're very sincere. But then the next sitting, everything's chaos. And we find out that somehow we really were attached. And we don't quite know where the clinging was. Because often the clinging is not actually to the breath—it's to the pleasant feeling that goes along with it. Each slow breath had a pleasant feeling. It's subtle. We often don't notice that, and we get attached to the pleasantness or aversive to the unpleasantness.

That's why there's often an emphasis to notice, at times when it's obvious, that aspect of experience. Like you sit in the sun—warmth, warmth, liking. Notice just the pleasant quality. Just notice it, that's all. Then you might see how the clinging comes into the pleasantness itself.

Again, Buddhadasa speaks a great deal about what a useful practice it is in our daily life to notice the wave-like nature of pleasant feeling as we go through our daily experiences. There's so much that's pleasant. He says, how much pleasant feeling have you experienced in your life in just one day? So much. And how long has any of it lasted?

It lasts just like this. And then there's another pleasant feeling, or an unpleasant one. He asks, how much of our experience do we value by how pleasant it is? The more pleasant feeling something arouses in our experience, the better we think it is, the more we tend to value it.

Meditation is the opposite of this. That's why sometimes people say, "I don't know what I'm doing here again. I'm here for some reason, but it's been so hard." And it's really a sincere question, because generally, if something's unpleasant and difficult, we're out of here. But we keep coming back, even though it's difficult, and that doesn't sit with this general assumption that the more pleasant something is, the better it is.

But really watch this. The wave-like nature of pleasant—it comes and it goes, comes and it goes. Just to see that. Notice how often when the sense of "I" is there, when you just feel solid and here, if you turn the attention inward, quite often it's pleasant feeling that the clinging is around, even more than the actual experience that's engendering the pleasant feeling.

So we have aspects of the body, this feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Of course, a lot of clinging also arises to the aspect of our experience of mentality—thoughts and emotions. Obviously, with both thoughts and emotions, at times the clinging is so quick and subtle we don't even recognize it. How often does it just feel like "this emotion is me"? It's not that I even like this sadness or like this bliss. It often just feels like, "Well, this is just me. That's how it is." That's how close the clinging can be.

Thoughts and emotions can be difficult to notice as what the clinging is arising to because they come so quickly, they change so quickly, and they're so interconnected. Have you noticed that? How a thought gives rise to emotion, and as soon as you notice the emotion there are all these other thoughts, and then they give rise to another emotion, and it just keeps ricocheting off each other. Then there are a few sensations in there that give rise to unpleasantness and more emotions and thoughts, and it happens so fast that often it's really hard to turn your attention and ask, "Well, what is the clinging to?" or "Where is this sense of self?" It just feels like me.

But at times, when the mind is a little quiet, we can actually watch how from a very mundane experience, this sense of self is created and gets solid in just that amount of time. Very mundane.

I remember one time I was doing walking meditation. One of those times when it's just walking—nothing going on, so nice. We like it like that. Just walking along, and I had a turtleneck on, and I just ran my finger under my turtleneck. I was aware of it—sensation, sensation—and just in that moment of running my finger there, a mental image arose. You know how you see yourself as if looking out from behind your eyes but seeing your body and imagining how you look doing that? Such a little, neutral kind of experience.

But as soon as I'm doing that—that mental image, which is all fine, there was no particular clinging—then a sense of almost seeing myself through someone else's eyes, and the unspoken thought: "I wonder what I look like. Do I look like a typical yogi schlump, or am I looking kind of okay?" And in that moment—this is just a little thing, not like a huge insecurity—just like that. Clump. Clinging. Birth of "I," my image, myself, my body. So fast and so subtle.

None of those things in themselves are a problem. It's just when there's clinging to that—"What do people think of me?"—that thought and that fear, then there's a sense of self. For me, with the sense of self there comes a feeling of contraction, of solidity almost, that wasn't there the moment before. And it's all the same experiences—the image, the sensation, the thought. The sense of self is like a solidifying of that.

No experience in itself is any problem or necessarily has to be clung to or identified with. It really doesn't matter what the experience is. I'll give you an example of that—how sensations, thoughts, emotions, and the stories we tell in thoughts really coagulate the sense of self, and how in any moment we can cut through it.

I think this was a different retreat. I was sitting, pretty quiet, in an open kind of space—not super concentrated, just being with things. And just noting: hearing, hearing, tickling, tickling, sensing, sensing, coughing, coughing, tickling, tickling, tickling, tickling... "Oh my God, this is bronchitis."

And that thought—"Oh my God, this is bronchitis"—was really clung to. "I" arose strongly in that moment. I had had bronchitis quite severely about two months previously and had been quite sick. As soon as that thought was clung to, panic arose, and that was clung to—the future and my plans. "I don't have time for this. I've got things to do. I can't get sick again. And I'm on retreat! No, no, no..." It really went wild.

And then I thought: what's really happening here? Tickling, tickling. Coughing, coughing. Thinking, thinking. That was it.

And the whole thing went away. I mean, not the tickling, not the coughing—but the panic, the fear, the dreadful illness, my life falling apart. It was really just what it was.

And then I could see the thoughts arise again, the panic again. Well, what am I going to do about it? Should I go to the doctor? And all of that. Okay, just come back to the bare experience. And the whole self would subside again.

Buddhadasa has a phrase which he actually uses in a different context, but I like it here: volunteering for suffering. And I saw in that moment—it was almost like a choice—yes, I'm going to really go into this "oh my God, it's bronchitis" mode, and suffer. Because at any moment the attention can come back and just be with tickling, tickling, thinking, thinking, and there's no problem.

This doesn't mean that we become non-functional in the world. I know this is one of the questions that often comes up. If everything's just tickling, tickling, thinking, thinking, then how do we function? How do we take care of ourselves?

Well, actually, when the sitting ended and I could just be with what was there—tickling, tickling, kind of noticed the experience—I said, you know what? It is bronchitis. But that was just a recognition. It didn't have all the extra stuff along with it at all. You can recognize something with still no particular sense of self, just a recognition of conditions, a perception. Oh yes, these things put together make bronchitis. And I went and saw the doctor and got the antibiotics and it was fine.

So actually, the functioning is much more sane and appropriate when we're not lost in this I-ing and my-ing and we're just present with experience. Don't worry that you're somehow going to be off in the ozone, lost in emptiness when there's no sense of self. It's actually just the reverse—because there isn't any self, you can't lose it. There isn't a self here. It's not like we're getting rid of something. Nothing changes but that we begin to recognize what's actually happening anyway. So it just makes things a lot easier. It makes things a lot simpler.

Emotions are tricky because, for many of us, certain emotions somehow feel much more me than others. Some seem much more solid, and when they come—oh, that's that anxiety, that's really the core of my being. I may not always be anxious; once in a while I can see it go. But by golly, I know it's going to come back as soon as I'm in any particular situation, because that's really who I am. So I can be mindful of it, I can be with it, I can really accept it, but there's still some subtle clinging of I or mine to that particular emotion—whether it's judgment or love or anxiety or fear or whatever it happens to be.

As we've said over and over, it's really helpful to notice the beginnings and endings, as with everything, but particularly with the emotions that you feel are very sticky. Just notice that there are gaps. Someone will come into an interview having been in a very painful, difficult time with particular emotions—really, really working with it very well, but it's hard. And in talking about it and describing it, they kind of realize, oh, but actually, it's not here at all right now. And it can seem a little puzzling, even as it's a relief, because it seems so solid, so much part of who we are.

One way I like to turn the attention back and explore that sense of clinging, that sense of selfing around an emotion, is to notice the difference when an emotion is just what it is—there's sadness or anxiety or judgment or happiness, just what it is. The emotion itself is not a problem. There doesn't have to be clinging or a sense of self. And then notice the difference when it's not just sadness but my sadness, or I'm sad. There's a little extra—that's the clinging. It has a slightly different quality, a different mental and physical experience.

So just explore that for yourself. You learn to tell, in a way, when sadness is just that—just moving through the space of awareness like a cloud—and when sadness has become clung to, when an I has arisen as an object, as a being in that moment. It's noticing the birth of self as emotion.

Just a couple of other aspects of experience I want to mention briefly, to explore.

They're somewhat subtle, but one that is really easily clung to, because it's often not even recognized, is this experience of intention. The intention that gives rise to speech, that gives rise to any particular action.

We've spoken about it some, especially if you were here for both retreats. But intention is—you could call it the urge that arises that lets the arm move. We couldn't move without that. It's a mental experience that, as it were, gives the signal for the arm to move, for the voice to come out, for the thoughts to form, for me to say what I want to say.

We often explore this. People will talk about it in sittings or during the walking, where somehow there's an itch and they're really aware, and all of a sudden they're scratching. They say, "I don't know how that happened. I really didn't mean to scratch, but somehow it was there. I kind of just spaced out for a moment and scratching happened." Or we're in walking meditation, feeling really present, and the next thing you know, you're in the cafeteria having a cup of tea. And you think, "How did I get here? I was really into the walking meditation." Those are intentions that weren't recognized.

This happens all the time. There are intentions arising every moment. We're never going to recognize them all—don't even try. You'll make yourself crazy. But we can notice the big ones. Some intention got you to come here. At the end of the sitting, an intention arises to stand up.

You can play with it at times. Before you stand up, feel the intention to stand up and then don't do it. Feel it again and then don't do it. It's kind of fun. Or with an itch—you're just about to scratch and then you don't. You're just about to and then you don't. It's a way to get that sense of what an intention is. And then see how just one moment of not noticing and—wham—we're up there scratching.

So that's just to get the feeling of intention. Intention is just another effect arising from a previous cause. It's just part of cause and effect. There's an itch, an unpleasant sensation. There's a thought, "I don't like this." There's the intention to scratch, which leads to the movement, which leads to the scratching, which leads to the intention to think, "Oh, I blew it. I should have been mindful." It's just all a series of cause and effect.

But it's really common that we think, "What do you mean? Who's scratching? I'm scratching. Whose idea was it to scratch? Mine." Whenever there's a talk about intention at the three-month course, or about anattā, you can almost bet money that somebody the next day will say, "If there's no self, who had the intention to come to this retreat? If there's no self, who has the intention to stand up?"

The classical answer is: nobody. Intention just arises out of causes and in itself becomes a cause for another effect. It's just a chain of appearances arising. A sensation, an intention, a movement, a sensation, a thought, an intention. They're all just cause and effect arising and passing, arising and passing.

The "I," that clinging—when clinging, which is just another effect arising from cause... we also cling to clinging. When the clinging to that intention arises—see, this is kind of subtle—but it's that feeling of, "Of course I'm the one standing up." This is another really good one not to think about. No, I'm serious.

Intention, and the next one I'm going to mention, and then I'll say a little thing about both of them regarding not thinking about it. The next piece is: who's aware? Who is mindful? Mindfulness arises in a moment. "I'm aware of the intention to stand up, the intention to scratch." Awareness happens. It's very easy for this subtle clinging of "my awareness" or "I am awareness" to arise.

And it's so subtle it won't even probably feel like clinging. But doesn't it really feel like, if I said "who's aware?" well, I am, obviously.

When I say don't think about it—either this, intention, or awareness—it's because it's the thinking about it that actually seems to solidify that birth of self. What do you mean, I'm not intention? How does that work? Well, if I'm not intention, then what is it? And if I'm not aware, then what is awareness? How can awareness just arise? And then we start thinking. And the clinging is coming in to those thoughts. The self, the "I-ing," is happening around those thoughts. And we think ourselves into a really solid sense of self.

Remember in the last retreat—and this happens every time—after the talk on anatta, a lot of people were coming in saying, "I've got to get it, I've got to get this." And just that is the clinging to thinking that makes the self seem so solid, like it's something we'll never see through. In that moment, no.

Whenever you notice that sense of self, though, rather than trying to think your way out of it, just turn the attention—never mind who's turning the attention—just let an intention arise from a memory arising of having heard these words. The intention arises, the attention turns back on the experience of, "Oh, I was thinking this," and just see what that experience is in that moment. Very simply, just explore it. Drop into that experience with wise attention.

I find that when I'm on a long retreat and using noting, this is a note I have. The note is actually "self." I tried to explain this to Sayadaw U Pandita once, and boy, it really didn't work. He just got hysterical. "Ha ha, you think there's a self! Ha ha ha, you know self!" It really didn't go anywhere.

What I actually do is when I feel that sense—that without looking one would call self—I turn the attention back on it, I note it as "self," but I connect with what the attention actually finds. What's the real experience? And guess what? It's always just one of the six sense experiences. Maybe it's pressure. Maybe it's an image. Maybe it's a thought. Maybe it's tingling. Maybe it's an emotion. Maybe it's a memory. It's usually almost always something different, but it's just an arising momentary appearance that's also passing in that moment. It's really like nothing. It's nothing special. And each time we turn our attention there, it's no big deal. You just see it. It passes. The next thing arises.

To do this over and over—it's really in activity, in our daily life, in conversation. Whenever you begin to notice that sense of self, just bring the attention there and see what's truly there. Birth and death of self many, many times in one day.

So rather than trying to get rid of self, we simply begin to see through its illusory nature over and over and over. And the heart and mind just naturally begins to incline to stillness—the stillness of not needing to get so reactively involved in experience.

So, nothing whatsoever should be clung to as I or mine. That means nothing whatsoever. It doesn't mean nothing except the teachings, or nothing except this idea I have, or nothing except views of practice, or sense of self, or anything. It means nothing. Whatever's arising in a moment, it's not worth clinging to. It's the clinging that creates the suffering.

And it's so poignant, because the clinging is really in service of wanting to find completion.

And it's the clinging that blinds us to the completion and ease that's already here—always here—when there's a heart and mind of no clinging and vivid wakefulness.

So it's also true. Buddhadasa again: "If at any moment any person has a mind empty of clinging to I and mine, in any moment, even if only for an instant, at that moment it means that the heart, the mind has realized emptiness." Even if only for an instant. And that can be very powerful.

I know for years I was waiting because I thought when the heart realizes emptiness, all these lights go off and that's it—it's realized it forever. Done. Finished. And it's not. So I'm sorry to say. But actually, once I got rid of that idea, you see that the heart can recognize emptiness, the mind can rest in emptiness, moments—many, many, many moments in any day. And it does. And so our practice is to continue to recognize this. Not necessarily anything exciting. But it's just as valid a way of recognizing emptiness, no self—this recognizing the birth of the sense of self out of the emptiness and the death of it. And then again, that emptiness. To recognize this over and over and over is just as valid; it goes just as deeply over time in our being, so that we really know emptiness, as having a really profound blowout experience.

Those intense experiences can be so strong that they cut through really quickly, and we really get it for a while. But even those, after some time, again—you're home arguing with the husband, having to do the dishes, and there's a rising of clinging, death and birth of self, even after a really intense, opening, empty experience.

So on this level of moment-to-moment awareness of practice—and this isn't just about being on retreat, this is all the time in our life—it's extremely powerful and it's absolutely freeing. Because in any moment when that sense of self is solid, if you remember to turn around and look, it's like... ugh. And sometimes you can go see, "I don't want to see that this is just clinging. I want to be right." Clinging to being right.

We've used different approaches to help us have this sense of emptiness, to be, as Buddhadasa talks about, learning to be content with these moments of emptiness. Because they're often nothing that special. Can we be content with these moments? We actually then grow to appreciate and incline more towards the stillness of these moments. But first we need to keep recognizing and being content with that—with things just as they are.

We've used here the metaphor of space a lot as a way to help us recognize the heart-mind of non-clinging. It's a metaphor; it's not a completely accurate description, but it is helpful. Because, as Buddhadasa again says, we normally don't recognize the emptiness because we're so involved with the experience and concocting our thoughts about it and our stories about it. So when we remember the space, it doesn't mean we dissociate from experience or shut it out, but we see that there's this that we're fixated on, and there's all that space.

That's why, for me, being here in the desert is such a great place to explore arising of sense of self and resting in emptiness. Because I can be caught up in any particular thing—maybe I had a difficult interview, I'm working on my talk, I had an argument with somebody, or I'm just tired. I just walk out and look at the desert and the sky, and immediately there's just a space of awareness. And the difficult thing is also still arising. It's not like, "Oh, there's space. Nothing else is here. I don't know what's happening." Just spacious emptiness. That's kind of a false emptiness that we can fall into at times—it feels really nice, but we don't have a clue in life what's arising and passing within the space. It's like walking in the desert and tripping over the cholla because we're so lost. That's not really the emptiness I'm talking about. That leads to indifference, to disconnection.

True emptiness has that spaciousness. It's not necessarily the space of spreading out. It's the space of not being fixated on whatever object's arising. We know it's there, but we also recognize the space around it—the heart and mind of non-clinging. So it might be actual space, but it also allows for an immediacy of connection to any particular experience. Exquisitely present, and there's still that spaciousness, that stillness, because there's non-clinging in it.

Someone told me about an experience on this retreat. She was sitting and just noting what was arising, and there was a really loud sudden noise—which happens here a lot. Just a really loud sudden noise; the attention noticed it. Hearing. And it really startled her into a vivid wakefulness. Hearing. And then she said, as if the mind went to go back and realized, "Oh, there's nowhere to go back to. It's just this."

And that was not fearful. That was an experience for her of such joy and lightness and freedom. Just this. And I saw her not too long after that, and she had just been in that space. Just the ants. Just the wind. Just the smell. Just the sensation. Just this.

That is like an exquisite presence in the heart and mind of non-clinging. It's spaciousness. It doesn't mean spaced out. It's spacious because there's not this fixated involvement. So when we use space as a metaphor, it's to help us recognize this quality of non-clinging. It's not to go off into outer space.

This true moment of emptiness, heart and mind of non-clinging—it doesn't really matter what experience happens to be coming and going. There's just this experience. It's exquisitely present, but it's empty of any I or mine, any separate self. And it doesn't lead us into a kind of passivity or disconnection from life or dissociation. Actually, it's the clinging, it's that I-ing and my-ing that creates the sense of separation, of fear, of me and other, of needing to protect, of needing to hold back.

When there's just that simplicity of presence without constructing an I around it, in any moment—that's what gives birth to true compassion. That's where real connectedness comes out of, because we see that's really what's true.

I just want to close with two quotations from two different Tibetans. From Padampa Sangye: "Once you realize emptiness"—and remember, realize it just for a moment, doesn't have to be the final one—"once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything harmful. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously."

It's the same thing. Emptiness of I-ing and my-ing means everything is present here in this moment. The natural expression of awareness is the flame-like heat of compassion. The flame-like heat of compassion. It doesn't mean this is kind of cooled out, floating on a cloud. There can be active, total engagement and presence because there's nothing that needs to be held back. No self that needs to be held separate.

"Let the entire game happen on its own, springing up and falling back like waves, without changing or manipulating anything, and everything vanishes and reappears magically without end."

Nothing changes and everything changes.

CHAPTER 359

Nature of Insight

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the essential nature of insight (vipassanā) and the conditions that support its arising. Drawing on Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching that understanding arises not from thinking but from sustained conscious awareness, she clarifies that insight is fundamentally a shift in perception rather than intellectual knowledge we acquire and possess.
>
> Using vivid examples—from magic eye images to practitioners' experiences with pain, fear, and anger—Wilson illustrates how insights emerge when we bring total, non-clinging attention to our moment-to-moment experience. She emphasizes that we cannot force insights to happen; we can only cultivate the supporting conditions through continuous mindfulness. The talk addresses common misconceptions practitioners hold about needing special concentrated states before insight can arise, pointing out that any experience—even restless, scattered states—provides fertile ground for awakening.
>
> Wilson explores the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) of existence—impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and non-self (anattā)—explaining how deeply ingrained our misperceptions are at a cellular level, even when we intellectually understand these truths. She offers the Buddha's teaching that "the search for a resting place is burning; not to need one is cool and peaceful," inviting practitioners to open to the poignancy of constant change rather than resisting it. This opening, she suggests, leads not to despair but to deeper love, appreciation, and wonder at the mystery of each moment.

Tonight I want to talk about insight—the nature of insight and supports for insight. After all, this is called insight meditation. So you may have been wondering: when are you going to get an insight? What actually is an insight? What do we mean by insight?

In some ways, it's obvious. It's not a piece of knowledge that we somehow acquire and then have. It's not "Now I will understand impermanence, and I've got it." An insight is that kind of aha moment when we suddenly experience ourselves or a particular situation, or the way we understand a particular situation, just shifts by itself. It's nothing that we can make happen, which is, of course, endlessly frustrating to us.

The thing about insight is the situation itself doesn't necessarily change. It's not that somehow we fixed everything. It's just a sudden shift in perception that changes our whole attitude to and potential response within whatever the particular situation or issue happens to be going on. So it's not a result of thinking. Let me read from Thich Nhat Hanh:

"Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking. It is the result of a long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding."

Insight is just literally, in my experience, a shift of perception. When we translate what the Buddha talked about as understanding things in the wrong way, or wrong view, I really like that translation—wrong view—as not being metaphorical but being quite literal. We're viewing ourselves, we're viewing our moment-to-moment experience wrongly, inaccurately. And insight is when that perception, in various ways, makes a little sudden shift.

The example I use a lot for the shift of perception—it's pretty apt—is those magic eye graphic photos. They have whole books of them. You look at it and it's two or three or four colors of just different graphic design. There's no particular recognizable literal image. But the whole trick to the magic, as you know, is if you look at it steadily in a particular way, which I've found is actually sort of unfocused but steady, suddenly a 3D image of something recognizable is there. It's like it suddenly leaps out. Suddenly there's dinosaurs, where before it was just little green and red images. And you really see it. Dinosaurs. It's not a trick. And then if you look away or you start looking too hard, it's gone. Shift of perception.

Until you see it for yourself, you can be told day in, day out, up the wazoo, "There's dinosaurs there." And until you see it, you may believe it or not believe it. You may beat yourself over the head trying to see the dinosaurs, which as we know doesn't work. The more you try, the more you grasp at trying to see it, the less likely you will see it.

Once you've seen it, then the next one that comes along, you don't know what's in it, but there's a shift in the mind stream, a shift in the understanding, and you know: "Oh, this looks like it could also be a magic eye." You don't know for sure. Maybe someone's tricking you and making a little graphic image and there isn't anything in it. That's possible. But you know it's possible to have that shift of perception, and it gets easier and easier. And it's also okay that it goes back. In a way, both of those ways of perceiving are possible.

That's really the kind of shift of perception that happens over and over in life, just in regular situations, but also—and particularly what I want to talk about tonight—in our meditation practice, in the way that we perceive and then understand our mind and body process.

That shift of perception comes with the magic eye, or maybe in daily life there's some problem you're mulling over, how to fix it, or something creative. We all know how when we let go of clinging so tightly to "what do I do," and just relax the whole thing and be present, often something unexpected springs up—whether we call it intuition or whatever. That comes from the heart, the mind, that lets go, that relaxes clinging to either a particular "I've got to know this," or "this is the way it is," or "I know," or trying to see what we think we need to see.

It's in the relaxing of the clinging, but with a continuing, steady, connected attention and awareness, that the shift of perception we call insight is possible. And as we all know, we can't hold on to the insight. We can't necessarily keep that shift of perception. And while the insight is not thought itself, of course we're going to think about it.

Thoughts will arise to explain it. Back to the 3D image, just the way I described it. "Oh, okay, there's something about optical illusion and the way it's arranged and a 3D image arises." There's nothing wrong with that. Just recognizing that's our use of thought to explain or describe something. But it isn't the same thing as the insight.

And we can't get back to hold on to always be perceiving in that new insightful way by continuing to hold on to the thoughts. So it's just seeing they're two different functions. Thought isn't bad. It's useful if we recognize it for what it is. But if we think we're going to grab a hold and think and think—you know, if I start thinking, "How can I look at these things in the correct way to see the soccer players? What is it?"—no, no, no, you completely lose it.

So the insights that come in practice, they're momentary, but they affect a change in the mind stream, don't they? It's like we see things in a different way, and it's never quite the same again. And they have varying degrees of effect.

A very common example would be sitting with pain—that's very common, we know that—and really bringing the attention over and over, gently, into the pain. Just seeing all the fluctuations the mind is going through around the unbearableness: "I'll just stay with it, I'll grit my teeth, I'm going to break my leg," spacing out, going into fantasy, the suffering, the craziness, whatever. And somewhere in there, maybe somewhere down the line, there's a little moment where the whole awareness is just totally present with that pain. In that moment, it's just sensation. You're not thinking about it. You're totally present. There's a total surrender, a letting go of trying to fix it, of trying to describe it, of trying to get away from it—of anything. Just total presence. And in that moment, it's like, oh, it's no longer suffering. You don't even think that. It's just, "Oh, okay, what's the problem?"

It doesn't last, does it? And that not lasting may just be that the attention wavers, or it may be that some thoughts start to come in, or there's a grasping of "Wow, this is great, how can I keep it?" The situation, the circumstance changes because it's always changing. And we're back in the suffering. Maybe the suffering seems worse because there's that thought in our mind: "Wait a minute. A minute ago, this was all okay. Now it's suffering. It's so much worse. I wish I never knew it could be okay. I wish I never heard of this dharma. I was much better off when I was ignorant."

But it's too late. It's not really a conscious option that we can take very well anymore—to just dull ourselves out. Even though I'm making a joke, you know, the suffering seems worse, but there's a shift in the mind stream. We've had a touch of, "Oh, right. Where is the suffering here?"

We can then think about it. You can extrapolate from an insight like that all the Buddhist teachings, really—the whole Four Noble Truths. There's suffering, which we would have said was "my knee is killing me, that's the suffering"—no surprise there. But in that shift of perception, that insight, we see that the suffering is the reactive mind. There was an ending, a cessation of that suffering. The mind let go into total presence—no more suffering. And the path out of suffering, in this case, is the path of clear awareness, not clinging, but steady, connected attention.

That's thinking. It's useful to help us understand and sort of digest what happens, and it can give us a guideline for how to meet pain the next time, but it can't hold on to that insight for us. But it's okay, because we learn to really trust that this understanding which comes from insight affects change on a cellular level—the way I like to put it. Like we're learning on a level below the level of conscious thought. And we learn to trust that.

So in that moment of insight, what really happens is we've seen through, you could say, wrong view. The wrong view that "I'm really suffering because my knee's hurting, and if the pain would stop, then everything would be okay. And it can only be okay if the pain stops." One woman on a retreat told me this little example. I love it because it's so perfect.

In the middle of a long sitting during an afternoon, it was very hot—a retreat in summer, a crowded room, kind of stifling. She was really restless, that kind of restlessness where you feel you're going to jump out of your skin. "I cannot bear this another minute." So she stood up. The hall was crowded, she was in the back, and to get out she would have been walking through people, creaking across the floor, and so on. Sometimes social pressure keeps you there. And sometimes that's good. In this case, it was good.

So she was standing there—"I can't bear this, it's so unpleasant"—the agitation, the restlessness, so unpleasant. And suddenly, just as she was about to leave, she said, she had the thought: "Oh, right. This is just uncomfortable sensation. What's the problem? I can be with uncomfortable sensation." And the whole huge thing just fell away.

Now, it continued to be uncomfortable sensation. It's not that suddenly she was floating on a cloud of bliss. But the whole sense of struggle and suffering and needing to get out was gone. And she really was awake in that shift. Sometimes it happens and we just kind of zone out and don't notice—it isn't really quite an insight then because we don't really take it in. But she really noticed. "Ah, wow." Nothing changed but the perception, almost the way of relating, the way of describing what's going on in that situation. But it changes everything.

And it was really a profound moment for her because it then affects our mind stream. It affects the habits of mind. Nothing is quite as solid the way we thought it was. And that's really what is going on in a meditation retreat—why we have so much emphasis on the moment-to-moment continuity of mindfulness throughout all the sitting and walking in the day. To really begin to allow our attention to get clear, connected, but not clinging, not holding to preconceived notions. Open for discovery. Because we can't decide, as I said, we can't make insight happen. Even when we've had it before, we can't make it happen again. All we can do is set up supporting conditions, and then pray to God some spontaneous insight arises before we get too discouraged. I'm kidding—it's just to set up supportive conditions. That's what we're doing here.

The main factors that I would say support the arising of these shifts of perception are exactly what we're doing here: learning how to bring a totality of attention together, of awareness of all our mental and physical energy, how to collect that in a moment and the next moment and bring it wholeheartedly to whatever is arising by itself. We meet it with bare attention. What Rodney talked about the other night is caring attention. It's an attention that has no preconceived notions, no preference, no underlying subtle conceptual ideas of "if I pay attention to this emotion, I will learn X, Y, Z." "If I bring non-judging, total attention to this pain, it's bound to go away because we know how things dissolve in the light of awareness." "That happened yesterday, so that meant I was doing it right—how to get there again."

You see how quickly, how quickly the non-clinging, non-judging, non-conceptual attention gets the subtle overlay of some notion, some idea, something we think we know or want to learn. But pure awareness, open for discovery, not even trying to discover—just to meet whatever's arising, totally, totally present. And in that, there's the possibility for perception to shift. Just the possibility for something other than what we expect, or think we already know, or don't even know we think we already know, to emerge.

Some perceptions, some ways we view reality—either the reality of who we are, what a human being is, what's going on in our mind and body, or the reality of what's happening in a particular situation—some of these we hold with such certainty. Yet it's easy, if we simply pay clear attention, for that perception to shift.

Sometimes the ideas, the views, the certainties we're holding to—we don't even know they're views or certainties. We just know that's how the world is.

Let me give you an example of how perception can shift easily. A friend told me this story. She was on a retreat some years ago with Ajahn Sumedho in Switzerland. At that time, to put on a retreat in Switzerland, they would rent these really huge old houses. All over Switzerland there are these big, big houses that youth groups rent in the summer, up in the mountains—fifty, a hundred kids can come and spend a week. So they're old, old, creaky houses with no insulation. You think there are little creaks on the floors here, but every time you'd walk anywhere in those houses, enormous creaks.

So she was sitting during a sitting period, a schedule like this, and the meditation hall was upstairs. As I said, it was really creaky. She was just starting to get focused on her breath, quiet, concentrated, and then she starts hearing: creak, creak, snap, creak. Somebody's walking downstairs. The walking room was downstairs under the meditation hall.

And the aversion that can just spring up immediately from an unpleasant sound! But also the immediate reaction: How can they be walking? You know it's a sitting period. There's a reason we have a schedule so we don't bother one another. And on and on. How do they expect me to get concentrated when this jerk is walking downstairs? Creak, creak, creak.

So this went on for some time during the sitting period. And as long as you're lost in that thought, you're lost in it. There's no chance for anything else to happen. Then she really committed: okay, let me just come back and be with the breath. Just try and be with the breath. So she came back and was feeling her breath. And lo and behold, she noticed that she was sitting with her back leaning against the wall. Every time she took a breath and her back moved out, it hit the wall and made a creak. She was hearing herself breathing against the wall and creaking—and getting completely incensed at this person walking downstairs.

That's a good example. Once you've seen that, there's no going back. But she could only see it by letting go of the story and her anger in the moment. Not even working through it, but just saying, okay, never mind, let me just come back and meet what's happening in the moment, this breath. And something completely unexpected is able to be perceived.

Okay, that's relatively easy, but it does take the same qualities of effort: the commitment to be present, the willingness to come with your full attention to whatever is, the non-clinging, the non-grasping to our ideas of things, and just the willingness to meet this moment fresh. We use the breath, we use the body, we use whatever's arising as a way to bring ourselves into the moment. But it's not really so important which thing she was meeting fresh—just something arising here and now.

So that's easier. But sometimes we can get so locked into not even knowing that we're clinging to a description of reality that we don't even notice information that shows us we're holding to some very limited idea.

Another example: some years ago I was teaching a retreat in California, about fifty people. It was like five days into the retreat, and I was meeting with a woman. It was her first retreat. There were a lot of people there whose first retreat it was. So when there are a lot of first-timers, we give a lot of very basic instructions, starting from sitting and posture and everything.

She came in, and she was just in agony sitting cross-legged on the floor. Not just some pains, not just some sittings where it hurts—but really in so much agony that nothing was happening except unbearable pain through all her sittings. Which isn't really the most helpful way to begin practice. You're just fighting with willpower.

She came in, and actually I saw her just at the end of this ordeal. She said she had spent four or five days like that because it was clear to her that's what you had to do. You couldn't meditate other than sitting cross-legged. About the fifth day, she looked up. I was sitting on a chair, like I always sit on a chair. She looked up while I was giving instructions or something, and it went in. Five days it took.

It went in. Oh. Oh, she's sitting in a chair. And she meditates sitting in a chair. Maybe it's possible to meditate without being cross-legged. It's amazing what our minds can do. And once that was in, of course, it changed. And I encouraged her in that, naturally.

So that's to give you a sense of how, even though we think we're really open and not bringing any baggage, we can be so sure of something—like that woman, so sure that's how you have to meditate—that we don't even have the space to notice something other. We just know this is how it is, and we don't even know we know it. We just... it is how it is. You'd argue to the death with someone: this is how it is.

In our practice here, one way that people can suffer a lot is in relationship to how they're evaluating or judging themselves in meditation practice. Sort of like this woman in the example I gave—"I'm not doing it right because I have to sit cross-legged and I'm dying with pain. I can't follow any of the instructions."

One of the things that people get caught up in a lot, in terms of relationship to insight in their practice, is ideas. And each of you can check for yourself: what are the ideas rolling around in there, in your mind, in your heart, that you don't recognize as ideas but that are your beliefs, your descriptions of what either good practice would look like or what kind of state you have to be having in order to have a useful, genuine, liberating insight?

And often it's, "I really want an insight into anatta, into no-self." And the imagination of that is either "I have to be so incredibly concentrated in samadhi that I can get to the eighth formless jhana of neither perception nor non-perception, and then maybe I'll have a blowaway insight into no-self, which will never go away again. It will completely and forever change the way that I perceive myself in life." No more suffering, no more unpleasant feelings, no more self-consciousness, God knows. Certainly no more greed. That's what we expect from insight.

Okay, I'm exaggerating a little. Maybe. I hope I'm exaggerating a little. But take it down however many notches and then look at your own practice and see if you're writing off what's happening now as something you've got to get through, get over, move out of—to get to a decent enough state that you can begin to really see something useful about life, about practice, about yourself, about liberation, about impermanence, about anatta.

So the thing about insight, this spontaneous shift of perception—it can happen any time, in the midst of any situation, throughout the day, whatever you're doing. I have some of my best insights in the in-between times, you know? Just walking into the toilet booth. I'm still present, but that little bit of extra trying to get somewhere has dropped away. And you're just present without the clinging, and ah, something comes up into awareness that I hadn't noticed before.

So really looking—sometimes practice is very subtle. Very subtle sensations of breath, subtle sensations of body. There's not much emotion and you're just really noticing the fine movements of attention. Generally, we like that. Generally, we think it's good, unless it bores you. Unless what you think should be going on is really strong emotional release, having something interesting to talk about, or at least to look at, or at least to feed a sense of, "We're really working on something here. We're really getting to the bottom of something now. Now I'm about to have the ultimate experience of my sadness, my grief, my rage." Ultimate meaning it's going to be gone, right? And then I'm free from it. So good, let's bring it on and have an insight.

And when it doesn't come, and it's just subtle breath, sensations, and you come in and go, "But this is so boring. There's nothing useful going on here."

But it doesn't matter what's happening. Whatever you're thinking needs to be gotten through in order to get to the level where you can have insight—that's a big mistake. Big mistake. Anything that's happening, just the mind being all over the place—it's the rich field of insight. The insight's not about what's happening; it's about our relationship to it.

When you're holding to anything as me, and suddenly that shifts, and you see, "Oh, this is just conditions arising"—that's insight into anatta. Like someone told me last retreat. They were having so much fear. They'd be afraid of the people in the hall. They'd walk out into the dining room and just be afraid of that. They'd walk outside and feel afraid of the space. They'd go to their room at night and be afraid.

And, you know, having – of course it's not pleasant – so some resistance to the fear, and also a kind of focusing while trying to tell themselves there's nothing going on in this room, there's nothing to be afraid of. This is a nice place in the country, there's nothing to be afraid of. The people in the dining room are minding their own business, there's nothing to be afraid of. Like that.

And suddenly they said, "Oh, I don't have to focus on all the objects – it's just fear. Awareness can be aware of fear." Fear. And it's just fear arising in the space of awareness. And it was really fine. Still fear, but not that sense of me and other and fix it and what do I do, and each new fear being a whole new gestalt to work through. Just: ah, fear.

That's a powerful insight into anatta, into the fact that fear arises due to conditions. You don't always know what they are. Awareness can be aware of fears like this. It doesn't have to refer back to me. And in that, there's so much space and not so much suffering. You can't hold on to relating in that way permanently, but it really changes the mind stream. You know it's possible.

Or I remember someone else was saying they were filled – there was some other yogi there who was driving them crazy. I know that's not happening here with anybody, but it was a different retreat. Some yogi was just driving this person crazy, doing what they thought were inappropriate things. Anyway, the person was filled with rage and anger, really trying to work with it, trying not to buy in, but really filled with rage. And they would come to the interview and say, "I can't believe it – and they spoke to me, and they did this, and they did that. I'm trying to feel the anger," you know, underlying that sense of, "Well, really, they are being a jerk" – that kind of self-righteous meanness.

But anyway, he said all of a sudden, after some days – a couple of days of this, not steady state, that's another thing – somehow there was a moment when he wasn't holding on to either the anger or the sense of himself as righteous or the judging himself for being angry, which is also holding on, right? Just a moment of pure attention. I think he must have been working with this person; there was some reason they were in proximity. And he just looked, saw this person's face – not trying to look, but just an open, completely present, non-clinging-to-any-view moment. And in that seeing of the face, he felt such a movement of compassion for that person.

You just get an intuitive sense of their suffering, and such a movement of compassion. It was so powerful that it just blew this guy out of the water in terms of his whole belief system – not only about what was going on in relation to how completely inappropriate that person was, but his own belief system about himself. Because he never would have thought he could feel that level of compassion, which only arises through open-hearted connection. Compassion doesn't arise when we're pushing away pain, others or ourselves. It's a connection.

And it just blew him away to see, to feel that possibility, that completely other way of relating in a situation. It really showed him a whole other possibility in his own assessment of his own internal experience and what was possible for himself. He would have previously not thought that was possible for him. "I'm a person who can't feel that level of compassion." The ideas we hold about ourselves based on non-continuous attention, based on not really seeing the truth of how things are.

So we don't have the conscious power really to decide what we want to see. And some of you have even said that in a different way coming into the interviews – "I came here with the idea that I was going to work on this particular issue." Maybe it's a huge issue in your life, or maybe it's the way practice was. Like someone said, "I always want to come to retreat and pick up right where I left off at the last retreat." We do that. Good place. We forgot. We forgot the first days, right? Which is a good function of bad memory, because it gets us back... Every retreat I start, it's like, "Oh God, right – that first day. I forgot."

But anyway, people come and think, "I'm going to work on my grief" or whatever, or this situation in life. But it's not coming up. It's not coming up. And we decide, "I think I really want to work on seeing impermanence today."

We might decide, "I'm going to see impermanence wherever I look." And you can sort of do that, incline your mind in that direction. But it may be a day when judging and aversion is what's actually up. Yes, you can see the impermanence of judging and aversion—you can. But we can't control what we're going to see. We don't have that conscious power. And that wanting to control is actually a clinging that again freezes experience, that doesn't allow for the unexpected insight, the shift of perception to arise.

So, for example, we can read about emptiness, get some idea of it, and then we start looking in our practice for that. That looking alone, I can guarantee, is going to preclude noticing emptiness—whatever the heck that is—because whatever idea we have about it is already too much, and then we're looking for that idea on top of it. Looking for is the best way not to see anything.

Krishnamurti's phrase "freedom from the known" speaks to this so truly. That's what mindfulness, bare attention, just a moment of it, truly is: a total presence that's free from the known and so open for fresh discovery. Open just to meet this moment completely new and fresh, completely free from the known.

The deepest patterns or misperceptions—I would say—that the Buddha spoke of often, the ones that are hardest to see through because we misperceive so steadily, are what the Buddha often talked of as the three characteristics. We perceive what is constantly changing, what is impermanent, as permanent or lasting. We all know we do this intellectually, but this misperception is on a cellular level almost. Or we perceive what is constantly changing, what can never give us any lasting satisfaction or happiness, as satisfying, as what's going to make us happy. And we perceive what is not self, what is basically out of control, as somehow being me—a lasting, permanent me—or belonging to me, and thus in some way subject to control.

Now all of these things—what is changing, what is essentially unsatisfying because it's changing, what is out of control, not self—that's everything that we can experience, mind and body. Everything fits those three characteristics. All phenomena that come and go.

And because we don't just hold on to those perceptions—they're arising moment to moment—and we don't even notice they're arising because it's so familiar, we generally just don't even think about it. It's just how things are.

All the struggle with the sense of self, and "How can there be no self?"—as soon as we talk about anattā, the questions arise: "Well, if I'm not self, who decided to come here? If there's no self, who's eating? How would I go to work? How would I know which family to go back to if there's no self?" All that kind of questioning arises because it's such a foreign concept to us, because we're continually, unconsciously reinforcing the sense of permanence, the sense of me back here driving the show, the sense that somewhere there's some experience that is reliable and comfortable, that's going to give me ease and peace, some experience that I can hold on to for satisfaction.

That's just so much an unconscious part of us until we begin to meet our moment-to-moment experience freshly, that it's really hard to see through. And just deciding, "I know intellectually that things change, so I'm ready to see through it. I'm ready now. I get it. I'm ready to put down my misperceptions of permanence. From now on, I'm living in the now. Constant change!"—we've probably tried that. It might work for a moment or two. But then it's just so habitual that we perceive the other way.

And sometimes on retreat, this is why the continuity of attention, of awareness, is so important—because it's in the steadiness moment after moment that constant change begins to reveal itself. You can't hide from it.

The fact that things are out of control—is that a big surprise when you think about it? If you think about any sitting you've had, is it news that the experience of the sitting was out of your control? Have you ever, ever been able to sit down and totally control what happened in a sitting? But have you given up somewhere? No?

When your sitting's going really well and then suddenly it goes south—I'm not sure why that's an expression for bad; I apologize to Southerners, my parents are Southerners too—but anyway, when the sitting goes south, do we still tend to think, "What did I do wrong?" Or do we go, "Of course, everything's in constant change and flux, so it's changed. Next moment." Once in a while, maybe. But generally, the first thought is, "I should be able to control it, and I've done something wrong." Hence, the pleasantness has changed.

And so the steadiness of attention begins to allow more and more opportunities for an alternate, more accurate perception.

Sometimes that perception—say, of anicca—I'll use anicca as an example because it's a good one. Intellectually, conceptually, the fact that things are in constant change isn't really a hard concept to wrap around, is it? It's not like anattā. Basically, we would all agree. But cellularly, the way we actually live—what would it mean to really, really live knowing that every moment is in constant change? To really live from that, not clinging to something that we know is already changing. That would be so different.

Many experiences, many insights can come into impermanence, and they can be at times very peaceful, very energizing. Sometimes after an insight you get a lot of energy, really inspired. And sometimes it can actually be quite frightening. It can go all ways.

One example: just this last retreat I was sitting, eating and chewing very carefully. I wasn't looking for insights into impermanence or anything. I was just really present with eating and enjoying whatever it was. Chewing it, and then I swallowed it. It was just one of those moments where as soon as I swallowed, it was so clearly gone. Do you know what I mean? It was just gone. It wasn't there. It wasn't anywhere. It was gone. I know it sounds silly, but then I thought, "Well, not gone—you can feel it in the throat." No, that's a thought. That actual food taste, that moment, is totally, irrevocably gone. Can't be back.

And that's how it is with every moment. It's there, and then that moment is irrevocably gone. The next moment, maybe I could feel something here, but that's not the food that was in my mouth. That's not the taste I was tasting. It's just a thought that says, "Oh, that's the food now working with the saliva and going down into my throat." And that thought, if we don't see it as a thought arising in the moment, we don't see impermanence. We see there's the food and now it's changed and it's going down my throat, and there's this whole nice sense of continuity, and behind it all is me experiencing that.

So just that moment of gone-ness—it was great. I loved it. Wow. And without thinking a lot about it, I just naturally started to notice how one moment just falls away and the next moment falls away. It didn't last all day or anything, but it was a real insight, the kind that is just peaceful and so obviously true that we're resting. It's easy.

But often, sometimes people have an experience when there's some concentration where the sense of the form of the body falls away, and it's just sensations arising in space, or no sense of the body at all. Or some really difficult emotions are there, and it's so "me," and then it just vanishes, and it's so confusing to have it gone. Even though at first it's far out, there's such a dissonance with our normal way of being that really quickly the normal views and opinions, the normal way of perceiving things, come back in with a vengeance. You've had this opening, and then fear, fear. Or the fear has the function of shutting the mind down, and everything's solid again right away. Nothing you can do about it. It just happens. Then you spend three weeks trying to get to that place where the body's open and it's just sensation. So what? But that kind of dissonance—because we don't really realize how subtle and deep these misperceptions are, how deeply entrained in the process of noticing.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama pointed out once, when I was listening to a teaching of his on impermanence, one of the reasons that even though on an intellectual level we get it—why is it that we still get so shocked when things change? Why is it we still keep holding on? It's that on some level, we tend to think of impermanence as: things arise, they last for a while, and then they pass away. So it can be: my life arises, lasts for a while, and passes away.

The sitting starts, lasts for a while, it passes away. Or this emotion, or my knee pain, or whatever—this day. But really, if it's something we like, it's just that the passing away happens before we were ready for it to. So I know it's going to pass, but it has this much more time it should go before it passes. Then I can let it go, but not now.

My parents are quite elderly, and when they started to really decline—my father got Parkinson's—it was such a shock. And I saw how really, on one level, I could say, well, of course, you turn eighty-three, stuff happens. But on another level, emotionally, cellularly, my body and mind wasn't quite accepting it. How can this be? It's like a kind of shock.

So his point, His Holiness's point, is that there isn't some steady state time between when something arises and when it passes. Change is momentary. Every moment is flux. Every moment of life is arising and passing, arising and passing. And like someone pointed out to me after I said this in a talk, there's nine billion plus nanoseconds in one second. That's a lot. Nine billion plus in one second. That's a lot of moments coming and going.

One of the things that happens in retreat as the mind gets quieter is that sometimes you start to see. One of the first insights is how fast the mind moves. If you're feeling overwhelmed by how many thoughts there are and how fast they're moving and how out of control they are—that's insight into impermanence, into dukkha, and into anattā. Right there. Welcome to insight. Your mind is out of control. It moves at an unbelievable rate of speed. It's changing faster than we can notice it. And that's not a mistake. That's the way life is. Not just now, not just because your mind's a little quieter. It's always how it is. It's not that once we have an insight into impermanence, things change and get impermanent. They've always been. It's always in constant flux. It's always out of control.

That feeling we get of being a square peg in a round hole, that dissonance when we have an insight—that dissonance is because of our kind of unconscious holding on. No, no, no. Let it change, but not so fast. Let this sense of being out of control... I know there's some way I can get to a place where it's controlled.

Personally, in my own experience, I find this in terms of anicca—staying with anicca, the fact that even as much as we know it intellectually, and as much as we experience the complexity, the unceasing change, how fast things are moving. And I know that, cellularly. I've experienced it in many different ways, millions of times, on and off retreat. I know it. It's the kind of thing I know. And still, still, when something unexpected happens or something I really love goes away or changes, there's a shorter or longer period of time where I think, no, this can't go. Why?

So why do we cling? It's so poignant because it's the clinging in service of trying to be happy that's actually keeping the suffering going. It's keeping us in delusion, the confusion of seeing ourselves and the world all wrong. And it's as if we believe that if we really see how much things change, the sadness will be too unbearable. The pain is too much. But it's just the opposite, isn't it? It's the refusing, the trying to deny it, that keeps the pain going. But it's so hard.

It's so poignant. Looking in myself and talking to people, my sense is that the clinging—whether it's to sense experience, to objects, or to having a particular internal experience, or to people in our lives, or to images we hold of ourselves, even suffering ones, particularly suffering ones—we really hold on. "This is who I am. This self-conscious person, this shameful person, this aversive person. I know this is who I am. I could never feel compassion like that. Maybe that guy did, but I never could. I just beat myself up all the time."

Why do we cling? And I see that sense of really letting go into the total flux. Once we've actually totally let go into it, there's not a me resisting. It's not a problem. It's just opening to the mystery of each moment. It's wonderful. But on the way, that shaky ground, that place of unreliability—I find for myself it's so scary on some level that the clinging is like looking for somewhere to rest.

Have you ever been in an earthquake? It's strange, because you want to hold on to something to find solidity, but it's the earth that's moving. There's nothing anywhere to hold on to. It's like, "Well, this isn't supposed to happen. The earth, at least, is supposed to be reliable. Something, somewhere." And it was really like a cellular experience of, "Oh my God, everything's all topsy-turvy." The mind doesn't like it too much. And we put so much reliance and identification into our mind, into our thoughts, into our descriptions.

So I find this grasping for something—a moment of pleasure, a description of the world, a description of myself, a view, an opinion, a sense of knowing what this means. As soon as your practice changes: "Oh, I was holding on to that, but now it's like this. Now I know what good mindfulness is like." Looking for somewhere to rest.

The Buddha said—I love this quotation—"The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful.

So we can't decide to see impermanence. But we can have the willingness to use the tools of the meditation practice and the continuity, the willingness to keep bringing that clear attention back moment after moment just to what's happening. And guess what? You can't not notice impermanence, because nothing lasts very long.

That really intense pain that's been there all day—if you really look, even if the pain seems to stay when you bring the attention into it, it's not steady state. There's changing in it. That bad mood, that anguish or that fear—if you really moment after moment look, it's there. Then it changes. The fear slides into impatience. It slides into terror. It slides into some whole story about the past, and it's not fear at all. It slides into wondering what's for lunch. It slides into boredom. It slides into—three hours later—"this fear." "Oh yes, this fear's been here all day. That's who I am, a fearful person."

Without a continuity of mindfulness, we don't notice how fast these thoughts and emotions come and go. And we just, without the steadiness of attention, don't realize how we kind of subconsciously dance away from the dissonance, the discomfort, the poignance, or the sadness of the changing nature of things, of seeing that there's nothing to hold on to.

But touching that poignance, that sadness, is what opens us up to the totality of life, to really living. I feel like it's living in three dimensions rather than in two—opening into the total mysteriousness that we never know what's going to happen in the next moment. Do we ever, really? It's more amazing that we have this schedule and ring the bells and you all show up and it sort of happens. That's actually more amazing, you know.

But really, we never know what's going to happen in the next moment. And opening to the poignance, opening to the willingness to feel the movement of things, the changing of things, the moving away of things—it actually opens us into love. Love of the moment. Love of this moment of life. Appreciation for all aspects. A real celebration of the mystery that we never know what is going to happen. Appreciation and love for each other—not the appreciation of holding on because your presence is going to make me happy, but just the appreciation of here we are, and who knows what's going to happen in the next moment.

I just want to close by reading some stanzas from a poem by Galway Kinnell, because to me it really expresses the feeling of impermanence—the sadness, the denial, and how the acceptance of it opens us to the exquisite wonder and beauty of life and love.

It's called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight."

You cry, waking from a nightmare.

When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.

I think that you think I will never die. I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.

I have heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down." I have stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old, don't die," little maud. And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake crying from—being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

Yes, you cling because I, like you, only sooner than you, will go down the path of vanished alphabets, the roadlessness to the other side of the darkness, your arms like the shoes left behind, like the adjectives in the halting speech of very old men, which used to be able to call up the forgotten nouns.

Back you go into your crib. The last blackbird lights up his gold wings. Farewell.

Your eyes close inside your head in sleep. Already in your dreams the hours begin to sing.

Little sleep's head sprouting hair in the moonlight, when I come back, we will go out together. We will walk out together among the ten thousand things, each scratched in time with such knowledge—the wages of dying is love.

CHAPTER 360

Habits of Mind

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson draws from her experience practicing and teaching in Burma to illuminate what it means to bring wise attitude to meditation practice. She reflects on how practicing within a culture that venerates the Dhamma provides a supportive container for practice, while acknowledging that Western practitioners often go against the cultural stream.

Wilson explores the Buddha's core teaching of dukkha and its cessation, emphasizing that our suffering stems not from difficult experiences themselves, but from our habitual reactions to them. She references Bhikkhu Bodhi's insight that most of our habits revolve around enjoying pleasure, avoiding pain, and preserving the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self. Through Āyya Khemā's teachings, she explains how we constantly seek to fill an inner void through sense contacts—a strategy that never truly succeeds.

The heart of the teaching focuses on how mindfulness itself is the doorway to freedom. Drawing on the famous Aṅguttara Nikāya passage about the luminous mind, Wilson explains that consciousness is inherently pure but becomes colored by attachments that visit it. Rather than trying to achieve special states or perfect our technique, she encourages practitioners to simply notice what is happening as it is—whether pleasant or unpleasant—and to recognize the quality of the mind that is observing. Each moment of genuine mindfulness, she explains, is a moment of freedom, where old habits are starved rather than fed, and the luminous nature of awareness becomes recognizable.

One of the nice things for me personally about practicing meditation in Burma, and also assisting with teaching there, is that I feel held in a sense of the tradition, a sense of the culture where in that same place, meditation—just like we're doing here—has been going on for hundreds and hundreds of years. It's a culture that, for whatever its faults (and there are many), really supports and venerates the Dhamma, the Dharma, meditation practice.

It's so different, really, to be putting out this courageous effort, this sincere work—it takes a lot of effort doing what you're doing here. It's really different to be doing it in a culture where the chance cab driver you meet, when they ask, "Why are you here?" and you say, "I come to meditate," they respond, "Wow, that's so wonderful. I really want to meditate, but I'm having to take care of my mother. But it's really what I want to do." That's more the normal response.

I don't even realize how much of what we're doing is, in some ways, going against the stream of the main culture here. Even now it's a lot different from thirty years ago, but we're still going against the mainstream. In Burma, that sense of cultural support has the effect of allowing me—and I know it's not only me—to relax into practice with a sense of greater faith, faith in terms of confidence. This isn't just some new age, airy-fairy thing. People have been doing it for ages, and somehow it works. So it just gives a little more sense of, "Okay, let me keep going," on those rare occasions when it gets a little tough.

I want to talk tonight about right attitude, or wise attitude, in practice. In the last year, I had the chance to sit two short retreats—just ten-day retreats—with two different teachers. One was Ajahn Sumedho here; one was a Burmese teacher in Burma. Very different teachers, very different techniques. But both of them, their main emphasis in how they talked about practice was to start with right attitude, before you even worry about the technique.

So what does that mean? I'll give you my spin on it. In talking about right attitude, what I'm really mixing together is our sincere motivation—the attitude is kind of the intention, our motivation, our willingness—supported by wise discernment, supported by wisdom. The right attitude we bring to our practice, whatever aspect of practice, whatever technique we're doing, is this sincere motivation held in the crucible of wisdom. Not total wisdom, certainly, but at least some beginning wisdom.

Because with all the will in the world, with total sincerity of motivation, if we don't know what we're doing and we don't really understand things as they are, the choices we make may not be grounded in reality and may not serve us so well. Our choices, our intentions, need to be guided by some wise discernment—seeing clearly things as they are, ourselves as we are, the world as it is.

This is really the beginning and the ending of our whole path of practice. Seeing things as they are with open-hearted, total presence and acceptance enables us to live in harmony with things as they are.

I'm sure most of you know the story of the Buddha when he first became the Buddha. After all his hard practice, when he awoke under the Bodhi tree, he was disinclined to teach. In a way, he said, "People aren't going to understand, and it would really be worrisome and bothersome to go around when nobody's going to get it anyway." But when he was persuaded to survey the world—all the people in the world—with his eye of wisdom, when he could read what was in all of the people's minds, what moved him to the compassion to spend his life teaching was really seeing this one thing I'm speaking about: that deep in our hearts, everybody wants to be happy. That's our unifying motivation as human beings. We want to be happy.

What moved him to compassion, so it's said in the texts, was seeing how, with the best will in the world, most everyone goes about their whole life trying to be happy doing just the things that keep them spinning in confusion and suffering. Because we don't really understand the nature of suffering, the nature of confusion, and the nature of peace or happiness as the Buddha spoke about happiness. And so he was motivated to teach.

When I'm talking about bringing this wise attitude, some understanding to our practice, to our lives, I'm directly speaking to this: to our really sincere intentions to do what's good for our own happiness. And probably most if not everyone here is also, in some way, deeply committed to the happiness of others, or at least to not causing unhappiness to others. But without understanding ourselves, without understanding what's true, we're going to keep getting caught in confusion and suffering.

Basically, the habits of our mind that we think are going to bring us happiness don't work. It's not that they're bad. They just don't work. And don't believe me that they don't work—check and see for yourselves. I'm sure you already know, or you wouldn't be here sitting for a month, for two months, if our other ways of bringing ease and happiness to ourselves worked. Unless you just love it, which some people do. Really, some people do just love to come here and sit and watch their minds. There are some people like that. Most of us ended up here because we discovered we liked it so much that we keep coming back.

An example from the world around us. I read a small article in the International Herald Tribune about Russia, where the writer was reporting on opinion polls about forms of government—democracy versus totalitarianism, or perhaps they didn't use that word, but versus more control. The article suggested that Russians didn't necessarily want democracy. And that's okay, whatever.

But what was interesting to me was that among the questions asked was: if Stalin were running for president again, would you vote for him? Now, it's no longer a secret in Russia about how Stalin threw twenty million Russian people into prison camps. A great many of those were murdered or died in those camps. This is no longer a secret.

So even knowing that, twenty-six percent of people said yes, they would vote for Stalin if he were running again. And another nineteen percent or something said they weren't sure, but probably wouldn't.

It's amazing to me. Just a sense of—and here I'm projecting—but somehow the sense of security and order would bring more happiness than terror. It's okay if there's mass terror, as long as there's order. That's an extreme example. But it's not that extreme. It's not that extreme. It's the same way our minds are working.

So remember last night how we were talking about the habits of our mind and going against the stream? What is it that we need to know, really need to know, to begin to bring wise attitude to our practice, to our life, to begin to move out of this endless cycle of trying to make ourselves happy by increasing our confusion?

That's samsara, basically—the cycle of wanting and getting and wanting and getting and wanting and not getting and wanting and not getting, on and on, and becoming. It's exhausting. And even if we only think of one life, it's exhausting. Never mind if we go into the Buddhist cosmology of eons.

Once I was talking to my aunt, many years ago. She's been dead a long time, and we were close. She was a Christian, not fundamentalist but a real Christian, and she had been unhappy for maybe the last twenty years of her life, since my uncle died. Somehow we got into the topic of rebirth, and she was asking me to explain it. So I was explaining how it worked. And she just had this huge sigh and said, "If I thought that were true, I couldn't bear it. I couldn't bear to think of keeping going like this." It was so poignant.

The thing is, really the thing is, the shift from samsara to freedom is just like that. Just for a moment, not forever, but just for a moment. Just a foreground-background shift. It's not about eons and eons and eons of dreadful going like that. That's what our practice is about. That's what wise attitude serves to help our awareness open into.

So what do we need to know? What are the habits that we get lost in?

Bhikkhu Bodhi, the American Theravada monk who is probably one of the foremost translators of the Pali texts into English these days, said: "Remember that the Buddha's teaching goes against the current of one's habitual assumptions and attitudes." Go back to what was said about this flow going against the current. "After all, most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self."

I want to read that again. And I just want you to notice over the next days if this is true or not for you: Most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self.

And if that's true for you, the question then becomes: so what? What's wrong with that?

Again, the Buddha wasn't—and we're not—up here to say this is right, this is wrong, this is shameful. It's simply asking: what brings suffering? And what ends suffering? What works? Do these habits work?

Of course, I'm going to say no. That's what I'm here to say. And to explain why, to some extent. But really, everything I'm saying, any of us are saying, is hopefully just to point you back to your own experience and see what's really true.

Because none of this works as an intellectual concept. It might be nice or not, whatever, but that's not going to free us. It's really when we so deeply recognize, "Oh, this really isn't working"—when it doesn't make sense anymore—that something lets go. That's when right attitude begins to come in.

So what is it we need to know to shift this? The Buddha famously said, "I teach one thing and one thing only: suffering, or dukkha, and its end." We have a friend who says that's really two things. But anyway, that's one. He wouldn't get into metaphysical questions. He said, "I'm teaching suffering and the end of suffering." Dukkha—a better word. Suffering is too limited.

And you might wonder, why does he have to teach dukkha? You'd think we know dukkha. That's why we're here practicing. We want to know about the end of it. But in my experience, if we really knew the ramifications of dukkha and its end, if we really understood dukkha, there would be no clinging. We wouldn't keep on in this cycle.

So the Buddha's little shorthand of his teaching is, of course, our friends the Four Noble Truths. And dukkha in this case has three aspects. First, understanding in our cells, in our bones, the impermanence of all conditioned things—physical, mental, any experience, anything internally, externally—it changes. When the conditions that bring it together go away, it falls apart. That's just how it is.

Then there's dukkha dukkha—there's just pain. If you have a body, sometime, somewhere, it's going to hurt. It seems obvious. How much of our time do we spend fighting that? If we have a body, it's not only going to hurt, it's going to get sick, it's going to get old. We all know that. But we don't really. It's amazing how much we don't.

The second truth is that the cause of our anguish, our discontent, our dis-ease, isn't the fact that difficult things happen, that the body starts hurting, that everything falls apart, that there's nothing we can rely on. None of that's the reason for our suffering. It's because of the way our hearts and minds react, respond to the first truth. Basically, the word they use is clinging. We cling. But I find it more helpful to think that the real anguish, the cause of our dis-ease and what brings us to practice, is the way the mind and heart reacts or responds in the face of things not being the way we want them to be or the way we think they should be. We hold on, we get aversive, we just deny anything's going on at all, we stick our head in the sand, we distract ourselves. That's what the Buddha saw when he said everyone wants to be happy but does just the things that keep them suffering—the way we respond to the first noble truth.

And the third truth, of course, is that with wise discernment, seeing things the way they are, clear seeing, there's an ending to this anguish of heart and mind. The craving, the clinging, the trying to make things different or hold on or deny—it just lets go. Not as an act of will, but because clinging, when we see things the way they are, just doesn't make sense. And we don't have to talk ourselves out of it. That doesn't work, does it? Have you tried to talk yourself out of wanting, or talk yourself out of aversion? "I'm not really upset. It's really okay." It just doesn't work. It slips around from behind and clobbers you.

But in the moment when we really see, "Oh, it's just going away," the clinging also just evaporates. And in that moment, there's a moment of peace. Ah, just this. That's a moment of freedom.

It's a moment of cessation—cessation of suffering, cessation of clinging. That's the moment of turning, just like this. It's not so far away.

But mostly, we're so entranced by our habits, so habituated to responding in these familiar ways, that we're looking through those habits, through those colorings of mind, at whatever's happening. We don't even know what's going on. Struggle, struggle, struggle.

And so that's why there's a path. That's why there's the fourth truth, which is the path of practice—the path of non-harming conduct, of samādhi, concentration and mindfulness and effort, and of wisdom, of clear seeing. But I really like the way Ajahn Sumedho described it. He kind of summed the whole path, the whole Eightfold Path, up in one word: awareness.

And that's the way I'd like to suggest we can approach this path throughout our practice here, whatever particular technique each of you may be cultivating. Whether we're staying really closely with the breath at the nostrils, whether you're working with the breath at the abdomen, whether you're open in choiceless awareness, whether you're doing walking meditation, whether you're doing mettā meditation—all the techniques are useful in terms of recognizing the truth of things when held in the crucible of wise attitude.

So that's what I want to talk about: what that is.

It begins by seeing these habits of our mind and heart without judgment, without criticism. That's wise attitude. Just seeing what is, in the space of awareness, without adding anything extra—without adding criticism, without adding blame, without adding me, me, me. Just like this.

So it begins by seeing, recognizing the habits. And it'll be more than once or twice. In that moment of recognizing, we've stepped out of identifying and stepped into: oh, greed is like this. Aversion is like this. In that moment, what's being fed in the mind stream is the mindfulness, the awareness—awareness of greed.

When we don't notice that, when it's "Oh my God, I'm so greedy. I don't know what's the matter with me. I'm the most greedy person who ever lived"—what's being fed is aversion to the greed, identification. You don't have to get rid of the greed. It's just: oh, greed is like this. That's all.

That's the movement from identification, from being lost in the delusion of the habit, to awareness, to mindfulness, to clear seeing. Just for a moment, just for a second. That's okay. That's a moment of purification of mind and heart. That's really what the practice is about.

Once we're able to be present—just momentarily, but more and more moments in that way—all the techniques are useful to us. Without that sense of just clear seeing, accepting, we can take any technique, turn it on its head, and turn it into a complete ego trip, and suffer. And you'll know you're doing that, you'll know your mind's doing that, because you'll be suffering. That's always the tip-off. It's very useful in that way.

This is the way Ayya Khema describes dukkha: "We're looking for something other than what we have. This alone is dukkha. It means there's an emptiness within which wants to be filled. Unless we see this quite clearly, we always try to fill this void from outside through our sense contacts. But it can't be done this way. Only when we realize we must fulfill ourselves from within can we really begin to take the spiritual path."

I would say that sense of filling the void—what tricks us is that it feels like the sense contact fills it, but it's just for such a quick second. And then we don't notice that it didn't really do it because we can move to another and move to another and move to another, and that's saṃsāra. When we turn around and go, "Oh, what's going on here?"—that's the movement from saṃsāra to taking up the spiritual path in the way Ayya Khema talks about it.

And the other interesting thing about the Buddha's awakening, about the way he talks about it—and this is how Ayya Khema puts it—in that moment of freedom, suffering isn't going to go away. The dukkha doesn't go away. The one who suffers is going to go away. Just for a moment.

And don't think about that. The more we think about it, we just get all knotted up in our mind, and me, me, me gets really strong. Just let it go. But notice those moments when there's just: oh, it's like this. Later, you can say, "Oh, there was no me there then." Yes, there was no me there. Now there is. But in the moment, you don't really notice anything. It's just this—a step, a sound, feeling of greed, heat, whatever it is. Just simple, basic.

That's a moment of real purity of consciousness. It's no big fireworks. It's mostly not what we think we're looking for, because these habits of our mind are so ingrained in most of us—I wouldn't speak for everybody, but in most of us they're so ingrained. This wanting to enjoy the pleasant, avoid the difficult, the painful, the unpleasant, and to think that everything revolves around me. It's so ingrained that without even knowing these patterns are there, that's how we assess the world, and that's often the motivation behind our actions.

And we come to practice—I mean, it's not a different mind, is it? It's the same. So we can get so caught up in looking to sense contact, as I've said, to fill that seeming void, that feeling of emptiness. Without realizing we're even doing it, very subtly, it can transfer to our practice. When that's happening, you'll know it sooner or later because there'll be that sense of glitch—the sense of, "What's wrong with my practice? It isn't working." We're either looking, very subtly and sometimes not so subtly, for the pleasant experience, for the experience that matches something we've heard or read or experienced before. Or we think it'll be cool, because then not only is it pleasant, but it fills my sense of finally getting somewhere on this endless path. We're avoiding the unpleasant, or evaluating the worth of almost all of our experience by whether it's pleasant or unpleasant.

Just notice how much we do this. I talk about this all the time. There's no way my conscious mind can say it doesn't know this. But over and over, when I get quiet and I'm going through practice—or in daily life too, of course, but in practice where you can really notice more minutely the workings of the mind—I'll find that it's somehow slipped in, that I started to very subliminally assess what's going on. "Well, this can't be right because it doesn't feel good."

It's rare that someone who's had a sitting that really feels good comes in and says, "You know, my practice isn't going well." It's more common when you've had an experience that just feels like crap, and your mind was reactive. But you were aware. You were really aware of all of this. Yet it's still much more common to come in and report on that and go, "After all this time, I should be past this. It's going nowhere."

And we'll say, "Yeah, but you're really describing it well. It shows you were mindful." And you go out thinking, "Oh my God, they're just giving me a sop. Can't they see? They train them to say this." That's garbage. You don't believe it, do you, for a minute? We're so caught in this.

But you know, the Buddha's awakening—his awakening didn't change his world. When he spent those forty-five years teaching, he still had a body. There are places in the suttas where he had backaches, where he had headaches. He died from eating bad food. His kinspeople went to war over water rights. One of his cousins tried to split the sangha and kill him. He had endless dukkha with all the monks and nuns, trying to organize an organization. We all know how that is. And he had to spend forty-five years like this, when all he wanted to do, really, was just go off and hang out in the bliss of Nibbana. He could have done that. Instead, he's walking up and down India barefoot, dealing with all these people. That was his life. It didn't change the world.

So what do we expect? What do we think is going to happen? I'm kind of joking, but I ask myself that sometimes, because there's always something lurking back there, subliminal, that I really think it's going to be like. And it rarely includes pain or people not liking me or my personality. Somehow my personality should completely morph into something beatific.

Not beatific, no. I've sort of given that one up. Ajahn Sumedho had a great line. He said, you know, it's consciousness that's pure. We're not here to purify our personalities. That's like a sideline, but that's not what we're here for.

So these reactions have us. It's not that we're stupid. It's not that if we just paid a little bit of attention we could see through them. They're so ingrained.

As most of you know, the way the Buddha described our moment-to-moment experience of consciousness is very precise. In any moment of sense awareness—take seeing, for instance—you need an eye organ that's working and a visual object. When they come together and there's a moment of consciousness, there's a moment of seeing. If my eyes are closed, there wouldn't be seeing. If I'm asleep or consciousness has completely gone somewhere else, there's no seeing. When those three come together, that's called contact—a moment of seeing or hearing or feeling with the body, thinking in the mind, anything.

In that moment, it arises together with a subtle sensation, which is really mental, of its being pleasant or unpleasant or neither one. Mostly we don't notice that. And when we don't notice, the tendency, the habit, is that the pleasant we start leaning into, wanting—and that's where that evaluation comes: "Yeah, this is good, this is right, give me more." The unpleasant, we may not notice it's unpleasant, but ever so slightly or not so slightly, we lean away. That can turn into aversion: "I don't want this, this is wrong, this is bad"—the whole nine yards—and then wanting something else.

And underlying all of that, and frankly, in my experience by far the most seductive and entrancing and engaging of all the habits of mind, is that it's all about me. Me, me. I'm the center of all of it.

Sogyal Rinpoche gave a great example in one of his books about this. He said in Tibet, when they're building a house, before they lay the foundation, they start with a center point where it's going to be. They take a rope the length of the frame of the house and measure from that point out all around to get the footprint for the foundation. And he said that's what it's like—this sense of me. We start from the sense of me, not an idea but this felt sense of me here now, and from that we measure everything. I like that a lot.

Just notice, not with judgment. Just notice. In the noticing is the wise discernment, the clear seeing. But if you can do it with a sense of humor, it's a riot. It just cracks me up. Watch the mind. You're going somewhere and somebody walks by way down there and they trip. First thought: "Glad that wasn't me." There's a loud sound somewhere: "Well, don't they know that's ruining—how could they let that happen here when I came all this way to meditate?" Just anything—bird call, the deer over there—there's a moment of pure appreciation and then: "Wow, I'm seeing these deer. Maybe it'll be like Bambi and one will come over and I'm really nature girl..." Just watch it.

It really, really helps to laugh, because if you're going to get reactive to it, you're going to be suffering a lot. The moment we're watching it, we're not being it anymore. Again, it's this sense of "Oh, I'm nature girl"—notice what that feels like. Try it. We can do that with anything, anything. Awareness can be aware, mindfulness can be mindful of anything.

Sometimes the energy of mindfulness isn't as strong as the energy of the habit. True. So we don't even recognize, say, that aversion is going on for a while. But at any point: "Oh, aversion. That's why everybody looks so horribly, dreadfully ugly today. Oh, they didn't all get up and decide to look their worst. It could possibly be aversion." Yeah.

Turn around. Aversion is like this. Oh, that's aversion. Okay, the object of mindfulness at that moment has moved from breath or walking or whatever to aversion. And awareness doesn't care what the object is. Any object—sight, sound, taste, smell, touch, mind—any object is a doorway to mindfulness, to the purity of consciousness, of awareness.

Mostly, our habit is focusing on objects for gratification, and we take that same habit into practice. We end up focusing on the breath—because we're supposed to focus on the breath—but we do it in a way that isn't imbued with wise attitude. We do it with wanting, with wanting practice to fulfill us in some way.

We get so focused on getting it right. How many breaths? How precise is the breath? How many sensations in the lifting? If I get more, I'm doing it better. We do that. We're so focused on the object that we don't notice the mind that's noticing the object. And this is the place of potential ease and freedom—turning around and noticing the mind that's noticing.

But these habits happen so fast that we get really entranced by them. So practice is here to help us shift the habit, shift our interest from object and self-referencing to the mind itself, to mindfulness itself, to awareness itself. Basically, we're moving toward getting more interested in the mindfulness—just in knowing what's happening and being with what's happening, whatever it is. That becomes more interesting to us, more fulfilling, more peaceful than owning or disliking or what we think about anything, all our reactions.

Doesn't it start to get boring? No? It's not boring yet? I mean, I'm really sick of myself. I don't know about you, but how many new thoughts? And if you're still having new thoughts, check in in a week. How many really useful, new, and important thoughts are coming up? How many new reactions? Is it fulfilling, really, when we look at it? I'm not advocating aversion. I'm just advocating noticing that it's not doing it. Our habitual reactions aren't bringing fulfillment.

Now, knowing whatever's happening—that is fantastic. Knowing. You don't get tired of knowing, of awareness. It's pure, it's clean, it's not colored by whatever we're aware of. It doesn't care. And that is so liberating. Just for a moment.

Remember Howie's quotation? It's the famous quotation—everyone always uses this quotation—but it fits what I'm saying. He read it last night: "Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it." The attachments, the aversions, the sense of self. "This the unlearned people"—those who haven't practiced or looked at the mind—"do not really understand, and so they do not cultivate the mind. Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really understands, so for them there is cultivation of the mind."

This isn't sequential. This is both at the same time. Luminous is the mind, brightly shining, and it's colored by the attachments that visit it. At the same time, it is free of the attachments that visit it. When we're focused in on the attachments, our observations, our sense of self, that's what we notice, that's what we're entranced by. And we don't notice the luminous quality—just that pure clarity, the ability to know. We don't notice that because it's not a thing.

We're much more entranced by: "I don't like that tree. It's a little crooked. I don't like the way he walks. I don't like. I want this. Oh, wouldn't that be great if I could just really get into that third jhāna? I'd really be getting somewhere." But luminous, pure, empty awareness? That's not so exciting, is it?

When the Buddha said, "This sublime peace has been discovered by me, the Tathāgata, namely liberation through non-clinging"—

Can you even imagine that? Is that a state you can imagine—liberation through non-clinging? I can't. Because it's not a thing. It's not a state. It's not some end state we can reach and hold on to.

It's just this—moment by moment, one moment at a time, the mind that doesn't grip around or become entranced by our reactions. In that openness, that non-clinging, just for that moment, the purity of consciousness is recognizable.

And so when we talk about cultivation of the mind, it's not that consciousness gets more pure. It's more that we recognize more and more. It's not even a quality—just that. We simply recognize more and more. And mindfulness is our tool. Mindfulness is our vehicle, and mindfulness in each moment that mindfulness is present is actually a manifestation of that luminous purity of consciousness. We don't have to get somewhere else. We just turn our attention back into the mindfulness itself.

Ajahn Sumedho said that consciousness is the doorway to liberation. Don't think about it. Because as soon as we think, it's limited by our mind, which can only think of things and spaces and experiences we've had and things we've read—it's just thoughts. But you don't have to stop thinking either.

What could that mean? Consciousness is the doorway to liberation. "I want to understand that"—wanting is like this. That's all. Wanting. That's what's coloring the attention right now. Wanting.

So we learn to do our practice with sincerity, with commitment, feeling the sensations of the breath at the rise and fall or at the nose. Wholeheartedly, with full commitment, just in this moment. And from time to time, we turn around and simply notice the quality of what's going on in the mind that's observing.

This is where we begin to bring in right attitude. Right attitude allows us to notice things as they are. And as soon as we're noticing things as they are, even in just a moment, that purity of consciousness is noticeable again. Because it's only hidden from us when we're caught up in the wanting, in the aversion, in the self-referencing. It's not that it went anywhere—we just don't notice it.

One teacher said, in terms of right attitude, in terms of how we practice: you're not trying to make things turn out the way you want them to happen. You're trying to know what is happening as it is. Whether that's this half breath, whether it's the step, whether it's the sense of frustration, whether it's confusion—you're just trying to know what's happening as it is. When we want this or that to happen, thinking things should be this way or that way, that's expectation. And expectations create anxiety and can lead to aversion and wanting.

Now, if we think, "Okay, how can I not have expectation?"—you don't have to do that. "Oh, expectation is like this." And right there, there's the movement from expectation to mindfulness. That purity of mindfulness. Sayadaw U Pandita used to say that a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom. Because mindfulness is that simple attention, knowing what is, without adding wanting, without adding aversion, without adding stories.

Just: "Oh, aversion is like this. Expectation is like this. Grief feels like this. Vibrating—you don't even know the word for it—is like this. The breath in this moment is like this. Wanting it better is like this. Sleepiness is like this. Hating everything and everybody is like this."

There's nothing mindfulness can't know. A moment of freedom—because whatever the object or subject of the mindfulness is doesn't matter. That moment of pure mindfulness is free from attachment, free from the delusion of aversion, free from the delusion of self-referencing, of identification. That's really the moment of peace and freedom. It's not the final liberation, the sure heart's release. But it's a moment, an intimation, and it's real, it's true.

I think it's really important that we begin to notice—I want to say value. I don't mean hold on to. I don't mean build a story of "I'm doing really great" around it. But to pay more attention when these moments of simple presence happen. All you have to do is notice, "Oh, like that." Not go build a whole story across five pages in your journal. Just notice what it feels like. Notice how it changes. Notice how wanting or aversion or self-story comes back in—not with judgment, just to see how it happens. What's the trigger? What starts the pattern up again? And then, "Oh, yeah, it's like this."

What happens is that we really begin to deepen—and I think our whole life can be a deepening—in confidence in the power of mindfulness, in the purity and ubiquitous availability of pure consciousness. It's always available. Sometimes we can't get there. We can't find it, we can't think of it, we can't even remember it, we think we made the whole thing up.

And often that's what people experience in turning to this mindfulness, just this awareness of whatever: "Oh, it's like this." Whether practicing with your breath, with mettā, with choiceless awareness—whatever way you're practicing—just noticing the attitude of the mind that's observing. Something shifts. I don't know what exactly. I don't want to say you're free forever, you're liberated—not that. But something really shifts. And it's so unmeasurable. It's not measurable on a chart of stages of insight. It's not measurable on anything.

So it's really easy, then or later, for the doubting mind to come in: "No, I made that up. I was making it all up. I couldn't hold on to it. It's not bells and whistles. I didn't get a certificate. Nobody verified. I must have been making it up. It's not here now."

And so I really urge you to find that place of sincere motivation and a sense of trust and faith in your own experience—not in anything I said, not even in anything the Buddha said or that you've read, but just seeing for yourself with interest, with honesty, with the real purity of your intention to practice for your own liberation, for your own happiness, for the happiness and well-being of others. Trust that motivation. Yes, we won't always do the wise thing because it's not always supported by wise attitude and wisdom. But it is, a lot.

And every time—every time there's just a moment of that purity of mindfulness—not only do we have a sense of being able to recognize it again, to have faith in it more, but it's also a moment of purifying our old habits. Because when we're really mindful, just for that moment, mindful of greed, greed is not being fed in the mind at that moment.

The Buddha talks a lot in terms of looking at your mind, looking at what you say and do and think, your actions—and not so much looking at the actions themselves, but at what's being fed, what qualities are being fed in the mind, what qualities are being increased, what qualities are being starved. I like that because to me it's very pragmatic and very helpful.

So take an example of working with the breath here. Very sincere. You're really dedicated. You're really trying to cultivate right effort. When you notice you're off, you come back. You're trying not to judge.

You come back. You're really trying to be precise. You're working, working, working, working. And slowly that's how it starts to feel. But we don't turn to look back at the mind. It's like, "Let me see the breath more clearly. It was clearer yesterday. Let me get it clearer." We think we're really working with clear motivation and wise intention. But what's being fed?

If you turn around and look, it's not a big secret. What's being fed is either incredible tension, frustration, self-hatred—take your pick, whatever your particular pattern is. And then on top of that, we go, "Oh my God, I'm really not doing it right. Because you're supposed to be relaxed. And if I was concentrated, I'd be happy. I am not happy. So I'm really doing it wrong." Then you're really feeding aversion even more.

Wise attitude is, "Oh, aversion is like this." Who cares if you're feeling the breath? You're noticing aversion. That's the practice. That's mindfulness. It takes a huge burden off, doesn't it? All you have to do is notice what's happening. You don't have to get it right. "Oh, aversion, like this."

Now in that moment of mindfulness, aversion is no longer being fed. Mindfulness is being fed. Aversion is being starved, to use the Buddha's terminology. And as Howie said, how much time we've practiced our habits over just one lifetime. But how many moments of mindfulness are there? I mean, it's not like one-to-one, okay? You don't even go there. We couldn't count it up anyway.

But it's really purifying our habits of mind, that ability to say, "Oh, look at that—me, me, me. Ha! Isn't that something? Me feels like this." Nowhere to go. Just like this. It's so simple that we can't really believe it. We tend not to trust it. I just want to beg you to let yourself trust it. That's all.

And then from that attitude, we can do any form of practice. Come back and be with the breath—not to get somewhere, not to get concentrated, not to be a better meditator, but simply to notice what's happening right now in this breath. Why? Just because it's so much happier to simply be with knowing what's happening than caught up in all this other stuff. We get that. We like it. We like to come back. It becomes our refuge.

And as that happens more and more, the trust naturally grows more and more. And whatever goes on in our practice—it may be easier, harder, whatever—but on some level it just doesn't matter. Because awareness becomes our refuge. More and more and more, deeper and deeper. On retreat, off retreat.

And this is really what wise attitude is about.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 361

Perception and Papañca

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines the nature of insight and how it differs from intellectual understanding, using the metaphor of Magic Eye pictures to illustrate how genuine seeing requires a relaxed, allowing quality rather than grasping. She explores saññā (perception) as one of the five aggregates, showing how from simple sense contact, we rapidly construct elaborate narratives about ourselves and the world—a process the Buddha called papañca (mental proliferation).
>
> Wilson draws on the famous teaching to Bāhiya from the Udāna, where the Buddha instructs: "In the seen, there is only the seen. In the heard, there is only the heard." She examines how our perceptions, often colored by ignorance, desire, or aversion, lead to inaccurate descriptions of reality that we then believe absolutely. Through vivid personal examples, she demonstrates how we create and recreate our sense of self hundreds of times daily, each story feeling completely real yet being utterly different from the last.
>
> The talk identifies three classical forces that fuel papañca: diṭṭhi (wrong view or sense of self), taṇhā (craving), and māna (conceit or comparing mind). Wilson invites practitioners to notice how these forces grip awareness and solidify ephemeral thoughts into seemingly concrete reality. She concludes with teachings from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche on recognizing the empty nature of thoughts, encouraging a return to utter simplicity—"a condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything."

Tonight I want to talk about perception, papañca, and right view. And after the questions and answers this morning, I'm afraid it's just going to get all of you thinking more, but that's out of my control.

When we talk about insight, we have to ask: what is the nature of insight? What is an insight? What I was pointing to, what we point to, is that you can't get to an insight by thinking. It's not something that is a product of thought. Insight is really a function of an intuitive process—a new way of seeing a situation or an experience. Insight isn't about creating some mental state or changing what's actually going on. We suddenly, "aha," see something differently. The situation doesn't change, but our perspective on it can change because we've perceived it in a different way. And of course that can be insights into our psychological makeup, into how to deal with something in daily life, and so-called Dharma insights—all of it.

So what allows for this radical shift of perspective? Just to give a very mundane example, which I think would be familiar to most of you—it's simple, but I think it's very apt. You know those pictures, I don't know what they call them, magic eye or something, that if you look at them, they're colored sort of geometric blocks. There's no particular content in them, but if you hold it in a certain way and let your eyes relax, suddenly out pops a spaceship or dinosaurs or hockey players or whatever happens to be within that image.

So what allows for that? There's nothing different in that graphic design when you see the hockey players—there's nothing that wasn't there before. And then when your eyes go back and you only see the graphic design, it's also nothing that wasn't there before, right? It's just that somehow you suddenly could let go of the normal kind of rigid way of looking at it and see in a different way. It's a kind of combination of a relaxed letting go—not holding onto the blue and yellow geometric designs—and a steadiness of that relaxed attention. And also a sense of allowing, isn't there? Like if you hold it up and say, "Where's the dinosaurs?" you know, it doesn't work. My mother, bless her, has never been able to see anything in one of these and it drives her crazy. Once we were in a mall and they had giant ones, and everyone's looking going, "Wow, look at this, look at that." She got so frustrated.

So that's how we feel when we're looking for an insight, isn't it? "I want an insight into impermanence," you know, and you're just ready to kick yourself after a while because you're looking for it.

On the other hand, once you've recognized the spaceship or the dinosaur, even when you're not seeing it again, you know it's somehow in there. And if someone else were to come up and say, "No, there's nothing in there—you made that up," you don't get upset about it. You don't have to prove anything. You know that that's there.

So it's like that, I think, with an insight. It doesn't stay. That particular perception isn't always that way. But having perceived in that way, it makes a shift in the way that we relate. And that moment of seeing differently exerts an influence, you could say, in the mind stream or in the way that we respond in a similar situation. It loosens something up, doesn't it? And even though we're not always perceiving in that way, we know things are more than they seem. We know that stupid little geometric design has something more in it. And so that's sort of the nature of insight.

It's not a thought, although God knows we will think about it as soon as we have an insight, and that's what we do. That's our way of trying to understand it and, of course, hold on to it. But the insight itself isn't a thought. It's just having allowed it to arise, be experienced, and let go, and it exerts an influence in the way that we perceive and understand. Something has changed.

In all of our practice, in all the Dharma teachings—Joseph was talking about the mind of non-clinging last night. There were a lot of questions about, well, if it's not a state, what is it? And it's really this sense that we're not trying to create or get to someplace new other than this, but simply to see through our mind's incomplete or inaccurate or limited or confused or plain wrong way of looking at and perceiving experience. I mean, it's all of those at different times.

I actually think the translation of diṭṭhi as "wrong view" is quite literal, not judgmental. It's not "this is wrong view and you're stupid to hold that view and this is right view." It's like we really experience or see or describe things in the wrong way—wrong meaning inaccurate. And so our practice isn't so much about changing anything out there as just that letting go that allows a different perception to be received. And if we think we know what that's going to be, we're already not allowing it to be received.

So that takes us to the experience of perception itself. I want to talk a little bit about that. Perception—saññā in Pali—is one of the five aggregates, five experiences that make up what we call a human being.

And I just say that to show that perception is arising in every mind moment.

So what is it? Just very basically, perception is described as that moment when there's sense contact—you hear a sound. Perception would be that immediate arising: hands clapping. It just comes with it so often. And a lot of people in interviews have said, "You know, I hear a sound and right away my mind goes 'bird call,'" as if they want that not to happen. It's just what happens most of the time. There's a sense contact, there's perception. We recognize it. So it's a faculty that's based on recognition, discernment, based on memory. If we hear a sound we've never heard before, there won't be an immediate perception. But—and this is where it gets interesting—most likely we'll make something up. This is the whole basis where perception gets very interesting to explore in our practice.

So, a moment of perception: sound, bird call, happening all the time. What's interesting to explore when we have the luxury of this relatively simple, quiet time to watch our minds is how, through perception, through the recognition, we perceive, we describe, we explain our whole world. We sort of land ourselves in place and time starting with perception.

For example, the bell rings. Right away we know that's the bell. It's 7:30. I'm at IMS. It's time for the talk. I'm on a three-month retreat. I had a great day, a bad day, a boring day. I wonder who's talking. I like it. I don't like it. I'm tired. I'm not tired. Our whole story, our whole sense of landing in this world, in this context, can arise from that perception and the thoughts about it and the associations and the memories.

Which is fine, as long as we know what's happening, as long as we realize that's what's happening. Often the description, the context that we put together from that perception—7:30, bell ringing, talk—we're in agreement about that context, which is good. It's helpful that we're in agreement about that. But because so many of the perceptions we are in agreement about, that leads us not really to even question very much. Why would we question? It's obvious that's what's happening. The bell rings and this is what it means and this is what I do.

Now, the problem is—and don't believe me, look for yourself—even if it's not very often, even if it's only sometimes, the perception can be quite inaccurate. It might be incomplete, colored by ignorance, or it might be colored by the particular mental states that are present at the time of that sense contact, which, if we don't recognize that, can completely distort—or a little bit distort—the perception.

The basic distortion, of course, is ignorance. It's a state of mind. It's not an amorphous thing that's hovering over us that we have to somehow chip our way out of. It arises and passes, just like any other state of mind. But it's that kind of cloudy, dull, not-recognizing state of mind. I think of when I'm driving and it's foggy at night, like these early fall nights. I'll have these moments—I have them a lot, and it's not just based on the fog. I'll be driving along and suddenly I have no clue where I am. Not only what state, but what country. What time of year is it? What day is it? And I'll really, for a moment, be looking for some kind of sight, something I can recognize—oh, the pizza parlor. I'm in Barre. Barre. It must be fall. Fall, right. It's the three-month retreat. Luckily, those don't last too long—so far.

I know the day is coming when those moments last longer.

That's like your basic ignorance—not recognizing what's happening. Another way ignorance colors perception is if I go around without my glasses on. Literally, I can't tell what's happening. If I'm in my house without my glasses, and I'm a bit particular about the house being really tidy, I'll be there thinking, "Oh, it's so neat. There's no dust, there's no dirt." And I get very happy about it. Then I'm working at my desk with my glasses on, and I start walking around going, "Hey, look at this! Look at this dust! Look at this grime! I thought it was so clean!" I get very unhappy. So the sense of ignorance is like not quite perceiving things the way they are.

It can also be a mental state—say, of desire or aversion or fear. For example, a friend told me about being at work when her mind was colored with a state of worthlessness, that self-judging feeling. You know that state. Not recognizing it, of course. And somebody across the big office frowned, happened to be looking in her direction and frowned. The perception, the immediate recognition, wasn't the way I just described it. It was, "He's frowning at me." Just seeing very clearly that's what it is—she thought very clearly.

Now the problem—and this isn't the only problem, that we perceive incorrectly—but this is the classic description: what one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates. This is the classic description of papañca. One complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas, by coloring it with mental states. And these turn into—in the commentary they say—these complications turn into the notions that assail and overwhelm a person. But we don't think it's the notions assailing and overwhelming us, do we? We think this is an accurate description of reality, and reality is assailing and overwhelming us. And this is where we really get into suffering.

So, for example, my poor friend didn't just stop with, "Oh, he's frowning at me, but I see that my mind state is colored with worthlessness and I'm probably perceiving inaccurately, so I'll let it go." We wish! She spent the whole day—I mean, she told me about this later, so she learned from it—the whole day: "What did I do? Why is he angry at me? He's always like that with me. What did I do wrong? I'm a nice person." The whole day she was just obsessed by this.

And the next day, coming in, a little bit cleared out of that mental state, she realized he wasn't even looking at her. He was thinking about some family problem at home. It had nothing in the world to do with her. He probably didn't even register she was there. But she spent the day obsessing about that.

This is perception, proliferation, major papañca—a description of the world that in that moment we really believe, and then we suffer from. And it happens often. It's actually kind of scary when you start to see how often it can be really, amazingly out of touch with what's actually going on, which is much more simple than we like to think. We get so far away from the facts so quickly.

So with ignorance, with the delusion and confusion in the mind, often we'll perceive—say, with sight—a kind of partial thing. We don't know what it is. And without a pause of a beat, the mind makes something up. I was walking in the woods in Switzerland years ago with Fran, and I just saw out of the corner of my eye this big yellow and white thing. And I said, "Oh, what's a circus tent doing here?" She looked at me like I was nuts because, of course, there wasn't a circus tent there. And as soon as I looked, I could see it was a huge boulder with lichen on it. Now, that's relatively harmless. Yeah, Fran said I shouldn't tell that story because it makes me look stupid. But still.

I said, that's my point. That's what ignorance does. I'm not taking it personally. That's what ignorance does. We see something, we make it up. That's an easy one. There's nowhere to go with that. You see it, okay, finished. Oh, ha, ha, ha. But what about the ones we don't see? Wasn't that funny.

We get into clinging, actually, to the stories, to the papañca, to the perception itself. Clinging because we don't even recognize that we're clinging. We just think this is how it is.

I love this when it happens on retreat because it busts it for me. You know, you're sitting in the dining room, you're dutifully not looking around, and someone comes and sits next to you. You don't look. But as you know, we know who everyone is here. We have our opinions about everyone based on very little, but they're strong and they're true, right? And so this person—you immediately know who it is based on some perception, some whiff, some color, some felt sense. And it happens to be a person that somehow either pushes your buttons or you compare yourself to or you feel self-conscious around. So through the whole meal, you're going through so much, all the emotions and the projection and the self-consciousness, and it's torment. And after twenty minutes, you happen to look up and the person you thought it was walks through, going to the dish room.

That happens to me all the time. Until I saw that person, I would have sworn to my grave that I knew who that was. Absolute certainty. Total delusion. And we build up a whole story and we suffer from it. So I like that when I see it—it really busts it. Sometimes we're so attached to our description or the perception itself that we don't actually let go of it.

So this is like a German joke that Franz told me, though it actually happens. Sometimes at night, getting on the Autobahn, someone might go on the wrong entrance and they're actually driving the wrong way on the highway. It just happens. And then on the traffic radio, they call this person a ghost driver. The traffic radio will say, "Between Augsburg on the way to Munich on the Autobahn, there's a ghost driver, so stay over to the side." And the joke is the person will tune on the radio—the person who is the ghost driver—and say, "A ghost driver? There's many ghost drivers."

So you get the drift. I think we all do that. When we're caught in clinging to some perception and the description ensuing from it, it's as if our awareness snaps shut. We don't let in any perception that challenges the way we've already decided things are. Like that ghost driver, we don't let it in. The trouble is, we usually don't know we're even doing that. We really just think that's how things are.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our problems stem from mistaken perception. That's quite a statement. All of our problems stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. In other words, our mindfulness practice, the bare attention—what's actually happening prior to all the stories we make up.

We can still notice perception, so it's not about saying there shouldn't be perception. But can we even hold that tinge of possibility that maybe the perception could possibly, just maybe, not be totally accurate? That it might be another way? Just hold the possibility. And that then the descriptions and the context that we're putting ourselves and the world in from that perception could be like that or could be different. Like the magic eye.

I would say in my experience that the most subtle and powerful description we make up of the world—and we don't often recognize it as description—is that seeming experience we have of me, of I, being some kind of solid, continuous, ongoing being, making decisions, doing things, in control of what happens, whatever our story is. And we spend a lot of energy and practice wanting to get rid of this I, because we hear that that's the way to letting go, that's the way to freedom.

But really, another way to approach it is to recognize that this story we tell ourselves of I—the physical experience, whatever that continuous solid experience is—is simply based on an inaccurate perception, a misperception, wrong view, literally. But it's reinforced so frequently, and because it's so common with us, we mostly don't question it. We don't even recognize it's there as a description. We just go along thinking that's how it is, and it's so ingrained. We're so not used to looking into it that even when we try to look into it—like we were talking this morning, trying to understand—it's just another way of reifying the solidity of the sense of me. So we have to look in a different way.

And that's what mindfulness practice is all about—looking in a different way.

It's often difficult to have the true openness to meet experience moment to moment without already having the overlay of our description, our perception. When we don't really know, when we can't yet recognize that it is an overlay of description, we don't even think "that's how it is"—it's more like we know that's how it is. Like that guy driving against the traffic.

So the whole sense of our body as solid and continuous—even though we can intellectually, all of us, look in the mirror and say, "Well, I sure don't look like I looked when I was three years old. It's certainly changed enormously." Inside, I don't feel like I've changed. I still feel like me, the same me from when I was three years old. If you ask me what feels the same, there actually isn't anything that feels the same. It feels completely different, but I still would say that it feels like me. It's sort of unexamined.

The analogy I often use for sighted people is that of seeing. We've talked a lot here about bringing awareness to seeing, to the eye door, because for many people—not everyone, but for many of us—seeing congeals so quickly. The perceptions of sight solidify so quickly into the classic description of how things are. When I look out here, I could say "form and color," but what I see is a bunch of people, each of you distinct. I know the names of some of you, I can look at the expressions on your faces, I have associations, I'm sitting here, and it's all really solid. And for most of us, because we're in agreement, it really seems like we see things as they are.

But of course we know that different animals have vastly different fields of vision. How do we know that ours is right, more right than theirs, that this is more accurate? It works for us—that's good—but that doesn't mean it's accurate.

My father, I think I talked about this last year, is having a lot of trouble with his eye—macular degeneration, where you lose the sight in the middle. Three years ago now, the eye doctors did a new procedure called a retinal rotation, where they rotated his whole eye about forty degrees so that the part that could see was more in the right place—I don't know what the right place is. They said, "Oh, you'll see fine." Well, the thing is, he saw everything about forty degrees off-center in one eye, but the other eye wasn't off-center. I tried that—it's really confusing! Is everything now really forty degrees off-center? They said his brain would adjust, which sort of it did and sort of it didn't. But it's as if saying it doesn't really matter if we twist it and see everything off, because the brain will compensate and take it back until it looks the way we're used to having things look. So then I thought, well, what's really out there? What are we really seeing?

If we take that into the moment-to-moment experience in our practice—which is a good place to explore—we can see how, particularly with the body, that's a good place to start. The perception of solid continuity, as the mind gets quieter, at times that's not the perception we have. We're told it seems continuous because of the rapidity of change. The classic story is that if you twirl a torch in a circle really quickly in the night, after a while it looks like a continuous circle of light, but really it's just moving so quickly.

Another way continuity is described has to do with distance. If you look at a line of ants—like marching army ants in Asia—from a distance it looks like one solid stream. When you get up close, you can see all the millions of little moving particles. It's just a shift in perception.

Oftentimes in sitting with our body, people will have different perceptions. It feels like it's all space, or the outline of what we feel as the frame of the body vanishes for a while, or it's just a lot of quickly arising and passing sensations and you couldn't really locate it somewhere, or it feels inflated or compressed, or it feels like you weigh five thousand pounds, or it feels like you're floating. Just altered perceptions. And while none of them last, it's not to say that one is more true than another.

But two things to notice. First, notice how often the quick response that comes up when a different perception arises—something different from what we're used to, what we're comfortable with—is so often fear. It's like a shot of terror: "No, I can't feel like this!" We like, in some warped way, our little boxes of description, knowing how things are, even though that's what keeps us suffering.

So many of us want the breath to be a certain way. We want the meditation to be nice and tidy. We want to be able to note everything, not have it be confusing, have it nice—one thing after another—and know what each thing is, as if that's how the world is. When was the world ever like that? When was anybody's life like that? But somehow we think we should sit down and it's all nice and tidy, controllable.

And when the way we look at the body shifts, those first moments, it's like, "Ah, no, it can't be like this!" It's breaking apart our sense of the known. But then after that, it's not so fearful. And it's not as if once one has experienced, for example, all these little arising and passing molecules in the body, that's another fear: "Oh, how am I going to function?"

If I really see I'm all space, how am I going to be able to pick up the soup ladle and eat my soup? But it doesn't affect that. It doesn't stay in that perception either. It's like the dinosaurs in The Magic Eye—it just opens up a possibility. It changes something. It has an influence. We're not quite so certain anymore that things are the way we thought they were.

And this is really helpful, starting to bust us out of our unconscious holdings, our unconscious descriptions that keep us from being able to meet experience in a fresh way. Because we already think we know how it is.

So when someone comes in for an interview and says, "I don't know what's happening," that's great. It's when you come in thinking you have to be able to know and describe and explain everything—that's caught. When we don't have a clue, we're much more likely to be able to just meet experience in that moment as it is and see what it has to reveal to us.

With our body, the Buddha said once that if you must identify with something, it's better to identify with the body because as fast as the body changes, the mind is changing so much more quickly. I think he was being tongue-in-cheek. I don't think he was saying you should identify with the body. But just that when we can see how fast the body is changing, the mind is changing a million times more quickly. Yet somehow we identify even more strongly, this kind of clinging to the perceptions and the descriptions of who we are based on mind. I'm the thinker. I'm the feeler. I'm being aware. It just feels natural, doesn't it? But can we look with beginner's mind?

So watching again, going back to perception: notice how from the point of perception—sense contact, consciousness, perception—the sense of me or I arises hundreds or thousands of times in a day. If we don't notice that, we just feel like "I have been experiencing and thinking about these things all day," instead of noticing the papañca arising, the proliferation arising from the particular sense contact and perception.

A simple example: any sense experience. There's the perception of it—it's like we isolate it, dwell on it, associations, memory, I. I was walking outside today, the smell of the autumn leaves. Just a smell. Perception: autumn leaves. That's fine. Memory immediately of my childhood autumns, raking leaves. We were allowed then to have bonfires, before pollution was an issue, and you could burn the leaves.

It didn't stop there. It goes on and on, and pretty soon my whole life is recreated. The sense of nostalgia, the sadness of autumn, the leaves are dying, the winter is coming, life is almost over.

Then I passed the bittersweet—you know, the vine with red berries with the gold around it—which I always associate with an old dear friend of mine who died last year at ninety-five. So immediately: the bittersweet, Mrs. Stenson, old age, disease, and death. It went on the same stream because that's what we do. We isolate a particular perception.

There were plenty of other perceptions. As I think back, I can see the image of the color of the sky, of the dirt path I was walking on, the sounds of the chipmunks. I was aware of all those, but I wasn't isolating and grasping onto that perception and really going off into the story. So I worked myself into quite a fall-whole-life thing. We do that so easily.

And again, it's selective. It's perceptions and associations and selectively holding on to that—not just seeing bittersweet, memory, Mrs. Stenson, smelling the air, lifting, moving, placing, moving on. Now if you watch, you'll see that we're doing this all day long. All day long. It's not bad. It's just helpful if we know what we're doing, as opposed to believing it all.

It's so exhausting, isn't it? It's just so exhausting to have to be recreating my life story with every fourth sense perception, and noticing how it can always be a different one too.

So at this point it might be helpful to look at what does the Buddha say is really going on? There's the perception, there's the association, there's the thoughts—but what's really happening?

He said: "When in the seen is only the seen, that's it. In the heard is only the heard. In what is cognized—the thought with the mind—is only what is cognized. In what is sensed is only what is sensed. That is all."

That's it. In the seen, there's only the seen. In the heard, there's only the heard.

Can we stand it? Can we stand to be that simple? I don't think so. That's our problem—we can't stand it.

But I have to tell you the rest of the story first. It says, "Through this brief Dhamma teaching of the Lord, the mind of Bahiya of the Bark-cloth was immediately freed from the taints without grasping." In other words, he became an arhat, which we like in these stories.

Then the Buddha went away on his alms round, and in the meantime, a cow with a young calf attacked Bahiya and killed him. So he had this sense of urgency—somehow he knew, right?

The Buddha came back and people said, "Oh, he's been killed," and they made a funeral pyre for him. The other monks were saying, "Tell us, tell us, where did he go?" Because the Buddha, with his divine eye, could see people's rebirths and could tell what level of awakening a person was at.

Now, I like this too. He says to the monks: "Bhikkhus, Bahiya of the Bark-cloth was a wise man. He practiced according to Dhamma and did not trouble me by disputing about Dhamma."

I like that.

And so he says Bahiya was awakened. He doesn't go into what troubling him by disputing about Dhamma would be, but we can only imagine—something other than "in the seen is only the seen" and "in the heard is only the heard." But what about this? And what about that? And what does this mean? You know, it's like complications that assail and overwhelm a person.

So from this sense of the simplicity of perception—and that doesn't knock thoughts out. Thoughts are what is cognized. We can be aware of a thought. We can use thoughts. That's very different from believing the thoughts that come through and thinking for sure that they're accurately describing ourselves and accurately describing the world. It's very different, and it's quite freeing.

So notice as you go through the day how you take a perception and run, take a perception and go to town with self-definition, self-description, creating the whole context of your world. And notice how, though it feels like the same "me," it's a different story every time. You can flip from sad—"woe is me, I've never had a happy moment in my life"—to being completely ecstatic because you had a really pleasant sitting, or a pleasant three minutes of a sitting, or you got what you wanted for lunch, or you got there before the eggs ran out for breakfast. Whatever it is, just notice that.

And notice when we're in the grip of a particular description, how the awareness snaps shut and we don't recognize conflicting perceptions.

And I have a body that—forget it. I mean, it's not even within the realm of possibility that I would ever be doing that. But they sound like they're having so much fun. So first, the perception will be a kind of "Oh, they're having fun"—mudita. That lasts a minute. Then there's a kind of "Oh, I wish I could do that." And then I flash back to the fifth grade when I was put into the remedial gym class because I couldn't throw a softball far enough—or actually, I forget why. And I don't think of it often, but I see when I flash to it, it's warped me for life. I have this image of my physical capabilities that flashes back to that time.

In that moment, that's all the perceptions of my life that come in. I don't remember any times I was physically happy, or all the fun things I did, or traveled around the world. I only go to throwing softballs, mountain bike riding, remedial gym class, acrobatics—forget it. That's torture for a remedial gym person.

But later, I've completely forgotten about that. I'm sitting and I have a quiet sitting, or I read some inspiring dharma article, and I get completely inspired about the nature of mind and emptiness. I remember the teachers I've been with. I remember being at Ramana Maharshi's ashram. I remember being in Thailand. And I have this whole other sense—which also is me, me, me, you know, I did all these things—but they're completely different from each other.

Watch as you go through the day. It's fascinating how we take a perception, just the simplest perception, and the story could be very simple too. The sound of rain, nostalgic feeling, memories of childhood, and right there it's me again. That's all. Just notice it.

One time when I was on retreat, I was just watching how these stories of me, me, me would go, and I had seen a movie before I started the retreat. So if you've ever done that, you might know how you get replays of that movie over and over and over again. Or if you listen to music, whatever it might happen to be—sometimes it's like anything, if this would only stop.

So anyway, I was seeing Harrison Ford over and over and over again. And then later it would be me. And then all of a sudden I realized there was this fugitive story, and there was the Carol story. One wasn't more real than the other. It really—and this isn't like a metaphor—it was exactly the same. Just different images, different stories, but emotions would come up, reactions would come up, associations would come up. It was all just completely empty. Only when we hook onto it and make it real and act from it do we get confused and suffer.

But this—even the willingness to possibly come back to the simplicity of "in the seen is only the seen, in the heard is only the heard," not necessarily buying or having to have a description and a context and a meaning for everything—opens us into the unknown, really. It's stepping off the ledge of just being here and opening into the mystery. Not having everything so neatly described in nice little boxes. Not knowing what's going to happen next.

In that moment, it's just totally simple and freeing. There's not even a sense of "I'm freed from something." There's no I to refer back to. It's just a moment of is-ness. That word Stephen keeps using that I can't remember in Pali. That kind of thus-ness. This is how it is. Just this. And this can even be thoughts too. It's not like we hate thoughts. They're just another arising, cognized experience. In the heard, there's only the heard.

I have time, so I just want to mention the three forces that classically are said to fuel so strongly this papañca, this proliferation. They're nothing new, but it's sort of an explanation of why certain memories and associations zoom us off into the past, the future, outer space—while other ones we can really just see. That's fine description. Maybe it is, maybe it's not, and it doesn't grip us.

So the ones that assail and overwhelm us—papañca—are fed by, first, diṭṭhi, of course, which is wrong view or sense of self. Which is obvious, just what I was saying. Take any perception—as I said, the sound of the rain. Add to that how it relates to me, a memory of me, the feeling of me, my third grade, my past, my future. All of that papañca is fueled by a sense of self, some idea of self, however subtle it might be. And that one is kind of at the base of all of them.

That can keep us running for a long time, a very long time. One of my teachers used to say, "The I-thought arises and in the twinkling of an eye, whole universes are created." And it's true, isn't it? Different universes at different times, but in the twinkling of an eye. That's papañca.

The second force that really fuels papañca is—guess what?—craving. Big surprise. Just to give a couple of examples, one way craving actually influences perception is that it is one of the forces that can literally color perception so that we perceive something different from how it actually is. There's a Tibetan saying that craving puts feathers on the object. It kind of pretties it up.

So if you're having a Vipassana romance about somebody, or in your life you get a crush on someone, in that state of desire, of being drawn toward, the person is so entrancing. They're beautiful, they're handsome, they're cute, they're charming. The way they dress, the way they walk—it's all so alluring, and that seems so real. And then when the crush ends, in a day or a week or a month, you come back and you're looking at the person—not in aversion, but just with clear eyes—and there's that sense of, what was that all about? There's nothing wrong with them, but what was so alluring about the way they walk? Craving can completely color just the basic perception.

And from that perception then, it fuels—you know how strong it is—a moment of craving can generate a whole flurry of thoughts and emotions and memories leading actually to action. So I call it the papañca of action. It doesn't just stop with thought, does it?

I remember one retreat I was doing walking meditation and something was going on with my parents. Suddenly the thought of my parents came up, the desire to go see them, and it just came up so strong that I literally stopped and started walking towards my car. As if I was going to drive to North Carolina! I don't think so, but the craving is just so strong. It drives us. You know those times when you're doing walking meditation with every intention of walking the whole time, until you find yourself in your room sitting there having tea. How did this happen? Papañca of craving. That tea just looks like the most wonderful thing in the world. It drives us.

And the thoughts that were ephemeral before become really solid, don't they? Like concrete. It's really clear that getting to the note board and writing this note is the thing that has to happen. I know it. It's intuitive. It's deep in my gut. This is just what has to happen. It's dharmic. It's so solid. That's what craving does.

The third force that is classically said to really fuel papañca is, again, nothing new: māna, or conceit, which is classically conceit of self. It's similar to the first. But remember, we define conceit as that comparing mind. And I don't think I need to tell anyone here how much thought and energy gets going once that comparing mind has taken root.

As we've said so much, the comparing so often starts with a perception of sight. Faster walker, slower walker, more mindful mover, less mindful mover, better dresser, better yogi. But it's just sight or hearing or smell or whatever. And as soon as that comparing enters and we believe it, a whole landslide of thoughts and emotions and reactions and sense of solidity—of the world, of how things are—is created.

What's so interesting, especially about comparing, as I think I said the other night, is that there's nothing steady-state about it. If anything, it's the one you look at that's the most in flux. With comparing, there's nothing steady to stand on. But somehow we get really caught in that, and it's a major force that feeds papañca.

So just being aware of these forces—not to judge or get down on yourself—it's more to respect the power of these particular torments of the mind. When you find that you have somehow, whether for a moment or half a day, gotten really far afield from reality —we call it yogi mind because it's a little exaggerated, but guess what? It's not just happening in yogis' minds. It's happening in all of our minds in our daily life, a lot of the time.

When you recognize that, without getting into beating yourself up or anything, see if you can just get simple again. You might recognize if there's a force of desire in the heart or mind. You might recognize if comparing has been going on. You might recognize if suddenly you're feeling really strong and solid.

Just recognize it, not any problem. And then come back to the utter simplicity, which is what our practice is. In the seen, there's only the seen.

The Buddha says in a few places that even what the world calls self is in fact unsatisfactory. For no matter upon what we construct ideas of identity, the fact is ever other than that. He didn't say the fact is sometimes other than that. Whatever construction we're making of identity, the fact is ever other than that. So forget about it. And of course we can't forget about it, but at least we can say, let me come back to the simplicity. In the seen, there's only the seen. In the heard, there's only the heard. In the sensed, what is sensed. In the cognized, what is cognized.

Can we be that simple? Or to put it as T.S. Eliot says, "A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything." Not less than everything. All our ideas about ourselves, our ideas about the world. It's not that we're living like people with lobotomies who don't know what's going on. It's just that we don't grasp anymore at these ideas. We don't take them for truth. Costing not less than everything. Are we willing to be that simple?

I'm going to close with a passage from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche:

"To understand the uncreated nature of mind, we must go to the source and recognize the origin of our thoughts. Otherwise, one thought gives rise to a second thought, the second thought to a third, and so on forever. We are constantly assailed by memories of the past and carried away by expectations for the future and lose all awareness of the present. It is our own mind that leads us astray into the cycle of existences. Blind to the mind's true nature, we hold fast to our thoughts, which are nothing but manifestations of that true nature. This freezes awareness into solid concepts such as I and other, desirable and detestable, and plenty of others. This is how we create samsara.

But if, instead of letting our thoughts solidify, we recognize their emptiness, then each thought that arises and disappears in the mind renders the realization of that emptiness ever clearer. All phenomena arise like a rainbow, and like a rainbow they are devoid of any tangible existence. Once you have recognized the true nature of reality, which is empty and at the same time appears in the phenomenal world, your mind will cease to be under the power of delusion. If you can leave your thoughts free to dissolve by themselves as they arise, they will cross your mind as a bird crosses the sky without leaving any trace."

Just cross your mind as a bird crosses the sky without leaving any trace. So maintain that state of simplicity. Whatever circumstances arise, do not plunge into either elation or misery, but stay free and comfortable in unshakable serenity.

A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything.

CHAPTER 362

Happiness and Harmlessness

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching on how beings remain fettered by envy and stinginess—rooted in our tight grip on preferences of what is dear and not dear. Drawing from a sutta where Sakka asks the Buddha why humans cannot live free from hostility despite their best intentions, Wilson illuminates how our misguided pursuit of happiness keeps us trapped in cycles of suffering.
>
> Wilson connects these ancient teachings to modern scientific research on happiness, citing studies showing that humans consistently misjudge what will make them happy and for how long. She unpacks the Four Noble Truths (cattāri ariyasaccāni) not as mere concepts but as an invitation to investigate our moment-to-moment experience—particularly our habitual flinching from dukkha and grasping for pleasant feelings. The Buddha taught that an untaught worldling knows no escape from painful feelings except sensual pleasure, creating an underlying tendency to lust after pleasant experiences.
>
> The talk offers a radical reframe: the Buddha's peace came not from having pleasant experiences but from complete openness to whatever arose—illness, conflict, loss—without clinging to preferences. Wilson emphasizes that liberation is found in taking refuge in awareness itself rather than in experience, allowing each moment of sense contact to become a gateway to freedom. This requires courage to let down our armor against life's unreliability and to simply be present without assessment, story, or reference to self.

I'm Carol Wilson, and it's nice to be back. A couple of you have come quite recently, some of you have been here for months, and some for a few weeks. I probably say this sometimes, but it's really remarkable walking in here. I go to lots of retreats and I'm rather blasé about walking into retreat environments because I do it all the time, but this is lovely. It feels like you're really doing it. It's palpable. Very inspiring. Thank you all for being here. And I know that as pleasant and comfortable a place as this has been created to be, there is no escape.

Coming out of the interviews today, and also an article that a friend sent me yesterday, brought up what I want to talk about. It's really basic Dharma 101, but as far as I can see, it never stops being relevant. This article was a long piece in the New York Times called "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness." Hopefully we're not going to agree in the end that our pursuit of happiness is futile. But in terms of how we usually pursue happiness, the way of the world of pursuing happiness—that is futile, useless, leading onward to more suffering and more confusion. So that's what I want to talk about.

There are a couple of different suttas, or discourses of the Buddha, and I'll quote from the beginning of one of them. To me, it really speaks to the fact that with our best intentions, we want to live in this world. Not only do we want to be happy, of course, but we also—and I'm assuming those of us here would agree—really want to live in a way that's harmless, in a way that brings about more peace, more connectedness. We don't want to create more suffering and hostility in the world or in ourselves. I think I could safely say that for people here.

But even with our best intentions, even if we just don't want to create more conflict in ourselves, even going around here with your mouths closed and hardly interacting with people, still hostility, aversion, and conflict arise in the mind. At least, please God, you don't act it out. But it does arise, despite our best intentions.

In this discourse, Sakka, the deva king, came down and was talking with the Buddha. He asked, "What are we fettered with? What are we chained with? Even though we humans, as well as devas, think: may we live free from hostility, may we live free from violence, free from rivalry, free from ill will, free from those who are hostile or from being hostile ourselves—even though we deeply think this, why is it that we keep ending up living in hostility, with violence, with rivalry, with ill will? What is it that fetters us? What is it that chains us?"

This is just one of the ways the Buddha outlines things, nothing you haven't heard before. But he begins by saying that beings are fettered by the bonds of envy and stinginess—envy, wanting what others have, and stinginess, trying to hold on to what we have, not wanting to share. And this is caused by holding tight to preferences, by creating in our minds and hearts what is dear to us and what is not dear to us, and then holding tightly to that.

He doesn't stop there, and I'll go on. But I find this particular description both very useful and also unsettling. It shakes up the not-so-comfortable-but-we-think-it's-comfortable world, the description or way of being that we have. How can we not have preferences? How can we live without preferences? Right away the mind can start to jump into reaction: even the Buddha had preferences, even the Buddha chose how he wanted to live. Can't you hear how the mind is justifying ourselves somehow?

But he says this is caused by holding to preferences, creating what is dear and not dear and holding on to that, which of course is caused by desire, which is fed and increased by thinking about our preferences and by the ensuing papañca—the proliferation that comes around that.

So I want to talk about this holding to preferences, this dear and not dear. Why does that create this ongoing inability to live in a way that brings happiness and peace to ourselves and others, even though that's what we want?

I would think, at least in my own experience, that holding onto preferences—of course we have preferences—holding onto what is dear, trying to get rid of what is not dear, likes and dislikes, really arises from our deep, truly deep yearning to be happy.

And as you know, the Buddha often said that everyone wants to be happy. We just—he didn't put it quite this way—but we just don't really get how to do it. We're lost in delusion and not seeing clearly. Our holding to preferences arises from our misguided attempts to find some way to really be happy in this life, to find some way to bring happiness to others. But what it comes down to is that we really don't know what true happiness is. We not only don't know how to go about living in happiness, but we don't really know what it is.

And that brings me to this article, "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness," which is really very fascinating. I'll spare you—it's quite long—I'll spare you all of it. But it's an article about some very serious scientific research that's been going on in recent years. A group of four professors: one who's a professor of psychology at Harvard, one's a psychologist at the University of Virginia, one's an economist at Carnegie Mellon, and one's a psychologist and Nobel laureate in economics at Princeton. So we're talking serious research, not some loopy fringe thing.

These researchers, especially the lead one, Gilbert, started basically looking at what it is that we do to be happy—studying the question of what it takes to be happy and the decisions we make trying to bring about happiness in our lives, all very scientific with scientific method and lots of tests and studies.

In a series of studies, they made a slew of observations and conclusions that undermine a number of fundamental assumptions—namely that we humans understand what we want and are any good at improving our well-being. The studies undermine that assumption. Basically, as he termed these studies, it is to wonder if everything you have ever thought about life choices and about happiness has been at the least somewhat naive and at worst greatly mistaken.

Now, these are scientific studies, and they're basically saying that we base our decisions on what will make us happy, on how we think we'll feel when a certain event happens, when we get a certain thing. And he goes on to show that basically we have no clue. We completely underestimate and overestimate how happy something will make us and how unhappy something will make us. And then we make our life decisions based on these assumptions, which turn out often—usually—to be not accurate at all.

An example: most people, if given the choice—which would you rather have, a broken leg or a trick knee?—people think a broken leg causes much more suffering. I'd rather have a trick knee. But over time, it turns out that a trick knee, a bad knee, although the immediate suffering in each moment is less, the amount of suffering over time is much, much more than a one-time intense experience like a broken leg.

And so he says, in general, we overestimate both how happy having something pleasant will make us and how long it will last. It doesn't make us as happy as we think, and it doesn't last very long. This isn't news to us, right? And the same for difficult things. We overestimate how horrible something will be and how much it's going to ruin our life. And it also isn't nearly as intense as we imagine and it doesn't last as long as we imagine. Sure, it still hurts. It's still sad. But it doesn't have the effect we think. And this is what we base our life choices on.

So that's just a real short beginning of what they're talking about. And essentially, I think that's what the Buddha's talking about. We base our sense of preference, of liking and disliking, of dear and not dear, on what makes us feel good in the moment—generally, what's pleasant. And what we think is going to make us feel bad, or it does make us feel bad, or even getting in the neighborhood of it makes us feel bad, and we run in the other direction. And we keep cycling our life like this.

And I know I've said this often, and I keep finding it in my practice on more and more subtle levels. Talking to people today, I can see how in real subtle levels it keeps coming in—that somehow this misunderstanding of what the happiness and peace the Buddha is talking about is, of what the happiness that's really available to us right now is—our misunderstanding of that, based on our not seeing ourselves and the nature of life clearly, keeps us looking in practice, in life, ultimately for things to finally get okay.

And it gets more and more subtle. But it's so easy that it creeps in—that somehow what we're practicing for, what we're living for, or the unspoken idea of enlightenment somehow carries the flavor of pleasantness, of happiness in the terms of we have what we like and what we don't like goes away. Or of somehow finally being in control and not being the so-called victim of all these unexpected, unpleasant, really crazy things that happen. Or at least—at least—even if a lot of unpleasant stuff happens, we're going to really understand it all. And so in that way, we're in control. That one really—I still fall into that one—but that one hooked me for a long time. It's okay, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, but I'm going to really understand what's going on.

A sense of control, a sense of knowing, a sense of having.

To really turn around and look at what the Buddha was talking about when he says, "I teach suffering and the end of suffering"—the enlightened one, the peaceful one. He says he does not suffer.

It took me years to really consciously look at his life after he was enlightened and think, "Oh, his life actually doesn't sound like it was any more pleasant in the experiencing of it than most of our lives." He didn't particularly have good health. He had backaches. He had headaches. As you know, he had all kinds of sorrows and aggravations and the loss of people close to him—both family and his chief disciples. He spent forty-five years of his life in tireless service to other beings. His sangha of monks was split. One of his cousins tried to kill him. His clansmen on his mother's and father's side went to war over water rights and killed many of each other, and he had to go and mediate. He chose a very simple life, so he certainly didn't have much physical comfort.

And yet, and yet, he made it very clear to us that he no longer suffered.

So I need, in myself, to keep coming back and reminding myself: oh, having no preferences. You can look at it the other way and say, well, of course he had preferences. He chose to live as a monk. He chose to live a renunciate wandering life. He's always talking about—as Marcia mentioned in her talk—choosing wisely the people that you spend time with. He's not saying do whatever you want, it doesn't make any difference. He laid out a very strict, very comprehensive path of how to live.

So having no preferences doesn't mean, "Ah, what the hell? I don't know the difference. Liking, disliking, pleasant, unpleasant—who knows?" Not that at all. It means paying very careful attention, being fully present for all of it, the whole show. And within the field of experiencing really difficult life stuff, as the Buddha did, within the field of choosing to live as a renunciate, having no preferences means not being attached to having it any particular way.

So when there was suffering going on in his life, how is the Buddha different from us in that way? I mean, I can only project. I'm certainly not speaking from my own personal experience, so I don't know what the Buddha's mind was like. But it seems to me that the difference, based on his talking about not clinging to preferences, would be that he could flow with, be with, wide awake in the midst of all of it. The difficulty, the beauty, the frustration, the exhaustion, the discomfort of the way he lived—because he could just be in harmony with whatever is arising.

Not holding to preferences means ultimately: in this moment, whatever's arising is arising, and I don't need to make it different. I can't anyway. You can't change this moment, can you? I know we try. We spend a lot of our practice—really a lot—trying to change this moment. And it's such a ridiculous and impossible thing to even try to do, because the moment's already over before we've even been able to notice what it is. And then we get engaged in throwing it into the future and trying to change it, but it's long gone.

But not clinging to preferences—the Buddha didn't awaken into some other life somewhere else. He lived a very engaged, connected, awakened life in this world as it is. And as he often said, without suffering.

So the suffering isn't about being able to change the external world. It's not about being able to have a better body. It's not about being able to manipulate and control our friends or the people that we're teaching. Liberation is really awakening fully into this moment without clinging to any preference whatsoever.

And I feel our whole practice is around allowing us to see and understand our moment-to-moment experience so accurately, so clearly, that our habitual or almost unconscious need to keep trying to manipulate and control and get it how we like it and avoid what scares us—that this drops away. Not because it should, not "I should get rid of this so I can finally be happy," but because it doesn't make sense anymore.

When we really experience with sati-pañña, with mindfulness wisdom, at a moment of sense contact, when we experience in that moment things just as they are, then the need—even just for a moment—the need for our ongoing construction of self and other, of trying to explain and assess and compare and give meaning to every sense contact that comes, in a way of trying to figure things out and control the world, that just falls away.

The need to grasp at the pleasant, the need to push away the unpleasant, the tendency to just space out and get deluded and ignore whatever isn't sufficiently intense to pull us in and say, "Hey, pay attention"—that drops away. We don't have to think about how we should be. It happens naturally, spontaneously, out of clear seeing.

The Buddha talked about cultivating unshakable deliverance of mind. That phrase really inspires me, because I feel that all of us here know the taste of freedom of mind. Really, it's moment to moment. It's not as if we have to experience either no freedom of mind at all or total absolute arahantship, with nothing in between. We all know a moment of freedom of mind where there's just being fully present, knowing a sight, a sound, a taste, a smell, and the knowing of it. And there's no adding of story onto it. There's no referencing it back to me. There's no clinging or pushing away. There's nothing. It's just this. There's no mind going, "Oh, now I'm experiencing a moment of freedom of mind." It's just this. It's so natural. It's so simple.

In that moment, the need to cling, to make dear or not dear, to manipulate, just doesn't arise, does it? It doesn't make any sense. You don't even think about it. And it's so normal and natural that we often don't even notice it—just, oh yeah, this is going on fine, fine, fine. But then this thing happened, and now I've got to fix it. And it's as if all that other stuff doesn't matter, because we get so caught, so entranced with our reactions to particular experiences.

This, of course, is where the Buddha was so brilliant and so clear in his precision in the way of talking about it. Here we have to mention the Four Noble Truths, which I'm not going to go into in depth. When the Buddha tried to teach us just what we need to free our hearts and minds—not to know everything he knew, but just to free us from our propensity to create suffering where it's unnecessary—the first thing he thought he needed to tell us was these facts of life. The first being, of course, dukkha: the fact that difficult, unpleasant things happen, that everything we experience is impermanent, is fleeting. And not just that it's going to go away at some point, but that even now, in this very moment, it is dissolving and changing. There is nothing reliable we can hold to. That's dukkha.

The second truth is that the cause of our anguish, of our ongoing suffering in our lives, is not the dukkha itself, but the habituated reactions and responses of our mind and heart to moment-to-moment experience—the clinging and the aversion to the fact that things are constantly changing, unreliable, and sometimes pleasant, sometimes unpleasant.

The third truth is that when we really, even just for a moment, clearly recognize things as they are, there is both momentary and, at some point altogether, a real liberation of heart and mind. A cessation of the clinging, a cessation of the aversion, a cessation of this creation of unnecessary anguish and suffering. And that can be touched by us here and now, in any moment, no matter what the particular experience is.

Our practice here is one aspect of the fourth truth, the path that the Buddha laid out: purification of heart, of mind, of cultivation; clear seeing; insight; a heart and mind that in a moment is free of clinging, and that freedom allows us to see clearly. And then that clear seeing further frees the heart and mind from the tendency to cling.

I mention these not as an intellectual concept—"Oh yeah, the Four Noble Truths, yada yada"—but to really take it as a call to inquire into your own experience, moment by moment. I was really struck today in talking with people. I talked to ten or eleven people, and in very different ways—each person in his or her own practice, each practice going on its own trajectory, which is appropriate for that person, with nothing to compare to somebody else—I was struck by how this theme of dukkha, of difficulty, of unpleasantness, and of our reactions to it, continues to be a significant thread through all levels, all aspects of our practice.

And not a thread like a mistake. Not thinking, "Oh yeah, even though I'm doing subtle practice, I still have dukkha—what's wrong?" That's exactly why it's a theme. Nothing's wrong. The first truth is: dukkha happens. If you think something's wrong because there's something unpleasant or difficult in your practice—well, as we were teaching Dhamma Ruh, the Sri Lankan guy, some American slang, he's got this one down. He said the other day: "Duh!"

Dukkha's coming up. Nothing's wrong. It's part of life in this body on this planet.

The difficulty is that reaction—"What's wrong?"—it's so instinctive to us to somehow flinch back. And on all the levels that we experience the unsatisfactoriness and suffering of this world on retreat, on all different levels... Talking to people today, the macro level, you could say, of the vastness and the unbearableness of how much suffering and cruelty and pain there is in this world—to start thinking about it is unbearable. To say, "Well, I'm just thinking, that's a thought arising now," the mind comes in and goes, "Well, you're selfish," and then you want to get lost in it again.

The sort of mid-level of something coming up in our practice, in our personality pattern, in our deep emotional, physical pain body—whether it's deep feelings of worthlessness or old traumatic memories or some deep loneliness or anger. Not just passing through, but the times when it comes up on retreat viscerally, in your cells and your practice. The mind says, "Why can't I just be back with lifting, moving, placing like it was yesterday? What's going wrong now? I've got to be with these waves of unpleasant emotion. I blew it." It's like, no. What's happening? What's happening now? No holding to preferences. That's another aspect of dukkha.

And then on seemingly very subtle levels where there's no big thing going on, but just in a moment where the steadiness of awareness disconnects, so to speak, from present moment experience. You're just there, there, there, and it just disconnects. And in that can come aversion or a kind of subtle restlessness, a subtle dissatisfaction—really the subtle element of samsaric unreliability. And you connect and it's gone again.

When it's gone, it's important to notice it's really gone. Because another thing we do is we hate the dukkha, and then when the unpleasantness is gone, we carry it around with us. Like one of my teachers used to say, it's like dragging a corpse around with you. "This was there when I wasn't paying attention, and as soon as I don't pay attention, it's going to come back." And then—what's happening now?

So the thread of how our heart and mind relates to both unpleasant and pleasant, but particularly the dukkha, because it's so ingrained to flinch away, to turn away, to think something else should be happening. It's really rare, really rare when things have been going the way you like them—which is "oh, good practice"—and suddenly it changes and it gets really difficult in whatever way, gross or subtle, it doesn't matter. It's really rare for the mind to just not have any quiver of preference, not have any quiver of "What did I do wrong and how can I get it back?"

And of course, everything we say, any instructions that are given, always tend in the direction of what seems like good practice. "And by the way, there'll be fear and there'll be aversion and you'll get caught." But when it's really going subtle, it's just note, note, note, note, note. Everything goes away really quickly. And then we think, "Yeah, that's what I'm heading towards—a world of no suffering, things just the way I want them."

But the second truth—again, it's not that the difficult stuff happens or that things change or that the way we think it should be isn't the way it is. I mean, really, how often in your life is the way you think it should be? How often does that actually happen at the same time that you still think it's the way it should be? Not very often, and it doesn't last very long. Then finally it gets to the way you thought it should be three years ago, but now you know it shouldn't be that way anymore. It should be some other way. It's hopeless. It is. That is the futile pursuit of happiness. That's what they're talking about.

But we can only recognize the truth of this—of the fact that the freedom, the peace, the happiness the Buddha is talking about is completely not dependent on having any particular experience be present or absent. That it's absolutely about the relationship, about the clear seeing and the openheartedness that lets this mind and body just be completely open, awake, non-judging, non-resistant, non-clinging, in the midst of whatever experience arises.

That's not something we can arrive at experientially by thinking about it or by listening to it, by reading about it. All of that can help us begin to look. But we only recognize the truth of this for ourselves when we, even for a moment or so, stop our habit of running from the unpleasant and towards the pleasant. When we stop our habit of averting our attention and pretending to be here in this unpleasant thing, but really waiting for it to go away and for practice to start up again and get better. And I'm talking about practice, but I mean, this is the way we live our lives.

When we are able to be as open and present in the midst of the beautiful, in the midst of the boring—unbearably boring—in the midst of the painful. And this arises by our simple willingness to look, to just stop our habit of running and turn around and look and see what's actually going on.

And this, of course, as you know, is the whole thrust, the whole point of mindfulness and samadhi, the whole point of our practice—to give us the tools of how to look, how to stop and look, and also to help us recognize what's actually happening. Because as you know, we're so entranced by our reactions to present moment experience: liking the pleasant, disliking the unpleasant, ignoring the neutral. And then building—I don't know if you've noticed this, I hope you have—building incredible stories about ourselves around any stupid little pleasant or unpleasant or neutral sense contact.

It's really quite astounding, the creativity and fertility of the mind, of thought process, of papañca, to be able to create a whole world. And if you're in worthlessness, just hearing a sound and having a moment of aversion can lead you in no time at all to a complete assessment of what a rotten, negative, hostile person you are—totally believed. No clue in awareness of seeing that what actually happened was just hearing and the knowing of it, unpleasantness and the knowing of it. Well, we weren't aware of the knowing of it, were we? We were just aware of—boom—down the road.

Pleasantness works the same way. We're so entranced by these reactions and the stories we tell ourselves about them. What this means about me, what this means about practice, what this unpleasant feeling in the breath means about my practice—so I have to do this and change that and make something else happen so that my practice can get back on an even keel heading in the direction of Nibbana. Which God knows isn't here and can't ever be in that direction as long as my breath has this heavy tightness in it. So let's fix that and then the goal is around the corner.

And we believe this crap over and over and over, sense contact after sense contact after sense contact. And we wonder why we're so exhausted. Why we're so lost. Why practice is so hard. Why life is so hard. We just really don't have a clue. We don't even know what's really happening.

And this is from that article again. Gilbert, the main researcher doing this investigation, says we don't even know what makes us happy. If it's difficult to figure out what makes us happy in this moment, how can we predict what will make us happy in the future? But how much of our practice, how much of our life is about trying to figure out what's going to make us happy or free or liberated? And how often is liberation just another way of saying happy—getting what I want?

So it's learning to see how we get so involved in our interpretations, our assessments of moment-to-moment simple experience. How so often the biggest enticement, the most seductive entrancement of all—and watch this in your practice, maybe I'm the only one—is that most of those assessments and interpretations somehow make every sense experience come back to revolving around me. Me, me, me. What it means about me, what my reaction to it means about me, what it's going to feel like for me in the future, how it's always been like this for me in the past. We're just the center of everything, the center of the whole world. Every sense experience is just happening to show us something about ourselves.

And because we get so enticed, it's hard to just see clearly enough to recognize: oh, that's just hearing and the knowing of it. That's just smelling and smelling consciousness. It's not quite juicy enough. If it's smelling and smelling consciousness, then yeah, that really makes me hungry. Then I can really get down on myself for being hungry because I had enough to eat and I want to keep the precepts and I shouldn't be hungry, and then I can get into a whole thing about how I can't even practice renunciation. That is much more suffering, but in a very weird way we find it more satisfying—because we're not looking carefully enough.

And I think we don't look carefully enough partly because we need some concentration and some mindfulness, and partly because of this ingrained, instinctive pulling away from dukkha, from the unpleasant, from suffering. Because looking carefully—the part that's so hard, the reason I think dukkha runs as a thread through all of our practice—is that to really open, to see things as they are, means finding the vision, the courage, even the interest, the resolution to stay here with as calm a mind and heart as possible in the midst of difficulty, as well as in the midst of beauty.

It's hard at first because we don't know any other way. The Buddha said—and I know this by heart—when he was talking about our habit, he says: "An untaught worldling, O monks, does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness."

That's basic. And I find it very profound, actually. The basic untaught person not exposed to the Dharma—the only escape they know from unpleasant experience, from painful feelings, is the enjoyment of sense happiness. So then in that person there becomes the underlying tendency, that subtle bias, that habit of mind to lust after sense pleasure. A lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind. And that's where we spend so much of our life—in an underlying subtle tendency to lust for pleasant feelings.

When we turn around then and look at the essence of a pleasant feeling when it's here, it's like so nothing, isn't it? Mostly in the world we never even hear about looking at pleasant or unpleasant or neutral feelings. And so mostly, as the Buddha said, we spend our lives trying to avoid the unpleasant ones and inculcating this lust for the pleasant and this fear of the unpleasant. Just feelings.

So when we start, and continue here, to have the steadiness of mindfulness—but also the resolution and the courage to just kind of stop running and turn around and really bring awareness to a pleasant feeling, to an unpleasant feeling, to a neutral feeling, should you ever notice one—what is a pleasant feeling, really?

It's like it's nothing. It's so short. It's so amazing that we spend our lives in driven pursuit of more of these fleeting moments.

I remember reading Ajahn Buddhadasa where he says, look at your life and see how—in his opinion—ninety percent of all the decisions you've ever made have been in pursuit of pleasant feeling. And when you really look at pleasant feeling, it's just so short. It's so ephemeral. It just comes and goes like a wave.

But when we stop and really look at this, the first moments of seeing it, there might be a moment of ease—but somehow it's not like, "Oh great, thank God, now I'm done with that, let's move on." There's some way it shakes up our world. Because we're basing our life, basing our understanding of happiness, basing our explanations of who we are and what's valuable so much on this pursuit of pleasant and avoidance of unpleasant—really unconsciously, when we don't pay attention.

And to turn around and just open to, "Okay, I can just be here with this fearful, unpleasant thing"—it's hard sometimes because it really means finding the stability and the greatness of heart to be present when all the suffering of the world is flashing before our eyes. Or when really strong, painful, grief-stricken memories are coming up and we're experiencing them with the intensity we felt when we were six months old. Or even the really subtle, seemingly subtle suffering of just that not-fitting discontent. Sometimes that's the worst of all because you can't even have the satisfaction in your mind of saying, "Yeah, that's really wrong, there's something horrible." It's just like, "Where can I go to get away from this?"

And the untaught worldling, as the Buddha calls them, doesn't know any other way. We're so fortunate that we have a path, that we have a refuge, because without that there is nowhere else to go.

This is what this man Gilbert is saying at the end, and he's light about it. He's saying that from all his studying, he really knows intellectually that what he thinks is going to make him happy isn't going to deliver in any way the way he thinks it can. But he's laughing as he says it. He says, "I really should have learned more than I have. For instance, I'm getting married in the spring because this woman is going to make me happy forever and I know it." And he really laughs. You can laugh at it. It's good. He says he finds it funny, not because it's untrue, but because nothing could be more true. That is really how he feels. She's going to make me happy forever and I know it. And so he says, "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations."

So something about the belief that there's the good and there's the bad and that this is a contest to try to get one and avoid the other—he says, "I don't think I want to learn too much from my research in that sense."

Isn't that amazing? He's been doing this for years. This isn't like a one-off test he's been doing. It sounds like it's actually made him really very honest in looking at himself. But without a sense of the peace of the Buddha, of a path and a refuge in awareness—without a sense that real happiness expands beyond and doesn't depend on nāma-rūpa, on sense experience, on mental experience at all—without that, when we're just caught in the world of sense pleasures and experience, there's nowhere else to go for happiness. Of course people don't want to stop and turn around and look and see that it all just vanishes the moment you touch it. Because the mind thinks, "How can I bear that?" And if there were no other happiness, how could we bear it?

This is why I say it takes courage—talking to all of you and seeing it in myself. It's easier for me to see courage in others than in myself, of course. But it takes enormous courage because it's not like we just get to look once and go, "Oh yeah, that's right. Pleasant feeling vanishes. Unpleasant feeling vanishes. So no problem, I can be with this. I can just tune into the refuge in awareness and no problem."

No. It takes us at times into really deep experiences of grief, of fear, of all the deep and strongly habituated defenses of the mind against having to feel certain depths of suffering—mental, physical, emotional—because we think we'll die, because we think there's nothing else there if we feel this. How can I keep going?

And of course, you all know, you've all experienced—but we have to keep learning it more and more—that the actual opening to the suffering in the particular moment is the way into that release, that peace, that refuge in awareness. Because awareness is unaffected, unbothered, by whether it's a wonderful, incredible experience, by whether it's painful, by whether it's mundane. When we can take refuge in the knowing, in the awareness, it allows anything—whatever sense experience is arising, internal, external, mental or physical—it allows that in that moment to be a gateway to liberation, a gateway to peace, a gateway to waking up. When we can just notice what's arising and the awareness of it. When we become more interested in the awareness rather than assessing and trying to take refuge in the experience.

And how often are we trying to take refuge in the experience? "Finally that horrible thing stopped and I can just relax into this peaceful breath." And ever so subtly—ah, yes—we're taking refuge in the experience.

We think, "Now I've found the peace." But we're still ever so subtly holding on to experience. We don't have to flee from pleasant either. There's calm, and there's the knowing of it. Then out of nowhere comes this surge of energy and the mind is talking a mile a minute. "What's going on? I have to figure it out." No, I don't. There's just the mind going a mile a minute and the knowing of it. We don't need to refer it back to me and make up an assessment of what it means or an evaluation. Just in that moment—what's happening and the knowing of it.

But it takes a great deal of courage, because this real letting go of the clinging, of the trying to use experience for refuge, for safety, for something comfortable, for something familiar—the real liberation from clinging of heart and mind comes about when we understand, not intellectually but in ourselves, when we've seen so clearly, so thoroughly, the ephemeral, unreliable nature of the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, of any sense experience, of the fact that there's just sense experience and contact and the knowing of it and nothing else there. When we really get that more and more, then quite naturally the tendency to clinging, the tendency to aversion, the holding to preferences doesn't arise—it falls away.

But this takes a willingness, an ability, the courage to let down our defenses against the fearsomeness and the unreliability of the world. This is the way Pema Chödrön describes it: "When we protect ourselves so we won't feel pain, that protection becomes like armor—armor that imprisons the softness of the heart. We do everything we can think of not to feel anything threatening." I actually think, and I know for me, a lot of my early years of practice was about that—somehow finding a way in practice not to feel anything threatening. We try to prolong feeling good about ourselves. Looking at color pictures in magazines of people having fun on the beach, many of us wish that life could be that good. "When we breathe in pain, somehow it penetrates that armor. The way we guard ourselves is being softened up. This heavy, rusty, creaking armor begins to seem not so solid after all. With the in-breath, the armor begins to fall apart and we find we can breathe deeply and relax. Kindness and tenderness begin to emerge. We don't have to tense up as if our whole life were being spent in the dentist's chair."

I can quite relate to that at times—that sense of just keeping the suffering a little bit at bay. And this tensing up, psychically tensing up, takes a huge amount of energy, psychic and even physical energy. We don't even know we're walking around so exhausted. There's so much energy available. People wonder why sometimes in concentration and mindfulness, as your practice deepens, there can be so much energy available. Maybe not this time of night—it's not steady state—but it does come. It's because that armor, that walking around tensed up like we're in a dentist's chair, starts to dissolve. And the energy is available for this simplicity of total presence, of pure seeing, of pure being—of simply allowing the mystery of life to present itself without having to know ahead of time or assess or refer it back or somehow control or be ready for it before it happens.

When we can just open fully into the mystery of this next moment, of this moment, without any reference point at all—not referencing it to good practice, not referencing it to what happened yesterday or what I think should happen or what this might mean, not referencing it even back to a sense of self, not making any assessment whatsoever, but just total open presence with sati and samādhi, with concentration, with the unification of mind in that moment, and mindfulness—that's really taking refuge in awareness.

And in that moment, just for that moment, we're getting an inkling, we're getting a doorway into the peace of the Buddha, into the peace that's accessible to us all the time. We are so fortunate to even have a path laid out for us and a sense that this is true and possible and available. It gives us the courage and the faith to not cling so desperately to our search for fulfillment and sense of self in pleasant feeling, to release our desperate fear of the unpleasant as a sign that we're failing, as a sign that something is inherently and desperately wrong with us or the world.

We are as we are. The world is as it is. And actually, when we give up needing to understand how that is—much less explaining it to ourselves—and we give up needing to protect ourselves against how it is, but just have this trust, this willingness to just be here totally for this arising moment, no more, no less, then we begin to really touch the peace of the Buddha. We begin to understand what he means when he says the doors of the deathless are open for those who see, for those who hear—now, in this moment.

And it doesn't mean we're fleeing from the world of the senses. It doesn't mean we want to hate sense pleasure, or say, "Yes, let's have some more suffering because that's my way to freedom." It doesn't mean we're trying to surmount living in a mind and body. It just means understanding more accurately where the chains are.

I want to end by reading two things about this—one from the Buddha, one from a kind of New Age guy.

So Eckhart Tolle, the New Age guy, says it's not that we should no longer appreciate pleasant or beautiful things or conditions. Of course we do. But to seek something through these beautiful conditions that they cannot give—an identity, a sense of permanency and fulfillment—this is a recipe for frustration and suffering.

And from the Buddha: "The eye is not the fetter of forms. Forms are not the fetter of the eye." In other words, the eye isn't the problem. Forms aren't the problem. But whatever desire and passion arise in dependence on the two of them—on the eye, forms, and contact—whatever desire or passion or aversion arises in dependence on that contact, this is the fetter.

If the sense door or the sense object, the eye or the form, were the fetter, if those things were inherently what was keeping us in suffering, then the Buddha said this holy life for the ending of dukkha would not be proclaimed. In other words, if the eye and forms were the problem, there's nothing you could do about it. So the holy life would not be proclaimed.

"There is an eye in the Blessed One. The Blessed One sees forms with the eye. Yet no desire or passion is in the Blessed One. So the Blessed One is well released in mind."

I really like that. We don't want to hate the eye. We don't need to get rid of forms. We don't have to run from contact. There is an eye in the Blessed One. He sees forms with the eye. But no passion or desire arises, and he is well released in mind.

Just opening to the mystery of whatever this next moment brings—without needing to run from it, hold on to it, make up a story about it. Just there is the door to the deathless.

So let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 363

Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that developing and cultivating the perception of impermanence (anicca) can eliminate all sensual lust, ignorance, and conceit. She opens with the Buddha's striking image of taking a bit of dirt under his fingernail and declaring that not even this much of any of the five aggregates (khandhas) is permanent or stable—and that this very impermanence makes the complete destruction of suffering possible.

Wilson explores why, despite impermanence being the most conceptually accessible of the three characteristics, we struggle to truly perceive it. She distinguishes between intellectual understanding and the deeper cellular knowing that transforms how we relate to experience. Drawing from the suttas, she shares the touching story of Ānanda weeping when the Buddha announced his approaching death, and the account of the monk Assaji who became distressed when illness prevented him from attaining his usual concentration states. These examples illustrate how even accomplished practitioners can be caught by assumptions of permanence.

Through practical guidance, Wilson encourages practitioners to notice the "gone-ness" of experiences rather than assuming continuity, to observe how we fill gaps in awareness with assumptions of permanence, and to recognize how changing conditions naturally produce changing experiences. She describes how the perception of radical moment-to-moment change, rather than bringing fear, opens the heart to a vitality of presence—what the Buddha called "the supreme state of sublime peace, namely liberation through non-clinging." The talk concludes with Nisargadatta Maharaj's invitation to be quiet and free from the obsession with "what next."

One of the three marks of existence in the way the Buddha speaks about things is that of impermanence, anicca in the Pali—the fact that things change.

The Buddha spoke so often about the centrality of this insight, this understanding of the nature of conditioned existence, of the power, the freeing power, of our really coming to know this as a truth.

I want to read you a couple of quotations from him. He was talking to a monk, and he said: "Bhikkhu, there is no form, no vedana, no feeling tone, no perception, no volitional formation, no consciousness"—that's the five aggregates that make up a human being—"none of any of those five that is permanent, stable, eternal, that is not subject to change, and that will remain the same just like eternity itself."

Then the Blessed One took up a little bit of dirt in his fingernail, a tiny little bit of dirt, and he said, "There's not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change. Not even this little bit under my fingernail of all the form in the world. If there were this much form that were stable, eternal, not subject to change, that was permanent, then this living of the holy life where the complete destruction of suffering could not be discerned—it wouldn't be possible. But because there is not even this much form, and all the five aggregates, this much form, this much feeling, vedana, feeling tone, this much perception, mental formations, consciousness that is stable, that is permanent—then there is the living of this holy life for the complete destruction of suffering."

It's a powerful statement. Not even that much that is unchanging, that is permanent. That's quite radical.

One other statement from him: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, that perception eliminates all sensual lust, it eliminates all lust for existence, it eliminates all ignorance, it uproots all conceit 'I am.'" That basically means a completely enlightened human being. Those are different ways of describing it—when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated.

I think that's a really interesting way to point to it: the perception of impermanence. Remember, perception, saññā in Pali, is that recognition of what is. It's one of the five aggregates. It's arising in every moment of contact. It's just that simple recognition. When I ring the bell, you hear the sound—"bell" just comes up in the mind. Perception.

So the perception of impermanence. Why should that be something we need to develop? If impermanence is the way it is, and that's what he's telling us, why should we have to develop and cultivate the perception of it? Why don't we, if in fact we don't, really truly know in our guts, in our cells, however you want to put it? I like to think of it as knowing it cellularly. Why don't we? And if you think you do, is that how you live? Really knowing that there's not even this much under your fingernail of something that's stable and permanent?

I think it's interesting. Of the three characteristics—anicca, the fact of change; dukkha, the unreliability or sometimes suffering aspect; and non-self—conceptually, intellectually, to me, the fact of impermanence is the easiest to comprehend. It's not so abstruse, really, is it? It's not so abstract. We can get it with our mind. And probably we wouldn't really argue about the fact that things change.

But when it comes to this level of perception, there's some way that we tend at times not to perceive the actuality of impermanence, but rather to perceive permanence—and proceed then to construct our thoughts, our views, our lives, how we relate, around this perception that things aren't really changing. At least not right now. At least, somewhere in the future they'll change, but I don't have to worry about that yet.

There's a huge amount of denial, which is not necessarily conscious. Maybe in another talk I'll explore how denial fascinates me as a power of mind. It's amazing. But I won't go too much into it other than denial of impermanence, which is big enough in itself.

The big picture—in some cultures it's not as hidden as it is here. Life and death, the change of seasons, tides coming and going—we're pretty clear that these things happen, that these changes happen. But still, when it actually happens to us or someone we're close to, there's this response: "Wait, wait, this isn't supposed to happen." There's a kind of denial, at least in the culture I grew up in, a way that these big changes aren't included as a natural part of life.

When I was in Burma this January, helping to teach a three-week retreat in Sagaing, near Mandalay, we stayed at the Chanmyay Monastery, a beautiful spot right above the Irrawaddy River. One day, the other teachers and managers—five or six of us—were taking a walk along the river. Just down from the monastery, about a five-minute walk, there was a whole bunch of people gathered, maybe a hundred people, up on the wall looking down at the river, going down into the river. There were some nuns from the neighboring nunnery that we're friends with, and they came running toward us.

We went up and asked them what was going on. One of our friends is the translator, so he speaks fluent Burmese. They explained that four or five young novice monks had been playing down in the river. A lot of young boys, from age eight or nine up to their early teens, become novice monks and live in monasteries. For some of them, it's the only way they get to go to school. So there are a lot of them, and they're always playing.

Several of them had been playing down in the river, and one of them—who it turned out had only come to this town from far away a week ago, so he wasn't used to the river—had gone under and hadn't come back up. It had been quite a while, like an hour, and they were all looking for him.

While we waited there, a small little nun named Yeti came running over. She's about six years old now, and they wear pink robes in Burma. She's so cute—she's the cutest nun in the world. We've known her for a few years, so she recognized us. She was there with some of the nuns who had gathered.

They found the boy, brought him up, and took him across the road to a big sala—a large open-air pavilion. It had been an hour; pretty clearly he was dead. They tried to revive him but couldn't. Then they brought a bed, laid him on this really nice wooden frame, brought down clean cloth to lay him on, put him in clean robes, and covered him. And monks sat there with him, chanting.

It was this very natural part of life. Yes, it was sad. People were upset. The little nun Yeti was upset—she knew him. And then some of the elder nuns came and got her and talked to her, and she was there too, chanting. His family lived about 24 hours away, so someone was going to stay there with him all night. Different people stayed and took turns through the night.

They also noticed that the other young boys who had been playing with him had, of course, gotten scared and run away. So they worried about them and went off looking for them because they knew they'd also be upset.

There was just this sense of—it was as sad as it would be for anybody. It was really sad, but it was included as part of life.

I thought about how here, if we pulled a young boy out of the water after an hour and he was clearly dead, we would still have to call 911, and there would be sirens and flashing lights and police, and they'd whisk him off. Don't let the little kids see. Such a different feeling. Whereas actually, the way that everyone stayed there for the 24 hours, taking turns and chanting, was really beautiful. It was really beautiful—the care and just the naturalness of it.

One of our friends we were with said, "You know, I'm 47 years old. I've never seen a dead person." And for some people in our culture, that's the truth. I was struck by the difference, by the way death and change could be more integrated into life. It hasn't been integrated so much in my own life.

So that's kind of the big picture. And there are, of course, finer and finer and finer pictures of the immediacy of change, and I'll talk about that too.

In my mind—I'm sure you can think of more—but two different supports for our denial system come to mind that I want to speak about tonight.

One is, especially with big-picture change like this, a kind of instinctive fear or resistance, a pulling back from sadness. The loss and death and change of things we love brings about sadness, grief, or a sense that something's wrong.

Basically, it comes back to the first noble truth that we've talked about. When things happen that we don't like, our instinctive sense is: this is wrong, how can I fix it? And if I get enlightened, then nothing wrong is ever going to happen anymore. There's this kind of shrinking back, a way of not quite even consciously recognizing—somehow it's a way of just not quite opening wholly to the fact of constant change.

Or if we feel sorrow or sadness, it's as if there's something wrong with us.

And yes, from reading the Buddha, from how he talks, if you were completely, 100% knowing the truth of impermanence, the mind wouldn't cling. There wouldn't be that sadness. But still, we don't have to judge or hate or fear the sadness. That's also simply a part of life.

In the suttas, in the stories of the Buddha, there's one place with Ananda, who is so lovable—if you could use that word for a monk who was the attendant of the Buddha for 25 years and quite austere. But he comes across as very human, very kind. In a lot of the suttas, he's the person that we can project onto: "Oh, I could imagine being like that." It kind of humanizes the suttas a little bit for me.

So Ananda, who's been with the Buddha for 25 years as his devoted attendant—when the Buddha basically announces that he's going to die within three months, he and Ananda get involved in a discussion about what to do with the funeral and such. And then Ananda kind of disappears. "He went into his lodging and stood lamenting, leaning on the doorpost: 'Alas, I am still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away who is so compassionate to me.'" He's basically leaning in the door crying: "My teacher's leaving, what am I going to do?"

And the Buddha, of course, with his all-knowing mind, inquired of the monks, "Where's Ananda?" Of course, he knew. And so they told him, and he said, "Please tell him to come here." Then it says, "Friend Ananda, the Buddha summons you."

So Ananda comes, and the Buddha says, "Enough, Ananda. Do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other? So how could it be, Ananda—since whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away?"

This is Ananda, who's been listening to the Buddha for 25 years and remembers every single one of his sermons by heart. So take heart. It just goes so deep: "You can't leave me. What am I going to do?" It's just part of our human nature. We don't need to flinch away from that sadness sometimes, that poignancy. We can open to it, and then it allows us also to see the truth.

So the nature of insight, the perception of impermanence—actually all insight really—it's not that with insight into impermanence, things change. It's not that things don't change until you have the perception of impermanence and then things start to change. It's already like that. It's like that right now. Everything—there's not that little bit of dirt under the fingernail that's exempt. It's already like that.

It's not like if you start perceiving impermanence, everything's going to descend into chaos and you're not going to be able to function. It's already like that. It's so interesting that we kind of know, but it's too scary: "I don't want to know that. It's going to wreck everything." Actually... I mean, we're getting through life, but how well are we really functioning with our trying to hold on to things and imagining that stuff's permanent when it really isn't?

So the shift in perception that happens—that's the insight, whether it's into impermanence or non-self or whatever—is just seeing things in a different way. It doesn't change how things are. It's just like when you have a problem and you're trying to figure it out, and suddenly from left field something hits you: "Oh, I could look at it that way." That's what it's like. Just a shift in perception. The actuality doesn't change. How we understand changes, and thus how we relate to experience, to ourselves, to life—that's what changes dramatically.

That's what affects liberation of mind and heart: the way we relate to experience. We're spending all our time trying to get different experience, but we're still relating to it in the same way. We're just spinning in the same circle. If you're spending your time trying to get to that one big blowout—peaceful or concentrated or empty or whatever you're looking for—experience, and somewhere in an unspoken way back there is the belief (we're pretending we don't have it, but we really do) that "I'm going to get here and it's going to stay, it's always going to be like this," then we're just functioning in the same old way. We've just changed objects.

We're holding the possibility of permanence in that way. So looking at how we relate—that's what changes with our understanding.

Let's examine the perception of impermanence and the perception of permanence. Perception is really an interesting thing to explore. I find it fascinating. The Buddha spoke about inverted perceptions, distorted perceptions—vipallāsa. It's like we see things upside down or backwards.

In terms of anicca, he says we tend to see the permanent in what is impermanent. That's the inverted or distorted perception. We look at our whole life and think, well, we might give lip service to "it's going to end," but the way we're really relating is: I'm here now, I'm going to be here tomorrow, I have my day book for what I'm going to be doing. In fact, I've been working on the summer of 2008 this afternoon, writing it down and assuming it's going to happen. Perception of permanence.

And the Buddha says the saññā, the inverted perception—and it can be just that quick perception of permanence or anything else—that perception leads to citta, to thought. So if we perceive permanence, we tend to think in that way. And then the way we think leads to diṭṭhi, to view. If we're having the perception of permanence, then we'll think about the experience as if it's permanent. And then the thoughts kind of harden into a view, like a belief we hold, which may not even be that clear in our mind. This is how things are. And that can be really broad—it can be in politics, it can be your idea about your personality—and it can be very subtle, like views of impermanence.

Our mind tends to interpret our perceptions and thoughts according to what's familiar, and then we use those thoughts to describe ourselves and the world, and then we believe that description. What's so interesting about perception is that our mind will tend to just look for the familiar, for what it already knows. It doesn't really tend to like opening into the unknown every moment. Often, if there's not a ready recognition of what's going on, the mind just fills it in with what it knows. So our perception is quite often inaccurate.

It's fun to watch this on retreat. When I was sitting in Burma recently, most of the people there were from many other countries. And it's a place where it's not dead silent, so there's a lot of talking. I'd be sitting in my room or walking outside, and I'd hear a whole conversation going on. It could be in the most likely languages—Korean, Vietnamese, Burmese, or Chinese—of which I understand not a word of any of them. And people would be going on, just talking, and all of a sudden I would hear a total sentence or phrase of perfect English in the middle of this conversation. Really a very complex phrase, and this happened over and over and over. I'd think, "Oh, it must be a couple of English speakers walking out there." I'd go look, and it wasn't. It was two Vietnamese nuns who didn't know any English. And then I'd realize they hadn't said anything in English at all. They'd said just some phrases and my perception turned it into what my mind was familiar with—some English phrase like, "Well, let's go down to the meditation hall now." All kinds of confabulation. This happened over and over. And it's not like I really heard that. I would swear that's exactly what I heard. We do this all the time. It's fascinating to see.

Have you ever had a time—this happens to me a lot—I'll be sitting in the dining room here, and by now, almost without even really looking, you kind of have a sense of who everybody is. Just have a sense of their energy as they walk past, or their feet, or their clothes, or you've run into them here or there. And if your mind is like mine, you have some little judgment going. You might not have a name for everybody, but you have some little judgment. It's just what our mind does.

So I'll be sitting there with my eyes closed, and someone comes and sits down near me, and I just know it's such and such a person. My whole story—whatever my story is, good, bad, indifferent—starts with that person. I have the reactions that go with that story. I have the self-judgment that goes with having those reactions to this poor person just living their life. And then I open my eyes. The person I thought it was is walking in at the other door. This person near me is completely different, had nothing to do with everything I'd been thinking. And I would have sworn I knew it was that person.

So just play with this possibility. The perception leads to thought, leads to view. I know it's that person, and I know my judgments about that person are accurate. I know what they did, and that's what they were feeling, and that's what they meant by it, and this is what they should have done. We believe all of that. All of us, all hundred of us, are running around making up stories like that and believing it all, from every perception.

So in terms of anicca, one of the reasons I heard the Dalai Lama giving a talk once, and he was talking about perception of impermanence. He said it's hard enough to see impermanence—to really see that things begin and things end. Even that's hard enough for us. But we think once we see that—oh, this arises, it lasts a while, it goes away—that's impermanence.

But this is the trick about perception: that it lasts for a while in the middle. No, there's no lasting for a while without changing. There's not even this much of anything that's stable, that's permanent, that's unchanging, that lasts for a while. Nothing's lasting without changing from second to second. Now that's a level of perception of impermanence that can really start to shake up our worldview.

And the idea of it isn't the same as perception of it. I'm saying it now, but it doesn't really make any difference, does it? You think whatever you think about what I'm saying, and I'm saying it. But right now, my perception isn't really in that moment-to-moment level. It's not that it has to be all the time, though. But perceiving that subtlety, that radical nature of change—which is something that can happen at times on a meditation retreat, it can happen off of meditation retreat—it's not that we stay in this moment-to-moment where you don't know what's going on, how are you going to function in the world if you can't recognize who you are from moment to moment. It's not like that.

But the perception of that radical nature of change really shifts something in how we relate to ourselves in the world, because we understand ourselves and the world differently. And when we really understand the radicalness of change, the clinging—the holding on to experience, to objects, to people, to ideas for security, for self-fulfillment, for self-confirmation—when we really are getting it, that amount of change, the holding on... it's not that we have to say "stop." It just doesn't make any sense. Like trying to hold on to sand draining through. It doesn't make sense, so we stop trying.

And instead of that being some horrible thing, it's like: oh, wow, what a lot of energy was going into trying to hold together this view of solidity, when it wasn't necessary to do that at all. So freeing. Oh, it's like this. I know, that's easy to say.

But what we can explore in retreat is the ways that we uphold and support our inverted perception. We can notice when we're perceiving permanence, when we're assuming permanence, and then that can begin to shift. That requires a willingness to see—like what I was describing about the language—how the tendency of mind, of perception, is to look for what it already knows.

Have you noticed that in your practice? You have a new experience—oh, emptiness! It's like this. A new view has been formed, perception of emptiness, thoughts about it: it's like this. And then that's our idea of what we need to strive for. All freshness, all openness to the unknown in that moment is gone, because now we know what emptiness or samadhi or mindfulness or clear comprehension or choiceless awareness or whatever the heck feels like, looks like, is like. And the impermanence, the fact of constant shifting, changing conditions—we're not seeing that. We're assuming permanence.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said: "As long as you're interested in your present way of living, as long as you're holding on to it, you won't abandon it. Discovery cannot come as long as you cling to the familiar. When you have all sorts of ideas about yourself, you know yourself through the mist of these ideas. To know yourself as you are, give up all ideas. You cannot imagine the taste of pure water. You can only discover it by abandoning all flavorings."

So that's what we're doing—exploring the flavorings in our mind and heart. Just seeing them, seeing them. And when we stop feeding them by holding on to them, they're abandoned. We don't have to abandon them. They just naturally drop away. And we can begin to discover things in a different way.

The Buddha said over and over—it's one of the refrains in many, many of his suttas—when he's talking to someone, he would say: feelings change, form changes, the whole litany I gave before. And people would say, yes, it's impermanent. And he would then say: Is what is impermanent satisfying? Can that be seen as self? And they'd always say no.

He's basically saying whatever is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying. Whatever is impermanent cannot be seen or held to as me or mine. He says that over and over. And in the suttas, when he says that, everyone agrees—yes, that's right.

Well, I just pose it as a question. I've put this to myself many times: Do I even believe that? Really? Not on an intellectual level, because at this point—I mean, that's a start, because the intellectual understanding helps us look. But at the level of how we're actually relating to experience: whatever is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying, not worth clinging to as me or mine. Do we, never mind if we really know that—do we even believe that?

Just look and see if it ever happens in your experience that something you really like goes away, it's really gone, and you cling to it, wanting it to come back. Does that ever happen? Because we're still not getting it, you know? Just look and see. It's not that we're bad or stupid. It's not about judgment—just about seeing: where's the suffering in that scenario? Is there suffering in that scenario?

First of all, if you don't think there's suffering, if you like doing that, there's certainly no motivation to look more carefully. If we don't look carefully, we think the suffering is that the thing went away, and if we can get it back, we'll be okay. If we think that's the suffering, then we're motivated to keep clinging, to keep trying to get the thing back.

If we really have the perception over and over—oh, whatever arises in my experience is going to go away, probably sooner rather than later, no exception whatsoever—does that actually bring us... I mean, that's often a fearful thought when it first comes up, a fearful experience. But really, deeply seen, does that perception bring fear and sorrow? Or does it bring a real freedom? An ease, an ability to be really here now, open to whatever might arise next—the real possibility of living a life that's so vibrant, so appreciative, so present.

The Buddha said, "The search for a resting place is burning, burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." Not to need a resting place—it is cool and peaceful.

Ajahn Chah said in one of his books, speaking about worldly knowledge and accomplishments: "Whatever worldly knowledge and accomplishments you have still leave you in this realm of suffering. Whatever happiness there may be—and there is happiness, sure—it comes about in dependence on external things. It's not the happiness of freedom, the happiness that does not depend on anything. What is it we depend on? We depend on possessions, on pleasure, on reputation, on praise, on wealth. We lean on all these things like leaning on a rotting old tree trunk. After we lean for too long, it breaks and falls, and we fall with it. Such is worldly happiness."

I just love that image somehow—breaks and falls, and we fall with it. He's talking about external things. But here in our meditative experience, we can have that same kind of trying to hold, trying to find a resting place with internal experiences, with beautiful meditative states. There can be that same habit of leaning on. Maybe it doesn't feel like a rotting old tree trunk—it feels like an incredibly beautiful, flowering, blissful, golden tree. We're still leaning on it. And it can still fall.

There's another sutta—I'm into the suttas tonight—where again, even a very accomplished, awakened monk still got caught in this clinging, in this not really seeing how things change. I find this inspiring, actually, that it still happens with these monks, because it says: okay, we expect so much so soon. It's so easy not to have patience for appreciating the depth and subtlety of our habits of mind, of our habit of perceiving permanence, of assuming permanence. That's a really deeply ingrained habit. So have a little compassion for ourselves, some patience.

Anyway, this is a monk named Assaji, and he was very sick.

In fact, he was about to die, and he wanted to see the Buddha. The Buddha came to see him and asked, "Well, are you getting better? Are you bearing up?" And the monk said, "No, I'm not getting better." He was basically dying.

The Buddha said, "Well, I hope you're not troubled by any remorse or regret." And the monk replied, "Actually, I have a lot of remorse and regret." The Buddha said, "Well, I hope it's not in regard to any of your actions or virtue. I hope you haven't done something horrible." The monk said, "No, no remorse about my actions, about my virtue."

The Buddha then asked, "Well, if you have nothing to reproach yourself with, why are you troubled by remorse and regret?"

And Asaji said—I'll paraphrase—"Formerly, Venerable Sir, when I was really ill, I could keep on tranquilizing." He could attain deep concentration even when ill, tranquilize the body formations, tranquilize the mind. And now he couldn't do that. Before, even when he was sick, he could reach this deep concentration. Now he couldn't, and he was filled with regret, remorse, with fear. "Let me not fall away. I cannot obtain concentration. Let me not fall away." Basically, "Let me not lose the Dhamma." He was really scared about this.

The Buddha responded, first saying, "Asaji, to regard concentration as the essence of the ascetic life is not accurate. That is not what I'm teaching as the essence of our holy life. It's about insight. It's about freedom."

Then he asked, "What do you think, Asaji? Is form permanent or impermanent? Is consciousness permanent or impermanent?" Basically he was saying, "Look, the conditions have changed. Your consciousness is impermanent, your body is impermanent, feelings are impermanent. Yes, the conditions are different and now you can't obtain concentration. So what? That's not what freedom is about."

And this was when Asaji became an arahant, just before he died. It always happens like that. So maybe if we're lucky, we'll have a Buddha come to us at the end... But again, this just shows that even with someone who was a very sincere, well-practiced monk, fear can come up. "Oh my God, I've lost this state. What am I going to do?" Equating that state with the Dhamma. Equating it with freedom.

You get the sense that "everything changes" is so radical that there's nothing—nothing—to hold on to. Not even that really beautiful state of emptiness, not even that free-flowing choiceless awareness, not even the way I feel when I'm really understanding impermanence. That's going to go away too, you know?

Can we really get it that not needing a resting place is cool and peaceful? Don't try to hold on to that understanding. Just let it go through. Let it go through. It's in the not holding on that the ease and freedom is discernible. There's not a "me" there to appreciate it. That's the thing.

So the Buddha says, cultivate and develop the perception of anicca. I just want to offer a couple of hints here. My mind goes in two directions when I give hints like this, because they're just meant for those times when it's appropriate, when this is what's coming up in your experience. Maybe the hint will just help us to notice. But sometimes impermanence isn't the thing that's showing up. So if you all go out of here thinking,

"Now, by golly, I'm going to see the beginnings and endings of everything"—please don't do that. You'll be twisted in no time. It's just like when we talk about vedanā or intentions; sometimes that's not the obvious thing.

So these hints are like something to put back there in the intelligence, in the attitude that we bring to our mindfulness practice. But in a moment of mindfulness, we let go of all referencing and just completely open with full attention into the actuality of the experience. Don't try to put an overlay of impermanence or an overlay of anattā or an overlay of anything, because that's just thinking. Does that make sense?

So, to the hints. Mindfulness versus confusing our concepts for mindfulness. Just the simplicity of attention that simply meets what's happening, just as it is. A simple sensation—burning—versus "the pain in my back that's been here since the beginning of the retreat." You see how we do that? "It's forty more minutes in this sitting. How am I going to get through this sitting with this pain?" Is that a familiar thought? That's just a thought. That doesn't have to be assuming permanence if you see that's just a thought, and that thought is now gone.

But do you see how easy it is for us to take that thought—this pain in my knee or my back and forty more minutes in this sitting—and add it up to a whole lot of dukkha for forty more minutes? That's taking the concept. The reality is: burning, thinking, fear. Just noticing—fear feels like this. Thinking is like this. Burning is like this. "She says it's like this. I can't do that. That's so—" Oh, is like this. There's really no way you can get away from it, because whatever it is, struggle is like this. And each of those is a new experience arising. If we just have that simplicity of mindfulness, we see each one as a new experience as arising. When we're caught in the concept, all of that is bundled up into one big mass of dukkha, which is about "my back hurts and this sitting has forty more minutes to go." And in fact, that was about ten different things coming and going. And that can happen in less than a minute. Incredible change. Incredible impermanence.

One thing that masks anicca, that hides anicca in our time here, is this: as diligent as you all are in really noticing moment to moment—the sitting and the walking and through the day—many of us at least have some moments in the day when we're not totally mindful. Could I fairly say that might be true for some people? Sometimes. Sometimes the gaps are bigger than others.

One of the reasons we encourage continuity—not heavy continuity, but just that willingness to be here, to show up moment after moment—is that the lack of continuity of awareness hides impermanence. We assume so much. Say there's a big emotional knot of loneliness or grief or feeling abandoned, and it comes up and you're really with it, you're feeling it. Then the bell rings for lunch. "Oh, I wonder what's for lunch." And you go to lunch and you're going through all of that and come back to the next sitting. "Oh, here we are again. And this knot—this is really quite my day's work, at least, if not my lifetime. I reckon this is my life. This is the core of who I am."

We're pretty lot assuming permanence. And I've talked to a lot of people in interviews where I'll say, "Did you notice it really wasn't there at lunch?" "Well, I wasn't aware of it because I was eating, but—" You're laughing because you know what I'm going to say, right? "It's there underneath. It just wasn't what I was paying attention to at that time."

And isn't it often a belief you have? This core, like this pile of whatever you have in there—loneliness or greed or trauma or sadness. When we talk about purification, well, every time it comes up maybe a little chip of it's purified away, but there's this big glob of it sitting there and I've got to work it all out. And even when it's not there, we think it's there.

So I would like you to really notice when things are gone. Not "Oh, I'm not aware of it, but I know it's under there."

That's perception of permanence leading to thought of permanence, leading to a view: "I have to work out all this loneliness." Really notice the gone-ness of things—beautiful things, difficult things, neutral things. You may not notice the moment it ends, and that's okay. But what we tend to do is jump into getting involved with the next object or the next experience.

Say you have a train of thought, and finally it ends. Thank God, let's get back to the breath. But just notice for a second the space before the next thought, before the next thing. You don't have to jump to fill it up. Something will come—you don't have to do anything. Something will come quickly. But just notice: that one is over.

This sounds silly, but somehow this was a big insight for me. I was eating on retreat, kind of mindfully chewing, chewing, chewing, and then I swallowed. As I swallowed, I saw what I usually do—I feel the sensations going down my throat, I can really track it, and so that's "the food going down my throat." But this time, I was really chewing, and then I swallowed, and it was in my mouth, and then—it was really gone. I mean, the food was gone. It wasn't there anymore. It was totally gone. And yes, there were sensations here, but that wasn't the food in my mouth. That was just sensations here, and the idea that it was the food was just an idea. You know what I mean? It's really, totally gone.

So notice that. Notice that with your knee pain. When it goes away, we tend to say, "Well, I didn't notice it for that moment, but now it's back." But it was really gone. Just notice. And for this, the simplicity of continuity is what really allows us to see that.

Sometimes with something difficult, we're afraid to look and notice it's gone because we think, you know, kind of that's bad luck—it's going to make it come back. But just notice. Loneliness isn't here. What's here is hunger. I'm not feeling abandoned. What's here is real annoyance at that person who's doing X, Y, and Z across the room.

So just pay attention.

Another way is to notice how changing conditions really change things. Like with Assaji—he was really sick, he was dying, and he expected to have the same concentration he'd had other times. Well, duh! The same thing happens here. Some days the energy's not so good. Some days the weather changes. You'd be amazed—maybe you wouldn't—but how much the weather seems to affect us. When we have nice days and then suddenly it gets really stormy and oppressive, it's really quite amazing how, not everyone, but a significant percentage of yogis that come in are cranky or tired. And we take it all personally. "What's the matter with me?" It's just the weather. We're not really separate from the weather. It changes. We think we can hold on and keep it the same.

So they say notice when things are over. Also notice when something new is beginning.

That's also change. And then you might also notice how we assume permanence, which I've been giving examples of – assuming into 2008, assuming that this pain is going to last the whole sitting, assuming that anything that's happening now is going to be happening in the next sitting. Never mind assuming that you finally got it right and so now your next sitting is going to be like this sitting and it's just going to keep on going like that, right? And then when it isn't like that, you think you did something wrong. That's a complete assumption. Denying cause and effect, denying the fact that all the causes and all the conditions are changing – how can it stay the same all the time? It's actually more amazing when your sittings are similar than when they're different. Just notice, that's all, the assumption of permanence. When we assume we have any clue what's going to happen in the next moment, we're assuming permanence.

It's actually amazing to me that so much of the plans we make actually do happen. That I did two years ago plan that this summer I would be in Switzerland and Holland and here and there – and it really happened. And you send someone an email and they meet you at the airport at the right time. I mean, that's amazing. And everyone's still alive to do it. The plane kind of went on time. They didn't change their schedule and that airline still exists. There are just so many different conditions that could change. It's amazing. So that's part of what lulls us into thinking things don't change.

Why would we want to cultivate this perception of radical, constant change? That there's nowhere to rest? That the search for a resting place is burning? I mean, that could be a valid question. Why do I want to look at life this way? Obviously I would say because the other way doesn't really work, but you have to see if that's true for you. Why would we want to perceive this radical instability in ourselves, in others, in our emotions, in our thoughts, in our bodies, in conditions, in life?

The Buddha said, "The supreme state of sublime peace, which has been discovered by him, by the Tathagata, namely liberation through non-clinging." The supreme state of sublime peace – resting at ease in whatever arises. So we're not looking for a resting place, but each moment, each arising experience is the resting place because we don't need to look for something other or something to stay.

This sense of opening to the perception of impermanence – my experience in the times that I'm really in tune with it, when that clinging isn't happening so strongly in the mind and the heart, it opens our heart, our mind, our consciousness, just opens it to a kind of vitality of presence here and now. This looking to something to confirm ourselves, to give us a steadiness, to feel safe – it constricts the mind, it constricts the heart, it limits us. It's what breeds fear. It's what breeds needing to know, needing to control.

One or two of you have mentioned a little bit of a struggle with wanting to control everything. It's dukkha. It doesn't work. I mean, we were never in control. See, that's the thing. You're so afraid of losing control – you don't have any control. None of us has control. Why are we beating ourselves up at the thought of losing it? This is one of the mysteries, the paradoxes to me of the spiritual life.

But the supreme state of sublime peace – just that letting go, even for a moment, of needing to restrict ourselves to the known, of clinging to something for security, of needing something to stay the same to feel comfortable. And I'm a big comfort wallah, you know. I like to be comfortable. Our idea of constant change isn't comfort. But resting at ease in whatever arises allows us to meet whatever's happening now with a fullness of presence, a vitality, a tenderness, an appreciation that is so different from this kind of: Is this going to mess up the boat? Is this going to... I've got everything carefully arranged.

Is this going to mess it up? What's happening now?

A kind of flexibility becomes possible in our response to others, in our response to life, because we're really able to not drag the past with us, but to be here for whatever moment is arising now. This is not only in meditation, but in regular life.

I read a biography of Issan Dorsey. He was a Zen master in San Francisco in the eighties. He started a zendo, I think it was in the Castro district, really at the height of the AIDS epidemic in the late eighties when in that area of San Francisco so many gay men were dying. He was a gay man too, who had AIDS. And he started a zendo there with no big plans, but just being very responsive to how things happened as they happened. And so it ended up that their zendo turned into a hospice.

But he says here that it wasn't any plan that they had. He says, "We dealt with whatever came to the door. We started the hospice because death came to the door." You can deal with a complex, changing situation because you don't have to control it. You don't have to force it into an ideal pattern. You can actually allow it to be whatever it is and allow yourself to adapt to what it becomes. Because this is the way we proceed—we respond to the immediacy of the situation—and therefore we end up being very practical.

You get a sense of that. It can be in a more complex situation like that, a zendo turning into a hospice, just because of that presence, that immediacy with what's showing up right now that allows for the ceaseless responsiveness. The way the Tibetans talk about manifestation of the emptiness of heart and mind—ceaselessly responsive—because we're not holding to some preconceived notion. That can be in a complex situation like starting a hospice. That can simply be in the way you meet the next moment of your experience in the sitting, in the walking, as you go outside.

It's a kind of opening into the unknown that really frees our heart and mind from fear, from clinging. It's not that we have to uproot clinging, but clinging just doesn't make sense when we're really perceiving this fact of constant change, how much things shift. Clinging just keeps us from being totally present here and now.

And that sense of appreciation, of surrender into the immediacy of life—it's so poignant, lovely, peaceful, whatever it is for you. You all know those moments when there's just no reference to past or future. There's just no reference to how it should be or what does this mean about me. There's just that simplicity of total presence without clinging, resting at ease in whatever arises. And it doesn't really matter what it is that arises in that moment. Resting at ease, and then it's gone, and resting at ease in the next moment.

That's really the gift of the perception of anicca, the perception of impermanence. So far from being a fearful, destructive perception, it opens our minds, our hearts, our lives to so much more sensitivity and so much more appreciation than is otherwise possible.

I'll just end with this one line from Nisargadatta Maharaj. He says, "Be quiet, free from the obsession with 'what next.' In the silence, something may be heard which is ordinarily too fine and subtle for perception."

So just be quiet, free from the obsession with what next.

CHAPTER 364

Opening Talk

Carol Wilson · 1h11

> This opening talk for a nine-day silent retreat at IMS introduces the central metaphor of the practice: just as spring thaws frozen lakes, mindful awareness melts the stuck, congealed places in our hearts and minds. Guy Armstrong shares how we often become frozen in habitual states—dissatisfaction, worry, fixed self-images, or rigid stances toward life—that prevent us from flowing with changing conditions. The path to freedom lies not in avoiding these difficult places but in meeting them with interested, friendly attention.
>
> The teachers emphasize three essential qualities for practice: relax, observe, and allow. When we bring spacious awareness to our experience without judgment, understanding naturally arises, and what seemed like obstacles become doorways to greater peace and compassion. The talk highlights how children naturally flow through emotions while adults often get stuck, and how meditation helps us recover this capacity for fluid responsiveness to life.
>
> Carol Wilson then guides the traditional opening of retreat, explaining the Three Refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) as symbols of awakening potential, and the Five Precepts as training rules that create a container of safety and non-harming. The refuges point to our capacity for awakening, trust in truth, and the support of practicing in community. The evening concludes with Rodney Smith leading a brief meditation on the crosshairs where mind meets body, establishing the foundation of embodied presence for the days ahead.

Good evening, and I'd like to welcome you all to IMS.

My name is Guy Armstrong, and I want to introduce the other people who will be on the teaching team this week. Just to my left is Carol Wilson. Carol lives here in Barre, so she's been here for the snowstorms and knows what you all have been through if you're local. And to her left is Rodney Smith. Rodney lives in Seattle and he knows what the rain is like—he's had some weather experience too.

I'll just say that it's really a pleasure for us to be here. We're old friends going back about thirty years together. We worked on staff here in the late seventies; that's where we first knew each other. So it's a lot of fun. This is the one time a year when we get together and get to reconnect, so we're happy to be here.

On my right is Maddie Klein, and we're also really pleased to have Maddie with us. Maddie is the Executive Director of Cambridge Insight Meditation Center, which is a very thriving and busy urban center in Cambridge, just outside of Boston. Maddie's come off a full work week and is joining us here for a little over half of our retreat. She's currently in teacher training in a program that's jointly run between IMS—with Joseph, Carol, and myself—and Spirit Rock with Jack Kornfield. So she's going through about a four-year program to become a retreat teacher. She's very well practiced, has done quite a bit of teaching already, and she'll be assisting us during this week together. We're really happy to have her support.

I flew in yesterday from California, and I love to get a window seat when I'm on these long flights because you watch the whole country sort of unfold outside the window. It's amazing to think back on what the first settlers had to go through in order to cross this continent—traveling by train, and when that ran out, getting in wagon carts. If you know California, you probably know the Donner Party, where they broke down in the snows and ended up eating the people who had not made it in order to survive. Compared to those journeys, cross-country flights are kind of a lark. You do the whole thing in five and a half hours now, and nobody gets eaten along the way.

But still, we adjust our expectations to modern travel conditions. Because I tend to fly a lot in teaching, I accumulate miles, and then they occasionally give you these things called free upgrade certificates—which, it turns out, you never get to use because somebody else has gotten in ahead of you with more miles or whatever. Yesterday I'd applied for a free upgrade from economy to first class. I had a bunch of certificates expiring March thirty-first, so I thought I would try to use them. I went through check-in and found out there was only one seat available and eighteen people ahead of me. So I wasn't able to use it, and I was stuck in economy.

I got on the plane and immediately started talking with the guy sitting on the aisle in my row, complaining about how I can never get to use these free upgrades they give us. I imagine a lot of other people are in that situation. I was starting to get into a little bit of complaining mind. And he just said, "You know, I don't mind this economy section. I've got enough leg room, it's not such a long flight, and it's not too bad."

All of a sudden, my complaining mind just went poof. That's really true—it's not so bad here. It was just a kind of indicator of how somebody who's in an accepting or contented place can shift our minds. That accepting or contented viewpoint is in all of us, but sometimes it just needs a little reminder, as this fellow reminded me yesterday.

So I settled in and really enjoyed the flight across. We crossed the Sierra, snowy, and I looked down into Yosemite as we flew through. The center of the country was quite cloudy, and then we burst into the open over the Great Lakes. Coming over Massachusetts, we flew right over the Quabbin Reservoir, which is a big source of drinking water for the eastern part of the state. It's due west of here—if you go out at sunset and look toward the setting sun, you're looking in the direction of the Quabbin.

It's a big reservoir, and flying above it, I could see that there was still a lot of ice on the surface, this kind of bluey-white color filling it up. Then all around the outside, near the land, was darker brown, and you could see that the ice was starting to melt. Across the rest of Massachusetts, little ponds and lakes showed the same thing. In fact, if you look at our little ponds around here, you'll also see that combination of ice and melt. I started to realize that this is really the first sign of spring coming to Massachusetts. So it's just a great pleasure to be here with springtime starting to unfold in this climate.

It reminded me that this metaphor of the frozen part and the melted part is an old metaphor for our minds. There are places in our minds that are stuck and frozen up, solidified or congealed, where things don't flow so easily. And then there are other parts—and this expands over the course of springtime—where the ice has receded. Then the currents in the lake or pond flow quite naturally, and the water can come in at one end and flow out at the other.

And that spring is really the period where that ice gets converted into flowing water, where the stuck places open up and it returns to its natural state, you might say, of change or flow.

This has taught me that it's actually a very good metaphor for the work we do on retreat—that we encounter both the flowing parts of ourselves. You'll experience, I think, great periods of peace and, I hope, contentment during this time. But we also experience these pockets where the mind just gets stuck. We go into some area of our being that is contracted, tight, frozen, congealed, where we don't flow so easily.

We can get stuck in a number of different ways in our lives—our busy, complicated lives that are always a mix of pleasant things happening to us and difficult things happening. Sometimes we start to notice that we get stuck in habitual states of mind or habitual ways of feeling. We may notice that very often in our life there's a feeling of dissatisfaction, or maybe loneliness, or worry and anxiety, or some kind of longing that just seems to be very present for us, a frequent companion.

Sometimes we get frozen in the way we think about ourselves. We hold a certain image of ourselves—maybe we're a happy person, maybe we think of ourselves as an unhappy person. Either way, it's a kind of frozenness that doesn't let us really flow with the changing conditions of life.

I've talked to some people about the teachings in this tradition. The meditation we'll be sharing with you comes out of the Buddhist tradition, where there's a lot of emphasis on looking at the qualities of happiness and unhappiness in our lives. The Buddha talked a great deal about this feature of unhappiness as a common experience that all people share. And sometimes the person will say, "I'm not unhappy." I'll ask, "Well, aren't there any things in your life that are difficult?" "Oh, no, not really. I'm really a happy person." I usually don't go much further unless I'm in a teaching role with them, because it tends to be a difficult conversation from there. But people who have the notion that they are happy people tend to gloss over or deny or turn away from the difficult times in life. And if we have the idea that we're not a happy person, then we miss a lot of moments where there may actually be quite a bit of peace, contentment, or joy in our lives.

In a way, I think one of the ways we get frozen, one of the ways the mind gets stuck, is that we just see what we expect to see.

There was this funny experiment, you may have heard of it, conducted by John Kabat-Zinn. John founded the institute at UMass Hospital in Worcester called Mindfulness-Based Stress Reduction, an application of meditation principles in a non-sectarian way that has really helped a lot of people deal especially with physical pain. As part of the training, he does this experiment where he invites people to watch a video of a basketball game. He says, "Pay really close attention to what's going on on the court." So people sit down in front of the video, noticing five players on each side, the ball getting passed back and forth very quickly. They're following it in a lot of detail, quite engaged.

At the end of the video, he asks them, "Did you notice anything unusual?" About half the people say yes, and half say no. When he asks what they saw that was unusual, the people who said yes report, "Well, about halfway through the video, somebody came out on the court dressed in a gorilla suit, stood in the middle of the court, beat their fists against their chest, and then walked off." And the people who didn't notice anything say, "What? That couldn't have happened. I was watching the whole video. I never saw any gorilla." Then he plays the video again and stops it when it gets to the gorilla, and people realize there was a gorilla on the court that they didn't even see.

Our minds work like that too. If we aren't expecting to see something, it's easy to overlook it. As the thaw starts to come in our hearts and minds, we may not notice the areas that are melting unless we're thinking to look, thinking to see that those are there.

Sometimes our mind gets frozen in a stance toward life. Over many experiences, many incidents, we develop a belief about the world—that the world isn't really capable of satisfying us, that it's intrinsically frustrating, that it doesn't work very well, that the political systems are broken and it's impossible to find happiness. This stance we've adopted reveals itself in our interactions. Maybe they have a built-in sense of irritation or an expectation of disappointment. We've gotten frozen in an attitude, a belief, a view about the world.

So often, as we begin to experience our lives with some care and attention, we find these stuck places generated out of old habits of mind—ties to the past that keep us from being really fresh and alive in each new moment.

As a way to contrast our stuck state, I like to think about children. If you hang out with a child for a while, you can see that they move through so many different moods and emotions so easily. Their minds just flow from happiness and friendship and excitement right into frustration and irritation and pain and sobbing. The child is transparent to all of that. It moves in and moves right through. The whole range is there for them to feel. Children have this way of going with the flow.

I got an email this morning from a friend who said that some trip they'd been planning for a while, they'd recently decided not to take. They said, "I got the feeling that circumstances were changing and I'm going with the flow of the new situation. I'm not going to take that trip"—it was a few months abroad, checking out some monasteries in England.

I think that my time for now will be spent in lay life here.

Life is always changing, sort of under our feet. And the question always is, can we go with its flow? Can we open ourselves up to the new way that life is presenting itself in this moment? Or is one of these stuck attitudes blocking our ability to be with it the way it changes?

Sometimes after a beautiful day like today—and maybe it will continue, I don't know, I haven't looked at a weather report—but sometimes when the rain comes back, because it will come back, there can be a resistance to it. "Oh, it shouldn't be raining. The sunshine really should continue." Just like on our cushion, when we've had some peace for a while and then some movement of mind comes back, some stormy conditions, we think that shouldn't be happening. But one Thai teacher put it this way: Do you think the clouds are wrong? Do you think that the storms are wrong when they come? Or can we have a mind that's really fluid enough to move from one to the other and not resist, not be stuck in wanting it one way or another?

In Zen, they have a saying that a wooden Buddha can't go through fire and an iron Buddha can't cross water. So is there within us the Buddha that can go through both fire and water? That can be wood when it needs to be wood and can be iron when it needs to be iron? We have that capability.

One of the things that people most often report after an extended period of meditation is a greater feeling of spaciousness in their life. Someone finished a retreat and was scheduled to visit right afterwards with her family. She had a somewhat challenging relationship with her mother from a long, long time. And she reported back after being at home for the better part of a week: "My relationship with my mother was much easier this time. She did the same things that she's done before in our relationship, but this time it just didn't bother me so much. I had so much more space around my relationship with her." And then her mother could feel that too and softened a little bit in her relationship.

So one of the great things about meditation is that we start to find more space in life—more space in our mind, more space in our heart, more space of ease and relaxation. In a way, this finding of space has a deep meaning in these teachings because our basic situation really is very spacious. When you think about it, we have all this physical space. There are things arising at our sense doors, but they're all surrounded by a deep silence if we start to listen. And as we move into the retreat and move into that habit of silence, that way of being of silence, we start to let that spaciousness hold everything that's happening in us. That spaciousness has a way of allowing all the different changes to come through and move through us, to flow in our experience. And it's really that quality of space touching the frozen parts that does the work of melting or unsticking them.

Now, this space is not just a physical space. It's really the space of paying attention. We could say the space of awareness. It's really the meeting of awareness with the places that have gotten stuck that starts to open them up.

When I was first meditating, the place where I was stuck that came a lot in my meditation practice was an experience of being afraid. I would experience it on the cushion. I'd sometimes experience it off the cushion. One time I was doing a meditation retreat in England in the summertime—very beautiful, soft summer evening. The light was kind of golden, the garden I was in was very lovely with flowers, a flowering tree, a lot of birds chirping. I was doing standing meditation out there and I noticed, "Oh, there's fear in the mind." I felt into it—yeah, there's definitely fear in the mind. I was starting to relate to it, feel it in my body, feel it in the mind. Then I opened my eyes and I just looked out on the gardens and the green grass and the soft light, the flowering tree, the birds, and I thought, "Wow, pretty scary world, isn't it?" And just having the ability to be aware of the fear and be aware of the space in the garden, the beauty in the garden—the meeting of those two just started to calm that fear, started to soothe it and release it.

So in our meditation practice, when we come upon these places that seem stuck or frozen—an old emotional pattern, an old way of looking at things—we want to let awareness start to relate to it. Our first inclination may be, "Oh, move away quickly. I didn't come to England to be afraid." But in fact, that's what's true in this moment. So rather than trying to move away from the stuck place, we need to move into it. Because the moving away is what keeps it stuck. The moving into with this awareness is where it can open up and start to melt.

As we pay attention to these places, we find that we can learn about them. And this is one of the most exciting discoveries in all of meditation: we can learn about the way our minds and hearts work. As we start to understand them, these stuck places don't feel like they shut us down. We feel that we have the ability to hold them, know them. When we understand them, we're not controlled by them. It's really this understanding that brings the kind of space that lets us feel a new freedom in relation to them.

I wanted to mention this word freedom tonight because it's in the course title. I don't know if you noticed it. Some people just sign up for a retreat based on the dates that are available and don't care what the course is about or the teachers or anything.

But this course happens to be titled Freedom Here and Now. We called it this because we enjoy talking about this topic, and the three of us in our conversations noticed that we've been speaking about freedom more and more lately. So we thought we'd call it Freedom Here and Now, hoping that might appeal to more people than just "Insight Meditation," which we'll also be teaching this retreat. We wanted to put a special emphasis on the quality of freedom.

In fact, the numbers for the retreat went down this year. So next year, I think we'll call it Bondage or something like that.

The other curious thing we noticed in the registration numbers is that usually at our retreats there are more women than men, and at this retreat there are more men than women. So maybe something about the language had something to do with that too. I don't know. I'm curious. This is the first time we tried it. We probably won't try it again.

During the week, we want to talk about how freedom grows. One of the main places freedom grows is when we open up to these difficult areas in the mind or in the body. We give them a degree of attention that we often haven't before. We become interested. We want to learn about them. And through learning about them, they open up.

Then there's one more really important ingredient in this mixture. There's awareness, there's interest, there's understanding. And the final ingredient that's really important is a quality of friendliness. When we can bring friendliness into our looking—not a cold, scientific, detached observation, as if we've got a microscope and we're going to pin this insect to white paper—but rather a warm, living connection with what we observe, because all these experiences are part of life, part of our human life. Then that friendliness starts to make itself felt in our relationship to them.

You know how if you're consistently friendly to somebody, they can't hold a grudge against you. They can't wish you badly. They want you to be well. They want you to do well. When we're consistently friendly to these stuck places in our hearts and minds, they also get friendly back. They kind of want us to do well. And they're not felt as enemies or obstructions any longer.

Sometimes when we encounter these difficult places, it may feel like an obstacle. "I came here to get peaceful. I came here to get happy. I didn't come here to feel anxious or worried." But actually, these seeming obstacles are more like opportunities. Each of us has a certain amount of space in our hearts and minds today, a certain balance that lets us live with our personalities, live with our partners or friends or family, live with our work. But all of us can find greater space in all those relationships—greater space, greater love, greater compassion, greater wisdom. The place we find it from is this opening with friendliness to the places that are stuck in us.

One of the hidden secrets of meditation is that there's not much more we need to do to find that space than to be willing to learn from what's difficult. Just paying attention with that friendly interest in what's difficult is what unfolds it all for us, melts those stuck spaces, turns them into flowing water, turns them into love and compassion and contentment and peace.

When we think of it in this way, we might assume we came here just to get to the peace, but in fact, the way to that peace often is through what looks like an obstacle. These are the very places where the growth happens, where the mind can expand, where the love can unfold more. So the practice becomes this alternation of feeling space and then perhaps encountering something that's not so spacious, that's stuck, and then finding space there, letting this space unfold us. As the space unfolds us, there's a feeling in our lives of greater and greater freedom.

Until, it is said, there are no more obstacles—no more apparent obstacles—but the mind can open effortlessly into every experience that comes. That degree of freedom is possible. The doorway to it is being willing just to feel in our bodies, in our minds, in our hearts, these areas where it feels sticky.

As the instructions go on in the retreat, we'll spend some time collecting the mind. We'll begin with attention to simple bodily experience like breathing, expand it to more of the bodily experience, then start to relate directly with these states of mind and the capacity of thought which often generates them. As we bring more understanding into each of these areas, the whole of our momentary experience starts to open up and be included in the meditation. Although in the beginning we'll focus on the body, ultimately that's to collect our attention so we can understand how we're relating to all of our experience—where the stuck places are, and whether we can bring this soft and interested attention to those, looking at that balance of mind that lets us just be with what is in this flowing and open kind of way.

So, a few tools of the retreat to support this investigation, this exploration. We'll have instructions every morning at the sitting after breakfast that will guide and extend the ways we'll pay attention. I'd encourage everybody to please come to that sitting. At the end of it, we'll have some time for question and answer, so if there's anything in the instructions that isn't clear or any part of your experience you'd like to ask about, there will be time for that every day.

Then the days will unfold in silence, and you can see from the schedule that it's basically an alternation of sitting meditation and walking meditation. In both, we want to bring the same quality of interested, alert, caring attention—just through different postures. As the retreat progresses, we'll expand that to all the other activities in the day.

You will be meeting with us in interviews so that we can talk more personally with you about your experience here. Some may be in groups, but everyone will have at least a couple of one-to-one meetings during the week with one of us. And then every evening there will be a talk, similar to the one tonight, on different aspects of the meditation practice and the kinds of understandings that go with it. Sometimes on the schedule it just says "talk," and some people who are new come in thinking, "Oh, you mean I'm going to get to talk to people then?" Unfortunately, no. We continue to monopolize the conversation—we get to talk more then. So there will be a talk every evening. And then at the last sitting of the day, we'll have a quiet sitting with a little bit of chanting that we'll share together, sometimes a nice way to round off the day and get ready for bed.

I'm really happy to see in this group some old familiar faces. I'd love to welcome people back to IMS. And for those of you I haven't met before, I'm also really happy to see new faces, and I look forward to getting to know you over our week together. This is a journey for us as much as it is for you. There's a wonderful sense of community and connection that grows as we share this quiet together, and I look forward to going on that journey with you. It's a wonderful experience from our side as much as it is from yours. So thank you all for coming. It wouldn't be the same without you.

How many people here have never done an intensive Vipassana meditation retreat? Great, welcome. How many of you have done thirty-five? Some of you may have. Of those who haven't done an intensive Vipassana retreat, is there anyone who hasn't been familiar with this form of meditation at all? Okay, great, welcome.

In terms of what we're doing here together, which Guy explained so well—that we're here really as part of the meditation, the particular structure of sitting, walking, bringing our friendly, non-judgmental attention to whatever's arising in our mind and body through the days—this is somehow not as easy as it might seem, but it is incredibly freeing and revealing. That's the meditation in essence. That's what we're doing, and we've set up the conditions here to really support that particular aspect of the path.

But as we begin tonight, I just want to emphasize that the meditation is a part—as Guy said, it comes from the Buddhist tradition—it's a part of the whole path of opening our hearts and minds to things as they are, of learning to live from a place of understanding and connectedness rather than from neediness, resistance, and fear. But it's a whole path. It's not just about meditation.

We want to start by emphasizing this because once we move into the week, what we're doing here is the meditation. But it starts with how we understand ourselves, how we understand life. That understanding gives rise to how we think about things, to our motivation, to our intentions, to how we speak and act. How we speak, how we act, how we think in our life, how we live our lives, how we meet each moment—this expands into how we live our entire lives.

And so in going into the retreat, it's really extremely helpful as we move into the silence to move into this commitment that hopefully you're each making with yourself: to really be here for this week, to really bring this willingness to meet yourself moment by moment. It's only for yourself. No one is there every moment checking—are you paying attention now? Are you meeting yourself with kindness? Are you beating yourself up? It's up to each of us.

As we enter into this really quite unique space in this crazy world... I know other people who don't do these retreats think this is the crazy space—coming into silence, not talking, sitting and walking like zombies. They think this is really the wacko place on earth. But after you've been to some retreats and had this sense of togetherness, what we call sangha, group togetherness, and the sense of the non-harming space that we create together, the sense of support that arises through practicing like this in silence, the sense of safety—knowing we're not going to be taking things from each other, accosting each other physically or verbally—there's really this support. And the space Guy mentioned, of silence and silent kindness, friendliness, allows each one of us to feel safe enough to open so deeply into ourselves, to just let whatever's arising—beautiful, scary, boring as hell (and that'll be a lot of it)—to come up.

That's really a beautiful space. And from this space, the rest of the world can seem pretty crazy.

I think a lot of what keeps me going in my practice, and what so inspires me in sharing this path with others, is that each of us can then bring back into the world what Guy described with that woman going back to her family, to her mother—a sense of a more harmonious, kinder, more connected way to be. And just by manifesting that, it starts to ripple out.

In terms of beginning the retreat, we like to do what is a bit of a ritual, but it's deeper than ritual—it's really turning our attention inward and acknowledging for each one of us the motivation that brought you here, the intention, the commitment that brought you here. So that we don't just say, "Well, this is the next thing I'm doing on my list. Nine days at IMS, check it off. Breathing in and out, noting, noting, lifting. Okay, that's it, on to the next thing." With the same mindset, the same kind of "doing, what am I getting" mindset. Let's put that down. Let's start by really connecting, each of us, with: Why did I really come here? What is the deep motivation in my heart? Taking a moment, just silently, to acknowledge that for ourselves.

I see it as sort of like entering a doorway where I'll just put down my normal habits of mind. I mean, you don't really put them down, but at least we give the sense that we'll look at them rather than being driven by them. And that we're opening up our way of being, our hearts, our minds, to another possibility.

The way we frame that in the Buddhist tradition is by taking what we call the three refuges: the refuge in Buddha, in Dharma, and in Sangha. I'll say what they are, but I see them all as symbols of the potential for awakening to a greater peace, freedom, and compassion—in ourselves and in the world.

So when we take refuge in the Buddha, the symbol of the Buddha there is just that—a symbol. Buddha was a human being. He's gone, long gone. But he's a symbol of our human capacity to open our hearts and minds, to live from a place of awakened freedom, a place of awakened compassion. We don't just have to go through our lives like robots. The Buddha was a human being; we're human beings. It's the potential for each one of us to experience moments—and longer and longer moments—of freedom, here and now.

Taking refuge in the Buddha is like reminding ourselves, when we come to one of those places of stuckness Guy mentioned, not to just say, "Oh yeah, this is how it's always been and this is how it's always going to be. It's hopeless." Take refuge in my capacity to awaken. That's all—just a little shift of intentionality.

Refuge in the Dharma. Dharma means the truth, just how things are, the laws of nature. It also means the Buddhist teachings. But again, it's like taking refuge in, trusting in, the power of the truth of this moment. For me, taking refuge in the Dharma is like surrendering into the reality of this moment. That's not a giving up. It's a giving up of fighting and pretending things are different than they are. It's a way of waking up in the moment. When we stop fighting—oh, just as this is—I can wake up in this moment. I can trust this is how it is in this moment. Taking refuge in the Dharma. Again, it's a shift from our wanting things different, our fighting. It's like this. So we wake up in this moment with full collected presence. That's the difference.

And the Sangha, in the classic sense in the Buddhist tradition, would be the community of awakened beings. I heard someone describe it recently as the awakened mind stream. And I think that's something we all share at different moments. Any one of us could be manifesting the awakened mind stream. So in the sense of the Sangha, the community of us here practicing together, we take refuge not in our personalities or each other's personalities—please—but we take refuge in the fact that together we're cultivating and manifesting the awakened mind stream. And that's a way that, as I said earlier, we support each other. We feel that support from each other when we're practicing.

Just on a very mundane level, the fact that we're here as a group will many a time be the main thing that keeps you from running out of the hall when you don't like what happened. Many a sitting I've had over many, many years where, if there weren't other people there, I would have been gone. But I kept on sitting and everything changed. And I was so glad I didn't just get up and leave because I was having an unpleasant moment. We're tired, someone else is doing the walking—oh yeah, I can do that too. It's the space of silence, the space of support. It's really a beautiful thing that can grow in the silence.

So we take refuge, and we like to do it as a call and response chant in the Pali language, which is what the first Buddhist texts were written in, just because we like it. And I'll lead that in a moment.

The second aspect of beginning the retreat is that we agree—and we'll do this in English—that we agree together to be here in a way of speech and body action that is non-harming.

Again, that's that space of safety, giving one another what the Buddha called the gift of fearlessness.

This isn't just about making conditions nice for meditation. This sense of agreeing to live while we're here by these five rules of training—they're not lifetime vows. They're rules of training, a way of pointing us back to the deep motivation that drives our speech and action. They really are rules of training, not externally imposed laws that you follow blindly without thinking. The point is to have us wake up to why we're doing and saying what we're doing and saying, and perhaps to exercise restraint before we do and say something harmful—not only so as not to hurt others, but not to hurt ourselves.

It's deeply based in the fact that real happiness and freedom is accessible when we are moved by motivations of kindness, of compassion, of non-harming. If we're lost in vindictiveness, in cruelty, in violence, there's no way we're going to be at peace. And so it's for our own well-being and ease as well as for others.

The five training rules or precepts are pretty straightforward. The first is that we agree to take the training rule not to harm or kill living beings. It's only March—a lot easier than the middle of May, as you know, when there are black flies and mosquitoes, and then it's really something to look at our minds and hearts. But here, it's still all beings, not just each other. We undertake not to hurt or harm living beings.

The second is not to take what is not freely offered or freely given. Obviously not stealing, but it's also a way of cultivating a sense of inner contentment. You go for breakfast and you want scrambled eggs and there's oatmeal. You're obviously not going to go into the kitchen and cook yourself up an omelet—hopefully—although there have been times when a staff person came down at three in the morning to find a whole yogi egg-cooking scene going on. That would be taking what is not freely given. But anyway, it's much more about that sense of contentment. I don't get the first-class seat; I'm sitting here in economy. That's fine. I wanted eggs, there's oatmeal. Hey, there's food to eat. I can be grateful for that.

The third—in daily life, because these five precepts in Buddhist countries are the way people practice in everyday life—the third precept is not to harm oneself or others with one's sexual activity. It's basically straightforward: not getting involved in affairs with someone who's in another relationship, or if you're in another relationship, or anything abusive involving power dynamics. On retreat, we take the precept to maintain celibacy, not to be involved in any sexual activity, and that's much more about going into the fourth precept, which is right speech. But here we have noble silence, which is really just to keep our energy with ourselves for this time.

The fourth is we undertake the training rule not to lie, not to use harsh or abusive speech, and not to get involved in divisive speech or idle chit-chat. In daily life, just check out how much of our speech is idle chit-chat. It's a lot. So this actually is a huge one. But we make it easier for you here with noble silence. It's actually much easier than trying to monitor every word. Though I would like to say, in terms of lying and abusive speech, just check out how you talk to yourself. You can work on softening the abusive speech there.

In terms of the noble silence—of course, in your work meditation, if you need to talk to the cook or the housekeeper, that's fine. In the group interviews, of course. But all other times, just really staying with ourselves. We don't need to talk. And it's not about engaging in trying to catch somebody's eye contact. We don't go around afraid to see each other. We're just letting each person have their space. And that's a real gift, as you'll find—it gives each of us our space.

The fifth is we agree not to take drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind and cause carelessness while we're here. This does not include any medications you're taking—please continue taking any medications. We're talking about recreational drugs and intoxicants, which is kind of a no-brainer in terms of coming here to cultivate clarity. But that's the agreement we make.

So to begin the retreat really is a way of consciously entering into this space of safety, of bringing this kind, contemplative attitude of interest and inquiry to our experience.

We like to begin the retreat by taking the three refuges and the five precepts. This is a traditional way of consciously entering into this protected space of practice.

For the refuges, we do them in a call and response format, repeating each one three times, which is the classical formulation. I'll chant these in Pali. And then we take the precepts, which I'll offer in English.

The first line we chant together is an homage to the Buddha—this is very traditional, something you always chant before anything else. Then come the refuges themselves: Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi—I go to the Buddha for refuge. Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi—I go to the Dhamma for refuge. Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi—I go to the Sangha for refuge.

If you're not comfortable chanting, that's perfectly fine. We're not trying to impose anything on you. You can simply sit and listen, allowing yourself to internally move into the retreat space.

Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammāsambuddhassa.

Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Dutiyampi buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dutiyampi dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Dutiyampi saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Tatiyampi buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Tatiyampi dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi. Tatiyampi saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

And now the five precepts:

I undertake the training rule to refrain from harming living beings.

I undertake the training rule not to take what is not given.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from sexual activity.

I undertake the training rule not to use false or harsh speech.

I undertake the training rule not to use drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind.

So we could consider that we've entered into this sacred space together for these nine days.

We're just going to do a really short sitting together. If you'd like to stand or stretch for a moment, that's totally fine.

Carol mentioned something very important to the meditation, and that is the sense of safety. Each of us can really relax—and has to relax—if we are asked to open ourselves to our own observation. There's no other way to do this without feeling safe. So with taking the precepts and settling down with one another and having a general way of ethical conduct between us, we can relax and not feel so defensive.

Most of us will be self-observing and not spending as much time other-observing. There's a way that this gives us freedom to not feel so socially conscious or self-conscious, and that too can help us relax. It's just one of the reasons that noble silence is so important during the retreat—we're not trying to interact in the same way we do socially. We're just trying to be with ourselves in the company of others, and to bring a sense of quiet observation to ourselves throughout the day.

The meditation can really be summed up in three words, and we will spend the rest of the week elaborating on those three words. When you get confused or troubled, when you feel perhaps a little at odds about what to do, remember these three words and just apply them, and you'll be right on course. It's self-correcting.

These three words are: relax, observe, and allow.

The meditation really isn't asking much from us, is it? It's not about performance. It's not about doing something tight or tense that requires a great deal of strenuous activity. It's really just the opposite. It's about unloading. It's about releasing. It's about just seeing. And the word "relax" is at the heart of the meditation practice.

Right now, I would ask each of us to take a posture that allows maximum alertness, and yet at the same time brings forth that intoned sense of relaxation. The back should be straight. If you're on a chair, I would suggest moving your back away from the back of the chair so that you're swinging free of it. Your hands can be in your lap or folded in any comfortable way you like. Your legs, if you're in a chair, should be parallel to one another.

Just take a sigh. Allow yourself to really feel physically here. It's one thing for your body to be here; it's another for your mind to move and allow for you to mentally be here as well. Acknowledging that the body is here begins to align the mind with the body. The crosshairs of the meditation—the mind aligned with the body, that place where they meet—is really what we're looking for.

Softening the mind. It's not a pressured task, so there's no need to feel ambitious or goal-oriented. Just softening the mind, releasing the tensions of the day so that we're not carrying a conversation we had earlier into this moment. Nor are we trying to plan what we're going to do after this evening. It's really about living at that crosshair, at that point where mind and body meet.

Observe.

We will notice, when we're not looking ahead of ourselves or regretting or reminiscing about something that has occurred, there's a quiet and expansive observation that begins to notice physical sensations, because we are basing our attention in the body. It notices areas of tension, which can therefore be released and relaxed—the neck, the shoulders, the eyes, the jaw, the belly. Just notice those areas. Invite your mind into the body.

Suddenly we become very still. That sense of knowing what's arising, knowing the breath is occurring—that is the definition of meditation. If we're thinking and not being present with that knowing of what's arising, then we are quite likely lost in thought.

When that happens, relax. Don't try to run right back to the breath. Let the breath find you from that sense of relaxed response. Just relaxing.

And you'll find that the breath comes back to you. You don't have to go searching for it. This is especially important in those moments when we have lost our attention and then regain our footing—to dissipate any attitude that might have accompanied that loss of attention. Not to badger ourselves or judge ourselves. That's not what we're looking for. Rather, just release all of the verbal commentary and come back to that sense of relaxation, allowing the breath to find us.

Where we feel the breath most often—we can feel it in the belly area or the chest, sometimes at the nose tip. Wherever we feel it predominantly, sometimes it's the whole sense of the body breathing, feeling the breath as it expands our chest and our abdominal area. Knowing that breathing is occurring and allowing. Just being present without demands, without judgment.

So we will sit for just a few minutes. Staying present. Knowing the breath is arising. You can feel the energy quieting down now as we begin to move into silence together.

Meditation isn't, of course, just about sitting on our pillows and following our breath. That sense of being collected and knowing what the body is doing extends throughout the course of the day—staying in the body, knowing when the shower is being taken, the motions, the feelings of the hands and the body as they do the tasks of the day. Just staying very much embodied. Knowing that you're there, not letting the mind rush off and move in a different direction. Keeping that crosshairs, keeping that X and Y axis at the crossing point—the mind in the body.

Tomorrow there will be a 5:15 bell. For those of you who have traveled, you have a choice this early morning whether to stay in bed because you're tired and need some additional sleep. But I will be up here at 5:45 for that first sitting. For those who would like to join, please come. And for those who need additional rest, you're welcome to stay. Breakfast will be at 6:30, and again, if you want to miss that meal, you're welcome. But I would suggest getting up sometime in that morning so as not to miss that first sitting after breakfast, which will be the time when we offer instruction and some additional guidance for the meditation.

So have a good evening. The bell is less than eight hours away, so you might want to go right to bed. We are in noble silence now, so please leave the meditation hall quietly. Collectively begin to slow down. We don't have to move at the speed of our normal pace. We have nothing to do here but follow the bells and get to the places in plenty of time.

I look forward to seeing you tomorrow. Have a good night's sleep.

CHAPTER 365

Seeing Through Our Mental Habits

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this talk, Carol Wilson examines the essential attitude that supports meditation practice: not technique, but wise discernment paired with sincere motivation. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that everything rests on the tip of motivation, she explores how our deepest intentions can carry us through difficulties when we reconnect with them.

Wilson introduces Bhikkhu Bodhi's articulation of our three fundamental mental habits: the desire to enjoy pleasure, the desire to avoid pain, and the preservation of the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self. These habits, she explains, become the lens through which we evaluate all experience—pleasant becomes good, unpleasant becomes bad—keeping us trapped in cycles of reactivity. Using everyday examples from medical misdiagnosis to encounters in a lab waiting room, she illustrates how these unseen patterns shape our responses and perpetuate suffering.

The talk grounds these insights in the Four Noble Truths, presenting dukkha not as 'life is suffering' but as the inherent unreliability of conditioned experience. Wilson emphasizes that liberation doesn't require changing our circumstances but rather recognizing how clinging and aversion arise moment to moment. Through Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that 'awareness' is shorthand for the entire Eightfold Path, she offers a practical approach: shifting our refuge from what's happening to the simple knowing of what's happening. This accessible practice—noticing 'sleepiness is like this' or 'thinking is like this'—reveals that peace and ease are available in any moment, not dependent on circumstances being pleasant or problems being resolved.

So you're still here after the first day. Sometimes, not always, but sometimes the first day can be a little bit arduous, a little bit fatiguing. Sometimes it's not. Nothing's always one way.

Tonight I want to talk about the essence, the attitude we need to support our practice. Really, in a way, the most important aspect of our whole meditation practice is not the technique or what's happening, but the attitude—supported by wise discernment, supported by right understanding—with which we do our meditation practice, with which we live our life. It's really right attitude and wise discernment.

There's a Tibetan saying that everything rests on the tip of motivation. So rather than looking towards external results, experience, what's happening, or how we like what's happening, or what we think should be happening, or what we want to be happening, the essence is really in the motivation, in the attitude.

Certainly, a sense for each of us in our life, in our spiritual path, and in our meditation practice here—a sense of internal connection with our deepest motivation, with why we're doing it, with our intention—is really essential. Otherwise you're not going to get through a day, you're not going to get through a sitting, never mind nine days, never mind our life. When things are going easy, it's fine, but when things get difficult or not the way we like them or we're confused, rather than fighting with what's happening, to turn our attention back inward and reconnect with the sincerity of our motivation is really what can give us the courage, the confidence, the trust to just be here for the next breath, to be here for the next step. We realign with our sincerity, with our intention when things are difficult—and when things are good also.

Part of what I want to talk about is wise attitude and sincere motivation, but also that by itself might get us going, might get us here, might keep us going, but it's not enough in isolation. Because with the most sincere motivation and intention in the world, if we don't have the right information, if we don't understand accurately, we can really be meaning to do good for ourselves and others and just not possess accurate information. We basically don't know what the heck we're doing. We get ourselves in all kinds of messes. So the wise intention and attitude needs to be supported by wise discernment, by clear understanding, by having the right information.

This is just for beginning the practice—the overview I want to talk about tonight. With the best will in the world, if we don't understand accurately, our choices may not serve us well, even if we're meaning the choice to be good for ourselves, good for others, to be for our own happiness.

The Dalai Lama said once that the purpose of our spiritual practice is to fulfill our desire for happiness, for peace, and that we are all equal in wishing to be happy, to be free of our suffering. He says that we all share the right and the potential to fulfill this aspiration. That makes sense to me. Of course I practice to be more happy, whether it's the meditation practice or how I live my life, and we all share in that aspiration and the potential to be happy.

But here is the rub. Here is the nub. Without accurate information, the things we do, the choices we might make in our sincere desire to be happy, could be the very habits, the very way we look at life, that keep us spinning in confusion and suffering. Without wise understanding—hence why we practice.

You can see this everywhere. For example, I read a couple of years ago in a newspaper about an opinion poll that was done in Russia in the early 1990s, a few years after the dissolution of the Soviet Union. As you know, Russia has been in quite difficult circumstances politically and economically. Life is hard for people. In this poll—I don't have the exact figures in front of me—one of the questions was: if Stalin was running for president, would people vote for him?

Now, by the point this poll was done, remember, Stalin was basically responsible for the murder of 20 million Russians in the Gulag. And this was no longer a secret. Before, people didn't really know, but it was out in public. So would people vote for Stalin? I think it was 19% or 20% who said yes, they would vote for Stalin if he were running for president. And another hefty percentage, over 20%, said they weren't sure but they might. Because basically they were wanting some kind of security. The sense that, you know, who cares if you kill 20 million people, my life might be more secure. Some sense of going for what we think will make us happy—comfort or ease or whatever it might be.

That's a bit of an extreme example, but in a way, it's what the Buddha is said to have seen when he first awakened under the Bodhi tree, when he came to his full understanding of the causes of our suffering and how we can live, how we can relate to life through wise understanding in a way that allows us to be free from dis-ease, dissatisfaction, confusion.

After he realized this—and saw that it's possible for all of us—he also thought, you know, it's so much trouble. People aren't going to really get it. And it would be so much dukkha for me, suffering for me, discomfort for me, to be constantly trying to explain this to people, and they're not going to get it. It's said in the suttas, in the texts, that he was inclined not to teach, not to share, because he thought it's just too subtle and people won't get it.

But luckily, he was moved by compassion. He could read people's minds and survey the world of human beings and other beings with his psychic powers and see people's minds.

And what he saw moved him to compassion—to teach. What he saw was just this, what the Dalai Lama said: that everyone wants to be happy, that the choices we all make in our lives are in some way, twisted or otherwise, coming out of our motivation to be happy. But because we don't understand accurately, because we're trapped in habits of mind that we don't recognize, habits that drive our choices, the very choices we make in our desire to be happy are the things that keep us spinning in confusion, in delusion, in this sense of dissatisfaction and things just not working. This is what moved the Buddha to compassion, to share what he had recognized.

So with the best will in the world, without the right information, we fall back into these habits of mind. They're not bad. It's not like we're saying this is bad and you should change and do the right thing. It's just that they don't work. In terms of our own happiness, in terms of bringing ease and compassion and comfort to the world, these habits don't work.

So what habits do I mean? Very basic ones. This is from Bhikkhu Bodhi. Do you know who Bhikkhu Bodhi is? He's an American from Brooklyn who's been a Theravada Buddhist monk for many years in Sri Lanka and now lives back in the States. At this point, he's probably one of the two foremost translators into English of the Buddhist texts from Pali. Here's something he said: "Remember that the Buddha's teaching goes against the current of our habitual assumptions and attitudes. Most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self."

These are the habits I'm talking about. Let me read it again: Most of our habits—and these are our mental habits, how we view our world and what guides our choices—revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self. Does that sound familiar? Can you relate to those?

Now, I'm not saying that these are evils. And you may think, well, of course, of course I want to enjoy pleasure. Of course I want to avoid pain. Is the Buddha saying no, you should go out and look for pain and avoid pleasure at all costs? No. But these habits are so strong that they come to be the lens through which we evaluate experience. And that's what doesn't work. All pleasant experience comes to be good through that lens. Unpleasant comes to be bad. It leads to the reactions of wanting and aversion, and to the sense that everything centers around me. I'll say more about that later. It seems obvious, but it really doesn't work. These become the lens through which we view things, through which we make decisions. We don't realize those habits. It's like wearing pink glasses—we don't even see that we're wearing them. And then the choices we make don't necessarily work.

I just read this week a review of a book called How Doctors Think by Jerome Groopman. I haven't read the book itself, but there was one little point worth sharing. The review discussed how many misdiagnoses there are—which of course is understandable, we're all human. They said about twenty percent of misdiagnoses are technical errors or wrong readings of a CT scan or something like that. But according to this book, many more of doctors' misdiagnoses are based on how they're thinking, and how they think colors the decisions and diagnoses they make.

Here are a couple of examples. Emotions can interfere. A doctor may like a patient too much—there's a sense of liking, of pleasant—and they can't consider a worst-case scenario because it would be too unpleasant. Or they don't like a patient, and that patient is complaining, and they just have aversion to that patient's complaining, so they don't really listen. They don't really take it seriously. Interesting, isn't it? Or the kind of stereotypes doctors have about age, about gender, about race, about socioeconomic class—whatever they hold that isn't even seen—can color the diagnosis. I remember reading in the past how for a long time, many women's heart disease and heart attacks were misdiagnosed and overlooked because the common thinking was that men are the ones who are stressed and have heart attacks, not women so much.

So these are just little examples. But you see, this is how it works for us all the time when we don't recognize that these habits are present and operating. They're not bad. And we don't even have to get rid of them. We just learn to recognize that they're operating, to let our attention be more with awareness rather than so caught up in trying to feed these habits.

The habits are the stream. Without recognizing them, we just jump in. We just say it makes total sense. But with the willingness to simply notice what's happening, we can step outside of that habit and go, "Oh, maybe there's another way."

A little example: just the other day, I was having to have a blood test read, so I was going to a medical lab to give my specimen. I went into the waiting room, and there was another older man there. One of the women who was working there—the door was open into where she was working—kind of came out and looked at us. The man started to say something, I started to say something, and she just slammed the door in our faces and went away.

I was like, "Whoa, clearly not in a good mood."

And it's interesting, because I was just there. I didn't have any particular thing going on. But as soon as she did that, I noticed irritation come up, aversion. It's like, "Someone's going to act like that to me? Well, the appropriate response is to act like that back." You know, that seems to make sense. Something unpleasant happens, right away something unpleasant goes back.

The man who was there said to me—very friendly, not angry—"Yeah, she's the one. Last time I was here, she really messed up my blood test." And he went on and on. It was really interesting just to see that's sort of the way the world works. Something unpleasant happens, then we respond with more unpleasant, and it just keeps escalating.

Then I thought, what could her day be like? She's working in a lab. She's basically examining blood specimens, urine specimens, and stool specimens. That's her day. Probably when we come walking in, we're like another walking specimen to her. That's probably how she sees us. And it could be easy to just move into this feeling of "this isn't so pleasant" and "your day isn't so pleasant" and the people and—you know—just a kind of aversion coloring everything.

That's projection, right? Maybe she just had a bad morning at home before she came. But either way, that response just seems reasonable to us. Something's unpleasant, we're going to be in a bad mood—that's normal. Then we just throw that bad mood onto someone else.

But it is not inevitable. It is not necessary. We do not have to live by these habits. These habits of mind do not have to color our experience, do not have to define our life at all. And that's really what meditation, what mindfulness, can begin to help us see through, move out of, be free from. When we have the right information, we don't have to keep suffering from these habits of mind.

Another example: the first day of a retreat—and not only the first day. One of the reasons that a meditation retreat like this can be fatiguing, can be difficult... part of it is just the physical adjustment. We come from a really busy daily life, a lot of sensory input, a lot of doing, a lot of energy, maybe a lot of stress. We come here and sit down and either we're really physically fatigued and exhausted and it's just going to take a couple of days of rest—more rest—to catch up. Or we're used to a lot more sensory stimulation, and when that's taken away from the outside, the mind doesn't know what to do with itself. It kind of checks out. We're not used to sitting and walking so long. We're used to expending the body in different ways. And so just on that level, it can be uncomfortable.

But none of that has to be a problem. The level at which it becomes a problem is the level of how the mind and heart are responding, reacting to these particular circumstances. And that's the place that the meditation brings us to—to see that freedom is possible, as we said, here and now.

It doesn't mean you have to get rid of this body. It doesn't mean it'll never hurt. It doesn't mean you have to never be sleepy again. It doesn't mean you have to like what's happening.

That's a big secret you should know. We don't care if you like what's happening. And it doesn't matter one iota if you like what's happening. It doesn't matter even to you. In terms of the practice, it's not about getting better experience—that's not what's going to illumine us. That's not what's going to allow us to open to freedom. It's not about that.

It's about stepping out of believing, being driven by these habits of evaluating everything by whether it's pleasant, whether it's unpleasant, what it means about me. Those habits are what keep us spinning in samsara, in the cycle of birth and death, of suffering in a moment. Those are the habits that keep us confused.

And so when you're sitting here today or next week or next year and your back hurts a little bit, and you think, "This is useless, I'm out of here, I can't do this anymore"—that's getting caught in that pattern of "it's a little bit unpleasant, so it's bad." When you're sitting and the body doesn't hurt and the breath is light and subtle, you think, "Now I've got it. Now it's right. Now I'm doing it. I understand how to meditate. I'm doing so well." Same pattern. It's all about me. How am I doing? Is my breath getting better? Is my concentration getting better? Is my mindfulness getting better? It's all about me.

I'm not saying these are bad. I'm just saying they're ubiquitous. They are really the way we tend to look at ourselves and life. And they don't work. That's why we're here.

So what is the right information that informs our attitude, that informs our practice? The Buddha, as those of you who have practiced a lot before know, distilled what we need to know to begin to see through these habits, to be able to step aside and watch them running but not be run by them. What's the information we need that helps us meet our life, meet experience, meet ourselves and one another in a different way—in a way that's more harmonious, in a way that allows for compassion and connectedness?

As you know, he distilled this in his first teaching. When he did finally decide to teach, after his awakening, he still spent seven weeks hanging out in the bliss of Nibbana. But then he spent forty-five years teaching. So when he finally stopped this and went to teach his first teaching—the one that he repeated over and over, the really elegant distillation of what we need to know—it was the Four Noble Truths.

I'm just going to say these very simply. The first truth: the word in Pali is dukkha, which I like to translate as unreliability, unsatisfactoriness. It doesn't mean that all life is suffering and only bad things happen. That is not what it means. It means that stuff happens. When we're born into a body, there are going to be times when this body hurts. We're all either going to die young or experience sickness, old age, and disease. We're all going to experience really beautiful things, and then we're going to be separated from those things. We're all going to have to be united with things and people that we would much rather not be united with.

There is a part of life that is what you would call unsatisfactory, unreliable. We can't depend on it for happiness in any lasting way. This seems obvious, right? It's not like he's proclaiming something we don't know. But in another way, how much of our mental energy—our psychic heart and mind energy—is spent in resisting this? Or blaming ourselves? We get sick, something goes wrong, we lose our job, someone makes a face at us, and we think, "Oh, they don't like me. I'm such a bad person."

How much of our mental energy is spent either blaming ourselves for not being perfect, or trying somehow to deny, to hide, to fix things?

Really, when you explore deeply your own ideas about what freedom would mean, what happiness would mean, what peace would mean—does it include that pain in your back? Does it mean that your migraines go away and never come back again? Does freedom include losing your job? Does it mean getting divorced? Does it mean having your friends suddenly move into some other life and losing connection with them?

When I think about happiness without being careful about it, when I notice what I'm actually imagining as ease, as freedom, as nirvana, it usually revolves around everything being really nice and pleasant—floating on a cloud with nothing bad happening anymore. It's really deeply ingrained, this sense that the bad stuff, the difficult stuff, isn't supposed to happen. But the Buddha is saying no, it's just part of life.

Another aspect is the fact that yes, beautiful things happen. There is pleasure. There is love. There are wonderful things. And it all changes. We can't keep anything constant. It's going to change. That's just another fact of life. So that's the first truth he calls dukkha—to be understood.

The second truth is that the cause of our suffering, our anguish, is not the fact of the first truth. That's just how life is. Rather, the cause of our anguish is the way our hearts and minds respond in the face of the difficult, in the face of losing what we love, in the face of having what's pleasant go away. It's not that these things happen, but the reactions, the habits of our hearts and minds in the face of this first truth—that is what really causes us the dis-ease, the sense of real suffering, of anguish, of life not working.

The Buddha uses craving as shorthand: the fact of wanting things we like to stay, wanting things we don't like to go away, wanting to be something or to be other. But really, these reactions, these responses, are the habits that Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about—those three habits. Wanting what we like, leading to aversion toward what we don't like, and thinking everything is all about me and what's going to make me feel good. So that's really the cause of the dis-ease in the face of things not being the way we want them to be.

The first two truths are simply stating how things seem to be. The third and fourth truths are that it doesn't have to be that way. The anguish described in the second truth exists simply because we misunderstand the way things are. It's not that we have to become a different person. We can simply learn to perceive ourselves and the world more accurately. And when there's accurate perception, when we have the right information even just in a moment, then the habits of mind—the clinging, the aversion—stop making sense, even just for a moment. They let go. With wise discernment, with a relaxed and really full presence, the clinging lets go.

And there can be a moment. It can be just momentary. You don't have to think about some end state that never changes, one we're never going to reach. That's just an idea that doesn't really relate to anything. But we all experience, over and over, moments when the clinging and aversion just let go. And it's possible to recognize the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of this mind and body, of life.

Take Guy's example from last night when he talked about getting on the plane. A simple example like that. As long as he was wanting to be in first class and disgruntled about not getting it—it's not huge suffering, it's little—but the way the mind works is the same whether it's something small or something enormous. He was in dis-ease, out of harmony, not happy. Suffering. Not huge suffering, but definitely not happy. And you can imagine how something little like that could work you into quite a state of aversion and negativity. And then if you really lose control, you mouth off at the flight attendant, and it just keeps escalating.

But as soon as that other person said, "Oh, I'm quite happy here," Guy's mind was open enough to recognize, "Oh yeah, right, this isn't so bad." In that moment, letting go of the wanting, letting go of the aversion—not as an act of will, because that's just more "me" wanting something—but simply recognizing, "Oh yeah, this is just what it is. What's the problem?" In that moment, there is no problem. The situation doesn't have to change. The mind that was caught in wanting, in aversion, in reactivity, simply sees: this doesn't make sense.

It lets go. We're in peace and ease, just as it is. This is really the cessation of clinging. In that moment, the cessation of suffering.

Today someone asked in the questions, you know, part of our practice seems—as Guy was talking about last night—really meeting the difficulties that arise in our mind, in our body, really meeting them with full, kind, non-judging attention, being there for them. We really learn from this. And on the other hand, there's the silence, the stillness, the peace in the room. How do these come together?

At times it really seems like we're struggling with a difficulty, then the difficulty's gone, and we can appreciate the peace, really feel what peace feels like. Because at first—and not even at first, but often—the difficulty, the reaction of our mind, which is what the difficulty actually is, not what's happening, seems so real. It so colors our perception that we know of no other way to be with it. We can only recognize peace and ease when that reaction's gone. That's right.

But what happens as we go on and on in practice is that the two come together. The thing that seems to be difficult—having to sit in steerage, or having your knee really killing you, or sitting here and having a really difficult memory come up with a lot of sadness, your mind just in chatter—you have to get rid of that to appreciate the stillness, the ease, the peace.

What happens with this third truth is that we start to begin to recognize, through the simple knowing of what's happening, through shifting our interest from what's happening or the experience and what I think about it to just the simple knowing of whatever's happening. In that knowing, we're touching. Pain is like this. Sadness is like this. Thinking is like this. None of it's a problem. None of it's a problem.

And when the reactions of mind to whatever's happening really let go, just for a moment—oh. Knee hurting, at ease. They come together. Natural peace and ease of mind and body doesn't mean the body never hurts. It doesn't mean we don't have difficult emotions. It doesn't mean that everything starts to be the way we want it to be. It means we realize more and more: hey, it's out of control. And the problem isn't that things aren't the way I want them to be. The problem is I want.

Oh, this is how it is in this moment. It doesn't mean we can't move from how it is. We can respond appropriately. It doesn't mean a kind of passive giving up, but it means a waking up with full presence. Oh, this moment is like this. Total presence. A friend of mine calls it the place of no problem. Just for a moment. That's a moment of cessation of clinging, what the Buddha called liberation of heart, of mind, through non-clinging. That's really the freedom. That's accessible here and now and always, just for a moment. It's not a state. And it's not some incredible, blissful experience. Just, oh.

But notice, as you go through the days here—they happen all the time, and in our daily life too, but one of the lovely things about a retreat is we have more space, we have more time, the little things you can really notice. So notice when there's a moment of that natural peace and ease. It might be that we notice it early first when nothing particular is happening. You're just sitting and drinking a sip of tea and you're really present and it's just this. Ah.

Our tendency can be to think, oh, it was the perfect cup of tea. If tomorrow at exactly the same time I make exactly the same tea, that's going to do it. And it'll take us the nine days to realize it wasn't about that.

So let's short-circuit that. When you notice that perfect moment of looking at the moon out there in the crystal air, when you notice that peace, that ease, that cessation of suffering, that wakeful presence—instead of focusing the attention out there on what the experience is, just notice that freedom from clinging, that liberation through non-clinging. Just kind of recognize what that peace and ease is like. And then we start to recognize that it's possible throughout all experience.

Not every moment, God knows. I mean, that's a possibility, I'm not saying that's what it's going to be like. It certainly isn't like that for me. But you'll find it can be accessible when you're sitting there and the person next to you is snoring and you think you just want to throttle them. Their snoring is ruining my... and suddenly it's just hearing, and there's no problem. Next minute, a problem. Moments like that are great because then you can see—wait a minute, it can't be the external experience that's the problem. It's the wanting it to be different.

Wow, isn't that fascinating? It's not bad. It's not like we're bad because we want, but it's fascinating. And it shows that peace and ease is much more accessible than we might normally think. You don't have to get to some incredibly rarefied state. So just notice as you go through the days—the sitting, the walking, the eating, taking your shower, going to the bathroom—it doesn't matter what we're doing.

And the fourth truth that the Buddha talked about is that there's a path. There's a path because mostly we don't notice that the habits are operating. Mostly when there are these moments of peace and ease, rather than seeing that it is the absence of wanting, the absence of believing in aversion, the absence of thinking it's all about me—we tend to focus outward, you know, trying to get back that perfect cup of tea. And so there's a path so that we can practice in all aspects of our life, seeing how these habits of mind keep us spinning in confusion, recognizing over and over how when the habit just for a moment goes away, there's no problem. We can learn to shift where we take refuge. We can shift what we trust.

Ajahn Sumedho—he's an American who's been a monk in the Thai tradition for over thirty years, really quite wise, I love doing retreats with him—he says a shorthand for the whole eightfold path, which includes wise understanding leading to our motivations, our attitudes, how we speak and act in the world, how we meditate, mindfulness, energy, and concentration—a shorthand for all of that would be awareness. The whole eightfold path could be awareness. And Thich Nhat Hanh says a similar thing: mindfulness. Same thing, really.

So there's that path. We can learn to shift our refuge. The reason these habits are so strong, the reason we tend not to recognize them, is because we're believing them. We're trusting them. It's our refuge. So, for example, when that lab lady slammed the door in our face and the first thing that came up was annoyance at her—a kind of sense of "can't treat me like that," even though that wasn't the thought—that's where the habit of taking refuge is, in that aversion. The safe place is to answer it with aggression, with aversion. That's the habit.

When something really pleasant is dangled in front of us, or when you're in pain here, the deep habit that we believe is: if I can get rid of this pain, if I can go have something pleasant, I'm going to be happy. That's what we trust. That's where we place our refuge. And as long as we keep doing that, that's where we're going to stay.

So in taking awareness as the path, it's shifting our interest, shifting our refuge from what's happening to trusting that we can simply be in the knowing of what's happening. And that's actually a place of freedom. Just in a moment. And it doesn't take huge effort or huge energy.

So, for example, right now, just humor me—feel your hands, whether they're touching each other, whether they're touching your knees. Can you just feel your hands?

Just notice the sensations. Is that pretty easy to do? Can you do that? Doesn't take a lot of effort, does it? Not too hard. That's all. That's awareness. Just feeling those sensations. That's pretty accessible, isn't it? Not too esoteric.

Now, to stay just on that level of simplicity and not—"Oh, they're just sensations." Does the mind then go into, "Well, my hands are kind of warm. They're feeling kind of tight. Maybe I shouldn't have them in this position. They're kind of tense. Maybe I should change it. What's the matter?" That's like we're off of simple awareness. Then you might notice, "Oh, that's thinking," and that's awareness again.

So awareness doesn't take a huge amount of effort or energy, but it takes a steadiness through the day. Our whole practice here is really that simple quality of awareness throughout the whole day. Just coming back, coming back, coming back.

Our tendency, when we give instructions in the sitting to feel the sensations of breath, in the walking to feel the sensations of feet—our tendency from our habits is to get into evaluating what the sensations of breath are like, evaluating how clearly we're feeling the sensations when we're walking, getting really tense, trying to do it better, trying to feel them longer, trying to feel it more subtly. But none of that makes any difference. We're just setting ourselves a very simple task so that we can keep coming back to the awareness, the awareness, the awareness.

As Ajahn Sumedho says, the wonderful thing about awareness in terms of what we're aware of—awareness, he calls it the point that includes—it can be aware of anything, everything. There's nothing that awareness can't be aware of. And this is the other thing: awareness doesn't care what it's aware of. It's not like if your awareness feels a really refined, subtle breath, that's a better, cleaner, purer awareness than awareness of a rough, tight breath. It doesn't make any difference.

It's about beginning to trust, to recognize, to take refuge in just that simple knowing—the sensations as your hands touch. That's all. We hear a sound, just the awareness of hearing it. It's so simple, so nothing. There's nothing to hold, there's nothing to point to, there's not a state you can name—so we overlook it. But awareness is always available as long as we're conscious.

In a way, our practice is really to shift our interest and our evaluations from what's happening to the awareness itself. Moment after moment after moment.

It's like a Tai Chi move, I like to think. So we're sitting here fighting with sleepiness. "Oh, sleepiness is like this." That's Ajahn Sumedho's language. Nothing else to do. Let go of trying to get rid of the sleep. "Oh, sleepiness is like this." That's awareness. Trying to feel the breath and the mind's going off into past and future, thinking it shouldn't be thinking. "Oh, thinking is like this." You're sitting and your back's hurting. "Oh, tightness is like this." "Boredom is like this." "Being all caught up in thinking I should be doing something better is like this."

There's really nothing that's outside of awareness. But we keep overlooking that and getting back involved again in these habits. They're just so deeply rutted in the way we view experience.

You know how the Buddha describes our moment-to-moment experience in terms of the six sense experiences? That would be seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—physical experience, physical sensations—and mental. That's the sixth sense door.

So mental experiences—emotions, thoughts. And the way the Buddha describes experience is again very, very elegant and simple.

Take any one moment: just those sixth sense experiences happening over and over and over, out of which we construct all kinds of fabulous stories and explanations. Take a physical sensation, or take a sight. If there's an eye that works—a working eye—and a form comes in front of it, and there's consciousness, when those three come together, he calls that contact. That's a moment of seeing. And every moment that there's contact, whether it's seeing or hearing or sensing, along with it there's a subtle mental experience of it being either pleasant or unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant—neutral.

This is fast, fleeting, happening every time there's contact, which is basically every moment. But we mostly don't notice it; we're busy, it's happening a lot. And from that, when we're not really noticing, what's common is: it's pleasant, so right away there's the "oh yeah, more of that"—a leaning into, a wanting. Unpleasant, like that lady slamming the door in our face, and right away there's a pulling back, a "no," a not-liking, which can go all the way to aversion, to murderous rage, or to fear. The wanting could be just a little "oh, I want it," or it can lead us into years of our life trying to get something. And then neither pleasant nor unpleasant—we often don't notice it at all. We often get bored at this point.

The other habit is that we think it's all about me. And this is really, I would say, at the bottom of all of it—the thing that we don't see. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—there's a reaction of mind, and that reaction of liking, of not liking, of being bored, we're completely entranced by it. It's all about me.

Notice this. I love noticing this. You have to have a sense of humor; it helps. It's all about me. At the same time, don't take it personally that your mind makes everything about you. But notice it.

You're sitting in the dining room and somebody walks by at the far side, really slowly, looking really mindful. And you notice that, and immediately: "They're better than me." Somebody drops a fork, and right away you think, "Oh, glad that wasn't me."

Somebody is sitting next to you making noise. "How can they do that? Don't they know it's bothering me?" It can be anything. There can be just a birdsong outside, and at first it's just a moment of hearing, and then: "Ah, I'm really having a peaceful moment enjoying this birdsong. I'm really so peaceful." Or your back hurts: "I'm not doing well." Your breath is heavy: "I really can't meditate because I have such a heavy breath. I'm so stressed, I'm so self-involved." Or you start noticing how every thought's all about me, every second thought, and you think, "Well, I'm really a completely self-centered jerk. Nobody else is having thoughts like this."

I'll just tell you now: we all are. We all are. It's just what happens. It isn't personal. That's what I mean by "it isn't personal." But it's fascinating.

Mingyur Rinpoche, who is quite a fun and lively, humorous Tibetan teacher, describes how we make this all about me, making ourselves the center of the universe. He says this fascination with me, this felt sense of "me here now," he calls it the original measuring point for samsara, or the cycle of suffering.

And he uses an example. He says in Tibet, when we're going to build a house, the way we measure out the foundation is we start from a place in the middle and we get a long rope, sort of like a measuring tape. From the point in the middle, we measure out to the end and all the way around until you have the footprint for the house. And he says, in that same way, everything is measured from that felt sense of me here now. That's how we measure everything that's going on. It's our biggest entrancement.

When we're so entranced in that way, that's what keeps us spinning in these habits of mine. It's all about me, and this is unpleasant, so we've got to get rid of it. It's all about me, and this is pleasant, so we've got to have more. Until we stop taking refuge in these habits and are willing to just experiment with taking refuge in the awareness itself, we're not going to see through it.

But when we're willing to just stop a minute and say, "Oh, right—feeling like I'm so important is like this. Embarrassment that I dropped the fork is like this." You don't have to fix anything. It's just this step into awareness of it is like this. It's really very accessible.

When we have this attitude, this willingness to just step into the awareness—not to evaluate everything that's happening by whether we like it or don't like it, whether it feels good or doesn't feel good, what it means about me—not to evaluate at all. Mindfulness, awareness, is just this simple meeting of experience. Whatever is happening, just as it is. Relaxed, without a lot of story about it, not judging. Just being here for this moment. And then this moment changes, being here for this moment. Over and over and over.

When we're able to do that, just willing to do that, our refuge begins to shift. We begin to see that there is really a possibility for a kind of ease and peace in relationship to this life, to ourselves, that we might not have expected, that we certainly didn't experience before. And it doesn't mean that the situations of our life necessarily have to change.

The Buddha, when he awoke—his awakening didn't change his world. It didn't mean that difficult stuff didn't happen. He lived a life where he had all kinds of suffering: the suffering of war, the suffering of illness, the suffering of friends dying, the suffering of relatives trying to kill him, trying to split the monks, trying to make him look bad so they could be in charge. Organizational dukkha, power politics. Monks and nuns breaking all kinds of rules, causing all kinds of trouble. All he wanted to do was go sit under the tree in the bliss of nirvana, but he had to deal with all of this because he chose to, out of compassion for the world.

His awakening didn't change that. He had headaches. He had backaches. His most beloved disciples died before him. Yet he was the peaceful one. He said he was free—free from suffering, free from confusion.

We don't have to have a different body or different circumstances in our life. It's really accessible to all of us, moment by moment. Don't look for some big blowout where everything's going to change, it's all going to be light and glitz and free from now on. You're just setting yourself up. But notice these moments when we shift from being caught in our habits, seeing the world through these habits, to the potential for simple awareness. Oh, it's like this.

Mindfulness—when we're mindful, any experience is a doorway to freedom. It doesn't matter what's happening. Without mindfulness, without the refuge in awareness, the most blissful, beatific experience just keeps feeding that sense of it's all about me.

So this is our practice here: just to learn, moment after moment, that we can really trust awareness. We can really make it our home, our true home.

CHAPTER 366

Impermanence and the Immediacy of Now

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this profound exploration of one of Buddhism's central insights, Carol Wilson examines why the perception of impermanence (anicca) remains so challenging despite being intellectually accessible. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings in the suttas, she shares his radical statement that not even a speck of soil under a fingernail is permanent—and that this very instability is what makes liberation possible.
>
> Wilson addresses our habitual resistance to impermanence: the fear of loss, the search for a resting place, and our tendency to solidify experience through concepts and storylines. She illustrates how we unconsciously deny change—whether by not noticing when emotions shift, trying to recreate pleasant experiences, or holding fixed views about who we are. The touching story of Ānanda weeping at news of the Buddha's approaching death demonstrates that grief is natural, while also pointing toward the deeper teaching.
>
> The talk culminates in an invitation to practice what Suzuki Roshi called "beginner's mind"—meeting each moment with totality of presence, without agenda, free from the obsession with what comes next. This willingness to step into the unknown doesn't leave us bereft but opens us to appreciation, wonder, and the flexibility to respond appropriately to life as it actually unfolds. Wilson closes with Billy Collins' poem "Aimless Love," beautifully evoking the tender attention available when we release our grip on permanence.

This practice, Vipassana meditation—the most common translation of Vipassana is insight—is called insight practice. I thought I might talk about one of the main insights that the Buddha mentions, one that arises from this practice. But first, what do we mean by insight?

Have you had any yet? Are you going to have any? How does this drudging up and down—lifting, moving, placing—have anything to do with insight?

All we mean by insight is really simply a shift of perception. We see, we recognize—I'm using "see" metaphorically for intuitive knowing, not necessarily visual seeing—we recognize an aspect of our experience, of our mind, of our body, of the way the world is. We recognize it differently from the normal way we go about, often without even consciously realizing it, interpreting ourselves and life.

In terms of insights that come in practice, it's not that if we practice hard enough, we'll be born into a different and better reality. This is it. This is the reality. We wake up from one interpretation into another, but the reality—as I said last time—the Buddha's awakening didn't transport him to another earth on another plane. He still had to walk barefoot around India, and that's just how it was.

So the insight is a simple shift of perception. But that's huge, because when we're not recognizing an experience accurately, the way we respond, the way we interpret, the way we act in relationship to that doesn't jibe. We don't have accurate information. What shifts when we recognize accurately is that our patterns—what I mentioned last time about trying to make ourselves happy and it doesn't work because we don't have the right information—those patterns change, not out of willpower, but just because it's so obvious. The main one of those patterns is clinging, of course. But when we recognize with wisdom, we see more accurately. The wisdom is the recognition, the knowing of that. And even though the old way of seeing comes back again, there's been a change, a shift in the mind stream. We know it's not only this way.

It's like those magic eye design graphics. They used to have whole books of them—just graphics of two different colors with no conceptual picture you could recognize. But if you look at them long enough with an unfocused, relaxed gaze, a 3D image springs out of it. Hockey players, or basketball players, or something like that. Then when you start staring again, or you look away and look back, it's gone. You just have the little yellow and blue graphics. But once you know that's there, something switches. You know it. Whereas someone who's never been able to see it—you can tell them about it, and they're like, "Yeah, right, sure."

My mother could never see them, and it would make her nuts. We'd go in malls—this was when they were really popular—and there'd be giant posters, and she couldn't stop looking. She'd be going nuts, and I'd say, "Don't you see the dinosaurs?" "No, I don't see the dinosaurs." Telling someone doesn't help, but you can help someone learn how to look. That's what we're doing here.

Once you know, once you've seen it—say, a flying saucer—if someone comes up and says, "No, you didn't," well, if you're clear in your knowing, if you have confidence in your understanding, he can say whatever he wants. You know you saw it. That's the shift. And we can respond differently. Really, that's all insight is. Then it shifts back, and we're moving between the two different ways of perceiving. This doesn't have to be a problem at all.

One of the most central insights that the Buddha speaks of—actually, perceptions—is that of impermanence. Anicca in the Pali: the changing, impermanent nature of all experience. All mental, all physical experience. That's the catch there—all experience. The misperception we have is that we perceive the permanent in what is not permanent, and we don't realize that's happening.

This is from the Sutta, from the Buddha. These are two different suttas where he's talking to his monks. He says, "There is no form"—meaning no matter, no solidity, our bodies, any other form. There's no form, there's no feeling tone—which is like the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral feeling tone. There's no perception. Perception is simply the recognition of experience, the naming, the labeling. There are no formations of mind, volitional formations, moods, thoughts, and no consciousness that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, and that will remain the same just like eternity itself.

And then the Buddha took up a little bit of soil under his fingernail. He's outside. He just took up this little bit of soil and he said, "There's not even this much form, consciousness, volitional formations, perception, feeling tone that is stable, permanent, unchanging. Not even this much." He said, "If there was this much, even this much that was stable, that didn't change, that was absolutely permanent, then this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering could not be discerned. But because there is not even this much that is permanent, that is stable, then the living of this holy life for the complete destruction of suffering is discerned, is possible."

I find that a radical statement. Not even this much. Are we comfortable with that? Does the heart leap up and say, "Yeah, great!"?

The other quotation—I mean, there are millions of quotations throughout the suttas about impermanence—but again the Buddha is saying, "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated..." So it's part of our practice, actually, consciously recognizing the perception of impermanence. It eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit "I am." Those are code words for complete liberation in the way the Buddha spoke. So when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it basically completely liberates our heart and mind from confusion, from suffering. It leads to that depth of wisdom, of understanding, based on simply the clear recognition of how things are.

Of course, developing and cultivating that perception—that's what we're doing in the practice, and I'll point to that a bit more later in the talk, hopefully. But first I want to bring up some questions. Why is it, or should it be, so difficult to truly know, to truly perceive, to live with a cellular understanding of impermanence?

Because of all the different perceptions, the different insights that the Buddha speaks about—the others being the unreliability of all experience and the non-self nature of all—impermanence seems to me intellectually and conceptually the most accessible. I mean, when we talk about things changing, nothing really staying the same, can you sort of agree with that? We go, "Yeah, yeah, things change." On some intellectual level, that's not incredibly abstruse. We all intellectually know that our bodies are very different now from how they were twenty years ago.

But then aren't we still shocked? Shocked! When we look in the mirror in the morning and there's more gray hair, or the cellulite starts to come, or somehow—how did I get to look like this? Or we see a picture of ourselves from twenty years ago. Oh my God. Or a picture of you and all your friends from twenty years ago. I tell you, actually, it's more shocking with the friends because we think, "I didn't change as much as they did." Well, they can say the same thing, so that makes it even.

But why is it so shocking? Every moment is changing. Yet this sense of what I would call the denial of impermanence—or what the Buddha calls the upside-down perception, perceiving the permanent in what is not permanent—is so... well, it's comfortable. It's what we're used to. There are lots of reasons of habit why we don't tend to really let in, on a moment-by-moment, cellular level as opposed to just the thinking level, the fact of change.

One question I used to ask myself—well, sometimes I still do—is: Do I really know that everything, not even this much, is not stable, that everything is changing? What would it mean in my life if I really lived in and from that knowing? What would it mean? And the mind that isn't there but is thinking about what that would mean can come up with something that usually isn't the most cheery and pleasant thing. It's like, "Oh my God, everything's changing." I know that's the first noble truth—that when we're born we're going to be separated from what we love, that we're going to have sickness, old age, and death, that nothing lasts. I know that. But thinking about every minute opening to loss—that's sort of the first thing that comes up in my mind.

That's too much. Loss is too painful. And so I think that's one of the first resistances. And a lot of this is actually not so conscious—this fear of the sadness, the pain, the grief of loss.

And of course, this is where we'll be going with it: the reason there's pain and grief and this real struggle with loss is actually because we've already related to experience in a way that is not consistent with what's true. We really, really suffer when what we want or like or are comfortable with goes away. We really suffer only when we've been clinging to it, when we've been in some way relying on holding on to that experience, that person, that job, that feeling.

In some way, and often it's below the level of conscious thought, we're relying on that for confirmation, for self-confirmation, for a sense of comfort, for pleasant feeling. And that's actually huge—that we're holding on and relying on stuff for pleasant feeling. For a sense of safety, for a sense of control. We like to know how things are and get them all nice and tidy and then have them stay that way.

Like Guy's example last night of how upset his mind got when he had to walk in a different place. He's not just a weird person, you know. Well, maybe he is, but that's another thing. But every time you came into the hall, it was a free-for-all. You don't get to hold on to which seat you sit in. Every time you come in, you just have to take what seat's there. Now, in terms of our life, that's not really a big deal, is it? But wouldn't it be a little distressing, a little upsetting? You come in and it's bad enough in the lunchroom, you know, and that's enough of a nightmare. But if we did that everywhere? What if you didn't know which room you were going to go back to at night? What if we gave you a different job every day? What if we changed the schedule? We like a little bit of consistency here—which there's nothing wrong with, but it's when we are clinging to it.

That's the problem with clinging. It's that it just doesn't work. And it really increases our suffering, keeps us suffering a lot more.

Our instinctive fear of the feelings of loss and sadness is another thing. It's just part of life. Sadness, loss is like this. In some ways, we know we're a little bit more alive. Sure, it shows there was clinging, but it also means we don't have to shut down and hide from seeing things clearly because, God forbid, we might feel some sadness of loss. It just runs through life. It's part of it.

Actually, can we just embrace that? Rather than either deny impermanence and just keep fighting and trying to pretend we can control and manipulate, or shut down altogether and pretend we're not clinging—pretend we don't care, pretend it's okay, it's pleasant, but I'm not going to really open to it because I don't want to get caught in clinging. That kind of indifference comes not from wisdom but from fear or ignorance.

Even in the suttas this comes up, and I find it quite touching. The Buddha's main attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life was a monk called Ananda. He comes through in the suttas as being a really kind person. It seems to me like he's the one who personalizes things. You hear about all the monks and nuns, and the Buddha gives a talk and they all get enlightened at the end. But Ananda, for twenty-five years, had quite some insight, yet he wasn't completely enlightened. And he served the Buddha with total love.

He also served as the intermediary. He loved the Dhamma. He loved the Buddha's teaching. And with great compassion, he was always trying to bring anyone who wanted to hear the Buddha to hear him. Rather than what we sometimes see these days with some great master or teacher where the people close are trying to keep other people away, with Ananda it was just the reverse. He was always trying to get people to come and hear the teachings and wake up. He was very kind.

Anyway, three months before the Buddha was going to die, when he was eighty years old, he knew what was going to happen and he told Ananda. They started talking—Ananda was present with him most of the time—about what to do with his remains when he died and all these practicalities of life. Then suddenly the Buddha was sitting there talking to some other monks and he noticed Ananda had disappeared. Of course, with what they called his divine eye, he knew what was going on. He knew where Ananda was, but he said to the other monks, "Where's Ananda? Where could Ananda be? Go and find Ananda for me."

So they went off and looked for Ananda, and where Ananda was—

He went into his lodging and stood leaning on his doorpost, crying and weeping, saying, "I'm still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away—the teacher who has been so compassionate to me. What am I going to do without my teacher?" And he was just standing there weeping.

It's so human, isn't it? I find it quite touching and encouraging in a way—that it's okay. Until we're completely, always seeing things the way they are with no ignorance, when we're faced with the loss of something deeply loved, there's going to be some attachment. We're going to be sad, we're going to grieve, and that's okay. There's no reason to try and deliberately hide from things because we might feel sad.

Of course, the Buddha then called him, and in a very loving way said, "Friend Ananda, enough. You don't need to weep." He said, "How many times have I told you? Things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other. So how could it be that what has come together through conditions"—meaning this body—"will not come apart again when the conditions change?"

And then he went on to really beam kindness and love to Ananda, praising him for all his good qualities. It wasn't like he was being harsh with him. He was meeting him with tremendous love. It's a touching interaction. But after twenty-five years with the Buddha, this was simply Ananda's natural human reaction. It's okay. There can be space for it—but let's not let it shut us down.

The other aspect of impermanence that makes it harder for us to recognize—and it's this aspect that the intensity of retreat and moment-to-moment mindfulness really helps us perceive more accurately—is the constancy of change.

I heard a teaching by His Holiness the Dalai Lama some years ago, and he was talking about impermanence, as teachers are wont to do. He was describing that even though we resist it, most of us would agree: conditions come together, like a life. It starts, then it exists for a while, and then it goes away. But he said that's not accurate. This is the place where we get confused, where we don't perceive accurately. Yes, conditions come together, something arises—a being is born, or a mood arises, or a cake is made, whatever it is. But the "persisting for a while"—that's what's not accurate. Nothing is persisting for a while unchanged. The change is every moment.

Thinking about it is where we get really uncomfortable. The sense of total instability, total unsettledness, the unreliability of anything—even though we can't, with our normal senses, perceive it. Like the change in this paper: it looks steady, although even as I hold it, it's different. It's changing. The conditions are changing. But even though we don't perceive it every moment, the fact that things are so much in constant flux is something my mind isn't really comfortable with.

I think it's from this that our sense of trying to control things arises—to control the environment, to control ourselves, to control how people behave, to know what's going to happen in the future. Our obsessive planning. I'm not saying we don't plan; we need to plan. I'm talking about obsessive planning driven by fear, by control, by "it's got to be this way"—to somehow stave off the fact of constant shifting change. As if to open into that would be enormous suffering.

But of course, it's just the reverse. The cause of our suffering here is the clinging, the misperception, continuously trying to relate to any aspect of experience as if it's going to be here just the same in the next moment. If it is, okay. But if it's not, okay.

One of my favorite quotations from the Buddha: "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful."

The search for a resting place is burning. And that search can be in the physical world—a house, a family, a relationship. None of this is to say there's anything wrong with those things. It's the trying to hold onto them for a security they cannot promise. That's the problem.

The search for a resting place can be just wanting to be comfortable in this moment. It can be the intensity of craving we bring to our meditation practice—to get to some deep samādhi where I can rest, to get rid of this pain or this bad emotion so I can rest, to just sit somewhere I'm not near that noisy person so I can rest, to get out of the cold so I can rest.

"He abides in peace who does not abide anywhere."

This sense of not needing a resting place—you can't will it. I'm going to say willingness, but we can't will it.

Just the willingness to open into not knowing. Each moment, who knows what's going to arise in the next moment. As we were saying in one of the interviews today, that's Krishnamurti's line: a freedom from the known. That's actually what mindfulness is. Each moment, there's just mindful awareness meeting whatever's happening. That's totality of presence, just for that moment, without bringing in any assumptions or concepts or ideas of what this is or what it should be or what it will be or what it was. Just this complete innocence, freshness—what Suzuki Roshi called beginner's mind.

We say "the breath." You sit down and say, "the breath." But you actually don't know if the sensations of breath are going to be the next thing that arises. We really don't know. Moment by moment, I sit down and think, "This sitting, I'm going to really be with the breath." And ten minutes later, I haven't felt one breath consciously. Maybe a lot of other things. Maybe really conscious, really present with mindfulness. But we never really know.

It's so ingrained in our habits to look for security, to look for steadiness, to look for something as if we can rest. This is from Pema Chödrön, whom I quoted last night: "To be fully alive, fully human, and completely awake is to be continually thrown out of the nest. To live fully is to be always in no man's land, to experience each moment as completely new and fresh. To live is to be willing to die over and over again." From the awakened point of view, that's life. Death is wanting to hold on to what you have and to have every experience confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together.

Isn't that what we're trying to do with meditation? And it just won't obey us. That's what's so great about meditation. You want it to confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together, and it just stubbornly won't do that. That's why we love it. When you come into interviews and you say, "Oh my God, it isn't working," we say, "Great." "I'm really in this heavy emotion." "Good." It's not confirming you. It's waking us up.

So even though we say yama mara is fear of death, it's actually fear of life—being continually thrown out of the nest.

Another way we can look at our life and practice is noticing the places where we are—and I say "we are," but it's not like we're consciously sitting here thinking, "I'm doing this"—but to notice when the mind, when the habits of mind, what it reaches for, what it holds onto, what it perceives as permanent, what we're holding onto to confirm us, to make us feel together, to confirm our life.

This is from Ajahn Chah, the wonderful Thai forest monk: "Worldly knowledge and accomplishments on whatever level still leave you in this realm of suffering. Whatever happiness there may be comes about in dependence on external things. It is a happiness, but it's not the happiness of freedom, the happiness that doesn't depend on anything."

So what is it we depend on? We depend on possessions, on pleasure, on reputation, on praise, on wealth. We lean on all these things, like leaning on a rotting old tree trunk. And after we lean for too long, it breaks and falls, and we fall with it. I love Ajahn Chah. Such is worldly happiness.

This is a delicate balance that we learn when we start to see all those things—reputation, wealth, sense pleasures, family, your job. When we realize that these are worldly happinesses and that leaning on them means at some point they're going to break and fall. But the delicate balance is that this doesn't mean these things are bad or wrong, or that pleasure and love and some kind of temporary happiness aren't available with them. They can be. And they can be very wholesome and lead to a lot of growth and a lot of good, wholesome action in the world. So it's not that we make the flip: "Well, everything's changing, so none of it's worth anything," and slide into aversion. No.

This is delicate. It's a sense of opening into, just beginning to let in the perceptions of constant change, of fluctuation, of the fact that we are continually thrown out of the nest—and to just be willing to hang out in that not knowing, in that instability. That actually opens us up more deeply to participate in life. It doesn't shut us down. Not "Okay, who cares about that anyway?" They say if you know a beautiful day is only here for a day, you can really enjoy that day. So it's all like that.

The mind might say, "If I really open to this instability, life is just too fearful."

But we shut down ahead of time out of fear.

The reality isn't like that at all. It's actually just the reverse. There's a sense of the totality of presence, the immediacy, when we're totally here in this moment—open to it, accepting it, just being with it for what it is without dragging in all our ideas and assumptions and concepts. Without that demand that it's got to stay the same, without tightening and contracting even before it's gone. It's very, very different.

But we can't talk ourselves into it. This is really where we practice: the steadiness, moment after moment, of cultivating awareness, cultivating this simple quality of attention that's willing to be so fresh that we don't already know everything before we even start looking. I mean, we think we do. Maybe you don't. I don't think I do consciously, but then I keep noticing I really do think I do.

This mindfulness—this is from Krishnamurti, and I like this description of how a moment of just pure mindfulness can feel: "When you look totally"—and you could be looking at the breath, at a sound, at a sensation in the body, at a mood, at a thought—"when you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself. Your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment, and then there is no room for fear, no contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

It has that sense of what Guy was saying this morning: the collectedness of all the psychic energy, just for a moment. Don't extend it in time—just for a moment. So present that we're not comparing or assessing or judging or fearing into the future. It's just this. Just this. That's why I keep using Ajahn Sumedho's language: anger is like this, pain is just this, in that moment. And therefore, in that moment, there's no conflict.

This sense of mindfulness, this innocent knowing, free from—or not confused with, I would say—all the concepts and ideas that come about something. We so often confuse these for the actual experience. And it's this confusing the ideas about an experience for the experience itself that keeps us in the habit of not perceiving anicca, impermanence.

A simple example: let's use physical pain because the physical sensation is just a little more gross, a little easier to notice. There's a sensation when you're sitting, and the first awareness of it might be, "My knee is really hurting." That's already a thought. That's already a concept: knee, my knee, hurting. And I know for me, as soon as I say that, there's a visual kind of picture in my mind, almost like my whole body and my knee down there. My eyes are closed—I'm not actually seeing my knee—but there's a visual image of me, my knee down there, really hurting.

And then right away, if I don't recognize that as a concept, if I don't bring attention just back into the sensation—we might say maybe it's burning or tingling. Yes, that's also a concept, but it's a little less fraught with sense of self and storyline and past and future. We don't go as far down the road with "my burning" as we do with "my bum knee that I had arthroscopic surgery on last year, and I can't believe I'm sitting here in this stupid hall. But if I go to a chair, that's failing, so I have to sit here even though..." Way down the road.

Bare experience would just be sensation, calm mind around it. But what we do is this: there's the perception of sensation, the perception leads to thoughts about it—like I said, my knee is hurting, I have a bad knee. Those thoughts, if we don't recognize them, very quickly form a story or a view that we absolutely believe. We don't even realize it's a description, a view. And that becomes the reality.

In this example, that could be what I said: I have a bad knee, I had surgery last year, and I know if I keep sitting like this, I'm going to do X, Y, and Z to my knee. I'm not saying whether it's true or not, but that's the whole view that immediately can spring up when the attention connects with burning.

I use that example because you can kind of see the way it moves.

One of the ways we don't recognize impermanence is that we don't see this process clearly. The lack of continuity in mindfulness actually hides impermanence from us.

Take the same dynamic with an emotion. You're sitting, and a very familiar but difficult emotion arises—we each have our favorite, the one we believe is really the root of who we are. Despair or loneliness or frustration or fear or depression, whatever it might be. And it's coming. Let's say it's worry.

You're noticing, and you feel like you're really mindful. "Here's worry. This is the story about the worry." We feel we're being really fresh with it because we see the story. "That's worry. But worry feels like this. I'm not buying the story."

Then something else happens. You go through the sitting, other things arise. Then you come back and say, "Well, this is here. It's been here all day." But the worry actually went away for a while. You didn't notice it at all. Then later in the sitting, or in the next sitting, there's worry again. Whether it's about the same thing as before or something different, you notice it and think, "I'm being really fresh with this."

But the thought and the view being solidified—we may not recognize this—is that this worry is always here. And it gets complicated. I might say, "Well, didn't it go away when you were eating lunch?" And you respond, "Well, I wasn't aware of it then because I was eating, but it was there. It was there waiting. And as soon as I got quiet, there was the worry."

It's as if we have a mountain of worry or despair or whatever, sitting down there in the gut or the throat, wherever we feel it. And sometimes we're distracted and don't feel it, but we know that when we're really mindful, there it is again. And that's who I am—this despair, this worry, this whatever.

So we're not acknowledging the impermanence in our experience. We're actually consciously denying it. "I didn't notice it, but that's just because my mindfulness wasn't good enough. If my mindfulness had been continuous, I would have known this worry was here all the time."

In fact, it's just the reverse. If we're really continuous in our attention, we'll notice something quite different. As strong as that despair or whatever is—you're really in it, it's really intense—suddenly there's just a little thought that comes through: "I wonder what's for lunch." And we go, "Well, that's distraction. Back to the worry." That didn't count.

Or we do go off and wonder about lunch, and after a few minutes of "I had pizza yesterday so it can't be pizza today, it can't possibly be as good," then we think, "Boy, I'm really a lightweight. Here I am, I could really be working with this core issue, and I'm worrying about what's for lunch, when really worry is who I am." We don't even want to get back to it. And we don't acknowledge that it's completely changing, changing, changing.

Or as I mentioned, a lot of times the really wholesome, positive states—contentment comes in, some samādhi, some steadiness of mind, equanimity—and as Guy was saying, we think, "Well, that's just what's supposed to happen," so we don't acknowledge it. Many people think, "This is some fluke. It's got nothing to do with me, because I know I'm going to be back in the despair any moment." So okay, contentment arises—let's not even pay any attention to it.

That's not going to hang around. And always kind of matching some idea of who we are or what we are, really leaning on some rotting old tree trunk of some idea about ourselves, instead of recognizing the constant change.

How many thoughts do you think you've had since you got here? Any idea? Sure, a lot of them are similar—I'll grant you that. But none of them are the same. Each thought is a new thought. They may not be the most creative thoughts in the world, but each thought is a new thought. You can't have the same thought twice. Similar, yes, but the same, no.

Just really noticing how much we deny the constant change. And there's another thing we do—I think someone mentioned it in a talk—selective perception. This is why "freedom from the known" is such an important line. We recognize, or I think Rodney said in his talk, we open to what we're already comfortable with. If you have certain political views, you're open to other people with those political views, and you can't see anything good about people who don't have those views.

I've seen that with myself, with some politician that I really have strong negative views about. I don't want to perceive anything wholesome or good about that person. That person couldn't have anything good going on. My mind just likes to make these boxes. It's not open for discovery. It's not fresh. And so we have this selective perception all the time.

"I'm this kind of person. I'm a low-energy kind of person." So if I'm on retreat and I wake up in the middle of the night—well, I'm a low-energy kind of person, I know that from my life. I need nine hours of sleep. If I get up now, there's no way I'm going to make it through the day because I'm a low-energy type of person. So I force myself back to sleep.

This is sort of from my own experience, what I'm saying. It took me years to actually say, "You know what? I'm wide awake. Get up. Just get up." And I'd find when I'd get up—not only was I a little sleepy, so what? I'd get up and I love the early morning hours. I don't need as much sleep when I'm on retreat. But how am I going to find that out if I'm telling myself, "No, I'm a low-energy type of person and this is what I know and this is how it is"?

Nothing's ever the same. No two days are the same. No situation's the same.

So other ways we deny impermanence: Someone mentioned how we try to recreate an experience. Recreate that really concentrated sitting. Recreate that perfect walking. Recreate that misty early morning, so we leap out of bed and run outside at exactly the same time because we had this really nice emotion when we were there.

But this time, of course, there's no way you can have the same experience twice. The conditions are different. The day's going to be different—misty or not. Your mental states will definitely be different because the day before you walked out open, no expectations, just present. Today you're running out filled with greed and hurrying and frustration. "Oh, let me feel this nice thing again." I don't think it's going to happen. It's going to be different. There's no way the conditions are ever all the same.

So what's the suffering in that? Trying to deny the shifting, the change.

Another thing is noticing, not trying to make something go away.

That's just aversion and wanting. But noticing when something's really gone—that's different. Like, for example, a strong emotion. When it's gone and you think, "Well, I just didn't notice it." Try actually noticing: "Now I'm not feeling despair, I'm feeling hunger." Try noticing: "There was contentment and that's gone, and now there's frustration." Just notice.

I know this is going to sound silly, but somehow this was a big insight for me. I was eating on a retreat not that long ago, very mindfully. I was quite quiet and slowed down, chewing, chewing, that little burst of flavor. And if you really stay with it, you see the flavor's gone like that, and then you're just masticating kind of tasteless stuff. You want to swallow it and get another bite of flavor. But I was just staying there, and I swallowed.

Usually when I'm paying attention like that, I swallow and there's sensations here and it's going down. In my mind, the concept is "This is the food and it's going down"—a whole concept of continuity. But this time I was just staying there, and I swallowed. I was in my mouth, and I swallowed, and the food was so gone. I mean, it was really gone. There was a sensation here, but that wasn't the food. That was just sensation here. I didn't hold on to the concept. I know this sounds silly, but that sense of the complete gone-ness of it—I couldn't find the food. It was gone.

We have to take the little insights we get. But it really spread out. Just notice that kind of thing and stay there with the gone-ness.

You can also notice beginnings. Meeting experience with this freshness, this beginner's mind—that's actually what mindfulness practice is. Whether it's the breath or the steps or sensation or emotion, all the instructions are just different ways of trying to help us, in any particular moment, to drop the concepts, drop the ideas from the past and what we want from the future and what we think should happen or will happen, and just sit down. "Well, what's going to happen now?"

I know when I'm on retreat and I'm really dropping in when I sit down and just go, "Okay, let's see what happens." No prior preconceptions. Not leaning into the future or dragging the past after us.

This is from the Buddha, a particular sutta called "One Fortunate Attachment"—actually, there are three suttas with the same verse. He says: "Let not a person revive the past or on the future build her hopes. For the past has been left behind and the future has not been reached. Instead, with insight, let her see each presently arisen state. Let her know that and be sure of it, invincibly, unshakably."

One of the monks gives an exposition of what that means. It's pretty much what you'd think, but I just want to say—he asks, what does it mean to not revive the past? It doesn't mean we can't think about the past. It doesn't mean we're so in the moment that we have no idea what our name is. People say, "If everything's changing and you're just open to the moment, how are you going to find your way home? How do you remember how to get to the dining room?" That's just our mind going through its trips. It's not like that. We can remember the past—well, less and less—but we can somewhat remember.

As this monk explained, reviving the past in the way the Buddha's talking about means one's consciousness becomes bound up with desire and lust when thinking about any particular aspect. "In the past, my body was like this, or I had this mood, or I had this form"—it becomes bound up with desire and lust.

And because of that, you delight in it, your consciousness shrinks, and that's what he's calling reviving the past. We're bound to it and we suffer.

The same thing about building one's hopes on the future. It's not that we can't make plans for the future or have a thought about what's to come. That in itself is no problem—that's not suffering. But again, when one's consciousness becomes bound up with desire, with attachment about building one's hopes on what's going to be in the future, then one becomes bound to it, one becomes suffering.

And what does it mean to be invincible in regard to presently arisen states? I love that translation—invincible. It means one's consciousness, one's awareness, one's presence is not bound up with desire, attachment, aversion, or lust about this presently arisen state. In other words, we're simply meeting this moment totally, just as it is, with totality of presence but no agenda. No agenda.

If you try to think, "How can I live like that?"—that's too much. But if you try to simply experience that in a moment, that's not too much. That's totally experienceable, and we all experience it many, many moments. In that moment of presence with whatever it is—sadness, hearing, sensation, contentment, it doesn't matter what's happening—that moment of pure presence without being bound by reactivity or fear, we are invincible. Invincible in terms of being unshakable. It's all workable. There's no suffering. There's no problem. There's nothing else one needs to do. Invincible. That's really a very powerful statement.

So this willingness, just this willingness to begin to explore the possibility of the perception of impermanence, the possibility of instability—not thinking about it, but bringing this pure perception, this freshness, this innocence of attention and totality to just this moment, just this moment—this willingness not to know, to recognize that each moment of mindfulness is like stepping into the unknown. That's what we're practicing, really. Opening to the unknown.

That doesn't leave us feeling bereft. That doesn't leave us feeling like, "Oh my God, life is unbearable." It actually opens us to enormous appreciation of the beauty, of the wonder, of the mystery. It doesn't mean it's always beautiful or lovely, but just the wonder of life, the sensitivity to be so present. When we don't know what's going to happen, isn't it a miracle? Whatever it is. And it doesn't mean we can't respond appropriately. Actually, we can be much more flexible because we don't have all our ideas about what should be happening.

We've already decided ahead of time what we're going to say, like in the interviews, right? You know what you're going to say and what we're going to answer, and it goes back and forth. You already had a better interview before you even came to see us—that one would work better anyway. But it's never like that. Anything you've ever planned, has it ever really gone that way? I used to sit on retreat having all these fantasies of what would happen when I went home and saw my partner—this and that, they'd say this and I'd do that—and then the next sitting would be a different way, and then a different way. Then I'd realize, okay, whatever I've thought, the one thing I know is that none of that is what's going to happen. We're wasting our time. We don't know.

So when we're open and present, we just appreciate anything, and that appropriate response is much more accessible. It's really such a different way to live, just in the immediacy of now, without dragging in the past, leaning into the future.

I want to close with a poem by Billy Collins that I really like because it gives that feeling to me. It's called "Aimless Love."

This morning, as I walked along the lake shore, I fell in love with a wren, and later in the day with a mouse the cat had dropped under the dining room table. In the shadows of an autumn evening, I fell for a seamstress still at her machine in the tailor's window, and later for a bowl of broth, steam rising like smoke from a naval battle. This is the best kind of love, I thought, without recompense, without gifts or unkind words, without suspicion or silence on the telephone. The love of the chestnut, the jazz cap and one hand on the wheel. No lust, no slam of the door. The love of the miniature orange tree, the clean white shirt, the hot evening shower, the highway that cuts across Florida. No waiting, no huffiness or rancor.

Just a twinge every now and then for the wren who had built her nest on a low branch overhanging the water, and for the dead mouse still dressed in its light brown suit.

But my heart is always propped up in a field on its tripod, ready for the next arrow.

After I carried the mouse by the tail to a pile of leaves in the woods, I found myself standing at the bathroom sink, gazing down affectionately at the soap, so patient and soluble, so at home in its pale green soap dish.

I could feel myself falling again as I felt its turning in my wet hands and caught the scent of lavender and stone.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute.

Nisargadatta Maharaj once said: "Be quiet, free from the obsession with 'what next.' In the silence, something may be heard which is ordinarily too fine and subtle for perception."

Free from the obsession with what next.

CHAPTER 367

Mingling Our Minds with the Dhamma

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the relationship between our deepest motivations and the moment-to-moment quality of intention (cetanā) that shapes our actions. Drawing from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche's teaching about "mingling our minds with the Dhamma until it permeates our whole being," she illuminates how wise understanding (sammā diṭṭhi) naturally transforms the habitual patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Wilson explores the Buddha's teaching that consciousness is naturally radiant and pure, only temporarily obscured by unwholesome mental factors. She demonstrates how simple mindfulness of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences reveals the automatic arising of clinging and aversion, and how clear seeing naturally releases these patterns without force or self-judgment. This connects to the Zen teaching that a lifetime of practice leads to "an appropriate response" - when the heart-mind is unclouded, the Brahmavihārās (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity) arise spontaneously.

The talk offers practical guidance on maintaining connection with our deepest purpose amid the distractions of modern life, citing inspiring examples including the Dalai Lama, Aung San Suu Kyi, and Mahā Ghosānanda. Wilson emphasizes the contagious nature of both wholesome and unwholesome states, encouraging practitioners to seek spiritual friendship (kalyāṇa-mittatā) and environments that support awakening. She concludes with Mahā Ghosānanda's prayer for world peace, reminding us that transformation begins with the peaceful heart of each individual.

So tonight I want to talk about motivation on two levels: our deep motivation, and also the moment-to-moment quality of intention, which is really how our purified consciousness manifests.

The essence of what I want to talk about comes from a line I read in a book by Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, where he talks about how we need to mingle the teachings with our minds, mingling our minds with the Dharma until it permeates our whole being. I love that because it's really a little synopsis of the whole path of our life. It doesn't happen all at once, but all the different ways that we practice and work in our lives are ways of working towards mingling our minds with the Dharma until it permeates our whole beings.

In terms of the Eightfold Noble Path, the beginning of the path, the beginning of our spiritual journey—and it keeps on increasing really to the end of it—is wise understanding, right view. Each time we recognize more accurately anything—mundane, supramundane, in practice, a problem in life—when we recognize it differently, the patterns that have kept us in suffering from not seeing clearly let go. That's right view. And that can be just enough to see that something doesn't seem to be working in my life, that maybe there's some other way. That gets us started on a spiritual path. And then the right view just keeps deepening and deepening. How does that manifest in our life, in our choices? That's where intention comes in.

I want to read a passage because I love it, but also just to pique us with the possibility of a very deep expression of wise understanding. This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was one of the most beloved and well-practiced of the Tibetan teachers in the last century. He's dead now.

"What we normally call the mind is the deluded mind, a turbulent vortex of thoughts whipped up by attachment, anger, and ignorance. This mind, unlike enlightened awareness, is always being carried away by one delusion after another. Thoughts of hatred or attachment suddenly arise without warning"—can you relate to that?—"and triggered off by such circumstances as an unexpected meeting with a friend or a difficult person. And unless they are immediately seen through with proper awareness, they quickly take root and proliferate, reinforcing the habitual predominance of hatred or attachment in the mind and adding more and more karmic patterns."

So that's just a description of our normal mind.

"Yet, however strong"—this is the right view part now—"however strong these thoughts may seem, they are just thoughts and will eventually dissolve back into emptiness. Once you recognize the intrinsic nature of the mind"—meaning the purity of consciousness—"these thoughts that seem to appear and disappear all the time can no longer fool you. Just as clouds form, last for a while, and then dissolve back into the empty sky, so deluded thoughts arise, remain for a while, and then vanish in the voidness of mind. In reality, nothing at all has happened."

I just love that. I'm sure in some ways you've all touched that sense of how mundane or wild a thought could be—attachment, aversion, confusion—and then it's just gone. And really, in some way, all of our mindfulness practice, our samādhi practice, all the different ways—effort, non-effort, all the million different ways we hear of practice—the essence of all of the path, all the techniques, and not just meditation practice but working with loving-kindness, working with sīla, with purity of conduct as Guy spoke of last night, with generosity: all of the path is for the releasing of these obsessive entrancements of attachment and aversion and all about "me." It's about our relationship to these entrancements, releasing these obsessive habits of mind. Not because they're bad, but because we see through them. And in that releasing of these habits, it allows the intrinsic nature, the natural great peace—the potential of how we can relate in life—the natural peace and ease of the heart and mind allows it to shine through.

So when we talk about these habits of greed, of aversion, of delusion, it's not like we hate them or you're evil. It's just that they hide the potential, that sense of ease that can come just when you hear Dilgo Khyentse say that all this vortex of thoughts dissolves back into emptiness and nothing at all has happened. Just nothing to get so upset about.

So that's one radical expression of wise understanding or right view.

A question that often comes up—whether it does or not, it's what I'm going to address tonight—is: how does this right view, this wisdom where we say nothing at all has happened, function in life? Often what can come is, "Well then, if nothing has happened, does that mean nothing matters? How do we function in life? Why even talk about purity of conduct? If nothing has happened, nothing matters." That way of looking is an aspect of delusion called falling into emptiness. Nothing matters, nothing's happened, I can do whatever I want. No, no, no—it's an attitude, it's not really wisdom.

So how does this right view show up in our life? This is where our motivation—both our deep purpose in life, our deep motivation, and also the moment-to-moment qualities in the mind that arouse intention to act—shows up. In terms of how the Buddha described it, the beginning of the path is wise understanding, right view—one of eight. Think of it more as a circle, but still it's in this order. The second is wise thought, wise intention, wise attitude—different translations of the same thing.

So in other words, how we think about or understand things—ourselves and experience, whatever's happening in the moment—is what gives rise to the attitude, the thought, the intention in the mind, which is what forms the third, fourth, and fifth steps of the path: our wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. In other words, how we speak and act in the world.

In terms of the link between the depth of understanding, the purity of consciousness, and how we show up in the world—the choices we make, the way we act with ourselves and others—it really comes together in this link of our motivation, our intention, our attitudes.

Guy mentioned the quality that's present in every moment of consciousness: cetana, intention, motivation. This is one way I want to refer to it. It's on the micro, moment-to-moment level. There's an intention for each movement, for each action, for a choice we make in the mind. It's a little movement of mind. And that particular intention that arises is fed by, is formed by whatever factors are present in the mind at that time.

So, for instance, if we're feeling sensations in the stomach and the mind recognizes that as hunger, there could be fear present in the mind at that time. And that fear says, "Oh my God, I'm hungry. If I don't really get to the front of the line, there might not be enough food." That fear motivates you to jump up and run out of the hall one minute before the bell rings. Or you want to, and you have to hold yourself down. Or you take three times more food than you can actually ever eat, because there's wanting in the mind.

Does that happen? You get to your plate and think, "What am I going to do with all this?" The next day you think, "I'm not going to do that." You think you're taking the right amount, but there's still wanting in the mind and it colors the perception, and we take too much.

Or there could be those same sensations and the mind is in a really quite quiet, equanimous place, and it just notices hunger. There's no wanting, there's no fear, there's calm, there's wisdom, there's concentration—and so you just keep on sitting there. Or there's calm and concentration and wanting, but the wanting is to hold on to the concentration, not the food, so you keep sitting there, but you're sitting there because you're wanting.

You get a sense of how the seed, the heart of actions in this way of looking, is not in how it looks from the outside, but in the intentions that are coloring, that are driving the choices. The habits of our mind are what show up in the intentions, and that's what naturally changes, purifies through the moment-to-moment mindfulness, the awareness, through seeing and understanding clearly.

Do you remember Guy's quotation from the Zen master? What was the question? "What's the purpose of a lifetime of practice?" And the answer was: an appropriate response.

This is exactly what it's talking about. It's incredibly powerful and it's really profound. An appropriate response implies that in any particular moment when something happens, the attention is so present and the understanding, the heart-mind, the consciousness is pure. In that moment it's not going to be colored by greed, hatred, or confusion, and that's what allows a recognition of the situation, of what's an appropriate response. You don't have to think it through. That's why the habits of mind are so key.

Again from Dilgo Khyentse, another way of describing what happens when the habits of wanting, of aversion, of delusion—which come connected to pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, as you saw this morning—are present. Dilgo Khyentse says: "When the sense organs encounter an object, the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object influenced by your accumulated habits and past experiences, the process is entirely subjective. When your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, and what you do is in accordance with that seeing, you experience everything as primordially pure and beautiful."

So just playing with that possibility—really seeing how consciousness, the moment of knowing, awareness itself, as a friend of mine described it, is squeaky clean. It's pure. The Buddha talks about the mind, the citta, the consciousness as naturally radiant and pure. It's colored, or we don't see through it, when it's obstructed by greed being there in a moment, or hatred, aversion, confusion, and we don't recognize it. But that natural purity is never stained or touched or affected really by these things. They don't mess it up.

That's why I keep talking about how we learn to shift our refuge from believing in the habits to noticing the awareness. Just that moment is a huge shift of habit.

Today in the questions, I felt—of course, I was thinking about this—so I felt like, oh yes, this really brought it out very well. Seeing how when something unpleasant arises, the natural habit, when we're not really noticing or paying attention, can be just a subtle aversion or a pulling away, or it can go all the way to murderous rage. When it's pleasant, the subtle habit is that wanting, that leaning in, that liking. And then that can go on to color the whole world. And as someone said really perceptively, with neutral, it's like... huh?

You know, let's get something else going on here because there's nothing happening. That's delusion. And the seed of all of those reactions is that they're all referring back to me.

But did you notice—and some people mentioned this—just the simple noticing, the relaxing, observing, and accepting, allowing it to be just as it is? Not trying to change it, not saying, "I have to get rid of this habit of clinging. Either I will never cling, or I will never let myself experience another pleasant moment. I'll do everything so that God forbid clinging should ever arise." You can hear the intention behind that is not wisdom. It's either wanting or aversion. So we're just feeding it again.

But did you notice in a moment of simple mindfulness? Oh, pleasant—look at that, the clinging comes up. Or someone described the unpleasant experience in their body and then saw the pleasantness of the thought, just how the Buddha said it somewhere: an ordinary person knows of no escape from unpleasant sensation except to lust after pleasant experience. And so that comes to be the habit of the mind. That's it—daydreaming or eating or whatever it is.

But the point is, when we just notice that, just notice it, when the mind's relatively quiet like sitting here, we just see it and go, "Oh, well, that doesn't really work. Look at that." And just for a moment—not for our whole life, unfortunately, but just for a moment—in that moment, there's the release of that habit, the release of the clinging. It's not out of a should or because it's bad. It's out of wise understanding, the clear seeing in that moment. Pleasant thought—there's nothing to cling to. It doesn't do it anyway. And we're here again. Do you get a sense of what I mean?

And that's simple. That's natural. We're not saying, "I'm going to see this in order to get rid of it." As you know, that doesn't work. So the natural shift of habits, the shift of intention from clinging to this pleasant thought to take me away—somehow shifting to just, "Oh, let it go." It's renunciation and it's just wisdom and it's just presence. That's quite spontaneous, quite natural. That's a shift of intention, a shift of attitude, and it happens by itself.

So in terms of appropriate response, as Guy said, in the moment of real presence, when the consciousness, the citta, the mind and heart is not colored, not caught in greed, hatred, or confusion—we have to be awake, not in a moment of being dulled out, because then that's delusion—the natural response, the appropriate response, can be one of the four Brahma Viharas that Guy mentioned last night. In the face of meeting someone, there's this natural connectedness, acceptance. In the face of suffering, there's a natural compassion. In the face of joy, we're open, connected—there's a natural sharing of joy. And in all things, there's an equanimity of knowing: I can't control even my own experience, never mind yours, and things are as they are.

This was expressed beautifully in a different way by Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrows of humankind become your sole concern."

Not like that's a should. It's just that when we're seeing with wise understanding, that sense of fear and separation, that sense of "it's all about me"—it goes away. And then that's the appropriate response. If there's some need, there's—right, it's my need, your need. It's just a need. It's just caring for the world. It's not at all a kind of "Oh right, nothing ever happened and so nothing matters and to heck with it all." It's not that at all. Quite connected.

I have this one page of notes I keep—oh, here it is, I keep misplacing it. But seeing once or twice, or one or two thousand times—because how many moments of that clear seeing have there been here and in our lives? There are really many moments where the habit releases itself. And each moment of that clarity, of that wisdom, of that metta, whichever it happens to be, is shifting the habit of mind. Again, that quotation Guy mentioned: what the mind frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination, the habit of the mind.

It will. That used to scare me when I would look at, you know, when I'm not really paying attention and just moving through the day without much awareness—where does my mind go? Left to its own devices, it's often not very pretty.

But how many moments there have been of pure awareness, of kindness, of generosity, of just allowing, accepting. On a retreat, it's a lot of moments. And continuing in our life, it really is shifting. But the habits—that's why there's a path. That's why it really takes this sense of moving into connecting with our deep motivation, our commitment, our sense of why, if it is, for each of us, why and how this path of awakening is important to us. And finding how we can continue to connect with that motivation and inspire ourselves, here and in our lives.

Because the habits are strong. They don't just vanish. It feels like here on retreat they might, but even more in our daily lives, it's almost like we get tricked back into the habits—either not noticing them or believing in them, or they're so familiar that they just feel like that's the way to respond in life. Someone is angry at us or does something hurtful, and the normal response is, yeah, you should get angry back.

One of the ways I feel we get tricked is that, by and large—not completely, that's why we have to look for what helps us with our motivation—but by and large, the messages we get from the greater culture reinforce these habits. Often, at least this is my experience.

Rodney was telling me yesterday—I don't know where he got this figure, but we'll assume it's accurate—that he read somewhere that in a normal week, for a normal person, whatever that means, in this culture, we are confronted with approximately 17,000 media advertisement inputs. That's billboards, things coming up on the internet, television, radio, magazines, postcards, phone calls—17,000 inputs in a week. That's a lot. And probably many of them are quick, subliminal, we don't notice them consciously. But what are those inputs telling us? You need this. You're not good enough. You should do this. You need to have this. Everyone else has it. Who are you? You need to be prettier, richer, thinner, younger. You need to be something. That's going in.

How many times—I call it a mail order catalog mind. Here we get a lot of mail order catalogs, and sometimes when I'm just tired and can't really focus at night, I like to flip through them. And how often do you end up really wanting something you didn't even know existed five minutes ago? But suddenly you've got to have it for your well-being and happiness, right? Well, 17,000 times a week we're subjected to that. Once in a while, it's going to catch us.

Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche said—and this is where we need to call on our motivation, our intention—when that happens, you don't hate yourself, but you notice it. He says, watch the fickleness of the mind, how easily it is influenced just by a pleasant or unpleasant sight or thought or sound into an immediate mood. Then, I would add, if I don't notice it at that point, that mood expands—we're off into a whole world, just triggered by some nice looking something in a catalog. And then there's a thought: wow, with that I could do this and that, and then we're off. Or how often are we a little bit bored and we start surfing on the internet? The next thing, I'm planning trips and looking at airlines and renting cars. I have to do that a lot anyway, but I get sidetracked off into something else. It's so easy.

So not that it's bad, but this is where, if we just let ourselves flow without resistance in the waves of society, in the stream—and this is what the Buddha said when he said practicing in his way is going against the stream of society, a quotation I read from Bhikkhu Bodhi—so it's not that we want to hate and fight, but we want to wake up.

We want to wake up. I mean, I hope we want to. I want to anyway. This is what the spiritual path is: seeing why we're doing what we're doing. What brings us happiness and peace? How can we affect others to help them have happiness and peace? What brings us into more suffering, into more feeling of neediness, of want?

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh. He says, "We've lost our taste for being quiet, for being alone. Society can take many things from us and dull us with noises, smells, sights, so many distractions. So the first thing for us to do is to return to ourselves in order to recover ourselves, to be our best. This is very important. Then we need to reorganize our daily lives so that we do not allow society to colonize us. We need to be independent, to be real people, not just the victim of society and other people."

Personally, I wouldn't use the word "victim," but more like haplessly tossed about by the winds of habit. But as Rodney said, really, we're hermetically sealed. No one else is making us fall into the habits of wanting, of aversion, of delusion. It's not that, but I think it's really helpful to recognize how we're not separate from each other, from the world, from anything. We are the world. The world is ourselves.

And sometimes that's beautiful. The beautiful, wholesome emotions and ways of being are contagious. But so are the others. Wanting is very contagious. Fear is contagious. Have you ever noticed that? I remember reading about a big fire in a nightclub in Rhode Island a few years ago. People panicked, and quite a lot of people died in the fire. I read somewhere later about it, someone who survived describing it. They said when the fire first started, people were scared, but they were heading more or less okay towards the door. And then they saw one person losing themselves in panic. And that panic is what spread like wildfire, and everyone lost control and trampled each other, and people died.

Well, the beautiful, the wholesome states of heart and mind are actually even more contagious because they're really more the natural expression of the truth, of the way things are, of who we are. But if, at least as I've found, I just kind of say, "Okay, well now I've done a retreat and I know that's important and I'll just sit back and let the truth mingle with my mind and body and turn into the compassionate bodhisattva of the ages..." It's not like I have to go out and try hard. It doesn't happen that way.

But it's more that willingness to recognize the moment-to-moment creation of decisions, of intention, of response to life. And it's not that we have to make our actions always be perfect. Forget about that. But finding in ourselves on a deep level—this is a more macro way of talking about motivation, of intention—finding what one Buddhist monk, Nyanaponika Thera, who wrote the guide The Heart of Buddhist Meditation, calls "aligning ourselves with our deepest purpose" as an aspect of wider mindfulness.

And this is really something that's come up in a few of the conversations I've been having with people in different ways. First, connecting with, really honoring, finding for yourself what is deeply true and important for you in your life. And then not just saying, "Okay, now I've found it, let it do its work," but also seeing how, as we make decisions, as we live our lives, as we go through our actions, connection with that purpose helps us make choices, helps us align ourselves with what we're doing and why, with what's really important. And also finding whatever in our life supports us to continue to deepen, to continue to reconnect with our purpose.

A couple of people have said here how when going through the retreat, when they come to a time—which does happen—where they can't connect to their commitment to practice or their motivation or what it is that inspires them... Sometimes you just can't find that. And if that lasts for a while, it gets a lot harder. Whatever's going on gets a lot harder. You're sitting and walking, and "Why am I doing this?" We all have times like that.

But if that really goes on for a long time, it's helpful to find things that help us connect. And sometimes we can get a little too caught up in thinking—like Ajahn Chah says, be independent. So we think, "I just have to be independent. I have to totally, all by myself, get in touch with my deepest purpose, stay really motivated, stay really inspired, and it's all up to me." You know? No. Let's give it over. It's hard enough. The path is hard enough. But just like we can't exist in isolation, just as we affect one another, so we can also use that to find what helps us reconnect.

So just another couple of words about trusting yourself. Really, you may already know what your deep motivation is, what your commitment is, what your inspiration is, what your purpose is. You may know that. And it may change over years—different words emerge. It may not even be words; it may just be a certain sense, a certain feeling. I can't put it in words, but sometimes that's all it is for me. And when I'm touching it, everything's clear. I know. The things that I do, the choices before me, are clear. There's not all this second-guessing and self-doubt and "is it good enough" and comparing. I know. And if something comes up that's really off, I don't have to agonize—should I do it? Shouldn't I do it? Should I get involved? It's like I know. I know. It may be hard. I may want to do the thing, but I know. And there's really no question.

When I'm not in touch with that, the first step is recognizing that—the feeling of doubt and confusion—and then finding what helps us connect.

So it may change over the years. But I just want to put in a plug: if this is something that resonates with you—it may not, and doesn't have to—but if it's something that resonates with you, just in your own time, in your own way, let yourself really deeply... it's not so much thinking about it, but just see, let yourself feel whatever it is. And honor it in yourself.

Often I found when I first started tuning into this, long ago, the expressions that arose in my mind, the thoughts that would come out, sounded—from my self-judgmental, self-hating pattern of mind—really arrogant or highfalutin. You know, "Who the heck do you think you are?" That kind of thing. Like it was coming from an ego place. But the real deep purpose is not coming from an ego place. Those thoughts of "who do you think you are, you jerk"—that's coming from the ego place.

So if something comes up—I don't know, it can be just "let me be more kind in life," or "let me be loving to my family," all the way up to "let me make the commitment to go through all however many eons of lifetimes it takes to be born as a Buddha"—whatever it is. "May I serve all beings. May I serve the Dharma. May I live with compassion"—whatever it is for you. Just let that be and honor it and treat it with tenderness and care. Don't dismiss it with "not me, not this lifetime."

Because the essence of the motivation is in that seed of intention. We can't control the results in life, how it manifests, how other people perceive us. If with the clearest intention in the world it doesn't turn out the way we want—that's nothing we can control. And mostly our tendency is to evaluate whether the motivation was right by whether things turned out in a good way. But that's not necessarily in our control.

So it's really learning to trust this depth of wisdom, of purity, in our own hearts and minds. You can't fix the world. But the reference point is what's arising in my heart, in my consciousness, what's motivating this action.

We keep using the Dalai Lama—he's so quotable. But he often talks about, when people ask him, "How do you know if what you're doing is right?" And he says, "I just trust the purity of my intention."

Tibetans—the next generation of young Tibetans, energetic activists. They were basically reproaching him because his deep commitment to engaging with the Chinese who've overrun Tibet and are systematically destroying the culture is really one of nonviolence, of compassion. He's committed to that.

And this interview really touched me because these young Tibetans were saying, basically, "Old man, it's not working. You're wrong. We need to take another tack." And so this article said he was quite touched, like a little tear coming down. And he's so open. He's saying, "You know, you might be right. It could be that you're right. It could be that I've been wrong. But I cannot be otherwise." Just so committed to compassion and nonviolence that the reference point is the deep motivation and purity of heart and mind. Not, "Well, this purity didn't do it, so I'll give over to anger. That'll get the result I want." That's from outside in. And wisdom and freedom and compassion and connectedness come from inside out.

So that's really the importance of connecting with our motivation. It gives us a sense of purpose and a stability and a reference point to maybe do things we wouldn't have thought we could do. I mean, when you first came on a nine-day retreat—some of you, this is your first retreat—when you thought about it, did you think you could make it through if you knew what it was like? When I look back at my first ten-day retreat, oh my God, I had no clue what I was getting into, which is mostly how people come. And then when you come to the next retreat, you'll find you forgot most of the bad stuff and you remember the nice moments, and then you'll start again and go, "Oh my God, I forgot about this"—but then you're here.

There's a clarity of purpose that we can come back to that keeps us going, that allows us to make choices we wouldn't have necessarily thought we could make.

One of the ways I look to keep connecting with my motivation and to keep inspiring it when it's getting a little weak or I'm getting distracted is by looking—this is one of the ways it works for me—looking to other people, like the Dalai Lama, but he's not the only one, of course, who manifest that. You can see they're ennobled by their commitment to the purity of their motivation and such a deep refuge in that.

Another person like that is Aung San Suu Kyi, the woman who's been the leader of the Burmese freedom movement. She's been under house arrest in her house for the better part of seventeen years. The place—I went by it the other month. You can't really get close, but you can kind of look over. It's all dilapidated, and no one's allowed to see her but the person who cooks for her.

Seventeen years. Her husband, who lived in England, died. She hasn't seen her kids for years now. She could leave any time, but she knows she could never come back. And even though no one can talk about her in that country—it's so repressive—she's really the focal point of so many people's hopes and sense of possibility. Anywhere you go there, as soon as people aren't around any that could be spying—because the military regime—I've been with poor nuns in little poor nunneries, and they take you upstairs, and they have her picture in little places underneath by the books, and they'd call her "the Lady." The taxi driver: "The Lady, she lives just down there." Everybody knows. She's committed to that.

But it's not—it's again, it's like the Dalai Lama—it's coming from a sincerity of her deep inner motivation, not out of an outer looking at what should happen.

This is from an interview. She said, "Just responding appropriately in each moment."

But you can see where it's taken her. What enormous courage and what enormous steadfastness and clarity of purpose. And I know from a few people who've known her and visited her that it's not like it's so clear and easy.

So really we have to reconnect with our purpose moment after moment, choice after choice. One teacher said once that every moment we're committing to something. The question is: to what?

So it takes us back into this immediacy of awareness of the moment. "So now I made a choice out of greed. Do I want to spend the next hour beating myself up about it, or do I want to see what choice I'm making in this moment? Oh yeah, right. My deep commitment is to awareness, to freedom from suffering. Okay, in this moment, can I manifest that?"

Moment after moment. What choices are we making?

Another person who really inspires me in this way—and this is just one example of how it's contagious, how we're interconnected. Because if something or someone or their behavior inspires us or touches us, what is it that's actually inspiring? It's touching that same potential in ourselves. Otherwise, we couldn't appreciate it. So when we see someone who's really so committed to compassion, like His Holiness, and if that inspires us, it's because it's touching that place of compassion in ourselves.

We're not independent in this. We use that inspiration, but not to give it all over—thinking "he's like that and I could never be." Rather, we see he's like that and that touches me. This is the potential for compassion in my heart in this moment.

Maha Ghosananda is another one who inspires me, because of seeing someone in whom the habits had really been shifted, been purified. He died on March 15th of this year, just recently. He was a Cambodian monk, very much like Thich Nhat Hanh—a real peace activist and peacemaker, a deeply realized Buddhist Cambodian monk who came out of the killing fields. His whole family was destroyed in that. In the Buddhist world, he's very famous for being so dedicated to peace and to metta, really, working in the refugee camps with all the Cambodians whose families had been killed. He led peace walks through Cambodia. He was just very inspiring.

This is from the New York Times obituary. They quoted a professor of Buddhism at the University of California who wrote that "Maha Ghosananda's ability to forgive those responsible for the murder of his entire family is incomprehensible until one heard his explanation of Buddhism." Maha Ghosananda said he does not question that loving one's oppressors—Cambodians loving the Khmer Rouge—may be the most difficult attitude to achieve. But then he added, "It's the law of the universe that retaliation, hatred, and revenge only continue the cycle." Reconciliation, he continued, "means that we see ourselves as the opponent. For what is the opponent but a being in ignorance? And we ourselves are also ignorant of many things."

Powerful.

Now, that's inspiring, but this next piece is what really moved me. A few years ago, there was a conference at Spirit Rock of Buddhist teachers from all over, from all different traditions. Maha Ghosananda was there, but he was clearly in the middle stages of dementia—I don't know whether it was Alzheimer's or what. So he was there and someone would stay with him through the day. He certainly wasn't presenting or anything. He was just kind of sitting there, and someone would be with him to make sure he didn't wander off.

If you went up and spoke to him, or even if you didn't, he just beamed total metta. It was so powerful to me. At the very end, they had him come up on the platform and lead us in the refuges. It just came out of him—first it started in French, and then it went into English, and it just poured forth. Sometimes he would end retreats by passing out red strings you tie around your wrist. So they gave him strings to pass out to about two hundred people.

When he gave it to me, and I watched with others, he would hand it to you with total presence, completely beam you with metta, and then move on to the next person. But he couldn't really carry on much of a conversation. I've spent a lot of time with my parents in nursing homes. I've seen a lot of people with dementia. So when I saw this, I thought, that's the habit of his heart and mind. This is how he got there. For some reason, I thought, wow—that's a life well lived. That's an appropriate response.

It really inspires me. If I think, "Fat chance, Carol, you're not going to get there," that's not helpful, that's not inspirational. But when I just let that touch me, and I don't go into any story about Carol or what's possible or the future, but just feel the power of love, of purity of heart and mind, in a moment—in a moment—that's possible.

So for me, that really inspires me. What I'm saying, though, is not that this should be your trip or that this should be what inspires you, but to find in your life the people, the readings, the activities—whatever it is that helps you reconnect, retouch deep motivations. It even deepens them, because people say, "Oh, more is possible than I even knew."

If I just stayed in my own little experience, it would be so limited. But as Maha Ghosananda said, we're all beings with ignorance. So what is possible for one, we can touch that in ourselves.

And that's the next piece I want to mention—recognizing this contagiousness of how we manifest, of how each other manifests. Just as we can catch wholesomeness and inspiration and commitment to freedom or wisdom or compassion or non-harming from others, so also we must recognize that how we are, how we manifest in a moment, with our own understanding as best we can, also affects others in the same way.

This is why we always emphasize the importance of sangha, the importance of recognizing spiritual friendship. Sometimes we're the person through whom the light is shining and we're the spiritual friend. Other times—and it could change every five minutes—it's the other person. We're all in this together. And so no one of us has to say, "I have to be totally perfect." But to have that openness to see what choices I'm making, and the openness to recognize when someone else is acting from compassion, from love, from wisdom—and instead of getting into envy or whatever, to let it in. It's kind of like sympathetic joy, like compassion. It's sort of like sympathetic goodness, appreciative goodness. We catch it from one another. Recognize and recognize. Cultivate the wholesome.

One of the reasons I really like to go and practice and sometimes teach in Burma, even though the government is really one of the worst in the world and there's a lot of horrible stuff going on, is that there are also quite a lot of Theravada Buddhist retreat centers and places to practice. It's a culture where, for the majority of the people, it's a Buddhist culture. And so there's a sense of—yes, Buddhism as a religion, but even without that—the qualities of non-harming behavior, of generosity as a source of happiness, not as "should" but as a source of happiness, of real metta, of real friendliness as the normal way of meeting someone new, as well as a real love of and respect and support for bhavana, meditation practice. Those are really deeply in the culture.

I didn't know that. The first time I went there was about six or seven years ago to do a retreat. I'd heard that, but I didn't really get it without being there—how much being surrounded by, continuing to meet people not just in the retreat centers but taxi drivers and the people who run the little guest houses and poor women who come in and help to cook in the meditation centers. I mean, really, so many people, people that you just meet on the street, imbue this kind of quality. They ask, "What are you doing here?" My first taxi ride, the young guy goes, "Well, what are you doing here?" I said, "Well, I came to meditate." And the response—and this is more the norm than the exception—he turns around. Luckily, the cars are old and things are going slow, so it's not that scary. He turns around and goes, "You're here to meditate? That's so wonderful! I really want to meditate too, but I have to take care of my mother." And you hear all the really heartrending stories. But he's not saying, "Oh, I can't do it." He's so happy that I'm there to meditate.

And the sense of generosity—of people's time, of food, of anything they can do to support you—is so strong. And people are so happy in being generous, which is the piece I never really got intellectually. Once we were in a village, I was with some friends, and an old fisherman took us up to look at a house a friend had built. He took like two hours of his day. Then we came back and he was so generous. We wanted to give him something, but he wouldn't take it. But he wanted to give us something. And all he had was a big dried fish. So that's what he gave us, this dried fish—and so happy to be able to give.

You receive this dried fish, and our kind of Western mind goes, "What are we going to do with this?" Take it to your friend in Bangkok? We're thinking, "Yeah, right, I'm going to take this dried fish to Bangkok." But he's so sincere and happy. This is just the first thing that came to my mind; there are about a hundred different examples. You just feel so honored, so happy to receive it.

And then he leaves and we go, of course we can't bring it to Bangkok. So who can we give it to? And immediately we thought of some nuns we knew who could really use it that day. We went and gave it to them, and then we were so happy to give someone this dried fish. The more you're there, the happier you get—you just want to start giving things, giving time, doing things.

Not the way we think of it here, where it's "oh, they did this for me so I have to do it for them"—tit for tat. That's not generosity. That's like doing the right thing; it's not bad. But this real generosity is a source of happiness. You want to do things for people. You want to give. It's mixed with mettā.

I've been going for about the last four or five years. The last few years I teach a month at Spirit Rock with Guy and some other friends, and I've been showing up from Burma the day before. The first couple of times I did it, they would say, "Carol, don't you think you could give yourself a little more time? You've got to teach, you've got to get over jet lag." And all that's true—I get tired. But they stopped saying that now because they noticed, "Geez, every time you come back from Burma, you're in such a good place. You're so happy."

And that's what it is. You catch the beauty, the joy of generosity, of mettā, of love of the Dhamma. These are just normal people, and we catch it. When we come back, when we catch it, we can pass it on. Not by "I'm going to give you generosity, I'm so great." No, just by being happy. Just by sharing it. It becomes a way of being.

That's just an example. So in a world of choices and actions and relationships, really seeing that each moment we make a choice—each moment we can choose to connect with, to align with our deepest motivation. And when we don't, the next moment we can choose to just see with awareness what we're doing, not beat ourselves up. What are we feeding? What are we starving?

I'll end with two quotations. One is about a Native American elder who is teaching his grandchildren about life. He said, "A fight is going on inside me, a terrible fight, between two wolves. One wolf represents fear, anger, envy, greed, arrogance, self-pity, guilt, ego—all those things. The other one represents joy, peace, love, generosity, friendship, kindness, compassion, faith. The same fight is going on inside you too, and inside every other person," he added.

The grandchildren thought about it for a minute, and then one child asked his grandfather, "Which wolf will win?" The old Cherokee simply replied, "The one you feed."

The Buddha used that a lot—not that story, but the imagery—looking at what we're feeding, what we're starving in the consciousness, in the mind. Sometimes the delusion is there and we don't know. We really think our motivation is coming from the purest place, from real compassion, from caring, from mettā, from wisdom. And that's really the best we can do—it's true. We just don't know. The delusion could be manifesting and we don't see it.

But we keep paying attention. If we find over time that the way we're acting or the things we're doing leads to suffering increasing, or wanting increasing, or aversion increasing—I don't mean just a mood that's coming and moving through, but over time, over days—you can really start to sense something's feeding this ill will. That's when we stop and look. Just stop and look. What's going on? Can I align more? Find a way to connect with that inspiration, that commitment, that purpose.

So I want to end with a quotation from Howard Zinn, a historian: "To be hopeful, to be an optimist in bad times, is not just foolishly romantic.

It is based on the fact that human history is a history not only of cruelty, but also of compassion, sacrifice, courage, kindness. What we choose to emphasize in this complex history will determine our lives. If we see only the worst, it destroys our capacity to do something. If we remember those times and places—and there are so many—where people have behaved magnificently, this gives us the energy to act, and at least the possibility of sending this spinning top of a world in a different direction.

And if we do act, in however small a way, we don't have to wait for some grand utopian future. The future is an infinite succession of presents. And to live now as we believe human beings should live, in defiance of all that is bad around us, is itself a marvelous victory.

Let us close with Maha Ghosananda's prayer for world peace:

The suffering of Cambodia has been deep. From this suffering comes great compassion. Great compassion makes a peaceful heart. A peaceful heart makes a peaceful person. A peaceful person makes a peaceful family. A peaceful family makes a peaceful community. A peaceful community makes a peaceful nation. And a peaceful nation makes a peaceful world.

May all beings live in happiness and peace.

CHAPTER 368

The Jewel of Awareness

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this deeply practical talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to fall in love with awareness itself rather than endlessly seeking happiness through changing experiences. Drawing from both Theravāda and Tibetan teachers including Sogyal Rinpoche, the Dalai Lama, Ajahn Sumedho, and Nisargadatta, she illuminates how our habitual patterns—pursuing pleasure, avoiding pain, and organizing everything around a felt sense of 'me'—keep us spinning in confusion even as we sincerely seek freedom.
>
> Wilson emphasizes that awareness is not something we create or achieve; it's always already present, like a radiant jewel we hold in our hands yet overlook while searching elsewhere for happiness. Through vivid examples—from sipping tea to walking in the desert to watching Yo-Yo Ma exchange instruments with an African bush musician—she demonstrates how mindfulness practice is simply a matter of turning attention around to recognize the knowing itself. Whether the breath is smooth or ragged, whether we're experiencing pleasure or pain, the doorway to freedom is equally available.
>
> The talk offers a liberating reframe: we don't need to get rid of wanting, aversion, or self-referencing thoughts. We simply shift our refuge from obsessing over conditions to resting in awareness, where 'wanting is like this' or 'doubt is like this' becomes the next object of knowing rather than a problem to solve. Wilson concludes with Billy Collins' poem 'Aimless Love,' evoking the tender appreciation for ordinary moments that naturally arises when we stop seeking confirmation and simply meet life with innocent, fresh awareness.

So what I hope to talk about tonight is falling in love with awareness, recognizing our true home. Essentially, what's the point of what we're doing here, in and out, in and out? What's the breath got to do with it?

This is from Sogyal Rinpoche: "The purpose of meditation is to introduce us to that which we really are, our pure awareness, which underlies the whole of life and death. In the stillness and silence of meditation, we glimpse and return to that deep inner nature that we have so long ago lost sight of amidst the busyness and distraction of our minds. Meditation then is bringing the mind home."

I'd like to say it's not so much bringing the mind home as if it were ever somewhere else, but simply learning to recognize more frequently and trust the recognition of pure awareness as our true home.

Why? Because essentially, that's the path of happiness. That's the moment—a moment of what Mark talked about last night—the ending of suffering. Not some place in the future at the end of some long stream that we get to, but right now in this moment. When we recognize true awareness rather than getting lost in the habits that Mark spoke about last night—the habits of wanting, of aversion, of me, me, me. When we shift our attention from objects and experience, from "what am I going to get" and "what does this mean," back to the simplicity of awareness in this moment. That's essentially what I want to talk about.

I wish I could just share with you the simplicity and the amazingness of this—the sense of the simplicity of consciousness, of knowing. It's like a radiant jewel sitting here that we hold in our hands, that shines in every single moment of conscious experience. And we're so busy looking for something to make us happy, so busy trying to get rid of the things we don't like, that we miss it, miss it, miss it. And when we don't miss it, it's not fancy enough, so we don't trust it. We don't recognize it.

You don't have to be in deep absorption, in samadhi, in silence, in order to recognize this. It helps, just because part of why retreats are so difficult sometimes is because the practice goes against the habits of our mind, as Mark talked about. It really is turning around and recognizing, just resting, just trusting in the simplicity of mindfulness, of awareness, of knowing.

It's so simple, but as the Buddha said, the path of his teachings, of his practice, goes against the current of daily society. That was true 2,600 years ago, and it's true now. It goes against the current of what external society feeds us.

And then as we sit here and get quiet—well, you found out, right, in these three days, those of you for whom this is your first retreat. The others of you maybe forgot and remembered that somehow it isn't just this smooth trajectory. We come and sit down and think, "Awareness, whatever's happening, there's peace." It's like, I don't think so. And the habits that we've imbibed from the culture externally are also the ones that we either don't see or deeply trust internally. So the practice is really just to help us shift where we place our trust, how we can recognize our true home. It's really about what do we really trust? Where do we really go for refuge in default mode or when things are tough?

This is from the Dalai Lama on why we practice. He says the purpose of spiritual practice is to fulfill our desire for happiness, for peace. We are all equal in wishing to be happy and to overcome our suffering. And he believes that we all share the right and the potential to fulfill this aspiration.

It came up in one of the groups—what brings us all here. On some level, however we might express it differently for ourselves, there is this deep, really deep wish for happiness or peace or a more connected life, to live with compassion, whatever words you use for yourself. And this is, for each of us, valid. And true, as the Dalai Lama is saying. It's really an expression of something we already know, what we so long ago lost sight of but have never really completely forgotten—this really deep essence of just the potential of awakening. Something pulls us to it.

But when we don't recognize how deeply conditioned we are by these habits of mind—by how we relate to experience—the very things we do in our commitment, in our efforts to bring happiness, peace, ease, love, whatever you say, to ourselves and to others, if we don't understand accurately, if we don't perceive ourselves and experience accurately, then the things we do in the service of happiness actually just keep us spinning in confusion. It's very poignant.

In a way, this is what the Buddha saw. It is said that after his years of practice, when he first awoke under the Bodhi tree and really understood as a human being the end of suffering for himself—and through himself, the potential for everybody—at first he wasn't very inclined to teach. First of all, he was just happy in the bliss of Nibbana. That was one thing. Another thing, he thought, "This is subtle. It's hard for people to see. And it will be wearisome for me to be teaching this."

But he was prevailed upon, and because he had these great psychic powers from his awakening, it is said he could survey with his mind the minds and hearts of all beings in the world. The thing that moved him to spend the rest of his life—forty-five years—just sharing what he had learned was the great compassion of seeing just this: that everyone deeply wants happiness.

And due to our confusion, our misunderstanding, our ignorance—ignorance not in a pejorative sense, just the ignorance of not knowing accurately—due to this ignorance, even in our acts of trying to bring happiness to ourselves and to others, we're doing it from confusion, and it just keeps us spinning in cycles of confusion. That is what moved his heart to compassion. And it's really very poignant to see that.

What's also important is the fact that at any moment—just for a moment—we can step right out of that cycle of wanting and suffering and spinning and confusion. It's not like you step out of it forever, but there's only this moment, only this moment. In any moment when we turn around and look back at awareness, look back at the knowing itself, we step out of that cycle of confusion. This is not only possible; we actually experience it many, many times in a day. Often we don't notice. Maybe some of you have noticed. Sometimes we notice and attribute it to the wrong thing.

For example, you're just sitting, having a cup of tea. Nothing special. But it's one of those moments where suddenly it is special. Just peaceful, no problem. It's not like fireworks going off, not like some incredibly ecstatic experience—that's too obvious. Just that sense of peace and ease. Ajahn Amaro says that peace and ease, that is the natural peace and ease of body and mind. We just experience it. Or walking in the desert. Or suddenly in the struggle of a sitting, there's one perfect, peaceful breath.

And our tendency then is to think, "Wow, that time I had that tea yesterday, that was so perfect. What time of day was it? Let's see, it was about right after the qigong. So maybe it was the qigong. And then if I go in and walk in just the same way and have the same kind of tea and sit in the same place with the sun coming in the same way, I'll have the same experience again." Or when we have that peaceful breath, we think, "Ah, finally I got it right. Not too short, not too long, just right. How can I get the breath to be like that again?" Because we're looking outward to experience, to objects, and we're missing that simple knowing, the simple awareness itself.

But the habits of mind are so tricky. If we're not aware of them, we can have the most deep intention in the world—really sincere, really pure, just like the Dalai Lama was saying, just like His Holiness, just like the Buddha saw—that we really want happiness. And that's the sincere, appropriate intention. But the intention itself—and it really helps us to connect with our intention every day, over and over, to connect with your aspiration—we need to find that. It gives us a sense of confidence, of willingness, the energy to show up again when things get hard. Really honor that. But the intention also needs to be balanced with what we call intelligent awareness, with discerning wisdom. Not complete wisdom, but the wisdom of just recognizing how these habits, when they're present in the awareness, color our perception, our assessments, our choices—when we don't recognize them. And this is really a huge aspect of practice.

This is from Bhikkhu Bodhi. He's an American monk, one of the two most—I would say—foremost translators into English of the Pali texts, the original Buddhist texts that are alive today. He says, again, remember that the Buddha's teaching goes against the current of one's habitual assumptions and attitudes. After all, most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self.

Do you recognize any of those three? Any of those come up today?

Now, he's not saying that enjoying pleasure is bad. He's not saying that avoiding pain is wrong. To preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self—he's pretty much saying that's impossible, but we give it a heck of a good try. What he is saying is that those are the habits that, if we really look deeply, I'd say most of us—certainly me, and I know I'm not alone—when I look deeply at how I react, how my mind reacts to situations when I'm not balanced and present, that's where my mind goes for refuge. I'm not happy, something's unpleasant, when it was so cold and raining. When my mind wasn't balanced and I didn't notice, I would go for getting comfortable—that's going to make me happy. There's nothing wrong with getting comfortable. It's the thinking that that's where happiness lies.

If I'm suffering in the cold, there's the aversion to avoid discomfort, and beneath that, a deep belief—not just that I should get warm if I can, but the deep belief that my unhappiness in this moment, my separation, my discontent is due to the cold. It's due to exactly what Mark was talking about last night in terms of aversion. The deeply held belief that that's where freedom is going to be found—like rearranging the furniture in prison to make it more comfortable. So engaged in doing that, we don't even notice the door is open and we can walk out.

Mark talked extensively about the first two habits. The third one, which I want to explore a bit, is the sense that everything revolves around my individual self. My shorthand for that is simply: it's all about me. Just notice that.

But first, let me say something about how these habits, when we don't notice they're present, really color our perception, our recognition of what's happening, the choices we make.

I just read a review of a book called How Doctors Think by Dr. Jerome Groopman. He's talking about misdiagnoses that doctors make and what factors, based on extensive research, lead to these misdiagnoses. He says technical mistakes account for only about twenty percent of misdiagnoses. The majority result from habits of mind that cause doctors to make snap judgments and heedlessly overlook alternative possibilities. In other words, bad thinking.

Here's the example, and this is exactly what I'm talking about. First, a doctor rarely revises their initial diagnosis, and then all the specialists that diagnosis is handed to down the line tend to accept that first diagnosis simply because it comes with authority. The guess may be wrong because the doctor stereotypes—paying more attention to a patient's age or gender or race or living habits than actually being able to look freshly at the symptoms being presented.

This is precisely the quality of mindfulness: the ability to bring beginner's mind, free from assumptions, free from thinking we know. It's really hard because we don't even know the assumptions we're carrying.

A doctor may like a patient too much to consider a worst-case scenario, while dislike may cause the doctor not to listen to important complaints. It's interesting, isn't it? We're in a state of aversion, and that colors how we assess what comes in. We're in a state of liking, of wanting, and that colors what we even let in.

You can notice these are really deep habits. Notice, for example, how it is when we have something we want, some expectation. Go walking out in the desert and you want something. You want a nice walk—that could be all you want, just a nice walk. Or you want some thinking to stop. Or you want to see some wildlife. Or, like some people say, "You all keep talking about how beautiful the desert is. I'm waiting to see how beautiful it is. I don't think it's beautiful." Anyway, you go out: Where is this damn beauty they're all talking about?

In any way we're going out wanting. The attention is all turned outward. Let me see this, let me have this, then I'll be happy. Turn your attention back while that's happening and recognize, as Mark said, the wanting mind. Recognize the effect. How open are we actually to receive what's arising in this moment? How open are we to the unknown, to the mystery, to something not expected?

Not very much. Not very much unless it comes and hits us over the head.

How are we with expectation if we meet a friend and we want something from them? How open are we to see them fresh, with beginner's mind—or a stranger? When you come and sit down in the sitting, are you wanting something? How open are you to just sit and feel the first sensation that arises of breath? It's jagged. It's tight. It's constricted. You don't like it. Can it just be that that's what it is? How much does wanting color our openness to experience?

Same with aversion, only the reverse.

Really, the mindfulness practice is to turn the attention around and notice what qualities of heart and mind are coloring the consciousness in this moment, are coloring the knowing, the awareness. Not hating it—just knowing.

And it's really interesting because as soon as we move from "I want to see this, I want to have this" to "Oh, wanting is like this" - it stops being a problem. We stop being so closed in, so tunnel-visioned. "Wanting is like this. Aversion is like this." It's just the next object of awareness. It stops being a problem. We stop getting so caught up with trying to rearrange everything. We're just here. No problem. Just for that moment. It doesn't have to take a long time.

And the third hindrance - I want to talk about this more because Mark didn't explore it as much - is preserving the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self. This is really, if we can not take it personally, it's actually a lot of fun. Let me say what I mean.

Sogyal Rinpoche has a great way of describing it. He talks about this fascination with "me, me, me." He's talking about the felt sense of "me here now" - not so much an idea, but you know what I mean. Just here. Close your eyes a minute. Do you have a felt sense of "me"? Just "me"? Can you feel that? It's no big deal, right? It feels like it's here all the time. It's not some big esoteric thing.

He calls it the original measuring point for samsara, for the cycle of suffering. He talks about how in Tibet, when they're starting to build a house to get the footprint, they start from a point in the middle - this felt sense of "me." Then they take a measuring rope, a measuring tape, and from that point in the middle they measure out to all the different places to get the footprint of the house. The footprint of life. The footprint of my life and what everything means. It all starts from this reference point right here - just the felt sense of me.

Now there's nothing wrong with this felt sense. It's just that we interpret it as being me - solid, ongoing, the center of the universe. And we don't recognize that interpretation. We misconstrue it and measure everything from that.

So for example, just notice if you see this happening in your experience. Check it out. You're just standing there and someone walks by really slowly in the distance. How soon does the thought come back to me? "Look at them walking so slow. Should I be walking slow like that?" It doesn't take long. Try it. With people - but it doesn't even have to be people.

Like today, I was walking out in the desert. Just walking. I wasn't looking for anything. I was just kind of in a state of being, really. And I had this moment of feeling really connected - a sense of rapture. And just at that moment, that exact moment, there was a tortoise. I really just... I don't know, there was something about it. I felt really happy.

And then two beats later - two beats - and the mind said, "That's the universe confirming my sense of being open."

Right? It's like that. It's like that. Everything is all about what it means about me - good, bad. You notice that in our sitting.

You know, my breath is like this. It's all about "I'm not doing it right." If it feels good, "I am doing it right." If someone else is making a noise, "They're messing up my meditation." The lights aren't right. "How can I listen to the talk with these lights? How can I give the talk with these lights?"

Just notice—it's actually hysterical. It's hysterical to see how any little thing, any little thing, a little rabbit runs by, and it's about me within a second. Within a second. Notice that.

And I say it's not personal because you notice how people are laughing? So somehow each of us is the center of the universe. Everything's all about each one of us. And how much energy goes into—not so much preserving that, I would say, because we believe it so strongly—but reacting from that. This is what makes us go after pleasure, avoid pain, think that's what happiness is.

The next thing is we think, "Okay, then I have to get rid of this, right? That's what meditation is about. That's the path of the Dharma. Get rid of the ego. Take out the pickaxe, start chipping it away. Get your notebook. Every time you have a moment that isn't about me, make a little mark and see how many. Maybe there's a couple more every day."

No. See, we don't have to do all of that. We don't. Already laughing at it—that's the shift. From "oh, it's all about me," which feels like this, to something lighter.

You see, awareness is always available, always accessible. It's not somewhere else. Nothing actually stains or colors or makes awareness inaccessible. It's just that our practice, our moment-by-moment mindfulness practice, is simply a practice of recognizing the awareness.

Awareness can be aware of anything, everything. Our job, as one of my teachers says, is shifting the direction of recognition. We're turning the direction of our recognition. Mostly we're recognizing objects—the five sense objects or mental objects. We're recognizing experience. That's fine to recognize, but that's where we're putting our sense of well-being, of organizing the world.

Turn around, like that cup of tea I was talking about. That's just so peaceful, so exquisite. We're out looking at what are all the conditions that made this happen and how can I get it back. You just turn around and go, "Oh, cup of tea, peaceful. It's like this." And it's turning around and seeing just in this moment: there's sipping and the knowing of it. Calmness and the knowing of it. Hot on the tongue and the knowing of it. Silence and the knowing of it. Raucous, loud, incredible noise, trucks going down the highway—and the knowing of it.

Does it matter? It doesn't matter one iota what's happening in terms of awareness. Of course, we don't believe that. That's our problem.

So our mindfulness practice is learning moment after moment to bring that innocence, that freshness, that beginner's mind to meet experience. And at first we're talking about experience, right? We're saying sit down and feel the breath. A lot of the questions arise: "Oh, the breath—is the breath going to get better?" And at that point, really what we need to say is forget the damn breath, because now you've just taken the breath and made it the thing we've got to fix to make us happy.

It doesn't matter about the breath. The breath is just a way to bring in enough calmness that we can actually turn around and notice: oh, awareness of breath. Awareness colored with wanting. "Get my breath." Oh, wanting. It's like this.

You know, today with Diana doing the different sensations—notice how deeply ingrained it is that unpleasant means it's a bad sensation. Pleasant or even neutral means, oh, it's going in the right direction. It's so ingrained.

When you think about really awakening, when you think about it—maybe some people don't even let themselves think because obviously, really, for them that's not possible, so don't even think about it—but let yourself think about it. Let it bring up in your mind: What would freedom from suffering look like? What would awakening be like?

I know when I'm really honest with myself, it doesn't usually include my headaches. It doesn't usually include people not liking me. It doesn't usually include the body really getting old and crapping out and decrepit. It usually doesn't include it. The freezing here—you know, I came down to the desert for the sunshine. Then the sun comes out. How many of you felt so much happier when the sun came out? I mean, I was too. I hate the cold. But how easy it is to think, "Oh, now. Now it's peaceful. Now the meditation's beginning to flower." Just because it's pleasant.

But the Buddha's awakening—he awoke into this world, not into a different world. He spent forty-five years walking around India barefoot with a begging bowl, eating one meal a day. He had headaches. He had backaches. He had all kinds of difficulties. His kinfolk and the lay people he dealt with—there were all kinds of wars and strife and dissension that he had to address. He had people in his sangha. In fact, his cousin, who wanted to take power from him, tried to kill him. He had stuff. Organizational dukkha—it's the worst. He had it. He just wanted to go sit under a tree in the bliss of nibbāna for forty-five years, but out of great compassion, he taught instead. So that was his awakening.

So what are we looking for? The jewel of mindfulness, of awareness, is that it's already here. It's right under our nose. Our practice is just hopefully helping us learn to keep recognizing this.

One of the reasons I love the desert here—it's the same reason I love being by the ocean, or why I think a lot of practitioners, or the ultimate practitioners, would go and practice in the mountains. It's the sense of space. It's metaphorical, but I also kind of literally feel it inside if I stand over at the edge and just look out. There's this vast sense of space, and there's all kinds of objects, all kinds of stuff in the space. But the sense of spaciousness—Ajahn Sumedho talks about it a lot—the way we recognize space is by not fixating, not clinging to the objects in the space.

So if I go out and there's just the spaciousness of the desert, it kind of evokes a spaciousness of heart, of mind. A spaciousness that doesn't have that moment of reference point back to me. I'm not trying to get rid of it. Just in that moment, it's not the reference point. Then it becomes me looking out at the space, and "isn't this cool," and the reference point's back again. But just play with it. Just the space.

And then notice how, just like that, you see something moving, and the mind goes right to the little thing. Then open up again. Sumedho has a way of putting it that I love: we notice space when we stop clinging to forms in the space. But the space is already here.

Silence is another way, another metaphorical way of talking about it. Not the silence of no sound. Not the silence of no thought. Not the space that needs to get rid of things. Just the letting go of the clinging. Things are all here—there's sounds, there's people, there's sensations, there's thoughts. Even wanting can arise. But when we shift from the wanting to the awareness, wanting is just another thing arising in the space.

So when we withdraw our obsession with conditions—and obsession is really a good word here, obsession with conditions—and we just notice the space, just the space of receiving whatever's arising, awareness receiving experience, receiving whatever's coming up. Just this. Just this. There's no reference point back to me, past, future. What does it mean about me? And if I can really feel it like this, then this is going to happen. Just this. Just that silence.

This is really just something to play with. Sumedho calls this consciousness, this recognition of just the presence, the doorway to liberation. It's always available.

One of my teachers says that this knowing, the simple quality of knowing, recognizing, is always happening. It's not something we do. It's not something we create. We don't have to strive.

So humor me a minute. Just put your two hands together if you don't mind. Do you feel that? Can you feel those sensations? It's not too hard, is it? Didn't really take a lot of effort. You didn't really do much of anything, did you? Except have the intention just to have awareness there. The awareness—did you make awareness happen? Could you make awareness happen if you wanted to? It's just like we noticed. Oh yeah, it's the knowing. That simple. That's mindfulness. It's not a huge, concerted effort. It's that simplicity of knowing, free in that moment.

There's no big deal going on. There probably wasn't a lot of wanting in your mind —"Oh God, I hope I can feel it right." Just, okay, I can feel it. Probably wasn't a lot of aversion, maybe a little to me telling you to do something, but just the actual sensation —probably not a lot of aversion, right? The purity. Not a lot of me. There's not a lot to say about those sensations, not a big story to make about that. I mean, we could, but you didn't have enough time.

And so in that moment, that knowing—as my teacher said, knowing is always happening. Our habit is just to keep turning around moment after moment after moment and recognizing it. That's the mindfulness. And the moment after moment part is really the key. Again, it doesn't have to be stressful or exhausting, but that's why we're sitting, sitting, sitting, and then we say notice the transition when you stand up, and then walking, walking, walking, and then we say notice when you sit down, and then we say notice when you eat. And the mind throws that ahead and it's all about me, and it's exhausting.

But it's only ever about just this moment. Touching. Just this moment, sensation. Just this moment, hearing. Just this moment, anger. Just this moment, "I am so bored," you know. Boredom's like this. Anger's like this. Sensation's like this. Raggedy breath is like this. Falling asleep on my face is like this. Aversion is like this. Hunger is like this, bubbling, bubbling. Enormous fear is like this, tightness. One, one, one, one—it's always available.

Now, if we're looking for some experience in meditation, as in life, we bring in our same habits. We're looking for a particular experience to fulfill me, to confirm me. An exaggerated way of saying it is you can go home and tell people you had this really incredible experience and feel good about yourself. But that's gross. On a really subtle level, even the littlest bit, if we're looking for the experience to confirm me, that wanting—we've moved out of noticing that simplicity of awareness.

But then, and this is what I love about the way Sayadaw talks about awareness, is like this applies to anything. It's like a Tai Chi move, or a Qigong move. You don't have to get rid of, "Oh, I want this sitting to be really good. I want a good experience. Oh no, I'm wanting, and it's all about me, and how can I get..." No. Wanting is like this. You don't have to get rid of anything. We don't have to bring in something else. The awareness is already here. We don't have to create it. We simply shift our refuge, our trust, our home from "Oh my God, this experience has to change" to "Wanting is like this." I am completely caught up. I'm completely confused. I have no clue what I'm doing. It's hopeless. I'm filled with doubt. Doubt is like this.

I know, it seems too easy. And then we want something a little more juicy, something a little more flashy, something a little more confirming of me, me, me. But really, where's the room in that for the wonder, for the mystery? Where's the space in that for the incredible beauty and unknown quality of each moment of life to arise? We have no idea what's going to happen. And that is what really allows us to meet each moment with this sensitivity, this care, this innocence.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "To be fully alive, fully human, and completely awake is to be continually thrown out of the nest. To live fully is to be always in no man's land, to experience each moment as completely new and fresh. To live is to be willing to die over and over again. From the awakened point of view, that's life. Death is wanting to hold on to what you have and to have every experience confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together."

How many of us—and I'm including me—meditate to confirm ourselves and congratulate ourselves and feel completely together? Did you come here to fall apart? Did you come here to realize you don't have a clue, and that's really fine? We want to be perfect, but we just keep seeing our imperfections, and there's no room to get away from that. No exit, nowhere to run. This is when the sword turns into a flower. We stay with what we see. We feel what we feel. And from that, we begin to connect with our own wisdom mind.

Another way of saying it is every experience, every object of experience—mental, physical—is a doorway to awareness, a doorway to freedom in that moment. There's nothing we need to change. It's always available. It's just if we remember to notice. It takes, at first, an enormous trust. And it takes support.

That's really why we have this set up the way we do now. That's why we're up here talking every night, just trying to encourage you to keep on meeting in this moment, in this moment, in this moment. Because if we do that often enough, and with this quality of mindfulness—this simplicity, this innocence, this willingness to explore, to bring a freshness without all our conceptions and ideas—well, the jewel of awareness gets more and more obvious. At some point we just recognize it more and more. At some point we start getting it on a subliminal level, and then it becomes more obvious that it's not about what's happening.

And so we emphasize in the mindfulness just practicing bringing this quality of simplicity, of openness, of interest to discover, to whatever arises.

My model for this is the cellist Yo-Yo Ma. He's one of my heroes. I really just love to listen to him play. But I also love, in anything I've read—I don't know him personally, but anything I've read—his whole attitude of openness to discover, of inclusivity, of meeting people in the musical world with this real freshness.

I saw a documentary on television once about him. I just got a little bit of it. It was in Germany, so it was in German, which I don't speak, so my friends were translating it. I just got this little snippet, but it has stayed with me as a real model of the wonder of awareness through mindfulness.

He was exploring different musics of different peoples. And at this part of the special I remember, he flew in by helicopter to a tribe of bush people in Africa. So he comes in, he gets out of the helicopter with his million-dollar cello, and he meets the man who's the head musician of this tribe, an old man. And this man has his instrument, which was kind of like a round, empty tin oil can with a long strut made out of a stick and a couple of strings—and that was his instrument.

So he's playing his instrument and singing, and Yo-Yo Ma is just completely enthralled, so open. And I could see my own cultural bias as I was watching. Then Yo-Yo Ma plays his cello, and I hear the rich tones of the cello, the beautiful sound, and this man's plunking on his thing. And then Yo-Yo Ma says, "Let's trade." So they trade instruments. And then Yo-Yo Ma is trying to play the man's instrument and he says, "I can't play this nearly as well as you. You show me." And he was just so fresh and present and free from dragging in the past and assumptions—really there. This sense of joy and wonder and connectedness.

To me, that's the quality we practice with mindfulness. Mindfulness of breath, mindfulness of anger, mindfulness of pain in your rear end, mindfulness of wanting, mindfulness of the space, of the desert. And eventually we see it's not about what's happening—it's about the mindfulness itself.

And then our refuge point, our trust, begins to shift. And we still call on the mindfulness. We'll lose it over and over and over. We'll find ourselves putting all our eggs into the basket of "if I could only get this situation to change, then everything would be okay." We'll all do that over and over. Beat our heads against the wall. Do that bargaining. Pretend we're being mindful, really open and fresh, but really so it'll go away. All of that stuff. Until finally something in us just surrenders. Okay, let me die. I'll just be with this. And then the jewel of awareness is recognizable again. Oh, it's like this. And then we see the potential in that moment for real freedom.

It's not freedom from the world. It's not freedom from unpleasant. It's not freedom from pain. But it's freedom from confusion, from separation, from unnecessary suffering, from dis-ease. Just in a moment. Just in a moment. But that moment is available in every moment, in every experience, to every one of us. It's already here. It's always here.

So we just use this practice and find those moments when we trust enough to just never mind the wanting, never mind the aversion, never mind the me.

It's all here. It doesn't even have to go away. But it's just not where we put our trust.

In those moments—that's actually what I was feeling when I saw the tortoise. The mystery opened. And then it was the me, me, me. And then I just laughed, because it's going to come back. And it doesn't matter. None of it mattered. It really doesn't matter what's happening. Awareness is the point that includes everything, as Nisargadatta says.

And in that not mattering, the other side reveals itself: if nothing matters, everything matters. It's not like who cares. It's that each moment is equally valuable as a doorway to freedom.

This is what really opens up the possibility for—and I'm an aversive type, so I'm not a gushy, lovey type—but it really opens up the possibility of moments of life that are just so filled with beauty, with love, with appreciation. And all those are words for just the isness of things. Just the isness of the ordinary.

I want to end with a poem by Billy Collins that I love, because it expresses this to me. It's interesting because it's called "Aimless Love." A friend, maybe one of the most aversive people I know, sent me this poem. It's really touching.

This morning, as I walked along the lake shore, I fell in love with a wren. And later in the day with a mouse the cat had dropped under the dining room table.

In the shadows of an autumn evening, I fell for a seamstress still at her machine in the tailor's window, and later for a bowl of broth, steam rising like smoke from a naval battle.

This is the best kind of love, I thought, without recompense, without gifts or unkind words, without suspicion or silence on the telephone.

The love of the chestnut, the jazz cap and one hand on the wheel. No lust, no slam of the door. The love of the miniature orange tree, the clean white shirt, the hot evening shower, the highway that cuts across Florida.

No waiting, no huffiness or rancor, just a twinge every now and then for the wren who had built her nest on a low branch overhanging the water, and for the dead mouse still dressed in its light brown suit.

But my heart is always propped up in a field on its tripod, ready for the next arrow.

After I carried the mouse by the tail to a pile of leaves in the woods, I found myself standing at the bathroom sink, gazing down affectionately at the soap, so patient and soluble, so at home in its pale green soap dish.

I could feel myself falling again as I felt its turning in my wet hands and caught the scent of lavender and stone.

Can we just sit quietly for a minute?

From Nisargadatta: Be quiet, free from the obsession with what next. And in the silence, something may be heard which is ordinarily too fine and subtle for perception.

Free from the obsession with what next.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 369

Faith/Devotion

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson reflects on witnessing a simple act of devotion at Ramana Maharshi's ashram in India, where the ashram president's unassuming circumambulation of the samādhi before serving dinner revealed the everyday simplicity of genuine faith. This observation becomes a springboard for exploring how our spiritual practice can shift from wanting and needing to understand toward loving the truth, trusting awareness, and surrendering into each moment.
>
> Wilson draws on teachings from Dōgen, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, and the Buddha's discourses to illuminate how love and devotion create the same measureless quality of mind as wisdom. She explains that lust, hate, and delusion are "makers of measurement" that impose limitations on consciousness, while in moments of genuine love or surrender, "the empty nature dawns nakedly." The felt sense of 'me' serves as the original measuring point from which all experiences of separation arise—measurements of time, space, and self versus other.
>
> The talk addresses the challenges practitioners face when running up against deeply held patterns, views, and comfort zones. Wilson shares the story of Khemā, the pleasure-loving queen who awakened upon seeing impermanence, and reflects on Ānanda's exemplary devotion to the Buddha. She emphasizes that faith provides the courage to step into the unknown, to "die into whatever's arising in this moment," and that even fabricated devotion can open doors to genuine liberation. The session concludes with taking refuge and precepts together.

A few years ago, I was visiting an ashram in southern India, an ashram where Ramana Maharshi lived near the sacred mountain Arunachala. There's a big hall there they call the Samadhi—they use the word differently there—it's the place where Ramana is buried. Every evening in the hour before dinner, some men and women from the ashram come and do an hour of chanting, and then everyone goes in for dinner.

At the far end of the hall is the actual samadhi, the marble structure where he's buried. It's customary for people to circumambulate, to walk around the samadhi. You can come in and spend some time doing that every day. During the chanting, people sit against the walls and listen, and from time to time they get up and walk around.

It's interesting to watch, and also to be part of, all the different ways that people walk around that samadhi. There are lots of people there—Indian people, Western people, all different kinds. And you can see, even in yourself, sometimes just walking around casually, not paying attention. Sometimes people are chatting while walking around. You can really get this sense of wanting to get what Ramana had, or wanting to feel the holiness, or wanting something. Some people go and really prostrate themselves in front. You feel the sense of supplication, of needing, or just looking spiritual. The whole range—all the stuff we see ourselves go through.

But one night, and this is the reason I'm bringing this up, there was a man who's the president of the ashram. He's lived there for many years, and every night when everyone goes in to dinner, he and the other male workers serve the food. You sit in lines on the floor with a banana leaf for your plate, and they come around with big buckets of curry and put it on the banana leaves. There's really this sense that they're serving us.

This particular night, the president was doing the chanting. Then the chanting ended, and the bell for dinner rang. He just got up, and I happened to be watching him. So simply and naturally, no big anything, just got up and with great care—but no big anything—walked around, did his three circumambulations of the samadhi, and then went in to serve the dinner.

Somehow it touched me so much. It's still in my mind. Something about attitude, about motivation, about the whole sense of spiritual practice coming from the motivations of faith, of love, of surrender—rather than from the motivation of wanting, needing to know the truth, needing to understand. You know how we can flip back and forth between those.

So I thought tonight I'd talk about another motivation, another aspect of our practice that opens us up to the same truth—because it is the same truth. Shifting from the motivations of wanting or needing to understand, to just touching on faith, and devotion even, and surrender.

What really inspired me watching the president walk around was the total everyday simplicity of faith, of devotion. No big whoop. No "I'm so filled with devotion, let me prostrate myself all the way around the ashram." Just walk around and go serve the dinner, both of those equal.

I could see for myself—it really went into my heart—how often, out of what starts with sincere motivation, my path, whether it's meditation practice or being in an ashram or cooking dinner, can slide into wanting, into either wanting or a kind of spiritual hubris. Trying to magnify my sense of being spiritually not attained, but getting there. At least working on it. At least I try. At least that's what my life is about. It's like wanting the truth, and that's very different from loving the truth.

That's really the shift. And what do I mean by truth? I don't mean some big explanation of something. In terms of our practice here, just the simplicity of awareness in one moment. Not ever, forever, always solid—in one moment. Do I love the truth enough to trust it so much that in this moment of awareness, this is truth revealing itself? Because where else could it be?

It's a real sense of surrender into what's happening right now. That's what awareness is. That's what mindfulness is. The opening into the unknown of whatever this moment is presenting.

And awareness and this moment are not two separate things. It only seems that way from the space of thinking.

This is from the famous Zen master Dogen. He says: "Truth is not far away. It is ever present. It is not something to be attained since not one of your steps leads away from it. When you have thrown off your ideas as to mind and body, the original truth will fully appear. Zen is simply the expression of truth. Therefore, longing and striving are not the true attitudes of Zen. If you cannot find the truth right where you are, where else do you expect to find it?"

Right where we are. Right with whatever's arising, right in this instant.

This quality that speaks of devotion, of faith, of trust—this is what we're practicing here. Moment after moment, we're practicing dying into whatever's arising in this moment. Not with fear, but with trust. Not trust that something we want to happen will happen, not trust in the next thing, not trust in anything in particular. Just so trusting in awareness that we don't need to hold back or hold on or keep constructing things. That sense of me, me, me.

But of course we can't make this happen. That's why it's trust. That's why it's surrender. That's why it's not "do A, B, C, and D, and then you get E." It's really, as somebody said today, radical. Just do your chanting, walk around the samadhi, go serve dinner. Just wake up in the morning, brush your teeth, eat your breakfast, come in and sit. One thing isn't better or worse or more spiritual or less spiritual than another. Every single moment of any of that, the truth is revealing itself. We surrender into the awareness in that moment.

Byron Katie has a book called Loving What Is. I didn't read it; I just liked the name. That's her practice: loving what is. I don't mean by loving something like, "Oh, I'm so glad that my foot hurts today and I'm feeling tired. I just love it." No. Not love in that sense. That's how we love pizza or pie. But love in the sense of surrendering our holding back, surrendering our ideas, our assumptions, our sense of "what does it mean about me"—just the willingness to be totally aware of whatever this moment is, without adding anything extra.

Does that sound familiar? It's only what we've been blabbing about the whole time. But I'm trying to shift the perspective just a little bit.

When we're in a moment like that—you all know—when the trust, the surrender into awareness, just for that moment, holds nothing back, there isn't anything separate. There's no "me" here, an object there. No "this sensation is happening and I'm being aware, I'm surrendering." In that moment, there's nothing separate. It's just the truth manifesting itself.

This poem from Izumi Shikibu:

Watching the moon at dawn, solitary, mid-sky,
I knew myself completely,
no part left out.

Sharon likes to say that to pay attention is to love. A quality of total presence. The moon at dawn—I knew myself completely, no part left out. The aching foot, the grumpy mind, the hungry stomach, the unpleasant sound. I knew myself completely, no part left out. It doesn't matter what it is that's happening. It's just that, in that moment, that quality of surrender.

This is from Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, a wonderful Tibetan Dzogchen master. All of us—except Andrea—we all went to see him together in Nepal a couple of years before he died. He says: "The present method for becoming quickly accustomed to the unfabricated state of awareness is to have devotion to enlightened beings and compassion to sentient beings."

Devotion and compassion are both love. In the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly. That's the real line I love: in the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly. He says, if in this moment of love, of devotion, of surrender, of trust, of faith—if in this moment you can look inwardly, it is like the sun unobscured by clouds. The nature of emptiness is nakedly manifest. So remember to look inwardly.

I want to talk a little about why and how this works—how the nature of emptiness is nakedly manifest in the moment of love.

In one of his suttas, the Buddha is talking about the immeasurable deliverance of mind, of which there are, you'll be happy to know, various types. Four of them happen to be the Brahma Viharas. He's talking about these and asking: what do they all share? In some way, all these different immeasurable deliverances are all the same. How? And he says: lust is a maker of measurement, hate is a maker of measurement, delusion is a maker of measurement. In other words—and this is the note from Bhikkhu Bodhi—lust, hate, and delusion may be understood as makers of measurement in that they impose limitations upon the range and depth of the mind.

The way I would put it, the way it looks to me, is that when there's any of those—lust, hate, delusion—the experience, when we look into our mind, when we look into our experience, it is limited. It's constricted. There's self and others, or there's awareness and that, or this thing we like and everything else. The mind is limited. There are senses of separation, and that's how we live so much of our life.

In the moment of love, devotion, look into the mind, and how does he say this? The nature of emptiness is nakedly manifest. There's no measurement in that moment.

Just as with paññā, with wisdom, with insight, as Joseph was talking about last night, there's a moment when—and one of the other ways the Buddha talks about deliverance of mind is through voidness, which is through really having insight into the emptiness of self, of mere mind. So it's on a par, you could say. Equal. When we talk about it through wisdom, really in a moment of insight there's no measurement there.

But sometimes that's not accessible. For some of us at certain times, and for others of us at more times, the path of faith, of devotion, of trust might open up more naturally—at certain times, or in who we are, or just how our mind works. And they work together. So in the moment of love, deep in the Brahma Vihara, in that moment of just surrendering into the truth of this moment, in the moment of just trusting awareness completely—there's no measurement discernible in consciousness, in mind.

We can explore this understanding, or this kind of heartfelt knowing, from these various ways. This is the Buddha, continuing: "In a bhikkhu whose taints are destroyed"—so now we're talking about arhats—"these three makers of measurement are abandoned, cut off at the root, made like a palm stump, done away with, so they are no longer subject to future arising. And of all the kinds of immeasurable deliverance of mind, the unshakable deliverance of mind is pronounced the best."

Now, that unshakable deliverance of mind is empty of lust, empty of hate, empty of delusion. That's the mind of an arhat, unshakable. Nothing's going to shake the measurement back in. But moment to moment, that's not—as Dogen says, that's what we're practicing. Not just putting in our time and hoping somewhere a big light goes off. That's what we're practicing moment to moment: no measurement. I'm not saying it's simple or easy. We know that. We run into the things that make it difficult—our safety nets, our comfort zones, the places where we say, "Oh, no, not this." How many times have I said, "No, if awakening means this has to go, or I have to be with this, forget it. I don't want any part of that." Notice those little moments when they come up.

But before I go to that, I want to say one more thing about measurement, coming from Joseph's talk last night—something that Mingyur Rinpoche describes in his book. I just love this. He's talking about the felt sense of "me" in a moment. Not the idea, not some concept, but actually when you're sitting here, walking around, brushing your teeth, and you tune in—there's a felt sense of "me," right? You know what I'm talking about.

You don't have a felt sense of me. I'm scratching my face. That's very basic. We all have that, right? Probably. Or you wouldn't be here, because you wouldn't feel like you had a problem.

So Rinpoche says that this felt sense of me is the original measuring point for samsara. He describes how in Tibet, when they want to make the footprint to set the foundation for building a building, they start in the middle with a rope or string. From that middle point, they measure out how far it goes, all the way around in a circle or a square. That middle point is the actual measuring point for building the house.

He says that's how the felt sense of me works. Everything in our experience in terms of measurement is measured from that, just in a moment. It's happening moment by moment, but it's quite interesting to play with. For some reason, this has been popping up in my mind during sittings lately. Just see which measurements you notice.

Measurement of time starts right here, doesn't it? Past, future, five minutes from now, yesterday, how long is this talk going to last—it all starts from here. Measurements of space: there's space all around, but usually the space all starts from here. Measurements of self and object: in a moment of meditating, there's a sense of self and the object, awareness and the object. As long as there's that sense of me, there's that sense of measurement.

And when it drops away—which it often does—people love it. They come in during interviews, or in your own experience: "Wow, it was so nice. There was just no sense of me." It is really nice. "I knew myself completely, no part left out" because she's looking at the moon and totally present, and the measurement drops away. Myself isn't really her. It's just the totality of awareness in this moment. Boom—that. No measurement of past or future. It doesn't mean this about me or you or anything.

So just play with that. Just seeing: referring back to me, referring back to me, that sense of measurement. And even though it's really a burden, it doesn't help us to intellectually hear that or think that. In fact, then there's another thing: "I'm so stupid—I keep adding this burden on top of myself." The times when measurement is gone, there's that sense of "Oh, wow, what's different?" No measurement. That's all. No measurement.

Nature, for many people, is a really inspiring support for that. You know how many awakening poems, like the one I just read, are set in nature. Many people here, when you're going through a really hard time or you're just a little tense or tight or things are just blah—going outside, even when it's not nice weather, doesn't have to be nice. There's something about being in nature that for many people, just the quietness, just nature itself, the fact that there's no one else around to get the māna, the conceit, the comparing going.

Mostly we don't compare ourselves to trees. To turkeys, I hope not. Turkeys maybe, I don't know. But not to trees, not to the stars, not to the chipmunks. And so sometimes imperceptibly, that felt sense of me isn't being recreated so strongly moment after moment. Sometimes there's just that sense of peace.

That's what it is, actually—nature supports our trusting, our settling into the simplicity of just this. We don't really usually compare this sunset to last night's sunset. I mean, sometimes we do, and then we realize we're missing it. We tend to just—oh, it's like this. Peace. No measurements.

To pay attention is to love, to the simplest of things. That's really how moment-by-moment mindfulness works. We start by learning to use our experience—sensations of breath, sensations in walking, the movements of the arms, noticing the thought, whatever sense object at the six sense doors is arising. We use that to remind us, to trigger awareness. We start with awareness of breath, awareness of this.

But then, when there's that quality of surrender into the awareness, there are those moments when it stops being awareness of and it's just the completeness of the moment. Just this. And the simplest things.

can trigger that.

This is a silly example, but I really noticed it the last couple of days. I have this one teacup that I really love. First, you must know, tea—like a pot of tea in the morning—is the high point of my day. I just love to sit and have tea. And I used to have three of these teacups, but two of them have gone the way of all things, and I only have one left now. And it's just perfect somehow. It fits my hand. I just love it.

I know I'm totally attached. When someone stays in my house and I'm away, I hide it so they won't break it. I know all this. I can live with that. I notice it. I know it's going to break. I've gone online. I even found I could buy more, but it's not the same. It's this teacup.

But I've noticed—I wasn't thinking about this talk, but I was just noticing—when I'm washing it every morning, I'm a little more careful. Because how do these things break? You hit it in the sink, you hit something with it in the drainer. So I'm just a little more careful.

But what I noticed the last couple of days, which was lovely, is that it starts, okay sure, it starts from greed. We can't pretend it's a highfalutin motivation. It's like I'm holding on to the cup. But I'm really paying attention. And then it really just stopped being about me and the cup and holding on. It's just the awareness. It's just what it was. Awareness, and these things were happening. And it's not awareness of or that in awareness. It's just: this is it. And the awareness gets much more interesting. And you know what you're doing. I know I'm brushing the cup. But none of that stuff matters. It doesn't matter.

Anything, anything opens us up to this recognition, this trust in awareness, this love for awareness, really. And when we start loving awareness more than we crave and hate the things that are happening, then trust and faith, devotion, surrender, start happening much more by themselves. And that only deepens our faith, deepens our trust.

So that comes by way of mindfulness. It also comes by way of actually recognizing, cultivating faith itself. At times we need to, and sometimes more than others. Some people's psychological makeup, you could say, is more one way than others. Some people are more wisdom types. Some people think of themselves as more faith types or devotion types. But I just want to say we all need all of it at different times. None of us can just do it in one way, because all the different factors arise in our minds.

I've always thought of myself as a real wisdom type—that what got me into practice was wanting to understand the nature of things, wanting to know the truth, what's going on. But just today, Sharda said to me—she knows me really well, we've known each other for, I don't know, thirty years—she says, "Oh, you're such a devotional type." I said, "Me? Devotional? No way. I'm the least devotional person I know." That's why I'm talking about this. She was shaking her head. Because, you know, we always talk about what we need to learn ourselves, right? You've probably figured that out by now.

So anywhere along our spiritual path, in a retreat like this, but also in our whole life—whether we have a lot of tendency toward devotion and surrender or not, whether wisdom is our way—when it gets blocked, we're all going to run into, and I bet you all have already here, times when...

It's just really challenging.

Not in a way we don't like it, but either our motivation drops out or we hit this place where, like I said before, I just can't go there if that's what it's about.

Sometimes people have mentioned this to me—I won't say any particular story—but it's something I also recognize in myself. There are times when what I find my mind holding onto in a moment is some suffering mental pattern. It's not like I'm holding onto some great idea of something in my life, but some sense of seeing myself in some screwed-up way that's so familiar it feels like a comfortable old blanket or a really nice glove. No, if that has to go, who am I? Who would I be without my complete self-loathing? How can I make it through the world without this?

Never mind when it's something that we actually like. But for all of us, our views, our beliefs, our deepest commitments, all of our ideas about ourselves—not some but all—are going to be challenged. And our views are what we use to try and construct, hopelessly but we never give up, trying to construct some sense of solidity, of order out of the chaos. Knowing what's going to happen. Trying to make ourselves better.

But enlightenment is not a self-improvement project. It's not about making our personalities better, nicer, kinder. Luckily, that happens as a kind of side effect. I mean, if you're getting angrier and meaner and crueler, something isn't working—that's true. But that's not the point. We start out that way. We all do, of course, but it's going to get challenged.

Stephen Batchelor, he's quite a brilliant guy. Not that everyone always agrees with him here, but he's a brilliant guy—he's too smart for me to even know if I agree or not. He says that emptiness is not just an experience of oceanic bliss. It's a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, self-centeredness, and seeming protection. And although it is freeing, it also evokes great disconcertion, great confusion, dis-ease, fear at times—like being in no man's land.

We think we want emptiness, and yeah, we think of oceanic bliss. We don't think of how all of our strategies have to also fall apart to recognize emptiness. Again, only in a moment. Remember how the mind, from the felt sense of me, projects into the future: "Oh, everything has to fall apart forever. How will I function?" Or with oceanic bliss: "When will I get there and have it?" But just in a moment, notice when we're running up against some strategy, some view, some sense of self, some way of being, the way we're practicing our understandings—and somehow the mind goes, "No, not this. I can't do this anymore."

That's when consciously calling on faith, on surrender, on devotion—if that's helpful—compassion, devotion to enlightened beings, can be helpful. As Sayadaw U Pandita says, it could be devotion to Buddha, to Dharma, to Sangha.

One of the definitions or descriptions of saddhā, which is translated as faith, is confidence. Another one, the way U Pandita described it, is willingness to do. It gives us the energy to take another step, if you will, to show up and die into this next moment, whatever it is, to take a breath and go, "Okay, this too," and just open into it.

Without faith, we do just get stuck. "Okay, I can't do it. I'm out of here." Luckily, we all have moments like that. I mean, we really go. We all have moments. "I'm glad I don't have my car keys. Okay, I give myself until after tea time. If it still feels like this, I go home." We all make those bargains. But you're all still here.

So I'm not talking about that as a mental state. I'm talking about when we really run up against something. Without faith, we wouldn't do anything. So just recognizing that faith is really like the ground spring that gives us all the energy to keep going.

In terms of this devotion, in terms of surrender, in terms of faith—it may start externally, kind of dualistically, a little even artificially. Faith in your teachers or in the Buddha or in the teachings that you've heard, or inspiration from another being. Nothing wrong with that. That's what gets us going. That's how it starts.

We all need faith in the face of the unreliability of samsara at times. We all need something to call on just to get us moving. But it's not that the faith makes everything clear and okay. The faith just gives us that energy to be willing to open again completely into the unknown, to take a step into who knows what. That's the paradox of faith—that it gives us the courage, enormous courage, to just let go, to surrender into who knows what, to trust that the truth is right here, no matter how mundane or boring or really, truly scary "here" is.

Have you ever seen a movie that came out a couple of years ago called Touching the Void, about two mountain climbers? I'll tell it quickly. It was a recreation of an actual event that happened fifteen or twenty years ago. Two men were mountain climbing together in Peru, somewhere in the Andes, a very high mountain, out in the middle of nowhere, no other people around. They were roped together, coming down, and they slipped and fell. One of the men fell over the edge of a cliff. He's tied, right? And the other guy is still on the land. And they hang like that—he hangs like that for an hour or so. The one on the land is trying to get him up, and he can't. He's being pulled. He can't get the other guy up. He can't go anywhere. And his choice is either to just get pulled over the edge... Well, he made the other choice. He cut the rope.

So he cut the rope. The guy fell into a huge crevasse. He just saw his friend go, and that was it. As far as he knew, his friend was dead. So he made his way down the mountain to base camp.

The other guy who fell into the crevasse—it's like a big cut in the ice—he fell down deep, broke his leg. His leg was really shattered. And he was stuck in this crevasse. He couldn't get back up. There was nowhere to go. And he said he had a deep, deep, primal terror of these crevasses. So he was in this dark place. His friend was gone. His leg was shattered. And he stayed like that for a day and a night. No water, no food. He realized no one was going to come—this primal terror.

And then he looked, and the only other way to go was... he was on a ledge. There was another opening, and the crevasse went down even deeper and darker, way down to where there was no light at all. He said, you know, he was totally terrified, but he couldn't get up. And he said, this is the question: I have to make a choice. I may be wrong, but I can't just abdicate. I can't just stay here frozen.

So he finally worked up his courage, and basically he lowered himself down as far as he could go with his rope into this other crevasse. Total terror. This is—in a way it's a heavy example—but it's like total surrendering to the unknown. He said, I can't abdicate. I have to make a choice. The other choice is to consciously make the choice to stay here and starve to death. That was his other choice.

So he lowered himself down with no clue. And of course, it turned out that as he went down, he actually hit bottom, and there was a kind of tunnel up that he could actually get up and out. And with his broken leg, he could hardly move, and it took him another couple of days on this shattered leg.

Really, it was unbearable to watch. Every moment, he had to keep making that choice even after he got out—to keep going, to keep going, to keep going over this horrendous landscape. And so obviously he got back. His friend had just burned his clothes, was just about to leave when he arrived.

But that sense of, you know, we're in the worst possible place, in a place where everything's fallen apart, primal terror—what can I do? Where can I go? It's totally hopeless. I know that's exaggerated, but we have moments in our practice that feel like that. There are moments when we're brought up against ourselves, our patterns, our sense of self, and it can feel at that depth like there's nothing I can do.

And faith is the quality of mind and heart that simply gives us the courage, the confidence, the willingness to act. And here all it is, is: okay, this too. Awareness of this too. Loving the truth in this. That's all. Even if everything I think is me is going to go, there's enough trust to meet this moment. Not knowing where it's going to go. Because if we knew, that's already back in the limitation of the known. That's measurement.

So yes, we need to call on faith, something to help us look outside of the view of reality we've unquestioningly constructed. And sometimes we need someone else to pull us along. That's what's so great about Sangha. That's what's so great, in a way, about just being here and the schedule. Even if you don't follow the schedule exactly, there's not much else to do. And sooner or later—I know you've found things, and I'm sure you've found things we don't know about. Sometimes we don't find out for years, and I won't even tell you some of the stuff we found out. But sooner or later, all that stuff gets old, and you really feel like you're wasting your time, and you go, right, here I am. Step into this void.

There's a story I want to tell about a woman in the time of the Buddha. Somehow we don't want to know. Let me just stay in my own little suffering state and kind of practice, but just within these little limits that I already know, not outside my comfort zone.

Her name was Khema, and she was the wife of a king who was a follower of the Buddha. I mean, kings had lots of wives, and she was incredibly beautiful and very spoiled and devoted to pleasure and beauty. She lived a life of luxury, and the king was always trying to get her to come and hear the Buddha's teaching, but she never wanted to go. She said, "Well, I've heard that this guy talks about renunciation and he's not really big on sense pleasures, and I really don't—I'm not so interested in that. So I don't want to go."

So the king tricked her. The Buddha was teaching in a beautiful pleasure park, so the king hired a singer poet to stroll around and sing a song extolling the beauties of this particular park where the Buddha was teaching, so that Khema would hear it. And when she heard this song, she said, "Oh, well, let me go see this beautiful park," because she couldn't stay away from something new and beautiful.

So she went, and he tricked her because she went and was standing on the outskirts. This is just the opposite of the story I told last time about the poor, miserable wretch who sat on the outside. This is the most beautiful, pleasure-loving queen—Khema, the golden one. But also, when the Buddha looked around with his eye, asking who can hear the Dhamma, it was: "Aha, it's Khema."

And so first, to speak to her mind, he constructed with his magic powers the image of a celestial woman so beautiful, so much more beautiful than Khema. And she saw this and was taken by the beauty. Wow, incredible beauty! And then he had this image just slowly, slowly age and get old and cracked and gray and flabby and disintegrate and die.

So she was watching all of this—it's like our whole life compressed into three minutes. And she was watching all of this and said, "Wow." It went in. If that can happen to her, that's going to happen to me.

So her mind was open, and the Buddha gave the whole teaching. And she was a rare example of a laywoman who, on hearing the teaching, completely became an arahant all at once. Then, of course, she became a nun. So the king lost out. I don't think he planned on that happening. But he had one or two other women to—you know, I don't think he suffered too much.

She was considered the foremost in wisdom of all the bhikkhunis, of all the nuns, because she was so wise—one of the few examples of a lay person in one stroke becoming an arhat. But basically, up until that moment, it was like, "Don't tell me. I don't want to know. I want to stay in my pleasure palace. I want to stay in my comfort zone," even though she had the capacity to completely awaken. And of course, once she saw things as they were, free of the concepts—boom.

So this is faith. This is confidence. What helps us open to it?

In the suttas, the classic Buddha teaching when they talk about faith, it's always defined as faith in the Buddha, faith in the Dhamma, faith in the Sangha. And that may or may not be what inspires this quality of devotion or confidence in us. It may be something else, and that's fine. For me, it's really the faith in the purity of awareness, in the accessibility of awareness, in the truth of the moment. Sometimes it's the confidence, the inspiration that comes from being with or reflecting on certain teachers I've had or known or read about. Or sometimes it's teaching. Sometimes it's other colleagues or friends. Sometimes it's listening to a yogi, because it's not personal—it's whatever you hear, or someone's manifesting in that moment, just kind of the Dhamma, the purity of awareness or seeing the emptiness, you catch it. Because it's true for all of us.

Faith can be triggered in many different ways when we surrender our preconceptions and open. And it can be really quite simple—it can be expressed very simply.

My favorite example of an expression of the simplicity of faith, of just living from and acting from faith in the suttas, is the example of Ananda, who I'm sure most of you are familiar with—the Buddha's attendant, his cousin. For the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life, Ananda was his attendant. And Ananda was totally devoted to the Buddha, totally devoted to the Dhamma, and a very hard worker.

He was one of the few really famous bhikkhus that you read about in all the suttas who wasn't an arhat through most of the texts. He was a stream-enterer—he wasn't just a spiritual novice. But in those days, with Kashyapa and Sariputta and Moggallana and Kema and all of these people, he was kind of in junior high school by comparison. But he was renowned for his kindness, for his devotion to the Buddha, and for his memory.

He had such total faith and devotion to the Buddha that when the Buddha—before Ananda became his attendant, he'd already been in the Bhikkhu Sangha for many years—needed a new attendant and was kind of looking around the group of monks, asking if anyone would volunteer, Ananda didn't raise his hand. Ananda didn't offer. And then the Buddha asked him, "Why didn't you volunteer?" And because he had such perfect faith in the Buddha, he said, "The Buddha knows who's going to be the best person to be his attendant. I don't need to volunteer. If I'm the right person, he'll know it. He'll ask me." Such total faith.

So he's kind, he's generous, he's inclusive. He served the Buddha just wholeheartedly for twenty-five years. He asked for some boons, some favors when he agreed to become the attendant. I'm not going to say what they were, but they were all things about setting conditions so that he wouldn't be treated special. That's what the favors he asked were—not "I'll be your attendant if you'll do this for me, if you'll do that for me." They were things so he wouldn't be special. And because he had such a good memory, he requested that if he missed any of the Buddha's suttas or sermons, they would be repeated to him later. Because Ananda's the one—when you read the suttas and they begin "Thus have I heard"—that was Ananda. After the Buddha died, he could remember every talk he'd heard by heart.

So he was that devoted. But his devotion also shows up as this generosity, this inclusion of spirit, where he's always trying to get people access to the Buddha, access to the Dharma. I've been around different spiritual scenes where it works the other way—people want to get into the in-crowd and then it's kind of like, subtly, "No, you've got to protect the teacher, keep people away. We're the in-crowd." Ananda was just the reverse. He was always trying to get people to hear the Dhamma, to get them in. And he was really kind. There are times where people would fall in love with him for his kindness.

There's one story where he was walking by a well in a village, and there was a woman at the well getting water. She was a woman from the untouchable caste, what they call the Dalit caste now. She was at the well, but in that system, they weren't allowed to actually get water for themselves. So she couldn't get water. Ananda walked by, saw what was happening, and said very kindly, "What are you doing? Can I help you?" She said, "I just need water, Venerable Sir." He said, "Oh, of course," got water, gave her water, and walked on.

And she falls in love with Ananda. She follows him back, following him around until finally the Buddha sees what's happening and asks her why. She says, "Because I love Ananda. Let me serve him. Let me take care of him." And the Buddha said, "You know, it's not Ananda you're in love with. It's his kindness." She fell in love with his kindness—really, basically, the pleasant feeling of the kindness, if we want to get down to the nub of it. But that's just one of many examples of how Ananda manifested and lived his holy life.

Devotion. Simplicity—it reminds me of the president just walking around the samadhi and going to serve dinner. That is one simple way of living with faith, of living with devotion. I said it may start seeming really dualistic for us, but I'm talking about how in the moment of love, there's no measurement. For us, it starts by looking for something to inspire faith, something to inspire this confidence.

Tulku Urgyen again: "In the beginning, you need fabricated devotion because natural, unfabricated devotion or uncontrived compassion does not occur immediately." So we're practicing karuna in a formal way. We need to cultivate, at times, fabricated devotion—calling up faith, calling up "Can I trust? Can I surrender?" That's fine. Because in the moment when the faith, the confidence, the trust really comes, in that moment it's the real thing. It doesn't matter. Like me and my teacup—it starts in a pretty banal way, but when the awareness is there, when the love is there, if you look inside, there's no measurement. Inside what? I don't know. The body, the mind. There's no inside, outside, right? Because there's no measurement, there's no separation. It's just this. Form and formlessness.

Ajahn Sumedho says a really interesting thing. I found this on one retreat we were sitting with him. He said that in his experience—Ajahn Sumedho, you know, he's a Western, an American man who's been an ordained bhikkhu, a teacher in the Ajahn Chah tradition for over thirty years, quite wise and very funny. I think we played a talk of his here, right? Very funny. Well, at this one retreat, he said that in his mind, the biggest hindrance he's seen for Westerners in practice is self-doubt. We tend to doubt—not only our self-hatred, that's one thing—but self-doubt, where we don't have faith, we don't have confidence in our own insights, in our own experience of awareness, in our own potential for liberation, or even our own experiences in a moment of liberation from our patterns, even momentary.

And he says, in part—this is him again—he thinks it's because for many of us in the West, partly culturally also, our personalities are so strong and believable. I actually think it's that we get so caught up in our personalities, we pay so much attention to our personalities. Everyone has personalities, but I've noticed when I've been in Asia for a while, yes, people have personalities, and they're not all lovely, but it just isn't in the forefront of every moment—my personality, my personality, and your personality, and let's process our personalities. When I come back here after being in Asia, honestly, I feel like I'm falling into this culture of which I'm a part, this neurotic obsession with personality.

Okay, that's a little much. He didn't say all that.

That was me.

But he says, here in the West, our personalities are really strong, and we believe them so much that we get really caught back into them. And so then, since for many of us part of our personality is this "I'm no good, I can't be free, that insight wasn't real because if it was real it wouldn't have gone away. If I was really able to be free, then I would never be angry again. If that was really a moment of awareness, then I wouldn't be suffering now. If that was really awareness, then how come these other people are asking so much more intelligent questions and I can't come up with anything?" All that stuff. And we believe it. We believe it.

That's why we need to cultivate a little faith. It doesn't just step outside of the box of personality—you don't have to fix it, you don't have to talk back to it, you don't have to shut it up. We just don't have to set it up on the throne. The Buddha's there, not our personalities.

So yes, we have to work a little bit maybe at faith. Taking the three refuges, for me, has become a practice from spending a lot of time in Buddhist countries. Refuge in the Buddha, or refuge in the seed of awakening. Refuge in awareness. Refuge in what Dogen said: "The truth is right here, right now. Where else can you find it?" And refuge in the understanding that this is not only true for everyone else—it also includes me. Refuge in the Dhamma, the truth. Refuge in the Sangha.

The real meaning of Sangha, the classical meaning, is actually the Sangha of awakened beings, or the awakened mind stream—just knowing that's possible, inspiring ourselves. If not that, then finding, being in nature. What brings about, again, the sense of mystery, the sense of awe, the sense of stepping outside of our ideas of the possible or what the world even is.

Again, from Arunachala—I often use this image. Arunachala, it's not really a mountain, it's kind of like a big hill, but there's nothing else around so it looks like a mountain. About 3,000 feet high. A friend who had gone up to the top told me that early in the morning, two or three in the morning, there are lots of mountain monkeys up there. There are monkeys down below, which aren't tame, but they'll jump—if you have one speck of food in your hand, they'll jump on you and grab it. They're very different. The mountain monkeys up on the top are much more wild.

And he said they would just get on the edge. It's very rocky, very rocky high, rocks and boulders down below, a few trees and shrubs, not very wooded. And he said these monkeys, they just get on the edge of the mountain, and then they throw themselves off into space. And they always land somewhere—they land on a rock or they grab a bush or somewhere. But just that sense of abandon into the moment. The monkeys of Arunachala.

Can we find that willingness to surrender, to throw ourselves into the moment? It's going to happen anyway. We might as well just relax into it. There's no way to stop it.

From Carlos Castaneda, talking about his sorcerers, he said: "Discipline for sorcerers is the art of facing infinity without flinching—not because they are strong and tough, but because they are filled with awe."

Can we just meet this moment—only this moment, not even each, just this moment—filled with awe? With the possibility of loving awareness rather than hating and wanting and reacting to whatever it is that's arising together with awareness. Wow, awareness is here. How wonderful.

Let's just sit quietly for a minute.

I just want to read the last paragraph of "Ash Wednesday" by T.S. Eliot:

Blessed Sister, Holy Mother, Spirit of the Fountain, Spirit of the Garden, suffer us not to mock ourselves with falsehood.

Teach us to care and not to care. Teach us to sit still even among these rocks, our peace in his will. And even among these rocks, sister, mother, and spirit of the river, spirit of the sea, suffer me not to be separated, and let my cry come unto thee.

The community then joined together in taking the refuges and precepts:

Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Sammā Sambuddhassa
Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Sammā Sambuddhassa
Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Sammā Sambuddhassa

Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi

Dutiyampi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dutiyampi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Dutiyampi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi

Tatiyampi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Tatiyampi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi
Tatiyampi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi

Pāṇātipātā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Adinnādānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Abrahmacariyā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Musāvādā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Surāmeraya majjapamādaṭṭhānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Vikālabhojanā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi
Nacca gīta vādita visūkadassanā mālā gandha vilepana dhāraṇa maṇḍana vibhūsanaṭṭhānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi

CHAPTER 370

Dāna, Sīla, Bhāvanā: The Three Pillars as Paths of Awakening

Carol Wilson · 50 min

In this deeply personal talk, Carol Wilson challenges the common assumption that meditation (bhāvanā) is the primary path while generosity (dāna) and ethical conduct (sīla) serve merely as supportive practices. Drawing from decades of intensive retreat experience and extensive time in Burma (Myanmar), she illuminates how all three pillars of Buddhist practice are equally valid paths of awakening that transform the suffering habits of greed, aversion, and delusion.

Wilson shares vivid examples from Burmese Buddhist culture, where dāna permeates daily life through alms rounds, rice offerings, and the symbiotic joy of giving and receiving. She describes how the formal, present-moment quality of offering—before, during, and after the act—creates genuine transformation rather than obligatory charity. The Buddha taught that recollecting one's own acts of generosity purifies the mind of greed and leads toward concentration and liberation, a practice available "while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children."

The talk addresses how our habitual responses to discomfort—seeking pleasant sense experiences or falling into resistance and aversion—can be transformed through conscious acts of generosity and non-harming. Wilson concludes with a powerful reflection on her visit to Dachau, emphasizing that liberation practice matters not just for personal peace but for the countless small decisions that shape our collective humanity.

Tonight I just wanted to share some teachings that might seem quite obvious but have been awakening more and more interest in me—a growing sense of possibility in what seems like the most simple teachings of the Buddha as part of a really intrinsic path of our awakening.

I've been on this path of studying Buddhist teachings and meditation for a long time, and I've been teaching Buddhist meditation and the whole Buddhist path for also quite a long time. It's just turned out that most of the teaching I do tends to be intensive silent retreats, anywhere from a weekend to three months. We just finished the first six weeks of the three-month retreat out at the meditation center in Barre. We do that every year, just to give you a sense of where my energy has tended to go.

This is also Cambridge Insight Meditation Center, and it's often the case that the heart of the teachings we learn about, what's new to us in this culture, is the meditation piece—which is, of course, fascinating. Meditation is the part of really learning to investigate, to explore the qualities of our mind and heart. As the Buddha said, everything he taught is to free our hearts and minds from suffering, to free our hearts and minds from confusion.

When I came up in my practice and the way I learned this whole path, the meditation piece was central, but it was kind of unspoken, sent as the most important. Yet anywhere you read the talks of the Buddha, the teachings of the Buddha, he always talks about the three pillars as dāna, sīla, bhāvanā in the Pali—generosity, ethical conduct or non-harming behavior, and bhāvanā, which is mental cultivation.

What's clear is that the thread of awakening, of really seeing through the confusion that brings suffering in our lives, in our heart and mind—the place where that seemed the richest, the most interesting, has always been in the meditation. So meditation centers, city centers, intensive retreats. And dāna and sīla, generosity and moral conduct, are important, sure. We were always told in the early years that you need to have ethical conduct so that you don't have remorse, so that meditation can go deeper if you're not out there killing people, basically. Which is true. And generosity is good, yeah, generosity is good.

So this might be like a "duh" kind of a talk, but what's been more and more rich for me in the past few years is coming to understand more deeply for myself that everything the Buddha taught—as far as I can tell in my limited experience—none of it's just like, "Oh, by the way, do this so you can do something better." Every aspect of the teachings is a path of awakening. Every aspect is a way to transform the suffering habits of our heart and mind into compassion, into clear seeing, into non-ill will, into loving-kindness, into wisdom.

So I just want to talk a little bit tonight about generosity and about sīla—virtuous conduct, non-harming conduct—as aspects of our path of awakening, and in themselves as paths of joy, of happiness, of purifying. Not that we have to wait till we can get to a weekend retreat. Weekend retreats are good. Or a three-month retreat—three-month retreats are great. Or go to be a nun for a year—that's great. But we don't have to do that. We can really start and continue to open up to generosity as a way of being that transforms our heart and mind in itself. That's a path of wisdom. It's not a second-best supportive practice.

The same with ethical conduct. And in both of them, it's about how we do it—how we pay attention as we're being generous, how we notice what's going on in our hearts and minds as we're refraining from harmful behavior. So you can see why, with awareness, with investigation, with kindness, with interest, these are really important aspects of waking up.

I can only, in this short of a time, hope to point a little bit. There's no way I can cover it all. There are vast things to say about both of these topics. So my only hope is if it sparks any kind of interest to take this into your life and really include it, explore it, enjoy it—to recognize the happiness that generosity and non-harming behavior bring us. Rather than it being something we should do, rather than not being generous or not being ethical becoming another way to hate ourselves, we can really see that these are sources of great happiness.

In the last few years, I guess every few years as we continue on our path, if we had to give a summary of what we're learning or how we see the path, it would probably change from time to time. So my current synopsis—I'm not up here saying this is the truth of all time—just my current synopsis would be that really, all of our practice is about transforming the suffering habits of our mind and heart. You see this everywhere in the Buddhist teaching, when the Buddha talks about sharing what will bring each of us to understand the deepest contentment, to really learn that we can live in this world as it is.

He never said he could change the world, and he didn't change the world. But he taught that we can learn to live in this world as it is without adding—by the way we relate to ourselves and others—without creating suffering for ourselves. And from that clear seeing, we can respond more appropriately to help alleviate the suffering of others. So it starts with ourselves.

In the most basic way, he was saying that the source of our deepest confusion and suffering is that we don't recognize the way things are accurately. And that's, you know, ten million other talks—I can't totally go into it here. But we don't recognize accurately, for example, the fact that everything is in constant change. We can say, "Yeah, I get it. Everything's in constant change." But then how do we act? We hold on to what we want. We're distressed when what we love goes away, as if that shouldn't happen, right? "No, no, I don't do that." Look and see in ourselves. Because we don't recognize accurately—and this is confusion, we don't see clearly—the habits of mind that cause us great suffering are greed and aversion, ill will, anger, fear. Basically: greed, negativity, and the confusion that doesn't see accurately. This is the essence of the Buddha's teaching.

And when he talks about transforming, what's so cool to me isn't that we have to go out and with hatred say, "Look at these disgusting habits in my heart and mind. I am a horrible human being, so I better change these now." That's mostly what people come to retreats doing. "I hate how much greed I'm seeing. It's really disgusting. I have to stop that." We say, "Well, you're just changing from greed to aversion. That's not really what we're trying to do here." But that's what we know. That's what we trust. That's what's so familiar we don't even recognize there's another possibility.

And the catch-22—you understand catch-22, right? I teach a lot in Europe in English, and have you ever tried to explain to somebody what that means if they haven't read the book? So the catch-22 is this: what keeps the greed and the hatred, the fear, the aversion going is not recognizing accurately. What keeps us from recognizing accurately? Guess what? Greed and aversion in the mind. So when we're really angry at someone, if you look at them, how do they look? Do you really appreciate all their beautiful qualities as they keep on doing this horrible thing that's making you angry? Not so much.

But what's so cool about the Buddha's teaching isn't that we have to uproot this stuff with hatred and willpower. "Okay, now I'm going to stop clinging. I'm going to stop having any greed from now on." Rather, it's that through paying attention, seeing how these habits arise and how they work—if we really notice that without judgment—we start to recognize the suffering in ourselves, for ourselves. And this is the cool piece: when we see that, wisdom naturally arises. "Oh, this isn't so helpful," and it starts to drop away. It's not that we have to cultivate this huge willpower, figure it all out ahead of time, and then create the insight. I mean, it's a huge job—we can't do that. We just have to pay attention. See what qualities in our heart and mind are bringing up more suffering. See what qualities are actually bringing up more contentment, more connectedness, more happiness, more joy.

And if we're willing to just look without prejudging, without self-hatred, without fear, it's really obvious. The habits are strong, but the clear seeing of generosity, of non-harming behavior—which translates as friendliness, as compassion—these naturally lead to wisdom. It's actually quite a cool thing. It's a huge task on one hand. On the other hand, it's so much less than we think. And we just have to start paying attention.

So what I'm trying to say here tonight is that you don't have to only meditate to do this work. Yes, meditation helps us learn how to look at our minds, but also cultivating generosity, cultivating non-harming behavior—these actually purify and transform these habits of mine that lead into greed, that lead into aversion and ill will.

Because the way we are set up as humans, we cling to the habits because we think they're going to be what makes us happy. It's not like we're just perversely evil or something. We're trying our best. We just—half the time—okay, don't take offense. Maybe I'll just speak for myself. Half the time, we just don't have a clue. We're doing what we think is going to make us happy, but it just doesn't always work.

So starting to recognize these patterns accurately, but also seeing how insidiously these habits creep in, both from inside and from outside, from the external environment.

I'll give you two examples that just came up this morning in my experience. I was sitting for about half an hour, and—for myself, the one I noticed was ill will, anger. I just noticed a habit in my mind which I've noticed many times: the mood you could call resistance. Have you ever experienced that? Just whatever it is—"I just don't want to do that." No one knows what that is, right?

Whatever it's directed toward, it comes up. But I was just sitting. It wasn't even aimed at anything. It was just there. And whatever then comes up into that mood—okay, I think I'll do this or that—what does the resistance mind say? "Oh, no. I can't do that." And if you're at all intellectual, you'll find that the mind is really, really good at rationalizing. So it can come up with all kinds of good reasons why I shouldn't do whatever the heck it is.

But because I've recognized this, thank God, over all these years, I can feel that the resistance is basically aversion—a kind of anger, negativity in the mind. And then whatever choice or thought or decision needs to be made happens to come up at that time. The view of it, the way we see it, is colored by that resistance. So it becomes, "No, that wouldn't be any good. Oh no, I can't..."—whatever it is.

The resistance may have come up, and I don't even know what it was about. I was just sitting there. Maybe it's because I didn't want to sit anymore. Maybe it's because—I don't even know. But then if I had to make a decision, like if someone had called me and said, "Would you do this or that today?" I would have said, "Oh no, it's too much trouble. I couldn't do this or that." I can't see clearly.

But I notice now that when there's resistance and I just get up—"Okay, resistance is like this"—and I don't really let it drive the bus, and I just get up and do whatever needs to be done, the resistance is gone, and I can see much more clearly what to do.

So it's a familiar pattern for me, and I see I'm not the only one. It's a quality of ill will, of aversion, that then colors experience. It colors the choices I make. It's kind of self-perpetuating, you know? Like with exercise—if you don't exercise, you'll be so tired.

Unless you're an exercise junkie who can't stop, one way or the other. But if I actually exercise, I feel better. If I listen to resistance, I'll just sit there and go, "No, I can't exercise." And the more I sit there, the more tired I get, which proves I really can't exercise. It just keeps going.

So that's on that level. But it's so familiar that if we don't notice, we're caught in it.

On the greed level—maybe some of you heard this too—I was listening to NPR this morning and there was a little segment. This is an easy shot, granted. They were talking to some so-called expert about conspicuous consumption in the U.S. So this is an easy target. But just talking to someone about how much you can buy, how much is spent—I have no idea if this is true, but they were saying...

That the level of consumption in this country—just buying all kinds of things, not particularly energy—if this level of consumption were replicated across the whole world, the earth could only support 1.4 billion people at this rate, rather than 7 billion at the already horrific levels so many people currently endure.

And then they were explaining how part of the economic philosophy that gets put out suggests that when there's a slump, what would help the economy is for everyone to go shopping. I have to say I've heard that in some form or another—this idea that it's better to get out and get that money into the economy. Basically, go shopping.

This operates on the same level with greed and how it can slip in as a way to make ourselves feel good if we're not paying attention. I was reading an interview with the actress Emma Thompson, who had just spent a few weeks in Burma with a nonprofit doing aid work. I've been in Burma many times. It's very poor, and it really needs a great deal. The government does almost nothing for the people—well, nothing good anyway.

So she was actually speaking at a conference in Burma, which is already unusual. But she said one thing, just one thing according to what I'm talking about, that I found really interesting. They were asking her, you know, why are you doing this? Why do you take your spare time and come here for weeks to do this aid work? They had been going around to villages—I'm not entirely clear what they were doing. But she said, "Well, you know, there's really so much suffering here and in the world. When I hear about the suffering, when I read about how much suffering there is, I feel really badly." And we do—we feel badly when there's suffering. She said, "So I realized that when I feel badly, I could either go out and buy myself a new handbag to make myself feel better, or I could take some generous and compassionate action. That's what I'm choosing to do now."

When I first read that, I thought, yeah, yeah. It sounded kind of glib, you know—an easy thing to say. But as I've thought about it more and just watched my own mind, without putting ourselves down, I've noticed something. Often when we feel badly—and there are many reasons to feel badly, and it's not that we always have to go out and do aid work when there's suffering—but when we're suffering even internally, often going and getting something pleasant is a way to think it's going to make us feel better. Maybe I just want to go get some ice cream.

I'm not saying that's bad. Don't get me wrong—I'm not saying that's bad. I'm saying we just watch what we do. It can feed the unspoken, unrecognized assumption that when things aren't going well, I need to get more good things. That's the way out of unhappiness. And sometimes, temporarily, it may be. I'm not saying there's anything wrong with that, but just to see.

There's one talk of the Buddha's where he said, "The uninstructed person knows of no other escape from unpleasant feelings except to go and lust after pleasant sense experience." The uninstructed person. If you watch how often we do that, it makes me really sad to think of a life where that would be the only way we knew to find happiness, to find peace—to go get more pleasant sense experiences. It seems like such a bleak life, doesn't it? But it's deeply ingrained in our habits. Not that it's bad to have pleasant experiences, but to see that this is not the only way out.

What Emma Thompson was pointing to is that generous and compassionate action actually brings so much more happiness, so much more contentment, so much more wisdom in our own hearts and minds. Not because it's a good thing you should do—not like that at all—but because it's actually transforming the habits of greed in our minds, the habits of self-centeredness, the habits of fear, the habits of ill will or anger. It's actually strengthening the wholesome grooves in this non-existent mind, you could say, rather than the suffering grooves.

So I want to talk now a little bit about working with generosity and, as I say, just pointing to a few things about generosity and ethical conduct—non-harming conduct—as paths.

The most important thing I want to say about both, starting with generosity, is that it's not so much an external mandate that we should be generous. It's about really bringing interest and awareness to our hearts and minds, and then to the situation around us, before an act of generosity, during the act of generosity, and after the act of generosity. What's transformative about cultivating generosity is the way that we relate to it, the way it really changes our heart and mind—from the inside out.

So it's not about simply giving, giving, giving in some glib or mechanical way. Not that at all. And we're not just talking about generosity of wallets, generosity of things. It's this sense of sharing whatever we have—food, our time, willingness to listen to a friend, caring, money, whatever.

In the culture in Burma, and also in Thailand where I was a nun, generosity is kind of ingrained because they're essentially Buddhist cultures. Both with the inner heart of it and also the external institutionalization of it that kind of kills the heart of it, just like anywhere. But generosity is very deeply embedded in those cultures.

All the nunneries, the monasteries, the meditation centers run completely on dana, on generosity. You could go to sit there for a year or for months. There's no fee ever. You show up and you're welcome, if there's room. There's never anything charged. And people come—all these meditation centers are signed up a year ahead. People come from outside, Burmese families, and offer the meals. They'll pay for the meal for the day. And it's not cheap anymore. The place I was sitting last winter, there were about two hundred people meditating each day, and the meals for the day cost four hundred dollars. I want you to know, except for the wealthy, people in Burma are really poor. It's a very difficult situation. And yet people are coming, signing up, offering meals, and then they sit and watch you eat. Because the generosity isn't just about the offering. It's in the sense that this incredible joy comes in the giving and in the receiving, and in doing it in a very intentional way together. There's something very immediate and joyous and contagious about the generosity in these countries.

But it's not just in the meditation centers. It's deep, deep in the culture. I remember I was riding in a little pony cart way up in northern Burma, and the driver was a really poor guy. We were riding along talking to him—I must have been with a friend who could speak Burmese, because he couldn't speak English. We were talking about this Western monk who had been living around that area for a few years, quite a character, so everybody knew him. He always went around barefoot. This pony cart driver, a very poor guy, kind of in rags, was saying, "Oh, I feel so badly for him. He can't afford slippers. I really wish I could just save enough money to buy him some slippers." And he really meant it.

In those first years I was there, my Western conditioning would kick in: "Oh no, you don't want to give to us. We have so much more than you. We don't want to take anything from you." But we started to see how separating, how alienating that is. The wanting to give whatever one can afford, and the receiving of it in the same open-hearted way—that is really what's beautiful and joyful about the practice of generosity. You see it's not just we people who have a lot doing something for you poor people who don't. That's a kind of minimum generosity. It's not the generosity that's really transforming our hearts.

The quality of generosity that truly transforms is the kind that, in that very moment, liberates our heart from greed. For sure, we stop hanging on to whatever it is we're offering. But also, in that open, very present giving and receiving, the sense of who's giving to whom honestly starts to break down. This might sound kind of pie in the sky, but I've been there enough times in Burma and spoken with so many other people who've had the same experience, so I know it's not just me.

After a while, you get happier and happier when people are generous, and it's contagious. You start wanting to be generous yourself. At first, with my American conditioning, it was, "Oh my God, these poor people are giving me so much. I've got to start giving back." But that doesn't feel good. That's not transforming. That's a kind of me needing to do the right thing. I mean, it's better than stealing from people, don't get me wrong. But it's not the transformation of seeing through our separation. When the heart releases from holding on, there's this sense of interconnectedness, of the joy that comes from both the giving and the receiving—something absolutely uplifting and faith-building.

Shantideva was a great Indian teacher whose work influenced many of the Tibetan teachings. He said once, "When I've done something for the sake of another, I feel no elation. I look for nothing in return. It's like having fed myself." That sense of looking for nothing in return. Or the Buddha saying never let a day go by without sharing a meal. This spirit is so embedded in the culture that we start to catch it. I start to catch it. And you can feel the heart and mind open up, become lighter, become more content, become less needy, become less wanting. The happiness of offering is really a beautiful thing.

Let me share another example. The year after the cyclone—a devastating storm much like Hurricane Katrina—hit a part of Burma not too far from Yangon, we went to our monastery in the winter. Even the villages around there had lost a great deal. The really poor villagers had lost some of their houses. The rice crops had been ruined. There wasn't enough rice. So the abbot of this monastery wanted to organize what's called a rice dāna—dāna meaning generosity—which simply meant that we bought many bags of rice. We had this huge room, maybe half the size of this one, filled with bags of rice. The villagers would come, each with a small chit for their household indicating how many people lived there, and we would give each family a bag of rice.

But they don't just say, "Okay, here's the room, go take your rice," the way I could imagine we might do it here. No. The Sayadaw—the teacher—came and insisted that we, who had brought money from our friends, participate directly. There were six of us, but we were very clear that we were just representatives of all the friends from the States and Europe and Australia who had offered the money. He said, "No, you can't just do that. You have to come." We put the rice on the table, and each person who came, we handed them a bag of rice. I have pictures of this. Narayan and I were both there, and these little ladies—these tiny little ladies—would come up. Narayan and I together could barely heave a bag of rice, and they'd plop it on their head and go walking off, some of them with children in their arms. It was unbelievable. We spent all day giving rice to the people in this village.

The next day, the monks went out early in the morning on what's called alms round. In all Buddhist countries, the monks still do this. They go out with their bowls, eyes downcast, and simply walk among the villagers. Anyone who wants to offer food can do so. The monks don't ask, they don't speak—they just walk their set route every day. Everyone knows where they're coming, and if they want to offer food, they can. This practice dates back to the time of the Buddha. In his time, it was the only way the monastics received food. Now in many monasteries, food is also cooked by lay people who come in and offer meals. So in these poor areas, like this one, the monks go out every day and all they receive is a little bit of rice. But it's really about offering the opportunity for generosity. They do this not because they actually need the rice—people come and provide the meals for the day—but because they're offering those who are poor the opportunity to give something. It's a really interesting dynamic.

So we had a friend, a guy from Mexico who was going on alms rounds. He told us—he'd been there a few months—he said they go every day, the same little route, the same villagers come every day, they know who comes. He said the day after that rice dāna, there were so many more people out offering rice, because now they had a little rice. And the first thing they did was to go and actually offer something back. It was just so beautiful. He said one family had all their little kids lined up, and each little kid had the chance to put rice in a bowl.

There's no pressure. No one's there saying you need to do it. It's because of the joy and the happiness and the symbiosis of that.

This is something that I've started to get more in my cells over all the years of being there. It's really become quite profound. I'm not saying that I've completely changed my mind. But I can see how this is the practice of awakening. The practice of non-clinging.

The practice of not being all about me and fear of you and needing to hold on to what I have. The practice of trust—that enough will be enough. We give now and when I need, it will come. It's been quite amazing.

Just one last little story, to show it's not just monks and nuns. I was walking on the road through the village between the two meditation centers where I was staying one afternoon by myself. A little boy, seven or eight, came walking up to me. I'd never seen him before or since. He had no clue who I was. He came up dressed in his little school uniform, very nicely dressed, and he had a tiny jasmine flower. He approached me and then very formally, with his jasmine flower, did this formal bow—that respectful way that people say hello and thank you. Really focused, he handed me this little flower. We both bowed. I said thank you in Burmese, my one word, and he went off. That was it. I was so touched by that—just this sense of connection.

It's not about what's given. There's a place where the Buddha said, even if you rinse your dirty bowl and throw that rinse water in a pond, thinking, "May whatever beings live in this pond be able to benefit, to eat or drink something from this rinse water"—that's an act of generosity. Because it's not so much what, but how.

So it's said, in the way of giving, before giving, really bring attention to the sense of volition. So it's not just this casual, "Oh yeah, you need something? Here, take it." I've done that many times. A friend was saying to me once, "Remember that casual generosity of yours at that one point? This thing I've used so much?" He didn't mean it in a bad way, but it really went in. He was right. It had been a really thoughtless kind of generosity. I just had this thing. I said, "I don't want it. Do you want this?" He said, "Oh yeah, I'd love it." And he did love it, and I didn't, but there was no real connection in that.

So it's simply bringing attention to your intention, and then when we give, really being present with it. That's all. Not like, "I'm so great, I'm giving you this," but just being present with the whole giving and the whole receiving. There's something so powerful about that.

At first I was a little shy about that, all kind of self-referencing. But again, in Burma, when you give—when we go to the nunneries, we give them money because they don't get so much as monks, to buy food or to build a new floor or to put a roof on that isn't leaking, to build toilets. Toilets are a great thing to give money for, by the way.

You know, it's very basic stuff, so you give money. Now, in Burma, the money comes in big piles because it's just not worth that much. So when you're going to give money, you do it very formally. They go and get this big tray. You pile the money up, and a hundred dollars could be a big pile like this. At first it looks so crass, doesn't it? Handing over this big pile of money—you think, "Oh God, I thought it would be a little nicer than that."

But it's different. The nuns sit there. We sit there. We all put our hands on the tray—it depends how many people there are, but a few nuns, a few of the givers. Together, you hold it up. You're kneeling down with your knees back, so this can be quite agonizing if it goes on for very long. And they chant this beautiful blessing and thanks.

It's a really common thing they say: "With this gift, may this gift be a cause for your awakening from suffering. May your generosity bring you to awakening in the shortest possible time." That's a common thing to say. It's really different than when I write a check and put it in an envelope. I could still be more present for that than I am—you can still cultivate the intention and the connection—but there's not that immediacy.

Just last week, a friend, a yogi, a meditator, gave me a check to bring to Burma, which was very nice. But as she gave it to me, it just came into my mind to say that, like they do. So she's handing it to me, and I just said, "May this generosity be a cause for your quick awakening from suffering and liberation." And I could see her whole face change. We don't usually say that because it sounds so—I don't know—weird. I figured I could do it at the end of a three-month retreat. But it just came out, and I thought, "Oh, it gives it so much more power." It honors what you're doing in the generosity. It really starts to change our habits and bring us joy.

And then afterwards—and this is really important because it's not something we do very much—the Buddha talked about this with both moral conduct and with generosity. Afterwards, after you've been generous, after you've refrained—and moral conduct can simply be refraining from harmful behavior, that's an act of wholesomeness, an act of compassion, of non-harming, just refraining from taking something that isn't yours—is to actually reflect on your past acts of generosity, your past acts of non-harming behavior.

I know in my culture anyway, we think, "Well, think about how generous I've been"—it sounds like a real ego trip, right? "Oh yeah, I'm so generous." It's not that at all. Let me read this to you from the Buddha:

"Furthermore, this is the case where you recollect your own generosity: 'It is a gain, it is a great gain for me that among people who are overcome with possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleaned of the stain of possessiveness, generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous and responsive to requests.'"

And this is the key: "At any time when a disciple of the noble ones, when someone on the path, is recollecting generosity, in the moment of recollecting, her mind is not overcome with greed." There's only room for one thing in there. If we're really recollecting generosity, we're not filled with greed. It's really very simple how it works. We're not overcome with aversion. We're not overcome with delusion. Her heart, her mind heads straight based on generosity.

"And when the heart is headed straight, the disciple has a sense of the goal, gains a sense of the dhamma, of the truth, experiences joy connected with the dhamma, with the truth. And in one who is joyful, the body grows calm. One whose body is calm experiences ease. And in one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated."

And then he goes on to describe how this leads all the way up to liberation.

The exact same process unfolds when recollecting your virtuous actions—those times when you simply refrained from doing something harmful. You don't have to be Mother Teresa. Just bringing to mind the times you've restrained yourself from causing harm, the times you've done something simply generous. Perhaps a friend calls wanting to talk about their problems, and your first thought is, "I'm too tired." But then you realize, "You know what? I can listen." Recollecting moments like that heads our minds straight. It's really a way of purifying our heart and mind. This isn't about thinking, "I'm so great."

The Buddha goes on, speaking to this layperson: "You can develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children." Basically, any time. Any time at all.

I always run out of time to talk about sila, non-harming behavior. So I will end with something that really inspired me in an unexpected way last year—something that deepened my appreciation for both the subtlety and depth of our difficult habits of mind. This isn't to put ourselves down or be judgmental, but rather to illuminate why it is so essential for me, and hopefully for all of us, to cultivate and transform our habits of greed and fear—for our own happiness and for the happiness of the world.

Because it's so comfortable to fall back into greed, to fall back into denial, to fall back into delusion—even though these patterns bring us suffering. Without really understanding how our minds and hearts work, without genuinely looking and seeing whether it's true that these qualities bring suffering, we remain caught. Don't believe anything you read, or anything I say. Look and see for yourself. Not with judgment, but with clear seeing.

I know for myself, after all these years of practice, that what I'm saying is true for me. But you don't know it for you. You may, but don't believe me—look and see. And even knowing this, I cannot say with certainty what my mind or heart would do in the most difficult circumstances. I know what I think I'd like to do, but it's not always within our control.

A year ago last summer, I was in Germany again, and I visited Dachau, a concentration camp I had never managed to visit before. They've set it up as a museum, and I think they did a really good job with it. First I was amazed at how big it was. Then my German friends said, "Oh, Carol, that wasn't even one of the big ones."

The museum was arranged with large placards and posters describing every aspect you could think of. But they also made it personal. In each section—like the room documenting all the different groups of people who had been imprisoned there, the Roma, people from Hungary, gay people, Jewish people, Catholics—they didn't leave it impersonal. Almost always there was a name, a photograph of someone, some brief story. Stories of people who were in the concentration camp, people who worked there, people who lived in the surrounding community.

I was also watching the visitors. It was incredibly crowded—somehow I had imagined I would be wandering around there by myself, but it was packed. Observing people move through the exhibits was fascinating. You could see couples enter chatting casually, and as they progressed through, you could see them becoming genuinely touched. The museum was designed in such a way that it reached your heart. You simply couldn't remain detached.

What that experience did for me—I was already having a difficult month—was bring me even more deeply into a sense that what I'm doing, what I hope we're all doing, is profoundly important. Because this is not just something about Germany in the 1940s. We only have to read history, or read today's news. I don't even have to name places, do I? The endless atrocities and genocides in the last twenty or thirty years, throughout all of history, events happening right now in Somalia, in Sudan, the Khmer Rouge, racism in this country. It's everywhere.

What I understood from looking at all those people involved was this: it wasn't just a few monsters who came up with some bizarre idea. It was many, many people in all different situations. And it's not as though we make one big decision. I don't know what I would do if I were in a situation where my family or the people I love were threatened, and all I had to do to protect them was turn a blind eye. Not actively do something harmful, but simply turn a blind eye.

I don't know. I can say what I wish I would do, but I don't really know.

So we see that it's just a series of tiny little decisions that we each make in our lives. When I'm not at ease with greed, or I don't understand fear, or I don't see how resistance can color all my decisions, then resistance or fear or greed is going to guide my choices—even when I think, "Oh, I want to be a good person," but I don't understand how my mind works.

Somehow that realization gave me a whole other level of inspiration. It's not just about meditation, but about the little moments. And there is no right or wrong—not that you should always give or always not give. But when I pass someone on the street who says, "I'm homeless and I need money," each time it's a new decision, isn't it? Each time. Not "you always give" or "you never give," but each time: Do I just walk by? Do I give? Either way, do I know what I'm doing and why I'm doing it?

If I give, can I not be embarrassed, and just be really present in that? Not think I'm doing something good for someone else, but simply be offering. If I don't give, know why I'm not giving.

Our whole life is just little moments, little moments, little moments of decision. We can take these chances of generosity, of restraining from stealing, from hurting people, from lying, from harsh speech. Just restrain, and do that consciously, and reflect on the sense of connectedness and wholesomeness and contentment that this can truly bring us.

I really believe that both of these practices—sīla and dāna—could be practices of liberation. Even when you're sitting at home in a house crowded with children and you can't come to meditate.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Notable Dhamma Teachers

Notable Dhamma Teachers — Carol Wilson

Four decades of warm, down-to-earth teaching on mindfulness, the brahmavihāras, and freedom

370 talks · Carol Wilson

Transcriptions produced locally using Swiss low-carbon electricity.
Corrections and rewriting by cloud-hosted AI.

dharmaseed.org