It's burning. And it just takes this whole level of solidity and craziness away. It's a lot harder to identify with a burning, changing to twisting fire element than it is with "my pain in my knee."

As we begin to directly experience our material nature in terms of the elements, we find it's much harder to identify. It becomes much more impersonal. Also, we see the impermanence much more clearly, because when you're looking at a sensation in terms of temperature burning and suddenly it changes to throbbing, it's changed. A different element is predominant. It's a different sensation. The seeming solidity of our experience really begins to break up. Even one sensation changes from burning to twisting to throbbing to different points of intensity, back to burning again. But in being with this in terms of elements, there's this constant sense of arising and falling, of nothing personal there.

So we're really seeing, just in being with that one experience in that moment, anicca, impermanence, and anatta, not-self, pretty clearly. Even if we're not consciously notching it up—"Oh, there's a moment of anicca, a moment of anatta"—we're viscerally experiencing that. Also the unsatisfactoriness: there's no solid me there. It's just this insubstantial, changing experience. There's no control, which is another way that we experience anatta or not-self. We can't say what sensation is going to come next. "I think I'll just be with the water element today." Fat chance. Or how long it'll last. Or what the next sensation will be. Or whether it's pleasant or unpleasant. There's a lot to be seen and understood from being with a moment of this first foundation of mindfulness of the body.

The second foundation is called contemplation of feelings in the feelings. We've spoken some about this, about the feeling element. I'll just briefly go over it again because it can be quite subtle, being in touch with the feeling tone of an experience. And it can also be quite crucial in our understanding of how suffering is created on a moment-by-moment basis in our mind.

Feeling, as we've said, has a very specific meaning in this context. It's that quality of an experience that is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. And it is one of the five aggregates, the five things that make up a human being. So it is present in each moment of our experience. It won't always be predominant, but it's present.

Feeling arises from what is called contact. In other words, we have the sense base—the eye, the ear, the nose. Take the ear. A sound arises, and in the coming together of that with consciousness, the knowing of it, this is called contact. When this happens in a moment, these three coming together, a feeling arises from that. That sound is experienced as pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. No big deal. There's no value judgment in any of this.

It happens so much and it's so subtle that when it's unseen, this is where we get into big trouble. Where the pleasant leads to liking, a kind of craving, wanting more, and without seeing, into grasping, into fantasy, into all the things we do to perpetuate pleasant sensation. Same with unpleasant—all the things we do to avoid it. And with neutral, all the things we do to change it because we don't even notice it. I can't say how many times people have, just in this last couple weeks, talked about boredom as a really difficult experience. Not quite noticing what's happening.

So this is this quality of feeling. And it can be so important to notice because it is one really observable place in our experience where this ongoing cycle of perpetuating suffering and confusion can be broken. The cycle that starts with ignorance, leading through this contact, the pleasant or unpleasant or neutrality, the craving that arises from that, going on to clinging, going on to becoming, going on to more pain and suffering. This cycle can be broken when it's touched with mindfulness.

We don't have to stay trapped like this. Mindfulness itself is an incredibly powerful tool that allows the power to go out of this cycle. Not by hating it. Not by saying, "I'm never going to experience anything pleasant again, so I don't have to get into craving." Simply by seeing it with the power of mindfulness. That's why this foundation of feeling is a really important one.

I know it may sound oversimplified when we're in the middle of some really strong emotional experience, and someone comes along and says, "Well, if you would just notice the feeling of unpleasantness, it would all just drop away." I know it doesn't always work like that. And feeling won't always be the predominant experience. But we can begin to bring it to our awareness and give it more attention, because it is really powerful.

So when there is something going on that we're caught in, stop a minute. Can we bring the attention back to the bare experience? You're sitting here. There's a recurrent noise in the hall from someone. You're aware of the noise. You're not off in fantasy, but really spinning in the aversion: "How can that person be so inconsiderate? Don't they know they're spoiling my concentration?" And on and on. Aware of anger, but not really completely gone.

When we can come back even closer to the original contact, we begin to see what Ajahn Chah said—that it's not that the sound disturbs us, it's we who go out and disturb the sound. It's just a sound. Hearing. An unpleasantness arising with that.

When we're sitting there, lost in anger, then there's the imagination: "Oh, they're gonna do it again." And then we're really angry, in anticipation of something that hasn't even happened yet. But you know it's going to happen. Okay—the next sound. Bring your attention open to it, fully to that actual contact, the hearing. Really note it. Be with it fully. And perhaps one will notice then the quality of pleasantness or unpleasantness or neutrality with it, that might or might not lead into this whole mental torment that follows. But each moment that we can be right there at that contact point, really aware of the pleasantness or unpleasantness, it's much less likely that we'll get so lost.

It's also a lot harder to identify with unpleasant feeling than it is with "that insensitive brute of a person ruining my meditation." Unpleasant feeling—there's not much to do about it.

The experience that I always bring up, one that was very strong for me, happened once when I was doing walking meditation late into a retreat one summer here, during one of our plagues of the flies, which we had really badly at times. I was walking very slowly, and this fly was just—you know how they are—crawling all over my face. And I was noting it. But I was noting sensation, and I was noting aversion, and growing aversion. And it was a lot of trouble, the way I was describing the eating meditation. I mean, I was going about that slow—to lift and move and intend to wipe and wipe. And by the time my hand got there, the fly would be long gone. By the time I got my hand back down, the fly was back. So it was a losing battle.

And finally I kind of said, "Maybe I could notice the unpleasantness." I got very careful with the sensations, and sure enough could really get a sense of that unpleasantness. And that was fine. It took really staying right there at that sense door, right at that contact, because each little movement of the foot brought up unpleasantness. But when I was there with it—it's just a little tickle. Unpleasantness. Now there's nothing to hate or really get off into aversion about. It's really quite freeing.

This is sort of an aside note. Why does the Buddha repeat, in each of his instructions, this "be aware of the body in the body, the feeling in the feeling"? I've read different explanations. The one I like best, because it really speaks to my experience, is this: often when we talk about observing the feelings, observing the body, the consciousness, objects of consciousness—

It sounds incredibly dualistic, like I'm standing over here somewhere observing the feelings in the consciousness, which is down there. The way Thich Nhat Hanh explains it, which makes a lot of sense to me, is that this phrasing repeatedly emphasizes in the language of the sutta that the Buddha is pointing to our direct, bare experience—not to thinking about experience.

This is what Thich Nhat Hanh says: "Remember the phrase from the Satipatthana Sutta: contemplate the body in the body, contemplate the feelings in the feelings, contemplate the mind in the mind, contemplate the objects of mind in the objects of mind. This means that you must live in the body in full awareness of it and not just study it like a separate object. Live in awareness with feelings, mind, and objects of mind. Do not just study them. When we meditate on our body, we live with it as truth and give it our most lucid attention. We become one with it. The flower blossoms because sunlight touches it and warms its bud, becoming one with it. Meditation reveals not a concept of truth, but a direct view of truth itself."

To me, that makes a lot of sense—what the Buddha is pointing to.

Often we won't be able to be aware of or contemplate the feeling quality of an experience. It's not always predominant. We might be really angry, way lost in being angry at that sound, with no chance of getting close to the contact and seeing the unpleasantness. That's fine, because feeling is only one of the four foundations.

The third foundation is the one we're paying attention to when we're aware of anger or aware of calm. The third foundation of mindfulness is contemplation of consciousness, or state of mind, and this includes mind states and emotions. What I love about this is there's no sense of hierarchy. It's not that we're doing a lesser contemplation when we're aware of consciousness rather than feeling. It's just as valid. It's simply that a different foundation is predominant in this moment. No one of the four foundations will always be prominent when we're working with vipassana in this way—it will continually shift and change. In my experience, that's not only not a problem, it's incredibly helpful because it keeps us from getting stuck in one way of seeing, stuck in our blind spots.

So, contemplation of consciousness. One way of looking at it is that there are two component parts of a moment of consciousness. Consciousness itself is that quality of bare knowing of what's happening, the bare awareness. But in any particular moment, arising together with the bare knowing will be some mental factor or emotion present with consciousness. It colors the consciousness, so to speak, in that moment. They arise together.

Mental factors might include greed, lust, happiness, faith, joy, boredom, or gratitude. In that moment, the bare knowing quality and the mental factor can't really be separated. It's like you're looking at consciousness through this mental factor. That's why it's so important to include this foundation of consciousness in our practice, in contemplating it—because that mental factor, that emotion, is coloring our perception, our experience.

This can be quite obvious. When you first fall in love with somebody, suddenly the world is beautiful, the sun is shining, and people you couldn't stand—you don't know what was the matter with you—they're so wonderful now. That happiness is coloring our experience of everything. When you're having a bad day here, suddenly this place is the pits, a prison; everybody is grim and forbidding and sick. And you really believe it.

I remember once, on a retreat I did a while ago, this first really hit me. I was sitting in the dining room and wasn't aware of the state of my consciousness. I was sitting quietly, noting, and each person that walked by—something about them was incredibly annoying. "Oh God, look at the way they walk. Look at that person—they haven't been mindful since the day they got here." Something like that, about ten people in a row. Finally it hit me: "Hey, wait a minute. I think there's anger in the mind here. And it's got nothing to do with the people."

This sounds rather obvious, but so often it isn't—until we remember to turn our attention to the quality of consciousness in that moment. When we're aware of it, it's very, very powerful. And when we're not, it becomes a veil we look at everything through.

So we simply, again, need to recognize the state of consciousness, acknowledge it, and allow it.

We're not trying to manage it or manipulate it—simply allow it. And this applies not only to difficult states of consciousness, but also to really pleasant and positive ones, and to neutral ones as well. It's quite common for people to come in and say, "It's just calm, nothing's happening." But calm is something. Calm is a mental factor. It's happening. We need to notice it. It's a worthy experience to give our attention to. It's the truth of this moment. The third foundation—state of consciousness—is important to pay attention to.

How do we pay attention to it? Again, it's simply knowing the quality of consciousness at that moment. That's all—the bare knowing of it, the direct experience. There's a phrase from the sutta where the Buddha says that a bhikkhu, or in our case a yogi, knows a consciousness with lust as a consciousness with lust, and knows a consciousness without lust as a consciousness without lust. That's all. It's not that complicated. We don't have to do something about it. It's simply to know it for what it is. Be with it. Feel it. Allow it.

Often in a strong mental state we can feel it in the body. And here's where the foundations start to interrelate, because you're moving into awareness of the body again. But just let the state of consciousness be as it is, with our mindful awareness of it—whether it's restlessness, sleepiness, joy, excitement, bliss, concentration, or calm. The key is alert attention and acceptance of whatever state the consciousness is in, knowing it.

As we begin to give our attention more to this area—because it can be quite subtle; mental states aren't always strong and can just nebulously color what goes on—we find that it also becomes clearer and easier to be aware of the subtle shifts of mental states. And this is where it moves into wisdom, into understanding. Because as we continue to observe this, we really see that no state of consciousness lasts very long. It really doesn't. How many times do you note calm, or do you note sleepiness? It might seem like forever, but it changes. Even the really heavy, seemingly negative states of mind that we feel caught in and identified with—when we really look on a moment-to-moment basis, no matter how solid we think it is, we start to notice moments when it's just really not there.

So we're really sad, filled with grief, and it hurts. It's hard. We're noting it. And suddenly there's a moment: "God, I'm so hungry. I wonder what's for lunch." And then we're back to, "Oh, I'm so sad." But that moment happened. The sadness was completely gone, and the mind had moved into hunger and desire for lunch. Just watching this carefully, this awareness of the impermanence of mental states begins to poke holes in the seeming solidity of what we think is our identity, of what we think is our experience of our mind, our consciousness. We see quite strongly that mental states come and go.

Sometimes as we practice for a long time, we find that really strong mental states are flipping back and forth with a seemingly crazy rapidity. This is quite common, and it's not a problem—except if we keep thinking each one is who we are. Then we're flipping back and forth between all these identities, and in one hour we go from exaltation to despair to starvation to murderous rage to loving-kindness, and we think, "My God, I'm crazy." But we're only crazy if we think each of those is who we are and we're trying to find some kind of solid core there, some kind of continuity. When we really start looking, there isn't a solid core and there isn't continuity. The more we're aware of the state of consciousness, the harder it is to really identify with it for very long. Whether it's pleasant or unpleasant or neutral, none of them last too long.

One might find—I've found this is quite perverse—that with really painful and unpleasant mental states, when I start to see how impermanent they are and they're beginning to dissolve away, there's a real clutching after them. "Wait a minute, if that goes away, then who am I? I'm this really screwed up, pained, depressed person." There can often be this kind of perverse holding on to really difficult and unpleasant states. Just notice that if it comes up. You'll see it when you begin to acknowledge the changing nature of consciousness.

No mental state will last. It can't. How much pain comes from identifying with and yearning for pleasant states of mind?

Concentration, rapture, bliss, calm—these also are mental states. They also arise and fall. They're also not us. No mental state is going to bring us lasting peace. It can't do it for us. And in that continuing to yearn for something solid and satisfying where it can't be found, until we bring our attention to actually look at the nature of mental states, we'll continue to suffer.

The paradox is that the peace that comes when we quit fighting the state of mind that's happening now and looking for something else—that acceptance, that total mindful acceptance of what's happening right now, is where the peace can come.

Sometimes I get the impression from talking with people that there's an almost unconscious tendency not to give full attention to states of consciousness. Sometimes because it's painful, something hard to be with. But sometimes I get the impression there's this sort of sense of hierarchy: "Well, being with mental states isn't as important as being with the breath. Somehow that's a more valid and useful object of contemplation." If you're feeling a sense of struggle in that way, sometimes stop for a minute. Check out the third foundation of mindfulness. What is the quality of consciousness? Is there something we're not seeing in trying to push it away and hold on to some idea we have?

Peace and freedom isn't about achieving the perfect, unchanging state of consciousness and then just floating there for the rest of our life. It doesn't happen. Peace isn't the absence of difficult or unpleasant experience, but the seeing of it for what it actually is —seeing the impersonal, ultimately unsatisfying nature, the sense that there's no abiding self here. And being aware of, noting and noticing and fully allowing our states of consciousness to be in our awareness when that's the predominant experience is an incredibly helpful part of understanding this.

One other thing I want to say about working with emotions, mental states, states of consciousness, because it's a strong one for many of us: seeing the mind state for simply what it is requires the use of what we call wise attention. Both of these are very powerful. The power of mental states is obvious; the power of wise attention is also very strong.

A good example of the power of both of these is in that phenomenon we've spoken of called yogi mind. In our normal life, in our normal experience, we have a tremendous amount of energy that's expended in activity, in going here and there, in our minds going here and there. And one of the things that's happening now as we sit and we focus and we pay attention and we really limit our activities and our movements is that this tremendous energy is being gathered together into the power of our meditation. It's really a strong energy. It builds and builds as the retreat goes on. It's very powerful when directed into mindfulness, into seeing. It's equally powerful and can be directed into total identification with what's going on in a particular mental state. And this is where we get yogi mind.

So a simple experience: you have a little sniffle, it's unpleasant. The thought goes through, "Uh-oh, I'm getting a cold." Fear comes up. There's identification with the fear. There's the thought, "Maybe if I had some echinacea, I must have some echinacea. I know I'll get better, I won't get sick if I have echinacea." And this fear builds, and all the energy we've been building up is going into this total identification with, "If I don't get echinacea by tonight, I'm going to have pneumonia." And you know, you come bursting into the office at 6 a.m.—"I've got to have echinacea!" And the poor people in the office are just sitting there: "Okay, sure, echinacea, right, okay." The incredible power of energy directed into identification with the mind state of fear. This is yogi mind.

Now we can also, at whatever point of the process we become aware of it, move that energy from identification with the fear into paying attention to the fear—into the noticing, the noting, the observing of it. We're not saying, "Fear, bad, go away." But shifting where the energy is going, from identification into observing the fear itself, back into the third foundation of mindfulness. This is wise attention—simply shifting the focus of energy.

And it's very powerful.

The fourth foundation is a very complex one, so what I'm going to say is incredibly cursory. The fourth foundation is contemplation of the dhammas, a word which can variously mean many things. One of the usual translations in this context is "contemplation of mental objects," or "objects of mind," sometimes "contents of mind," "the process of mind." Again, it's the bare knowing of what we call objects of mind.

This is not license to spend the next three and a half hours fantasizing about what you're going to do when you leave here. "Well, this is an object of mind. I'm being quite mindful of the fourth foundation here." No, sorry. It's awareness, bare knowing of the objects of mind.

The Buddha actually, in the sutta, is very specific. Fred and I were just talking before about how the list of what he gives as the objects of mind basically comprises the whole of the Buddhist understanding. Each one of these could be a huge talk. I'm just going to list them and give an example of one.

He discusses very specific dhammas, objects of mind, listing the five hindrances, the five aggregates—the five factors that make up a person—the six internal and external sense bases (which are eye, ear, nose, touch, smell, and the mind base internally, and their objects externally), the seven factors of enlightenment, and the Four Noble Truths. A huge, huge area. And we're not talking about thinking about these things, ruminating, philosophizing, trying to remember, but much more the bare knowing.

To give an example using sense desire as one of the five hindrances: knowing when sense desire as a hindrance is present in the mind, and knowing when it's absent. Not getting lost in fantasies of desire, but rather the process being that you're having the thought, "What would the perfect lunch be? If I could dream up the perfect lunch to make here, what would it be?" And then you're aware, "What would be the perfect zafu? How can I get my sitting arrangement just right so there's no pain? What would be the perfect concentration experience?" And then suddenly, "Oh, wait a minute. Desire. Sense desire is present in the mind right now." That's the knowing, the bare knowing of the objects of mind, of dhammas—fourth foundation of mindfulness.

It could be the same knowing of the presence or absence of concentration, of investigation, of energy, of calm. Not judging, but simply knowing when it's there, when it's not. Knowing the absence of sleepiness, the absence of restlessness.

You can see that as we begin to become aware on this subtle level of the presence or absence of these objects of mind, it gets very subtle. And our awareness of the balance of our experience also begins to get accordingly subtle. This bare recognition really cuts into the power of identifying with, for example, sense desire. When we see, "Oh, the presence of the hindrance." Or when it's gone, it's like, "I'm doing so great. I haven't had any desire." You notice, well, there's the absence of that particular hindrance—but there's the presence of pride at this moment. Simply noticing it, the experience becomes much more one of cause and effect, one condition leading to another, and much less "I'm doing so badly" or "I'm doing so well."

Another very interesting part of being aware of the dhammas, the mental objects, is this: as we allow careful and repeated observation of the presence or absence of these mental objects—not trying to do anything but simply noticing, without a lot of fighting with the experience or judging it—we begin to notice, to understand through repeated recognition, what conditions (both inner conditions, qualities in mind and body, and external conditions) lead to the presence or absence, the arising and dissolution of these various qualities. This can be a very useful experience in our practice. It's useful information.

We begin to see from our own experience which conditions favor the arising of desire, which conditions keep it going, which conditions favor desire's dissolving away, which conditions inner and outer favor desire not arising so much. So we find, for example, that when desire has arisen and we just let ourselves keep thinking about all the different nice things we could have, suddenly desire has gotten incredibly strong. After a while, we see there's a moment of choice where we've noticed that desire has arisen, we're fantasizing about what we're going to do when we go home, and suddenly we think, "Oh, this is desire." And we know that if we keep going like this, it just gets a lot worse. We have that moment where we say, "You know, I don't really want to do this." And we come back to just noticing the desire itself rather than the fantasy.

Our experience becomes much more that it's a series of conditioned processes. It's not personal. We begin to know what conditions allow sloth and torpor to arise. Instead of it being, "Oh no, I'm this slothful, decrepit yogi," we start to notice—as one yogi said this summer at a retreat we were doing in England (it was very warm and these big bumblebees would come in and just buzz all around the room), this person said,

They recognized that something about the sound of a bee buzzing brought up associations of fields and lying around and sleeping, and they would get incredibly sleepy listening to this sound.

It's just kind of interesting to notice. It's a very personal thing, but we all have our personal conditions that will bring up either the hindrances or the seven factors of enlightenment, or contribute to their dissolution. So just notice this. Notice what brings energy. Notice what sustains it. And notice all the different qualities, the factors of enlightenment. It's very helpful. And again, we could talk much more about what these are, and we will later on.

So these are the four foundations of mindfulness in brief. And as you'll see, these four include everything in our experience. There's nothing left out. It's important to give attention to whichever one of these four happens to be arising predominantly in the moment—not to have the feeling that sadness is more important to pay attention to than tingling, or that unpleasantness is really where it's at, or that feeling is better to be with than objects of mind. Just allowing ourselves to be fully there and recognizing whichever foundation is arising predominantly in our experience.

This leads into a really harmonious, broad, direct seeing into all aspects of our life—physical, emotional, mental—as well as a deep seeing into the laws of nature: the impermanence, the unsatisfactoriness, the sense of not-self that we often don't see when we're not paying such careful attention.

The other thing I want to say is don't make it complicated. Please don't sit here with a checklist and make sure that you're running through all the four in the right order. They're actually so interrelated that in my experience I find it quite hard not to be in touch with all four. For example, there's a sensation in the body. You're aware of that. It moves into unpleasant feeling. Moves into aversion. Moves into restlessness. You recognize that—oh, there's the hindrance of restlessness. Right there you've covered all four foundations. And it just keeps on going. "Oh, I'm really good. I recognized restlessness." Then there's pride. Back to the sensation in the body, back to a pleasant feeling, up to desire, into fantasy, into recognizing it. It just cycles around and around and around. The sense of interdependence is so strong you can't really isolate one from the other.

The Buddha said once: mindfulness of breathing, developed and repeatedly practiced, perfects the four foundations of mindfulness. The four foundations of mindfulness, when developed and repeatedly practiced, perfect the seven enlightenment factors. The seven enlightenment factors, developed and repeatedly practiced, perfect clear vision and deliverance. It's a strong statement. Mindfulness of breathing, mindfulness of the four foundations, perfects clear vision and deliverance.

Why? How? In each moment of mindfulness, there's that clear, direct, intuitive knowing of the arising experience just as it is. And because in that moment of mindfulness the mind is undistorted by greed, hatred, or delusion, we can know the experience as it's actually occurring. This repeated, moment-by-moment direct experience, direct knowing of what's actually occurring, repeated over and over and over, allows us to have a very deep, visceral experience of the laws of nature—of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, anattā, not-self. Not thinking about it, but viscerally experiencing on a deep level how these laws are present in each moment of our experience. And this understanding—this intuitive understanding, not a thinking-about-it understanding—can open the mind as it deepens to liberating insight.

I want to use an experience of the breath as an example of how we experience these things over and over. The taken-in breath, just breathing in, breathing out. And continually, over and over, this deep intuitive knowing of the bare experience of it. It could be the breath, it could be a sensation, it could be anything. After a while, you just really become aware each time of the arising of the breath, of the dissolution of the breath, the arising of it, the dissolution of it. Impermanence isn't a thought anymore; it's the actual moment-by-moment experience. And then the breath breaks down. It's not just an in-breath.

There's all these different sensations that comprise an in-breath—perhaps experiencing them more finely as different elements: pressure, tingling, vibration. And then each time one becomes aware of the arising and the dissolution of each of these smaller experiences in the breath, sensations rapidly arising and passing, over and over and over.

The more we keep bringing in our attention and simply being with the experience, the more it keeps breaking apart. The more we see there is no solid breath there at all. It's just coming and going. And then even the gross breath itself is changing all the time—from long to shallow, from deep to rough to smooth. Where is there any substantiality there? Any substance?

There's no I. There's no sense of who's in charge. Can we control the breath? Not for long. We can hold it a little bit, but we can't determine whether it will be shallow or rough. Am I going to feel pressure or tingling with this breath? There's no control over what will arise.

And in a way, there's a deeply unsatisfying nature to this. It's all shifting, moving away. There's nothing solid there. We experience this over and over with each breath, with each sensation that arises, with each mental state that comes and goes. A really deep wisdom—intuitive—is being developed through this experience.

And even further, we begin to see that there's no separate existent entity. We see the interdependence of everything: that the breath arises only due to conditions. There are lungs, there's the heart beating, there's a body, there's air, there's life, there was food that kept the body going. When conditions change, the breath will change. When the physical nature changes—if we get sick, if we catch a cold—the breath will change. If the state of consciousness changes and we're really lost in fear, the breath will change.

Nothing exists separately. It's all dependent on previously arising conditions. The more we look into it, the more the illusion breaks apart. And we repeatedly have a deep personal experience of anicca, dukkha, anatta from any one of the four foundations of mindfulness in any moment. It's very powerful.

So as the Buddha said, the four foundations of mindfulness, developed and repeatedly practiced, perfect clear vision and deliverance.

I have to say, in reading the sutta and seeing how the Buddha could break all this down for us in a way that's really comprehensible is amazing. It's such a comprehensive and practical instruction for the realization of liberating insight.

I want to end by saying again: don't get complicated. Whatever is happening, whatever is arising in this moment is one of the four foundations of mindfulness. There's nowhere else to go but this moment—being fully present with whatever is presenting itself as the truth of this moment. That is one of the foundations, and it's a sufficient object of our attention to contribute to the arising of liberating insights.

CHAPTER 242

Five Spiritual Faculties

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers an in-depth exploration of the five spiritual faculties (pañcindriya): saddhā (faith), vīriya (energy), sati (mindfulness), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom). She explains how these qualities, when strengthened and balanced, exert powerful influence over the mind and transform both meditation practice and daily life.

Wilson distinguishes between 'bright faith'—the initial inspiration that draws us to practice—and 'verified faith' that arises from our own direct experience of truth. She emphasizes that trust requires radical acceptance of each moment as it is, without subtle aversion or attempts to arrange experience. Drawing on teachings from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita and the contemplative writer J. John Noé, she explores how genuine trust means complete openness to whatever arises, including difficult experiences.

The talk provides practical guidance on balancing these faculties: faith with wisdom (preventing both blind devotion and dry intellectualism), and energy with concentration (avoiding both restlessness and dullness). Wilson clarifies the distinction between thinking about dharma concepts and actual intuitive wisdom (paññā) that arises from direct experience. She uses the vivid simile of a lion versus a dog responding to a thrown stone to illustrate how we can remain steady with the process of practice rather than chasing after thoughts, even inspiring dharmic ones. Throughout, she emphasizes that working with these faculties is not about self-judgment but skillful investigation into the natural energies of the mind.

I had a friend visiting here today who hadn't been here for a while. She used to be on staff and has sat a lot. She was saying how seeing all of you here walking really slowly, really quiet and pulled in, at first felt really bizarre because she'd been out of the scene for a while. But after being here and beginning to feel the energy, you don't know how powerful it is what you're all doing here. It kind of exudes by osmosis. The rest of us get to pick it up once in a while. And it brought back to her some of the feelings of the joy and delight that can come with practice, that she's experienced in the past in practice. I know probably a lot of you were not feeling joy and delight today, but you taste it at times. Just realize that it's having a powerful effect on everyone that comes into contact with you, and even people that come into contact with the people that have come into contact with you. So what you're doing is really wonderful.

As a second little aside, I don't think any of them are here, but I wanted to really appreciate our maintenance department because they have been working so hard these last few days trying to get the water going again. They're working like eighteen-hour days down there in the bowels of the building, and I just wanted to appreciate them publicly for what they're doing.

What I want to talk about tonight is the five spiritual faculties. Another list. Sometimes I know it might seem endless—the eight this, the seven that, the five that, the four this. Not to try and remember them all or just sort them out. A friend of mine said recently, "Which one's the most important? I've got to figure out which one is the one I need to memorize and learn." Not to have it with that attitude at all. I relate to it as these are all different conceptual ways of talking about our spiritual development, the arising of insight, and relating to the specific work of practice that we're doing here. At any particular time one or the other might be a helpful guidepost or reference to you. I have particularly found these five qualities of mind to be very helpful to me in my own practice.

These five spiritual faculties, or controlling faculties, are so called because as they strengthen through our practice—and they do strengthen—and as they come into balance, which is very important, they come to exert a very powerful influence on our mind, determining the state of the mind at some points almost continuously. They also have a powerful influence on the way we live our lives when we're not in retreat.

These five qualities are faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. The way I personally have found helpful to work with them is first in hearing about them, in reflecting on them, to develop a kind of recognition, an intuitive feeling for these qualities of mind—knowing when they're present, knowing when they're absent. When we've done that, we learn how to balance them with each other in a way that allows them to develop to their full potential in our minds. When they are balanced in this way and strengthened, it's a very strong support for our practice and for our life.

The first of these qualities is faith. When I was reflecting on this, to me the two aspects of faith that come up that helped me get a feeling for this quality are the aspect of trust and the aspect of confidence.

Faith itself is totally basic to our being able to practice. None of us would be here if there had not been some faith in our hearts to bring us here, and none of us would stay here if faith did not keep being strengthened. Faith tends to arise at first perhaps when we encounter someone or something that really inspires us—someone whose way of being touches something deeply in us, or just a scene in nature that also touches something deep in us. Many different things can inspire faith, something that moves us. This type of faith really fills the mind with a sense of devotion, a sense of brightness, a sense of love and appreciation. We can experience it in different ways. It's a real brightness in the mind, and this is what we call bright faith. It can be very strong and deep and can motivate us in very powerful ways in our life. As I said, we wouldn't be here if we had not touched that in some deep way.

The problem is that like everything else, it's not stable. It doesn't last. It doesn't stay. While it can be incredibly strong at first and motivate us to do many things that we would have thought very difficult or impossible to do, it tends to lose its freshness. It tends to lose its power, its impelling force after a while. It needs to be strengthened because this type of faith is often referenced externally, looking to something outer to inspire the faith again. This is certainly valid, but it needs a lot of reiterations, and it's not strong enough to really keep us going sometimes in the darkest points that we come to.

What reinforces bright faith is the faith that comes from our own deep intuitive understanding of the nature of reality, the nature of suffering, impermanence—a deep intuitive understanding that comes from our own clear seeing. Perhaps we just see that we're able to experience our patterns of mind with more of a sense of freedom, more of a sense of spaciousness. It's not like you have to have the ultimate enlightenment experience to have verified faith.

But the small insights that we have, the possibility of more freedom from greed, hatred, and delusion—those are the kind of intuitive understandings that lead to verified faith.

So while bright faith, the original faith that triggered us off, can be very strong, because it's dependent on an external source for reinforcement, it can also be blind. It doesn't have a reference to our own inner experience of truth, and we can be led wildly astray. When the faith becomes verified by our own inner experience of truth, on all the different levels that we can experience that, it becomes, after a while, almost unshakable. Because what we know for ourselves, no one else can take away or can say isn't true. It doesn't need to be verified by anything external.

So faith and wisdom need to be balanced together. But since faith is not constant—even verified faith flickers—and short of deep realization, really deep enlightenment, how can we develop it? I find this a very interesting area of exploration, because there are lots of little tricks to develop concentration, to work with mindfulness. But faith is so basic. Without it, it's so hard, if not impossible, to keep practicing. Yet it's not something one can give to somebody else.

This is where the quality of trust comes up very strongly in my mind when looking at developing faith. Trust meaning the ability to open to, to be connected to our experience in each moment, whatever that is. And the quality of mind that embodies that trust is one of total acceptance, or what a phrase that I really love—from a man who calls himself J. John Noe—radical acceptance. He says, "Radical acceptance is radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, as all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways. To let go, accept—it is necessary only to give up your concerns and your fears."

And Sayadaw U Pandita says the same thing. He says that unless there's softness and receptivity of mind, unless one totally surrenders, it will be almost impossible to receive anything. In surrendering to what is happening right now, total radical acceptance of what's happening right now.

So what are we resisting? Just looking in the mind and body right now, what are we resisting? What are we unwilling to receive in this moment, in our practice today? It can be very subtle.

When I was sitting recently in Australia, I was having a lot of very deep grief and sadness, which was impossible not to notice. And it was impossible not to note. So I was noting sadness, sadness, grief, grief. This was going on for days. And I thought I was really acknowledging it, really present, really accepting. But there was a very subtle sense of, you know, if I was really doing it right, this wouldn't be here. Very subtle. Just this tiny little aversion.

But that's enough. That subtle sense of, well, it's just not quite right if this is here—that is not trust. It prevents acceptance. It prevents being present in the moment. And it leads to lack of faith, because faith arises from our own clear seeing, and we can't see what on some level we won't accept, won't allow to be present.

There's a great difference between trusting in the moment just as it is, no matter what's happening, and subtly trying to arrange experience to meet our expectations. Even though those expectations may match all the things you hear in the dharma talks and all the things you read in the books, it doesn't matter. If you're trying to arrange your experience in any way, in any way, that's not trust.

The other thing about trust is that it's a very vital quality. It's not a static place that one reaches and then there's trust and then it's okay. Because our experience is changing so quickly, moment to moment, and acceptance, openness, must move with it. So each moment is opening to a new experience of whatever it is. It's very vital. It takes great commitment, great willingness to be present and open to whatever's arising in this moment. And as soon as it changes, opening to the next thing.

It can be very unsettling. Indeed, it is very unsettling. The tendency of the mind is often so strong to look for something solid, to make things secure, to make them safe. Just some place of firm foothold of knowing—and then it'll be okay. And usually that firm foothold is going to be somewhere pleasant, and then it'll really be okay.

Krishnamurti says, "To seek the truth is to deny it." The search itself prevents trust. Because when we're looking elsewhere for anything, we can't be present with what is here. And what is here is what there is in this moment. That's all there is.

So how much of our time, on subtle levels, do we spend trying to find something to trust in? Not only in our life—which is a whole topic in itself—but on a day-to-day, hour-to-hour basis in our practice. Trying to restructure our environment, get the perfect sitting place, so then our sittings will be really concentrated. How often does one find oneself, after having a particularly clear walking period one day, the next day trying to recreate all the circumstances exactly the same way? Eating the same thing for lunch, taking the same amount of time before going down to the walking hall, holding the hands in the same way with the same amount of light. It's almost like a ritual, trying to recreate a certain experience. And then when the experience comes again—"Oh right, my faith is verified. There's trust."

It doesn't work that way. The trust comes first, because there's a total letting go into experience, into whatever's happening. Then the wisdom, the clear seeing, arises. And that wisdom does lead to more trust. But real trust doesn't come from having arranged things so that we have an experience we like. If we think we're trusting in that, we're going to be really devastated when the situation changes and something different happens.

So can we have trust without any conditions placed on it whatsoever? Total radical trust.

This is J. Krishnamurti again: "It's not a matter of whether or not faith is present in your life. It is. It's only a question of whether you place your faith in truth and reality, or in your considerations, your abstractions, your judgments, and your thoughts about truth and reality. Do not doubt that you are currently practicing faith. Consider only where it is placed."

Radical acceptance is the practice of faith.

And Sayadaw U Pandita again—I seem to like juxtaposing these two. He says, "Clinging to anything for security is like trying to scoop up water with a butterfly net." And that includes mind states, meditation states. It includes anything.

Another factor of faith or trust that can be difficult is that opening completely, trusting completely, being fully present with what is happening in this moment, often requires being with something that is quite difficult or unpleasant. I've been working with this factor a lot in myself recently. I have many unknown things going on in my body. I don't have any answers for it, and it's requiring a great deal of attention just to be present and see what's going on. Working with the quality of trust, I see how tricky it is—where one wants to be open to what's happening, but there's the subtle sense that real trust means when I get it right, then things get better.

That's not what it's about at all. It's about the willingness to totally open into the experience as it is and trust that—that this is the reality, and that it's okay. That one can be fully present with it no matter how unpleasant, how scary, or how contrary to one's ideas of what it means to live a life, to be spiritual, to meditate. Just how it is.

This willingness, as it develops in our practice, to open into the unknown in each moment, leads to the other aspect of faith: a strong sense of confidence. Confidence in one's own ability to be present for whatever's happening. Confidence in one's ability to practice. Confidence in the practice, in the Dhamma.

That confidence manifests as a willingness to come face to face with our experience, just as it is—our insecurities, our pains, whatever is arising in the moment. This confidence is also a quality of not hesitating, so that when some object arises, the mind goes forward to meet it right away, without confusion, without holding on to past experience, not afraid to face anything. Because of the quality of trust, one knows one is able to face anything, and that this is where the truth is—in this moment. There's nowhere else to go.

We begin to see that confrontation, even with our imperfections, can give rise to clear understanding. And this lends a lot of confidence and faith. So it's a kind of cycle. The faith leads to confidence, which leads to wisdom, which leads to more faith. We come to have a real sense of trust in our own strength, our own understanding, and our own willingness to be present for whatever arises.

This trust and confidence, this faith, is accessible even when the mind is cloudy, even when experience isn't what one wants it to be. It's not dependent on good noting or good meditation experiences. And we can learn to trust that much.

This faith lends a quality of real brightness and confidence to the mind. And this engenders a willingness to do, a willingness to confront things. This leads to the second spiritual faculty, which is the quality of energy or effort. Other ways of talking about it are enthusiasm, joyful effort, or heroic effort, as Michelle spoke about the other night. Commitment is a word I find helpful too.

I just want to say a little about effort because it's been discussed quite a bit before. As we know, energy is really the root of our ability to investigate, which is the root of our practice. And we see how hard it is to maintain energy when faith is lacking, because it takes so much effort to keep with the work, and if there's not some faith behind it, it's really hard to sustain.

I want to talk a little about the balance of effort, which most of us are constantly working with in our practice. I remember the first three-month course I did. I went to one of the teachers early on and said, "I just can't find the right balance of effort. I go too far one way, then too far the other." And he said, "Yeah, it'll be like that your whole practice." And he was right.

But it doesn't have to be a problem that it's like that. It stops being a matter of judging oneself—"Oh, I've blown it, I'm trying too hard," or "I kicked back, I took a nap, I've ruined the whole six weeks, I've got to start over." It comes to be, for me actually, quite an interesting investigation—noticing how the balance of effort is working, when there's too much, when there's too little.

As you know, when there's not enough energy, the practice can become a total drag. You're dragging through the days, dragging the mind trying to note. It becomes tedious. These thoughts arise: "I really could be doing a lot better if I was anywhere else but here." And so doubt comes up really strong, and it can become a circular thing.

The reverse, I find, is that when the energy is flowing, when there's a real sense of connection with what's happening, the sense of really being fulfilled and connected in the practice—for me, this is not a function of nice objects arising or pleasant meditation states so much. I find it much more a function of the wholehearted quality of effort. When I'm feeling like I'm just there with what's happening—the effort simply to be present in the moment, not an effort of strain or striving, but just to be with what's happening—when that effort is wholehearted, it's like it doesn't matter what's going on. In some ways it matters; there's aversion and everything, but that's just noted too. There's a sense of real connectedness and commitment. And that comes when the effort is balanced, wholehearted.

Another important aspect of effort, I find, is that that wholehearted quality arises when it's generated from within ourselves, from within our own heart and mind. If we try to impose it from without—and for sure, often in the beginning we do have to impose it from without until we have the faith to keep going from within—but if we try to practice in conformity too strictly, to mesh ourselves into some kind of model of how we think our practice ought to look, to meet an ideal that's all outwardly imposed, at some point it just doesn't work. If it's not connecting with the inner energy, with our heart energy, the practice can become one of struggle and resistance. And that's often a sign that the effort is forced rather than coming from within, from our own interest and enthusiasm.

We all swing back and forth all the time, and we'll all have times when the energy is really low.

And I'm not implying that when energy is low one should say, "Well, I'll just kick back. It's low, I don't want to impose it from without, so I'll just wait until it springs from my heart and then I'll start practicing again." I wish it were so easy, but that's just not the facts. What we know is that effort does bring energy.

So in those periods when the energy is low, we shouldn't whip ourselves or say, "Okay, my energy is low, so I'm going to sit for three hours and walk for three hours and try not to sleep tonight until my energy comes back up, by God, and then I'll be able to practice." That could get a bit rigid. But neither should we give up. Not to just slack off, because it just gets harder and harder to get the energy moving again.

So working in the low energy times means continuing to note whatever's arising. And the noting may be weak and the object may not be clear, and that's okay. Don't be discouraged by that. As the effort continues—to just keep noting, keep trying to see what the object is, see it as clearly as possible—the energy will eventually begin to build. It's like the difference between one weak string in that first weak noting, and as it continues, it's like a bunch of strings that get wound together and become very strong. The noting will become more clear. And as that happens, the interest will revive. The enthusiasm will come back and you'll be in a cycle again with stronger energy.

It's really helpful in the low energy periods to remember the importance of patience, because it plays a big factor in our practice. Another thing I've found very helpful is that though there's a difficult period or the energy's low, shrinking back from it or falling away from the practice in those times makes it much more difficult. It becomes so much harder to regenerate the momentum once we've actually taken a big chunk of time out. It might seem like there's no momentum going. It might seem like you're just dragging through. But there's more going on than might seem observable at first. And to stop altogether makes it much more difficult to kick in again.

Also, not to berate oneself for the quality of experience, which I find is very easy to do. Once again, when I was sitting in Australia, I went into U Pandita once and I was having a little fit of "Oh, everything's horrible, I can't see what's going on and there's nothing but fear and there's nothing but aversion and I can't really get to anything and none of the objects are clear"—and I tantrumed on like that for a little while. He just looked at me and said, "Well, can you note it?" I said, "Yeah, I can note it, but none of it's clear." And on and on I went. He said, "Are you lying about idle all day?" And I said, "Well, no, I'm sitting and walking all day. I can note the stuff." And he said, "So, what's your problem?"

So yeah, right. I just wanted it to be different. I wanted it to be nice. I wanted the energy to be strong. It really helped me a lot.

As we continue to work with the effort, with the continuing to note, continuing to connect with the object, that grows stronger and leads to a strengthening of mindfulness and a strengthening of concentration that follows on quite naturally. These are the next two spiritual faculties, controlling faculties.

Mindfulness is the factor that balances all the others. It's always helpful. It encompasses all our experience. There's nothing that's extra or outside of mindfulness or that doesn't count. One way of describing mindfulness is as observing power—a very specific definition. Observing power that rushes directly towards whatever object arises. You can almost experience it that way. An object arises in consciousness and the mind just rushes directly towards it without hesitation. Again, this comes from confidence and it comes from effort. But it rushes directly to it without hesitation, without thought. Immediately moves to and falls into the object. Covers it completely. It's not a matter of thinking about whether I want to pay attention to this object or not. In that thinking about it, the knowing of the object is missed. But the observing power has the quality of just taking possession of the object immediately, not slipping off. One example is that mindfulness is like pouring water into a cup. It doesn't just stay in one place, but it covers the whole surface.

It spreads out and covers the whole cup. And that's how mindfulness spreads out and covers the whole object, covers every part of whatever's arising. There's not a sense of discrimination or distinction that some objects are more worth paying attention to, more worth giving mindfulness to than others.

Another quality of mindfulness is that it's non-coercive. It's completely non-violent, totally accepting. That quality of mindfulness is very active—that moving toward, completely covering, not slipping off. It's very active. But it's not trying to change what's happening at all. There's no sense of control, no sense of trying to change things, to make things different. It's just fully present with the thing as it is, without judging, totally accepting.

And that happens, that full sense of presence, when there's no discrimination of thought getting in between the movement of mindfulness toward the object. This mindfulness has, as I'm sure you've all observed by now, incredible power for leading to the unfolding of things that one would never have imagined or expected—just from sitting and watching object after object come and go in our experience when we're not controlling.

When we persevere with a continuity of this mindfulness—and it does take perseverance, these streams of moments of mindfulness building one after the other—the mind becomes more steady, calm, and clear. From this, the fourth faculty of concentration becomes strong, becomes quite well established.

The characteristic of concentration is that the mind sticks to the object without a lot of fluttering, movement, or wavering. It's just very steady on whatever the focus of consciousness is in that moment. It's a way of collecting all the mental forces, all the mental factors together in a moment, in one aspect, so that all our energy—which tends to be scattered, flying off in many different directions, and which we're often not aware of because it's so dispersed—becomes unified and focused on one thing. And that's very powerful. It leads to a mind that can be very calm, very quiet and peaceful. That sense of non-fragmentation, that sense of unity, gives such a feeling of completeness. That's why there's such a sense of happiness that can come with concentration—a kind of happiness much different from the happiness of sense pleasure, say, the happiness of eating a peach. That unity of mind is very powerful.

In talking about concentration, I feel we must be cautious not to set it up as some goal—this is what a concentrated mind is like, and this is what I need to have in order to practice. That can lead to a lot of suffering. I know from personal experience. Concentration is not something to arrive at at some future point. We're working with developing it right now, just in this moment. It's not a matter of getting concentrated for the next hour or concentrated for the next minute. Just in this moment, can the mindfulness really move right to whatever the object of attention is? Can the attention stick there, stay there steadily? Just connect with this one object. That's all. Not to make it a big project to fill our days with—getting concentrated so that tonight I'll be really concentrated. But just bring it back to this moment of awareness, this moment of connecting and sticking with the object.

In Vipassana, what we're working with is a steadiness of attention to a flow of changing objects, as opposed to, say, just staying with the breath and never moving from it. We're cultivating a steadiness of attention, but the objects are constantly changing. It's helpful to know we don't need to limit ourselves by thinking that concentration is only possible when certain types of objects are arising, or that it's only possible in certain situations. That steadiness of mind can be developed under possibly a broader range of circumstances than we might expect.

If you're feeling really unfocused or a lot of discouragement, know that there's a lot of judgment that comes up around concentration. Many people I talk to will come and say, "Well, I'm really not concentrated." What does that mean? One just makes up an idea of what it means to be concentrated, then decides one isn't it, and then gets really discouraged about it and suffers a lot. To some extent there's a lot of concentration in almost anyone's mind here. How many people can just sit for an hour without a great deal of focus and concentration? Or walk for an hour, never mind sitting and walking for six weeks. There's a lot of concentration.

So not to give in—if there's discouragement, rather than thinking, "Because it's discouragement, the energy is low, I can't concentrate," let the discouragement itself become the object of attention, the object of inquiry.

Keep bringing the noting mind back to it. Note the sensations in the body. Really let the trust come in that this is the reality of the moment. And with that trust can come real attention, effort, energy. By continuing this effort of noting and being with the discouragement, that's the object in the moment, the mindfulness again restabilizes. Concentration again becomes strengthened, using discouragement as an object. It doesn't have to only be the breath. And that's again seeing that nothing is outside the scope of practice.

What we find as we go along in practice is that the mind might still go off and get creamed or get really lost. But the restabilization process might take much less time, and it might be much less of a period of confusion and despair. Often we lose sight of that because it still seems really intense when it happens. But what threw you for three days two weeks into the retreat might be a bubble of intense confusion that lasts for an hour or an hour and a half now. And that itself is a product of increasing mindfulness and concentration.

So concentration brings calmness, depth, and steadiness, and it must be balanced with effort, which brings energy and clarity. I'll talk about that more in a minute.

Then out of these qualities of mindfulness and concentration, the fifth factor, the fifth faculty of wisdom, will arise. It does arise. It arises of itself. It's not something one can sit down and make happen.

By wisdom, I mean intuitive, deep intuitive understanding. While concentration clarifies and purifies the mind—when we're mindful, when we're concentrated, greed, hatred, and delusion are not present in those moments—and that lends a real strength to the mind, it really purifies the mind. But it's not enough to eradicate deep underlying tendencies for greed, for anger, for fear, for ignorance to arise. What eradicates those is understanding, wisdom.

Nyanaponika says that greed, hatred, and delusion are abandoned not by acts, not by doing things, but by wisely seeing. And this wise seeing unfolds of itself through our being fully present with object after object as it arises, with trust, acceptance, and steadiness of mind.

Classically, the intuitive wisdom I'm talking about is a deep, visceral understanding of the nature of impermanence, the nature of unsatisfactoriness, the nature of the insubstantiality of self—of the sense of self—that there's nothing solid anywhere to be called "I." It's not that this happens all at once. We all have varying levels and degrees of insights, of understanding happening over and over. It's as if we experience the same thing over and over on deeper and deeper levels. And each of those seeings adds to our faith, to our deep intuitive understanding of the way things are.

And it can be experienced more or less directly. A metaphor that I really like: it's like seeing a light at night in the distance. You don't actually see the fire, but because of the reflection of the light, one knows without doubt that there's a fire there. That's one way of experiencing understanding. And then the actual seeing of the fire itself is likened to liberation.

In the unfolding of this wisdom, the quality of investigation is very important. But investigation is not the same as thinking. This deep intuitive wisdom is not coming from thought. It's not coming from feeling. I think this is a place where we can often be caught, confusing thinking with understanding, with wisdom. We often take thinking about something to be the understanding itself. But wisdom can only arise from direct experience, experience beyond thought.

One place I find we can easily be caught is when we have Dharma thoughts. We would all agree that thinking about the past, thinking about the future—what am I going to do when I go home in three months?—we know that's thinking, and sometimes we get caught in it. But when the thought's a Dharma thought, somehow that often doesn't count. We can easily be misled into thinking it's real wisdom.

A concept I find very helpful in learning not to get caught is that of wise attention. Wise attention is based on the fact that when our attention is directed fully in one direction, it can't be so focused on something else. That's pretty basic and simple. With wise attention, keeping that in mind...

We can learn to take real care of where we give attention, where we give energy in any given moment. And with wise attention we can learn to direct the energy, the attention to the process rather than the content, no matter what the content is.

For example, you're sitting and you have some very blissful experience in meditation. And then the thought arises, "Wow, this is great." Then there's pleasantness, and you note the pleasantness. And you note, "Oh, well, it's impermanent. It'll go away." And you note that. And then you think, "Wow, the practice is really working. I didn't get attached to that." And it goes into more thoughts about impermanence. "It's really incredible. The Dharma is really fantastic. And it's really working because I'm not caught in this." And on into deep thoughts about the nature of impermanence and the power of that in changing one's life and the quality of existence now that impermanence is understood. These are really far out thoughts and on some level very helpful. But this is getting caught in dharmic thoughts, in the content. It's not wisdom. That moment of intuition, of seeing the nature of impermanence—that's a deep intuitive understanding.

Wise attention would be directing the energy not to the thoughts but seeing them as a thought and directing the energy back to the process. A thought is a thought no matter what the content is. And so we don't give favoritism to certain thoughts because the content is so inspiring.

I find that this takes a lot of trust. The trust being that the deep insights we have are not based on thought, and we don't need to cling to thoughts about them in order to hold on to the understanding, the wisdom. A real trust that insight has arisen, it's passed, and now another thought is arising in this moment—and to be able to see it as a thought and just note it.

I heard a Tibetan Lama give a talk a couple of weeks ago and he gave a great simile about working with thoughts. He said if you throw a stone at a lion, it'll just sit there. It won't even look at the stone. It'll just look right at you, where the stone came from. If you throw a stone at a dog, it goes running after the stone and doesn't even stop to look at you. That's how we often are with our thoughts. A thought comes flying by and we run after it. Then another one comes and we run after it. We're just running around in circles. So can we not be misled by the stone but keep our attention steady on the process and not fly off after thoughts?

From this we begin to see, we come to recognize that actually our minds are incredibly unreliable. The thoughts that come up are totally unreliable. They're unreliable because we continue to perceive the permanent in what is constantly changing. We continue to look for happiness where it only brings us suffering. And the mind and thoughts continue to see a self, to try and construct a self out of what is insubstantial. We don't have to keep buying into this. We can see it happening over and over and over. And that's fine—it's a thought. We don't have to run after the thought when it comes.

From these direct experiences of wisdom, faith is strengthened and the whole cycle starts over again.

So those are the five faculties and how to work with balancing them. Faith and wisdom are two faculties that we work at balancing with each other. They serve as a natural balance. If there's a lot of wisdom without faith, it can manifest in really two ways. One is a kind of false wisdom where there's a lot of thinking, a lot of imagining, maybe inferential knowing. One really thinks one knows, one thinks one understands, but it's really more from hearsay than direct experience. You think you know without really looking.

It's a kind of conceit. And this can grow very easily into skeptical doubt, into an unwillingness to actually look. There's no faith in this at all.

The second form of how wisdom can be unbalanced without faith is when there is real intuitive wisdom arising, a real insight. But without faith, it can turn shallow. It can lead to too much thinking about it—what I was just describing of having the insight but not having the confidence, not having the clarity to be able to let go of the insight and continue with the practice. Without faith, the mind gets caught up in a lot of thinking, a lot of running around in circles, afraid to let go of the thought. And again, doubt will arise, disguised this time as investigating power. Because often when we're having these really interesting dharmic thoughts, it seems that we're really investigating into the nature of things. And it can easily lead to skeptical doubt.

When this happens, we tend to lose energy. The mind starts to waver more, can become a bit indecisive, and begins to have a lack of clarity. And from this, of course, can come disappointment or a sense that the practice isn't working—"I don't see the benefit of the practice"—and doubt is really in strong again. What's lacking here is faith's quality of commitment, of clarity. In these moments, it's important to remember that every moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom, and to just keep going, even though it seems that the clarity has come lacking. Just keep going.

On the other side, faith needs to be balanced by wisdom. Because faith can be too excessive. It's kind of, "Wow, this is it! I really know the answer!" It's so enthusiastic, really over the top. The kind where you sit and think about how you're going to turn everyone you know onto the Dharma, and you really go through these great Dharma talks in your mind, and you've really done wonderful things. But you can't practice. There's just so much faith, but there's not the balance of wisdom to keep one going. There's no discriminating judgment.

The simile for the balance of these two is like a real turbulent river. There's a group of people on the bank, and they really need to cross to the other side. When there's a lot of wisdom without enough faith, it's all these people running up and down the banks of the river looking very busy and important, but they're not getting anything done. There's no results. The person with too much faith might boldly plunge into the river, but maybe not in a very wise way, to the point that energy gets frittered away. Maybe they get washed away, or they're just floundering in the river. They're very courageous, but without the discriminating wisdom to do it in a way that helps.

The balance of the two would have the courage and conviction to plunge boldly in, but the judgment to be able to do it in a way that brings oneself and others to safety. This is the balance we work with between confidence, real trust, and a discriminating wisdom and understanding that backs up the faith—so that the faith isn't blind and our energy isn't uselessly frittering away.

So wisdom and faith are balanced with one another. Concentration and energy need to be balanced with one another. And this is one I'm sure you're all familiar with, day after day in your own practice—balancing the calmness and depth of concentration with the energy and clarity of effort.

When there's an unbalanced effort, an excess of energy, the mind can become really restless or really scattered. It's as if the consciousness and the object can't stay together. The consciousness hits the object and flies off, or it seems to leap past it. There's not a sense of real connection. So if your mind is kind of slipping off what it's trying to pay attention to, it's a good sign that there's too much energy, too much effort going on. At this point, it's very helpful to simplify. Simplify the number of objects you're noting in your sitting. Simplify the walking—just lifting, placing, or just stepping, stepping. Don't try to note a lot of different objects. If you're doing touch points, don't try to do a lot. Just simplify when the energy is too high.

If there's a deficiency of energy in proportion to concentration, again, you'll find the mind kind of drifting along with the rise and fall, very comfortable, very nice, and very sleepy after a while. Sayadaw U Pandita likened it to a mind that solidifies like butter—unfresh and slimy. You need to heat it up with energy, so it's real supple again.

And at that point, it can be helpful to work with very precise aiming and very precise timing of noting the object, and with very clear noting, because it takes more effort and that brings in a little more energy. You may need to add a couple of touch points and more objects because that also picks up the effort. It brings in more energy. Be sure that you're balancing the sitting with walking if the mind is getting more concentration than energy.

And really important to remember—it's all skillful means. It's not a judgment that there's something wrong with one's practice or wrong with you. It's just the natural course of things. That balance is a very fine line, and since conditions are constantly changing, so is the balance. And it can be a real—I find it a very interesting, fascinating place of practice to just investigate these qualities and see when it's tipping one way and tipping the other way. It becomes very skillful, and there's no judging necessary in it at all. It's just really a continual learning, a continual refining of our understanding of the nature of these energies as they manifest in our mind.

So wisdom balanced with faith, energy balanced with concentration, and mindfulness is kind of like the overseer. You can't have too much mindfulness. It can't be unbalanced unless—well, it would be unbalanced if you don't have any. You could bring a little in. But it can't get out of balance any other way. It serves as a balance for everything.

So these are the five spiritual faculties. And I've just found it very helpful working with them in my own practice. And as we continue in our practice, these faculties will become more balanced, more refined, and really grow in strength and power. They develop into quite strong powers in our mind that affect our lives far beyond our time sitting here at IMS. I've found that they really contribute to an enduring clarity of mind, enduring steadiness of mind. A trust that goes beyond just sitting. The ability to trust in the moment. To trust in our own understanding. And a wisdom that really changes our relationship to our lives and to our experience far beyond what happens just sitting here.

So this is much more than faculties of mind that we develop from meditation. They affect our whole life in very deep and powerful ways.

CHAPTER 243

Three Noble Truths

Carol Wilson · 1h49

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a penetrating exploration of the first three Noble Truths, leaving the fourth—the Eightfold Path—for a companion talk. She begins with dukkha, examining its three aspects: ordinary suffering (dukkha dukkha), the suffering inherent in change, and the subtle oppressiveness of conditioned existence. Rather than presenting these truths as depressing, Wilson frames them as profoundly liberating—once we stop struggling against the nature of experience, a spaciousness opens that allows genuine appreciation of life.
> The talk delves deeply into craving (taṇhā) as the cause of suffering, illustrating through vivid personal stories—including a memorable milkshake pursuit—how craving distorts perception and drives us toward confusion. Wilson explains that craving arises from blindness: not seeing the impermanent, insubstantial nature of phenomena, and then constructing elaborate stories about what we mistakenly perceive. The practice of mindfulness allows us to observe craving directly, watching it arise, persist, and fade without needing to act on it.
> Wilson concludes with the third Noble Truth—cessation—describing both the ultimate freedom from craving and the momentary tastes of liberation available in each moment of clear mindfulness. Drawing on teachings from Nisargadatta Mahārāj, Tibetan sources, and Thich Nhat Hanh, she points toward our true nature as already complete, requiring only that we cease forging the chains that bind us through understanding.

Tonight I want to speak about the core, the central teaching that the Buddha gave, the basis for all our practice here together, which many of you have heard before, called the Four Noble Truths. Actually, I'm going to talk about the Three Noble Truths, and tomorrow night Sylvia is going to talk about the fourth one—kind of keep you coming back. The fourth one's the nicest one.

In some ways, if you just hear these three truths, especially the first two, and not look deeply into them, but just hear them and take them at face value, it's a very difficult teaching. Because the first truth is that the nature of much of our life, of our mind and body, is essentially unsatisfactory. The word is dukkha, sometimes translated as suffering—essentially there's an unsatisfactory quality to our life, which I'll go into more. The second truth is that the cause of our suffering is this quality of craving, of thirsting, which I'm sure many of you experience just sitting here. The third truth is that there is a cessation, an ending to this craving, to this confusion, to this living in such a confused and suffering way. And the fourth is what is called the Eightfold Noble Path, a path of living both in and out of formal meditation that helps us continue to see, to stay in touch with the truth of what we are, to live in a non-harming way and in a way that helps us continue to stay awake with what is true.

But as you can see, the first two are a little heavy.

I have a lot of respect for people who are on their first long retreat, because as a couple of people said to me just today, "I had no idea what I was getting into. If I had known beforehand, I probably wouldn't have come." We have this idea that meditation leads us to greater peace and bliss—which is true—but the path it leads us through is not one of greater peace and bliss. For the odd moment, we might have that. But when we really sit down and walk and go through the day, it's really hard. Not always, but frequently. And the question arises as to why. Why does it have to be so hard? That's what I want to talk about in speaking of these truths.

It's said that when the Buddha first came to his great awakening and with his omniscient eye could look all around the world and see everybody, what he saw was that everybody in the world only wants to be happy. But in our ignorance—ignorance really meaning blindness, not seeing what is true—in our ignorance, in trying to be happy, we keep on doing just the thing that makes us more miserable. And not getting it, we do it more, and we do it more, and then we don't understand why our lives feel like such a mess. This is what motivated him, it is said, to teach, out of his great compassion for our poor, ignorant, confused condition.

When we speak about ignorance, ignorance being like the root of our confusion and our actions, one of my teachers described ignorance as having two manifestations. I like this a lot as a way to help me understand it. Ignorance, as I said, is really blindness. In one aspect of this blindness, we don't see what's here. We just don't see the truth of what's right in front of our face. Actually, it's closer than the front of our face. It's inside of us. It's what we are, and we just don't see it. And then, in not seeing what's true, we take what we do see, construct all kinds of confused things about it, and proceed to see what isn't here and act as if that's true. That's what we live from.

I feel that the Buddha, especially in his first two truths of unsatisfactoriness and craving, is speaking to this blindness. It's sometimes hard to hear because we don't want it to be that way. We want it to be different. Yeah, that's the whole problem—we want it to be different. If we can just allow ourselves to open and see things how they are, then a whole other possibility of how to be, how to exist, of knowing what we are, opens up to us. This is really what our practice is about. This is what we experience here many times in small ways, if you allow yourself to notice it.

Actually, coming to understand, to open to this unsatisfactory quality and the power of craving, is not depressing at all. It has been and continues to be an incredibly freeing way of being in the world.

So we'll talk a bit about each of these three truths that the Buddha spoke of. There's a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was a great Indian wise man: "The obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain."

And so that's what the Buddha is talking about. What this does is obscure our true being. It doesn't deny it. It can't change it. All it does is serve as a mist between what we know and what our true being is.

Speaking to these forms of blindness, this truth of unsatisfactoriness, the Buddha enunciated it in a couple of different ways, in his usual clear list-making fashion. One form of dukkha—I like to use that word because "unsatisfactoriness" is sort of okay, but it doesn't quite give the real meat of it. Dukkha is a great word. Anyway, one is just plain dukkha dukkha, the pain of pain.

Now this one seems clear enough, you'd think. All we have to do is sit here—most of us. There's the odd person here who's not having any experience of physical pain, but most of us just have to sit for a few hours and hello old friend, we're introduced to physical pain. Or read the newspapers. It doesn't seem like it's a big secret. So why does he proclaim it?

But when we really look, when I really look at my own experience—are we really open to the fact that there is physical, emotional, mental pain in the world? The Buddha described it as birth, aging, sickness, old age, death, pain, grief and despair, separation from the loved, not getting what we want, coming together with what we dislike. This is dukkha dukkha.

What's our real attitude to it when one of these things arises? Do we really say, "Oh yeah, that's how life is. There's separation, there's pain"? When you're sitting here and something difficult comes up in your physical or mental experience, isn't the usual, perhaps subconscious attitude, "This is a mistake. It shouldn't be happening. If I was doing this right, it wouldn't be happening. Something's wrong with me, with the practice, with whatever."

And in life as well, when someone's really ill, when someone we love dies—these things are really sad. We're not talking about how it shouldn't be sad. But somehow, deep inside, it's hard to accept that this is really an aspect of life. It's not going to go away. Even if we're totally and completely enlightened, we're going to get sick. People we love are going to die. We're going to have to be with things we don't like. There's going to be difficulty.

And the real suffering of it is that we continually try to fight this. It's the struggle against something that we absolutely cannot change that blinds us to the clear perception of our true being.

This doesn't mean that if there's something difficult in life, or our job is horrendous, and we can with great care and attention make a switch, we shouldn't do it. This isn't saying go out and look for pain or don't act in an intelligent manner. But it's just saying: acknowledge what's really happening when it's really happening.

It has been to me a very deep and ongoing teaching to see how much I struggle and how much I try to change, to pretend things aren't the way they are. And that's the real suffering, really, much more than the pain or the unpleasantness itself.

And this to me is not depressing. I know it sounds really cheery. It is not depressing because it opens the possibility to relate to life in such a different way.

The denial runs really deeply. Here are a couple of examples. Sometimes we deny because it's really hard to feel in ourselves. All our life, our training, our deep conditioning is: as soon as it's difficult, go in the other direction. And as long as this works, it's fine. What happens when we sit down here is it doesn't work anymore. So we develop all kinds of denial, outer and inner.

I've told this before, but once I was in the hospital and a doctor was doing a relatively painful procedure—not terrible, but painful. I was kind of stretched thin and I started to cry. And he looked at me and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

And just, you know, if he let in that it was hurting me, that would be really painful for him.

Another way I look at denial in myself is when I go to India. India is a very painful place to be because all the suffering that we hide away is just right out there on the street. Life, birth, death, sickness, filth—it's all just right out there. So one thing I watch in myself—I've gotten better at just observing and not judging too harshly—is how long do I stay open to all the beggars? Because anywhere you go, there's just a stream of beggars, really sad and painful to encounter. People that are really emaciated, small children, people who are maimed with withered limbs, people with leprosy. It's really quite painful for me to see.

And everyone does their own dance with how much to give and when to stop. Because you could give everything you have in five minutes and it's over and it does nothing. It doesn't end it; just more people come until you're besieged. But anyway, I just watch in myself: how long can I stay open, and when do I shut down? And I shut down simply by pulling down a wall, averting eye contact, no longer making a connection. Because I could stay open and still not give. It's not the giving as much as the being willing to be there and present and participate in this aspect of humanity. And it's hard.

I think for most of us, we do hit a place where the suffering, inner or outer, is just overwhelming and we need to shut down. Well, we do. It's kind of out of our control. It's like there's some mechanism that says, "Okay, that's enough," and we shut down and take a break. On retreats and in life, I respect that. But that's different from a total mass denial where we're not willing to investigate this aspect at all.

One thing I find helpful is to investigate when I do shut down—what's the nature of shutting down, what goes on in that process. Because that helps me to see, well, what's the point of opening to all this anyway? I could just, as a friend of mine did, go to India and find the pain is really just too much. So he would stay in a nice hotel, just go eat at the American Embassy. And I can respect that's the level of pain one can let in at that time. But investigating why, and what happens when we open—why is it worth it?

I can see that for me, the shutting down usually comes out of fear. And the fear comes again out of this blindness, of not seeing clearly what's really true. So the fear is that, "Oh no, it's going to be this way forever. I'm going to die from this. I'm going to be destroyed." Even if the mind doesn't actually say that, that's the feeling: this is going to destroy me.

Now what's interesting is that this "that's going to destroy me" could be a cramp in my toe during a sitting, or it could be some really overwhelming painful experience in life. It's that same quality of, "Oh no, I can't be with this. It's going to destroy me." There's not seeing the impermanence, that everything changes. And also for me, a sense of misidentification. Somehow that pain, physical or emotional, inner or outer—I think that's me. The pain that I feel has become so big it fills the whole world, and that's me. The burning in the knee, if I just be with it as burning—it hurts, it comes, it goes, it's more or less intense—but it doesn't have that gripping quality of "this is who I am and it's never going to change and I got to get out of here."

So when I start to see this, you see that the fear of the pain again comes from our not seeing clearly what is. And this is where our mindfulness practice is so helpful.

The other thing I see is that when I'm shut down in fear, in pain of whatever sort, we can't shut down selectively. So for example, again with the beggars in India—because it's a really clear example to me—as soon as I shut down because I can't take in the pain anymore, also what shuts down is any sense of our human connectedness, any sense of joy, of compassion, of love, appreciation of the moment. It's all shut down. I can't say, "I'm shutting down, I don't want to feel the pain, but I'm also going to really appreciate the beauty of the moment." It's not possible.

When our energy is sucked into fear and denial of what is, that's the struggle that keeps us from seeing and appreciating the truth of who we are. And so I notice when I open up that again, there's a sense of eye contact. The people, whether I give or not, I feel the pain.

I feel the pain of not being able to give. The pain of not being able to do anything. But there's also a human connectedness, a sense of our own interrelatedness, and also the possibility of appreciating just what is in this moment, however it is. The possibility of knowing ourselves as we truly are. Pain still stays pain. It doesn't all transform into clouds of bliss. But the attitude shift allows something else to emerge.

I've found in my life that the more I'm able to acknowledge and be with difficulty, the more I've been discovering a commensurate increase in equanimity, yes, but also in real appreciation and joy in life. I really feel a lot happier than I did twenty years ago, and I honestly feel that it's from the willingness to be with things as they are, not needing outer things to support it.

The second aspect of dukkha that the Buddha talked about is that of change—that things change. Again, this is one that intellectually is incredibly obvious. We would all agree on that. But it's also a truth that while we intellectually agree on it, we actually viscerally live as if it's not true. And so this again can bring in a real sense of confusion and conflict. Because if we look to anything—any sense experience, any emotional state, any person, any situation, any condition—as that thing which is somehow going to bring us lasting happiness, it can't do it. It's impossible because nothing is lasting in the long term. And because we forget this, we keep running into confusion. This is that blindness.

It's not to say that because things change that means they're bad or that we can't enjoy. Actually, the appreciation of experience can be much richer and deeper. I was thinking about this as I walked up here tonight, looking at the sunset. It's incredibly beautiful and people are out there looking at it. If the sunset stayed all day and night, it somehow would lose some of the poignancy, some of the sense of beauty. We can really appreciate it. And we don't really think, "Oh no, the sun went down again. It's so sad." There's a way that some things we can really accept.

Well, all of life can be that way. We can really appreciate, really value, really live quite richly with whatever it is that we're meeting in our experience at this moment. The fact that it's impermanent doesn't mean we shun it—"Oh, I hate it. It's never going to give me lasting pleasure, so let's not have it at all." It doesn't lead to aversion in that way, but just to seeing things as they really are.

And again, we often tend to see change as a mistake. A year ago, I moved into a little cottage that had just been built brand new. After about a month, I walked into the main living room and there's this big crack on the wall where the plaster was settling. And I thought, "Oh my God, they did it wrong. The house is falling apart." And then I realized, oh no, this is what happens. Things change. Nothing stays the same and perfect. I really noticed there was like one second of that house when everything was clean and new and perfect. And that was it. Since then it's been just ongoing decay. It's sort of like our bodies—some of them decay faster than others.

And we still are amazed by it. I must say I've been noticing this retreat, for some reason the conversations, especially in the staff dining room or among the teachers, keep coming around to old age and middle age and how we're all creeping up there, and decay of the body. Somehow we put on this nice veneer—of course we know that. But why are we talking about it like it's a shock if we really, really lived as if we know this is what's going to happen? Somewhere deep down, it's amazing. How did I get to be forty-one years old? I'm still a kid. And I imagine I see my father. He's seventy-five and he's sitting there going, how?

75? I still feel 20. And it's really so interesting to see how we can keep on doing this.

So really getting it, really opening to the fact that everything comes and goes, can open us to a life of much more appreciation and a whole lot less suffering. Because what the Buddha saw is that we keep doing just the opposite of what would make us happy. The main thing we're doing is looking, craving for insubstantial, impermanent things to bring us happiness. And when one doesn't do it, we go on to the next, and we don't see this. When we really deeply know in our guts that nothing's going to last, a huge space opens up.

Why it's so hard to really, really know this, I don't know. I would think I really know it, but on retreat, you're sitting here—how many mind states have you had today? And how likely is it that the next strong one that comes, like, "Oh no, this is it. I'm going to be like this the rest of the retreat, I can't stand it, I'm going home"—even though we know it's all just flashing through.

Sometimes people say, "Who needs to look this closely?" It just seems a little too overwhelming and depressing, especially since I haven't added the third form that the Buddha spoke of. And I'm just going to touch on it lightly. But it's a very subtle underlying sense of the oppressiveness of things that we're not usually even aware of. See, I knew you'd really want to hear this one.

I'll just give one really simple example, which I actually read about in one of Jack's books. There's a type of vipassana meditation where you just really focus on when you move—why are you moving? And if we really pay attention, when we're lying in bed, if you didn't have to get up for the bell and you could just lie there as long as you wanted, you'd think that would be the most comfortable position. But sooner or later, what happens? You have to pee, your back starts to hurt, you get hungry, or you get bored, or you get restless, or something gets uncomfortable. And so we get up and move. And then we take a shower and that feels good, but how long can you stay under the shower? You start to wither up and turn into a prune and it doesn't feel good, and—oh—get out of the shower. And you can just follow this through the day.

Now admittedly, if this is all you focused on, it could get really demoralizing. There are times in practice when quite naturally, not of our choice, the mind does sort of focus on these things. We call those dukkha times. And they really are. Because what you're seeing is true, but it's imbalanced. It's out of balance. You're only seeing that, and none of the joy, none of the peace, none of the equanimity—just overwhelming dukkha. So it's true, but it's not in balance if that's all you see.

But even so, this truth of unsatisfactoriness has been to me one of the most freeing things, over and over, in my experience. And so that's one of the reasons I really feel it's important to talk about. Like for an example, I'll be in some situation in my life where I have to figure out, should I move here or should I move there? Some kind of big decision, and I'm all knotted up trying to figure out the right thing. And I could be like this for days, and suddenly it hits me: there is no right thing that's going to make me always happy. What I'm caught up in is thinking that if I figure out the exact right thing, then I'm always going to be happy. There's no such thing. That immediately, when that thought comes up, I get tremendously happy, because I'm not looking in the wrong place anymore. And I can still go ahead and make the decision, but there's such a freedom and spaciousness about it. That happens to me quite a bit.

So anyway, that's the first noble truth. And in a way, it's one of the ways of blindness—not seeing what's here, not able to accept things as they are.

The second noble truth, the cause of suffering, the cause of a lot of our distress, is this energy, this movement of craving, this thirsting for something. Whatever it is, the object actually doesn't make any difference. It's this movement of craving that we think is going to make us happy. Craving—and it is always—craving for that which changes, that which is insubstantial. There's no solidity, no solid self-existence. This craving has never given peace to anyone. This is really the crux. This is what the Buddha saw us doing endlessly. And we keep focusing on the object.

We think, well, this one didn't do it, so I'll try another one. It goes from money to cars to family to relationship to spiritual practice to states of mind to states of absorption. It's just endless. The objects can get more and more refined, but the suffering and the delusion are still running our lives.

So much of our life is spent in this tandem: it's unpleasant, let me out of here; it's pleasant, let me go have it. And then grieving when it's gone and wondering why we're so confused. Craving is born of not seeing what's true, born of the denial of the unsatisfactory nature of experience and the fact that everything is going to change.

In the instructions this morning, Sylvia spoke about noticing the pleasant or unpleasant or neutral aspect of an experience. This feeling quality arises with every sense experience we have—mental sense experience, sight, sound, taste, touch, smell. What's fascinating about mindfulness practice is that we can begin to see how, on a moment-to-moment level, this energy of thirsting, of craving, arises. And how it doesn't have to get so out of hand.

Every time there's a pleasant feeling, when we're not paying attention, our natural conditioning all our life is that the mind moves forward to it, the heart moves forward to it. When it's unpleasant, we push it away, back off. When it's neutral, we usually don't even notice it. So that's again the ignorance, the blindness. It becomes a good time to just zone out or feel bored and try to make something happen.

It's important to really begin to look at this because, in a funny way, when we don't examine the nature of craving and our actual experience of it, it feels like there's something really sweet about it. The Buddha even said once that craving is accompanied with delight.

When you're sitting here and you go off in a long daydream—maybe a food fantasy, or you've gotten involved in what we call a VR, a Vipassana romance, where you've really latched onto someone you've never met, never talked to, know nothing about, and the mind is just off into craving and wanting and fantasy building—in that moment, it can feel really kind of sweet. That moment usually goes on for twenty-five moments when it feels really sweet like that. We're not really examining it.

When we come out of it, what's the result? You suddenly wake up and you're sitting here. Has that really made things a lot sweeter? It's usually, "Oh, here I am sitting here again with the breath. Right, right. And that person doesn't even know me and nothing's going to happen." We usually end up more discontented with the way things are, less in touch with the way things are. If it was a food fantasy and you go to lunch and that thing wasn't served, it makes us much more disgruntled with what actually is served, much harder to appreciate.

So though we think it's sweet, when we examine it, what we find about craving is that it distorts our perception. We don't see things the way they are—things become kind of distorted so we see what we want. When you're having this strong Vipassana romance, the things that you make up about that person... could anybody be so perfect and loving? No way! The mind is completely distorted, and usually you only need to have two sentences with that person after the retreat and you think, "Oh my God." Once in a while I do know some where the people got together and got married, but it's rare, believe me. And then they also found out that nobody's that perfect. Nobody.

There's the saying that when a pickpocket meets a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets. That's how we distort things through the energy of craving. So it's not about hating it. Our mindfulness practice is to understand it. It's through understanding that we're freed from the confusion, from the distortion.

Krishnamurti said, "By themselves neither pleasure nor pain enlighten. Only understanding does." That's what our practice is about. We're not looking for pain. We're not looking for pleasure. They're both fine when they come. It's the understanding of what's happening that allows us to open to the truth.

To understand craving, again, we use our practice of simply coming back and being here when it arises. How does it feel in the moment?

You're sitting here, there's a thought, a sound, a sensation, another thought, you're noticing it, or perhaps you're a little spaced out, and suddenly—glom—something in your experience has been clutched onto, and craving has started.

If in that moment it's noticed, ah, craving, then in that moment the craving is not increasing. It's not being fed. Simply seeing, in that moment of mindfulness, we're seeing craving, but actually it's not being created. It's not arising in that moment. It doesn't necessarily have to go on.

When we don't see it, it builds. It leads to more fantasies, more solidity. And besides the fact of the craving getting so strong that you might find yourself jumping out of the hall and running to satisfy it, what's really happening is this: it's not that the thing you're wanting so much is so important. The craving itself is so uncomfortable that we do anything not to have to feel it. And mostly in our culture, we can get away with that to a huge extent. We can satisfy a lot of our cravings. So again, we have the feeling that if I'm craving and I can't have the thing, something is wrong.

With our practice, we can just sit and be with the craving, watch it come, feel its discomfort, explore it. And you know, it just fades away at some point, no matter how strong. This is really an amazing process that we're putting ourselves in, that we're opening ourselves up to explore. Not to have to spend our lives running back and forth between avoiding the unpleasant and trying to get what we crave. It opens up a huge space of intelligent choice, a huge space of freedom.

So play with it, sitting here. Play with it with little cravings. Wanting an apple. Wanting to go get water. I play with it—sometimes I'll walk into a store and look at clothes and see myself really want something and just walk out. It's kind of fun to play with. We're not going to die from craving. We might die from trying to satisfy it.

When we're lost in craving, really lost in it—not observing it mindfully, but lost in it—both kinds of ignorance are present. Craving arises in the first place because we're not seeing what's true. Because we're not seeing the insubstantial, impermanent nature of things, we're somehow thinking that satisfying the craving is going to bring us lasting fulfillment. And when it's present, as I said, craving not only distorts so that we don't see what's here, it also distorts so that we see what's not here.

I told this story last year, but it's so perfect I can't help using it again. It actually happened here last year with an anonymous, unnamed person. It was late in the retreat, really hot in the afternoon, and I was sitting talking to some people who had come by to visit for a little while. In the course of it, one of them mentioned some new place down the road where they made these great milkshakes.

Now, in that moment, craving arose in my mind. It was not noted, it was not noticed, and it got really solid. Immediately the distortion began. I wanted those people to leave—like immediately—so I could go and get a milkshake. Two minutes before, I hadn't thought of a milkshake for two weeks. It wasn't something I needed, but the mind gloms on.

So I was no longer appreciating these people. I kind of stopped talking, shut down, and said to my friend, "Let's go get a milkshake, let's go get a milkshake." And they left, finally.

When we're in the grip of craving, it also distorts our perception of appropriate behavior. I think we had maybe twenty minutes before the next sitting. We leapt in the car, went flying out looking for this milkshake, and got to the place. It was maybe five past three and it had closed at three.

So instead of stopping there, we said, "Well, there must be somewhere in this whole strip that we could get a milkshake." You can see, at this point, the craving itself has taken over. There's no sense—I mean, who even cared about a milkshake at this point? It was just the craving energy.

So I'm driving. We're going down the road, trying to look at all these different places. And my friend yells, "There it is! There it is! Yogurt cafe."

That's it. And I said, oh, great. And I looked over, and it said, "Urgent Care." I swear.

This is a little example of what happens to us all the time. This is craving. You just don't know what the heck is going on, and you'll do anything to satisfy it.

So that's why I say, when you're sitting here, no matter what the craving is for, just some little thing, and you can really be mindful of it—notice it's coming, its movements, and how it just fades out—this might not seem like much, but it's really an important and powerful experience. Because it's a movement out of the distortion of ignorance to clarity, to really being able to see things as they are and to not be driven by habit and by discomfort. It really allows for us to open into freedom.

And that brings us to the third truth that the Buddha spoke of: that there is an ending in our experience to confusion, to getting lost in the movement of craving.

So if craving is the mist between us and freedom, the good news is, yes, it's only a mist. There are a lot of ways to talk about this ending of suffering, this ending of the movements, the pain of craving and aversion. On the deepest level, it's really living in a way that craving does not arise. And that comes about through really deep seeing, experiencing the true nature of existence, of who we are beyond the temporary manifestations of our mental functioning, of our body.

And it really is impossible to describe, you know. I was with one teacher, and he was pointing to different people and saying, "Well, everyone describes and manifests this differently. For you it's love, for you it's peace, for you it's silence, for you it's emptiness, for you it's fullness, for you it's joy." But what the truth is, is that it's here and now and always accessible when we're not lost, when we're not seeing things in a distorted way.

I wanted to read one poetical description. This is a Tibetan poetical description of our true nature. Again, it's poetical. Anything you say isn't exactly it:

When left to itself, ordinary mind is fresh and naked.
If observed, it is a vivid clarity without anything to see.
A direct awareness, sharp and awake.
It is not permanent, since it does not exist at all.
It is not nothingness, since it is vividly clear and awake.
It is not oneness, since many things are cognized and known.
It is not plurality, since the many things known are inseparable in one taste.
It is not somewhere else.
It is your own awareness itself.
The face of this primordial protector dwelling in your heart can be directly perceived in this very instant.

In this very instant. And when we touch that and acknowledge, allow ourselves to know that, clinging just doesn't make any sense. So of course it doesn't arise. Why should clinging arise when, in Thich Nhat Hanh's words, the idea is that you do not put something in front of you and run after it, because everything is already here in yourself. Everything is already here in yourself. It makes absolutely no sense to run after anything. And this is true for all of us with no exceptions.

Mindfulness is really a tool that facilitates our cutting through our confused and distorted ways of perceiving, of thinking about things, to just touch things as they are in any moment of our experience. It makes no difference what it is that's happening. No difference at all.

And that's another level that is sometimes spoken of as freedom. Sometimes a moment of mindfulness is spoken of as a moment of freedom. It's a way of tasting. Because in a kind of microscopic sense, mindfulness is this quality of direct, bare attention, being fully with something just as it is. Say craving—knowing it just as it is, sensations, without a lot of story, without any interpretation, just clearly knowing it, without wanting and without pulling away. In that moment of direct being with, knowing without any movement of mind, in that moment greed, delusion, anger are not arising. Even though the next moment they might, in that moment they're not. And we all have many moments of this. Sometimes they're so They're not lights going off. We sometimes don't notice them. But I really would like to suggest starting to pay attention. There's a real peace in these moments when the mind isn't caught in craving and aversion and confusion. Some are more noticeable than others. I can't imagine you could be here this whole ten days and not have lots of moments like that—moments when things feel so exquisite. It might be the sunset, or a little lizard that you see, or a particular cup of tea that you have, or a particular footstep that you take. It could be anything. But just that sense of the exquisiteness of a particular moment.

A lot of times—and I can remember lots of particular moments like that—they're more vivid usually in retreats because there's more stillness in the mind. And for years I would attribute the exquisiteness of that moment to the thing that was happening. That was a particularly beautiful rose, or a particularly cute lizard. I remember one lizard from fifteen years ago, sitting in a chair and this little blue lizard went by. Why do I remember that moment as being so exquisite? It's not that that lizard was any different from any other lizard, not more special. But the exquisiteness comes from a mind and heart, a being that's at peace. It's not wanting, it's not pulling away. It just is, touching that primordial protector—whatever you want to call it—that space of emptiness, of fullness, of love.

We all touch that. See if you can just be with and appreciate that, and not look for an object as the cause of it. You'll find that if you try to recreate that cup of tea again, it doesn't happen, because it's not the cup of tea. So just noticing these moments of mindfulness—a little taste of a moment of freedom, momentary freedom from suffering and confusion. It's really amazing what just this gentle paying attention can do, how it can work such wonders.

So that's the three noble truths. Sylvia will talk tomorrow night about the path, the Eightfold Path of living, of developing both in and out of formal meditation, of living in a way that continues to open us to the truth of what is.

I want to end with a couple of things. One is that in a way, yes, we put in a huge effort to be mindful, to be with what is. But in another way, we don't have to try so hard. Sometimes we try so hard that we don't see what's right here, closer than our nose. So can we just, with our mindfulness, settle back into what is, just as it is, and allow that to unfold under the sunlight of mindfulness?

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Nothing physical or mental can give you freedom. You are free once you understand that your bondage is of your own making and you cease forging the chains that bind you." And that comes about simply through understanding.

Let's sit together for a few minutes.

It is not permanent since it does not exist at all. It is not nothingness since it is vividly clear and awake. It is not oneness since many things are cognized and known. It is not plurality since the many things known are inseparable in one taste. It is not somewhere else. It is your own awareness itself. The face of this primordial protector dwelling in your heart can be directly perceived in this very instant.

around the world are involved in the same process or quest or opening that we're involved in here.

One of the great preoccupations of human beings over the millennia has been to find that which brings transcendence, or brings us to touch that which is sacred or timeless—that which takes us beyond the small and limited sense of ourselves and the world. In all cultures, this is the journey of the yogi, the healer, the wise man, the medicine person, the wise woman, the shaman. And although it may take many forms, in some ways it's a universal journey. A journey from being unconscious or lost, from living in an ordinary kind of reality, to opening beyond that and discovering that which is sacred or holy. The root of the word "holy" is "whole"—not cut off, not separate from anything in life, wise in all the realms.

So here we are together in the desert, participating in this great universal journey. There are six stages or aspects to this journey.

The first is that of renunciation. Our life may be fine in an ordinary way, but often there comes to us a sense of some other possibility. There must be more, even if we're successful. One very famous and rich author wrote, "There must be more than having everything. There must be more to life than having everything." There's some sense that we come to that there's some other possibility within us and in life.

For some, life isn't okay. We look out at the world and see one war or one revolution supplanting another, whether in the Middle East or Central America or Asia. The democracy in the Soviet Union, which is so wonderful and exciting, and then all of a sudden the ethnic fighting and rivalries in Eastern Europe and parts of the old Soviet Union. We see that something is amiss in the world. Or we see in our own culture a kind of loss and sadness, a longing for connection that we used to share. So many people busy and isolated, lost in consumerism or desireism. As Joseph Campbell said, you climb the ladder only to discover it was against the wrong wall.

There was a cartoon in The New Yorker which showed the three monkeys sitting—one with hands over the eyes, one with hands over the ears, one with hands over the mouth—and then a fourth monkey in the same room saying, "I think there's some denial going on here."

The addicted society. Anne Wilson Schaef writes that the substance and process addictions so common in our culture—gambling, alcohol, drugs, sexuality, workaholism, so many kinds—usually have a meaning beyond our personal dilemma. The modern society in which we live needs addictions, and its very essence fosters them. It fosters addictions because the best-adjusted person in this society is the person who is not dead and not alive, just numb—a zombie. When you're dead, you're not able to do the work of society, and if you are fully alive, you are constantly saying no to many of the processes of the society: the racism, the polluted environment, the nuclear threat, the arms race, drinking unsafe water, eating carcinogenic foods. Thus, it is in the interests of modern society to promote those things that take the edge off, that keep us busy with our fixes and keep us slightly numbed out, zombie-like. Consequently, the society itself not only encourages addictions—it functions as an addict. A very powerful indictment of the way we can sleep in our culture.

For some, the renunciation comes very personally—because of our own isolation or loneliness or pain that we've suffered, or past abuse, or because we face the fact of death in someone we love. We want some understanding of this, or we live along and all of a sudden we're surprised.

One day, when the Sultan was in his palace at Damascus, a beautiful youth who was his favorite rushed into his presence, crying out in great agitation that he must fly at once to Baghdad, imploring leave to borrow His Majesty's swiftest horse. The Sultan asked why he was in such a hurry. "The cause," the young man answered, "is that as I passed through the gardens of the palace just now, Death was standing there. And when he saw me, he stretched out his arms as if to threaten me. I must lose no time in escaping from him." The young man was given leave to take the Sultan's horse and fly. When he was gone, the Sultan went down indignantly to the garden and found Death still there. "How dare you make threatening gestures at my favorite," he cried, "in my own garden!" But Death, astonished, answered, "I assure Your Majesty, I did not threaten him. I only threw up my arms in surprise at seeing him here, because I have a tryst with him tonight in Baghdad."

So that happens. We think it won't happen, or it doesn't happen to people close to us, or to ourselves. But we start to look and see that life changes. Karma changes, said the Buddha, like the flick of a horse's tail. Praise and blame and gain and loss and pleasure and pain. And if we don't want to live at the mercy of these elements, we must sense that there's some other way to be in the world—not just following what we like and what we don't like.

Somewhere in us we sense another way, and we let go for a moment of our habit, our usual way, and begin—not by doing something, but by stopping. To listen to the stars, to our breath, to the wind around us, to our hearts.

Often it's a lonely journey, at least in part. We have community and sangha. In many traditions there's a company of those who practice. But in the end, one does it alone. The wonderful old Huichol Indian shaman from Mexico, Don José Ríos, with whom I studied at some point early in my practice, wrote: "I've practiced my apprenticeship for eighty-four years. Many times have I gone to the mountains alone. Yes, I've endured much suffering in my life."

But to do this, to hear the voices of the gods, you too must go to the mountains. For it is not I who can teach you the ways of the gods. The gods are heard only alone and only in solitude.

That being alone is really the solitude of the heart. It's what the silence here allows you—that listening in yourself. There's a turning from the ordinary of our life to listen in a deeper way, sensing that there's some mystery, some possibility.

Then the second stage of this journey is a sacred question. Each of us will have our own version. Each of us has to listen for our own sacred question.

During the Kuwait war this last winter, a friend of mine, a poet and peace activist, was very upset by it. She went to Europe to try to come to terms with the war. She visited the concentration camps and spent a couple of weeks there after the war broke out, sitting in the crematoriums, sifting the sand and the ashes of the bones of people. She meditated on what makes enemies and how we learn to hate one another, writing letters from there to everyone she could as the understanding grew in her. That was her question: What makes us do that to one another?

Another friend sought the answers to his sacred question through working with the dying, through hospice work. He's done years of hospice work now. Recently when I was with him, he told me about a man dying in his hospice—fifty, a hundred, two hundred people die a year there. He said this was an older man and his two children were attending to him. They came in alarmed one day and said they had just received an emergency phone call. Their father was on the verge of death, but the phone call told them that his youngest brother had been killed that day in a car accident. Should they tell him? Would it disturb his process of dying?

They went back and forth. Maybe they shouldn't say anything. Finally, they decided just to leave him be in peace. They went into the room where he was indeed near death and sat by his bed with my friend, the hospice director, together there with them. After they sat down for a minute, he looked at them and said, "Don't you have something to tell me?" They said, "What do you mean?" He said, "About my brother dying." They said, "How could you know? How do you know?" He said, "Oh, I've been talking to him." Then in a few minutes he said the last things he had to say to his son and his daughter, closed his eyes, and died.

Now, how do you understand that? How does anyone understand this mystery that we're born into this life? Where does it come from? And where does it go?

During the three-month retreat one year at Barre, at the end of the retreat, this great Korean Zen master, Kusan, came to visit. People had been sitting and walking like this for weeks and weeks. He came and gave a little Zen lecture and asked a few questions about vipassana. Then he said, "Oh, you're doing it all wrong"—which was pretty alarming to these people. He said, "Don't waste your time with vipassana." He said, "Only one question: What is this? What is this? Forget all the rest of that meditation." Of course, what you're doing actually is sitting and seeing what is this. Or maybe your question is, how can I love well? Or how can I live fully in this life? Or what does it mean to be free? But somewhere in us there comes this wanting to awaken, to know, to see.

Now, based on this renunciation, this question that comes in our being, we must then undertake some discipline.

It requires a vehicle, some discipline, some practice, some way to break open the shell of our habit, of our conditioning, of this small sense of self that we have been caught in.

Sometimes, of course, it happens by accident. Travel or birth or death or some special event in life will awaken us for a moment or a day. But to really awaken and integrate it, the path of the yogi or the wise person or the shaman generally requires some repetitive discipline—chanting over and over, praying over and over, going into solitude, seeking visions.

In the Native American tradition, one group of Indians in their shamanic practices would have a large ground stone and a small one, the small one representing the sun as it went around the earth, as it seemed to go around the earth. And the person seeking a vision would go and sit day and night, simply rolling this small sphere around the larger one, concentrating on it and looking at the mystery of the circularity of those two until something opened up in them.

Here we're doing it with the breath and our steps. We meditate. We take a seat. And it's really very simple. As James talked about last night, it's manual labor. It's repetitive. It's just like being a parent. You have a young child and the child wakes up at night and you have to go in there. In the morning again, you get the child dressed and you feed the child. And then the child needs its diaper changed. As soon as you've gotten all the clothes on, you take them all off, change the diaper, put them all on again. And you do that over and over, a thousand times.

Boredom is a part of meditation. In fact, Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche said that when you get really bored, it should be considered good news—that you're finally letting yourself be here and not somewhere else. A kind of appreciation for the monotony of life itself. The rhythms of the sunrise and sunset and the moon rising, the rhythms of the seasons, the rhythms of your breath.

There's a story of a somewhat crabby dowager who lived in an apartment building in New York. She went out of her apartment and pressed the button for the elevator, and it didn't come for a while. She pressed it again a number of times and waited more and more impatiently. Finally the elevator arrived and she looked at the elevator boy and said, "Where have you been?" And he looked at her and said, "Lady, where can you go in an elevator?"

It's like that. You're sitting here, you go up, you go down, you go up, you go down. Your breath comes in, it goes out. You're happy, you're sad. And part of what really brings the learning in meditation is that willingness to stay with these things that make up our life and pay attention to them.

The Buddha begins the four foundations of mindfulness, speaking to the Kurus in the marketplace, saying, "My friends, there's a most wonderful way to realize purification and overcome grief and sorrow and pain and anxiety and realize freedom, or nirvana." And he says, "Sit yourself down under a tree or in a quiet place. Be aware when you breathe in and when you breathe out. Be aware of the feelings that arise. Be aware of the thoughts as they arise. Be aware of contraction, grasping, fear, desire. Be aware of releasing, letting go. Openness. Freedom."

We do it over and over and over again.

Now traditionally, there are outer circumstances—forest monks sitting in the woods with tigers in the distance roaring, sitting out in sun and rain, in caves during storms. We don't need that. All you have to do is sit here with your boredom, your doubt, your fear, your longing, your pain, the storms that come. There's plenty of difficult weather. There's plenty of circumstances. Just sitting here and being with yourself.

Gandhi said, "I have only three enemies. My favorite enemy, the one most easily influenced for the better, is the entire British Empire. My second enemy, the Indian people, is far more difficult." And if any of you have traveled in India, you understand just what he means. "But my most formidable opponent is a man named Mohandas K. Gandhi. With him, I seem to have very little influence."

So what it is, is this discipline to sit and walk and breathe and pay attention and acknowledge what's here, and do it over and over and over. And distractions come and the elevator goes up and the elevator goes down. And we discover in the midst of this a capacity of our heart and our mind to stay present.

I have had a number of friends and members of the sangha who have died over these past years in the AIDS epidemic. One close friend I used to go and sit with at times got to the point where he couldn't speak much, and we would just sit and hold hands and breathe together. Or when I couldn't visit him, I would call him on the phone and I would chant to him on the telephone, and then I'd say, "All right, let's breathe together." And we would just breathe together.

There's something really significant in being there, that present, with death, with pain, with whatever it is—bringing yourself again and again into the moment, facing the difficulties. It's only by doing it over and over, facing the difficulties, letting things come and letting the difficulties teach us, that that which is indestructible in us can be born.

Now it's not done by force or fighting against yourself, but rather it's done by awakening within you this greatness of heart, by your sincerity.

Martin Luther King—I read this passage from him very often—speaking at the most difficult moment of the civil rights marches, when his church had been bombed, when people had been killed, when the kind of freedom and justice that was so obviously necessary for African Americans was so tangibly there, and yet in seeking it, the very seeking brought this immense amount of difficulty and suffering. He said, "We will match your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul force. We will not hate you, but we cannot in all good conscience obey your unjust laws. But we will soon wear you down by our capacity to suffer. And in winning our freedom, we will so appeal to your heart and conscience that we will win your freedom as well."

So that's the spirit of doing something over and over again with your sincerity, with your whole being.

Now whenever a person undertakes a genuine practice or discipline of truth—as a yogi or a meditator in prayer or meditation, or as an artist, or as someone in marriage, or as a parent, something that you give yourself to really fully—what inevitably arises is the next stage, which is hardship. It's called Mara in the Buddhist tradition. Mara is the name of the god of darkness, the shadow, that which is difficult, the forces of greed, fear, delusion, prejudice. And Mara has the capacity to arise in a thousand different forms.

I don't know if you've noticed Mara during this retreat, but I'll read you a poem from Kabir. He says, "Friend, please tell me about what I can do about this world I hold on to and keep spinning out. I gave up sewn clothes and wore a robe, but one day I noticed how well woven was the cloth. So I bought some burlap, but I still throw it elegantly over my left shoulder. I pulled back my sexual longings and now I discover that I'm angry a lot. I gave up rage and now I notice that I'm greedy all day. I worked hard at dissolving the greed, and now I'm proud of myself. When the mind wants to break its links with the world, it still holds on to something." Kabir says, "Listen, my friend, there are very few that find the path, yet it is right here in front of us."

So there are these thousand forms of Mara. Mara comes in the form of temptation, distraction. "Let's get a little more comfort. Let's go for tea instead of taking a walk. Let's follow this fantasy. Let's have a nap. Let's do this or that." It kind of comes and taps you on the shoulder and says, "Come on, if you do this, you'll be happy." And then you say, "Yes, that sounds really good to me." And off you go in fantasy or action. All those things, and yet you've done it a thousand times, but the voice still is very believable. "Come on, this time it'll really work."

You know, Socrates lived quite frugally, but yet he was often seen going into the marketplace. And so his students said, "What are you doing? You live without even sandals, barefoot and very frugally." And Socrates said, "I love to go to the market and discover how many things I am perfectly happy without."

So Mara comes with all these other things you could be doing or having or feeling. And you see those temptations, the temptations of desire. Or Mara comes in other forms—as fear, "This is too hard, too painful." As aggression. As restlessness. And what you're asked to do is sit and acknowledge, as Carol talked about, these different energies, to name them. Fear, fear. Restless, restless. Desire, desire, desire. Whatever they happen to be. Simply to stay present again and again. And to say, "Oh Mara, here you are in a new form. Nice to see you again. What do you have to say today?"

To really let yourself see it.

I remember being with my teacher Ajahn Chah at one point. We took a trip to a monastery on the border of Cambodia, about eighty miles over dirt roads in this back province. The driver was one of those crazed—I would say third world drivers. You would find them in this country as well, except that there are more policemen here. It was a one-and-a-half-lane dirt road going around over hills and mountains, with water buffalo and ox carts and bicycles and buses, and he was just passing everybody, leaning on the horn half the time, completely unable to see what was ahead. I was sure I was going to die. I mean, it was clear that this was the end of my life.

So I'm sitting there, not even wanting to see as he's passing this bus on the curve, holding on really tight and breathing in meditation, thinking, "Well, maybe I'll use my meditation to die well as a monk anyway." And I look over at Ajahn Chah who's sitting next to me, and his knuckles were white. That felt very good somehow. That was reassuring.

Obviously we made it there—as you can see, I'm still here. After all that time, the car came to a stop at the monastery. He turned over to me and looked at me and said, "Scary, wasn't it?" It was such a lovely moment, because I don't think he was afraid to die. He seemed pretty much at peace with birth and death and whatever it was. That was simply the fact of it. It was the way it was.

So this is what you do with Mara. "Oh, fear arising. Hi, interesting to see you again." Fear, fear. What does it feel like in the body? You name it. Fear, fear. As long as it stays. "Let's see how big you get." Fear, fear, fear. Terror. "Oh, interesting." Terror, terror, terror. If you really acknowledge the feelings that come, they last ten notes or twenty or thirty labels, and then they turn into something else. Maybe it turns into sadness or calm or interest or anger. Who knows what will happen? But it's just to see that which arises, these hardships.

Then Mara has more subtle temptations. Once you get good at it, as Kabir says, then you feel, "I'm really doing well." Pride arises. Or clarity—"I'm doing so well, I just want to keep this clarity." Or you feel joy or rapture arising. These too are simply to be acknowledged. Joy, joy. "I really like this." Liking, liking, liking. "I hope this doesn't go away." Hoping, hoping. Simply seeing what arises. All of the temptations, pleasant and unpleasant, and sitting in the midst of them.

This is really what the Buddha did. He sat under the Bodhi tree and took a vow to open his eyes and his heart to the entire mystery of life without withdrawing from a single thing. To really let himself see it and know it all. To sit as if in the eye of a storm. To face what Zorba the Greek called "the whole catastrophe."

This, in the shamanic tradition, is called the equilibrium of a shaman—this capacity to enter all the realms of existence and stay balanced.

One of the great inspirations for me in practice was a Tibetan lama and master named Karmapa. His Holiness Karmapa, when he visited this country, was for the most part this most joyful, beautiful being—like a big fifty-five-year-old baby who loved everybody and loved everything. I remember when I first went to see him, he arrived at the airport in Boston. Some friends of mine said, "This great Tibetan lama has come to visit and we're going to the airport. Do you want to come along?"

And I said, okay, sure. Why not? I hear he's a fine teacher.

So there were about twenty of us to meet him at the airport. People brought flowers and bowed and so forth. It was kind of a line. And then it was my turn. And I looked at him. I'd been in monasteries for so long, I thought, well, another fat monk. He seemed like a nice man. He was a little bit round. Nothing good or bad.

And I went up and I kind of bowed a little bit. And he took my head and pushed it all the way down to the floor. Which I think I needed.

Then I got up and I looked at him and I smiled and I walked away. I got about ten feet away from him and all of a sudden I felt cold. It was this complete shock because I wasn't expecting anything. I felt this coldness and all I wanted to do was walk back up and sit at his feet and hug his robes. There was this tremendous field of warmth that was completely unexpected to me.

He would perform the black crown ceremony with this wonderful black hat, a crown that was given to him a thousand years before in a past incarnation by the emperor of China, in which he would become the bodhisattva of infinite compassion—surrounded by monks chanting and Tibetan horns and ancient ceremony. He performed it a number of times in this country, in halls filled with thousands of people. He would place it on his head and take out this crystal rosary and become transformed into the bodhisattva, the god or goddess of infinite compassion.

And I would look at his face and it was the saddest face I'd ever seen. His eyes were as sad as anything I'd ever seen, looking out into the world and seeing the sorrows of every single being. And he would do 108 beads on his rosary and say 108 prayers of compassion for beings everywhere. And then he would put the crystal beads away and put the crown away and complete the ceremony and turn into this big baby again.

It was remarkable. He could be in any realm. He could be anywhere.

In bringing awareness to our practice, in facing hardship, there is a profound healing that takes place if we are willing to not put anything out of our heart. When we sit, we will see our own fear that we've run from, our grief and loss. In fact, one meditation teacher and psychologist at Harvard, a good friend, sees the whole process of meditation as really one of grieving, of letting go of deeper and deeper things.

We'll feel the wounds that we carry in our bodies and in our hearts, the loneliness, the suffering of the world around us that we know—homelessness and warfare and children who don't have enough to eat. We'll feel the pains in our own body that we've carried for such a long time. And what we're asked to do is sit and discover a new way to touch all of this within us.

Here are words from Chögyam Trungpa. He says: "This is the practice of the sacred warrior. What is the awakened heart of a warrior? It is the heart of tenderness and sadness. When you awaken your heart in the face of all the difficulties of the world, you find to your surprise that your heart is empty. You find that you are looking into outer space. What are you? Who are you? Where is your heart?

"If you really look, you won't find anything tangible and solid. Of course, you might find something very solid if you have a grudge against someone or you've fallen possessively in love. But that's not the awakened heart. If you search for the awakened heart, if you put your hand through your ribcage to feel for it, there's nothing there except for tenderness. You feel sore and soft, and if you open your eyes to the rest of the world, you feel tremendous sadness.

"This kind of sadness doesn't come from being mistreated. You don't feel sad because someone has insulted you or because you feel impoverished. Rather, this experience of sadness is unconditioned. It occurs because your heart is completely open. It is like pure raw meat."

Even if a mosquito lands on it, you feel so touched. It is this tender heart of a warrior that has the power to heal the world.

So there's a way, as hardships arise in our practice, that we are asked to learn to transform them—an alchemical transformation from lead or difficulty or pain into the gold of compassion and patience and steadiness and kindness. Thomas Merton says, "True prayer and love are learned in the hour when prayer becomes impossible and the heart has turned to stone." Just when it is the most difficult is actually when your practice becomes the most interesting and the most compelling. To sit and awaken in the center of those difficulties is to recreate what the Buddha did under the Bodhi tree, for yourself, in this very life, in this body.

One of the most remarkable paintings of the night of his enlightenment is a Tibetan thangka. The Buddha sits there under the Bodhi tree, attacked by the forces of Mara—temptations and aggressions and fear, all the sorrow of the world thrown in his face. Arrows and bows and weapons launched toward him. And he sits under the Bodhi tree facing all of that with his hands raised in this gesture. There's a kind of line painted from his heart to his fingertips, indicating compassion. And he touches each arrow and each spear as it's thrown to him with compassion, and it turns to flower petals and falls at his feet. He's surrounded by mounds of flower petals.

"This is the last lesson," says Don Juan. The transforming power of our own presence, of our love and attention—it is always left for the very last moment, for the moment of ultimate solitude when a person faces their death and aloneness. Only then does it make sense.

So we come through hardship, we face difficulties, and we still stay seated—present, open, wakeful—transforming them with our awareness and our compassion. And from that there comes the next stage, which is transformation itself, or awakening itself. We let go. We surrender. We open. We die a little bit at a time. You do. You die in here every day. You expand yourself. You let the whole capacity of your being open over and over. And then the old sense of yourself starts to shift.

Remember the story of Mullah Nasruddin going into the bank to cash a check? The Sufi fool and wise man. They say, "Could you please identify yourself?" So he pulls a little mirror out of his pocket, looks at it, and says, "Yep, that's me, all right."

We have these notions of our identity. And as we sit and pay attention over and over and over again in deeper ways, and the different parts of ourselves and life and the world show themselves, and we let each arise and acknowledge it with attention and compassion and allow it to pass, then our whole sense of identity opens in a new way. Not through fighting, not through struggle, but by being willing just to be, to open, to let go—we discover something new that is timeless.

Kalu Rinpoche, the Tibetan lama, wonderful master, says, "You live in illusion and the appearance of things. There is a reality, but you do not know this. When you understand this, you will discover that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. That is all."

So you discover that none of these things can you possess or hold or say, "This is me." They all come and go—different forces of the heart and body and mind. And there's this space in the middle that knows what is true. Discovering that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. There's this opening, this awakening.

Whitman puts it another way. This is his vision: "I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey work of the stars, and the egg of the wren is equally perfect, and the grain of sand, and the tree toad is the chief work of the highest, and the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven. And the cow crunching grass with lowered head surpasses any statue. And a mouse is a miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels."

A mouse is a miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels. There's this amazing thing which is our life in front of us. And no one knows how we got here.

How did we get in this body with a funny hole at one end into which we stuff dead plants and animals? That's what we do, right? And move the tube around by kind of falling in different directions against gravity. And come out of the vagina of another person, out of their belly, out of their womb. How does that happen? And here we are, born into this thing, or we are this thing, or something. And then you look out at night and there are all those stars hanging out there, billions of galaxies spinning around.

So there comes somehow this awakening, this realization that's not about solving your problems, but seeing the mystery of birth and death itself—and discovering that what we've longed for, what we've sought for so long, is here, just now, where we are.

Zen Master Suzuki Roshi could say, "If when I die, that's all right, you know. If I suffer, that's all right, you know. Just suffering Buddha, no confusion in it." Sun Buddha, Moon Buddha, Happy Buddha, Sad Buddha—to rest in that which is timeless, that holds birth and death and joy and sorrow. The heart of the Buddha.

When Thomas Merton visited the statues at the great monastery of Polonnaruwa—two-thousand-year-old Buddhas carved out of the cliff of marble—he walked across the grass in bare feet in the early morning. He said they were the most beautiful pieces of art he'd seen in the world. These huge Buddhas smiling, this half-smile knowing of tremendous peace. The peace not of emotional resignation, but of openness that has seen everything without refutation, without argument, without trying to discredit anything. The peace and compassion just of openness.

The Buddha sat under the Bodhi tree, and when he awakened, seeing all of life, birth and death, he sang a song. He said, "O house builder, thou art seen at last. The rafters are shattered. The ridge pole is broken. No longer shall you build this house of sorrow." The Buddha had broken out of the house of desire and grasping. "No longer shall you build this house of sorrow. Freed am I from birth and death. Awakened the unshakable deliverance of heart."

So there comes to each of us in our own way—in days or moments, in ordinary ways or extraordinary ways—some sense of opening beyond the busyness of our life, some transcendence. And then we realize that it is we who know, and not someone else who will tell us, that we found it in ourselves. Tremendous joy in that opening and discovery.

And then of course one has to go back. You go out into the wilderness or up into the mountains only to return again. But because we have let ourselves touch our fear and our sorrow, our aloneness, our death, our rapture, our ambition, our hopes—for some people, their life is more difficult than their death—because we've let ourselves feel and face and sit in the midst of all of this, there comes a kind of fearlessness. The fearlessness of one who has traversed the territory of humanity, of birth and death. And so we become a wise man or a wise woman, a seer, a healer, a bodhisattva—someone who's journeyed through the center of the earth to touch all of these things.

I see retreats as having two great functions: one teaching us how to live, and the other teaching us how to die. Teaching us how to die because if you sit even for ten days or twenty days and really just be with everything that comes, there grows this great capacity. So that when someone you love is dying, you can sit there and hold their hand and breathe with them. And when they feel pain, you can say, "Yes, I know what it's like to sit in pain." Or fear arises and you say, "Yes, I know what it's like to be afraid, to not know." Restlessness arises, boredom arises, all the difficult states. And you can sit there and hold their hand—or when it's time for your own death—and say, "Yes, this I know, this I've learned." It's an enormous gift.

But it's also the gift to be alive. Because as we sit and walk and sit and walk, breathing and feeling our steps and eating and paying attention and reclaiming with our attention the whole of our life, we become more alive. We see more, hear more, and feel more fully. And in being alive, we live from ourselves and not from someone else. It's a wonderful way to live. And out of that, we become happy. That's what the Buddha was called—the happy one.

In the Zen ox herding pictures, the monk goes off in the forest seeking the ox, and then finding it, and taming the ox, and then losing oneself and the ox in both, just in the emptiness of things. Going through this whole journey. And finally in the last stage, returning back to the world. Emptiness let go of, ox let go of. Coming back, there's this wonderful old man with his bag and his bowl and his stick. And he says, "I go to the marketplace with my wine bottle and return home with my staff. I visit the wine shop and the market, and all whom I look upon become enlightened." He speaks of the wine bottle and wine shop because he says, "I go anywhere."

It doesn't matter where it is now. I can enter this world without fear because I don't carry that fear in the way that I used to in my own heart.

And this is really what's offered here—that we too go through this journey. Out of this, we learn the gifts of our heart that we can bring and return back to all of those we touch in our lives. Sometimes it's little by little in monotonous, regular ways: one breath, one step, one sitting. Sometimes it's great moments, mystery of reawakening. It doesn't matter. The elevator goes up, the elevator comes down. And where can you go except here?

So let's sit together.

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journey work of the stars. The egg of the wren is equally perfect, and the grain of sand, and the tree toad a chief work for the highest, and the running blackberry would adorn the parlors of heaven, and the cow crunching grass with lowered head surpasses any statue, and a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels.

Breathing in and breathing out. Being awake and present. The feelings of the body and heart and mind. Thoughts and images arising and passing. Staying present. Wakeful. In the center of them all.

As we come into the middle portion of this first ten-day retreat, really let yourself settle into the practice. The one thing that you can do—not to strive or force anything—but one of the things that really helps the whole process open is your continuity. Take care as you stand up and walk out. Take care as you eat. Take care as you change clothes. Just bring that spirit of presence, that spirit of being awake and mindful, and make it a thread throughout the day.

As you take a walk, you can walk far into the desert. That's fine. It's not about denying yourself enjoyment. Some days will be pleasurable. Some may be terrible. That's fine too. But it's to be present and to keep coming back again and again to simply be where you are. And all of the process will open from that.

Nature of Thought

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson investigates one of the most fascinating aspects of meditation practice: the nature of thought and how profoundly it shapes our experience. Beginning with the opening verses of the Dhammapāda—"We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts"—she explores how thought, while an amazing tool for communication and understanding, becomes a source of tremendous suffering when we misapprehend its true nature.
> Wilson examines how perception itself becomes distorted when craving, aversion, or delusion operate unseen in the mind, leading to what Buddhist psychology calls "inverted perceptions"—seeing permanence in what is impermanent, satisfaction in what cannot satisfy, and a solid self where none exists. She introduces the concept of papañca (mental proliferation), showing how a single moment of bare perception can rapidly expand into elaborate stories, self-definitions, and emotional reactions that take us far from what is actually happening.
> Drawing on teachings from Nisargadatta Mahārāj, Kalu Rinpoche, the Dalai Lama, and Thich Nhat Hanh, Wilson offers practical guidance for working with thought through wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Rather than fighting thoughts or trying to eliminate them, she encourages practitioners to return again and again to the source of experience—the bare perception before interpretation begins. She closes with the Buddha's profound instruction: "In the seen, there is only the seen"—pointing toward the simplicity that underlies our seemingly complex mental life.

I want to speak about something that I personally find fascinating. I want to talk about thought—about the power of thought, and how we get so confused by it.

These are the first two verses of the Dhammapada, which is one of the books of the Buddhist suttas, translated in various ways. This is one translation:

We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with an impure mind and suffering will follow you as the wheel follows the ox that draws the cart.

We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you as your shadow, unshakable.

That speaks to how powerful thoughts can be. Thought is amazing. It's amazing that I can sit here and make these noises and it vibrates in your eardrum and we understand each other—that these sounds in our mind turn into coherent thoughts. It's an amazing tool, and in a way it really does construct the world. When we understand it, it's such a powerful ally.

But how much in our practice, in our lives, do we find ourselves struggling with thought? Countless times people come in for interviews and it kind of slips out somewhere: "I'm trying to get rid of these thoughts," or "I'm still having thoughts. When will I get to the point where there's no more thoughts?"—as if that's what the practice is about. The reason we want to get rid of thoughts is because somehow we know we're suffering tremendously from what we perceive as the presence of the thought.

So really I'd like to suggest that instead of fighting with thoughts, we can turn our attention to seeing them for what they are, understanding how we can get so confused, so caught up, how they can seem so powerful.

If we really look as we sit here and just look at thoughts, what is a thought? It just comes, it goes, it's nothing. It's so ephemeral. "The sky is blue." "The sun just set." "How long will this talk be?" "My hand hurts." A thought is just nothing.

Kalu Rinpoche said—and I think Jack read this quotation from the last retreat, a very powerful one: "We live in illusion and the appearance of things. There is a reality. You are that reality. But we live in illusion and the appearance of things."

So much of that illusion, so much of that appearance of things, is created through thought, through our misperception of thought. We live in illusion through not seeing what's really happening. We live in a dream that we're just making up every moment as we go along, and then we start suffering from it because we believe it's real. Thought is a big contributing factor to this—not thought per se, but our misapprehension of thought.

It seems to be true that we in the West, in our culture, are really a thinking culture. Whenever I've sat a retreat with an Asian teacher, they tend to be really amazed at how much Westerners—or Americans anyway—think. They say, "Ah, you're always thinking." We can't just come in with an experience. We analyze and interpret and compare and try to figure out our motivation and connect it to what happened in our childhood. We can't just sit and feel pressure. We're tortured, and I really have sensed this sometimes in Asian teachers, this sense of real bewilderment at how agonized we can be about simple experiences.

So we try to get rid of the thoughts, but that's not really the source of the suffering. Nisargadatta Maharaj talked once about how if we examine our mind closely, we see that it's seething with thoughts. We don't have to look that closely to see that it's seething with thoughts. And it may go blank occasionally, but as he says, a becalmed mind is not a peaceful mind.

So often we mistake that for peace. The exact quotation is: "This peace is very brittle. What you're calling peace is only the absence of disturbance, temporary absence. Real peace cannot be disturbed."

Real peace is not about the absence of thoughts, necessarily. If that's all that peace was about, we could just have lobotomies and go home. It's true, right? That's all we needed to do. So real peace, as we've said ten million times, and we all need to keep reminding ourselves, comes when we know and understand what's really true in this moment.

So how do we get so caught up in creating this dream world out of misperception and thought? I want to talk about just a few ways, because obviously it can be quite a complex topic.

One of the ways we get confused, which leads to further confusion, is on the basic level of perception itself. Perception, as defined in Buddhist psychological terminology, is a quality that's present in every moment. It's the quality of recognition. It involves memory. It's like a quality of discernment. For example, you recognize warm or cold or blue. This is perception—just seeing what's there.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. In a nutshell, that's our whole practice. Mindfulness practice is about direct experience, which allows for the arising of true knowledge.

So what's this mistaken perception? Why does this happen? How do we misperceive? Some of this I've spoken about before. When in a moment there's present in the mind, unseen, our old friends—and you can guess what old friends they are: craving, aversion or anger, confusion or delusion, or you could call it blindness, really—they actually can affect how we perceive. So we don't perceive accurately.

I've given some examples before. I want to use one that someone told me in an interview, and I hope this person doesn't mind because it's a perfect example. Being in a state of aversion, walking in here, and reading "perceptory" as "purgatory"—but really reading that, you know. The mind does that. And then when you flip back and see what's really true: "Oh, how could I have ever done that?" But in the moment, you totally believe that perception is accurate. And it leads to a whole constellation of more thoughts, more emotions, more feelings, a really solid construct of what's going on.

So as we said before, that first mistaken perception arises because there's aversion or greed in the mind. And that arises when there's pleasant and unpleasant feeling that we're not aware of, and the mind just naturally moves into craving, aversion, confusion. Even closer to home is what really comes from confusion: not even noticing the feeling, or seeing how one thing is leading to the next. This is happening on a very fine level, but perception is happening in every moment. And so a lot of the time we get really far, far away from what's actually happening. Then we wonder why we feel so out of touch and confused.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "When you look at a pencil"—or you look at this, you perceive it, say "okay, gong, bell ringer, whatever," I don't even know what you call this thing—"but the stick itself may be different from the stick in your mind." And that's really how it is.

One example I've used other times in talking about mindfulness, in seeing how the presence of wanting in the mind can distort what we see, was a scientific experiment, a psychological experiment, where the subjects were instructed to watch a video. Given some reward, it was about four or five minutes of a very fast basketball game, and they were instructed to count how many times the ball was passed. So they were really focused—just seeing that tunnel vision you get when there's grasping, when there's wanting in the mind. That was their task.

At the end of the experiment, as they turned in their thing, the experimenter said, "Well, what about that woman in white?"

They said, "What?"

The experimenter said, "Oh yeah, in the middle of the video, this woman dressed all in white with a white parasol kind of sauntered through the middle of the basketball court, in one side and out the other."

Nobody had seen this. Nobody could believe it. You totally trust what your perception is. So they showed them the video again, and there was this woman in white. From then on, you could never see the video and not see the woman in white. But before that, there's no way they could have been convinced that had happened.

Just examples of how perception can be so mistaken. Wow, that's interesting.

[An earthquake occurs during the talk]

There's no reason to go anywhere. Just sit down and relax. Stay right here. Just stay with what is. There's nowhere to go anyway. That was interesting. We're a few miles from the San Andreas Fault actually—it slips once in a while. Just sit down and ground where you are now. Just feel yourself sitting here.

May we be peaceful. May we be present with equanimity and clarity. May we feel our connection with all other beings. We retouch that place of trust in the Dharma where there's nothing to fear. We send love to all beings in this area, wishing for all beings freedom from fear, freedom from danger, freedom from confusion.

Just let your attention come to rest in this present moment. Can we be right here, right now, in this moment?

It's interesting—I was never in an earthquake before. I thought it was kind of interesting. See, we never know. We construct all these ideas out of thought about how things are and what's going to happen. We plan, and you never know.

Not knowing can be like trust in the unknown. It's freedom.

So, where were we? The basketball video, that's right. Anyway, when there is craving or aversion in the mind that goes unseen, it can so color how we perceive that we just don't know what's really happening.

In a way, the root—the even more basic quality in our experience that leads to misperception—is that of ignorance. Perhaps blindness is a better word.

Sometimes when we talk about ignorance, I know I tend to have the feeling that it's this solid thing—something we're born with that we can never escape. But it's really just another experience that arises and passes, same as craving, same as joy. And we can actually begin to feel and experience the qualities of it. In a way, you can sort of recognize sometimes when this blindness is present in your experience.

One way it manifests is simply as confusion, dullness, heaviness—like a fog. Or I think of it like those times when you've slept too long or too warmly, and in your dreams you're trying to wake up and there's this kind of struggle. For me, I'll try to see and everything's upside down, and I just can't come out of it. I can't see clearly, though I know I'm not seeing clearly. That's the quality of fogginess, cloudiness, that this blindness or ignorance can introduce into our experience.

When this is present in a moment, what arises out of it is what's often called wrong view, or a basic distortion of perceiving what's happening due to the cloudiness and fogginess. There's a classic example given in the Buddhist sutras of walking in a forest, although actually here walking in the desert is just as good. If you're walking at night without a flashlight and you really can't see stuff clearly at all—you can kind of tell the trees, you can kind of tell the big cactuses, but everything is really not clear—as you're out walking, you see a really big snake. And it scares you. "What am I doing out here at night? There's snakes all over." You get scared and hurry out, thinking it's dangerous. "I'm out of here." Then if you go back in the daytime, you see it was just a big piece of dead cholla lying on the ground.

So that basic misperception coming about through the cloudiness or confusion—you see how that misperception gives rise to a whole series of assumptions. First there's an unpleasant feeling and fear, and we act on that fear, and we draw assumptions about the desert at night, and it just proliferates. You go back and see it's nothing, and you think, "Oh, how obvious." That's how it is when ignorance, this blindness, is active in our experience. We recognize in a mistaken way, and then that mistaken recognition defines how we relate to the experience, and all our actions are based on this mistake.

Once I was in Thailand walking in the forest, where there are lots of cobras and poisonous snakes. I was walking along in the daytime with my glasses on, so I wasn't worried. I saw what looked like vines hanging all over, and I walked up and almost brushed into one—then I saw it was a green snake hanging down. I had thought it was a vine. So it works both ways.

This is what's happening often, a great deal of the time, in our basic perception of who and what we are. We perceive what we are as humans in this mind-body process in an inaccurate, mistaken way. We organize our basic perceptory input—the sense data that we're experiencing moment after moment after moment in our practice here—we organize and construct it in our minds inaccurately. And then our actions and assumptions and how we live come out of that mistaken perception.

They talk about three inverted, upside-down perceptions that we have: seeing permanence in what is constantly changing and in flux; seeing satisfaction, or rather the possibility of satisfaction, in this changing flux, which can never give lasting satisfaction; and then in a way the root one—seeing a solid self-existence, an unchanging self-nature, a person, where there isn't such a thing. This leads to our confusion, our sense of separation, and a great deal of our suffering.

As we continue to be here, to pay attention in our practice, we see over and over and over that what we call "me"—generally this mind-body process—is a series of constantly shifting physical and mental experience. Sensation, sensation, feeling, thought, sound, smell, sensation, sensation—constantly changing. It never stops for a moment. It's not static. There's no place where everything stops and rests in this mind-body process. But they say, because it happens so fast and because often we don't really look, it seems really solid and unchanging and permanent to us. Like if you take a lit torch and twirl it around really fast, it looks like a solid circle.

And it's sort of like that with us. Everything is always coming and going so fast that it seems really solid.

Some misperceptions are easy to see through. You come back and look at the sign and you really see, "Oh yes, it says 'directory.'" You go back and look at the cholla and realize, "Oh yes, that's really not a snake." And once we've seen through it, there's no way we could ever mistake it again.

But others, like this basic misperception of what's going on in this mind-body process, are much harder to see through—partially because of the quickness of its happening, but also because we don't really examine very carefully. We're so used to it that we take it for granted. And in the taking for granted, we don't really look. We just assume this is how it is, and we act from that. We build our thoughts from that, and we don't really stop to look.

This is the power, really, of this meditation, this process of mindfulness. At times when we do look, we all have little glimpses where this veil is lifted and we realize, "Oh, yeah, it's so obvious." But then suddenly we get lost again. The blindness arises once more. We stop looking so carefully because it does take a willingness to keep looking.

But in those moments when the veil is lifted, it's so simple. And what's interesting is that before such a moment, we're afraid. "What about me? I'm going to lose who I am." But we don't lose anything, because there's nothing there in the first place. You can't lose what's never been here.

One of our teachers once said: when you look, you don't see anything—there's nothing solid or permanent there. When you don't look, you see samsara. Samsara is just the endless cycle of suffering and birth and death that seems to be our experience of life. So all that changes is our relationship to what we experience. We don't lose anything.

But another reason that it's so difficult to shift these inverted perceptions, to shift our perception of who we are—and this is coming back to the thought process—is because we describe our experience and who we are with our thoughts, and then we take that description to be true. This is something that really fascinates me. We take that description to be true without really examining it, and then any perceptions that arise that don't fit into that description, we just completely discount. We don't even notice them, or we find some reason to think they're not true.

Here's an example. Sometimes when people in meditation are just sitting very mindfully, noting, and things are coming and going, they come in and say, "I can't sustain attention on an object for very long. As soon as I know it, as soon as I'm mindful of it, it goes away. I can't do it. I can't be concentrated." And we say, "Right, that's because things arise and pass very quickly. You can't sustain attention for long because nothing's lasting very long." But people don't want to let that perception in. Instead, they turn it around to say, "I should be able to sustain attention." We don't want to let in the perception of how quickly everything's arising and passing.

On a larger scale, I see it in myself and I see it in friends and in people I speak with on retreat. We'll have some self-description that we're currently caught in: "I'm so morbid." "I'm never happy." "I'm a really selfish person." "I can't meditate." "I'm lazy." Whatever your particular self-description—it might be one you've carried with you all your life, or it might be one that's gotten locked in really solid in the last couple of days. And you come and talk about that self-definition, that self-description, and I'll ask, "Well, was that what you experienced every moment?" "Well, no. There were times of joy, and there were times of peace, and there were moments of hunger, and there were lots of neutralities." "Well, what about this solid self-description you're talking about?"

And the other experiences are just ignored, forgotten, discounted. In fact, something that fascinates me is how often the negative self-definition is really bought into. People say, "Well, sometimes there are moments of joy, but that's just kind of a mistake, or it's grace, or it's not really my experience. This morbidity is my true experience, my true nature. This other stuff happened by mistake, and it'll probably never happen again, so don't count it."

This is how we take thoughts, string them together, make them solid, and then ignore everything else that doesn't fit into them. We give thought an amazing power to define us, to limit our perception, to keep us from seeing what is actually happening, because we try to fit our experience into our thoughts.

So our challenge here is this: can we let go of self-definition? Can we be with the bare perception of what's happening right now? Just let it in. Just notice how it is—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Craving arises. Aversion arises. Thoughts and interpretations arise from that. That's okay, but know that for what it is. Can we just come back and be with the bare experience?

in an unbiased way, not choosing some and discarding others. This is really the function of mindfulness—to be with what is, without discrimination. And this is what begins to open up to us the possibility to perceive accurately the truth of who we are.

And then, just to have a moment of clear perception of what's happening—pressure in the body, whatever—as we watch, we can see how quickly the whole thing flowers into a story, into a description, into a really solid reality.

For example, just walking here and some person walks by, somebody you don't know. The actuality of that experience is seeing form and color. It's unpleasant. We don't really quite notice that. Aversion arises. And then the whole thing: "Ah, they look so sloppy. Look how they dress." The association with being really judged and criticized all one's life by one's parents for being sloppy. A real negativity, a real judgment of that person. Not only that, they're dirty. They probably can't meditate. I know I don't want to be near that person in the hall. I'm sure I couldn't stand to eat across from them. It reminds me of this guy in sixth grade I had to eat across from who made me nauseous. And pretty soon this solid reality has developed around what was basically a perception of form and color and that it was unpleasant.

And that can turn into a Vipassana vendetta. It goes on the whole retreat. I'm really solid then in that definition of me as opposed to that person. And this can happen in that amount of time. It's really fascinating.

This process is one of my favorite words. It's called papañca. It means proliferation. And you can really see how it is. There's form. There's color. There's unpleasant. There's aversion. And suddenly, boom—there's proliferation of thoughts and more unpleasant feelings and association and memories and more thoughts and pleasantness about feeling "I'm so good and they're so bad," on and on and on. Papañca is how we get so far away from what is true, when we don't see it happening.

So there are a couple of strong ways that papañca is fueled. I've already talked about a couple of them. The first is this: proliferation is fueled by that basic wrong view I spoke of—the sense of a solid, separate entity of myself. This is really what gives rise to the desire for pleasure and the fear of pain. If I'm really in a space of knowing there's no separation, that what is is just what is, that it's all connected, this fear of pain and desire for pleasure just doesn't make much sense. But it makes total sense if I think this is solid and real. And so this is one of the basic fuelings of this proliferation.

Another way that this really takes off—and again, we've spoken of this a lot—is through the energy of craving. Just notice: you're sitting, having a fairly mindful sitting, and just a little thought comes up. "Gee, I wonder if I got that call from home." And then that's pleasant, and a little craving comes up, and it's not really noticed. And suddenly that thought has huge power. "I really want to get that call, because if I get it, then I can do this, and then that means that, and I'd better not have to make that other call, and I have to plan on this, and what am I going to do on Sunday, and I wonder what happened to this." And it's just this blossoming up of thoughts, getting stronger and stronger and stronger. And maybe you make it through the sitting, but you beeline for the bulletin board the second the bell rings.

This is the strength that comes from this proliferation of thought fueled by craving. What happens is we start to think the thoughts are an accurate reflection of reality, which they may or may not be. But in not seeing the thought for what it is and letting it be fueled by that craving and just taking off, we've lost all touchstone with what's actually happening in the moment.

It's interesting to see on a small scale like that here. It's scary for me to see it on a large scale. For example, with countries. The whole war in the Middle East that we were in last year could basically—and this is rather simplistic—but it could basically come down to craving for oil, craving for comfort, for power, and then all the proliferation of thoughts that arise from that. The thoughts are basically a justification of the craving. And then the thoughts become real in themselves, and further actions to support and justify the thoughts. The whole source of all this confusion is usually lost by the time all the justifications have gotten really solid.

of proliferation that happens is this craving for becoming. Becoming is an interesting one. It's really a sense of how we describe and define ourselves, how we become moment by moment through the energy of craving and grasping and identification. We keep creating a new becoming, a new identity, a new self-definition.

This is really, again, I find this fascinating to just watch the process when you're aware of it. Say you're doing your yogi meditation, your yogi job, doing the dishes, and suddenly there are a few more thoughts, but you're present, and then: "Oh, I'm so mindful." That's pleasant. And that leads to more thoughts. "Yes, I'm so mindful. I'm sure I'm the best yogi here. I've always been really good at whatever I did. I remember when I was in college, I was such a good student, and I went to law school, and I won these awards..." This whole solid sense of who I am, becoming this really good yogi, good lawyer, whatever. Solid.

And the next moment: "Oh, I really spaced out." Back to the dishes. "God, you're so unmindful." Unpleasant, leading to aversion. Leading to memories: "Yeah, you did really well when you started school, but did you ever finish? You dropped out. You never finished anything you started, and you probably won't finish this either. You might get to the end of the retreat, but you'll never get any further. You're just wasting your time." Another solid self-definition.

And both are believed in the moment, because unquestioned, because unseen. We take that thought to be an accurate description of reality. When we watch this and can just see it happening over and over, sometimes it's really funny if you can have that little space of not quite believing it. But it's also amazing to see. The Buddha talked about looking at impermanence, how fast these things come and go. He said the tendency is to take your body to be permanent, but the mind is changing so much quicker than the body. Just to be aware of that. And to see, through these self-definitions, how the thought leads to the feeling, leads to the emotion, and we've created a whole gestalt.

When I was on a retreat last summer for a couple of months, one day this was just so amazing to me—to really see how we're making up the world in each moment. I was sitting in my room, and the thought came up, "God, I'm really alone here." It was kind of a neutral thought. And then I went, "Yeah, I'm really alone." This sense of sadness came up, and that was unpleasant. "I'm so alone in my life. I live alone. I could die in this room, and no one would know for two days." It was unpleasant. I felt the sadness. I was on the verge of tears.

And suddenly it came to me: "Yeah, but you're making this all up." I said, "All right, let's just try changing it." "It's really great to be alone," I said. And all the emotions changed. "Yeah, it's so beautiful to have this time alone. And look at the tree outside. It's just glistening. I'm so blessed to have two months alone." And the emotions went along with it just as real as literally thirty seconds before. I thought, "Whoa. This is it, folks. This is what I'm doing moment to moment in my whole life." And it's really true that we're doing that.

So in some ways you could say, well, we might as well make up a nice dream, as long as we're going to make up a dream. But we should still know what's actually really happening. Again, from an Indian teacher: "If you become something, death awaits you. If you don't become something, there is neither birth nor death." Moment to moment, just noticing what we're becoming.

And in that clear seeing of it, there is no birth or death, because in the seeing of it, there's no longer the believing and the becoming.

Just one last way I want to mention that gives rise again to this proliferation of thought, and that is what is called in Buddhist terminology mana, or conceit. But what conceit really means is comparing: I'm better than, I'm worse than, I'm equal to—any of those. And I'm sure you've all experienced one or another of those in some rare moment. But notice just how quickly it comes up and how it leads again to such a strong sense of self-definition.

Someone walks by slowly. "They're better than me. I'm no good." The whole story unfolds. Half an hour later, you're slower than someone else. "I'm so much better than they are." Or: "We're just equal. We're just the same." This whole sense of comparing, of having to find one's place, of having to define oneself in terms of some idea—again, it totally takes us out of perceiving what's actually true.

Because what are we comparing ourselves to? There is no solid, unchanging thing to compare ourselves to. Is there some unchanging speed of walking that's the right speed, some base we can always refer back to? There's nothing solid. There's nothing to refer back to in the comparison. It's just a movement of proliferating thought away from the truth of what's happening in this moment.

In talking about how thoughts proliferate, how they define ourselves, how we get lost in that and confused, I want to again emphasize that thought is not the enemy. The way that thought can construct and communicate and build things is amazing. And some of the definitions, some of the constructs that we put on experience are really useful. It mostly works when we all agree on the same definition.

Like, we all agree that this is a meditation retreat. And we agree that I'm talking and you're listening. Now, if we didn't all have that same shared understanding—if just whoever felt like talking talked, whoever felt like listening listened—if you didn't agree it was a meditation retreat but thought maybe you could dance in here, or maybe you want to build a bonfire in the middle of the room—if we didn't all have the same kind of agreement of thoughts, it would be quite chaotic.

But the thing to be aware of is to know that it's an agreement, and just because we all seem to agree doesn't necessarily mean that it's true. In our relative relating, we all act as if we're separate, as if we're unchanging. We recognize each other, and we unconsciously reinforce our misperception in the first place. So we can use thought, we can use our constructions—and we need to—but we must see them for what they are, so they don't have to blind us.

The Buddha told a story once about a widower who had a small son living in a village. One day he was away working, and some bandits came and burned down his house along with some other houses in the village, and kidnapped his son. When the man came back, he found his house burned down, and he also found a small body that he assumed was his son. That was his understanding, his perception. Those were the thoughts and the description he built around it, and that was it—solid, he believed it.

Sometime later, his son escaped from the kidnappers, found his way home at midnight, and started banging on his father's door. The doors were locked, and the father called out, "Who's there? Who's there? Go away."

"It's me, Dad. It's your son. I found my way home."

"Go away. My son is dead. I carry his ashes with me in this little bag. I don't want you coming and trying to prey on my emotions like that. Go away."

The boy kept banging. The father said go away, wouldn't come down. Eventually the boy left, and he never saw him again.

Just because all the facts fit the interpretation we've made up, and we're sure that it's true, we still need to come back and be willing to be with the bare experience. We must be willing to be open to perceptions that don't fit what we've decided is true, or we're locked in a self-definition that might not be accurate.

The Buddha said, "Sometime, somewhere, you take something to be the truth. If you cling to it so much, when the truth comes in person and knocks at your door, you won't open it."

So our practice here—the key to coming out of clinging to our idea of truth so much—is just this key of mindfulness or wise attention: the willingness to open our attention to the bare experience of what's happening, without any preconceived ideas or notions about it.

With thought, there's an example often given for how to use wise attention. Thought is like throwing a rock. Unwise attention is like a dog—if you throw a rock and hit the dog, it gets all excited, runs all around, and goes chasing after the rock. If you throw that rock at a lion, it just sits there and stares straight at the thing that threw the rock. That's wise attention. Go back to the source. Don't just go running after the thought.

Some thought comes and we go running after it, like Jack talked about those trains the other day, and you wake up in Bali or wherever. We don't have to go running after it.

That's unwise attention. Just come back to the source of the thought, the source of the experience—from where did it arise?

A simple example in practice, one that we all experience often: there's some unpleasant sensation, or more likely a whole constellation of unpleasant sensations. Perhaps there's pressure, perhaps there's tingling, perhaps there's an ache and a kind of sleepiness. It's generally unpleasant, there's aversion, and it keeps cycling over and over. That's the bare experience—it's unpleasant, and aversion happens.

But by the time we talk to somebody, this has proliferated into a whole series of interpretations and explanations: "Well, this is happening because it's a kind of release," or "I'm building up too much energy, and if I could just find some way to shift the energy and release this and let it go and bring in more energy and sit in the right way, if I could bring up my faith, if I could find the right effort..." And then it goes into a whole complicated story of what to do and what this means and what kind of a yogi I am.

Can we just bring the attention with wise attention back to the experience? We say, "Okay, what's happening?" Well, there's pressure and there's tingling and there's unpleasantness. Okay, that's what's happening. All the rest is interpretation and aversion and confusion and fear and desire and remembering how good it was last retreat and remembering what we heard our friends say and what we've read and what the teachers have said and what it should be like and what we've made up about what it should be like.

What's happening? That's all that matters. That's all that there is. So our practice with wise attention is simply quit following the rock and come back to the source.

The thing is, we can't just do that once. It's an ongoing willingness to meet the bare experience in the moment, over and over.

Once a friend had me do "drawing on the right side of the brain," where you sit down and the premise is that we don't so much need to learn how to draw as we need to learn how to see. So he sat me down and said, "Okay, this is the task—you've got to draw me."

It was really fascinating because immediately I was assaulted by all my self-definitions and memories from back in the third grade when the teacher told me I couldn't draw, and I always did poorly in art, and I can't draw now. It was so strong that I literally couldn't move through that and actually begin to draw. It was really fascinating how solid that self-definition was. I was looking at him and saying, "Draw you? That's really complicated. Drawing a person? I can't do that." Real bondage.

And then I kind of said, "Okay, just sit down and look." And to really look at an eye—not my concept of what an eye was and what it meant to draw an eye, but just really see what was there. Just little flecks of form and color and shape, and then starting to draw that. It was fascinating to cut through all that idea about myself and what it meant to draw and what he was and what I was, and just be with the bare experience. I could actually sort of draw the eye and draw him.

But it also took a willingness moment after moment to keep coming back to the bare experience. Because as soon as I would space out a little, in would come rushing all the thoughts and all the self-definition. "You can't draw. What are you doing? Who are you kidding?" Oh, what am I seeing? Little flecks of gold, little flecks of brown. It was a very interesting experience.

So with wise attention, we see the power of thoughts and learn that we can use thought. They're our friends. We like them. They'll always be with us. But we don't have to be confused by them. We don't have to be afraid of them. We can use them but not get lost in thought—to understand thought for what it is, and to direct our attention back to the source, the source of the thought in this moment, the source of who and what we truly are and always are.

The more we can do that, in a moment of coming back to the source of experience, that's a moment where this blindness is not coloring our perception, where greed and confusion and anger are not coloring our perception. Just being with pressure, just being with sadness—this can be the opening to really touching the source of all that we are, to really touching the possibility of true peace. Peace that is not just the absence of thoughts, but the peace that comes from really knowing the truth of who we are.

Our life seems so complicated, so complex, when we don't see a thought as a thought. But in reality, it's so simple it's awesome. It's so simple we can't believe it.

This is my favorite stanza from the Buddha. Really, just let this sink in. Just kind of feel it:

In the seen, there is only the seen. In the heard, there is only the heard. In the smelled, there is only the smelled. In the tasted, there is only the tasted.

In the cognized, there's only the cognized. In the sensed and what is felt, there's only what is felt. That is all. That is all. Everything else is interpretation.

Can we live that simply?

I'll close with one stanza from the Tao Te Ching. I think James read it before, but I really like it:

Empty your mind of thoughts. Let your heart be at peace. Watch the turmoil of beings, but contemplate their return. Each separate being in the universe returns to the common source. Returning to the source is serenity. If you don't realize the source, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. When you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kindhearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king. Immersed in the wonder of the Tao, you can deal with whatever life brings you. And when death comes, you are ready.

Let's sit for a couple of minutes.

May all beings everywhere live in the peace of their true nature.

CHAPTER 245

Nature of Thought

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines one of meditation's most universal challenges: our relationship with thought. Opening with the powerful verses from the Dhammapada—"We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world"—she explores how much of our confusion stems not from thoughts themselves, but from misunderstanding their nature and giving them power they don't inherently possess.
> Wilson explains how the process of papañca (mental proliferation) works, showing how a single perception can rapidly expand into elaborate stories, self-definitions, and emotional reactions. She traces this back to the three "inverted perceptions": taking what is impermanent as permanent, seeking lasting happiness in what is inherently unsatisfactory, and perceiving a solid self where none exists. Through vivid personal examples—from mistaking sounds for machine gun fire to constructing elaborate narratives about Marine bases from a simple boom—she demonstrates how quickly bare experience transforms into believed reality.
> The talk emphasizes that true peace cannot depend on the absence of thought. Using the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya—"In the seen there is only the seen, in the heard only the heard"—Wilson points toward the simplicity of wise attention: returning to bare experience rather than chasing the content of thoughts. She invites practitioners to notice how self-definitions arise and pass, how wanting and aversion fuel proliferation, and how mindfulness serves as a magnifying glass revealing the constructed nature of our seemingly solid world.

This is one of my favorite topics because it so universally concerns all of us: the nature of thought. I find this particular aspect of life fascinating.

I want to start by reading the first two verses of the Dhammapada, which is one of the books of the sayings of the Buddha, about just how powerful thought can be—in case you didn't already recognize that.

We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with an impure mind and trouble will follow you as the wheel follows the ox that draws the cart. We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you as your shadow, unshakable.

Now, if you think that the Buddha is speaking not in hyperbole but actually just stating what is so—that we are what we think, and all that we are arises with our thoughts—that's an extremely radical statement. What I want to talk about today is really how true that is, and how much of our confusion and suffering comes not from the thoughts themselves, but from our not understanding the nature of thought itself. From taking thought to be something other than it is, something much greater. By giving it a power it doesn't need to have through our not understanding it.

Thought is obviously really important to us. It's an amazing tool, a powerful ally in the world. Just that we can sit here and communicate—that I can move my mouth and my vocal cords and make noises, and it means something to you, hopefully. Or if someone were up here speaking in Swahili, the same process would occur, but we don't have the same agreement as to what the thoughts mean, so it doesn't make any sense. Thought is really useful, incredibly important.

But how much of our life, or how much of our practice, can end up feeling like it's a struggle against thoughts? How often do you find yourself—and maybe you don't, but I know I often do, and it certainly comes up in talking with people—slipping into: if I could just get rid of thoughts, if I could just stop thinking, then practice could really happen. Then maybe I could know my true nature. If only thoughts would go away. And it gets into such a struggle.

But if we look at just thought itself, when we talk about thought as another phenomenon appearing in the vast space of awareness—just like a sound, just like a sensation—what is a thought? It just comes and goes. "It's evening." "The rug is pink." "My back hurts." "I'm a really bad meditator." Can that one just come and go too? When it doesn't, when we stop seeing it as just thought arising in space, that's when all the seeming trouble starts.

Basically, through misunderstanding, through misperceiving the simple nature of thoughts, we're spending the greater part of our lives creating an incredibly complex world of dream and illusion, living in it, fighting against it, and suffering because of it—through not knowing its true nature.

Remember the quotation from Kalu Rinpoche that Howie used, and I think Jack also used it: "We live in illusion and the appearance of things. You are a reality. There is a reality. You are that reality." Well, the illusion and the appearance of things is largely created through our misunderstanding, our misperception of thought, and our sometimes rapid reactions to it.

I think I mentioned sometime in this retreat how surprised Asian teachers often are by how much we think. When you go into an interview sometimes with an Asian teacher—with Sayadaw U Pandita, for example—you can just sense this feeling of bewilderment that we can't come in and just say a simple thing like, "I experienced pressure arising and noticed it getting stronger." It turns into this whole story: "There's this pressure in my left knee, and it has something to do with the way I sit, and I remember an accident I had in my childhood, and perhaps..." And we go on. It's like this. Pressure can't just experience pressure. There's just this real bewilderment about what a story we make up. And we really believe it. We will often fight to the death anyone who challenges us to see it as a story. "This is true!"

Something we often suggest, just as an experiment, is to get a feeling for the ephemeral nature of thought. It comes, it goes. Like Joseph likes to say, it's just a bubble. Where did it come from? Where did it go? When it goes, notice that space between thoughts that it comes out of. So sometimes we'll suggest: in a sitting, try imagining that every thought that arises comes from the person behind you. Try it in your next sitting. It really gives a good sense that the trouble isn't with the thought. I'm serious—try it.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once, in talking about thoughts, that when we look closely we see that our mind is seething with thoughts. And it's true—the more we look, the more seething it seems to be. He goes on to say, and this is where we often stop looking: "A becalmed mind is not a peaceful mind. This is a peace that's very brittle. What you're calling peace is only an absence of disturbance." Maybe we'll settle for absence of disturbance sometimes, but it doesn't really go very far. True peace cannot be disturbed.

If true peace only meant an absence of thought, then does that mean that the whole rest of our life, when thoughts are arising, peace is impossible? Peace is inaccessible? That's unacceptable to me. Truth cannot be dependent on the absence or presence of anything, and that includes thought.

So a lot of our challenge, I feel, is to begin to understand a thought as a thought, and also how it is that we get so carried away in thought—that it builds up such a world of illusion and confusion that we take to be so real, so real that we come to equate the presence of thought with suffering.

One place where our confusion, our misunderstanding of thought, sort of begins—where thought kind of begins in the process—is on the basic level of perception. Perception, meaning in this context the simple quality of recognition of something. In the Buddhist psychology, perception arises in every moment whenever there's a sense contact. Perception is this quality of recognition, of discernment as such. It involves memory. So for example, I know seeing, and I can recognize this as a rug, or as pink. We see each other and we perceive a person; we perceive a male or a female; we perceive someone that we know. This is all perception. I perceive this as a hand.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. On this bare level of perception, it's really fascinating. This is, I believe, why the emphasis in our mindfulness practice is so much on simple, direct experience. Why one of the definitions of mindfulness is knowing what's arising in a moment accurately. Because so often we are reacting from a mistaken perception.

I'll give you an example. What is a mistaken perception, and how do they arise? Basically, it's recognizing incorrectly. If I were to say this rug is green, that would be a mistaken perception. Someone who's colorblind would have what they thought was the correct perception of a green rug, but in our common agreement, that perception is incorrect.

So in our ongoing moment-to-moment process of perceiving different experience, the three roots of confusion, the three roots of suffering that we were talking about this morning—the arising in the mind of blindness or ignorance, the arising of greed and wanting, or the arising of what's called hatred but is really aversion, pushing away—when in the moment of perception one of those is arising, it tends to distort our recognition. We perceive wrongly, and we don't know it.

Someone last year told me that she was walking up to the preceptory here in a really foul mood, having had a really dismal day. Walking into it, she looked at the sign that said "preceptory" and actually read "purgatory." That's a mistaken perception, fueled in that moment by aversion. But that one was easily corrected—she could go back and see that it said preceptory. Yet this is happening to us all the time, and we don't know it. We think what we're seeing is true. We're not noticing the mistaken perception, and that leads to our opinions, our conclusions, our reactions. Before we know it, we're in a whole gestalt of activity that is so far away from what's actually happening.

That's why mindfulness is so insistent: come back to the bare experience, the bare perception, and see what's so. We get so far away in no time. You can all think of, if you really consider it, hundreds of examples in any day. This is what we're doing, creating this dream over and over.

An example that comes to my mind is from when I was in Vancouver, staying in a friend's apartment. It was at night, and my friend was in another friend's apartment, so I was there alone, sort of falling asleep around ten or eleven o'clock. In that state when you've just fallen asleep, some loud noise woke me up—that moment when you don't have your usual storyline going yet. I just heard these sounds. They were like booming sounds. They sounded like shelling or something, and in fact, my mind immediately turned it into machine gun fire.

I was lying there, and it kept happening. Machine gun fire. That was the perception, the recognition, and it got locked in really quickly so that there wasn't a freshness of just being with the bare sound. From machine gun fire, the mind went into a whole story: "Well, that's impossible on the streets of Vancouver, there's no reason... Well, it could happen in Beirut. What makes you think if it happens in Beirut it couldn't happen in Vancouver?" I started getting images of guys in fatigues running door-to-door, shooting machine guns at each other. I was really getting out there. I leapt out of bed.

I turned on the radio to see if there was some kind of war going on in Vancouver. There was of course nothing on the radio. I looked out the window; the streets were just dead empty. And it was really escalating and quite real. If I had had any other perception that could have strengthened my belief that there was some kind of war going on in the streets of Vancouver, I would have believed it. Fortunately for me, absolutely no following perception strengthened that. I could see people watching TV in the apartments across the street, and I thought, "Well, I guess there's not a war." I never did find out what was going on. But this is how far and how fast we can get.

Wanting in the mind, or in this case fear in the mind, ignorance in the mind—it completely distorts our perception of what is happening. Like Jack said the other night, the Indian saying: when a pickpocket meets a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets. Wanting distorts perception. So does aversion. So does fear. So does blindness. We don't know what's happening. This is going on, I must say, for a lot of us in the greater part of our moment-to-moment experience. When we're not looking, when we're not investigating, we're taking stuff for granted, acting on it, responding to it, and wondering why our lives can feel so confused, why when we talk to someone else our experiences don't seem to match exactly.

The real root cause of our basic misperception is this quality of blindness that we were speaking about this morning—usually translated as ignorance, but I like blindness better. It also arises moment to moment in our experience. It's not monolithic, here since beginningless time while we're chipping away at it, a little chip, a little chip, a little chip. It really arises moment to moment when the conditions are there, and when the conditions are not there, it also passes away.

What's interesting about ignorance is that we can learn to recognize its presence in a moment of our experience in the same way that we can recognize aversion, or recognize wanting, or recognize sleepiness. It's very helpful, I think, to begin to recognize this quality of blindness. Because then we often know—we can go to the next step and know—well, it's a good bet I might not be completely perceiving the situation accurately. And just give it a little space.

When ignorance is present, it clouds discernment, and that's one of the ways it feels—this experience of cloudiness, of dullness. You're not going to have that really pristine clarity of mindfulness when ignorance is present, because its function is that it clouds things. The way I think of it when I'm trying to feel it, really to get a sense of what it's like experientially, is like sometimes when I'm waking up in the morning. I've slept kind of late, or I've slept too warm, and there's this sense of knowing it's time to wake up and trying to wake up. In the sleep, you're trying to wake up but can't quite get there. When that happens to me, everything seems upside down, and I can't quite tell what's going on. There's this sense of knowing something's off, but not being able to be any clearer about it. I don't know if that makes sense, but that's how blindness feels to me—this kind of cloud of confusion and dullness.

When it's present, it gives rise, as I've said, to misperception. And the basic misperception is that of wrong view, that of not knowing what is so. The basic wrong view that most of us operate under is the wrong view of who and what we truly are.

Let me give a more simple example of how ignorance gives rise to misperception and wrong view, and acting out of that misperception. This is the classic example given in a lot of the Buddhist texts: walking in the forest, like in Thailand where there are lots of snakes, lots of poisonous snakes—cobras and such. It's dusk, and you can't see clearly. That's the confusion mode, the blindness mode, that time of dusk when you can sort of see and you think you can see better than you really can.

Walking through the woods, you come upon a snake coiled in the path. It's really sudden and really scary. It gives rise to a lot of fear—the sense of "What am I doing out at night without a flashlight?" which in Thailand is literally risking your life, because if you step on a poisonous snake and you don't know what it is, you can really die. Seeing a snake can give rise to a lot of fear, which then gives rise to further thoughts about the unsafety of the forest, or one's own foolishness for coming out without a torch, and a sense of "Just let me get out of here, I'm never going back"—a whole proliferation of story around that.

Then you go back in the daytime and see that that coiled snake was just a rope that somebody had left lying there. It's a whole different story. When the perception is accurate—oh well, there's nothing to be afraid of, it's just a rope—all the fear and all the personal reactions and all the way that we responded changes completely.

So you can see from that how our fears and assumptions, our conclusions about what is true, arise so quickly from our basic perception. And when that perception is incorrect, all the basic assumptions and conclusions that we're acting on, that we're basing our understanding of life on, are not accurate.

This is going on all the time in our basic perception of who we are, perceiving ourselves as this mind, this body. Ongoing basic misperception that gives rise to so much confusion, to wanting, to aversion, to separation—deep basic misperception. Out of the constant arising and passing of sense data, as you sit, as you walk, what's the experience? It's one sense perception after another: hearing, seeing, sensation in the body, another sensation, thinking, an emotion, hearing, seeing, smelling, touching, tasting, thinking. It's just the same six sense perceptions over and over and over—maybe different specific sense perceptions, but the same six senses.

Out of this basic sense data coming and going, coming and going, we organize it through our misperception, through our thoughts about it, our assumptions and conclusions about the sense data. We create a whole inaccurate idea—and maybe not even a conscious idea—of who and what we are, and then we suffer from it.

They talk about three inverted perceptions, or three upside-down perceptions, that are the ongoing support for our mistaken idea of who we are. We've spoken of these a lot; you'll recognize them. The first one is that we take what is impermanent and constantly changing to be unchanging. We don't see the change. That's really fairly obvious.

As I just said, this constant flow of changing sensations—we take it to be one solid train of thought, for example, or one solid body sitting here. And when we really look, it's just sensation after sensation arising. There's nothing solid there. But we take it to be solid and unchanging.

The second upside-down perception follows on this first one. Once we think there's something unchanging here, we are looking for happiness where it can't be found. In other words, what is changing and unsatisfactory, we're looking there for lasting peace, for lasting happiness, and we don't see that it can't be found here. This is what keeps us looking in the wrong direction for peace, for truth, for beauty.

And of course, both of these lead to the third upside-down perception, which is thinking or seeing or feeling that there's a solid self here—a solid, unchanging, everlasting self—when in fact there isn't one. This is the place where, as much as we might want to believe that there's not a solid self, most everything in our unquestioned experience leads us to continue to believe and continue to act from the strong conviction that there is a solid self.

It's like when Howie was speaking the other night, having us turn our attention into questioning it. It's exactly this—it's such an unquestioned assumption that we don't even know we're making the assumption. We don't think to even question it, never mind bringing our attention back to the basic perception that gave rise to that assumption in the first place.

Some misperceptions are easy to see through. For instance, that one of "percolatory"—just come and look at the sign and it's really clear. Once you've seen through a confused perception like that, it's so obvious you can never imagine how you didn't see it before, and you don't usually make the same mistake again. Unfortunately, others aren't quite so simple and easy to see through.

Or it's more that so much is happening so fast. For instance, the sense that there is no solid mind and body here—it seems solid. It seems like I'm the same mind and body, pretty much, that I was yesterday. When I look in the mirror I recognize myself. And if I look at a picture of me when I was two, I sure don't look the same, but I feel like I've not changed at all—I'm the same person that I was then. Oh, that's so obviously ridiculous if you look at the facts.

It's sort of like everything's happening so fast in the mind and the body, this flow of sense experience. I can't even speak as fast as it's happening. Hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, cognizing. Hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, cognizing. According to the Buddha—and translated into modern language—each perception can happen in one thought moment, and there are seventeen trillion thought moments in the blink of an eye. It's really fast. Is it no wonder we don't see through it?

I think it's sort of like recently someone showed me a color photograph—just of whatever—and had me look at it through a magnifying glass. I had never seen this before, but it just resolves into four different colors of dots. That's all it is, just all these little dots put together. And when we look at it without the magnifying glass, it's this solid photograph of a landscape or a person. It's just exactly the same.

Mindfulness is really our magnifying glass here. When we turn it on to our actual experience, moment to moment to moment, when we really examine—not even our assumptions—but coming back to the bare experience moment to moment, we start to see the sense of solidity break up. Or more what it is, is that we start to see what's really happening, free of our concepts and interpretations about it. If we really paid attention, we would see that everything was changing all the time. It's just that we get so lost in our interpretations. We take what we think is true so for granted that we don't even question, we don't even inquire.

I've read this before, but it's so appropriate—Nisargadatta: "We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination." And we're just sitting here doing that all the time. Excess of imagination and lack of attention.

And when, in the process of simply being, without all the extra interpretation, without believing all the interpretation—just being, hearing, or spaciousness, sensation, thought, it doesn't matter what phenomenon is appearing—we're not identifying with it, simply being. It's so obvious when there's a moment of no ignorance. It's so obvious that we're not this thought, that this thought is not an accurate reflection of who I am, that I'm not this sensation or this sound, that everything's coming and going and I'm not any of it. What is true is just so painfully obvious, so apparent, and we think there's nothing to do. It's so simple. It just is. How could I ever have missed this?

Just like with seeing the signs as "percolatory." Only it seems this particular clarity of perception—or rather, the misperception of who we are—arises again so easily because things are happening, as I said, so quickly. Somehow we drift out of that clarity of seeing, another sense experience arises, another perception arises, and we don't see it clearly and we're off again on a whole other creation. What had been so clear that we can't imagine ever not living in that space becomes, in that moment, as if it's just a memory.

Or sometimes, in the space of just spaciousness, of clarity, of no story being constructed, it's so simple—and sometimes fear comes up. "Well, what about if I'm not really here? How am I going to go to work after the retreat if I'm not really here?" How many times does that start? "If there's no self, then..."—and you can add whatever particular thing we think we won't be able to do.

Nothing changes. What can change? It's not here in the first place, so we're not losing anything. The only thing that changes is our relationship to experience. But otherwise, nothing changes. The fear is again coming from a misperception, from a confused notion.

How we understand our experience informs all of our responses to it, all the ways that we behave. A very simple example—it's not from seeing no-self, but it's just an example of how we interpret experience and how that inspires how we behave. A yogi told me on a retreat last summer that he was really noticing this. He would get certain sensations, just kind of prickly little sensations all over, like a fly landing all over him—which I'm sure many of you have had that experience here. And when in his mind he knew it was a fly, there was a lot of aversion, a lot of restlessness. It was very difficult to deal with. But then he started noticing that in certain—to him, what he defined as—very concentrated states, he would get exactly the same experience of these little pricklings all over that felt exactly like a fly walking on him. So if he thought it was from concentration, well, it was fine. He really liked it. It was no problem at all to deal with.

If he thought it was fly feet walking all over him, a lot of aversion arose. The experience itself, the actual sense experience, is just what it is. It's no problem. It's pleasant or it's unpleasant, no matter. The way that we interpret it is what creates the struggle or the sense of ease in being with it.

One of the ways that confusion, that blindness, works to continue us in our misperception—once we've made an original misperception of who we are—is that we use the thoughts that arise quite naturally to describe and define our experience. For instance, "the flies walking all over me." We take that experience, that definition, to be accurate. And then, without continuing to examine, we think, "Well, now I know what's so." With that certainty, our future perceptions become skewed, so that very often we don't even acknowledge or recognize perceptions that don't fit with the story we've made up. We've rigged it so that we're never going to see anything other than what we think to be so.

This is one of the things we do with impermanence. We all know it intellectually. We all nod. But the way that we live our lives is somehow never thinking we'll get old, being really shocked when something goes wrong with our body, being really shocked at the thought of death, being really shocked when a new pain comes up. "What's this pain doing here? I was feeling so good!" We don't really let it in.

A couple of examples, even on a more basic level, of how we construct a definition and then disallow any information that would challenge it. It happens often in meditation where people will get some idea of good concentration. Good meditation means when a particular phenomenon arises, the attention can really land on it, can focus on it and stay with it for a long time. "I should be able to stay with the breath for half an hour. When pain arises, just be able to stay with that pain and really explore it. Stay with that emotion and really explore it." That's the idea, the perception that gets locked in.

People often will come and say, "Well, you know, concentration is no good. As soon as I notice the pain, I just can't stay with it—it goes away. I notice the emotion; it dissolves, it goes away. I just can't hold on to it. The concentration is no good."

Let go of this self-definition and look at what's actually happening. Things are changing really quickly. That's how it is. No one can hold on to things when they're really changing. But instead of just seeing what we see, we twist it to fit our self-definition, and then we suffer.

Or consider how often we make up a particular definition of ourselves for that day, or that year, or this lifetime. "I'm such an aversive person." "I'm such a kind person." "I can't do this meditation; I never could and I never will be able to." "I'm an incredibly great yogi." "I'm a mother." Whatever our particular self-definition is.

And then notice how all the different thoughts that arise from all our different perceptions—how many there are that have absolutely nothing to do with that self-definition. "I'm such an angry person." Has every moment of your day been angry? How about all the moments of peace, or just enjoying the lunch, or just having a sense of pleasure looking at the owls, or a sense of sleepiness, or just calmness, or boredom, or fear? Many, many, many experiences. And out of that, we take the ones that fit our perception and don't pay much attention to the others if they don't bolster our idea.

Often, especially, we tend to glom onto the negative self-definitions. "I'm no good at this." And if something else arises—like half an hour of real joy and gratitude and happiness—we say, "Yeah, that's grace." But there's a twist to it. "That's grace. It fell from the sky. It has nothing to do with me, and it'll pass. But the real core of who I am is anger. The real core of who I am is this self-judgmental, negative person."

Somewhere, we don't give equal credence to all our perceptions. And look at that one anyway—the one about the core, "This core of who I am is anger." Like everything else is arising and passing, but somewhere in a core of nothing solid anywhere, there's a little rock of anger that's sitting, that's solid, that's who we are. Look at what we're thinking. Look at how we create this sense of confusion.

So even here, even with the sense of "I'm such an angry person," it's not the thoughts themselves that are the problem. That thought could arise and pass with as much of a bubble as "Today is Tuesday." It's allowing the thoughts to define reality. It's believing that that thought is an accurate description of who we are, and really giving it that power through aversion, through clinging, through identification.

Self-judgment, as an example, is so acutely painful mostly because we believe it—or we don't even notice it. We take that string of self-judgment to accurately define who we are, and then do our best to live up to it. Or else we fight it and hate it and say, "It's not who I am"—and that's the same thing. We're really believing it.

This misunderstanding—that it's the thoughts themselves, and not seeing where this power comes from, where this confusion comes from of believing them—this is what gives thought such amazing power. And this is where we can get so confused.

And one way to see our challenges: can we let go of self-definition altogether? Notice how as we go through the day there can be such an ongoing stream of talking to ourselves, describing our experience, defining who we are. Can we just let that be a stream of thoughts without holding on to it, without believing that is our self-definition, without using it to define the world? Can we be with the bare experience just as it is, without getting so engrossed in the content of the thoughts?

That's our challenge, and that's the function of mindfulness. That's what we're learning how to do—simply coming back to bare experience. And as we all know, it's not a simple process. It's very subtle how quickly we get lost in the thoughts, how quickly we're believing what they say without recognizing that. But this willingness to come back to the bare experience without expectation, without a preconceived notion of what it means, just with an openness to explore, an openness to be present—this is what allows us the possibility to really know who and what we are. To really touch the truth, the spaciousness of what we are, unencumbered by thought. Thoughts not in the way, whether they're present or not present.

When we can have a moment of just being with the bare perception of hearing, of sensation, just peacefully there—that's when you can begin to notice, and this is what gets really fascinating to me, just how quickly the whole show can spring up out of nowhere. This is really what makes thought so powerful and why it's so easy to get lost in it. In that instant, that quick, we can go from bare perception to a whole world.

You can watch it in yourself. I watched it this morning in the 8:15 sitting. Do you remember there were a couple of loud booms? I didn't know what they were. I was very present, there was this boom in hearing, and then a moment of not-mindfulness, and within no time at all my mind had constructed an incredibly elaborate story of what those booms were. Moving from "an earthquake"—no, it couldn't be an earthquake from how it is other times, when the booms are different—to the marine base. Must be coming from the marine base, although it's different from last week when they were shelling. And from that into a whole construction of who I am in relationship to the Marines, what my opinion is of people who become Marines, and of Marines who are shelling in such an environmentally sensitive area as this desert. Within no time, from a bare experience of hearing—no problem—there was a really solid little reality created: me in all my self-righteousness versus the Marines who are jerks. In the blink of an eye, we're really solid and we really believe it.

This process of all this flow of thoughts is called papañca, which is a word that I love. Papañca is usually translated as proliferation, diversity. And it's just this: from one perception, an endless flow of associations and memories and thoughts and self-definition. It's how we get so far away from what is true when we don't see it as a process.

So I just want to talk briefly about what fuels this papañca, this proliferation. What energy gives it the strength that we get so lost in it, that it carries us so far?

Papañca is fueled by wrong view, which I spoke of—the sense of a separate "I." This is really, I think, the bottom line for most of our confusion. When I'm in that space—me and the Marines, "I"—there's a sense of separate self, and this is what gives rise to wanting, what gives rise to aversion. The sense of separation, the sense of discontent. You can see how all of that gives rise to more thought about how to fix it.

Papañca is also fueled by wanting, by craving. This is also pretty obvious, and you can explore it in your own practice—in a sitting, in a walking—over and over and over. Not by hating it, just by watching how there can be a moment of wanting that's not really experienced clearly as wanting. See how it fuels a whole show of thoughts and self-definition, leading to proliferation, even into action.

For example, someone told me about seeing an article of clothing on another yogi that she really liked. Wanting arises, and it gives rise to thoughts: I wonder where they got it, I wonder where I can get it. It can give rise to whole sittings of shopping sprees and comparing stores. It can give rise to writing notes to the other yogi and scheming of ways to find out, how to meet at the end of the retreat. It can actually give rise to the action of hopefully, when the retreat's over, getting in the car and going to the store to buy whatever this thing is.

This is the papañca, the proliferation of thought and more wanting leading to action, fueled by this energy of wanting. And not seeing the wanting, it just keeps going. As you know, we could just come back to the bare experience of wanting. Say, "wanting, wanting."

I remember one retreat I somehow got it in my head that I wanted pink shoes. And this was a two-month retreat. I spent so much time on that retreat scheming about these shoes and what they would go with and where I'd go get them. And then, you know, alternate times hating myself for being so stupid. And then it's over, you go to the store—I remember I went shopping and I looked—I don't want pink shoes. What's that all about? It's just wanting proliferating itself. There's nobody there.

We think these thoughts are a reflection of reality, though, and that's what's scary. Because they might or they might not be, but we really think they're true. On a large scale, I mean, it's funny when we're talking about pink shoes. But when we look at the world, this craving for whatever really proliferates—from wanting clothing, to wanting food, to wanting land, to wanting other people not to be on your land. It ends in a situation like with the Serbs and the Croats today. It's really scary to see how far the proliferation gets from the basic perception, from the wanting, and how solidly entrenched the views become, and how lost we get in that, and how far we'll go to get what we want.

Craving for becoming is another really powerful fuel for this energy of papañca, this energy of proliferation. Becoming, basically, is how we describe and define ourselves, moment to moment. Each time there's an identification with a particular experience, a particular thought, in that moment, that's what we become. There's a grasping, a becoming, and again, a whole little self-definition leading to suffering. Watch the process—it's fascinating. And see how quickly what we become can change and how much we believe each one.

It can come up a lot just in, say, walking meditation. Walking very slowly and mindfully, someone walks past more quickly—"I'm such a good yogi." In that moment we really identify, and it leads to more thoughts, more proliferation. "I'm such a good yogi. If I keep on doing this, maybe I'll go to Dharamsala and study with the Dalai Lama. Maybe I'll go and live in a cave there for a few years and practice tummo yoga and come back and teach at Harvard. Or maybe I'll become a great guru..." And we give Dharma talks in our heads, and it goes on and on and on.

And we all do this. It's really solid. This is who I am.

Two minutes later – two seconds later – someone walks by that you've got in your mind pegged as the best yogi here. You just have to see them walk by. "Oh gosh, I could never do it the way they're doing it. If I had to walk that slowly, I might as well just give it up right now." And it goes on to our memories of all our failures in life, and this is just going to be another failure, and what's the point? It goes back to childhood and kindergarten and the fights we got into. "My older sister was always better than me anyway – she would have been able to do this. I'll just go off and wash dishes somewhere for the rest of my life. That's all I could do anyway." And that's really solid.

All we have to do is pay attention. It sounds so ridiculous, right? Unfortunately, on some level, this papañca, this craving for becoming, takes over. And without coming back to the bare experience, we're just off on the train. We really believe it.

What's the bare experience here? It was just seeing. Seeing, and a pleasant feeling arising. Seeing, and an unpleasant feeling arising. And then thoughts, memories, associations – but that's all they are: thoughts, memories, associations. It's not who you are.

The Buddha said once that if we're going to identify with either the mind or the body, it would be better for us to identify with the body, because the mind changes so much more quickly. But usually we reverse it. It's a little easier to see we're not the body.

So this is how we're making up the dream. We're making up reality, moment to moment, over and over. And instead of really turning around and inquiring – where's this coming from? What's the source of this? – we're simply believing each reality as it arises.

Once, a couple of years ago, I was on retreat. The sense that it's really true that thoughts are making up our reality – it's not just a nice metaphor; it's actually the case – became very clear. I was sitting in my room way back at the end of a corridor, and the thought came up: "I'm so alone here. I'm so lonely." In that particular tone.

Immediately following came this sense of sadness. The emotion was really present. And I was really quite mindful, so I was noting all of this – the emotion, the sense of "I live alone, I've been alone for so long, on this retreat in these back rooms here." You know, people could die and you wouldn't notice for three days until it started to stink or something. And it just went on and on, this deep grief.

But it was pretty mindful, and just the thought occurred: "Well, I'm making it all up. Let's just flip the story." So quite consciously I said, "You know, it's so wonderful to have this time to be alone." That was all.

Immediately there came up emotions of – wow – what gratitude to have two months to spend alone. "It's so beautiful here." I noticed the beauty of the summer and the trees outside. There was a real joy, a real peace.

This is really amazing, because it's not just that I picked one thought. The thought led to a whole train of associations and emotions and identification, and it really felt solid. "This is me." It's as solid as it gets. Really fascinating.

That's when I really got it: we are making it all up. We are making it all up.

Sometimes we have the choice, and if we know we're making it up, sometimes we can make up a more pleasant one. There's nothing wrong with that. Someone told me once – I think it was Roger Walsh – that they read somewhere from A Course in Miracles that actually, to awaken to truth, in a way it's easier to awaken from a pleasant dream than from an unpleasant dream. So that's kind of nice. We have the choice. But most important is knowing that this is a dream, and knowing how it's being created, and being willing to come back and be with just what is.

And the key to being with just what is, is again this process of mindfulness, of wise attention.

So just quickly, to describe wise attention in working with the process of thoughts: it's being able to bring our attention to the source of the thought rather than running around in the content. A common example given is to think of a thought as if throwing a rock. The thought's kind of flying like the rock. Unwise attention is like a dog that gets hit by the rock and gets really upset and goes running around after the rock – following the thought, lost in it and fighting it. Wise attention is like a lion. If you throw a rock and hit a lion, it just ignores the rock and stares straight back at the thrower of the rock, at the source of the rock. It just cuts through and goes right back to the source.

That's wise attention. That's what we're cultivating here. And wise attention, in coming back to the source of the perception, the source of the thought, allows us to see, to know much more deeply that we are not thoughts – and much more than that.

So when you're in a constellation of a really difficult experience – pain in the body and tension in the mind and stories about it – I remember one story a teacher told where a man came in and said, "I have this tension in my jaw, and it's so painful, and it just shows me what a tense person I am, and how I've lived my whole life in a really rigid way, and how that's affected my family, and how I can never really be a kind person."

And so the teacher said, "Oh, you mean there's tension in your jaw?"

He said, "Yeah, and I'm such a rigid person, and I'm so uptight..." This went on for like three or four times.

Where is the tension when we come back? There's tension. It's unpleasant. That's all. Can we just deal with that? And notice the interpretations and the associations – they can come, they can go. It's all extra.

Forget the story.

Come back to what's really happening.

And when we're willing and able to remember, to bring wise attention, to be with what's really happening, it's so simple that it's awesome. The truth of who we are, the truth of our life is so simple we can't believe it. Because it's got nothing to do with thought, being or not being. It's so simple.

My favorite stanza from the Buddha—he's describing this to a man, and he told this man just this one stanza. Immediately after, the man was killed by a wild cow, but the Buddha said that's okay, this stanza was enough. He got it.

And so it's this: In the seen, there is only the seen. In the heard, there is only the heard. In the smelled, there is only the smelled. In the tasted, there is only the tasted. In what is felt and what is sensed, there is only that sensing. In what is cognized or felt with the mind, there is only that cognizance, nothing else.

That is all.

And that was the stanza of the Buddha. That is all.

Can we be that simple? Can you deal with pressure, and that is all? No problem, no me, no suffering.

Let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 246

Balancing The Five Spiritual Faculties

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson presents the five spiritual faculties (indriya) as essential qualities that develop through meditation practice: faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Rather than viewing difficulties in practice as personal failures, she reframes them as imbalances among these five mental qualities—an impersonal understanding that makes investigation both easier and more interesting.

Wilson distinguishes between "bright faith"—the initial inspiration that brings us to practice—and "verified faith" that develops through direct experience. She explores faith as radical acceptance and trust in the present moment, whatever it contains. The discussion of energy emphasizes finding balance between the extremes of giving up and grim, forceful determination, suggesting that balanced effort springs from a joyful, interested heart rather than harsh self-discipline.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with these faculties: when energy exceeds concentration, simplify your objects of attention; when concentration dominates, add precision or touch points to enliven practice. Wilson emphasizes that mindfulness serves as the balancing factor for all five qualities. Drawing from Thich Nhat Hanh's teachings on cultivating "seeds of joy" during difficult periods, she validates skillful backing off as sometimes the most powerful way to allow the practice to continue. The teaching concludes with the understanding that these qualities strengthen not just in retreat but throughout our lives, becoming increasingly accessible as we grow more familiar with recognizing and balancing them.

The art of this meditation practice that we're doing together here is really one of balancing. There are all kinds of different balances we could talk about, and we will as the retreat goes on. What I want to talk about tonight is five specific qualities of energy—a different five from the five hindrances. These ones are hopefully more on the positive side, if you want to make such a distinction.

These are five qualities of mind, mental states really, that we all experience on an ongoing basis anyway, but that develop strongly as our practice grows and continues. As we continue to practice, we can learn to recognize each of these mental states and learn how to bring them into balance.

It's been an incredibly useful tool for me in my own practice to learn that what I think is the practice going wrong—in other words, it's not the way I like it in this moment, so definitely it's not working—to start to see that one way of looking at that is not that I'm bad, I'm wrong, I'm useless, but that these five energies are out of balance. It's not personal. And it makes it much easier, and actually interesting, to investigate: How can I bring these together? What's low? What's out of balance? How to bring it back into balance?

I think it was Trungpa Rinpoche who said once that the way we come to balance is by falling out of balance. That's how we notice it and come back to balance. So it's not such a big tragedy when things get a little out of balance.

These five mental states, these five qualities, are faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. I'd like to speak in an introductory way about each of these tonight. When I'm talking about them, if possible, rather than just intellectually listening or thinking about them, see if you can get a feel in your own experience for each of these mental states, because they're all ones we're familiar with. Learning to recognize when they're present, when they're absent.

Faith, the first quality—these are called the five spiritual faculties, by the way, if you like list names. A definition that I particularly like for faith is "the drive towards that which cannot be described." It puts you right in the middle of what faith is about. It's about opening into the unknown. Sometimes we tend to think of faith as being based on some kind of knowledge—if we have a certain knowledge or we know the outcome, then we'll have faith in it. But it's just the reverse.

There are two aspects of faith that I'd like to talk about. First, knowing that faith is intuitive; it has nothing to do with intellectual rational knowledge, which is why it's so frustrating for our minds. But we all have experiences of faith. And I would say for everyone here, to some degree quite strongly, or you wouldn't have come here in the first place, and you definitely wouldn't still be here.

They talk about how when faith first arises in the mind, it's called bright faith. You can see why, because it has this quality of brightness, of energizing, of clarity. This is the kind of faith that's usually inspired in us—either hearing the Dhamma, meeting someone, or hearing someone that you find very inspirational. For instance, I get that from the Dalai Lama, or from some of my teachers. Just this sense of brightness and confidence and willingness. I get it often from talking with yogis in interviews, just seeing someone lighting up from touching the truth. And it doesn't mean they're having a pleasant experience either. But often I'll come out of an interview feeling this bright faith, this real sense of confidence.

It's what gets us going. It's really what brings most of us to this practice, or any other practice, in the beginning—a real sense of lighting up. And it's wonderful. It's also impermanent, as is everything. It wavers. Usually on a retreat, for me about the second day, when you start to hit the hindrances, almost always my mind says, "Oh no, I can't believe I did this to myself again. What am I doing here?" And for most people, at some point when we hit the wall, whatever that happens to be, the bright faith really starts to flicker. It's not sustaining, because bright faith is basically aroused from an outside source.

But as we continue to be with our own experience, what develops that is more sustaining than bright faith is what we could call verified faith—verified because it's not arising from an outer inspiration but is verified through our own immediate experience.

This is really what our mindfulness practice allows us to discover—through our moment-to-moment willingness to simply be with what is happening right now, with the truth of what this moment is presenting. This allows for intuitive understanding to arise: understanding into the nature of our mind and body, perhaps into impermanence, into the fact that there is no solid, unchanging self here. Faith that in being willing to open to and explore something difficult, it can transform into a completely different and unexpected experience. Faith in all kinds of areas of wisdom—all these things are wisdom, which is really the fifth faculty—but when these come from our own experience, it's a much deeper, more sustaining quality of faith than this bright faith that gets us started and gives us energy.

Really, the Buddha's teaching is based on this verified faith. It's one of the things that always made me trust the Buddha's teaching more than a lot of others. There's one sutta that we love in the West. In the East, they don't need it so much. But in the West, it's kind of our favorite—the one where he says, "Don't believe anything just because I say so. Don't do it because anyone else tells you to. But try this and see for yourself. What are the results? Does it lead to less suffering? Does it lead to freedom?" So even though it takes an initial kind of bright faith—even blind faith—it's very much that we need to verify it through our own experience. And this is what the Buddha talked about. From this faith comes a great deal of confidence, a great deal of energy.

I want to talk about one other aspect of faith that has been very alive for me in my practice the last few years. It's one aspect of faith, really the quality of trust. I see trust as the willingness to connect with, to simply be with the truth of this moment. Really, the trust is the willingness, the ability to take refuge in this moment, whatever it happens to be that this moment is presenting. It's also a kind of innocent, childlike quality, because it's willing to take refuge without having any guarantees, without having any outcome promised—just simply without knowing. And that's how life is. You never know what's going to happen in the next moment.

My favorite way of describing it comes from one teacher who calls it radical acceptance. He says, "Radical acceptance is radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways. To let go, to accept, it is necessary only to give up your fears." Only. These guys always make it sound so easy. But really that's the quality of trust—to accept truth in all forms in this moment.

And so right now, today, what have we been unwilling to accept? What have we been resisting, unwilling to accept as truth in this moment? This can be very subtle. The mind is very tricky in this way. And the fears—it's necessary only to give up your fears—the fears also can be very subtle, so that we hardly notice they're there.

I see it often myself in my own practice, in my life. It's really no different. For example, I remember one time I was going through a wave of deep grief and sadness. It was lasting days and days and days. And I felt I was being very present with it, very mindful with it, noting it, allowing it, accepting it. But really, somewhere quiet in the background was the sense, "You know, if I was doing this right, this wouldn't be happening." And no matter how subtle a thought that is, what it's coming from is not accepting. Somehow that isn't okay as truth in this moment.

And when I really look at it, most often that fear isn't so much about what's happening right now, but more the fear of, "If I really let go into this, then what will happen? Then it will really overwhelm me. Then it will get worse." And then the whole fountain opens up. So it's really interesting just to notice that point—because when we're not moving, opening into the unknown in that way, we're often shut down through fear. And fear is almost always of something that isn't actually happening yet.

So trust is this kind of radical acceptance that what is now is the truth in this moment.

There's nowhere else to go. It might be really unpleasant, but there's a sense of trust that I can take refuge in that. It too is a gateway, a doorway to understanding.

And it is scary at times when we are really living in that space where we know we just don't know what's going to happen in the next instant. We really don't know what the next thing is that's going to arise in our experience. You think you're going to take another breath, but suddenly there's this shooting pain in your knee that wasn't planned. When we walk out of this room, we have no idea. It doesn't mean we don't make plans, but really living in that space where we know we don't know—it's scary.

But it can also be incredibly freeing. It opens the doorway to so much energy and possibilities. Because when I'm holding back, afraid, wanting to know what's going to happen next, so much of my energy goes into trying to control, trying to organize, trying to manage what's uncontrollable in the first place. It's a futile tying up of energy.

But still, we like to know. We want to have some basis of knowledge. And it's kind of frustrating when we keep looking for more knowledge and more security, and instead what we find is greater and greater mystery. The more we look, the less we know. I have to say, the more I've practiced, every time I come out of a long period of practice, I really don't know anything. I know even less than I thought I knew the last time.

I came across a science article in the New York Times. The largest galaxy ever detected—the discovery was announced last week—includes more than 100 trillion stars and measures more than 6 million light years in diameter. This galaxy is 60 times the size of our own Milky Way. Now, this new galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump, a cluster of about a thousand galaxies called Abel 2029. But then they said that further study will provide clues to the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter. Since there doesn't appear to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the huge gravitational forces that would seem necessary to cause all these clumpings of galaxies, they think it's caused by this dark matter. According to the prevailing wisdom of scientists, some 99% of the universe consists of this missing mass. Which means that what is generally thought of as astronomy actually concerns only a tiny subset of particles that happen to be detectable by human nervous systems.

So we just don't know. And when we stop trying to know so hard, it's really wonderful, because what I find happens is we can open up to the wonder of things. I mean, it's wonderful that 99% of the universe is some unknown substance. It's really amazing. Who can explain just the wonder of a simple thing like a baby bird? Or why are robin's eggs blue? Or what makes it rain? You can say the scientists can explain it, but you don't really know. These things are wonderful. And that sense of awe, that sense of playing in the beauty and wonder of it all, is really what opens up to us when we can just be with what is in this moment, when we can begin to move from this space of trust.

Krishnamurti said, "To seek the truth is to deny it." We simply just be the truth in this moment. This practice for me has been wonderful that way, because no matter how difficult a particular experience might be, no matter how overwhelming, how much we're caught in fear and resistance—and we do get caught, and we are caught, and it can be for days—at some point, there can be just that one moment of: Ah, all right. This is how it is. I don't have any idea what's going to come out of it. It's okay. This is just what is. That moment of trust—that's a moment of faith. It's really where wisdom arises from. And it's almost as if this is a practice of trust, and it grows the more we do this meditation. It's really quite lovely.

So you might notice something that we often do in practice which is sort of the opposite of trust. I call it manipulating meditation. When you find yourself trying to recreate a certain state of mind, a certain physical state that you've had, a certain really high concentrated state where you thought, "Now this is it, now I'm doing it right." And you find yourself going back to the same place to walk, at the same time of day, or holding your hands the same way. There are all kinds of ways we can get into these little routines, almost like magical routines, trying to recreate what we've decided is the right way for things to be. And if it happens, then we think, "Oh, I've got so much faith." And if it doesn't happen, we feel really frustrated. This is not trust. This is not faith. This is basically craving and manipulation.

But notice when you catch yourself doing it—we all do—what's the state of mind that's being fostered in that state? And often, for myself, this can be quite subtle: a feeling of either fear, dissatisfaction, or neediness. The sense that somehow what's happening now isn't okay and I've got to make it different. And then when we see that and again just say, "Okay, sleepiness, this is what is," and there's a surrendering to that—again, this trust and confidence grows.

So this faculty of faith gives us a great deal of confidence that builds our capacity to be with, to face whatever it is that's arising in our experience in this moment. And that confidence leads into the next faculty, which is that of energy. Sometimes I've heard it called "willingness to do," of a sort. Energy—sometimes I like to call it joyful effort, because it's not this grim, determined "I'm going to do this no matter what." That has energy in it, but it's not balanced. So it's a kind of joyful effort and interest. And as you can see from your own experience, it's a vital quality to continue in this practice at all. No question. This sitting and walking all day with alertness takes an incredible amount of energy. People who haven't done it can't believe how much effort and energy it takes just to sit and walk slowly all day. But it takes a lot. It's really, in a way, the root of our practice.

It's really important to be aware of energy as an impersonal mental state or force. I myself find it so easy to identify with especially low energy as being me, being a bad yogi, being my fault. But if you just start to notice, energy always ebbs and flows. There are always roller coasters of energy. As with every other mental state, nothing is static.

Everything changes. When the energy is low, even with the best intentions, the practice just starts to drag on and drag on. The enthusiasm wanes. It can become kind of tedious—I don't know if any of you have experienced this. The ideas start to come up almost inevitably: "Ah, I should be doing something else. I'm not suited for this. This is the wrong time." Whatever. And it's really easy to interpret it as "I'm not doing this right." But that's just not the case.

Begin to notice the reverse. It took me a while to discover that when I was feeling—or am feeling—really present and fulfilled in my meditation practice, really interested in what's going on, it's not necessarily that what's going on is really cosmic. It's that the quality of energy is strong and balanced, so that I'm pretty connected, paying attention, interested in what's happening. What's happening could be total dukkha. But when the energy is balanced and present, it's okay. There's not this kind of self-flagellation: "You should be doing it better, you should be doing it better."

Balanced energy and effort is, I think, one of the most ongoing dances that we work with in our lives and in this practice. These faculties are present in our lives outside of formal meditation practice as well. For energy to be balanced, it really comes from inside ourselves, from within our own hearts, and actually springs from a joyful, interested heart. It's true that sometimes we have to just make a commitment and do it. There are times when the energy is low and we have to just keep going. But when it's really flowing, when it's balanced, it comes from an inner joy and interest.

And if that dies and we're too much just trying to impose an outer form on ourselves—for example, just walking slow, incredibly slow, no matter what's going on, not paying any attention to the conditions within or without—often that is such an effort that the heart and mind can start to wither. When it's no longer springing from inside, everything can get really dull, really dry. Sometimes you need to check in and see what's going on.

I remember one time in my practice it was like that for about two weeks, which is really long for me for it to feel that way. And finally I came to this point. I was coming up these stairs—I always walked in a certain hallway—and I said to myself, and really meant it, "If someone else is walking there, I'm leaving the retreat and going home." Of course, I live two doors away, so I don't know if I'd really have gotten away. Luckily, no one was walking there.

But that's the kind of state it can reach when the energy is out of bounds and becomes dull and dry and forced.

When that's happening, it's tricky, because our mind can tend to go two ways. One is like, "Okay, forget it. It's not springing from inner joy. I'm just going to kick back and read and walk and sketch until I feel like doing it again." I wouldn't really advocate this, especially as the first thought that arises in the mind. It's really true that when the energy is falling down low and it's feeling dry, usually what's happening at that point is difficult. That doesn't mean we should just stop.

It takes a delicate balance. But if we're willing to just gently—not forcing, but gently—say, "Okay, it's dull, it's dry now, but I'll just keep doing it." Not out of strain, but just in a gentle, loving way. Keep doing the sitting, keep doing the walking, and let it be just as it is. That willingness to continue.

It's like Sayadaw U Pandita uses the image of polishing a brass mirror. At first you can't see anything. You just polish and polish and polish, and it gets brighter and brighter until you can see really clearly. It's not like you're pushing your fist through the metal. You're just gently being willing to be sustained and continuous.

But don't confuse not quitting—don't confuse continuing in this gentle way—with trying to make things different. It's not that at all.

And that's the other place. I think it's the place where most of us get really hung up in an imbalance of energy. The tendency for so many of us, when something difficult begins to happen, as I said earlier, is to interpret, "This means I'm doing something wrong. This shouldn't be happening." We're just so conditioned that pleasant is right and unpleasant is wrong. So as soon as it gets unpleasant, it must be wrong.

When that happens, for many people—I know I see it in myself—the more difficult it gets, the more I interpret it as wrong, and that starts to mean that I'm wrong, I'm bad. It gets into a whole feedback loop of self-judgment and criticism and negation.

I remember once I was doing walking and noting my thoughts, and I realized I was in an unbelievable state of self-judgment and hatred. I'd gone all the way back to third grade—everything I had done wrong, the people I had offended. It was really heavy. "How did I get here?" And I just said, okay. I tuned in, and what was happening really was a pain in my big toe. That's all. Which was unpleasant. I hadn't really noticed that. But I had judged it and then turned it around that it shouldn't be happening and gone into this whole story of self-hatred.

That can happen when you're in a long, extended period of low energy. It can happen really strongly. And because the energy's low, it's also harder to notice that that's what's happening. We start to believe it.

From that space, rather than giving up, the other extreme is, "No matter what I do, it isn't enough. No matter how hard I try, I'm not trying hard enough." And we drive and we push and we get grim, and we say, "I'm sitting with this no matter what," and grit our teeth. Literally, people sit and sweat is pouring off them and they're shaking, and they finally move, and they come in feeling defeated—their practice is no good because they moved after an hour and a half of torment.

This is not balanced energy either. Grim, heavy determination does not equal balanced energy. It's not the same thing.

So while we don't want to just automatically give up, it also isn't helpful to swing the other way and push our way through no matter how painful and overwhelming an experience might be. The mind and heart just wither when we stay pounding through a difficult experience, whether it's physical pain, emotional pain, or psychological pain. Yes, we want to acknowledge, we want to be present—but not with this grim driving. This is not balanced energy either.

So if you're finding that the effort arising in your practice—look at it and see: Is it the effort to change something? Is it the effort to make things be different or to make something happen? Is there some expectation there? Almost certainly it's an unbalanced quality of effort, and it leads to frustration and tenseness and difficulty.

When you find that you're really lost in this flip side of unbalanced energy—this heavy, grim pushing—the mind is judging. And at that time, sometimes you just can't clearly evaluate what the quality of energy is.

I know when my mind is lost in self-judging, any evaluation I try to make is colored by that judgment. No matter how you try to evaluate the quality of effort, that mind is going to come in and say, "You're not doing it good enough, you're not trying hard enough, you're a wimp, you're a coward." You can't trust it in those moments.

One thing I have found helpful when you're feeling lost in the heaviness of some overwhelmingly difficult, fearful experience is some of what Michelle was talking about last night—to deliberately bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh called "seeds of joy."

I'll read some things Thich Nhat Hanh wrote. He said, "Most of us ask the question, what is wrong? We forget to ask what is right. There are many things that are not wrong. When you focus your attention only on what is wrong, things can get a lot worse. Therefore, it's wise to be aware of your capacity to enjoy peace, happiness, joy—your capacity to be in touch with what is refreshing and healing in the present moment. During the war in Vietnam, we were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country. But we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage. So I would mention these to the social workers and peace workers so they would be in touch with them. Each of us has moments of difficulty. When at times we are not able to deal with them, we can ask our seeds of joy to come up. In this way we can counterbalance the suffering."

Sometimes that's the most skillful thing to do in our practice. There's something the Buddha talked about as skillful avoidance. It's not that, "Oh no, I'm never going to look at this again—anything not to know that this fear is present." But it's knowing that we're grim, that we're overwhelmed, and just finding a simple way to bring up our own seeds of joy.

It could just be shifting the focus of attention to hearing—it's a very spacious field of attention. For me, when I am on an intensive retreat doing vipassana, I tend hardly to go outside. I used to, when I'd get like that, just walk out on the fire escape on the second floor of the Catskills for four minutes. Just that little bit—not noting for four minutes—just opening up to the sky and the tree that's there. And that would be so refreshing to my heart, to my mind. Just bringing in a sense of softness.

It might be doing metta or compassion for yourself or for others. It might be deliberate reflections—any of the ways Michelle talked about last night of cultivating joy. At times, a skillful backing off is the most helpful and powerful way to allow the process to continue in its own way. Again, the difficult situation arises, but there's more balance, more freshness of energy. There's not this withering of the mind.

So just play with this in yourself. There's no rule of thumb. It's really about being aware: What's the quality of energy? What's the quality of mind in this moment? And as the energy continues to become more steady—and it does, it still fluctuates, but it becomes more steady as we go on—this is what strengthens the quality of mindfulness.

I'm not going to say a lot about mindfulness because I think Steve's going to talk about it tomorrow night. But obviously mindfulness is kind of the core tool of this practice. Mindfulness is sometimes translated as "observing power"—that non-coercive, non-violent quality of attention, knowing what's happening clearly, the mind connecting with the experience without hesitating, knowing it just as it is, without all the concepts and interpretations.

Knowing pressure as pressure. Not the whole story about how this pressure means I'm so rigid, which means I'm such an uptight person, and how come I acted like that back in the third grade, and on and on and on. Pressure as pressure. It's unpleasant. Maybe there's aversion. Mindfulness is just connecting with what's happening as it is.

Alert, clear seeing, yet also relaxed—again, not that tension.

This mindfulness is so powerful because in the moment of true mindfulness, really connecting with knowing what's arising just as it is, we're not clouded by confusion, by aversion or anger, by greed. There's just this clear knowing, and it's from this clear knowing that deep wisdom arises. Each moment of mindfulness is very powerful.

You can see how balanced energy and attention leads to this balance of mindfulness. I have a little story that to me was a good example of it. I was in a game reserve in South Africa where you drive through and look for all these animals. But it wasn't one of those ones with wide plains where you can see ten miles off. It was all jungly and thickets and overgrown. So you'd drive really, really slowly on these roads and just peer through all the undergrowth and the tall grass looking for lions and giraffes and elephants and everything.

When we started, we were all excited and looking specifically for elephants, giraffes, lions. A lot of energy, a lot of interest, but it was really tight—looking for, you know, very tense. And we would see some things, but we didn't actually see elephants and giraffes and lions. After a while, because you do this all day for days, just drive around on these roads, eventually I got quite tired. I just couldn't stay that tense, and also frustrated because I wasn't seeing what I wanted to see. That's the quality of energy when we're just too tight, too expecting.

So then I just said, okay, forget it, and lay back and just cruised in the car, spacing out, not really paying much attention at all. And then the energy came back again, and I just quit looking for anything and started appreciating—oh, the grass is really nice. Look at the dew on it from the morning. I was really appreciating the freshness and being quite alert and present with just what was, without looking for lions and giraffes and elephants and everything.

It was really interesting because I started to see very subtle things that I would never have noticed, that I didn't notice at all when I was looking so tightly. I remember the first thing I saw—I was just looking at the grass and I saw a baboon up in a tree. It was almost exactly the same color as the tree. I never would have noticed it when I was looking so hard for something. But just being relaxed and present with what is, things stood out very clearly. And it was also much more enjoyable. I was just very appreciative of whatever was presenting itself.

That really felt to me like the balance of energy that leads to mindfulness, where it's just connecting with what's right there in a very clear way. And when we're content with what is like that, life is really so much more enjoyable. It's so much easier than wishing everything was different. I don't know why it's so hard to live like that.

So, as I say, each moment of mindfulness is a powerful moment. It's not going to feel powerful, like things going off, but it's a strong moment. And it kind of builds moment by moment, and it leads to a strengthening of concentration, which is this fourth faculty. Concentration becomes strong, becomes well established through this continuity of mindfulness.

By concentration, I mean just feeling it in your mind. We have all these ideas about what concentration is, but it's really that quality in one moment. Just think of it in one moment. Don't try and stretch it out over time. It's that quality in one moment of how the mind, the attention, sticks to the object—whatever's happening, the breath, the sensation, the motion. It sticks to that object steadily, without a lot of fluttering, without a lot of unsteadiness. Just pain in the knee, knowing it. Rising, knowing it.

Concentration has the function of being a unifying force, a gathering force. Usually the mind, our energy, is dispersed and scattered all over the place. In a moment of concentration, it's all brought together. It's unified in this one particular experience. It's amazing how powerful, how much strength there is in the mind when it is all unified in this way. This unification, this feeling of non-fragmentation, leads to a very deep sense of peace. We have contentment. Strong states of happiness come about through periods of one-pointed concentration. It's really so lovely when our mind and energy is not flying off in ten million different directions at once.

Part of that's what we see when we first sit down and in the first few days of a retreat. Part of why it's so difficult is that what we're starting to consciously experience is just how scattered the energy is—the physical and mental energy. In our daily life, we couldn't believe how scattered it really is until we try to say, okay, just stay with the breath, and we see how incredibly difficult that is. And how joyful it can be.

You tell someone, "I was with two breaths – it was so wonderful, I felt so happy!" And it doesn't make sense to somebody who hasn't tried it. But it's that sense of non-fragmentation that's so lovely.

In working with this form of vipassana, we're not cultivating one-pointed concentration or samadhi practice in that way. Rather, we're developing a steadiness of attention, a concentration that grows on objects that come and go, come and go, come and go. But in each moment that there's a real connecting with what's happening, knowing it clearly – that's the mindfulness. With this sticking quality, this non-fluttering – that's the moment of concentration.

I know I used to get all bent out of shape. I'd go into an interview and say, "I'm not concentrating." I had some idea of what concentration meant over a whole day – my mind was never supposed to wander, never supposed to do anything except go to the breath and stay there. And the most helpful advice I ever got was: forget all the rest of it. Just frame this one moment. In this one moment, whatever is predominant – the breath, the lifting of the foot, tingling, it doesn't matter what – is there a sense of the mind really connecting with that experience and sticking there? Not kind of vaguely noticing it, not kind of pushing past it, but really connecting and sticking there. Then that's concentration growing.

And you also will begin to see, as concentration does develop over these days – and there's no way it can't, sitting here like this – we'll still fall out of balance. We'll still get scattered. But what happens is that, quite naturally, the restabilization does not take as long, and it happens more naturally. Where something would blow me out of the water for three days, then it might take one day. Or it might be three hours. Notice that. Because often we tend to say, "Oh no, this again – it threw me off again," and we forget that a little while ago it would have been three days of hell instead of half an hour. We still focus on the difficult. But notice that we come back to balance sooner and more naturally. And again, you can't force concentration any more than you can force mindfulness or force effort. It also arises out of this moment-by-moment attention, and really out of a rest and ease and joy in our being, not from forcing.

Now, quite naturally as these four factors I've talked about – faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration – all develop through this practice, arising out of that, quite by itself, is insight or wisdom. Really, that's the point of this practice. It's a wisdom practice, a practice of insight. As I said in the beginning: intuitive understanding through our own experience of the nature of life, of who and what we really are, of what's true about our experience. And that can only come from being with our experience, allowing ourselves to know it as it is, without all this trying to filter it and make it different and explain it so that it fits our preconceived notions.

When with mindfulness we're able to simply be with what is, then there's a chance – oh, that's what's really going on! Of course I never saw it before. As long as I persist in thinking I'm a solid, unchanging body and I can't let go of that concept long enough to just feel vibrating, then that's going to be my experience of the world. Through the willingness to be with sensation, whatever it is, all of a sudden there's a moment where – wait a minute, there's nothing solid here. And that's not a concept. That's the experience in the moment. These kinds of moments arise over and over. That's the arising of wisdom. Oh, things really are impermanent. There really isn't a substantial self hanging around here.

And what's so magical, really, is that this unfolds by itself through such a simple process as sitting, walking, washing dishes – whatever you're doing – and simply being with things as they are. We don't need any kind of fancy special subject to be paying attention to. Anything will serve.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh: "The world reveals itself even when the eyes are closed. The world is neither inner nor outer. It is vital and complete in any object of contemplation – the breath, the tip of the nose, or anything as tiny as a speck of dust or as huge as a mountain. Whatever it is, it is not fragmented from ultimate reality. In fact, it contains the vast totality of reality."

Anything.

And so as this intuitive wisdom continues to develop, again it strengthens our faith. Faith becomes more verified, and it kind of comes full circle.

Just a tiny bit about balancing these qualities. In your practice, you can see that the quality of concentration and the faculty of energy balance each other. When they're out of balance—like more energy, too much energy in relationship to the concentration—the mind is all scattered, can't really land on an object. You have a lot of energy; restlessness, in other words, is what develops. It can be helpful sometimes to be spacious, as I was saying this morning in answer to the question. Sometimes if there's been enough steadiness previously, it helps to actually simplify what's going on. It's like too much energy—pinpoint your attention. Just pinpoint it on the breath, or pinpoint it on one part of the foot as you walk. Take fewer objects to pay attention to, because having a lot of things to pay attention to just kind of gets the energy going more.

When there's a deficiency of energy and actually more concentration, we tend to think you can never have too much concentration. But you can have too much in relationship to energy. You can get into this kind of nice space. The mind is calm. You're pretty much on the breath or something. You know what's happening. It's fairly pleasant. It's just going along. And it starts to get really drifty. It's easy to think, "Oh, this is a nice state of concentration." But pretty soon it just turns into a nice state of torpor.

So to notice at that point: it's comfortable, but it's not so helpful. Just bring in a little bit of energy. Again, you can note very clearly, like when you're sleepy—note clearly and steadily. You can try to be very precise in aiming and connecting with the breath, with the sensation, with whatever's happening. If it's really dull, you can add a touch point, a feeling of some touching point in your body between breaths—like your buttocks or your hands touching together—because adding another thing to pay attention to takes more effort, and more effort brings in more energy.

And it's a continual adjustment. Nothing is static. The forces are always shifting back and forth. So it just requires mindfulness to notice. And none of this is about judging. It's not like, "Oh, I'm so sleepy, I'm so lazy." It's, "Ah! The energy's a little low. The concentration's stronger." It's taken such a huge weight off of me to be able to look at it that way instead of it always being my fault somehow.

Wisdom is balanced with faith. And it's interesting because they say when there's an imbalance of faith and wisdom—when the wisdom is stronger—what tends to happen is it turns into analytical thinking. Notice how you can have an insight, some deep seeing into something that just arises. And it's not a thought like, "Oh yeah, everything's vibration," or "Oh, that's what this pattern of self-judging is about." It's just a knowing in the moment. And then there's an excitement and we start thinking about it. "Wow, that's really fantastic. Wait till I get home. Wait till I tell everybody. Now I really understand the Dharma." And you start giving talks in your mind.

This is really like an imbalance of wisdom. There's not the faith that gives the energy to do, to just say, "Okay, but keep practicing. What's happening right now? Thinking." That's the faith, the energy to do. Without that, the wisdom quality just takes off and we end up in analytical thinking, and it can even end up in skeptical doubt.

The other side is probably more obvious.

When there's a lot of faith but not much wisdom, we can become blind. We put faith in all kinds of inappropriate places and people. Someone told me once about her teacher, "I'd jump off a cliff if he told me to." You have to find the balance for yourself, but too much faith without the counterbalance of wisdom can lead to excessive zeal. "Yes, yes, I understand, I'll do anything, anything"—but there's not the counterbalance of real understanding.

I was talking with a friend who lives in Cambridge about how to deal with walking alone at night in the city. She said she used to have this excess of faith where she thought, "The Dharma will protect me," no matter what, and wouldn't take care. Yes, the Dharma will protect you if you also use some wisdom. You don't walk at midnight into a group of five men hiding in the shadows. You cross the street. And that's not acting from fear. That's simply seeing what the situation is and acting appropriately. Balance of faith and wisdom.

We need all of these factors. Mindfulness is what helps us balance all of them. You can't have too much mindfulness. And it takes mindfulness to even notice that the other factors are out of balance.

As we continue in our practice, in our lives, these qualities strengthen—not just in retreat, but in our daily living. They really work together. When you come to sit again, you'll find that your practice starts out more balanced and stronger. These qualities become much more accessible. We become more familiar with them.

I want to end with a little poem by Kalu Rinpoche, a wonderful Tibetan teacher:

When you practice the Dharma, the clouds of sorrow will drift away and the sun of wisdom and joy will be shining in the clear sky of your mind.

CHAPTER 247

Inner Contentment

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this talk, Carol Wilson examines the deeply ingrained mental habits that prevent us from experiencing our natural sense of completeness and inner contentment. She explores the three root reactions—craving toward the pleasant, aversion toward the unpleasant, and delusion regarding the neutral—and how these patterns distort our perception of reality before we even consciously respond to experience.
> Wilson discusses the four areas of grasping (upādāna): sense pleasures, views and opinions, rites and rituals, and the notion of self. She illuminates how grasping at views can be even more difficult to relinquish than attachment to physical objects, using the Buddha's parable of the father who refused to recognize his returned son because he had become attached to the view that his son was dead. The talk explores how identification with experience—the moment-to-moment arising of the self-idea—creates suffering and separation.
> Drawing from her experience as a nun in Thailand, Wilson offers a compelling reframe of renunciation: rather than deprivation, it represents an opening to profound joy and appreciation. She explains how the outer simplicity of retreat life creates conditions for touching inner contentment. Quoting the Pāli term appanihita (wishlessness), she describes the understanding that everything is already complete within ourselves. The talk weaves together Buddhist teachings with passages from the Tao Te Ching to illuminate how releasing grasping naturally gives rise to compassion, generosity, and the capacity to appreciate life's beauty without the agitation of craving.

Last night Michelle spoke about opening and understanding. I want to speak tonight a little about some of the habits of mind, the inclinations of mind that block, that hinder what seems like it should be a natural process of opening. These habits block our touching, our living with a sense of inner contentment. They keep us from knowing that we are complete and whole in ourselves.

When we're just going along normally, there's not a real attentiveness or care. There's not mindfulness in our experience in a moment. The natural way that our minds—that all of us—react to situations, these really deeply ingrained patterns of response, of habit, is our natural kind of way of being. Or it feels like our natural way of being because it's so familiar to us.

These root habits or patterns I've spoken of before are that when we come in contact with the pleasant, the impulse is of craving, of wanting. When there's contact with some unpleasant experience, the impulse is of pushing away, aversion, hatred in the strong sense of talking about it. And in contact with neutral, the impulse is just not seeing what's going on or spacing out. It's really a root habit of perceiving, a habit of reacting, that keeps us so out of touch with what's true, but it feels so natural. Of course, that's the natural way to be. How else would one respond?

There's a little cartoon I got from a friend's refrigerator. Refrigerators seem to be a great place to find important information. It says, "Science has noted three basic types." You wander alone down a crowded city street, jostled in the bustle, solitary yet surrounded—just like here. You think, "These people are..." and it's multiple choice. A: my brothers, my sisters. B: perverts, probably pickaxe murderers. C: I sure could go for a chili dog.

Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse: A: I know what he feels. He feels hope. He feels fear. B: Why is that pervert looking at me? C: Maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

Then the last one: further down, construction workers are tearing the street to rubble. How symbolic, you marvel. It reminds me of A: the path of life, B: the highway to hell, C: rocky road, my favorite flavor.

It's natural, part of our experience. What's really quite fascinating to me is the subtlety of these tendencies of mind. Because not only can these energies of greed, of hatred, of delusion inform our reaction, they are also so subtle that they can actually color our perception so deeply that we don't even consciously, accurately perceive what's happening. That's even prior to the response.

Here's an example. I read in a book by a friend of ours about psychological tests that were testing just this kind of perception and how it's skewed by desire, by aversion. In this one test, they had a four-minute video of a very fast basketball game, and the subjects were told to count how many times the ball passed. There's a sense of focusing, of really wanting to see that particular aspect. So they did that and were questioned at the end about how many times the ball was passed.

In the meantime, throughout the basketball court during this fast game, they had a woman in white with a white parasol come stately walking from one side to the other. Nobody mentioned it later when they were asked about how many times the ball was passed. In fact, when they asked the subjects about it, they said, "I never saw that," and absolutely would not believe that had been part of the video—until it was shown again. And then it's like, "How could I miss that?"

This is how the habit, the impulse of craving, can distort our perception so that we really consciously are not relating to what's actually going on.

You can see this both with craving and with aversion just in our day-to-day life. When you walk down a street, do you ever notice that what you particularly notice is kind of the set that your mind has? If I'm hungry, I'll notice restaurants. If you're looking to buy a new car, you notice the kinds of cars that drive by. If you have a particular aversion—like on retreats sometimes people get, you know, the opposite of a vipassana romance, a vendetta, a vipassana vendetta, where someone just drives you crazy—there's a setup of aversion. Do you ever notice that somehow you see that person more than everybody else in the whole retreat?

These habits are very strong. They arise frequently, almost automatically when we're not aware, when mindfulness is not present in our experience. They arise based on our not seeing or knowing in that moment what is true—that we are complete and whole in ourselves, that there is nothing to want, that nothing can give us lasting satisfaction. When we truly know this, craving doesn't arise.

Our mindfulness practice gives us the space, the opportunity to actually become aware of these habits, these patterns of mind. Sometimes painfully so. In fact, often people will come and talk about how aware they've become of craving, how aware they are of aversion. It seems like that's all they see. So now we not only notice craving, we judge it. And then we're back into that same tunnel vision—craving and aversion are all we notice. It can be very frustrating, very discouraging, because it can seem as if we're getting worse, that things are more difficult, that we're more caught in these unskillful patterns of mind than before we started paying attention. The sense of living in inner contentment might seem much more removed than before we began practice.

Of course, I'm going to say that this is not an accurate perception. It really does help to have patience and some faith, because it may seem that we're drowning in these habits—or in the noticing of these habits—but truly, this beginning to see, to know how the mind reacts to pleasant, to unpleasant, to neutral, is opening up space for a whole different possibility of how we can be in life, how we can relate to life. A whole possibility of living in our true potential, of being with the truth of things just as they are.

A couple of expressions of this. From the Tao Te Ching: "The Tao never does anything, yet through it all things are done. If powerful men and women could center themselves in it, the whole world would be transformed by itself in its natural rhythms. People would be content with their simple everyday lives, in harmony, free of desire. When there is no desire, all things are at peace."

And another: "The way is perfect, like vast space where nothing is lacking and nothing is in excess. Indeed, it is due to our choosing to accept or reject that we do not see the true nature of things."

So it is through choosing to accept or reject that we do not see the true nature of things. These habits grow and blind us through inattention. The care, the attention of mindfulness, the opening up to see what's really going on—this is what opens up the potential to see and know the true nature of things. It allows understanding to arise quite naturally. As Michelle said, we don't need to force it. It arises quite naturally, through seeing and not fighting these seemingly inherent habits of mind.

As we see, and as understanding arises spontaneously, what we can actually begin to notice in our moment-to-moment experience—as a result, as an effect of understanding—is that our attitude, the way we think in a particular situation, begins to change. Another way of saying it: we begin to notice from time to time, on rare occasions, that the inclination of aversion or anger might actually not arise, and instead what arises is compassion, caring. The inclination of greed, of grasping, suddenly and spontaneously gives way to renunciation, to non-greed, to a sense of contentment.

A simple example of how this change in attitude happens quite naturally. Thich Nhat Hanh uses this example often. I appreciate him because he's so simple, so down to earth. He talks about a small brother and sister. The younger sister is sick—whining, complaining, yelling, driving her brother crazy. It's unpleasant. His attitude is one of anger and annoyance. When his mother explains to him, in a way he can understand, how his sister feels—that she's sick, she has a fever, a headache, she hurts—in a way that he can see and relate to, without any forcing, his attitude spontaneously transforms to one of compassion, of feeling-with.

So it's nothing esoteric. It's the natural result of understanding that our attitudes of mind begin to shift. The Buddha spoke about this—actually, the second stage of the Eightfold Path is that of wise attitude, wise thought, wise intention, as it is variously translated. The first stage is understanding. And how we understand our lives, the world, is what gives rise to how we think about the world.

What our attitude is, how it arises in a particular situation. And of course the next three stages are concerned with wise action in the world. So how we think, how we relate, what our attitude is in a situation is what gives rise to how we act.

The Buddha was so practical. It doesn't seem like he talked about anything just for the heck of it. From what I've read, it's all very practically directed to helping us understand the nature of our minds and how to be free from suffering and confusion.

In speaking about this wise aspiration, wise intention, there is also a very practical application—helping us see that when there's mindfulness, there are times when we actually do have a choice where the mind dwells. In other words, these strong habits of aversion, craving, and confusion will arise quite naturally. With mindfulness, there are times when we have the space of choice. The Buddha said that what we reflect upon frequently, towards that the mind will naturally incline. It seems obvious.

When we're doing formal metta practice, one aspect of what's happening is that we're deliberately choosing where to let the mind dwell. We're choosing to move it from unthinking aversion and confusion to a deliberate dwelling in thoughts of love and kindness. This has great power. With our work of mindfulness, it's quite obvious. We can notice when this happens, and we can also notice how we can use this rather obvious principle.

An easy example: sitting here, a pleasant thought of home arises, and it turns from craving into really strong grasping. Grasping is the next step after craving. There's an impulse of craving—the example given is like looking for something in the dark. Grasping is when you grab it, you seize it, you've got it. You're really in the grip of it now.

So this impulse to go home comes up and turns into really strong grasping. That's the mind motivated by greed. And we can sit here, really feel it, and quite deliberately decide not to do that—quite deliberately bringing up the intention to renounce that particular grasping, that particular desire, for the purpose of something that seems more important: for the purpose of understanding. Simple. But this is the kind of space of choice that mindfulness opens up to us.

While this transformation happens quite naturally from understanding, being aware of the possibility and of what these strong habits can transform into, there are also times when we can use this quite consciously and be surprised at how much power that can have to change how we're relating, to change our confusion with experiences. We don't have to be enslaved by our habits of thought. We don't have to feel like constant victims.

Wise attitude can also be looked at as a willingness to greet any moment—each moment—as a chance to learn rather than as something we've got to fight against or just put up with. In any moment there's the possibility of choice, the possibility of growth and transformation.

The attitude that craving can transform into is really one word: renunciation. I like much better the sense of inner contentment, also of non-greed, actively of generosity. The sense of inner contentment—not being caught up in needing, in acquiring, in wanting—basically arises from the understanding that we're full and complete in this moment and that nothing outside is going to bring us any kind of lasting happiness. It's not really an intellectual understanding. It's more a visceral one in the moments.

In that inner contentment, which is a very deep and profound touching of truth, there is the space to deeply appreciate whatever is here right now. When we're caught in grasping, that's just the thing we can't do—appreciate what's here and now.

Moments of this wholeness, this completeness, this inner contentment arise quite frequently in our life on retreat. Those times of clarity, of fullness, of deep appreciation. And it doesn't matter what's happening in that moment—whether you're drinking a cup of tea or hearing a birdsong, just taking a step, watching the filter of light on the leaves, or brushing your teeth. It really doesn't matter what's happening. These moments are so full. The truth is emptiness, but another way of experiencing it is sometimes fullness—such a fullness that the thought of wanting anything or pushing anything away is inconceivable, just makes no sense. That inner contentment exists because there's no desire, no aversion in the mind.

I want to speak about the four different areas of grasping, of being aware of what areas we get easily pulled into, somehow thinking this is going to make us happy. The first is the most obvious, the one I tend to think of when I speak or think of craving: sense desire. Objects, relationships, sexuality, food, whatever. The five physical senses and the mind. The area of sense pleasures is the first area of grasping.

In our society, when we speak about renunciation, that's usually what comes to mind for me—either extreme asceticism or in any way giving up sense desires. It's definitely not a big thrill in our society. It's not really supported. It's not even respected so much. In the East, when people become monks or nuns in Buddhist countries, even though the majority of people don't want to live that way themselves, there's a tremendous respect for the willingness to give up sense pleasures on a certain level.

In our society, we're bombarded with possibilities for sensual fulfillment. Just reading the New York Times magazine presents things to want that I never would have even thought of. Have you ever had the experience of looking at an ad or hearing something on television and suddenly being gripped with desire for something you never knew existed half an hour ago? It's like this blast, and inner peace is gone.

The Buddha said often that his teachings were contrary to the ways of the world. And it's really true in this area—in all the areas of grasping, but particularly in the area of sensual grasping, the pull is very strong. I haven't been all over the world, but I feel that we in the West are somehow so inundated with possibilities for sensual gratification that it's really hard for us to even get a feeling for what it's like to renounce some of that. We could renounce so much and still be bombarded. It's just incomprehensible to me how much stuff we have.

I want to talk a little later about the joys of renunciation, because they're very real. But in the way that we've been brought up, with the constant information we get from the media, from other people, it's considered very strange not to want things. I got a television a couple of months ago, the first time I've ever had one. I thought it was really strange to have one, but I would meet friends who couldn't comprehend that I did not have a TV—as if that were some extreme form of suffering, which it definitely was not. It was a pleasure not to have one.

So that's the first area of grasping, and perhaps the most obvious to us.

The second area of grasping is grasping at views, grasping at opinions. This one is really fascinating to me. It's so easy to get caught in this—views about explaining the nature of the world, explaining the nature of ourselves, views about spirituality, views about politics. It just goes on and on. Views about the nature of this body, views about death.

It's defined as thinking, anytime you think, "This alone is true, everything else is false"—only usually we don't bring it to consciousness that clearly. Then we're grasping at a view. Remember, it's the grasping that's the root of confusion and suffering. When we're grasping at a particular view, a particular explanation of the world, a particular way we think things are, it leads us to perceive—again, it's like tunnel vision—it leads us to perceive the world, to perceive information in the light of the particular view that we hold. We discount any facts that come our way that don't fit it, unless the fact is so overwhelming we can't avoid it anymore.

I remember Roger in one of his talks at the last retreat speaking about near-death experiences and a man who was a complete atheist—that's a view. He would reject any kind of spiritual experience that anyone told him about, anything that would seem to suggest the existence of some greater power. But then when he had such an incredible near-death experience that he couldn't deny the truth of it, he said, "Well, maybe I was mistaken." Sometimes it takes a huge knock over the head to shake us out of grasping at views—sometimes even to notice the views that we're holding.

The Buddha tells a story about a man in a small village who had a son. He was a widower. He went away one day to work, and in the meantime bandits came, kidnapped his son, and burned his house and the rest of the village. So there was no one there to tell him what had happened. He came home terribly distraught, of course, found some bones of a child in the ashes, and said, "This is my son." He lovingly wrapped them in a velvet bag and carried them with him. He rebuilt his house.

Quite some time later, his son escaped from the bandits and came home late, like at midnight, banging on the door: "Father, father, let me in!" By this time, the father had so grasped onto the idea that these bones were his son, that his son was dead—that was his grief, that was his life—that he just said, "Go away. My son's dead. Don't come to torment me like this." The son banged again. The father said, "Go away." He wouldn't open the door. Eventually the son went away, and they never saw each other again.

The Buddha says, you know, somewhere, sometime, you take something to be the truth. And if you cling to it so much, when the truth comes and knocks at your door, you won't let it in.

It's fascinating and it's very subtle. Views—we form them, we grasp onto them on a moment-to-moment basis. It's not some solid, unchanging thing. Nothing is. But perhaps you can start to notice over the course of the days together here. Notice how we'll have a particular experience, and it's amazing—immediately we'll formulate some view explaining it: "This is what this means, and now I know what practice is." Then without realizing it, we grasp that as the truth, use it to evaluate the rest of our experience, and the net result is conflict.

This is what happens when we grasp at a view. We come into conflict with others who don't agree with our view. We come into conflict with ourselves.

So notice: I've been with three breaths of very distinct sensations. This is good concentration. This is what's supposed to happen. And when that doesn't happen at the next sitting, that view of "this is good concentration" is used as a club. Or: I'm not having enough emotions. I must be suppressing. The last retreat was more emotions.

And then that becomes a view. Or: I'm having too many emotions. I'm not concentrated enough. People sitting right next to each other will each be holding these different views. If they could switch, then they'd be happy.

I've noticed often when I'm sitting that this will come up. I'll be caught in it for a while and go, "Oh, that's a view. An opinion." It drops away. And immediately a new view is formed. It's really quite interesting to watch.

View in itself is not a problem. We certainly need to formulate views and opinions to exist in this world. We need to vote. We need to make choices. If you have money, you need to decide how to spend it, where to invest it, who to give it to, which organization you like better. We need to have views. It's the grasping. It's the not seeing a view as a view, taking it to be the truth. That's where we come into conflict.

In talking about or thinking about the idea of renouncing, of giving up the grasping, is it harder to give up grasping after some physical object or at a view of how we think life is? I find the latter much more difficult to really renounce.

And the views come down to our mistaken, our inaccurate view that things are unchanging, that somehow we're not going to die, that this is a solid body here, that we are a solid, separate self-entity. When our views are threatened or challenged, often the result in the moment is a lot of fear. It can be very scary. It's like having the ground shaken out from under us.

Often in a meditation retreat, when someone has an experience of anicca, of impermanence—the body dissolving, or any other kind of sense of impermanence, or just a little quick hit of no-self, of "there's no me here, things are just happening"—what is ultimately quite freeing, in that moment, is very often accompanied by terror. Real terror. In fact, sometimes if someone says they've had a momentary experience of anatta and they're just in a panic, we'll think, "Oh yeah, they probably really did." Because the fear of having our view shaken, of having our idea of the world shaken, can be so strong. But the grasping at the view is what's keeping us feeling separate. It's what's bringing us into conflict with the way things are.

The third and fourth types of grasping I don't want to go into so much. The third one is grasping at rites and rituals, which could be described as the view—again, it's a view—that a person is able to purify oneself or free oneself from suffering by means of external outward rules and rituals. In other words, as the Buddha said, we need the raft to get to the other shore, but then you don't carry the raft along on your back once you get there. We don't mistake the pointing finger for the moon. Devotional rituals, that's one form of ritual, can be very helpful. In a way, sitting in formal meditation practice is a method, is a ritual, extremely helpful. But we don't mistake the outer form for the truth of who we are.

The fourth field of grasping—and this is like a whole talk in itself—is grasping at the idea of self. It's really a view again. It's grasping at the idea, often not on the conscious level, that there's some permanent unchanging essence sort of sitting here viewing the world that comes and goes. Or the way I can relate to it on a more immediate experiential level is the grasping onto, the identifying with, any particular experience in a moment as being me.

A simple example: sitting, there's an unpleasant sound that someone near you is making. You notice the sound, you notice unpleasant, aversion, anger. Why is that person doing that? Or self-judging.

How can I be so horrible as to be so angry at that person? That is the movement of identification. That's the impulse, the grasping at that particular experience as being me. My anger, my judgment, my self-righteousness. We might not be saying all that or even clearly knowing it, but it's quite a different experience. You can feel then, if you turn the attention onto it, how solid the sense of "me" becomes. In that moment, I'm angry, I'm judging, I'm suffering.

The same experience without the grasping, without the identification—you could have that same experience in the very next moment. Where there's hearing, it's unpleasant, there's aversion, but there's no grasping around that, and it just goes. And there is no real sense of "me" in that moment. Nothing so special, just not the grasping at the self-idea.

So you can start to notice how and where the self-idea is grasped at. When does that arise as a grasping in any particular moment? It's a becoming that happens over and over on a moment-to-moment basis. It's not some solid self-idea waiting there that we're knocking out with a hammer, finally going to chip it away for good. It's something that arises on a moment-to-moment basis, and we can notice when it's solid, what's the grasping at that moment, and when it's not.

So these are the four areas of grasping. I wanted to mention them all because often when I think about it, when I feel the sense of renunciation and the beauty of inner contentment, I sometimes forget about the last three and tend to just focus on the sensual, sense pleasures aspect. So I just wanted to broaden it a bit.

When we start to tune in to the nature of grasping, the nature of craving, we can't really help but notice that it's not so wonderful. It's not really so pleasant, and ultimately more suffering arises from the craving than pleasure comes from getting what we want. In that way, this natural renunciation, this getting in touch with inner contentment, comes quite by itself.

But this space to make a choice also arises quite often. It can be helpful just to reflect a bit on the nature of craving and the joy, the benefit, so to speak, of renunciation, because sometimes that can help us in that moment make a choice. As I said, our society often thinks of renunciation as equaling suffering. When I was a nun in Thailand, I felt people respected what I was doing a lot, but I really felt, out of that respect, they were treating me as though I were giving up so much. On a physical plane that was true. But there was this real sense that renunciation is so hard to do.

But it isn't. Once we've actually done it, what arises is a joy, an appreciation that is so much more powerful than any sense gratification.

This is from a Christian priest, speaking about the renunciation of celibacy. He says, "To be alive is to love. The ultimate purpose of monastic life is to create an environment for lovers. One reason for being celibate is to be a greater lover. The only reason to renounce one particular pleasure is to enjoy the unbearable pleasure of God's company."

I really love the feeling of that. Renouncing one particular pleasure to enjoy the company of the truth.

One little haiku I love that just gives me the feeling of the self-feeding nature of desire and also the futility of it: "Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto." We do that, and desire breeds desire. It just keeps us looking in the wrong direction, and it's futile. It keeps us in bondage.

As we begin to naturally experience renunciation, Suzuki Roshi said a lovely thing: renunciation does not so much mean giving up the things of the world as accepting that they go away. It's lovely. This begins to arise quite naturally in our experience as we feel and know the futility and the pain of this energy of grasping and desire. Craving arises and grips the heart because we're not knowing and seeing what is true—as if something outside can give us security, can give us wholeness, the sense of inner contentment.

There's a word in Buddhism—this is from Thich Nhat Hanh—apranihita, which means wishlessness. The idea is that you do not put something in front of you and run after it, because everything is already here in yourself. That's the sense, that's the inner contentment—really knowing that everything is already here in yourself. It begins to arise quite naturally.

But as I said, it can also be helpful to deliberately work with making a choice of renouncing. Renouncing a particular desire—to get up and leave in the middle of a sitting.

Anyway, by the end of that time where there was really no outlet, the desires for the most part fell away, and the space of appreciation, the space of contentment with just what was—you know, so it was really humid, but there was contentment with seeing the humidity and the dewdrops on the trees, just appreciating the beauty of that instead of the mind immediately racing to do something to make it more comfortable. Just that contentment with what is.

And that's really the strongest, most powerful teaching from that whole time for me, and one that has been strong with me ever since then. I honestly know that the depth of that learning would not have been possible without the outer renunciation and the inner renunciation of desire and grasping that went along with it.

That's, I think, one of the powerful lessons of a meditation retreat. You all are in a state of very strong natural renunciation even to be here, to go through the day, to live the way we're living here. And that opens up the possibility of moving out of these habits of greed and aversion and confusion and touching what is true.

Geshe Raptin, a Tibetan teacher, said, "Having great compassion for oneself is the same as renunciation"—renouncing the delusion, the attachment that keeps one bound to samsara, to this endless cycling of suffering. The point of renunciation is a development of love and compassion for oneself. Only then is compassion for others possible.

So far from being an avenue to greater suffering and discontent, working with and noticing this attitude, this shift of attitude in our being—the willingness to just let go of grasping in this moment, that's all, just in this moment—is actually an act of great compassion and love for ourselves.

Sometimes people ask, you know, "If I give up desire—not all desire is going to go, but I'm willing to renounce desire in the moment, to not just move towards pleasant and away from unpleasant—does that mean everything is just all neutral and boring? That you can't tell what's pretty from what's ugly and life's just one dull gray blur?" There's often a fear of this.

And it's really not so. We're not giving up seeing how things are, not giving up being able to tell differences on the relative level of life. What we're giving up in that moment of renouncing is the craving, the fear that this particular thing is going to change, the needing for this particular experience to be in my life right now in order for me to be happy—giving up the craving that binds us to samsara.

The Buddha said, "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it."

That's the space of inner contentment.

In fact, there's so much more in the world that's beautiful, that we never even notice when we're in the grip of grasping. When we're living in the space of inner contentment, there's so much more beauty in the world than we're ever aware of in our normal state of dull habit.

I want to end with one more reading from the Tao Te Ching—this feeling of just living in the simplicity of inner contentment:

Let your heart be at peace. Watch the turmoil of beings but contemplate their return. Each separate being in the universe returns to the common source. Returning to the source is serenity. If you don't realize the source, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. When you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kind-hearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king. Immersed in the wonder of the Tao, you can deal with whatever life brings you. And when death comes, you are ready.

Everything is already here in ourselves.

Sīla/Precepts Update

Carol Wilson · 51 min

> In this deeply personal talk, Carol Wilson invites us to reconsider our relationship with sīla (ethical conduct), moving beyond viewing the precepts as mere rules to follow before "getting to the real business" of meditation. Drawing from her year as a nun in Thailand and decades of practice, she shares how working with conscious conduct has become one of the most profound and subtle aspects of her path.
> Wilson explores how the Buddha's Noble Eightfold Path begins with wise understanding, which then informs intention, which in turn shapes action—revealing that ethical conduct is not blind rule-following but an expression of awakening itself. She examines each of the five precepts with remarkable honesty: the complexities of non-harming when confronting cockroach infestations or ants in the shower; how stealing relates to inner poverty and our consumption patterns affecting billions worldwide; the subtleties of truthfulness discovered when practitioners tried not lying for just one day; and the challenges of wise speech.
> What emerges is a vision of sīla as a practice of oneness—where protecting others through non-harming simultaneously protects ourselves, and where skillfulness depends not on external results but on the mental factors present in our intentions. Wilson draws on teachings from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita, Thich Nhat Hanh, Robert Aitken Roshi, and Dōgen to illuminate how mindfulness is "the fundamental precept" and how, when we realize nothing is lacking, "the gate of emancipation is open." This talk transforms ethical practice from obligation into a joyful expression of interconnectedness.

I just wanted to speak a little bit tonight about the practice of sīla, or conscious conduct, which we always mention briefly at the beginning of a retreat. We run down the five precepts or the eight precepts, and I think for myself, over the years of my commitment to practice, I've been finding that working with awareness of my speech and actions is such a deep and profound aspect of practice, such a rich path of understanding. I would like to talk about it because I have found it very inspirational and also very subtle and quite difficult in many ways. And I think it's very important.

Joseph mentioned last night that our meditation practice can come from the foundation of loving-kindness—that it really can be a practice rooted in joy. Not every moment joy, but really rooted in loving-kindness and joy. This is how I relate to ethical conduct, or sīla, often translated as morality. It's a practice rooted in loving-kindness, in our understanding of the oneness of all beings. It's both an expression of that understanding, and in our continued mindful attention to our speech and actions, it serves to deepen that understanding.

We often speak about sīla as being the foundation for the more formal meditation practice. Really, I feel it's much more than that. It both opens the gateway to liberating understanding in itself, as well as being the expression of our understanding.

As most of you probably know, the Buddha spoke of his Eightfold Path—eight areas of our life that are an expression of an awakened life. These are divided into three areas: wisdom, wise action, and the so-called samādhi group, which deals with meditative aspects of mind.

Much of what I say tonight I'm speaking quite personally from my own experience of meditation retreats and working with sīla. I'm not claiming to speak for the Theravāda tradition per se—I'm just speaking from my own experience.

I've always acknowledged that sīla is important, but for me, often in the past, there was this feeling of, "Yes, sīla is important. It's an aspect of the Eightfold Path. So we'll take the five precepts or we'll take the eight precepts. Of course it's important not to harm, but let's then just get onto the real business of doing the meditation. That's where the understanding is going to come from. That's what's really important." And we just put up with sīla as a necessary—and of course important—byproduct.

I feel that attitude does us such a disservice because in a way it shuts out such a rich area of life. It's all of life really: our speech and our actions, our intentions. When we somehow think that it's just rules to follow, when we don't have the same care, the same interest, the same willingness to learn from paying attention to our speech and actions, we somehow think that freedom isn't really going to come from paying attention to this—it's going to come from getting certain states of mind in meditation. This is a bit of a gross dichotomy I'm creating, but it's a way to explain a feeling I've had over time of somehow not giving ethical conduct the profound importance it can have in our understanding.

When I relate to sīla, when I relate to paying attention to conduct as just as viable a path, an opening to freedom as formal meditation, it opens up an area of such beauty in all of life, in all of action. It makes appreciation of whatever's happening in this moment so much more possible and so much deeper.

Sometimes I think that for me, some of this sense of separation came about because when we first brought this style of meditation to this country from Asia, it was taken out of context. The way we do ten-day or three-month meditation retreats is separated from the rest of our life and from the context of the society we're living in. Whereas in Thailand, for example, where I was a nun for a year, the meditation is very much rooted in the context of people's lives. Sīla, samādhi, and wisdom—paññā—are really integrated in people's understanding. People come to the monasteries daily or weekly to take the five precepts and they go home again. They might come once a month or so and take eight precepts and spend the night, do meditation for a night, or stay for some days and do meditation, and then return again to their life. There's not such a sense of dichotomy, such a sense of separation. Even when doing the formal meditation and returning to daily life, there's a real appreciation of sīla as being the groundwork from which the meditation is coming.

Of course we have a strong sense of ethical conduct in our society, but it's not so seamlessly woven together with the meditation. It's been easy—especially when I first started practicing—to just go and do a retreat, have good moral conduct at the time of the retreat, but somehow not quite get it that it was also just as important how I acted and how I paid attention to my mind outside of the retreat. The culture I went back to had no understanding of what I was doing, and so there wasn't a sense of support for that. I had to kind of do it on my own.

Over the years, I've been appreciating more and more—I think it happens quite naturally—the profound depth of understanding that can come from this practice of sīla. And how interwoven paying attention to our speech, our actions, our intentions of mind is with the growing of understanding, with the development of the qualities of mind: energy, concentration, and mindfulness. They all come together.

What I find interesting when I think about the way the Buddha laid out the Eightfold Path is that wise action is not the first step.

The Eightfold Path begins with wise understanding. The second step is wise thought or intention, and it is then that it moves into wise action. What I hear in this is that our understanding is what informs how we think, our intentions of mind, and that is what our actions arise from.

From this we can see that working with sila, with conscious conduct, is not a matter of blindly following some set of rules. Rather, as we begin to awaken to the nature of reality, to the nature of our own existence—even just a little, the first initial recognition perhaps of impermanence, the sense of non-separation or connectedness—whatever a beginning of understanding is, this then is what can give rise to the beginnings of our caring about our conduct. To the beginnings of caring about how we act and move in the world. To paying attention and seeing that how we act, how we speak, affects everyone else we come into contact with. We begin to see that our actions are the natural effect of our understanding, and so the whole path is really very intertwined.

A simple example: we begin to notice the nature of cause and effect, that if I act in a certain way it has this effect. If I tend to lie, if I tend not to be truthful, I begin to notice that people don't trust me. It's quite natural. And then that doesn't feel very good to me—I want to be trusted. This is obvious, but it is a result of understanding cause and effect. Actually, when we begin to understand cause and effect, that's the beginning of seeing anatta, a sense of no-self. Because when we're seeing that this cause brings this effect, this effect makes me feel like this, we're seeing that we're not separate autonomous beings. There's a cause and an effect and another cause and another effect, and there's no way to be separate. We are all one.

That understanding then gives rise to the caring and the interest to continue paying attention to our actions and speech. Perhaps then I try to be more truthful. And being more truthful tends to lead to more harmony, both outwardly and inwardly, which allows for more space to really pay attention to the fact that there is a connection between all of us. The sense of understanding oneness and the sense of harmony grows deeper through the behavior. It's like a cycle that keeps spiraling deeper and deeper.

I know for me in the beginning, I did try to follow the precepts, but it was more out of a sense of, well, I guess it sounds good. Obviously, intellectually, I don't want to harm people. I'd like to be a good person. It was basically good motivation, but more a sense of should. What's been happening more and more is that it moves, in my experience, from being a sense of should—my relationship to actions and speech feels more like a movement of my heart. The actions become an expression of a greater harmony that I feel inwardly, and I also get more immediate feedback from myself when I'm not acting in harmony.

I don't like to really use the phrase "break a precept," because that sounds so much like this is a rule and you broke it and you're bad and you're guilty. This really is not about guilt. None of this is about guilt or judgment. It's about being interested and being able to pay attention in order to learn, in order to grow—not to make ourselves bad, simply to see what happens.

I've been finding that as my relationship to working with conscious conduct comes more from my heart, more from a willingness to learn, when I blow it, so to speak, the feedback is so much more immediate, and in that way it actually serves again to deepen my understanding. A small example, but a common one: if I'm not paying much attention and I say something abrasive, something cutting or harsh—and that can happen quite easily—usually now, as soon as it's out of my mouth, I don't have to wait for some kind of feedback from the other person. I viscerally feel a sense of separation, a sense of contraction in the heart or the mind. Right away that action has contributed, in that moment, to a greater sense of separation.

But because there's this willingness just to pay attention, rather than having that sense of separation turn into an even greater sense of separation through blaming and judging—"Oh, what a horrible person I am"—or having to justify myself, just noticing that, being willing to bring this non-judging, mindful attitude to what happens, the fact that we're really not separate, the fact that how I act affects others, that I can't separate my pain from another's pain, becomes more clear. It becomes more of a visceral experience.

As soon as I've said something harsh, I actually suffer myself, even before that other person says, "Wow, that really hurt. Why did you say that?" Sometimes they'll say that to me, and sometimes they won't. But what becomes clear is that action coming from harming, from harsh speech, has brought in that moment a pain that can't be separated, whether it's me or the other person. And so even by blowing it, it can be an occasion to again experience the oneness of all of us.

Actually, Sayadaw U Pandita, when he speaks about working with the precepts, I've often heard him say that acting from the precepts is acting from our understanding—it's an expression of the oneness of all beings. So it's really a very powerful practice.

The Buddha said, and I like this a lot, that by protecting others through our care with non-harming actions, we protect ourselves—protect ourselves from suffering and pain. And similarly, by protecting ourselves, by being careful with our actions so that we don't suffer the unpleasant consequences, we're simultaneously protecting others. Again, no difference.

What really helps us understand how to protect ourselves and others—and this is just a very short synopsis because we'll talk about this in much more detail over the course of the three months—is understanding that when we talk about conscious conduct of speech or action, of what is skillful, we're really talking about a morality of intention. Every thought or speech or action has a volitional force, an impetus that drives it, that makes it happen. And this motivation, this intention that brings about the thought, the speech, or action, is seen as skillful or unskillful depending on what mental factors, what qualities of mind are present feeding that intention, so to speak.

For example, an action or speech would be seen as skillful if the intention is associated with the mental factors of compassion or wisdom, equanimity, loving-kindness, among many others. And of course, unskillful if it's associated with rage or greed or hatred or cruelty, confusion. You can see how subtle this can be, because what it means is that the same action can be coming from very different motivations, and it's the motivation that determines the skillfulness of the action. It's the motivation that we can work with, that we can pay attention to—in a way we have no control whatsoever over the results of our actions.

An action can be performed with the deepest sincerity and very skillful intentions, and the results might look very harmful or might actually be harmful. An example that is given in the suttas is of a blind bhikkhu, a blind monk, who was doing walking meditation. As he was walking in the forest, he was walking on all these ants and killing them. Some of the other monks saw this and they went running to the Buddha. I have to say, there seem to be a lot of suttas where monks are running to the Buddha and kind of tattling—so-and-so did this and so-and-so did that. It sounds like it's no different from today.

Anyway, they went and said, "He's supposed to be free, he's supposed to be enlightened, and he's killing ants. Clearly that's a precept, that we don't kill, so what's the story?" And that's when the Buddha explained that being blind, he had absolutely no way of knowing he was killing ants, and his intentions in the walking meditation were completely pure. And so his action was not unskillful.

You see, it's very interesting, and this is why I find it so fascinating, when we begin to open up to a really deep commitment to explore how we relate in our speech and action to ourselves and to the world. Because it requires a great deal of honesty with ourselves. Also a great deal of mindfulness to even be able to tell honestly what the intentions, what the motivations are. And to be willing—mindfulness means a clear attention, but it also means a non-judging, accepting quality of attention—so that when, for example, we see ourselves doing something that's really disgusting, we can just see it for what it is and explore it without adding a whole extra load of self-hatred and judgment and guilt, because that doesn't help us to learn.

So sila is so much more profound than just five or eight or two hundred twenty-seven rules that we follow. It's not just a list. I feel for myself, when I am committed to paying attention, when I am committed to working with my relationship to my speech and conduct—and it takes a huge amount of energy; I certainly can't say every moment I feel actively committed to working on it—but when I am, I really feel that it's an actual practice of oneness. It really is practicing loving-kindness and compassion. It really, to me, feels like a practice of freedom when I relate with real integrity and commitment.

So I'd like to briefly share, just again this is personal, some of my reflections and some of other people's on just the basic five precepts—just showing, sharing with you how subtle it can be. And I'm sure my just mentioning a few things will bring up many more ideas in your own mind, in your own experience. And also I think how exciting and how interesting it can be to explore these nuances of intention, of behavior and speech.

Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master, talks a great deal about working with the precepts. He says to really see them as guidelines, as directions in which we incline the mind. It's essential that we not begin by expecting to be perfect. And I know for myself and a lot of people I talk to, we tend to have that tendency to right away think that we should be perfect. I'm going to observe the five precepts of not killing, not stealing, not harming with my sexuality, not lying or using harsh speech, not taking intoxicants to cloud the mind—and right away I'm going to do it all perfectly. It's really difficult.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, we try all our lives to understand and practice the precepts better. I really think it's like that. The more I pay attention, the more I see subtler and subtler ways that I haven't been paying attention before, that I am not coming from non-harming. And you can see why mindfulness is so necessary.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Mindfulness is the fundamental precept. Think of the precepts as the manifestation of mindfulness. Because when you are mindful, you're responsible."

When we truly pay attention, when we're genuinely present and open in a moment, we naturally don't do things that are harmful to ourselves or others. When we're not paying attention or feeling disconnected, having the precepts as guidelines can serve as a helpful reference point.

So, not killing. At first, this seems fairly clear. Most of us probably don't kill other human beings. We probably don't kill animals. But it gets very tricky, especially when we expand it to non-harming. Even not killing animals—can any of us do that perfectly? What about when we're digging in the garden? What about when there's an infestation of cockroaches, something we've been dealing with here for years? What about when the house across the street that we at IMS owned and were renting to tenants had an infestation of fleas so severe that I walked in and walked out thirty seconds later with my legs black with fleas? How can you ask tenants to live in a house like that? What do you do? It's genuinely complicated.

Robert Aitken, the Zen Roshi in Hawaii, once said that the practice of peace and harmony is peace and harmony—it's not some technique designed to induce them. In other words, we don't try to do something in order to become peaceful and harmonious. Rather, as Thich Nhat Hanh teaches, we practice being peace and then acting from that space.

When I first arrived at the temple in Thailand where I ordained as a nun, I had very long hair. You sleep on the floor in these kutis, these little huts. That first night I woke up with ants streaming through my hair—there was a river of ants crossing the kuti with no way to stop them. I didn't know what to do. Being new in Thailand, I ran to the assistant of the abbot, who was actually quite well-known. I asked him, "What do I do? How can I get rid of them?" I was shocked when he went into the kuti and came back handing me a can of Raid. I was just blown away.

There are questions without easy answers. At that time I desperately wanted easy answers. Now I've come to love that there aren't any, because if there were, I could just tune out again—follow the list of what to do and stop paying attention. But because there aren't easy answers, I have to stay truly aware. I have to remain connected. I have to care about what I'm doing, care about other beings, care about the environment. I have to be awake. Working with the precepts helps me stay awake and wake up again when I fall asleep.

Perhaps I feel—and it's rather presumptuous to say—that I understand about not killing animals out of anger. But what about out of indifference? If I don't have my glasses on and step into the shower, I can't tell what's on the bottom. I can't distinguish between a piece of lint and a tiny ant. If I don't take the trouble to bend down and check before turning on the water, and it is an ant, I've just washed it away. Because I'm aware of this, because it's happened more than once, it's not like the blind bhikkhu who genuinely didn't know. It's an action arising from delusion or laziness. How do I relate to the precept of non-harming? How much effort am I willing to put in, even though I don't consciously want to harm?

It keeps expanding when we consider it as non-harming. I think a lot about the violence in our popular entertainment culture—what effect does it have on my mind, and what effect does it have on others? If I pay to see a violent movie, in a way I'm supporting that. Does this contribute to the violence in our culture? I don't know. But if I think it might, yet decide to go anyway just for entertainment, what does that say about my commitment to non-harming?

I just heard on the news about the ongoing controversy around certain rap songs and the violence in them. There was some new song they were having a controversy about, again talking about killing cops. And some young guy was driving in a stolen car, and a cop stopped and pulled him over and walked up to the car, and the kid killed him. In the tape deck was this song about killing cops. And the kid said, "Well, you know, I was all jacked up from listening to this song, and that really is what made me kill him."

I mean, who knows? But then I have to wonder, what am I doing that might be contributing to that? And what I found is that this kind of reflection doesn't bring on more guilt if I'm really trying to look honestly. Rather, what it does is help me become so much more attuned to our oneness, to our interconnectedness.

I was just in Germany, and I don't know if you've heard, but there's a lot of violence going on between different cultures, really, is what it is. A lot of young people who are out of work are attacking refugees—they call them asylum seekers—in different parts of Germany. And how much of this stems from the sense of not perceiving our oneness, that somehow this group of people is other than me? I just got a letter in the mail asking for money and talking about various episodes of the same kind of racial violence—Asians against Latinos, whites against blacks—taking place in this country, just lots of isolated little incidents.

So then I have to look at myself and see: when I shut off my sense of oneness enough that I don't bother to look down and see if it's an ant, that might seem really minor. But what's the effect in my consciousness? If I pay attention at that moment, I notice that it's as if the consciousness contracts, the heart shuts, there's a feeling of separation. And it might sound silly, but I really have to reflect on whether that has an effect in the culture. When I'm contracted like that, when I'm not willing to take an extra little bit of energy not to harm, how is that energy reflected in the culture and what's my responsibility? How am I contributing to the greater violence that's taking place in our cultures?

You can see it just keeps expanding, actually and infinitely, and we each have our own areas in which we can look at this.

The same applies to the second precept: not taking what is not given, which is another way of saying not stealing, but a little broader. And again, it's looking at it as intention. What's our intention? It's much more than just not stealing. And even just on that level, blatantly, none of us are probably going to go into each other's rooms and riffle through people's stuff looking for money—or maybe chocolate as the retreat goes on.

But it's much broader than that. For instance, when I'm in the bathroom: "Oh, look at that neat shampoo. I've been wanting to use that for a long time. I'm sure that person wouldn't mind." Probably they wouldn't. But what's the motivation in that?

If we flip it from the negative way of saying it—not stealing, not taking what's not given—and give it a more positive aspect, it would be really coming from a sense of inner contentment, not just abstention from unskillful action. Dogen, the great Zen master, said, "The self and the world are just as they are—the gate of emancipation is open." When we're like that, when the self and the world are just as they are, in that sense of deep inner contentment, there's no thought of neediness even. If you saw that shampoo —"Oh, that's a nice shampoo"—the thought of wanting it doesn't even arise. In that state, the gate of emancipation is open. To me this is really the deepest expression of this second precept. And can this be enough for our life? A deep appreciation of what is just as it is, without needing something more.

Aitken Roshi, again talking about stealing and how much stealing comes from the sense of inner poverty, the sense of lack of contentment—and he's talking not just about stealing objects, that sense of inner poverty that we need more objects. He asks how much do we steal from ourselves? Do we steal peace from ourselves? When we get lost in some gaining idea, even in meditation, when we try to make ourselves someone else or try to gain some other state that we don't have, in that moment we're stealing peace from ourselves. We're stealing from ourselves the possibility of opening to what is true because we're so busy reaching for something else—the sense of inner poverty.

It says in the Tao Te Ching: "If you realize that you have enough, you are truly rich. Be content with what you have. Rejoice in the way things are. When you realize there is nothing lacking, the whole world belongs to you." When we're living with that understanding, when you realize that nothing is lacking, it makes no sense to want anything. That's the sense of the self and the world being just as they are. That's when the gate of emancipation is opened.

And when I continue to reflect on stealing, again it broadens from just my own immediate action to how I am as part of society. I question a lot whether stealing is part of our economic system. The whole capitalist system is set up in order to manufacture more wants for us. If you look at the ads on TV or in magazines, look at ads for kids' toys—the whole focus of them is to make the kids want that toy and go out and get it. I look in the New York Times Magazine and they have all these different perfume ads, all these new perfumes. Does the world need a new perfume? And then somehow I can find myself thinking, "Oh yeah, I really would like to have that perfume."

Where is that coming from? And what kind of society is it that runs on manufacturing more wants?

I got this statistic from the Union of Concerned Scientists talking about environmental crisis, and it hit me hard. Energy consumption in the United States, for example, is so high that 250 million Americans consume as much as all 4 billion people in developing nations. That's amazing. We consume as much as 4 billion other people in the world.

When I read that, I can't think of it as anything other than taking what is not freely given. And by my actions—when I turn the heat up in my house and keep it really warm—I'm stealing from other people in the world.

When I come back from England or Germany, England is a good example. It's really cold and they really keep the heat down. Once I was there in December, it was freezing. The house had a big meeting the first of December to decide whether to turn on the heat. They decided to turn it on and kept it at 58 degrees. We wouldn't dream of that. It was hell. It was really hard. I don't know if I could live like that.

But that kind of statistic is just enough to make me look. Every time I turn on the heat, it's an act. I don't mean I shouldn't have heat. But what's my intention? What's my motivation? Am I aware of my connectedness to everyone else in the world when I turn the heat up really high? Or if I decide to eat a hamburger? Am I aware that we are so interconnected that that hamburger has something to do with the fact that people are starving in the Horn of Africa? And I mean that quite literally.

I don't say this to bring up guilt about having a hamburger, but to really open my awareness to the depth of our interconnectedness. It becomes not a practice of guilt or feeling bad about everything that I do that other people in the world don't have, but rather that the choices I am able to make to let go of some things come out of love—out of the feeling of our oneness. With those choices, the visceral experience of our oneness deepens, and it's actually a practice of great joy, of deepening love and compassion and connection with the rest of the world.

When I shut off from that and just get back in my own little routine with a sense of disconnection, that's a real feeling of suffering. The openness to how we're all connected, even though it might make our life more difficult on the outward physical level, is actually so much richer.

I want to briefly mention the other three precepts because you can see from the ones I've talked about how carefully we can examine our intentions and how subtle it gets.

The third precept is not misusing sex—honoring our commitments to ourselves and to each other. Of course, on retreat you don't have much chance to act on sexual energy, but we can pay attention to where the impulses are coming from, simply to learn. Do we use our sexual energy from love and commitment? Or do we use it from fear, from neediness, from exploitation, for a sense of personal power, for self-image? Really to learn and to see how we affect each other. And when we talk about not hurting people through our sexual activities, I always like to add: remember that you're one of the people involved too. It also means not hurting yourself.

The fourth precept is working with wise, non-harming speech. Sometimes, for me anyway, this is the most complex and difficult area. It's so easy to stray off into harmful or frivolous speech. There are four areas that are traditionally spoken of: not lying, not using harsh or abusive speech, not using speech to divide—that kind of backbiting that causes division among people—and not just spending time in idle frivolous chatter. You can see that covers an awful lot of our speech.

I want to talk a little about just the complexities of the first one, not lying, which seems simple. I felt, "I don't lie. I don't have any intention to lie and no need to lie." But once a friend and I were leading a weeklong "sandwich retreat" in the city, where people would get together and sit in the evening, then everyone would go to work during the day, and come back the next evening. We were working with right speech. So one day we were all going to focus simply on not lying, just paying attention.

And I think we all went out feeling a little cocky, like, well, we don't lie, but we'll pay special attention today. When we came back to talk about it that night, every single one of us had at some point caught ourselves in a lie. And sometimes it was hours later before we realized it. It was really fascinating. And they were subtle. Some people found that they were lying through their actions—trying to give the impression that they were working really hard at work when actually they were completely spacing out. Someone else found that they were lying in order to protect someone else, or lying to maintain a particular self-image. Or they had a job in sales and found that in just doing their job, trying to sell, they found themselves telling lies. It was really fascinating to see.

And then I started paying more attention, noticing how many little exaggerations I might make in describing something. And what's the intention behind that? For self-image, to give a certain impression of myself? Or I don't really want to admit how many times I've done something stupid, so I sort of scale it down to about half. Just paying attention to things like that.

In retreats, I think this commitment to honesty in looking at our own minds, our own motivations, is one of the most powerful parts of the meditation practice for me. Because I see how much—just in paying attention to what's happening in my own mind, not even that I have to tell anybody about it, just to observe it for myself—how much of what's going on I somehow don't want to quite acknowledge. It's too painful, or it's too difficult, or it's too disgusting, or somehow I can't believe this is coming up again after twenty years. And to just really be honest with that, that that's okay. Honesty is so powerful.

It's said that of all the different perfections of a Buddha, the different qualities of mind that the Bodhisattva who's going to become the Buddha cultivates over eons and eons of lifetimes, truthfulness is the one that was never broken. Very powerful, this willingness to be honest.

And the fifth precept: not taking intoxicants or drugs that cloud the mind and lead to heedlessness. Again, that seems obvious. Or as Sayadaw U Pandita says, once you break the fifth precept and take intoxicants, it's so much easier then to mess up all the other four. But just watching that in ourselves, more out in life than here.

I just want to end by reading a short passage about how powerful this practice of working with the precepts can be, from Thich Nhat Hanh. It becomes really moving—from a sense of "should," perhaps, or a dry doing of what seems like it might be helpful in order to move the meditation along, it comes much, much more from an inner understanding, from a movement of the heart. And then the practice of sila is also a very powerful purification—purification of action. And it really is, in this time, the strong and necessary foundation for the deepening of our meditation practice. But it's much, much more than that.

This is a strong statement of the potential of our work with sila:

"In summary, it could be said that these precepts issue a clarion call of emptiness and non-ego in action. Each precept is permeated with the understanding that concepts, thoughts, and actions are inherently impermanent and insubstantial. Each precept enjoins a form of moral action that is based on non-separation and an aware state of compassion. Not holding on to a notion of self, we are invited to engage ourselves courageously in the world and, with discriminating awareness, to undertake the task of liberating all sentient beings."

It can be a very powerful practice.

CHAPTER 249

Arousing and Stabilizing Interest

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines the quality of interest as essential to sustaining vividly awake awareness in meditation. She discovers that what she calls "interest" naturally comprises the three factors of the Noble Eightfold Path: wise effort (viriya), wise concentration (samādhi), and wise mindfulness (sati). Using the memorable example of "Super Bowl Mind," she illustrates how we can sustain intense, focused attention without fatigue when genuinely engaged—but notes that without mindfulness, such attention lacks the non-discriminating quality essential to practice.
> Wilson explores how our habitual tendency to evaluate experience as pleasant or unpleasant creates subtle filters that distort perception, causing us to value some experiences over others and even affecting what we consciously perceive. She draws on psychological research and personal examples—from autumn leaves to the fall of the Berlin Wall—to demonstrate how beauty and sorrow, joy and suffering, cannot be separated. True mindfulness, she emphasizes, means equal willingness to be present with whatever arises, without preference or interpretation.
> The talk then turns to two mental factors that feed and strengthen interest: saṃvega (spiritual urgency) and investigation (dhammavicaya). Wilson recounts the Buddha's awakening to the four heavenly messengers and shares her own experience of urgency driving her spiritual search. She concludes with the seven conditions conducive to investigation—including questioning, cleanliness, associating with wise people, and total commitment to truth—and closes with the awakening poem of the Elder Nun Paṭācārā, reminding us that any moment can open us to liberation.

It's really nice to see you all. It feels like so long, as Sharon said the other night—it feels so long in between times of connection and seeing old friends, the people I don't work with. I feel like saying hi, hi. You're not supposed to. Sometimes we forget it's supposed to be in silence.

What I want to talk about tonight is interest—the quality of interest.

We've been speaking often in interviews and in the instructions about relaxing into this natural open space of awareness in which appearances arise spontaneously and effortlessly. The knowing of appearances also arises instantly and effortlessly—a kind of vividly awake awareness, as somebody describes it. And it sounds wonderful. The times that this is our experience, vividly awake awareness, we really know what it means: there's this bright connection and it's effortless.

But at least speaking for myself, perhaps more often than I care to admit, the experience of this open space of awareness is more like one of being lost in space. So what I want to talk about is how we can learn to stabilize this vividly awake awareness—just one aspect that might be helpful.

Because it has these qualities, this instantaneous knowing, this clear seeing. It has the elements of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration. And then we turn around and say, well, but it's relaxed. It's effortless. The question comes up in my mind: how to be in this non-distracted open state and at the same time be relaxed? It comes up a lot in interviews.

For many of us, what we've learned as a way to cultivate concentration and effort and mindfulness is a real striving, pushing kind of effort—a kind of clutching at the appearances, desperation in case we don't see them clearly enough before they go away. God forbid we should miss something. For many of us, this sense of striving, of pushing, is exhausting. Our whole practice is really an ongoing dance of learning what it means to be relaxed and at the same time vividly awake and energized.

I only want to speak to one hopefully helpful aspect of that tonight. I have no idea that I'm going to be covering this whole thing, but the aspect that to me has been very helpful, even essential, in getting a feeling for this is that of interest.

Now, I'm using the word interest rather broadly. What I'd like to talk about tonight under this heading of interest is first to describe an experiential sense of some aspects or factors making up what I'm calling interest—which surprisingly enough, and it was surprising to me, turned out to be the three factors of the Eightfold Path: energy, concentration, and mindfulness. I want to describe some of those as aspects of interest, and then also talk about two particular mental factors that we experience in our practice, factors that we can at times cultivate, that feed and help strengthen interest. These are the factors of spiritual urgency and investigation.

So the three qualities of interest first, just broadly describing it.

I was just told yesterday that there are different ways you can describe how people take in information. Many different ways you could organize it. But anyway, I was told by someone who was listening to me talk that I'm kinesthetic. I never thought about that. But in putting this together tonight, I realized it was true, because I was just feeling my way into what interest feels like in my experience. What are the essential qualities?

In doing that, I realized that there's a lively, energetic quality of attention. Interest is very awake, very present, very alive.

The second quality is that not only is it lively and awake, but interest also has a focused, steady quality of energy—non-distracted. If you're really interested in something, the mind isn't just flittering all over the place with restlessness. It's steady and focused.

The third quality is that with interest, when it's lively and focused like this, it allows us to know, to see what is, what we're interested in, as it is—without the bias of interpretation or preference, without a filter, but to know the truth without distorted perception.

And then I looked at these three and I said, oh, well that's wise effort, wise concentration, and wise mindfulness. Very interesting.

But a lot of times in thinking about—intellectually or imagining—being interested, staying interested over a period of time, this alert, focused quality of energy, we tend to think, oh, I can't sustain that. It's really tiring. It's draining. I can do it for a little while, but I just get burned out after some time of it.

But with a balanced interest, this isn't so at all. When we're truly interested in something, it brings energy. It's actually a delight to be fully present with whatever it is that the interest is connecting with. And we all have this experience. This quality arises quite naturally and spontaneously in our lives outside of here as well as in practice.

My favorite example of this—because it shows how universal and spontaneous this sustained quality of vibrant interest is—comes from two or three years ago when I was in California in January during the time of the Super Bowl. For those of you who are not from this country, this is the big playoff game of American football. The San Francisco team, the 49ers, was in this playoff—I think it was their second year in a row.

The quality of interest this generated was amazing. I know a lot of people in that area, and every single person I knew—that's all they were going to do that day. I was with a group of friends, and I mean, it's sort of a nice thing to watch, but I don't really care very much about football. Without exception, when the game was on, every single person was completely focused and attentive and filled with interest for every little nuance of movement of anybody on those teams.

And I realized it wasn't just my friends, because traffic stopped. During halftime, traffic started up again. Then it stopped again when the game started. And this was not a tiring experience. People at the end of the game didn't say, "Oh, I'm so exhausted from being so interested in the football game." They were much more energized, really taking a delight in everything that happened.

You can see that this quality of interest—and this is the energy and the focused part of it—arises quite spontaneously in our lives. And when it's like that, it's not tiring. We don't think, "I have to take a break now from being interested." It's really when we feel most alive. So I've been calling this quality in my mind "Super Bowl Mind."

But Super Bowl Mind is not really a balanced interest because it lacks mindfulness. It lacks mindfulness because, with perhaps rare exception, this is a quality of consciousness that is definitely colored with greed. I mean, there were few people, I would imagine, watching that game purely for the delight of each movement. There was a definite desire for a certain result, and everything that happened was judged or evaluated by how it related to that result.

If we can put so much interest into a game like football—and ultimately, how meaningful is that for our life? Some people, and I have a friend whose voice I can hear now, to him it's very meaningful. But for many of us it's not all that meaningful. Yet that same vibrant energy is accessible for the whole dance of our life. It's always accessible if we can but open to it.

This is where the quality of mindfulness comes in—bringing that interest to know the dance of life just as it's happening right now, without looking for a particular result, without needing for some particular thing to happen, but simply bringing this full force of energetic attention and steadiness to whatever is happening right now. This is the quality of mindfulness, or sati—to know things in themselves just as they are, without expectation, without looking for any kind of payoff. This nondiscriminating awareness, awareness of just what is without preferences, is a very essential quality of the factor of mindfulness. And it's this, coupled with the energy and the steady focus of mind, these coming together, that allows for interest in whatever it is that's happening.

I want to say a bit about this essential aspect of nondiscriminating awareness. Because our habit, as I'm sure you've noticed here—the habit, both conscious and unconscious, of our minds—is to evaluate, to judge our experience or any particular aspect of experience as either good or bad, positive or negative, based on whether we experience it as pleasant or unpleasant. Neutral experiences we just tend not to even notice.

This is an amazingly subtle tendency. It causes us to value some aspects of life, of our mind-body process, any particular experience—it causes us to value some more than others, to give interest and attention more to some aspects of our experience than to others. And this tendency to judge things according to pleasant and unpleasant is so subtle that it can even affect what we consciously perceive.

I've used this example other times. I got it out of a book called Vital Lies, Simple Truths about the psychology of self-deception—a very interesting book. In it, the author, Daniel Goleman, talks about one particular psychological experiment testing what people were conscious of perceiving, of noticing.

There were two aspects to this experiment. The first involved setting the mind to want a particular thing, making that thing pleasant. There's a short video, four or five minutes, of a fast basketball game—I guess this is sports night—and the subjects were ordered to count how many times the ball was passed, which was a lot. So they were very focused; that was the object of attention, what was wanted. And in the middle of that, a woman in white with a white parasol strolled through the middle of the basketball court, in one side and out the other.

What was so interesting was that the people in the experiment didn't notice this.

And when they were asked about it later—you know how when you just can't believe something, absolutely no way, I was watching every second, that couldn't have happened. And then they showed the video again and of course it was blatantly obvious.

That's how this fixation of the mind, this preference towards a particular thing, can completely distort what we consciously perceive.

They did another experiment, this one geared to stimulus that was frightening or threatening—just drawings. Subjects had to look at different drawings and then later remember what they'd seen and describe them. Certain aspects of experience that were particularly fearful or threatening to some of the subjects' psyches would be included in some of the drawings. They would not remember that part of the drawing.

For instance, say one part of the drawing was just an innocuous person reading a newspaper. Perhaps the other part was some scary, violent thing that was particularly threatening to that person. They wouldn't remember that part. And somehow—this I don't remember too clearly—they had some way of measuring where the people's eyes actually looked when they were looking at the drawing. They saw that in some subliminal way, people managed to know where not to look. They picked up some kind of preconscious signal and consciously didn't even look at the threatening part of the picture.

Very interesting, this predilection to value our experience by pleasant or unpleasant.

Mindfulness is completely non-discriminating. Equal interest, equal willingness to be fully present with whatever aspect of experience is arising right now, without valuing or interpretation or judgment. This is what cuts through our confusion, allows us to know just what is, without filters, without interpretation. It allows a balance of perception, not leaning towards one side or the other.

Thich Nhat Hanh speaks about this quite often. He talks about the need to be mindful of both great beauty and great suffering. I myself find it one of the paradoxes of my practice that as I open more, I open to both—much more depth of appreciation and joy and beauty, and simultaneously to deeper experiences of anguish and pain, both my own and the world's.

You can see it in your own experience, over and over and over. Can we hold both experiences, allow both experiences without judgment, without choosing one over the other? It doesn't even sound right to us. How could we possibly say that you can't choose what is good and beautiful over what is ugly and distorted and violent? It doesn't make sense in our world. But in the space of non-discriminating mindfulness, it is just that—allowing what is, without the judgments.

Just a couple of personal examples that to me show how it's hard to say what is good, what is bad, what is positive or negative.

A simple one, given how beautiful the leaves have been this fall. I just look out the window of where I live and it's like the woods are on fire. It's incredibly beautiful. I have a moment of deep opening to this, really deep appreciation. So far, the last week, I've been watching this. Every single time, almost immediately, there's been an uprising of deep sadness, a kind of poignancy, a sorrow. It's like they kind of go together—personal sorrow, a sense of poignancy at the ending of things, sometimes a more universal sorrow, sometimes no thought at all.

When I find myself contracting around, trying to shut away the sorrow—thinking this is in the way of my appreciating the leaves, go away and let me just see how beautiful it is—as soon as I contract around the sorrow, there's no more appreciation of the beauty going on. There's been the sense of a barrier coming down, and it's just seeing, seeing, very pretty.

It's really interesting. How can I say the sadness is bad and the appreciation is good?

In a bigger scope, in the world—thinking back to when the Berlin Wall first came down, there was a sense of euphoria. When some of the countries in Eastern Europe first became free to self-determine their own government and way of living, there was such a sense of how wonderful this is, how positive, how thrilling and exciting.

And now, from that same situation—that's still true, all of that. And there's also so much confusion now. The freedom to self-determine in some places has turned into the freedom to hate and actively act that out against peoples who are somehow perceived as different. It's turned into wars. It's turned into real conservative, anti-foreigner violence. It's really painful and scary.

How can one be separated from the other? How can one say, well, they should have just stayed how they were and then all this wouldn't be happening? Who knows?

One more example: I have two friends, different people, who are both HIV positive. Watching them over the years—neither of them is particularly sick—watching them over the years as the diagnosis and the implications and the various things that come up have been sinking into them, I've seen the fear and the ongoing physical discomfort, the suffering of that. And at the same time, both of them in their different ways are just radiating light and love. People more and more just want to be around them. They're opening up and filling the people who come around them with metta. They're really deepening their understanding and their wisdom. It's very obvious when I'm around them. It's beautiful. How can I separate one from the other, or say this is bad and shouldn't be happening while this should be?

So with mindfulness, there's an equally vivid interest in whatever it is that's happening, without knowing—no way of knowing—what effect, what result might come from that. And knowing that we can see, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, the profound nature of reality in anything, who are we to say which appearance is going to open up the nature of reality to us and which one is a waste of time?

Again, Thich Nhat Hanh talks about this a lot—how we value a rose and disdain garbage. But when a rose dies, we throw it into the garbage. It becomes the garbage. And when the garbage goes into compost and we put it on the garden, that garbage itself becomes the rose. There's not any separation.

This sense of balance of perception—nothing unduly going towards the pleasant or pushing away the unpleasant—because that's just how appearances present themselves. And it continues to be fascinating to me in my own inquiry, as it keeps on going, to keep seeing more and more the subtle levels of this tendency of the mind to somehow value the pleasant as more true than the unpleasant. I mean, it's certainly more pleasant. It's more desirable. We're not arguing about that. We're not saying we can't tell the difference. It's just that subtle valuing of it. And if I'm not really awake, it's easy for practice to drift into a subtle pursuit of the pleasant without really knowing it.

Just one example, if this ever happens in your own practice. You're feeling pretty clear and aware. You're noticing whatever appears. If you're noting it, you notice it as soon as it comes. It's pleasant, it's unpleasant, it's neutral. It comes, it goes. You know, just—I'm really here. And suddenly, a new kind of state comes up, really light or really peaceful or really spacious. It's like, "Ah! I'm so clear now. There's no need to note this. It just gets in the way. I'm so vividly awake I can just hang out with this."

That is a red flag, because usually what the noting is getting in the way of is not the experience. The noting is getting in the way of seeing our attachment to what is very pleasant. And so as soon as I notice I'm drifting into this—"I'm so clear, I don't really need that noting anymore"—just check it out. What's really going on?

Some people, of course, do this in the reverse, where the mind gets so hooked into noticing the painful or the unpleasant. This is often the case when we're in a state of strong self-judgment or self-hatred or self-doubt. You might be quite clear but seeing through this filter, and then the pains are really noticed, all the fear is noticed, all the stupid thoughts that come up are noticed, all the patterns that you've seen a million times are noticed. Then there's a moment of real clarity—it's not noticed. It's discounted. It was a mistake. It came in here by mistake.

Or often people come into interviews and describe really being filled with something pleasant, perhaps love or compassion. And so often there's this disclaimer: "Well, I'm probably not remembering it right." Or, "It felt like compassion, but it probably really wasn't compassion. It's just, you know, I'm mistaking pity or something else for compassion." There's this sense of—and this is just as much identification as being identified with the pleasant—"It's not possible that I could experience a pleasant one of the Brahma-viharas, or some concentration, or whatever experience."

Both of these, Upandita calls these getting attached to the pleasant or the unpleasant—stopping within. It's like in the space of clarity, of awareness, appearances come and go, and there's one that the mind clutches around. Even if so subtly, you're not quite aware of the clutching, it's like we stop. The mind stops within and hangs out there, either in this pleasant open space or sometimes we stop within the most painful, excruciating experience. Simply to notice that all of this is coming from our interpreting experience through the quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, and putting some kind of value judgment on it.

This is a question for me—I don't know if it's true. Sometimes I wonder, is there any interpretation of experience that is not based on valuing pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral? I'm really curious, so if you notice an interpretation that's not based on that, I'd like to hear about it.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Indian man who certainly from his writing seems to have been quite awake, said: "The mind is restless. All it knows is restlessness with its many modes, its many varieties. The pleasant are considered superior and the painful are discounted. What we call progress is merely a changeover from the unpleasant to the pleasant. Changes can't bring us to the changeless." And then he goes on to say from his own experience: "I experience pleasure and pain in consciousness, but I am neither consciousness nor its content. I am neither consciousness nor its content."

This is, to me, a really powerful expression of knowing things just as they are, without interpretation, without judgment. And this is the quality of mindfulness, clear knowing, non-discriminating awareness. This clear knowing together with energy and focused, non-distracted attention—these taken all together is what I'm calling interest. It's vivid, alert awareness that can sustain itself in a non-distracted way.

Here is a description of that from Krishnamurti: "You will discover for yourself that the only way to look at yourself is totally, immediately, without time. And you can see the totality of yourself only when the mind is not fragmented. What you see in totality is the truth. So when you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment. And then there's no room for fear, no room for contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

This totality of interest and attention, and therefore no fear and no conflict—this leads into what I want to talk about next: How do we wake up this quality of total interest, complete self-abandonment? How do we keep renewing it, keep it alive?

There are two mental factors that I've personally found very helpful. The first is spiritual urgency, called in Pali samvega. The second is investigation.

Krishnamurti's description of this total quality of attention is in a way a good description of the quality of interest that's aroused through this mental factor of spiritual urgency. It's a powerful and compelling state, often arising—although not always—after awakening to our own suffering and confusion, or to the world's suffering and confusion. It's this urgency to be free from this, to know the truth. And in this state of spiritual urgency, this becomes more compelling than any other condition in our lives. It's that complete self-abandonment that Krishnamurti talks about.

Here is a short description of how this urgency can feel, from Chinul, who brought Zen to Korea. And this is strong, but this is how urgency feels: "The triple world is blazing in torments as if it were a house on fire. How can you bear to linger here and complacently undergo such long suffering? If you wish to avoid wandering in samsara, there's no better way than to seek Buddhahood."

And that's the energy: How can you want to keep lingering here? So seek Buddhahood. You can see it takes us right into interest, inquiry, investigation. For me, all these questions come up: What is Buddhahood? What is suffering? What did the Buddha discover that put an end to this feeling of being in a house on fire? How can I discover it? It becomes compelling. It wakes us up. When urgency is awakened in us, interest isn't a problem—it quite spontaneously arises.

Also, we're not easily distracted. The classical example is given: if you're away from home and someone comes running to tell you that your house is on fire, you start going home immediately. You're not going to be distracted by friends coming up and saying, "Let's go have a cup of tea, let's stop and have a chat." It's not even a question. The urgency of wanting to see what's happening, to get out of that suffering, is so compelling.

I do think that urgency needs the balance of sati, of mindfulness, because I can imagine it turning into a blind kind of expectation or efforting, or even despair at the depth or quality of suffering. But this is shading into something else entirely. That is not urgency. Samvega is this energy, this deep interest to inquire, to come to freedom, to understand the nature of suffering and how to be free of it. It's not about feeling sorry for ourselves or getting lost in despair. And it's not about looking for a particular result or how things should be. It gives us the energy to stay very present and focused, to inquire into what is in order to understand it.

As I mentioned, this urgency is often aroused through suffering, either our own or that of others. The classical example is that of the Buddha before he was the Buddha, when he was the Prince Siddhartha. I'm not going to go into the whole story, but as most of you probably know, he was this very wealthy prince protected by his family from any signs of sickness or death or decay. They even snipped off the flowers before they wilted, so he would have no intimation of impermanence.

What aroused his urgency was going outside his palace walls and seeing what are often called the four heavenly messengers: an old person, a sick person, a dead person, and then a monk, a renunciate. Upon inquiry, on realizing that old age, sickness, and death would inevitably happen to him and to everyone else in the world, and seeing the impermanent, unsatisfactory nature of his experience, it just became impossible for him to any longer enjoy his life, to go back and become complacent again with his comforts. This urgency to be free, to understand, to know truth outweighed everything else at that time.

I wanted to read something I really like as a statement of urgency. This is not from the suttas but from some commentarial material, purporting to be what the Buddha was speaking to his charioteer, who was going back to his father who was grieving. This is right as Prince Siddhartha had left, the night he departed:

"So that my father's grief may be dispelled, tell him that I have gone to this penance for the purpose of putting an end to old age and death. And by no means because I yearn for heaven, and not because I feel no affection for him, or from resentment. Since I have left for the homeless life with this end in view, there's no reason why he should grieve for me. Someday, in any case, all unions must come to an end. It is just because we must reckon with perpetual separation that I am determined to win salvation. For then I shall no more be born away from my kindred. There's no reason to grieve for me who has left for the homeless life so as to end all grief. Rather grieve over those who greedily cling to the passions in which all grief is rooted. My father will perhaps say that it was too early for me to leave for the forest. But there's no such thing as a wrong season for Dhamma. Our hold on life is so uncertain. Death confronts me all the time. How do I know how much of life is still at my disposal?"

This is the sense of urgency. It might not always be so dramatic. The Buddha is clearly our most shining example. But I remember in my own case, it wasn't so much some kind of clear-cut suffering as an undercurrent of something just not being quite right—an undercurrent of the unsatisfactory nature of things that awoke the sense of urgency to know, to be free.

I was in college, just starting, and I remember really clearly I started to have this sense of: what's the purpose of this? I go and I learn these things, and what can I do with it? I was studying literature. Then I can teach it to other people. And what will they do with it? They'll teach it to other people. And it just keeps going around in this circle. I felt so strongly the meaninglessness of it all, with no understanding of it. But I see now that's really part of the cycle of samsara.

It drove me to quit college in my first year, and then the next year to go to India—not having a clue what I was looking for, traveling alone and scared to death, really miserable actually. But this urgency, this compelling need to understand, to be at peace, gives us strength and courage, a kind of commitment to go through obstacles and fears that we could never go through without it.

And it was there that I ended up doing my first ten-day meditation course that year. It was much as Steve Armstrong described his—not understanding a thing about what was going on, going through ten days of physical pain and torment, and walking out of there with my life completely changed. I knew when I walked out that it really did change my life.

That urgency enables us to go through all kinds of difficult things and lets us put down, move away from what we hold as dear, what we think we need in order to live. Urgency feeds this interest, this inquiry, and that in turn can continually reawaken the sense of urgency. Because like everything, urgency is a mental factor. It arises due to conditions and it passes away when those conditions fade away.

And so easily—sometimes I feel that the whole last twenty years of my life since that first course has been a struggle against complacency. It's so easy to get comfortable and think, "Oh well, just now I've got it. It's peaceful. I know this is good enough. I'll float along." But when we're really wanting to wake up, everything in life kind of conspires to reawaken the interest, to reawaken the urgency.

Our culture here does a good job of hiding those four heavenly messengers. Old people, by and large, aren't so mingled with the families anymore and live in the same housing or apartment developments. Sick people are put away in hospitals. Dying people—you never see a dead person lying on the street. You hardly ever see a dead person. In Asia, you don't see monks very much or nuns either; they're put away in cloisters. In Asia, it's all just part of life.

But still here, if we just are interested, even for a moment, again it wakes us up. The other day, I spent the afternoon in a big hospital in Worcester. And just for a little while, I kind of came out of my self-involvement, started looking around. And just seeing the pain and fear in people's faces—people of all ages from the very old to young children with chronic diseases walking around or on stretchers—it really hits. What am I waiting for? What makes me think I have time to be complacent?

And this one image that's with me so clearly: a woman in the elevator clutching her overcoat, her clothes, in desperation, and there was so much anguish in her body language and her face. I have no idea what her story was, but it just zapped me really strongly. Again, it reawakened my sense of urgency—of I don't have time to fool around. I can't take it for granted.

So you can see how urgency is a very strong factor in awakening and keeping interest alive. Interest arises quite spontaneously.

The last quality of mind I want to speak about just briefly is this factor of investigation. Investigation is one of the seven factors of enlightenment—seven mental factors, qualities of energy that when balanced allow the mind to open spontaneously to what is true. They'll be talked about a lot more over the course of the three months.

Investigation is this non-thinking, non-thought-based inquiry. It's described as the ability to know by non-intellectual discernment, to know the true nature of our mental and physical experience. When investigation is present, they describe it as lighting up the field of awareness. Investigation lights up whatever appearance is arising as the object of awareness, and so the mind can penetrate into the true nature of whatever is arising.

You could kind of feel how when there's this lit-up quality to the awareness, to whatever is arising, there's quite naturally an interest. Oh, what is this coming? How is it acting? How does it disappear? What is it actually? And you could feel how investigation is one of the three energetic factors of enlightenment because it brings energy.

While they say that the immediate cause of investigation arising is insight—and you can see how that's so, when you have a strong insight everything lights up, the awareness lights up, the mind lights up, there's lots of interest, there's really this close investigation of what's going on, things are energized—this is how insight brings about investigation.

But also, it's classically spoken of that there are seven conditions that are conducive to the arising of investigation. In other words, we don't have to just sit there and hope that an insight will arise so that we can have some investigation be present. These are interesting, these seven factors. The first one is questioning.

Questions related to Dhamma, related to practice, simply questioning what has happened now, what is happening right now. Nisargadatta again: "In its own place and time, nothing is wrong. But when you are concerned with truth, with reality, you must question everything, your very life." That quality of questioning clearly would arouse interest.

The second condition, and I think this one's quite interesting and unexpected, is cleanliness and neatness of our own body and of our surroundings. They call it cleanliness of the inner and outer sense spaces. It says that when things are clean, when things are neat and tidy, it helps brightness and clarity of mind. So I started paying attention. It's true—when things are dirty and untidy, the tendency of the mind is to be confused. I started to notice this: if I walk into my room, whether I'm on retreat or not, and everything's thrown all over, my mind kind of gets scattered. It starts here and it goes there and can't quite decide which thing to do first, or it just feels oppressed, not very light. That was quite an interesting observation.

The third quality conducive to the arising of investigation is the balancing of the five spiritual faculties or powers that Stephen Smith talked about the other night—faith balanced with wisdom, concentration balanced with energy, and mindfulness as the overall balancing. I would think this would be conducive to the arising of almost any of the seven factors of enlightenment, because when the five powers are balanced, we're energized, we're seeing clearly, mindfulness is strong, we're not unbalanced. Kind of an obvious one.

The fourth and fifth conducive conditions are avoiding foolish people and associating with wise people. If you think about it for a minute, it's pretty obvious. When we hang out with people who are foolish, often our behavior kind of sinks down to the lowest common denominator. Spending time with really wise people lights us up. When I go to hear the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh, I come away really energized. What do they know? How did they get like that? What do they know that I don't know? And how can I find out? It happens quite naturally. It's not effortful.

Being here with each other, we all serve in that way for one another here in the Sangha. Yes, at moments, each of you is the wise person that everyone else is admonished to spend time with. None of you is the foolish person—I hope you're thinking that. But you can see when your energy lags, you're tired, you feel like you can't do it anymore, and then you see someone who's so steady it really brings up the inspiration: "Oh, I'll just look a little harder." Or if you see someone who's clearly suffering a lot, that will also often arouse us out of complacency and say, "Well, how do I know I don't have another minute, another hour before that's what's going on for me? Let me really pay attention. Let me investigate." Listening to each other's really sincere questions can light up a whole area of investigation. The Sangha is such an invaluable support. You're all such an invaluable support to one another in this field of investigation.

The sixth conducive condition, also sort of obvious: wise reflection, used in moderation. Reflection on any insights you might have had on impermanence, on the preciousness of our human life, on the unknown time of the ending of our human life, the shortness of time. Sometimes I reflect on the three refuges, on just what it is I can really take refuge in—in truth, in the Dhamma, in the Sangha. That will also arouse my interest in investigation.

And the last one is interesting too: real commitment to cultivation of investigation. Actually the notes I had said total commitment to cultivation of investigation. Nisargadatta again—this is an expression of total commitment: "The desire to discover the truth will be surely fulfilled, providing you want nothing else. But you must be honest with yourself and really want nothing else."

There are moments when that might be true for each of us. Simply reflecting on what I really want all those other moments—that in itself arouses investigation again. It's quite fascinating. What do I really want right now more than truth?

It's kind of embarrassing sometimes. Luckily you don't have to tell anybody else.

So you can see how these factors of investigation and urgency contribute quite strongly to this interest in recognizing and stabilizing the non-distracted quality of this vividly awake awareness—this effortless noticing of appearances as they arise and pass.

And in that awareness, there's no question. We know that any activity, any appearance whatsoever can show us the profound nature of reality. There's no choice. We don't need to pick and choose.

I want to close with one short poem, showing how any activity can open us to the truth. This is from one of the first women who ordained as a nun during the time of the Buddha. Her name was Patachara. An interesting story, but I don't have time to tell it—that's just a lead for you to follow. She went through immense suffering, lost her mind, was really quite lost. She came to the Buddha, and he basically said, "I can't take away your suffering. You've cried mountains of tears in all your lives." And she came back to her senses and ordained as a nun.

This poem was written sometime later, describing her moment of awakening. You can also hear the suffering in it:

I've done everything right and followed the rule of my teacher.
I'm not lazy or proud.
Why haven't I found peace?
Bathing my feet, I watched the bath water spill down the slope.

We never know when or where.

Just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 250

The Nature of Attachment

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed examination of upādāna (grasping or attachment), one of the key links in paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination). She distinguishes between taṇhā (craving)—the mind inclining toward something—and upādāna—the firm taking hold that follows when mindfulness is absent. Drawing from the Buddha's own hesitation to teach because "this generation relishes attachment," Wilson illuminates how each moment of unnoticed grasping strengthens the next, creating a blinding quality that obscures the peace always present.
> Wilson explores two primary domains of attachment: kāmupādāna (grasping at sense pleasures) and diṭṭhupādāna (grasping at views and opinions). Through vivid personal stories—including a memorable journey to Heathrow Airport—she demonstrates how suffering arises not from circumstances but from the grasping itself. She references the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta and Thích Nhất Hạnh's commentary, emphasizing that when we simply observe "my mind is desiring" without fear, we see the impermanence and selflessness of both the attachment and its object.
> The talk offers practical guidance for retreat practice: noticing how consciousness contracts around grasped objects, tracing attachment back to simple sense contact, and discovering that peace emerges naturally when grasping dissipates. Wilson emphasizes patience and non-judgment, reminding practitioners that understanding attachment—not fighting it—is what opens us to freedom. She closes with the Third Zen Patriarch's teaching: "When the heart exists undisturbed in the way, nothing in the world can offend."

I'm sorry I had to cancel last night at the last minute. I appreciate your coming back tonight.

Tonight what I'd like to talk about is a highly unusual and original topic: attachment, or grasping. One of the things the Buddha said to himself during that period when he was trying to decide whether to teach—I love this quote—he was reflecting on how hard the truth is to discover, and he said: "Because this generation relies on attachment, this generation relishes attachment, delights in attachment, it's hard for them to see the truth."

That describes us at times pretty well.

What I mean by grasping is this: when we talk about craving, it's compared to the mind inclining towards something, groping in the dark to steal an object. Grasping is like, "got it." You've really grabbed it. It's taken a firm hold. In the chain of dependent origination, craving arises on contact with pleasant feeling when there's not mindfulness. Grasping is what develops in the next moment, and each moment of grasping strengthens the next—this really grabbing hold and not being able to let go.

So that cheery topic is what I would like to discuss tonight, and really in some ways on quite a fine level, on a microscopic level.

But I want to share something that helps put things in perspective. After some period of sitting, some weeks, as you've all been here now, we are working and seeing things on a very minute, very microscopic level. I love being able to talk about, for example, the arising of grasping as a moment-to-moment experience. But sometimes, often actually, people say after a period of practice that it feels so inward, so self-involved, that they start to feel disconnected or wondering if it's relevant—sitting here obsessed about attachment to having a certain seat in the cafeteria, for example.

The other night, there was a brief, maybe twenty-minute special. Some film crews had gone to Somalia, and it was quite affecting for me. They were filming and talking to people who looked like they were going to die the next minute from starvation. Very real. Just hundreds of these people—women, children, men. They were also filming how the whole famine there is not caused by drought or natural conditions. It's caused by people's greed and delusion. They filmed gangs of men with machine guns and anti-aircraft guns going around literally stealing food and blankets with guns, just ripping them away from starving women and children, then selling them on the black market for money, attacking relief warehouses with fifty machine guns. It's really amazing what's going on. And in the midst of it, lots of volunteers, many of them Westerners, just trying to help bring in the food, bring in some medical aid.

It was very affecting to me. And it had the effect, in my heart anyway, not of thinking, "Oh, what are we doing here obsessing about our minute little problems while this is going on?" Rather, this is what happens when we don't understand the nature of attachment. When it runs wild and blinds us in a huge way, it leads to this kind of thing in the world, all over the world. It's exaggerated, but the process isn't any different from how attachment or grasping arises in a moment of our experience—how it feeds itself when we're afraid of it or don't understand it.

I really feel quite deeply that what we're doing here is not irrelevant to that. It's a very deep way of learning that peace and freedom is accessible, learning how not to be blinded by grasping—and that's going to have a profound effect on anyone we come in contact with. I feel so strongly the connection: everyone here has such a commitment to understand this process in themselves, to know what peace is. We really are doing it for all beings. We're not irrelevant. We're not isolated. We're not just playing with mental ideas. What we're doing here is very real.

So, from the big perspective down to a much smaller perspective, let's talk about this experience of attachment or grasping.

In your experience, there's really only six things that happen: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical touch, and mental experience. That's it. Six objects just coming over and over and over. It's amazing what a big deal we make about it.

Any one of these six sense objects that arise—there's contact. There's the eye, there's a sight object, there's eye consciousness, contact, feeling. If the feeling is pleasant, there can be craving. If it's unpleasant, aversion. In the next moment, if there's mindfulness—if there's sati in that moment—then with the sati we understand the nature of the craving, the nature of the object of craving. In a way we see its impermanence, we know its ephemeral, non-satisfying nature. Wisdom arises in that moment and the craving dissipates. That moment might seem like nothing special—many, many moments like that in our life on this retreat.

But when the sati's not there, when the wisdom doesn't arise in that moment of craving, the next moment that's conditioned is one of grasping—that really grabbing hold of the experience. And that's what blinds us, where the mind gets fixated on a particular thing.

Something simple: there's a pleasant smell. We don't really notice the pleasantness. It's grasped at. The mind gets fixated in some fantasy of food, not really even noticing where that fixation began. This is the grasping that blinds us.

This is from the Buddha: "For some people, contact—the point where sense plus object meet each other—this point is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity. And because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does, and so their craving ends. They realize total calm."

Really, here he's saying that because of understanding the nature of our experience, the craving ends. We realize total calm because of understanding. That's why I want to talk about this nature of attachment or grasping tonight—to help us continue to look at it, to understand it. Through that understanding, we touch the peace and calm that's always available quite naturally. We don't have to create anything.

Of course, often we're not going to notice this right at the point of contact. Quite often we wake up far, far along in the experience of grasping. Perhaps there was a pleasant feeling of warmth, clinging, craving that feeling, and then it gets into clinging, and the next thing you know you're in a long extended fantasy about a vacation in the tropics—what you're going to do when you leave here, on and on and on, really lost in it. You can see how it's blinding, but there's no sense of what's happening here, no appreciation for what's happening in the moment. And when we wake up, it's even worse to wake back up in Massachusetts when you've been hanging out in Bali for the last ten minutes.

When we talk about craving, how blinding it is, I use that quotation: when a pickpocket sees a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets. A blinding quality of grasping.

This is the Buddha again: "There are many kinds of suffering in the world and all of them grow from the same source: grasping. When a person knows no better, she or he gives way to this grasping and slow and dulled goes through one misery after another."

He doesn't try to sugarcoat things. "So do not create this misery for yourselves. Use your knowledge to see how suffering begins and develops in attachment." See—over and over, he doesn't say hate it, fear it, get rid of it, pretend it's not happening. He's saying use your wisdom. See how suffering begins and develops in attachment.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh commenting on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, where it says, "When the mind is desiring something, one is aware: my mind is desiring." It's very simple. You don't have to be afraid of it. You're simply aware: my mind is desiring.

His commentary: "In identifying the mind of desire, in observing the nature of that mind and the nature of the object of desire, we will see the impermanence, the selflessness, and the interdependence of it, and we will no longer be dominated by that mind."

The attachment itself is ephemeral, has no inherent nature, arises because of conditions and ceases when those conditions change. With wisdom, with mindfulness, we see this and we can see through the attachment to the peace that the attachment blinds us to.

On an experiential level, how can we experience the nature of grasping? I love watching this happen in a sitting—unless I'm in a really judgmental frame of mind—because it's so interesting. We're sitting or walking or anything, but it's easier to observe in sitting relatively calmly. Appearances are arising and passing. There's hearing and seeing and thinking and sensation and the breath coming and going. There's that sense of open, spacious awareness. It's peaceful. It's calm. No appearance is a particular problem.

And suddenly, out of this flow of changing perception, one perception arises. "Oh, the breath should be clearer," I thought. And that particular perception—the mind inclines to it and grasps. It's almost like a physical contraction in that moment. I can feel as if the consciousness, which has been open and spacious as the sky, suddenly becomes as contracted and small and hard as a little pebble around this thought. It could be anything. It doesn't have to be a thought. "I wonder what's for lunch," or "I want to hear that sound again," whatever it happens to be.

In that contraction, the mind is unbalanced. Almost physically, the body could feel unbalanced. There's a sense of solidification. And that one isolation and grasping and identification, not seeing, leads to a whole flow of constructs and story and endless suffering. In that moment of the consciousness contracting, there's immediate separation. There's an immediate sense of me or self, and other, the object grasped. Immediately there's a sense of there's a problem, where before there was no problem.

A simple example: if you've experienced the VR phenomenon—you know, Vipassana romance—you're just simply walking outside, minding your own business, lifting, moving, placing, noticing, hearing, smelling, feeling. And suddenly there's a sight. This person walks by, but the experience is simply seeing. And it's pleasant, and that's not noticed, and a craving arises, and there's a strong grasping. What is the experience in that moment where things have been quite peaceful? There's such a sense of self and other. A whole construct begins of me and them and what I want and what do they think about me and what do I think about them. I wish all these other people weren't here in the way. Everything has become constricted. It's extremely unpleasant. It can really feel like a prison. And one moment of grasping not noticed leads into stronger and stronger grasping—to get rid of the grasping, trying to tell ourselves to stop it. It just goes on and on.

Contrast that with the same kind of walking outside when the mind is clear, simply noticing the sensations, noticing the sounds. Clarity. A sense of peace. There's such an exquisite appreciation of whatever—just the sense of the foot lifting, a little caterpillar going across the driveway, the sound of the leaves. When things are so vivid and it's so exquisitely peaceful.

What's the difference? It's simply that the mind, the consciousness, is free from attachment or aversion—really two sides of the same thing—in that moment. It's not a peace that's created. It's that the attachment is so blinding that we can't recognize or touch this peace which is always present, here and now. It's always what is true and accessible. It's the attachment, the grasping, that blinds us to this. It's attachment that gets us thinking we have to do something special to know what it is to be peaceful, to be free, when really it's always available. It's the absence of being caught in attachment itself. It's not the situation.

Here I will dredge up an old story that I haven't told for a few years, but it's a good grasping story about the difference between when grasping is present and when it's not.

A few years ago, I was in a relationship with a man who was living in England. I was working here and had gone over there for a week. It was one of these special week-long tickets that you can't change—if you miss it, you just lose the money. Plus, I had to be back here.

We were in London the night before my flight. He doesn't know London. Neither of us knew London. He's American. We were staying at a friend's apartment, but the friends were away, so we didn't have anyone around who could help us.

We get up in the morning. It's all fine. I'm getting ready to call a taxi to go to the train to the airport. No problem. And he got it in his mind that he really wants to drive me to the airport so we can have more time together. He really got it in his mind. It was very strong grasping. I was saying, "Well, you don't know the way. I don't know the way. And it's really easy to take the train."

We spent the next hour—when we could have been enjoying each other's company—arguing about this. Finally, I just gave up. He was just so strong. I could really see the grasping quality. I said, "Okay."

Now, of course, it's late because we spent all this time arguing. The only map we had was one of these London A to Z guides, which has a page for each block or something. Very detailed, but if you don't know how to get from A to Y, it really doesn't help to have all these pages in between because you don't know which to use. So that's what we had, and we're trying to figure out how to go. We're in the car. I'm looking at the map. Get on this street, and then I have to find the next page, and by the time I'd find it, we'd be off of the next map already. We were really quite late.

Now, I was really grasping: "I have to make this plane." That was the thought in my mind, totally grasped onto. This time together was really pleasant, I can tell you. So I was wildly looking through this. He was driving like a maniac. We finally got on the right motorway, got partway out, and hit a total dead-stop traffic jam. Neither of us knew if we'd gotten off there where to go to take a shortcut.

I was in a total frenzy, just totally gone in this grasping, really suffering. And suddenly, when we hit this traffic jam, it all blew up in a bubble. I thought, "Oh, I'm going to miss the plane." It really hit, and the whole grasping just dissipated. Confronted with the facts, there was nothing to grasp. It completely dissipated, and in an instant I was quite relaxed. I was looking around going, "Oh, look at all these cars. Well, I've never missed a plane internationally." I was quite in a pleasant space again.

Nothing had changed except the grasping had gone away. All the suffering wasn't about missing the plane or him having a different idea from me. It was because of the grasping in the mind that blinded me to anything else.

To go on, I ended up not missing the plane. I used to not say this, but then people would really ask me the next day what happened. We got to the airport with like ten minutes to make the plane, and then all the grasping came back. Everybody was in my way. I ran to the head of the immigration line, pushed myself in, ran to the plane. I was the last one on. They shut the doors, and we sat there for forty-five minutes.

This is life. But it was such a clear experience of: it's not the situation that's suffering, it's the grasping.

I saw this guy a year or so ago, and out of nowhere he said, "Remember our ride to the airport?" I said, "Yeah, I use it in a Dharma talk." He said, "Well, do you tell my side?" So I'm probably not telling his side.

When we begin to investigate the nature of attachment, of grasping, in this way, for one thing it's fascinating. But for another, we can't help but see how often it arises and how easily the mind is seduced. And so I want to say about this: the importance of patience, equanimity, and non-judging. We're here to explore, to discover, not to judge ourselves for what we're seeing, because it's the nature of our human condition. We're all in this together.

There are a few areas where I find it helpful to identify this process of attachment where we so easily get lost. Traditionally they talk about four areas. I'm really only going to talk about two tonight.

The first kind of grasping they talk about is the obvious one: sense pleasures. This is a definition of sense-pleasure grasping by Ledi Sayadaw, who was a Burmese meditation master from early this century: "Laying a firm hold on something, it implies the inability to shake off a thing even after experiencing great pain due to it and perceiving its many harmful consequences."

This is really, to me, one description of grasping at sense pleasures. Just a little thing, like I sit down and start eating ice cream and keep going until I finish the carton. I know this is having a painful effect on me in the here and now. And the grasping just keeps feeding on itself if I don't stop to look at it.

It's like the story of Nasruddin sitting there eating a whole basket of hot chilies and tears just pouring down his face. Someone comes along and says, "What are you doing that for?" He says, "Well, I'm waiting for a sweet one." And we keep doing that. "Well, I've done this a hundred thousand times and it hurt, but maybe this time it's really going to make me happy." I just keep coming back to: in my mind, there's pleasant sights, pleasant smells, pleasant sounds, pleasant touch, pleasant taste, pleasant mental objects, and that's it. So what? Why do we keep needing new ones? But we do.

Once I went to U Pandita complaining about something that was going on in my practice, and he just said to me, "So what do you want? Different things to note?" It just really reduces it. Oh yeah, that's all it is. What difference does it make?

The Buddha spoke often, very graphically, about the perils of sense pleasures. Some of the more accessible ones: they're dangerous because they're like a dream—when you wake up, they're gone. Or it's something that's borrowed—you just start to get into it and the owner takes it back.

But the danger, the perils—we want to emphasize—it's not saying that pleasant sense experience is bad or that we have to be afraid of it. The Buddha went through extreme asceticism, and that was not what he was advocating. He was advocating the middle way. But I think it's important for us to really notice what the peril, what the danger is of sense pleasure. It's not the sense pleasantness itself, but simply that the tendency to grasp is so strong. The idea that somehow this one is going to do it is so seductive that we so easily get lost. And that's dangerous to us because, in that getting lost, in the grasping as it strengthens itself, it keeps us looking in the wrong direction for peace. We're looking and waiting for that sweet one instead of seeing that peace is available right now if we'd stop looking so hard.

I think one of the reasons we don't get it is that in our day-to-day life, we don't really look that hard. Our culture especially, but all cultures in some way, we're just bombarded with opportunities for pleasant sensory experience. As soon as one sight doesn't do it, we can go to another one. As soon as one taste doesn't do it, we can go to a pleasant feeling or a pleasant sound. You can come and sit here and go on endlessly into pleasant thoughts. So if we don't look, somehow the rapidity of the movement hides the fact that the search itself is the suffering. It hides the dukkha, the same as when we move our body, it hides the unsatisfactoriness of the senses until the body starts to hurt.

On retreat, the simplification is really helpful, because the possibility of sense pleasure is so amazingly reduced. This is a kind of choice of renunciation. And the mind might go crazy at first. The first week is really hard. The mind's just kind of fighting and wanting more sense things and more things to do. And then it settles down.

The renunciation of simplicity helps us to look. Because what do we see when the mind settles down? The grasping doesn't get any less. It just changes its object. Where before we were grasping for something really important—your husband or wife or children or cats—something really major in life, now it's down to an orange instead of an apple. But the strength of the grasping is no different. This is what's scary. It can be for anything.

But the other side of the simplicity of retreat is that because the object of our attachment can be so greatly reduced, almost to the point of the absurd, we can't hide from the intensity of the attachment. It really makes us look. Because at some point we all wake up and go, "Why have I spent half a day filled with craving and anger because I had to sit in a different seat than usual?" And we all do it.

So the retreat is a wonderful opportunity to really notice what's going on. When you're caught in grasping, notice what it is arising from. You can trace it back and see it's coming from one simple sense experience—a sight or a sound or a feeling or a thought—that this simple contact has given rise to this whole series of grasping moments. That's fascinating to me.

And the other thing we can do is to know that when we're really gripped with attachment, we don't have to do anything about it. Our whole life is spent doing something to get out of that feeling. Here we can see, "Oh, I don't have to avoid this. I can just sit here. I can just stand here. I can just lie here." Whatever's going on when we notice it, we really bring awareness to the process itself—to see how one moment of grasping, when we're not aware of it, really feeds the next, and how much the strength of it grows through one moment conditioning the next.

We can sit there and see how, if we're just noticing, noticing with a calm attentive awareness, sooner or later that grasping, that attachment, dissipates by itself. And notice the experience when it's dissipated—because we see that the peace, the happiness that we thought we could get by attaining the object of grasping, when that grasping dissipates, that peace is right here. That's what we were looking for all along.

When we meet and explore grasping with sati, it allows for the peace that's camouflaged by the grasping to again be acknowledged, recognized, touched. And that's a wonderful experience, because it's the wisdom, the beginning of the wisdom, that helps us know we don't have to spend our lives running around driven by this energy of grasping or craving.

Sometimes I think that the peace of non-grasping is more subtle at first than the kind of intense gratification that might come from sense pleasures, any kind of sense pleasures. It takes the quietness, the calmness of mind that you're all developing here to really appreciate how much more exquisite and subtle it is. But when we touch that, actually, sense pleasures lose their pull. It's a kind of natural renunciation.

I remember one retreat where I'd been for weeks going through all this kind of grief about the end of a relationship—oh, actually it was that same guy—even though I knew I didn't want to be in it anymore. Going through, going through, going through. And then I just got into that place of non-grasping that is so peaceful and lovely and calm. At some point, the thought of sexuality came up, and it was totally unappealing. Just really gross compared to—I don't mean that in a judgmental way, but gross compared to subtle in comparison to that calmness, that peace of equanimity.

We don't give ourselves the chance to recognize that a lot in our daily life. Here, you're all touching moments of that over and over. Please recognize them, acknowledge them when they're happening.

One other thing that I think lends to the seductive quality of grasping at sense pleasures is that when we're not examining craving, as the Buddha said, there's almost a sense of pleasantness. He says, "craving accompanied by delight." That feeling of just one more fantasy. It's so pleasant.

There's a poem I love that to me evokes this feeling, by a Japanese woman from about the year 1000 named Shikibu, from the ancient court of Japan: "Although I try to hold the single thought of Buddha's teaching in my heart, I cannot help but hear the many crickets' voices calling as well."

So we don't have to be afraid of the crickets' voices. We just have to recognize them for what they are. We don't have to cultivate fear or aversion to pleasant sense experience, but we can see the difference between attachment and appreciation.

The Buddha says, "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it."

With the clarity of non-grasping, we really can appreciate what is beautiful in the world. Knowing that it will pass, there's no need to strive after it.

Suzuki Roshi says that renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of the world, but in accepting that they go away.

When we see contact clearly, the nature of sense objects and sense desire, when we are open to exploring the quality of grasping and how it leads to suffering, this sense of natural renunciation arises quite spontaneously.

The other area of attachment I want to talk about tonight is grasping or attachment to views and opinions, which is a really interesting one to me. The Buddha speaks about it quite a lot.

That could be described as the tendency of mind to think, "This alone is true, everything else is false." Unfortunately, we don't usually think it quite so clearly, so we're not so aware there's a view forming. But any view or opinion that we're grasping onto, that we're not seeing as a view, is of course blinding. It limits our world. It limits the possibilities because we don't even let in the facts that don't fit into our view. We only perceive what fits.

Remember when I talked about that basketball video and no one noticed the woman in white? It doesn't fit in with anyone's view of a basketball game, that that should be happening. So we limit the possibilities of what can be perceived, of what we can know about life.

We see this everywhere. Such suffering is created by this attachment to views, by holding these views to be some kind of absolute truth. Right now, you're lucky you're missing the presidential debates that have been going on. It's really been something to watch. There's no sense—debate is a joke. There's no sense that there's any kind of open communication happening. Each person gets up and lays out their views. The other person gets up and lays out their views. There's no sense of meeting. There's no sense of actually hearing. There's such a rigid clash.

People go to war about such differences of views, of holding on to such an idea. When one is listening without subscribing to any of the views particularly, what one hears—or what I hear—is, they don't sound very different. What are they fighting about? There's much more agreement than there is disagreement, but it turns into this rigid conflict.

Most of us can probably see at some time the way that we are rabidly attached to some opinion that we have, such that if it's challenged, we get really angry or frightened. It can be about anything—politics, the environment, our spirituality, religion, medical things—and we'll hold on to our view in spite of the evidence. It gives us some kind of security.

One example—and I'm bringing this one up on purpose because I don't know if it's controversial, but it might touch things in people—I read a book recently going through the history of the discovery of AIDS and the first few years of how it developed in this country, both in the gay community and other parts of the country, and how the medical establishment reacted, how the government reacted, how the newspapers reacted, how the blood banks reacted.

It's so interesting because all of the different groups had their own particular views that they were grasping onto and protecting much more strongly than wanting to listen to the evidence that was coming out. The government didn't want to spend money on it, didn't want to hear it was a crisis, and basically held views like "It's only gay people and Haitians, we don't need to worry about it." The media, in a way, treated it the same way. The doctors were squabbling amongst themselves about whether it was true or what wasn't or who was going to get the credit. The discovery of the virus wasn't really talked about in the American media for a year because it was discovered by some French people, and the Americans wanted the credit. The gay community—a lot of them didn't want to hear about how it was spread through sexual activity because of the view that they were just coming into a sense of sexual freedom and not wanting to be told how to behave because it was moralistic. And on and on—the blood banks didn't want to hear that it was contagious and kept putting out the blood for some time after the facts were really out.

It's horrendous. But it was fascinating to me because everybody who was at all involved was holding on to some kind of view, and in the meantime a crisis developed. This is how we are. None of us are outside of that. Our views are more important, when we're holding on to them, than knowing the truth.

It can stop your mind, how strange or unsettling it is when we come up against some kind of evidence that we can't ignore, that shakes a view we don't know we have, that we're really grasping.

A friend just told me this story I like. A Tibetan Lama, Lama Gendun, was giving a talk to quite a large group of people. He was talking about, in their language, a pure land. It's a place where one can be reborn, a happy realm, a practiced realm. Amitabha Buddha is there. It's a great place to be reborn and practice and be happy. He was going on and on about it, describing it in detail, all these tiny little details. Finally, the people in the back of the room started to snicker. "Where is he coming off talking about all this? He's really in delusion." He just stopped and looked at them and said, "Well, you might not think I know what I'm talking about, but I've been there."

It just stopped. Everyone just kind of stopped. Doesn't fit in with their view of what's possible or what's true.

Can we just begin to notice a view as a view? That's all. Notice when grasping or attachment to a view is arising. Then we don't have to be so gripped by it. Then we can continue to be open for discovery, open to see what is true in this moment, what is actually happening, not colored by our views and opinions.

One of the things the Buddha says about views a lot is how holding to views brings us into conflict—conflict with others, conflict with ourselves. Just talking to people this last week, I can see this happening so much. We all do it in practice. We set up a view and immediately grasp it and then start suffering because our practice does not match the view that we're holding onto.

Anything that's said in the instructions, anything that's said in a talk—the mind just somehow, this particular line comes up, that grasping takes place. "Right, that's what noting's supposed to be like. Right, that's what the breath's supposed to be like. This is what spacious awareness is supposed to be like." And it's not what my practice is like. Immediately there's comparison and suffering.

It's really funny in a sad kind of way to see how we create so much suffering for ourselves. People will come in and say, "I'm having too many emotions. Clearly my practice is no good." The next person will say, "I'm just not having any emotions. I must be suppressing. My practice is no good." Someone will say, "I'm just too much on the breath. I don't have spacious awareness. My practice is no good." The next person will say, "I'm hardly ever with the breath. I only have spacious awareness. My practice is no good."

We just take whatever form of view and immediately we're in conflict. This comparing mode—comparing is actually the quality of conceit or māna: better than, less than, or equal to. But if we watch what the comparing is arising out of in our practice here, it's grasping at a particular view. So it's not to hate the view, but to see a view as a view, to explore it.

I find it fascinating to do because I'll say, "Oh, that's the view of what practice is supposed to be like. Just relax." And the next minute, whatever starts happening in my mind goes, "Oh no, this is how it's supposed to be." And it might be five minutes or it might be five days before, "Oh, that's another view." Okay, see through it.

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "The state of craving for anything blocks all deeper experience. Nothing of value can happen to a mind that knows exactly what it wants. Because nothing the mind can visualize and want is of much value."

This moment-to-moment mindfulness, just pure being with present experience, is a constant challenge to our unacknowledged views. That's one of the reasons it can be so difficult, really noticing what's happening moment to moment. It doesn't fit—or rarely—our ideas about what's supposed to be happening.

When we're in a struggle like that, just check and see: Is there a view here? Is there grasping?

It's not to say that views are bad or opinions are wrong. We need them in life in order to vote. We need to have a view and an opinion. But we need to know that that's what it is and not hold it as the absolute truth. If I felt my vote was the absolute truth, I would have had to commit suicide twenty years ago because no one I vote for ever wins.

One of the wonderful things about retreat is our views do start to break down. Our view of ourselves as a solid body—is that our experience? I defy anyone to actually look and say their experience is, "I'm a solid, separate body." You see it breaking down, like with a lot of people being sick now. You come in, your experience is a sensation here and an emotion there and a heaviness here. A lot of times people can't put it together because the views, the concepts, are falling away. That's wonderful in retreat. That's what retreat is for.

Now, out in life, sometimes we need to be able to put the concept together and go, "Oh, I think I have the flu," or "I think I have bronchitis, I should go to a doctor." That's quite helpful. To know that that's a view, that's an idea we've built up around certain sensations. It's knowing how

Disentangling Your Thoughts

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines the nature of thought and its role in creating both suffering and liberation. Beginning with the opening verses of the Dhammapada on mind as the forerunner of all actions, she explores how our moment-to-moment perceptions become distorted by the kilesas (mental afflictions) and how these misperceptions cascade into elaborate mental constructions.
> Wilson introduces the crucial concept of papañca—the mind's tendency toward proliferation, where a simple perception rapidly expands into complex webs of thought, emotion, and self-identification. She explains how this process is fueled by three primary forces: wrong view (particularly the misperception of a solid self), craving (including craving for becoming), and māna (conceit or comparison). Drawing from the Bāhiya Sutta, she offers the Buddha's radical teaching: "In the seen, there is only the seen; in the heard, only the heard"—pointing to the awesome simplicity beneath our conceptual elaborations.
> Practically, Wilson guides practitioners to notice the space between sense contact and recognition, to observe how quickly the mind constructs stories from bare perception, and to use wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) to return to direct experience. Rather than fighting thoughts or seeking a "becalmed mind," she emphasizes recognizing thoughts for what they are—empty, arising and passing—which naturally loosens their grip and reveals the peace that cannot be disturbed.

What I want to talk about tonight is the subject of thought.

The first two verses of the Dhammapada, which is one of the books of the suttas, of the sayings of the Buddha—different translations exist, but this is a pretty typical one:

Mind is the forerunner of all actions. All deeds are led by mind, created by mind. If one speaks or acts with an impure mind, suffering follows, as the wheel follows the hoof of an ox pulling a cart.

Mind is the forerunner of all actions. All deeds are led by mind, created by mind. If one speaks or acts with a serene mind, happiness follows as surely as one's shadow.

The power of the mind, the power of thought in our life—as I'm sure I don't need to tell you after you've been sitting here for six weeks—is really amazing. We create our whole world with thought. Just that I can sit here and force air through my vocal cords and make noises and it communicates, hopefully, to you in some kind of sensible way. It doesn't communicate to the two nuns here because English is not their language. It's just amazing how powerful this process of thought is. And I don't need to add how much we struggle with it and fight with it, suffer from it. How much, just talking to people, it seems like the unspoken or unacknowledged goal is to get rid of thinking once and for all.

But when we really look at a thought—and we've said this a lot—what is it? It's just nothing. It just comes out of nowhere. It vanishes back into wherever it came from. It's like a phantom, phantasmagorical. There's nothing to it. So what was that tangle of thoughts that you were hitting your head against the wall about yesterday? It was so real. Where is it now? What was it then?

I find this whole thing fascinating since we suffer from it so much, and I want to talk a little about it. You know that quotation that Stephen and Joseph both read from Kalu Rinpoche about how we live in illusion and the appearance of things. Why? What is this illusion and how do we get so tangled up in it? Why does it seem so real?

A big contributing factor is how we understand—or don't understand—and relate to thoughts, to the thinking process. Often Asian teachers, when we're working with Asian teachers on a retreat, will comment about how much we Westerners think. It really amazes them. We'll take any sensation or experience and explain it and define it and interpret it and make up the story. Actually, we do it with almost every experience, much more than seems to be the case in Asia. "You Americans really think a lot." Yeah, it's true. There will be a sensation, and oh, this is a blockage, it's here from my childhood, it's always how I related to my mother—and just on and on in this whole story. And we're really suffering from it. And one of us will say, "Well, what's happening right now?" Oh, yeah, twinging.

But just fighting with thought—I don't think it's the answer somehow. Nisargadatta Maharaj says once that if we examine our mind closely, we'll see that it's seething with thoughts. It may go blank occasionally. A becalmed mind is not a peaceful mind. This peace is very brittle, this peace of the blank mind. What you're calling peace is only an absence of disturbance. Real peace cannot be disturbed.

So often I think if what we really are looking for is this becalmed mind, we could just have lobotomies and go home. That's not what it's about.

That's got nothing to do with peace.

So how does this dream world created by thought become so real? Why does it get created in the first place? I want to talk about a couple of different aspects of this.

The first one begins on the basic level of perception. This is where we first begin to get confused. Perception, as we've said, is that quality of recognition, of discernment in the moment. It includes memory, but it's not just memory. If I clap my hands, there's hearing, and when the mind goes, "Oh, clapping the hands," that recognition is perception—present in every moment of consciousness.

Now, the trouble can start right here. It doesn't have to get far from perception at all. The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. All of them, he's saying. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. That's what our whole practice is about—emphasis on direct experience.

So what do we mean by mistaken perception? And why do we misperceive? When in the moment of perception, that moment of recognition, there is present in the consciousness any of our friends the kilesas—the afflictions or torments of mind: greed, hatred, delusion, fear, pride, conceit, identification—when any of these, or many others (you know the list), are present in a moment of perception, it distorts the basic perception so that we're not seeing what's actually happening.

You can experience this yourself. You can play with it during this retreat because it's a great time to observe this point of perception. Notice that instant of sense experience prior to recognition, prior to perception. For example, you might know that it's hearing, but it hasn't been recognized yet. You might know that it's smelling, but you don't know it's bread cooking yet. That moment just prior to recognition—and then you can easily see how, if in that moment you happen to be wallowing in a fit of aversion, that really colors how we perceive, how that perception arises.

At this place we teach in California, the meditation building has a big sign on it that says "Perceptory." One woman came one day in a fit of aversion, and she looked at it—she'd seen it a million times—and as clear as day, it said "Purgatory." That's the kind of way that perception is mistaken.

Or imagine, to see how this mistaken perception then leads to a whole string of associations and memories and ends up in action based on this whole story—imagine being alone at night in an unfamiliar empty house. An empty house can make all kinds of noises. This can happen to me if I don't know the noises and I'm alone and it's at night. Each new banging, cracking noise—there's that moment of just hearing without recognition. And then if I happen to be afraid or nervous, that colors the perception: "Someone's trying to beat down the door!" And I really believe that. That's the explanation. That's the perception. And it leads to a whole series of emotional reactions—fear and judgment. It leads to running around the house, checking all the doors, making sure everything's locked. And then I think, "Oh, well, I guess it wasn't that."

And then there's another noise again. Bang. "Oh, it's mice running around. There's mice, you know." And that builds up a whole story. And that's the truth.

And then it happens again. And I'm looking out the window and think, "Oh, it's just the wind banging this limb against the window." And that happens to be an accurate perception. But each of those previous ones was just as true in the moment—the whole story, the whole reality of thought and reaction and emotion that gets built up from it.

So those are kind of obvious examples about how the presence in a moment of any of these qualities, these torments of mind, distorts perception, and that leads to a whole basic story that isn't true.

The root distortion really is ignorance. Ignorance meaning this confusion, cloudiness, dullness of mind so that we perceive wrongly. Ignorance is an experienceable

It's not like some monolithic thing, unchanging from the beginning of time—ignorance as our given condition that we can never recognize. It arises and passes on a moment-to-moment basis, just like anything else.

I was in Switzerland last summer, walking in the forest with a friend. I looked up through the trees and said, "Wow, look at that—this big yellow and white striped circus tent. I wonder what that's doing here in the woods." My friend looked. It was a rock. Just a big rock with lichen growing on it.

That's a basic distortion of perception from ignorance—just not seeing what's there. The mind pulls out a few bits of perception, puts it together from memory, and simply makes something up. A circus tent. We do this more than we might like to think. That's the problem. That's why there's such value in beginner's mind, where we just see something without having to draw on all our past memories to make it into a little package that fits what we already know.

This experience, this quality, this mental factor of ignorance—we can begin to recognize when it's present, in a dull sort of way. It's like a fog, a sense of dullness, a kind of darkness. You might really want to see clearly, but you just can't. It's foggy and dull. You can't quite tell what's going on. I liken it in myself to those dreams you have in the morning when you're trying to wake up and you just can't. The whole dream is about trying to wake up—that happens to me a lot. Everything's upside down and backwards, and I know everything's wrong, but I can't get out of it. That's what ignorance feels like to me. We can start to recognize when we're just really zoned out and dull, even though we're trying to be present. It's not our fault; it's just that ignorance is present in that moment.

From this cloudiness, this fogginess, what tends to emerge in our perception is wrong view—confusion, not seeing clearly, like I described with the tent and the rock. The classic example given in the texts, and I like it because it's so straightforward while encompassing all the cloudiness: imagine you're walking in a forest at twilight. You can sort of see, but you can't see clearly. You can sort of see the path, the trees, the big rocks.

It reminds me of when I was a nun in Thailand, staying in a place that was jungle. The paths are broad and you can sort of see, but you can't quite see clearly. There are lots of vines hanging down. You get close and see something hanging from a tree, and as you approach, it appears to be a snake.

In that moment of perception, of seeing it as a snake, that gives rise to thinking about it, to all our associations with snakes. There are lots of poisonous snakes in Thailand, so it can give rise to fear—the emotional reaction that goes with that recognition, the feeling that the woods are unfriendly, the thought that you don't have a flashlight, wondering how you'll get out without being hurt. We get scared, and it affects our whole reaction to the situation.

If someone comes along with a flashlight and turns it on, you see—oh, it's just a vine. The misperception vanishes, and so too does all the reaction to it.

This is what we're doing so much of the time—really, all the time when we're not paying attention—in our perception of who we are. This basic root of ignorance is the fundamental misperception of ourselves. That's what we're hammering away at every night when we're talking.

When we don't really look at our experience, in that fresh way, without assumptions, moment to moment, we usually act from what they call three inverted perceptions—three upside-down, inaccurate perceptions that we don't investigate and assume to be true. They're the three we talk about a lot: we see the permanent in what is constantly changing; we keep thinking we're finding satisfaction where it's not to be found; and we keep thinking there's a solid self-existence when there isn't one anywhere.

It's not just that these are thoughts. These are conclusions and assumptions that we make unconsciously, and we then perceive our experience in that light. From there, the illusion just takes off.

Some misperceptions are easy to see through.

Like, for example, as soon as I saw a rock, I never again could see a circus tent in the rock. When you see that the snake is a vine, you know it's a vine, it's over. But this basic misperception of ourself is much harder because it's so fundamental.

For one thing, it's how we think we've experienced the world and ourself for so long that it's hard to remember to even look at it freshly. That's really one of the points of meditation practice—to learn how to be fresh with each perception. We take it so for granted we don't even know that we have that assumption. And also, as we've said, the change is so rapid, it's hard to see unless we look really closely.

Not long ago, I was at a printer's, and they were showing me how printing of color photographs works. They took a very elaborate, lovely color photograph and had me look at it through a certain kind of microscope, something printers use. And when you look at the photograph, it completely breaks up. It's nothing but dots of four different colors, and only four different colors of these dots. That's all that photograph was. It was really amazing to see that. Looking that closely, it's clearly nothing but dots. I don't see any kind of solid wholeness to it. In that way, when we look, the veil of our illusion is completely lifted and it's no problem. It's just so clear. It's not that we lose anything because there was nothing solid there in the first place. The fear that comes up about it isn't about actually losing something. It's just a kind of unfamiliarity.

But on the other hand, when I take away that little microscope thing and I look at the picture, I don't see colored dots anymore. It's again this very elaborate, lovely color photograph. And so it's a lot like that with us. Even though I know, I really know from experience that there's nothing solid here—it's just a constant process of mental, physical change arising and passing away—as soon as I'm not really looking, that perception isn't there and I feel really solid. So it really takes this willingness to keep looking.

One of my teachers said that when you look, you don't see anything. There's no problem. When you don't look, you see samsara. That's where we get caught. And that's why our expectations are so blinding, because they're based on our prior conclusions and not on this freshness of seeing.

Another reason it's hard to see through these inverted perceptions—like I'm just using for an example the one of impermanence—is because once we've made these unconscious conclusions on permanence and we perceive things in that light, we tend to ignore or discount perceptions that don't fit in. We've talked about this before, I know, in relationship to emotions, where people will say, "I've been in this one emotion all day." And we'll keep saying, "Well, really, look." And everyone discovers, "Well, I haven't been gloomy all day. I've been gloomy and happy and bored and hungry and sleepy and... oh, gloomy." A lot of people here have reported having that experience.

We can do it on a more subtle level, too. Often people will say, "I really want to explore my emotions, but they just don't last long. I'm doing something wrong." Or they come in really upset and say, "I just cannot sustain attention on any object very long. I have no concentration." But when we probe, we find out, yeah, it's because no object is lasting very long. Things are really changing rapidly. And rather than let in that perception, we try to twist it to fit our previous conclusion that things are solid. When it shakes up our conclusions, our tendency is not to want to let in the perception.

So that's why there's so much emphasis on just being with the bare experience. Whatever definition we make up—and we're making them all up—doesn't last very long. It's never true across the board all the time. When we see that what's true today as a description of your experience has absolutely no relevance tomorrow as a description of your experience, it becomes a lot easier to let go of the definition and the assumption and just come back to the bare perception. And that is what our mindfulness is all about.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, to have a correct perception, we need to have a direct encounter. So that's what we're doing here—just having direct encounters, moment to moment to moment.

So that's one part—how the illusion, how we get so tangled up in a construction of thoughts, starts with this basic misperception on a moment-to-moment level.

The other part I want to talk about tonight is something I'm sure you've seen: just how amazingly quick the mind is to move from that perception to a whole incredibly elaborate construction of thought and story and emotion and self-identity. Just like that.

I mean, just a cough. Recognition of cough. Depending on the mental state, depending on how much pain there is in your body, depending on your prior conditionings about coughs—in this amount of time, you could have constructed a whole world of yourself in the hospital with pneumonia. You could have constructed a whole sense of what an incredibly insensitive, vile person that is sitting in the other part of the hall coughing. Really solid. And in no time. In no time. Such a solid reality, and it seems really true in that moment.

This process of moving from bare perception of hearing, recognition of cough, to a whole story about the disease process and your history of disease and what you think about people who don't cover their mouth when they cough—this is called papañca. It's one of my favorite words. It is translated usually as "proliferation"—this immediate and endless expansion, proliferation, entanglement of thought that arises from perception, where the initial experience is so quickly and so completely hidden by the whole construction that comes on top of it.

The Buddha, in describing this process of papañca, is talking about visual consciousness, and then he goes through, as they do in the suttas, each of the six sense doors. He talks about visual consciousness arising when there's contact with the eye, the visual object, and visual consciousness—that's contact. Due to contact arises feeling. What one feels, one perceives—that recognition. What one perceives, one thinks about, has thoughts about. He's just describing this bare process. Out of these associations, these thoughts, papañca is manufactured. That's the translation Vimala uses: manufactured. And papañca is the proliferation, projection, ideas, descriptions—you name it.

Then, in a loose translation of the next couple of lines: these notions, this papañca, assail and overwhelm a person who's not mindful of the process. And it really feels like this. "Assail" is like being attacked, being overwhelmed. It's like you're just completely under the power of these ideas, of this papañca. Or as one commentator puts it, it's the tendency of imagination to break loose and run riot. That's really what it feels like when we've been spending five minutes or an hour just struggling with some construction of thought. It really does feel like we're under attack.

This is papañca. It gets so solid and so concrete. It's fueled just as misperception arises due to the confusions, the kilesas present in a moment of perception. Papañca is also fueled by these mental states in the mind.

For example, there's the original misperception based, say, on aversion, which then projects—it's as if it projects the inner experience out onto the object and then fuels our reactions, our emotions, our thoughts.

A simple example: once I was in the hospital, and sometimes when you've been in the hospital a while, you can get into a state that's not quite psychotic but a very distorted state of mind. I was in that, just very fearful. And this nurse came at six in the morning to wake me up, to weigh me. And that's another thing—why do they need to do that? But anyway, I was in a fearful state of mind. And the misperception, the fear, projected onto my visual perception of her, and I really saw her as demonic, as really evil in that moment of her coming. And then that fear proceeded to fuel my reactions and my thoughts, and I ended up just screaming at the poor woman. Really lost in fear.

That's how papañca not only distorts perception but continues to fuel our actions. And the next time she came, I was fine—and she was really afraid. I could see it in her face. I felt terrible.

Papañca can be fueled by any of these kilesas, any of these habits of mind. There are three particular kilesas that they speak of often as being really strong and frequent fuel for this takeoff of papañca.

One of them, as we've talked already, is that of wrong view. And as we all know, that's kind of really the basic fuel for papañca. Anytime we're referring back to a sense of a separate, solid self, we know we're in for trouble, one way or the other, because we're already out of sync with what's really true. The whole desire for pleasure, the fear of pain—it comes out of this basic fuel: wrong view. And all the thoughts and emotions and actions that follow. I mean, really, if you look at it—if I look at it—how much of my life is driven by this basic form of papañca, proliferation based on a sense of myself and wanting pleasure?

So I'm not going to say a lot more about that. It's really our whole practice, exploring that. But a place to really watch the process of papañca itself, just to become mindful and aware of the process—and I think this isn't just scientific interest.

It really does lead to not being tangled up in this web of construction.

The second great fuel for papañca is, of course, our other old friend: craving. Really watch how it works. In the moment of craving, the mind projects desirable qualities out onto whatever object is craved—like that Tibetan saying I mentioned the other night about putting feathers on the object, making it attractive. That's the first movement of papañca.

But then watch in your experience how, once craving has entered into perception, it leads to so much mental, emotional, and even physical activity. See how far the papañca, the proliferation, takes us from the bare experience.

For example, something simple: you're sitting, you're pretty present, and suddenly you remember the yogi need request you put in a couple of days ago. You think, "It should be here by now. I really need those cough drops." Suddenly craving comes up. "I've got to have those cough drops. I'm sure it must be here. They've certainly had time to go to Barre Circus by now." Thoughts just proliferate. Emotions proliferate. And it's all you can do to keep from jumping up and running to look at the note board to see if your note is there. You're just sure it's there. In fact, you might even go and read your name on a note that doesn't remotely look like your name, because you're so certain it's there. This is papañca. This is proliferation. It not only leads to constructions of thought; it also proliferates in action.

You'll see when you leave here—if you can even imagine that; you probably can't even imagine it now—you'll feel calm. Things are simple. We do one thing at a time. Watch how fast the papañca moves from thinking into action. Suddenly you have to do this and make this phone call and make this date and go do that and go to the store. It's really amazing to watch how fast it happens.

So here, it's wonderful. You can just watch it in relationship to wanting a note on the board or cough drops or something. But in the world, this type of proliferation based on craving is what leads to solidified nation-state identities. It leads to wars. It leads to a sense of "this is my land, this is your land"—so solid. And at that point, to try and tell somebody, "This is all just proliferation based on craving from a particular sense datum"—forget it. Way too far gone.

Another aspect of craving that I find very interesting to watch is not just craving for things, but craving for becoming. How many different becomings, different definitions of yourself, do you go through in a day? Watch how the proliferation of thoughts begins as we hook into a particular idea, a particular definition, and that begins to really solidify into a becoming. It's so quick and changing, but we keep believing in it. And this too is papañca. It's also a form of craving.

I like to play with it when I'm on retreat. Just notice—I'm sure you all have—how you tell yourself stories all day, describe your experience, make up definitions of what you're doing, on and on and on. What is so amazing is that we keep believing it, on and on and on. And this, again, is papañca.

Notice: you're doing your yogi job, just vacuuming, being very mindful, and the thought comes, "I'm being so mindful. I'm really getting this down—how to be mindful in motion." Pleasant. This is nice. Pride: "I'm doing great." Right then there's craving. It's like a becoming—becoming in that moment a mindful person, a good yogi. And, as we all know, it expands into being the next great spiritual world teacher, being introduced to the Dalai Lama, whatever the particular story is.

That's papañca, that is a total illusion. And in that moment, that's really who we think we are. And the next moment—oh my God, I've been lost in thinking. Unpleasant sensation, aversion, judgment. How could I even think such things? I can't even be mindful of vacuuming for more than two seconds in a row. I'm the worst yogi here.

Or someone said to me, "I have a congenital defect. I can never be mindful. I won't be mindful for more than two minutes. I might as well leave." And that's really solid—a whole tangle of thoughts. And we're making it all up. We're making it all up.

I was sitting in my room back in the Catskills a couple of years ago. Just sitting, as you do, minding my own business. And the thought came up: "Oh, I'm so alone." Kind of neutral. And then immediately it glommed onto something more: "Oh, I'm so alone here. I could die back here. No one would notice for three days. No one knows how lonely..." And not just the thoughts—the emotions came up really strong, a real sense of self, the whole story going on and on.

Suddenly I thought, "Well, since we're making it all up, I think I'll just try a different story." I did this really consciously. So I was still in the "oh, I'm so alone," and I deliberately said, "You know, it's really wonderful to have the opportunity to be so alone." And immediately, all the attendant emotions on that particular thought came up. I started feeling really joyful. I felt so inspired and grateful to have the chance to be so alone for two months in practice.

It was really amazing. Because there was no way I could pretend either of those was true. It was thoughts and emotions—true in that moment, yes, and those were the thoughts and emotions in the moment. But that's all they were.

The Buddha says that if we're going to identify with any part of our experience—which of course he's saying we shouldn't—but if we're going to identify with any part, it would be better to choose the body, because at least it doesn't change so rapidly. He said the mind is changing so much quicker than the body that it's really crazy to identify with that. But that's really where we can so easily get caught.

Again, one of my Indian teachers said, "If you become something, death awaits you. If you don't become something, there is no death or birth." And we're talking moment to moment—becoming and not becoming.

But can we live without self-definition? Can we do that? It doesn't mean to destroy the definitions, but just to see—like when I was sitting back there—that that's all they are. They're just proliferation of thought and emotion and description based on a sense experience. It's very freeing. It can also be scary not to have a sense of definition. Even a bad definition you might like better than no definition.

The third fuel for papañca that's often spoken of is māna, the Pali word translated as conceit. It's not just pride, but as we've mentioned before, this sense of comparing: I'm better than, I'm worse than, or I'm equal to. All of this is this mental factor of conceit. And I know from talking to people that just about everybody here has had real attacks of experiencing this nature of comparison—and just how unpleasant and how much suffering it can be.

It comes up in interviews so much. And it arises about anything, anything. People comparing one breath to the next breath, one sitting to the last sitting. All it takes when conceit is present in the mind is for someone to walk by slowly. That's it—it's finished. They're slower than me, I'm no good. I'm slower than them, I'm fantastic. Or we're going at exactly the same pace—but they're not one of the people I think is a good yogi, and we're only going equal. Or they're the person I think is a fantastic yogi, and I'm walking just as slowly. And this whole mental activity unfolds from there.

It's very strong, very subtle, this comparison, this conceit. It's said to be one of the last delusionary qualities that goes on our path because it's so subtle and so pervasive. But one thing that weakens it is our ongoing understanding of, our perception of impermanence, of anicca. You can see how that can weaken a sense of conceit, because when we see that everything's changing, there's no solid thing to compare anything to. In walking, for example—oh, I'm walking so slow. But five minutes later, I'm walking fast and they're walking slow. There's no solid thing to compare to. We start to see that everything's in continual flux, and comparison makes no sense because it's just constantly shifting sets of conditions. Comparing absolutely makes no sense when we are seeing things in this state of constantly changing conditions, rising and passing. It really weakens the sense of conceit.

Now, this proliferation, this papañca—again, it's not like we have to get rid of it. The way the Buddha described it, it's a natural process. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about turns into this whole story of papañca. But then if we're not mindful of it, it really assails us. We really struggle. The thoughts, when we know them for what they are, can momentarily define our reality—and that's actually helpful, especially when we all agree on the definition. It works pretty well, for example, that we pretty much have an agreement on what it means to be a yogi, that at this moment we agree on the definition of reality that I'm talking and you're not talking. You know if you're a yogi, if you're a cook, if you're working in the office. We know what's appropriate behavior for each of those roles. If one of you suddenly got up in the middle of the room and started screaming and dancing and jumping around, it would be really disturbing because it doesn't fit with our agreed-upon definition of things. So the definitions are helpful.

But the key is to know that it's only a definition. In these conditions, right at this moment, you are yogis. But that's not your definition for your whole life. If you thought you had to behave like this all the time, there would be some big problems. If I thought I had to go around lecturing people all the time, there would be big problems too. So it's recognizing the definitions and what they're built on, but not attaching to them. That's the place where we get lost in the illusion and the tangle.

First, it's to see thoughts for what they are, to understand how papañca arises and gets fed and created, and then not to attach to it, not to take it for more than it is. Just because thoughts are powerful, just because they seem solid, just because they're connected with really strong emotions—that doesn't necessarily mean they're an accurate description of anything. We tend to think that the stronger the thought, the stronger the emotion, that must mean it's true. It's just not the case.

There's a story the Buddha told often, one you've probably heard, about a widower living with his young son, five or six years old, in a village in the time of the Buddha. One day some bandits came while the man was out. They burned down the village, burned down his house, and kidnapped his son. When the man came home, he found the village destroyed, his house destroyed, and the remains of a little corpse that he assumed was his son. He was grief-stricken, just devastated. He saved the little bones in a velvet bag and carried them around with him, grieving and grieving.

Quite some time later, the son escaped from the bandits and came back home. His father had rebuilt the house. The boy arrived about midnight, banging on the door. "Father, let me in! Let me in!" But the man was so convinced of the reality he had constructed that he said, "Go away, don't torment me. My son is dead. Don't torture me in this way." The boy kept banging, the father kept refusing, and finally the child left. They never saw each other again.

The Buddha ends the story by saying: Sometime, somewhere, you take something to be the truth. If you cling to it so much, when the truth comes in person and knocks at your door, you will not open it.

This is the difference between recognizing papañca and proliferation for what it is, and really being caught in it, not recognizing it for what it is. That's all we need. We don't have to get rid of it. We just have to recognize it. That's one way we begin to find clarity and peace in this whole jumble of explanation and confusing experience.

Another way, when the concepts are apparently so solid—and this comes up a lot in interviews—is when there really somehow just isn't space to say well, maybe my son really didn't die. There's not even space to think that.

Then the key in coming out of proliferation and back to bare experience is just what we've been practicing here: wise attention. Wise attention is a concept of the Buddha based on the fact that we can really pay full attention, give our full attention, to only one thing at a time. So when you're feeling really caught in the papañca, really in a solid concept and struggling, just notice: where is the attention right now? That's why so much of mindfulness is coming back to the direct perception.

An example that's often used, a simile by Buddhist teachers, is that a thought is like throwing a rock. That rock being thrown is like a thought. And if you throw that rock and hit a dog, the dog gets all excited and it thinks the rock is the cause of its problem and it runs around chasing the rock. That's what we do when we're just following out the concepts, following out the thought, the proliferation, running after it like a dog. They say if you throw a rock at a lion, it completely ignores the rock and just stares straight back at the source of the throwing. It cuts through all the extra and gets right back to the source. That's the sense of wise attention—bringing the attention to the direct source of the perception, of the experience. We can do that.

So again, a simple example. You're sitting. A constellation of sensations. They're unpleasant. There's aversion. Again, it gives rise to this whole interpretation: "I'm so blocked. I can never get feeling in this part of my body. I'm such a rigid, blocked person." And you're back into the whole story. "I've got to release this. I've got to move through this. I've got to transform it." That's just the beginning, and you find yourself in a whole series of struggling and self-judgment and condemnation and comparing and suffering.

If you can, when you notice that, not try to talk yourself out of it, not try to make up a different explanation, but simply go, "Oh, what perception is this arising out of?" And come back and simply feel that horrible sensation that proves what a blocked, dreadful person I am. And just keep coming back, moment to moment. "Oh, yeah, this is burning. This is tightness. This is hardness." Just being with the direct perception without needing to make up a story or an explanation about it.

In that direct perception, you'll notice all the explanations and the papañca that comes flying out. That's fine. Let it fly out and keep bringing the attention back to the direct perception, the bare experience that generated it.

So with mindfulness, we have the ability to know thought, to know proliferation for what it is, to be able to be with the bare perception and know what's actually true, and to tell the difference. We don't need to spend our lives fighting an illusion or lost in a dream. We just don't need to do that. And that's really what we're doing every moment that we're with our bare experience here.

So acknowledge the thoughts. Notice the mental state, the kilesa, that's feeding the proliferation. Notice how much and how fast the proliferation moves and how it leads to action. Bring the attention back to the source, the bare perception. You can even notice, at times, that moment of sense experience before the recognition. Just keep noticing that when it happens. Notice the space between thoughts. Notice the times when we're not lost in a becoming, in an identity, in a definition. Just begin to notice all those times, coming back to the source of all of it—the source that's beyond any of this changing, confusing, unsatisfactory nature of things, the source beyond all the distortions and clingings.

When we are caught in this illusion, when we are not seeing this process of proliferation and instead believing these descriptions to be an accurate reflection of the world, life is incredibly complicated and difficult at times and confusing at times. But in fact, at the level of what's actually going on, it's so simple. It's so simple, it's awesome. Unbelievable. Our mind won't believe it.

This, I think, is a paraphrase of my favorite—I think it's my favorite—sutta of the Buddha.

This man came up to the Buddha while he was on his alms round and begged him to give some teachings. The Buddha said, "Wait until I finish eating. I'll go on my alms round and come back." But the man said, "No, I must have it right now." Finally the Buddha assented, and this is the teaching he gave him. It was a good thing he did, because five minutes later a wild bull came along and gored this man, and he died. But he had this teaching, and it had opened his heart and his understanding, so it didn't matter.

Can we really be that free of concept that it doesn't matter if we die? That's so amazing. The Karmapa is said to have declared on his deathbed: "Nothing happens." That's really extraordinary to me. It's one thing to talk about these things when we're sitting here feeling mindful and aware. It's another thing entirely to be dying and truly know that nothing happens.

This is the sutta the Buddha offered, expressing just how simple things really are:

In the seen, there is only the seen. In what is heard, there is only the heard. In what is smelled, there is only the smelled. In what is tasted, there is only the tasted. In what is felt or sensed, there is only the sensed. In what is cognized, known with the mind, there is only the process of cognizing.

That is all. Everything else is interpretation. It is awesomely simple.

There's one last quotation, from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. This reflects the Mahayana view: "Mind creates both samsara and nirvana, yet there's nothing much to it. It's just thoughts. Once we recognize that thoughts are empty, the mind will no longer have the power to deceive us."

What is cognized is just the cognized. That's all.

CHAPTER 252

Foundations of Practice

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common discovery among retreat participants: that the difficulties of life follow us even into silent practice. Drawing from the Buddha's own life after awakening—his physical ailments, the wars among his clansmen, conflicts within the Saṅgha, and the deaths of his chief disciples Mahāmoggallāna and Mahāsāriputta—she demonstrates that inner peace has nothing to do with having a perfect life.
> Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Four Noble Truths, emphasizing that dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) is not meant to demoralize us but to wake us up to how we actually relate to experience. She examines the dependent origination of suffering through our habitual reactions to vedanā (feeling-tone): how we cling to pleasant experiences, resist unpleasant ones, and completely ignore neutral feelings. The Buddha's teaching that "he abides in peace who does not abide anywhere" points to freedom through non-clinging rather than through finding some permanent, secure state.
> Using the Buddha's simile of six animals tied together—representing our six sense doors each pulling toward their preferred experiences—Wilson illustrates how an untrained mind is constantly dragged about by craving and aversion. She contrasts this with the unlimited mind and heart that arises through established mindfulness, where we can experience pleasant and unpleasant without attachment or repulsion. Through poetry, personal stories, and the example of Yo-Yo Ma's childlike wonder, she invites practitioners to meet each moment with open-hearted attention and curiosity, recognizing that every moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom.

It came up in some of the discussions today, and I think it's by no means an unusual discovery—this being a little bemused, thinking that we're coming to this retreat, especially if it's your first retreat, to get away from the hustle and bustle and pain of our lives. And as you've discovered, guess what comes with us? That's not a mistake.

What I want to talk about tonight is really the way the Buddha described the facts of life and the potential for our freedom. I think a lot of our confusion and struggle comes from our ideas, perhaps unformed even in our own minds, of what we're actually expecting freedom or happiness, inner contentment, peace—whatever word you use—to feel like, to look like, to be like. Because if you're looking for a different reality from this one, a nice, happy, safe, secure place, you're not going to find it.

When we look at the Buddha's life after he was awakened—the supremely awakened one, free from anguish, free from confusion and suffering—he spent forty-five years teaching. But if you look at his life, stuff happened. He wasn't just drifting on a cloud for forty-five years. He was walking barefoot all around northern India, begging for food.

In terms of things that happened, he had physical problems. He had headaches. He had backaches. There are suttas where he says, "Ananda, you give the talk. I have to go lie down and rest my back." He didn't give him a day's warning either.

There were wars going on between clansmen—his own clansmen from his father's and his mother's clans—and they would be killing each other over water rights. How would you like it if all your in-laws were killing each other and you had to go and try to stop it? Everything wasn't groovy.

There was quarreling within the Sangha. Many suttas exist, and a lot of the monks' and nuns' rules come about from times when one of the monks or nuns would see another one doing something and run to the Buddha and tell on him, basically. "So-and-so is doing thus and so. It doesn't seem good." Often it was appropriate, but there's definitely this little element you get. There is envy and all of that.

His two main disciples, Mahamoggalana and Mahasariputta—next to him, I suppose, the most awakened, the wisest—Mahamoggalana, in his old age, was murdered. And both Sariputta and Moggallana died before the Buddha did. There's a lovely sutta where he's saying it's as if the sun and the moon had fallen out of the sky when they died. So he noticed that they were gone.

And his cousin Devadatta, who was very jealous of him, continually tried to sow seeds of discord in the Sangha and divide the Sangha, and actually tried to kill the Buddha. The Buddha was tried to be murdered. So it's not as if everything pleasant was in his life. And in the end, he died. They all died. Everybody died. That's what happens.

So looking to the Buddha's life, the supremely awakened peaceful one, which he was, we have to see that inner contentment, true liberation of heart, must be about something else than having the perfect life, than having everything be the way we want it to be.

So what could that be? The way the Buddha introduces what it could be to us is by having us let our hearts and minds, our vision open to be able to live face to face with things as they are, rather than as we might wish them to be or think they ought to be if we did things right.

When he lays out his Four Noble Truths, the basic facts of life, the first one, as most of you are very familiar with, is that there is unsatisfactoriness in this world, in our bodies, in our minds. There's birth, which is suffering, if you think about it. There's decay. Old age, sickness, death. There's separation from those we love and from things we like. There's having to be brought together with those we don't love and things we don't like. This is what happens. It's not the only thing that happens. Luckily, there's beauty and joy and love and happiness within this realm of form.

But there is not a way of not having unpleasant experience arise. And if you stop and think about it—which obviously I have, a lot—you need to consider: okay, we all nod, sure, there's birth and death, we get sick, we have to be with things we don't like. But is that the way we really meet these experiences when they arise?

You don't have to think far. Just cast your mind back over today. That's as far probably as most of us need to go. If you're one of those for whom today was a good day, you can look at yesterday. We really don't have to go far to see that we're going to come face to face with difficult, painful, unliked experiences. And how did we relate to them?

I think the Buddha's not saying this in order to bring us down, not in order to say life is miserable, suffer. It's really to wake us up to see how we relate to this. The fact that things are unreliable, that they're in constant change, that there is difficulty—we think we accept it, but do we? The denial is so amazing. Just the denial of the fact of pain, of suffering, that things happen that we don't like.

How much of the unpleasantness that has come up in your body or mind or in your surroundings today has your mind greeted as a mistake, or your fault because you're not mindful enough? If you were more mindful, this unpleasant thing wouldn't be happening. Well, I've got news for you. As we get more mindful, we actually begin to notice not only more joy, but also more of the unpleasant things that we've been in total denial about. Our denial mechanism is huge. Witness Michelle's story with her ice cake the other night. It's amazing.

I'll tell you another one. I really like this story because it's just so flat-out denial. Quite some years ago, maybe twelve years ago, I was in the hospital for some days and I was on an IV. I had some big infection. And you know how after a few days, your veins sort of collapse and it gets harder and harder to keep putting in the IV. So this one time, whatever time of day it was, the nurse was trying repeatedly and failing. She was sweating. It hurts. It's not a pleasant experience—you wouldn't call it that. And I could tell she started, in a little way, to panic. It's hard to know you're hurting someone, especially when your intention—her intention—is to help.

She finally kind of gave up and ran out in the hall and grabbed the nearest doctor who was passing by. And I wasn't completely cogent, but I was cogent enough to know that now I was really in trouble. Because who practices and puts in the IVs, huh? Have you ever had the doctor, the surgeon, come in and put in your IV? Not too often. So I was like, okay, right, just be cool, be calm. And the doctor had the same problem. I wasn't my most equanimous. I didn't say anything, but little tears trickled down. And he looked at me with such an expression and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

It's just so amazing. And I could understand how hard it is to let in—if you really let in that it was hurting me—the pain of knowing that with really kind intentions, you're hurting somebody. That's so hard. It's hard for us to be connected and open-hearted in the face of painful experience, physical or emotional. It is hard for us. And so a lot of the time, we don't even know that we're blocking it out. And that's just flat-out obvious pain. I mean, that's the most obvious, and we can deny it.

So not to get down on ourselves about it, but I really think that this first truth of the Buddha's that he enunciated—certainly how it works for me—is as an invitation into my own experience. Not a philosophical point of debate. I mean, we can debate that, but for me, the point is that it brings our awareness in to look and see. And when I first heard this years and years ago, when I first began to sort of understand—oh, stuff happens. It's not my fault.

And really what it was, was a huge relief.

Because when I was first introduced to the Dharma, when I was about nineteen, I had had up until that time what you would call—like in the fifties storybook picture of America, you know—the middle class suburban happy life. My family stayed together. My parents weren't abusive. You just didn't talk about it. Our friend's mother who committed suicide down the road, or the divorce up the street, or my friend whose father had left when she was a kid and she never met him, or the fact that my mother never even met her own father—things like that. You didn't talk about it. Everything was happy, happy.

And I actually couldn't point to anything that was really bad. I had sort of imbibed the idea that you grow up, you do whatever you do, get a career or whatever, and you have this happy ever after life—like the Donna Reed show on television, or the way all the movies end, going off in this happy cloud where nothing bad ever happens again.

I don't know if this will resonate. I'm really showing my age with this. But when I was really young, and it was really the sense of everything's good, nothing's bad, we don't talk about unhappiness—my mother took me to see this Walt Disney movie called Old Yeller. I don't know if you remember. It traumatized me for years. Because it's this loving—I mean, all I remember is it's a loving family with their golden lab, this wonderful, perfect dog. Everybody loves everybody. And in the end, the dog saves the little boy from getting attacked by a rabid squirrel. And then the father has to shoot the dog because he has rabies.

So this is, you know—Walt Disney traumatized me. Because I thought everything ends happy all the time if people are nice. And it just didn't fit with my worldview. So when I heard about, "Oh yeah, this is part of the facts of life—there's unhappiness, there's death, things you love go away, you sometimes have to be with things you don't like, and everything is changing all the time"—I felt this huge sense of relief. Oh, I'm not crazy. It's okay that I'm not happy happy every minute, and I don't have to keep pretending. Which for me, being an aversive type personality, was really a relief.

So that really, I think, is the beginning of freedom—just to see, okay, to come face to face with the fact that things aren't always the way we want them. And then it becomes: how do we relate? Rather than: what's wrong with me? What's wrong with things? I'm crazy. We begin to stop our lifelong habit of running and hiding from pain, or from the unpleasant, or hating ourselves when we do something or something happens that we think we should have been able to avoid.

In one retreat, a man was telling me in an interview how he'd all day been seeing aversion in his mind to experiences he was having, to feelings in his body, to thoughts—just aversion to a lot of things. And he was labeling in a subtle way everything he was aversive to as bad. This is bad, this is good. And suddenly he stopped and said, "Wow. So much of my experience has been bad today. So what I'm saying is that much of my life is bad." And then he said, "No, that just isn't true. It's just part of how it is. Sometimes unpleasant, sometimes pleasant." And that took a huge burden of judgment and negativity off the way he was relating to his life. It's just part of life.

Someone told me—this may be apocryphal, I don't know it to be true, but she said it was—that Robin Williams, the comedian, has already had his tombstone engraved, and on it it says, "I knew this was going to happen." He's a step ahead of us, you know. When we know it, we can stop being afraid. We can start to actually live each moment as it presents itself, instead of holding on, planning for the next moment.

So there's this being together with what we don't like, and also the quality of unreliability, the changing nature, the fact of impermanence—which is also included in this first truth. And again, we all know everything changes. But if we really knew that, how would we live? I think we would live very differently.

Someone said in a retreat we were doing together, just about this subject of impermanence for a week—she said on reflection, when I asked her, "How would I live if I really understood and accepted impermanence?"—she said, "You know, I would stop being afraid." Because when we know it's going to change, we don't fear it. We can relax into here and now. Sure, there's a poignancy to change. That's okay. But we don't have to grip so blindly.

I think one of the reasons for the denial of change on a deep level is again this poignancy, this sadness—that maybe it's not quite okay to feel. But it's fine. Let the poignancy in.

This is my favorite part of a poem that I love, because it touches for me that place of love and knowing things change and the poignancy of clinging. It's Galway Kinnell. I'm just going to read part of it. "Little Sleep's-Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight" is the name of it.

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up, and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us. I think you think
I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars,
even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I've stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

We are forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. It's poignant. It doesn't have to be awful. When we can relax into that moment just as it is, without needing to cling or change or look back at the last moment—there can be peace in that.

But I think, at least I certainly notice in myself, one response to this constant change, this unreliability, these shifting sands, is to look quietly but frantically, moment after moment, for some steady, unchanging place to abide. Whether it's a physical experience or an emotional experience, how much do we try to manage and control our lives so we get everything just so? Ah, finally.

In a small way, it's like when you finally get the house all clean. How long does it last? This used to drive me crazy. It lasts two seconds, and then it starts getting dirty again. That's a small example, but I think we're doing this all the time—always looking for some place to abide, to rest and say "finally." And it's that very looking for an abidance that keeps us suffering, off balance, and fearful.

The Buddha said once, "He abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." It might not be what we had in mind, because our minds only know what they already know. You know Krishnamurti's famous book, Freedom from the Known. We can only imagine what we already know in some way. So to rest in peace—"he abides in peace who does not abide anywhere"—it really is the peace of letting go of that frantic searching.

But we won't and we can't let go. We can't even have a concept of it until our heart begins to understand through experience how much the searching itself is creating the suffering, the anguish, that feeling of being off balance. Because it's not the fact that things change. It's our resistance to that fact that's actually so poignant and scary and awkward.

Nyoshul Khenpo, a wonderful Tibetan teacher, said once, "Remember, whether or not you go with the flow, the flow always goes with you." We can't actually step outside of that. But we can start to just look and see, "Oh yes, that's what's happening." We can feel the poignancy. We don't have to fear it. As someone once said, "Let's face it, I don't fear it when unpleasant experience is going away. It's only the pleasant ones that I'm holding on to." There's something important to notice about that.

So you might be thinking, who wants to look this closely? Maybe denial is ignorance, but it was working okay in a lot of situations. And often, on our journey, on our spiritual path, we hit moments where we say, "Oh God, I wish I could go back to not seeing quite so clearly." Because I meant it—even though you laughed and I said it in a joking way—as mindfulness strengthens, as our ability to be present for whatever arises strengthens, we will be so much more at ease and happy, but we will also be much more aware of the unpleasant and the changing nature. That actually brings us to freedom, believe it or not. Knowing things the way they are is what releases our heart and mind from this fruitless clinging, this fruitless searching for steady state in a world that is totally unsteady state. But the way out is in, and we go in kicking and screaming most of the time.

So looking at this first truth, it's a wake-up call, really a wake-up call, not just something to be demoralized about. As Ajahn Chah said, "There's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering." The difference is in the way we relate to the difficult, the painful, the poignant experience.

And that brings us to the second truth, the second fact the Buddha describes. What is the cause of the suffering, the anguish? Not the fact that there's unpleasant experience, but how our hearts and minds relate to experience—that is the place of bondage or freedom. That is where understanding can really begin to flower.

So how is the Buddha different from us?

If he went through experiences after his awakening, and if you believe that he was a human being, then his awakening has the same potential for us. He wasn't some kind of divine being with different factors making up his mind and body. So how, in his awakening, in going through these difficult experiences, what would be a way of describing how he was different from us? Or different from me—I don't want to project onto all of you.

One simple way I want to talk about it is in how he related his understanding: that it's the clinging, the aversions, the longing for things to be different, the denial—all these reactions to the bare facts of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience—and then our total entrancement with those reactions. I mean, look at it. We're totally entranced with how much we don't like something, or how much we like something, how involved we get. We go from an unpleasant sound to the history of our life in two seconds. Completely involved. So entranced that we don't even know it's happening.

It's our reactions, our identification with them, and the total entrancement that has us off and running—this is what hides the way things are from us and obscures the potential for really living in contentment, in peace, with things as they are, for rediscovering, resting in, and trusting the radiant mind, our basic goodness, as Chögyam Trungpa calls it. This is not a state that you can get and hold on to and rest in. There is no steady state of heart and mind. But it's an attitude that can arise no matter what state is coming in our body or in our mind.

The peace, the freedom, the happiness of the Buddha has nothing to do with what's arising in your experience right now. Freedom has nothing to do with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. It really doesn't matter. And it's the hardest thing for us to really believe. When you come in and you've had one of these crummy sittings, and all this stuff is coming up, and yesterday it was so clear, and we say, "Oh, yeah, fine. Yesterday was clear. Now it's really painful. Those are both good. Just pay attention." And you think, "Yeah, right." We don't really believe that very well. But the fact is, it's true. Freedom has nothing to do with the particular experience that's happening. It has everything to do with the relationship to it.

Someone came in and said—I think it was this retreat—she was really getting that pleasure, the experiencing of pleasant feeling, is not the same as happiness. Pleasure is pleasure. Sure, it's nice. If we had a choice, we'd probably take pleasure over displeasure. We can tell the difference. The Buddha could tell the difference too, I think. It's not heading toward this dull neutrality. But it's not getting into all those reactions.

And that allows us to turn away from our entrancement with our reactions and ourselves and our stories and everything, and actually come to live in this moment with a total intimacy, wakefulness, loving, awake presence that can allow us again and again and again to glimpse, with more or less depth, the true radiant nature of our mind, our heart—big mind heart, not this little heart—the radiant nature of what we truly are.

In the process of this shift from our habitual reactive mind to opening into whatever is happening this moment with totality of presence and intimacy, yes, we are more aware of the unpleasant and more aware of the beautiful, the joyful. As someone was saying today, it was really beautiful—in the midst of a very difficult day, one little experience that we normally would completely overlook. And in the middle of all the difficulty, she said, "You know, this doesn't seem like much of an experience," but it was giving her so much joy.

Like someone was talking about the flowers. Franz and I planted a couple of peony bushes last year, little new ones. And two days ago, Monday, one of them bloomed for the first time. Now, for some reason, that day hadn't been a particularly joyful day. I forget—it was really hot. I forget what was going on. But I wasn't dancing in joy through the day. And just seeing that flower open over the course of a couple of hours brought so much happiness and joy. When we're more present, it doesn't take winning the lottery to feel joy. We can be really present for suffering, and something just lovely happens, and we're really present for that. There's this immediacy, this vitality of presence—all of life becomes so much richer in the little things.

When we're not afraid of the impermanence, we're really here. This is called "Living" by Denise Levertov.

The fire in leaf and grass, so green it seems each summer the last summer. The wind blowing, the leaves shivering in the sun, each day the last day. A red salamander, so cold and so easy to catch, dreamily moves his delicate feet and long tail. I hold my hand open for him to go, each minute the last minute.

You get a feeling of the presence in that poem. She's not like, "Oh my God, each minute the last minute!" It's more like: if this is the last minute, let me really be here for it.

I have a story of a friend of mine, a man who's been coming to retreats on the West Coast for some years. He must be in his mid to late sixties, very hardworking. He told us this story a couple of years ago. He said he'd had open heart surgery—he had to have a valve replaced. And he's one of these people, which I'm sure a lot of you can relate to, who felt that his practice was never going anywhere. No incredible bliss experiences, no wonderful jhanic concentrations, just kind of slogging through the days and the nights, year after year of meditation, trying to be mindful and getting nowhere. Right? Yeah, you can relate.

So he woke up in intensive care after the operation, which apparently had gone fine. Family was there, telling him everything was okay. And then something went wrong. He said he was hooked up to machines from every orifice, and all of a sudden they all start blinking and sirens going—which must be quite scary—and nurses running. He didn't know what was wrong, but something serious was wrong.

And he said he noticed his mind just start to go into total panic. "Oh my God, I'm going to die. This is really it"—which it very well could have been. He saw his mind going into panic, his breathing got tight, and he said he doesn't know where it came from, but the thought arose: "Well, if this is going to be my last breath, I might as well be present for it." And he just came totally into that breath. The panic went away. He said he must have gone unconscious after that, and then he woke up and things were fine.

But you never know. We can't evaluate what's going on in our practice, but that's the quality of real presence. And each moment the last moment isn't a scary thing—it's an invitation into being alive in this moment, because this moment is really all we have. We can plan a lot about all the next moments, but who knows what's going to happen? We really don't know. We really don't know what's going to happen in this next moment. Like that other night when the low water alarm went off in the middle of the sitting—no one knew that a moment before. We never know.

So this moving out of our reactivity into open-hearted presence does not hide life situations. It allows us to live them more fully.

How do we get so sidetracked? Why is it that we get so into this clinging, which is so poignant? One way—we touched on it, and Stephen talked a bit about it, and Susan did—I just want to go into it more deeply. It's only a habitual pattern, but it's so deep we mostly don't notice it: the habit of how our heart-mind relates when confronted with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience.

The way the Buddha described our experience is that there are six senses: the five—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—and the mind. So we can have any of those six sense experiences: thoughts and emotions, or any of the five senses. And that's really all that's happening. So keep looking in your experience. As Jack Kornfield likes to say, just these six things are happening over and over. And if one of you experiences something else, please let us know.

First of all, just by beginning to reduce it to that, it takes a lot of the hoo-ha out, doesn't it? Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, thinking, emotion, thinking, emotion, seeing, hearing, smelling, touching. Oh, what's the big deal?

And then each of those arising one after the other really quickly, we experience—like a sound, for example—as being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Same with touch, emotions, thoughts.

And we don't all experience these in the same way, given our past conditioning and our karma. So take the sound of a crow—someone could hear it and find it pleasant, while for me it's unpleasant, and for somebody else it's neutral. That could even be different for the same person at different times.

Now, this quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral is a relatively subtle thing, and it moves very fast. The habit of our mind—and this is the place in dependent origination where we can explore how suffering and confusion arise—is that there's the sense contact, there's the hearing, it's pleasant, and without awareness, immediately there's that movement: "Oh yeah, I like that, that's good," or "I want more," or "Let's keep it going."

If it's unpleasant: "Oh, bad. Get away. Not good. How can we fix this?"

And if it's neutral? Well, have you noticed many neutral experiences? That's what happens with neutral. "Huh? I'm bored. Nothing's happening. Let's think about a really unpleasant fantasy because that's better than being neutral." God forbid we should be neutral. It's actually quite interesting to see how often our mind does that—"I'll suffer rather than be calm and neutral."

It happens so quickly that often we don't even know there's a difference between unpleasant and aversion. But those are two different experiences. There's a difference between pleasant and clinging, between neutral and spacing out. The second is a reaction to just the bare fact of an unpleasant or pleasant experience. But it's so deeply habitual in most of our minds that without mindfulness, we not only often don't recognize it, but we can easily evaluate our whole experience, the whole tenor of our life, on the basis of how pleasant or unpleasant or neutral it is. And this is where we really get off into being entranced.

For example, when you're evaluating your meditation, so often the good ones are the pleasant ones and the bad ones are the unpleasant ones. When you're having pleasant ones, not too many people come in and say, "I'm useless, I'm worthless, I can't do this." But when it's unpleasant, it jumps from unpleasant to "I'm the worst yogi, I can't do this, I'm filled with doubt, this is stupid"—and self-hatred, and all this really painful stuff, just in a moment from an unpleasant experience. Neutral, we don't even notice.

We get so entranced that we can actually base our whole life on wanting pleasant and avoiding unpleasant, without seeing what we're doing. Ajahn Buddhadasa, the wonderful Thai teacher, talks a lot about pleasant feelings. He says it's so fast—it just comes and goes so quick. And he says almost everything you do in your life, the choices you make without awareness, we do for the sake of pleasant sensation. And how long does it really last? It's a little scary when we look at how long it really lasts.

There's a story I love from the Buddha, really about Ananda, his attendant. Ananda is a very personable character. He's the one who's very compassionate, always saying things, and the Buddha's kind of going, "Not so, Ananda—it's really like this." You can really empathize with him. And he was very kind.

In this story, he was off on a mission for the Buddha, and he passed a village well. He was very thirsty, and at the well was Pakati, a young outcast woman. He asked her for water to drink—one of the few things a monk was allowed to ask for. You must remember that in India at that time, the caste system was really strong. An outcast couldn't even touch something and hand it to someone of higher caste. It was that rigid.

So Pakati said, "Oh monk, I am too humbly born to give you water to drink. Do not ask any service of me lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of low caste." She's so thoroughly bought into this.

And Ananda replied, "I ask not for your caste, but for water."

The woman's heart leapt joyfully, and she gave Ananda water. He thanked her and went away, but she followed him at a distance. When she found out he was the Buddha's attendant, she went to the Buddha and said, "Oh Lord, help me. Let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells so that I may see him and minister unto him, for I love Ananda."

The Buddha understood her emotions and her heart, and he said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you don't understand your own emotions. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness."

Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice toward you and practice it towards others.

Sweet, isn't it? But mistaking that pleasant feeling that she associated with Ananda, she was ready to follow him and take care of him for her whole life for the sake of that pleasant feeling, without being able to understand exactly what was going on. We do that from time to time, and in sometimes far more confusing and destructive ways than that.

Or with unpleasant. Again, sometimes in the whole field of experience, the mind can get so fixated on the unpleasant and lost in aversion to it that we build up a whole world based on reactivity rather than clear seeing.

Have you ever had a time when part of your tooth breaks off inside? It happened to me last year, and I was traveling, so I had to go for a few weeks with it just broken. You notice how the tongue cannot stay away from that place. You're sitting perfectly happy, and the tongue just has to go over there, feel how rough it is, feel it's unpleasant, get upset. What am I going to do? My teeth are falling apart. I'm getting old. A million times a day.

Now, all the rest of my teeth didn't hurt. That's neutral. Did I notice that? No. We have one thing that's wrong and a million things that are neutral, and we don't notice those at all when we get completely fixated on the negativity. Frustration, self-doubt, judgment. And neutral, we just don't notice.

So often, actually, the entrée into calm—a kind of radiant, connected peace—begins by seeming neutral, and we so much don't know what to do with that, that we bounce away, fall asleep, or create a diversion.

This is from the Buddha, really describing what we do with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Someone asks him what the difference is between an awakened person and an unawakened person—an "untaught worldling," as he says.

And he's very straightforward. He says, okay, here's the difference. An unawakened person, when touched by a painful feeling, worries and grieves, laments, beats their breast, weeps, and is distraught. They thus experience two kinds of unpleasant feelings: a physical unpleasant feeling and a mental unpleasant feeling. It's as if, in being shot with an arrow, they shoot themselves with a second arrow.

Sound familiar? That's what an untaught, unawakened person does. We experience pain from two arrows whenever we have an unpleasant feeling.

Now, it goes actually deeper than that, into how it becomes habitual. The Buddha says that when touched by painful feeling, we develop an underlying tendency to resist that—push it away, don't feel it, resist. Many people have talked about just seeming to come up against a wall of resistance, subtle or not so subtle, in the practice. And you're right. We've cultivated an underlying tendency to resistance to unpleasant for most of our life. And we've got to begin to see it. That's why it's coming up. It's great it's coming up.

So what do we do? Unpleasant—no, this is bad. We shoot ourselves with another arrow again.

And the Buddha goes on to say that unawakened people do not know of any other escape from painful feelings than to go after a pleasant sense experience. Isn't that right? And so they also inculcate the underlying tendency to crave the pleasant.

We've cultivated these two habits: this ongoing resistance to unpleasant, and as soon as there's something unpleasant, leaping after something pleasant, lusting, wanting the pleasant, because that's the only way we know to bring us happiness. The only trouble is it doesn't work for more than the lasting time of the pleasant feeling.

The difference with an awakened person: when an awakened person experiences an unpleasant feeling, that's it. They don't create anything around it, to paraphrase Ajahn Sumedho. They don't get into resistance, and they don't go lusting after something pleasant to hide from it. Same with pleasant. Experience a pleasant feeling, that's it. Experience a pleasant feeling. The mind is calm, creating nothing around it. It's not that you don't know the difference. We just don't get into these reactions, being so entranced by them and this ongoing tendency to move away from the present moment.

And that's what's so poignant. Our underlying tendency of resisting the unpleasant and moving towards the pleasant, totally ignoring the neutral—we're doing it without knowing we're doing it. And yet it's all in the service of our own real happiness and peace. None of us would continue this pattern if we really, truly knew it was keeping us confused and suffering. But we don't see it clearly. I'm saying all this, and yet I find myself doing it in subtle ways all the time. It's so ingrained when we're not paying attention, this going after what's pleasant.

The poignancy of it is that it's just this clinging and craving, just this pushing away, this checking out, that hides from us our true potential. It's just this looking in the other direction that obscures us from recognizing that freedom is right here. In fact, it's so right here that we're not usually right here enough to recognize it. We're always just a little bit leaning away.

The Buddha said, "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata"—meaning himself—"namely, liberation through non-clinging."

Now see, that doesn't sound so exciting, does it? Liberation through non-clinging. I want bells and whistles. I want some fireworks going off. Liberation through non-clinging? But that's the way into recognizing our potential for awakening. Non-clinging allows totality, intimacy of total presence.

Otherwise, the way we live our life is as the Buddha describes someone who does not have mindfulness established—because mindfulness is our way in to see what's really happening. In a moment of mindfulness, pure non-judging presence, there's no clinging, there's no aversion, there's no delusion, because it's connected. Just a quick moment. Sayadaw U Pandita used to call it, "A moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom." Not total absolute liberation where confusion never arises, but it's a moment of clarity. And that moment is what allows any experience to become a gateway into really recognizing our true potential.

Without that, a person without mindfulness established lives their life according to this simile the Buddha offers. Imagine a person catches six creatures from different habitats. Six—the six senses. Everything always matches: eye, ear, nose, touch, taste, and mind. So imagine you took a snake, a crocodile, a bird, a dog, a hyena, and a monkey, and you tied a rope around each of them, then tied a knot connecting all those ropes together. These six animals are all bound together with a rope in the middle. And then what happens? They all start struggling to go where they want to go. The crocodile wants to go to the water. The bird tries to fly up. The dog tries to go to the village. The snake tries to go into the garden. They're all pulling in every direction, and the strongest one pulls all the rest along after. So probably the crocodile takes them all down to the water.

You get the simile? The Buddha spells it out: that is just like a person whose mindfulness is undeveloped and unpracticed. Each of those animals represents one of the six senses—the eye, the ear, the nose, the mind, the body, the taste—and they're all struggling to go after pleasant experience and all struggling to run away from unpleasant experience. Whichever one's the strongest wins, moment after moment after moment. Eyes are often really strong. That's why when you're out doing walking meditation and a chipmunk runs across your path—seeing, pleasant—boom, everything else is gone. It's like the crocodile running to the water.

That's a rather exhausting way to live, I would say. But for one who has cultivated mindfulness and presence, "when seeing a form with the eye, that mind is not attached to pleasing forms and is not repelled by unpleasing forms."

And the same with all the other senses. It knows pleasant from unpleasant, but it's just not attached to the pleasant, not repelled by the unpleasant. And so she is one who has established mindfulness of the body and dwells with an unlimited mind and heart. Unlimited mind and heart.

So mindfulness is really our tool. It's like a rattle, one of my teachers says. We're like two-year-olds just going after, "I want this, I want that, take me over here, I want to do this." And he says, "I just shake the rattle and say, turn around, look back here. It's right here. Come home."

And that's all we're doing with our mindfulness. What's happening? Knee pain? Fine. Come home. What's happening? Sadness? Great. Come home. What's happening? Bliss? Fine. Come home.

Mindfulness doesn't say this is good, this is bad. It doesn't think this is more important to pay attention to than that. It doesn't say, "I've seen this before, therefore I don't need to pay attention to it again—I'd rather pay attention to that." Just noticing what's arising with a quality, as we talked about, of non-judging, total, kind attention. Coming back to the bare experience, not the reaction and the story and the hoo-ha we create around it. Not all the story about why that sound is so unpleasant, but coming back to the sound itself.

Ajahn Chah says, "The sound doesn't disturb us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound." Just stay with the pure hearing. And bringing to it this quality of no preconceptions, a kind of wonder, such curiosity, such a willingness to discover something new instead of thinking we already know. Not "I already know what the breath is like, but I'll go to it" or "I've experienced these cramps before, I know all about them, but all right—cramping, cramping." Not that. This newness, open to discovery each moment.

I'll leave you with an image that really helps me get the feeling of this quality of open-hearted attention. In Germany, I saw a documentary on television about Yo-Yo Ma, the famous world cellist. He has such a lovely attitude of openness. In this documentary, he was flying to Africa with his really fancy, beautiful cello—I don't know how much that would cost—going to visit a tribe of Bushmen, of Bush people, to share music with them.

So here he is with these Bush people, and they get the old man who's kind of like the old village shaman musician. He brings out his instrument, and Yo-Yo Ma brings out his incredible cello, and they start trading music. Now, this man's instrument was literally a round kind of oil can with a stick coming out of it and one string or line or something like that. And he's playing along, and Yo-Yo Ma's going, "Wow, this is so incredible! It's so beautiful, the sounds he gets, the music he gets out of this!" And he was totally sincere.

Then he says, "Let's trade instruments." So he gives this old musician his million-dollar cello or whatever it is, and Yo-Yo Ma is trying to play on the old man's instrument. He's going, "I can't play this nearly as beautifully as he can."

And he had such a childlike, open-hearted sense of discovery and wonder and appreciation and newness. I could see how we might be sitting there thinking, "Oh, an oil can with a string coming out of it," while he's saying, "Wow, what an instrument! What sounds he can get out of it! What beautiful music!"

It's really a different way to live with the same facts, with the same circumstances. It's just a difference in how we relate to them. So that's really what we're practicing here. And it's okay that we blow it a lot of the time, because every moment we have another opportunity to meet what's happening with the simplicity of open-hearted attention and wonder.

Let's sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 253

The Possibility of Inner Contentment

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this accessible and heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental question at the heart of Buddhist practice: why do we struggle to find the peace and contentment that is supposedly always available to us? She explains that our deeply conditioned assumptions about happiness—that it requires pleasant experiences and the absence of unpleasant ones—keep us perpetually looking in the wrong direction.
> Wilson illuminates how the habits of craving pleasant experiences, pushing away unpleasant ones, and ignoring neutral ones create a kind of blindness that obscures our natural capacity for peace. Drawing on teachings about vipassanā (insight meditation) and the five hindrances (desire, aversion, sloth and torpor, restlessness, and doubt), she shows how these mental patterns not only distort our perception but actively prevent us from recognizing contentment in the present moment. Using vivid examples—from a student's jaw tension that spawned elaborate self-criticism to her own milkshake-seeking adventure that led to mistaking a hospital for a yogurt café—she demonstrates how desire literally blinds us to reality.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with difficulty on retreat and in daily life, emphasizing the importance of self-compassion and the deliberate broadening of attention to include what is beautiful and peaceful, even amid suffering. Wilson draws on teachings from Thich Nhất Hạnh and Ajahn Sumedho to remind us that the conditions for awakening are already present in our ordinary experience—we need only learn to touch each moment with what she calls 'affectionate curiosity.'

Tonight I want to speak about the possibility of opening to inner contentment.

Last night I mentioned that this practice has come to us from Buddhism of Asia and that the word Buddha actually translates as "one who is awakened." To me, that speaks to the whole purpose, the whole reason that I—and hopefully all of us—engage in this form of practice at all: in order for ourselves to awaken. To awaken to the fact that deep, lasting inner contentment, peace, and happiness is available to us here and now, in whatever particular situation we might find ourselves. The possibility exists in any moment that we can awaken to our true nature, come to recognize it more fully, and rest here more completely.

I'm sure that's what your experience today has been like. And that's what the mind tends to throw up: "How, for God's sake, does sitting here and trying to find one breath in a hundred and feeling pain—what has that got to do with contentment or peace?"

Vipassana, which is what we call this practice, actually means "to see into," to see clearly. In the actual form, the technique that we're cultivating, we're not cultivating the technique as some end in itself—to become a perfect breather or a perfect walker, or to develop the perfect ability to label every arising experience. That's not the point. Vipassana means seeing into what is true about our experience here and now. Seeing clearly. And in seeing clearly whatever's arising, we can't help but begin to awaken to fact, to what is true.

What we begin to see is that as difficult as our experience might have been today or tomorrow or any other day, one of the main reasons we are not recognizing the potential for deep inner contentment right now, in this experience, has a lot to do with our assumptions about what happiness is, about what peace is. Until we really look, until we really see into what is true without prejudice—which is what the quality of mindfulness lets us learn how to do through inquiry—we begin to see that it's not the experience that's blocking peace. It's our assumptions that keep us looking in the wrong direction.

Our inquiry is not a thinking inquiry. The simple inquiry of mindfulness into this moment's experience will begin to let us see the assumption that is very common in our culture. I don't want to speak for everybody and say this is your assumption, but it's certainly been mine: that happiness or contentment or peace has to do with having all the circumstances in my life right. Basically, there should be no unpleasant experience going on, or at most it should be very minimal. And that to come to inner contentment is either some kind of state where everything is under control, or I'm in some altered ecstatic state of bliss. It might sound funny, but really looking at our own assumptions reveals what keeps us looking in the wrong direction.

Based on these assumptions, one of the things we begin to see about how the mind works as we sit here—and if you've heard this talked about, you've heard it talked about a lot, and if you haven't, you've seen it over and over but might not have thought of it in this way—is that based on the assumption of whatever it is that we're looking for that will mean contentment or peace or happiness or nirvana, it's often the underlying assumption that leads to a certain habit of mind, a certain way that our mind responds to situations, that keeps us confused.

And that's sort of the assumption that any pleasant experience is good and to be desired. Any unpleasant or painful experience is bad, it's a mistake—get away as fast as possible. Neutral experience? A lot of times people say, "What's a neutral experience?" Because we don't even notice it.

The habit of mind, when I talk about pleasant or unpleasant—I mean in any of our sense experiences. Seeing a pleasant sight, the lilacs that you see, and there's this "Ah, isn't that nice?" And the sense of wanting arises in response to that experience. "I don't want to go inside. I want to stay outside longer and see the beautiful lilacs, or smell the beautiful lilacs, or hear the sweetness of the birds singing, or taste some more of this lunch, or feel some more of the pleasantness of the wind on my face. I'm not going to go sit this time." Or think again this really pleasant thought—the thought of your vacation comes up, so pleasant, at least the first hundred times it's pleasant. And the tendency is to keep going. When pleasant comes up, the habit of mind is to want more, to crave, to go towards it.

When it's unpleasant, it's just the reverse. Your body's hurting in the sitting, and it's not a pain that signals that you're hurting yourself—it's just a hurt, a painful sensation. And all our training is: this is bad, this is wrong, do anything to avoid it. Similar with emotional pain. Similar with just mildly unpleasant visual experiences, or hearing someone next to you who keeps coughing, and the scenarios we can go through of how to throw them out, how to move our seat, how to write a note that this person should obviously be secluded.

Someone just called me from another retreat somewhere else in the country with some Burmese teachers, and he said, "You know, this guy came late and he was coughing and breathing loud, and he had a respiratory ailment so he couldn't be told to stop, and they literally wanted to seclude this guy away from the whole rest of the people." What is it? It's a sound. It's unpleasant. That's all.

Neutral. The breath is often neutral. Why do you think we find it so boring sometimes? Because our habit with neutral is to generate a little interest. If we can go for pleasant, that's preferable, but watch yourselves. As often as not, the mind will reach for a really unpleasant fantasy rather than be with a neutral experience. This is just our habits of mind. There's no blame about it. But it's so deeply conditioned in us that we often don't notice it.

Or if we do notice it, we might think, "Well, of course. I mean, who wouldn't want to go for what's pleasant? Who wouldn't want to avoid what's unpleasant? That's just sensible." So what's the point?

And it's true if we have the choice. But how many of you would be here if you could work it so that you only had pleasant experiences in your life? If that was happiness and you could arrange it, I bet you wouldn't be sitting and walking here for three days, fourteen hours a day or whatever it is. Something about this conditioning of the mind, this habit of how we relate to experience, doesn't work. It isn't bringing us happiness.

And this is what we begin to see when we relate to our experiences with mindfulness. What these habits tend to do is solidify our sense of separation—separation from what is true, from each other, from the world, from contentment. The habits keep us looking towards the next pleasant thing, or wondering when we can get away from this unpleasant experience. "Then I'll be happy. Then peace will be available. Then I can meditate. Then I'll be more spacious." Whatever. There's always another carrot.

And because this is endless, and because until we stop and inquire—not through thinking but through our moment-to-moment being with what is—until we stop and inquire, we don't really see what's going on. We keep thinking that peace is elsewhere, that we somehow have to be different before we can recognize true contentment, before things can change.

These habits are very deep and ingrained, very subtle. I could really talk a long time about how subtle they are. In a way, just as a simple example, they're so subtle that they can even distort what we actually perceive. When desire is very strong—say you're hungry, not just a normal hunger where you go eat, but that kind of craving for, say, a pizza—and you're walking down a street, do you notice how all your eye picks out is restaurants?

There's a saying in India that when a pickpocket meets a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets. These habits of mind, of wanting and resisting unpleasant experience, really distort what we see. And it gets very, very subtle. Until we begin to notice this pattern in itself, we continue looking for peace in the wrong place, in the wrong way, and really don't understand why things seem so confusing.

This is from an Indian wise man, Nisargadatta Maharaj. He says, "We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination." We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination. What we're trying to do with our simple practice of being present is reverse that—to pay attention to what is real and learn to recognize imagination as imagination. Imagination is fine if we know it's imagination. If we think it's the truth, we're in big trouble. And a lot of the time, that's what we're doing.

A simple example comes to mind from years ago. Joseph Goldstein was teaching a retreat, and a man came in to talk to him and said, "Oh, I'm so tense. I'm just so uptight, and nothing's good in my life. I'm so striving, and I just can't conduct my life in any kind of way. My attitude in business is just off. I'm really a horrible human being."

Joseph said, "What's the experience?"

The man said, "Well, I have this tension in my jaw, and I can see from this tension that the way I relate to life is really striving, and I'm never in the present moment, and the way I conduct..."

Joseph said, "Yes, but what's your experience right now?"

"Well, I have this tension in my jaw, and I'm so bad..."

This went on back and forth until finally the man said, "Oh, you mean it's just tension in my jaw?"

That was the real—tension in the jaw. All the rest? There might be some truth in it. There might be some striving in the way he relates to life. There might be things that the tension in the jaw points to, things one can associate with it. But in the moment, the actual, the real experience is simply tension. All the rest of that association, in this moment, is imagination.

So much of the time we are living in the imagination and not really noticing or giving credence to the actual experience. It's as if we're a little bit away from what's actually going on. And so we can get so lost, so caught up in these habits, in what are sometimes called torments of the mind—or what I like to call disturbances of the heart. When we're lost and really gripped by craving or anger or aversion, or just this total dullness of confusion, it's really hard.

It's really unpleasant. It's a lot of suffering, and we really struggle with that. What we forget in the struggle is how to notice that even in that, there's a potential to touch peace and contentment.

There's an analogy that's used a lot for the way we lose sight of the radiant nature of our hearts, of our minds—a radiance that never fades or goes away, but we just don't know how to notice it. The analogy is to think of the sun as the radiant, pure nature of mind, of consciousness, of heart. Sometimes it's really clear. A lot of times it's covered with clouds—sometimes little wispy clouds that don't bother you too much, sometimes dark storm clouds. And you can get really involved in resisting them or fighting them or wishing they'd go away. We can get so involved in the clouds that we completely forget to notice that the sun never went anywhere. It's untouched by the clouds. And even though it might not be shining so clear, the evidence of it—in that everything is still radiating the light of the sun—is always here when the sun is out. We can forget that because we get so busy fighting and involved with the clouds.

So yes, clouds are clouds. We need to know them, understand what they are, not pretend they're not there. They can still pack a punch. And yet, when you're flying through them, you can never really find them. You know how it is when you fly through clouds? You never really get to the clouds somehow, but the plane's really going up and down—something's going on. It's sort of like that. You can't deny it, but it doesn't have much solidity, whether it's a strong emotion or a pain in the body. It's here, but it also goes away. And the sun, the radiance of our nature, never leaves.

That's just an analogy—not exactly accurate, but just to help us remember we don't have to stay lost in these patterns. We can wake up. And hopefully that's what mindfulness, this attentive awareness without discrimination, without judgment, can help us do: to really learn for ourselves that we don't have to react to situations always with fear or desire or falling asleep. That there is another possibility altogether.

It's quite radical because it's so obvious. It's that we can simply be with things just as they are, knowing it clearly, accepting it without judgment, because it's what is in this moment—and you can't change this moment anyway. We're not talking about a life of passivity or not taking action, but in this exact moment, really being with what is. The real openness of heart and mind. The real fullness of attention without looking for something better.

As simple and obvious as it might sound, as I'm sure most of you have seen today, it's not easy. Our deep sense that the unpleasant cannot be borne, that separation from the pleasant cannot be borne, is so deep that just to be with what is can seem excruciatingly difficult. Yet this has the power to transform our lives in unimaginable ways.

It continues to amaze me how something so simple as being with the breath, being with sensations, just sitting and walking and being with whatever arises moment after moment, can powerfully and deeply transform our understanding of ourselves—and through that, our relationship to all aspects of our life. Because once we stop fighting what is and allow our attention to be fully with it, our heart to be fully with it, first there's the opportunity to really know what's happening for a change, because we're not so involved in our ideas of how to change it. And in knowing what's happening, there's the potential to begin to recognize something other that's always here: the radiance. We can always notice it, but when we're so busy fighting or looking for something better, we never stop to notice. We never stop to recognize.

Really, these habits of craving and pushing away—it's almost like if someone was making all this up, they couldn't have thought of a better way to keep us running around in circles and not seeing what's so obvious.

One of the things the Buddha said would drive you mad if you tried to think about it is the first beginning of things. I used to wonder: why is it like this? Why is there... And it really does make you crazy. So he would say, "Look, I know a lot more than I'm teaching you, but what I'm teaching you is all you need for peace and freedom from suffering and confusion." And basically he would say: just do it and quit asking all these questions. That works in Asia; it doesn't work so well here.

I think one of the reasons retreat is so hard—especially in the beginning, especially if you're new—is that just beginning to cultivate mindfulness, simple awareness of what is, without letting the mind just run where it will, just being with the breath, just being with whichever sensation comes up, whichever sound comes up, without choosing so much... it runs counter to all this ingrained habit of avoiding the unpleasant and being with the pleasant. We're opening to a field of choiceless awareness, equal interest in whatever arises.

You know how it is when we have a strong habit and we begin to try to break it. It's almost like the habit rears up and does anything to pull you back into the old way of doing things. It's sort of like that. Things get magnified; difficulties get magnified. When you go home and you think about it—what was that all about? You were in such a snit because you only got one piece of cake, or you wanted oranges and they were bananas. You'll go home and think, "I don't understand what that was all about."

But in the middle of the experience, the suffering is intense—and I'm not making fun of it, it's really so. The habits of craving and aversion are really, really strong. What's more, we fully believe that's the way things are, and that makes it much harder to see through them.

It's said that when the Buddha first came to his deep and full enlightenment, when he emerged from it, he could—and this is one of the powers of a Buddha—survey the world with his Buddha eye and see what all beings were doing and what was happening with them. What he saw, and what awakened his deep compassion, was this: everybody, no matter who they are or what their conditions, everybody only wants to be happy. And in our confusion, in our wrong assumptions that we never think to question—assumptions about who we are, about what is true—in wanting to be happy, most everybody continues to do just the things that bring more suffering upon themselves. Fully convinced that what they're doing is going to bring them happiness. Seeing this is what aroused his deep compassion and brought him out to teach.

I think a lot of this energy of wanting, the wanting mind, is what engenders this confusion about what will bring us happiness. Craving blinds us. Notice it should it come up—tonight or anytime tomorrow. If you suddenly notice you're feeling a little crazed, tune in and see. There might be something you want. It doesn't matter what it is. Perhaps you suddenly decide, "If I just had one more piece of foam rubber, then I wouldn't have any pain in the sittings." And the mind just gets obsessed. What else do you see? What else can you think of? Nothing counts until you can get back there and go through looking for the foam rubber.

Or if you're hungry and just wanting to get to lunch and you're at the back of the line, how do you feel about the people ahead of you? Are you filled with the warmth of sympathetic joy? "I'm so glad they're getting to take as much food as they want, heaping it on their plates." The craving, the need to get what we want, blinds us to everything else. We think that contentment will come when we get to the front and get the food on our plate. And so in standing in line, we're completely blind to the fact that contentment is accessible right here and now.

If you can notice the craving and just tune in to standing—so often I'm just standing. Okay, there's standing. There's craving. There's thinking. And then suddenly you'll notice something completely outside of this little scenario. Perhaps a person who seems really beautiful walks past, and there's a thought: "Ah, what a nice looking person." Just a little sense of joy that is possible because we came back from trying to jump ahead to the table and just landed here, right now.

They say there are two different ways that ignorance—or really, blindness, the blindness of craving—operates in our experience. One thing it does is this: when craving is present, and I don't mean just you're hungry and need to eat, I mean this lusting after whatever it is—you can't and don't appreciate what's here now. That's where we're blind to the truth, blind to peace. Blindness also functions by not letting us see or recognize what's here and appreciate it. And it can so distort our perception that we see what isn't there at all. Have you ever really wanted something so much that your mind creates it, even though it's not there?

I'll tell this story. A friend of mine and I were teaching in the desert in California a couple of years ago. It was a beautiful afternoon. We were sitting outside, warm, talking to some friends. One of them mentioned they'd just been down the road somewhere and had a really good milkshake. It was a hot afternoon, and somehow that just went into us. Really strong desire, craving arose. I really want to have a milkshake, and I want it now. It was instantaneous, and I was caught in it, so I didn't really notice this until later. I quit enjoying the conversation with the friends. My friend and I looked at each other and kind of said, let's go. You could tell we just pulled back from the conversation, started going "yes, no, yes, no" until they left. We ran to the car and got in it to go get this milkshake.

Craving leads you to do things that lack judgment too, because we only had about fifteen minutes until one of us had to be at the next sitting. So we went racing down to this place—and it had closed ten minutes earlier. We turned around. Did we come back? No, because craving really had a grip. We kept going way down, miles down the road in the other direction, just looking on either side for any Baskin Robbins or something that would have milkshakes.

I was driving and he was looking around. We'd both been down this road many times—I mean, we knew what was on this road. He looks over and goes, "Look, there it is! Yogurt Cafe! Quick, go in there." I looked, and I said, "That says Urgent Care. It's a hospital."

This is true.

So it's good when something like that happens. We were quite chastened. We said, "Well, I guess desire was driving this car." We turned around and went back.

That's the blinding quality of desire, of craving when it's not seen. And what's kind of interesting—one word for it is how often it's working in this way. And then we wonder how come we're not happy. We wonder why we feel disconnected. How come I can't find peace?

This is from the Tao Te Ching: "The Tao"—like another word for truth or Dharma—"never does anything, yet through it all things are done. If men and women could center themselves in it, the whole world would be transformed by itself in natural rhythms. People would be content with their simple everyday lives, in harmony and free of desire. When there is no desire, all things are at peace."

When there is no desire, all things are at peace. That's always available to us, just in a moment when we're not blinded by desire or by aversion, when we're not trying to change things. Truth reveals itself by itself in just a moment when things are at peace. And the natural expression, it seems, of understanding, of recognizing our truth, is compassion. That's why the two wings of the Buddhist teaching are great wisdom and great compassion.

I love the way Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master and peace activist, speaks about this. He has such simple examples showing how compassion is just the natural outcome of understanding. He talks about this one example of a small boy and his younger sister. She's really cranky and whining and driving him crazy. As brothers and sisters do, he's really annoyed with her and arguing back. They're really starting to get into it, and he's really aggravated. And then he learns—his mother tells him—that the sister is really sick. She has a high fever. She explains the kind of pain that the sister is in, in a way that he can understand. And as soon as he understands—oh, that's what she feels like, of course that's why she's cranky—without having to do something, a natural compassion arises. It's an understanding of the pain, an empathy, an acceptance that it's okay.

And it's the same with us. It can be the same with us towards ourselves, not just towards others. As the Dalai Lama says, our truest expression as human beings is the expression of compassion, arising out of our truest being—that of contentment, that of peace.

You can certainly see for yourself in a retreat like this, in our lives too, but retreats are really good microcosms. There's ample opportunity to begin to open towards yourself with compassion. What goes on here—just in talking to people today—what goes on here is often really difficult. There's a lot of physical pain. There's a lot of deep emotional pain. There's the pain that comes up for everyone of the emotions the Buddha called the five hindrances.

Almost nobody escapes going through these on a retreat or in our lives. There's sleepiness, or sloth and torpor—we love that word. There's restlessness of mind and of body, the mind just spinning and spinning, the body just wanting to jump out of your skin.

There's desire that's just outrageous. When you're sitting and you want this and you want that and you need a new car and you want a new job and you're changing your relationship and you're going through everything in your life that you want—and suddenly, oh, just recognizing it as desire is very helpful.

And the flip side: aversion. This often comes up on retreat, where you just hate the person next to you, you hate the food, you hate how the bulletin board looks, you hate how the hall's set up, you hate how the bell sounds. It just goes on and on until you finally realize, oh, I think it's simply the emotion of aversion arising in my experience—after we've projected it out onto every single sense object that comes our way.

And doubt, which obviously tends to come up with any or all of these.

These are very common emotional, energetic experiences. Just about everybody goes through them to some extent on retreat. And they can seem really magnified, really blown up, because—back to the quality of mindfulness—we're not trying to hide them.

We're not distracting ourselves from them. We're not jumping up and going for a drive as soon as we feel restless, hopefully. We're not going out and satisfying every desire, or at least going down to the convenience store to satisfy something. We're sitting here, we're walking here, and we're noticing it. And it's really difficult. It's painful. And mostly we're not used to being with this kind of difficulty, this kind of pain.

And it's funny, because so often the response to our situation is not one of compassion. It's either "there's something really wrong with me, I'm doing this wrong, you can never do anything right, and here you are sleeping, you're useless." Or it's the reverse: "This whole place is stupid, this whole meditation is ridiculous, I don't know what made me come, the friend who told me about this is in big trouble." One way or the other.

Does it ever occur to us to say, "Yes, this is really painful, this is really hard. And I'm really working to open to it, to soften to it, but sometimes that's just not possible"? To really begin to bring in compassion. The compassion can begin from the understanding that yes, this is part of life.

This happens to everybody. Part of why it's so difficult is that I think it shouldn't be happening. And I'm learning how to relate in a different way. So right now it's hard. And to really bring in some softness to ourselves, to really bring in some kindness.

Thich Nhat Hanh, I was just reading in a book, gives a little exercise that you could try later to just get the feeling of compassion—of just touching your one hand with your other. Often we just do it mechanically. But to do it with a real feeling of compassion: touch your left hand with your right hand, really feeling a loving, kind compassion toward your left hand from your right hand. And you see that it works both ways because both hands feel touched with compassion. We can touch all aspects of ourselves—all aspects of our body, of our emotions, of our life—in the same gentle, compassionate way if we'd only remember to do it.

Mindfulness is really this compassionate touching of whatever aspect of life is presenting itself right now. Whether it's the breath, whether it's sleepiness, whether it's sadness, whether it's boredom, whether it's joy—doesn't matter what—learning how to touch whatever is arising with mindfulness. I like to think of mindfulness as affectionate curiosity. Whatever comes up: "Oh, okay, what are you about? What's this about right now?" Not choosing this one I'll pay attention to, this one out the window. Because it doesn't work anyway.

As we learn to touch ourselves, our experience, with this compassionate mindfulness, we don't have to do a lot else. All by itself, this mindfulness that doesn't discriminate begins to broaden our experience of life, to balance our perception of who we are and what's going on in a really amazing way.

Sometimes it might seem that what we're talking about is just opening to the difficult—opening to the hindrances, to the pain—because that's what many of us are so versed at shutting out. But with the balancing perspective of mindfulness, with the opening to whatever's happening, we begin to find that we're also opening to what is beautiful, to what is very warming in our heart. Actually, we begin to open without even realizing it to inner contentment, to peace—because it's not somewhere else we have to look for. We just have to let down our blinders and open up to what's here.

What's interesting is that in this broadening of our perspective, we begin to notice that little aspects of peace, of contentment, of joy are always available—and in a much more simple way, a much more so-called mundane way than we might have expected when we were looking for whatever we were looking for, the big bliss trip or whatever.

This is again from Thich Nhat Hanh, speaking of how he works consciously when drowning in suffering, when really caught in difficulty—to consciously balance the perspective, the perception, by noticing something that's happening right now that's beautiful, that's peaceful. He says: "Most of us ask the question, 'What is wrong?' But we forget to ask, 'What is right?' There are many things that are not wrong." During the war—he's talking about the war in Vietnam—"we were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country, but we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage. I would mention these to the social workers and peace workers so they would be in touch with them."

It's sometimes hard to imagine, in the midst of what was probably to most of us unbelievable horror, to actively stop and say, "Okay, smell the coriander that's growing right here." And yet that's a really important aspect of being able to be centered and open and present with unbearable suffering. Even in that unbearable suffering, there is a real peace that's possible.

It doesn't have to be the middle of war. Anytime—here on retreat, experiment. Not just as soon as something a little unpleasant comes along; that's not what I'm talking about. But when you're really feeling caught up, tight, overwhelmed—and that happens to all of us—don't think you just have to grit it out. Deliberately soften. Open your heart. Open your perspective.

I used to go in the middle of a long retreat—I was on the second floor and I hardly ever went outside—but I used to just go stand on the fire escape and look at the tree at the end for just four or five minutes. It was summer, when I was really tight and caught up. And that was enough. Just letting in the beauty of nature would bring such a spaciousness and, again, a receptivity to my heart. I could again be with whatever was going on. Look at the sky. Just take a quiet breath. Whatever touches joy, whatever touches peace for you—and there's something almost always available here and now. It doesn't have to be so fantastic.

So we can do that consciously, but it also begins to happen quite naturally as we continue to work with mindful awareness, because mindfulness includes everything and doesn't just choose one or the other. What we begin to see is that what was supposedly neutral or mundane can put us in touch with so much joy, contentment, or appreciation.

I just read an article somewhere—in a newspaper—about a young twenty-one-year-old woman who was born with cystic fibrosis, which completely clogs up your lungs; you usually don't live very long. She had just had a partial lung transplant from each of her parents so that she could keep living. And she was saying, "It's so nice to be able to breathe like a normal person." She said, "I love air. It's so wonderful. Breathing is the most wonderful feeling I could ever imagine."

I thought, gosh, how many breaths have I been really present with? Quite a lot in twenty years of practice. But how often have I really appreciated with that depth the miracle of breathing?

It's wonderful, you know. There's so much in our life that when we simply notice it, it's that wonderful. And it's so easy to lose sight of that, to take it for granted.

Again, Thich Nhat Hanh talks about how when we have a painful toothache and it stops—ah, it's so wonderful. How much of the time do we not have a toothache? Do we ever notice, "Wow, my teeth feel really great"?

There's a lot that's available to us if we can come out of our tunnel vision of just going away from what's unpleasant or towards what's pleasant. When we get in touch with our eyes, our heart, our breathing, and our non-toothache and really enjoy them, we see that the conditions for peace and happiness are already present.

When we walk mindfully and touch the earth with our feet, when we drink tea with friends and touch the tea and our friendship, we get healed—and we can bring this healing to society. The more we have suffered in the past, the stronger a healer we can become. We can learn to transform our suffering into the kind of insight that will help our friends and society.

It's really possible, and it doesn't take all kinds of amazing circumstances. Everything that we need to awaken is right here and right now in this moment. There's nowhere else we need to go. We don't have to wait for some better experience to present itself so that then we can pay attention.

A lot of times we either think, "I have to be in a better, more spacious place, and then I can really explore." Or we think things are nice—well, what happens to me is I think I have to start suffering more to give me an oomph, a little push, because things are nice enough, so who cares? It's good enough.

That was one wonderful thing about the Buddha. It was never good enough until he really knew in his heart what was true in a way that's unshakable, so that the inner contentment that's always accessible was really always accessible to him.

And that's possible for us. At least we can touch it in moments and recognize that it isn't going anywhere else—we just lose sight of it. We just forget that it's possible here and now. Whatever situation is presenting itself is an opportunity for affectionate curiosity. Whatever situation is coming up right now is the gateway to inner contentment. Your knee pain is good enough. Sleepiness, irritability, sadness, joy—it's good enough. We never have to wait for something else to begin to open with loving attention to what's happening right now.

One teacher said, "We can't love anything till we love and appreciate what is present in each moment."

So rather than trying to create ourselves into a different, better person, can we just open to love and appreciate only this one moment? That's all. Don't worry about all the next moments. Never mind the last moments. Can we just practice a little bit loving and appreciating what's present in this moment just as it is, and recognizing it for what it is? That's the power of mindfulness.

I want to close with a paraphrase of one of my favorite quotations from Ajahn Sumedho, an American who's been a Buddhist monk in the Thai tradition for twenty or twenty-five years and has a monastery in England. He says something to the effect that you don't have to experience all sorts of extreme pain and difficulty in order to overcome suffering. The pain of your ordinary life is enough to be enlightened.

And again, from Thich Nhat Hanh: "Practicing Buddhism is a clever way to enjoy life. Happiness is available. Please help yourself."

I don't mean it's simple, but it's just to open ourselves to another possibility.

CHAPTER 254

Closing Talk: Integrating Practice into Daily Life

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> This collaborative closing talk offers practical wisdom for transitioning from retreat to daily life. The teachers begin by examining the first two steps of the Noble Eightfold Path: sammā diṭṭhi (right understanding) and sammā saṅkappa (right intention). They emphasize shifting from a quantitative orientation—the cultural conditioning toward accumulation and achievement—to a qualitative appreciation of each moment. Central to this reorientation is adopting an attitude of learning, where every situation, especially difficulties, becomes an opportunity for growth rather than a personal problem.
> The discussion expands to cover sīla (ethical conduct)—wise speech, action, and livelihood—as an indispensable foundation for awakening. Rather than rigid rules, these are presented as areas for ongoing investigation of our intentions and motivations. The teachers acknowledge honestly that the microscopic quality of mindfulness cultivated on retreat typically doesn't persist in daily life's complexity. What remains available is sammā vāyāma (wise effort): the willingness to wake up again and again, even through simple practices like taking three conscious breaths.
> A powerful story illustrates the teaching on generosity: a nine-year-old girl dying of cystic fibrosis who, despite her own suffering, created an 'I love you' poster for her grieving father. This exemplifies how investigating what inhibits our natural expression of heart—usually our own suffering—allows generosity to flow naturally. The talk concludes with mettā bhāvanā (loving-kindness meditation), extending wishes for happiness to oneself, benefactors, loved ones, and all beings.

We'd like to spend a little time talking about the subject of returning to our daily lives and bringing the meditation back into our workaday world.

Let me start by prefacing Mike and Carol's comments by saying that no teacher that I know of has this completely down. All of our responses are incomplete; the book is still being written, so to speak. So given that, we can start discussing from the point of view that each one of us has.

What I'd like to do is just talk briefly about the first two rungs on the Eightfold Path, the first two steps. I think it will become obvious that given the right orientation to life, given the right attitude to life, the practice unfolds in a moment-to-moment quality just through our interfacing with that right attitude.

It's sometimes easier to start where we should start rather than to try to go straight to mindfulness and being meticulously aware moment after moment, doing everything—picking up the coffee cup, opening the door. We lose that ability very quickly in the hubbub of a very active and hectic existence unless we have the right attitude on which to approach our living experience.

The first rung of Buddhism is right understanding, having a sense of what the purpose of life is all about. The purpose of life, as it's being conveyed through the television sets and movie screens, is very much based on quantity—the more the better. The bumper sticker reads, "The person who has the most toys when they die, wins." This is sort of the way we govern our existence.

But on a more introspective level, that also means we have to look at our own ambition, our own sense of gain, our own sense of priorities. What is it that we're doing, and how is it that we're approaching life? Are we approaching it on a quantitative basis? Self-improvement is part of that. In many, many subtle ways, we're involved in that competitive striving. And it has left us rather poverty-stricken—inwardly poverty-stricken.

At some point we have to change over, re-look, and reassess our lives so that we gain a renewed understanding and appreciation for the quality of the time that we spend here on earth. That change, that flip from quantity to quality, is really the movement from unskillful to skillful understanding.

When we're focused on quality—the quality of our life—then we start appreciating ourselves in the moment as it's expressed in its fullness. We start expressing an appreciation for just being in relationship, regardless of how that relationship moves, or the motivations for being in that relationship, or whatever happens eventually to that relationship. Just the bare expression of relating to someone else, relating to life, smelling the flowers—not trying to grow gardens and gardens of flowers, but being able to appreciate a single flower—is really a shift. You can feel the impact and the orientation, the posture that would have if we would just embrace it.

Now, given that right orientation, that right understanding, we have to have the right attitude that we bring to that understanding. And that is the attitude of learning—being able to say that every situation in this process I have the ability to open to and to learn and to grow from, regardless of what is happening. Every situation is the optimum strategy for our own personal growth. There's nowhere else I need to go to grow when the opportunity is laid bare before me.

This means that all of the problems, the perceived difficulties that we have with people, with ourselves, with our job—all of that, all of our own personal suffering—is an opportunity to move in a different direction. Ajahn Chah used to say that there are two types of suffering: the suffering that leads to greater suffering, and the suffering that ends suffering. When we grow and open ourselves to those areas of ourselves that are less than complete, imperfect, we are moving away from these problems as being personal problems to being opportunities for our own growth.

I leave you with that as being the main focus, the main intention, the main way that we should be leaving the retreat. If you have gained some techniques which are helpful to you along the way about being mindful in the moment, then so much the better. Certainly for people who use their hands a lot, as we all do from time to time—like in dishwashing and laundry—there will be that immediate groundedness in mindfulness.

But to assume that we'll be able to carry that moment-to-moment mindfulness, that meticulous, careful attention in most of the ways we live, didn't prove true for me. If you're able to do it, fine. I just needed a different direction. I needed myself to say, okay, what's all this about now? What are we really doing here with this mindfulness? Mindfulness accesses ourselves, accesses our relationships so that we can learn from them. So let's go to the learning. And when we learn, we're already awake. We're alive. We have to be participating in that moment fully, and therefore we are mindful. It's putting the horse in proper relationship to the cart.

The other thing I would encourage you: if there was a word or a description that rested well with you this weekend—like "true and useful" or "generosity" or "love" or "learning"—I would encourage you to take that word and move it into your life, into a field of investigation, to see how deeply you could move with that word. Like, let's take generosity. I think it resonates with me. I'd like to be a generous person.

So I'm going to find out what it is that keeps me from being generous. I'm going to see if I can make a life statement, a posture to the world that will be in terms of generosity, in terms of service, because it resonates with me. It feels like that's the way people should live. It's the way I should live.

And so I move out into my life with that sense of generosity. And suddenly I feel myself very caught in my own problems, in my own selfish desires, in my own way of life, at the expense of everything else. And I look at myself and say, this doesn't feel generous. Now what is it that is inhibiting that generosity? What is it that's inhibiting my ability to serve and to reach out beyond myself?

And so we start looking at the things that inhibit that. What we'll find, almost always, is that it's our personal suffering that inhibits our ability to listen and to move out beyond our own patterns.

They talk about acceptance in dying. If I can share with you a story about a nine-year-old girl with cystic fibrosis who was dying. Frequently when people die, they get lost in their own drama in a way that keeps them or prohibits them from being able to listen or to reach out beyond their own pain—which is what our problems do in relationship to our generosity.

But this young girl, nine years old, whose mother and father had just recently split up in divorce—the divorce was instigated by the mother, but both parents had rejoined to come to their dying daughter's bed. There was obviously a lot of pain in the father, who was suffering both the pain of the separation and the pain of seeing his daughter at the end of her life.

And this young girl—I had the privilege of being there—she said, "Okay, I would like everybody out of the room." There was the mother, the father, and myself. We thought she was trying to send people out of the room so she could die alone. She was craning her neck so that she could breathe, because in the end stage of cystic fibrosis, it's very difficult to pull in the amount of air that you need. We felt she was very close to dying.

She asked everybody to leave. And after everybody had left, she got up and drew a big "I love you" poster for her father. Then she asked people to come back into the room and offered that to her father—reaching out beyond her pain to be able to touch somebody else's, even as she was dying.

That's generosity. And we need to understand that this is not always available to us. To be able to explore and investigate why, and what inhibits that natural expression of heart—we all have that natural expression. Understanding what inhibits us allows it to occur in its normal and natural way.

I leave you with that, and my appreciation for all of us having been together this weekend.

Since Rodney began with the first two steps of the Eightfold Path, I'll round it out by talking about the remaining six steps, which are really two segments. The Eightfold Path is what the Buddha offered as a way of living that both actualizes our understanding of truth—of who we are, of our interconnectedness—and also a way of living that helps us keep waking up. As Rodney said, it helps us keep investigating, helps us keep seeing to the roots of our experience, to the roots of our suffering. Why is this situation so difficult? Where am I attached and confused here? How can I touch the truth?

The second segment contains three steps, and the third segment contains three steps. Both are really fundamental tools for use in our lives to help keep us awake.

The first three of these deal basically with our speech and our actions, our expressions of ourselves in the world, in our relationships with others. They give us a way to reflect back on ourselves. How am I behaving? How am I speaking, and why? What effect do my actions and speech have on others, and what effect does that have on myself?

It's really back to those five precepts that we talked about at the beginning, but simplified into wise speech, wise actions, and wise livelihood—including all the active aspects of our life and really giving attention to them.

Why speak? How do I relate to others through my speech? When I use untrue or wounding speech, rather than making ourselves bad, we really look and see why. What was the deep inner pain in me that brought about this harsh response to someone, or this actually untrue expression?

Not again as "I will never again tell a lie" or "I will never again bark at somebody in an unkind way." Please don't set yourselves up for that. It's not about that kind of rigidity at all. It's much more a pointing to let's use our lives to wake up, and let's use all aspects of our lives as a way to pay attention, as a pointing to truth, as an area to learn, as Ravi said.

So this second portion of the Eightfold Path points to looking at our speech, looking at our actions—basically actions of harming, actions of stealing, actions of misusing our sexuality in ways that are harmful to ourselves or others, misusing power, misusing authority. Basically, any action that harms another, and seeing almost immediately, really feeling in ourselves, that that harms ourself.

Working with our speech and actions, you can see how it actualizes the sense of our oneness with each other, with all beings. And at least in my experience, it's an infinite area of exploration—far more subtle than it would seem from just thinking, "Well, I just will work with not lying, I'll work with not killing." It's a very subtle area, one for ongoing investigation of our intentions, of our motivation.

You know, because it's all about what we mean, what's our intention in our actions. So if you're walking and you don't see and you step on an ant, and there's really no intention whatsoever to hurt that ant—there still might be pain in ourselves, compassion, when we realize that it's been killed through our step, and that's appropriate. But there's no need for blame. But then other times, when we see a bunch of ants and think, "I can't be bothered to walk around, I'll just walk through them"—that's a little different. And so we just look at how we act, and why, and how we feel after doing that. Because I've done that, and I feel so much worse than if I had just taken two minutes and walked around the ants. So we continue to explore.

And with our livelihood—how do we make a living? The Buddha specifies this quite directly: not making a living in arms trading or in selling drugs, the things that obviously bring harm to people. And again, for me it's been an ongoing exploration of really looking at what my relation to livelihood is, what's the truest expression of who I am and how I want to be in the world. And whatever we're doing, what's our intention in doing it? Of course we have to have a livelihood to make money—of course that's part of the intention. But also, how do we actualize that? How do we relate to it?

Whatever we're doing, it doesn't matter if it's something that seems socially really responsible, or if my job is sweeping a driveway, or taking care of kids, or working in a supermarket. All of these relate with people, relate with our environment, and we can do that with an attitude of connectedness and caring. It doesn't matter so much what the surface livelihood looks like—it's much more our inner relationship to it.

And as I said on the first night, working and giving attention to our actions, our speech, our relations to ourselves and others is an indispensable foundation for a life of awakening. It's an indispensable foundation for being able to continue questioning really honestly. And as Rodney said, if you have the attitude of questioning, sooner or later you start questioning how your actions and speech are, so it all works together. But really giving attention to this area lays a basis of harmony with ourselves, harmony with others, with life, with what is—a foundation that can help us continue to open in very deep ways to the potential for peace and happiness, for harmony in our life as it is now.

The last segment of the path is really the tools, in a way, that we've been learning in the formal sitting and walking in mindfulness meditation here—the tools of mindfulness, concentration, and energy. The willingness to give energy and commitment to our awakening, to our questioning, to caring about ourselves, really.

One of the things that somehow took me years to understand—I was really slow about this—is that, as Rodney said, mindfulness and concentration, that very careful quality of attention that lets us be somewhat microscopic and present and minute in our experience on a retreat—that level of mindfulness is not going to last, most likely, when you walk out the door. You start driving on the highway and reading the signs, and you might make it a few miles before you suddenly have to turn on the radio. Nowadays, talk on the phone. I was driving with a friend in L.A. and she's talking on the phone, switching lanes, drinking a cup of coffee, and talking to me. I was a nervous wreck. And then I saw everyone else on the freeway doing the same thing. It was really scary.

But in other ways, we can all relate. How often, if we're eating alone, do we have to have a newspaper to read, or listen to the news, or something? Just eating somehow isn't enough. But you can see here from eating what an incredibly rich and varied and full activity eating really is, if we would but pay attention.

So in our daily lives, the same quiet, microscopic quality of mindfulness is generally not available, nor is the concentration—that real sense of one-pointedness, of just sticking with one thing at a time. It's available, but not in the same degree that it is here. Of course mindfulness is available in the larger lens of clear comprehension that Rodney spoke of.

The third quality, and the one that lets us be mindful, wake up to what we're doing, be concentrated enough to at least just do two things at a time instead of four—the one that lets us keep questioning, that turns difficult situations in our lives into potentials for growth—is the last aspect of the path, and that's wise effort.

This is what took me so long somehow to put together. Maybe that's my particular bugaboo; yours might be something else. On a retreat, we're putting in an immense amount of energy, of effort, through our willingness to look, to sit, to walk, to bring our attention back to the here and now, whatever we're doing, over and over and over. How many times in these three and a half days have you woken up and realized, "Oh, I'm spacing out," and just gently come back to the walking, to the eating, to the sitting? That's effort—just that willingness to see what's so.

When I do a retreat, I'll put in a tremendous amount of effort. And for years I thought then I could just walk out the door and cruise—that that was all you needed to do, and life just takes care of itself. But it just isn't so. What we learn on retreat is really what is possible for us as human beings—that it's possible, and we can develop that quality more, to be, as Rodney was saying this morning, in the middle of the storm and really have an island of peace.

We can touch that peace from moment to moment. And it's in our daily lives that the storms really rage. It's so easy to forget that this, too, is the opportunity. This is a storm. It might be a lot more complicated than what we experience on retreat. Instead of just me and my mind, there really are three other minds involved.

Now that you know how complicated your mind is, can you imagine what's going on when you get four of you together and you're all in some kind of storm? You're all projecting and imagining. You don't even hardly know what's going on for you, and you all think you're going to relate in some reasonable way. No wonder things can get so out of hand so quickly.

I remember one teacher said to me once, "The worst thing you can do—and we all do it—is put yourself at the mercy of another person's mind, now that you know how crazy yours is." And we all do it, letting other people judge us and taking that in and accepting it as true.

But the willingness to say, whatever's going on in our life, however difficult the situation is, "Right now, I can wake up"—that's the effort. And the tool we have is just this mindfulness, this meditation. You can wake up. As Thích Nhất Hạnh says, just take three breaths. Just stop, take three breaths, connect with your breath, connect with your body, with this moment. That can make a huge difference.

You don't always say, "Let's have this argument after I go meditate for an hour." But we can say, "Let's just take three breaths and really connect with what centeredness is and start again." Really connect. Let yourself connect with the other person, with their pain and their confusion, and start again.

Sitting a little bit every day really helps us stay in touch with this possibility. If you sit forty-five minutes, great. If you can sit an hour, great. If you can sit two and a half minutes, great. Don't get into judging that you should be doing more. Appreciate what you are doing so that it's a joy rather than some grim duty.

There are many ways to continue waking up, many ways to remember: How can I wake up in this moment? How can I at least just connect with this moment? A lot of the formal meditation opens us to the possibility and gives us some tools. Hopefully that's what you might have touched this weekend.

Rather than trying to cover everything we could think of about coming back into daily life or how to keep practice awake, we wanted to see if you have any questions. Please feel free to share. If you've done this a lot, you'll often have more helpful things to say than we do. As Rodney said, everyone has a slightly different experience, and I haven't met anyone who really has it down, who is always awake.

A participant asked about the connection between generosity and family, and whether people can give too much.

Rodney: I do think so. And usually that comes from not really understanding one's boundaries and giving too much, giving in excess. It's often based upon a need within oneself to feel appreciated through generosity or to receive something in return.

The generosity I'm speaking of is really a life posture in which we know our boundaries very well. We give what we can and we don't give what we can't, and we keep that well defined. Yet it's keeping ourselves on the edge of our selfishness, so we're always exploring how we can be more generous—but not to a fault.

In every situation, we could always be giving more, but we're on the edge of what we can possibly give. We look at that edge to see where we're holding back, where we're protecting ourselves, why we need to do that, and who it is we're protecting. And we also see what we're able to give and share within that limit. As we grow in the practice, that boundary becomes more transparent and permeable.

Another participant asked about the loving-kindness meditation from the previous evening.

In a way, this goes into the core of compassion. What I was saying last night—"May I be happy," or "I deserve to be happy"—that's also okay. I was talking about mettā, loving-kindness, which is a sort of unbounded love for yourself and for all beings. Compassion is really an aspect of that.

Compassion is a little more specific in that it's that love turned towards your pain, or turned towards others' pain and suffering. There is actually a similar compassion meditation where you would focus on yourself or another being and say the words, "May you be free from suffering." It's more tuned into the suffering aspect, but with love. Whereas with loving kindness, you can feel that same wish for love even toward someone who's really happy and doesn't seem to be suffering.

We'll practice again at the end this morning. It can be quite peaceful and calming. And for some people, actually, the compassion aspect is more alive and more accessible, and that's fine.

Is there anything constant? I'm not trying to be flippant, but I invite you to really examine your experience to see if there is anything constant. My answers come through my own experience, and they mean very little to you unless you've explored everything within yourself—your body and mind—to come to your own conclusions about that.

One thing that we sense as permanent is some abiding soul or self within this process. We haven't spoken too much about that this weekend, but it's worth a great deal of inquiry as to whether that is what we think it to be. To examine that, to see whether there is something back there that maintains itself through time, unperturbed and undisturbed, or whether there are just qualities that come and go within a whole process that we call personhood. So I invite us all to inquire into that.

Faith is one of the really vital aspects of awakening—the sense of trust and having to make an inference beyond our actual experiential knowledge, or else none of us would ever even start looking. It gives us a sense of confidence. And then, through our own experience, our own experiential understanding, what gets added to it they actually call verified faith. It's no longer because of something someone said; you have a sense that it's really verified from your own experience. Both of those are really necessary.

I think it depends upon what your need is in a particular situation. There are times when sitting, your heart just longs to sit and to do long retreats and just to spend quiet time. It calls out with that kind of urgency. And there's something that needs to be done in relationship to that sitting practice; it's calling out for growth in that area.

At other times we feel very alive and awake and active and energetic and in movement, which is much of our life, most of our life actually. If it just ended up that meditation was defined by the time we spent on retreat, then it wouldn't be very useful, to be honest. We have to be able to carry it out into interfacing with life, to experience how—because there's a part of ourselves that doesn't get touched in the same way on the pillow as it does when you're talking to your mother.

The walking meditation is an expression of meditation in movement. It's the bridge between ourselves in stillness and in activity. It requires the same kind of effort to bring that same quality of attentiveness to ourselves in movement—perhaps more effort than we do in stillness when we're not moving. The body's at rest; it's a little easier to focus on. And you can spend, if you have half an hour a day, walking if that feels more comfortable to you, more fitting for your own heart. Or you can spend it sitting if you say, "Oh boy, I just want to quiet down here." It's what calls out for you to do. Sitting and walking are equally valuable at different times in anyone's practice.

The time of day is a matter of personal preference. I personally prefer to get up and sit first thing in the morning. And actually, it's nice if you can do it just before you go to bed too—a little of both times is good.

I think the most important thing for helping establish some stability in daily practice is to pick a regular time that you know you can maintain, and a realistic amount of time. Saying "now I'm going to sit two hours a day" is really hard. But if you know you can get up and do it in the morning for half an hour before you do anything else, and you make it a regular part of your day, I think that's the most helpful.

And then you could add ten minutes over your lunch break. I know people who go and sit in their car in the parking lot at work and sit for ten or fifteen minutes at lunch, and they say it really helps their day be much more balanced and focused.

Regarding sitting with a tape that has affirmations—for doing Vipassana, I wouldn't recommend that, since it's very much about just being with what is right now. Metta is perhaps the closest thing to affirmations, but even that is trying to get in touch with the actual feeling as it's manifesting now. So from the point of view of Vipassana, I would suggest sitting in silence and really just being with the breath, the body, the thoughts and emotions as they are now.

Something that's really helpful is sitting with other people. Even if it's only once a week or once a month, it gives some juice and sense of community to the practice.

One participant shared: "What I frequently do is look at areas of myself where there's some blindness, some areas of selfishness, and give myself a positive affirmation such as 'I can listen to people.' When I'm starting to do ten thousand things and not really listening, having that reminder points me towards where I'm not listening and reawakens me to my potential to listen."

Yes, and as Carol said, the way I use it is to point myself towards the experience of how it is that I'm not listening, rather than using it as some kind of mantra that I just repeat mechanically.

I'm not sure I can say anything that hasn't been said this weekend because there's no secret teaching here. It's been communicated as best we're able in the course of these three days together. To understand this, and to be patient with the process of coming to that point, is probably more important than any single thing that we do.

To know that we're going to get stuck and we're going to react, and to keep the attitude that as long as I'm learning from this, it's not going to add more reaction to that which is already there. The right orientation to all of this going on in whatever hectic environment we live in is to really work upon our own reactivity in that situation. And ultimately that will have the most benefit on everyone around us.

There is no little trick, but in a way we can each find our own little reminders. For example, if there's a particular kind of situation you call "high drama"—a way that you get sucked in or a way that you feel—you can find a particular thing that works for you, something quick to get you back to the present for just a second. The trick will be to remember it.

As I said before, take three breaths. For me, if I just remember to bring my awareness back from out there, involved in the mania, and come back and drop into feeling my body—that's enough. It takes no time; it just takes remembering. Then you have one particular thing to do when you remember, and it can land you in the moment. "Oh right, this is high drama." And once you recognize it's high drama, even for an instant, you might have the possibility of choosing for this minute not to get involved in it, because now you've recognized it and in that moment you're not a participant in it.

Some people use the sound of bells or clocks to wake them up. Or you could use the recognition itself—when you say "I can't stand this thing," oh, high drama! As soon as you can name it, you're aware. Just come back and feel your body. For an instant, you're out of it. And it expands from there. You find your own ways to do that.

Someone asked about running and whether it's possible to practice mindfulness while running. Sure, it's possible. But they also shared that sometimes they let their mind wander during runs, and it's become the most beautiful time of their life.

That sounds good to me. It doesn't sound exactly mindful, but in this life that we live, we all need periods of time when we can reflect on situations or when we can allow creativity to come up. It's true that when you're sitting, sometimes you get the most creative ideas, but if you were jumping up and drawing and writing the whole time, you'd never have the quietness.

But if you're an architect, say, you've got to have creative ideas once in a while and let them roll. So this sounds like a very conscious period when you're letting the subconscious and unconscious flow in a very fluid and creative way. In a very broad sense, it's not moment-to-moment mindfulness, but you are aware of what's happening. You're aware that you're letting the thoughts run.

You're aware that creative ideas are coming. You're sort of present with that. And I think that's really important. It's different from just the mind going chit-chit-chit-chit all the time.

So we wanted to end with about ten minutes of loving-kindness meditation together. Please let yourselves get comfortable. Stretch for a minute if you need to.

Sitting in space, here and now, feeling your body on the chair or the cushion. Just let your mind, your heart, your body relax. Relax into here and now. Just forget all the trying to create, to be, to be different. Forget all the judgments and comparisons. Even forget all the ideas about who you are, all your self-identifications. And just feel yourself alive here and now, without limitations or descriptions. Notice the sense of living presence.

In some ways, this living presence can manifest as loving-kindness—all-embracing, all-connecting loving-kindness. Begin by feeling the sensations in your heart center area, sensations of life, living energy of the universe. Let this living energy manifest as love, as a gentle friendliness. Let this loving energy radiate outwards and fill your whole being. In a way, knowing that who you are is this love. How can you be separate from it?

Loving yourself just as you are right now, it doesn't even make sense to have some limitation or exception on it. Just showering love still in your body. And out of this deep love, wishing for yourself the deepest peace and happiness that you would wish out of all-embracing love.

May I be happy. May I be peaceful. May I be free from suffering. May I live with a heart of compassion.

Really deeply wishing this happiness for yourself. You, as much as any other being in the universe, deserve it.

May I be happy. May I be peaceful. May I be free from suffering. May I move with a heart of compassion.

Now bring to heart, to mind, the image of someone dear to you that you easily feel love for—not sexual and not complicated. Someone you feel a lot of love and appreciation for. Perhaps a benefactor, someone who has really helped you somewhere along in your life. Holding their image in your heart, feeling and directing this all-embracing loving energy towards this person. Feeling in this love the deep wishes for happiness for them that you would also wish for yourself.

May you be happy. May you be peaceful. May you be free from suffering. May you live with love and compassion.

Feeling how this energy of loving-kindness encompasses our dear friend in the same way it encompasses us, no different.

Just now, for a minute or so, if any other images come to heart—perhaps people you're going back to see, family members, friends, co-workers—just focus on the parts of them that you easily love, on their so-called good part, and then feel this loving energy for the entirety of these beings.

Really wishing: May you be happy. May you truly be happy. May you live in peace. May you be free from suffering. May you live with love and compassion.

The connection through loving-kindness dissolves all differences, all judgments and separations. A connection from one heart to another. Feeling our deep unity, really. Our deep interconnectedness.

Now include all of us here in this room in the circle of this unbounded energy of loving-kindness. Appreciation for the support we've given each other through our steady inquiry and presence. Letting this loving energy extend to the staff, the cooks, the maintenance workers, the managers, the office people upstairs, people in the front office. Everyone trying as best as possible to express their understanding and love. Letting the loving energy extend outwards in all directions. As the Buddha said, all beings only want to be happy.

May it truly be so.

May all suffering beings find relief—those who are seemingly causing the suffering, those who are dying, those in prison, those who are sick, those just being born. We are all equal in that we only truly want happiness and peace.

May all beings everywhere be free from suffering.

May all beings know true peace and happiness.

May all beings live with a heart of love and compassion.

May all beings know the truth.

CHAPTER 255

Intentions and Thoughts

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of meditation's most common challenges: working with thought. Rather than promising to dissolve distractions, she guides practitioners toward understanding the nature of thought itself—recognizing that thoughts, like all phenomena, arise through conditions and have no tangible reality or intrinsic existence.
>
> Wilson explores how mistaken perception, colored by greed, aversion, or delusion, leads to papañca (mental proliferation), where one perception spirals into elaborate stories we mistake for truth. She shares vivid examples, including her own experience of mistaking fireworks for artillery fire, to illustrate how we construct reality from assumptions built on potentially inaccurate perceptions. The practice involves returning to bare experience—seeing thought as thought, just as we learn to feel sensation as sensation.
> The talk beautifully connects the wisdom of emptiness with compassionate action, drawing on the Buddha's Noble Eightfold Path to show how right understanding naturally gives rise to purified intentions, which then manifest as skillful speech and action. Wilson emphasizes that recognizing our interconnectedness doesn't lead to passive detachment but to vibrant engagement with life. She concludes with the aspiration of bodhicitta—practicing not merely for personal liberation but for the awakening of all beings, transforming even the most ordinary activities into expressions of wisdom and compassion.

I received a letter from a dharma group in the mail, and it had a little advertisement in it that said: "Deepen your meditations, improve concentration and absorption, dissolve distractions and inner chatter." It was an ad for a hypnotherapist. So I'm just offering that—if that's the way you want to go, you can go.

After the instructions this morning, when Sharon just mentioned we were going to pay attention to thought, everybody cracked up. It made me think maybe that would be something to talk about tonight: working with awareness of thought.

I can't promise what the hypnotherapist promises—that you will dissolve all distractions and inner chatter. Nor is that the aim of the meditation. When working with thought, it's really about learning to understand the nature of thought, just as we bring our attention to understand the nature of every other experience. And within that wise understanding lies freedom. It's not about getting rid of thought, although all of us, at some point, spend a large amount of our time thinking about how we can meditate in order to get rid of thought. That's not what it's about.

Thought is an amazing thing, isn't it? We'd really be lost without it. It's incredible—we need it. It creates so much. It's a wonderful tool, when it's a tool. Unfortunately, a lot of the time it can feel as if we're victims of our thoughts.

This is from the Buddha: "How can a troubled mind understand the way? Your worst enemy cannot harm you as much as your own thoughts, unguarded. But once mastered, once understood, no one can help you as much—not even your father or your mother."

Thoughts are incredibly powerful. Yet if we could look at a thought just as a thought, what is it? Right now, deliberately think a thought: "It snowed last night." Poof. What is that? It's nothing. How is it that we get so caught up in such a struggle, so imprisoned by our thoughts? How did they become so problematic?

One way is that we confuse the thought itself for the reality of what we're thinking about. Here is a short poem from the Polish woman who won the Nobel Prize for Literature, Wisława Szymborska. It's called "The Three Oddest Words":

When I pronounce the word future,
The first syllable already belongs to the past.
When I pronounce the word silence, I destroy it.
When I pronounce the word nothing,
I make something no non-being can hold.

The thought, the word, is just that—it's nothing else. It's not the actuality of what the thought or the word symbolizes. But this is a hard lesson. It's hard for us to really believe that, because we get so attached and identified—either to the thought, or the reaction we have to it, or how it makes us feel, or what it means—that actually we don't even notice what a thought itself is.

From Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "Myriads of thoughts have run through our minds, but all they have done is increase our confusion and dissatisfaction. When a rainbow appears, we see many beautiful colors, yet a rainbow is not something we can actually clothe ourselves in or wear as an ornament. It simply appears through the conjunction of various conditions. Thoughts arise in the mind in just the same way, through the conjunction of various conditions. They have no tangible reality or intrinsic existence at all."

He's not speaking metaphorically here. This is actual: they have no tangible reality at all. "There is therefore no logical reason why they should have so much power over us, nor any reason why we should be enslaved by them. Once we recognize that thoughts are intrinsically empty, they will no longer have the power to deceive us."

They're not bad. Once we recognize what a thought itself actually is, it doesn't have the power to deceive us, and then we can use it in a way that's helpful.

But again, it's that we don't see, we don't know how to use our wise attention to recognize the transparent nature of a thought. We get so hooked in, as I said, from our reactions, from the sense of who I am and how this thought affects me or reflects me or is me.

And I want to say: just because a thought occurs frequently, or arises together with a strong emotion, does not make it more accurate. It does not make it more true—although that's often what we tend to think.

Like, "It snowed last night." Now that happens to be in the realm of relative reality, an accurate thought. There's no big thing necessarily connected with it. But "I am a stupid jerk"—because it keeps arising, because it comes with a lot of baggage attached to it—it's actually less true than the other. We can learn to look at the thought itself as distinct from the sense of self and story that grows around it.

Some of you may have read Mark Epstein's book, Thoughts Without a Thinker. Just the title says it all. The thoughts are without a thinker. Now, use your thought and think about that. If the thought doesn't have a thinker, it's really not a problem. Actually, the thought's not the problem. The thinker's the problem.

I don't know if anyone here has mentioned one of Joseph Goldstein's more brilliant recommendations along this line of getting a sense of thoughts without a thinker, which is to imagine that every thought that arises that you're aware of comes from the person behind you. It's brilliant, isn't it? If it's not your thought, it's really not problematic. Just some weird thought that came and went, just like a sound. This is a really good way to approach it because, you see, it's the thinker that gives it all the oomph, not the thought.

So we can begin to learn how to bring wise attention to the experience of thinking, or thought itself. And by itself, it's the same as we bring attention to sensations, to emotions, to our breath. By just meeting it with bare attention, we begin to see through various layers of where we get hooked—which I can't pretend to talk about all of them tonight. I just want to talk about a couple.

One is on the level—actually it's the moment pre-thought—of what we call basic perception. Now, perception in Buddhist psychology is a very specific quality that arises in every moment of consciousness. When there's a sense contact—a moment when there's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, or mental activity—when there's a moment... take something simple like hearing. There's something that makes a sound. There's an ear door, an ear that works. And there's consciousness. If you were in a coma, we wouldn't say hearing was occurring. So when those three things come together—a sound, an ear door that works, and consciousness—that's called contact, a moment of hearing.

Perception is said to arise in every moment that there's contact like that. And it is what we would call the quality of recognition or discernment. So with a finger snap, for example, it might not even be a whole thought, but it's recognizing. It's based really on memory and it arises out of being aware of what's happening.

But that perception—often people have said, when we talk in the interviews about opening to hearing, someone will say, "Oh, you know, I can be with the bare experience, but of course right away my mind's going, 'Well, that's a bird, and that's a car going by...'" Yeah, that's perception. There's some way, if it's something we've heard or known before, we recognize it.

Now, I don't know if Sharon mentioned at this retreat, but at the last retreat she talked about her favorite word in Pali: papañca. Papañca is generally translated as proliferation—this proliferation of mind that just goes wild on something. More technically, it's said that in a moment of perception, what often happens is, first, we often don't even recognize perception happening and we're on to the thoughts about it. Our reactions are the next thing it reminds us of. This is what's called papañca.

What one perceives, it's said in the texts, one thinks about. And then what one thinks about, there's associations and memories and on and on and on. And it says these notions then assail and overwhelm a person. It's the tendency of the imagination to break loose and run riot. These are from the old commentaries. This is papañca. We have one perception—finger snap—and when we're not really attentive, the mind just does a riff on it, goes into this whole papañca, and you wake up who knows where. And that's just a normal tendency.

Now what confuses it even further is this: if we're aware, we can bring our wise attention back to the original sense contact, the perception—finger snap—and nothing much happens. That's a lot of what we're doing in meditation practice. We're learning how to just be with the breath rather than the whole story of how uptight and type A I am because my breath is shallow. We're learning how to just walk. Learning how to just feel a sensation in the knee rather than the whole story about being in the hospital. All of that is just coming back to the bare experience.

But often we don't recognize this perception part. And what gets really interesting is that on the level of basic perception, a lot of the time our perception is not correct—and we don't know it. The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. So it's not only that the imagination meets the perception, breaks loose and runs riot. First of all, it met a perception that wasn't even accurate, and then goes wild on that. No wonder we don't know what's happening. All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge.

Mistaken perception is said to occur when, in that moment of contact, the consciousness is colored with one of our three friends that Sharon mentioned last night: delusion, greed, or aversion. These can actually color the perception itself, and we don't realize it if we don't know they're present.

Take Sharon's example of the chili pepper. Biting down on the chili pepper, if you go to the bare experience, it's stinging and hot. That's just how it is. But the perception of chili pepper could be colored with "I want to get out of this country, I can't believe people eat this food, this is horrible." Or it could be colored with "this is an indication of something healthy." And then the papañca goes off in two completely different directions, when really it's just stinging and hot—and everything else is extra.

This quality of mistaken perception can be more or less obvious. I remember one time I was in the hospital. I'd been there a few days, and when they give you drugs and such, the mind can go into a kind of weird state, definitely. One morning, real early, like five o'clock, a nurse came. It was her job to wake me up and get me out of bed to weigh me—that was really important, how much I weighed. My consciousness was filled with paranoia, which I didn't realize. And I actually visually perceived her as demonic. It's really how I saw her. And the poor lady—because I reacted according to the perception—I screamed. I don't remember what I said.

But the next day, the same lady had to come at the same time, get me out of bed, and weigh me again. This time I didn't have that paranoia coloring my perception. Instead, I saw what was probably more accurate: a nice-looking lady who looked a little scared. I felt really bad.

But that's an example of how, when the perception is that distorted, don't we really believe that's how it is? If someone else had a different notion, we'd say, "Look, I know what I see. Don't tell me otherwise." How often do we do that?

This is why it's so tricky, because the bottom line of this practice is that you absolutely can only open to wisdom through your own experience. It has to come down to trusting your own experience. But you see the layers of subtlety here—we have to keep looking, not take anything for granted, because superficially our own experience can be absolutely not correct. And then we can take that mistaken perception way down the road.

Greed and aversion can really color perception. They're a little more noticeable. But delusion—this quality of confusion or just not knowing—that's actually harder to recognize when it's present. One of the things we do when we don't actually know what the perception is, is make something up based on past experience and go from there.

A story—I know I've told this before, but it's a perfect story, so I'll tell it again.

I was teaching in Vancouver and staying in a friend's apartment by myself at night. It was a daytime, non-residential retreat, so I'd go home to her apartment each evening. And before bed, I was reading a book about the civil war in Beirut by a reporter who had lived there during those ten years. It was really gripping and interesting. But you can imagine reading that just before you go to bed—that was the state of mind I was in. A kind of paranoia, cars blowing up on the streets, a guerrilla war going on in the city.

I fell asleep in that state where you're not really deep. And I woke up to these loud booming sounds. I lay there for a while, you know, how you slowly come into consciousness and you don't know where you are or what's going on. That's delusion right there. And then I just heard this booming, and the mind immediately goes: artillery firing.

Now, sometimes I teach in Southern California near a Marine base where they actually do artillery firing all night. It sounded and felt a little bit like that. So I thought, okay, this is artillery firing. And part of my mind says, "I don't think so, Carol." But I said, who knows? Just because it's Vancouver, you never know when civil war could break out.

I got quite agitated. I jumped out of bed, looking out the windows. I didn't see anything. I said, well, that's natural—there's nobody on the street because, you know. I turned on the radio trying to get news. I said, well, of course there's no news because the first place they ever go, they want to lull everybody into thinking it's normal. Really, I worked myself into it.

This went on for about ten minutes. I thought, should I call up my friends? No, that's too stupid. I did have some element of knowing, some little tiny thread of knowing. I think there's delusion happening here.

And finally I walked to the front window and I didn't see anything, but it looked over a field that had had a world exposition some years ago. Somehow seeing that, I just knew it was fireworks. Although it was no holiday—I don't know why there would have been fireworks—but I knew that. Okay, right. It clicked in. I went back to bed.

But that's what we do. We take some perception, fill in the blanks, and then make up a whole story based on it. We act and react, and we're lucky if we find out within ten minutes what's going on.

That's delusion. Not quite knowing, and not really knowing that we don't know.

And this is, in a way, what's underlying a lot of the confusion that leads us to get so wrapped up in identifying with thoughts, or holding onto them, or running away from them. We use thoughts based on any perception to tell a whole story, and then we believe that story—even though it changes the next minute and we don't seem to notice that.

So our practice is one of coming back to the bare experience and not taking anything for granted. It's not that you want to dig everything up and question and get all unstable. Just look fresh in every moment. Because when we don't look, we might be making assumptions based on misperceptions we don't even know are happening.

There's a story I love from Oliver Sacks, the neurologist and anthropologist, from his book An Anthropologist on Mars. One of his stories is about a man who was basically blind from the time he was five until sometime in his fifties, and had pretty well adapted. He worked as a masseuse and had his life. He was quite at ease, at home in his world. His perception of things was put together based on hearing and touch.

At some point around when he was fifty, they found they could do an operation that would give him back his sight, which he hadn't had since he was five. So they do the operation. Everyone's standing around so excited, taking off the bandages, thinking he's going to be so happy to see.

And Oliver Sacks says, you know, when the bandages were removed in the first moment, the man had no idea what he was seeing. Everything was just a blur—light, movement, all mixed up, meaningless. And out of one part of the blur came a voice that said "well," and only then did he realize that this chaos of light and shadow must be a face—the face of his surgeon. But he didn't really see that. He just knew that voices come out of faces, so that must be a face.

It was really interesting because actually his life got a lot harder from that time on. The perceptions never really came together the way they do for someone like me, having been born sighted, where it seems like that's just how things are.

The way the mind puts together all this visual information—I don't question it. It seems like an accurate perception. But as Oliver Sacks said, we can't really imagine his confusion because if you're born with the full complement of senses, we've learned how to correlate all of our senses to create a sighted world from the beginning. When we open our eyes each morning, it's upon a world we have spent a lifetime learning to see. We've learned to give meaning to visual objects, to have concepts that accompany them.

But when he opened his eyes after being blind for 45 years, there were no visual memories to support a perception. There was no world of experience and meaning awaiting him. He saw, but what he saw had no coherence. His brain could make no sense of the visual perceptions. And it was stressful. His life got chaotic. It was an enormous strain. When he finally couldn't take it anymore, he'd close his eyes and go back to not being able to see. And then he'd feel at ease and sure and could shave himself or eat or do whatever he needed to do.

I love that because it's not just in that field, but in our whole experience of who we take ourselves to be as an unchanging, distinctive, solid human being. That's what's going on all the time. We are not—if we're not really looking, if we're taking it for granted—my body's solid, my sense of who I am is solid. And in fact, it's changing all the time. I'm not saying this to make you believe that, but just to have us look.

When the Buddha talked about mind moments, about how fast thought moves, a mind moment is every moment that there's a new experience—something that is translated to seventeen trillion in the blink of an eye. It's fast. It's fast. And he said no wonder things seem solid, because it's changing so quickly we don't notice the change.

What we learn to do physically, emotionally, mentally is to keep bringing our attention to the experience over and over, and then suddenly we'll perceive a discontinuity. Sometimes people notice this in meditation physically, where they're sitting and we just assume it's my solid body, and suddenly there's just an experience of a sensation coming and going, coming and going, in a vast expanse. It suddenly isn't within this solid body. And then that goes away again. And we think, well, that was kind of a neat experience. But we don't really consider—hmm, maybe that's just as valid as this lump of solid flesh that I drag around with me most of the time. Maybe that's also true.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, look deeply. We look deeply. We never stop at the surface appearance. You don't have to think about this, but this is what our mindfulness practice leads us into.

Since I want to talk about this in terms of thought, we see how, when we continue to look deeply and consistently, thoughts are arising and passing, describing ourselves and our world to us almost constantly. And if we don't look, we don't even realize it. We take those descriptions to be true and accurate and react from them, just like I took the war in Vancouver to be true and accurate.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once that the world appears to you to be so overwhelmingly real because you think about it all the time. Cease thinking about it and it will dissolve into thin mist. And we think, well, do I actually want it to dissolve into thin mist? Do I want to feel like thin mist? Maybe not. And we start thinking about it. But all of these series of thoughts, unobserved, unrecognized—rather than just seeing them as the perception of "oh, that's a thought"—they contribute to maintaining this false perception or assumption of an unchanging solid self. Each of these contributes to the vast proliferation of becoming—becoming this, becoming that—over and over, that keeps us locked in this cycle of confusion and keeps us reacting to thoughts. Because again, if the thought has nothing to do with you, it's really not a problem. But how many of the thoughts are describing us, our reactions, defining us, giving us a sense of meaning? And we don't maybe quite want that to dissolve into thin mist.

But it gets really ultimately fascinating, and I find it sometimes hilarious, to really begin paying attention to these thoughts as they describe things rather than just believing them. To notice how that comes from the simplest perception.

I'll give the basic kind of things that happen on a retreat, but you can expand it out to our life. You're just sitting, minding your own business, feeling very mindful, and somebody goes rushing by, gets a cup of tea, slops it down, and you think, hmm, I'm pretty mindful here. I'm doing pretty good.

Now, what's actually happened there? Seeing, and then the perception based on memory of "that doesn't look very mindful to me." And then some kind of pleasant feeling, another thought, "I'm doing better than that." Comparing, which is ego conceit. We don't notice; those are just things arising. And from that: I'm pretty mindful here. Within thirty seconds, you know, we're meeting the Dalai Lama. We're opening spiritual centers. Somehow every yogi here is bowing down to us, and we remember everything great we ever did in our life and all the things that show what a success we are. Everything—our whole life is here in that moment, but selectively chosen.

And then after that, however long that was, we wake up and say, "Huh, maybe they're slurping their tea, but they might know they're doing it. Whereas I, on the other hand, don't even know where I am. I think I'm in Dharamsala." So actually, I'm not doing too well at all.

And again, it's the same thing. There's just a perception of a thought, again seeing that person, another memory, and an unpleasant feeling. And then you drag in everything—all the times you've failed in your life, all the unfinished business, all the unkind things you've said, all the moments you weren't mindful, all the completely unfair judgments and comparisons you've made of other people, what a total worthless jerk you are. And again, your whole life. And again, selectively chosen.

In each of these movements, if we're not seeing what's actually happening—that it's just a series of thoughts coming together with different emotions and memories—if we're not seeing that, each of them feels really real. It's me. And if we don't look at it, it seems like the same me, although actually they're totally different me's. But it feels like the same me. And we're doing this all the time, with any little perception.

I remember walking in a retreat once and I looked out the window and it was snowing. Okay, seeing. That's all that was happening—seeing. From that seeing, I went into a whole thing about snow and my childhood and what it felt like and pleasant feelings and snow days off from school. Just seeing whiteness, that was it. All the time we do that if we don't pay attention.

There's a great line from Lily Tomlin where she says, "I always wanted to be somebody, but I should have been more specific."

Our tendency is to try and think our way out of this. When really our practice, as the Dalai Lama says, to have a correct perception we need to have a direct encounter. In other words, wise attention—it simply is our challenge to notice: this is a whole story, explanations, concepts, self-definitions. What's actually happening? Bring wise attention to the bare fact of experience.

A thought. Just like that thought, "It snowed today." Or "I'm the most worthless yogi here." Or "I'm incredible, I'm brilliant." Or "That person is hopeless." Whatever it is, it's just a thought. Tightness. Unpleasantness. Burning. Memory. Bringing our attention to simply meet the experience as it is.

It's radical. It's always available to us. And it's not that if we do this we're going to get so into bare experience that we forget who we are or where we live, that we can't find our zafu in the hall anymore. Somehow all of that still works. But it's just being able to come out of these stories and meet the bare experience.

That's what we've been doing. That's what the whole mindfulness practice is. And learning to do it with thoughts is exactly the same. It can seem a little trickier, absolutely, because thoughts are actually so ephemeral. Something we give so much power to is actually the most ephemeral of our experience. So it's learning to bring a skill to it, that's all—to recognize thought as thought.

One approach is what I mentioned before: just because a thought comes with strong emotion doesn't make it more real. It's very helpful when there's a lot of repetitive thought to recognize—and this is like a kinesthetic way, the way it feels to me—to recognize thinking and drop my attention under it, to recognize and touch the emotion that's going along with it. Seeing that they feed each other, but they're not the same thing.

Another way, when you're looking at thought itself and bringing attention to thought itself, is to rest in this quality that Sharon spoke of, that we've all spoken of—spaciousness. So that it's not just glomming onto the thought, but seeing it in the vast space of awareness.

The image Sharon talked about, of the bird flying through the sky—that's a perfect image. If we think of any thought that comes as the bird, but our awareness is the sky, the thought really isn't such a problem. We notice the thought, it kind of comes through and flies out. No matter what kind of bird it is, whether it's a beautiful parrot or a lovely nightingale or a turkey vulture, it doesn't really matter.

But instead of that, we don't notice the sky and we get caught up—I've got to have this bird, I've got to have this bird—and we throw up nets and we try to hold on to it. We can't, but we get completely bent out of shape. Or it's flying by and it's hideous. We think, Oh my God, get rid of it. Get out the air rifle. Pop it away. Actually, that makes it hang around longer because it gets a little hurt. It flutters down. It goes around our head. If we'd left it alone and just noticed it flying through the sky, it would just fly on out. But we get so involved in the reactions.

If you can just have the inclination to notice the space around thoughts, the space between thoughts—it takes them out of being so deadly important, every thought. And in terms of sitting here on the cushion, it really doesn't matter what thought arises.

Because you're going to sit here until the bell rings, you know. Even if it's just from shame, you're still going to do it. So no matter how strong the thought is, just notice the space around it. Notice what it does. Let it go away.

Space is actually a wonderful metaphor—not just for making things more relaxed, more nice, just kind of spacing out. That quality of spaciousness that allows us to bring a clear knowing to what is, is what actually allows our understanding to deepen, to see underneath that surface reality and open quite profoundly to the truth.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho. He's talking about space as a metaphor. He says Buddha wisdom is very humbling, very humbling. "Knowing the unconditioned"—now the unconditioned is another word for nirvana or true nature, freedom—"is knowing the unconditioned very interesting or fascinating? You might think, 'I'd like to know God or Dhamma. It's going to be incredibly fascinating to know, something blissful, something ecstatic.' And so you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think getting high is getting close. But the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. Look at the space in this room. Is it interesting to look at?" He says, "Not to me. The space in this room is just like the space in the other room. It's the things in this room that we get involved in. They're interesting or uninteresting, attractive, good, bad, ugly, whatever. But the space—there's not really much you can say about it. It has no quality except being spacious. And to be really spacious one has to be patient. As there is nothing that one can grasp, one recognizes space only by not clinging to the objects in the room."

When you let go, when you stop your absorptions, your judgments, your criticisms, your evaluations, your clinging to the people and the things in the room, you begin to experience the space of it. But that takes a lot of patience and a lot of humility. Humility in that we can just let go of how important our assessments and attitudes and reactions are. We get that sense of the space by not clinging or reacting to the objects in the room. We begin to recognize the space. And that space, that not clinging, is what allows us to begin to recognize the great wisdom of the Buddha, the great wisdom that is really the potential of all of our hearts and minds, where we really begin to have a correct perception of who and what we really are, of what is true.

And at this point, the question often comes up: Well, what is it, just some kind of space, space out? That's what's true? Is this it? Actually, this came up in a few groups. Is this it? You just let go of reacting and being aversive and clinging and you're left with a traffic jam and not being upset. Is that it? We sit here and thoughts come and go and we're at peace with them.

Is that it? Yes and no. It's not that we're just left with a kind of spaciousness, a seeing the emptiness of thoughts, of our sense experience, that they come and go and have no intrinsic selfness, and so who cares? It doesn't matter what happens. Sometimes when people hear talk about emptiness, it can be misunderstood as "well, nothing really matters, so it doesn't matter what I do," and there's a kind of no sense of responsibility. It's not that at all.

So the question becomes—staying with thoughts—where do these thoughts begin to matter? How does this deep understanding that we are not our thoughts, we are not our sense experiences, we are not this temporal coming and going—how does that manifest in our lives? Because it's not nihilistic. It allows us to see through this sense of separateness, this sense of trying desperately to hold on to constantly changing experience for a sense of security, which breeds only fear.

When we see through that, what we see is not the emptiness of nothingness, of noncaring, but the emptiness that leads us into our intrinsic wholeness, our absolute connectedness. To me, there are two quotations that express this beautifully. One is John Muir saying, "I find if I touch anything, it's connected to everything else in the universe." That's emptiness. When we're not clinging to anything, that's how we can experience our lives. That's how we can experience the world.

And then this gives rise naturally to the balancing aspect of great wisdom, which is great compassion. It's the reflexive expression of our clear seeing, of wise understanding, that we begin to meet ourselves and the world with great compassion. In fact, wisdom and compassion are often spoken of as the two wings of the bird of the Buddha Dharma. A bird can't fly without both wings. Great wisdom can't really arise without great compassion, and vice versa.

So it's right at this point of wisdom and compassion that we see how we can begin to recognize and use thinking in a way that comes from truly understanding the nature of life, the nature of who we are, and the nature of thought. You know the quotation from Nisargadatta, it's really well known: "Wisdom tells me I'm nothing, love tells me I'm everything, between the two my life flows." It's really like that. When we see that we're nothing—I'm not all these thoughts about my past and my future and even my present—when I see that, then I see that I'm everything.

How does that manifest in our lives? This is where I think the Buddha laid out his teachings so elegantly, so brilliantly. When these factors of mind—when you have a thought coming together with greed or hatred, or coming together with compassion—when these thoughts manifest as intention, the application of mind, the energetic direction of mind that gives rise to speech and action, these intentions often manifest as thought. So when a thought is coming as intention and we act on it, then it makes a difference, then it matters. If you're sitting here on the cushion, the most murderous, awful thoughts—they really are empty. But when the thought manifests as intention, a murderous thought becomes truly a murderous action, and it matters.

This is where the Buddha's teachings are so elegant. When he laid out his Eightfold Path, the way to live a life of awakening, the first step is understanding—wise understanding, right understanding—how we understand ourselves and the world. And how we understand ourselves to be gives rise to the second step, which is translated as wise intention, wise thought. And the intentions and thoughts give rise to the next steps: speech, action, and livelihood—how we live our lives in relationship to ourselves and others. So this is where they come together. How we understand things to be gives rise to how we are motivated to speak and act in the world. It's just so elegant to me.

You can see this clearly. If we're in a moment where we're feeling unsafe or paranoid, very separate, feeling that we need to protect ourselves and that other people are a threat, then our speech and actions will be motivated accordingly. The intention comes together with that state of mind, and the intention arises from fear. That will be how we speak and act.

But if in another moment we're touching that place of just seeing that things are as they are—someone said to me today, "It's just breathing, just touching the floor"—in that moment, it's so clear there's nothing in excess, nothing that needs to be gotten rid of, nothing missing. In that moment, the sense of what Thich Nhat Hanh calls wishlessness, the sense of touching everything—if I touch this, it touches everything in the universe—then the natural purification of our intentions happens. Out of that moment, an intention of desire or greed or hatred is simply not going to arise. It just isn't. When you're in one of those states, you don't think, "Well, let me run and get the last muffin."

Who cares? Everything's perfect.

I love the way Thich Nhat Hanh describes it. He says, "The idea is that you do not put something in front of yourself and run after it, because everything is already here in yourself."

Don't try to think, "How am I going to experience my whole life like that?" Just a moment. Our whole life is only a moment, ever. It's only this moment. Each time we are awake in a moment of recognizing that sense of everything being here in ourselves—that if I touch anything, it's connected to everything—the natural result is that our thoughts and intentions purify to ones of letting go, of generosity or non-greed, of love and compassion.

You can see this happening in little ways on retreats all the time. Notice it in yourselves. So often people describe how somebody in the hall is coughing or sniffling, and all the things they go through—from feeling annoyed to thinking "I should be compassionate," which is not the same as the natural arising of it. But that thought is still coming from some understanding that somehow compassion is a more natural response. We're just not totally there yet, but still, honor that.

But not really being there takes really being honest, paying attention to our intentions—attending to the wanting to kill, to turning the anger in on oneself, to just resting in that anger for a moment. And suddenly, as if effortlessly, there's actual compassion. It's like, "Oh, wow, that must be really uncomfortable having a cold. May they be free from their suffering." And so often people say, "Where did that come from? I didn't make it happen."

That's what happens as our moments of wisdom increase, as we touch our true nature and honor it more and more—our intentions of how we relate in little moments and in big moments purify. That's the P word. Sometimes people hate that word, but it really happens. They transform. They change. It gets easier for compassionate and loving and non-greedy intentions to arise than for actions and speech based on neediness, fear, and cruelty.

Learning to recognize when thought is manifesting as intention is a wonderful tool, both here and in our lives. It comes into play whenever we're making decisions, when we're having to make choices. If we can just notice "I'm about to say or do something"—which isn't always possible, but if we can—it gives us a moment of choice. And that's so wonderful, because so often then, in that choice, we'll be able to choose consciously to come from our connectedness rather than from our fear.

Sometimes it might seem a little bit forced, but that's okay. It's still better than coming from our fear or our greed. And other times we won't be able to make that choice, but we'll be able to see what's happening. You still meet that with kindness. And in that kindness, again, meeting the bare experience—like meeting that anger at the person in the hall—naturally again, some compassion may arise.

Sometimes we work on it very consciously in our lives. It's not that we just sit back and wait. But once we understand, once we've had moments where we've touched this truth, it can become a very deliberate intention to cultivate these purified intentions.

A person who inspires me a lot with her compassionate action in the world is Sister Chan Khong, the woman who works with Thich Nhat Hanh. What's interesting is that as our understanding of emptiness deepens, it doesn't lead to passivity. Actually, the compassion and the mettā and the non-greed lead to a much more active engagement, in whatever form. Our sense of vibrant aliveness, of real connectedness with our experience and with others, gets palpably stronger—because we are connected. That's what lets us see the truth.

Sister Chan Khong has basically, from what I read in her autobiography, spent her whole life since she was young involved in social work—in the middle of the Vietnam War, working in very difficult circumstances. Not being a perfect human being, I'm not saying that; we all have our stuff. But with this dedication. What inspired me is that, at least from what I could tell from her autobiography, she doesn't take it for granted. Even at this point, she's working very consciously to choose to act from intentions that grow from understanding, from compassion rather than from anger.

She talks about being involved in recent years in a campaign of writing letters to the government in Vietnam, who had been arresting many nuns and monks and artists. She said, "Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew I had to do walking meditation." Now, is that one's normal response? "I'm angry, I better do walking meditation." So that in itself is very interesting.

She continues, "Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities have acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

To me, that kind of encompasses it all—the deep seeing of our interconnectedness, the emptiness of our thoughts of anger, of our reactions, the commitment to acting from the awareness of our interconnectedness and knowing we can't always access it. And that's okay. But knowing that if we have the choice, we'll make it to come from our deepest understanding, knowing that it's a process, that it's our whole life. And it gets so that it's less and less something amazing and more and more the natural expression of understanding.

Shantideva says it in a way I love: "Even though I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises. It is just like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return."

And just one last thing is noticing how both consciously and naturally the intentions that can inspire us in our spiritual journey—which at times is boring as hell and at other times incredibly arduous and at other times so wonderful—really do begin to expand from the intention of my own happiness and peace to that word we often use of bodhicitta, that sense of a deep commitment to awaken so that I may serve all beings and help awaken all beings.

I've noticed in myself—I was talking to someone today who was noticing this herself—that in the beginning when one hears that and thinks, "Well, I'm practicing for the sake of all beings," it can actually sound quite egotistical. Like, who do I think I am practicing for all beings? But that's our misunderstanding. It really starts to change when the motivation begins to shift and move and take on this vastness beyond our limited sense of my own personal happiness, my own personal freedom. Truly there become moments when you're practicing for the awakening of all beings. It's not egotistical at all. It actually brings such a vastness of connectedness and compassion, a strength and a courage that lets you sit through things, look at things, hang with things, that if it was just for you, you'd say, "I think I'll go get a pizza now. That's enough. I don't really need to wake up now."

But when you really get it—that you can't awaken without all beings, and that practice really is to affect all beings—it brings such a depth, such a power to what we're doing that again it keeps bringing us back into a deeper and deeper understanding. And it lends such a meaning to our lives. Not in the big sense, but that even the most ordinary activities become activities of awakening.

So I just want to end with a quotation from Geshe Rabten, who's a Tibetan teacher, because I really like the way he says this. He says for himself, "All actions, even the most simple, are for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings."

It's just a possibility. All actions—washing the dishes, changing the diaper, eating your soup—for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings. That's kind of like the ultimate purification of intention. But starting where we are, that's the aspiration.

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound Dhamma talk, Carol Wilson explores the nature of the deluded and non-deluded mind, drawing from a teaching that our mind is naturally luminous and pure, only temporarily obscured by visiting attachments and aversions. Using the metaphor of the sun and clouds, she illustrates how we become entranced by our passing mental states and forget the radiant awareness that is always present.
> The heart of this teaching examines the five spiritual faculties (pañc'indriya): faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Wilson offers particular depth on faith—distinguishing between "bright faith" that initially inspires us, and "verified faith" that deepens through direct experience. She emphasizes the Buddha's teaching of "ehipassiko" (come and see for yourself), encouraging practitioners to trust their own investigation rather than blind belief. The quality of faith as trust—the courage to open into the unknown moment by moment—becomes central to practice.
> Wilson provides practical guidance on balancing energy and effort, cautioning against both grim determination and checking out when practice becomes difficult. She teaches that balanced effort means simply being present with whatever arises, without expectation of particular results. The talk offers skillful means for working with overwhelming experiences, including deliberately nurturing the heart through appreciation of beauty and stepping back when needed. Throughout, she returns to the essential teaching that every moment presents the crossroads where recognition of our true nature is possible.

In a very unmindful way, so please raise your hand or something if I do that.

One Tibetan teacher said once that the main purpose of these Dharma teachings is, one, to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind, as well as how the deluded mind works. It's very to the point, I think. I actually love this quotation.

So what does that mean? Discovering the nature of the non-deluded mind is, in a way, to my understanding, the ultimate, the whole point of our practice. Unfortunately, there's very little that one can say about it that makes much sense because it's beyond all concept or thought. The Buddha did say one time that the mind is naturally luminous, naturally pure. And this is a translation by the esteemed Gil Fronsdal: "Luminous is the mind, brightly shining. Yet it is colored by the attachments that visit it." Another way I've seen it said is that it is temporarily obscured by visiting torments or defilements—meaning attachments, aversions, angers. Temporarily obscured.

So the mind in its natural state is luminous, radiant, naturally peaceful. This is in a way what we could be referring to as our Buddha nature. Remember when we took refuge on the first night in the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha—really in the Buddha, taking refuge in our own potential for awakening, our own enlightened Buddha nature. This luminous, radiant presence—or absence, or however you want to talk about it—is not something that we need to create. It's not something that can be changed or improved upon, and you'll be glad to hear this: there's no way, no matter what you do, that you can damage it in the slightest. And it is who we all are. It is all of our essential nature.

So that's the good news.

The other part, which is really what's easier to talk about and what a lot of our meditation practice is working with, is how the deluded mind works. The deluded mind is just that aspect of the temporary attachments, aversions, and confusions that obscure this radiant nature of peace.

An image that is often used—and it's an image, not an exact perfect way of describing—is to think of our radiant nature as the sun and the temporary passing obscurations as clouds. The clouds could be really thin and scattered, and you don't really notice them too much, and you're really in touch with the sun. Or they could be really thick and dark. What our deluded mind does is when a cloud floats by—whether it's a cloud of anger or fear or desire, restlessness, sleepiness, a lot of the things Mary spoke about last night—we get so entranced with the cloud. We get so involved in it. If it's nice, we want it to stay and get bigger. If it's not nice, we want to change it, fight with it, get rid of it. We're so involved that we completely forget to notice the sun.

Even if it's a big dark cloud, even if it's raining and stormy all day, there's still evidence of the luminous warming nature of the sun everywhere. The fact that we can even see what's around us is evidence of the luminous nature of the sun, but we tend to forget that and get lost in fighting with and rearranging the clouds.

Because we get so involved in our moods, in our explanations, in the stories of our lives, in the fact that we have a pain in our toe, in whatever it happens to be—and these can range from really small and ludicrous to very deep and profound experiences in our life—it's not to negate our experience. But what we learn in working with the nature of the deluded mind is not to take any one experience as anything more than what it is. It's here now. It will pass. It has no self-existent, unchanging reality. Nothing that arises in our experience here of the five senses or the mind is going to stay. Nothing. There are no exceptions to that. I know we're not supposed to use absolutist language, we're supposed to temper it, but in this case, that's how it is.

So a lot of what we're doing, a lot of what we speak about in our practice, is to get more familiar with, to really understand what the deluded mind is and how it works. And this is essential.

This is not a waste of time. It's equally essential because understanding the deluded mind will help us learn to recognize what we so easily ignore. Kempo again says that the only difference between Buddhas and regular beings is that Buddhas simply know what other beings ignore—the true nature of one and all.

And this is even more interesting: this recognition of our true nature, this borderline between Buddhas and other beings, is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives. It's not that we have to practice and change and work for twenty-five years or seventy-five lifetimes to maybe have a moment where we could possibly, if we're lucky, recognize our true nature. That potential, that great crossroads, is present at every moment of our lives.

I feel that this is really the reason why we do this practice. The reason we don't recognize our potential for living in peace, for living in spaciousness, and for the natural compassion that is its expression, is simply because we are so unfamiliar with the deluded mind that we keep getting tricked by it over and over and over. Really, that's what mindfulness does. It gives us the opportunity, moment by moment, to come out of all the hullabaloo and the running after illusions, to just be with what's happening this moment, very simply. And in that, there's a possibility to see what's true, when we're not being tricked by our deluded mind.

Last night Mary spoke about several of the most common and often very difficult aspects of mind to even recognize, much less work with, much less see through as ephemeral clouds—anger, desire, sleepiness, restlessness, doubt. Tonight I want to speak a little bit about five helpful qualities of our mind and heart that are present with us from time to time throughout our life, but which can get strengthened quite noticeably through the process of formal meditation. In learning to recognize these qualities and balance them in our experience, this balance can help us moment to moment to be so present—in a way that's not leaning forward or tilting away—that there is the possibility to suddenly just turn around and say, "Oh yeah, right. Radiant, pure, peaceful."

These five qualities of heart and mind will strengthen naturally as the retreat goes on. I want to talk about them to help us recognize them. It's not only important to be able to name and be open to the difficult aspects. Sometimes we forget that it's equally important to be able to name and recognize and open to the pleasant aspects, the helpful aspects. Mindfulness is a balanced awareness. It's not just zooming in on what we don't like, nor is it just zooming in on what we like. It's really balanced.

These five qualities are called the five spiritual faculties. And as they really strengthen in our practice, they change to the five spiritual powers. They are faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. It's not so esoteric—you've all experienced all of them quite many moments of each day. I want to say something about all of them, although I think I'm going to focus more heavily on faith and energy, the first two.

Faith is an interesting quality. I read somewhere—I can't remember where—a definition of faith as the drive towards that which cannot be described. To me, it really speaks to the movement, the opening to trust in basically our true nature, that which cannot be described. It's intuitive. Faith in this way that I'm speaking about it is not a faith of surety, where if I do this, that will definitely happen.

Faith first awakens in what's called, in Buddhist terminology, bright faith—which is really quite an accurate description. It arises when one first comes in contact with someone who deeply inspires them. Maybe a teacher. Maybe it's a personage like the Dalai Lama that you might not know personally, but whose dedication and commitment really inspires one. Maybe it's a friend. Maybe it's someone whose sincere commitment to their awakening lights up that same feeling in you.

Bright faith often gets lit up in me during interviews with people. I'm just talking to someone often who's going through extreme difficulty, and it's hard, and there's no pretending it's not. But there's this simplicity and this faith and commitment to just simply be here with it, without a lot of expectation. And it often comes for me at the end of a retreat that I've been teaching. You often don't realize it yourself if you're the one sitting, but you all just light up. There is such a change in the course of ten days, such a beauty that shines out of people when they've been sitting. And I know enough now—it's not personal, it's not that you've become a more beautiful person. It's just that the inner truth is shining through more.

We get a little more out of the way, and something like that can light up this sense of bright faith. It's bright—you feel bright, you feel energized, you feel confident. It's really what motivates us in some way or another to begin or to continue on our path of awakening, whatever that particular path happens to be.

I would venture to guess that in some way each of you has felt that over and over. Something got you to drag your body here to this retreat, and it takes some kind of awakening of bright faith, of recognition. To me it's like a recognition of something we've always known, albeit perhaps not at all consciously. It's really a recognition of our true nature. When I feel that sense of bright faith, it's like coming home to somewhere I didn't know I wasn't home. It's just, "Oh yes, this is home." And it's wonderful, that quality of faith. It could be inspired by nature, it can be inspired by anything—it can be inspired by going through a difficulty in your life with presence and seeing it open into something so wondrous and unexpected.

The thing about bright faith is that it's impermanent. It's bright, it's energizing, it's really motivating—but it flickers, it wavers, it disappears. It may come back again many, many times, but it doesn't really often have the staying power. You'll feel this in the early days of a retreat, when the going gets a little patchy, when you're hitting the skids and you think, "Why did I come?" There's this memory of what brought you here, but it just doesn't do it, that memory. It's not exactly lighting us up.

I hit that almost every retreat I've ever done. Somewhere in it, I'm dragging along. I've been up for eighteen hours. Why am I doing this? I don't exactly remember. That's not a problem really—it's just that bright faith at that moment isn't alive to energize you. And so it needs to be strengthened by the understanding, the wisdom that comes from our own experience.

The other thing about bright faith is that as we're lit up, as we're inspired by a being, another person, the environment, some experience—that's valid, extremely valid and helpful. But it's so easy for us then not to recognize that the brightness we're experiencing is actually, whether conscious or not, an intimation, a recognition of the truth of who we really are. It's easy not to notice that and to keep the attention turned outward, to think, "This is so great because of this person, because of this situation." In that case, when the person leaves, or if it's some teacher that you're putting all your need for faith into, at some point you'll likely be disappointed.

We need to use the energy, the awakening power of bright faith to turn back into our own experience and let the faith deepen into verified faith through being fully present with our experience, acknowledging what is true for us.

One of the things I love about Buddhism—what probably drew me to it in the beginning and has kept me there—is that the Buddha spoke very strongly against any kind of blind belief or blind faith. There's a line he said often: Ehi passiko, which means, "You too, come and see." He always said, "Don't believe what I'm saying just because I say it.

Don't just take it for true because someone you respect says it. Give it a try and see for yourself what is true. See for yourself if this practice, if this path leads you to more peace and happiness, to less suffering. Only then believe it."

This is the aspect of deepening faith, verified faith. It could be verified faith in a particular teaching, faith in the Three Refuges, faith and confidence in your own ability and willingness to simply be here for whatever arises in this moment's experience. This leads me into the next aspect of faith I like to talk about, because it's been very central to my own practice and continues to be: the aspect of faith as confidence—the confidence to trust.

Not to trust in a particular result. Not even to trust that if you do this practice, such and such will happen in a certain way. But the ability to trust that we can open into the unknown, moment by moment, that we can open into the unknown and really be present for it.

There's a quotation from a book I read long ago that embodies this aspect of trust. It was speaking about radical acceptance: "Radical acceptance is radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing—nothing but accept truth in all things, as all things, at all forms, in all times." Meaning, whatever is happening right now, can we accept that as a manifestation of truth?

To let go, to accept—it is necessary only to give up your concerns and your fears. Only. But think about it. Just reflect for a moment. What in your experience today were you fearing? What in your experience were you not able to radically accept? What was not seen as an aspect of truth in this moment?

And reflect on that as you go through the day tomorrow. Just notice, and it can be very subtle things. I often find that it's not the big things I'm having so much trouble accepting. It's the little nudgy ones that somehow slip in, that are not okay, that are not accepted.

So this aspect of faith is the trust, the confidence, the courage to live consciously, to open to the not knowing, the unknown in this next moment. And it's uncomfortable, you know. But it's true—we really don't know. Who knows what experience is going to arise in your mind and body in the next moment?

You sit down prepared to have a really pleasant sitting. You had a great walking, you're really focused, you're just going to sit down and really be present—and twenty minutes later you wake up and wonder, how did I get here? Or just when everything's gotten cooled out, some extreme pain has the nerve to present itself out of nowhere, and that's your meditation for the next hour. You just never know. Or like that little tremor of an earthquake this morning—you couldn't predict what was going to happen in the next moment. You can't plan out your sitting. Our whole life is like that.

The thing about meditation, taking these ten days, sitting, walking, being removed from our day books and our hourly plans—it strips away what normally hides from us the fact that we never actually know what's going to happen. We think we know what's going to happen every hour of the day. And unfortunately, in this culture, it often happens that way. I don't quite get how it does it, but we tend to do every hour what we wrote in our day book, and it really hides the fact from us that we don't actually know a thing of what's going to happen next.

In meditation, sitting and walking and really being present moment to moment, we can't hide from this fact. We try really hard, and that's a lot of the reason it's so uncomfortable. But we are forced to confront the fact that we just don't know.

And because that can be scary, it's easy to fall into many forms of control—having some idea of a desired result and then trying to shape our meditation, shape our actions to make that happen. I think Mary mentioned last night how common it is, manipulating meditation. You have a certain walking and you think, that was great. Next time I'll walk in that place. I'll hold my hands in that way. I'll drink just the same thing before I did it. I'll wear the same hat. I'll look the same way. I'll always walk at this time of day in this place. And the same with the sittings. Or if we have a really terrible walking or sitting, then it's like a jinx—we'll avoid everything that had to do with that. I'll never sit next to that person again; I picked up their bad vibes and it ruined my meditation. This kind of magical thinking.

Next time you find yourself in a manipulating meditation mode, just check out for a minute what the actual quality of your heart and mind is at that moment, as you are desperately trying to recreate a pleasant sitting. Is it peaceful? Is it spacious? Do you feel like you're potentially opening to the truth of things? Or is it contracted, fearful, grasping? Just notice these things.

We can't control anything. How can we possibly recognize the radiance of peace when we're lost in trying to rearrange the clouds? No way. Nisargadatta Maharaj once said that nothing of value can happen to a mind that knows exactly what it wants. We're locked in.

He's quite uncompromising. Because nothing the mind can visualize and want is of much value. I just dropped that one in. Do with it what you will.

And what's even more fascinating is that the closer we look—as we keep coming back with our attention to this emotion, this sensation, this breath—rather than finding a kind of security, some solidity, the closer we look, the more we find space. The more we find emptiness. The more we find that there's nothing solid.

I clipped an article out of the New York Times a couple of years ago from the science section. Some astronomers were announcing that they had discovered the largest galaxy ever detected—more than 100 trillion stars, more than 6 million light years in diameter. It's 60 times the size of our galaxy, the Milky Way. And then they found that this new galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump of a thousand other galaxies, which they call Abel 2029. It makes you wonder how many others there are.

They said they hoped that further study of this galaxy would provide clues to the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter. There doesn't seem to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the huge gravitational forces that would be necessary for all this clumping together of galaxies that's going on. So scientists proposed the existence of vast amounts of this invisible matter. According to the prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe consists of this missing invisible matter—which means that what is generally thought of as astronomy actually concerns only a tiny subset of particles that happens to be detectable by human nervous systems.

We're just the same as that. The closer we look, the more we find out that there's nothing solid there. And the more we want solid knowledge, the more we'll find incredible mystery.

When we can have the confidence, the trust, the faith—even for a moment—to just open into "don't know," into not knowing, then it's not so fearful, even for that moment. And in fact, it gives us great energy. It allows us to really move and dance in the beauty of the mystery of life and to respond to whatever arises out of a natural compassion and love—not from preconceived ideas of how we should be, but from what naturally springs from the source of this mystery.

It's a wonderful way to live, even for a moment. Not to set it up as an expectation. We all have the possibility to experience just this—resting with the unknown, being okay with whatever arises in this moment—at any time, in a retreat, in our life. And it happens over and over. It gives space for so much appreciation of things you wouldn't expect.

Someone said the other day that she'd spent time in another retreat just hours lying on her back watching a hummingbird. And it had seemed like such a joyous, awake, clear experience. That's what happens when we're not so focused on achieving results.

Many, many moments arise like that. You notice them more in the course of a retreat in this beautiful desert. And again, it's easy to put the emphasis outward and say, "Well, it's because the desert's so quiet. It's because these animals are so cute. It's because, because, because." But just for a moment, turn the attention back and see: maybe it's just because we're not filling up the space with conclusions and results and needs and wants that we're able to just open into what's always here.

So that's an aspect of faith, trust, and confidence that I wanted to speak about in exploring these lines of faith. And this confidence, this willingness to be present, leads quite naturally into the next spiritual faculty I want to discuss: energy.

Without some faith, without some willingness, some inner inspiration, it's really hard to have the energy or the interest to do this practice. At those times when bright faith wanes and you can't quite touch your own verified faith, it's like you're dragging yourself along. The energy we're talking about here is a vital, absolutely necessary function of our practice. It's necessary for practice to continue.

I think this is one of the most delicate balancing acts in the whole practice—finding over and over the balance of wise energy, of wise effort. And again, because everything is in flux, nothing is static, it's not like you're going to work out wise effort, balanced energy, put it on cruise control, and have it stay there for the rest of the retreat. No, sorry. It means understanding how we fall out of balance, how we push too hard, how we don't try enough—what that feels like—and then we begin to intuitively know from our verified internal experience how to balance.

In speaking about energy or effort, I want to say that this energy is really the energy of enthusiasm. An energy born of interest. Not of some outer force. Not of trying to match some goal or form that you have in mind.

Because then you might push, push, push. You might think you're putting out a lot of effort, but it turns into drudgery.

I find that when I feel most connected with my practice—really alive, really present in it, really feeling fulfilled—it's when my energy is strong and balanced. But it means the energy, the willingness to be present for whatever is, to simply meet what's happening with attention. So when I feel really there, really fulfilled or so-called happy with my practice, it has nothing to do with what's actually going on. I could be walking, I could have pain, my mind could be scattered, and I could be frustrated—but there could be the quality of energy, of effort, that's willing to simply meet each of those experiences just as it is. And that's balanced effort.

Balanced effort doesn't mean things are nice. It doesn't mean your experiences are all going to be pleasant. And that's something that really goes against our unconscious conditioning. So I want to talk a little bit about all of that.

First, the quality of effort when there isn't energy. And I actually prefer to think of it as energy rather than effort, because it's less personal that way. And by the way, none of these qualities of mind and heart are personal. They're forces that arise due to conditions, and when the conditions change, they change. The quality of energy is one of the easiest ones to see this with—to see this impersonal nature. But it's also one of the ones that we tend to identify with the most.

So if the energy is really low—and you know how it is when you're really sleepy, really tired at the beginning of a retreat—you drag yourself along and it's hard. Nothing's very interesting. You could care less about the breath or your feet or anything else, and it just becomes a drudgery that pretty soon breeds into a whole ball of doubt. You know, what's the point of this anyway? And it just kind of goes downhill from there when there's no energy.

Sometimes we try to meet that in this imbalanced way of, okay, I'm going to walk really slow, I'm going to sit really still, I'm going to do everything in the form that they tell us and try to make it match. And that's the way to have balanced effort. But that also just breeds frustration and tightness.

I remember one retreat I was doing not that long ago, a seven or eight week retreat with this Burmese teacher, Sayadaw U Pandita, who's very demanding, very exacting. And there's a real form to follow. Everyone walks extremely slowly, noting. You note really every single moment that you're awake—you're noting what's happening, whether you're eating or going to the bathroom or walking or whatever.

I was doing that every moment, but there was a lot going on in my life just before I came into the retreat. I was having to call my mother every day; she had just had an operation for cancer. A lot of things were going on. And I was just making myself conform to this structure for three weeks—lifting, moving, placing, noting, noting, noting. And it was so dry and so dead. And I know from experience that this same practice could be really vital and alive and energizing and beautiful. So I had that faith, my own verified experience.

It got to the point which finally woke me up that I was really in unbalanced effort. I came upstairs to my walking place one day, and the thought in my mind was: if someone else is walking there, I'm leaving the retreat, I'm going home. And that thought can come, but I meant it. I was really going to do it. Luckily nobody was walking there.

That really was what woke me up. Something's wrong here. Three weeks of this is long enough. This is not balanced effort—although we often mistake it because we know we're putting in a lot of effort. But on the other hand, our other tendency can be, well, things are tough, this really stinks, I'm getting nowhere—so let's check out. I'll just go downtown, have a cup of coffee, maybe take in a movie. In fact, one retreat I had to beg someone not to go away for the weekend to a motel and watch videos. This was a three-month retreat. I really don't think it will help.

That's the flip side. And it can easily come up, because when things become difficult—not just that the energy is low, but when you run into quite a difficult experience, either frustration or deep grief or just physical pain or just boredom, restlessness, agitation—it doesn't have to be a life trauma, but anything that's difficult and ongoing—mostly our conditioning says, "Oh, this is wrong. I must be doing something wrong." If it's unpleasant, we tend to think we have to change it.

And so the effort that we then try to put in is usually, if we're not quite clear, somehow the effort to make it be different. Somehow the effort to get back to that clear sitting I had yesterday or last year or ten years ago. Or somehow the effort to get rid of this particular tiredness or this particular grief or this particular sensation in order to then really begin to develop and deepen in the practice.

We can put in very sincere energy and really think we're just being present, being present—but we're confusing effort with expectation. If you think you're bringing your attention just to be here, but there's this subtle edge of "in order for something to happen," it's generally unwise energy, unwise effort. Unwise, why? Because you're going to end up suffering. It usually becomes frustrating, difficult. And that's the clue. If you don't notice the expectation, you'll generally at some point notice the frustration. That's the clue that there's something we want to happen that isn't happening. And it's the clue to say, "Oh, wait a minute. The only energy or effort I need to do here is be here with what is happening." So what is happening? Just bring your attention back to the bare experience and see what it is.

It's very easy for us, without having gotten really familiar with the quality of mindfulness—which is just being with the bare experience—to confuse all our stories and interpretations with what's actually going on.

For example, this is an old story, but it's a good one. Someone came in years ago to a friend of ours, Joseph actually, in an interview and started talking about, "Oh my God, I've got so much tension in my jaw. It just shows what an uptight person I am, and I'm not able to meditate, and this runs through my whole life. I just see how everything I do is tight and controlled, and it affects my relationships." And Joseph goes, "Oh, you mean you're feeling tension in your jaw." "That's right, tension in my jaw, and it goes to show that no matter what I do, I do in such a—" and on and on. "Wait, you mean you're experiencing some tension in your jaw." And this went back and forth and back and forth. It's so simple. It's so much simpler just to feel the tension in the jaw. But we're so used to all the elaboration that sometimes we just can't get there—just to the basic experience.

Try it here. Next time the person behind you is sneezing and sniffling and moving and clearing their throat, see if just for a moment you can get to what's the actual experience here. That's perfect. It's hearing. It's just hearing. So what? Maybe the hearing experience is pleasant, maybe it's unpleasant. All the rest—and I can't tell you how many people have described the murderous rages they've gone into on this retreat—all the rest is interpretation and elaboration and story on a simple experience of hearing. I say it's simple. We all know it's not simple to come back to that place. That's when the energy is balanced, the wise effort to simply be with what is. It's a little more possible to do that with that open receptivity to just what's happening.

Sometimes another way we can get into really unbalanced effort—usually we'll have that element of trying to change, if not giving up. But often there'll be something very difficult going on, either very difficult and chronic physically, or very deep and strong emotional pain or difficulty: terror, fear, anger, rage, grief. And our tendency, especially in our culture—the only kind of effort we seem to know is push, push, push. So often the feeling is, "If I just stick with this, stick with this... it's happening because I'm not staying with it hard enough, or I'm feeling overwhelmed because my mindfulness isn't strong enough, and so I've got to push and be here with it and be here with it and be here with it"—as if grinding is mindfulness. And it isn't.

It is quite possible through just our grim determination to go into the terror, go into the terror, go into the terror. Well, we get completely terrorized. Mindfulness is gone and we're really thrown back out of balance. It's not helpful. And one of the hardest things for most of us—not all of us, but most of us—to learn, to really begin to take in and trust, is that there are times in a very ongoing difficult and painful situation where the most skillful aspect of this practice would be to gently back away. Not forever, but for a time, before you get overwhelmed.

People always say, "No, but that's quitting. That's cheating. That's giving up. That's distracting myself." Well, gently backing away does not mean you check into a hotel and watch videos for two days. There are other ways of gently backing away. You can, for instance, if you just find terror coming up really strongly, quit trying to dive into the middle of it every single time with the hope that you're going to blast out the other side and never see it again. Back up. Move your attention to your body. Go out and walk and really feel your feet hitting the ground. Move into the body. Open up if it's a lot of pain, a lot of sadness.

There can be times when going outside and really opening up the field of awareness is what's needed. Just be with hearing. You're not spacing out—you're very mindful, very present. The hearing is the actual experience of this moment. And it brings a real spaciousness and nourishment to the heart, to the consciousness. Then the next time grief or laziness or terror or the pain in your knee arises, there's more of a balance of consciousness, a spaciousness of heart to really be with that experience in a clear and balanced way. Again, the effort to simply be present for what is can become much more spontaneous and heartfelt.

I think this is a very important lesson to learn, and you learn it by doing it. Sometimes you might back off too early when you don't really need to. How can you tell? Because you'll end up totally zoned out, getting more distracted—you want a cup of tea, then you want more food, then you want to go for a drive, and then you think, "Wait a minute, how did I get here?" Time to come back and be a little more present.

Other times you might find you've pushed too much. How do you know? You get really grim or frustrated. You get so overwhelmed by the difficulty that you feel not just a passing feeling of wanting to give up, but you can't face another sitting. You can't face seeing the meditation hall. You can't face seeing all of Yucca Valley. It's just too much. You've pushed too hard. And it's never too late to back up, to open up, to bring some nurturance into your experience.

For me, walking out in the desert will do that. You don't try to get nurtured—you just open up and let it happen by itself. For some people, doing loving-kindness practice, whether for themselves or for someone else, is the way. For some people, just getting up and walking is enough. Sometimes you might need to just have a cup of tea, relax, and not try so hard to be mindful.

One thing I really want to emphasize is that grimness, heaviness, a kind of dead feeling—that look—is not equivalent to mindfulness. And it is not the sign of balanced effort. It doesn't mean you're doing it right if you're grim. It doesn't mean you have to smile all the time, but it doesn't mean you have to be grim if that's not how you're feeling.

One other thing that can sometimes help when you're in very deep physical or emotional pain, when turning to sounds or other objects just isn't even accessible because the pain is so strong and overwhelming—Thich Nhat Hanh talks about deliberately bringing up in your mind seeds of joy. Now, this is a little different from Vipassana because you're not just letting it arise by itself. It's a deliberate cultivation in that moment, a deliberate reflection, a deliberate noticing of what is present now that is beautiful and nurturing. This can bring a real lightness to the heart.

He talked about this in one article I read, describing how during the Vietnamese War the social workers he was working with were so busy helping the wounded, helping their friends, trying to go back and forth between sides—just enmeshed in unimaginable suffering. And he said they would forget to stop and smell the beautiful fragrance of the herbs at night, the rosemary, the thyme. He would remind them: Stop. Smell the herbs. Smell the beautiful gifts that nature is giving us. Appreciate what is beautiful in your life.

That's not some kind of Pollyanna-ish "let's pretend everything is okay." It's a deliberate balancing of perception, a deliberate balancing of mindfulness. Because that beauty is also true, here and now. And sometimes when we really feel like we're drowning, it's extremely helpful to deliberately recognize it. Whatever is true and beautiful and nurturing for you in your life, there can be times when it's very helpful to just touch either the memory of it, if it's someone who's not here, or the beauty of nature, or the fact that we all have the capacity and the ability to practice the Dharma together—whatever it may be. Let yourself nurture and nourish your heart.

What happens is you learn to balance the energy more and more. And the only way we learn balance is by falling out of balance. So don't be discouraged. You fall out of balance and say, "Oh, I was pushing too hard. Okay, nurture a bit, come back, feel the breath, feel the sensations." Another time you're just zoned out, falling asleep, and you think, "It's not so much that I'm exhausted—it's that I just kind of quit paying attention here."

I wasn't really too interested. So try to cultivate some interest—not forcing, but genuine interest. And you just keep learning how to come back, how to come back to balance. It's no problem when we fall out. It's another chance to learn. As the steadiness of energy grows, as it becomes more balanced, we find that the quality of mindfulness grows stronger and stronger.

I have about two minutes for each of the following three factors now, so I just want to mention them briefly.

Mindfulness we've talked about a lot, and we'll continue to talk about it. In some way, it's the most balancing of all the factors. Mindfulness balances everything. You can't have too much mindfulness. Faith needs to be balanced with wisdom—they help each other. Energy and concentration need to be balanced—they help each other. Mindfulness balances them all.

By mindfulness we mean that quality of bare knowing, just what is. It can know tension as tension. It can know "Oh my God, I'm so controlling" as thinking and fear. So it's not about getting rid of everything, but knowing our experience for what it is. It's noncoercive, simply being with what is without attachment, without pulling away, without judgment.

It's sometimes said that a moment of mindfulness is like a moment of freedom. Because in a moment of pure mindfulness—just being with that tension—there's no hating it, there's no desiring it. There's not the dullness of ignorance or confusion. It's simply being with what is, without interpretation. And in that, there's the purity, the spaciousness of mind that isn't lost in the clouds. That opens the possibility in any moment of pure mindfulness to recognize something other—to recognize that there's much more, something much greater than just what we think of as our limited mind and body. In a moment of mindfulness we're not lost in the clouds, and there's the possibility of turning around and noticing the radiance that we are.

We have lots and lots of moments here, opportunities for one of these little moments of mindfulness, moments of freedom. Mindfulness is an incredibly powerful tool. And it's really amazing because it seems so simple and unassuming. It's hard to imagine how by simply noticing our breath, noticing sensation, noticing emotion, the whole world unfolds—all our psychological processes, all our memories, and much more. Seeing deeply into the nature of our phenomenal existence, of the clouds. Seeing the impermanence, seeing the fact that nothing lasts, the ephemeral nature. Seeing that none of it is who we are, because how can it be who we are if it's coming and going, coming and going?

Somehow the balance of all five faculties, with mindfulness at the forefront, allows all of this to open up in its own way. We don't do anything. All we do is be here with what is, and everything else opens up by itself.

With the steadiness of mindfulness, the continuity of mindfulness, the willingness to come back and be present whenever you can in the sitting, whenever you can in the walking, and in the times in between—not grim, but just that willingness to be present as you stand up, as you walk to lunch, present as you eat, as you take a shower—this leads to the development of concentration. Continuity of mindfulness in practice is actually an extremely strong tool for developing concentration.

Concentration is the fourth spiritual faculty. I feel that concentration is sometimes, at least in talking to many meditators on retreat, misunderstood or becomes a sticking point. Often people say—almost out of all these qualities—concentration can become the goal. Sometimes it seems that people judge themselves or evaluate their practice or their progress, which again is a waste of time, by how concentrated they are. This leads to a lot of confusion and misunderstanding.

When we talk about concentration, it's really an observable mental quality where the mind is steady with whatever is arising—steady with this one breath, steady with a sensation, steady with an emotion. It can stay there without a lot of fluttering around, without jumping off. Concentration has a unifying quality, stability, so that all our energy, which as you may have noticed by now can get very dispersed—mental energy all over the place, one thing after another—as concentration strengthens, that dispersion comes together and the mind becomes quite unified.

Concentration can be taken to incredible depths of real absorption and one-pointedness, which is not what we're cultivating here. But it's understandable why people can get hooked on it, because that unification of mind is really lovely.

Instead of all this monkey mind jumping all over the place, all this stuff going on, you just get completely absorbed into one thing. It can lead to a lot of bliss and peace and happiness. There's one aspect of practice that just develops concentration, but that's not what we're doing here. Because what we want to do is bring in the insight aspect, the aspect leading to the development of wisdom.

And so we open up the field of awareness. We don't just stay with the breath. We open it to sensations and emotions and thinking. But that doesn't mean we're not cultivating concentration. Concentration is that quality of really being steady with whatever is arising. We're cultivating concentration on changing appearances. It's called momentary concentration.

So it's like there's a sensation of the breath, then there's tingling, then there's burning, then there's thinking, then there's sadness, sadness, tightness, tightness, burning, rising, falling, rising, thinking, thinking. Now that can be very strong concentration on each arising thing. But it doesn't necessarily give that sense of harmony and peace, because a lot of what's arising isn't so nice.

Often when we've experienced deep concentration, which is very helpful to the practice because it helps us cut through all that telling of stories—it's the concentration that strengthens the mindfulness to come back from how controlling you are to just feeling the tension in the jaw—but sometimes when people experience a real depth of concentration, of one-pointedness, it comes to be in some way the goal of practice. To get back to that peaceful sitting. To get back to that sense of bliss. Admittedly, it's nice. But then what? It's not going to last. And it's not freedom.

What we're cultivating here is a concentration that can really strengthen the mindfulness, the energy, that can really help us see what's actually going on, feel what's actually going on, and then the mindfulness helps us let it go and be really present as the next thing arises. It's these qualities together that give rise to wisdom. Wisdom being, again, our own intuitive understanding of our own nature, of impermanence, of the fact that nothing that's arising and passing is our essential self. Wisdom can arise into our personality patterns, into deep personal insight.

And then of course we do tend to think about whatever it was that we really recognized, and that's fine. But don't confuse the thinking about for the wisdom of our own verified inner experience. It's just not the same thing. In fact, wisdom that just turns into thinking and thinking and thinking turns into skeptical doubt. Doubt can actually come about from too much thinking about an insight.

That's how wisdom is balanced with faith. If there's just wisdom, we think, we analyze, we discuss, but faith gives us the energy to just come back and do it. Just come back and feel the knee pain, instead of analyzing it endlessly. Wisdom gives faith the balance it needs not to just be blind. Someone said to me once about her teacher, "I'd jump off a cliff if he told me to." That's blind faith. Not so helpful. They balance each other.

Concentration and energy balance each other. Concentration is calming. Energy is uplifting. They give each other a balance. And mindfulness balances them all.

So those are the five qualities that are present in many moments of all of our experience. It's helpful to recognize them, notice how they balance each other. And just remember what Nyoshul Khenpo said about every moment—we're at that great crossroads. Every moment is the moment when we can recognize our essential purity, our essential peace. This moment, whatever's happening, there's nothing we need to shut out. And nothing needs to be any better or any different than it is in this moment.

CHAPTER 257

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates intention (cetanā) as the crucial bridge between wisdom and compassionate action. She explores the Buddhist teaching that our practice requires two wings—wisdom and compassion—and shows how intention is the observable link between understanding and how we move through the world. Drawing on the Eightfold Path's progression from wise understanding through wise intention to wise action, she demonstrates how our view of reality shapes our motivations and subsequent behavior.
> Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching on kamma (karma), emphasizing that the skillfulness of an action depends entirely on the intention behind it, not its outward appearance. She illustrates this with the example of someone leaving a meditation hall while coughing—the same action could arise from embarrassment, self-hatred, or genuine compassion for others. This points to why mindfulness practice is so valuable: only through awareness can we truly know our own motivations.
> The talk addresses how habits of greed, hatred, and delusion often unconsciously drive our actions, even in seemingly noble pursuits like environmental activism. Wilson suggests that while anger can be energizing, it ultimately burns out and cannot sustain balanced action. She offers loving-kindness (mettā) practice and the cultivation of bodhicitta as methods for consciously inclining the mind toward compassion. The practice of clarifying one's deepest purpose becomes a beacon for navigating life's choices, allowing practitioners to act from wisdom rather than fear or habit.

The main theme I want to talk about tonight is this area of intention, which I think is a really key area of understanding and freedom. It's the link between understanding and action. In my life in the last couple of years, it's becoming a focal point of my practice. By practice I don't mean just sitting on the pillow. I mean the waking up, or attempting to wake up, from moment to moment throughout the activities of our life.

When Buddhism is spoken of in the big overview, it's spoken of as having two wings, the way a bird needs two wings to fly. The wings are that of great wisdom and great compassion. And just as a bird can't fly with one wing, true freedom and deep understanding do not arise without both of these aspects.

I was listening to a talk by Bob Thurman once, who is quite an interesting Tibetan scholar, former monk, kind of a wild man actually. He said something that I found very interesting. He was talking about wisdom and compassion, and he said the wisdom of emptiness—which is what we speak of, the sense that everything is empty of a separate self—this wisdom that we look at as we notice that all thoughts, all sensations, all emotions arise, we're with them, they pass, none has any more intrinsic importance than any other as we sit here on the pillow. This wisdom of emptiness can seem quite cool, quite removed. We generally, at least at first, touch it in silence with concentration in our formal practice. I think that coolness of touching in silence is what often can lead some of us to think, "Well, what's this got to do with the rest of life?" or to feel like being a bit self-absorbed in this practice.

When wisdom is imbued with compassion, met with compassion, the compassionate aspect comes from the heart. Compassion is an energy that connects. And in fact, compassion only arises from connection—with ourselves, with our own pain, connection with the world and with other beings and the pain of other beings. So compassion does not arise just from the coolness of emptiness. The two need to go together.

Luckily for us, that's the natural way it works. The natural outcome, the natural manifestation of wisdom, of understanding, is that of compassion. It's been said that compassion is the link between Buddhas and beings. Buddhas don't just, when they're fully enlightened, turn their back on the rest of us poor souls and go off and sit in the bliss of emptiness for forty-five years until their life peters out. But they spend—and you notice it today because there are these whole worldviews of eons and eons, not just our little minuscule one of this life—Buddhas don't just go off and sit alone, but they really spend their time helping others, and that's through the enormous power of compassion.

So compassion is the link, you could say, between wise understanding and wise action. And how this link is observable, or how it manifests in our experience, is something we can explore more easily in the silence and simplicity of a retreat. The way compassion—or anything else for that matter, which I'll get into in a minute—manifests is as intention, in this quality of intention. And that's why intention can be so important.

For example, when we're just sitting, as I said, the wisdom of emptiness: everything comes and goes. Greed, hatred, anger, rage, self-love, pain in the knee, murderous feelings, total feelings of unity with the world—the whole litany. And this could all be in an hour. You sit, you watch it, it comes, you notice it, very nice, it goes, okay. The same attitude this practice brings to whatever arises, no discrimination whatsoever. That's the wisdom of emptiness.

And then we can say, well, but that doesn't work so well in the world when we have to act. Where these states of mind and heart, where the way we understand things begins to make a difference, is when these murderous impulses or these feelings of great love and unity manifest as an intention giving rise to speech or action. Then it does matter. It's fine for the murderous feelings to arise. We really note it with acceptance. It passes. That's really fine. But if it manifests as an intention and you get up with a hatchet and go to the person next to you, it's not so fine.

It's really important to incorporate both of these aspects in our practice. Padmasambhava, who is seen as the person who brought Buddhism from India to Tibet—he's revered in Tibetan Buddhism as the father of the whole lineage—said once, "Although my view is as spacious as the sky, includes everything, the view of ultimate truth, my respect for cause and effect and my actions are as fine as grains of flour." Both aspects are necessary.

So I see intention as a key factor for how our understanding, our insights, transfer to the way we are in the world. And this was, at least the way I interpret it, what the Buddha said. You have to realize it's all coming through little veils of not complete clarity always. But how I interpret what the Buddha said in speaking about intention: he gave it really strong importance in the Eightfold Path that Jack spoke of the first night. The first aspect is wise understanding, how we understand the world. And this gives rise to the second aspect, which is often translated as wise aspiration or wise thought. It's also translated as wise intention. And then the third, fourth, and fifth aspects are how we move and speak and act in the world: wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood.

Just by the ordering of that, you can see really clearly that how we understand the world gives rise to our intentions, to our thoughts, which then inform how we act. So if our understanding of the world, for example, is that the only thing that brings true happiness is having as many material possessions as possible, that's going to inform our intentions of how we act.

We will act to get more things, and that will be seen as the greatest good. If our understanding as a small child was that speaking up, saying how we really feel, or asking for something we need would result in being beaten, then we truly learn our view of the world. Our understanding becomes: don't ever open your mouth to say the truth because you'll get creamed for it. And that informs how we speak, how we act, how we live our lives.

So you can see how, as our insights into what is true arise—on or off retreat—it quite naturally informs how we think, what our intentions are, and then how we act.

To say a little bit about what intention is: we talked about it this morning in the instructions, noticing that basic sense that informs a movement—a feeling of "about to." About to move, about to get up, about to open your eyes. Sometimes it manifests as thought, a thought of "I'm going to do this now." Sometimes it's just a little sense. But it's the link between the mental and the physical.

In the way the Buddha described how things work in the world, in the big picture, I'm sure you've all heard of karma. The word karma translates specifically as "action." And the teaching of karma is really a teaching of action and result, cause and effect. Whatever we do, there is some effect that arises from that. That effect in itself then becomes the cause for another effect, and this whole chain of dependent origination goes on and on.

Many of us, when we're not really thinking, tend to look at whether an action is good or bad—or the terminology is more "skillful" or "unskillful," which is a little less loaded—by examining what the effect or result of that action is, or what that action looks like from the outside. But in the way of looking at karma, in the way that the Buddha described our life, what really determines the skillfulness or unskillfulness, the karmic result or feedback that we'll receive from a particular action, has nothing to do with what it looks like from the outside. It has everything to do with the intention.

The intention that informs an action is what seeds both our own karmic result and how it manifests in the world. This is in some ways a very subtle point, but it is so key because it's so easy to overlook.

The second factor is that an intention that arises in the moment—like everything else—arises, has its effect, and passes. Another one arises, has its effect, and passes. But as an intention arises, take for example the intention to leave the hall. That intention can arise from a whole variety of mental experience. It can be accompanied by any of our whole palette of mental states that we're getting familiar with. Intention can come from greed, from hatred, from self-loathing, from generosity, from boredom, from compassion, from wise seeing, from mindfulness. So intention can have a whole range. Someone pointed out this morning that it seemed like there were different kinds of intention—that's absolutely true.

Take the example of someone in the hall having a coughing fit who gets up and leaves. From where we're sitting on the outside, there's no way to really know what the intention behind that action is. That can only be known to the person themselves, and that's really what determines for that person the skillfulness or unskillfulness. I could leave the hall coughing out of acute embarrassment, out of fear of what other people think, out of self-hatred and just not wanting to stay and submit to that, or out of real concern and compassion for other people's silence, or fear that I'll give them a cold. It can run the whole range. We can't tell from the outside.

So you can see how important and how valuable mindfulness is for our own experience, because it really takes the ability to bring our awareness back to the point of intention to have some clue for ourselves about why we're doing what we're doing. And this is really the key of all our actions in life: Why am I doing what I'm doing? This is how we find out so much about ourselves.

Often we just look at the results of our actions and wonder why our experience of the results isn't matching what we think we want to happen. But we're often not really clear about what our intentions are, which is understandable because they're often quite mixed. It's very subtle.

We've been talking about, in the instructions this morning, just that sense of "about to"—the intention before movement. Even that can be very complex, but it's the most simple to notice. Sometimes it can manifest as thought. And in a broader sense, which I'll talk about a little later, we can look at intention as manifesting as our purpose in life or in bigger situations—not just a momentary movement, but our larger intention in some of the big decisions we make, in some of the choices we face.

I want to go back to this point of saying that the natural fruit of understanding is compassion. This is something Thich Nhat Hanh says often. And I can't say how many people I've spoken to here on retreat who have described some little annoying experience they had. I don't know if you recognize that what you're talking about is just this: the experience you had that was so unpleasant, the way you were able to deal with it in a mindful way, was really showing how understanding leads to compassion.

Just for example, there have been innumerable little stories about difficulties in the hall. This person's too close, this person's too far, this person took my place, this person's coughing—whatever. And it's great. It's great to have so many people in the hall. It's great to have these little bumpings and rubbings coming up. There's a Korean Zen saying, I believe—I'm not exactly sure—that the way they clean potatoes is to put them all into a big vat of water and then just bump them all against each other. That's sort of how our...

I don't think I need to say any more about that.

For example, someone will say that another person near them was just driving them insane—all the anger, all the rage. And they were aware, as we're all aware, that this reaction was a little bit out of proportion. But we're also aware that it doesn't just evaporate. We try to say, "Oh, it's okay," but it's not okay. We hate it, and we know that. Yet something in us keeps us from either running out in total frustration or getting up and yelling at the person. We choose the middle way, and that's the whole path of Buddhism—the middle way. And you sit with it.

At some point, much like I was talking about with fear, you stop just sitting and hating, and you start sitting and hating but with mindfulness of hating. Now that's a huge difference. We always think the hating has to go away first, but it doesn't. It's just that mindfulness of hating is what arises. And that in itself is a natural purification.

So often it happens that at some point, the person says, "You know, it went on for an hour, it went on for a day, it went on for a week"—it doesn't matter. At some point you say, "I just started really softening. I saw how the suffering was for me, and I really realized that person was just doing the best they could." This is the natural arising of compassion from understanding. Understanding not intellectually, but understanding that arises from our willingness to bring our attention, our mindful awareness, simply back to the present moment experience. That's all we have to do. The understanding of what's really going on arises by itself.

This happens over and over and over. I'm just trying to point it out because I think often we know it happens, but in a way, later on, you don't give yourself credit. You think, "Oh, you're talking about practicing out of compassion for all beings. Forget it. I have no compassion. That's too much. I don't even know what compassion means." But we do know what compassion means. It arises often for ourselves and for others. Just that little feeling of, "Oh, that must be hard." Or, "Oh, this is really hard. I'm doing pretty good to hang out with this." That's compassion. It doesn't have to be a big show. You don't have to join Mother Teresa's nuns. It doesn't have to be grandiose. We can start little.

I think one of the reasons compassion is the natural outflow of understanding is because in that moment, whenever we really touch or even have an intimation of what is true, of our true nature—that sense of luminous clarity, whatever you want to call it—there is in that, whether we're conscious of it or not, no separation. In that place of knowing what we all are, there's no more sense of separation or incompleteness. And in that total completion, in that sense of unity, the idea of craving or of anger or of needing to pull something in or push something away doesn't even arise. It's irrelevant.

Even though that might not be what we're consciously knowing, I think intimations of this truth are what arise. And in that, there's the melting of separation—the ability in that moment, in feeling my own pain, to feel another's pain. Or just the sense of, "Yeah, we're both here together trying to fit into this space." Instead of my space, your space, it's our space. That just arises quite naturally. It is, I think, in a very simple way, how wisdom gives rise naturally to compassion.

Okay, that's the upside. We can't just talk about how nice it is, because we all know that's part of our experience, but it isn't the totality of our experience. At least not mine—I'll say it's not the totality of my experience. Compassion and love, I think, are our truest expression. As the Dalai Lama once said, he thinks compassion is the truest expression of a human being.

That little children, he observes, show compassion more naturally than other emotions. So yes, of course hatred is also an expression of human beings, but not our truest one. Our truest one is compassion.

But when we're not touching understanding, when our habits of mind are predominating, when those clouds I talked about the other night are really obscuring the sun, when all we can see and recognize are the clouds, when our experience goes unexamined—the habits that commonly arise in many of us, deeply ingrained habits, are habits of wanting, of greed, desire, fear, self-protection, anger, just spacing out and wanting distraction. The three basic so-called poisons, and they really do poison our understanding: greed, hatred, and confusion. They're deeply ingrained habits. They're not our truest nature.

Something I've been becoming more and more aware of in the last couple of years is how often, in the world at large, the force of these habits of mind serves as intention. Habits of greed, or of anger, or hatred, or indignation with a tone of judgment—they are very powerful forces for action. And what I've found interesting is how often these particular habits of mind go unquestioned as the most valid or useful intentions that give rise to action.

This is why intention is such an important aspect of how we act, not just the result. Think how many really valuable and important things come to be—how many people work for the environment or work in science or work for peace—and the motivation is really anger, rage, and fear. It's a huge motivation for action. It's very energizing. And it seems to get a lot done.

But if you pull back and look at the big picture, at some point it goes slightly awry. The results seem to go slightly awry. Last summer, for example, I was at a retreat specifically for burned-out environmentalists. People very active, for many years deeply active in the environmental movement—lawyers, scientists, doctors. Some had a spiritual practice and some didn't. And it came out in many of the discussions that what had motivated them most deeply, what had kept them active all these years, was anger. And why were they so burned out? That was a lot of it. This wasn't my observation; this is what people were telling me. Anger kind of burns up the ground that feeds it. It can't sustain itself as a reliable and balanced motivating force for action, even though it seems to get so much done.

It's painful, but I've been fascinated to watch what's been going on in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. When some of the totalitarian regimes first started to break apart, there was—at least from here, at least as it was reported—some sense of euphoria. The good is finally winning, fear and despotism is falling apart, now everything will be flowers and beautiful. And look what's happened. It's incredibly painful, but what we're seeing is that one fear, the fear of the totalitarian regime, was just keeping a lot of other really deep fears and greeds submerged. Now, rather than fear of whoever the dictator is, it seems like every little group hates every other little group. There's a great fear of the other, the stranger. And there's also a lot of greed that arises. The purification really has to come in our own hearts, in our own intention. We can't just rearrange how things are outside and then everything will be okay.

The suffering, the immense suffering in this world—it's unthinkable, absolutely unthinkable. But we're not that different. The suffering all arises from human action. And human action is driven by intention. Without investigation, without a willingness to look, the deepest habits of intention are those of confusion and greed and anger and fear—all with the deep, somehow thinking that this will make me happy. That's the confusion.

So in some ways it might seem self-serving to sit here on a pillow, to be in this idyllic environment while there's so much suffering going on in the world. But I feel deeply that if we have the willingness to keep bringing our attention back, to really be honest and accepting of whatever we see in our experience, to really notice our intentions—they will begin to purify, to change, and it will have an enormous effect in our lives. It really ripples outward to everyone we're connected with.

And I'm not exaggerating to say that what we experience here matters. One yogi said to me, after some pillow wars in the hall—who sits where, this is my turf, fighting over who gets first in the lunch line—we have all kinds of wars during the three-month course. Wars of turn on the light, turn off the light, turn on the light, turn off the light. It's really intense. Can you imagine something that's been blown out of proportion, and you're sitting with it for two months, and it gets aggravated each day when you see the person who turns on the light? Once in Burma, two monks—foreign monks, really committed people—came to blows over whether the fans should be on. As one yogi said to me once, this is how world wars start. Luckily all we have here is pillows.

What strikes me, and what's actually kind of sad and amazing, is an underlying assumption that often comes up in conversations: well, but if I give up desire and anger...

How will I ever do anything? Someone said to me once, "Well, if I don't have desire, what will I do? Just sit in my room all day?" You see, the unconscious assumption is that desire and fear and anger are all we have to act from. It's really kind of sad. But it gives us a chance to really open up and explore other possibilities.

And it isn't so easy, necessarily. Last summer I took a self-defense course called Model Mugging, which is very intense. Honestly, the conscious intention I had to take it was as a way to cultivate compassion. I know that might not make sense, but that was really why I went. I thought, well, if I really confront my fear of being attacked, then I won't be so afraid to move into what I perceive as dangerous situations, and I can be more open to the fear and respond with compassion. That was my thinking. Whether that was self-delusion, I don't really know.

The way this course works—this is just for women, the men's course is different—they have guys who are all padded, I mean really hugely padded, with these huge helmets and pads and everything. Because you're taught to defend yourself full strength when they come and attack you. It's not just that you do this move and this move. You really have to practice doing it with your full power. There were five sessions, each one five or six hours long. It was really intense and exhausting.

I found out pretty soon I actually wasn't going to confront my fear, because even though these guys would come to attack me, I knew they weren't going to hurt me. Still, the whole point is to encourage you to get up your energy and really do the techniques they teach you with all your strength, with all your power. And the way they cultivate bringing up that energy, of course, is anger.

In many cases I can understand this. I'm not saying anger is not important to feel. Many of the women in the class had been raped or abused, and the fear had been so paralyzing that they could not even say no or defend themselves. To get in touch with the anger and free the energy and let it out—I think that's extremely important. So I'm not saying that isn't a valuable part of it.

But what struck me was there was never any intimation that there could ever be any other motivation than that. I remember the first day, after all the group work where they're trying to rev us up, keeping us screaming all the time—well, it breaks the freezing, actually; it's a helpful technique; if you ever need to fight, screaming really gets your energy going—at the end of the group, one of the assistant instructors stomped over to me and said, "Great, let's go, kick-ass." And I thought, oh, I don't know if I'm in the right place.

So I spent my time really challenged to get my energy up, because I never got angry. I also don't have a history of being attacked or abused, so I didn't have something like that to draw on. But I consciously kept asking myself: can I bring up this level of energy to repel an attacker out of some other motivation? Can we have clear, direct action just out of clear seeing? No, I'm not going to let you punch me in the face—but without hatred, without fear. Can it actually come from compassion?

I can't say I got to that place. I got to where I could act without feeling angry and really bring up a lot of power. I can't say I actively felt compassion. But it was very interesting for me as a way to begin discovering how to act without it having to be only from the so-called negative force of intention.

And if we look around—again, we can only know from the outside—some of the people who seem most driven by the intention of compassion, whether or not you agree with their viewpoints, demonstrate how that intention can lead to much deeper and more long-lasting action and effect than rage or fear ever can.

Take someone like Mother Teresa. Again, whether you agree with how she does things, that little lady has done an incredible amount. Or Gandhi. Or Sister Chan Khong, who works with Thich Nhat Hanh. She is, to me, an amazing woman, just a powerhouse of energy and commitment. She's involved in ten million different projects and seems to have very deep understanding, and a lot of compassion—what you'd call tough compassion, not "oh, you poor thing." It seems to me that she acts from a strong intention of compassion. I just want to read something she wrote once, if I have it here somewhere.

I don't seem to have it. Something... oh, here it is.

This to me is an expression of the real strength of compassion that greed and anger can never have. This is part of a eulogy she wrote for some friends during the Vietnamese war, some close friends who had been killed by grenades that were thrown into their school:

We cannot hate you, you who have thrown grenades and killed our friends, because we know that people are not our enemies. Our only enemies are ambition, jealousy, hatred, and the misunderstanding that leads to such acts of violence. Please allow us to remove all misunderstanding so that we can work together for the happiness of the Vietnamese people. We must share the responsibility for the poverty and injustice in our country.

I think it takes an amazing understanding and greatness of heart to even write something like that, much less mean it. And I believe there's a strength from that, a strength that none of our confusion and delusion can ever come close to matching. It's just that the habits are so strong we sometimes forget there's another possibility.

That's the beauty of this practice of mindfulness. By our willingness to simply look, first it wakes us up to our habits. By even remembering to notice the intention, it can give you a moment of choice. Some people reported just kind of playing with that in movement today—noticing an intention to move arising and then not moving. Noticing it arise and then not moving. And getting to the place where quite a few people said, "Well, what will ever make me move?" It's fun to play in. But then suddenly some intention arises that is somehow powerful enough, and you move. That's on the simple level.

But we can notice that, and it is the noticing that gives us choice, that purifies naturally the intention. Again, the time when you're so filled with rage at someone here and you don't do anything about it and you just stay—that's the purification, noticing the intention, and it purifies naturally. It changes to care, to compassion.

Or when you see there's one last piece of cake and everything in you wants to throw the person ahead of you out of line and grab it, and you restrain yourself. And maybe real joy comes up: "Well, isn't it great? They look so happy to get that piece of cake."

Now, the noticing of the intention with mindfulness—that might have seemed like something you did. You noticed it. You made a deliberate choice not to act. And then the intention sort of purifies, changes quite naturally. It's not always that we have to work so hard.

And sometimes I think we can get discouraged because we think, well, once we see that this intention of greed isn't so helpful, that attachment brings suffering—once we see it, that should be it, right? It's clear. I've really felt the suffering. The habit should go. And it can get quite discouraging at times when it doesn't.

Last summer I think I heard an analogy that I really love. Our old habits don't just vanish—I'm sorry to tell you, but they don't just vanish. This person said it's sort of like they slowly wear out, like a piece of cloth. At first you can't see through it at all, and you use it and use it for years and years and years—I don't know how many years, a lot of years. And it slowly gets thinner and thinner, and it's sort of translucent, and you can see through it, and it gets some holes in it, and then it's really clear. It just slowly, slowly wears out. And in the end you hardly notice that it's gone. It's been so gradual. That really fit with my experience. That's a lot what it's like.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once, "Do not be afraid of freedom from desire and fear. It enables you to live a life so different from all you know, so much more intense and interesting, that truly by losing all, you gain all."

So just notice sometimes the tendency: if I let this desire fade away, where will I be? Who will I be? Who will I be without this self-hatred? Who will I be without constant judging? And I love it so much.

You know, it's as if anything would be preferable to freedom from desire and fear. It's really quite wonderful.

Our intentions do purify naturally, quite a lot, through our willingness simply to be with them. But the Buddha was so practical—there are also ways we can consciously, gently help to guide our intentions, to incline the mind toward compassion, toward loving-kindness, just in gentle ways.

That's actually what we've been doing with the loving-kindness meditation. Sometimes people find themselves confused about this. They'll say, "I don't get it—you're telling us to just be with whatever is, and then you turn around and say wish that people's suffering may go away, wish that things can be different." But we're not doing loving-kindness as some kind of naive wishing, like rubbing a magic gem—if I wish, then everything will be okay. What it really is, is a cultivation of intention. Each time we say, and truly mean, "May I be free from suffering"—that's an intention. We can't control the result, as you well know. You can't even make the feeling of loving-kindness come up, much less can you declare, "I will no longer have suffering."

But in this working with simply feeling—not just repeating the intention in a rote way, but tuning into it and meaning it—it has a profound effect. Often, again, one that's not noticed at first. The Buddha said once that what you think about, what you reflect upon often, toward that the mind will naturally incline. Which is sensible. It makes sense. In continuing to reflect upon and arouse the intention of loving-kindness, that begins to manifest in a much more spontaneous way.

It's quite interesting because very often, especially if you've been doing an intensive loving-kindness retreat, practicing a great deal, many people have said—and I found this to be true myself—you can say it and feel it, but it doesn't really feel like that much is going on. Especially if we have the idea that strengthening the intention of loving-kindness means from now on I'm just walking around in this bliss of unity and love, with love spontaneously arising, a sense of oneness with every being we encounter. It's not like that.

But I found, and many people I've talked to have found, that on leaving a retreat and coming back to your everyday activities, your everyday relationships, you might think, "Nothing happened. I don't feel any different. I don't feel any more loving." That's because we're looking too big, looking for something too significant, too noticeable a change.

But what you begin to find—and it's really very profound—is again, it's on the level of intention. You walk into a little situation that before would have just made you crazy, and you start to get crazy, and then all of a sudden will come up: "Oh, that's okay. This is hard, but that's okay." And the whole situation just broadens out. It's okay to feel the difficulty, and in that there's a breadth of feeling—it's also okay for the other person or for the other situation to be just as it is.

I've noticed this happening in myself over and over and over. Loving-kindness and the intention of it doesn't jump over the difficulty. It opens to that and then has a much broader range, a much more all-inclusive range of intention that really lets everything be as it is and is okay with that. And it's really fascinating to notice how this arises. It's not like saying, "I think I'll make things be okay." It comes by itself. What we reflect upon frequently, toward that the mind will naturally incline. And so it does itself. You think you're just sitting here feeling like a stone, saying, "May I be happy, may I be happy, may I be happy." But if there's an intention to meet it, it's having an effect. It's having an effect.

So it's not just what I call a pillow practice—something you do on your pillow that doesn't have anything to do with the rest of your life.

Another way I've been working lately with conscious cultivation of the intention of compassion is borrowing a little bit from the Tibetans—cultivating the intention of bodhicitta, which translates as "enlightenment heart" or "enlightenment mind." Citta is a Sanskrit and Pali word that shows the split we have—we distinguish between heart and mind, but that word means both. They don't make the differentiation.

The cultivation of bodhicitta—again, it's intention, not looking so much for the result—is to clarify in oneself the intention to awaken in order to help all sentient beings awaken. Now this might sound very grandiose if we look at the big picture. People might think, "I can't do that. I can just barely be here for my own pain. I can't be here for the pain of all beings in the world. That's just too grandiose for me." But that's jumping over the intention and thinking that somehow we've got to go out and save all beings.

This has been a very wonderful practice for me this last year or so—simply cultivating that intention at the beginning of a sitting. The way it was recommended to me is simply to move my attention inside, get in touch with what's my purpose, really what's my purpose in practice, and tune into just the suffering in the world, the suffering of beings. This is not a guilt trip. It's just tuning into what is. And in that tuning in, it's so easy for just in that one moment to arise a sense of, "Yes, I'm really doing this difficult practice so that I may awaken to help all beings awaken."

Just that simple. And it has a profound effect—it can. Again, the intention comes, it goes. You don't try to hold on to it through the whole sitting. But that intention can give rise to a real vastness of mind, of heart.

It's said that that vastness, that all-encompassing nature encompassing the pain of all beings, the willingness to practice for all beings just for that moment—that vastness is akin to the vastness of our original nature. It approximates, the same way that the unlimited quality of metta approximates that spaciousness.

So notice, if you're interested, try it for yourself and see how the quality of the sitting can change. I don't mean you get better experience. I don't mean you get all pleasant. I don't mean anything like that. But the quality of our intentions that keep arising in the sitting shifts.

If I'm just sitting down and I don't really check in and clarify my intention to awaken, to help all beings, and I sit and I start to hurt, it's easy: "Okay, I've had it. I think I've got something else to do. Who needs this? What's the point of sitting with this pain? It's too difficult."

When there's that intention, that vastness of connection with the suffering of all beings and that intention to somehow be of service, it's a lot easier to be here for what's happening. It's not nearly so self-confined. And I'm not talking about some grandiose idea of "I'm so important." Actually, we're not important at all individually. But in the whole scheme of things, what else is there to do? At least finish the sitting and be as present as possible, because it's not just for me. It really is a connection with all beings.

As I say, it's been a wonderful practice for me. It gives one much more energy, less discouragement. You can act without so much fear, without so much hesitation. When your actions are not just for yourself, it's like a mother with her child. If the child's in danger, you don't think, "Well, I don't know, I'm a little afraid. I don't want to go talk to that weird guy talking to her. What if he doesn't like me?" You don't think about stuff like that. You go over and you do what has to be done.

Working with the intention of metta, intention of bodhicitta, of compassion, can have that same effect. We can act much more directly. We still have our stuff, but we don't have to be so limited by it. It's quite powerful. At least I've been finding it that way.

I was going to talk a little more about other aspects of compassion, but I'm not allowed to tonight. That's okay—I could go in two directions here and there's not that much more time, so I'll continue.

This isn't so much on the compassionate aspect of intention, but again, another way I have found in daily life that our ability to tune into intention, to notice it, can be an extremely helpful and valuable tool—in broader aspects of our daily life, in areas of activity where we need to make a choice, where we need to make decisions. The ability and willingness to tune into intention I've found extremely helpful in this area.

This is an aspect sometimes called clear comprehension. It's taking the microscopic aspect of mindful awareness that we cultivate here—really looking at intention, that little moment before you stand up, before you move your finger, before you turn around. It's a little hard to do that at work, or when you're in a busy conversation, or when you're taking care of your kids. But the same quality of attention, the same understanding of how intention works to link our understanding with our actions and decisions, can be used in a more macroscopic way of looking at things, at our larger activities.

And again, the fact of being aware of our intentions, of our purpose, gives us a little space of choice. It might close up again the next second—that's okay—but it gives us a little space of choice where we might not have to just act blindly from habit.

So in this larger area of working with clarity of purpose, it's the same inquiry: What's my intention in this action? Is it skillful? Is it not skillful?

Am I taking this cake out of greed? Or is it okay? Am I just hungry? These are simple things.

But there's also, on a larger scale, a kind of tuning into: Is this action, is this decision—and again, this isn't every little thing you do; you go and take a shower, you don't have to do this—but is this action, is this decision in accord with the most important purpose, the most important intent that I hold for myself, that I hold for my life?

This I've also found extremely valuable over the last few years. Of course, this necessitates reflecting and really looking at yourself, at your choices, and what you hold to be most dear, what's most true for you, what's most important in your life—really consciously clarifying that for yourself, for now. Of course it can change. Everything can change. Hopefully it just refines and refines.

But in our lives, in this culture anyway, most of us are so bombarded by choices. It's not like in the old days. We all have endless choices about where to live, what job to have. So many people in this culture change jobs every couple of years. My father had the same job for forty years. He's lived in two houses in my whole lifetime. And for me, hardly the longest I'm in one place in the last some years is three months, and that's because of the three-month course.

Our lives are really different. We're bombarded by choices and actions—should I get married, should I have kids or not have kids, should I adopt? We have untold choices, on and on.

The point I'm trying to make is that without some kind of reflection, without some kind of clear intention of what really is our deepest purpose, it's easy to just drift from one thing to the next. We wake up and years have gone. We wake up and our whole life has gone. We think, wait, but what about what was really important?

So I find it valuable to take some time to really reflect, or just notice when it arises spontaneously. And I would encourage you to really honor yourselves and honor that purpose—not to get into some kind of self-judgment or self-denigration, thinking "I'm not good enough to have such a noble purpose," or whatever.

When this first ever arose as an issue for me, I was on some short retreat some years ago, and it just spontaneously came out of nowhere, but with real resolve and clarity: my purpose in this life is to serve the Dharma. I thought, "Oh, who said that? Where did that come from? What does that mean?" I didn't know what that meant.

But the tendency that next followed was, "Well, who do you think you are? Who do you think you can ever help? How do you think you can serve the Dharma?" But if any of us aren't the Dharma, that's all we are. And whatever we do can be a service to truth and a service to other beings. There's no way it has to manifest.

I'm not saying that should be your purpose. Whatever is really true for you, whatever is really at core, what's most important—honor that in yourself. Don't let yourself get beguiled by all those little matterings in the back of your mind: "I'm not worthy, I'm not good enough, I don't know what this means." No, you don't know what it means. But I found it to be a beacon, a really powerful kind of guide in times of decision.

When I first started teaching, I would never have done it had it not been for the clarity of that intention arising in me. This is my purpose. It was within two months of that arising that I was kind of nudged into teaching. I would never have done it without that. I hated the whole idea. I was petrified. I would have done anything to get out of it—which I could have done by just saying no.

But I was nudged and nudged, and a couple of good friends who usually, if I said no, would just go "okay"—they wouldn't take no. At some point, like a light bulb went off, and I said, "Oh right, that thing that came up before: my purpose is to serve the Dharma. This is where I have to apply it."

I'm not looking for this. It just came. And all the fear and all the dread and all the unpleasantness—that just becomes part of our practice. It's not a problem. I mean, we don't like it, but to have fear of being uncomfortable make my decisions in life isn't really how I want to live my life.

Let's close with this from Thich Nhat Hanh:

The interdependence of all beings is not a philosophical game removed from spiritual and practical life. In bringing to light the interdependence of all phenomena, the meditator comes to see that the lives of all beings are one, and she or he is overcome with compassion for all. Seeing and loving go together. Seeing and loving are one. Great understanding goes with great compassion.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 258

Patience in Mettā

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common experience among practitioners: the discouragement that arises when we see our mental afflictions (kilesas) more clearly through practice, yet they seem to persist or even intensify. She reframes this perception, explaining that our increased awareness of suffering is itself evidence of deepening purity of mind—we see more because we're more awake.
>
> Wilson introduces the concept of āsavas (biases or tendencies of mind) as underlying conditions for ignorance to arise, using the Buddha's metaphor of a seed that only grows when supportive conditions are present. She emphasizes that ignorance is conditionally arisen and therefore can cease when those conditions are absent. Rather than drowning in discouragement about our defilements, she encourages practitioners to notice those moments when the mind is free from kilesa—to pause and recognize the quality of pure consciousness.
> The talk focuses on two pāramīs (perfections): generosity (dāna) as the manifestation of non-greed, and patience (khanti) as the perfection of non-hatred. Drawing from her transformative experiences as a nun in Thailand, Wilson illustrates how generosity creates interconnectedness and how patience arises from seeing things as they truly are. She concludes with Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that Buddha-wisdom is humbling rather than fascinating—knowing the unconditioned is as simple and spacious as the space in a room, requiring the profound quality of patience to recognize.

In speaking with people over just the last few days, I'd say one of the themes I've noticed—not with everyone, of course, but running through a lot of the conversations—is a sort of underground, or not so underground, sense of discouragement, a kind of impatience manifesting in various ways.

Partly, people speak of really having deep insight into some of our very painful patterns of personality, or really experiencing on a deep level the dukkha of craving, or the pain and misperception brought about by self-judgment, just to pick two common ones. And despite this deep understanding, this seeing, it's still going on. It seems actually to be going on more than it was before, or more tenaciously, or they're seeing more subtle levels of it—which indeed can be discouraging.

Another way it's talked about is this: as mindful as I've been all this time, it seems that as soon as the energy drops or somehow the mindfulness goes away, in like a rush come our friends the kilesas, the torments. It's like, if that happens here, where the conditions are so supportive, and where I have such a relatively small amount of distraction, I might as well just give up. Because when I get out of here, it's just going to be so much more.

These are common kinds of themes that have been coming up. I don't know if you can relate. And I mean, those are perhaps accurate perceptions. But I would like to posit that the conclusion drawn—that it's hopeless—is not an accurate conclusion.

I want to talk tonight about really two aspects. The main thing I want to do is to shift our focus for a while from our obsessive attention to the kilesas to perhaps reminding us to also notice the pure aspects of mind, which are also getting stronger. We forget to look sometimes. But the first aspect I want to speak to is the impatience and the seeming strength of these torments of mind, how quickly they come flying up.

And I think that's true. When we first start practice—not even when we first start practice, I mean on and on and on—it's hard to appreciate. At least it is for me; it's always a new revelation to appreciate the depth and the subtlety of ignorance. I know this morning someone told me that Steve was saying, you know, we've spent at least however old you are now—that amount of your life, more or less most of the time—cultivating greed, hatred, and delusion. And that's only if we speak of one lifetime. But somehow we think that we just have to see it a few times in three months and it'll go away.

I mean, we really deeply believe this. It's like a betrayal somehow that this stuff keeps coming up. It's still for me—it's been twenty-some-odd years—and I'll think, "Oh no, again this. I saw it to its depths years ago."

The Buddha spoke of this as a causal condition for ignorance to arise in a moment. He calls it āsavas. A translation I like for it is "bias of mind" or "tendency of mind." What we're talking about with these is the subtlety—it's not the full-blown presence of the kilesa or the hindrance itself, for example desire. The āsava is this underlying tendency for becoming, or sense desire, or wrong view. It is the underlying tendency for this to arise in a moment when the conditions are supportive for it to arise—which usually means when we're not really present, when there's not mindfulness, when we're acting or responding to stimulus out of habit. That's often the supportive condition for these āsavas to burst into full flower, so to speak, as craving or as becoming.

The Buddha gives the example of a seed. Say it's the seed of a rosebush—the seed has the potential to become a rosebush, but only if all the necessary supportive conditions are present for that seed to become a rose bush. It's the same way with this concept of these biases of mind, these āsavas. It's not like no matter what happens, if something pleasant arises, we're going to be gripped in craving. It doesn't have to happen. But when the supportive conditions are there—wow, that's really nice, just imagine how it would be if I really... Unmindfulness, liking, not noticing, grasping—the supportive conditions—and craving arises. It's subtle. It's pervasive. It can be discouraging.

I remember once a couple of years ago I was sitting here in a pretty mindful space, not really spacing out much, just really watching. As an experiment, I was seeing just leaves of some tree, and I was noting "seeing," I was noting "pleasant," very peaceful, calm, nothing else arising. And I deliberately—it was almost as if I pulled the energy back from the knowing, from the noting, and quit being mindful on purpose.

It was really fascinating. Just like that came up, like a whole—like the armies of Māra—this whole slew of desire and fantasy, nothing to do with the leaves. I mean, it was just leaves on a tree. I don't even remember what the story was. But what was amazing to me was how fast and how strong these tendencies came shooting up into actualization in my mind at that moment.

So if I just thought, "Well, that's what's going to happen no matter what," it would be quite discouraging. But I don't think that's the case. I know that's not the case. It was more an experiment to see what happens when conditions are right. And this tendency is, I think, much more pervasive and more subtle than we like to believe or like to give it credit for. It's also not personal, so we also like to blame ourselves for it every time craving or aversion or wrong view comes up.

But what it does point to, to me rather than discouragement, is the fact that ignorance is not unending. Ignorance is a mental factor that arises due to causes. And when those causes are not present in a moment, ignorance will also cease to be present. It comes and goes. It's not like the big bang—one day ignorance started and now it's here forevermore. The Buddha said that ignorance in fact is known as something that is conditionally arisen.

What we're doing here, besides learning to recognize the presence of ignorance and its manifestations as wrong view, craving, and aversion, we're also learning the conditions both for the arising of ignorance, for getting caught in blindness. We're also learning the conditions for recognizing the truth.

We're learning this not intellectually, but experientially. We're discovering that mindfulness, equanimity, and wisdom are the causal conditions that allow us to open to what is really true—that allow us to recognize our true nature, the true luminous nature of mind. We come to know that truth which is not colored by these biases, these tendencies of mind.

I think it's really important for us to keep recognizing this aspect and not let ourselves drown in our reaction to how strong and pervasive these tendencies toward ignorance are. What we're doing is learning the conditions that let us open to truth.

In the process, another part of the discouragement is this: because we're seeing more clearly, that's precisely how we're able to be aware of how pervasive, how subtle these biases of mind are. Because of the strengthening purity of mind, I was able to deliberately do that experiment of pulling back the mindfulness and watching how these tendencies rushed in. It's because of the deepening purity, the deepening mindfulness, that we are experiencing the painful nature of these torments, these afflictions. And we're experiencing the pain much more consciously, much more fully, with a much more open heart and an open mind.

The result is that it hurts more. We notice it more frequently. And we get so enmeshed in this process that we forget to notice why it's hurting more. We only notice that things we never would have noticed two months ago are now agony. We think, "Is this what I'm giving three months of my life for? To find new and various and subtle ways to suffer?"

If we let ourselves rest in that concept, it is overwhelming. It's also not accurate. It's another filter—another filter on our perception that's distorting what we see, distorting how we understand our perceptions.

So I'd like to offer a suggestion. As we open to the truth of dukkha, as we recognize and learn to open to the torments—and we really are doing this, there's so much more equanimity, so much more wisdom, so much more ability to be with the difficult, even though you might not really remember what it was like two months ago—but sometimes we forget. We get so involved in noticing these difficult aspects that we forget something essential.

When you're being fully present with one of the torments, one of the difficulties, and it goes away, stay really present. Also notice that moment of anger vanishing, that moment of craving dissipating. Don't just go, "Oh great, now it's going back to the breath." Wait a minute. Just a second. Really notice the quality of consciousness free from kilesa. Notice the quality of consciousness in that instant of purity.

It might not be spectacular, and then we hurry back to the breath: "Let's get the concentration going now that the anger is gone." Give it a break for a minute. Notice what's happening in that moment of peace. Begin to recognize the pure nature of consciousness. You don't have to be in such a hurry to get something else happening.

Along those lines, the rest of what I want to talk about tonight is just this: some reflections, some ways of talking about the manifestations of the pure nature of consciousness, of the purity of mind. There are many ways to speak about it, so I'm going to speak specifically in terms of the paramis, the perfections.

None of this is new. It's all reminders. I just want to balance our perception a bit.

Classically, in the Theravada tradition, when speaking of the luminous nature of mind, it doesn't really have any qualities. So in trying to talk about something with no qualities, it gets difficult. But I almost experience it as if whatever qualities we speak of are like reflections, manifestations of this luminous consciousness, not actually it itself.

Classically it's spoken of as non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. That's the very—I don't want to say dour, but unexcited—Theravadan way of speaking about things. But these are much more than neutral, unnoticeable qualities.

Non-greed, as I've spoken of before, is the quality of non-attachment, renunciation. It also has the more active aspect of generosity—thoughts and actions of sharing, of service. Non-hatred encompasses acceptance, compassion, metta, patience. Non-delusion is that brightness of mind, that clarity of perception you all know quite well, that allows for the arising of equanimity, of insight, of understanding. Because in that illuminated clarity, we just see what is, without all the extras.

What I'm going to speak about specifically tonight are two of the paramis: generosity and patience, which are spoken of as being the perfection of non-greed and non-hatred.

But first I want to share an experience, because sometimes I find in myself, or in talking with others, that speaking about the perfection of these qualities—or even the possibility of recognizing the purity of our true nature, or that word which to some people is almost anathema, enlightenment, because it sets up so much difficulty in comparing—becomes challenging. Sometimes I've found it difficult for myself or for others to not just think about but really open to the possibility of experiencing quite deeply, or recognizing very honestly, any of these qualities of awakening: metta, compassion, generosity, patience.

There can be this sense—again coming from the space I started talking about, where we're seeing how much craving there is, how easily anger and delusion arise—a tendency to say, "Yeah, great, in some other lifetime maybe. When I can go and renounce the world. Or maybe I can experience moments of purity here, but forget it once I'm back in New York City or Boston—it's out of the question." Sometimes even thinking about these so-called awakening qualities leads one further into comparison and discouragement.

An experience that's been a kind of metaphor for me, showing that this is not true at all, happened at the first retreat I ever did, some twenty-something years ago. It was in Bodh Gaya in India, the little village where the Buddha sat under the Bodhi tree and came to his deepest realization. Now it's still a small village, but it's obviously a big tourist attraction, with a temple there and everything. I hadn't been back for a long time.

since that first retreat, and I went back maybe four years ago with some friends. I'm not especially a devotional type, so going to a stupa, a landmark like that, I wasn't really expecting anything. I just went because I thought it would be nice going back to Bodh Gaya, a nice idea. So I wasn't prepared for how powerful an experience that was for me.

And it was really along these lines of helping me wake up to the fact that what is true is accessible to us here and now, as we are now. They have a successor to the original Bodhi tree there, a descendant, with a big temple behind it and a fence around it. So you can't actually sit underneath it, except some of the people we were with got permission and they unlocked the gate. We actually did get to sit underneath the tree one day, which thinking about it now, I think would be very humbling. What right do I have, defiled as I am, to sit underneath this tree?

But the effect of being there actually had the opposite effect. This is just a dirty little village. This is a real place. And it made me get it that the Buddha was a real person who was struggling with the same things we are, who sitting under this tree came to this understanding in this human realm. It took it out of being a myth for me and into being reality. It really touched me very deeply. I found myself just weeping, which for me is very unusual in public. It was very moving. And I thought, wow, it's really possible. It's not just some story.

Being in Bodh Gaya went on as an even deeper metaphor for me, because it also took the sense of understanding who we are, of freedom, out of the idea of, well, only if I go and spend thirty-five years in a cave, or since I stopped being a nun, I might as well hang it up. I'm lost in the frivolous life again. It can't happen in the marketplace. Bodh

Gaya itself served as a real metaphor that that's not so, because this temple is just in the middle of everything. Bodh Gaya is a dirty, dusty little Indian village with all kinds of things going on outside the temple grounds. But never mind even that—within the temple grounds, you're sitting around near the tree or walking around the stupa, and there are hordes of tourist groups coming in with microphones in all different languages—Japanese, Thai, Hindi, American—running around. There was a whole group of Tibetan monks sitting on the side doing some chanting ceremony for three days. There were starving dogs fighting. There's all kinds of noise from outside. There was a mad Tibetan woman who was just running around screaming and yelling at anyone who stopped for more than a moment. There are lines and lines of beggars leading up to the temple because it's a great spot for begging. In fact, I was told some of the beggars live in the next village and take a rickshaw over to work every day to do their begging. Honestly. It's a lucrative place. I mean, there are also beggars who are truly starving, but both exist there. And Sharon or somebody told you this story about how the Hindus catch the fish out of the ponds and sell them to the Tibetans, because then they'll go and release them back into the pond to save them. It's quite a scene.

And I thought, there's no sense of let's remove ourselves from the hubbub of life. It's all right here. It was a wonderful metaphor that reminded me it's not about having to disengage from being human, from all the beauty and total insanity that's part of life in this world. It was very inspiring for me.

That particular experience gave me more faith that it's okay to open to these supportive, these awakening qualities of experience. And again, I find—in talking with people I find—that tendency in ourselves to not trust when we've experienced generosity or metta or non-delusion, clarity. People so often say, "Yeah, well, I was compassionate then, but you should see how I feel now. I was loving, but that was only for a minute, and since then I've been lost in anger." We're so quick to try and knock it away, to deflect these really important experiences—important because if we would really recognize and honor them, they can help us to recognize what is really true. Instead, we're in such a hurry to move on to how defiled we are.

Another thing I've noticed is that when we do truly open to compassion or peace or patience, there can be a kind of poignancy, because what comes in so soon is, "Oh, this is so nice, but there's no way it can last." People are saying, "Now there's only a little more than two more full weeks of intensive sitting. How am I going to hold on to this? It's almost like I don't even know if I want to feel it because then I just start suffering because I'm craving for it." This poignancy of the ending of things. Although we know that it's not the case, that of course it's going to end—every experience is going to end, every physical and mental state is going to end—that's not a problem. In fact, when we know from the outset that whatever we're experiencing is of course going to end, it allows us to experience it much more fully, with a much greater depth of appreciation for it just as it is, without needing it to continue for our happiness. It's really quite wonderful, and in itself it deepens and opens our potential for resting more easily in the natural state of awareness—instead of being so afraid to touch it that we run back to our familiar pain.

I'm not talking especially about an ecstatic high. That's kind of another way we get sidetracked. That's why I'd really suggest you just keep looking at those moments. Notice, feel the quality of those moments when you're not caught in kilesa. Don't get distracted by looking for something with fireworks. Just notice those moments of purity.

So that was the introduction. I can see I'm not going to make it through this whole thing. We'll edit as we go along. Maybe we'll talk about one parami tonight, I don't know.

To continue, I wanted to talk about these qualities in terms of the paramis, which I know has been spoken of a little before. Paramis are often translated as perfections or noble qualities, described as perfections of character or conduct—especially the perfections in the bodhisattvas or the noble ones. I see the paramis as a reflection in action, a reflection in character of the true understanding of our nature, of what we really are, of truth. As this reflection of the luminous, pure nature of mind, it manifests in our daily activities as something you can get a handle on. You can notice your conduct. You can notice your character. It can serve as a radiance back to the luminous pure nature, if you want to put it that way. But it's also a way to work in relational activities—to notice these perfections of character or conduct in our activities, in our relations to each other.

I want to list the ten paramis, not for you to remember or hold onto intellectually, but just so you can recognize them experientially when they arise. They're not just some offhand experience. The first is generosity. Then sila, or conscious conduct. The third is renunciation of attachment. Fourth is wisdom. Fifth is energy. Sixth is patience or perseverance. The seventh is truthfulness. The eighth is resolution. Ninth is metta. Tenth is equanimity. You'll recognize that many of these have been ongoing themes we've been speaking of.

On first hearing or looking at the list, I wondered, what about compassion? That's not on the list. I thought that was the other wing. But quite interestingly, in looking at the commentaries about the paramis, it says that all the paramis, all ten of them, have the characteristic—in other words, what you can tell about them—of benefiting others. And that the immediate cause for a parami, for any of the ten to arise, is compassion and skillful means. So what that's saying is that intrinsic to all of these paramis is compassion and skillful means.

Tonight I want to talk more about the paramis of generosity, and hopefully patience—we'll see.

Generosity, as I say, is related to non-greed, which is non-attachment. But generosity is a movement of that, like a spilling out, the generous giving out of energy and connecting with the world around us, connecting with others, really moving out of being enclosed in ourselves into an active state of interconnectedness.

If you think of attachment, you can feel how it's this state of mind that compulsively refers everything back to myself. What can I have? What does this mean to me? What do people think about me? What's going to happen to me? Everything that happens, we refer back to how it's going to affect me. It's a very contracted, separate, closed state.

Non-attachment is not only free of that constriction, but the energy that goes into holding that—and it's a huge amount of energy—is then free to turn back out to others, to sort of spill outwards into the movement of generosity. So with the arising of non-greed come natural generous impulses in any of a variety of forms. You all see that here. You see as the retreat goes on, people are doing all kinds of sweet little generous acts for each other, or just having generous thoughts.

A generous thought is also the same intention. And so it shows that generosity, this parami, arises and is strengthened quite naturally by our mindfulness. Each moment of mindfulness in which greed dissolves—that compulsive referring back to "I"—that moment of purification allows for the potential of generosity to arise in consciousness.

As with all of the paramis, as with everything, we always come back to say that mindfulness practice is one of the strongest protections we have, and really the most powerful way that allows all these qualities to develop naturally—or really to be uncovered, I would even say, more than developed.

We can also see how the practice of generosity itself is a very powerful practice, not only to develop the feelings of generosity, but actually as an opening into wisdom, into understanding, into interconnectedness. In fact, as you know, often when the Buddha spoke of his teachings, he broke them into three very basic practices: dana, which is generosity; sila, which is moral conduct; and bhavana, which is mental development.

Generosity doesn't have a specific form, of course. They talk of threefold generosity. The first is giving of material things. The second is giving of fearlessness, which I think is very interesting—giving of fearlessness described as protection of beings from harm. One very powerful way we have of giving fearlessness is through our moral conduct. It's often said that through our conduct of non-harming, we are giving other beings the great gift of fearlessness in knowing that we will not harm them. And the third is giving of the Dhamma, in whatever way that manifests in us.

Of course, working with Dhamma as practice, it's not so much in the observable results, but it always comes back to intention—the intention in consciousness, the intention in the mind that gives rise to the thought, the speech, or the action of generosity.

In this country, dana isn't so culturally instituted as a practice. When I was a nun in Thailand, I think one of the most profound learnings I had was on the power and the beauty of the practice of generosity, because it's part of the culture there around the practice of Buddhism. It was really very profound for me. It's very strong in the culture.

Being there as a nun or a monk, you're completely supported by people in the temples. Even as a lay person, you can go to pretty much almost any temple in the country—and there are thousands and thousands of temples—and no matter how poor or how crowded, you just walk in and say you want to practice and you're made welcome. You're given a place to stay, you're given food. If you need some supplies and they have it, they'll give it to you. And there's not the slightest ounce of begrudgingness about this. It's done with so much openness and so much joy that it really blew me away.

Even when I first went to ordain, I went to a temple north of Bangkok, a very rich temple where the abbot was old and revered and well-known. I mean, I was just somebody who walked off the street. He didn't know anything about me. And he was showing me around a little kuti I could stay in—the abbot himself, which he didn't need to do—and it was very dusty. He said, "Oh, it's so dusty, you know," and he starts trying to clean it up for me. Very pure, just: let's make this as nice as possible. And it continued like that however long I stayed, anywhere I went.

I was in one small temple in the north that only had about six little kutis for women, a serious practice temple, and the kutis were all filled with Thai nuns. On any day, unexpectedly, any number of people could show up and want to stay. Once about ten women showed up, which is a lot when there are only six huts. The head nun, every time this happened, in an instant she'd give up her hut, put as many in it as possible, and go stay in the cave or stay in the woods with such joy. And then all the other Thai nuns would pack in as many as they needed to in each kuti. And me being the honored guest, they never put anyone else in my kuti, even though it meant they were sleeping four to one of these tiny little huts. It was really beautiful.

I would think back to when I was on staff, and I thought: was I ready to give up my room so another yogi could come and stay when the place was full? Did the idea even cross my mind? It's very beautiful to see.

I could go on and on, but my whole year there was just the experience of one act of beautiful generosity after the other, none of it forced. Really seeing how it works in people—because generosity kind of drives away, doesn't leave room for unwholesome states. To give, you have to first look at your attachment to something and let go of it. And then in the giving there's some affection, some metta, some caring, a real unity. It brings a real brightness, a joy, like sympathetic joy.

You could see that in the generosity of the people I met in Thailand, over and over and over—a happiness and a joy that arose in their consciousness in the process of their acts of generosity. That was really beautiful and very deep and profound. It's something I see on occasion here, on occasion in myself, but not in such an ongoing, spontaneous, and really deep way as I experienced in Thailand.

You can also see how in the act of generosity it strengthens our understanding of interrelatedness. In the giving, you can't give without a receiver. You can't receive without a giver.

Giving is an openness into our interrelatedness with another person. I think that's one of the reasons it's often suggested that if you're having difficulty with somebody, you give them a gift. This doesn't mean throwing them some piece of junk that you don't want anymore—"Here, take this." We're talking about real, deep, genuine giving, true intention of giving.

The teachings say not to give with resentment. As stated in the commentaries, "Do not give detesting the gift or those who ask for it." That's not the intention of generosity. When we're giving with pure intention, there's that volition to give up whatever it is completely, without any expectation of return.

Just in that moment—and don't use this as another club to beat yourself because you're not a hundred percent pure in your intentions of generosity. It's a practice.

Some of the teachings from Sayadaw U Pandita speak about how to work with an act of giving as a conscious practice for opening our own understanding. First, in an act of giving, really give attention to the volition, to the intention, so that it purifies through our intention. In other words, if we're giving and we see that we're really giving because we want something back, the noticing of that in itself can be enough to purify the intention.

Also, as we're giving, we can see the clinging we have to whatever it is we're giving, whether it's our time or a thing. In that seeing of the clinging, we allow that clinging to dissolve, giving the gift freely.

And then something I learned directly from U Pandita is, if possible—but not here, please, until the retreat is over—to give directly, hand to hand. I had given him a book that I knew he wanted, and it had been passed to him while I was sitting. When I went over, he made me sign it, and I just kind of put it down. He said, "No," correcting me. He made me pick it up and give it to him hand to hand, really looking at each other.

There is such a different depth of power and presence in the act when it's done in that way. I really felt full faith and confidence in the act of giving, being fully present for it, and also much more aware of the interrelatedness of giver and receiver—that both are present. The sense of the metta moving back and forth, so that you really couldn't tell whose was whose, made the whole act so much more alive, so much more profound. It was really quite a beautiful lesson.

At the same time as giving, we give with the mind really focused on the act of giving—in other words, just being really present. Not just "here" and then "now I'm going to go do whatever I want to do, glad that's over with," but being really present.

This next point I thought was interesting because it acknowledges the momentariness of all experience: after the act of giving, continue to be aware, mindful of the intention, of the volition, because of course it can easily change. We all know that—giving with the purest of intention, and ten minutes later the thought comes up, "Oh gee, I wonder if I should have given that. I could have really used it." Just to notice that. Of course things change, and again, in the noticing is the purification.

Also, to be aware of the broader context of giving—I think this also comes in with purity of intention. In other words, giving what is really useful and what is helpful. The commentaries go into long lists of the kinds of situations and things in which you wouldn't give. For example, you don't give something harmful, even if it's what the person really wants.

It reminded me of when my sister was very severely ill and was in intensive care in the hospital, on one of these respirators for days. She couldn't drink; all she could have was ice chips. I've never been on one, but apparently it's just torment—your throat is dry and horribly unpleasant, and all you want is something to drink. And that's the one thing you can't have. I just remember her begging, pleading. It was really heartrending.

That's an extreme example, but in that instance, it's not compassionate and it's not a true act of generosity to give water when she's going to choke to death on it. You give what you can—the ice chips that would be helpful. Or you give compassion, or you give love in that instance. You give what is helpful, and that's the true giving.

Also, allowing oneself to receive in the same focused, present, allowing way is equally powerful, and I think it's vital. It's really a way of looking at the purity of our intentions of giving. If we can only give but we can't receive, it doesn't work that way.

For instance, one of the other powerful lessons about being on the receiving end in Thailand—knowing how we live here and how poor the people were there, and how much they were giving. I knew I could write home and have anything I wanted or however much money I wanted, and these people were really sacrificing to give me food. It's hard, given our conceptual framework, not to feel totally rotten about myself, completely undeserving.

Now, there are a couple of mistakes in that. One is taking it personally. The giving is not personal. It's supporting the Dhamma. It's supporting anyone who practices and carries on true intention of spreading and supporting the Dhamma. It's not "I like you as a person" or "I don't like you as a person," so "I support this one and not another." It's not personal.

And it's also seeing that in blocking—by not receiving really deeply and genuinely and openly—we block the flow of generosity. There was so much joy coming to the people from the giving. It was wonderful to watch. And if I were to say, "No, I won't take that," you can feel how it just stops the energy. Or if I say, "Well, I'm not deserving of that"—that's just a way of... It's really, in a way, a giving to receive when what you're receiving is being given with such pure intention.

Notice it here, even in our culture, in one common way: in receiving compliments. Never mind thanks, but how...

how hard it is for some of us to just really let someone say something very positive about us. We say, "Oh, well, you know..." We turn it away, we're incredibly uncomfortable, we want to list all the reasons that's not true. It stops the flow of interconnectedness. It brings us into feeling quite separate.

To receive with the same purity of intention is equally a part of this movement of generosity, of non-attachment. And of course, giving—I'm not just talking about things. It includes service, giving of our time, giving of our care, any way in which this movement of non-attachment, of generosity, moves out to others.

The second parami I want to talk about is patience. Patience is said to be the perfection of non-hatred in character and in conduct. And I can really feel how that's the case. It has the characteristic of acceptance, obviously—this quality of acceptance, a kind of equanimity. But it really means enduring difficulties, harmful or difficult situations, whether brought on by other beings or by internal formations.

So sitting here, you know, it's being patient not only with the external situation but with all the internal difficulties as well. It's not a state of endurance tinged with aversion—"Please God, let me get through this until something better comes my way." That's not patience. Patience is the state of consciousness, the act of consciousness itself. It's not only the span of time that you can be with something, but it's that momentary arising of consciousness that is dominated by non-aversion or acceptance, again accompanied by compassion or skillful means.

And what I think is really interesting is that another immediate cause, the proximate cause for patience to arise, is seeing things as they really are. Patience isn't just something we do because we can't do anything better—"I'll be patient until I can get really clear and mindful." Patience arises from seeing things as they really are. I don't think we should underestimate the importance of the consciousness of patience in opening us to wisdom and to truth.

Again, I don't know why I'm in Thailand tonight, but Thailand was also one of my best teachers in learning patience. Because aside from how beautiful and generous everyone was, it was a very difficult experience. I went there to practice with the idea that I would do a long period, a couple of years, of intensive practice. I had places like IMS or similar retreat centers in England as my model—long, quiet, peaceful. Forget it.

I thought I'd be out in the woods, a real nature retreat. Instead, I spent months in Bangkok in this temple where I ordained, which was actually very nice for Bangkok but incredibly noisy. Loudspeakers blaring all the time. Three in the morning, a hundred roosters decide to wake up every single morning. People everywhere, hordes and hordes of tourists.

Even when I got to the woods, the temples would have people come in on tour buses because it's sort of like their parks. They come on Sunday, have picnics, wander around, look at the monks and nuns, take pictures of you as you're doing walking meditation—right in your face. And incredibly hot. Incredibly hot. In Bangkok during the hot season, I'd wake up and see that ball of sun coming up over the horizon and think, "I can't bear another day." It would just go on and on. Finally I got out to the country, out to the woods, to this little temple I was telling you about, way back in the forest by a riverbed.

It sounds idyllic. The forest is not quiet. The forest is so loud I could not believe it. So many insects and lizards and snakes and bats and birds and monkeys. Incredibly loud. You can't imagine it if you haven't been sitting there, waiting for mangoes dropping on the tin roof like explosions during mango season.

One night there was a strong rain and the river, which was really low, rose about five feet. It was a river with woods on each side and then sheer cliffs going up, so the sound just reverberated back and forth between the cliffs. I remember thinking—literally—that I was going to lose my mind that night from the noise of the river. I was losing it. I was losing it in aversion. I thought this stuff was an obstacle to my practice. There's no way to practice in this kind of environment, never mind the bugs and the ants, and poisonous—I could go on forever.

So this was two or three months or more into my stay. When I finally got it, I said, "Oh, these things are not an obstacle to my practice. My reactive mind is an obstacle to my practice." If I didn't start paying attention, I could see that what I was really cultivating was aversion. I could spend years cultivating aversion, or I could start to work with patience. The choice was mine.

It made a huge difference to see that. I mean, it didn't make it more pleasant—I didn't like the conditions any better—

But as that reactivity that made everything a struggle began to fall away, there arose this quality of simply being with whatever it is that we cannot change.

Now, the Buddha spoke also of skillful avoidance. Patience doesn't mean enduring a really harmful situation that you can actually do something about. For example, if there was a particular food that made me violently ill and there were other things to eat, it wouldn't be patience to think, "Well, I'll just eat this food along with all the others and be violently ill." That's not necessary. Sometimes we get a little confused and think that skillful discernment means we're not being patient. But that's not the case.

It's with the things we can't change that patience reveals its true nature—pain in your body, having the flu, the person next to you who moves a lot, an unexpected message from home that stirs up a whole whirlwind in your mind. With situations we cannot change, this quality of patience is not just a way to help us get through to something better. It is the quality that arises because we know what's true, and it allows us to deeply open into the truth of who we are instead of looking for something spectacular.

I want to read something Ajahn Sumedho says about patience, about this sense of not looking for something spectacular. Ajahn Sumedho is an American monk who practiced for many years under Ajahn Chah, the great Thai forest monk, and now has a monastery in England.

He talks a lot about being patient in Thailand, about how hard it was and how he eventually stopped wanting to be really interesting and fascinating. He realized that was a waste of time, sweating in a kuti in Northeast Thailand. He started looking at the water buffaloes and thinking, "There's the most stupid-looking creature in the world—a Thai water buffalo." So he would sit there trying to tell himself, "That's what I need to do. Be like a Thai water buffalo." He'd just sit and create the image in his mind of a water buffalo—becoming more stupid, more dull, more patient, and less fascinating and clever and interesting.

He's talking about this quality of patience, not just getting through something, but how it opens in us quite deeply the truth. He says:

"Buddha wisdom is a very humbling wisdom, and it takes a great deal of patience to be wise like the Buddha. Buddha wisdom is not a particularly fascinating kind of wisdom. It's not like being a nuclear physicist or a psychiatrist or a philosopher. Buddha wisdom is very humbling because it knows that whatever arises passes away and is not self. So it knows that whatever condition of the body and mind arises, it's conditioned, it passes away. And it knows the unconditioned as the unconditioned."

And this is the part I think is interesting:

"But is knowing the unconditioned very interesting or fascinating? Try to think of knowing the unconditioned. Would it be interesting? You might think, 'I'd like to know God or Dhamma. It's going to be an incredibly fascinating thing to know—something blissful and ecstatic.' So you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think that getting high is getting close. But the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. The space in this room—is it very interesting to look at? It's not to me. The space in this room is like the space in the other room. The things in this room might be interesting or uninteresting or whatever—good, bad, beautiful, ugly. But the space, what is it? There's nothing you can really say or think about it. It has no quality except being spacious."

And to be able to be really spacious, one has to be patient.

CHAPTER 259

Patience in Mettā

Carol Wilson · 52 min

In this loving-kindness retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates an often underappreciated dimension of mettā: patience (khanti). She challenges common misconceptions about loving-kindness—that it should feel like sentimental bliss or passionate ecstasy—and instead points to the quiet, unflamboyant quality of open acceptance as mettā's transformative core.

Wilson explains that true mettā arises from wisdom (paññā), specifically from recognizing our intrinsic wholeness and completeness. She explores how our habitual reactions to experience—clinging to the pleasant, resisting the unpleasant, ignoring the neutral—perpetuate a false sense of fragmentation and separation. This pattern, rooted in not truly understanding impermanence (anicca), keeps us searching outside ourselves for happiness that already resides within.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with difficult experiences during meditation. Rather than struggling against physical discomfort, boredom, or emotional challenges, Wilson encourages bringing bare attention grounded in mettā directly into the experience itself. She shares a personal example of transforming tiredness through patient acceptance, demonstrating how this quality creates spaciousness and allows us to embrace the whole show of life—pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral alike. Drawing from both Buddhist teachings and a passage from Dostoevsky, she shows how this all-embracing acceptance is not weakness or passivity, but a courageous and powerful way of meeting life as it truly is.

If this is the first time that you've done a loving-kindness retreat—or maybe even if you've done other ones before—you might be discovering by now that metta, or loving-kindness, has many different aspects. You can experience it in various ways, and perhaps some of those aspects have very little to do with our expectations or our ideas about what loving-kindness should feel like or how we should experience it.

Tonight I want to talk mostly about a particular, less flamboyant aspect of loving-kindness, but one which is, I think, particularly helpful to tune into at this time of the retreat. It's also an aspect that really opens us to deep acceptance and freedom. This is the aspect of metta that is sometimes called patience, or open acceptance. It's not too flamboyant.

I remember a conversation I had a couple of years ago with a man who was on a Vipassana retreat. He really wanted to talk about loving-kindness and his resistance to it—his sort of negative feeling about loving-kindness and why he didn't really want to practice it or think it was a good idea. I think this shows one of our inaccurate expectations or ideas about what love is. To him, metta conditioning us to really accept whatever arises, to meet whatever arises with friendliness, was a form of weakness, of real passivity, leading to victimization, to letting ourselves be used as a doormat. Just this kind of namby-pambiness where everything's okay, everything's lovely.

This corresponds, I think, to some of the ways that in our culture we experience the idea of love—ideas that carry over into what we perhaps unconsciously associate with metta. One aspect that we often think of as love is what you could call sentimentality: everything is kind of soft and rose-colored. It's the kind of thing in movies when lovers are tripping through a beautiful field of flowers and Mozart is playing in the background and everything is just so perfect. And of course they have to end it with "they lived happily ever after"—which, as we know, is impossible—but they have to end it there because you really can't keep up that illusion of soft, beautiful, everything's-nice perfection.

It's easy to drift into that sort of sentimental idea of love and to bring that into what we might expect of metta: that somehow all our experience turns nice, and if we're filled with metta, everyone we meet is really so sweet and pleasant, and the world takes on that rosy glow. But we can forget that that's not what happens exactly, and looking for that just sets us up for trouble. That's not love with wisdom. And metta comes with wisdom. Metta arises from wisdom, is associated with wisdom, with seeing things as they are.

The flip side of our inaccurate assumptions about love is not weak but really strong—the real sense of passion, which is usually blind, but leads to incredible strength and sacrifice and willingness to be together, willingness to die for love, love of country, love of another person, whatever. This real strength can lead to a sense of blind passion. In our loving-kindness practice, it can subtly, at times, lead us to expect that the metta should be these throes of ecstatic bliss. Most of the time, that's really the culmination of it, and if we're not experiencing it that way, we think we're not there yet. In fact, we may believe we've never experienced one single instance of metta at all, because we don't experience it that way. But I can promise you will not always experience it that way. And it would be exhausting, I think, personally. I'm one of the people who rarely experiences things that way. But again, that blindness, that passion is associated with clinging, with attachment. And this is also not the true love, the pure love that comes from wisdom.

Metta arises from wisdom, and one way that I like to express the essence of wisdom is the deep recognition of our intrinsic wholeness, of our essential inner completeness. Metta is a powerful force that lets us access this deep truth—not an intellectual truth of "oh yes, we're essentially complete," but experientially knowing, living from that place of inner wholeness, of completeness.

The Buddha often said that everybody wants to be happy. I think—this is me now, not the Buddha—that the real yearning, that yearning for happiness, that yearning for whatever it is we're yearning for, is at least in my own experience a yearning for that unity, a yearning for coming home to deep inner connection, to true peace.

The sad aspect of our experience is that in that yearning for deep completion, we don't really see—we somehow have lost sight of the fact—that we've already got it. We keep looking outside to experience, to people, to whatever, to try and somehow feel whole again, somehow feel complete.

I read in a newspaper last year a little description of an Oprah Winfrey show. I assume you all know this is a talk show—I've actually never seen it. But she was mimicking a movie called Sleepless in Seattle, which I think was about a widower who called into a radio show to try and meet a partner. On Oprah's show, she had five men who had, in some recent period of time, lost their wives. I think they had children too, and good jobs—doctors or lawyers or something. I assume they were probably nice-looking; it didn't really mention that. But the point of this program was simply introducing these guys. I mean, what can you really get to know about some guys sitting on Oprah Winfrey for an hour? And then she invited any women who were interested—so this was rather heterosexually biased—to write in letters asking for a date.

Two weeks later, she came on her show with a bulldozer. She had received 60,000 letters. These guys had actually received 60,000 letters from women looking for love, looking for happiness, looking for a partner. It made me really sad in a way—the loneliness in our culture and the lack of connection, of family, of whatever. We can read all kinds of sociological interpretations into it, but my point for now is simply this: that deep yearning for completion, for wholeness, keeps sending us outward when what we seek is already here.

is that to me this was a great example of how we posit our happiness, how we think that somehow completion can only be found outside of ourselves—sometimes way outside of ourselves. And it's precisely this looking that keeps us from recognizing we're already home.

Loving-kindness, this mettā practice that we're doing, is opening up our heart, opening up our experience so that more and more deeply we can come to recognize this place of inner completion—to dwell here, to rest here more and more frequently, and to respond to other beings and to the world from a place of unity rather than from a place of fear, separation, and fragmentation.

There's a passage from a Tibetan text about how the sense of completion is already here within us:

Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that this state is never impaired or improved on in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is realized by just resting at ease in whatever happens.

Resting at ease in whatever happens. This is really one of the aspects of mettā, one of the ways of being in our life and in the world that mettā opens up to us. And that's the aspect I want to talk about tonight.

What we call in English "patience"—which is pretty undramatic and even boring, we could say—opens us up to this resting at ease in whatever happens, which is truly connected and beautiful as a way to live our lives. It's transformative. And this acceptance, true acceptance, patience, is mettā.

I think it's often something you might experience here in the retreat, but because it's so unflamboyant and often nothing special—just a kind of mild friendliness, a sense of okayness with things—we can easily overlook it and think, "This isn't quite good enough. It's not quite juicy enough." We try to work it up a little bit. Or we might think, "Patience? I didn't really come here for that. I was expecting some kind of really blissful, far-out unitive state that I would reach at least by the end—hopefully by the fifth day—and stay there, maybe with breaks for eating, until the retreat ends. And if I do enough retreats, that'll be it for the rest of my life."

You can see that there's a way—I know that's a little exaggerated, but it hits the nerve—there's a way that we're still looking for loving-kindness to bring us out of our sense of fragmentation. And it's a false sense of fragmentation. We're not fragmented, but we think we are. We live as if we were. We perceive experience as if we were somehow separate or fragmented. And we look for mettā as a way to take us out of it—out of the fragmentation, the separateness, the loneliness—but also it should take us out of everyday mundane experience as well.

I mean, the stuff that's been going on the last two days, the large part of some of your experiences—does that count? Is that what you're looking for? The knee pain, the sleepiness, the incredible boredom with these four phrases that pound in your head like a drill, this over and over coming back, coming back, the effort it requires. And then when you say you're putting out effort, we say, "Take it easy." And then the next minute we say, "Be continuous, keep it up no matter what you're doing—but take it easy." Not exactly what—well, we might not have even consciously known what we had in mind, but usually it's not that. Usually that's not what we think when we think about practicing mettā.

And this is exactly the place where patience—not as "okay, I'll wait it out till it gets better," which is not patience but a mild form of aversion—but a true "okay" with what is. It's in these difficult places, or simply mundane places, or just sort of boring places, that we begin to discover truly what mettā is and truly what the power of this open, accepting quality that mettā brings to experience.

Acceptance and patience arise from mindful, clear seeing. So it's arising again from wisdom. As we pay attention to our experience throughout these days, we can see that one of the ways mettā, acceptance, and the clear seeing from which acceptance arises helps to heal us from fragmentation is by allowing us to discover moment to moment how this sense of fragmentation is being perpetuated—how it's arising in our moment-to-moment relationship with experience, how it's being perpetuated throughout the day through more moments of experience. Through not really looking at what's happening and then drawing conclusions and interpretations about what's happening, we take ourselves really far away from just being here and now.

Let me give an example of what I mean. Just reflect for a minute on any of the various experiences you've had today. I know that we're pretty much doing the same thing as a form—holding to the sense of self or benefactor, repeating the phrases. Within that, there are varying degrees of loving-kindness or friendliness or acceptance—or heart of stone. And there are also other experiences. Physical experiences of comfort or dis-ease or pain or heaviness or sleepiness. Mental and emotional experiences of frustration, discouragement, love, boredom, self-judgment, self-loathing, sleepiness—whatever.

So just for a moment, reflect on all the various beautiful experiences, difficult experiences, sort of boring experiences. And if you can remember: what was the attitude of heart, of mind, that would flow into and meet these experiences?

Or did actually, on the unpleasant experiences, was there any semblance of flowing in and meeting the experience?

Now the attitude of heart, of metta, of true acceptance, of patience, is a real open-hearted, full meeting of whatever's arising. Without judgment, without trying to change, without hating, without loving. It's a wholehearted embracing of each event—whether it's knee pain, whether it's heart like a stone, whether it's feeling really loving and fulfilled, whether it's just ho-hum, another sitting. Whatever it is that arises, this willingness to be fully present, to experience it quite openly, not cling to it if it's beautiful, not try to make it stay, not flinch away if it's difficult or unpleasant or not what we had in mind. That's the attitude of metta.

But is that our habitual reaction to experience? If things are just coming and going and we're trying to get into loving-kindness? It becomes more habitual through this cultivation of the intention of metta that we're doing, absolutely. But one of the reasons that we are really working so hard, devoting so much time and energy to the cultivation of the intention of deep loving-kindness, of self-acceptance, is because it's not, for many of us, the habitual response or reaction of heart to experience that comes up.

Most likely, most habitual is that if something is difficult or unpleasant—painful physically, painful emotionally, or unpleasant simply in that it's not what we wanted, that it doesn't meet some idea we have of what should be happening—that in itself can be extremely unpleasant. The tendency when we're not really meeting or paying attention, when any of these experiences come up, is: "Ah, this is a mistake, this shouldn't be happening, I've got to get rid of it," or "I've done something wrong," or "Somehow this has to change so I can do the practice properly, so I can get on with things."

If a pleasant experience arises—feeling very loving or very light and at ease in the body, or in some way it meets your expectations, even if only for a moment—quite insidiously, the thought can come up or not even quite form: "Ah, this is right. Now somehow I've got on the right track and I've got to figure out how to make it stay this way, and in fact get more this way until it doesn't change anymore."

And if it's neutral, actually, we just don't even notice it. And then it becomes difficult because it's not intense enough, and so then we've moved into difficulty.

Right here, in this very basic relation to emotional, physical, inner or outer experience—this rejecting of certain things, denying, avoiding, this clinging to others, kind of madly trying to make things happen or make things stay, choosing one experience as the way things should be and throwing others away—this in itself is creating a sense of real fragmentation in our lives. We're rejecting half of our life experience as not being valid, as not being okay. We're looking for other things that aren't here that we need to be complete, to be fulfilled. And then there's a whole level in the middle that we're just ignoring completely and not really alive and vital in.

These filters of clinging and attachment, of aversion to what's difficult, of not even noticing what's neutral—they become filters through which we experience and evaluate and perceive experience. And they keep us spinning in confusion. Because it's through this filter then that we'll try for something more pleasant to come back, to find that sense of completion, to find true happiness. And of course, whatever pleasant thing we find, at some point it changes, it goes away. So then we look for another and we look for another, not seeing that we need to see through the filters themselves.

This whole sense of confusion, fragmentation, limitation—the habit of mind that keeps us in the sense of separation, this particular one I'm speaking about—is fed very deeply by not recognizing the truth of impermanence. By somehow, even though consciously we know everything changes, we're all born, we all die, there are seasons, nothing lasts—even though consciously we know that, to really on a deep level live from that place, so that we respond to experience knowing that things change, that I cannot control that, that if something beautiful goes away it's not my fault, and if something difficult comes up I'm not to blame, that none of it will last—if we really related to our life, in our life, to experience from that deep understanding, you'd see so much of our sense of struggle, of our sense of fragmentation and limitation, would fall away. Because the sense of looking outside for something that's changing to bring us ultimate satisfaction would go away.

And if you think of it, any time during the next day or so when you realize that the metta sort of faded and you're in a sense of some kind of struggle with whatever's going on—whether it's knee pain or back pain, whether it's a feeling of sadness or a sense of self-judgment, whatever—see if you can notice that there's some underlying, maybe not quite conscious assumption. One, that what's happening is never gonna change: "I'm gonna have to live the rest of my life feeling this miserable, with my knee hurting, hating myself this much, being this unconcentrated," or whatever. Or how much comes from a sense of something that you liked having gone away, and the despair and the sense of self-blame that can come from that—that somehow I've done something wrong, I lost it, and I have to find a way to get it back.

And it's just this shrinking back from the unpleasant and lunging into the pleasant that keeps us from opening fully to what's here right now. It's what keeps us from seeing that we're already whole.

So metta, this loving-kindness practice—why it's so revolutionary is because it's a real training in opening our hearts and opening to our life experience in a whole other way. It's revolutionary because it's a real training. It's not like we just have to wait and hope that a bolt of insight hits our heart and we suddenly see through all the clinging and all the aversion. That'll happen from time to time. But along the way, each time that we can come back to a moment of metta, strengthen in that moment simply the intention of well-wishing to whoever it is, to whatever the situation is, that's a moment of strengthening that ability to be really patient and accepting and not feeding our old habit of looking for happiness where it can't be found.

So this: a moment of metta brings a real equality of attitude. We cultivate that through the formal practice. As you know, we'll go through different sets of people. We start with people that are supposed to be easy to feel metta for—not a contradiction. I say "supposed to be" because often for ourselves it is a contradiction. But a benefactor, a dear friend. Then it moves to a neutral person, and then we move to a so-called difficult person, cultivating a true well-wishing, a true equality of attitude to each of these people.

And it really works. I know that at some point the person I was using for my neutral person—I didn't even know her name, I was sitting here and she was sitting there—and after a few weeks, if I saw her somewhere

I would get so happy—just this happiness would come up. I knew nothing about her, just from the cultivation of well-wishing for somebody.

As the metta practice goes on, it's very carefully planned so that we open up the field and consciously begin to cultivate the ability to tune in to some lovable aspect of anybody or any situation. And then you find that this begins to be the attitude we bring into meeting whatever experiences arise.

Since we're here on retreat, you might think that if you're not saying the phrases, you're not cultivating metta. But each time you bring this openness, this equality of attitude, this really flowing into experience—that is metta, that is loving-kindness. And it's not blind, it's not one-sided. Actually meeting the difficult with this open acceptance brings a spaciousness and an inclusivity of experience that's quite amazing.

I'll give a small example. Yesterday I was driving home in the afternoon, and for some reason I was physically just really tired and heavy. I was driving home aware of that, feeling "I'm so tired, I'm so heavy. Why am I so tired?" I was aware of it—I knew that's how I felt—but it wasn't the awareness of mindfulness, of non-judging, needing acceptance. My heart and mind were really shrinking back from the experience of heaviness and tiredness. There was aversion to it. And that was all I was aware of—that and the road. That was my world. It was very constricted.

Then, not consciously, I didn't decide "Oh, I should do metta." What I did was simply let my real open attention flow into the physical experience of the tiredness and heaviness itself—whereas before I had been shrinking back, I just flowed all my energy and mindful attention into it. Feeling heaviness. Feeling tiredness. Just being fully present without judgment or expectation.

Very interesting—in just a moment the tension eased, because so much of the tension was the result of aversion, resistance to what I was experiencing. The tension eased and a real spaciousness came in. I stayed tired, of course, but all of a sudden, quite spontaneously, I said, "Wow, isn't this a beautiful day?" Then I started noticing little chipmunks, which are all over, playing on the side of the driveway as I was driving. "Oh, isn't that cute? Isn't that sweet?" Just this whole sense of inclusivity of life—that there's a lot of beautiful stuff, some really pleasant things happening—and I was still feeling tired and heavy, yes, but it really didn't matter very much.

That's just a little example. But that's what I mean by bringing the attitude of metta, of patience and acceptance, to our experience.

Especially in these first days of retreat—well, really all along, but especially in the first days when the focusing and the being pulled inward of the metta hasn't developed as strongly yet—you'll be much more aware of physical discomforts, annoying sounds outside, things going on, emotional states. There will be times when what else is going on is a little too strong to simply notice it and come back to the metta. That's the time when our mindfulness, our awareness practice, can really come to our aid. And the awareness is really grounded in the field of metta. In a way, the two are corollaries—they're really intertwined, especially the attitudes.

Bringing in the quality of bare attention, of moving directly into experience when you're beginning to feel a struggle, not able to stay with the metta—bring your bare attention immediately into the experience with this attitude of patient, loving acceptance. Bare attention to the bare experience, as opposed to our interpretations and ideas and judgments about experience.

With my tiredness yesterday, before I used bare attention to flow right into the physical experience of tiredness itself, what I was caught in—knowing I was tired—I could easily have said, "Oh, I'm aware that I'm tired. There's awareness." There was awareness, but there wasn't mindfulness. There wasn't bare attention grounded in metta. Instead of really feeling the tiredness, I got into feeling I don't like it, I wish it would go away, it's happening because of X, Y, and Z, there's something wrong with me, something physically wrong, I should go to a doctor, I need a full checkup. You know how the mind just goes. And if we're not really paying attention, we say, "Oh yeah, I'm aware of that. I was really aware that I was tired"—sort of aware of this whole process, but not bringing attention into the bare experience.

And so that's something to really begin to pay attention to over these days, because there will be times when this is an invaluable tool—this bare attention grounded in metta.

When a difficult experience comes up, notice how you habitually respond. What constructs, what interpretations does the mind tend to get hooked into? If it's unpleasant, does it bring up aversion or fear? "I've got to get rid of this. Something horrible is going to happen. It's a mistake." Does it bring up self-judging? "This shouldn't be happening. It's happening because I'm no good, because I'm worthless, because I'm useless." Does it bring up a sense of outer anger? "It's happening because these people sitting around me are total jerks. It's happening because this place is really out to lunch. It's happening because the food isn't right."

Once you notice that you're beginning to get hooked into some interpretation, you might try to come back to the metta. "Okay, I know my knee hurts, I'll just come back. May I be happy." You send metta to the knee. "Uh-oh, another forty minutes. Uh-oh, I wonder if I'm going to have to go to the hospital. I wonder why Carol sits on the chair. I bet she really blew her knees out." And the mind goes on and on.

When you can begin to notice that that's what's happening, that's the time to see that you're getting hooked. Take your attention at that point off of the phrases and bring it right into—very lovingly but very openly—the actual experience of sensation in the knee itself. No expectation, no judgment, good or bad, no "it should go away if I do it right." Nothing of that. Just simply, lovingly, openly being there for it, being there with it. Notice what happens.

That is the quality of all-embracing metta—simply being with what is because it's there. It doesn't mean that we can't tell the difference between a painful sensation and a pleasant one. And of course, given our preference in life, we're not going to say, "I don't care if I stick my hand in a fire or not." We're not talking about losing discriminating wisdom. But we're talking about being able to open to life as it presents itself.

And as life presents itself, it's going to have the whole show. There are going to be many painful and difficult moments in our bodies, in our hearts, in external experience. There are going to be many beautiful and loving and connected moments and pleasant moments. And there are going to be many that are sort of neutral. The quality that transforms our life is to meet each moment with a real open, affectionate curiosity —with an all-embracing willingness to be present because it's what is so. In that, you can find that we meet life with a real peace and spaciousness that is not dependent on having things change. And it's not dependent on receiving something from the outside in order to feel happy.

That's really one of the wonderful things about this loving-kindness practice. We see over and over that the happiness, the connectedness with ourselves, with other beings, with our own experience that's generated in the loving-kindness—no one else is beaming that into you and making it happen. And it's not that somehow it's being created artificially. It's really much more of a purification, a clearing away of the barriers, clearing away the false sense of limitation, of separation, of preference, that lets the loving-kindness, that lets the unitive energy begin to shine forth more and more.

So patience, metta, acceptance is not a sort of stepping back from experience. "Okay, I can be with this. I can be with this. I know it'll change." Not really. That's sort of indifference or fake patience. Real metta patience is actively connected—really actively connected to experience, very wholeheartedly present in experience, actively aware—yet with the bare experience itself, not constructing some tower of interpretation and personal story about it.

And seeing the whole show. The proximate cause in the commentaries, the proximate cause for patience to arise, is seeing things as they are. Patience is a result of true wisdom, of seeing things as they are. That's really quite profound. When we really see that things are changing, when we really understand that, patience—active connection without expectation, open acceptance—arises quite naturally. And it's not a kind of passive submission, "I can't do anything about it anyway." It's not passive at all. It's not victimization. It's active, very powerful, and it lends great strength and courage. Much more so, actually, I find, than the sort of pretend "I can put up with it" kind of false equanimity.

It's transformative. Seeing things as they are lets us meet whatever arises with deep acceptance. I don't know why it's so difficult for us to really get this—how things are.

Even just the simplicity of change. Look in your own practice and see how often we resist it. Look at the world, the rhythms of nature, the fact of seasons, the fact of day and night, the fact that we're all aging, that sometimes we're healthy, sometimes we're sick, sometimes we're happy, having a good year, and sometimes it's like a year from hell. You can look around and see how some friends are going through very beautiful times while others are going through very difficult times, and then two years later it will be switched around.

I have a good friend who said to me last year, "You know, I've been so happy. I wonder what's going to make it change." I thought that was a very wise thing to say, because he knew, of course, it would change. He was just wondering what would seem to be the catalyst for it.

Or we can see that even when something's beautiful, it isn't all beautiful—there's also difficult experience. We go outside, it's finally so beautiful after all these months, and the black flies are there immediately as soon as it gets warm. I can't stay outside for more than five minutes. It's just how it is. There are both sides—just like being really tired and it's also a beautiful day.

Opening deeply to one aspect, we open to all aspects. Trying to block out one aspect, even unconsciously, we block out access to our own completion. We block out access to true love and connection.

So in your practice here, in the simple metta practice, really know this: sometimes the practice will be calm, centered, connected, and the metta will seem to flow. Sometimes it will be restless, jumpy, boring. Your heart feels like a dead stone. Nothing's going on. That's just the way it is. There's absolutely nothing going wrong in that.

If we get away from knowing this, if we get lost again in our expectations, you can see what a rich field that creates for self-judgment. Getting lost in one slightly unpleasant experience that we don't see we're resisting or avoiding or thinking is a sign of our badness—it can lead into a whole world of self-loathing and everything bad we've ever done, everything we've ever failed at since we were five years old. You've had five thoughts in a row, one of them lasted five minutes. You come back and say, "See, I could never focus. I can't do this. I can't concentrate. I failed math when I was in third grade." And it'll just keep going and going. Then you wonder why you don't feel loving-kindness for yourself.

It really starts with something so simple as not accepting that in this moment the mind is wandering. In another moment it won't be wandering. Both are okay.

When we're not deluded anymore by changing conditions—not deluded into thinking that there's some lasting, unchanging condition we can create or hold onto that's going to bring us happiness—when we stop looking outside ourselves for that, this is what metta can open to us. Not that we think the metta itself stays in some unchanging way of experience. It will experience the whole range. But metta as an attitude, as a way that we greet life, far from being weak and passive, opens us up to the whole show with great courage—the courage of seeing things as they are, and the willingness to act that comes from real love and compassion.

And that sense of inclusivity—for me it's a kind of knowing that in any situation going on in the world, among people, when I'm really tuned into acceptance and patience with myself and others, I know that I could probably at some point act in any of the roles unfolding in that situation. Who am I to judge or say that one is better than another, or to withhold including a sense of well-wishing for one person because they don't deserve it?

What made me think of that—I just want to read something from the newspaper this morning. Just a little scenario, one of however many millions are happening in the world. It's a painful scenario. It's in Sarajevo. A young man, about twenty, was just walking across the street and was hit by sniper fire. It struck him in the back, knocked him down, and he's paralyzed now.

But the scenario is this: as he was walking across and got hit, there was a television cameraman filming it. There was a United Nations peacekeeping soldier standing on the side under cover, frozen, watching the whole thing. And then there was a civilian who was galvanized to action, who came and yelled at the United Nations soldier to move his vehicle to cover the wounded man from the sniper. Then the civilian ran and dragged the young man out of the street.

It's interesting—a very strange scenario, but just a little synopsis of so many different ways of being happening in one situation. There's the sniper, the civilian shot on the city street, the television cameraman waiting there for something like that to happen so he can film it, the United Nations soldier who is really afraid and frozen and doesn't know how to act, and then the civilian who is galvanized and simply goes and helps.

It's just a scenario of life. To me it represented all the different ways that humans can be, captured in one little synopsis. And I could really see how, at different times, I could be any of those people.

The sense of metta is not to say, "Well, it doesn't matter if you shoot somebody, who cares?" I don't mean that at all. But for me, the challenge is: can I find the place in my heart that can open, really deeply open, to the fact that each of those things is happening? That is life. It isn't all beautiful. It isn't all ugly. It's the whole show.

And the power of metta, of this patience, of this open acceptance, is that it lets us be really alive there in the middle of the show. We embrace all aspects of ourselves, and in that way we really heal our sense of fragmentation. In embracing all aspects of ourselves with acceptance, we find that we can embrace aspects of others with acceptance and understanding.

This doesn't mean that we encourage people to kill. We might be able to be the one who could act. When we're not lost in fear, when we know things change, we might be the one who could act. But at another time we might be frozen in fear. And can that be okay too? Can we embrace all aspects of ourselves and all aspects of life?

This power of metta really lets us begin to do that. And in doing so, it absolutely transforms how we relate to ourselves and how we relate to life.

I want to end with a quotation from Dostoevsky. The language is a little different from ours, but I think he's basically talking about metta and embracing the whole show:

Have no fear of human sin. Love people even for their sin, for that love is the semblance of divine love and is the highest love on earth. Love all of God's creation, the whole and every grain of sand of it. Love every leaf, every ray of light, love the animals, love the plants, love everything. Because if you love everything, you will perceive the divine mystery in things. Once you perceive it, you will begin to comprehend it better every day. And you will come at last to love the whole world with an all-embracing love.

Or just an all-embracing acceptance.

CHAPTER 260

Balancing Aspects of Mettā

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this Vesak full moon talk, Carol Wilson reflects on her transformative experience at Bodh Gayā and draws profound connections between the chaos of ordinary life and the potential for awakening. She describes how the bustling, dusty pilgrimage site—with its beggars, tour buses, and ceremonies—became a powerful metaphor for practice: liberation doesn't require removal from life's difficulties but can emerge within them.

Wilson examines how mettā practice serves as a crucial counterbalance to vipassanā insight practice. While vipassanā opens us to the truth of dukkha (suffering), this opening can sometimes become overwhelming, leading to what she calls seeing through a "dukkha lens" where everything appears unsatisfactory. Drawing on Thich Nhat Hanh's teachings, she explains how loving-kindness naturally broadens our perception, allowing us to acknowledge suffering while remaining connected to beauty, joy, and interconnection.

The talk offers penetrating insight into how mettā illuminates the nature of attachment—the "near enemy" of true love. Wilson shares personal observations of how easily pure loving-kindness can shade into wanting something back, creating subtle conditions and needs. Through careful practice, we learn to distinguish between boundaryless, fearless mettā and the tunnel vision of attachment. This discernment reveals that genuine happiness is not dependent on external conditions but arises from touching our essential completeness and interconnection with all beings.

The full moon of May in the Theravada tradition of Buddhism, which is what we here at IMS practice in, marks the Vesak festival. The Theravada teaching of the elders represents the schools of Buddhism from Southeast Asia—Burma, Thailand, Sri Lanka, Cambodia, Laos. This is really the most significant day in the Theravada Buddhist calendar because it's said that the Buddha was born on the full moon of May, came to his full enlightenment on the full moon of May, and also died on the full moon of May in our tradition. In Thailand, for example, where I spent about a year, it's quite a big occasion for celebrating the Buddha and the teachings that have come down to us. So I wanted to mention it since it's the full moon of May now.

This also made me think of the last time I was in Bodh Gaya, the small village in India where the Buddha is said to have reached his awakening. At the end of his six years of ascetic practices and wanderings and very intense practice, it was under a Bodhi tree in what is now the little village of Bodh Gaya where he sat and had his full, complete opening experience into enlightenment, into freedom—which he then proceeded to spend the rest of his life sharing with us.

In 1989, I went back to Bodh Gaya with several dear friends. I had not been there for maybe eighteen or nineteen years. The first meditation retreat I ever did was in Bodh Gaya. But since at that time I knew nothing about meditation or Buddhism or anything else, I didn't really appreciate the spiritual and symbolic significance of that village or its meaning as a place to begin my acquaintance with Buddhism. When we went back in '89, it turned into quite a metaphor for me of our life and practice. It was really quite a powerful experience.

Bodh Gaya is a dusty little town in the state of Bihar, which is by far the poorest state in India, if you can imagine that. It's very dusty. The people are very poor. It's very dry. And Bodh Gaya is a little village in the middle of all that. When you go, there's of course a beautiful stupa next to a descendant of the original Bodhi tree that the Buddha is said to have sat under. The stupa is located in what's a very pleasant park—lots of green and trees and bushes. It's really a very lovely spot with a little pond and walls around it that are locked at night.

As you walk up to this sacred space, which is quite a pilgrimage spot for Buddhists from all over the world, there's just the village life of India. You have to walk past a whole line, a huge lineup of beggars. They just sit one after the other. And just before you get to them, there are a couple of little guys sitting selling coins that you can buy to give to the beggars. For a rupee, which is worth 100 paisa, you can buy nine 10-paisa pieces to give. So that guy makes ten paisa and each beggar you would give ten paisa, which is basically worthless—there's nothing you can really do with ten paisa.

There are people running up with little plastic bags filled with water and fish that they're trying to sell to you, because these fish are taken and liberated into the ponds inside the temple grounds by Tibetans, people who are really valuing life and setting a life free as a way of earning merit and good karma. Then different people, Hindus, will go and catch the fish and put them in little bags and come out and sell them to people. It's just this kind of atmosphere—all of life.

We went in, and sitting underneath the tree on the wall nearby, it was a very profound experience for me. Somehow it brought to me the sense of the humanness and the reality of the fact that this isn't just some mythological story. The Buddha was a real man, a human being. And that potential for liberation that we always say is possible for all of us—I got it. It really is possible for all of us, and this is accessible here and now.

We were sitting quietly trying to meditate on a small wall near the tree. And again, it turned into a metaphor for the whole mandala of our human existence. Being inside the temple ground and near the sense of reality of it, it's also not particularly removed and peaceful. Tour buses come up constantly bringing big tour groups of Thai people, Japanese people, Indian people, Westerners coming through talking in megaphones, talking really loud, staring at us sitting there trying to meditate. There was a woman who roamed around screaming the whole time. There was a group of Tibetan monks sitting on the side for three days doing a ceremony, which was quite lovely, but with loud chanting and blowing of horns and banging of cymbals. Dogs running around. It's wild.

And still, within this whole show of humanity, it's as if it's not in spite of that—it was because of it somehow. Seeing that this potential for awakening doesn't have to be so removed. That it can happen in the midst of the whole show. That became the metaphor for me.

And that we don't have to be some kind of incredibly special, unique being—that awakening is possible and accessible for all of us if we really open to that, if we can really commit our hearts to it.

So just as there are so many ways to manifest in the world, there are also so many ways to manifest in the mandala of our practice. Sometimes our practice will be being in the world, being in the chai shop, having a tea. Sometimes we're the people on the tour bus, kind of going through, checking it out, but not quite getting involved yet. And sometimes we're taking time to do really serious, intense practice in a more removed way. All of it is part of our life and part of our growth. There's not one way that's better than another—it all comes together in a circle.

I've come to think of the way we cultivate and develop in love and understanding in the same manner. The Buddha taught vipassana, the insight practice, very much as coming to liberating understanding, coming to the end of suffering and confusion, the sure heart's release, the happiness of peace, by seeing deeply into the nature of suffering and the cause of suffering—his first two Noble Truths, the nature of suffering and the cause being attachment. In vipassana we tend to inquire along that mode.

What I'd like to talk about tonight is the ways that metta has really expanded and broadened both my understanding of the nature of suffering and also of the nature of attachment. It is another piece of the mandala of practice. I've found that intensive loving-kindness practice and its after-effects in my life and understanding provide a very important balancing effect to the understanding that comes about from vipassana.

Let me speak about what I've learned about working with aversion and noticing attachment from the view of metta practice.

Aversion first. As Michelle was talking about last night, two of the five hindrances she spoke of were aversion—anger, fear—and the other being attachment, desire, grasping. She mentioned that these two have very deep roots in our mind, much deeper than, say, sloth and torpor or restlessness.

Aversion, fear, anger, hatred—all are reactions to the difficulty or pain or suffering that we experience or perceive, or do our best not to experience or perceive, in the course of our life, in the course of a day, in the course of a sitting. When difficulty arises, we respond with aversion, fear, or else overwhelm or denial.

Very briefly, metta offers us as a balance to this the potential not to shut off to the suffering, but to be able to expand and broaden our experience so that we're not blind to the suffering, while also opening to the potential for happiness, for joy, and for love. I have found that metta lends a real breadth, a real inclusive aspect of experience, and a real strength to be with the difficulty without drowning in it.

On the other side, with attachment: as we've said several times, affection or love with attachment in it is the near enemy of metta because it's so close we can confuse it. Yet at the same time, I've found that by cultivating and becoming deeply familiar with the actual experience of the state of pure loving-kindness—and all the times that I get lost in attachment—it has very much deepened my understanding of and recognition of attachment, the nature of the suffering that attachment can bring when not recognized. Through seeing and feeling more and more deeply what the nature of true love that doesn't want something back is, it really highlights the suffering aspect of attachment.

To begin first with speaking about aversion, fear, difficulty: whenever in sitting and walking, in our daily life, aversion or fear arises, it's in response to a difficult or painful physical, emotional, or mental experience that's actually happening here and now in this moment.

Physical, that's obvious—you can tell. If you hurt, there's a response of fear or aversion to it. That's clear, it's here and now. But even mentally, we might be thinking about something that happened in the past, fearing that it will repeat itself in the future. So that actual thing isn't happening, but the thought about it is happening in this moment.

The freedom, the sure heart's release that our practice hopefully guides us to, that it points to moment by moment, comes from truly knowing things as they are without a lot of interpretation, without getting carried away into stories. And freedom comes from being able to meet directly with openness whatever is happening here and now in this moment. That allows us to see it clearly.

This obviously makes it necessary to be able to meet fully, to open in a balanced way to the painful aspects of life. Because quite a bit of our moment-to-moment experience is not going to be pleasant—that's just the way it is. And if we cannot open to the difficult when it arises, if we need to deny it, if we need to always move away, or if we get really lost in the fear and the aversion, then rather than being able to open to truth, we end up spending our time lost in struggle, trying to control, to manipulate, to change.

Yet—and this is something that can often happen in our practice—as we do begin to truly open to the pain of the world, to the pain of our own experience, to injustice, the opening can sometimes seem so vast, and the confusion and the pain can seem so overwhelming, that we can just feel like we're drowning in it. The sense of seeing things as they are can really start to be unbalanced. We start to see and experience things through what I call a dukkha lens. Dukkha is a word for unsatisfactoriness or suffering. And there are times in life and practice, as we begin to really acknowledge the suffering in ourselves and in the world, when all one notices is the unsatisfactory or suffering aspect.

I remember one time I was on a long retreat, and I was really opening to this. I would walk in the room I was in—which was a very nice room, sunny, with a little plant in the window that made it very pleasant—and I would see the plant and think, "It's just going to die." Anything that would come into my experience I'd see through this lens of the potential of change. Two friends who had just gotten into a relationship would be walking down the driveway, and I'd think, "In two months they're going to be suffering."

Anything that came into my experience would be seen through this lens of change and inevitable loss. Yes, that plant will die. But also in the meantime, it can be very beautiful, it can bring a lot of joy, and it might be ten years from now, and death is also just a natural part of things. The view was unbalanced.

Thich Nhat Hanh, who talks a lot about working with this balance, says that it's very important for us to stay in touch with the suffering of the world in order to keep compassion alive in us, in order to keep the connection with the world alive. But getting in touch with suffering is not enough.

It can get really unbalanced. It's not the whole picture. We can start to drown. And instead of staying in touch through the suffering, instead of staying in touch with compassion, our response can easily turn to that kind of negativity I was describing, or anger, or frustration.

This is where I found the broadening and strengthening aspect of loving-kindness to be so helpful. It helps me to hold the whole range of life without having to focus on just one way or the other.

It seems like a real paradox to me that in opening to what is true and opening to beauty, to love, to interconnection, we also open to great depths of sadness and suffering—and vice versa. For all of us, this mystery can be quite hard to hold. It seems our minds have a tendency to want things either one way or the other. If there's suffering, something difficult going on in the world, then we don't know how to notice what's beautiful, what's wonderful, what's connected. If we're feeling filled with love and happiness, we kind of don't want to hear anything about war and difficulty, because it might bring us down.

Opening to the whole show is something I have found metta to be extremely helpful with.

During the Gulf War, when it first started, I was in India. Somehow it felt much closer to what was going on, and you also got a whole different perspective on how the world felt about the war than you got from the newspapers and media here. In the middle of it, I came back to the States. It was actually quite interesting to see. In India, people basically hated the Americans and hated the war. I came back here and it was so rah-rah. It was really interesting compared to the attitude during the Vietnam War.

I was walking near my cottage down the road during the war, just feeling the pain of it and the sense of helplessness—all that goes on when we're really feeling the suffering and feeling there's not much we can do about it, but still feeling responsible in some way, part of it. It's a very lovely driveway, and as I was walking, I suddenly noticed, wow, this is so beautiful here. I had a moment of deep appreciation of what a beautiful place I live, how peaceful and silent it was. This was followed immediately by a wave of guilt and self-hatred: Who are you to think that you have the right to enjoy such a beautiful, peaceful experience when people are fighting and dying? Somehow it wasn't okay to let in both perceptions.

Talking to people here in the course of our small group meetings, this has come up quite a few times in different ways—either a feeling of guilt at taking the time to send loving-kindness to oneself, a feeling that this must be selfish to just sit here and cultivate loving-kindness when there's so much suffering and grief in the world, or even a sense of mistrust, of not being able to trust that this is true happiness. A sense that somehow we're deluding ourselves, that there's got to be some kind of catch, and when we really see the whole picture, this is all going to evaporate because it can't be true.

It's very sad to me in many ways to see how hard it is for us to be able or willing or to trust that there can be happiness and love while also acknowledging quite deeply our connectedness with all beings who might be suffering, who might be confused. We try to separate the two, when actually opening to the metta, allowing the sense of really pure love for ourselves and for other beings to be nurtured, to flower, to really grow to a depth—this actually brings us much more vividly, much more viscerally, into a real living experience of knowing our connection with all beings. But it's so hard for us to trust it.

You might not feel this profoundly on retreat, but I've noticed very much in my life outside the intensity of retreat that in subtle ways, that's where the loving-kindness begins to bear fruit—where you might find it beginning to flower, to broaden and balance our experience.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh: "If we see deeply into the nature of interbeing, that all things inter-are, we will stop blaming, arguing, and killing. To practice nonviolence, we must first of all learn ways to deal peacefully with ourselves. If we can create true harmony within ourselves, we will know how to deal with family, friends, and associates. Most important is to become nonviolence, so that when a situation presents itself, we will not create more suffering. To practice nonviolence, we need gentleness, loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity directed to our bodies, to our feelings, and then to other people. With mindfulness, the practice of peace, we can begin by working to transform the wars in ourselves."

I think this is very profound. It's not just nice words. By directing gentleness, loving-kindness to our bodies, to our feelings, and to other beings, we are transforming the wars in ourselves. This is the most vital place where we can then begin to open to the wars in the world and do whatever little we can to transform them. We can't separate them.

Thich Nhat Hanh offers some conscious techniques, one that's a little different from metta, for working with balancing our perception—for working with the times when we're really drowning in the suffering, drowning in the pain. What I found interesting is that through the practice of metta, the technique he offers is what naturally happens in my day-to-day life as a result of cultivating the intention of metta.

What he suggests is this: most of us ask what is wrong. We forget to ask what is right. He describes working during the war in Vietnam with the young people and students who made up what was called the School for Social Work, who worked in villages trying to ease the life of people and trying to bring reconciliation between the two sides in the war—which means that everybody hates you and nobody trusts you because you're not taking sides.

And a lot of their friends and workers were killed.

He says, "During the war, we were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country, but we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage." He would mention these herbs to the social workers and peace workers so they would stay in touch with them.

It might sound like a small thing, but the idea behind it is that in times of difficulty, we can consciously expand our field of awareness and notice that even in the most difficult situation there can be seeds of happiness, seeds of joy—or just noticing the mint, noticing the beauty of the countryside, even when your heart feels weighed down.

What happens with loving-kindness is that this begins to happen naturally, without consciously thinking of it. And I know this is not only my experience, because quite a few people have commented to me that in small ways, when they left a metta retreat, in much more subtle ways than they expected, they found the metta would arise to counterbalance what could have been an overwhelmingly difficult experience.

You might have come in thinking that when you leave, you're going to be brimming with love for yourself and all beings and spend your life floating on a cloud of happiness and love. You might have some times like that, and that's nice. But what I've found is that in a much quieter way, I'll notice some difficulty. In fact, the metta seems to highlight states of aversion, states of fear—but it also allows them without struggle, and immediately there's a counterbalancing response.

For example, I noticed at one period when I was doing intensive metta that I began to see just how much fear was underlying my response of aversion. When I first noticed this, it was one of those little things on retreat that shouldn't be eliciting the response it was, which makes you really ask, "What's going on here?" It was during a time when there were two lunches, one at twelve and one at twelve-thirty, and halfway through the course they changed the times.

So what? My mind went into this state of total aversion. What was interesting was that I wasn't really into food. I wasn't particularly hungry. It wasn't like I didn't want to wait the extra half hour—I really didn't care. Yet I could see my mind going into this state of aversion. As I continued doing metta, it just allowed the aversion: "Oh, that's okay, aversion. May you be happy, Carol."

And underneath began to surface a sense of fear that turned into panic. I was just sitting there thinking, "What is going on? What is this panic about?" I was tuning into the panic, this little blip of fear that arises in the conditioning of my mind whenever anything new comes into the range of experience. It was really quite fascinating.

As I kept watching the thoughts, there was panic. "Oh, I have this little table I always sit at, and the same people sit there, and now different people will be sitting. Or I might not even get to sit at that table." And then, "Who cares? I don't even care if I eat lunch." And then it would start up again: "Oh no, what if, what if?" It was just the fear of any change, of anything new.

Without the metta, I usually wouldn't see that fear. It would just move right into aversion and stay there until something major came to blast it out. With the metta, it let me see it—it highlighted the fear much more than it normally would have.

And of course, as soon as I sat down at the lunch table, because the metta was there, there was a sense of "Oh, this is really nice. These people are quite lovely. This is actually even more pleasant than it was before." And the difficulty was gone.

What I've noticed is that this same quality—highlighting the fear and the aversion, with an almost immediate counterbalancing of seeing something really lovely or appreciating something else about the situation—has come up more and more in my daily life. And it's not conscious. It's not like I say, "Oh, I should find something to balance the fear." But the cultivation over time of the intention of loving-kindness to oneself and to other beings has the effect of really broadening experience and lending a balance to the fear, to the aversion. Not blinding us to it. Not pretending that the difficulty isn't there. But simply seeing, "Oh, there's this fear—and there are also some really nice aspects to this situation."

So I'll see it now if I'm in the middle of something and the phone rings. There's this little quick fear, and then aversion: "I don't want to talk on the phone."

And then I pick up the phone and hear someone's voice and feel this surge of loving-kindness. How nice to talk to this person. So the fear and the aversion don't catch hold. And my experience of life is so much broader and not unbalanced—not unbalanced in a "let's pretend everything's wonderful" kind of way.

I also see quite clearly that this sense of aversion to difficulty, or fear, comes so much from a sense of separation, a sense of limitation. There's a fear that I need or want certain things to make myself complete, to make life pleasant. A fear that those things might get taken away. A fear that somebody else might have more, and then the mind starts comparing and begins to suffer a sense of emptiness and neediness that it didn't even have before it saw that somebody else had more.

All this is coming from not understanding things as they are. The whole sense of seeing ourselves as a separate, limited being needing something—anything—from outside to be fulfilled is the core delusion of our existence.

And how mettā is so powerful is that without our even having to have any intellectual understanding of it, as we continue to cultivate the loving-kindness just to ourselves, it begins to spread to other beings. True mettā does not discriminate. When you're experiencing a moment of mettā, there is not with it that sense of, "Well, only me but not somebody else." In fact, in that moment you're not really making any discriminations at all.

Mettā is fearless. In fact, the Buddha taught it as the antidote to fear. It's boundaryless, and at its most pure and powerful moments it's also centerless. The experience of mettā is not referring back to me having this experience, this feeling, and sending it to you. I mean, that's the way we have to think about it when we begin practicing, of course. But the actual power of it is that it leads us into a real visceral experiencing of the boundaryless interconnection of all of us, of the sense of no separation.

And from that space, from that knowing of non-separation, there is no fear. There is no neediness. There is no need for something outside to fill us up, because we're touching the essential purity and completeness of who we are. And mettā is an avenue into this understanding. It's really quite wonderful.

And so again, that leads me into talking about the way that working and practicing loving-kindness can highlight or deepen our understanding of attachment—and the ultimate suffering and confusion that comes about from attachment.

Attachment is that sense of wanting or needing something outside of us. Whether it's a sense experience, another person, a particular experience in life, another job, a particular emotion, whatever. Needing or wanting some particular passing experience to fill us up, to make us happy. And as we've just seen, that isn't true happiness. But it's so hard for us to trust that. We're so used to looking outside, and the idea that we are somehow intrinsically incomplete, intrinsically lacking—this tendency to keep looking somewhere else for the answer—this is the deep suffering that comes from attachment.

And it's so strong in our culture. I read in the newspaper, it must have been a few months ago, about an Oprah Winfrey show. She had done a show based on the movie Sleepless in Seattle, I guess, which was about a couple on opposite coasts who met through hearing about a lonely widower on a radio talk show. Anyway, the newspaper said Oprah Winfrey had done what she called a "Sleepless in Seattle show." She had, I think it was five, relatively young middle-aged widowers—men who had children, whose wives had died, and who were clearly good relationship material. That's how it was set up. What can you say?

So I didn't see the show, but I guess she interviewed them all and really tried to put them in a good light. And then she said, I guess kind of casually, "Well, if any of you out there are interested, send in letters." Two weeks later—this is what the article said—she came on the show with, like, a bulldozer. She had gotten sixty thousand letters from people who wanted to meet these guys. One guy alone, I don't know what made him so special, got forty thousand.

And you know, it's funny, but it's really not. Because I just felt like, oh, it's so sad in a way. I mean, maybe somebody will meet someone. I don't know how he picked who to go out with out of forty thousand people. But how much we're really yearning—for sure, for intimacy and companionship and a relationship in life, and that's all very positive. I'm not saying that's not. But somehow the depth of the inner yearning for real love, for a sense of our completeness, for real happiness in life, and how deep the sense is that we need it from somebody else—or from something else, but really from somebody else—is much more powerful and more subtle than we realize.

And it's hard to trust when we begin to be able to connect with and actually cultivate and experience deeply a love, a pure love, that is not dependent on anybody or anything else. It doesn't fit what we've unconsciously, perhaps, grown up believing.

In practicing with mettā, getting more and more deeply familiar with that experience of pure love that has no conditions on it, that wants nothing back, and experiencing how happy, how freeing that quality of love is—it began for me to highlight more and more the difference between that love and the nature of attachment, and the kind of happiness that I thought was coming from attachment.

If you think of attachment in the really gross sense first, without moving to the near enemy where attachment and love are sort of mingled and it's more confusing—if you just tune into what attachment is, what desire or craving is in a gross way—it's easier to see its ultimately unsatisfying nature. We can see it in a moment and then forget it the next moment, but attachment or desire, being this wanting of something that grows so strong we get really holding onto it, grasping, gives us a kind of tunnel vision.

To make a very simplistic example: you're sitting, you're walking, it's very peaceful, you're very present, there's a sense of happiness or love or simply peace, and suddenly the thought of pizza comes up. Or potato chips. Or chocolate cake. Or jelly beans. Whatever it is for you. And it comes up and there's some desire. That would be really nice. I wonder if there's pizza for lunch. And it gets stronger. I really want pizza for lunch. What happened in that moment to the sense of peace, to the sense of appreciation for the environment, for your state? It's sort of like Michelle said yesterday—the happiest moment in her life and the thought comes up, What's for tea? And that happy moment's gone.

But we tend not to recognize this and continue to focus on the object, the thing we're wanting. And if pizza isn't for lunch, do we appreciate what is for lunch? Not so well. Everything pales in comparison. And depending on how strong the attachment grows, you might find yourself on a pizza mission into town. It happens. I've on many occasions met yogis in the supermarket. I don't suggest it.

Attachment gives a real kind of tunnel vision. All we see or look for is what we want. Other things we're not able to appreciate. There's a saying that when a pickpocket meets a saint, he only sees the saint's pockets. We focus on what we want. And we're not happy because the wanting is suffering. It's uncomfortable until we get what we're after.

So say we get pizza for lunch and—ah—peace. Again, we tend not to recognize that the peace isn't the pizza. The peace is the absence of that craving, of that attachment. It's gone. It's like, ah. And if you just watched it—wanting, wanting, wanting—and at some point it faded away, that same peace would be here. But instead we think, Oh, if one piece of pizza made me this happy, two pieces would make me even more happy, and we'll have three or four. And then somehow it didn't work. Somehow we feel worse. But we still don't get it, and instead we say, Well, okay, maybe something else. And we keep focusing on the thing that we want and not noticing that it's the process of looking to something outside of ourselves for happiness—something that's always changing—it's that process that's bringing the suffering.

And on a slightly more subtle level, sometimes we can even confuse the process of the longing itself. You can find that kind of pleasurable. It's a little strange, but I was watching the movie Shadowlands, and there was one point where the character playing C.S. Lewis was teaching literature to his class. I just remember one section where he was talking about the code of chivalric love during the Middle Ages. He said something to the effect that the ideal of this chivalric love is that the knight would love a woman who could never be obtainable, someone he could never have a relationship with, because that longing that could never be satisfied was the most exquisite happiness. I was just cringing.

I thought, a life of misery, and they think it's the most exquisite happiness. It's so interesting. Somewhere in there, some of that conditioning—I can see it still in myself, somehow confusing the experience. When you're falling in love with somebody but you don't really know if it's going to happen or not, if you really look, I experience that as torture. But somehow the mind puts it into, "Wow, love! It's so wonderful." You're mooning around, you can't eat, you're miserable, you want the phone to ring—oh, isn't it wonderful, love! It's very strange. We're so inculcated not to quite see what's going on, even in something as gross and simple as attachment to pizza or a new car. Then moving into how confused the messages become when we start to think of romantic love.

When we begin to work with metta, or when it becomes concerned with someone we do truly love—whether someone we're romantically involved with or a very dear friend—you can see, if you haven't already begun to explore this, how easily, without real attention, without real grounding in metta, we can get confused. We think what we're calling real love actually is real love, without looking and seeing that it can so easily slide into a subtle mode of longing or attachment or need.

At the same time, I've found that because the two—metta and real caring for someone with certain conditions attached—can so easily move back and forth, I could learn a tremendous amount about the quality of pure love with someone I'm in relationship with, and about the nature of attachment. But I do want to say: it takes first getting really grounded in recognizing and trusting, in knowing the feel of pure metta.

That's the reason why, in giving the instructions and going through the categories of people, as Michelle was saying this morning, it's traditionally taught that for quite some time you don't use someone of a sex to which you would be attracted, or someone you're romantically close to, because the two are so easily confused. We're not really so clear about what pure, true love is. But as we spend time getting more and more grounded in recognizing the qualities of metta—the whole range from very subtle to really strong—we begin to tell the difference.

I found it fascinating, first with not a partner but just a dear friend, to see how easily and subtly what was really pure metta would begin to shade into affection with attachment. I'd be sending metta to the friend, just feeling happiness and closeness, wishing well for them, wishing well. And then: wouldn't it be nice to see each other more? Pretty soon there was this slight change of wanting something back. At first I wouldn't notice the moment of change, but suddenly I'd realize that the feeling was not this outflowing, happy, spacious movement of energy from the heart, but a little grabbing—like from a lower chakra—just a little wanting of something. A little bit of condition, a little bit of fear, a little bit of need.

Then I began to notice that as soon as that happened—and it was still quite subtle, you wouldn't call it suffering by any means, it was still masquerading as metta—the little discursive thoughts that arose, which didn't seem to have anything to do with my dear friend or myself, suddenly had a lot to do with attachment to this or that. I'd think of my house, and wouldn't it be nice to get this, and I wonder if that's happening, and what's happening with my family, and what's for lunch. Just that attachment had begun to come up in the experience, almost as if, as the metta shaded into attachment, it lifted attachment generally, making it more easy to come into my experience.

Once I noticed that, it became really fascinating to explore—not to be afraid of attachment, but to have clarity and willingness to recognize both attachment and metta, to explore the difference. I learned a great deal about it. Toward the end of a long period, very lightly and easily, I would from time to time begin to include my partner as one of the categories, just to see what would happen. As you know, when you're sending to a person you know, you get a sense of that person and send metta. Different situations I'd been in with the person would come up—a certain conversation we'd had, a certain image, a certain situation.

I really began to see how different it could be if my speech and actions came from loving-kindness, versus that subtle shading again into thinking I was wishing well, thinking I was really wanting the best for the person, but with this little shading of attachment: "But you should act in a certain way. I want the best for you, and that means you will then do X, Y, and Z for me." Or even more subtle than that.

Coming out of retreat, I really noticed that actions and speech that on the surface might seem very loving, very caring for the person—when they came from seeming caring but with the little unspoken condition of "But what about me?" somewhere in there—the response would be one of resistance or some kind of resentment. Before really tuning into metta, my reaction would have been puzzlement, because I thought I was just acting out of love. But it feels different. And then the same speech or action coming from true metta—this unbounded moving outward of energy, truly wishing that person well, even if it means you never see them again, wanting them to do whatever they need to be happy with absolutely no conditions attached—it's so different. And the response that comes back is so different. It's amazing.

All of this might be going on at a quite subconscious level. The other person might not even consciously realize what's happening. But it's been very powerful to explore the difference. As we get more grounded in the real, open-hearted, completely unselfish quality of metta—

Even when you're sending it to yourself, the quality of metta is unselfish, unself-centered. As we get grounded in that, it becomes easier to notice when we're sliding into attachment. And we really can see that the joy, the happiness, the love that arises with the practice of metta is so much more profound, so much richer than what we call love that's mixed with attachment. It's like two different worlds.

As Thich Nhat Hanh likes to say, practicing Buddhism is a clever way to enjoy life. He says, "Happiness is available—please help yourself." That's really what we're trying to cultivate here with loving-kindness: a way where happiness and peace are always available, no matter what the external or internal conditions. It's not dependent on needing anything to fill us up.

We can be—we are—happiness and peace itself, if we will only trust that enough and commit ourselves to cultivating it, allowing it to flourish whenever it might happen to arise by itself.

So could we sit for a moment?

CHAPTER 261

Mettā With Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential relationship between wisdom and compassion as the two wings necessary for liberation. Drawing from Śāntideva's inspiring verses on the awakening mind, she explores how the cool, spacious quality of emptiness (suññatā) must be balanced with the warmth and connectedness of compassion (karuṇā) for genuine spiritual development.
>
> Wilson focuses extensively on the crucial role of intention (cetanā) as the bridge between understanding and action. She explains how the Buddha placed wise intention (sammā saṅkappa) between wise understanding and wise speech in the Noble Eightfold Path, emphasizing that the skillfulness of our actions is determined not by results but by the quality of intention that gives rise to them. Through the practice of the brahmavihārās—mettā, karuṇā, muditā, and upekkhā—we engage in a conscious purification of intention, reconditioning the mind away from habitual patterns of greed, hatred, and fear.
> Drawing on powerful examples from Sister Chân Không's work during the Vietnam War and her own experiences in a self-defense course, Wilson challenges the assumption that anger and fear are the strongest motivations for effective action. She demonstrates how compassion, balanced with equanimity, provides sustainable energy for engagement with the world's suffering. The talk offers practical guidance for bringing this purification of intention into daily life, from supermarket lines to airplane seats, and introduces the aspiration of bodhicitta as a way to expand our practice beyond self-concern into the boundless intention to help all beings awaken.

I want to start tonight by sharing a short expression of what might be called joy in the practice or the Dharma from Shantideva, who was a Buddhist teacher at Nalanda University in India in the 8th century. This isn't actually so connected to my talk, but since we've been playing with joy today, and this really makes me happy—hopefully it will you also:

As a blind man feels when he finds a pearl in a dust bin, so am I amazed by the miracle of awakening rising in my consciousness. It's the nectar of immortality that delivers us from death. The treasure that lifts us above poverty into the wealth of giving to life. It's the tree that gives shade to us when we roam about scorched by life. The bridge that takes us across the stormy river of disturbing emotions. The cool moon of compassion that calms our mind when it is agitated, the sun that dispels darkness, the butter from the milk of kindness made by churning it with the Dharma. This awakening mind is a feast of joy to which all are invited.

So if you can't think of any other reason for mudita toward yourself, even one moment of the awakening mind arising in our consciousness is all of that. It's really quite wonderful.

Buddhism as a practice, as a path, is often described as having two wings. In the way that a bird needs two wings to fly, so our opening into liberation has to include both of these aspects: great wisdom and great compassion. As we've hopefully been exploring over the weeks, they're not really very separate, and just as it's natural for both wings to balance each other, so also is the case with great wisdom and great compassion.

Once I was at a talk by Robert Thurman, the Buddhist Tibetan scholar who works in New York. He said something that really struck me, and I've noticed it in my own experience. He was talking about how the wisdom of emptiness, that understanding of anatta —the emptiness of no inherent separate self-existence—can seem, just on its own, kind of cool, kind of removed. We tend to touch it in silence, in samadhi. We come to silent retreats. And while it's quite liberating, when not balanced by compassion, it can seem to be quite freeing, but it lacks a certain sense of depth or connection.

Compassion is a movement of the heart that arises through contact with the world, with ourselves, with other beings, contact with suffering. But again, compassion can get quite unbalanced if it's not balanced with the wisdom of emptiness, with the wisdom of equanimity. And so the two wings really support each other.

What I want to talk about tonight is one way in which we can begin to discover and explore how compassion, metta, all the Brahmaviharas form the link between our understanding and our actions and speech in the world. It's been said that compassion is the link between Buddhas and beings. The Buddha didn't just spend the last forty-five years of his life sitting in the bliss of emptiness in a cave. He could have. But he spent it tirelessly meeting with people, trying to share, trying to awaken people to the joy of the freedom that he discovered. This is the action of compassion, the tireless energy of compassion that can't be discouraged by our perhaps feeble responses to such wisdom.

This compassion as the link between Buddhas and beings, as the link between our own understanding and wisdom and how we act in the world—it expresses or manifests in the function of intention. That's what I want to speak about tonight, this quality of our experience that we call intention.

In the way that the Buddha describes our action in the world, a key element in action, in coming to understand what is skillful and what is unskillful in the way that we speak or act or even think—whereas our tendency is to look for the results. And that's something that we've run up against as a hurdle in a lot of the questions, or in speaking with people in interviews, in cultivating this practice of loving kindness, compassion, and mudita: our tendency to look for the results or to focus on the results or to get confused because we can't see the results. In fact, the whole crux, the whole nub of speech and action, of what determines whether it's skillful or not, is in this quality of intention.

In a Vipassana retreat we pay some attention to intention. It can be seen before any action. It's easier to see before a large action. It's the sense of the impulse, the impetus that gives rise to the action—just a little "about to" feeling before the action. It's the impetus that gives rise to speech. And there is even intention before thought, although often intention is unconscious and we don't recognize it.

Working with noticing and paying attention to this quality of intention is, I think, key when we begin to wonder: How does this practice that I'm doing move from the pillow into the world? And what good is it if I sit here and think loving thoughts and then just continue to sit here? How does it translate? The place that our understanding moves from the cool remove of emptiness into the connectedness of action and compassion is via this area of intention.

An intention to move, an intention to get up and leave the hall, an intention to eat—the impulse will arise to do it, and arising with it is any of our whole vast array of mental states, mental and emotional experiences. This is where it's really interesting, because whereas we tend to judge by results, you can't actually tell by the result or the action. You can't necessarily tell from outside what was the intention that informed that action.

And that's really where the heart of skillfulness or unskillfulness lies.

An intention could be accompanied by greed or fear or hatred or boredom, compassion, loving-kindness, sympathetic joy, equanimity—the whole show. For example, someone in the hall starts to have a coughing fit and leaves, which happens all the time. We sitting here can't tell which of a variety of intentions gave rise to their leaving. It could be true compassion, not wanting to disturb other people. It could be a sense of self-centered embarrassment—what do people think of me? It could be a sense of total relief and desire: finally, I have a reason I can get up and leave this sitting. We can't tell from outside.

In the same way, something that came up in the question periods the other day is that the same intention of compassion could manifest in vastly different actions, because it will be filtered through the particular understanding a person has, their particular view of the world, or their idea of what compassionate action is. You may remember the question about an inchworm on someone's hand. For her, the sense of compassion moved the intention to act, to get up and leave. That is compassion forming as an intention that leads to action. The intention that gives rise to thought is actually not as strong as the intention that gives rise to speech, and stronger still is the intention that gives rise to action. Someone else said that with that same intention of compassion, his response would have been to do something different. So again, by the outer action, we looking in from the outside cannot assess what that person's intention is.

You see how subtle this can be, and how our tendency to leap over intention and focus on results can get us into all kinds of confusion, leaving us out of touch with where the real heart of the matter is.

The Buddha, to me, really pointed to the powerful and important linking nature of intention when he laid out his Eightfold Path. I'm not going to go into the whole Eightfold Path, but it's his main outline of the qualities we cultivate and develop throughout our life to continue in our practice of awakening. The first stage of this path is wise understanding—seeing things as they are. Since it's the beginning, it doesn't mean we start from perfect wise understanding, but at least there's some little glimmer somewhere that things are not as they superficially seem, or we wouldn't begin practice or a whole life of inquiry or spiritual development anyway.

The second step is translated in various ways, but one of them is wise intention. Understanding gives rise to intention; how we understand the world informs our intentions, which then lead to speech and action. The third, fourth, and fifth steps deal with wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood. To me—and this is just the way I look at it—by putting wise intention between understanding and action, the Buddha is making it really obvious how important this particular aspect of our experience is.

He says in one part of the Dhammapada that how we understand the world colors how we act. Someone who is a psychopath, completely self-centered with no sense of connection or cause and effect, will just do whatever they want with no sense of remorse or understanding of the pain they are inflicting on others. This is in the opening of the Dhammapada, one of the books of sayings of the Buddha: "We are what we think. All that we are arises with our thoughts. With our thoughts we make the world. Speak or act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you as your shadow, unshakable." And he gives a similar refrain saying that if you speak or act with an impure mind, trouble will follow you as the wheel follows the ox that draws the cart. "How can a troubled mind understand the way? Your worst enemy cannot harm you as much as your own unguarded thoughts. But once mastered, no one can help you as much—not even your father or your mother."

Intention often manifests in our experience as thought. The practices of the brahmavihāras—one way you can look at them is that what we're doing is a very conscious purification of thought, a purification of intention. Each time we sit with "May you be free from suffering," or affirm "I care about you, I care about your suffering," that is a conscious reconditioning of intention. We can't control the effects, as we know, but we're working on this much more subtle level.

In a moment when there actually is that intention—"May you be free from danger"—just that there's that intention in the mind, in that one moment, is quite a deep purification. Because in that moment, we're not strengthening the habit of greed or hatred or delusion. In that one moment, there's the purity of the intention of loving-kindness or of compassion. You might not really notice so much about that at the time, again because we're so keyed to results. But each moment of that purity of intention, of that willingness, that commitment to again come back and condition that pure intention—it has an overall powerful purifying effect on our own being and our experience.

Just as the wisdom of emptiness—that there is no separate self, no lasting substance I can call "me"—just as that understanding, whether we touch it in a meditation retreat or in our life, gives rise to its natural expression of compassion and love, the brahmavihāras are all of them a natural expression of emptiness. And so the other way around, through the deliberate cultivation of loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity, we might begin to find that the reverse is also true.

Through the cultivation of these pure intentions, we move again into the same truth of emptiness, only on its flipped side of interconnectedness. In touching these boundless, limitless states, we see that there is no way—in that moment of metta or karuna—to say this is separate, I am separate from you, your pain does not affect me, my pain does not affect you. There is no way in the moment of compassion to think that the pain of any one being is somehow isolated, that we are somehow separated from it. And in that boundless, limitless aspect of the Brahmaviharas, we again have a doorway into the liberating understanding of no separate self, of total interconnectedness.

Whichever doorway we want to take—emptiness or love and compassion—we end up at the same home, the same potential for liberation. In a moment when we're touching that boundless connectedness or that boundless emptiness, whichever way your mind later wants to conceive of it, in that moment the caring, the love is just natural. When we're seeing that there is no separation, the sense of inner completeness is total. In that moment, greed, aversion, hatred, clinging makes absolutely no sense.

It's not that we have to somehow hate ourselves or get rid of clinging or give up everything we've ever wanted in order to touch completion. In that moment of completion, there's absolutely nothing to want, and there's no need to push anything away. The natural outcome, the natural intention giving rise to speech and action from that understanding is going to be connectedness. It can manifest as metta, love. It can manifest as compassion, when faced with suffering. It can manifest as mudita, when faced with joy. It can manifest as equanimity when faced with any of it.

Through the depths of our practice, whether it's Vipassana or Brahmaviharas, our intentions are going to be purifying spontaneously. This purification is happening even in those moments where you think not much is going on.

But also, at least for myself, there are many, many moments where this particular purity of intention is not manifesting quite so obviously, shall we say. We've talked before about the deeply conditioned and ingrained habits of our mind—confusion, aversion, greed, longing, fear. When we're not paying attention, or when we're not cultivating love and compassion or wisdom, what so often arises and forms the intentions from which we act are these habits of mind, especially greed and hatred and anger and fear.

What I find—and I've been really exploring this in my practice the last few years—is that it's kind of scary to me, and also very sad, that unexamined, it's almost as if we accept the validity of anger, of fear, of greed as motivation for action. They certainly can be incredibly strong motivations, and a lot gets done out of the intention of greed, of wanting things, or of fear, or of anger. How much of our economic progress and all the comforts that we enjoy in this country comes from these motivations? Some of it might be done out of compassion, out of caring. But a lot of it, I would venture to say, comes out of greed.

It's almost as if we accept that these are the strongest motivations for action, and we get confused—as people often do—at the idea of giving up desire. "Well, if I give up desire, what am I going to do? Just sit in my room?" People have asked me that very seriously. "Without anger, how can I protect myself?" That's a more complicated question, because at first we might need anger as a protection. I'll speak about that in a minute.

But it's this sense of looking at the results. So many peace demonstrations over the years seem to have good intention, but actually the momentary intention is one of anger or rage or even self-righteousness, which has a tinge of anger. If you want to just look pragmatically at what doesn't work about these, even if we're only looking at results and not tuning into intention, it's that if the intention is unskillful, at some point that begins to taint the action and the results. It's as if anger kind of eats itself up—it eats up the ground that it feeds on.

There's a passage from Thomas Merton: "The rush and pressure of modern life are perhaps the most common form of its innate violence. To allow oneself to be carried away by a multitude of conflicting concerns, to surrender to too many demands, to commit oneself to too many projects, to want to help everyone in everything, is to succumb to violence. The frenzy of the activist neutralizes their work for peace. It destroys the fruitfulness of their own work because it kills the root of inner wisdom which makes the work fruitful."

It might seem more difficult or hard to trust that as our intentions purify, we can be just as effective—even more effective. But I deeply believe it's true. Last year, Joseph and I were teaching a retreat billed for burned-out environmentalists. There were some who had practiced a lot and some who had never really done any kind of meditation practice—a whole range. In talking to some of the friends there who had done a lot of practice, they could articulate for themselves that the burnout, the stress, the problem came from two things: how hard they were working, and that so much of their energy was fueled by anger and rage. Anger cannot sustain itself as an intention or motivation for fruitful action—hence burnout, and somehow needing to find another inner source, another inner wellspring of energy from which to act.

We can also see in the larger world how something that from the outside might look wonderful tends to break apart when the intentions really aren't as skillful as they seem. One of my favorite examples lately is Germany, because I have a lot of German friends and I've spent some time there. I remember the fall when the Berlin Wall came down. Even here, there was this feeling of euphoria, a real sense that love and connection was winning, that it was really getting stronger. Since then, my friends who used to love Berlin don't like to be there anymore because the whole feeling of the city has changed. Between East and West, the people who lived in the East with different cultures and different economic needs and backgrounds, there's a sense of competition, a sense of struggle, a sense of antagonism.

And my friend Franz told me there's even a T-shirt that says, "We want our wall back"—on the West side, not the East.

But it's not all that it seems. In fact, I had a friend—I remember seeing on TV when the wall went down that first night, it looked like this beautiful, loving, euphoric party. But I have a friend who was in Berlin, and she said it was like that for a few minutes, but actually it was horrible. People got really drunk and it was really wild. She said, "I was really scared. I left." I thought, oh, that's really interesting.

And so even the most helpful or seemingly wonderful things—when our own intentions, our own understanding isn't purified, the hate and the fear might make way for greed. Or the greed gets more evened out and it makes way for hatred of the person who's different.

To take it back from the larger world, I'm sure many people here have seen—and it's said almost every retreat—in looking at how some sense of anger or some sense of desire built up in the mind about some petty little thing, this is not any different from how world wars start. And it's not.

We've had in three-month courses here what I call "light wars"—people want the light on, other people want it off. I was just talking to a friend who remembers it from five years ago: people unscrewing the light bulbs, people putting tape over the light bulbs, people hating each other because some of them want the light on and some of them want the light off. And we have friends who were practicing in Burma when two Western monks actually came to blows over whether a fan should be on or off in the meditation hall. This is true. Scary, right?

I'm sure most of us can think of at least some incident where we could relate. If you can't, then good for you.

This is why, even if we think we have the vast wisdom of emptiness, we can never think we're so far removed as to disdain the very fine level of intention that gives rise to our actions. This is from Padmasambhava, who is the father of Buddhism in Tibet. He said, "Although my view, my understanding, is as spacious as the sky, my actions and respect for cause and effect are as fine as grains of flour."

So this is the work with intention—really beginning to explore in ourselves: Can we trust? Can we find a way to come from the intention of loving-kindness, the intention of compassion? Can we see that it is an even more powerful force in the world, or in our own lives, than greed and fear and hatred? It is hard to trust.

Last year—it seems like a couple of years ago now—I took a self-defense course called Model Mugging. Actually, Michelle did it too, though not at the same time. We had different kinds of experiences.

What it turned into for me—it's a very intense kind of course where you go five times and each session is about five hours long. It's set up so that for women, they have a separate course from men. In the women's course, the men who are called the "model muggers" are padded with these huge helmets and pads because the idea is you learn ways to deflect certain kinds of attacks, and you have to practice at full strength. You have to really be able to kick and hit and gouge eyes. It's very down and dirty—there's nothing too clean or elegant about it.

My personal motivation in going might sound crazy, but somehow I felt that my motivation was this: I saw how fear was preventing me from acting out of compassion. I saw that over and over. For example, if I was in a city and there was some disturbed person or a beggar, someone who wanted something but looked really kind of off, I would see that the fear got in the way of my being able to go over and connect—whether I gave money or just connected human to human. The fear was in the way. So somehow that motivated me. I don't know how that link happened, but anyway, I found myself in this class.

And I saw that, at least in the way the instructors in my class taught it—and other instructors might have done it differently—what was assumed as our joint motivation was anger and rage and fear. Now, in many cases, women who have been raped or abused or really hurt or damaged in some way, and who had been frozen and paralyzed, unable to contact the energizing quality of anger—for them it can be very appropriate to get in touch with that anger to break the paralysis and act. So again, I'm not saying anger is never a helpful or appropriate emotion, necessary to contact.

And they really taught how to do this. They scream a lot. I mean, you run up and down the room screaming. I'm serious—a lot, just to get the energy moving. And you always say "No!" right at the beginning to bring up the sense of anger.

But what began to strike me was that there was no even idea that there could ever be any other motivation than anger or fear. And I actually wasn't very angry because I don't have a history of having been abused, so I couldn't contact that in my own experience. And the guys who were the muggers were so clearly getting beaten up over and over and over. They were clearly such nice guys—who else would come and do a job like that? I really couldn't work up to getting angry at them.

So for me, it became a kind of koan, a riddle. Can I find a way to access the energy? And it also became clear they were never going to hurt me. They might not let me win, but they weren't going to hurt me, so fear just didn't happen. I didn't really get to work with that aspect. But it really became a koan: Can I access an energy of deep action and response and protecting myself out of some other intention or motivation than anger or fear? Can I really come from a place of compassion and loving-kindness? I'm not saying I achieved that, but it was a very interesting area in which to explore.

And I think that's when it really began to sink into me how much it's assumed that if we've got to do something really active and really energetic, the best source is anger. I just don't buy that. But it's more subtle, and it's less what we're trained in, and it's less what's supported—to see how much energy can come from compassion, can come from loving-kindness.

If we look around in the world, in literature, in the newspapers, or if I look in retreats, you can always find people who are achieving amazing things who, from at least as much as we can tell from what they say and their way of being, seem to come from compassion.

One of my big inspirations—Steve mentioned Aung San Suu Kyi last night—one of my big inspirations is Sister Chân Không, who has been working with Thích Nhất Hạnh for years and years and years, since the early sixties. Even when I first met her in 1986, I didn't really know anything. I'd never heard of her. I knew nothing about her. But even then, spending some weeks with them, I was really blown away by her. As far as I could see, everything she was doing—and I'm not exaggerating—was coming out of taking care of people, both at Plum Village or when she was on retreat here, or taking care of people in Vietnam. And that would take her to any action that needed to happen, from bringing in bug spray and clearing fleas out of somebody's room, to sending money to orphans, to digging in the gardens, to whatever.

I really deeply felt that the motivation for her energy was true compassion. And I have rarely met a person more filled with energy and who gets more done than Sister Chân Không. I tend to sit and go, "May all beings be happy." Meanwhile, she ran around and did five hundred things, all while at the same time genuinely wishing people could be happy.

Recently I've been reading her autobiography, which is probably why she's more in my mind tonight, because there's just stuff on every page that shows the depth of her willingness to work with compassion—and that it doesn't just come totally naturally. It's something we need to meditate on, to get ourselves attuned with over and over and over. And it's so powerful. This book is filled with events of friends getting killed in the Vietnam War, on and on and on.

This is one particular eulogy she wrote after some dear friends of theirs at the School for Social Work were killed. These were young people just trying to help the poor villagers in the midst of the war. Because they wouldn't take either side and worked for peace, both sides feared them and killed them and bombed them, so they were in constant danger. This is the eulogy she wrote after some of her dear friends were killed:

We cannot hate you, you who have thrown grenades and killed our friends, because we know that men are not our enemies. Our only enemies are misunderstanding, hatred, jealousy, and ignorance that lead to such acts of violence. Please allow us to remove all misunderstanding so that we can work together for the happiness of the Vietnamese people. Our only aim is to help remove ignorance and illiteracy from the countryside of Vietnam. Social change must start in our hearts with the will to transform our own egotism, greed, and lust into understanding, love, commitment, and sharing responsibility for the poverty and injustice in our country.

The thing is, I get the impression that it's not just an idea—that she has the idea and writes the words of what would be a compassionate thing. Because she mentions later another eulogy she wrote for four other friends who were killed simply for belonging to their social work group, where she said she had to spend three days and nights, hardly able to sleep, in deep grief, just coming back over and over and over with mindfulness to meditate on compassion and love and interconnectedness. Until she could finally hit the point of true love and interconnectedness for the people who had murdered her friends—only then could she write another eulogy.

So it's not that for some people it might be more natural, or that these people who truly have dedicated their lives to such action are simply different from us. It's the willingness to continue clarifying and recommitting and restrengthening the intention of compassion, of connectedness, of mindfulness. That's what gives it the strength. And that's actually what we're doing here, even though it might not seem quite so dramatic in this particular setting. But that commitment, that strengthening, that clarification is, to me, what our brahmavihāra practice is about.

Again, sometimes people, in thinking about purification of our understanding and intention—another thing people sometimes ask besides "If I don't act from desire or hatred, will I just sit in my room forever?" is "Does it mean I won't care about anything anymore?" Like some sense that if I'm not acting from desire and hatred, everything's just this dull, blobby gray and boring. You don't care. "I don't care what's for lunch."

I don't care if it's burned. I don't care where I go for the movies. Anything's fine. We could have kasha every day for breakfast for the next year, and it wouldn't matter at all. I haven't reached that point yet, by the way.

Again, it's not so. Two quotations I'd like to read. One from the Buddha, who said, "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it." You get that? Things are still beautiful. All that goes away is the striving after it. It doesn't mean we can't tell what's beautiful. It doesn't mean you can't tell if someone sticks a pin in you. You'll feel it. You won't say, "Is that pleasant or unpleasant?" You'll know. But there won't be that sense of, "Oh my God, someone stuck a pin in me! How could they do that?" with all that suffering. It's just, "Oh, okay. Unpleasant."

Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "Do not be afraid of freedom from desire and fear. It enables you to live a life so different from all you know, so much more intense and interesting, that truly by losing all, you gain all."

The mind of desire trying to project out into the rest of our life—how is it going to be without acting from desire and fear—isn't going to be able to figure it out. You cannot trust the mind of desire. You cannot trust the intention of anger and hatred and fear to give us an accurate sense of what life would be without it.

So what we do is begin to notice when our intention is colored by desire and fear and anger, and when it is not. And this is where the equanimity and the balance of Vipassana come in. Because it's not that we should begin now judging ourselves: "Uh-oh, I acted with the intention of greed. No good, I'm a bad person." Just to notice it and to notice the difference.

You'll also see when you go home that you might not have noticed the impact of the purification of intention here because it happens in little things. But when you go home you might begin to notice it in little things as well.

For instance, here you might be standing in the food line wanting that piece of blueberry coffee cake, and you see that there's only four pieces left and six people in front of you. And the sense of greed that could arise—suddenly everyone else is not a being with needs and wants but something in your way, because that's the effect that greed has on consciousness. And it might not be this particular example, but many others. And suddenly there's a moment of, "Oh, that's okay. I want it, but I can live without it. And isn't it nice that these people get to have a piece of cake?" Just a little shift like that. Sometimes we're looking for the big explosion and we don't notice the little moments.

Or similarly, so many people report on retreats, and on this one too, where someone in the next room or someone in the next seat is somehow doing something that is just unacceptable behavior. Unacceptable, why? Because we don't like it, of course. It bothers us. And we can go through the range of righteous indignation, of self-judgment, of hatred of the other person, of all kinds of murderous fantasies. And if you've had any, you're not alone. It's really normal.

And suddenly there's this sense of, "Oh"—really connecting either with, "I can stand this unpleasantness," and immediately there's a sense of spaciousness and caring for the person. Or it might turn out, "Oh, they're really suffering." And the sense of connection with their suffering gives us the space to really be okay with what's going on and connected.

Again, it's a small moment of shifting of intention, giving rise to thought and our response to a situation. But it's powerful, important to notice.

And so there are different ways that we can consciously cultivate this strengthening of a pure intention. It will arise spontaneously the more that we practice, and we can also cultivate it consciously.

A large part, and perhaps the most powerful way I know, is just what we've been doing here. The practice of metta, the practice of karuna, of sympathetic joy, and equanimity—which we get to tomorrow—is really that, as I've mentioned: a conscious cultivation and purification of intention.

And again, it's not naive wishing, or affirmations. "May such and so happen because I want it to." It's really coming back over and over to that intention that wishes well for someone with no attachment at all to the results. And this is really what gives it the purity. As soon as there's an attachment to wanting something to happen, the metta or the karuna has gotten mixed with some attachment, has gotten mixed with some wanting. Not bad, but just to notice that there are now several things going on at once. But each time we come back, that pure intention is strengthened.

The Buddha said once that whatever one reflects upon frequently, towards that the mind will naturally incline. And that's what's happening. It's not that we can sit here and make ourselves feel loving-kindness, connected to all beings, radiating outward. You know by now you can't make that happen. All you can do is say, "Okay, I'll come back. May I be happy." That's all we can do. But with the mind reflecting upon it frequently and frequently, that's when suddenly you'll find that little blip of, "Oh, so what? Let them have the cake. It makes me really happy." And you think, "Where did that come from? Somebody else must have said that. That's not the voice I'm used to."

We can't control the outcome. And this is where our compassion, our metta, really gets boundless—because it's balanced by equanimity.

Again, a story from Sister Phong. She was talking about one time, sometime in the sixties, when she was in jail in Vietnam because she was caught traveling with subversive literature, which was some of Thich Nhat Hanh's peace writings. She was in jail for quite some time under very horrible conditions. A lot of high monks and people knew her and agitated for her release, so she was freed after a few weeks, not very long.

She was writing in her book about how when she came out, she said to the head of the police or whoever released her—she talked about two young twelve-year-old girls who were in the prison under these really bad conditions. She said they had just been arrested because they happened to be around when some guerrillas were arrested, and because they were just in the vicinity, they were also arrested and thrown in jail. Out of compassion, she was saying, "Thank you for releasing me, and these two young girls who've done nothing are here. It's clearly such bad conditions for young minds—maybe could they be released?"

And her words, which were pure intention, had the effect of the police officer saying, "Oh, they've been talking to each other, the prisoners. We have to make the regimen more strict."

We can't control the outcome. With all the best and clearest intention, that's out of our control. And without the balance of equanimity—of really seeing that we are not in control of any results, of really seeing that things are as they are, and that all beings will have joy and all beings will have suffering—without that, we can just drown in the pain as we open with compassion, with love. Or we get so hooked on judging by results that we say, "Well, compassion is clearly too weak. I should come in here with an Uzi and blast them out of jail."

It's really a way of such strength and courage. It's unimaginable to me, actually, the courage of people like this who can continue to face such responses of ignorance and hatred and continue to come back with the courage of compassion and love. It takes far more courage than it takes to be angry. Because it takes really taking in, opening to the seeming unfairness of the world, to the pain that there is, and still finding some way to connect—even to that police officer who responded in that way.

Equanimity again with ourselves, for all the times that we can't do that. Not to have unrealistic expectations that from now on all my motivation should come from love and compassion. We know how hard that is. We know how hard it is even to be compassionate with ourselves for ten minutes sitting here in relative comfort and ease, being so hard on our experience. How then can we expect that we're going to be able to bring that to others?

But it's in just this way—working with your knee pain, with your judging voice, with the anger at someone who's making noise during tea time or whatever. It's our willingness to see and accept our own difficult responses, our own lack of compassion for others and ourselves, that brings this practice, that makes the link from what is just a pillow practice to real action in the world. And it's just these little times when you notice the intention shifting that can maybe give you the strength to keep going.

In our daily life, not only the formal practice of metta, but bringing it up in situations where you feel a little difficulty or even just separation. I'll use it a lot in the supermarket line when I'm impatient and somebody with seventy-five things and seventy-eight coupons is trying to write a check and wants it to be more, and I only have three minutes. That's the time to bring in metta. It's astounding. Just a couple of phrases, a little dropping in, and instead of me and them and in my way, we're just all together. It's us in this situation.

Or on planes—I do it on planes all the time. I go on a plane and I don't want to talk to anybody. I don't want to even look at the person in the next seat. It's kind of my time alone. And within a couple of minutes, I notice how completely isolated and fearful I've become, because if I don't want to talk, that leads to fear. I'm sitting there cringing, my head under a blanket. And I just begin to send metta to myself and everyone on the plane. It's astounding. It's never failed that within about ten seconds, there's this really happy sense of being family together for this little period of time in this little metal shell in the sky. It's very amazing.

Another way we can consciously cultivate intention aside from our formal silent practice—and I've heard this from both a Tibetan teacher and also Sister Phong—is simply having the thought, as you do particular activities, of using that activity as a way to remind you to cultivate compassion. So, for example, as you're going to rest, saying, "May all beings rest in the peace of understanding." Or Sister Phong mentioned again that time when she was three days and nights coming back to mindfulness in order to connect with the people who had killed her friends. She'd be washing her hands and she'd say, "May my heart be cleansed of anger and hatred. May the hearts of the people who killed my friend be cleansed of ignorance and violence."

It's very simple, so simple. It takes no time. You're already doing something. And what I found interesting is how easily resistance can come up to doing it. It might feel effortful. I'd rather think about what's on at the movies. It's interesting again just to see that this is the conditioning of habit—the mind's used to running on in its own little distracted way or amusing itself way. And just to notice that and make that little commitment to open to the potential for compassion, to wishing all beings well.

One other practice I wanted to mention because it's actually becoming more and more powerful for me. And again, it's a conscious cultivation of the intention of compassion. It's what's called in the Tibetan tradition the aspiration bodhicitta, to develop the wish of bodhicitta. Bodhicitta, very briefly, could be translated as "heart of awakening." And the cultivation of this wish is simply the generation of the aspiration or the intention: I want to awaken to freedom in order to help all suffering beings to awaken.

Again, stay with the intention, not with the thought—"Who am I? How could I possibly help all beings awaken? This is too much. I couldn't..." Just let all that stuff rest. Come back, and it's simply at the beginning of a sitting. At the beginning of almost every sitting, I'll just sit and form that intention. Notice the different quality it brings to our actions, or sitting, or life.

This aspiration of compassion—of wanting to awaken in order to help awaken all beings—lends such a vastness, such a spaciousness to the compassion, to our practice, that it's a vastness that approaches the vast emptiness of truth. And the intention of compassion lends so much more courage, so much more strength. It just expands us beyond our separate little self and our self-concerns, just in little ways. You're sitting and you really connect with a sense of the suffering of beings and the intention that may my practice be for the awakening of all beings. It's a lot easier to sit with knee pain. Or when I'm sitting and it's unpleasant and there's some unpleasant emotion—ah, why should I stay with this?—and it comes up: well, you're not just doing it for yourself. There really is this intention to help awaken all beings. The sense of "why should I stay with this?" just vanishes.

There's so much more depth and breadth and joy that comes from what we're doing. And the question of silent meditation practice or sending compassion to yourself or sending love to yourself—the question of that being selfish, of that being limited—just vanishes when our whole life and practice is put into this broader context. I'm not saying one should do that. I'm just giving that as an example of how the conscious cultivation of connection and compassion adds a whole depth and breadth to our experience that can't be imagined when we're coming from our own wanting and fear.

You've probably heard Thich Nhat Hanh speak about, or write about, how our own practice, our own purification of intention and action and speech, affects all with whom we come in contact. He gives the example of one calm person in a boat. He talks about some of the boat people during the period when there were many refugees leaving Vietnam in boats, really packed into these rinky-dink fishing boats. And a lot of them were pirated, but a lot of them also ran into very severe storms. From talking to hundreds of refugees, they found out that in some of the storms, everybody on the boat panicked, and a lot of people didn't survive.

But they found out that in the really bad storms, if just one person on the boat stayed really calm, that calm communicated itself to the people around, which then affected the people around them. One calm person on a boat seemed to make enough difference that the rest of the people calmed down and they would survive through the storm.

You know, we tend to want such large results. But if we can just send enough compassion, enough loving-kindness to ourselves—that's all we do—the natural purification of intention that happens will mean that we will be, in some ways, that kind person, or the courageous person, or the loving person, the connected person, whatever it happens to be, however it manifests through our own personality. And that can have an effect on all with whom we come in contact that we can't imagine sitting here trying to envision it. And we don't need to.

So I just like to encourage us all to honor the difficulty that you're going through. Honor each moment that there's a spontaneous transformation of intention.

CHAPTER 262

Patience: Active Acceptance

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> Carol Wilson opens with the Dalai Lama's teaching that genuine world peace must begin within ourselves, then examines how our conditioned habits of craving, aversion, and delusion keep us from recognizing the peace that is our true nature. She illuminates how we habitually filter experience through pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral reactions, creating elaborate stories of suffering from simple sensations—a mild toe pain spiraling into self-hatred, or a cough triggering murderous fantasies.
>
> The talk redefines patience not as passive endurance or resigned waiting, but as an active, spacious acceptance rooted in mettā (loving-kindness). Wilson distinguishes true patience from aversion masquerading as tolerance, emphasizing that patience actively meets all experience—pleasant and unpleasant alike—with compassionate, non-judgmental presence. She suggests replacing "letting go" with "letting be," pointing to a quality of full acceptance rather than subtle rejection.
> Drawing from her year as a nun in Thailand, Wilson shares how cultivating patience amid extreme heat, insects, and discomfort transformed her experience completely—not by changing conditions, but by changing her relationship to them. She quotes Ajahn Sumedho on recognizing the unconditioned through patient non-clinging, and the Dalai Lama's teaching that patience is strength while anger reveals weakness. The talk closes with Thích Nhất Hạnh's poem written during the Vietnam War, demonstrating how patient, compassionate presence can meet even unimaginable suffering with invincible love.

I want to read one of my favorite quotations from the Dalai Lama. He's talking about the need for peace and freedom and how calling on governments to provide peace and freedom is not sufficient:

"It is crucial to investigate what the true nature of happiness is, what the true source of peace is, so that we can develop a form of peace that will last. The question of real lasting world peace concerns human beings, so basic human feelings are also at its root. Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. Peace must first be discovered within ourselves, then gradually expanded to include our families, our communities, and ultimately the whole planet. Developing attitudes such as love, compassion, patience, and understanding between human beings is not merely a source of personal happiness, but has become a condition for human survival."

Tonight I want to talk a little bit about one of the deep-rooted habits of our conditioned mind that keeps us from recognizing true peace and profound happiness. I also want to explore how this quality that the Dalai Lama spoke of—patience—can be helpful in our practice and in our lives to open our awareness, enabling us to recognize and abide in true peace and happiness.

Throughout these days we have been speaking, and will probably continue to speak, of how this is a practice of awakening—of how our true nature is peace, that peace is our very existence. But is that actually our experience in an ongoing way? We may have glimpses of our true nature of peace. Maybe for some people the glimpses last a little longer. Maybe you have frequent glimpses. I know for many of us the glimpses are much less frequent—if we even notice them at all. They're there, but whether we notice them is the question.

What seems to come up in talking with people, especially in the first days of a meditation retreat, is that what we actually seem to be opening to is frustration, pain, discontent, sleepiness, boredom, doubt—the whole list—with an occasional moment of happiness and peace and quietness maybe to balance it. So how do we lose sight of what is our true nature?

The Buddha said that one of the things that motivated him to teach, that really deeply touched his heart of compassion, was that in looking through the world he could tell that the deepest motivation of everybody—something we all share—is that we want to be happy. It seems like that's something that links us all. What is so sad is that through our not understanding clearly our own nature, the nature of reality, what we tend to do in our pursuit of happiness—which we're guaranteed in this country—is things that increase and continue the cycle of suffering and confusion. It's really sad because it's so unnecessary.

One of the great benefits of taking time like this, these ten days on a meditation retreat, is that for a little while we've stopped some of our cycle of frenzied activity and we're taking the time to really inquire into what's going on here. What's the nature of happiness? What's the nature of suffering? How does suffering arise? How is it created? How does it continue?

Khenpo Rinpoche said once that the main purpose of these Dharma teachings is to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind as well as how the deluded mind works. You'll find that experience fluctuates between the two. There are times when we're really seeing, knowing, understanding the nature of the non-deluded mind. And there are other times that we're deeply entrenched in discovering how the deluded mind works. That's the point of our mindful awareness practice—to be with the suffering, the difficulty, and pay attention to see what's really going on.

I feel that one of the basic manifestations of our deluded mind is a core misunderstanding of what will really make us happy. This is what sets up the ongoing cycle of craving and trying to get and being dissatisfied.

Some very simple examples: Our idea of happiness or peace might be, very crassly, getting what we want. Getting what we want could be physical comfort. It could be certain physical conditions. It could be having people treat us the way we want them to. It could be having all the injustice in the world disappear. It could be having certain types of sitting—spacious, alert, aware, really concentrated, really focused. It could just be absence of pain. You can add whatever comes up in your own list.

As we begin to inquire into what's really happening in our experience through the process of mindful, undiscriminating, choiceless awareness, we begin to see that inquiry challenges these basic assumptions of what happiness is. If you can imagine or remember, or even touch for a moment, times here—sitting and walking or just having tea—one of those moments of very alert, awake, spacious awareness, regardless of what particular experience or appearance is arising. It might be that there's hearing and just that vivid awakeness that's fully present. Or it could be seeing, or sensation in the body.

It could be an emotion. It doesn't matter what's happening. But in that moment where the relationship to whatever is arising is not one of clinging or grasping, not one of resistance or pushing away, not in any way involved and stuck to that experience, but very clearly awake and present, knowing quite clearly what is arising—in that moment, what's the problem?

In those sometimes all too brief moments of this vivid non-grasping awareness, nothing that arises is really such a problem that we're acutely suffering. We're not lost in fighting or holding on. Moments like this point to the nature of our mind, point to the peace that is who and what we truly are. And in that moment there's nothing we have to do. It seems so simple.

And yet so quickly—at least for me, I won't speak for anybody else—so quickly, over and over and over, the attention in the mind gets distracted, gets somehow involved in a particular experience. Either struggle or conflict with myself, conflict with my experience, wanting things to be different.

If we look at what's happened in that moment where we get distracted, we can find that on one level we've begun again to believe that our happiness or peace depends on some changing condition. We're looking for it where it can never be found. As soon as there's a sense of struggle, as soon as there's some grasping or desire going on, somewhere, somehow, I'm thinking that this particular internal experience that's happening is going to make me happy. That ease of body will make me happy. That the weather is the thing that will make me happy. That the way other people behave is the thing that makes me happy or makes me unhappy.

We find that we're looking either to internal changing experience or to so-called external changing experience. But it's all, all of it, in constant flux. There is no experience that lasts. This goes to what Joseph spoke about last night as one of the mind turnings: the deep, visceral understanding of impermanence. Because when we really, really get it, then that clinging to some changing experience is not going to arise. And it's that clinging, that resistance, that turns us away from recognizing the potential for peace here and now.

It's not that that particular experience—the leg pain, the beautiful day, whatever—has to go away. It's the clinging and the resistance that blinds us to what is possible.

So one of the root ways that we get in the habit of getting lost in this confused way of relating to experience is what I want to talk about. And that's the deep-rooted habit of mind of relating to experience with craving and holding on if it's pleasant, with pushing away, resistance, some kind of aversion or anger if the experience is unpleasant. And if it's neutral, we tend not to notice it too much. We get bored, we space out, we create some whole melodrama that at least holds our attention more than a neutral experience.

In Buddhist psychology, in the way of describing our mental and physical experience, it's really brought down to the very basic, bare experience without interpretation. In any moment we're experiencing one of six sense experiences: seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, tasting, and whatever mental experience might be arising—thoughts, emotions. The mind in that way is treated as a sense door. And in that moment of, say, hearing, it's said to be experienced as either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

Now this can be really obvious sometimes, but a lot of times it's quite subtle. And it's not what we're so tuned into noticing. So what happens in that moment, if it's a pleasant sound, for example, and we don't notice that, there's not awareness at that point of contact at the sense door—then almost immediately the habit of the deluded mind will say, "Oh, that's nice. I like it. Let's have some more." If it's unpleasant, it almost immediately moves into, "This isn't really good. In fact it's bad, it's a big mistake, and it needs to change." And it can go on from there, depending how long the experience lasts and our particular propensity. If it's neutral, we tend not to notice. It just kind of passes us by.

These three reactions are spoken of as some of the roots of unwholesome behavior in the mind: the root of greed, of hatred, of confusion or delusion. In a lot of the way Buddhist psychology describes experience and suffering, it often comes back to one of these three roots as the motivation or intention of thought, speech, and action.

What I want to talk about tonight, though, is how when we don't realize this process is happening—and it's a habit, it's not inevitable—when we don't realize the sensing of pleasant and wanting more, it becomes a filter through which we tend to interpret our experience without even realizing it. So if it's pleasant: "Oh good, this is good, this is how things are supposed to be, this is correct." If it's unpleasant: "It's bad or evil or a big mistake, it's not supposed to happen." And again, neutral, we don't interpret, we just go and create something else.

What's interesting is that often people will come in during a long retreat and say they've begun to notice that they're very calm. And rather than that being something they're relaxing into, they're realizing that they found the calm sort of neutral and boring. And the mind then began to create suffering scenarios in order to wake up.

These filters of our conditioning, these ways that we interpret experience, are very strong and powerful if we don't recognize them when they're present. What we often find happening in a day of sitting or walking on retreat—it's easier to notice there, but it's the same thing that goes on when we're at our jobs or with our family—is that when we're caught in the blinders of attachment or aversion, we're not able at that moment to open up to the big picture. It's sort of like tunnel vision; we're locked on that particular thing.

We get so entangled in either trying to prolong or bring back the pleasant experience, or in fighting and struggling with the unpleasant experience, judging it. We get so entangled, and we suffer so much from that, that the activity itself keeps us so occupied we don't notice another possibility altogether. I've used this example before: it's like being in prison and spending all your time trying to rearrange the furniture and make the room nice so it's as comfortable and spacious as possible—and that keeps you so busy you don't notice that the door is open all the time and you can just walk out. It's sort of like that in the way we engage with experience, with this push-pull and judging of it.

So as you go through the day, tonight, tomorrow, see if you notice this filter on experience happening at all. And again, it's not to judge it as bad or good, but simply to begin to notice the filter. Simple retreat examples: you have a sitting that is pleasant. Pleasant could mean simply that it meets your expectations of what's supposed to be happening. Or it could be that it's comfortable, or that you felt really concentrated, or really spacious. It really doesn't matter what it is—it's just the fact that it was pleasant, and immediately, without realizing it, there arises: "Oh, this is how it's supposed to be. This is correct meditation. This is what's supposed to be happening."

And then another sitting that's spacey, all over the place, or the body's really painful, or thoughts are arising every half of a breath, and there's this sense of uncomfortableness. It's so easy not to notice the filter that says, "This is wrong, this is bad, this is a mistake, I'm not doing it right, this isn't what's supposed to happen." Both of these filters, when unseen, are taking us far away from the actual bare experience. This is how we get so lost, so out of touch with the bare experience of what's happening now.

A lot of what we're doing in the very simple practice of sitting—coming back to the bare experience of hearing or breathing or sensation in the body, whatever's arising—is to help us begin to actually know what's happening and tell the difference between that and all the interpretations and stories and hoopla that we build up and then take to be so without realizing it.

For example, say in the hall there's somebody coughing. It's unpleasant. Without noticing that, it's so easy to move into aversion and judgment and hypochondria and anger. Quite literally, I'm not exaggerating—there are some retreats where people have reported that they felt they were barely restraining themselves from throttling the person next to them because they were sniffing or coughing or something. And they would have a little sense: "I think this is out of proportion." But the pain, the suffering, is very genuine. I laugh to try and lighten it, but the person is really in deep suffering about this.

Our practice is simply: "Oh, can I come back to the experience of hearing? Just the sound itself." And in that, you might notice if it's unpleasant. You might even see the whole build-up from the unpleasant. And in the seeing, that's enough. We don't have to get so lost in all of that. But part of the problem is we don't like to come back to the unpleasant. That's the whole point of patience, and why I want to talk about that in a minute.

Our whole training is: if it's unpleasant, it shouldn't be happening, and I don't have to be here with it. All our training is to get away if it's unpleasant. If it's pleasant, all our training is to hang on, make it last, do it again. And desire can lead to the same kind of elaborate story that an unpleasant sound can. Strong, strong habit. Not inevitable.

Another example, and this is a little bit more subtle: someone experiencing a strong tension in the head. Happening a lot, throughout a lot of sittings. It's so easy to build that up into a whole thing: "This tension is unbearable. Eight more days of this. I'll never last eight more days. I'll never even last the rest of the sitting." And moving even from that into: "This tension is reflective of the way I relate to life, of the way I relate to myself. This tension is here because I am such an uptight, rigid person. I'm unloving. I'm harsh." And it can just go on and on and on until by the time—someone's actually speaking about this experience in an interview, the tension in the head is barely acknowledged. It's mushroomed into a whole story of self-hatred or unworthiness or whatever. And the habits of our mind—they're really expert at picking the particular story that's really going to hook us, that's sort of hard to see through.

Now, somebody coughing is a lot easier than something that leads into our deep-rooted psychological patterns. And I'm not saying the psychological patterns aren't true—they might be true—but what's actually happening in the moment is an experience of tension that's unpleasant. And if we can see that, that that's just what's happening, it does not have to mushroom into such a whole story. Sometimes when we notice we're really caught in some story, it's possible to bring the attention back to the trigger, to the bare experience that's going on. And it's amazing how that can cut through and bring us back into a balanced relationship to our experience.

I remember one time I was on a long retreat, doing walking meditation, and I thought I was very present—noticing thinking, noticing the sensations. I wasn't spacing out, so to speak. I was quite present. And then I started to notice that the thoughts were becoming very judgmental, very self-hating. They started to move into stories that dealt with the present, and then they started going backwards in time. When I realized I was back to the third grade and the horrible things I had done to other kids, and that proved what a worthless person I was, I said, wait a minute. I think I'm missing something in this experience.

I just stood there and opened up the field of attention. I said, well, what's going on now? And it was amazing, because what was going on that I hadn't noticed was a mild pain in my toe. That was all. It wasn't even a bad pain. But it was unpleasant, and I hadn't noticed it. And out of habit, I started to react to unpleasantness with aversion and resistance, and then my particular personality propensity was to take that anger and turn it inward. Someone else might turn it outward, or might go off into a different pattern altogether.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once, "We miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination." What we're trying to do here is help us, moment by moment, to recognize the real in the whole range of its manifestations. Not to judge these habits of mind as bad—that's just falling into the same filter—but to understand how they work.

When unseen, these habits of reaction to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral are what keeps our sense of separation going. It's what feeds and strengthens desire, fear, hatred, confusion. It keeps us looking elsewhere, looking outward, looking to another time, another place, another experience for freedom or peace. It keeps us from recognizing the potential for peace and freedom here and now, keeps us from noticing the essential purity and completeness that is here—here and now and always.

So our practice of mindful awareness, of simply and gently coming to connect with and recognize our experience—what's happening, without judgment, without agenda, without reaction—it opens us to another possibility altogether of how to be with our experience, which is to be fully present with things just as they are. It's simple, but so difficult to be in that place of open acceptance, moment by moment by moment.

And so we practice being with things just as they are. The different techniques—tuning into hearing, tuning into breath, tuning into sensations, emotions, whatever—that sense of waking up, "Oh, I've really been spaced out," and coming back, it functions as one of my teachers described it: like a rattle with a two-year-old. A two-year-old is really locked onto something, screaming, having a tantrum, wanting something so badly. And on the other side of the room, you just shake a little rattle, and they just forget the whole story. They turn around and go, "Oh yeah, look at the rattle."

It's sort of like that. Each moment we can wake up and just connect. It doesn't even matter what we're connecting with—just connect with what is. It's like that rattle. It's simple. We don't have to do so much. We just have to stop our confused involvement.

As a little aside, speaking about the different techniques that we use as a rattle, I just wanted to say again that we've talked about beginning a sitting by staying with hearing, or maybe being with the breath, being with sensations. We wanted to emphasize that there is no one correct or right way that you're supposed to do it. For some people, beginning a sitting and opening to hearing, or using hearing as the rattle the whole time, is extremely helpful. Helpful means not that it's always pleasant, not that we're going to enjoy every minute. Helpful means it helps us stay alert, awake, and able to relate in a balanced way. For some people, that's not helpful, and moving right into a balanced and connected experience of the sensations of breathing is what's helpful.

For some people, beginning with breathing and then opening up to sensations in the body is what's helpful. We're offering different techniques, and I want to say: really look at your own experience. Not by whether you like it or not—that's got nothing to do with it—but whether it helps you come back over and over to reconnect with a sense of ease, connectedness, and clear seeing. And it's going to vary a lot. So don't set up some expectation that if you figure out the right way, then you'll always be open and connected and spacious. Sorry. Doesn't work like that.

One aspect of the non-deluded mind, an expression of the non-deluded mind, is this quality of patience. Patience is extremely important in this practice, this work that we're doing here together. I want to talk a little bit about patience and what I'm meaning by it, because I mean something quite specific.

Patience is an aspect of loving-kindness. We use the word mettā in Pali, which is a sense of very active connection with beings, with experience, that is limitless—not discriminating, not feeling loving-kindness for this person but not for that person because I don't like the way they act. A moment of loving-kindness is very spacious, very active, very connected. And patience has this quality.

I think patience gets a bad rap in our culture. In meditation too, people come and say, "Well, this horrible thing is happening and everything I've tried doesn't work, so I guess I'll have to be patient." It's like the last resort when nothing else works. This is not exactly what I'm referring to. We call it patience, but it's more like passive endurance: "Okay, I'm putting up with this until it goes away. I'm really cultivating patience." That's not patience. That's aversion—just masquerading in a mellower form.

There's another way we call it patience: "Okay, I know this is difficult. It's here. I've seen it. I've really accepted it. I've really allowed it. Now I'll sort of detach and not really pay attention to it until it goes away." That's also not being patient.

Patience has the characteristic of acceptance and of spaciousness. And it's also an active connection and acceptance with whatever experience is arising. As the Dalai Lama spoke of the necessity for patience between human beings, what we can discover and cultivate here is the quality of patience within ourselves, with our own experience. It's a very powerful force.

Patience actively meets whatever experience is arising. It's not like looking at it from a distance and saying, "Okay, later we'll check it out." It's really opening to meet very directly and very fully, and it's accompanied by compassion. So if it's a difficult experience, that meeting has an open, non-judging quality that is really present for and okay with the difficulty, the unpleasantness in the situation.

Patience is also the same way we meet pleasant experiences. We tend to think of patience only with the unpleasant, but that same quality of open, active connection, non-judging, non-violent, is the same way patience meets pleasant experience and neutral experience—knowing it clearly, allowing it fully, but not reactive, not caught up in trying to make it different or trying to keep it from going away.

There's one other way that people often seem to get confused or mistake aversion for patience, and it's the use of this term "letting go"—which is used a lot. "I just have to let go of my attachment. I have to let go of my anger." I'm personally on a little crusade to change that particular expression, because over and over again people will be saying, "Well, this is going on, I just haven't been able to let go of it yet." And reading between the lines, what it means is: it's still here, it hasn't gone away, I haven't been able to get rid of it yet.

In the aspect of patience, if you could change "letting go" to "letting it be"—it's just totally okay that this experience is happening, really present with it, quite awake, and really okay when it goes. Because it will.

Everything does.

And one other aspect of patience that I found very interesting. I was reading a commentary on different aspects. We call the perfections of the Buddha different qualities that during all the many eons of bodhisattva-hood that Joseph talked about last night, he was cultivating—in the Theravada it's ten, in Mahayana it's six—ten different qualities, bringing them to perfection. And patience is one of them.

So I was reading this treatise about patience, and it said that the proximate cause, the immediate cause for patience to arise in our mind, is seeing things as they are. I really like that a lot, because so often we say or think, somehow subtly, that patience is passivity—that it doesn't act, that it doesn't really get how difficult things are in the world. But patience actually arises from seeing things as they are.

And I think that can come back to one of the things we see as they are—this aspect of impermanence. Our impatience arises from wanting things to be the way we think they should be: wanting all the difficulty to go away, wanting the injustice to go away, wanting people to stop. Sometimes I just get crazy wanting people to stop doing such stupid, hateful things. Wondering when people can stop polluting, when people can stop torturing. It just can make me crazy. That's an aspect of impatience, and it's also an aspect of not seeing things the way they are—meaning that everything changes, and the way this life is in this realm, the samsara realm that Joseph spoke about last night, is a constant flux of beautiful and horrible.

Even if we look at nature, it's all a rhythm. This beautiful green time now; other times it's really dry and begging for rain. I understand, although I haven't been here, that in the winter it's just solid snow for months on end. Such different environments. The tides that come and go, the moon that waxes and wanes, the dead of winter, the bounty of summer.

And in our own personal experiences, I'm just beginning to get it at this point in my life—that life isn't just this linear process where things get better and better and better until then suddenly you die. In my twenties I'd think, okay, now when's it all going to get better? And you do whatever you do, you get married or whatever, you find the perfect job, and then everything is just sort of hunky-dory and you live the rest of your life. But I think I'm starting to get it. It's a constant flux. Sometimes some years are wonderful and happy and everything seems to be clicking along. And a couple of years later, it's like a year from hell. It's so easy to think, uh-oh, I blew it. What did I do wrong? And I'm just starting to know—hmm, it's been pretty good for a while. I wonder how it's going to change. Because it is going to change. And that's not necessarily bad. That's just how life is.

Working with this aspect of patience, with our mindful awareness, allows us to be just as open and present with all sides of life without trying to deny one—seeing the interrelatedness. As Thich Nhat Hanh talks about so often: Can you look at a rose and see the garbage that it goes into? Can you look at the garbage and see how it becomes compost to become the rose? Can you see that there are two sides and you can't separate them? You can't just have a rose and no garbage.

This is just a little image that stuck with me. A few years ago I was in Ulm in Germany, which is a town with a large cathedral that sort of dominates the town. We were just walking around and we looked at a store window—one of these with a door and then a big picture window on each side. We were looking in the first side and it was all statues of the Madonna and Mary and Jesus. Oh, a spiritual store. That's nice. We walked to the other side and it was all beer steins and guns. We said, oh, that's the other side of things. That's what it's like. And it is. That's what things are like.

If we struggle with it, instead of just seeing it as it is, there's so much more suffering. And it's worth it. It's really worth it to be willing to open to the unpleasant, the difficult, the so-called downside of things. To meet that with the same open acceptance we can meet the beautiful, the touching, the so-called positive.

Remember Joseph read last night from the Dalai Lama? He said that the Buddha taught that patience is the supreme means for transcending suffering. The supreme means for transcending suffering.

Not for pretending that it never happens, but for meeting difficult experience in a way that can transform that experience completely because it transforms our relationship to it.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does, because it—meaning acceptance of pain—ends the false sense of self by ending its habit of avoiding pain. By opening up and meeting with active, spacious acceptance the difficult experiences in our sitting, in our life, the effect... I continue to be amazed by the effect.

One aspect is that we find out we cannot shut down selectively. If we could just screen out all the pain and all the unpleasant experience, but be really open and connected to life and connected to other beings and just really be feeling alive—that would be great, right? We'd all do it. But it doesn't work that way.

I've noticed over and over again, when I start to feel really disconnected, self-involved, caught up or separate from other people, however that manifests, if I stop and look, I almost always see there's some kind of painful or difficult experience that I'm going through that I'm not actively meeting and accepting. And granted, sometimes there's so much difficulty and pain. We can certainly have such painful experiences in our childhood and in our present that we can't open to them right away, that we would be overwhelmed or drown. So I'm not trying to say it's simple—it's a process, little by little.

But what's so fascinating is that as soon as I say, "Oh yeah, I'm really feeling lonely right now. Can that be okay? Can I be really present with that?"—almost immediately the experience transforms and the sense of openness and connection comes back. Because if I shut down to my pain, I'm shut down to other people's pain. If I can open to difficulties in my experience, then I don't have to shut down in the face of somebody else's difficulties. It just seems to work like that. And so the acceptance, the active acceptance through patience of the difficult experiences that we have, can transform our relationship not only to ourselves but to others and the world.

A practice example: About a long time ago, ten years ago, I spent a year in Thailand as a nun practicing in different forest monasteries. And of course I had expectations and ideas of the experience I wanted, what I thought it would be like when I went. Of course, as you know, things are never the way we think they're going to be.

The first few months I was acutely physically uncomfortable. It was extremely hot, and I was in a temple in the city rather than out in the forest—not the idyllic forest setting I had imagined. I was staying in a little wooden hut with a tin roof. You have to wear all acrylic clothes and really long sleeves and this long robe over everything. So imagine it much, much hotter than it's been here in the middle of the day, a hundred percent humidity, wrapped up like this and sitting and cooking in this little tin shack. Aversion comes quite naturally to this particular set of conditions. So there was a lot of aversion.

And the insects—constant, constant. Bugs and scorpions and spiders, and the food wasn't agreeing with me. It just was going from bad to worse. And when I went out finally to the forest, tropical forests, they're not quiet places. They're incredibly loud. I couldn't believe how loud this forest was—the bugs. I'd hear this huge thump on my tin roof and look out, and it would be a giant snake just sticking its head off the roof. And I was under a mango tree, so I'd be sitting, trying to be so peaceful in my meditation, and unripe mangoes would fall off onto the tin roof. It was like an explosion. Okay, calm, calm, calm—forgetting to include that in the meditation.

Well, I was really miserable until at one point—a little slow, I'd say two or three months in—I realized that what I was actually doing was cultivating aversion. We can cultivate patience, we can cultivate love, and we can cultivate aversion and greed. We do that a lot, actually. Whatever new thing was coming into my experience, I didn't even wait to meet it with any kind of openness. Aversion would spring up right away. Instant judgment.

Realizing that helped a lot, because I saw: Okay, this is how it is. And that came first, before the patience. This is how it is here in Thailand. I can leave, or I can adjust to it, or I can stay here and be miserable for the next year and a half. Those are my choices. And once I realized that, over just a month or so, my relationship to the experience changed completely. Obviously, the conditions didn't change.

But by the time I left, I was so happy and really peaceful. And it wasn't that I was in some kind of samādhi that was removing myself from experience either. I was just living a very normal day-to-day life, very simple life. And the simplicity had become so powerful.

What made the difference was that as I began to cultivate patience—just an active, open connection with the experience rather than resisting it all the time—it allowed the space to recognize something other. It allowed me not to be so caught up in my little story and to recognize the peacefulness that's accessible when we're not fighting, when we're not clinging. It was, really, one of the most wonderful times of my life. And I think if I hadn't noticed how caught up I was in aversion, I never would have been able to experience the other.

So that's just a small example, but it's one way that the attitude of patience can absolutely transform our experience, transform our life. It reveals that happiness and peace is absolutely not dependent on any particular set of circumstances or any particular situation.

There's one other way that I think patience can really help to open us up to the potential to recognize our true nature, the peace of our being. I want to read from Ajahn Sumedho, who is quite an inspiring man—an American who is a monk in the Thai Theravāda tradition and has a monastery in England. He's talking about patience:

"Buddha wisdom is very humbling because it knows that whatever arises passes away and is not self. So it knows that whatever condition of the body and mind arises, it is conditioned, and that whatever arises passes away. And it knows the unconditioned as the unconditioned."

The unconditioned could also be what we're calling the nature of mind, prajñā, true nature.

"But is knowing the unconditioned very interesting? Try to think about knowing the unconditioned. Would that be fascinating? You might think, 'I'd like to know God or Dhamma—it's going to be incredibly fascinating, something blissful and ecstatic.' So you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think that getting high is getting close. But the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. Look at the space in this room. Is it very interesting? Is it very fascinating to look at? It's not to me. The space in this room is just like the space in the other room. The things in this room might be interesting or whatever—good, bad, ugly, beautiful—but the space, what is it? There's nothing you can really say or think about it. It has no quality except being spacious. And to be able to be really spacious, one has to be patient. As there is nothing one can grasp at, one recognizes space only by not clinging to the objects in the room. When you let go, when you stop your judgments, your criticisms, your evaluations of the people and the things in the room, you begin to experience the space of it. But that takes a lot of patience and humility."

I really love that paragraph because it's really what we're doing—learning how to stop our judgments and our abstractions and our clingings to all the people and the objects and the thoughts. And when that clinging isn't arising, it's possible to recognize the space. That's all. There's nothing we have to do or create.

Just one last thing I want to say about patience. The Dalai Lama said that many people think patience is a sign of weakness—that we'll put up with something, we won't really work to change it. But he says this is wrong. Actually, anger is a sign of weakness. Reactivity is a sign of weakness. With real, true patience and open acceptance, it's far from passive endurance or weakness or fear. It actually gives a strength and a courage to be with things and situations that we might have previously thought were unendurable—and to be in these situations in a way that isn't reactive, but that is more open and connected and seeing clearly than we could have ever imagined.

Far from passive or weak, the courage that comes from patience, that comes from mettā, from unlimited loving-kindness, lends a clear seeing—seeing things as they are—and a courage and strength to act in a way that's far more appropriate than when we're responding or reacting from anger. It is possible at times to do so and still not be withered or destroyed by such depths of suffering and pain as we might encounter in the world.

I want to close with an example of this.

It really touches me—a poem Thich Nhat Hanh wrote during the Vietnam War as a response to suffering and hatred and violence that would seem to be unendurable, from a heart that has opened to it and is clearly acting. It is a poem offering a way we can relate to seemingly unendurable suffering.

Promise me,
Promise me this day,
Promise me now,
While the sun is overhead
Exactly at its zenith,
Promise me:

Even as they strike you down
With a mountain of hate and violence,
Even as they step on you and crush you like a worm,
Even as they dismember and disembowel you,

Remember, brother,
Remember:
Man is not our enemy.

The only act worthy of you is compassion—
Invincible, limitless, unconditional.
Hatred will never let you face
The beast in man.

One day, when you face this beast alone,
With your courage intact,
Your eyes kind, untroubled,
Even as no one sees them,
Out of your smile will bloom a flower,
And those who love you
Will behold you
Across ten thousand worlds of birth and dying.

Alone again,
I will go on with bent head,
Knowing that love has become eternal.
On the long rough road,
The sun and the moon
Will continue to shine.

Let us sit for a moment.

Attachment

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson delves into the nature of attachment (upādāna) and grasping as the fundamental obscurations that prevent us from recognizing our true nature. Drawing from the Buddha's Second Noble Truth—that craving (taṇhā) strengthening into attachment is the cause of suffering (dukkha)—she explores how these mental patterns create separation, distort perception, and lead us away from the peace that is always available when grasping ceases.
>
> Wilson examines the mechanics of how grasping arises at the level of sense contact (phassa), referencing teachings from the Sutta Nipāta about understanding our sense activity. She identifies three key fields where attachment manifests: sense pleasures (kāma), views and opinions (diṭṭhi), and attachment to rituals and techniques. Through candid personal anecdotes and practical examples, she demonstrates how grasping blinds us to what is present while making us see what isn't there—the dual manifestation of ignorance (avijjā).
> The talk offers the retreat setting as a laboratory for investigating attachment experientially. Rather than suppressing desires or judging them, Wilson encourages practitioners to turn attention toward the physical sensation and mental quality of grasping itself, watching how it arises and naturally dissipates. She emphasizes that the peace of non-grasping, though subtler than sense gratification, reveals the completeness that was always present—our innate purity that grasping only temporarily obscures.

Tonight I want to talk about, in an experiential way hopefully, something that I find really fascinating. I get really happy somehow talking about this. And the subject is attachment, or grasping. Not that grasping is happy, but I just find the exploration of it so interesting. It's really key to the nature of suffering and the nature of freedom.

Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche said once that Buddha nature, the essence of awakened enlightenment itself, is present in everyone, all the time. It can't be improved upon, it can't be changed, and you'll also be glad to know it can't be degenerated. We can't harm it, no matter what we do. Buddhas simply recognize what the rest of us ignore—the true nature of all of us.

In working with our meditation practice, it's really on the principle that what keeps us ignoring our true nature is that it's veiled by temporary obscurations, temporary things in the way. The example often given is the way that clouds hide the sky or seem to block the radiance of the sun, although actually having no effect whatsoever on the sky or the radiance of the sun.

Our conventional meditation practices, this is also from Nyoshul Khenpo, can work in two ways to uncover our true nature. One is by dissolving the obscurations, which then lets our innate purity shine through. And the other is by simply recognizing these obscurations for the ephemeral, impermanent, insubstantial phenomena that they are. In either case, letting us notice, revealing what has always been present—our Buddha nature, so to speak, or our innate purity.

The phenomenon of clinging, of grasping, of attachment, is in some ways one of the key obscurations that we get blinded by. So much so that the Buddha, in elucidating his Four Noble Truths—the first one I'm not allowed to talk about because it's the nature of suffering; that's all I'm going to say about suffering—the second one is that the innate cause of suffering is craving or clinging, strengthening into attachment. It's that important. It's that key as an obscuration.

So I want to explore it together.

Several people have commented either about yesterday or other times during this retreat, and at times not on retreat, where there's been a sense—whatever you want to call it—of just this pristine, total interconnectedness. No sense of self, no sense of separation from environment. Maybe just warmth, maybe just hearing, maybe just seeing. Just the sense of being—a totally interrelated, all-encompassing experience with actually no me, no other, no sense of separation.

That's not some unusual experience that's been somehow created out of the intensity of a meditation retreat. It's not like taking a drug that can put the mind into some kind of altered perception that's dependent on the drug. This clarity, this state of just being but in vivid awakeness, is an intimation of the purity of our nature. And it's not that we've created it. It's just that for once there's a moment where it's not being obscured by the contraction of grasping, the contraction of wanting, the contraction of self.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once that the obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain. Both of those can really come under attachment, under grasping.

So I want to experientially describe attachment or grasping—how it functions in our experience, how it affects our experience and obscures the truth.

Craving or wanting, which we've spoken about quite a bit in relationship to pleasant experience and the mind inclining towards it, could be likened to groping in the dark for something. The mind is inclining towards it. If we don't notice at that point what's going on, it just strengthens. And where we were just kind of groping for something, it's like—ah, gotcha. And then the whole train starts. That's grasping or attachment.

What is going on at the basic, very basic level of our moment-to-moment experience? You may have noticed that as complicated as we can make everything in our interpretations and descriptions, when you get down to moment-to-moment awareness, there are only six types of experience that we're having. Just flowing through over and over. We're just seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling sensation in the body, and mental experience happening in the moment. That's all. Over and over.

Broken down to that, there are the sense doors—those six. There's a sense object: a sight or a sound, a thought, whatever. And when there's consciousness, when those come together and there's consciousness knowing of it, that's called contact. Just a moment of seeing, a moment of hearing. And as we've said, then there's the pleasantness, the unpleasantness, the neutrality that comes with it. And following that, if we're not paying attention, the craving can come.

Or if it's unpleasant and we push it away, again it moves into grasping for something else. If there's just clear awareness, even in that moment of "ah, I kind of like that sound," that could just be it. It doesn't have to lead into a whole story and a whole field of suffering.

But when we're not really noticing—and this happens so fast and so frequently, quite a lot of the time—we're not really noticing, and it so quickly strengthens into this sense of attachment or grasping.

So just the thought comes up: a walk might be nice. That could be all it is. But without noticing it, there's a sense of "yeah, a walk would really be nice. In fact, right now I really want to go for a walk. I don't know if I can last through the rest of the sitting. It's really a mistake that I haven't taken a walk." And it can just lead us off into a two-and-a-half-hour walk.

It's nothing to do with a value judgment of walk or not. The whole discussion of attachment and grasping has nothing to do with the thing grasped at, but only with looking at the process of attachment and grasping itself. And as complex as the thing grasped at might become—a walk and my sense of union with nature, and after all I came here from the city and I should see it, and I haven't been over that ridge, and on and on and on—it all started just at that basic sense contact. No matter how complex any of our desires and fears are, it's starting at that basic moment of sense contact. Which is one of the reasons a meditation retreat can be quite interesting, because it gives us the chance once in a while to notice that moment, fast as it is.

This is from the Buddha, from the Sutta Nipata, which is one of my favorite books of suttas—it's sometimes quite poetic:

For some people, contact, the point where sense plus object meet, is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road.

He never minced words.

Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity, and because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact is, and so their craving ends. They realize the total calm.

He doesn't say get rid of it—simply understand our sense activity. And in the understanding, this getting lost in craving and grasping ends. We can experience the calm that is always accessible when we're not blinded by grasping.

For me, a large part of my practice over all these years has been an active inquiry into the nature and experience of grasping, of attachment, as it arises. Krishnamurti said once that unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable.

So here we have a great laboratory. Just sitting, just walking—it's not too complicated—and we really have a chance to notice the moments when grasping arises. What's it like?

Take a sitting. Simply relaxed, alert awareness, whether it's tuned with hearing or the breath—doesn't really matter—but there's not the sense of tightness. Just awake. All the various six experiences are coming and going. There's hearing, there's internal images, there's sensations, there's thoughts, there's emotions, coming and going. And there can still be just this sense of spacious, alert presence. No problem.

And then suddenly, whatever it happens to be, some experience arises, just floats up: "I wonder if I should make that phone call." And it's grasped at. What does it feel like? What's the experience? How is it different from the instant before?

For myself, I feel it actually as a physical contraction around that "I should make the phone call," whatever it is. And from that moment, there's a strong sense of separation, a tension, a discomfort. What had been just what it is—actually no analysis, you wouldn't even say there was no sense of self or other because you aren't even thinking about that—but from that sense of "I should make the phone call," it becomes a very strong sense of me versus what I need to do, versus what I want. The object grasped, the phone call, all the things. The sitting, which previously had just been what it was, fine, is now in the way. Where we might have been quite open and appreciative of whatever was happening, in the moment of grasping, that appreciation, that connection is not accessible.

Separation. Tension. Strong sense of me and other.

And if we don't notice what's going on, we tend to just focus rather on the thing we're grasping at. The whole story proliferates enormously. It's very seductive, this energy of grasping.

It's so easy to get drawn into this energy of grasping. Most of our training tells us that when you want something, if it's attainable, you're supposed to go get it. That's the obvious thing to do—it gets rid of the suffering of the wanting.

What we can do here, however, is shift our attention to what's actually going on when that grasping is present. We begin to see how it's the grasping itself that's creating the suffering, the separation, the lack of peace.

Sayadaw U Pandita, our Burmese teacher, said once that you can see ignorance manifesting in two different ways. One is that when ignorance is present in a moment, we don't see what is here—we simply don't recognize what is here clearly. The second way it manifests is that we misconstrue what we do see, and then we see something that actually isn't here at all.

This has many levels. Certainly on the ultimate level that I started with, we don't see our innate purity, and we do see a lot of separation and unhappiness and wanting. But even on a more mundane level, the way that grasping works when it arises in our experience and we don't notice it is exactly in these two ways: it blinds us to what is here—we can't appreciate what is here—and we can see something that absolutely isn't here at all.

A small anecdote. I was told at a retreat I was doing in California this spring by friends on staff that I wasn't allowed to tell this anymore, because they'd heard it too much. Well, probably not too many of you have heard it. Besides, I thought if Joseph could tell his chicken story, I could tell mine.

It's just a perfect little anecdote on a mundane level to see how attachment functions. I was at this retreat in California—it's in the desert—and I was sitting talking with another friend I teach with. Someone had come from outside to visit in the middle of the afternoon, quite hot and dry. We were having a very pleasant, relaxed conversation, quite appreciative, quite at ease, until this visitor said, "Well, I just had this great chocolate milkshake at this new place down the road."

For some reason, that particular idea just hit us. My friend and I looked at each other. We didn't have to say anything. We both knew: we've got to go now. And really, we stopped being interested in the conversation. We were answering in monosyllables, just kind of wishing the person would leave so we could go get a milkshake. Not noticing this process at all—it was all in hindsight. Because if you notice, you can say, "I don't really need this."

Anyway, we jumped in a car because we had to be back for the next sitting, and went flying down to this place, which had literally closed ten minutes before. So we're like, "Oh." But this is where the energy of grasping is really seductive—it feeds on itself. One moment feeds the next. Instead of the sensible thing, which is just to go back and give it up, we said, "Where on this road could we get a milkshake?" It's one of these strips. We've been up and down it hundreds of times. We should have known.

So I was driving, and we're driving in a frenzy. My friend is looking, trying to see where there might be something. He looks over and says, "Over there—Yogurt Cafe!" I looked. I said, "That says Urgent Care."

It's embarrassing, but true. And that didn't even stop us. We kept looking. We didn't find anything. We came back.

And then, poof, it was over. But this is precisely what's so scary about it—because it's so obvious. How much of the time is this going on when it's not so obvious? A lot. Really a lot.

So grasping distorts what we see. It brings us a sense of separation, an inability to be connected and appreciative of what's happening now. And it seriously impairs judgment. That's the very nature of it.

One of my friends spent some years with a Chinese Taoist master in Colorado, and he's always telling me different little lines this teacher used to say. One that he repeated often was, "Stop this slavish behavior." And that's exactly what we're doing when we're in the grip of grasping—we're slavishly following this mental state that says we can do anything to get whatever it is we want.

I'm using simple examples here. Of course it's much more complicated in our actual lives. And it's really important to understand that looking at the pain and confusion that comes with grasping is in no way a negative evaluation of whatever the particular object is. It's how we're relating to any object that's blinding us.

So if we could really use the rest of our days here as a laboratory to explore this phenomenon of clinging and grasping when it arises—and probably it might even come up once or twice tonight before you go to bed, you never know, certainly a few times in the next days—just see if you can remember, which is not our natural conditioning, to turn the attention away from whatever elicited the grasping and onto the actual experience arising in the moment.

Notice the physical clenching. Notice—don't believe me—look and see if you feel a sense of separation. Look and see: what does it really feel like? What's the relationship to the environment? What's the relationship to other people? What's the relationship to the object that's grasped?

And it's not about trying to talk ourselves out of it—"Oh no, I don't need this, I can do without it." Really look at the clinging, look at the grasping, because that's how we learn about it. Let ourselves experience it quite fully.

And you can also see that it's nothing to be afraid of. The experience of clinging is simply another arising appearance. It doesn't have to be so overwhelming. We don't have to get so wrapped up in it. We can turn our awareness to it, and in this way see through this obscuration as simply another ephemeral appearance that doesn't have to have this power to make us slaves.

In trying to turn our attention to this area of attachment or grasping, it's often spoken of in four different areas, just as a way to help us tune in—some more obvious than others—to places where we might not even recognize that clinging is going on.

The first and perhaps most obvious area where we get caught in grasping is around sense pleasures. Most of the examples I've been giving have been sense pleasures. It's kind of concrete, kind of obvious. We all do it.

It's interesting, because the moment we're caught in thinking, "This rice cake at tea is really going to be the thing that makes me happy"—no, it gets that bad sometimes on a three-month course—or this walk, or this swim, or this whatever. Not that it won't be pleasant. But as soon as the grasping is in the mode of "This is what's really going to make me happy," clearly it stems from that stems from — first, the delusion that there's a "me" in the first place, but I'm not allowed to talk about that too much either. That will come up tomorrow. And second, the total denial of impermanence. The notion that any particular impermanent, passing experience is going to really make us happy — this is such a way to keep us suffering.

In our society, at least here, I actually think it's a misfortune for us because we are just bombarded by sense pleasures, the possibility for one after the other. And even though we might choose to live quite simply compared to the rest of our culture, it's really easy. I find myself, if I come back from Asia or even from England, when I come back to the States — I live relatively simply, but within a few days I'm just overwhelmed by the potential for pleasant sense experience.

Anything you want to eat, you just have to go out and get it, or you can get it frozen at the health food supermarket down the road. Anything you want to see, any game you want to play, anyone I want to talk to anywhere in the world — I can just pick up the phone. Anytime I want to take a walk, it's just endless. Anything I want to buy, anything I want to wear, it just goes on and on and on.

And what this does is that instead of really being able to see the suffering, the discontent that comes from the wanting, it's just so easy. As soon as one wanting is satiated, the mind immediately jumps to the next. And if it can't get that, it just makes a little lateral trip and gets something else. It never has to last without sense pleasures in our culture for too long without finding some kind of substitute.

It's too bad for us because it makes it harder to see the point that the happiness of getting what we want isn't getting the thing we want. It's the fact that in that moment, the grasping has stopped. It's this peace that comes from the ending of grasping. But unfortunately, we associate it with the rice cake or the orange or the new relationship or the ice cream milkshake or whatever it is. And since that one did such a good job, maybe I should have two. I should have one every day. We can just keep expanding.

I think it's for this reason the Buddha — again, he could get pretty intense — talked a lot about the dangers of sense pleasures. I'm just going to say a little bit. I'm not going to go on as strong a riff as he does. I just want to give you an idea.

These are some of his examples. Sense pleasures are a piece of raw flesh, a piece of waste meat of a butchered animal that a bird might pick up in its beak. That's not the worst. Sense pleasures are a pit of burning charcoal into which we may be pushed and burned to death. Sense pleasures are a poisonous snake, dangerous beyond measure.

Actually, these next ones I relate to more. Sense pleasures are a dream, short-lived and not real. Sense pleasures are borrowed possessions — they do not belong to us, and we cannot hold on to them. That's actually more my experience. But I wanted to put out how dangerous the Buddha says it is.

In my understanding, it's not a value judgment on pleasant experience. It's not a value judgment on eating nice food or having a relationship or whatever. Rather, it's to alert us to how seductive this energy and the pattern of grasping is, and how easily we can get drawn into trying to satisfy our yearning for inner completeness by trying to fill it up, pulling in pleasant things from the outside. It's like trying to quench thirst with salt water. It doesn't work.

There's a kind of intensity of pleasure that can come from satisfying a sense desire. And I've noticed in myself that sometimes, at first, the idea of the peace that comes from the absence of grasping doesn't quite feel like it would do it. It's not quite so intense. It doesn't have the charge of the next, more intense sense experience. I think, at least personally, that can be another seduction that keeps us from seeing that it's the grasping itself that's the real suffering, that's the real obscuration.

So play with it. Here again, in this laboratory of being on retreat, when you're sitting — or maybe more when you're walking, because when you're walking and a really strong sense of something you want comes up and you feel it really turning into grasping, whether it's a phone call or having a cup of tea or taking a walk or taking a shower, it doesn't matter what it is — if you're walking, there's this sense: "Oh, I could go do this now."

It's a good thing to do. Just stop a minute. Don't say, "No, it's bad, I shouldn't do it." But stop and really let yourself, as I was saying, be with that grasping, with that whole attachment. Just feel like you're going to die from wanting whatever it is. And just stand there with it, as spacious awareness as possible, feel it in your body, notice the thoughts, let it be, and notice as it dissipates. And it definitely will dissipate, since it's also impermanent.

It might be intensely uncomfortable, because all our conditioning tells us you're not supposed to be with this. But just hang out with it, and then notice what's the experience when the grasping is completely gone. I know for me, if I tune in, it's really the peace of non-grasping. And in some ways, the same peace or even a more profound peace than if I went and did or got the thing that the grasping was about. It's reconnecting again to the peace of completeness that grasping only obscures.

So use it, and use the little things. Don't pick the most difficult time in your life, but just the little things, and watch it. I play with it a lot in my day-to-day life sometimes, when I'm not totally obscured by delusion. I do it a lot shopping, going in, looking at clothes, and this desire will come up, and I'll just walk out of the store and watch it. Of course, it helps that everything's so expensive I can't afford it, but that's another thing.

Just play with that and go out and let the desire come and go and see: my happiness is not dependent on having this thing. And there's not a negativity in that. This is not a judgment. It's just giving yourself a chance to play with this to see we don't have to be driven. The peace of not grasping might not have the oomph, but it's a lot more stable even though it's subtle.

Sometimes we get entranced, not even by the thing that the grasping is after, but the actual energy, the movement of mind, of grasping itself, is somehow entrancing, enthralling. There's a haiku I really like. I think it's by Basho. It says: "Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto." You just get lost in that longing without any sense of where you are.

I saw the movie Shadowlands some months ago and there's just one line in it that really hit me. The character playing C.S. Lewis was teaching a class and talking about the chivalric ideal of love, which was—I'm paraphrasing—that the perfect chivalric ideal of love is one that is absolutely unattainable, so that you have this perfection of longing for the rest of your life. And I thought, oh my God, what a way to live. To have the mind actually turn that longing into an ideal to be strived for is really very telling of how we can get so far afield from being able to recognize what is true, by confusing the longing itself for happiness.

This doesn't mean, and I really don't feel the Buddha was advocating, that we adopt a kind of grim negativity to any sense of pleasure or joy, or that we become grim ascetics. Sometimes, and I've experienced it in talking with people, and sometimes in Thailand, some of the monks or nuns can take the rules that are set up—which are very much made to strip away the possibility of getting caught in sense pleasures—and turn them in a way that becomes this grim fear of anything pleasant. Where a monk gets into this state of fear and negativity to even see a woman, or vice versa. And I've seen some people eating one meal a day, supposedly for restraint and renunciation, who could pack in more in twenty minutes than you would think is humanly possible. Mounds of food. It's really awestruck, actually. I don't think that's exactly restraint of the senses and really cultivating freedom from grasping.

Again from Thích Nhất Hạnh, on how to strike that balance: "We have to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. Attachment to sense pleasures can bring about suffering and entanglement, both in the present moment and the future, for ourselves and for others. The joy and happiness of a peaceful mind bring neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others." Two quite different things.

And again, when there's not grasping, the appreciation for what is, for the beautiful, is actually much more poignant. The grasping actually blinds me to the real connected appreciation. The Buddha said once that to a wise person, what is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it. It's not that we cease to appreciate, but with just the willingness to restrain the instant gratification, we can open up a whole new world of appreciation, of joy, of presence and connectedness.

So that's sense pleasures. The second field of grasping, as it's spoken of, is called grasping at views and opinions.

This one I find very fascinating, and usually most of us will hit some point where we rapidly disagree with it—when we begin to hit the view that we're really attached to.

View, in this context, means the tendency of the mind to think, "This way of looking is true and everything else is false." It's obvious when we know that's what we're doing. Where it's much more insidious is that a lot of the time we don't even know we're holding a view or attached to a view. We just honestly, deeply think this is how it is. And that's when it's really threatening.

When we're attached to a view, obviously, people with opposing views come into conflict with each other. When we're attached to a view, it really limits our world because what we tend to do in the attachment to a view—certainly we use views, but in the attachment to one—we tend to not let in any perceptions that counteract our view. We say, "This is true," and when someone comes and says something opposite, my mind immediately goes, "Well, what do they know? They don't know about this. I know. This is true."

This is something you must run up against all the time in the work that you do. It might be easier for us to see how other people are attached to their views and how their views are so clearly incorrect and based on false information. The challenge, of course—I don't even need to say it—is how closely are we willing to inquire into what's a view for us?

The real damage, the real dangers that can come in this world from rabid attachment to views and not knowing it are obvious. I don't even need to mention it, but I'll take just one example from a book that I read, just because it's so heartbreaking. Many of you may have read Randy Shilts' book And the Band Played On—how the whole AIDS epidemic began to be investigated and discovered and gradually mushroom out of control. Again, being aware that anything I read, the person writing—and Shilts was incredibly, incredibly clear—is also going to be slightly distorting information through their own view. It's just what we do.

But anyway, even within that, to see in the whole process of the disease first coming to light and the investigation of what it could be and starting to make the links between people that had it—how the information that was coming out of it being sexually transmitted, of it growing in logarithmic proportion, really scary. There are sort of a couple of heroes and heroines in the book, the people who were really discovering, just scientifically collecting the data and trying to put it out. And every single group that was at all involved was somehow being threatened in whatever particular worldview they had and not being able to let it in.

The government didn't want to acknowledge the ramifications and the immensity and didn't really fund research for years and years. But also the different scientists were at war with each other because having the recognition of having discovered the virus was more important than getting it out and getting the healing going. The newspapers, based on their view of what would attract readers, didn't really print much about it for quite a while—because people weren't that interested in reading about gay people and Haitians. Look at how much room they decided to give the whole thing with O.J. Simpson. Unbelievable. That was their view of what would sell papers.

And in the gay community, for example in San Francisco, having—as Shilts described it—just come into a real sense of not being so oppressed and being able to express their sexuality openly and freely, they got incensed at the word coming down that this was sexually transmitted and that they should close the bathhouses. "Absolutely not—this is just sexual oppression." They wouldn't hear it for quite a long time. And the blood banks also refused to hear it for years and continued to send out contaminated blood because it would be too expensive to screen it all. It's heart-rending. And that's just one example.

As I was thinking about this today—thinking how horrible, this could have been stopped—there's underlying even my reaction a view: that somehow disease isn't supposed to happen, that people are not going to get sick and die, that somehow that's going to be prevented. There's a little hit in that moment of me not really accepting the inevitability. Which doesn't mean for one minute that we shouldn't do everything we can. I don't mean that. But just really looking clearly: where are my views getting in the way of just seeing what is so?

I think that's a real challenge for me. I think it's a real challenge for all of us in opening to what is really true. It means really looking. And it's extremely unsettling.

You can know when you're really hitting something—that we don't even know is a view, as I said, we think it's true—you can know when you're beginning to get some information that doesn't fit with our views because it's scary, it's unsettling, or we get really angry, or we find ourselves getting defensive, or simply wanting to dismiss it out of hand.

A friend told me—he has been with a lot of Tibetan teachers—about this one time where a Rinpoche was giving this whole long talk to a big group of Western students about the pure land, which is a realm, a higher realm than our human realm that coexists with us now, a very happy realm where the Amitabha Buddha lives and teaches. He was describing this realm in intricate detail, on and on, the way any of us could describe this ranch and the people here and what goes on and what it's like. He was that detailed, going on and on. And then my friend said he noticed the teacher beginning to see the students kind of rolling their eyes, getting like, "Come on, why doesn't he get off it?"

He just looked at them and said, "You might think I'm making this up, but I've been there."

Can we even let that possibility in? What does the mind do with that? And that's a nice example—that's a nice one to let in. There are a lot of not-so-nice ones.

As we begin to look, we can see how what we don't even realize are views—the way we think the world is, the way we think experience is or how it should be—is based very much on our own particular perceptions of our own experience.

As a simple example, last night Joseph and I were having a little conversation, in the course of which he said to me, "Well, do you have a lot of emotions in the day? Like, how many emotions do you have in a day?" Without even really thinking, I said, "Oh, thousands." Then I said, "No, that's too many, but hundreds—oh, definitely hundreds." And I just went back to the last sitting and started reeling off, you know, twenty, twenty-five that had just come and gone in that sitting alone. No big deal, just arising, passing, arising, passing.

And he couldn't really think of any. Good. No comment.

But that's my point. There's not a right or wrong about that—although we certainly have opinions about it. The experience forms the opinion, and that will form our view about certain aspects of life. For example, a relationship. It's just how it is. If we can know, "Well, that's a view, that's an experience"—there's no problem to it. When there starts to be a right and a wrong, when it starts to come into conflict, then we can see we're taking some particular momentary experience and making it a thing, how it's supposed to be.

You can notice that a lot in practice. Mostly I notice the mind likes to have somewhere to rest. "This is how it is." It's uncomfortable to be in that "who knows?"

A lot of meditation practice—I find it fascinating to watch—either I'll hear some instruction, and immediately the mind makes up some construct: "Well then, this is how I'm supposed to be with the breath," or "This is what a sitting is supposed to feel like," or "This is what open awareness is," or "This is what freedom is." The list is endless. And then our experience either matches that or doesn't, and we suffer. Or we have some kind of "Ah, this is how concentration is supposed to be." Finished.

And I watch that happen over and over. I'll watch my mind congeal an attachment to a view and think, "Ah, that's a view. Look at that." It dissipates. And the next instant —"Ah, but now this is how it's supposed to be." Just kind of retreating one step back, but wanting somewhere to rest, wanting it to be clear. "This is the nature of reality. Give me a list."

I have a good friend on staff at IMS. He's always coming and saying, "You know, I just want the list, Carol—the ten things of how it's supposed to be and what do I do and what's freedom. Just give me the list." He's joking now. He wasn't the first time. Now he's joking, but it's sort of how our minds are.

The Buddha talked really a lot about the dangers of attachment to view and how much conflict it brings. I just want to read this one little last paragraph about it: "For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who have grasped after views and philosophical opinions, they wander about in the world, annoying people."

He thought he wasn't a funny guy.

Again, I'm not saying we don't use opinions. We have to function. We have to vote in elections.

We all have our views of what's important to do in the world, of how to work with the environment, our political views, our views of who we are, our views of family. And they're important. We need to use views to function, absolutely—but not to be attached, not to hold those views as truth.

The underlying view—this is actually the fourth field, and I'll just mention it now—the underlying view that is the delusion leading to all of our grasping is the view of a separate, abiding self. For most of us, this is something we can't actually get to, realizing it's a view, because it seems so experientially solid: our solid body, our emotions that feel like who we are, our thoughts, our experiences, our families, our relationships. I'm not going to talk extensively about this because it's very complex. But just to point to the fact that even the sense of self itself is simply a view. It's that radical—the willingness to let go of all views and rest nowhere.

Are we willing to abide free from any view whatsoever, even for an instant? It's incredibly freeing. The thought of it can be really scary. And it's radical. The Buddha went that far in saying that even his own teaching is not to be clung to, is not to be attached to, is not to be used as a view. That can kill it.

There's a very famous parable he gave, the parable of the raft, where he talks about being on the side of a river that's very stormy and dangerous, wanting to get over to the other side, which is calm and peaceful—this being our spiritual journey. You build a raft, put it all together, make this really nice raft. It's very helpful. We need it. It takes you across the river. And then what do you do? Do you look at it and think, "This is a great raft. It's beautifully made. I think I'll carry it on my back for the rest of my life"? You don't. You leave it. You let it be. And he says that's the same with his teachings.

Here is Thich Nhat Hanh paraphrasing: "I've given you this teaching on the raft to remind you how necessary it is to let go of all these true teachings, not to mention those which are not true." Don't hold on to anything. And he defines true, by the way, as not believing what he said but investigating, inquiring, and experiencing for yourself what is true peace and happiness and what is suffering—never going just by belief or just by assuming it's so because someone said it.

The same thing applies to technique. This is the third and final area, and I'm just going to mention it. A field of grasping is grasping at rituals, grasping at rites, grasping at the idea that some particular set of things we do is going to bring us freedom, is going to make us perfect. It takes real dedication, real commitment not to be blinded by our views in whatever form, not to be blinded by grasping.

Thich Nhat Hanh sometimes might sound a little flowery or nice—notice the happiness and all—but I always feel underneath a real strength: this is how it is. He says, "We are not determined enough to liberate ourselves from our deepest suffering. We remain attached to words and ideas, both in our study and our practice." The way we are with our breaths, the way we practice loving-kindness meditation, the way we recite mantras, the way we do any practice—all can lack in skillfulness. We can get caught in the forms. It doesn't matter what; we can get caught in the forms. It's not easy to give rise to awakened understanding.

And as I've said, it's not that we can assume we've seen through it once and attachment will not arise again. It happens on a moment-to-moment basis. It's the nature of grasping, of attachment, that when it arises and we get caught in it, it obscures the recognition of our innate purity.

But it's also true that this recognition, as Khenpo says, is the borderline between Buddhas and beings. This moment of recognition is the great crossroads, he says, at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives. Every moment is a potential opportunity to either get caught in our attachment—our views, sense pleasures, technique, sense of self—or to recognize what's actually going on, to recognize our innate purity.

And if we wake up from a whole nightmare of being caught in some story or some grasping or some suffering—never mind. Because this moment is again the great crossroads at which we find ourselves.

I feel like we never need to despair. We never need to be frustrated or give up. But we can never take it for granted. We can never think, "I've seen it once, finished. Now I'm just going to float in the bliss of nirvana from now on." In that moment, attachment to views arises again. In that moment, we can see it again and be free from it.

As Nisargadatta Maharaj says: "Nothing physical or mental can give you freedom. You are free once you recognize that your bondage is of your own making, and you cease forging the chains that bind you."

CHAPTER 264

Question and Answer

Carol Wilson · 45 min

> In this Q&A session, Carol Wilson offers practical guidance on common challenges that arise in meditation practice. She begins by exploring the different streams of mettā (loving-kindness) practice—the phrases, the feeling, and the recipient—explaining how these elements eventually integrate after initial experiences of them seeming disconnected. Wilson addresses the difficulty of sending mettā to those committing harmful acts, sharing Sister Chân Không's powerful practice of meditating for days to find compassion for those who killed her friends during the Vietnam War.
>
> The discussion turns to how perception shapes our experience, using the example of how we automatically create mental images when hearing sounds. Wilson explains that while this perceptual process aids survival, it can also reinforce the delusion of a solid, unchanging self—making direct sensory awareness a valuable practice for loosening our fixed views. She also addresses questions about dreams in practice, the persistence of intense mental states after retreat, and the effects of mettā on its recipients.
> Wilson provides detailed guidance on working with intention (cetanā), cautioning against trying to catch every intention before each movement, which can create tension. Instead, she recommends settling back and noticing what arises as predominant experience, using bigger movements like turning or standing as opportunities to observe intention more easily. The teaching emphasizes fluidity and relaxation rather than rigid effort in mindfulness practice.

The question was about doing metta as a concentration practice and two different experiences of it. Sometimes the focus is very much on the phrases and they're very clear and it feels very concentrated, though not particularly emotional. Other times it's a real heartfelt feeling that doesn't feel so concentrated.

When there's that heartfelt feeling, are you aware of the phrases or the beings you're sending metta to? Yes, exactly—sometimes both at once.

This was my experience too. There are three streams of focus: the feeling, which comes and goes; the phrases; and the person you're sending metta to, or all beings. I found that at times one would really be highlighted, or maybe two, and it seemed kind of awkward, like they weren't all coming together.

But they do all come together. I remember it took me ages where I could really focus on the phrases and the sense of the person, but metta just wasn't there. I didn't feel hateful or anything, but I wasn't really in the feeling. After some time, the phrases themselves became imbued with the feeling. I'd have to pull back and focus, being really clear with the phrases or the person, and begin to feel the meaning with each phrase—consciously feel the sense of myself meaning that phrase. Not as a heavy thing, but just a reminder.

For some weeks, it was like jumping back and forth, and then they all came together. So don't worry. It is like that with the different streams.

Another question came about sending metta to all beings. When mentally scanning the earth or thinking about different beings, sometimes it's difficult because there are many beings now doing horrible things, and it's hard to send loving-kindness to them.

Very true. Are you doing loving-kindness as a full-time practice, or just at times during the day? Part-time—yes, it is difficult. And metta is meant to be done in the way that's easiest. That's why before we do all beings, when we're going through ourselves, a benefactor, a friend, the last being we come to is the difficult one—someone doing atrocities or someone we've had a hard time with in our life—because it is difficult to really genuinely feel the connection of loving-kindness with a being like that.

So first, know that this is normal. Second, don't try to push it or do the most difficult metta first. If I sit down and I'm not really in the flow and I think, "Well, I'll send metta to the people killing each other in Rwanda," I can't get to metta with that. It's just too appalling.

But if you want to work toward that, at a time when you really are feeling the loving-kindness flowing, start in the way that's easiest and then gradually expand. In working with difficult or hateful people, we still try to tune into their lovable aspects with metta. That's hard, especially with people you don't know—when all you know about them is the horrible things they do.

For me, I try to tune into the fact that whatever they're doing is from ignorance, and in some twisted way, what they're doing is somehow what they think will bring them happiness. Or they're doing it out of fear of retribution for themselves.

Sister Chan Khong, who works with Thich Nhat Hanh, has some beautiful passages in her recent autobiography where she talks about times during the war in Vietnam when their friends had been killed by grenades or deliberately killed by people from either side of the conflict—they never knew who. She would have to write eulogies for them, and she would meditate on it for days until she could feel some sense of connection with the people who had killed her friends. It could take a long time.

One time, she got to a place of understanding because someone had survived and reported that the killers had said, "We have to do this." She took that and really meditated on it until she felt that they were doing it because if they didn't kill her friends, they themselves would be killed. So it's like out of fear—and you can come to understand the humanity even behind horrible things. That's one way to access it.

But again, for doing loving-kindness here, the practice is really to cultivate the feeling in yourself and begin to spread it out—not to be super-metta warriors, beaming with love for all beings every moment. So don't force it. If you're getting tight around it, pull back and do what's easy, what comes clear.

You identify it and probably picture it. But it's likely a survival mechanism in a way—you know what's making the sound and whether or not it's a danger to you.

"So I guess what I'd like to know is, is there any advantage to knowing sound in some other way than that? Why would one cultivate the capacity for just hearing sound with no picture of it and no identity?"

His question is about sound, but it really applies to all the senses—that when the sound arises, he doesn't just hear the sound. There's an immediate mental picture of airplane, and they almost come together. You never just get the sound without that. It might be helpful to know it's an airplane as opposed to something potentially dangerous, so perhaps it's a survival mechanism. Is there any point to knowing just bare sound without that arising image?

There can be. It's true that there's the immediate perception of what it is and then the superimposed mental image. There are really three different things going on there, but it all happens so quickly. We are really geared to the perception—the recognition, the identification of what it is. Definitely, it helps us a lot in our day-to-day life to know what's what, what's the sound, what's the sight.

The danger of it, and the reason it's helpful to just recognize hearing as hearing at times—and it happens sometimes in a long retreat where that visual image might not arise—is because our perception is not always accurate. Many times, and we'll talk about this more, we might be responding to a sound and the mental image that arises is actually not what is creating that sound.

In an even more subtle way, many of our perceptions give us the sense that we're a solid, unchanging self. And it seems really true—that's the arising image or thought or feeling that arises with sense contact over and over and over. So we think, "This is me, I'm solid." That's just the truth. And we can go through life in real delusion.

So certainly, a lot of what we're doing when we say "just come close to the sense contact, just notice what it is"—it's not to deny the perception, but it's to bring in the possibility that our perception might not be accurate. It opens up a whole field of investigation. It jars us loose from the solidity of thinking we know what we are. So it is very helpful.

"Well, an interesting observation in relation to what you just said. Yesterday, in listening to sounds, I heard a lawnmower being started up. It sounded like a car that wouldn't start. And then finally, it started."

Exactly. We can get ourselves into a lot of trouble by misperceiving. That's really one of the roots of ignorance.

Okay, we need to stop. So have an insightful day, free of misperception.

I want to make a few more clarifications in our ongoing illumination of the nature of practice.

"Do you reflect about dreams when you wake up in the morning, or not at all?"

The question is about dreams. Does one—or do I personally, I'm not sure which—reflect on them?

"No, just in practice, because I've experienced that sometimes dreams showed me some strong patterns of behavior, identifications, goals, and so on."

So it's about the skillfulness of reflecting on one's dreams when you wake up. Can it be helpful? She goes on to say she has found it very helpful in illuminating patterns of behavior and roles—or should one cut it altogether?

I think at times, as you described, it can be helpful if the reflection is really kept to a minimum. For myself, it's not every dream by any means. It certainly isn't getting into dream analysis. In most cases, I can treat my dreams very much like my thoughts—okay, it's done, it's over, there's nothing to think about.

Occasionally, though, you can feel that a dream has some power in it, that there really is some strong sense of intentionality or some pattern revealed in it. I usually tend to feel that emotionally. If there's something lingering when you wake up, then really pay attention to that. You're paying attention to what's happening in the moment—that lingering, that sense. A short reflection can be helpful, the same as a psychological insight that might arise in your sitting. We give some conscious reflection time to it.

With reflection though, really be aware—I find the actual usefulness of reflection time is pretty short. And then what we're calling reflection becomes "oh yeah, and that happened, oh yeah, this, and then..." It's the same thing—just spinning. It's not reflection anymore. It's just letting off into thinking.

So be really watchful for that difference, and it's usually shorter than we think—like one thought we need for reflection, and then it changes quality.

The question is about whether yogi mind states can persist after retreat. I suppose I need some clarification. Do you mean being in tune with aversion, or do you mean out of control aversion? Or desire? That kind of explosive quality?

So you mean getting locked into some desire or aversion about a particular person in the retreat and then for the next year having no way to change your mind. Hopefully nothing is that solid and unchanging that it will persist the same without movement for a year. But as I said last night, that sort of exaggerated quality of wanting or aversion—we call it yogi mind, but as I said, we could also call it staff mind, or a teacher might experience it. We all experience that at times in our life, when we find ourselves doing really stupid things or really out of control. We've experienced that exaggeration of mental state.

So it certainly can happen out of retreat. And I think I have experienced coming out of a retreat—not for a whole year—but maybe for a little while after the retreat, it can vary where I haven't quite sort of closed up or balanced up again at the end of the retreat. Because in the retreat we get very vulnerable, very open, with exaggerated mental states. And also we kind of regress, so that around November, you know—exactly, she put her thumb in her mouth.

So everyone's internal rhythm is different, and it's possible for retreat to end and we're still back there, you know, at two and a half. That's one of the reasons we have integration week—to sort of get the armor back on. So things could be a little exaggerated afterwards. But that you'd stay locked into it for a year? I don't think that's so likely unless you're really not looking at it for a year. Or there's something that came up in relationship to that person, some really deep wound or some deep holding or resentment that is still there and you're not really seeing, haven't really moved through, and so it's still active. It just is more practice. I wouldn't worry about being out of control from now on. No, no, it passes.

The question is some confusion about whether in doing metta, it's just for the cultivation of that quality in ourselves, or if there's some magical aspect where the metta really does affect the people that we're sending it to. I don't know if I like to use the word magical.

Technically, in doing it, it's a cultivation of intention in our practice. So in the doing of it, I'm really cultivating the intention that truly wishes well to myself or whoever, the person. I'm not at all focusing on a sense of effect—that if I really wish well, then the person's suffering will go away, then they'll be okay. It's really bringing the attention to the intention, for that feeling, that mental state, that brahmavihara to arise in us more and more easily.

And on the other hand, it is said in the commentaries that if you're really, really concentrated, it does affect the person. And certainly there are many stories of the Buddha. Like there's one story where by the power of his metta, he stopped a raging elephant. He just stood there and this elephant was raging, killing everyone in its path. And he just stood there and radiated metta. The elephant felt it and stopped.

And actually, often after a retreat or after a period of doing metta, I've had the experience where it seems magical, where I'm going out in the world and just doing my thing and people respond with this real warmth. A friend once was watching this and didn't know what had been going on. She said, "What is in your body? Why are people being so nice to you?"

So something definitely does communicate and is felt, but in doing it, the focus is on our own intention, not trying to change. You can't change someone's karma.

And if I do that, then it would change all the time. Should I just drop the noting altogether?

The question is, as he's with the breath and noting with rising and falling, but he loses rising and falling. Changes to hearing or changes to something else? Changes to something else—it's almost like the in-breath seems like it's falling or something, or else he's getting confused.

I see. So somehow you're still in the experience of the breath, but rising and falling doesn't seem to fit what's actually happening. But you're continuing to note rising and falling, and it gets confusing.

I'd certainly say if you're noting anything like rising and falling and it doesn't seem to be matching what's happening, leading to mental confusion, it's not helpful. As soon as the noting starts to somehow seem that it's not fitting, it pulls away from the sinking into the experience, which is the point of the mental labeling in the first place.

So if you're finding a dissonance, and that's creating any kind of mental activity, maybe at that point actually drop the noting. I mean, for this point with the breath, because you could really start thinking, "Now does it feel like rising? Last time it felt like falling. Now is it rising?" You know, it's like, please.

If you really know it's hearing, note hearing. If you know it's pressure, note pressure. Or otherwise, you could just be very carefully with the breath, and when rising and falling seems to fit again, use it.

I'd say that's in distinction to, say, noting rising, falling, or in-out, which seems to fit, but you're noticing a lot of other sensations. For example, during the rising, you might notice there's pressure, tingling, burning. Don't try to note all of those sensations—that's not what I'm saying. I'm just saying when there's this dissonance.

Noting is never meant to lead to more thinking or analyzing. That's not the point. If it gets like that, just simplify. Use a really generic note like "sensation" or "emotion" or "thing happening" just to get your attention into it.

Another question is about doing metta practice while walking. When one is doing full-time metta practice or any of the Brahma-viharas, you do it all the time—sitting, walking, eating, whatever you're doing. And if you're not doing it full-time, it could still be quite fine if you're doing it, say, once or twice a day here now, to do it while walking.

Essentially, it's just the same as sitting. You're walking back and forth, the same as in the Vipassana walking, but you don't pay attention to the walking. In other words, the mindfulness is not with the walking or your physical sensations at all. You do exactly the same thing: you bring up a sense of yourself if you're sending it to yourself, or the benefactor, or the friend, whoever. You really do just the same—you hold the image of the person, have a sense of it, although please do walk with your eyes open. And repeat the phrases, and if the feeling is there, sink into that. It's exactly the same.

In that walking, you might find you don't have to focus so much on going slowly. Often you can tell people who are doing metta because they don't have that slow mindfulness of their movements that happens when you're being mindful of mind and body in Vipassana.

Sometimes I find for myself, when I'm walking with the metta, even if I'm staying with dear friend, starting with myself for five or ten minutes and then moving to the dear friend, I might find that if it starts to feel a little tight or encapsulated, and say a chickadee goes by or a dog comes by, then just for the next set of phrases I'll send it to that being. It's just a nice way of opening it up and connecting to whoever's around. Somebody walks by, a squirrel goes up the tree, whatever. I found myself sending it to the crickets a lot last year. It's just a way to open up the field a bit but still be connected, and then again go back to whoever your subject is. It's fun doing it in the city.

Quiet day. That's nice. That's how I feel too.

You're keeping a graph.

So that I'm not feeling full at the first sitting, but I'm not starving at 10:30—something like that. I can keep going, working to that end, trying to not feel too full and not end up being hungry. Is there anything you have to say about that? And also, is there some innate benefit in just not eating a whole lot—like not eating dinner? I could pay attention to hunger, hunger. I can do that, but is there some innate benefit?

The question was about eating. It's really two questions. One is he's just sharing that he's in the process of finding exactly the right amount to eat—so he's not too full and not too hungry. I don't have a whole lot to say about that except please don't get too tight around it, because it changes all the time. The balance shifts. Some days you might, if you really pay attention when you're eating, come to sense: okay, that's enough now. Rather than looking outside and trying to think about how much food would be enough.

The second question is whether there's some innate value in, say, not eating much—for example, not eating dinner. He says he knows he could just be with hunger, hunger. But is there some innate value in that?

Really exploring that is one of the points of taking eight precepts. You know the eight precepts—the one that really changes things for us here is that you don't eat solid food after noon. Of course, all the monks and nuns, all ordained people live that way. And in Buddhist countries, anyone who is coming to a monastery or going on a retreat, most retreats are conducted in that manner, where you don't eat in the afternoon.

It's different for different people. I myself, of course, lived that way for a year or so when I was in Thailand. And I found, for myself and given my body type, it was really fine. I found I didn't actually need any food after noon. And it's not just noting hunger, hunger. Actually that passes fairly quickly, at least it did for me. And it wasn't this actual craving for food. What it did was release this whole amount of energy and obsession and mental thought that went into food—what can I have, when will I eat, how much will I eat. From noon on you just knew that was something you didn't think about. It actually was great. It gives so much time and freedom, really. Like when you fast, all of a sudden there's so much time in your day that you didn't have before. Not eating in the afternoon can really open that up.

And it also, of course, is very instrumental in showing us relationships we might have to food, or to fear of not having enough. Of course, in monasteries you don't see other people eating in the afternoon because nobody's doing it. So that's harder here.

But I must say we haven't been pushing it so much this retreat because we've also found that for quite a few people, on a long retreat, it's physically quite difficult for them. We have quite a few friends who lose a lot of weight when they're on eight precepts and get a little bit weak. And it's not so much obsession in the mind, but that physically it's hard on them. They come back from Birmingham, Joseph comes back twenty pounds lighter. It's hard to imagine—where does he lose it from?

So we're not pushing it, but personally, I found it very interesting to play with. My first three-month retreat I ever did, you could decide to do it or not. I did it, I think, for about six weeks. And I had a kitchen job putting out the tea. One of the maintenance guys, who's since turned into one of my good friends—but I didn't know him then—every day I was putting out the tea, he'd come in and make a cheese and tomato sandwich. And every day he'd go, "Carol, you want a cheese and tomato sandwich?" I was craving cheese so much. And I'd say, "No, Rodney, I'm on eight precepts." The next day, the same thing. It went on for a month.

It was a real test. It's worth playing with.

There's no guarantees with these practices. You don't say, okay, I don't eat dinner and I suddenly drop three levels in samadhi. There's no guarantees. Certainly, overeating is one of the five obsessions with senses that the Buddha talks about. And in this society, mostly we're not too heavy on the starvation side. So I would say, if you have a lot of questions coming up about it, explore it for yourself. But there is no automatic formula where if you don't eat after noon, your practice suddenly gets better. Sorry.

One of the techniques for dealing with sleepiness is to visualize white light, which is true. Bringing light into the mind is supposed to help. But not everyone finds it easy. I think different techniques might work better for different minds. For instance, some people can visualize very easily and some people can't. So I don't think there's one technique that's easy across the board.

You might try, though I wouldn't make a big thing about it, visualizing like a circle. Just imagine seeing it, so to speak, rather than trying to bring it in. Imagine that you're seeing a circle of white light. Don't push too hard, and just see if it expands. Go to the other techniques if it doesn't help. Or sit with the eyes open and then when it's light inside, close the eyes.

Yesterday morning, in response to a question about working with angry thoughts and the difficulty of not getting caught up identifying with them, Joseph recommended dipping down into the body level, the sensation, to feel the contraction. Someone tried this and found it was fine in the sitting, but in the walking they got into some sense of struggle about how much to stop or when to start walking again.

The thing is, if it's really strong, these contractions, so strong that you want to stay with it instead of starting to walk—then it becomes standing. So what? Standing is fine. Stay with it. Let it be there, really explore it. You might find, you know, it's not like we do better however many walking passes we make. We're not keeping a record. So if you spend the whole walking period and you only go from here to there, but you're present, great.

You might find, though, as emotions come and go, as the feeling begins to fade but is still present, you don't have to wait until it's totally, completely gone to start walking again. When it's not so engrossing, when it's not catching your mind so much, when you still have some background sensations but they're no longer overwhelming—you can go ahead and reconnect with the walking at that point and start moving. If the anger zooms up again, stop again. That's my song. It doesn't need to feel like a struggle. Just be with what's predominant, not some idea of what you should be doing.

One practitioner raised a question about working with intention—not the intention propelling the practice, but intention itself as an object of awareness. He'd been starting to work with it, and it seemed like there was just too much to do now before every step. There's feeling, and feeling goes away, and then keeping track of thinking—it felt like everything was getting jammed up. Was it useful to let go of noticing thinking?

This is what starts to happen: you begin to realize it's not just adding intention as another thing to notice. God knows there's an intention before every single movement or thought. You're not going to notice all of them. Trying to catch every one—this cat-at-a-mouse-hole kind of energy—isn't so helpful because you get really tense. It's like jumping into the next moment. What am I missing? I'm missing it. Just settle back. You're not going to catch every intention, just as it's quite difficult at times to notice every thought. Things are happening so quickly. And in fact, as the practice goes on, rather than feeling calmer, you might notice just more and more things happening—seventeen million, or is it trillion, in the blink of an eye. That's how fast. So there's no way we're going to notice them all.

Working with this practice, yes, it is helpful to notice intention. It's extremely helpful because it's that link that really helps us see cause and effect. It really helps us see how the mind gives rise to some intention and the body moves. There's an unpleasant sensation in the body; it gives rise to some intention and the desire to move. Just this cause and effect—it can really lead us into a deeper experience of impersonality, of anattā. You see how we identify with the intention, but it's really just another arising phenomenon based on conditions. So it is very useful to explore, just as thoughts are.

But not to set up the idea that now you're going to notice every intention, or now you're going to notice every thought, or every sensation when you lift your arm. We work with a sense of settling back and relaxing in this moment, and then noticing what arises as predominant experience. So sometimes intention—maybe before turning or before beginning a step—might be more noticeable. Maybe you don't notice the intention because there's this big thought of "I'm so sick of this," and that's the predominant experience. Do you see what I mean? It's having the fluidity of momentary concentration to notice what's up.

If we set the mind too strongly looking for intention, you might notice more intentions, but the thoughts could be completely derailing your mindfulness and leading you into judgment. You don't notice it because you're so busy looking at intention. It's subtle.

Someone observed that the feeling of intention is subtle—you need to make some effort to look for it. You can, but pick big movements. For example, the ones I use a lot when I'm first starting and haven't begun to feel it, because it is subtle. It's hard to describe. It's not really physical sometimes. It's sort of a mental click.

It's hard to describe. It might be physical, it might not be. It can be different for different people, and at different times for you it can be different as well.

So pick large, obvious movements—say, about to stand up, or about to start walking. When I'm walking, if I'm not yet at the point of noticing the beginning of each step, I can really try to notice intending to stop, intending to turn, intending to start again. You can play with it during walking meditation. It's a good place to explore this. Just stop. And see if you notice what that feeling is just before you take the step.

I know Joseph has this story about how he was waiting for intention one time while walking, and he stood there for half an hour because he couldn't find it. So you can do that—there's nowhere to go. And you might be feeling it without knowing it. You might be looking so hard that you're not just noticing what's already there.

So just pick big things. Reaching, turning—those are good ones.

Have a mindful day filled with intentionality.

CHAPTER 265

Question and Answer

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this comprehensive question and answer session, Carol Wilson addresses a wide range of practice concerns that arise during intensive retreat. She begins with skillful approaches to working with memories—from fleeting recollections to deeply suppressed trauma—emphasizing the importance of feeling emotions fully in the body while noting mental content without getting lost in story.
>
> The discussion explores the subtle resistance and fear that can arise as practice deepens, particularly around states approaching absorption. Carol points to how the sense of self has an 'incredibly intuitive way of catching us,' and how true trust in practice isn't about knowing what comes next, but rather a letting go like leaves falling from a tree. She addresses the difference between breath meditation at the nostrils versus the abdomen, noting tendencies toward concentration or mindfulness with each approach.
> Practical guidance is offered on working with anger toward others in the silence of retreat—emphasizing returning to one's own bodily experience rather than rationalizing or prematurely applying compassion. Carol also clarifies the nature of intention (cetanā), explaining how intentions arise moment to moment and condition subsequent mind states, rather than single intentions controlling outcomes. The session concludes with discussion of how physical sensations can arise without emotional content, and how thoughts can pass without identification—illustrating the natural arising and passing of experience when clearly observed.

The question is about how to skillfully work with memories—strong memories that come up over and over with emotion attached and story. Is it skillful sometimes to really go into it in a cathartic kind of way?

There are different qualities and intensity of memories that come up, and I think how we deal with them can vary depending on that intensity.

For example, when one sits there are often floods of memories—everything from when you were two years old, just little snippets of stuff. They might have a little feeling attached, but they're not really killers. And then you can just really notice it: seeing, or remembering. If there's a feeling, an emotion attached, definitely notice and note that, always. But then let it go.

Then there's more intense ones that really come back over and over, up to the level of intensity of maybe past trauma that's been repressed. That can surface as memory on retreat. And that's a whole other level. The strongest level of real suppressed trauma can at times, when it surfaces on retreat, blow you away. It just can be too intense, and so there's different ways of dealing with it. You certainly can't just say "memory, memory" and dismiss it. No way. And going into it is, at times, unavoidable—but at times going into it is too overwhelming and you need to skillfully back off. So that's a whole other level.

The medium level, and this happens a lot on retreat, is strong memories coming up with visual images, words, thoughts, and emotion attached. I think there's a balance. I find when a strong memory keeps coming over and over, or any strong thought, for sure I would note "remembering." But I'd also be really careful to feel, notice and feel, and really fully allow in my body the emotion that's happening with it. To let that happen for as long as it happens. To be wary that in noting "remembering," I'm not sort of pushing it away and saying, "Okay, stop now. Right, there's sadness. Right, okay, on to the next thing." But really feel in the body, bring the attention into the physical experience of that emotion, and note it and be with it until it fades.

I'm a little leery of saying this, but I will anyway. Once in a while I've found that some particular strand of memory—that comes maybe in a lot of different ways with a strong emotion associated—has a feeling that there's something underneath it. Once in a great while, really once a retreat, I have found it useful to actually stop, reflect on it a bit, go into the content. Not so much thinking about it, but let myself really notice the content of all these memories, because it's usually a lot of different ones. And underneath, often there's some psychological understanding about myself or my personality patterns, or some way I've been relating throughout my life to a particular experience. I'm getting that information through the different memories that are coming up and the emotion.

But as I say, that's once in a great while. Mostly, by far, the real understanding—both psychological and more on the level of dharmic truths—has come from simply allowing it fully to be there, the expression of the memory, but not going into thinking about the content.

But yet there's this little subtle resistance that I can't get into it, because I'm afraid it's the old Catholic in me or something that doesn't want to give it up. I've heard Bhikkhu Kamala talk about possession and all of this. I don't know where I am. But I mean, just real journeys. Nothing needs to be noted. It's all happening by itself. And it's extremely pleasant.

The question is something about trust and songs in the mind. The sense of I—that's what I get from it.

Well, the one piece I guess is it seems like the experience is happening by itself, perhaps moving into what might be perceived as a deeper level, which we can't necessarily trust that one. But the sense of subtle resistance in the mind—maybe it's manifesting in all these whacked-out ways like songs and this and that, or the kind of fear of just letting go and letting the process happen. Is that sort of the nub of it?

It's a good point. You're right, the resistance, that sense of I arising and passing. It seems to have its own intelligence—or lack of, I would really say.

That's our practice. If we could at any moment completely, completely let go of any attachment whatsoever, no matter how subtle, in that moment we'd experience our true nature. There would be no problem. And theoretically it's simple. But your question really points to why, in some ways, we do this difficult practice—so many of us, our whole life—because the subtle clutching itself, or the resistance to whatever's happening, can be experienced as the sense of self. And you're right, it seems to have an incredibly intuitive way of catching us so we'll grasp at it. It's got just the right way for the resistance to come up that will really grab at us, or just the right song or whatever to make us get sidetracked, or fear, or whatever.

It's our practice. And the sense of trust isn't a trust that I know what's going to come next. That's what we usually tend to think of as trust—if I do this, then this will happen, it's familiar, I know what it means, and I can relax. The trust is like when the leaves flutter down: they don't know where they're going to land. They don't know what's going to happen. They just let go of the tree, and that's it.

So intellectually we can know that. The subtle resistances that come up, the fear—all of it's just part of the show. None of it is something we have to get rid of. None of it. That having to get rid of is just another agenda. But the simple opening of the attention into the resistance, into the fear, even into Popeye and Olive Oyl—it's just stuff happening. And you're right, it does it all by itself. You and the resistance. Just somehow we can learn to trust that much.

So, it's time for walking. Do you have any questions about your practice?

Yogi: I've got a question about the breath as an anchor, and some considerations about observing the breath in the nostrils versus the abdomen. Here's some background: for me, it's easier to get concentrated with the breath in the nostrils. However, there's one drawback to that. There tends to be a component of visualization. So it's not body in the body with the breath—it's sort of seen with the breath. And that leads to conceptualization. My experience with the breath in the abdomen is that it does ground you more, connect you with the body, and tends to be more conducive towards mindfulness. What are your thoughts on that?

His question is about using the breath as an anchor and the differences he's noticed in his experience between being with the breath in the nostrils and in the abdomen.

What are my thoughts about that? Of course, there's no one way for everybody, for sure. Just one question: when you talk about being with the breath in the nostrils and there's this component of visualization, is there also a component of physical experience? Are you using noting? Do you note the visual as seeing?

This is something I don't have a lot of experience with, though I've just been noticing it lately. Certainly one isn't right or wrong. I think there is, for many people—not everybody, but for many—a tendency with the breath in the nostrils where some can find it much more focusing, but the other side is that for some people it feels much more heady, and for different reasons could lead into more thinking or more tightness.

Whereas in the abdomen—again, this is not true for everybody all the time, so please don't think your practice should be this way—moving into the abdomen can be a kind of deeper moving into the body. In some ways it's a larger experience and it might not seem so finely focused. That's my experience. If I'm moving with the abdomen, I get much more into mindfulness of all the various things that happen. I don't stay with it as one-pointed as when I'm with the breath at the nostrils.

And I've heard—I'm not sure this is gospel truth—but I've heard passed down that one of the reasons Mahasi Sayadaw really taught noting the rising and falling at the abdomen is that you have to really fight to get up to your nose from there. One reason I've heard is that they thought people tended to get too one-pointed and concentrated at the nose, and the idea is to open up to all experience, not just hone in.

But the thing about the visualization—that can happen at the abdomen too. That happens for me. Or with any experience where you think you're feeling it but there's this visual overlay. If you can not think of that as a problem but note precisely what the experience is—if it's the feeling tone, note the feeling; if it's sensation, note that; but when the visuals are in the forefront, just note seeing—then it doesn't matter. You're within a foundation of mindfulness. Maybe not the one you want. Does that make sense?

The next question is about whether, when many sensations are happening in the body, it's fruitful to let the attention be with them in changing patterns as they're happening, more or less at some points abandoning the breath. Or should you try and go back to the breath anyway? And similarly, should you try and stay with a sensation until it ends, even if a lot of other things are happening?

This comes up a lot. As always, there's no absolutely tried and true answer, but the tendency would be that we're not trying to control what we pay attention to or to control experience. In other words, we're using the breath as a way to steady and focus the attention—or the body, or hearing, whatever you're using—but it's not because the breath is better. It's not that we want to stay with it, and the better your sitting is the more you're with the breath. That's not true at all.

Everyone's practice will differ, and your practice will differ at different times. But there will be times when there are a lot of sensations or a lot of visualizations or a lot of things happening, and the attention can be quite present with each one as it occurs by itself. Know what's happening. Don't try to hold on to the breath at all—it's just another form of trying to control experience.

There can be times—I know I'll take two breaths, and it might be twenty minutes before I'm noting breath again. But I've been noting consistently, steadily, that whole time. It's just that so many different things are happening. So if a lot's happening and you can be with it, know what's happening. See what happens to it.

Fine. If you're trying to be with a lot of sensations and it turns into a mishmash where you don't know what's happening—you know a lot of sensations, but you're nowhere, not able to land on anything or truly know it—that's when you consolidate and go back to the breath.

Similarly, if there's a lot happening, don't try to stay with any particular sensation until its end. In a way, that's a kind of holding on. There are going to be times when no matter what you do, you don't see the endings of things, and you can't change that. There are times you'll only be with something in the middle—just when you know tingling, a pain arises somewhere else, and just when you know burning, itching arises. It's just like that.

The mind doesn't like this. It wants to know, "I'll just stay with this until it ends, and then that." But it's simply not like that sometimes. Again, if it's going really fast and you can't tell what's happening, that's when you come back to the breath. But then let go of it and open up again, and you notice a lot.

One student shared: "I thought I discovered something very useful just now. When I'm with a very strong sensation of pain, whatever it is, I discovered that when I go back to the breath and concentrate there, the pain really diminishes. It becomes secondary."

She discovered that with strong pain, when she went back to the breath and really stayed with it, the pain became secondary, and that was quite wonderful. But now she's concerned—could this be used as a form of avoidance or control?

It could be. But it also can be skillful. See, this is what's so complicated. What's happening for one person is different than what's happening for another, which is why these question periods are tricky. You can't take what's said to one person and necessarily apply it to yourself.

In working with strong physical pain, it most likely isn't going to change really quickly or just go away when you notice it, especially early on in a retreat. There's a balance between moving into it—noticing it very carefully and gently, but fully present with it, noting it, noticing whether it's burning or tingling, what happens to it, with a mind that's non-reactive, just being there—and knowing when to step back.

When the pain lasts some time, the mind can begin to tighten. You begin to get aversive or you're just fighting with it. It's skillful then to go back to the breath and let that pain recede, reconnect and refocus, calm with the breath. That can be very skillful. When you again notice the pain, though, it's not to hide in the breath, but to then move back, explore it as if for the first time, and then again return to the breath as a way to keep the attention soft and pliable—not to avoid what's unpleasant by just staying with the breath.

Does that make sense? And keep talking about it in your interviews, because it will clarify.

Notice how even sitting inside we're so affected by the wind. We're not separate at all. I think it's interesting to notice.

One student asked about merit—what the term means. Joseph had said a little bit about it, that it's not gold stars, and that helped. And then he said, well, it is. The questioner couldn't remember what came after.

I actually don't think I'm the right person to ask, to tell you the truth. I'm being really honest. It's a concept that I don't relate to very well, and so I actually don't want to say something because I don't think I could be that helpful.

Another student began: "I've got a question, but I'll give you a preliminary question first. The key to the whole thing is that the five skandhas are all impermanent, and I go, yeah, yeah, yeah. But then you get to consciousness. The Buddha asked, is consciousness permanent or impermanent? And yeah—but wait a minute..."

That's not my experience. I mean, it may be somebody's experience, but consciousness feels continuous to me. It's a sticking point for me. So let me ask you a two-part question. What does it mean to say that consciousness is impermanent? And even if it is, why is that unsatisfactory? Why is that dukkha automatically, necessarily?

His question relates to the sutta Joseph read last night about the five skandhas being impermanent. He's saying that in his own experience, he doesn't experience consciousness as being impermanent. And he's asking, why is that unsatisfactory if it is impermanent? He also said, you know, if we all understood that, of course we'd be enlightened. And that's true.

Just because you don't experience consciousness as being impermanent—and I think that's the whole point of our practice, not just consciousness but any of the five skandhas—even if we intellectually understand or think we understand that it is impermanent, or we intellectually say no it's not, neither one of those makes much difference. The whole thing of the practice, the reason we do this, is to keep exploring, keep looking, really with an open mind, to viscerally, over and over, experience what your actual experience is—consciousness or whichever of the skandhas.

If you don't experience it as impermanent, that's great, because you're really looking at what you are able to tell for yourself and not trying to make your experience fit an image. And so if you keep looking, I think you'll see that it is impermanent, but it's so subtle. All of the skandhas are arising and passing much more rapidly than we typically notice. And in some ways consciousness—that arising of knowing that arises together with whatever is known—is a very subtle thing to even notice, to have that be the main thing we're aware of. It's very subtle.

And so the identification with it is also quite easy to arise, that sense of "I know." Even though the knowing is coming and going, somehow that identification can easily come with each knowing, and there's this sense of continuity that actually isn't there. It's sort of strung together as a subtle memory from each last one. But the most important thing is not to believe it because you hear it. Keep looking, keep looking, keep looking.

And why is that unsatisfactory? You could think of unsatisfactory not necessarily in the nature of immense suffering, but unsatisfactory in the nature of there's nowhere to rest. There's nowhere to take a stand. There is nothing but just this constant, constant moving. A sense of satisfactory would be some place to finally land—ah—and there isn't. There just isn't. So I take it personally at that level of unsatisfactory. But don't think about all this too much. Just keep looking. Just keep looking.

The next question was about helpful hints on skillfully dealing with anger that arises at the perceived unskillful behavior of others, especially in silence.

The question is about anger arising in the mind and heart, especially in relationship to other people here—something which no one else has experienced during these weeks—and how to deal with it. One thing she did was try compassion, which often doesn't cut it at that moment. Another was sort of saying, well, it's my ego bumping against the other person's, and that didn't do it either.

I was thinking, actually—you said bumping into it—maybe someone's used that image before of how they clean potatoes in Korea or something. They put them all in a huge, big barrel of water and just keep stirring them around and bump them all into each other. And that way they get clean. So for some reason that occurred to me in the sitting room. I must have been picking something up.

It is in the kitchen, yes.

Really, the thing is coming back to the fact of the anger in your own experience. Both of the things you mentioned are sort of rationalizations. And compassion toward someone when we're actually angry is a way of trying to sidestep accepting the anger. It doesn't work for just that reason. You know, "may you be free from suffering"—but you're the one who's suffering.

Compassion toward yourself might help, but the first step really is to just tune in to your own body-mind experience and accept and tune in to the fact that anger is arising. Feel it in the body, notice it in the mind, keep coming back to the physical experience. Note it very clearly, because that can help you stay there and not go off into the story. If the story's hooked into self-righteousness—yes, they really are, that person really is acting like a jerk—that self-righteousness can really keep feeding it.

And often here in the silence, it works both ways. Because of the silence, you can't really work it out with the person. I actually think that's a gift, because then we come back and really deal with what's going on in ourselves about it. Whether or not it seems justified in terms of the situation, unless something incredibly harmful is going on, mostly there's no need to say something. It's really a chance to work with the experience of anger in ourselves. And it's not easy—it's really painful.

So it's really about pulling back that sense of needing to blame, needing to figure out who's right and who's wrong, which is so much what we try to do. And knowing that in the world, of course, we would be able to get in touch with our own anger, see what's clearly so, and not act out of a deluded attachment or fear from the anger. But when you can really be centered in the experience of anger, be with it, let it come—it does fade, and then we can act in a more appropriate way without all the fire in the mind of anger.

Here there's just a lot of opportunity to be with what comes up in ourselves and take back the blame that we so easily put out on whatever the situation is with the other person. And not blaming oneself either. Seeing that conditions have come together and I am really angry. Okay. Feel the anger. That's okay. It's simply coming up. We don't have to hate it, and we don't try to sidestep it, but really be in it without being driven by it. And notice—it doesn't last all that long. It might come and go, but it doesn't consume us necessarily the way we think. It might feel like it for a while, but that's really our work here. It's a good one.

Just a practical note: if you feel anger is consuming you and you're going to do something, please talk to one of the teachers rather than act, because we think we're acting when we're calm and often we're not. That's one of the reasons we really ask everyone to just stay in your own experience, because it's so easy to affect each other so much anyway. Even in reaching out to do what we think is nice, we have no idea what space the other person is in. It can escalate amazingly because you don't know—you don't know how sensitive and open you are now. The slightest nuance sets up huge reverberations in each other's minds and bodies. It's just how it is right now.

Question from the room: Why is it that we really can't be objective in seeing where we are right now? You just mentioned we're a lot more sensitive than we realize, and I've seen from experience that that's true. But why does this just feel like normal, everyday life? In a way, now it actually is normal everyday life for the next few weeks—it's just the same. I see things, I hear things, I feel things, I think things. I don't talk, I don't read or anything. I always have a sense at the end of a retreat that I've wasted my time. Really. I've done about fifteen retreats, and at the end of each retreat it feels like a waste of my time. Often it takes months, and I'm still seeing subtle changes, subtle ways I'm relating to life differently. I've never really understood why you just can't see that happening when you're in the middle of it.

You know what I'm asking? Why does it seem so normal, and why can't we tell in the middle of it what's going on? Why can't we be objective?

When you say you feel like you've wasted your time at the end of each retreat, but then you see changes later—does that mean you don't feel like you wasted your time once those changes appear?

No, it's just a feeling I have. I used to think it was counterproductive. But now I've progressed to the point where they just feel like a waste of time. I realize that's just the impression.

Right, clearly. Actually, in a way, in my mind you've answered your own question. Saying that you feel it's a waste of time is an impression you have. You know that's not actually how it is for you. That's sort of how it is on retreat.

We're not objective because we're not objective. We're identified. We are so in the middle of experience, whatever our particular experience is—even though that can change wildly from day to day—but we're so in the middle of it. And we're getting really inside, so delicate, so subtle in what we're experiencing that we're not relating to our experience as if from an outside reference point.

Because we're saying, quit comparing, quit thinking about what it was like six months ago and what it'll be like when you're back in daily life. Just be totally here in this experience. And so without that outer reference point, there isn't really anything to compare to. So yes, it feels like daily life. And in another way, you don't really have the tools here—and it wouldn't be so helpful anyway—to be trying to assess what's actually going on.

It's sort of like you're in a boat and you've been put out to sea, and you've lost sight of the shore, which is your daily life. And you haven't come to the other shore, which is back in your daily life. You're just at sea, and the little things that happen at sea are everything. There's nothing to bounce it off of, to see.

So, for example, when something happens and you get angry, you might get so furious. And if you could compare it to daily life—well, if that person cut across my walking path, would I be murderous? Probably not. But the experience is so vivid, so real, that we don't stop and make that comparison, which is fine. It's not necessarily helpful to make it. It's more useful to just go into the anger and be there. But we are losing touch with our daily life, our regular ways that we assess experience. And since everyone else here is doing the same thing, it seems really normal that we don't.

So, have a normal day. Tonight there will be a talk, but there won't be a talk tomorrow night. Not normal. Pretend today's tomorrow.

Are there any questions this morning? Quiet minds finally. This is it, the last moment, the peak moment of your whole retreat.

One thing I wanted to say, sort of as an adjunct to the talk last night: there's still quite a lot of time left in this retreat, but it might be a good point—just a feeling I've been getting sitting here and talking to people—to notice in a very gentle way if you've fallen into certain habits of how you're relating to your practice. Not routine necessarily—there's nothing wrong with a routine—but it can become a rut. And a rut can be comfortable even though it might be difficult.

You might have established a certain habit of how you're relating to practice that, for instance, might have felt like wise effort and now is really pushing. Or you might have had to back off a while ago, and now you're in a routine of being good to yourself but you're actually really spacing out.

Our mind so easily forgets that each moment is fresh and new. We think we've discovered the right balance and we don't have to look anymore. We don't like it that every single moment requires fresh presence and fresh looking.

I don't mean to make a big deal out of this, but it's something I've noticed in my own practice a lot. It's very easy to think I've got it figured out and be in some kind of a rut—hide in a rut, even though it's not a comfortable one.

So, please continue.

Questions about working with intention or noticing intention arose. Someone had set the intention to have a seamless day but had a terrible morning, and wondered if the intention was one of desire instead of a so-called good intention.

I think it's complicated. For one thing, intention is arising in almost every moment. So I could say, "I have the intention to have a seamless day." That could be arising as desire in that moment—an intention associated with desire. It could be an intention associated with resolution, which is skillful, or intention associated with aversion. That thought manifesting as intention could be associated with many different mental states. It might have been a skillful one or not. I can't know, not being there. It might have been associated with desire.

But even if it's extremely skillful, resolute—"I will have a seamless day"—that's arising in one mind moment. That intention, that single one alone, cannot control what happens in the day. It's like the next mind moment, that intention might not arise. An unpleasant sensation might arise. There's aversion. And there isn't really the intention, say, to notice it, and we get carried off.

So it's much more complex because so many intentions arise with every thought, every speech, every action. We're not going to notice them all. And each of them can be associated with any of the mental states.

Not to be discouraged. Sometimes it sounds like—as in the story of the strength of the bodhisattva's intention last night—"I will someday be a Buddha." Well, that didn't happen that morning. It was eons and eons of so many lifetimes and so many ups and downs. That intention might have run like a thread, arising over and over again in all those lifetimes, along with fear and lust and hatred and generosity and all the other things.

Someone asked whether the intention had come and gone or whether it was continuous, making a thread.

It arose again. That intention could make it likely for a similar intention to arise in the next moment, and for another similar one to arise in a later moment. So it's the thread of conditionality, of cause and effect. It's not that same one intention, but the strength of it could make it arise again.

Just as the strength of our intention to be mindful here—that might give rise to mindfulness in the next moment, and then the next moment might be a total space-out. Suddenly we wake up again, mindful. Again there's the intention of mindfulness arising on the strength of it having been conditioned. But it's not the same one making it happen. It's happening over and over and over. One moment conditions the next.

So a clear intention like having a seamless day—that doesn't mean the day is going to automatically be seamless. But you might notice you're spacing out ten minutes later, half an hour later, and it would make it easier for the intention—"Right, I want to really be clear today"—to arise again, and to arise again later the next time you notice you're spacing out. Do you see what I mean? It's much more complicated than just "I have it and then it happens."

And when we don't notice or make a clear intention, then the intention for discouragement, the intention for restlessness arises. We don't notice it, and the next moment's more restless. Another intention with restlessness arises. The next moment's more restless, the next moment's more. We're not noticing it, but intentions are still arising and strengthening the ease with which that mental state arises again in another moment.

She's saying the mind and body seem to be separate in that two different things are actually happening. One, sometimes she feels physical expression of emotion, but there's actually no mental or emotional content. So it's physical experience, basically, with no emotional or mental trigger. And other times she's experiencing very strong, ugly thoughts, but no physical or even emotional manifestation. They just come and go like a flower.

I wouldn't say that the mind and body are disconnected. I mean, those are two very different experiences. And sometimes we can have emotion that expresses itself physically, and there is no story going with it. It's just what it is. We're so used to having a story that we want to make one up.

And I would even caution you. There are times I've experienced what I would call fear in the body. But when I really looked, it wasn't fear. There was no fear going on. It was just physical manifestation that had nothing actually to do with fear. And I was calling it fear out of old conditioning.

So I would look, if you can, when you have a strong physical manifestation that feels like anxiety. Really look and see if there's actually no anxiety there. It may be simply physical experience. It's not separate from mind because the knowing of that is nāma, is the mind. There's the knowing and there's the physical experience. They're not separated. But it's not always that there's an emotion and there's a feeling in the body and they have to happen together, or that every feeling means an emotion.

And similarly with thoughts. What you're experiencing is really just the fact that a thought arises and passes. It can be just like a balloon. It just comes and goes and the content makes no difference at all. You weren't identified with that thought. It just kind of—ah, that was really ugly. Ah, that was really beautiful. Gone. Nothing.

And again, at that moment, that isn't a physical experience. That's a mental experience. But it doesn't have to be that we grip on and have an identified emotional reaction to every thought that appears. In fact, it's beginning to see that thoughts arise, that sounds arise, that sensations arise, that smells arise. No difference. So that's quite common.

I'm just saying, don't assume. Don't assume that because you have a little quiver, it's anxiety. Really look.

We make so many assumptions from past conditioning. This is a great deal of what keeps us in our not seeing clearly, in our delusion. So I'm not saying it is or isn't anxiety, but really look. Don't assume. Don't assume it's anything. Be with the actual, bare experience without any interpretation. And just see what happens to it, how it behaves. Watch it come and go.

CHAPTER 266

Question and Answer

Carol Wilson · 42 min

> In this intimate question and answer session, Carol Wilson responds to practitioners' inquiries about various aspects of meditation practice and the broader context of Buddhism's transmission to the West. She reflects on Thích Nhất Hạnh's teachings about saṅgha and the importance of mutual support in keeping the Buddha Dhamma alive, noting how Western Buddhism is evolving away from devotion to individual masters toward a more community-centered approach.
>
> Wilson offers practical guidance on working with the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā), particularly the balance between energizing factors like rapture (pīti), investigation (dhammavicaya), and effort (vīriya) with calming factors such as concentration (samādhi), tranquility (passaddhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). She addresses how to skillfully work with strong energy before it becomes restlessness (uddhacca), suggesting techniques like one-pointed attention on the breath or careful attention to pleasant and unpleasant sensations.
> The discussion explores the relationship between citta (mind/heart) and how Western linguistic distinctions can create artificial separations in experience. Wilson also addresses the common retreat experience of intense emotional reactions and periods of confusion, encouraging practitioners to stay present with these states rather than avoiding them. She discusses how deep inner practice gradually permeates outer experience, even when visual perception continues to appear solid and separate.

So welcome to our lovely New England winters. It goes on like this for months and months. Any questions about your practice?

Anything I might say would be my own opinion and interpretation of what he's saying, which I don't think I should presume. I think he's being inspirational and speaking to what he sees as the need now for mutual support and growth in keeping the Buddha Dharma alive, and in continuing to deepen and find ways to bring Buddha Dharma into practice in our present-day world, in our present-day conditions.

Right now, at this moment, if we're waiting for a Buddha to come down the pipe in the next eon, we're kind of putting it off. And what we have to look to now—it does seem to me that if we're looking to one person, at least the way things are going in the West, looking to one teacher to exhibit perfection, we do have eons to wait.

It seems that more in the culture of Buddhism coming to the West, there's a growing sense of having to not pull back from teachers entirely—the sense of devotion to masters can really awaken our hearts—but the practice of giving over to a master all perfection keeps being blown apart. I don't even have to go into it, but you know what I mean. One master after another gets caught in some kind of scandal—sexual, money, power, whatever—and it's been continuing this fall. Not here, of course. But then we don't claim to be any kind of masters. Couldn't get away with that.

So this is totally my sense of what he's saying: use teachers, use great beings, but spread it out to appreciate and support one another as a sense of sangha. I mean, it's really amazing. Everybody here, a hundred people—really a hundred and twenty if you count the ones coming for the first six weeks—so devoted, in whatever form it takes in each of our minds, to awakening, to living a life of integrity, a life of harmlessness. It's powerful. That's what I think is going to help awaken the planet. And so that's my view of what he's saying. I could be completely off.

As for what's happening as Buddhism comes to the West and starts to grow, I have an opinion, though I don't like speaking first.

There are different aspects of Buddhism in Asia. There's Theravada Buddhism, which is basically what this practice comes from, and that's more Southeast Asian. Whereas Zen, say, is Japan, Korea, used to be China, and there's still some in China. So there are different facets. I certainly am more grounded in the Theravada tradition.

If you look at just the countries that were the real strongholds of Theravada: Sri Lanka is in the middle of a civil war and really struggling. Thailand still has a lot of practice, as does Burma, but Burma is in an atrocious sort of civil war. Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam was a stronghold of Buddhism—it's sort of decaying, with politics taking over. In many ways it's not dead by any manner of means, but it certainly doesn't enjoy the flourishing support that it did quite some years ago.

So yes, it does seem like Buddhism is moving out of the Southeast Asian countries and more into the West, and of course changing as it does so. Because at least in those countries there's the support of the culture. For instance, in Thailand, if you say, "I'm trying to observe the five precepts in my daily life," that's more or less understood, respected, and supported. And here, if you say that kind of thing in a lot of situations—you go to a party and you say, "Well, I don't really drink, I'm observing the five precepts"—you're kind of looked down on sometimes. So there's not quite the same support here culturally, but maybe that's what Thich Nhat Hanh was talking about. We can help it grow. Opinion, opinion only.

As for the observation about Buddhism not really taking hold in certain regions, I certainly share that observation. At least, I know the Vipassana scene—I don't know Zen or Tibetan as well—but it certainly seems to me to be more than predominantly white middle class.

And so I can't speak from within the Black or Hispanic communities. That, I think, is actually part of the limitation—a group of white middle-class people brought at least the Theravada Vipassana over and started teaching it, and it seems to be emerging from within that particular culture. I don't know if it's partly about the leisure time that's necessary to devote to this practice. I can't speak from other cultures, so I can't say why it hasn't taken root there. I certainly share your observation. It's only a small pocket, and it hasn't spread throughout the country or taken root in all the different cultures. There are so many cultures in this country. So it's a severe limitation. I really agree. That's all I can say.

Question from a participant about studying continuously with one teacher in Theravada Buddhism in the States.

Continuously? Well, I know that Bhante Gunaratana has a small monastery retreat center in West Virginia called Bhavana Society, and I think he's there quite a good deal of the time. I know people who have gone and spent a year or so there, so that would be under his guidance to some extent. He travels also, but that would be one option.

In this little Vipassana world here at Spirit Rock, the teachers are pretty much on the move, and it's mostly discrete retreats or sitting groups. Lucila Nanda, again these are both monks, is in the Bay Area of California, but I don't believe he has any kind of retreat facility. If you don't want to stay at a retreat facility, you could live in Cambridge and practice at the Cambridge Insight Meditation Center with Larry and Ryan on a day basis. There's lots of that kind of ongoing connection if you settle in a city where there's a sitting group—you could have continuous contact with a teacher. There's not a residential facility that I can think of other than Bhavana, and maybe Ajahn Sobin in Southern California.

The teacher then addresses the group.

Please sink into your practice. Seriously. You're not doing yourself any favors by thinking about all this stuff. There's nowhere to go. Please, we're still in silence. You're not doing yourself or anyone else any favors by talking. I really hope we don't have to say this every day for the next three weeks. Please really settle into the practice. You're here—really be here in this moment. It's the only moment. Anything we're thinking of a month from now is only a thought. It doesn't matter how powerful—it's only a thought. Really just be here now. That's all there is to do. And it's everything.

A participant asks about the separation between body, heart, and mind in how the teachings are presented, and whether this separation dissolves with deepening practice.

And with less deepening practice it doesn't exist either. It seems to be a distinction in your experience between the mind and the heart. I think in my experience too, and I think in a lot of us, there seems to be a distinction between the mind and the heart.

I think part of it is actually a linguistic distinction we make here in this country that's unnecessary. The word citta in Pali is used for both mind and heart. There's not like... and often mind is pointed to here. So I actually, well, I'm rooted in this culture, but I think we certainly exacerbate that sense of difference talking about the mind, the mind. When we talk about metta as the practice of the heart, okay, that's a way of speaking that I think can exaggerate that seeming distinction. It's a way of also bringing home the fact that many people talk about their practice, experiencing it all in their head and as if seeing it from the head. And we're a very head-oriented culture.

In my experience, though, it's true, as my practice goes on, I begin to experience everything as if it's arising from here, whether it's thoughts, sensations, whatever—that there actually isn't a distinction. And I remember one talk Sayadaw U Pandita gave, I don't know, sometime when I was sitting, where he actually talked about that, which surprised me because I didn't know if it was just my own weirdness, but actually he talked about how that's how it is, that everything arises from the heart, so to speak. It's not actually arising from the physical heart. It just seems that way.

But you can even begin looking now rather than thinking, "Oh, if my practice deepens, I'll see that distinction fall away." You can even notice many ways that we are creating, through the way we describe experience, through the way we perceive or interpret experience, that we're creating the sense of a distinction.

All I can say is it's true and it's difficult using language in a way that doesn't create dualism. Difficult. I find it impossible. Don't let yourself get hung up on words, whether it's words you're hearing from us or the way they're being interpreted through your own experience. When you notice you're having a hang-up and it seems to be around words, it's not worth getting caught in it. Really, it's true. Drop it and go to your own experience and see what's really going on.

The next question is about when he feels strong energy or so-called positive energy rising, and at some point he notices it changes to restlessness. Where before he didn't catch it until he was about to jump off the cushion, now he's catching it sooner, wondering if he's doing something wrong or if it's just happening or what.

It's a good question because it points to one of the ways that we work—I mentioned it briefly in my last talk—which is balancing the different factors of the seven factors of enlightenment. And one of the balances is between the tranquilizing factors and the energetic ones. One easy way to look at it, though it's not always this simple, is the balance between energy and concentration.

So often what happens as all the factors are building, as mindfulness increases, energy can get very strong. There comes a lot of energy in this practice. And often when we don't see what's happening, the tendency is to just let it build. If the energy gets really high and we don't quite notice, we're paying attention to the energy, but there are actually ways that we can work to bring up, to balance the energy with concentration, with calm, or with equanimity, rather than let the energy just keep building. If it builds too much without that balance, it does turn into restlessness.

So it's not like a right or wrong. It's just really to notice the way these mental factors are arising and how they work together. So for instance, when you can feel building energy, if you can, when you notice it, bring in mindfulness—really continue to note it, to be aware of it on a very steady, ongoing basis. And you can also bring in concentration. So for example, if there's strong energy and it's in a sitting, and it's not to restlessness yet but you see it sort of building, you could get a little bit one-pointed on the breath for a while—not to block out the energy, simply to bring in some concentration and calm, and then open up again. Or if you're doing the walking, you can get really absorbed in just feeling the bottom of the feet. This isn't a forcing. You're not trying to force the energy down.

You're using that energy in the service of balancing the practice—balancing mindfulness and concentration. So that's one way to work with it. And really, that's what all the instructions about restlessness are trying to accomplish. At this stage of retreat, when you're noticing the subtlety of energy coming up, you can bring in some one-pointed concentration or some equanimity. If you see there's energy and you're starting to become really reactive to whatever's happening, start really noticing pleasant and unpleasant, liking and disliking. That's one of the ways—not that it makes equanimity come automatically—but noticing the reaction, noticing the pleasant and unpleasant, tends to bring more of the spaciousness of equanimity into the mind.

One question that arose was whether acute awareness of pleasant and unpleasant is itself a sign of restlessness. Not necessarily. You could be very clearly aware of pleasant and unpleasant and be totally equanimous, or you could be acutely aware of subtleties and really what you're noticing is the reaction itself. Those are two different things. But even suspecting it might be restlessness suggests there's some to-ing and fro-ing around the pleasant and unpleasant, and you're noticing it on a more subtle level. It doesn't have to be restlessness—in a way it is restlessness, but we're also starting to see what actually goes on, how subtle this pulling toward the pleasant and avoiding the unpleasant really is. It's extremely subtle. It's happening on levels far beyond just the huge, obvious desire and aversion. So it's really helpful to see it. When you start to feel like you're truly lost in the reactions, that's when we need to work with equanimity.

Another sign of restlessness isn't always physical. It's the mind jumping all over the place, or worrying—an agitated mind. That's another manifestation.

Someone shared that a few times during this retreat, she'd had hours of almost hysterical reaction to sensations, waking up the next morning thinking, "What was that?" You know, sensations become unpleasant and the mind really goes into aversion or fear. She felt almost embarrassed to say it. But you're not alone. Almost everyone, at some point on retreat, has times when they feel like they're going off the deep end. It's part of it. It's not a mistake. You could say it's an imbalance, but it's actually a necessary part of this process.

If you were just even, even, even all the time, you'd never truly get the suffering of attachment and aversion. You'd never understand how much we're gripped by wanting things to be the way we think they should be. If we could see it all neat and tidy, we'd never really get it. So for some reason, part of how this process works is that things become incredibly exaggerated. If you pull back the next day and look, it seems extreme. But in that moment, the forces you're gripped by—they're exaggerated in relationship to the particular experience. They're not really exaggerated in relationship to how they actually run our lives.

In a way, you're seeing it on a microscopic, exaggerated level. There is an imbalance for sure, and we're really identified and caught in those times when we feel like we're going over the edge. That it comes back to balance in a day or two—that's fine. If it goes on for a month, okay, something is out of balance and needs to be adjusted.

One student shared, "I cried for two hours about sensations I felt in my body and the awesomeness of life. And then the next morning I woke up and thought, God, they were just sensations."

I know. And you don't normally do that, right? That's why we come here, so you can have such an experience. There's also a kind of beauty to this—it's not always just difficult. In a way, we get so sensitive that sometimes we can be crying or seem imbalanced out of just an appreciation of the awesomeness of life. As you say, many of us don't often feel or experience life with that level of connection and vulnerability consciously in our daily lives.

It really is, in some ways, like peeling away layers of protection or confusion—or just not quite feeling or seeing through them when we're so busy and running around. So I don't think that's exactly yogi mind. It's part of the process, an important part of it. And sure, the next day you think, "Just sensations, what's the big deal?" That's true from that vantage point. It is. But at the time it's happening, it's a valid, real experience.

So just be as present as you can within it. You don't have to say, "Hey, come on, this is just a sensation. What am I weeping about?" You don't have to do that. But just keep the balance. If you can stay somewhat mindful—know that you're crying, know the feeling of awesomeness, know the sensation, know if it's pleasant or not—just keep coming back. That's really all you need to do, and not worry about it.

Another student asked about the energizing factors—rapture, restlessness, excitement. She mentioned feeling a lot of energy arising, knowing it's near the end of the retreat, and then refined her question to ask more about rapture.

When we talk about the energizing factors, usually we refer to the helpful ones, which doesn't include restlessness and excitement. When we discuss the seven factors of enlightenment, the energizing ones are rapture, investigation, and effort—or energy itself. They're best understood, all three of them, when we realize that they're balanced with the calming ones: concentration, tranquility, and equanimity. And then mindfulness serves as the overarching balance for all of them.

What can feel like restlessness—an overabundance of energy—in gross terms can be physical, or it can manifest as that feeling where you just want to run around and talk to people and do things, this really high energy. Rather than seeing it as something to get rid of, when we've been in deep practice, we have the facility to bring up the calming factors to balance that, rather than just blowing it all out. That's a lot of what you all actually have the potential to explore and play with now.

One thing about this kind of high energy is that it turns into restlessness when we don't bring in mindfulness. Notice the energy. Turn the mindfulness into being present with feeling and noticing the energy, rather than saying, "Oh, this is uncomfortable, I have to do something about it." You can use concentration—not in a stifling way, but in a calm way. If in the sitting your mind's all over, just count the breaths, one to ten and start over. Or in the walking, just walk very aware of the sensation of the foot rather than trying to take in too much. That can sometimes bring in a little bit of one-pointedness, which can help balance the excitability.

Notice it, and know that it's contagious. It really is. We think we're these separate beings, but actually we're just not separate. We pick up each other's energy, and that's part of why coming to the end of a retreat—no matter how committed you might be, how deep in your practice—there's no way the mind doesn't start thinking, the body doesn't start picking up each other's energy. It's just the law of nature. But what we can do is not hate it, keep being mindful of it, keep balancing it.

Now, rapture per se is an energizing factor that can manifest in different ways.

And one way rapture manifests is just this really keen interest in what's going on. Not the kind of interest that we manufacture—"Let me get interested in the breath" in order to bring in some concentration—but those times when the breath is just sparkly and you are simply drawn into it and it's so fascinating. Or excitement, or whatever's happening. This kind of real keen, deep interest—that's a manifestation of rapture. As are lots of weird physical manifestations that you wouldn't necessarily think of as being rapture.

Marjorie raised a question. The more she sees, the more she's struck by the split between her inner experience and her outer experience. Over time, there's no question she experiences the inner as something real—her eyes able to experience everything that happens, healing, life, everything. And then she opens her eyes and everything is the same old solid. She was curious why the inner doesn't translate to the outer. It doesn't seem to.

Yes, hopefully they will continue to come together. Her question is how the inner doesn't translate to the outer experience—meaning internally she can experience herself as being nothing but energy, impermanence seems clear, and when she opens her eyes, solid and normal again.

First of all, it can be different for different people. But I also experience that sight is in some way the most solid sense. I can just know there's nothing but energy, but the interpretation that goes along with my sight is really deeply ingrained.

But first I'd say that now it might seem like the inner doesn't translate to the outer. And certainly we need to function. If we went through life and all we saw was pulsating energy and we really couldn't bring it into form, it would be difficult. There are moments—I've had moments when it is like that on retreat, and I'm really glad I'm on retreat and don't have to function. That's, I think, one of the purposes of this intense so-called inner work.

And I say "so-called" because as we continue to practice, that functional division between inner and outer, which is helpful, we more and more begin to experience as a functional interpretation. Even if I open up and see things as solid, the experience that that's not how it is becomes more deeply understood—more cellular, you might say.

You're right, we've spent at least this lifetime so conditioned to see things as separate, to experience things as separate, that that conditioning springs up. It's a very strong habit. And even a few years of sitting and practicing and really deeply experiencing in a so-called inward way that it's nothing but energy, there's no solidity, there's no permanence, it's all connected—we open our eyes and it's solid. A few years of that isn't enough to make the whole conditioning we've had go away.

But it begins to become more permeable. You can see it's conditioning and don't necessarily believe it, but we can use it. And we can use our practice—the formal practice—because I don't think practice stops when we stop sitting or when we walk out of here. The experiences and the deep understanding, the visceral understandings that come over and over and over through the deep inner looking, do begin to permeate the way we live and the way we relate. You might not experience everything visually as that, but the understanding of what's so is what begins to permeate. You'll see it really does start to change how we relate.

Another practitioner shared something along the same lines. Sometimes sitting here he feels very confused, doesn't know what's what. So he tries opening his eyes and there doesn't seem to be confusion. He shuts his eyes and there's total confusion. Opens them again and there's no confusion. He hasn't been able to figure it out—wondering if he's walking around confused all the time in his everyday life.

I don't know. All I can say is keep looking. In a question like that I certainly can't say. But when you're sitting with your eyes closed and noticing confusion, can you just note it and be with it, or do you open your eyes because you don't like it?

He said it takes him a while to realize that it's just confusion. Once he starts noticing it, it's clear it's confusion, but he's still feeling it. So he got curious—what happens if he opens his eyes? It was a way of exploring that.

It just wasn't clear to me what was going on between opening my eyes and shutting my eyes. That's why I was interested in your perspective.

I could make things up, but not knowing quite your experience, I wouldn't want to. I'd say, since it was confusion, of course you're not clear what's going on—that's the nature of confusion. My tendency would be, not to focus on what's happened, but to hang out with confusion more rather than trying to move out of it. Really keep exploring confusion until you get familiar with it. Then when you open your eyes, you can have it sort of in the back of your mind—okay, things seem solid, things seem clear—and just maintain an open sense of awareness and notice if there's confusion with that too.

Also, I know for me, that sense of the world springing into solidity that Marjorie was talking about with opening the eyes is a very strong experience. So it might be that that just gets so strong it takes you out of the confusion of not quite knowing what's what. I don't know if that's particularly helpful. It might be good to hang out with not knowing what's what.

When things are starting to dissolve?

Yes, different things. One is, again, with every experience—every sense experience, every mental experience—it's actually happening so quickly that it's not like I'm looking at you and it's one long solid experience. It's visual image arising, you know, 17 trillion times in a second. Just as internally with the eyes closed, as the mind gets more concentrated and more still, there are times when the perception is of things coming incredibly quickly—arising and passing, arising and passing. The same is true of the visual field. There are times when the mind is quite concentrated and still that visual experience can begin also to be coming and going. And there are also periods in practice when what is noticed is the dissolution of everything. It's just that way for a while. And that will include the visual as well. Everything just is dissolving.

Hopefully it will pass?

Yes. And until it does, don't drive down the freeway.

Please really appreciate this day. When we fully appreciate something, we don't hold onto it when it ends.

CHAPTER 267

Patience and Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers profound guidance on how mindfulness (sati) and patience (khanti) serve as essential allies in the practice of awakening. She explains that the Buddha's teaching points us toward recognizing our essential completeness—a radiant nature of mind that cannot be created or destroyed, only remembered and recognized in each present moment.
>
> Wilson illuminates how we habitually look in the wrong direction for peace, mistaking pleasant conditions for happiness and treating unpleasant experiences as obstacles rather than doorways to freedom. She describes how feeling tone (vedanā)—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality of each experience—becomes an unconscious filter that shapes our reactions and keeps us spinning in confusion. Through vivid examples, including her own experience of how a small pain in her toe spiraled into self-judgment, she demonstrates how bare attention cuts through layers of interpretation to reveal what is actually happening in each moment.
>
> The talk explores patience not as passive endurance but as an active, openhearted engagement with experience—a quality intimately connected to loving-kindness (mettā). Wilson emphasizes that the proximate cause of patience is seeing things as they really are, particularly the truth of impermanence (anicca). She includes moving poetry to illustrate how opening to change, even when sad or frightening, allows us to experience genuine connection and aliveness. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, she concludes by pointing toward the unconditioned—likened to the space in a room—which can only be recognized when we stop grasping at the objects within it.

It looks a little bit from here like the honeymoon is over. Starting to look a little serious.

I want to talk tonight, in a kind of general way, about mindfulness and patience.

You may know that one of the translations of the word "Buddha" means "one who is awake." And that is appropriate since this practice is a practice of awakening. Awakening, in the first place, to simply being awake in this particular moment of our life. To start really being here—vital, alive, not sleepwalking through our lives. And on another level, awakening to the potential for profound inner contentment. To awaken to our essential nature, that of completion: nothing needed, nothing can be taken away. To awaken to that reality here and now, in this moment—always and only in this moment, nowhere else.

And in that recognition of our essential completeness, the natural manifestation in our speech and actions, in our intentions in the world, is that of compassion, of love, of manifesting a recognition of our interconnectedness.

Mindfulness is, in a way, our doorway in—our beloved friend, in a way, to this recognition, over and over and over. I deliberately say "recognition." We're not creating some state of peace brought about by certain conditions, because when those conditions change, that peace would also change. So we're not trying to get to some certain pinnacle. What we're practicing here is a way to help us really land fully present, open and wide awake, here and now in this moment, no matter what's happening. And whatever it is that's arising in our experience in this moment—that experience thus becomes our doorway into that recognition, or perception, or resting in our inner unity and completeness.

So you might, over the days, have even had a moment of mindfulness already since you've been here. It's possible. It doesn't matter what's happening. Maybe you're just putting your foot down and really feeling those sensations. Or maybe you're hearing the rustle of leaves or the sound of the rain on the roof. Or maybe you're drinking a cup of tea. Maybe you're just stretching out to go to sleep but you're really still aware. It doesn't matter what's happening. But in that moment of mindfulness, of deep connection with whatever experience is arising—without interpretation about it, without pushing into the next experience, without somehow holding back—take a moment of stepping. Just that clear, full presence of sensations, without story, without resistance. It can be so exquisite, so alive.

And in that is a glimpse, an intimation of what the Buddha called the radiant nature of our mind. It might not seem like anything so special, and we tend to then think, "Wow, walking is so great. I'm gonna walk for hours now and forget the sitting." Of course the next minute that's gone. Or you think, "The rain is so wonderful. I hope it rains the whole retreat because the sound of it really wakes me." Some of you have the reverse: "The sun is so beautiful. If only the sun would come out, my heart would open up and I would be able to experience the true unity of myself and all life."

In that moment, though, without the story I just put around it, in that moment is the glimpse of what the Buddha called the radiant nature of our mind—potential for real peace, for true happiness within present moment experience, not in spite of present moment experience. In this way, we could say that this is a practice of freedom. We're not creating it, but we're recognizing, over and over and over.

But just as the Buddha said the mind is naturally radiant and pure, the next line of that particular quotation is that it is obscured by temporary obscurations from time to time. You may also have had a glimpse of that over these few days. Both of these are the nature of our life and the nature of our practice.

The Tibetan teacher Nyoshul Khenpo said once that the main purpose of these dharma teachings is to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind, as well as how the deluded mind works. You see, we're doing both of those. When we are talking up here, we talk about both of those—both equally important aspects. It's actually easier to talk about how the deluded mind works, because it's hard to put words on the nature of the non-deluded mind. We can only sort of point.

So what happens? There's that vivid, wakeful clarity, pure presence, no sense of conflict or struggle. And the next moment it's gone. We become distracted. There's a sense of struggle with our experience, a sense of conflict with what's going on—with ourselves, with others, with the environment. Something seems to have changed. This radiance is hidden.

It's so hidden, it's like we can't even believe it ever existed. And then we become lost in this struggle to somehow make it come back again and stay here—for the rest of the retreat, if not the rest of our lives.

There are many different ways to talk about what happens as we move into this sense of conflict and struggle. I can really just talk a little bit about one way tonight; this is really what we talk about for three months.

One thing that's happening here goes back to what Steve was speaking about last night—the different types of happiness. I feel that basically, until we really begin to look at and be with our experience with mindfulness, being with what is without trying to interpret and analyze it all the time, until we really are investigating our experience, we don't really know what happiness is. And so we continue to look for peace, look for happiness—in my mind I put it in the wrong direction. We keep looking where happiness, true peace, cannot be found: in changing temporal conditions. Over and over we get caught in it. We're looking to pleasure for happiness, which again is one of many changing conditions. So we put our attention on the wrong aspect, the unhelpful aspect of experience.

When we have that moment of clarity, so easily we look to the circumstances, to what the particular sense experience was, and look to that as the source of that sense of peace in the moment. Whether it's the weather, whether it's the food, we look to having the proper room, the proper sitting, the proper schedule. We are affected by other people's behavior. If we could only get everybody else in line, then this retreat would go like cake. And pretty soon, we're just moving into the real potential for the hindrances to get out of control.

I just want to mention that this tends to come up on retreat. We start to get notes—total love notes, total hate notes—usually signed "Metta." I'm not kidding. "If the person next to me doesn't stop breathing so loud, I'm going to strangle them. Metta." We get notes like this. And in that moment, the suffering in that is genuine. We acknowledge the suffering. But the source of the suffering is not being seen clearly at all. And that's where we get so lost, where we get so into a sense of conflict with what's arising—external, like other people, or internal.

The sitting has pain in it. The last sitting, the thoughts were kind of quiet and wispy, and now they're like a freight train and I don't like it. Or there's pain in the body. Or I think the breath should be really smooth and light and yogic and sattvic, and instead I'm gasping here like I'm strangling. I don't like it. This again, internal or external—whatever it might be, it may be a really unpleasant experience, but none of this is going to last longer than that. It's all in constant flux, and we keep focusing on the outer or inner, on the changing experience. We're looking in the wrong direction. We have a mistaken idea of happiness, of peace, and that mistaken idea can keep us spinning in suffering and confusion. It has kept us spinning in suffering and confusion for a long time.

The conditions, the arising experience, are not the problem, not the source of the distraction or the real confusion. The radiant nature, our real nature of completion, is not affected one whit by whatever condition happens to arise. But what is affected is our ability to remember this, to recognize it. That is affected really strongly by arising conditions. We get so engrossed in struggle with what's happening that we simply forget that peace is accessible even within this experience.

My favorite simile for this is like being in prison. You have a room, you have some furniture, and you're so busy trying to make it as comfortable as possible—it might be a little bit like here, getting the right blanket, getting the right window, getting a little flower for your windowsill, setting up your little altar—you get so engrossed in that, that you don't notice the prison door has been open all the time. You could just walk out. It's sort of like that in any particular moment.

Two of our allies, the ones I want to talk about tonight, in helping us cut through this confusion and land again back in the potential for peace, in awakeness here and now, are of course the tool of mindfulness, but also the attitude of patience. I want to talk a little bit about patience later. By patience, I also mean open-hearted acceptance.

Now I want to talk about one of the many ways—but one of the ways—that we get so entangled in what's arising, in our reactions to it, without noticing. Michelle spoke briefly about this, and we'll certainly be talking about it more: the root obscurations, you could say, the root torments that arise from moment to moment in our experience—the experiences of greed, desire, clinging; hatred, aversion, pushing away, fear; and delusion, basic confusion, not knowing what's going on and not really recognizing anything very clearly. Rather than thinking of this abstractly or conceptually, what we begin to notice through the tool of mindfulness is how these root obscurations manifest in our experience on a moment-to-moment level.

These three responses—liking or not liking or just plain ignoring—then become a sort of filter. We're so habituated to respond in this way that, without mindfulness, without attention, when we're not really paying attention to what's going on, the mind responds automatically. And when we don't notice, that response becomes a filter, quite easily, as if you're looking at the world through blue glasses and everything looks blue and you don't know it. You just think that's how everything is.

So if you begin to notice when you're evaluating your sittings or your walkings or your retreat or your life or what happened at work three weeks ago—whatever you're evaluating—we tend to think that if it's pleasant, it's right, it's good, it's the direction to go in, we're doing well. If it's unpleasant, it's so easy to think, "This is a mistake, this shouldn't be happening, I've got to fix it somehow, I've got to try harder, I've got to practice harder," whatever way your mind goes. And if it's neutral—well, as Steve said last night, the different experiences of happiness get more and more subtle. At first we often experience them as being neutral, so boring, like nothing's happening. So we have two choices: fall asleep or make something happen. Because mostly this culture is so intense, and we're getting more and more used to needing really intense sensory stimulation to even notice something. So if it gets more intense, then maybe we'll wake up and maybe something will really be happening.

Notice this in your practice, because often what we do is make something intense but unpleasant happen. During the last three-month course I taught, I had a whole string of people come in one day, halfway through the course, reporting that they had become aware they'd been experiencing calm and peace but it was boring and they didn't like it. Their minds then created whole scenarios of suffering and unpleasantness—bad memories, imagining unpleasantness in the future—in order to sort of feel alive again. It's interesting.

So when not noticed, these biases or habits of mind really filter how we evaluate experience, what our expectations are, how we're judging what's going on today. And it keeps us looking in the wrong way for peace. Because generally—well, for me anyway, I can't say for anyone else—when my mind's working this way, peace generally means pleasant, absence of pain, absence of restlessness or anything that I don't particularly like. Or it can mean meeting my expectations. And what are expectations based on? Something we've read, something we've heard, something we've experienced before and decided is generally pleasant or good. Only based on the past. Only on the known. Incredibly limiting.

But anyway, generally, when I've decided this is happiness, this is peace—have you ever thought "this is happiness" when there was something really unpleasant going on? So it becomes the filter, the definition for the peace, the sense of inner completion, whatever we're looking for. And it's not so. It keeps us looking in the wrong direction.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Indian teacher, said once that what you are calling peace is only absence of disturbance. Real peace cannot be disturbed. Not by the rain, not by someone coughing.

Not even by snoring. Not even by pain in our knees. Not even by the thought arising, "Oh no, I could never do this. I'm doing it wrong. I'm so worthless." Real peace cannot be disturbed. And it cannot be created. We simply learn how to recognize it over and over and over.

This is where the tool of mindfulness—sati in the Pali language—is really going to be the main tool of our practice here together. This is where it really shows its power and its strength. Any moment of pure mindfulness cuts through all these habits of interpretation and storytelling and looking in the wrong direction, and brings us right here, recognizing what's happening just as it is.

By mindfulness, I mean clear connection with whatever is arising—whatever of the six sense experiences, thought, emotion, whatever is arising. A clear connection without interpretation, without a story, without analysis. We call that aspect bare attention: just as it is. But also a clear, open-hearted, accepting connection. Not judging it, not wishing it were different. Simply being fully present because this is so in this moment. Recognizing and knowing it clearly just as it is.

I want to give a couple of examples because this is what, moment by moment, cuts through all the layers and layers of obscuration that can arise like this over the simplest experience. And actually, to me it becomes fascinating to watch how these obscurations, these levels of complexity, can arise like that from a simple sense experience.

Hearing. There's just hearing. It's unpleasant. We don't notice it. It becomes, in the identification, "That's a person coughing." We don't like that. There's a sense of contraction in the body, a startling, a pulling away. The thought comes up, "If they have a cold, why don't they sit in their room? Don't they know how close we all are in here?" That leads into a sense of remembering how you had pneumonia when you were four and a half, and what if it happens again, and how sick you can get, and more anger at the insensitivity of all these other people. And besides, they're all sitting so still—don't they even hear it? What's the matter with them? And on and on. "I'm so bad. They're so peaceful. Why can't I just..." And it goes on forever. Then you're anticipating the next cough. It doesn't even happen, but you're just in a frenzy of tightness waiting for it. You see, you know what I mean.

What's actually happening in that moment? And that's where we learn to bring this cutting-through clarity of mindfulness. In that moment of hearing, can we bring the attention right to hearing? Just hearing. Mindfulness doesn't hesitate and moves right into the bare experience of hearing. And that's all that's happening.

If it's unpleasant, if you're right there, you might notice the unpleasantness. Or if it's gone way too far and it's murderous rage, well then, at that moment what you notice is the actual experience of murderous rage as it's arising here and now in this moment. Not the story and all the other people, but simply mindfulness cuts through to here and now. And there can actually be a moment—of course the coughing can just be sound—but there can even be a moment where murderous rage is just emotion and sensation. A moment. I'm not saying that's easy, and I'm not saying it lasts. But you get a sense of the difference between being so convinced in our rightness or our wrongness, either way, and the difference between that and simply being with what is so.

Another good example, and one that comes up a lot and has already been coming up today for people, is pain in the body. This happens all the time. People will come and say, "I have this tension in my shoulders and in my head. I'm contracted, and it's a result of the way I've been relating to my practice, or to my life, or it's the way I've been ever since I was two years old. It shows I'm uptight, I'm type A, I can't learn how to be flexible. I came here to learn openness and all I'm doing is getting more contracted. This noting and this mindfulness is only increasing it." You know, just this. And every time the pain arises, it's treated as a confirmation of the sad deficiencies in our character. And it gets really concretized, really locked in.

If you say that to any of us, we might nod, and after a while we'll say, "Well, what are you really feeling?" And the answer comes: "Oh, there's tension and pain, and I'm type A."

What are you really feeling? Well, there's tension. There's pressure. And when you really look at it, what happens? Well, it might get stronger. Maybe it changes to tingling, or maybe it kind of fades away. Or, you know, I didn't even notice it after a while, and then I was just hearing the rain. It's just what it is.

And even if it's accurate that the pressure, the tension, the constriction is a result—because everything's a result of conditions—even if it's accurate that it's a result of the way we've been relating in our life, here and now in this moment we're not back in the office. We're not back at two years old. In this moment, we're right here. And what's happening now is tension, pressure, here and now in this moment.

Our mindfulness gives us a chance, over and over and over, to simply rest in that. Because it is so, but recognizing it as it is, without all the extra. Even a moment of that can be so illuminating, because then we begin to feel, to know, the difference between being really here and being here through the veil of our interpretations and filters. And it's really different.

It's not easy. I don't mean to imply that it's easy. And I don't mean to imply that we can just dismiss all our interpretations and our memories and our conditioning like that. That's certainly not the case. There will be times when the memories or the interpretation or the persona of how we present ourselves in our life will be what's really arising strongly to pay attention to. But then we'll know that that's so. We won't be being led by the nose by it.

I've found that the mind is incredibly good at picking the interpretation or the story that's going to really hook us about any particular experience—the one where you say, "Yeah, but this is really true." It's amazing that way.

I remember one time—for me, the hook of not being good enough, of self-blame and judgment, is quite strong—I was doing walking meditation, pretty aware. I wasn't spacing out; I was present, but mostly noticing thoughts and emotions. I wasn't really noticing physical sensations. Walking and present and noticing thoughts, and suddenly I realized that the thoughts had taken a turn for the unpleasant. They were getting more and more unpleasant. In fact, I was running through every selfish and horrible thing I'd ever done. I was back to the third grade by the time I kind of caught the drift. I said, "Hmm, something's going on here."

And just for a moment—the tendency would be to try and stop it, or say, "Oh no, you're so good," or something—but just stop. Okay, what's going on here? Sort of widen the field of attention and notice. And this is really true: there was a little sharp stabbing pain in my big toe. That was all. But I wasn't noticing it. And so every time I stepped, the stabbing pain would come—sharp, unpleasant—and I didn't notice it. I would recoil sort of internally, rather than mindfully just meeting it. I'd recoil with attention away from what was happening, and that aversion would then get the hook that works so well in my mind—"I'm no good"—and just take it and go for a really long ride.

As soon as I could bring my attention—oh yeah, pain in the—I mean, it was funny. I just started laughing when I saw that. But as soon as I could bring the attention—oh right, sharp pain, unpleasant—that was it. Just present with what was happening.

And even a pain in the toe can be the avenue in to serenity, to peace, to completion. It doesn't matter what it is. What does matter is the presence and the attitude of presence. The mindfulness and this attitude of real open-hearted acceptance, of patience. It's like another possibility entirely of relating to life presents itself to us in every moment. And that's the possibility of simply being with things just as they are.

It's so simple. It's so peaceful. It's so un-effortful. It's so impossible so much of the time. I mean, I know what it's like. Last year I was sitting out there in your place, and it was great. I'm envying all of you.

But in that moment that it is possible—to be with what is just as it is—it transforms everything. It doesn't transform what's happening, but the relationship to what's happening transforms experience entirely. It transforms our life. It transforms our understanding. It's incredibly powerful.

Notice it when it happens, instead of waiting for the big lights to go off. Notice those moments when you're totally present and really accepting. We stop looking in the wrong direction then.

But it takes a real commitment and a real sense of integrity with ourselves, because it is really hard. The mind is really tricky. And there are many, many difficult experiences that will arise over the course of this time, and pleasant ones that will go away over the course of this time.

So mindfulness is the tool, and the attitude of patience is so vital. Patience is one of the ten perfections spoken of by the Buddha. Before he became, in that particular lifetime, the fully enlightened Buddha, it's said that he spent many, many previous lifetimes in all different types of roles, perfecting these ten qualities of heart and mind. I'm not even going to name all ten because I don't have time tonight, but one of them is patience. And by patience, I mean a much broader description than I would think of normally in day-to-day usage.

We tend to think of patience as the last thing to do when something's going on we don't like and nothing else has worked to get rid of it. Then we say, okay, it's time to be patient. But what does that mean? It's time to passively endure with gritted teeth, saying, "Yes, I'm being mindful and patient and I know it will change because everything does. Thank God for impermanence." That's not what I mean by patience. That kind of patience is tinged with aversion, with this pushing away.

True patience is very active, and it's an aspect of metta, of loving-kindness. With patience, there's actually an active engagement with whatever is happening—open-hearted acceptance, but really connected and engaged. It's not like the acceptance of something unpleasant happening over there on the other side of the trees. It's really engaging with that unpleasant sound, that real meeting of it wholeheartedly, just as it is. In that moment, there's no fear and there's no clinging.

Patience with the desirable as well as the undesirable. Meeting what we like equally open-heartedly, without that little tug of "let's make it stay." So patience has an alert and very spacious quality, yet at the same time is very connected and nonjudgmental. You can see how it's really the attitude that goes with mindfulness.

It's not passive submission to abuse. Patience doesn't mean not knowing what's going on. "Oh, that guy can be patient because he's totally deluded and doesn't see how much suffering is being inflicted on him"—that's not patience, that is delusion. Patience is actively engaging, but out of an open-hearted acceptance. It's accompanied by compassion.

In the commentaries which speak of these different qualities, they talk about what's called the proximate cause—the conditions that need to be there for this quality of mind or heart to arise. And this I find really interesting: the proximate cause of patience is seeing things as they really are. It's not being deluded, so you're patient until things change. It's seeing very clearly just how things are. And in this, it gives rise to the potential, the possibility to open-heartedly engage with and meet with acceptance whatever's happening, because we really, as Joseph put it the other night, begin to know what's what.

So it's transformative again, this quality of patience. Seeing things as they really are.

One of the main characteristics that we see as it really is, is this one of impermanence that Joseph spoke of the other night. And as he said, we intellectually know that things are impermanent. But the next time you're really struggling with your experience—whether it's wanting something to come back or wanting something to go away—in that moment of struggle, just check in. Are we acting from the heart's knowing of impermanence in that moment? Or have we again started treating that experience as permanent?

Whenever I'm in some emotional state, I mean—how many emotions have I seen come and go in my meditation, in my life? Millions! How many have you seen come and go since you've been here?

Or how many thoughts? Next time you're feeling angry or sad or bored or restless, just check in. Is there some little current under there that thinks this is how it's going to be for the next three months, just like this, and I can't bear it?

Not seeing things as they really are makes it hard to bring this open-hearted acceptance to the experience. We start to struggle. What I mentioned earlier—the filters on our experience of judging pleasant, evaluating pleasant as good, not wanting the unpleasant, thinking it's bad—this of course figures in quite strongly in our difficulty in truly living from the understanding of impermanence. Because you see, we open to the truth of change from time to time, and sometimes it's really sad. And sometimes it's really scary. And that's hard. First, because we just don't know how yet to be with the difficult. Patience and mindfulness will teach us that. But also because there's this judgment: if it's sad, it's wrong. It is sad. Sometimes it really is sad. Can that be okay? Can that even be beautiful?

This is a Chinese poem:

Green leaves that dawn after dawn grow yellow,
Red cheeks that fade with the passing days—
If our world is made up of such changes as these,
Is it strange that my heart is so sad?

Sadness is okay. Let it in. It's not the only experience of impermanence, but if we judge that or think that it's wrong or evaluate it as incorrect or as too hard to feel, we deny ourselves so much else. We deny ourselves the real beauty and connectedness and love of ourselves and others and appreciation of the moment that can come through our life when we're not trying to block out the fact that this too is rapidly changing.

In fact, opening to another being or to ourselves with a real care, with a real connection, with a real love is often the experience that paradoxically leads again into opening to the impermanence. It works both ways. You can't just block out what's sad or scary and then have this really connected, vital relationship to life, because your relationship is trying to be with something that isn't true. So sometimes it's real caring that opens us into impermanence. And that's okay too.

This is one of my favorite poems, from Galway Kinnell. Just part of it I'm going to read. The same subject:

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars,
even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I have stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

We have to at times recognize that that's what it's like—being in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. And sometimes it's scary and sometimes it's sad. And sometimes it opens us to such connectedness and potential for joy and serenity and real peace in our life that it's wonderful beyond anything we could imagine.

And often it's that connection—like the love of the man for his little child—that can open one to the realities of life, both the scary and sad and the wondrous and the magical. It takes both sides.

And this quality of mindfulness and patience, open-hearted willingness to be with whatever is without putting on top of it the overview of how we think things are or how we want things to be—just meeting moment by moment by moment. We don't have to think about it. The whole world opens up. It doesn't stay sad. It doesn't stay scary all the time. Yes, there's that insecurity, that pre-trembling. We never know when the house is going to fall. But when we know that we never know and stop trying to figure it out, then all of that energy is released for appreciation and real presence of being here and now. Our energy is withdrawn from attachment and fear and can move into connection and aliveness. We can find a real serenity even in the midst of not knowing, even in the midst of pleasure and pain. We can even relate to the not knowing in a way that's humorous, that's filled with lightness because we're not holding on.

So this willingness to meet both sides of experience—the scary, the beautiful, the pleasant, the painful, the boring—this lets us see things as they really are. And when we deeply see things as they really are, that's when we have the potential to open into the vivid wakefulness of freedom, of peace.

So in our time here, can we remember, if we don't recognize it in a live way in the moment, that life is change? Life is filled with cycles of expansion and contraction, with beautiful, with ugly, with whatever. Meet each one.

A symbol of that to me is a story from Germany, in a cathedral town. It was one of these stores with a door, and on each side of the door was a big picture window filled with what they sell. I was walking with my friend and we came to the first one—it was all statues and pictures of the Madonna, of Mary, and trinkets and all kinds of things. We thought, "Oh, that's nice, a religious store." Then we walked to the other window and it was all beer steins and guns. I thought, "Oh, that's interesting. Kind of an interesting store here." You know, both sides are there, right together.

Or as a friend of mine said last year—I asked how she'd been doing and she said, "Oh, I've just been so happy for the last two months. I've just been so happy. I wonder what's going to happen to make a change." Quite realistic. That wasn't depressing. That was like, "Oh yeah, something's going to happen. It is going to change. I wonder what it'll be." Can we relate in that way? There's so much freedom in that. There's so much potential for aliveness and appreciation.

Can we do that here? Next time you're really spacious and your breath is so calm and you're really focused and the thought comes in, "Wow, now I'm really doing it right"—see if the next thought can be, "Oh, I wonder when it'll change." Without a lot of hating of that thought. Without a lot of holding on.

When your knee is killing you, when it feels like you just sat down and there's that twinge and it's, "Oh no, I can't bear it"—see if you can, first of all, notice what's really happening. Are you in the hospital yet? Are you on crutches? Does it even hurt or is it just a little twinge? You know, that's one thing. Bring the mindfulness to what's actually happening. And see if there can be that moment of patience. "Yeah, this is unpleasant." Be fully there and know it will change too. But not rushing to "it will change too." Yes, it will change, and while it's here, can I experiment with being fully here for it?

Another aspect of patience is how it really does open us into the ability to perceive what is truly so. This is from Ajahn Sumedho, an American monk in the Thai tradition who has a monastery in England. He's talking about patience. He's talking about knowing the unconditioned, which is different ways of saying the radiant nature of mind, or freedom, or liberation:

"Buddha wisdom is very humbling because it knows that whatever arises passes away and is not self. Whatever condition of the body and mind arises, it is conditioned, and so whatever arises passes away. And Buddha wisdom knows the unconditioned as the unconditioned.

"But is the unconditioned very interesting or fascinating? You might think, 'I'd like to know God or Dhamma. It's going to be incredibly fascinating, something blissful and ecstatic.' Do you have that thought sometimes? So you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think that getting high is getting close. But the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. Look at the space in this room. Is it very interesting to look at? It's not to me. The space in this room is like the space in the other room."

The things in this room might be interesting—good, bad, ugly, or whatever. But the space, what is it? There's nothing you can really say or think about it. It has no quality except being spacious.

And to be able to be really spacious, one has to be patient. As there is nothing that one can grasp or hold onto, one recognizes space only by not clinging to the objects in the room. When you let go, when you stop your absorptions, your judgments, your criticisms and evaluations of the people and the things in this room, then you begin to experience the space of it. But that takes a lot of patience and humility.

Buddha wisdom is just that much: knowing the conditioned as the conditioned—the people and the things in this room—and the unconditioned as the unconditioned—the space. Buddhas are no longer deluded by any conditions, and they incline to the spaciousness, the emptiness, rather than towards the changing conditions within the space.

So we investigate the nature, the workings of the deluded mind. We investigate the nature and conditions of the people and the things in this room as they arise. We investigate the nature of the clinging and the aversion and the pushing away and the judgments and the absorptions. And we begin to notice how much suffering and confusion comes from all of that.

And then, just maybe, there will be a moment when we can simply stop—all of that absorption in the people and the things and the space and the thoughts—and we get a glimpse of the spaciousness.

That's all it takes. It's not so complicated.

So let's just sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 268

Balancing Effort

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most nuanced aspects of meditation practice: finding the balance between vigorous effort and effortless presence. Drawing from the Pāli concept of viriya (energy/effort), she explores how genuine interest and spiritual urgency naturally give rise to balanced, joyful effort without forcing or straining.
>
> Wilson uses the vivid metaphor of "Super Bowl mind" to illustrate how spontaneous, sustained attention arises naturally when interest is present—yet distinguishes this from wise effort by noting how ordinary interest depends on getting a "payoff." She examines how our habitual patterns of evaluating experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or mundane fragment our attention and drain our energy. Through personal stories, including her own struggle with split attention during retreat while her mother faced cancer, she demonstrates how even meticulous practice can become dry and torturous when disconnected from wholehearted presence.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with both extremes of imbalance: the tendency to shrink back from difficulty (which shouldn't be confused with genuine self-compassion) and the equally common pattern of pushing harder when energy flags, mistaking desire for wise effort. Wilson emphasizes that spiritual urgency—rooted in opening to dukkha and impermanence—provides the natural fuel for sustained, balanced attention. She concludes with skillful means for times when we're overwhelmed: deliberately bringing up "seeds of joy," turning attention to nature, or practicing mettā to restore spaciousness before re-engaging with difficulty.

Tonight I want to begin talking about balanced effort or balanced energy. It's a topic that we will all discuss a lot in different ways. Edwin, our esteemed associate director, contributed the title, which is "You Don't Pull No Punches, But You Don't Push the River." That's from Van Morrison. So that's what I want to talk about.

In our instructions, both in the hall here and in our interviews, we keep talking about how to have this quality of really relaxed, spacious, open awareness, yet at the same time very precise and alert. We say to summon up tremendous energy to meet each moment, yet at the same time don't do anything. How do we work with this seeming dichotomy, this delicate balance? How do we rest in vivid awakeness, yet at the same time remain very receptive and open, relaxed? Clearly, it's a dance of balance that involves our whole practice, moment to moment.

Tonight I want to talk about it in broad strokes—some aspects that help us to discover and cultivate this quality of balanced energy. It can also be spoken of in a very precise, minute way, and there's so much to say. I had to choose, so tonight I want to paint with a broad brush stroke. I want to focus on two qualities of our experience that can help us over and over to access and recognize this quality of balanced energy: interest and urgency.

When the energy or sense of effort is balanced and strong, it quite naturally gives rise to mindfulness—a quality of simply recognizing, connecting with, and knowing what is present. Moment after moment of mindfulness naturally leads to a deepening of concentration. And all of this naturally leads to wisdom. It's a whole series of the way these factors of mind work together. And in a way it really happens by itself. We can't force any of it.

Looking at this quality, which is experienceable as a factor of mind—this quality of energy or effort—the Pali word is viriya, which is variously translated. On one end is heroic, courageous effort. Another way of talking about it is joyous effort, commitment, enthusiasm. It doesn't have to be so intense, but it needs that quality of inner joy and steadiness.

A quality or factor of mind that helps us connect naturally with this sense of joyous effort and enthusiasm is that of interest. Really awake, alert, connecting with what's arising quite effortlessly and naturally, moment to moment to moment. Sounds exhausting. Every moment, meeting every moment with this interest, with this kind of joyful alertness—it gets overwhelming even to think about it. It takes so much effort.

But that's where it's just the reverse. The interest itself gives rise to spontaneous effort, spontaneous connection that isn't tiring and isn't difficult. And we all have this capacity. It's an experience that we all have quite frequently in our lives.

If you go to a movie, that's an obvious one. The example I like to use, because I was observing it and to me it was much more intense—I couldn't miss it—is watching friends, mostly male friends I have to say, watching sports events on TV. Recently, it was the World Cup this summer. A few years ago, I was in San Francisco just at the time of the Super Bowl. That's American football if you're from overseas. I was in San Francisco when the San Francisco team, the 49ers, was playing in the Super Bowl in the old days.

I thought, you know, I can get mildly interested in both the World Cup and in watching football. But what amazed me, where I really zeroed in on this quality of interest leading to such a steadiness of energy and focus, was everybody I knew in San Francisco—and I know a lot of people in that area—they shut down their lives for that day. The whole city shut down to watch this game. Big groups would gather. So I was watching with a group of ten or fifteen people. Incredible focus on every moment of everything that happened. And no one said, "Oh, what a chore. I have to focus on this game." It was spontaneous. It was joyful. I honestly can't remember who won. That shows I wasn't really quite that focused. I was more watching the people.

But you see, it's a quality that we all possess in abundance. And when the interest is there, the energy, the effort, the steadiness of focus springs up quite naturally. It's not a problem.

Now there is one drawback to what I call Super Bowl mind. It's not mindful because it's slightly tinged with a certain quality of craving or desire. There's a payoff that holds the interest. And even when someone says, "Well, I don't care who wins, but I'm watching the artistry of the game" — that's still a payoff. Because if it was just a bunch of schlemiels bumbling around on the field, nobody would be so interested. It has to be a certain level of artistry that gives one that experience of pleasure.

So this isn't wise effort in terms of our practice. It's energy leading to effort that stays interested because it's getting a certain payoff, something we want. Things are going the way we want them to, or we're getting this certain experience of pleasure.

But how come we can't bring this same quality of spontaneous focus to our life, to what's going on here? You'd think our life would be at least as interesting as a football game. But we bring the same tendencies, the same blindnesses to our life outside of here, to our day-to-day, hour-to-hour, moment-to-moment life, that we bring to sports or anything else. Some experiences, yes, there's this natural interest and the energy's balanced and we're present. And some experiences don't quite make the grade. We're bringing in our same filters.

And the ones we've spoken about so much before — they're not new information. The ones of either judging pleasant as good and desirable, unpleasant as not wanting to be with it. Or maybe something's just intense enough to hold our interest. But when it's mundane or not really intense, somehow that interest tends to fall away.

Often people will say in interviews, "Oh, nothing's happening." What do you mean nothing's happening? You sit and nothing happens? "No, well, it's calm. And there's sounds, there's sensations, there's emotions, there's thoughts, but nothing very interesting about it. It's not very intense." That's not nothing happening. That's a lot happening.

It's as if we think the interest is somehow inherent in what's happening, in the appearance, in the arising object. And some things have it and some things don't. But that's not it at all. The interest comes from within our own experience. As you can see for yourself, sometimes the breath is just the most boring thing you could imagine. And three sittings later, it's so fascinating, incredible. Do you think the breath is really that different? Probably not. But the quality of interest has led into an energy and effort that leads to mindfulness that really connects.

This tendency in all the different ways it manifests in our experience — to evaluate what happens, to accept some experiences, to reject others, to be interested in some, to cringe away from others, to ignore others altogether — that's one of the tendencies we keep looking at over and over because it's so insidious. It is often so unconscious, and it surfaces in different and more subtle ways as we continue to explore our experience.

That's the power of the mindfulness we're practicing and this quality of interest that we can cultivate: it's non-discriminating. It's not picking and choosing which experiences to pay attention to, which experiences are worthwhile, which are worthy of our interest, and which are not. Because when we're picking and choosing, what do we know? The basis on which we're picking and choosing comes from such limitation. From such views and opinions and limiting of our world. Everything's interconnected in ways that we can't even imagine. And sometimes the experience that we find the most mundane or the least interesting — just that one is the potential for opening to a real awakening insight. We can't know how things link together, how things interconnect.

Thich Nhat Hanh says that good and bad are only an idea of the mind. They have no ultimate reality. On this level of meeting whatever arises with interest, with mindfulness, that's true. Evaluating as good and bad is only an idea of the mind, no ultimate reality. That's not to say what Joseph was talking about last night. Some experiences are wholesome — they lead to more peace and freedom. Some are unwholesome — they contribute to suffering. On another level, that's also true.

As Suzuki Roshi says, there's no such thing as right and wrong—but right is right and wrong is wrong. That's how it works.

On the level of our moment-to-moment experience, however, when it comes to what's worth paying attention to, there's no distinction. Every moment of experience, every arising appearance is totally worth being interested in, worth paying attention to. Because in that moment, that's the expression of our life. It's the manifestation of truth. There's nowhere else we can go to discover truth but in that arising appearance at that moment.

I appreciate the way Thich Nhat Hanh writes and talks about how we can't rationally separate experience into "this is good" and "this is bad," "this is worthwhile" and "this isn't"—because everything leads into everything else. If you've read him at all, I'm sure you've encountered the way he can take anything, even an empty plate, and by looking deeply into it with some reflection, open up whole realms of understanding. Looking at that empty plate, we can have it as a symbol of the finishing of our meal, an experience of gratitude and appreciation for all the cooks who prepared it, for all the farmers who grew the food, for the animals that helped take care of the food, for the people who transported it.

And then also a sense of sadness arises—the fact that many people didn't get to eat anything today. A sense of connection with that. A realization of how many people in the world are dying of starvation at this very moment as we sit here. And realizing that interconnectedness, realizing also how hard it might be to open to that, our sense of guilt at ourselves—because one moment we're realizing our interconnectedness with starving people, and the next moment we're moaning to ourselves because there are no seconds, or wishing we had a cookie.

Just seeing all the play of the mind, and not trying, in terms of mindfulness or interest, to say this one's okay and this one shouldn't be happening. They're all happening together. You can't separate it out.

Again, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, we tend to value a rose and not pay much attention to garbage. But a rose will die and we dump it in the garbage—it becomes garbage. And then we take the garbage and put it into compost and spread it on the flower bed, and it turns into a rose.

It's the same in our meditation here. That moment you felt so guilty about—feeling like "I don't care if people are starving, I really want another Snickers"—that might be the moment that opens us up to some real understanding of ourselves, some real sense of freedom, of disidentification, of not identifying with thought at that moment, of seeing that it all comes and goes. You can't reject anything.

In the space of open, non-discriminating awareness, no experience is more or less interesting, more or less worthy of our total presence. And if it feels like, as we begin to discover this interrelatedness, there's a lot of shadow material arising, a lot of hard things to be with, a lot of difficult experience—or even more, a lot of just really mundane, not very interesting experience at all—this balanced perception, this seeing of interrelatedness, can come about partly through reflection. What I was describing about Thich Nhat Hanh's approach is really reflection. But through our interested meeting of experience moment to moment, we begin to perceive in this way quite naturally, without reflection. It becomes the natural perception of how things are.

A poem that reflects this, by the Japanese woman poet Izumi Shikibu from the imperial court around the tenth century:

Although the wind blows terribly here, the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house.

To me, that really feels like practice. The moon also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house. That's how my mind feels a lot—like a ruined house. And somehow the moon manages to leak through when we're willing to be with the ruined house.

When there's that quality of non-discriminating interest, the energy, the effort, the willingness to be present with mindfulness becomes effortless. It's balanced.

The trick, of course, is how to sustain this quality of interest without the payoff—without somehow deciding, "Okay, I'll be interested for a certain amount of time, but then something big needs to happen to keep me interested." How do we sustain this quality without the payoff? It's not simple.

One tool—and it's only one tool of many—is this quality of spiritual urgency. I've found it tremendously useful, both in times of difficulty when the mind just wants to cringe back away from what's going on, and perhaps even more so in those times of seemingly endless mundane experience. Those times when you're just asking yourself: Why am I doing this? What possible relationship does the sensation in my big toe when I lift my foot have to anything that matters in my life? What am I doing this for?

I hit that point about the second or third week of every retreat I do. At some point, the purpose just eludes me. What am I doing and why?

This quality of spiritual urgency is very profound and very strong. It arises from really opening to the suffering aspect of our lives, of the world. Not drowning in it, but really opening our eyes, opening our hearts, looking around us, inside us.

This quality of spiritual urgency wakes us up to the point where we see the confusion, the pain, the suffering in our own experience—the unsatisfactoriness, the inevitability of death, of sickness.

At some point, and over and over again, the urgency to understand, to be free from confusion, to be helpful to other beings—whatever form it takes for you—becomes more important than hanging out in our comfort zone, than living a life of denial. It actually feels like a comfort zone, but it's not so comfortable at all. We're just not really looking at it.

At times this quality of spiritual urgency can be called up consciously. At other times it arises quite spontaneously, simply by opening our eyes and looking around.

When we don't have spiritual urgency, when we're just going through the motions of practice without that sense of interest which urgency inspires—even though your practice might seem really right on, very meticulous, even though you're not just going through the motions but really being very precise, and it feels like you're putting in a lot of effort—but it's sort of meeting an outside model, whether it's the model of how things should look or the model in your own mind. The motivation is trying to match some expectation you have, or you think someone else has, rather than arising from the inner urgency, the inner interest in your own heart. It doesn't quite work. You can practice in a meticulous way and it gets drier and tougher. You're dragging along. It can be torturous. And you can't quite figure out what's going on, what's missing, because it seems like you're doing everything just right.

I had an experience of this. A few years ago, I came here to sit a two-month retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita. I was really up for it. But the day before the retreat, I talked to my mother, and she told me she'd just found out she had cancer and was going to have an operation. She had breast cancer and uterine cancer, both, and was going to have an operation within the week. She refused to let me come home. Said, "No, no, you must do your retreat. I don't want you to come home." She got really adamant about it, which isn't like her.

So I came on and did the retreat. I would call home every day. Things were going fine. It wasn't an emergency operation or anything. She was doing fine. And I was practicing extremely meticulously. I was noting every moment. I thought I was really present. And it was getting drier and deader. It just felt like sawdust. It felt like I was dragging myself through it. But I thought my effort was really right there, really present.

I didn't quite wake up to what was going on until one day, after about three weeks—I always used to walk in the same place in the hall in the Catskills. I was walking up the stairs to my walking place and the thought came, more than a thought, it was like a real conviction: "If somebody's walking there, I'm leaving the retreat. That's it." And I meant it. That's what was scary. And I really hoped somebody was walking there. Of course nobody was.

That sort of woke me up. I thought, what's going on here? What's the story? Because that just wasn't a moment of aversion. That was really a deep-seated response to the quality of energy, of effort, that was going on.

What was happening was I wasn't really wholeheartedly present in my energy, in my effort. It looked like it. It even looked like it to me. I was meeting the form which I know from the past, trying to meet my expectations of what it's supposed to be like. I could do it and I thought I meant it. But somehow—and this is weird because you'd think the quality of urgency would be stronger because of what was going on—basically what was happening is my mind, my interest, was split.

I wasn't using the fact of my mother's sickness to bring up urgency and put that urgency into my practice. I was simply splitting my attention, worried about my mother and not wholeheartedly present, moment to moment. So I could put on a good show for myself, but it was all directed outward. That inner spring of urgency and interest wasn't there.

We can carry this kind of divided effort so far and really feel like it's balanced, but at some point it just won't hold. We can't keep doing it. It withers the heart.

On the other hand, when the energy and interest are present and balanced, it becomes the payoff in itself—if you need a payoff. The times I've felt most connected and balanced and present and really joyful in practice don't have anything to do with what was actually happening, whether it was pleasant or unpleasant, incredibly intense and insightful, or just everyday stuff. This quality of real, alive connectedness had everything to do with that balanced energy and effort that was wholeheartedly present, meeting what was happening moment to moment to moment, without evaluation, without resistance.

When the effort and energy are in that balanced groove, whatever's happening isn't a problem. The interest is there, and that's enough. That carries us.

I want to read something from Krishnamurti, a way of talking about this quality of wholehearted interest and attention: "When you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment. And then there is no room for fear, no room for contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

Can we attend to whatever's arising with complete self-abandonment? Our nerves, our ears, our eyes, everything of ourselves? That's the quality of really alert, interested energy that isn't looking for something special to happen. In that space, the urgency is there. We don't need to reflect on it. We don't need to look for it. Things are in balance.

Without this wholeheartedness, the energy flags. If things are difficult, there's that tendency for the mind to fall back, cringe away, shrink down. In fact, remember Joseph was talking last night about how we can confuse sloth with compassion. Sloth is sort of like an absence of energy. In moments when the energy and effort are strong and balanced, you can experience what it's like: the mind is bright, clear, and interested. Energy has the quality of patience, of being willing to be with suffering or difficulty without cringing back.

That cringing is the tendency of the mind when there's no energy. When something difficult comes, we think, "Oh no, let me not feel this." And if there's too much difficulty, one thing after another without energy, we just wither down—like a sopping, twisted towel. "I just can't be with this anymore."

Energy, as Sayadaw U Pandita says, is a support in the mind, like the support of a house. It supports the mind to stop flinching away from what is unpleasant, to open and be bright and meet it again with this quality of interest and presence.

So you can see why that first initial shrinking back, if we say, "Oh no, I must be kind to myself, this is really the way to balance"—this shrinking back is a sign. I think that's what Chögyam Trungpa called "idiot compassion." Don't take the first sign of shrinking back as necessarily the sign that you need to pull back altogether, because that's just the natural response of the mind to something unpleasant. If there's interest, if there's energy, that will be a support where we can come back and meet it again.

As you can see, energy isn't static—certainly not. It's a quality that comes and goes. It's also something we can easily identify with. When it comes, we think, "I'm doing really well now." And when it drops, "Somehow I've blown it. Big mistake. I've got to fix it somehow." This can lead to our tipping out of balance even more, either way—the cringing back and giving up, or, and this happens even more with most of the people I talk to, the energy drops and we think, "It's my fault. I need to push, and push harder." And when things still aren't the way we want them to be, we push even harder.

And it's not actually interest or mindfulness or wise effort. It's totally trying to make things be a certain way. It's desire or expectation masquerading as wise effort. Except the effect isn't one of bright, alert interest. It's one of frustration, self-judgment, tightness—more tightness, more heaviness, more grimness—until we're just really tied in a knot.

It can be very subtle. Sometimes it's incredibly blatant, but sometimes it's very subtle—the way that we think we're meeting what's arising with interest. But if you look at the underlying intention, it's "I'll meet this in order for it to open up, in order for things to start flowing again, in order for that bright interest to come back"—a long, long list of whatever we're hoping for.

In either case, it can lead to that kind of loss of interest that just makes us say, "Who cares?" Back to that place of "I don't care what happens. I lift my foot. I put my foot down. I feel tingling. I feel pressure. So what?"

This is the time to open our hearts and minds to this quality of spiritual urgency. Now, urgency is not panic. No, it's not fear and desperation. But again, it's getting in touch with that motivation for why we came to this retreat, for why we're engaged in a spiritual practice—the urgency of that. Getting in touch with that motivation where opening to truth is more important than anything else in our life at that moment. It encompasses everything in our life. It doesn't shut something out.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said—I'm paraphrasing—something along the lines of: if you deeply want to be free, to understand your true nature, you will be. But you must be honest with yourself and really want nothing else. That's the quality of spiritual urgency. It gives courage. It gives interest. It gives this motivation and willingness to meet and explore and investigate whatever particular experience is getting thrown up at us. It gives us the courage and the interest to come out of denial over and over and over.

And we don't really have to sit and ruminate about it. All we have to do is open up our eyes, our ears, our hearts. Just pay attention to our experience for any short period of time without that evaluating and pushing things away. And the truth of impermanence, of the unsatisfactoriness of things, of the suffering that's within and around us—we can't escape it. We might want to. That's the denial we're coming out of.

This is from Chinul, who is kind of the father of Korean Zen. He says, "The world is blazing in torments as if it were a house on fire. How can you bear to linger here and complacently undergo such long suffering? If you wish to avoid suffering, there's no better way than to seek Buddhahood." He goes on to say, though, "Understand that the Buddha is the mind. People do not recognize that their own minds are the true Buddha. They want to search for the Buddha, yet they will not observe their own minds."

It's a strong statement, but to me it encapsulates this quality of urgency. When urgency is awakened, there's no problem paying attention. We don't have to look for interest. It comes naturally.

One of my teachers uses the same metaphor of the house on fire—and the Buddha used this one also. My teacher says: if you were somewhere and someone came and told you that your house was on fire, you'd immediately start going home. And if on the way you ran into a friend you hadn't seen for a long time, you wouldn't say, "Oh, let's stop and have a cappuccino. There's this nice little place open." You don't have to stop and ponder, "Well, should I? It would be nice."

I haven't had a cappuccino for a while. No. You don't stop. It doesn't even arise as a possibility. You just say, "Sorry, the house is on fire, I'm going home." That's the energy, the one-pointed interest that comes from urgency.

Our house is on fire. And we are home. So it would behoove us to wake up and pay attention. Discover what the fire is and how we can quench the flames. That's our practice. And we're not going to discover it by shutting our eyes and putting on some nice music and pretending it will just go away. It won't just go away.

It doesn't mean we have to get lost in despair. As with everything, there's a balance, but we do need to wake up. And all we have to do is keep paying attention. When we have that urgency, when we're confronted face to face with the fact that our house is on fire, the interest, the energy, the mindfulness, the understanding comes quite without effort.

I'll give you an example because it really shows how the difference in understanding comes from that sense of awakeness, from urgency, not from the situation. I don't know if you saw a program a couple of years ago on Bill Moyers' special where he was exploring different kinds of things with the mind, and one of them was Jon Kabat-Zinn's stress reduction course in Worcester. It showed the profound effects on people who are sent to this stress reduction course at UMass Hospital, people who have come to the end of what formal medicine can do for them. They're all either in extreme chronic pain, living with life-threatening illnesses, daily migraine headaches, whatever. And how simple mindfulness practice—they only come once a week, and they do a forty-five-minute tape of mindfulness every day, that's all they're doing—has these profound effects.

Well, ten years ago, when I was managing here, myself and my other co-manager, and another dear friend who was cooking here—actually it was during a course with Sayadaw U Pandita, that one Joseph talked about, where the whole atmosphere was very tense. As tense as it was for the yogis, I want you to know for the staff it was ten times more tense. It was a difficult time. So we picked this time to go as interns to the stress reduction course, which means the three of us would drive in and take the course, do everything that the people in the course do. That was basically it, and talk a little bit about it afterward.

So we would fly in in the morning—it's an hour's drive—do this course, fly home, do a staff meeting all afternoon. It was on that day. These people, I mean, in three weeks they're reporting these experiences: "I had a migraine every day for six years and now I haven't had one for two weeks." All kinds of amazing things, really profound openings, understanding their life in another way.

We, meanwhile, would fall asleep during the meditations. Literally. I remember my friends snoring on the floor. We'd be looking at our watch. We'd go flying home through traffic, come back at least half the time with splitting headaches, move into the staff meeting and just be going, "Please, just let me out of this meeting." It was stressing us out enormously. And we definitely went in with a little cockiness. Well, we know this mindfulness gig, you know.

It was really interesting. We would try to do the meditations at home, just as instructed. The first couple weeks, you lie down and do a kind of mindful moving through your body, starting at your feet. I don't think I ever got higher than my knee without falling asleep the whole time. And the same with both of my friends. It was really pathetic.

As the weeks went on—eight weeks—there were profound changes in these people. Because they had a real urgency. The truth of things was hitting them. They couldn't avoid it. And it led to a natural effort and exploration and wisdom. We were just in your basic arrogant denial, so to speak. I actually learned more about it later as I've reflected on it.

What I'm sharing now reveals how easy it is to be complacent, to take things for granted, to think, "Well, we've looked at suffering. We've looked at dukkha. We're meeting it every day." Yes, we're meeting it every day, but are we actually looking at it? Are we actually opening to it? That's another question altogether. It's so easy to be complacent.

After my mother had cancer that time, after I finally woke up in my practice, it really did inspire a sense of urgency—a deep opening to all of our impermanence and death, a real kind of cellular experience of dying. And then she got better. She's been fine for five years. And complacency rises. "Oh yeah, my mom's fine. I'm fine. Everything's fine. There's no problem."

It's hard to stay open to the unsatisfactory nature, to the fact that our house is on fire. But it's worth it. The freedom that comes out of it, the real connectedness, the real aliveness—that's worth it, rather than living shut off and dead and denying.

So we can use anything. Just notice what's happening. God knows, just pay attention through the sittings and walkings in the day. You don't have to look any further. Notice how you're meeting the difficult and unpleasant. Is it a mistake? Is it something to get rid of? Or is it an inspiration that says, "Yes, this is how this life is. Do I want to just keep wandering in samsara? Or do I want to explore what's happening in order to wake up?"

We can use nature. All the chipmunks squashed on the road—there are a lot of chipmunks this year. We've all been talking about it. It seems like we can't even drive down the driveway without six chipmunks darting out. It's really quite tricky.

Or when I go to my doctor at UMass, I really like going because it's a big teaching hospital. There are so many people I pass in so many stages—children with chronic diseases, old people seeming kind of bewildered and confused, lots of fear in people's faces. Sometimes there's a real spark of beauty and love as somebody connects or sees the fear and reaches out. It's a very alive time for me. I really use it to wake up to the fact that there's nothing to be complacent about. What am I waiting for to pay attention? Am I waiting until something really horrible happens again? Am I waiting for something interesting enough to be worth paying attention to? The mundane is just fine. We can wake up with that as well as with anything.

The difficult experiences you go through here—it doesn't have to be life-threatening angst. It can be the frustration of pushing too hard. That can be enormous suffering when we don't see what's going on. Any kind of overwhelming suffering is a great time to see what's really going on and let the urgency come up.

Someone today, in an interview, expressed this really beautifully. It touched me. She'd been going through a very difficult time, to the point that all of us reach at times where it just feels like, "I don't know if I can handle this." That does happen. She was at the lake looking at the leaves drifting here and there in the water, thinking, "Do I want to live like that? Just tossed back and forth, back and forth?" And the answer was clearly, "No, I don't." It doesn't make everything okay.

It doesn't make the suffering go away. It doesn't bring clear bliss. All the suffering's still there. But that sense of, no, I don't want to live that way—it's worth coming back and being with this. Paying attention.

In fact, you don't even have to go that far. The attention, the interest, the urgency just arises naturally. And there's the energy again to meet what's happening for another moment. For another moment. And we only have to take it one moment at a time. We don't have to think, "Oh no, this and three more days of this—it's unbearable." That might be in your mind, but it's only this. It's only this moment. We have no idea what's going to happen in the next moment.

Sometimes the most difficult moments, when we've just thought, "I've had it. This is it. I cannot face another moment of this"—and then we face the next moment. And you never know, that can be the transformative moment where we really just open to something much greater and more profound than our fear and aversion of the difficult. Sometimes the most difficult moments are the moments of our awakening.

I want to read a poem from one of the women who was a nun with the Buddha at the time of the Buddha. Her name was Sama, and it said that for twenty-five years her mind was always distracted while meditating. Two weeks isn't so hard, folks. And she was a nun, mind you, so she wasn't doing much else.

So this is her poem:

It was twenty-five years since I turned away from home and I hadn't had a moment's peace. I had no peace because I didn't know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Conqueror—that's the Buddha—because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died.

That's a way they have of talking about awakening—saying "I've finished with craving, seventh day." Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert.

So it took her twenty-five years. Maybe it won't take us so long to realize that we can be alert no matter what's going on. And again, this alertness, this energy that comes from urgency—it's a balanced quality of connection and effort. Not desperation, not fear, not panic. When we're meeting difficult or not difficult experience in this balanced way, it naturally leads to the balanced perception where the difficult opens also into the sublime. And that's why we don't despair. That's what lets us have the energy to come back and meet the next difficult experience.

But sometimes we can tip out of balance and really feel that we're drowning in despair. We feel we're really open to the fact that our house is on fire and we see no way out, and it just feels like we really can't bear it. That's when the energy is beginning to tip out of balance.

This is from Anna Akhmatova, a Russian poet, written in 1921, just at the height of all the terrors and starvation and war of the Russian Revolution:

Everything is plundered, betrayed, sold. Death's great black wing scrapes the air. Misery gnaws to the bone. Why then do we not despair? By day, from the surrounding woods, cherries blow summer into town. At night, the deep transparent skies glitter with new galaxies. And the miraculous comes so close to the ruined, dirty houses. Something not known to anyone at all, but wild in our breast for centuries.

That's why we don't despair. But sometimes we lose sight of the miraculous coming close to our dirty houses.

And we do despair. We can feel like we're falling into a great black hole or drowning in suffering—whatever the suffering, whatever the experience. Or we turn it into that kind of effort that's pushing, pushing, pushing, and then blaming ourselves because things aren't the way we think they should be, and the only way to remedy it is certainly to try harder, to make it be a certain way. Again, subtly mistaking balanced effort for wanting things to change.

At this point of despair, being overwhelmed perhaps by the strength and intensity and ongoing nature of suffering—whether it's terror or grief or this tight, tight pushing or fear or sadness—it doesn't matter what it is. But when it's just more than the mindfulness can meet, more than there can be a balance of perception, then our mind and heart really does wither. We really do tip off into a genuinely unbalanced quality of presence, quality of effort, where we can just get really lost.

Again, this is the place where it's not just that cringing back of sloth, but where it's truly skillful means to pull back a little from what's happening. Because in our trying to meet what's happening with what we think is wise effort, we're getting tighter and more forceful and grimmer and heavier. And I just want to make clear that grimness is not equivalent to wise effort. The grimmer you are doesn't mean the more mindful you are or the better you're doing. Sometimes—I swear—people really ask, "Is it allowed to smile?" It is allowed to smile. It helps a lot sometimes to smile.

So if you find that you're falling into that, or even worse, that you just feel like you're drowning in a swirl of pain and confusion, that is the time when balance means back off. Instead of trying to drill a hole through that experience, instead of trying to meet it by God with openness—just listen to the tone of voice of that note. It's skillful to back off, turn the attention elsewhere.

Bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls "seeds of joy," seeing that maybe you're not noticing the balance of perception, but you can deliberately bring it up. For me, sometimes when I'm walking up in the castle, I'll just go stay on the fire escape on the second floor and look at the sky and the trees. Just open up to seeing, to hearing, to nature. It brings a spaciousness to the heart, to the mind, to consciousness. See what it is for you. It might be just sitting and opening to hearing. It might mean going down and sitting by the lake. It might mean reading an inspiring passage. Whatever brings up seeds of joy.

This is not cheating. It's not giving in. It's not being a wimp. And when you're in that pushing phase and judging it, you're not going to be able to trust whatever evaluation you make of your practice. So at that point the thought will come up, "Maybe I should back off, open to hearing," and immediately go, "No way. That's just giving in. That's just being a coward. That's just sloth. That's just idiot compassion." You can't trust the evaluations when you're caught in judgment.

So just look—if there's no mindfulness, if you're withering your heart, withering your mind, turn the attention somewhere else. Bring up seeds of joy. Take a walk. Do whatever helps to bring a sense of spaciousness and happiness into your experience. Maybe it's doing loving-kindness practice. Whatever it is for you. This is skillful means. This is how to balance.

And again, once there's that sense of openness, of spaciousness—even just that much—then the reconnection can come again. The natural interest and sense of the urgency of things can arise, and we can come back and maybe meet that difficulty just for a moment in a more balanced, open way.

So that's just broad strokes of this balance of energy that we work with moment to moment to moment. It's an ongoing dance. It's never static. We never get to, "Okay, this is it. Now I can forget about it and coast." Sorry.

Let me end with a quotation from Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche: "Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore or overlook it are deluded. This recognition is the borderline between Buddhas and beings, and this recognition is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives."

Every moment. It doesn't have to be daunting. It's a wonderful opportunity. Every moment is the crossroads between recognizing our true nature or not.

So, let's sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 269

Grasping

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to explore the nature of grasping (upādāna) not as something to hate or overcome through force, but as a fascinating process to understand deeply. She explains how the Buddha taught that suffering arises from attachment, and that through truly seeing how clinging functions moment to moment, we can open to the peace that is already present.
>
> Wilson examines how grasping develops from initial craving—using vivid examples from retreat life like waiting in the food line or longing for a walk around the lake. She describes the 'tunnel vision' effect of clinging, how it creates separation between self and other, and blinds us to our innate completeness. Drawing from traditional commentaries, she explores the four fields of grasping: sense pleasures, views and opinions, rites and rituals, and the sense of self. She illustrates these with memorable stories, including her own 'milkshake incident' that demonstrates how unexamined craving leads to confused action.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing the difference between appreciation and clinging, and encourages practitioners to notice both the arising of grasping and the peace present in its absence. Wilson emphasizes that freedom doesn't require never having pleasant experiences, but rather understanding the process of attachment itself. As Nisārgadatta reminds us, 'You are free in a moment of recognition.'

The Buddha often said, when being really simple, that what he taught was suffering and the end of suffering.

A lot of what each of you is doing, in your own unique way, what you're confronting day to day, moment to moment, is your own particular flavor of suffering. Whatever the particular story, the physical and psychological components, more or less intense—it takes a great deal of ongoing courage and commitment to do what each one of you is doing here, in whatever form that happens to be taking.

Of course, luckily, the point of confronting our suffering is that by truly understanding it, seeing it for what it is, understanding through that open seeing how the suffering and confusion arises, is created, is maintained moment to moment—in the power of this understanding, of this knowing itself, that's sufficient to open us to the end of suffering. It's not like we're here with a shovel trying to dig up every moment of defilement or suffering until we finally get it all and there's this big hole of emptiness. Sometimes it seems like that.

Whatever the particular variety of manifestation—and part of how we get caught up is by looking at our own uniqueness in it—underneath how it manifests in your own experience, there are some really basic core principles, one of which I want to talk about tonight. One of the most core causes of our suffering, of our confusion, moment to moment, is the experience of attachment. Big surprise.

Tonight I want to talk about it not as a bad thing, not as another means to engender self-loathing, but as a way to actually get fascinated in the process of clinging, of attachment itself. Because through that willingness to explore it without hating it can come about the deep understanding that lets us let go of it altogether and open again to our original nature of peace.

It's really poignant in a way. The Buddha also said, early on before he began teaching, that one of the things that moved him to compassion was seeing how everybody deeply wants to be happy. We can see this if we look around, if we tune into ourselves. But in our confusion, in our not understanding what is so, the things that we do to try to make ourselves happy are the very things that keep us spinning in suffering and confusion. And the harder we try to be happy, the more we get lost in this suffering. It's very poignant.

This is really why exploring the field of clinging, of grasping, can be so important, because that is one of the key places where we get lost in this confusion.

The Buddha said, "The truth is profound and hard to discover. You can't attain it by thinking about it—but for the wise to experience. But this generation relies on attachment, relishes attachment, delights in attachment. So it's hard for them to see the truth."

Well, we haven't changed much in 2500 years.

I hope tonight we can together have a sort of experiential exploration of the nature of clinging, of attachment, as it arises in our experience. Just to begin to explore it without fear of it. How it affects us. How it distorts and hides the truth.

We've talked a lot about craving—the mind inclining towards something pleasant, or when there's something unpleasant, inclining towards something pleasant to get away from that. Clinging or grasping is simply the next step of really grabbing hold. It's given in the commentaries the simile that if craving is the mind groping in the dark to steal something, grasping or clinging is actually grabbing it and stealing it. It's just a strengthening of mind moments into a real holding on to something.

And it has this quality of blinding, of thirst. We're not talking about when you're hungry and you know you need to eat and you go to eat—a very neutral, straightforward activity. We're not talking about that kind of desire. We're not talking about the aspiration for freedom or the aspiration to help all beings that's coming from not a blinding, distorted place, but a real sense of motivation. We are talking about that blinding, driven quality of grasping or attachment. And I'm sure you can all tell the difference in your experience when it arises.

So how does it arise? On the basic level of experience, whatever of the six sense doors—this is one of the ways the Buddha talks about our whole life experience—is simply the six sense experiences, six sense contacts arising one after the other, after the other. And that's all. Seeing, hearing, thinking, emotion, tasting, smelling, just happening, coming, going, coming, going. And suddenly one of them is like—stopped. And it might just be a moment of craving.

Oh, that's pleasant. Without the mindfulness, without noticing it, as we know, it just kind of hardens into grasping. There's no wisdom there. The grasping gets more solid. Each moment of it makes it easier for the next moment of grasping to arise. And it gives rise to all kinds of thoughts and actions and sense of self and the whole picture.

Just walking outside back and forth, minding your own business, and suddenly this thought arises: "Ah, a walk around the lake would be nice." Just a thought coming and going. But there's that mind inclining towards it. And the next time it comes up: "It really would be nice." It inclines a little more. The third time it comes up, there's no more sense of spaciousness or peace. It's like, "Yes, I must walk around the lake right now. I'll never be happy again." And we go, or we don't. But that quality—that's how the grasping arises.

That's a simple example. Obviously sometimes it's so complicated that we can't even see where the point of contact was that triggered it. But no matter how complex, each moment of grasping or attachment begins at that point of contact, which is one of the things we can begin to recognize when we have the silence and the mindfulness being developed over a long retreat. Teasing something out of a complicated experience to the point of contact can be quite difficult in our daily life. Here is the unique laboratory to explore that.

This is the Buddha again: "For some people contact, the point where sense plus object meets, is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity. And because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact is, and so their craving ends. They realize the total calm."

I love that. It doesn't say you get rid of anything. It says you simply see just what contact is, what it does. And in that seeing, the craving ends. It fills one with delight, that sense of calm—the calm of the mind that's free from clinging, that's free from pushing away, that simply is resting in things the way they are. It's wonderful. It's exquisite.

And we all experience moments of that over and over on this retreat. Notice them. And we experience lots of moments that aren't that, over and over. Notice them. That's what we are cultivating the mindfulness to help us understand: just what's going on. Understand our sense activity. Inquire into the nature of clinging, of grasping itself, when that is what's arising. It's a key way to again recognize what is true.

Krishnamurti said that unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable. Inevitable, because, as Nisargadatta goes on to say, the obstacles to the clear perception of our true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain.

So this is a great laboratory. Not to hate clinging—"Oh, I hate it, here it is, and it's my obstacle to my clear perception of my true being now." That doesn't help; it really doesn't do it. But we can begin to inquire into it whenever it arises, to begin to understand how it functions to blind us to what is true. How it functions to cloud our knowing of that stillness.

So play with it when you're sitting, when you're walking. Just as I was saying before, you sit, things come and go. This is my big insight for the week. It's a little embarrassing that this is it for the whole week, but I was looking at a mail order catalog yesterday, and I kind of got it: "Oh, it's just like a sitting." Looking at a mail order catalog is exactly the same as being in a sitting and kind of watching reactions of mind arise. The things come and go. There's a sight, a sound, a thought, an image.

Or I was turning the pages. There wasn't anything particular I was looking for, just being there—oh, this, this, this. And suddenly something arises, and the little pincers come out. Ah, that.

Notice in your sitting: what does it feel like? Things are just flowing—big things, little things, emotions, thoughts, wisps, the breath, it doesn't matter what. And suddenly something stops the flow. There's that feeling of this. Feel it in your body. Feel it in your mind. Really recognize what it's like. I know for me it's really as if internally I went like that—if it's a bigger thing. If it's really subtle little thoughts that you hardly notice, I was noticing just this little pincer in my mind going, eh, eh, eh. Notice how that works, and keep paying attention to the function of that grasping as it's still present.

So for example, you're standing in the food line. Just present, standing, seeing what's for the meal, and that's fine—just seeing and hearing and thinking, and judgments come and judgments go, but there's no real charge. And suddenly the perception comes up: Oh, there's only six more muffins, and I'm kind of far back. What if that person takes two? What if I don't... Around the idea of muffin, around those thoughts, it gets stronger and stronger and stronger.

First, looking at the clinging itself: what's the effect it has on the whole experience? What had been a sense of presence, coming and going, spaciousness, connectedness—isn't this nice, we're all here together in this one beautiful retreat—suddenly everyone in front of us is an obstacle, the enemy, in the way. There certainly is such a strong sense of self and other that comes up almost immediately with that movement of grasping. The grasping could be just a simple wisp of a thought, but the sense of self gets really hardened very quickly in that moment.

Clinging has the effect of giving us what you might call tunnel vision. We get really focused on the object clung to, the object desired, and other things—such as the people in the way—are just ignored or seen as something else. Really a sense of separation. And clearly there's no sense of peace or stillness in that moment. It really distorts both our ability to be open and appreciative of whatever else might be happening, and it also can distort our perception of the thing that we want. There's a saying in India that if a pickpocket meets a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets.

So clinging is this tunnel vision, and it blinds us. This is really how it works—to blind us to the possibility in that moment of recognizing our innate completeness. What do you mean, innate completeness? I won't be complete unless I get that muffin. Then everything will be okay. I mean, why don't we get it? I don't know why we don't get it, but over and over—the muffin, a new car, a better relationship, it doesn't matter what it is—it's that same movement. It's not the lack of muffin or a car that is hiding the radiance of the sun of our innate purity. But it is that movement of clinging that completely blinds us. It keeps us looking in the wrong direction.

So on the ultimate level, you could say—well, on both levels, both ultimate and the kind of relative we're-separate-people-and-let's-keep-it-that-way level of reality—Sayadaw U Pandita said once that there are two ways a moment of ignorance manifests in our experience. When ignorance is present—it's also something that comes and goes, a rising mental state—it has two functions. One is that we don't truly see what is here, what is present. So we don't recognize the stillness. And the second manifestation of ignorance is that we misconstruct what we do see. We misperceive what we do see and see what's not here—such as this incredible muffin that's going to make everything okay.

That also works on the relative level. And when we don't see what's going on, as you may have noticed, we can go to amazing lengths—all kinds of thoughts and activities and energy expended in order to gratify some particular craving—because we're not really seeing what goes on. We're seeing things as they're not.

Well, some of you have heard this story, but I'll tell it for the ones that haven't, because it's a perfect example of this—something that we all do so much of the time by not seeing how the grasping in the mind distorts our perceptions of reality.

So I was teaching in Yucca Valley some years ago, and it was a beautiful, warm, sunny afternoon between sittings. I was sitting and talking with my friend, one of the other teachers, and another friend who had come to visit. Just peaceful, things were lovely, very spacious—we were talking, present.

And suddenly, this other person who was visiting started talking about how they had just been to a new place down the road and had this great milkshake. And that was the particular experience that my mind just grabbed onto, totally unmindfully. I looked at my friend—not the one who said this—and it was kind of like this immediate, yeah, let's go get one.

From then on, no appreciation anymore of that situation in the moment. No more appreciation of being with this other person who had come to visit. It was like, we've got half an hour until the next sitting—let's end this conversation right now and get going. And that's basically what we did.

We jumped in the car, drove down the road to this place, which had—I'm not exaggerating—closed ten minutes previously. So that should have been enough, but it wasn't, because when you don't really see the strength of grasping, it just strengthens into the next thing, and the next. You do really stupid things.

So we said, well, where could we get a milkshake? I mean, we knew this strip of road. We go there every year. And we only had now fifteen minutes to get back to the next sitting, which one of us had to lead.

So we go flying—I was driving, flying down the road, looking for somewhere to get a milkshake. Just kind of madly reading the signs on the side. And my friend says, "Oh, over there—yogurt café, yogurt café!" And I looked over. It said urgent care.

That's what we do. And even that didn't stop us.

The thing is, we're doing that all the time. All the time. The lengths we go to, the activity we get involved in to satisfy some craving. Do you think—oh, we never did get a milkshake—do you think it would have made us really happy? No, we would have gotten it, slogged it down, and whizzed back into the sitting because we were late. It was just a little episode of craziness.

As one of my friends says, "Stop this slavish behavior." That's what we're doing. We're enthralled to the idea that if we can end this feeling of craving, we will have peace. That's true. That is true. And we had peace before the feeling of craving arose.

All we have to do is simply notice that that clinging itself is another arising appearance. It doesn't have to drive us. A lot of the times it will—don't be setting up some expectations, like, "Ah, just see craving, la-di-da." A lot of the times it will drive us. But simply, if we can relate to it as another arising appearance, explore it, feel it, notice how it comes, just stay there with it—and you know what happens? It goes. It vanishes. At some point it vanishes, it dissipates.

And again, in that moment, notice the potential for wakefulness, the potential for freedom, for peace, in that moment of the clinging's vanishing. Whether or not you obtained what the clinging was about is irrelevant. And that's what's so hard for us to believe. That's where we get so seduced.

As one of my friends said when I told him this milkshake story, "Well, I get it, but the thing is—when do we get to drink the milkshake?"

This leads into the four areas of grasping, of clinging, talked about in some of the commentaries: the area of sense desire, clinging to views and opinions, clinging to rites and rituals or making oneself perfect, and of course, the big one—the sense of self.

So this "when do we get to have the milkshake" leads right into the first of these areas—the clinging to, the grasping at sense pleasures.

It's very interesting because often we'll hear or think, "Okay, it means I can never have the milkshake. It means the only way to be free from clinging is never again to act on clinging, never satisfy it, and that way I'll be free from it." Now, there is a lot to be said for renunciation because it does give us the opportunity to see that the peace is not dependent on getting what we want. But it's also possible to renounce out of self-hatred, out of fear, out of grim negativity. That's not what we're talking about. So there's a balance.

I want to talk a little bit about this area of clinging to sense pleasures. One definition of sense desire comes from a Burmese meditation master of the last century, Ledi Sayadaw, defining sense desire as implying laying a firm hold onto something and the inability to shake it off even after experiencing great pain due to it and perceiving its many harmful consequences.

And doesn't it feel like that sometimes? It's like, "I don't want to want this. It's killing me." But still the clinging can be so strong.

Sense desire is a very seductive aspect of our experience, and certainly in our culture it's overwhelming. We have just a barrage of possibility to satisfy sense desire. The Buddha spoke about the dangers of sense desire in incredibly strong terms. I just want to give you a couple of milder examples. He's talking about the danger of indulging, of being obsessed by sense pleasures: They're like a skeleton, bare bones thrown to a hungry dog that do nothing to appease its hunger. They're like a burning torch—its flame might burn the hand of the person holding it if the wind shifts suddenly. Sense pleasures are like a dream, short-lived and not real. Sense pleasures are borrowed possessions; they do not belong to us and we do not hold on to them.

Those last two really seem true. I'm leaving out the stronger examples—really, really strong teachings about the dangers of getting lost in clinging to sense desire, to the desire for sense pleasure.

We know it doesn't work, that trying to make ourselves happy through more sense pleasures is like trying to quench our thirst with salt water. Theoretically we know it, but if we really look at our behavior, much of the time what is the underlying understanding? I'll speak for myself. The underlying behavior I often seem to be acting from is that somehow some sense experience over there is going to fulfill my sense of need for inner completion. And I don't quite notice that's what's going on. We don't get it. That's the danger.

And in our society, even here, with so much stripped away—and it's really a true renunciation, spending three months like this—even here there's an endless potential to gratify sense desire. Whether it's the meals, or just thinking about the meals, fantasizing, writing a letter, going to look for mail, looking at the bulletin board, taking a walk (which can be skillful, but can also just be wanting some pleasure), having a cup of tea, washing your socks. One thing after the other can be for many different reasons. But if you look, how often is the motivation, the intention, coming out of some feeling that clinging to something pleasant is going to make me happy?

I noticed we just don't get it. When something happens and we feel a little peaceful—or we don't—rather than stopping and noticing the process, we simply move on to grasping after the next sense pleasure. When we get it or we don't, we're frustrated or we're happy, either way that particular grasping ends, and the next moment another one comes up. And we just keep moving to the next, to the next, to the next. In our life, of course, it's endless how much we can move on. And moving on can so easily hide the fact that it's the search itself, it's that grasping in the mind itself that's bringing the sense of incompleteness, that's bringing the sense of suffering.

But we forget. We get so focused on the thing grasped, whatever the sense pleasure is, even just a fantasy in the mind. There's a saying that desire puts feathers on the object desired, makes it more attractive, and then we really go after it. When we stop and look at the process, we're kind of brought up short—which is why we don't like to stop and look. We keep going.

I noticed last year when I was sitting during this course, at one point it just really dawned on me—it was around lunch—how, not that I was craving lunch all morning, but so often thoughts would come up: "Oh, lunch will be in a couple hours. That'll be nice." Not intense craving, but it's subtle.

It doesn't always have to be intense. But over and over, that leaning into turns into a grasping. Oh, lunch. Lunch will be the high point. Lunch will be pleasant. This will be the sense hit for the day. I mean, the mind didn't say it that clearly. And one day I really noticed. Lunch came. What actually happens at lunch? Notice how many moments are actually this pleasant sense experience and how much are judgments and waiting and just chewing and the tedium of lifting and placing and lifting and placing. Oh, that's a nice flavor. Wanting more. Just really notice it. And then all of a sudden, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes, it's over. It wasn't what we'd imagined.

But does the mind really look at that? It goes, Oh, well, four and a half more hours, there'll be tea. And even after a month of peanut butter and crackers every day, my mind was saying, Oh, peanut butter—four and a half hours.

Another seductive aspect of this serial craving, so to speak, or serial clinging, is that unlooked at, it's as if in the experience of clinging itself—clinging to sense pleasure, going for the next one, the next one—there can be almost as if the clinging itself is its own sort of intensity, even a kind of pleasure or delight. If you really look, it isn't. But unlooked at, it's almost as if we can get addicted to the clinging itself.

In the movie Shadowlands, there was one scene where the C.S. Lewis character was teaching a literature class and talking about the European Middle Ages ideal of chivalric love. He said something to the effect that the most ideal chivalric love is that which can never be obtained—and that's the most exquisite pleasure of love. I was cringing. A lifetime of yearning for that which cannot be obtained. I'm not a scholar of the Middle Ages, so forgive me if I'm getting this philosophy a little wrong; I'm just coming from the movie. But that this could even be thought of as an ideal to be held up—constant yearning that can never be satisfied. What a hell realm.

Well, we do it to ourselves. We might keep changing what we're yearning for, but we can easily get seduced by that sort of intensity. One of my favorite haikus by Bashō is: Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto. Just longing, for the sake of longing—almost as if it makes us feel alive. And that's what's so poignant, because the real vitality of life is already here, and the longing only blinds us to it.

It's so wonderful that we have the opportunity now to stop and turn the attention around and really begin to experience that, so we know it for ourselves. The peace we seek is already here. Always. And it's only that grasping, that clinging, that keeps us from seeing it.

I say "only." I don't mean to imply that it's simple. It's incredibly subtle and ingrained, and sense pleasures are actually the easiest of the four areas to notice. It's actually rather obvious. And in fact, the peace of non-grasping—this is in my experience—is a much, much more subtle and quiet type of peace or happiness than I generally, or ever, have experienced in the gratification of sense pleasure. But we're like an intensity-junkie society, so it can be easy to miss that if we're not paying attention.

Not so easy here, because your minds are getting more and more tuned to stillness. You can recognize it more. The kind of gross overabundance of sense desire isn't available to you here. And even though that might seem like suffering moment to moment, in the big picture it's a blessing, because it really will let each of you begin to explore the process itself rather than being so blinded by the possibility for so-called satisfaction.

It's not that we can never have the milkshake—but know what we're doing when we're doing it. And opening up to paying attention to the seductive quality of clinging, of getting lost in obsession with sense desires, that's not the same thing as developing an aversion for life, or a fear of experiencing pleasant experience because you might get attached. Aversion and fear is not freedom.

It's only aversion and fear. It's not what we're cultivating here.

So the invitation is to really begin to explore the difference between real appreciation of what's true in the moment—which actually is not possible when we're clinging—and clinging itself. The difference between appreciation and clinging. Neither of them is aversion or pushing away.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh: "When we are obsessed by sense pleasures, we lose our freedom. This was taught by the Buddha. But we have to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. Attachment to sense pleasures can bring about suffering and entanglement both in the present moment and the future for ourselves and others. But the joy and happiness of a peaceful mind bring neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future for ourselves or others."

The peace and happiness of mindfulness, of an open mind. The joy of a peaceful mind brings neither suffering nor attachment. Explore that.

When you look at the sunset, there can be just a moment of pure appreciation, of joy. That's possible because we know how things really are. You know the sun's going to go down—no two ways about it. And we don't stand there trying to wish it wouldn't happen. And so there's no clinging, and there's the possibility of just pure presence. It's lovely. And we don't weep with sorrow that the sun's gone.

Notice when that moment changes to a moment of clinging. You might actually not weep that the sun's down, but there's just a little "oh, that was so nice." We're clinging to pleasant experience just in that moment. Not the sun, but wanting that pleasant feeling. Notice the difference.

Or like I said the other day, I was looking at the leaves with that same appreciation, and suddenly it changes to clinging. It's nice. We want it to last longer. We want to hold on to it somehow. Notice that as soon as that clinging comes up, the peace is gone. The spaciousness is gone. The sense of interconnectedness is gone. It's like I somehow separate from these colors and these leaves, and I have to grab them all and hold onto them somehow.

Notice. Just notice the shift. That's all. That's all we have to do. And those moments of clear presence, that stillness of seeing just what contact is—notice that too. Just let it be, but really let that peace, that quality, begin to sink in, to counteract our unconscious ideas of the intensity of pleasure we can get from sense pleasures.

So that's the first field of grasping.

The second one, which I find very interesting, is clinging or grasping to views and opinions. This is defined as thinking, the tendency of the mind to think, "This alone is true; everything else is false." At least that's easy enough to see if the mind would actually consciously think that. Then you'd have the awareness—view, view coming up—and that would help a lot, because at least you'd know what it is you're clinging to.

Clearly, views that are clung to limit the possibility of what we can experience. They divide the world, create conflict. Because what tends to happen is when we're holding fast to some view, we tend to perceive or accept only the facts that corroborate that view and sort of ignore the perceptions that don't fit in.

We can see this quite clearly in the world if you look at various areas of conflict—religious wars, all the weird things that go on, really horrible things that, if we're not involved, we can look and say, "Oh yes, that's so clearly clinging to views," which complicates and leads to war.

For example, Northern Ireland. To an outside observer like myself, the Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland seem really very similar to one another—much closer to each other than I am to any of them. But the view can create such hatred and fear and division. Or the view in this country on abortion, pro or con, leading to people actually murdering one another over that particular view. Such a holding to "this is right, this is the only way."

I just heard on the news tonight that some academics at Cornell University had invited some intellectuals from Cuba, from Castro's Cuba, to come and speak. And so the people at Cornell who'd invited these intellectuals received death threats from anti-Castro Cubans in Miami.

Death threats, because they invited someone to come and speak at the college who held a different view. This is the power of holding to views and opinions.

And it's, as I said, easy to see from the outside. But what about when you really believe it, that it's true? Whatever it might happen to be—whether it's politics, whether it's medical, whether it's gay rights, whether it's abortion, whether it's your view in a family argument, your view of who you are. When I feel I'm really right, I know I'm right, how open am I to really hear the possibility that maybe the other person's right? And what about when you both really know you're right, but somehow you have opposite ideas of what's right? Have you ever had an argument like that in a relationship? I know what happened. No, you don't. This is what happened. And you both are positive that you're right. It doesn't make for a lot of free play of "okay, let's hear your opinion." This is how it is. That's what views do. And when our deeply clung to view is threatened, it brings up such anger, if not fear. It's as if our whole life is threatened. And on some level, our whole understanding of life is threatened in that moment.

In Vietnam, during the Vietnamese War, when Thich Nhat Hanh and Sister Phong were simply trying to help people who were hurt by the war without taking sides or adhering to either side's view, that was so threatening to both sides that held the view. It's like it's more undermining almost than the obvious enemy. And they would kill the people in the School for Social Work who were only trying to rebuild villages or educate children, because of the deep unsettledness of having your views not accepted, of having them challenged.

So at least we can work with this when we recognize it's a view. What about when we don't?

A friend told me a story—this is kind of a light story so I like it—of a Tibetan Lama who was giving a long talk to Westerners, talking about the pure land, another higher realm, a higher plane of existence where a future Buddha is residing and giving talks and teaching the Dharma to other celestial beings. He was going on and on, describing this realm the same as you would describe this room here, in that amount of detail, that amount of precision. And the Westerners were clearly getting more and more restive—yeah, sure. At one point he just looked at them and said, "You might not believe me, but I've been there."

Do we even let it in? Or does the mind go, yeah, sure.

On the level of our own day-to-day experience, never mind opinions about politics or anything else, this is what we're doing moment-to-moment, day-to-day: constructing views out of our own particular experience, clinging to them, and then judging everything else or comparing by that view. And just not letting in perceptions that don't fit. That's where we get really blinded.

An example. One summer, quite some years ago, I spent the summer in England with someone I was in a relationship with. It was a new relationship, and we were staying in this really exquisitely beautiful place in England—a little cottage boathouse right on the river in Devon, on this beautiful estate. I had been there many times before, and I had many friends there. It was like the most idyllic setting you could imagine. So unknown to myself, I had formed the view: well, of course I must be happy. You couldn't possibly not be happy in a situation like this. The relationship was terrible, but because I had decided I couldn't not be happy, I didn't even let that in. The whole summer was like that. I left. We broke up the day after I left. Clearly, it wasn't like this idyllic summer. I still never let that in the whole time I was there.

I didn't realize it until the next summer when I was back again in the same place, visiting friends, and I was walking through a field. I remember this so clearly. At this point I didn't have any particular view to protect. I was just walking through the field, quite open and present. And you know how sometimes your body will have a bodily memory of a time? I wasn't thinking about the year before. I just walked through this field I'd walked through many times the year before, and the bodily memory of how I'd felt came up. I just felt that. Oh. Oh, that's how I felt? I must have been miserable. That's really unhappy. I never let that in to my conscious experience because it didn't fit the view I held.

We do that a lot.

Probably that happens to you once or twice here in a day. A rich time for this is the question period in the morning. People hear a question, and without even realizing it, they think: "That person's hardly having any emotions, and I'm having so much. It must be that the way not to have emotions is right practice, and mine isn't." Immediately we start comparing and judging. Or just the reverse—the person with no emotions hears another person say they're having all these experiences, and they think, "Oh my God, I'm suppressing. I'm supposed to be having these huge emotional releases, and I'm not. This is how the practice is supposed to be."

Or people who are a lot with the breath hear someone else talking about many different experiences and think, "Oh, my practice is so boring, it's not really moving, it's not really free-flowing mindfulness." And the reverse happens too. Then we take experiences just in our own internal life and think, "Ah, now I see what mindfulness is." I watch my mind do this all the time. "Oh, I thought it was that, but I see that was a view that was wrong. This is how it is." And immediately another view is formed. It's fascinating, if we can notice that. If you don't, you find yourself comparing, judging, expecting. See if you can pull back and say, "What's the opinion here? What's the view? What's being clung to in this moment?"

In a way, I'm going to the fourth field now—the biggest, but also the most subtle. The view that we cling to most deeply is that of a separate, solid, unchanging self. By not realizing that it's a view, we think that's just how it is. Even if intellectually we can all say, "Oh no, I know, that's one of the main teachings—anattā—that's not so, it's all transparent, we're all interconnected." That's nice talk, but what do we really cling to unconsciously as the view, as the way of being? And then we don't let in perceptions that don't match that.

For example, that of impermanence. When we really look, really feel sensations in the body, there is nothing permanent there. But it's hard to let that in. It's kind of, "Oh yeah, that's interesting, but..." And then there's the image of the solid body, or the memory of myself since I was five, or whatever particular way that view arises in that moment—that sense of clinging to self.

This is, of course, extremely subtle—all the different aspects of experience that arise in a moment and that are clung to as a sense of self. Simply, again, beginning to notice it. Don't think you're going to just eradicate it, but notice. The clinging to any experience itself—it can be clinging to a physical image, it can be to a sense of personality, to a particular emotion, to the experience of knowing, of consciousness, clinging to intention. They're coming and going, coming and going. A particular experience arises and there's that contraction, that identification, that sense of self arising around it. Just notice it. That's all. And notice that it keeps changing. Just begin to let in the possibility of perceiving things in a different way.

We'll talk more—this is a huge topic, I'm only just touching on it—but it's the fourth area of grasping, this subtle sense of self. When you notice it, see if you can feel that grasping, how out of the spaciousness, the clarity, there's suddenly—it might be a huge grasping or it might be just ever so subtle—just, "I'm clear." Or, "This clarity is nice. This is how it should be. I wonder when it'll go away." However it arises, just notice that subtle movement and notice the effect of it: that in that moment there's me and other, and it seems solid. But we don't need to accept that just because it seems solid, it is. That's how we fall back on views.

It's scary not to have views. It's scary not to rest with some solid sense of self. Can we imagine living without clinging or resting in any particular view? People sometimes get actually quite angry to hear about that or think about that. How can we live without views? How can we vote? How can we take part in things?

No one's saying we don't have opinions. We're talking about the clinging to them as if they are the truth—a clinging that doesn't let in another possibility. The Buddha often said that people who cling to views go about in the world annoying one another.

Thich Nhat Hanh again: "Because we human beings are afraid of nothingness, we cling to the belief in a permanent, indestructible self."

The Buddha said—or asked, really—is there any view of self in which you can take refuge that will not cause anxiety, exhaustion, sorrow, suffering, and despair? Of course, they all answered, "No, Reverend Teacher." But look for yourself. Can you find any view of self that you can take refuge in that does not lead to anxiety, sorrow, suffering, despair, exhaustion? Just keep looking. Somehow this fear comes up about letting go of that clinging, but it's just the same as the clinging we spoke of earlier. It's the clinging itself that's creating the suffering, that's keeping us bound, that's keeping us from simply stepping back and seeing: it is perfectly complete here and now, just as it is. There is nothing that needs to be done.

The last area of grasping is any kind of rite or ritual—the idea that some outer form in itself is going to bring me perfection, is going to purify me. Again, it's like looking outward and holding to something external. The Buddha, in the famous parable of the raft, talks about even his own teachings. Incredibly useful as a raft to get across the river to a safe shore. But when you get there, you don't pick the raft up and walk with it on your shoulders for the rest of your life. It's useful. We use it.

So just using this time here, one of the ways to explore how the movement of grasping, of clinging—whether incredibly gross and we're acting out all over the place, or really, really subtle—just that movement out of stillness and knowing, how that obscures the peace of mind, how that obscures the recognition of our own innate completeness and has us looking outside for perfection and for happiness.

I said in one other talk how Nyoshul Khenpo has said that this recognition of our true nature is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives. Every moment is another chance to recognize, in a moment of just pure being—without grasping, without delusion, without aversion—that innate stillness of peace. Just know when that's how it is. And recognize how the clinging, how the wanting, how we start looking elsewhere for what was always here, and how far and fast that can take us, seemingly. And how the next moment, if you just stand there and be with the craving and be with the clinging—it's okay, I'll explode from clinging—and just see what happens, the next moment it could be gone, and again there's the potential for recognition. It's a great exploration. It's really fascinating.

Let's close with Nisargadatta. He says, "Nothing physical or mental can give you freedom. You are free once you understand that your bondage is of your own making and you cease forging the chains that bind you. You are free in a moment of recognition."

Abandoning the Causes That Give Rise to Ignorance

Carol Wilson · 1h06

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching on how ignorance arises not as a fixed state but as a conditioned phenomenon that can be understood and abandoned. She explores the concept of āsava—the subtle underlying tendencies or biases of mind toward sense desire, becoming, wrong view, and identification—that condition ignorance to arise moment by moment. These tendencies are so subtle that we often find ourselves lost in confusion without knowing how we got there.
>
> Wilson presents seven methods the Buddha taught for abandoning these causes of ignorance: wise attention (paying attention to the right things in the right way), restraint at the sense doors, careful attention to how we use necessary resources, skillful avoidance of what we cannot handle, patience with what cannot be avoided, removing or cutting off unwholesome states with wisdom, and developing the seven factors of enlightenment. She emphasizes that these approaches aren't hierarchical but situational—what's appropriate depends on internal and external conditions.
> Drawing from her personal experience as a nun in Thailand, Wilson illustrates the interplay between patience and avoidance, showing how feeding aversive tendencies only strengthens them. She offers encouragement that while these patterns are subtle and pervasive, the very seeing of them opens the door to freedom. The talk concludes with the reminder that mindfulness practice naturally develops and balances the seven factors of enlightenment, and that recognizing what is before us allows what is hidden to become clear.

The longer we continue our path of practice and exploration, the more it seems to me that we begin to become aware of the vastness which Joseph spoke of this morning. Just how vast the whole journey is. How vast and mysterious the process of our mind is. Almost incomprehensible.

Sometimes that vastness is delightful—a real joy opens us into freedom, into letting go. But that's not what I'm going to talk about tonight. I talked about that last week. This week I'm going to talk about when the vastness kind of flips and we get overwhelmed by the vastness of ignorance.

As you get quieter, you're really noticing, you're really more tuned in to experience. Often people will comment—and I comment on it a lot in myself—it can sometimes seem amazing and discouraging how quickly ignorance arises, how suddenly the kilesas come shooting in when you think you've just been so present and calm. This can have its discouraging moments when we're looking under that lens.

Of course, it's not a discouraging thing ultimately, because the seeing of this subtleness of the arising of ignorance is the key to our freedom. There's a quotation from a Greek Orthodox abbot of 1000 AD, Simeon was his name: "The more a person enters the light of understanding, the more aware she is of her own ignorance." And that's really what begins to happen.

We might start on our path kind of blithely thinking we'll practice for a week or three months or a couple of years and then we'll sort of be free. We'll be happy. Things will be okay. And instead we find we're plunging into—now I'm definitely giving the downside, it's only one bias—sometimes we can feel we're plunging into this morass that we had no idea existed under the surface. But each bit of seeing, the seeming complexity of this, is actually our key into freedom and understanding. It's just that we lose sight of it from time to time.

The Buddha said quite often that ignorance is not some solid state that we're stuck with, but that ignorance is something that arises in the moment due to conditions. And when those conditions change, when those conditions cease to be, then so also the ignorance ceases to be. You can see that from both sides: ignorance can arise over and over because the conditions that cause it keep arising, but also it vanishes, it dissipates over and over and over. We're not stuck with some unchanging mess that there's no way out of.

Tonight I want to talk about a particular discourse of the Buddha, just sort of describe what he's talking about in it. He's talking about the conditions for ignorance to arise, which he mentions briefly, and then seven ways that we can work with transcending or abandoning the causes that give rise to ignorance. None of this is going to be anything new. It's all what we've been looking at and doing already. I just like it because it shows us that there's a whole array of ways to work.

I've noticed a lot recently that many people are sort of recapping or trying to make sure they've got everything before the end of the retreat. "Now what do I do about this? How do I do this? What are these seven? What are these five?" Somehow trying to get everything and make sure it's the right way. I kind of like this sutta because he just lists out seven different ways to work, and of course there are many, many more. There's no one right way. It changes all the time depending on what's appropriate at a given time.

The cause that the Buddha gives for ignorance arising in a moment, when he's listing his chains of cause and effect, is this: ignorance arises in a particular moment of experience due to the presence or the arising in the previous moment of what he calls subtle underlying tendencies of mind. I know this gets a little subtle; I hope it's not too intellectual. Certain latent tendencies or biases of mind, when present, give rise to ignorance.

In other words, he's saying ignorance doesn't arise because there's a huge full-blown mind state, say, of sense desire. That's already after ignorance. But in a moment in the mind there can be arising the subtle tendency or bias—the conditions for sense desire to arise, if the conditions are right.

He lists four particular biases, any of which arising is the condition for ignorance to arise. Because it's so subtle, I think it's hard to see until we've been on a retreat looking at our minds this amount of time. And because it's so subtle is also one of the reasons that we find ourselves so often lost in a manifestation of ignorance—a pretty mild one—and not knowing how we got there.

These underlying biases—and the ones the Buddha lists specifically—he calls them āsava, that's the Pali word. And "bias" is a nice translation. Some of the other translations are "canker"—I mean, they're like nasty translations.

Anyway, I'll say what they are. The bias towards sense desire, the proclivity for sense desire to come up. The second one is towards becoming—becoming anything, something. Towards wrong view, of course, are main ones. Any view that we establish of self or a view of not-self, a view of who I am, or any underlying tendency to identify with anything.

Oh, they're broad. You see why they come up a lot. It's broad and it's subtle.

So this tendency is not the full-blown state itself—not the full-blown state of craving or identification, of being totally lost—but simply the possibility for it to arise. And not noticing that, it becomes circular. There's a proclivity, say, for sense desire. We don't notice it. It arises. We get really into a state of desire. And again, all of this without mindfulness, it strengthens the tendency for desire to arise again in the next moment. And so it just keeps going—the biases condition ignorance, which conditions the biases.

I have to say, when I look at this on paper, it's not a satisfying explanation to me because it's so circular. It's descriptive. But my mind always wants to say, well, let's get back to the very beginning one—that's the start of it all—and just get rid of that. And of course that's not how it works, because it's all conditioned. One gives rise to the next, gives rise to the next, gives rise to the next. And as the Buddha said over and over, there is no one beginning point of ignorance or anything that we can go to and look at. It's all arising due to conditions. And when they fade, it fades.

And so again, as he's so pragmatic, he's showing us how to look at, how to notice, and how to work with abandoning these underlying tendencies. Often he describes freedom or enlightenment as the total extinction of these underlying biases of mind. That's quite remarkable—not always; he describes freedom in different ways, but that's one of the ways. A mind that has become completely free of these tendencies in which there's no more bias for sense pleasure or conceit or a sense of self to arise.

We can experience that in a moment, anyway.

Again, these are subtle and quite pervasive. And I'm not trying to be depressing. I'm just trying to bring home the sense of the subtlety, and also that it's not personal. So that in fact, you don't get caught in some sense of defeat or discouragement or failure.

Why, when we see clearly some painful, unhelpful pattern of our mind and we really see it and abandon it in that moment—why isn't that it? Why does it come back later? This is something we can only wonder at: "I really saw it, and now it's back. I didn't do something right." But that's not the case. It's just that we're not appreciating the level of subtlety with which all these conditions are operating.

For me, when I begin to appreciate that level, it takes away any sense of personal blame or failure. And again, it opens up to the vastness, and to the recognition: okay, this is for the long haul. I might as well relax and settle in and just pay attention.

In the Visuddhimagga, this word āsava, these underlying tendencies—it actually means either "to flow in" or "to flow out." And so one description I like, because it gives the sense of these tendencies as if exuding, coming out from the unguarded sense doors like water from cracks in a pot—a sense of constant trickling. Trickle, trickle, trickle. I mean, that's a metaphor. It's not actually like we're sitting here and things are trickling out of our ears and our eyes.

Don't take it literally. It's a way of talking.

But it really points to something important. These biases aren't inherent in our experience. In other words, they're not there no matter what. Otherwise, there would be no point in practice, obviously. In the clear seeing, there's the abandoning of these tendencies. But in the not seeing, there's this sense of constant trickling—well, I don't like "constant," but it's trickling a lot. The sense of how easily these biases of mind can give rise to thought and speech and action is what can be so surprising when we're on retreat.

Here's a simple example that I was quite aware of at the time. A couple of years ago I was sitting some weeks, and I was very quiet and mindful and present. It wasn't a big space-out or an overwhelming or emotional time. I was just being with what is, noting quite steadily. And I remember—these moments are just so vivid—I was looking at a tree. It was summer, out the window of my room. And I was noting, "seeing, seeing." That sense of attention connecting with what's happening, this very balance. And I could just feel, it's almost as if for some reason I consciously let down the mindfulness, just kind of backed off, so to speak, and quit just meeting, quit just noticing. Okay, seeing, seeing—just kind of backed off.

Immediately—it blew me away actually—immediately there was the sense of, "Oh, isn't that a pretty leaf?" And desire just came up. I mean, about a leaf on a tree, for God's sake. The mind leaned towards the pleasant and desire came up, and memory started, and the whole story started, just fueled by sense desire. Like that. I thought, wow, that's really amazing.

That was such a clear example to me of how this tendency, if the conditions are there, how easy it is for it to give rise to ignorance. The ignorance is what clutches at a sense of pleasure to make me happy, and then just on into the whole story. The bias exerts an influence; it flows in.

In our daily life, our normal life, this is so quick and subtle we're mostly not going to notice on this level. But here, at times—not always, but at times—we can. And again I want to emphasize, rather than that being depressing, it's just that seeing is what's opening the door to our freedom from it. Normally we're so inured, so used to these biases that we don't even notice them. Again, we've talked a lot about how when a kilesa is present in experience, like greed, it colors our perception. This is the same dynamic on a very subtle level. Here we begin to see that, and rather than getting distressed by the seeing, it's the door to letting go, to liberating understanding.

And I know probably half of you are sitting there going, "That's all fine for her to say, but she doesn't know what my mind's like and how identified I am and how caught up I am. Forget it. I really am getting worse no matter what." So you guys have no perspective, really.

Let me share a little newspaper article. Steve Smith is actually really laughing at me because he says I talk about renunciation and then clip things out of the newspaper all the time. This is a little article about unexamined ignorance. You can see the difference. I don't think anyone here fits into this category.

A 94-year-old career criminal is heading back to prison again, this time on assault and gun possession charges. Ninety-four years old. "Pop," they call him—Pop Honeywood—was sentenced to serve seven years at 94. He pleaded guilty to armed assault and possession of a firearm for pointing a gun at a man who warned him not to eat grapes growing in the man's yard. Since 1946, Mr. Honeywood has been charged with 46 crimes and has served eight jail sentences. Under one of his sentencing options this time, Mr. Honeywood could have been sent to a nursing home. But he resisted that option, saying, "If I go to jail, I may be out in a couple of years. If I go to a nursing home, I may be there the rest of my life."

That's the difference between examining our ignorance and just living with it, not even knowing it's there.

There are three levels of experience, three levels of mind from which these biases give rise to manifestation—this might have been mentioned before. The first is the level of speech or action, clearly the strongest level. They've really come up and gotten strong and led to speech or action. Whether we speak in anger, whether we hit somebody, whether we write an angry note. Whether we point a gun—whatever it is we do. And this level is worked with or purified through sīla, through purification of conduct. We can really control speech and action through working with sīla.

The second level, in these layers of decreasing intensity—

The second, slightly less intense level is the obsessive layer, where we're fueled by the bias towards craving or anger or identification. We're really lost and spinning, feeding the thoughts and the story—that sense of really spinning in it. And each thought, each emotion strengthens the potential for it to rise again in the next moment. I'm sure you all know how that goes.

This level is really purified through samadhi, through mindfulness and concentration, where we can come out of the obsessive thinking and return to the actual experience itself.

Both of these levels—both sila and samadhi, the mindfulness and concentration—when they're functioning are in a way not giving these underlying tendencies room to expand, not giving them room to develop. And that's the third layer, the one I'm talking about tonight: underlying the latent, the potential for these obsessive or stronger acting-out defilements to arise if the appropriate conditions are there.

The example often given is that it's like a seed. In that seed—say for an oak tree—there's the latent, underlying potential for an oak tree to grow if the conditions are right. If it's watered, if it has the proper earth, if the climate is correct. But in that actual acorn, we could tear it apart and we're not going to find a tree. The tree isn't actually there. And if it's not watered, if it's not fed, it just withers and dies. It does not grow into a tree. It's not inevitable that it grow into a tree. That's an analogy for how these underlying tendencies are said to work.

While the first two levels can be purified through sila and samadhi, the third level—really the tendency for these things to arise—is abandoned by seeing clearly, by really seeing things as they are on the level of visceral understanding, and the natural letting go that happens from that.

We can see why our practice of sila and of mindfulness, concentration, wise effort, all the factors of enlightenment—they're so vital. Because in each moment that there's presence, that there's mindfulness, that we're seeing, maybe we're seeing the beginning of anger, the beginning of identification, or even further along, but we come in and we're just there with it—it's not giving it room to expand. It's setting the conditions for us not to be blinded, not to be obsessed by these potential tendencies of mind.

When the mind is not clouded by the obsessive nature of the defilements, when that's not coloring our experience, it gives us the potential for deep seeing, for awakening to what is really true. And as we've said, when there's just a moment of touching that which we really are—whatever way you want to describe it: emptiness, interconnectedness, the ultimate true nature, inner completion, peace—in that moment of actually recognizing it, for that moment, and maybe for longer, even the underlying tendency for these confusions to arise is eradicated.

You can see that in your own experience. Often people will say, when they have a moment of just knowing impermanence—not remembering knowing it, not saying, "Oh yes, I know everything's impermanent, so I won't be bothered by this knee pain"—but in that moment of really knowing it, automatically the grasping, the wanting it to change, goes away. The grasping, the sense of self, goes away. There's no tendency for it even to arise in that moment. And so that's the way, at least momentarily—and the deeper we see, the more full it becomes—that these tendencies vanish altogether.

You can see: it might not be what your experience is a lot of the time, but every moment that we're not confused by the obsessive quality, every moment that we're simply present with what is, is setting the conditions. It's not allowing the tendencies to arise and strengthen, and is in fact opening us up to clear seeing.

Let me give an example of how, if the conditions are right and there's no mindfulness, the tendencies flower—and how, when there's really clear seeing, they don't.

Without mindfulness, without a sense of clear seeing, the tendency for grasping, the tendency for identification—just little things. You go to your walking space where you've walked every walking period since the beginning of the retreat, and someone else is there. And you know they know that you always walk there. Anger, grasping, whatever, just shoots up. You're lost in it.

Then another time, when there's not only mindfulness but there's also been that clear seeing at some point—just of interconnectedness, for example—you walk there, the same situation, and nothing happens. It's not like you're sitting on it and saying, "I will not get aversive." It just simply doesn't come up. Or even more, metta comes up instead.

Many people have mentioned this, and there's this sense of: who was that? Where did that come from? It's not what we're used to. But again, this is an example of that underlying tendency not even being there, not giving rise.

So, the seven ways—seven different ways we can work, that the Buddha spoke about. Ways to abandon, to transcend. They're all things that we're doing now, and they're not all that radically different. I just want to run through them a little bit. There's no hierarchy, no one way that's better. It's just whatever's appropriate given your situation, both internal and external, and what's accessible, what's possible in a moment.

The first one is obvious: seeing wisely, wise attention, seeing clearly. And of course, ultimately, it's what I just spoke of—that clear seeing of our interconnected nature that just abandons quite spontaneously. But on a more prosaic, moment-to-moment level, the Buddha speaks about wise attention. He talks about this a lot. Wise attention, he says, has two components: what we pay attention to, and the way in which we pay attention.

And again, he's so practical. He says, for what we should pay attention to, wise attention is simply, quoting him, "When we're not familiar with the Dharma, or we're undisciplined in it, we don't really understand which things are fit for attention and which things are not. So we pay attention to the wrong things."

I think it's just so basic. And of course it's very obvious. The "wrong things" is simply —it's not a matter of blame—but it's simply those things that as we pay attention to them, it causes states of desire, aversion, becoming, and ignorance to either arise, or if they're already arisen, we pay attention to things that make those states get stronger. Those are the wrong things. And it's just so obvious. It's not some moralistic good or bad.

And of course the right things is just the opposite. What we pay attention to that does not cause states of greed, aversion, becoming, identification to arise. Or when those states are already present, like we're lost in anger, what we pay attention to that does not cause them to increase and causes them to fade. It's obvious. And what we've been emphasizing the whole retreat—basically paying attention to the process, to the bare experience, rather than to all the papañca and all the story about it.

So just a simple example. You're walking, someone walks past, they're walking slowly, and there's the thought, "They're a better yogi than I am." Or maybe there's the thought, "They're showing off. I know actually that they're not a better yogi than I am." Either way. And then we pay attention to the content. Are they? Aren't they? Am I? I'm being pretty picky here right now. I'm being pretty aversive. I really should be paying attention to my own feet. And the whole self-blame, judgment, whatever it goes into. And then we say, "Oh, I shouldn't be thinking these things. It's not good." And it just keeps going. Paying attention to the wrong thing. It's not that those thoughts are bad, but we're paying attention to the wrong thing. We're just feeding it and it keeps on going, sort of like inertia. Once it's set in motion, it just has a tendency to stay in motion. It's really hard to stop.

So the right thing is not, "Okay, I won't pay attention to this, I'll pay attention to my breath." It's coming back and being with the experience as it is. Whether it's the feeling of anger, whether it's the sense of shame, whether it's simply the contractions of sensations in the body—simply being with things the way they are. The bare experience, or as it's sometimes talked about, with total attention, freedom from the three times. That's how to pay attention to our experience. The three times being past, present, and future.

So how to be with that sense of contraction, of aversion, the sense of self-judgment, the sense of envy, whatever it is. Whether you feel it as a physical contraction, whether you feel it as a tone in the mind, whether it's observable as an image—doesn't matter. But that willingness to be with that experience in that moment with total attention. When we're with it with whole and total attention, the past and the future don't come up. And if we're with total attention, we're also not analyzing, interpreting, or comparing. We're simply with contraction or seeing. Whatever it happens to be, in whatever form it's taking.

When it's not that total accepting attention, as Sayadaw U Pandita says, it's like past and future come up. Say there's a pleasant experience. It's not the total attention to it, although it's sort of there. And then he says it's like we start remembering all our past pleasant experiences that were sort of like it. As U Pandita says, we bring up past pleasures and relive them over and over like a cow chewing her cud. And then we move into the future—potentials for the future times, "I could have the same pleasant experience in the future." Or we get really into analyzing, interpreting what's happening in the present.

How did it get to be like this? What does it mean? How can I keep it going?

Total attention—this is the other aspect of wise attention—is just simply there, free of the three times. Not bringing in past or future, not analyzing the present. Just what is.

So this first of the seven ways, wise attention, this quality of wise, total attention, is what opens the door to liberating insight. It keeps us from being sidetracked by our interpretations and biases. Without it, with unwise attention, we fall into what the Buddha called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views—all those views of "I am this, I am that. I am a self, I am not-self. I've been this in the past, what will I be in the future?" He lists all these views.

You can really see how unwise attention, even if it's as simple as remembering past pleasant experiences, imagining future ones, and analyzing the present, leads us into all kinds of opinions and views about who we are, who we're going to be, who we were in the past, and what's really going on. By and large, they're a waste of time. They definitely aren't helping us to see clearly.

So that's wise attention.

Another attitude—and a lot of these are attitudes, not necessarily techniques—for understanding and abandoning some of these biases in the mind is restraint at the sense doors, guarding the sense doors. In first reading the sutta, it could be easy to think it just means real restraint of not looking around, not reaching out to sound. This can definitely be helpful. Many of us have talked about how much the desire to look around leads to so much suffering—so much wanting, comparing, negativity both inner and outer. And how just the simple act of restraint of the eyes doesn't give these tendencies room to expand.

But it could be easy to take that a little far. Actually, a friend of mine once did, going around the retreat blindfolded for several days. That's not exactly the point—to try to go around blind and deaf and not feel anything. It's not about engendering a loathing or fear of sense experience.

Rather, restraint at the sense doors is really what we've talked about regarding papañca, the proliferation of mind. It's being able to notice what's happening at the sense door. If someone walks by where we're seeing, there might be perception of who it is, and we just keep it there. We keep the attention there. We don't have to expand it into that whole story of judgment and comparing and craving and envy.

Of course, sometimes we can't do this. Again, this is just one of many ways to work. But sometimes we can really work at restraining the proliferation at the sense door, being just as in that sutta of the Buddha I quoted earlier: "In the seen there is just what is seen. In the heard there is just what is heard. In the sensed, just what is sensed. In the cognized, simply what is cognized. That's all."

It's not like some aversive holding back, but more a relaxed settling back—simply seeing, hearing, sensing, thinking, inner seeing, emotions. Just what is, without any problem. This is really restraint at the sense doors.

When there's that simply being with what is, the tendencies for sense desire, identification, whatever, simply do not flower. They do not sprout. Without that, as we all know very well, it leads into fields of proliferation and story. And as I said before, each moment of really getting into who I am and what can I do to make myself better, to be a good yogi, to have a better sitting—each moment of that we're not aware of, that isn't met with mindfulness, is actually strengthening that bias, the tendency of the mind to move into craving in the next moment, to move into judging in the next moments. Just how it works.

Ajahn Chah said, "When the nose smells an odor, let it go. Just leave it at the nose." So that's what we do. Just leave it at the eyes. Leave it at the ear. Leave it at the nose. There's nowhere to go with it. It's just empty anyway.

The third way is interesting. I wouldn't have thought of it myself, which luckily we have the Buddha for—we don't have to think of these things ourselves. It would be a mess.

see the field of meaning out of which it comes—you know, impossible. Amazing. It was amazing the way the Buddha put all this stuff together. How many of us could sit here and come up with a theory that there are these underlying biases of mind that give rise to ignorance in a moment? I mean, it's quite amazing.

I'm saying this not to indoctrinate or suggest that this is simply how it is, but rather as a way to turn each of you, each of us, back to our own experience. Simply look at your own experience and see what is so. See what holds up. See what's true in your experience. What leads to more suffering? What leads to less suffering? And that's what you believe.

I'm so appreciative that the Buddha laid out so many maps and ways to at least begin to move into understanding our experience. This is a way to start.

So this third way of abandoning the bias for greed, bias for identification, for becoming, for wrong views, is through careful attention to the attitude with which we use things—the attitude with which we use those things which are necessary for our existence. The Buddha is talking to the monks about the attitude with which they use food and clothing and shelter. And I think it's really interesting. We can certainly see the outer effects in the world of so many centuries of using all our resources with absolutely no care whatsoever to the attitude with which we're using them. That's the outer effect. Here we can begin to pay attention to the inner effect.

Do we use things out of an attitude of care, using just what we need to take care of ourselves? For example, however many blankets you need to keep warm. The amount of food that we need to be healthy, to be wakeful, to be strong. Where does it tip over? When we're using something out of care and respect for ourselves and others, when does it become fear that we won't have enough, or greed in case we won't be happy? When do we run around and save a few extra blankets that we don't actually ever use, just in case, even though someone else might need them?

But even leave aside that someone else might need them. Consider the way that it strengthens the bias for fear to arise. If we're using, say, more blankets than we need out of fear, holding on to them, a moment of using in that way is strengthening the tendency for fear to come up again. So we're really bringing on the potential for more suffering in ourselves.

Or when we take three extra rice cakes at tea after we've finished—what's the attitude? It might really be that you know your energy drops at nine o'clock, or when you get up in the morning you need them, and you take them out of real care and appreciation. Fine. Or is it that lurch of fear? And they're piling up on the back shelves there in the small dining room—ten rice cakes from the last week and a few old moldy bananas.

Never mind the outer effects. Okay, you're feeding the cockroaches and they're very appreciative. But what's the effect on our inner nature? This is what is really important to see: that what's happening in that moment of using resources out of an attitude of fear is we're bringing on ourselves more suffering.

And again, this isn't about looking from the outside and saying what's bad or good, or practicing out of some kind of austere asceticism. That can be done out of hatred for oneself, which is also not helpful, because then that's just propagating the tendency for hatred to come up. This is really looking at how we relate to the things that we use.

When we can just use what's needed with this sense of trust, not worrying or fearful about tomorrow—probably no one here is going to starve tomorrow. Probably there'll be breakfast. Probably there'll be lunch. Probably there'll be rice cakes and peanut butter for tea. You can probably count on that. And if not, that's something else.

You know how it just feels so free when we can let go of that fear or that greed, just in a moment, and appreciate what's here—without that scarcity model in which everyone else becomes a rival for a limited amount of resources. Instead there's a sense of just taking what we need and flowing, which is really such a lovely way to live.

Or just notice that difference between when you're appreciating the lunch—just eating, appreciating, no problem, open, spacious—and then you hear that scraping of the spoon on the serving table. You think, "Uh-oh, there's not much left. I wonder if I should get up now and get seconds before it's gone." And that thought, unnoticed, expands, gets going. And where's the appreciation? Your plate's still half full. But where's the appreciation of the rest of the meal? Gone.

You know, it's just a struggle. Do I jump up now or do I wait? No, I'll wait. I'll just be open. I won't be craving. But we're just tight. And the difference between that appreciation and letting it go—we don't need to act out of fear. Well, sometimes we do need to act out of fear; we don't have a choice. But when we have a choice, we don't need to. And to just expand into that way of relating to resources is quite lovely.

So that's the third way. The fourth way—and this one, often people don't believe us when we try to talk them into it in interviews—the Buddha said, yes, one way of working with difficult experiences is to avoid them. Of course, he didn't say avoid means "I don't like this, so I think I'll leave the retreat." Not exactly that level of avoidance. The examples he gave were things like avoiding a savage elephant, or avoiding a poisonous snake, or avoiding unwholesome company. But it's really, I think, looking with discernment and realizing that we can't handle every experience.

Sometimes the savage elephant or the poisonous snake is a so-called internal experience in ourselves. Something's just coming up so strong and overwhelming that it's just as if we were run over by a wild elephant. And so easily, people seem to get the idea that true mindfulness means I can be with anything, every moment, and if I back off, I'm wimping out. So I think it's really important to understand that the Buddha said yes, this is one of the things to do. You avoid what is unwholesome, what is difficult, what one is unable to meet with any kind of balance at a particular time.

Now obviously this is going to vary in your own experience widely from time to time. What you might need to avoid at one time you might be quite able to be with at another time. So there's no cut and dried experience here. But you can see just in the way the retreat is set up there are a lot of experiences that we've arranged for you to avoid. We ask you not to get your mail, not to talk to each other, not to read Newsweek every week. We don't have TVs in the back dining room. There's a reason for that. We set it up so that you avoid certain situations.

We're not saying communication is a bad thing, that it's really unskillful to communicate with your family, or that hearing the news is wrong. Nothing like that. But to be inundated, to have so much contact, so much input, so much communication just makes it so much easier in a situation like this for the tendencies to come up, for sense desire to arise. All you need to do is see one commercial for something on TV and go, "Oh yeah, Jamaica"—you just see a commercial of Jamaica and that's it for the next two hours. And those who've received a letter suddenly in the middle of retreat know it can just send the mind flying with either fear or wanting or self-identification, whatever.

So it's a wise avoidance, in order to set the conditions where these tendencies don't arise so that we can then see what is so—set the conditions for knowing truth, for knowing things as they are. It's avoidance of discernment, not of aversion. So if you find you're working with avoidance and you discover that the motivation doesn't seem to be a balanced one of seeing "I can't handle this," but rather one of total aversion to what is happening, avoidance might not be the right attitude. And it probably won't work anyway. When we're doing it from that point it usually doesn't work.

So, aside from avoidance, the next one that the Buddha spoke about is patience. In other words, the things that we cannot avoid, the difficult experiences that we cannot change, we meet with patience—which we've spoken about quite a lot. That quality of total acceptance of things just as they are, with a real equanimity that isn't flustered by whatever's happening.

You know the phrase: develop a mind that is like the earth. Whatever we throw on the earth, whatever we do to it, however ravaged it might be, it accepts all things equally. And at some point it begins again to nurture all people equally. It doesn't say, "I like you, I don't like you. You can drink the water, you can't breathe the air." It's just this sense of spacious acceptance of whatever might come.

And I really love to see how if there's just a little crack in the pavement, a flower or grass will start to grow up. However much we try to pave over the earth, whatever we do to it, somehow the life, the nurturing aspect of the planet begins to come through no matter how hard we try to suppress it. I think of that image when I try to call up in myself the attitude of patience, this open acceptance. I talked about last week this radical acceptance of the things we can't change, external or internal. Again, it's quite a discerning thing to know when to use acceptance and when avoidance.

And it's going to be changing a lot back and forth.

When I was in Thailand for a year or so during that time as a nun, I learned actually quite a lot about patience but also about avoidance—when to use each, and when I would try to avoid what was unavoidable, how much suffering comes from that.

I went there with at least a year planned, maybe a couple of years, having sat mostly here and in England, with highfalutin ideas of going off into the forest and living this life of solitude and peace and bliss, really getting deep in my practice—all these expectations and self-conceited ideas about what it would be like. Which of course, forget it.

I thought I would spend months alone in the beautiful forest, and instead I spent probably the first four months in a temple in Bangkok. Very noisy, extremely noisy, not quiet. Very hot, extremely hot. It was the hot season, and I didn't have much time to grow into it—I arrived pretty close to the hot season. Outside the walls of the monastery, there were all kinds of loudspeakers blaring rock music, Western rock music, Thai rock music. Inside, there was a plethora of animals. What I remember particularly are the roosters, because there must have been hundreds of them, and they would start maybe at three in the morning. One by one, they would all crow over and over and over. And I said, "Please, please stop. I'm not ready to get up yet." But forget it. You have to get up. And the dogs and the cats, they screech and they howl. It was just wild.

The heat was, for me, unbearable. Very humid, probably 120 degrees, plus my little hut had a tin roof. So it was just bake, bake in there. And yet I was in a temple where the abbot was wonderful to me. I didn't know at the time how really radical he was being, because he ordained me as a nun and there were no other nuns in this temple. He ordained me, then he let me stay in a kuti. They had little kutis with grass around them, and it was very nice for Bangkok—which I didn't realize at the time. I just got into aversive mode. I was in a little kuti surrounded by kutis filled with monks, which is almost unheard of. But it basically meant I could never step outside without being completely covered. You have these long-sleeve shirts, always polyester, with a polyester undershirt. I tried to get cotton—it was really, really hard. And then you have to put this robe over, again polyester. So I would just kind of walk out and drip. Go back inside and wash and curse a little bit and say, "Oh, that's ruined speech."

I could go on and on, but it was not engendering light, blissful mind states. I was there for probably three months, and finally I went to the forest. I did have a nice kuti in the forest. Actually, I was treated wonderfully everywhere I went, and it wasn't until a month later that I could appreciate it.

The forest, I want to tell you, is not quiet. I thought the forest would be quiet. It is so noisy, it's incredible. Just the insects and the tukke lizards that go off all night in your kuti, out of your kuti, really very loud. I was under a wild mango tree, again with a tin roof, so I'd be sitting in the middle of meditation and these mangoes would drop on the roof like an explosion. Really, I'd jump, about to settle down again.

And then of course, the wats in the country are beautiful, like parks. So on weekends, tour buses of people from surrounding areas come and they all kind of troop through in front of the kutis. The women's kutis, of course, were on the side where all the people are, so it would be safe. The men are across the river, nice and quiet. That's how it always is. So they'd troop by, two tour buses of people, go off into the woods, have their picnic, troop back out. It's nice they could come and enjoy and support the temple—it's really part of the symbiotic relationship, it's lovely. But I wasn't in that mind state at the time. People would come up and look in my door: "Oh, look at the farang mae chi!" They'd just stand there and stare at me while I was sitting. Or I'd be walking and they'd come up—I'd turn around, they'd be right there with a camera to take my picture.

It was a trip. So, working between patience and avoidance.

I thought, okay, I can put up a sheet over my screen so people can't look in. And that would really help me avoid engendering a lot of unpleasant mind states. But there was a lot I couldn't avoid. And it was at least a couple of months before I saw clearly that I was so much feeding the tendency for aversion to arise that it actually got to the point where almost anything that came into my experience, aversion would arise. It didn't even have to be particularly aversive.

And I got it. Oh, I'm conditioning aversion here. I'm practicing aversion. This is not helpful. The seeing of that really did help. That really, just the seeing was like a releasing, a letting go, an opening up. And that's the opening into patience. Wait a minute—this is how it is here. I can leave or I can stay, and if I stay, this is how it is.

That patience really broadens the experience. That's when I could start to appreciate actually how wonderfully I was being treated, and of course the many positive aspects that I talked about another time. It's really quite interesting. Patience is a wonderful tool. It's not just a way to get through something we don't like.

In a moment—just in a moment of being with what is—all the times when you're sort of present but you're not really concentrated, you don't really like what's happening, you can't say "I'm having good practice," but there's patience, there's that acceptance—in that moment, through the patience, the underlying tendencies are not being given room to flower. And that's a lot. Because each moment that these tendencies aren't flowering is a moment that's conditioning patience, metta, and clear seeing. It's letting clear seeing be possible.

So really, when we get to these subtle levels, don't undervalue patience. It's actually an amazing tool. It's not flashy, but it's really a huge aspect of allowing us to open to truth.

Now of course I have one minute to talk about the other two. The sixth method for abandoning the habits of mind—the translation I read called it "removing." What I would call it is what Joseph calls the sword of wisdom. These are the times when we're not meeting experience right at that door of perception, when we can't just guard the sense doors, but we land in the middle of an already arisen state, whatever it is—wanting, fear, greed, identification. But there's that moment of recognition when we can bring in that kind of clear seeing: okay, that's it, enough now. Don't let it expand any further.

Now, this gentle sort of wisdom—I'm not talking about a hammer, you know, "that's enough, get away." That's just more aversion. But that place where we can see, I'm really getting into aversion. Okay, so it took two months. And sometime I saw it—that's enough. There's no need for this to expand anymore. Of course we can't always do that, but there are many times when we can. I think we don't do it nearly as often as we could. Sometimes we get seduced by thinking we're being mindful, but actually we're getting sucked in. So there's this—just, okay, you think you're no good because that person walks slower? That's enough. Just come back to the experience. That's enough. Removing, not giving them a chance to expand.

And the last method is happening quite spontaneously, simply by virtue of your mindfulness practice. This is the development, the strengthening and balancing of the seven factors of enlightenment. Has anyone given a talk about all the seven factors? No one has. We've talked about each one of them separately. But one of the ways—conceptual perhaps—but one of the ways of holding a sense of what's going on in meditation practice is that each of these seven factors is being strengthened and balanced.

I'll just say what they are. There are three tranquilizing factors, three calming factors. One is calm, tranquility.

One is equanimity—that real non-reactive space of mind. And the third calming one is concentration, focus, steadiness of mind. It just stays with what is, doesn't move around.

Then there are three energizing factors. Energy, obviously—effort or energy. The second one is rapture, pīti, which sometimes manifests as this real vivid interest in what's going on. And the third energizing factor is investigation, which I know Michelle gave a whole talk on. Investigation—not thinking about, but the investigation of being with what's happening, seeing what happens to it without interpretation.

So three energizing, three calming. And the seventh is mindfulness—what else—that balances all of them. Mindfulness can't be too out of balance. You can't have too much mindfulness.

A lot of what we do, one of the ways we look when we're talking to people in interviews, is seeing which factors are stronger, which factors could be boosted a little. These seven factors are all quite naturally being developed through the practice. It happens by itself. But sometimes people tend to get fixated—we talk a lot about mindfulness, a lot about concentration. We mention all the others, but often people just tend to focus on concentration, maybe on mindfulness, maybe on effort. We forget it's a whole range of all seven.

What happens naturally—and as you become more familiar with the energy of each—you can tune in. I'll do that sometimes when I'm sitting and things are feeling off. Not that I don't like what's happening, but it just feels not quite right. I'll tune in and see if one of these isn't quite happening. Sometimes there's maybe no investigation. I'm trying to be mindful, but there's this underlying feeling of "I don't really care what's going on." Oh, okay—let me see if I can get a little interested here. Sometimes there's not much energy; that's obvious. Sometimes we're really with it, but there's no calm, for example.

So a lot of what goes on in interviews is just steering toward whatever seems to be a little out of balance. It's a constantly evolving and shifting process. And don't get all hung up on it because it's happening by itself.

So again, that's the seventh way that he speaks of—the developing and strengthening of the seven factors of enlightenment. I don't know if you remember earlier when I read a quotation from the Buddha where he said that mindfulness of breathing, developed and practiced, perfects the four foundations of mindfulness, which developed and practiced perfects the seven factors of enlightenment, which developed and practiced perfects clear vision and deliverance.

So you see, it's a natural progression. I've talked all night and then I say it's actually happening by itself. Sometimes the noticing can be really helpful to see where we're stuck. Sometimes it can get too intellectual and you're thinking about it. In that case, forget it, because it's all happening by itself.

And again, as subtle and pervasive as the tendencies might be for confusion to arise, for wanting to arise, for identification to arise—the seeing of it, don't let that be discouraging, because the seeing of it is the opening to freedom from it.

This is actually a quotation from Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas: "Recognize what is in your sight, and what is hidden will become clear to you."

That's what we're really doing here. Recognizing what is in our sight. By itself, what is hidden will become clear.

So let's sit for a minute.

Miracle of Awakening

> In this Thanksgiving reflection, Carol Wilson opens with Śāntideva's beautiful verses on awakening as "the nectar of immortality" and "a feast of joy to which all are invited." She shares a powerful personal experience at Bodh Gayā, where sitting near the Bodhi tree amid the chaotic hubbub of pilgrims, beggars, and vendors, she was struck by the profound humanness and immediacy of the Buddha's awakening—not as myth, but as real possibility accessible in all conditions of life.
>
> Wilson explores how we construct a sense of solid self through identification with the five khandhas (aggregates): body, feeling, perception, consciousness, and saṅkhāras (mental formations). She describes how mindfulness reveals that what we call "I" is actually a rapidly arising and passing phenomenon—sometimes a subtle sensation, sometimes a contraction, sometimes an image—never the same twice. Rather than fighting this process, we can simply turn attention to observe how quickly each sense of self vanishes upon investigation.
>
> The talk culminates in a teaching on faith and radical acceptance. Wilson distinguishes between "bright faith"—the initial inspiration that draws us to practice—and "verified faith" that arises from direct experience. She invites practitioners to embrace the fundamental uncertainty of existence, quoting Suzuki Roshi on appreciating the rain without knowing what the next moment will bring. True freedom, she suggests, comes not from controlling experience but from surrendering to the mystery, accepting truth "in all forms, at all times, in all ways."

So it looks like you all survived the day, more or less.

I'm going to talk about a few different things tonight. Hopefully a theme will emerge—maybe, maybe not.

I want to start by reading something that, since it's Thanksgiving, feels to me like a beautiful expression of the real thing there is to be thankful for. It's from Shantideva:

As a blind person feels when she finds a pearl in a dustbin, so am I amazed by the miracle of awakening arising in my consciousness. It is the nectar of immortality that delivers us from death. The treasure that lifts us above poverty into the wealth of giving to life. The tree that gives shade to us when we roam about scorched by life. The bridge that takes us across the stormy river of life. The cool moon of compassion that calms our mind when it is agitated. The sun that dispels darkness, the butter made from the milk of kindness by churning it with the Dharma. It is a feast of joy to which all are invited.

That's our true feast of joy—the miracle of awakening that arises in each of our consciousnesses. And the real miracle is that it's an open secret to which every being on this planet, every human, is invited. What's more amazing is why so many aren't drawn to listen. But it's so immediate, so human, and this miracle of awakening is accessible to us not just here on some three-month isolated retreat but in all situations. It's part of our human condition. It's amazing.

I want to share an experience that in my life has served as a metaphor for this—both for the humanness of our quest, the humanness of awakening, and the fact that it is part of all life, accessible in all conditions. It's a metaphor, but it really brought this home to me.

The first retreat I ever did, my first introduction to Buddha Dharma, was in a town called Bodh Gaya in India, which is the town where the Buddha supposedly sat under the Bodhi tree and came to his full awakening. Now it's a real shrine. There's a descendant of the original Bodhi tree—at least they say it is. It's in a big park with a wall around it, and there's a large stupa right next to it. The tree itself has a little concrete platform built around it.

When I was there in 1971, it was still pretty much a dusty little village. I didn't go back for years and years. Then maybe five years ago, I returned to Bodh Gaya with some good friends. It's gotten much busier since then. I'm not a particularly devotional person or one who's given to visiting shrines, so my reaction surprised me.

Sitting there—actually it's pretty hard to sit directly under the Bodhi tree because it has a locked fence around it, but you can sit near it on the concrete wall where pilgrims make circumambulations of the shrine—something hit me so powerfully. Oh, the Buddha's not some myth. This was a real guy. Maybe he was really sitting in this place. It's not a made-up story. And the potential for freedom is not some airy-fairy idea. It's as real as me sitting here now on this concrete wall.

It touched me so much. I was just weeping, which is also not that common for me. But just that sense of humanness and immediacy.

And the second piece of it for me was that this was happening in the midst of incredible hubbub. We're not talking about some esoteric peaceful shrine in the middle of a beautiful country village. Bodh Gaya is in the middle of one of the poorest states of India. It's really dusty and dirty. As you walk up, it's just the regular hubbub of a little Indian street.

But as you walk up to the shrine, to the park surrounding it, first of all there's a huge row of beggars sitting against the wall. And just before you get to that row, there's a guy sitting there selling little coins. He'll sell you a pile of nine or ten anna coins for a rupee—which is really ninety or a hundred annas to a rupee—so he's making ten annas off the transaction. Then you can give one of these coins to a beggar.

Now, a coin like this is basically useless. It's less than a penny. You can't buy anything with it. So you can purchase these and relieve your sense of guilt or whatever, creating some gesture of generosity, but you're not really doing anything for anybody. Someone told me that for these beggars, it's like their job. I don't know if this is true, but someone who lived in Bodh Gaya told me that some of them take a rickshaw from neighboring villages over to their begging spot for the day. I don't know if it's accurate, but that's the tone of things—this press of humanity getting in, getting out the door.

Once I was almost literally lifted off my feet just from the crowd of people trying to go up the stairs and get out the gate of the shrine. There was no particular panic. It's just a lot of people in a hurry to get out the door.

And as you're sitting or walking around the stupa, there are pilgrims from all the different Buddhist countries—very touching. They come in huge groups from tour buses with loudspeakers, from Japan, from Thailand, from other parts of India. There weren't any American or European tour groups when I was there. People going around talking really loud. There was a whole group of Tibetan monks doing some kind of three-day chanting puja, sitting on the side with their horns—really beautiful. There was literally a mad Tibetan woman who would run around screaming and yelling at anyone who sat down. Starving dogs, all kinds of people coming and going. Hindus who would fish—they would take fish out of the lakes in the park and put them in little plastic bags and sell them to Buddhists, because then the Buddhists could earn merit by freeing the fish back into the pond. I'm not making this up.

So you can't really get into "Oh, how beautiful, how esoteric, how sublime." It's the whole show. And that's what became the metaphor for me. Sometimes, sure—it wasn't like that when Gotama was sitting under the tree. But still, it was so powerful. And there was no sense whatsoever of seclusion from the world or any of the craziness of the world.

Again, it brought home to me that freedom, our potential for awakening, doesn't have to wait until we can do a three-month retreat, or until we've arranged the perfect circumstances, or until our mind is calm and quiet. There's nothing to wait for. There's no reason to wait. As Shantideva says, it's a feast of joy and we're all invited. All we have to do is accept the invitation. And it's so amazing how difficult, how scary it can sometimes be to accept that invitation—or when we look around in the world, how few people really do.

The other big thing to do in Bodh Gaya is hang out in the chai shop and drink chai all day. There's not really much else to do. So hanging out there, Joseph was commenting how the people that live there—the guys who run the chai shop—are good people. He's known their families for years. But they're not really interested in awakening. So many wonderful Buddhist teachers come through Bodh Gaya from all different traditions, and the people that live there are interested, they're nice, they like to meet the teachers. But there isn't this pull to really delve into the teachings, to awaken. It becomes so clear that even having the opportunity handed to us isn't always enough.

What that brings up in me is such joy and appreciation for all of us—that something in us has recalled us to our true selves, has awakened in us the willingness to really begin exploring, to come home again to what is true. You might not have known it before you came here, if this is your first retreat, but now you do: it isn't easy. It isn't necessarily fun. It isn't every moment a moment of the joy of the miracle of awakening arising in your consciousness. It is—you just don't notice it.

It's tough. Nisargadatta says that the search for reality is the most dangerous of all undertakings, because it will destroy the world in which you live.

I mean, it's true in a way. It's not that it obviously destroys the outer world or makes us unable to live in the normal world. But it subverts all our perceptions. It destroys the world in which we live by destroying our clinging to all of our previous preoccupations—all of our holding on to this constant birth and death of the self. It destroys our sense of what is true and who we are. And this, obviously, can be very unsettling.

But it doesn't mean—and I want to emphasize this—that once we awaken, we don't live a normal life. In fact, it might be more normal than ever.

This is from a Sufi master: "The true person of God sits in the midst of her fellow men and rises and eats and sleeps and marries and buys and sells and gives and takes in the bazaar and spends the days with other people, and yet never forgets God even for a single moment."

That's the difference.

And for some reason, when we're still in the grip of the constant rise and fall of the self, still clinging to our old perceptions, it feels like the world we know will be destroyed. Opening to that insecurity can be so frightening, so threatening. We don't know that on the other side of that is a life so filled with joy that never forgets the truth even for a single moment—and yet is thoroughly in the midst of all beings, of all life. Not at all separated. In fact, more completely connected than ever.

The Buddha said once that what is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer thirsts after it. Just a shift of perspective. And that main shift can come about through part of what we're observing here with our mindfulness.

When we begin to explore what we're calling this continuous "I," when we let go of that constant referral of every sense contact back to a sense of me—there's a sound, I'm hearing the sound; there's a thought, I'm having the thought—it's not even that gross as "the thought, I'm having the thought." But that moment-to-moment referral of experience back to some unquestioned sense of solid self.

One reason it can get so disorienting as our consciousness lets go of old perceptions and assumptions, as our mindfulness strengthens and we begin to explore more, is because we begin to see: it's not that there's some solid "I" that we have to somehow see and define and annihilate—and then we're scared, wondering what we're going to do when there's no I. But as we begin to look, we see it's more like there's this sense of the birth and death of a sense of me, Carol, separate. That birth and death of that sense arising and passing so quickly, almost moment to moment. Again, so fast we don't see it.

It's actually much more simple than some solid thing we've got to get rid of. But on the other hand, it's so subtle that you can see why it can be hard to see through. Or more so, it's not even that it's hard to see through—but we see through it once and then we wonder why in the next moment it's back. "I really saw it that time. How many times have you had the experience of a new layer coming up? Oh no, I dealt with that one before. I saw it to the depths. I really understood it. Something's wrong—it's coming back."

It's because in some way we keep falling back into this sense of unchangingness, this sense of permanence.

So what we can begin to do with our mindfulness is not think about it, not analyze it—forget it, we do that way too much. But when there's just that subtle sense of me, don't try to figure it out. Just turn the attention back on what you're calling "me." It's almost like you can note it the same way you note any other sensation or thought or experience. For example, when I'm practicing and it's to the point where the noting is very, very steady, I've started to notice that almost every third note I make might be "self" or "me" or "Carol."

That's the note. But the perception that the note is arising out of is a different experience every time. And so that's why we need to turn around and look. We say, "Oh, there's me again. There's me again." But there's no "again." One moment it might have been a subtle sensation. Another moment it might have been just a sense of contraction. Another moment it might have been an image. Another moment it might have been a thought. Another moment it might have been, again, a sense of contraction.

And as soon as we turn our attention to it, we see that this so-called "I" is vanishing. As soon as it arises, it's vanishing. And the next moment, another is arising. If you really look at it, you'll see that one, too, is vanishing. And the only reason there's continuity is because we don't really look, and we think, "Oh, that felt the same as the last one." Actually, we don't think that—we think it is the same one. That's what happens without mindfulness.

With mindfulness, when we turn onto the experience and really look at it, we see that all of this is contact, sense contact, knowing, feeling arising. And without mindfulness, there's some clinging, some aversion. It might be as subtle as that, or it might be ten miles down the road and worlds and worlds away from here, feeling much more solid. But it's all the same process.

I find it really fascinating to just keep turning around and looking at that. Not trying to get rid of something. Not on some big crusade to rid the experience of "I." It's not an enemy. It serves us well in functioning in life when we see it for what it is—just a sense, a contraction, a clutching of experience, a holding on and solidifying. It's what we call identification. All that's happening is just contact, sense experience, and knowing of it. Perception.

I just want to briefly mention, not really go into them, but to put it in your minds again because it's been talked of before: in this looking at the experience in the moment that's being grasped and experienced as "I," it's going to be one of the five khandhas—or skandhas in Sanskrit.

Just to mention what they are again: we might be experiencing a sense of body, body sensation. And as you know, probably all of you have had at times the experience where there's just tingling—there's no sense of anything else going on with it. Notice the difference between when it's just tingling and when it's my tingling. So that's one way: sense of body, when grasped, gives a sense of self.

It can also be more subtle. Not so much contracting around a particular sensation, but more around an image that we don't quite notice of the body. For example, there's tingling, and a mental image comes up of the knee, or a mental image comes up of the whole body. There's actually a kind of identification, a clutching around that image, which is actually mental. This isn't the body itself, but an image of it.

Or sometimes for me, there'll be a subtle felt sense, almost an imagining of my whole body, when if I'm really attentive there's just sensations. But then this felt sense arises of it landing in the body, or even looking in the mirror, or even remembering how I looked the last time I looked in the mirror as I'm sitting here. And that's actually all mental. That's actually not the body. But in a way, it's one of the ways that subtle sense experience can be clung to, and it gives us a feeling of solid body.

Of course, there are feelings—the second of the skandhas—the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, which we've talked about quite a lot. The clutching around any of that experience gives this real sense of separation between me and other.

Perception is the third. That quality of recognition, which includes memory. It's interesting to notice that the grasping of perception, the identification with perception—and again, this is so fleeting, but it can be so solid. Just for example: how much do you trust your perceptions? As I think I talked about once, the perception that we're unchanging is a total delusion. But on an even more noticeable scale, have you had the experience of really having a perception of someone else here who you don't really know? "That person is so arrogant. They're so angry."

They're so self-centered. They're so whatever. And then a couple days later, as the mental state affecting consciousness lifts, you look at that person again and realize, "Oh, I think maybe it wasn't them that was so arrogant and so angry and so self-possessed. Maybe it was me."

Or vice versa—if you're filled with metta, our perception of people is one of friendship. People look beautiful. We see the light shining out of their eyes. We see them as walking embodiments of truth. Which we are. But generally, if someone at any of those moments came up and said, "Do you think your perception could be a little off?" we'd probably fight to the death. "No, I know what I'm seeing, and don't take it away from me." Solid clinging.

Consciousness, the fourth skandha, is that quality of knowing. Hearing and the knowing of it. Seeing and the knowing of it. The awareness of it, you could say. Again, very subtle to notice. It's sort of like a foreground-background shift. We're more aware of, or in some subtle way tuned in more to, the appearance that's arising—the sound, the sensation, the thought, whatever—and not quite as tuned into the knowing quality. But sometimes that knowing quality is very vivid. Yet again, rising and falling so rapidly with each new sense contact that first it's even hard to notice, and then it's hard to see that it's coming and going. So that sense of continuity gives a sense of solidity, and there can be a subtle clinging to that. Subtle clinging to the sense of being the knower. A subtle clinging to the sense of being the witness. It's tricky.

The fifth skandha is called sankaras, or mental formations. This includes everything else—emotions, thoughts, everything. One I'd particularly like to point out is intention, because you can see how that arising of intention is so easily clung to and identified as self. "I'm getting up. I'm going to generate metta. I'm reaching." Who's deciding to do this? Who decided to come here? It's very easy to identify with intention.

I'm just mentioning these. I don't want to engender a lot of thought. But if, in that moment of realizing there's an "I" in the picture, you simply turn around and see what the "I" is emerging out of in that particular moment—I wanted to bring these up as possibilities. They're called the five skandhas of grasping, really. And again, it's not that if there's no grasping in that moment, they all fly apart and we're not a human being anymore. But the sense of permanence, that sense of referring everything back to some unchanging thing, comes when there's grasping at these experiences.

Sometimes that sense of contracting around, identifying with a personal experience, a sense experience, is obvious and easy to see—and can even be quite funny, how it just arises out of nowhere. Sort of like the miracle of awakening. Sometimes the miracle of a solid sense of self just seems to arise out of nowhere.

One time I was doing a self-retreat in a very beautiful hilly area in California. I was sitting up on the side of a hill on a bench, looking out from pretty high up, in one of those states where the mind just feels open and clear, experience just arising and passing, no contracting, no sense of me. Some turkey vultures were flying out of nearby pines and whizzing past really close. Far out, just appreciating whatever was arising. This went on for some time, and there were more and more of them—five or six flying around. I thought, "Wow, this is far out."

And then suddenly—I guess what I first identified with was seeing, and then there was a thought—I realized they were circling. And I realized they were circling me. I had this moment of total panic. I had to hold myself back—I just wanted to stand up and scream, "I'm still alive!"

It's funny when it's so solid, so quick. And it's always right after you've been sort of thinking, "I'm so free. I'm so open."

But other times the sense contact that gives rise to that grasping contraction of self is so fleeting and subtle that we don't even notice the contact, and we wonder why the self seemed so solid. It really takes a situation like this, perhaps—of silence, of some kind of development of mindfulness and concentration—to even notice these subtleties.

I think it's very interesting. Last year I was sitting, and this is where I first really saw how this could work. Out of just such a little nothing experience—I was doing walking meditation, nothing special, just present. I had a turtleneck on, and I just kind of ran my finger under my turtleneck. That contact somehow gave rise to an unclear, physical memory—how to say it—almost like a physical memory of myself, not even very formed. It wasn't something I could have put words to at all, but it was just this feeling of myself. And then it gave rise to a stronger image of myself walking, and then another memory of myself, this time more solid, and then a sort of projecting out: "I wonder what I look like walking back and forth like this." I think I was bouncing up and down, wondering if I looked a little weird. And all of a sudden I realized there was this solid construction. Just from a very, very subtle experience.

That was very interesting to me. There's nothing to fight or hate about that, but it just gave me some information about how it can seem so empty, and suddenly the awareness of that emptiness seems to have vanished. In its place, there's this sense of Carol again doing her little dance. Very quick, very subtle movement. And in the seeing of it, it all just fades away again, no problem.

So I find it fun to explore, fun to play with. Gross or subtle, it doesn't really matter. But knowing this, it's not something to fight or to be afraid of. Yes, sometimes fear comes up when our little cozy sense of security and permanence gets threatened. It does bring up fear. That's okay. That's just fear coming up. But in the bigger picture, sometimes not out of fear, but often people will say, "Well, who wants to live like that? Detached and dispassionate and not part of things." Again, that's not how it is. It's just the reverse. It's not about a gray, empty life.

Nisargadatta again: "The world, the sense of self, by its very nature, is painful and transient. But when you see it as it is, you divest yourself, you rid yourself of all desire and fear. When the world does not hold and bind you, it becomes an abode of joy and beauty. You can be happy in this world only when you are free of it."

Happy in this world. Free of it doesn't mean rejecting anything. It really means liberated from our enclosed and resistant sense of self and liberated into a life of real beauty and joy. It's really a movement from a life of clinging and fear and trying to control what can never be controlled into a life of faith, of deep trust and deep surrender. And scary as that might be, or difficult as it might be for us, it's so miraculous.

I think everyone here has touched that somehow, somewhere, over and over—or none of us would be here. No one comes and does something like this just because you don't know what else to do for three months.

So in a way, it's the movement of faith that allows us to begin to open to the miracle of awakening. And it's the retouching of that truth that lets us move deeper and deeper into a life of faith, a life of trust and surrender. I read somewhere—I don't remember where—a definition of faith as "the drive towards that which cannot be described." I really like that: the drive towards that which cannot be described. It fits with my personal relationship to the experience of faith as trust. Trust in that which cannot be described or defined or known or owned or contained.

Sometimes two types of faith are spoken of, and I want to mention this briefly. The first sort of reawakening to our true nature, this recalling of the beauty that we really are, is sometimes called bright faith. We might be inspired by anything—by another person, by something we've read, by just seeing another yogi here, by hearing a story of some master in the world, whatever. That first recalling of what we really are awakens a kind of brightness in the mind, a joyous confidence, a real energy. You know, you really have this sense: "Yes, I'm going to do this. I'm really going to commit my life, whatever form it takes." And that's wonderful because that's what gets us going. It can be reconnected with, reawakened throughout our life.

In fact, in times here when you're really feeling like faith is gone and you don't know what you're doing here and your practice is dead—the second type of faith is verified faith, which really deeply arises from your own experience. And you might think, "I never had any experience that any faith could arise out of." But you can reconnect, you can find ways to reconnect with so-called outer inspiration to reignite this bright faith, to recall ourselves again to the miracle of awakening. And that again can give us the energy to come back to our own experience, which will open into verified faith.

For me, over and over, talking to yogis, to you in interviews, it awakens a sense of bright faith in me—so much to see just the light of truth, the light of Dharma, kind of shining out from everybody. And it wouldn't be in the moments you might think, either. But just to see how the truth works its magic, no matter how hard we try to stop it. We do everything we can not to just be with what is. But the Dharma is stronger than we are. So it just shines out. And every day something happens that wakes up again in me deep appreciation and love of the Dharma and total awe of how it works, of the mystery.

You can see it in other yogis here. Sometimes when you just don't have the juice, you see someone working really hard. Or it can be tuning into someone who's in difficulty and seeing that they're really meeting that difficulty with fortitude or with their own faith. Or a sudden spurt of compassion comes up in your heart where you least would have expected it. Whatever it is, just know that this tuning in to whatever inspiration awakens the bright faith can be a way back into the trust to drop into your experience.

And out of that will come what's called verified faith, which is intuitive experience, real understanding that comes from your own experience, whatever that experience might be. It might be one of impermanence. It might be just emptiness, interconnectedness. It might be of the power of metta, of non-separation. It might be just a moment of suchness standing in the snow—whatever it is. A sense when again we touch the possibility. And when that's been touched for ourselves, it's called verified because if someone comes up and says, "No, that's not so," you don't even want to argue. It doesn't matter. We know. We know. It's not of the mind, but we know. And no one can take that away.

From that place it becomes possible to move more and more into this trust of the unknown. And we're all living in the unknown anyway—mostly we try to control it. A life of faith, to me, is really moving into that with trust. Not to confuse it with getting more knowledge, trying to understand things, trying to be able to explain everything. The way it's been for me is the more I practice, the more I look, the more I see that I don't know anything. And I know even more of nothing than I thought I did twenty years ago, or last year. And it gets more and more okay not to know anything.

There's a science article from the New York Times—it's talking about astronomy. This is from a few years ago, but I heard an update on the radio the other day, and the update wasn't very different, so I'll just read this. Astronomers discovered the largest galaxy ever. It includes more than one hundred trillion stars, measuring more than six million light years in diameter—sixty times the size of the Earth's galaxy, the Milky Way. Sixty times the size of the galaxy we're in. This new galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump of galaxies, a cluster of one thousand galaxies called Abel 2029. Somehow, okay, if we name it, we've controlled it.

But then it goes on to say—this is just the introduction—that they hope further study will provide clues to a mysterious substance called dark matter. Since there doesn't appear to be enough matter in the universe to account for the gravitational forces that would be necessary for all this clumping of all these galaxies, scientists propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that escapes detection because it emits no radiation. In other words, they're making it up. They have no idea.

According to this theory, 99% of the universe consists of this missing matter. So confronted with this, the more we look, the more we see – it's a total mystery. A total mystery.

And the attitude that really makes life with this knowing possible is one I encountered in a book I read once. The author called it radical acceptance. He says that radical acceptance is radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways. Radical. To let go, to accept, it is necessary only to give up your fears. Only. But it's radical.

Can we accept truth in all forms, at all times, in all ways? Whatever is manifesting, can we accept that radically as an expression of truth here and now? Sometimes. And when we can't, when we feel that resistance, just looking and seeing – what have I been resistant to today? What hasn't been acceptable as an expression of truth in this moment? And it can be really obvious or it can be really subtle.

I know there can be ways that one feels one is accepting, but there's a certain not giving in to the mystery, to the unknowing, that actually manifests as resistance. I remember one retreat I sat where I was having wave after wave of grief and sadness. It went on for days and days to the point where this one mental image would come up and I'd go, "Oh no, it's starting." Then I'd start noting, and I really felt like I was feeling it, accepting it. I was noticing all the images. I was saying, "It's okay, it can be here." But very subtly underneath, a certain lack of trust, a certain feeling that if I was doing it right, it should go already. And really under that was more – it was okay in this moment, and I knew that, I was there with it in this moment. But a subtle fear of what might happen in the next moment. Just this settling, this "what if it gets worse?" – even though I'm totally okay with how it is now. It's not really a problem.

This radical acceptance, really living in trust, is knowing that willingness to be totally okay with what is just as it is now, knowing that we never know what's going to happen in the next moment. We have no idea. I mean, we think we do. We think I'll keep talking and the bell will ring and we'll walk out and you'll do walking. And often what we think will happen sort of happens in the big picture, so we get this delusion that there's some kind of order and we can plan things. But we don't really know what's going to happen in any moment.

When you sit down to a sitting, you have no idea what's going to happen in that sitting. Can we sit down and just say, "Whatever happens in this moment, I surrender to the Dharma," and just let it happen? It's hard. Just this subtle expectation, trying to arrange experience to meet our expectation, is a movement away from this living in unknowing. Manipulating meditation. Somehow trying to hide the fact that we don't have a clue. If we could just surrender to not having a clue, it's actually not a problem. It's kind of exciting. It's interesting.

But on the way there, it's scary. And the mind so much doesn't like this constantly shifting ground, the sense of uncertainty. It's so easy to fall into expectation – whether it's expectation trying to recreate an experience you had before. Do you ever find yourself doing that? Trying to figure out just the right amount of sleep. Exactly this amount of sleep and eating these certain things. And at this time of day I had this perfect meditation. How was I sitting? How did I hold my hands? How did I move my head? What was my attitude?

And you find yourself falling into patterns, into rhythms, trying to recreate, to manipulate what should happen. This comes out of fear, out of controlling, out of this trying desperately to hide from the vastness of the mystery.

Expectation is really a way of searching for somewhere to rest, coming out of this constant shifting ground. And it's another form of control, a sense of self. Sometimes the expectation, the preset idea, almost determines what we experience. So watch out what you're expecting.

One of my teachers—he's so kind of earthy—he said, "Expectation is like garbage on your head." He says, "You become what you think. If you think garbage, what do you smell? Garbage." He goes on to say, for example, the thought "I'm not free, I can't know freedom, I'm hopelessly trapped" can set up that expectation, and that's what we find.

So just being aware—to stop looking for answers, stop seeking for explanations, stop trying to recreate the familiar—that's really moving into a life of trust and faith. A true warrior is willing to step into the mystery every moment. But the fact is, we are anyway. There's nothing we can do to change it. It's just a difference of: can we do it with grace? Can we really just let go and dance with the changes? Or do we get caught in the resistance and the fear?

This is another science article from the New York Times. It's about spiders. They're talking about how in 1884, after the huge volcanic explosion of Krakatau that just blew up the whole island—all life killed, scorched—nine months later, scientists were exploring to see how life would start coming back. And the first life they found was this tiny spider. And they wondered, how did a spider get here? Because they can't fly, right? And there was no other life there.

Apparently, a lot of kinds of spiders, at some point in their life, do something called ballooning. On the tip of a leaf, they attach their little strand of spider web and just let it out and fly with that web. It says they can go—not just baby ones, but really big spiders—they can occasionally reach thousands of meters of altitude and travel hundreds of kilometers before they come down. Clearly, they're not directing it with a rudder. It's like, just let go and fly. They could come down anywhere.

I don't think that's so different from our life. The difference is just how much resistance there is to the willingness to let go and fly. And that's not always in our control. There's something about the mind that really doesn't like insecurity. Something in the psyche is deeply wounded by this.

A few years ago, at a retreat in Yucca Valley in California—some of you were there—we had a couple of earthquakes. Not huge ones. The second one was scary for some people, but they weren't huge, and there wasn't really any damage. But for the next two days, hundreds and hundreds of aftershocks, just every few minutes that first night. I didn't actually find the earthquakes that scary; I'd never been in one before. But after two days of aftershocks every five minutes, there's something deeply unsettling about that. Not just to the mind, but visceral to the body. Just as soon as you settle down... and you never know if you have to run outside because it's a big one. Of course the radio always says, "Twenty-five percent chance of the big one in the next thirty-six hours." I don't know why they do that. It doesn't help much.

The sense of growing insecurity, and the mind just frantically wanting to find some solid place to rest—the mind and the body. You can imagine what a world of good it did for the yogis on that retreat. But it was fascinating. The psyche hates it, but it's fascinating to see the resistance that comes up. But that's really how it is all the time. And it's not the unknowing, it's not the mystery that's the suffering.

You know, it's the resistance that's the delusion. It's the trying to steer things in some weird way that we think we want it to go, trying to desperately grasp on, to know what's going to happen—when if we could just let go from that leaf and let the wind take it, there's really not a problem.

There's a beautiful passage from Suzuki Roshi that captures this perfectly:

"While you're practicing zazen, you may hear the rain dropping from the roof in the dark. Later, the wonderful mist will be coming through the big trees. And still later, when people start to work, they'll see the beautiful mountains. But some people will be annoyed if they hear the rain when they're lying in their beds in the morning, because they don't know that later they'll see the beautiful sun rising from the east.

If our mind is concentrated on ourselves, we'll have this kind of worry. But if we accept ourselves as an embodiment of the truth or Buddha nature, we will have no worry. We think, now it's raining, but we don't know what will happen in the next moment. By the time we go out, it may be a beautiful day or a stormy day. And since we don't know, let's appreciate the sound of the rain now.

This is the right attitude. If you understand yourself as a temporal embodiment of the truth, you will have no difficulty whatsoever. You appreciate your surroundings and you appreciate yourself as a wonderful part of Buddha's great activity, even in the midst of difficulties. This is our way of life."

If you can appreciate yourself as the embodiment of truth even in the midst of difficulties—even for one moment—it can change everything.

So let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 272

Aversion and Attachment: Making Friends Through Mettā

Carol Wilson · 1h03

In this intimate dharma talk, Carol Wilson shares her personal journey of discovering unexpected insights through intensive mettā (loving-kindness) practice. Drawing from the Mettā Sutta's teaching to "cherish all living beings with a boundless heart," she explores how cultivating loving-kindness transformed her relationship with the very obstacles to love itself—aversion and attachment, traditionally known as the far and near enemies of mettā.

Wilson offers a refreshing perspective on working with difficult mind states. Rather than trying to uproot negativity through force of will, she describes how mettā creates a safe space for making friends with our habitual patterns. She illustrates this through candid examples from retreat life—noticing her mind's tendency to fixate on what's unpleasant, experiencing fear when lunch schedules change, or feeling aversion toward new people in the meditation hall. Through mettā, these moments become opportunities for deeper understanding rather than occasions for self-judgment.

The talk addresses the subtle ways attachment can masquerade as love, particularly in close relationships. Wilson distinguishes pure mettā—an unconditional outflowing of well-wishing—from love with conditions attached, noting how the latter creates a sense of wanting something back. She offers practical guidance for navigating intense practice periods, suggesting when to stay with mettā phrases, when to shift to vipassanā, and when to consciously bring in joy and spaciousness. Throughout, she emphasizes that spiritual practice isn't about achieving perfection but about embracing our full humanity with kindness and clear seeing.

I first began practicing metta intensively, and I suppose before I practiced it, I had a bias towards Vipassana or insight practice, since that's what I'd done for so many years. I had this sense that metta would be wonderful—to really cultivate loving-kindness and this all-embracing care for beings—but that the bottom line for freedom is wisdom, understanding. I wasn't really expecting much insight to arise from doing metta practice.

I was quite surprised. I continue to be quite surprised, both in the formal practice itself and in the effect that I feel as it blends more and more into how I relate to experience in my daily life. What I've found through practice of loving-kindness is a deeper experiential understanding of the nature of both attachment and aversion—which, oddly enough, are the near and far enemies of loving-kindness. So we get to experience both of these aspects, these so-called enemies, very much in our loving-kindness practice.

The different angle that metta brought into the mandala of my practice has helped deepen my understanding and sense of freedom from enslavement to aversion, to fear, and enthrallment with attachment and clinging. With Vipassana, I could subtly have the sense—even though we say you open and accept things as they are—that I have to uproot all the attachment, uproot all the negativity, the defilements. There was a certain sense they had to be done away with. Somehow metta really strengthens my ability to make friends with these aspects of experience.

When attachment or aversion arises in my experience and I'm practicing metta, rather than "bad, get away," there's a sense of really flowing into seeing clearly and accepting this aspect of experience. This acceptance leads to clear seeing, which leads to deeper understanding and ultimate disengagement from either attachment or aversion—from these forces of suffering. That's really what I want to talk about tonight: some experiences of working with attachment and aversion as they come up in metta practice, ways that it's been helpful for me.

Really, it's in everyday small experiences, not always the big boom—which is another thing I had expected. Somehow in practicing loving-kindness, I thought the sense of all-embracing love would be so powerful that it would just supersede all other experience. And it can do that at times. But I expected it would stay that way somehow, and if I didn't hit this pinnacle of perfection of loving-kindness, I wasn't doing it right. I could get into an even deeper dejection about it.

This is a partial piece of the Metta Sutta said by the Buddha when he was describing loving-kindness practice:

Let none deceive another or despise any being in any state. Let none through anger or ill will wish harm upon another. Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world, spreading upward to the skies and downward to the depths, outward and unbounded, freed from hatred and ill will.

When I read that, when I feel it in my heart, there are times it's so beautiful, so inspiring, because it evokes that unbounded loving-kindness in all directions. I really can feel: yes, let me never harm another, let me never deceive another.

Then there are other times when I read that or hear that and my gut reaction is: it's impossible. That is so far from my moment-to-moment experience, how I live my life, even with the best intentions. I'm not there. I'm not perfect. So much ill will can still come up. Aversion still comes up. So much desire can still come up.

I want to talk a little on that level, because I used to think there was this huge gap. And I see that metta is really working, really transforming us on these little moment-to-moment levels. We don't have to think nothing's happening because we can't feel it boundlessly in all directions.

Another thing the Buddha said often is: Hatred can never cease by hatred. Hatred can only cease by love. This is an eternal law. It's powerful. It's beautiful. But when I look deeply into my conditioning, into my life and the way my habitual responses have been through much of my life, I'd have to honestly say: do I really believe that? That hatred only ceases by love? Is that what deeply motivates some of my reactions and responses?

Rather than blaming myself at all, it's just to begin to look honestly. And this is the attitude of loving-kindness. I can look back at how I was brought up and what I really learned in my family life. I didn't have an abusive or horrible family life at all. But I saw recently an advertisement for a book called How to Argue and Win Every Time: Ways to Win Arguments at Home and at Work, and I thought: yes, that's what I learned when I was growing up—that the real strength is knowing how to win your argument no matter what. Ultimately it usually came down to who could get the angriest with the most force. I don't mean actual physical force, but anger has a real power to it at times, a real sweetness almost. And it also has a real discrimination—when I'm really angry, to the point where my mindfulness is being overpowered, the things I say can be hurtful. They're hurtful because I'm also seeing right into the other person's weakness. There's a real discrimination that goes on with anger, but used very unwisely.

Well, that's what I learned, really, about where true strength is, about how to get what you want. And although there was lip service to kindness and generosity, and there was real caring, when the chips were down you kind of went for the jugular a little bit.

Today, I hadn't really thought of this particular aspect of my life this way before, but when I was about eleven or twelve, I started taking piano lessons. The woman who taught me I came to know very well over the years. She sort of became like a grandmother—I didn't really have any living grandparents. I took piano lessons for more years than I care to remember, considering how awfully I play the piano, although I like it. But this woman and I became very close, and in her way, she was a great inspiration to me, showing me that there's another way to relate to life.

She was a Christian Scientist, which I'm not going to try to explain because I know I wouldn't get it accurate. It's not a way of living that I came to myself. But what really deeply impressed me about her was this: as I understood it anyway, the way she talked with me and the way she lived her life—not that she was any perfect being—but there was this deep and conscious faith and commitment to live a life that was based on love. That love was really stronger, is really stronger, than pain, than our fears, than our anxieties.

As I understood the way she explained it to me, a lot of that sense of being so sure of love's power was part of not going to doctors—being so certain that love is stronger than our ideas about our materiality. I never really quite embraced that aspect. But who she was as a being, her deep faith and her commitment to try and live a life that came out of her conviction that love is stronger than pain, that love is stronger than fear—I realize now that really opened me up to the fact that there's another way of living. And not that we have to be perfect in that way of living, but that we can simply explore the possibility.

That's how I would really hope we could approach our loving-kindness practice. Not with this sense of perfection that we must get to. If the perfection is an inspiration, an opening of the heart, that's wonderful—it really can point to that boundlessness. But when we fall into aversion or self-judgment and start to compare ourselves and judge ourselves by that idea of perfection, then could we let go of it and look at our practice as simply an opening to exploration? To really explore the nature of love and connectedness. And as someone said today, in that exploration we begin to see what blocks love and connectedness.

Two of the big blockages, so to speak, that we will experience head-on in any metta retreat are the far enemy and the near enemy. I want to talk a little bit about each of those in the context of loving-kindness practice.

So this anger, aversion, fear, and all the different ramifications—irritation, grief, sorrow, murderous rage, self-judgment, self-loathing, terror, just slight irritation and pushing away. You can add your own particular flavor, whichever one happens to be coming up for you. Or maybe not, maybe none is coming up for you.

If we begin to look at what's actually going on, how do we experience whichever of these manifestations is present at a particular moment? You see, it's not just some big amorphous blob of emotion that somehow descended from nowhere, a curse from the gods. Really, if we can bring our attention into just what we're experiencing here and now, we can see that it's arising—take aversion or fear—it's arising in this moment, here and now, as a response or reaction to some experience that's happening here and now. It's something we can really come to know quite intimately. We don't have to be afraid of it.

Something difficult or painful is happening—a physical sensation. Aversion is a reaction of pulling away, of not liking that particular physical sensation. Or it might be a particular emotional experience, or it might even just be a thought. The thought might be of something in the future, but it's the thought happening right now that actually engenders the aversion.

The thought might be, "Oh no, this pain is bearable now, but I'm never going to be able to make it till ten o'clock tonight. Forget it." We so easily think that's in the future, but what's happening is that thought, right then, projecting some experience into the future. We're experiencing fear as a result of that thought here and now.

So fear and aversion are always experiences that are reactions and responses to physical, emotional, and mental experiences happening right now. Which to me simplifies it enormously, because then I can get a handle on coming in and seeing how it's happening.

When I realize there's knee pain, and there's aversion to the knee pain, and then there's that projecting it into the future, that thought, and then there's fear—how do we actually experience the fear or the aversion in a moment of experience? It's experienceable as the mind, the heart, the attention flinching away, pulling away from whatever it is that's happening.

I remember the other night when I was talking, I mentioned how I had this feeling of real heaviness and tiredness in my body. There was a knowing of it, but when I really brought my mindful attention in to feel it fully, I saw that what had been happening in the aversion—the not wanting to feel that way, the attention, the awareness is pulled back. It's not connecting. And it's an absolute, literal experience of disconnection, of separation. It's exactly in that moment we can see why we feel disconnected or separated. It's almost literal with the attention—it's pulled back and we're not connecting with what's happening. That's really how aversion, how fear works, so to speak. That's how they manifest when we're just exploring them, paying attention to them on a moment-to-moment level.

Now with mettā, it's the opposite. When we meet that experience of pain in the knee, or when I meet that experience of heaviness and tiredness and aversion with mettā, what happens is the attention just flows right into that experience—whether it's right into the pain, right into the heaviness, right into the emotional experience of aversion. There's no hesitation. There's no preference, no inner questioning of "Do I want to feel this or not? Maybe I'd rather go there." It's just: this is happening. Flow right into it.

And there's also no clinging to it. There's no agenda of "Let's make this stay." There's no agenda whatsoever. Just this moving right in, into it and surrounding it. It's not blind. The mettā doesn't only see that pain and nothing else. It sees the pain, knows the pain, and whatever else is going on around it.

What's interesting is that as we are working with cultivating mettā, that's not the idea we're having. We're not sitting here saying, "May I cultivate mettā so that in a moment the attention can flow into the experience." We're very simply cultivating the intention of mettā, coming back to that over and over. May I be free from danger. May you be free from danger. But what happens is that quite spontaneously, as this intention has been strengthened, as other difficult experiences come up—whether it's physical pain or emotional pain in our own experience—almost as if all by itself, you'll find that the mettā begins to activate in that way, to really let us move into the difficult experience rather than flinching away from it.

So in a way, energetically you could say, or awareness-wise, you can see how mettā is the opposite of aversion or fear, that it works in the opposite way. And it's in this way that the power of loving-kindness really begins to manifest itself. The strength and protection that it offers us—to be with the difficult, to heal us from our sense of separation—comes not by overpowering or getting rid of what is difficult, what we don't like, what we fear. It comes by making friends with it, by including it in the whole context of our experience.

The mettā flows into and softens and includes what is difficult, but then—at least in my experience—it expands outward and beyond it. Rather than drowning, getting lost in the knee pain, or getting lost in the aversion I feel or the fear that I feel, rather than "I'm so heavy and tired, I can't stand it"—the mettā flows into that, really experiences it in a very full way, and then, because it's non-discriminating, it also allows the rest of our experience to be noticed and seen equally clearly.

So: "My knee is really killing me, I can't bear it." Flow in, and it's tingling, it's pressure, it's hard, it's tight. And then: "Oh, but you know, it's really very peaceful in this room. It's really quite nice today. I like the sound of the raindrops." It just opens up the whole field.

In some ways, that's what I meant when I said the other night that loving-kindness helps us open to the whole show of life—all the beautiful, all the horrendous, and everything in between. It helps us open to the whole show of ourselves. It does this by softening into what's difficult, but also because it gives us a whole context in which to hold what is difficult.

If all we saw were the painful, horrific, difficult aspects—which sometimes in our practice are highlighted, and we call those dukkha times or difficult times, when everywhere you look is suffering or pain or anguish, whether internally or externally in the world—we can drown, it seems, at times in that. With mettā, those aspects are included, but because the context is so much larger, because it's held in this sense of totality, of acceptance, of softness, of non-judging, the mettā can bring a real safe space to let these difficult aspects surface. We begin to feel at ease in accepting them and being with them. It gives a real safe, protected context. It's very powerful that way.

And it happens by itself. In the groups over the last couple of days, quite a few people have expressed, in varying ways, experiences of being able to be more present for difficult aspects of themselves or their personality.

Either to be able to be softer with their self-judging, to be a little more kind when a sense of worthlessness comes up. The things that normally are so painful, we try not to even feel them. Or if we do feel them, we're so aversive to them, so fearful of them, that we just shut down altogether, or we fall totally into self-flagellation.

It's painful, but the metta, because it includes it in the larger context, makes it all much more workable. Much more workable. It broadens it. It gives us the courage to see and open to the difficulties, because so clearly we know that's not all there is. And again, this is the wisdom aspect.

When you're feeling a sense of metta and suddenly some people say, "It comes up, but I don't deserve to feel this. There's something really wrong if I'm feeling happiness. I don't have that right in this lifetime." And in the context of metta, even if you're just feeling for a moment that sense of pure loving and well-wishing, it's so clear that that sense that you don't deserve it isn't really true. It's so clear on some level that that's not who you truly are. Even though, believe me, our mind wants to keep believing, "That's who I really am, and that's my conditioning." But on some level, having just touched metta, we know that's not true.

And this gives us the courage to be able to more clearly, with the metta, move into this difficult aspect and not be so overwhelmed—to really have the courage to open to it and see more and more that it's not nearly as powerful, that it doesn't nearly have the grip that we thought it did when we were afraid to be with it, without even realizing we were so afraid.

Just sharing some of my own experience of this: it's not always in the big moments. For me, it's often been in the really small experiences of opening to the difficult aspects, to fear and aversion, that don't seem like much at the time but that I really see changing my relationship to myself and to fear and aversion over the course of years in my life.

Metta, as you know, can really highlight aversion. It can really highlight fear, these difficult aspects. It's almost as if with the nondiscriminating, open, loving attention of metta and awareness, because we're not pushing things away, it sort of makes a space for the subterranean stuff sometimes to come up much more clearly to the surface.

I know some people today were expressing the sense of hitting a wall. It's going along fine and suddenly there's this wall. We each have our own particular manifestation of wall that we hit—whether it's terror or fear or self-hatred or just nothingness or disconnection, or again, fill in the dots.

But it doesn't always have to happen in the form of a huge wall. What I noticed often is just that, as I was practicing metta, the little aversions that come up would be highlighted. Because it was so—at least with aversion and anger—you can tell that it's not metta. You can at least tell that it's different, and because of that, you really notice it. Really often my metta phrase would turn to, "May you be filled with suffering." And I'd think, "Oh, I think I've drifted off here," and kind of come back.

So the tendency in my mind towards aversion, which happens to be a rather large tendency in my particular mind—we all have different degrees of all of it—has become over the years much more highlighted. I see it in finer and finer detail. And what metta has done... I thought in the beginning that what it would do is bring me to this pinnacle of being this perfect, loving, compassionate being, kind of beatific and glowing and always saying the loving, kind thing. I've given that one up long ago, and that's a relief.

What it's done actually—and I don't know how to be encouraging to you all—what it's done is I've really made friends with the aversive tendency of my mind. It's not even my mind. I just see it as this habit of mind.

I remember one time when it became so clear to me. I was on a ferry in Thailand, about an hour and a half ferry ride. Beautiful day. Perfect day. And I was standing up on the deck. There were so many beautiful aspects to the day. I was at peace. There was no problem. And I could see down to the lower deck, and there were all kinds of people—mostly foreigners. And there was one woman whose behavior just drove me nuts. That was the only thing I fastened on. Immediately I saw her being totally inappropriate, and my mind said, "I'm sure she's an American." And I always, you know, "God, another American. I hope no one can tell I'm American."

And I really saw that out of this multitude of perceptions and sense data, my mind went unerringly for the one that was unpleasant and really stuck there and built up a whole story and got into all this aversion. It was really interesting.

It was funny because it was so clear, and I thought, "Oh, that's the tendency of my mind. Okay."

Now with metta, what happens so much is that my mind will do that about myself, about anything new that comes into my experience. I noticed when I was on retreat here a couple of years ago that anytime something changed—somebody new came into the dorm area, somebody different sat next to me at lunch, the schedule changed, anything that changed even slightly—immediately aversion would come up in my mind.

Whereas in the past I would have been quite judgmental of myself about that. "What are you so aversive? The poor person's coming here to practice and here you are sending them all this negative energy." Now I would just notice it in that same way as I noticed my mind on the ferry. And immediately in that noticing with the friendliness of metta—"Oh, look at that aversion"—without any conscious intentionality on my part, the scenario would immediately broaden. Within the context of "Oh, that person, they're making so much noise in the bathroom," the next thought would be, "Well, but they're really here practicing. Isn't that wonderful?" And that would be true. It wasn't like a rationale trying to deny the aversion. When the aversion was really accepted, included in the field of metta, the field of experience would immediately broaden and I'd have the whole picture.

It has continued in that way, to be really lovely. I haven't changed that much. It's not that the mind doesn't still go to what's aversive. But whereas before it wouldn't have been able to notice the other aspect very well, now immediately that's included. And that's the inclusivity of metta. It makes the aversion so much more minimal, so much less powerful. I don't get reactive to it. I don't act out the whole scenario. It's just, "Oh, there's aversion, and isn't that funny?" It's almost like, "Oh yes, my old friend aversion is coming up again." And then there's a sense of appreciation for the other person, for myself, for the situation.

You see how that inclusivity of metta gives the strength and the courage to open even more deeply into seeing how aversion arises, because I'm not so afraid of it. I don't try so much anymore to put on some outer attitude of how I think I should be. I used to internally deny a lot of the little slight aversive reactions in my mind, trying to give an outward appearance of the perfect person. It just led to a whole lot of confusion. When I'm not so fearful or afraid or hating of the aversion, and I really include it, it loses its power quite a bit. I mean, I guess you have to ask my friends if I'm exaggerating. Maybe I feel a lot freer and more flowing because I'm not all clogged up. But on the other hand, I'm not censoring so much anymore either. And that's been safe, more or less.

I was reading the Dalai Lama's autobiography last year. Of course, he's always in my mind—Mr. Compassion, just one of the more wonderful beings on the planet. I was really shocked, but then I got a kick out of it when I read that he was talking about how he had all kinds of food out for the little birds, but bigger birds would come to prey on them, so he'd shoot at the bigger birds with an air rifle to send them away. And I thought, "Okay, even the Dalai Lama. I can get off my case a little bit."

So the fearlessness and the sense of true interconnectedness that can come through metta can come in these small ways—not always just living in the bounty of happiness, but in bringing a kind of general boundlessness, opening up the boundaries of our experience. When we're meeting the difficult in that way, with the fearlessness of acceptance, it allows us to see more deeply into the dynamics of what's actually going on.

Again, personally, with the sense of aversion, as I've become more and more friendly with it, more okay with it, I began to see during the last metta retreat that every time something new came in, there was aversion. When I stopped flinching away from it and was just with it, that allowed me to begin to see that really what was underneath each little hit of aversion is fear. And it was such a subtle, quick fear that in thinking about it or looking for it, I never would have seen it. But by being really okay with the aversion, I began to get much more in touch with the fear that was feeding it—the fear of being intruded on, the fear of my space being taken away from me, just the fear of instability, the fear of change. I was really beginning to see how across the board, how often that fear came up.

Again, because of the metta, because of being okay with aversion and then being okay with the fear, not thinking I had to change it, I got so I could even laugh. Remember on the three-month course how halfway through the retreat they just change which lunch you go to? I went into panic that day. And even then, part of my mind was saying, "Carol, get over yourself."

Panic, because the lunches are changing. But I could laugh at it, let the panic be there, and then just watch what little situations would bring up a new spurt of fear. Fear that somebody different would be sitting across the table. I'd been sitting across from one person, and now I had to sit across from someone else. My mind would ask, why am I afraid of that? It doesn't make sense. But it doesn't matter. It just allowed me to really begin to open into what had been such a difficult experience before—that as soon as the fear came up, my mind would react with aversion. I'd push the whole experience away and never even notice the fear. So really, through metta, it allowed a much deeper understanding of the dynamics of the process that had been going on in my experience.

And with this, again in the context of real okayness, as soon as a thought would come up—these people are really so annoying in here, so pushy, they're not at all like the ones at the other lunch, it's different people—immediately the balancing feeling would arise, the balancing understanding. Either I could feel the pain of a person who was in some kind of hyper state about the food, or who had to be first in line. It's painful sometimes around the lunch line. Really, I think an enormous amount of joy, but also suffering sometimes when I'm going through that lunch line on a retreat.

And that's another way metta is a protection, actually. When I'm in a deep vipassana retreat, very open but very tuned into the suffering, I'm really not exaggerating—I can barely stand to get through the lunch line. Sometimes it's so painful to me I almost feel like I'm going to throw up. I'm serious. With metta, there's that pain, but again, there's the love, there's the connection with the pain rather than holding off from it. And it was really a protection. I was amazed that I could go through the line, still feel the pain, but it was much more balanced, much more broad—not just that one experience.

So just in these ways I've discovered very deeply, and it continues in my daily life, which isn't really that different—how the metta, the willingness, and it's not even a conscious willingness sometimes, just to flow into the situation, naturally expands beyond it. Fear and aversion can really open into appreciation, into acceptance, into connectedness. And in that way, through the metta, experience can become more and more boundaryless.

Because the sense of fear, the sense of aversion, very much sets up a sense of me and other. Whatever I'm afraid of, whatever I'm aversive to—whether it's something in my own experience, a sense of disconnection, whether it's someone else doing or being or saying something that brings up fear or aversion—very much me and other, and somehow needing to fix it.

With the metta, almost immediately for me, the me and other somehow turns into us. And the metta is not blind. It doesn't mean we don't see and feel the difficult aspects. It just gives a broader context for it. And a real fearlessness that comes from being able to see things as they are.

And knowing that as difficult, as sometimes overwhelming—I've been giving little experiences, but I know many, many times it's much more overwhelming than this. It just all seems to shoot up: the fear, the aversion, the terror, the rage. And it's so hard to meet that. Sometimes the metta isn't strong enough at that moment to seemingly meet it. But ultimately it is. Ultimately, love and truth are so much stronger than fear, than anger, than terror, than pain.

These difficult things can definitely seem to hide the love, the connectedness. They can definitely seem to hide what is true and what we truly are. But ultimately, the power of metta, love, and awareness cannot really even be touched by pain or fear or anger. It can be obscured a bit, but it really can't be damaged or touched by it.

A teacher of mine used to say that a spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies. And really, it can be that way. We can be struggling or angry or so caught in feeling worthless and self-blaming. And there can be just one moment, one spark of loving-kindness that comes. Even though it might fade again, in that moment it completely shines away, shines through all the self-hatred, all the fear. In that moment, however short it is, there's no room for doubt about what we're actually experiencing. We don't say, "Huh, I wonder, is this a real experience?" Well, sometimes people say, "Am I making it up?" But already they're out of it at that point and back to the self-doubt.

In a moment when the love, the connectedness is really shining, it's so clear. There's no question. It's so clear that we don't need to make ourselves different to be happy, that we don't need to somehow be perfect, make ourselves perfect in order to achieve loving-kindness, in order to achieve completion. It's so perfect that this becomes obvious in that one moment—that it's all here now and there's nothing we have to be different. There's nothing we have to actually change in ourselves to make that true. It's already true.

And then there are the times when that seems so far from our actual experience, and the memory of it—that's when we're saying, "I made that up. That never happened." When you're hitting that wall, as people have described today. I just want to acknowledge that this is a very important part of the practice. These intense aspects come up because of the strength of the loving-kindness practice. Because of the inclusivity of the heart and mind of loving-kindness, we're no longer censoring or pushing away the painful or so-called ugly aspects of ourselves. They are coming up.

It can seem like your practice has been growing stronger and stronger and you feel, "I'm really getting the flow, I'm really getting the knack of it now." And then—wham. At those points it's so easy to think, "Oh no, I blew it. I had a little period of grace but my true nature is really surfacing and this is how it's going to be for the rest of the retreat. This is what I always suspected was true all along."

So I just want to say this: it's going to happen, most likely, at some point. It's not a mistake. It's part of it.

There will be times when we can just softly be with it. Okay, wall. Just be with it and gently keep up the loving-kindness practice. Fine. But there will be times when that just isn't feasible—when the wall is too strong, the fear is too strong, or the anger, the self-judgment. We just feel like we're contracting and beating ourselves and shrinking. That's the time to let go of the formal metta.

Our first fallback is to move to vipassana—to really open into the soft presence and experiencing of: how do I experience the wall? Where are the physical sensations? What's the emotional tone of it? Can I just consciously acknowledge it? Let it be here. Not try to change it, but be present for it.

You can hear how that's not that much different from the attitude of metta. But it's taking an attitude of metta and bringing it into conscious presence with things just as they are. Sometimes in that we can get enough grounded in what's happening that we kind of find where we are again. Whereas when something really strong is going on and we keep trying to do the metta phrases, it's like something huge is happening—the elephant in the corner—and we're over here going, "May I be happy, may I be peaceful." A huge thing is going on and we're ignoring it. When we do that, this keeps getting bigger and bigger and bigger, and the metta gets smaller and smaller. That's the time to really stop and turn around and say, "Oh yeah, here you are. Let's really be here together and see what's going on."

And then sometimes—and this can be true at times for almost everybody—what's going on just gets too strong. Or our contraction, or just the sense of trying too hard, we just get worn down. It's exhausting and wearying. That's the time to really step back, to take a break, to open up your field of awareness, open up your heart, and deliberately bring in some joy. Because that's the time when the difficulty is getting so large and looming so big that we can feel we're drowning in it. This could be whether it's a so-called internal experience, say of self-judging, or whether somehow we're just tuning into the pain of the world—and God knows there's enough—and we can seem like we're just drowning in that.

This is something Thich Nhat Hanh talks about a lot: that we have to open to suffering for understanding and compassion, but suffering isn't enough. At times, what metta does automatically is broaden the field. Sometimes we can do that quite consciously. When we say, "Okay, it seems like it's really hard right now, why don't you just put down the practice for a minute and take a walk and open up your senses—smell the apple blossoms, listen to the birds, feel the wind on your face—and just be in nature for a little bit." It's a deliberate way to try and bring in some spaciousness, some joy, to counteract the intensity of the involvement with the pain and the fear.

It's a very skillful means. So we really encourage you to find ways to consciously balance when things are getting difficult. It's not running away.

It's different from saying, well, I'm a little bored now, I think I'll get into that fantasy I had yesterday that really made the hour go fast. That's not exactly what I mean. But rather, some way that can bring in, in an aware way, something that really touches your heart, touches your mind, or just brings in some ease. It might be taking a bath. It might be taking a walk. It might be having a cup of tea. Find a way for yourself and know that this is a skillful part of practice. It's consciously bringing in what metta does by itself.

Well, there's not much time left for attachment. We're both aversion types, and when we teach with Josie, he'll go on about attachment and make it sound so wonderful, and he'll never get to aversion. But I do have some things to say about it.

So attachment is the near enemy of loving-kindness. What I experienced in doing the practice of loving-kindness is that I learned quite a lot, and I continue to learn quite a lot, about the subtler aspects of attachment. Whereas loving-kindness is this real outflowing of the heart—a joy or well-wishing or friendliness that really meets the experience wholeheartedly—its near enemy, love with attachment, can also seem to be really flowing into the experience, into the specific object wholeheartedly. But there's a certain grasping at the end of it. And whereas loving-kindness sees all aspects quite clearly and has wisdom with it, attachment is blinding, even in its subtler forms.

For example, with loving-kindness flowing towards a person, maybe even someone you don't know that well, there's just this real well-wishing, a loving joy, you're lit up, but it doesn't blind you to what that person is truly like. It's loving, it's appreciating them as they are. Attachment, clinging—there's a Tibetan saying that clinging puts feathers on the object. It prettifies it. We don't really see it in a clear way.

Think of the sense of first being in love, as we call it. There are certainly aspects of true metta, of real caring for someone, absolutely. But as we practice metta and get more grounded in what pure metta really feels like, we can see when it moves into attachment. There's some subtle sense of needing something back. Even if it's just that they love me back, or that they be a certain way, or at least that they don't hurt me. There's a subtle shift of needing something in return, and we are no longer seeing that other person or that object so clearly. It's somehow prettied up.

You know the phase after you fall in love—the other person is so perfect and so wonderful—and then suddenly the feathers fall off and you start to see that all the things you loved them for are the things that are driving you crazy now. How can that be? They've come down off their pedestal. Attachment can really feel let down, can really feel cheated. Whereas metta, there's nothing that is wanted, so there's no way that it can feel let down, no way it can feel cheated.

In practicing loving-kindness, what I saw in my own experience was that just as it seems to lift up the far enemy, I also found that it would easily shift slightly into attachment and seemed to bring up all kinds of attachments. I'll speak about this in a subtle way, not the huge blinding attachments—like "I've got to have a pizza, I've got to have it now, I don't care who's in my way, I'm getting in my car, I don't care what happens." That's really obvious clinging, blind. It's not too subtle, and we can usually tell it's happening. If we don't get what we want, we can pretty much agree that it's suffering. It's not too hard to see.

But the subtler levels—this is what I found really helpful—the way they would sneak into metta: say I'd be sending real metta to a dear friend, really wishing her well, and all of a sudden I'd find, "Oh, may she really be happy. We don't see each other very much anymore. I wonder if there's a way we could get together. I wonder if there's something going on."

I wonder why she hasn't called me. And suddenly I'd think, sort of, that that was still loving-kindness. But when I'd tune in, I could feel that the feeling had, little by little, quite shifted. From being an outflowing of the heart, it had moved a little down, and there was a little wanting coming out, and it was no longer free from suffering.

I'd find many ways that the loving-kindness, quite purely, could easily shift. One way is starting to think of things that I want back from the person I'm sending it to. Another way I find it is in how I'm relating to the practice itself—moving from truly wishing well to whoever, to wishing well in order to feel the loving-kindness, which is different. That's no longer metta, and you're not going to feel it at that point because that's not what's being cultivated. Wanting is being cultivated, and that's what we'll feel.

Another way is again in how we relate to the practice, where rather than just resting back in the wishes and the feeling and who we're sending it to, we start getting into some kind of expectation, some subtle striving for some result—whether it's concentration, or trying to get a clearer image of the benefactor, or trying to be more steady with the phrases. And just this shift, from this real settled-back flowing out, to a little leaning forward. It can get more and more subtle.

What was very interesting to me is that, the same way it worked with fear and aversion, the metta didn't make me hate attachment or fear attachment, didn't make me afraid to practice metta because I might get attached. It's like, sure, attachment is part of my life as a human being here. It's going to come up. It's not the most horrible thing that ever happened. I can see it clearly. It's going to arise. And the more I practice metta, the more I really see the difference. So it can really begin in our life—to know more and more clearly when we're coming from metta, and to notice as it shades into attachment, and to pay attention to the results.

After I'd been practicing some time and felt more grounded in the metta, really recognizing it, knowing when I was shading off, at that point I started to bring in my relationship partner. That's really one of the reasons we suggest not bringing in someone you're so close to at first—because of how subtle the difference between metta and love with some kind of attachment can be. Until we get more and more familiar with the purity of the loving-kindness, we can in some way delude ourselves. Because it can feel like really caring, but there's just that little bit of wanting something.

So after I felt a little more grounded—certainly probably not grounded enough—I would sometimes deliberately work with sending loving-kindness to my partner and just feel the difference. I'd imagine a certain situation and feel these loving feelings coming out, this well-wishing for him, really seeing how all I wanted was for him to be happy, whatever that meant. There was no "but we should stay in the relationship" or "he should change this or that." Just really wishing he should be happy. And then suddenly there'd be this little shift, and I'd see the same situation and I'd think it was love. But there was this "but"—"you really shouldn't act like that towards me anymore." And I could see, when I came out in the situation, that even if you're not mentioning it to the other person, when I would say or do something that overtly looked the same but came from true metta, with none of that conditioning I was putting on it, he would really feel it. The response would be so much more open.

And I could say or do the same thing, and I could see now how often I had deluded myself that it was coming from pure metta, when there was really this unspoken need or want. And boy, he picks up on that right away. The response is totally different.

Now, of course, I'm not saying there'll never be need or want, or that there shouldn't be. I'm not at all saying that. But to be able to more clearly differentiate—and at times when I'm feeling really tangled up, or the communication is really breaking down, things just aren't satisfactory—when I can go and have access to some sense of pure metta, get back to that metta space where in the deepest heart of the relationship it's about really wanting the other one to be happy, to be free, not about getting what I want... when I can really access that even for a moment, at least for me, it changes all the suffering, all the need. And that was wonderful to see.

In many other ways too, attachment will come up. Not to be afraid of it. Not to think we have to hide from it. It's part of life. And with metta, you'll see that it disentangles of itself. It begins to let go of itself. The revelation to me of metta is that we don't have to do anything to make ourselves perfect. The all-embracing nature of love embraces ourselves, our humanity, deeply, just as we are.

It's a true, deep acceptance of humanity because it sees all the warts. It's not blind to any of it. This doesn't mean we can't act—we do whatever we can to bring more peace or change or whatever seems necessary. When we can see clearly, it's easier to act. But this embracing of my own humanity, not having to be different, has been such a revelation. It has led to so much more ease with myself, and so much more free-flowing happiness and ease to be present for other people than I used to experience.

Our world doesn't suddenly become perfect. As one friend said to me the other day when she's been practicing or feeling more metta: we roll with it better. We see it clearly, and we roll with it better. It doesn't suddenly change.

I want to end by reading a little paragraph that really inspired me, from a book a friend from Holland just sent me. You might have heard of it—it's called An Interrupted Life, the diaries of Etty Hillesum, who was a young Dutch woman in Holland during World War II. She was Jewish, and she died in one of the camps eventually. But the book is her diary, and it's really about her spiritual opening—a really beautiful person.

There are many stories of people where the sense of love can truly triumph over amazingly horrible conditions. And the triumph of love doesn't necessarily mean that those conditions go away, which is really hard for me to grasp and understand. At the same time, I find I get quite inspired by people who can manifest this. What's inspiring about this book is that she's not just this perfect being. The whole book is a struggle—feeling overwhelmed and coming back, feeling overwhelmed and coming back again.

CHAPTER 273

The More You Love, The More You Know

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that often arises for practitioners: must wisdom precede love, or can cultivating the brahmavihāras lead to genuine understanding? Drawing from both Buddhist and Hindu perspectives, she illuminates how these two aspects of spiritual development are not sequential but arise together as two sides of the same wholeness. A Tibetan teacher's insight frames the discussion: in moments of pure, unconditional love, the radiant nature of mind shines unobscured, allowing the wisdom of emptiness to dawn nakedly.
>
> Wilson offers practical teachings on how the brahmavihāras help us experientially understand non-attachment. Through loving-kindness and compassion, we taste a peace and happiness far more profound than the satisfaction of getting what we want—revealing the subtle suffering inherent in craving. She examines intention (cetanā) as the crucial meeting point of wisdom and compassion, explaining how our practice recondititions habitual mental patterns at their root. Each time we return to phrases of mettā or karuṇā, we strengthen wholesome intentions that will eventually arise spontaneously.
> The talk addresses the balance needed between tender-hearted compassion and the wisdom of equanimity. Using examples from Sister Chân Không's activism and environmental workers, Wilson shows how genuine compassion—far from creating passivity—gives rise to fearless, effective action in the world. This warrior's heart remains connected without burning out, acting from care while releasing attachment to results. The practice begins modestly with ourselves, but its effects ripple outward to touch all beings.

Tonight I want to speak about the ways that wisdom and love and compassion work together, supporting one another. Or you could say they're the same thing.

It's said generally that the natural fruit of understanding, of wisdom, is compassion, is love. That's the way we would naturally be in the world. Sometimes in doing these Brahmavihara practices, the question comes up, and several people have posed it to me in different ways: Aren't we doing it kind of backwards? Trying to cultivate metta and compassion without necessarily having the base of wisdom, of understanding. Another way people have brought it up is: How can I expect to generate pure metta or pure compassion without pristine understanding? It's bound to be somewhat tainted.

There was a time when I used to think like that. But I really know now that that's not so. It's not a case of it having to move always in one direction—that you have to start with wisdom and then maybe, by some grace, touch love and compassion, or vice versa. They both arise together, like two sides of the same wholeness, the same spiritual wholeness.

Either way, it seems to me, practiced quite sincerely, each leads into the other. For example, the insight, the wisdom of emptiness, of unity, of interconnectedness—quite naturally, as soon as we touch that sense of total completeness, it naturally expresses as love and compassion. It makes complete sense. But on the other hand, as we deepen in loving kindness, as we deepen in our cultivation and experience of true compassion, we can find that this also becomes a pathway to deeply knowing and experiencing the truth of non-separation, the truth of emptiness of a separate self, the truth of total interconnectedness.

So in a way, either aspect—the practice of insight, the practice of the Brahmaviharas—both become gateways to truth. And either way, you end up with the other one. You can't really separate them. You can't just practice one. You can't stay lopsided, really, if we're practicing this sincerely.

A Hindu teacher that I know, using slightly different language, said: To be on a wisdom path, such as insight practice, is to know. And the more that you know the Dhamma, the truth, the more you love. To be a bhakti on a devotional path is to choose the path of love. And the more that you love the Dhamma, the truth, the more you know. It works both ways. After a while, you can't really separate it.

I feel quite deeply that a true, authentic, full spirituality is going to be deeply rooted in both insight and in love and compassion. Really, in my mind, it's inseparable.

So I'm going to talk a little bit about some of the ways that these two aspects—divided for the sake of our rational, sometimes linear minds so we can talk about things—can develop and support each other. How can compassion, how can love open us into that heartfelt, intuitive understanding of truth beyond words, beyond any concepts?

One Tibetan teacher, quite a high Lama, wrote in one of his books that in his opinion—and it's probably not just his opinion—the supreme method, the supreme way to become quickly and deeply at home with the radiance of our true nature, to recognize this pristine truth and to really become more and more familiar with it, is that of devotion and compassion.

He explains it in this way: In a moment of pure love, pure compassion, when the mind and the body and the speech are just filled—just think, if you've had a moment, it just has to be that amount of time; we're not talking about dwelling here unchangingly, we're just talking about a moment—when the body, speech, and mind are filled and overflowing with unconditional love, with unconditional compassion, in that moment, if you were to look inwardly, the way he describes it, it would be as if the radiant nature, the pristine true nature, would be shining like the sun when it's unobscured by clouds. It just shines in the center, so to speak, of love, of compassion. Or as he puts it: in the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly. It's just there. Nothing we have to do. In fact, there's nothing we can do. It's because in the moment of love and compassion, for that moment, somehow we've managed to stop trying to do. That allows this unobscured nature to shine, to dawn nakedly.

In that moment, in all these different moments when they happen—it might be quick—but in that moment, we're really vividly awake. It's not a dulled-out sort of "this is nice, but I don't know where I am or who I am." We're vividly awake, and the heart at that moment is completely free from any attachment or any aversion. Just in that moment. So there's vivid awakeness, no attachment, and no aversion. That's what allows this knowing, this connection, this potential to open to freedom of heart, freedom of mind.

So through the practice of the Brahmaviharas, through moments of love, of compassion, we begin to discern the wisdom of non-attachment through the vehicle of joy, through the vehicle of love, which you've got to admit is sometimes a lot nicer than through the vehicle of suffering, which is also a way that we discern quite profoundly the wisdom of non-attachment. Both are useful. I think we need both.

But as a lot of people here have said, "Something has to be wrong because either this feels too good, or it's feeling easy. It's not supposed to be so pleasant. It must not be the right feeling. I'm cheating." All of those things somebody has said, because we're so inured to thinking that only through the depths of suffering can we discern truth. And we need to be able to discern truth in suffering—we can't only discern it through joy either. But we can sometimes. It helps. It's really quite powerful.

One of the ways I feel that my understanding of the peace, the joy that comes from non-attachment, has been strengthened through metta and compassion practice, and the other Brahmaviharas too, is because these Brahmaviharas, in that moment of just touching the pure state, we really experience quite profoundly and unmistakably a peace or a happiness or a connectedness that is so much more peaceful, so much more happy than the happiness that comes through attachment. It's so much more profound a happiness or a connectedness or a unity than the feeling of completion that I get when I get what I want.

On the general level of life in our culture, when we haven't really been investigating, it's so easy to associate happiness with getting what we want. And so attachment itself comes, in a funny way if we're not really looking, to be associated with pleasure. Attachment or grasping or wanting can almost carry a sweet delight in the longing for something. Do you notice yourself sometimes going back into a fantasy that is total longing? And when you wake up from it, it's just so clear that whatever you were longing for isn't here. But we get seduced back into it over and over again. If we really look, what's so pleasant about it? What kind of fulfillment is coming? But we keep getting seduced by that unclear association of longing with happiness, present or future.

So it is important to begin to understand more and more deeply the nature of attachment. And this is where our wisdom practice, our insight practice, is a very important balance and tool. With the loving-kindness we might have experienced intuitively such a profound peace and happiness that when we're back in the attachment, we can sort of feel how washed out that kind of happiness is by comparison. But to bring in some investigation, some insight, will really help us to see more clearly, to understand more clearly what's going on. And perhaps we won't get so seduced so often by attachment.

As I said with aversion the other night, the attachment is the same thing. When there's a feeling of clinging, of grasping, of wanting, it's arising in relationship to something that's happening right now, in this moment. It might be that there's a pleasant sensation in the body, or a pleasant emotional experience that's happening, a pleasant meditative experience. Or, and this is more subtle and we're more likely to miss it, a pleasant thought about a future pleasant experience that might happen, or a past pleasant experience that happened once ten years ago and it might happen again.

We don't often, without paying attention, notice that the thought itself is the pleasant experience that's keeping us, that's leading into this feeling of attachment. It's easy to bypass that and get really involved in: How can I make this experience happen that's so pleasant? How can I get back to that experience that happened before? We get sucked into whole worlds of desire and making things happen and trying to change behavior, not noticing that it's just the mind, the heart, pulled towards something pleasant that's happening right now.

Just as in aversion the mind cringes away, in pleasantness it's like, "Yes, yes, this is the one, this is it! Let's just dive right in and hold on to this as long as possible. Obviously this is how things are supposed to be and it'll never change. And I'll do whatever I can to ensure that it never changes." And of course we all go, "Well, that's a setup for suffering." And of course it is. But without paying attention, how often is that how we behave? Quite a lot.

So when we begin to notice when attachment is present in the mind, not to hate it—

Not to say, "This is evil and I'm an evil person," or "I'm hopeless because so much attachment is arising." It's our human condition. The mind is drawn towards the pleasant. It's just how it is. But we can begin to be a little more aware of the experience of attachment when it's happening. Because when we really pay attention to it, a lot of the pleasant, seductive aspects can really drop away.

So when you're really wanting something to happen, when you're really attached to a thought, a sensation, an emotional state—what's going on in relationship to any sense of connection with yourself, with life, with other beings, with anything else that's happening in experience? Attachment gives us tunnel vision. This thing is good. Other things are generally in the way.

Even something so simple as having a certain place you like to sit in the dining room at lunch. You're really happy if you get to sit in that place. So how do you feel if you're a little late and you see someone heading towards your place? Just something really stupid like that. But we're attached to it. The people ahead of us in line are in the way. The person sitting in our place is really a villain. We might be able to work up some sense of loving-kindness toward ourselves and them, but it's not the first reaction. And other places are dismissed. Somehow that place is glowing golden and everywhere else is just down in the dumps.

That's a silly example, but our mind—as I said the other night—craving puts feathers on the object. It distorts our perception so there's a sense of separation, me and other. There's also an unreliable perception of whatever the craving is leading us into as being so beautiful. And we can't trust that perception at all.

I had this experience this spring. I did a month-long self-retreat, and it was difficult. A lot of fear, a lot of difficult stuff was coming up. At one point, longing was arising, craving, and the object that would incite the craving—what my mind would grab onto—was an image, a thought that kept coming up about a particular street corner in Bangkok. It would bring up this longing. And even with that happening, my mind was saying, "There is nothing—this street corner in Bangkok is a pit. There is nothing about this street corner in Banglampoo that is remotely attractive. I never hoped to be back on that street corner in my life." That's how I felt at the time. I had just come through Bangkok on my way to this place. And my mind is going, "What? What is looking so enticing about this street corner?"

But then the image would come up and my heart would go, "Oh, to be back on that street corner in Banglampoo," and it would start adorning these little shops that sold locks and electric sockets. I mean, really, it was very interesting. This kept happening over and over, and it got very amusing to me because it was so clear—there would be that moment when the image would arise and that street corner would just be so beautiful, so attractive. And then the next moment I'd go, "Oh no, not again."

Well, that's what craving does. Only a lot of times it's not so obvious to us how really out to lunch it is. And so we get sucked in.

In that moment of attachment to whatever it is—the attachment doesn't make the thing we're attached to bad, or mean that we have to reject it. We'll be attached to our friends, we'll be attached to our families at times. It doesn't mean that therefore I should never have anything to do with my family because attachment comes up. It's more looking at the attachment itself in the moment that it's there and seeing the effect it has.

In the moment of attachment, there's no freedom of heart. There's no freedom of mind. There's not true love or compassion in that moment of attachment—which can also be just as short as that. But the moment of attachment is a moment of separation. It's a moment of positing me and other. A moment of positing incompleteness and needing something else to find fulfillment.

But it's not to be hated. It's just by accepting that we begin to see through it. As Krishnamurti said once, unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable.

So on the side of understanding, of wisdom—and our Brahmavihara practice helps us in this—it's just our challenge to begin to understand more and more deeply the ways of desire. With insight we see the impermanent nature of everything that's desired. We begin to feel more deeply the suffering nature of desire itself, of attachment—that attachment that's craving, clinging, I'm talking about—itself.

And we can see how the sense of grasping, the blindness, follows so closely and quickly on an experience that's simply beautiful and pleasant that we can easily begin to confuse having any kind of being able to enjoy and really appreciate the beautiful, the pleasant, the wonderful in life. Because the tendency of mind is that so easily that can turn into attachment, sometimes it turns the other way and you think, "Well, I shouldn't enjoy beauty. I shouldn't even practice loving-kindness because I'm just going to get attached to it. So forget it—just stay away from anything pleasant."

I'm certainly not talking about that. It doesn't mean to live a life of fear of beauty or fear of love. It doesn't mean no joy. But it really is seeing the difference between deep love and appreciation of an experience or what's happening and how it switches over to attachment. And if we can do that with interest rather than with aversion or self-blame, it can be really fascinating.

Another small example from my retreat this year: I was in a beautifully landscaped retreat center in South Africa. It wasn't a wild landscape at all, really sort of an English garden kind of landscape. And along the paths, they're lined with huge bushes of white irises—bush after bush after bush, quite a beautiful vista. For the first couple of weeks, there weren't many blooms on the bushes. For a few days, it was very rainy and cold, and my experience wasn't exactly cheery to go along with the weather.

Then one day the sun came out really bright, and everything was so green and beautiful. Suddenly, on just about all of these iris bushes, lots and lots of these very delicate, beautiful white blooms came out—white with a little center of violet. So many on these vistas of bushes with blooms. It was just so delicate and exquisitely beautiful. It matched the kind of delicate happiness that was beginning to come into my experience. So the two together kind of blew me away. I was filled with this delight and joy and a real sense of just love of being.

I was appreciating it for a few minutes. And then it sort of switched to: "This is so beautiful. And I know it won't stay this way. It would really be good if I could take a picture of this, because it's so lovely. And my mother—I know she would love to see this, she loves to garden." And this went on. "But I don't have a camera. How can I get a camera?" And it went on and on for quite a while, maybe ten minutes, until I suddenly realized that here I was standing—the beautiful thing I was appreciating hadn't even gone away yet. It was still here, and already I'd moved from real joy and happiness into suffering, because it was going to go away and I didn't have a camera to capture it.

It was funny, sort of funny, but really clear—how easily it can slide from one to the other, how easily we can confuse it.

So mettā, muditā, even compassion give us an experience of a much purer connection, joy, peace, a unity of total presence that, as we experience it over and over in varying degrees—even if you're not conscious of it—will begin to loosen our bonds of attachment, our inclination to always respond with attachment to what is beautiful. That's one way that wisdom of non-attachment and the practice of the Brahmavihāras work together.

Another way that brings the two practices together shows that without this joining, there's a sort of incompleteness to our spiritual being. Sometimes I've felt that the wisdom of emptiness, of non-attachment, of no-self, without a practice of the Brahmavihāras, without the compassion, without the love—the wisdom of emptiness can seem to me a bit aloof, sort of removed. We sit, we walk, everything comes and goes, we see very clearly. It's all impermanent—whatever emotional state, whatever physical state, whatever thought arises and passes, terrifying, beautiful, whatever. It's all impermanent. It's not self.

It comes and goes. And we're saying that in this practice too—there's nothing that's going to last.

So in this wisdom of impermanence, of emptiness, without it being connected to life with compassion, with love, it's kind of easy to wonder: what matters? Who cares? What difference does it make what I do? Because everything's coming and going, as am I. In fact, I'm not even here to come and go anyway. What difference does it make?

And on the other side, I'm cultivating the Brahma-viharas without awareness of a sense of wisdom. Sometimes I would, in a kind of dull moment, feel like this as well. It's a wonderful feeling of being connected—it's lovely, it feels really good. Or maybe it doesn't feel really good; I'm just repeating these phrases over and over. And on the other side, we're accepting whatever comes up in our experience with compassion. That's okay. I'm acting like a jerk—that's okay. I'm really angry—that's okay. I wrote a horrible note—that's okay. Everything is to be accepted. So what about any kind of response in life?

Are we just either going to be cool, removed, distant, untouched by things? Or do we become these really moist, compassionate wimps that can't really respond in any clear way? These are like an exaggeration of the two sides when they don't come together, or when at a moment practice can feel out of balance, not always rounded all the time.

So one place I want to talk about where they do come together is in the aspect of our experience that is intention. We've talked about this before—that what we're actually developing and cultivating in our Brahma-vihara practices is a strengthening of the intentions of mettā, of karuṇā, of muditā, and of equanimity, tomorrow.

I want to talk a little about what that means and how intention is really the coming together of wisdom and compassion. It's really the way that we then act in the world.

Intention, as many of you have experienced, is the impulse of mind that gives rise to speech, gives rise to action, and even to thought—although that's really hard to notice. Sometimes people sitting here will notice the impulse before they stand up. And if you feel it, then you can choose to stand up or not. Or the impulse before you move your arm to scratch an itch. If you notice it, sometimes there's a moment of choice to scratch or not.

These intentions, these motivational forces to act, are arising due to conditions, of course. They don't just arise out of nowhere. They arise from conditions and are accompanied by certain mental states. So an intention to stand up could arise from aversion. It could arise from fear. It could arise from a pain in your leg. It could arise from hunger. It could arise from just kind of clear seeing—the bell rang and it's time to go walk. There's a whole range. And you can't tell from the way an action looks, or even from the result of an action, what the intention is. The same action could actually have sprung from many different kinds of intentions.

The way that cause and effect, or karma, is understood in Buddhism is that the seed of whether an action is wholesome or unwholesome, skillful or unskillful—the seed of that action is determined not by the result but by the intention. All the motivation and all the effect that will come from that action karmically, whether we'll suffer or not from it, is in that seed of intention. This is a little different from how we might normally evaluate our actions. I might do something that I feel sort of angry about, but I say something to someone and it doesn't seem to have a bad effect. I say, "Well, even though I was coming from anger, it worked out okay. They didn't really get it, or the right thing happened."

It doesn't work like that in this understanding of cause and effect. If I speak with the intention of anger, even if the seeming effect looks like it's okay, it really is an unskillful action, and at some point I'm going to suffer from that anger.

Which actually, if I'm paying attention, I suffer as soon as I say something from anger. I'm speaking quite personally now—as soon as something angry comes out of my mouth, I really feel a lot of pain, even physical pain, but definitely emotional pain and separation. And that's not from judgment. That's not from hating myself. It's from the actual effect of the anger in my experience.

So this seed of intention is extremely powerful. Because how we understand things is what gives rise to our intention, which can manifest as thought. And it's the intention that leads to how we speak and act in the world, how we connect who we are, how we respond to situations. It all comes out of intention. It's really very crucial.

What we're doing moment to moment here in our Brahma-Vihara practice is working on the level of conscious intention. Each time we manage to remember, each time we have the energy and commitment to come back and say "may I" or "may you be safe from danger, may you be free from suffering"—whatever phrase we're offering—we're working deeply at the core of our habits of response, at the very intentions that shape how we're going to be ourselves and how we're going to be with other beings.

Far from being a passive practice where we're just sitting here like mummies saying things over and over—"may you be happy, may you be happy," what's the point of this?—we're really, whether you're aware of it or not, engaged in crucial reconditioning. We're beginning to soften our habitual responses and allowing the intentions of kindness and compassion to surface more naturally, more spontaneously.

When we're unaware of our intention, when we're not really paying attention to what's going on, our habits of mind—which often are aversion and confusion and attachment—give rise to so much speech and action in the world, even from the smallest experience.

So back to my experience with the irises. Even though I saw the suffering being created, even though I recognized I was missing something still present, that attachment still continued to arise in the mind enough to give rise to an intention to actually see if I could borrow a camera. This necessitated calling my one friend in South Africa, who wasn't there. The phone kept being hit by electricity and was out for five days at a time. You know how it is on retreat—a simple phone call should be easy, but you end up putting so much energy into walking to the place, finding a time when no one's there, then the phone doesn't work or the line's busy, and you go back. It can occupy so much energy and so much mental time to do one simple thing.

Now, each of those actions, each time I went back, each time I thought about it, each time I actually made a call and couldn't get through and then tried again—each of those is a separate intention. It's not like just one intention arose, "Oh, I'd like to get a camera." It was being strengthened over and over and over. And the intention of action is stronger than the intention of speech. So in a way, in all that little scenario, I was quite unconsciously—sometimes somewhat consciously—strengthening and cultivating the intention of attachment.

We can be quite good at cultivating attachment, cultivating aversion. We don't really think of it that way, but it's a habit. Even with our overall best intentions—my overarching intention to go on retreat certainly is to cultivate more freedom of heart, more understanding, more compassion—I certainly don't go thinking, "Let me see how many different ways I can cultivate attachment." And I don't go thinking, "I want to hate myself because I will cultivate attachment and then I'll hate myself for wasting my time." No.

I'm sure whatever your conscious intention was in coming here, it's something very beautiful, very skillful. You didn't come here thinking, "How many ways can I abuse myself for the next ten days?" But the habits pop up. They're going to pop up. And that's okay. Part of our process here is being able to see them.

That's why in every retreat we have space wars. We have conflicts over rooms. We have battles over who wants the lights on and who wants the lights off. Every retreat this happens. And we all have the best overarching intentions, but the habits that give rise to thought, speech, and action are just really deeply ingrained.

The Buddha said that that which the mind dwells upon frequently—towards that the mind will naturally incline. In other words, if we're thinking about aversion, if we're sitting here hating ourselves frequently, then in a moment of unawareness, that's going to be the easiest slope for the mind to go down.

So it might seem a little rote sometimes, cultivating love for yourself, cultivating compassion for yourself. But where do our minds dwell if we just leave them to their own devices?

This is from Ramakrishna. He says, "In effect, one is constantly repeating, consciously or unconsciously, 'I am not free.' The conditioned person obsessively repeats, 'I am worthless. I am superficial. I am incapable of transcendent insight.'" So the more we repeat this, the state of illusory bondage becomes increasingly vivid and convincing.

Does that sound familiar to anybody? It just doesn't seem like so much work to keep saying this to ourselves over and over because we're so used to it. And it seems like so much work to keep coming back to something different because we're basically going against the grain of habit. So many of you have seen just how difficult it has been or can be—how coming back and saying, "Yes, I really do care about myself. Yes, I really do accept myself just as I am"—how that can almost raise the sleeping demons of all the ways we've been used to speaking to ourselves, describing ourselves, affirming ourselves unconsciously for so much of our life.

This is one reason that loving-kindness, karuṇā, muditā can seem so difficult. Another is simply that concentration practice is difficult because it means disciplining the mind, and the mind is rather undisciplined. But it's also because we're going against our deeply habituated intentions of thought, speech, and action. Where better to start strengthening these intentions of mettā and compassion than with ourselves?

It makes us really happy to see that most people here have been quite okay, willing, and even eager to spend a lot of time with themselves—to really begin to see that this is not a cop-out, that this is not selfish. What better place could we start to cultivate and strengthen these intentions, even just the intention of thought, than by bringing it into how we relate to ourselves and into our moment-to-moment experience here? Not trying to be grandiose. Not expecting that after ten days here we'll walk out and meet everything that comes our way with wisdom and love. Just starting in little ways with our simple practice.

But you can really see how it begins to bear fruit—not only in that the ability to come back to our conscious intention via the phrases gets easier, not only in that the feelings during formal practice might become stronger or more accessible at times, more flowing—but also in the seemingly other aspect of the practice: all the so-called difficulties, the demons that come up and rear their heads. That's just as important, in fact sometimes even more so, both as feedback that perhaps even a tiny, tiny bit, the intention of caring, of compassion, is actually becoming easier to arise, and also as a way to more consciously practice not just in thought but also in action.

That's why we speak so much about really paying attention to how you meet the difficulties that arise in your time here. How do you relate to yourself when you're filled with petty irritation at someone else's behavior? Rationally you know it doesn't make that much difference. But inside you really want to kill. It happens to all of us at different times. How do you relate to that in yourself? How do you relate to the sleepiness? How do you relate to the intensity of judgment because your mind wanders off more than you want it to, or because you want to feel loving and instead you feel bored, or to a really powerful sense of self-judgment or self-hatred or lust or fear or restlessness—any of the demons that come up, whether they seem petty or whether they're truly overwhelming?

Still, this practice of compassion, of mettā, is giving us the opportunity over and over again to respond from an intention of caring. And amazingly enough, at times it actually happens. Sure, then we fall back into habit, of course. We tend to be impatient. Once we've been able to accept that we get irritated very easily at people who are doing nothing except clomping their feet a little loudly, we think, "Okay, now I've accepted it. That's it. I've accepted it. That's it for that particular demon." And of course it doesn't work that way. The next moment we might be irritated again. Okay—another opportunity to cultivate the intention of compassion toward myself, because irritation is suffering.

And it happens. It's really quite amazing to see that by cultivating intention as it manifests as thought—the thought of the phrases that we're saying, which seem so rote, so dry—suddenly stuff really starts to happen.

Now, do you feel like you're actually making any of this stuff happen? Do you feel like you could, if you wanted to? For me, this whole practice is one of very powerful experience of the uncontrollability of experience, of no-self. As much as I say, "May I be free from suffering," I don't actually feel like I can make myself feel compassion for myself by saying that. I feel like I'm just saying it and trying to mean it. And then suddenly I'm really suffering and—poof—up comes this spurt of real caring for myself, where another time I would have really taken out the whip.

So try not to be too cynical or think that even if you don't feel anything much going on except that you can say the phrases a little more easily than you could eight days ago—please don't think that that's all that's happening.

There's a lot happening on a very deep level. Really learning to meet our demons as they are, however huge or however small, is very, very powerful. Love and acceptance for the demons and for ourselves.

And it's not, as you know, compassion and love is not necessarily the easy way. It sometimes might sound like it—oh yes, accept everything and everything's really nice. But especially if you started with compassion yesterday, you find that quivering of the heart in connection to pain. It's not that it's a painful practice. Ultimately compassion is very beautiful, very connected—this soft, quivering heart. But I wouldn't say it was the easy way. It's really very difficult, what we're doing here.

But this true compassion grows and strengthens from the way you're relating to yourself in even these littlest demons that come to visit. I want to emphasize that because so often we pass that over and think that nothing's happening, the big stuff isn't happening. It's in these little moments that these intentions are being more strongly cultivated.

But true compassion, as soft and tender and quivering as our heart is in response to our own or another's pain, actually gives so much strength and so much courage. Somehow, again, the softness of the connection—it's not about wimping out and not being able to act. It gives the strength and energy and courage of a warrior, so to speak.

This is from Chögyam Trungpa. He's talking about how compassion gives us the strength to be very connected, to be with great difficulty:

"At the awakened heart of the warrior, there's nothing there except for tenderness. Your heart is completely exposed. Even if a tiny mosquito lands on it, you feel so touched. You would like to spill your heart's blood, to give your heart to others. For the warrior, this experience of sad and tender heart is what gives birth to fearlessness. Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. You are willing to open up without resistance or shyness and face the world. You are willing to share your heart with others."

To me, I just love that as an expression of the exquisite tenderness and connectedness to others' pain. But this connectedness, rather than causing us to shrink back, gives us fearlessness and courage. Because of the connectedness, compassion when met with wisdom will spontaneously lead to clear action. It's not at all about cultivating some sense of total acceptance of everything that then does not lead to any kind of clear action or any kind of relational connection in the world. Just the opposite—it gives us the courage to act.

You can see this from role models. As Steve mentioned last night, talking about Aung San Suu Kyi—just how amazingly fearless a woman like that can be on the strength of the tenderness of heart, of compassion and love. When we really feel that quivering of pain and the clarity, the clear seeing that can come from wisdom, then there's the fearlessness and courage to act in a way that's appropriate. But that is also acting from intentions of compassion, not confusing the result. In other words, knowing that you can't control the result, but doing whatever is clear action coming from compassion and not anger.

So often when we're not deeply rooted in compassion and wisdom, it can be so painful. We're opened with some compassion to the so much suffering in the world of others or in ourselves, but there's still either that pain that is so overwhelming that we don't know how to balance it with equanimity, or we're still attached in some way to a result, somehow thinking we can control the outcome. And this can lead to so much frustration. Action that begins out of compassion is continued in anger and frustration, and it starts to burn up its source.

I taught a retreat the last couple of years for—in quotations—burned-out environmentalists who want to connect or reconnect with their spirituality. Some of them have told me their hours are grueling, the work is endless, the cause just goes on and on and on, and the work itself can be totally maddening and frustrating. They say it's difficult, almost impossible, not to fall into frustration and anger, which can be a really energizing emotion—but it's exactly what leads to the sense of being burned out. At some point we lose the tender heart of the warrior, because it's so tender. It's so tender that without the balance of equanimity, we almost can't bear it. And so we've got to do something to change this.

This is how compassion and love really must, as we deepen and deepen in this tenderness, be balanced with the wisdom of equanimity. With knowing that deeply as we care, deeply as we're connected, we can only work from our intention. We cannot in any way think that we can control results.

or think that somehow with our best intention we're going to be able to end all suffering.

Someone here was telling me that she has friends who work with the homeless, and they've said the way they can continue their work without getting burned out is by knowing they're not going to be able to help everybody, they're not going to be able to end the problem of homelessness, and they may not, with all their caring, be able to help specific people.

I'm sure you've run up against this in your metta, in your compassion practice, where we feel so much caring for a particular person and wish that if we could just care hard enough, we could change perhaps self-destructive patterns, or outer events in their life, or health that we have no control over. And how to be able to stay that connected in compassion, in love, not flinch away because we can't always change things.

This is the real dance of wisdom and compassion, of equanimity and knowing we can't control, but at the same time not giving up because we can't control. How to act from compassion and with wisdom. It's quite a delicate dance that we do. But it doesn't have to mean that we just shrink back and say, forget it.

Another role model for me, much like Aung San Suu Kyi, is Sister Chan Khong, Thich Nhat Hanh's colleague. Ever since I met her some ten years ago, she was just this amazing dynamo of energy. And of course one can never tell looking from outside, but as far as I could see, so much of what she is doing really comes out of caring for other people and trying to help—trying to help people in prison in Vietnam, trying to help the boat people. When I was at Plum Village, it was trying to help anybody who had a problem, whether it was spiders in their room or wanting to stay in a nicer room or needing some kind of special food or organizing whatever needed to be organized. No drawing the lines that this is too mundane or this is really great, but just doing whatever needed to be done to help people, with a tremendous amount of energy, a tremendous amount of courage.

When I read her autobiography recently, what touched me very deeply is that she really does seem quite motivated by compassion, and she very openly acknowledges that in her whole thirty or forty years—since before the war in Vietnam and during the war in Vietnam—she was in situations of enormous suffering that I can't even begin to imagine. Seeing friends killed by grenades from either side in the war, and somehow finding an ability to care deeply for her friends, to say eulogies at their funerals without blaming people. Saying, you know, "I see our enemies are hatred and ignorance, but our enemies are not the Vietnamese people."

What touched me even more, though, is that this wasn't something that just came naturally to her, that she's just always connected and always loving. Starting back when she was young and even now, she has to really continue to work at it, continue to cultivate how to come from an intention of caring, an intention of compassion. Even now, she says, when she hears of new nuns and monks or artists being put in jail in Vietnam, she's initiating whole letter-writing campaigns and trying to speak to people in authority to try and get them out of jail. But she says even now she'll get really angry when she first hears about it, and she will not do anything as long as she's angry. She'll meditate. She'll consciously cultivate compassion. She'll consciously cultivate mindfulness and loving kindness until she can find some way to feel a connection of some kind with the people she's going to write to. And only then will she actually write a letter. Sometimes, she says, it could take weeks.

I'm just very touched by the depth of that commitment. It's an inspiration to me, both in that compassion doesn't turn us into weaklings—I think just the reverse—and that it must come with the wisdom of not just expecting it to be automatic, being willing to really look and see what our intentions are. And if we have that moment of choice, to say, okay, let me see. Can I go back to the karuna practice? Can I go back to the metta practice? And if I can wait until I act until I can come from a clearer intention, I will. Of course, there are times when we can't wait or we don't wait or we don't have that clarity to see. And that's when we bring in the compassion and the kindness to ourselves, not expecting that we're somehow going to be perfect. Our life isn't perfect.

So our start here may seem kind of modest. We're starting with ourselves. The results might not be what you had hoped for or expected. They might be much more than you hoped for or expected. They might be totally different from what you hoped for. But even if you're having some really beautiful, peaceful experience now, that'll change. It's nice, it's wonderful, but the experience itself, as you're experiencing it now, will change.

But on a much more profound and subtler level, a much deeper change is going on—a real shift in our understanding of who we truly are, our understanding of the world, of what the potential of true happiness is. And somewhere in each of you there's a little seed of knowing that that potential for true happiness is your birthright and is part of who you are, and that we all have access to it.

And whether you're feeling that or not right now, I don't think that's the main point, because these changes in how we relate to ourselves, how we relate to and connect with others, and how we will be and can be in the world—both connected and effective—are going on at the often unconscious level of our habits of mind, our habits of belief, of really knowing what's true.

And I think you might be surprised. I know I was, to find that once I was no longer in retreat—and not even consciously necessarily thinking "I want to be really connected to all beings"—this would just start to come up spontaneously. I would say or do something out of metta or compassion without thinking I was going to do that. Whereas before, I could do something out of aversion and attachment without thinking that I was going to do that.

And even though it might seem like it's still pretty conditional love right now—to ourselves, to people we care about, maybe sometimes to all beings or an enemy—often people hear themselves saying, "Well, it still feels quite conditional." Don't worry about it. Because it just will fill up and fill up and spill over by itself.

And even if you never have the conscious intention to want to have compassion for all beings, or to be practicing for all beings, it sort of starts to happen anyway. Because in this connection of this tender heart with yourself and others, in that moment of connection when someone's pain is your pain, you can't tell the difference. In that moment, it's so clear that we really are all beings. All beings are us. And even if we don't put that into a conscious thought, we have a profound effect on all beings we come in touch with.

This is from the Dalai Lama:

Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. Peace must first be discovered within ourselves, then gradually expanded to include our families, our communities, and ultimately the whole planet. Developing such attitudes as love and compassion between human beings is not merely a source of personal happiness, but has become a condition for human survival.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 274

Finding True Happiness

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental question at the heart of Buddhist practice: What is true happiness, and why do we so often confuse it with pleasant experiences? Drawing from her own early attraction to the Buddha's teachings on the ending of suffering and the "sure heart's release," she examines how our habitual reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences keep us trapped in cycles of confusion and dissatisfaction.
>
> Wilson explains how the three unwholesome roots of mind—greed, hatred, and delusion—arise from our automatic reactions to experience. She offers practical guidance on using bare attention held with kindness and acceptance to see through these deeply conditioned habits. Through personal examples, including a vivid account of working with physical tiredness and aversion, she demonstrates how genuine mindfulness transforms our relationship to experience. Rather than hovering around difficulties or grasping at pleasures, we can learn to meet each moment with "affectionate curiosity."
> The talk culminates in an exploration of impermanence as the gateway to freedom. Wilson suggests that truly understanding constant change—not just intellectually but through direct experience—naturally loosens our clinging and opens us to what the Buddha called "the emancipation of heart through wisdom." She emphasizes that this equanimity is not resignation or indifference, but rather an unbounded awareness that allows for both deep appreciation of life and compassionate action in the world. Even difficult meditation sits, she notes, are valuable opportunities to break the chains of conditioning and discover that peace is always accessible, regardless of circumstances.

The attraction for me in the early days of my practice to Buddhism and meditation specifically was rooted in the philosophy of what the Buddha spoke of. He was always so clear that what he was teaching was the highest happiness—the ending of suffering, the sure heart's release. In a way, and this sounds rather crass, though I didn't put it to myself that way at the time, there was this sense of, well, that's what to go for in life: the highest sense of happiness, whatever will make me truly, lastingly happy.

Talking to people who come on retreat, I find that in one way or another, this tends to be what draws us to go through this rather difficult and sometimes strange process—a kind of hope or faith, or whatever word is suitable for you, of some higher happiness, some greater sense of serenity or ease in one's life.

In first practicing, in my first retreats and in many people's experience, you might touch moments of what seems like a higher happiness, or a sense that we're somehow heading in the right direction. It could be the momentary peace of concentration, that bliss of a unified mind. It might be an ecstatic sense of interconnection. It might just be the simplicity and peace of being fully present. There's a whole range of things it can be.

For some time in my practice, it was experiences like that which kept me coming back, thinking, "Oh yes, this shows I'm heading in the right direction." And it really took a while before I began to get it on some deep level that all this was is a continuation of the search for pleasure. I was taking pleasant experience—maybe a little more transcendent, maybe a little more subtle than I experienced in my daily life—and equating that with true happiness.

What the Buddha is talking about, and what our meditation practice here is about, is finding that the true happiness the Buddha was speaking about is of a whole other order. What most of us think of as happiness is not what the Buddha was speaking about as the true source of happiness, the true heart's release. We mostly don't know what true happiness is. And a lot of what I think our practice here is about is finding out what we're doing wrong, so to speak—how we're relating to our lives and the world in a way that, rather than furthering our happiness, keeps us spinning in confusion.

What is it that the Buddha is talking about? What is it we're doing here that can lead us, that can open us into experience of real happiness?

It's a common misconception, and I find myself, when I'm not really being aware, falling into it often, that meditation practice or this process of purification will somehow create in ourselves or in our minds a subtler, more eternal kind of state. The misconception is that through meditation, through purification, we're going to create some transcendent other reality in which we will live, from which we will relate to this mundane world of affairs and somehow float on a cloud somewhere or be the serene Buddha in the midst of it—but that somehow we've got to create something different. We've got to get away from who we are, from what we are, from what's happening now.

What we begin to awaken to, if this is a practice of awakening—Buddha really means one who is awakened—is the fact that this is a much more radical proposition. We're not trying to get out of this reality or create some other reality from which we look back. Rather, we discover that that which we're seeking, however you describe it to yourself, is always and only accessible in the immediacy of the here and now, whatever experience happens to be present as here and now.

We're awakening into fullness of presence, to full aliveness, connection, and acceptance of this moment—fully, totally this moment. And in that is where true peace and happiness can be found, never by looking to something else to somehow create another reality.

So whether it's an itch that's arising, whether there's sadness, whether there's total boredom or doubt or just the pure breath or ecstasy, pain, a footstep—it doesn't matter what. Each experience, as it arises, is like a messenger, a calling to say, "Awaken now. I'm your gateway in this moment to the possibility of awakening to your essential inner completion." In moving away from this pain, in moving away from this happiness, in any way trying to construct something other, we're effectively bringing down the blinders and not noticing what is always accessible to us.

And that's the paradox of spiritual practice. If our truest nature is this pure awareness—Joseph spoke last night of pure awareness that is absolutely untouched by any arising experience—if this pure awareness is always present and accessible to us, why don't we notice it if it's so obvious?

This is the paradox of practice. It's said this way in one Tibetan text, and I just love this little poem:

Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few of us see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that this Buddha mind is never impaired or improved on in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease in whatever happens.

Just resting at ease in whatever happens. It's so simple. Why do we have so much trouble doing this? Just resting at ease with awake intelligence and quite accepting, open awareness within whatever happens. Not our natural inclination, is it?

Yet we all have moments of it. Joseph referred to a moment like that in his talk last night, and someone mentioned it to me today—a moment where there's just a sense of ease, of presence. It might be, as Joseph was talking about, when you feel so vividly awake and connected, and somehow the shimmering leaves of the tree seem so exquisite. Or someone mentioned today just really being present for eating, being with one's meal, maybe for the first time. Or it can happen just taking a footstep. There's just this sense of such peace, such ease, such presence. It can happen no matter what we're doing. And if you're paying attention, we all experience moments of this, more or less frequently.

What these moments are pointing to is that it has nothing to do with what's actually happening in that moment. The leaves of the tree aren't suddenly more vivid. The breakfast wasn't suddenly a superior breakfast to any we ever had in our life. That footstep wasn't somehow different from other footsteps. But we tend to take that moment and instead of noticing just that ease, that awakeness, that vivid awareness that has nothing to do with what's happening but knows what's happening, we instead tend to fixate on the wrong thing. We tend to keep looking to changing conditions. So somehow if the leaves were beautiful and it was two in the afternoon, we'll try again at two in the afternoon when the sun's a certain way and we've had a cup of tea, to go look and see if we can hit that space again—without realizing that it's got nothing to do with those external or internal conditions.

It's only that in that moment there was an awakeness, and a heart and mind that was free of resistance, free of grasping or clinging, that was in no way reacting or trying to change or resist what was happening. Just total awakeness and presence. That's really what allows us to rest at ease in what is happening and to notice the potential for serenity and peace within whatever is happening. So if you have a moment like that, see if you can just notice the whole show and not fixate on the changing conditions.

Because that's our tendency, whether it's so-called external conditions—the weather, the way we're sitting, the clothes we brought, the way other people behave, the food we're eating, the schedule, whatever. We tend to focus on those conditions as what can make ease and peace possible or not. They might be more or less pleasant, and again we're confusing pleasant with true happiness, with peace. We do the same with internal conditions: our state of mind, our thoughts, the absence or presence of physical discomfort. Trying to somehow arrange and manipulate these conditions, and if we can get them somehow in the right order, in the right coming together, then—ah—this is peace, this is happiness.

And all the while not noticing, although it's so obvious we would all agree when it's pointed out, but not noticing that there is no condition, so-called external or internal, that lasts. Everything is changing. If we're positing any sense of happiness, any sense of true peace on any changing condition whatsoever, we're in trouble. But because things change so fast, it's always easy to say, "Well, this one didn't do it," and somehow our mind leaps to "but the next one," or "I can get this one back again when it changes." And we somehow don't stop and look at what's really going on.

That's the whole purpose of our meditation. It gives us the clarity and the focus and the tools to actually begin to look inward and see what's going on. It's said that the Buddha said on his enlightenment that he felt so much compassion for all of us in our human state, because he could see that most deeply at the core, every person, every one of us—and this sounds simplistic, but I really believe it's true—that at our deepest core, each of us truly wants to be happy. But through our not seeing what is so about ourselves, about the nature of the world, through not really understanding what is so, many of our efforts to bring happiness to ourselves and others actually only succeed in increasing our confusion, in increasing our sense of struggle, because we don't know what true happiness is.

Mark Epstein, a psychiatrist who's been a practicing Buddhist meditator for a long time, talks about happiness, saying that his experience as a psychiatrist trained in Western medicine and in the philosophy and practice of Buddhism has given him a unique perspective. He writes, "I have come to see that our problem is that we don't know what happiness is. We confuse happiness with a life uncluttered by feelings of anxiety, rage, doubt, and sadness. But happiness is something entirely different. It's the ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning."

Happiness is the ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning. I would actually go a step further: that non-reactivity of mind, in any one moment—we're not talking about every moment of life, just take one moment—when there's this total receptivity, non-reactivity of mind to whatever's arising, in that moment of alertness and stillness, that gives the potential, the possibility to recognize something much more true than our passing reactions. A place of awareness from which whatever arises is not a problem.

So I want to talk a little bit about this habit of grasping at the pleasant and condemning the unpleasant—a very incredibly strong and subtle habit of our mind. What we can begin to notice using our tools of mindfulness and concentration is how these habits of conditioning are working on a moment-to-moment basis. We can see how they arise, how they lead us to certain forms of mental, physical, and vocal behavior. And by paying attention we can see how those behaviors don't really work, and how these habits of mind really aren't serving us. A lot of our practice is beginning to observe this.

Taking it on a real moment-to-moment basis, it's not theoretical—you can really begin to notice how this happens. When we pay attention to what we're experiencing on a basic level of bare attention, in the Buddhist psychology you can see there are six different experiences that happen over and over.

There's seeing, there's hearing, there's smelling, there's tasting, there's physical sensing and physical sensation, and then there's the whole field of mental experience—thinking, emotions, mental images. In Buddhist terminology, these are called the six senses, with the mind being the sixth sense.

All that's happening is these six things arising over and over and over. And then we make up story, which is just another mental experience arising.

As each experience comes—say a sight appears—we experience it as being either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. But when we're not really looking, this seems sort of intrinsic to the experience. I look out and there's seeing, and it's just this pleasant feeling. Without paying attention, the habit of mind moves toward: "Oh, that's nice, I like it." And it could stop there, or it could intensify: "I really like it, I'd like to go out and really be with it and see it more"—this kind of grasping at the pleasant.

If it's unpleasant—the rain comes and it's cold—the body shrinks away, the mind contracts: "I don't like that, I don't want to feel this, let's do something to change it." And when it's neutral, most of the time we tend to not even notice it. We sort of ignore it. Often, notice this in your experience, we almost experience the neutral as unpleasant, and our mind will create something a little more stimulating to wake us up.

These are the three unwholesome roots of mind that the Buddha said lead to suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion or confusion—based on reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

This is so important because it's happening really almost every moment, and we're so used to it. It happens so fast that we don't notice it's a habit of mind. The reactivity to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral becomes like a filter through which we judge or evaluate experience. Without paying attention, when you're sitting here and you have a pleasant sitting, it translates almost as: "This is right, this is good, this is how it's supposed to be, I've got to make it happen some more." When it's unpleasant—we're restless, there's pain in the knee—it's not only unpleasant, it's wrong, it's a mistake. Something isn't happening in the right way and we've got to do something to change it. And when it's neutral? Forget it. We just go off into daydreams. Sometimes we'll actually find our mind creating whole scenarios that are quite unpleasant as a reaction to hanging out with neutral.

Often in retreats, people come in and start to talk about their experience and they'll say, "Oh, nothing's happening, and I don't like it." "So there's calmness?" "Oh yeah," they'll realize, "I guess that's calm. I don't know what to do with calm." And their mind has been creating all these suffering scenarios. We don't know how to be with neutral. Yet in a way, neutral can be so pleasant, so wonderful.

Thich Nhat Hanh talks a lot about this. One example he gives: when we have a toothache, it's so painful, so unpleasant, and when it stops, it's like, "Ah, how wonderful—no toothache!" But when we don't have a toothache—and most of the time we don't—do we even notice anything? Tune into your teeth right now. It's really nice if they're just kind of neutral. It's actually quite pleasant, it's peaceful, but we don't notice that.

I was at a movie a few weeks ago—I don't even remember the film—but the coming attraction was for Die Hard with a Vengeance. It starts with this humongous explosion that practically blows you three feet back in your seat, and it just gets worse from there, so intense. I was thinking, "My God, that's our culture." No wonder we don't know what to do with calmness or with neutral experience. We're so hyped up in this culture that things have to keep getting more and more intense just to get our attention. But anyway, that's a little aside.

Begin to notice. Have you found that this sense of pleasant becomes a basis for your whole evaluation of how your practice is going? It becomes a filter for self-judgment. You have a "good" sitting—meaning basically it's pleasant. How many of you have had a sitting where you were really restless, where there was pain in your knee, where your mind was wandering, and you came away saying, "That was a really good sitting"? But we have to have sittings like that. There's no such thing as only pleasant. I don't know if you've noticed this in this life, but there's no such thing as only pleasant. Yet somehow we operate from thinking that unpleasant is a mistake and we're going to fix it.

Our retreat is just the same way—there's no such thing as only pleasant. When you have a sitting like the unpleasant one I described, it's so common for the evaluation to be: "This is wrong, I'm not doing it right, I'm a bad meditator." Or we reverse it outward: "This is the stupidest practice I ever heard of, clearly they don't know what they're talking about, it's a waste of time." Either way, there's no sense of equanimity, no sense of peace or spaciousness. We're making our happiness, our rightness, our sense of truth dependent on things being pleasant, meeting our expectations, being how we want them to be.

That's a setup, definitely, for deep suffering.

Our practice lets us begin to see these patterns. Without the awareness, it's like we're living blindly, following these habits of mind. It's like we're stuck in the ruts on the road here.

It made me think of when we drove in. Joseph and I and Grove and some friends drove in two cars on Friday. It was really raining that day, and the roads were muddy and soupy. Franz and I were in a car with two friends—just a rental car, some Ford. It wasn't four-wheel drive and it actually had very low clearance. So we're driving behind Grove's big suburban, and we're sliding all over, really muddy. The friend who was driving was really good, but we were going all over the place. It was tough. Each corner we'd come around would be harder than the next, and Grove kept calling back, "Get in the ruts, get in the ruts, you've got to get in the ruts." He finally stopped us and came back and said, "Wes, you've got to get in the ruts."

It was really funny. Wes was going, "Get in the ruts, get in the ruts." If only we'd bang into the ruts—but then you're really stuck in them. And I really felt like that's how we are when we're following these tendencies blindly. Because for our car, the ruts didn't necessarily work. They'd work for a little while, and then suddenly there'd be this huge hump and the whole bottom of the car felt like it was scraping off. Wes is going, "Oh no, the oil pan, the oil pan! Get out of the ruts, get out of the ruts!" The whole thing was just this dance. And when you're in the ruts, you can't get out of them anymore.

So what our practice really lets us do is begin to see the ruts and how they're working—this rut of blindly following pleasure, of blindly moving away from the unpleasant, of totally spacing out when it's neutral. When you can see the rut, sometimes it works. Like Joseph said, if your hand's in a fire, it's a good idea to follow the impulse to move away from the unpleasant. But there are plenty of times that it just doesn't work. There are plenty of unpleasant experiences that we're not going to be able to move away from.

When we can see how those ruts work, we can also see when it's helpful to move out of them. Then we have the whole field of experience available, and we can act and respond appropriately—not out of blind reactivity.

If you reflect on it, watch over these days: how much of our physical and mental activity is just to forget ourselves? How much of the time are we physically or mentally just blindly trying to move away from discomfort, trying to get away from something unpleasant? There's a little practice in Vipassana that one teacher in Thailand used to teach, which is simply this: every time you move throughout the day, watch why you move. See how much of our movement arises as a slight discomfort comes up and we shift. Not that we have to stay and hurt—I'm not saying that—but just begin to see how much of our activity is a mask for slight discomfort, how much is trying to move towards pleasure.

If this strategy worked, none of us would be here. So it's about finding, within all of that, how we don't have to be so driven, how we don't have to be caught by this dualism. This is where our mindfulness and concentration begin to serve us, begin to help us learn how to see through this conditioning over and over. And that seeing through gives us the space to respond appropriately.

There are a couple of aspects of mindfulness we've talked about that I want to emphasize. The first is this quality of bare attention—bringing the attention into the actual experience that's arising, whether it's a physical sensation or a sound or a sight or a thought or an emotion. Bringing the attention into the actual experience rather than confusing the interpretation with the experience.

The only way we can come into the experience is when the mindfulness is held in an air of kindness, really of softness, of loving-kindness and acceptance toward whatever is arising.

An experience comes up—say it's a physical sensation of pain in the knee, like Joseph was talking about in the instructions today. Mindfulness is non-discriminating. It doesn't say, "Hmm, should I pay attention to this? Should I pay attention to that?" As soon as something arises, mindfulness moves directly to it in a non-discriminating way, but meets it with an attitude of real softness and openness. You could say affectionate curiosity. Just feeling: What is this? Just being with it without any preconceived notions.

The concentration gives us the focus to stay with the actual experience—the twinging or the burning or the twisting—as distinct from, "Oh my God, I don't know how I'm going to get to a hospital in time, and what if it rains? It takes hours to get out of here." That's not the experience. It's just a twinge.

It's amazing, the transformation that can happen when we use our mindfulness to be with the experience itself. It changes our whole relationship not only to it but to everything else.

I'll give you a little example.

A couple of weeks ago I was teaching a retreat in Barre, and for some reason I was very physically tired and heavy, quite exhausted, but I couldn't find any reason for it. I wasn't particularly overworked or anything. I lived just about two minutes down the road by car, so I was driving home, and I was aware of being tired and feeling the physical heaviness—but it wasn't mindfulness.

The difference being: "Oh, I'm so tired, I'm so heavy. I wonder what's going on. Maybe I must be getting sick. There must be some resurgence of disease. There's something really serious going on. I really hate it. I feel so horrible. There's eight more days of this retreat and I'm so heavy." This is not mindfulness. This is really aversion and resistance.

But often we can fool ourselves, because there was also a knowing of the fact that I was heavy and feeling the heaviness—but not with the bare attention that just feels the heaviness alone, and not with the attitude of affectionate caring, of open patience and acceptance of what is. It was total interpretation.

And I caught what I was doing. All it took was just a minute, just to say, "Oh, be with heaviness." I mean, that wasn't like, "You stupid jerk, be with heaviness"—that's also not mindfulness. It's just, "Oh, right, I'm thinking about it." And it's as if I let my attention just gently drop into feeling heavy and tired in my body. That's all. I just kept driving.

And I saw that in that moment, although before I knew there was heaviness, the aversion—the way aversion works in the mind—will keep your attention a little bit away from the experience. Like, I know it's heavy, but let's just hold it over there and not quite really sink into it. Notice that when you have a pain, you kind of hover around it. We sort of look at it, but we don't want to quite go there.

So I just dropped into it. Full surrender. Just feeling heavy and aversive and tired and fearful, with no expectation of anything.

It's amazing. The whole response to that changed. I just thought, "Oh yeah, heaviness, tiredness, that's okay." It was really okay. It didn't feel any different, but it was really okay. And all the other story went away. I was just being heavy, tired, and all of a sudden, without any kind of conscious volition—and this is what happens when we really are mindfully open to what's happening, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant—the whole field opened up, and my heart just opened up. It was such a beautiful day. The spring was coming out, the trees were budding, and I just suddenly had this burst of joy and connection with the environment, with what else was going on.

That's really what happens when we open fully to whatever's presenting itself as truth in that moment. It's just the opposite of what we might think if we don't pay attention. We think that if we don't really let ourselves feel the aversion or feel the pain, if we can just a little bit keep it in the background, then things will be okay and we can kind of appreciate life more. And it's just the reverse.

If we try to hold away the unpleasant, we can't open selectively. We can't ignore the unpleasant and open to beauty and connection. We need to be connected with whatever's happening. And when we soften into, "Oh yeah, unpleasantness, tiredness"—boom—the beautiful day is also suddenly apparent. A sense of self-acceptance can also be there.

It's just a moment, it's just a little thing. But that's what our life is made up of—just these little moments. And that's really what we're learning how to do with bare attention held in this attitude of open-hearted acceptance. It cuts through these deeply conditioned habits of running away from the unpleasant and our ceaseless pursuit of happiness through pleasure, which ultimately doesn't work.

So the patience, the kindness, the acceptance is what lets us be able to come back over and over and over when there's a difficult experience. We also come back over and over and over when there's a pleasant experience too.

We're not only attending to the difficult, but it's important—and one of the reasons we tend to emphasize the difficult more is because our habit is much more ingrained to try to avoid it. And it's this avoidance that keeps us closed off from truth, that keeps us distant from true connection with our own selves, with our own hearts, and with those of all others.

There's a saying from Rumi: paradise is surrounded by what we dislike, and the fires of hell are surrounded by what we desire. So we tend to go towards what we desire and land in hell. And if we can just open to what we dislike, we land in paradise. It's somehow the opposite of the way we might think it is.

The more we can practice this, it's not like all of a sudden everything changes. But even one moment of coming out of the ruts of following habit—just this opening into what is—you can begin to see how transforming it is. It opens us into another possibility altogether for how we relate to ourselves and to life. This is really what is the intimation of the potential for true serenity and peace. The possibility to be with things just as they are, to meet ourselves and our experience and others with a true kindness. Not the kindness of idiot compassion, but the true kindness that, by being with things in totality as they are, opens our hearts and our minds to the potential for liberating understanding.

It absolutely transforms our life, because we meet things with a peace that is not dependent on having a situation be a certain way—because there's no way we can control that. And it might seem like a long way to come from just noticing our reactions to pleasant and unpleasant, but this is very profound, as subtle as it is.

This is from the Buddha. It might sound a little archaic, but see if it makes sense. He says, "Someone seeing objects with the eye"—and then he goes through all the different senses, so we'll just talk about seeing—"someone who is attracted to things that are pleasing and repelled by things that are unpleasing, that person dwells without mindfulness and her mind is restricted. She does not experience the emancipation of heart through wisdom. But another person, seeing objects with the eye, is not attracted to things that are pleasant and is not repelled by things that are unpleasing. She dwells with mindfulness present and her mind is unbounded. Thus she experiences the emancipation of heart through wisdom."

Simply by being able to be so equanimous that we're not drawn helplessly into the pleasant and repelled by the unpleasant, our mind is unbounded and we experience emancipation of heart through wisdom. To me that's really a profound statement. And it's also very immediate. It's not like some impossible ideal a million years down the road. In any one moment it's possible to see the difference between the restriction of heart and mind by being caught in desire and aversion, and a moment of that boundlessness of heart and mind when we're just present without needing things to change. Really awaken to that.

This is not a kind of equanimity of indifference, or a kind of gray "who can tell the difference?" It's pleasant, it's unpleasant, who cares? I'll take whatever comes. I can't change what happens in life. This person's mistreating me—that's okay because it's all the same anyway, there's nothing I can do. I'm not talking about a kind of acceptance of resignation or defeatism or fear, but really that sense of unbounded serenity that arises from seeing things as they are. Actually, acceptance and patience, clear meeting of what happens, arises because of seeing things as they are.

When we're seeing something clearly, if something is abusive or needs to change and it can be changed, there's the spaciousness in that clear seeing to know what can be done and the energy to do it. But it can come out of the intention of clarity and of caring about the whole situation, not out of just some knee-jerk reaction of fear or aversion. So this unboundedness of heart is not just some mishmash of grayness, of dullness, of who cares. It's so connected. It's much more alive and connected in life.

Mindfulness allows us to see things as they are. On a moment-to-moment level—like, for example, seeing the way I saw the tiredness. Rather than seeing it as this whole immensity of some horrible illness coming on that I didn't know what to do about, it's simply heaviness and aversion. And that's okay, it's just what it is. There's seeing things as they are on that level, and you can see how that loosens the restrictions of heart and mind.

But it's also seeing things as they are on a much deeper level—the sense of the nature of how things are in this world, of what we really are, the nature of existence. The Buddha often referred to it as the three marks of existence. But basically it can come down to the uncontrollability of things in our life, the uncontrollability of experience, the fact that everything is constantly changing. As long as something's pleasant and we're happy with it, it's going to go away. Unpleasant is going to come and we can't change that. We keep trying to keep things the same and it's all totally out of our control.

As long as we're not really deeply living from that understanding, as long as we're caught in some sense of trying to keep things from changing, of trying to have some kind of control—this almost obsessive self-referencing of how every experience somehow refers back to me and how it affects me—as long as we're not living from understanding the uncontrollability, we're going to be caught in the suffering, in this confusion. But true acceptance comes as we begin to see this.

The easiest aspect to talk about tonight, and the only one I want to address, is this fact of constant change. Which, again, we all say is obvious. "I know things are changing." But looking at our experience, do we deeply, genuinely live and respond from that knowledge? Much of the time, for many of us, probably not.

Because if you look closely, this wanting pleasant experience, the shying away from the unpleasant, any attempt to manipulate and control experience—it basically arises from not deeply recognizing impermanence. When we really, truly know that however wonderful this moment is, at some point conditions will change and it will go away, that doesn't decrease our appreciation. In fact, the appreciation becomes all the more poignant. We can be all the more present with it because we're not somehow grasping, trying to make it stay.

When really unpleasant, painful, sad, grief-stricken experiences arise, no matter how hard they are, there's often somewhere in there the feeling that this is never going to change—that I can't bear to be with this for the next forty minutes, for the next year, for the rest of my life. Again, that's not being with bare experience, but it's also not really moving from the fact that everything is changing and it's all out of our control. And we take it all so personally. We refer it all back to ourselves.

Take, for example, the weather. It's so obvious, and in a place like this it's wonderful because the scope is so vast. Just the other day—I think it was the day before you all came—it was a pretty day, really bright and beautiful. Then suddenly, like this afternoon, rain clouds came. In just a moment it started pouring, and then just like that it turned to hail. There was this really vicious, wild hailstorm for a while, and then just like that it stopped, the clouds cleared, and it was so silent. It was amazing. There are moments like that where you think, "Gosh, totally out of control, always changing." That's so obvious. We can just see that's how things are, and it seems—who's going to try and change the weather?

But as a friend said to me last year, someone who's been really looking at this for years and years, she said, "You know, it's just coming as a revelation to me. All this time I'm watching everything in the world changing, the whole world is changing. And suddenly I realized—oh, it's happening to me too. It's not me here watching everything else change. What I'm calling 'me' is also a process of constant change."

And that somehow, for many of us, is sort of the sticking point where we don't really quite open to the fact. Even with other meditation teachers who've been doing this stuff for twenty, thirty years, we sit around going, "Oh my God, my hair's getting gray. Look at my wrinkles. I have to wear reading glasses." Like, big surprise! You go into your forties and your fifties and your body starts to decay. What else did you expect? But somehow it's amazing—it's a surprise. All of a sudden our parents are getting older and they're dying, and somehow we're the first generation this ever happened to. It's totally amazing how hard it is to really take this in.

I heard this interview on the BBC last year, very serious. They were interviewing some man who had invested, I think, a hundred and fifty thousand dollars in a company in Greece that will freeze you when you die, and then hold your body until—I guess—they can cure whatever you died from and bring you back to life. You have the option of either freezing your whole body, or you can just have your brain frozen. And that's cheaper, if you just have your brain frozen. This is very serious. People do this, and it's a hundred and fifty thousand dollars—I think that's for your whole body. They were interviewing an English man who had done it. He was very serious. I wrote this down. He said, "It seems quite a sensible idea. There's no guarantee, of course, but there's a reasonable expectation." It's amazing. A reasonable expectation of what? You know—living forever. And it's our culture, but it's not just this time. It's the world.

In opening to the constant changing, there are times, both in formal practice and in our lives, where as we open to it more and more, it's hard sometimes. You see why there's a resistance in our hearts and minds to really live from that, because then there really is this sense of things ending, so much. You can go through what's sort of like a phase of practice that can last a more or less amount of time, where there's a real sadness about it, a real sense of loss. And in a way that's true, but it's not the whole picture.

But I see why, when I go through those times, there's this resistance. It's because of not wanting to feel sadness. It's just back to the same not wanting to be with what's unpleasant, being afraid of it.

So there are times it's sad. But I know for myself that what's even more sad and more fearful is to live in that denial. Because again, we're denying ourselves the opportunity for a much deeper connection with ourselves and with all life. Even knowing something's changing—well, then I'm so much more present for it. And the opening to change is our opening to connection and real tenderness and caring for other beings too. Sometimes it's our tenderness that opens us to the truth of change.

I just want to read you part of one poem. It's by Galway Kinnell, called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars,
even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I've stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old,
don't die, little moth.
And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry,
this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

Forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

But it doesn't just have to be sad and scary, because when we truly see this—moment to moment in meditation practice, moment to moment in our life—when we truly see it, the clinging, the aversion to unpleasant, the trying to keep things, is so patently useless and so obviously increasing our suffering that it's not like we have to talk ourselves out of it. It just stops making sense. It opens up.

Again, this is the boundlessness of heart, the boundlessness of mind that can really be fully present for what is and can still be fully present when that changes. It gives us such a serenity and a sense of happiness and peace, and also a much deeper connection. So opening to impermanence can also be opening into great joy, a great kind of dancing, a playing in life.

There's a story—maybe you've heard—of a Hasidic rabbi in Eastern Europe, early in the century, who was very renowned for his scholarship and his wisdom. A young student from another country came to visit him and was sitting in the rabbi's house talking. The student was quite astounded by how simply the rabbi was living. He looked around and said, "But you know, you've lived here so long and you're so renowned—where are all your things? Where are your books? Where is your furniture? Where are your clothes?"

And the rabbi said to the student, "Well, where are all yours?"

The student said, "Well, I'm just passing through."

And the rabbi said, "Well, so am I."

That kind of lightness with life.

Our practice here—even the little nudgy stuff that happens, the little twinges, the boredom, the restlessness, not to mention the obvious sadnesses and pains and difficulties we go through, or the happiness or the boredom—it's all a microcosm for what's happening in life. It is our life. And the way our heart and mind is relating to these little things is exactly the way we're relating to the bigger, more complex issues in our life. This kind of pares it down and lets us begin to cut through the complexity and come into the bare experience and see the conditioning, and gives us moments of potential to move out of that conditioning—to respond in another way altogether.

So even when you think your practice is so-called bad because nothing that you want to happen is what's happening—not only is that good practice, sometimes we say that's the best practice, because that's where we're going to be able to break these chains of getting lost in pleasant and unpleasant and constructing a sense of who we are out of that.

In a way, each time you just open for a moment into a pain in your knee—even if it gets too intense and you move, fine—but a moment that you're just with it as it is, that's a moment where we're coming out of confusion, where we're learning not to be deluded by changing conditions, where we're learning that even for that moment, there's a possibility of real ease and freedom. Even when something unpleasant is happening, even when something pleasant is happening, even when nothing particular is happening.

And again, this acceptance is not that of a kind of blind dullness. It comes from clear seeing, and it gives such courage, such a strength of understanding. You'll find, even here, that it gives us the courage of clear seeing but also the compassionate heart—to soften into what is, not to be hard about it, not to try and push it away. The energy of compassion allows us to respond in a way that's appropriate.

Whether it's the pain in the knee or whether it's later in our lives—some situation that comes up that we can't change, that seems beyond the bounds of endurance, whatever that is for each one of us—there might be a moment where, with the courage of clear seeing and the kindness of compassion, we find that even the unendurable is possible. Not only to endure, but to have some moment, perhaps, of serenity within it. We discover that ultimately our true happiness and peace has absolutely nothing to do with what is happening internally or externally.

All our efforts to change things—they can be useful in the world of cause and effect. They can be useful in the functional world. I'm not saying give up our work. But understand where it's coming from. It can come from the compassion that arises out of knowing that as much as we do to help people, to help the earth, to make things better, and we can have some real effect—at bottom, the true peace is going to come from being able to rest at ease in how things are. So that when we can't make a difference, when we can't change things, we don't have to give in to despair. We don't have to give in to frustration and come back to anger and confusion and pain.

When we can meet life with the serenity that that rabbi was meeting it with, then all the energy that previously goes into struggle and fear and confusion and rage—all that energy can go into action, into relating to the world, into relating to ourselves, into really dancing with whatever's happening. So much more energy is available to us from the space of wisdom and compassion.

So hang with it when your knee hurts, when you're bored, when you're sleepy. It's not real.

CHAPTER 275

Wise Effort/Balancing Energy

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of meditation's most subtle challenges: finding the balance between wholehearted effort and complete non-doing. She explores how the Buddha's teaching on right effort (sammā vāyāma) isn't about pushing harder, but about discovering a quality of relaxed alertness where sustained attention becomes effortless.
>
> Wilson draws on the Buddha's famous analogy of tuning a lute—neither too tight nor too loose—to illustrate how we must continually adjust our approach based on present conditions. She distinguishes between genuine balanced effort that springs from authentic interest and the exhausting striving that comes from trying to match an external form of "good practice." Through personal stories, including a powerful account of practicing while her mother faced serious illness, she reveals how effort that doesn't arise from the heart ultimately withers our capacity for presence.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing when we've tightened the string too much—when grimness and heaviness signal we're pushing rather than being present. Wilson emphasizes that opening to joy and beauty isn't a diversion from practice but essential skillful means (upāya) for maintaining the spaciousness needed to meet difficulty. She encourages practitioners to trust the wisdom of backing off when drowning in suffering, using nature and sensory opening to restore balance. The teaching points toward a profound truth: when effort is truly balanced, practice becomes its own reward, independent of what's arising in experience.

A lot of what we've been trying to describe in the instructions and a lot of what we do in the interviews is trying to help each of us find what we call balanced effort, balanced energy—the place that we keep talking about of really relaxed yet very vividly awake and alert. It sounds like such a paradox.

A lot of our practice is really not so much about what's going on, but about finding, recognizing, and learning how to dwell more often in this space of absolute non-doing and total presence. So, for example, when we talk about opening to hearing, it's to give that sense of nothing to do, yet the knowing is spontaneous. The sounds arise by themselves. And then going to the breath and noticing that same thing.

And then the next thing we're talking about is really connecting with the breath, really sustaining the attention, getting very precise. And you can wonder, what happened to open, total non-doing? Here we're being asked to put forth this incredible effort to meet every moment of experience. And at the same time, we're being told to do absolutely nothing. What are we talking about in the first place? And how do we find that? How can we learn to dance that line in our practice?

I want to try and talk a little bit about this tonight—this delicate balance of relaxed alertness. How to work with the openness without it becoming lost in space. How to work with precise, connected attention without it turning into tight, controlling effort, being wound so tight we're about to break.

This is really about learning to recognize and explore, to begin with, this mental quality of energy. It's something we often don't recognize as a mental state, a mental factor that comes and goes. Energy is impermanent like every other experience that we have, every other mental state. Sometimes the energy is strong and present and flowing, and sometimes it's really low.

Often we don't recognize that it's simply a mental factor rising and falling due to conditions. We tend to identify with energy and take it very personally when it leaves and think that we're doing something wrong and think that the answer is to push, push, push. Strive, strive, strive. If we force, then the energy is going to come. And we tend to think relaxation means you just disconnect altogether. Just open up, space out, kick back. Turn on the TV if you had that option.

There happens to be a broad middle ground between those two. I want to talk about some ways tonight that have been helpful to me to keep reconnecting with this delicate balance of energy, what's called wise effort or right effort in the practice.

One aspect I want to begin with that I find essential to being in that space of really flowing, balanced attention is this quality of interest, which we've been going on about—get interested in the breath, get interested in your feet. And I know that's not always exactly what the experience is. The thought is often, "Interested in my breath and interested in my movements all day? This is such an exhausting proposition. How can one possibly sustain that level of interest? It takes too much energy. It's too tiring." And then we're tired just thinking about it before we've even explored if it's possible.

But when there is true interest in our experience, then actually sustained focused attention is quite effortless. In practice here, of course, you might experience it momentarily, but in our lives we all know this experience. I know all of you have different work that you do that you're all quite involved in, and I'm sure you can think of different times in your work—not just five minutes or so, but over a period of maybe some hours—where your interest was just totally engaged, where you weren't wandering. Maybe you were working at the computer, maybe you were working in a courtroom, maybe you were working with a group of people or writing or singing or whatever. When the interest is completely engaged, there's not this sense of, "Oh, I can't pay attention to this anymore, it's too much trouble." It's effortless at that point.

A lot of what brings the interest in the beginning might be a sense of greater motivation. In your work, you might begin it and what might sustain the interest is a sense that you're doing it for some particular good cause, or it might just be for the payoff of having something be the way you want it to be. But when you're actually immersed in the work, if you're getting lost thinking about the motivation, the interest actually isn't there. When you're really interested, you're just there with the work. All of us know that.

And it doesn't even have to come from a so-called pure or wholesome motivation like compassion or trying to help people. One of my favorite examples that really brought home to me the universality of how interest brings focused attention—and that this is effortlessly available to all of us—was a few years ago. I was in San Francisco visiting friends in January during the time of the Super Bowl. I'm not a football fan particularly, but everybody I know in San Francisco basically is a football fan. That year, their team, the 49ers, was playing in the Super Bowl.

It was fascinating to me because for those three hours or so, it's like the whole city stopped. I know a lot of people in San Francisco, and they all got together in little groups between five and twenty people, just fixated. I was in a group of about ten people fixated on this game. As soon as the game would start, no talking—it wasn't even thought about. There was no diversion, nobody did anything else, just totally, totally focused.

And no one was saying, "This takes so much energy to pay attention to this game, it's really so hard, I don't know if I can keep it up." It was completely effortless. It's also interesting that as soon as the commercial came on, that quality of interest was totally gone, just turned off like a switch.

So it's not that the interest and that focused attention and the steadiness of it isn't accessible to us. What's more interesting to me, actually, is to see what it is that we choose to get interested in, and why it is that so many people can get so fascinated by a football game. I mean, these are people who are deeply committed to non-harming and non-violence in their lives, who are really spending their lives trying to do things to help themselves, one another, and the planet—and they're so engrossed with these guys beating each other up on the field. It's really quite an interesting phenomenon to me. But okay, that's an aside.

What's even more interesting is that I could care less about football, but being in their company, I got really involved in the game too. And that's what's fascinating to see—it's sort of catching. So partly on this retreat, you can catch interest in the meditation from each other.

Now, I'm not trying to say that the interest, the quality of attention in that football game, is exactly the same as the quality of attention in our practice, because there are certain elements of motivation that aren't so wholesome. For example, I don't think anyone was watching that game without a real desire for one particular team to win. So there was an ongoing quality of craving in the motivation—or maybe hatred of the other team, or whatever—but it's not just pure interest. Even though there's a lot of talk about the artistry of the game and all this stuff, there's definitely a sense of a not-so-wholesome motivation. But still, the potential is there.

And why is it, whether we're a football fan or something else, whether it's a movie, why is it we can get so effortlessly present for periods of time for some things, but it can be so difficult when we come here to bring that quality of interest to what's happening in our life? I mean, whatever's arising in our experience in this moment—that is absolutely all we have in the world, in our life, is this moment. And how much of the time are we not that interested in it? We'd rather have another moment. We'd rather think of a different moment that happened five years ago. We'd rather make up something that could happen next. But we don't have that interest that just lets us be fully present for this moment.

There's a sense of picking and choosing. Of course, I talked some about that the other night—that part of that picking and choosing comes from our liking the pleasant and not liking the unpleasant. It also comes from our sense of evaluating what we think is worthwhile, what we think isn't worthwhile. And a lot of the time in practice here, what we are present with is just something that is sort of mundane. It's maybe not intense enough, or it's really familiar. I mean, have you ever had the thought, "Oh, the breath again. I've felt the breath so many times. I really know the breath. Let's move on to something more interesting."

I read an article in the San Francisco paper a few years ago about a young woman, twenty-one, who had cystic fibrosis—was born with it, of course. And so at twenty-one, she was on the verge of death, and she got a partial lung transplant from both parents.

It was just quoting an interview with her, and it was so beautiful. She was so upbeat, and she was saying something like, "It's so wonderful to breathe. Air, a clear breath, is just the most wonderful thing I could imagine in this life."

I thought, ah, you know—how many breaths have I taken in my life? Even that I'm aware of, I've taken a lot of breaths in my life. But how often have I brought that quality of real interest to it? And how would it be if we didn't breathe for five minutes? Even two minutes, we'd be pretty interested in it.

So it's often this not even conscious judgment: "It's too familiar. I know it. I've experienced this before." "I don't have to pay attention to this pain. I know about this pain. I've looked at this pain." "Oh, I know this emotion, this anxiety. I've experienced it a thousand times. Let's move on to something else." And what we're doing is denying ourselves the interest for our life, because that's our life at this moment.

So really, what our practice is—the practice of mindfulness—it gives us the skill to bring our attention more closely into whatever's happening. And sure, at the first moment, we might not be interested in the breath. But what we find out is that when our attention is more connected with what's happening, the interest is actually enhanced. So when you're really there with the breath, there can be times when the breath is just fascinating. It's not that the fascination or the interest is inherent in the object or in the breath.

The interest is in the quality of attention. It's that willingness to bring the attention that will again arouse the sense of interest.

This unconscious—or sometimes conscious—tendency we have to evaluate what is worth being interested in is so insidious that we don't even notice it. And what makes it even more insidious is that this tendency to only be interested in certain things, due to whatever conditioning, actually distorts our perception of reality. Without realizing it, by just following what we're interested in like a leaf in the wind, we're not even perceiving what's actually so.

An example from Daniel Goleman's book Vital Lies, Simple Truths illustrates this perfectly. He describes a psychological experiment where subjects watched a four or five minute video of a basketball game—a very fast-paced sequence with a lot of rapid ball-changing. The assignment given to the subjects was to notice how many times the ball was passed. That's what they were really focused on, what they were interested in.

That interest so narrowed their vision that while this fast game was going on, a woman in white with a parasol strolled through the middle of the basketball court—and nobody noticed. When the experiment was over and the subjects were asked how many times the ball was passed, they all answered. But nobody mentioned, "What was that woman doing on the basketball court?" In fact, when the experimenters asked about it, the response was essentially, "What woman? What are you talking about?" Most of them hadn't even noticed her.

It's amazing because once that's pointed out, you couldn't watch that video and not see the woman. But when we're just going with selective interest, we miss so much and we don't even know it.

This is why we have discipline in our practice—because there will be times when we're not interested. God knows. And the discipline is not about pushing, but that gentle coming back to let us again connect: just with the breath, just with the sensation, just with the emotion. Not choosing what's happening, but simply connecting with what is. In that gentle being with it, the interest will come again. And once more, this connection and presence will begin to seem effortless. It won't be this sense of push, push, push anymore.

The more we begin to pay attention in this way, the more mindfulness allows us—consciously or not, it just begins to happen—to drop these distinctions of what's worth our interest. We begin to see, to really experience, the interrelatedness of all experience. We start seeing that our evaluations—this is good or bad, right or wrong; this particular experience is going to lead to opening in my practice, while this particular experience is a total waste of time that we'd better get rid of—we begin to see that this is a totally useless form of thinking. Although of course we all do it, mostly unconsciously.

Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master who teaches meditation—he's a Buddhist monk and also a peace activist, in case you don't know who he is; he's become quite well known in meditation and mindfulness circles in recent years—talks a lot about interrelatedness in very simple terms. He speaks about how we can't really say "this is good" and "this is bad" and divide experience or divide the world up in this way, because everything is cause and effect. We can't say what cause leads to what effect.

He uses the example of how we tend to like a rose and disdain garbage. But actually, as a rose dies, it becomes garbage. And then we take the garbage and use it for compost, and it turns into a rose. How are we making these distinctions? How are we saying one thing is worthwhile and another isn't worth our interest? Actually, sometimes it's the thing we think isn't interesting that can open us up to much more profound understanding. The sublime and the painful are two sides of the same coin. In my experience, they often come so close together that I couldn't separate them.

I was doing a self-retreat this spring, about four or five weeks. I was going through a period where it was a painful retreat—a lot of terror, a lot of fear, a lot of confronting the uncontrollability, the imminence of death, how one moment can change our whole life and nothing can change it back. That kind of retreat.

And nature was playing along too. It was in South Africa, in a really beautiful location overlooking some green, beautiful hills. They had the most incredible thunderstorms I have ever experienced in my life. There weren't many people there, and I didn't know anybody. I'd only been there a few days. And the day I hit into this sense of terror—complete uncontrollability, imminence of death—that was the night nature decided to have the most amazing display of fireworks I've ever seen. Lightning every second, flashing for miles across the hills and flashing right into the room. It was really amazing. It went on for two or three hours.

And of course, I was terrified. I was hiding under my blanket, saying to myself, "Oh, just fear, fear, just empty fear."

But I really liked the way the universe will conspire to let us know what we need to pay attention to—in case I didn't notice that it was out of control, and that that brought up fear, here's another dose.

On that retreat, there were also moments of just opening to the beauty, to the exquisiteness of nature, and the joy of being alive. And it was so interesting because I found it was impossible to open to that without immediately there being a rush of fear—of the uncontrollability, of the imminence of death. In fact, they were so close together, the incredible joy and connection with all life. Of course, as soon as we're connected with all life, we've got to connect to impermanence, to uncontrollability, because that is life. But it was like the beauty and the pain were so close together that at times I really couldn't even tell the difference.

It was so clear that I couldn't pick one and say, "This is worth paying attention to, and I think I'll ignore this other one." At that point I didn't have a choice. But when we try to ignore one and just get interested in how beautiful something is, it doesn't work for very long. We need to be really open to the whole and see that they feed each other.

Another example where sometimes what seems horrible, so painful, is actually the door to real opening: I have a friend who has AIDS. He's had HIV for some time, and in the last few years, as it does, it's getting more intense. He's not dying immediately, but he has varying sicknesses. What's been really interesting to watch—because I've known him for some ten years or so, well before he was diagnosed—is to see how almost it goes together. The more often he gets sick, the deeper the disease goes, the more he's opening. His heart and his being are opening into a kind of radiance that people are just drawn to. His understanding just flows out of him. He's a real beacon to many, many people in their lives. And at the same time, he's going through a real depth of suffering and terror. It's not like he's dancing through it. It's really the deeper the suffering goes, the deeper the radiance is coming out of him. And almost—I mean, I'm not wishing he were ill, you understand what I mean—but it's almost like you can't separate the two. It's how life is. The two go so close together. There's no such thing as only beauty.

And even just opening to the mundane. It doesn't have to be the horrible suffering of age or illness—just the mundane. Just opening to our footsteps. Just opening to being present when we think it isn't very interesting. Like the other night when I talked about opening to the sense of just being tired—that's all. Just being with the tiredness. Not that interesting. I don't expect anything to happen from it. There's no big payoff. And suddenly there's the awareness of beauty. It comes together.

This is a poem from a Japanese woman of the tenth or eleventh century:

Although the wind blows terribly here, the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house.

I love that. Although the wind blows terribly here, the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house. And opening to one, we open to all of it.

Having experiences of that for yourself—my telling you might, for a moment, make you say, "Oh, well, maybe I'll look at something I didn't think I'd be interested in." But then when you do that, and you really have an experience for yourself of how something that normally wouldn't be interesting can be compellingly interesting and open us to a much deeper understanding of ourselves—then, again, that will fuel the interest and the willingness to be present that lets this effortless awareness begin to flow more easily.

So often—and people have said it here—it can happen on a retreat where there's a pain, and after we've exhausted every possibility of avoiding, of bargaining, of moving, of trying to pretend we're paying attention while we're really paying attention to something else... you know the whole scenario. And finally it dawns on us that maybe I could just really pay attention to this pain and nothing else and just be there with it. That takes a balance of energy. That takes a time when the energy is sort of fresh and you can be there with it. And we really move into that pain and it gets really interesting. It might go away, it might not go away. Later the energy falls and you can't be there with it.

But in that moment, it's really interesting. And often what is seen is that actually, sometimes you can't even call it pain. So much of what was difficult was the fear, the aversion, the thinking about it, and all the resistance that was going in. The same is true with difficult emotions. And seeing that for oneself, even if it's just for a moment, can be transformative. It gives us what is called verified faith—faith coming from your own experience. And that's really where the confidence comes to bring interest, where interest will spring from in your practice. It doesn't take hours of seeing something like that. It just takes an instant to give more of a sense of verified faith. "All right, I don't think this is worth paying attention to, but maybe if I really do let myself sink into it, it gets interesting. It's my life. It's worth it." And we have more of that motivation that isn't so hinged to wanting a future result—that's much more about being willing to be awake in our life.

So when this interest is present—and of course this comes and goes too—when it is present, the quality of balanced effort, of balanced energy where we're just there, we're not thinking about pushing or changing or needing to relax, we're just totally there, it becomes its own reward. There's no need at that point for a motivation or trying to get to some other goal.

I've actually found in my own formal meditation practice, meaning on retreat, when I'm noticing these qualities much more finely—of course, it's present in our life all the time—but when the effort is balanced in this way, it's its own reward. I've come to feel that when I find a sense of real fulfillment, of almost happiness in my practice—and it can happen, it can happen that you actually are happy to be practicing this form of meditation—that real sense of fulfillment and happiness comes not from something nice happening. It's got actually nothing to do with what's happening. It's when there's that quality of wholehearted interest and attention and effort, the effort of just being present. I know that I can be having what would seem like a day from hell in my practice, and what makes the difference between me calling it bad practice or me feeling fulfilled in it is this quality of interest. When I'm really there and willing to be with whatever happens, then whatever happens, I feel like the practice is going fine. And there's nothing to do or nothing to change. And of course, that changes too, because everything changes.

So you can be in that quality of really balanced energy and effort, meeting what's happening with interest, without making distinctions. That effort, though—and I've said it before, I'm going to say it again—the effort we're making, the energy that's coming, is only to be fully present with what's happening. That's all. There is no quality in this balanced effort of trying to change things, of trying to move it on a little to the next place, of trying to make it more clear, of trying to get it to open. The effort can be wholehearted, absolutely complete, but only to fully be here for what is.

You see how delicate that is. It's so delicate. For many of us, the deep habits of our lifetime are that we do something to make a certain result happen, and that's the only way we know how to put out an effort. And so we might for a moment meet something fully, but so easily the expectation or the motivation, the idea of what we're trying to make happen, comes in. And we think it's still this balanced effort, but it's really expectation or wanting in disguise. We think we're meeting something fully, but somehow it gets a little bit skewed. And you can begin to tell because it won't have that fulfilling feeling anymore. It won't have that sense of ease or effortless presence anymore, because somehow, somewhere, what's happening has suddenly stopped being quite okay.

And at that point, our response can be one of two things. It can be—which it often is, if we've really learned how to strive in our lives—"It's not right, so put out more effort." But again, this effort is skewed. It's expectation. So it's push, push, push. And we're not meeting what's happening. We're not meeting the breath. We're not meeting an emotion. We're not meeting the pain. We're pushing at it. We're hammering at it. We're trying to shift it. And it's really exhausting. It really withers our heart and mind. The other extreme is, "Let's just blow this off. It isn't happening."

But first, I want to talk about this point when effort gets a little bit skewed, but you think you're still really trying wholeheartedly. It can be very deceptive. It can really fool us. You get this sense of pushing, pushing, bringing up more effort, needing it every moment. But because it's skewed, because we're trying to make something happen, the effort we're putting out is not skillful means. Skillful means is perhaps adjusting the way we're relating—not to change the arising appearance, but simply to find again that balance of relaxation and attention.

The example the Buddha gave in talking about finding this balance of effort was to a person who made lutes, an instrument like a guitar. He was very skillful in who he would talk to; he could always find the thing that would exactly meet the way their mind worked. So he gave the example of a lute, that it has to be tuned just right to sound good. You can make it a little bit tighter, and that might help—but if you keep going, just tighter, tighter, tighter, it doesn't necessarily work. Eventually the string will snap. But if it's a little bit too tight and you loosen it a bit, then it sounds fine. Yet if we think, "Well, loosening is the way to go," and then we loosen, loosen, loosen until you can't play the string at all. And even though you can get it at perfect pitch, you play it a little while and the pitch changes again, and you have to check it out. You can't assume that because last time you loosened it, this time you should loosen it too. You don't know. You have to play it. You have to see what the conditions are right now. Is it too tight? Too loose? Try a little bit. You tighten it—no, no, it was too tight, so you loosen it. It's really being very immediate, looking at what's happening right now, finding that balance, learning how to play. And we usually learn by going too far one way, seeing how painful that is, seeing that it doesn't work. We might go a little too far the other way, and then we come back into balance.

I really got this one time in my own practice—the sense of how it can look like perfect practice, total effort, and yet be dry and torturous without you even recognizing it. I was doing a retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, who Joseph has mentioned. He is a real taskmaster. You don't go there expecting him to offer some of the things I'm going to say later about opening up and going out in nature—you're not going to hear that from U Pandita. So it's very easy to tighten the string and tighten the string until you're about to snap, and not really get any other kind of feedback. I had practiced with him often before, and I could be very present, noting every single movement, every single thing I was doing, from the morning I got up until the moment I went to bed.

The day before this retreat started, I talked to my mother on the phone, and she told me she had just been diagnosed with cancer. About ten days into the retreat, she was going to have a mastectomy and a hysterectomy. I said, "Of course, well, I'm coming home." She said, "No, you're not. I don't want you to come home. No way. You have to do this retreat." This was my mother, who wasn't really into sitting, and she was usually not that firm. She said, "I do not want you to come home." All right. Okay. She doesn't want me there. I won't come home.

So I went and started the retreat. I was calling home every day, and that was fine—it wasn't sending my mind spinning or something. So I thought I was fully present. I was doing this retreat perfect to form, from the moment I got up to the moment I went to bed. It looked perfect. I felt like I was really putting out complete balanced effort. And it was getting more and more dry and arid. I didn't quite realize how bad it was until about three weeks in. I was coming up the stairs where I would always do walking meditation in a certain hallway. And I thought—and this wasn't just one of those passing thoughts; this thought I really bought into—"If someone is walking there, I'm leaving the retreat." I really meant it. I opened the door, and no one was walking there.

I thought, "Oh, I have to stay. Something's going on here that I'm really not noticing." It woke me up.

And I really saw that it can look like—to yourself, never mind anyone else, but to yourself—that the effort you're putting out is really there, really balanced. I was meeting every moment. But if it's not really springing from your heart, if it's not really springing from within, it won't work.

So in a way, what I was doing was putting in an effort to match an outer appearance of how the practice is supposed to be, how I knew the practice was supposed to be, and I could conform to that. But there wasn't a true interest in it springing from myself, from my heart. It was really fifty percent show. And when I saw that—because half of me was home with my mother, that's where I really felt I should be—actually, after that, I did go home. I left the retreat and went home, and she's fine. She's been fine ever since. And I stayed home for some days. It was the right thing to do. And then I went back and I was totally present. It was like a six or eight week retreat, and I was totally present there for the rest of it. Really different. You know, not always joyous, but the interest was there. It was springing from myself.

So really seeing that in the beginning, we can think right effort means to match the form perfectly. But if we're doing it with this outer forcing, it's going to wither our heart, wither our mind. We're not going to be able to keep it up. And something will wake us up to that.

So a lot of our practice is learning how to find this balance. Because when there's the real balance of interest in the mind, the mind is bright. It's interested in being with what is happening. And there's a patience, a willingness, just an ease to come up and meet what is difficult. If there's not that balance of effort and interest coming from inside ourselves, we won't be able to meet what is difficult.

Because as you've seen, when there's painful or unpleasant sensations or emotions or any kind of experience, when it comes up, the mind's immediate reaction is to kind of shrink away, to fall back. That's the first reaction of aversion. Also, when Joseph was talking about sloth and torpor last night, the tendency of the mind is to just pull back, shrink away, fall down. And if there's energy, if there's interest and energy, that serves as a support to the mind. So when there's a tendency to shrink back, the energy can come in—that balance that can be fed by interest—and it's like, "Oh, you can come back and meet it."

A lot of people have reported how some kind of difficult experience tends to come and go, often throughout the day. In the morning, for example, there's a kind of freshness. There's more energy and it's easier to really meet that experience and be there with it. And later in the day, there's not that freshness. The energy is lower and so it doesn't give the support, and the tendency of the mind to shrink away and get fatigued is stronger. There's just not that energy there to balance it. And we don't quite know at that point how to find that energy again.

But in the times before we've gotten so fatigued from really fighting or struggling with something difficult—in that first moment of coming to something difficult, the pain, anger, difficult emotion, and there's that tendency to shrink away—we can see again why we say it's not necessarily being kind to yourself to give in to that. Because that shrinking could just be for a moment. We can summon mindfulness, interest, and energy and come back and meet that, and it's not even a difficulty anymore. But if we just get into that tendency when it first arises, it's really, as Joseph was saying, that sloth and torpor, and it just leads to more fatigue, more disconnection, and we really get lost.

This is from Thomas Merton. These words might seem a little strong. I would just call it the mind shrinking away. He's calling it laziness and cowardice:

Laziness and cowardice are two of the greatest enemies of the spiritual life, and they are most dangerous of all when they mask themselves as discretion. This illusion would not be so fatal if discretion itself were not one of the most important virtues of a spiritual person. Indeed, it is discretion itself that must teach us the difference between cowardice and discretion. Laziness and cowardice put our own present comfort before the love of God—or I'd say the love of truth—they fear the uncertainty of the future because they place no trust in God. Discretion warns us against wasted effort.

But for the coward, all effort is wasted effort. Discretion shows us where effort is wasted and when it is necessary. Laziness flies from all risk. Discretion flies from useless risk but urges us on to take the risks that faith and the grace of God demand of us. Sooner or later, if we follow Christ, we have to risk everything in order to gain everything. We have to gamble on the invisible and risk all that we can see and taste and feel. But we know the risk is worth it because there is nothing more insecure than the transient world. For this world as we see it is passing away.

So it's different language from what we use in Buddhism, but the same feeling. Discretion is our skillful means—knowing when the shrinking away of mind is really what he's calling laziness or cowardice, or what I would simply call low energy or our tendency to avoid. And discretion can bring us back in to be with what is happening in a gentle way.

Discretion can also tell us when the energy is low and the mindfulness is not present, when what is happening is too painful, too ongoing, when the mind is withering from constant battering against the painful, whether physical or emotional. By continuing to try to meet it with an effort that's a little askew, we're only going to bring on a sense of defeat, a sense of frustration and greater pain. At that point, discretion says move the attention away. This is not cowardice and this is not laziness. This is skillful means born of clear seeing—the recognition that there are times when the energy is not balanced enough, when we're somehow caught in struggle, and the only way to come out of that tightness is to move the attention away altogether.

Even when we have a deep commitment to be with what is so in our practice—it might be something very painful, and there is a genuine wanting to understand it—even when our motivation is quite pure, quite sincere, somehow just creeping in, we've gotten caught in trying too hard, tightening the string too much, coming at the pain, coming at the emotion. Sometimes a well of grief opens up in us, a well of memory, a well of terror, a well of physical pain, and it comes so strongly that it seems we're drowning. We're just drowning in it. Or we're somehow so wanting to be with it that we keep battering against it, getting tighter and tighter. At these times, it's skillful means, it's discretion that tells us we're losing the spaciousness. In fact, spaciousness is a word that hardly seems relevant at times like that. We just feel like we're being engulfed.

It's important to open to difficulty and suffering, yes. And we've talked a lot about that. In fact, one of the ways we can cultivate commitment and interest when it starts to flag—one of the classical ways this is taught—is to consciously reflect on the suffering in ourselves and in the world. This is not morbid, not about making ourselves miserable. This is for those times when we're sitting and we think, "Why should I bother paying attention? What's the point? I've been looking and looking—what am I doing this for?"

There are classical reflections that bring up a sense of commitment, a sense of urgency. One is on the imminence of death, the fact of impermanence. It awakens a sense of "I don't have time to waste." Another is tuning into our own suffering or the suffering in the world around us—what is sometimes called the defects of samsara, of this round of birth and death. We begin to see that it somehow doesn't quite work in the way we think. Another reflection is on the preciousness of our human life.

For everyone here, just by virtue of having the time and the willingness and the interest to be here, we are incredibly graced. Out of all the possibilities for existence on this planet, as we all know, there are so many people whose suffering is so intense that even the thought, the possibility of beginning to explore the nature of themselves and the nature of truth seems too far away, where all of life is engaged in a struggle just to eat.

Going to Asia is always a wonderful reminder for me of this—both an awakening to the immensity of suffering on this planet, which spurs me to see what I can do in my little way to at least not bring more suffering, and if I can do something to alleviate it, even better. But also a sense of such gratitude and appreciation for the health, the willingness to really look at what is true, the opportunity. And there are many people who have both the health and the opportunity but just plain aren't interested.

When we go to Bodh Gaya—Joseph mentioned it the other night, where the Buddha was enlightened—this really struck me. There are people like those who run the chai shop where we hang out, who have lived there all their lives. Streams of Buddhist pilgrims come and go, all kinds of teachings happen, all the Tibetan lamas pass through, any Buddhist who's anybody comes through there at some point, as do Hindus, as do all kinds of spiritual people. And this man is living and running the chai shop and he's not really too interested. It's just not a priority, just not a particular value. So even to have this as an interest, we are so blessed. When I reflect on that—one of the classic reflections—it can bring up motivation.

"Okay, okay, I'll go back and be with my knee pain. I don't have so much to fret about after all."

So there's a way that opening to suffering really brings up this sense of spiritual urgency—if we open to it, not in the way of drowning, not in the way of "oh my God, this is unbearable," but if we meet it as an inspiration. There's a Thai teacher who recently died, Ajahn Buddhadasa, who said that there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and there's suffering that leads to the end of suffering. And it's not the particular suffering—it's in our attitude. So when we really open and see what's around us and in us, that can bring us back to this interest, this motivation to investigate, to be genuinely curious about what's happening for us.

We can be in the same situation and yet become so complacent that it can be really helpful sometimes to bring in these reflections.

About ten or eleven years ago—you've probably heard of Jon Kabat-Zinn by now, and his stress reduction program at the University of Massachusetts Hospital in Worcester, which happens to be very near Barre, where our meditation center is. For a period of eight weeks, once a week, seriously ill patients who've been referred to this program by doctors who basically can't do anything else come together. They might have ongoing chronic pain, they might have cancer, they might have anxiety—all different conditions, but basically very serious ongoing pain and stress that the medical profession can't help them with anymore. And what they teach in this program, without any of the Buddhist terminology, is basically just the meditation we've been doing here.

With each program, they have a group of interns—people who can sit in on the program who aren't patients, but who go through it exactly the same way just to see how it's done. So about eleven years ago, I was managing the retreat center with my friend, the other manager, and another dear friend who was cooking, and we did this internship program.

It was so fascinating. What I learned the most about was complacency—and the power that comes from real spiritual urgency.

We went in definitely complacent. Well, we know this meditation stuff. We not only work in a meditation center, we've been doing it for fifteen years, and so on and so forth. We would come into the class, and while he'd be doing the meditations, having us lying down, the patients would be really getting into it. We would fall asleep. And then we'd have to listen to this body scan tape every night at home. I don't think I ever got higher than my knee without falling asleep. I don't normally fall asleep every time I meditate, but I just didn't have this interest.

And we'd come home exhausted, with headaches, really stressed out. We actually got really stressed out from doing this. Meanwhile, the people in the program were having amazing experiences. I remember one woman said, after about four weeks—I mean, they're only coming to this for three hours a week and doing forty-five minutes a day of meditation at home, that's all—after the fourth week, she says, "I've had about four migraines a week for the last several years, and I haven't had a migraine now for two or three weeks." My friend and I just looked at each other. We were going home with splitting headaches from this.

And we knew it. We already knew all of this.

So there was something—both about the freshness, but I think it's even more the motivation. Being faced with pain and suffering when you've been told that the medical profession you believe in has basically said, "Sorry, folks, we can't do anything"—it's like, "Oh, we've really got to look. I've got to wake up. I've got to see what's going on." It was profound, and it continues in that way to this day.

You can see how I came out of that thinking: What am I waiting for? Do I have to wait until I get a terminal disease before I really start paying attention to my life? I mean, we all have a terminal diagnosis anyway. And just because we might feel healthy now, the truth is—who knows what's going to happen when we walk out of the door? And I just take it so for granted.

So that's a way that opening to suffering doesn't have to be overwhelming. It can really be an inspiration to us, to get interested again.

And again, opening to suffering in the bigger picture like this, or in our practice when something is happening—that's what I started to say before I took this digression. When there's something happening that we're trying to open to, but it's just too much. Or sometimes the suffering in the world, or the suffering in our lives or in people around us, is just more than we can be with at that time. And there are going to be times like that for all of us, in our practice and in our life—where you just feel like you're either beating your head against the wall or you're drowning, just drowning in the suffering.

And it seems like it's all futile and pointless. The idea of effortless attention, of interest, of a kind of joy and fulfillment in practice becomes a totally alien idea.

Part of what's happening is we're leaving the comfort zone. When we begin to open and pay attention—as Joseph was saying, as we get more concentrated—things that we didn't notice before really start to come into our field of attention. And with the practice of paying attention, we don't really have an out of running away. So it looms larger and larger. We're leaving the comfort zone that we've set up for ourselves, and we've all found ways in our lives to try and stay comfortable. Of course, that keeps us restricted. It keeps us in denial. And the only way of opening is by coming out of the comfort zone.

But sometimes it's just too much. And the skillful means, the discretion, is knowing that the most skillful thing you can do is take your attention away from that difficulty and turn it to something else. Pushing, pushing, pushing is not necessarily the answer. In fact, it usually isn't. Grimness and heaviness is not balanced effort. If you're feeling really grim and heavy, I'd say there's a ninety-eight percent possibility that you're pushing too hard, or that something's going on you can't quite see or be with, and that the skillful thing to do at that time would be to take your attention and turn it elsewhere.

It's hard for most of us to believe this. Because generally, in my experience, when that grimness comes in and I'm pushing so hard because something isn't right, what's also come in is a sense of self-judgment. It's not right because I'm not doing it right, because I don't understand the practice, because I don't have balanced effort, because whatever. And in that state of self-judgment, which I'm very familiar with personally, if you don't recognize its presence, that self-judgment is going to filter any evaluation you make of what's going on.

So when you're pushing and you're in self-judgment—I'm not doing it right, it's my fault—and someone says, "You know, it's too heavy, you need to back off, you need to open up," your mind will never believe it. No, I'm being a wimp. Wimps don't open up. Clearly the schedule is sit, walk, sit, walk. That's for a reason, and if I don't do it, somehow I'm not good enough, I'm not doing it right. A lot of what we do on meditation retreats is beg people to back off, because it's really hard for someone to get it that that's the most skillful thing to do, that that is good practice at that time.

Thich Nhat Hanh talks a lot about how it's important to open to suffering, but when we're drowning, we need to consciously bring up seeds of joy. So sometimes that means here, in a way, we're graced. It's one of the reasons it's so helpful to do a meditation retreat in such a beautiful environment—because the balance, the potential for opening to joy, for touching what is beautiful, for bringing in the spaciousness of heart and mind, that is accessible to us pretty immediately.

So when you're feeling this gripping, this heaviness, when you're just pounding your head against a wall, go outside. Take a walk. Go down and sit by the river. Open up your senses. Smell all the different smells of the grasses and the wildflowers. Just listen to the birds. Watch them playing. Watch Miss Faye roaming around here looking for scraps. Watch Elvis the dog, who Franz and I decided is the perfect impersonation and manifestation of restlessness, of restless energy. If you want to see what restless energy is, watch him down by the river. He can't sit still. He can't follow one thing for one second. It's really great—it makes you laugh.

Bring in some joy, some lightness. It's the most skillful thing you can do at those times. It's not a diversion. It's not cheating. It's not wrong in this practice to be happy, to have joy. We need it. We need it because it's the only way we can find the balance to open to how painful things can be at times. The two really support each other.

So if you even have the suspicion that things are too grim, give it a try. Go out, open up, and just be with what is. Not with clinging—appreciation of things as they are, not with clinging.

And you can tell when the clinging comes in because the joy kind of stops.

I had an experience again at this place in South Africa. It was beautifully landscaped, the retreat center, and the paths were lined with huge bushes of white, very white and delicate lavender irises. Mostly it was bushes, but one day it was really hot and they just all bloomed and it was so exquisite. I came out, and I was just looking at that, drinking it in—just beautiful, so happy, the joy.

And then there was this one moment where it went, "This is so beautiful. It will only last a day. I wish I had a camera. Maybe I could get a camera and take a picture, and then I can really preserve it, and then I can show it to my friends." And I really got into this—"Got to find a camera, got to preserve it, it's so beautiful." Well, I was no longer appreciating it at all. I was totally caught in clinging, and it wasn't pleasant. But somehow if we don't notice that, we think we're still appreciating.

So just have an eye out for that when you go out—when it stops being joy and turns to clinging. Or on the other hand, when it stops being awareness of joy and you're just totally spacing out. You're walking, but you're not aware of anything; you're just thinking again. Then that's gone too far in the openness direction and it's time to come back and sit, or do your walking meditation.

I just want to encourage you all to know that opening, changing the attention—opening to hearing is one thing to do in the sitting. Opening to the whole of nature is the next step when it's really getting too tight. And trust it. Pay attention to the effects. If you do it and feel a sense of more spaciousness and ease, and you can come back and sit a little easier, it's helpful. If you go out and find all you want to do is keep walking—and in fact you think you'll just walk right on out of here—then that might not have been what you needed in that moment. It's a delicate balance, and you have to just pay attention. How tight is the string?

I want to end on that note with a poem by Ryokan that embodies for me that sense of presence and appreciation of nature that comes when we're really interested and attuned. And the same can be tuned to ourselves.

A Poem of Early Fall

After a night of rain, water covers the village path.
This morning the thick grass by my hut is cool.
In the window, distant mountains the color of blue-green jade.
Outside, a river flows like shimmering silk.
Under a cliff near my hut, I wash out my sore ear with pure spring water.
In the trees, cicadas recite their fall verse.
I had prepared my robe and staff for a walk, but the quiet beauty keeps me here.

So let's explore the quiet beauty in ourselves for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 276

The Illusion of Self

Carol Wilson · 1h08

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to move beyond conceptual understanding of anattā (not-self) into direct experiential investigation. She addresses the common tendency to analyze selflessness intellectually, identifying this as a form of doubt (vicikicchā) that prevents genuine insight. The antidote, she explains, is sustained attention and a quality of verified faith—confidence based on personal experience rather than blind belief.
>
> Wilson explores how our deep-seated need for security leads us to grasp at a sense of self as a "resting place" amid constant change. Drawing on the five aggregates (khandhas)—body, feeling tone (vedanā), consciousness (viññāṇa), perception (saññā), and mental formations (saṅkhāra)—she offers practical guidance for investigating where the sense of "I" actually lands in each moment. Through vivid examples, including earthquake aftershocks and mistaking movie memories for personal identity, she illustrates how identification with passing phenomena creates the illusion of a solid self.
> The talk offers two complementary approaches to practice: the precision method of turning attention directly toward the experience of "I" or "mine" when it arises, and the spaciousness approach of attuning to emptiness and noticing when grasping emerges. Wilson emphasizes that liberation comes not from destroying the ego but from seeing clearly that what seemed so solid was never truly there. This seeing naturally brings ease, joy, and freedom in the dance of arising and passing experience.

So now we're back from the world of just pure presence and nature to the world of concepts and ideas. Even though we sit here talking about no concepts, the whole fact of sitting here making noise and exchanging words and it means something—hopefully—is so amazing, but it's so conceptual.

I want to go on a little bit more from what Joseph was talking about last night, about this experience of no lasting self. I want to talk about it in a very experiential way, pointing our practice, our moment-to-moment awareness, back to this sense of self as it seems to arise, and exploring what it is.

But first, I want to take a little diversion. Because when we begin to talk about concepts and what's the reality underneath them, almost without fail—especially for people whose first retreat this is—if Joseph had done a question period this afternoon, he would have been bombarded with questions about "if there's no self, fill in the blanks." Because the concept of it, in hearing about it, until it's our actual experience, until it's experiential, intuitive understanding, true or not, it's just another concept.

What that tends to do for us—certainly I spent years in this—is we take that concept, and the concept alone isn't enough to blast through, to help us see through the inaccurate perceptions or the inaccurate concepts we've been living with all our life. And in fact, there's no real reason to believe that the idea of selflessness is any more true than what seems like our experience of being a pretty ongoing, identifiable self.

What often tends to happen is that it sets up a sense of the mind just starting to spin. You start to think about it, try to bring it into experience, try to analyze it, and you can really get into quite an energy—a mental energy of thinking about, analyzing, figuring out, comparing. What is this sense of no-self? Trying to figure it out with our minds, with our reason, with our logic.

I wish my saying this would be enough. I know it won't be, but I'll say it anyway: it won't work. It will never work. We can never figure out with thinking, with our mind, with opinion, with logic—we can never somehow figure out or make sense of this idea of no-self, because it can only be understood experientially. It can only be something we touch with our awareness free of previous concept.

What can start to happen is that we take really fascinating ideas like no-self, and analyzing and thinking about them can be really interesting. It can feel like we're really practicing, really grabbing hold of something juicy here. But what it actually can turn into is doubt.

Doubt is somewhat obvious when it manifests as a thought of "I can't do this," or "this is stupid," or "I don't think they know what they're talking about." But another way that doubt arises in our experience is that it masquerades as analytical thinking. So we're sitting there, we start to pay attention, and the mind goes: "But that's not me. That can't be me. Is that pain me? If there's no me, how come I feel that pain? How come I have an opinion?" And the mind just starts going and going.

The way doubt manifests as a hindrance, when Joseph spoke of the hindrances the other day, is just this: the mind is spinning and spinning, thoughts are going, and there is a complete inability when doubt is present for the attention, for the mind, to just land on anything. It will keep landing and skittering off. When doubt is masquerading as analytical thought, each experience will just trigger off a whole other set of ways to think about it.

Believe me, I've spent a lot of time doing this. At first it seems somewhat fulfilling. It's a lot more interesting than all the other thoughts I was sitting with for days before. "These are Dharma thoughts, so this is okay to hang out with." Just notice: if it's this sense of spinning, spinning, not able to touch anything, it's doubt—no matter what the content is.

On a level of moment-to-moment practice experience, as you're sitting or walking and you notice this, the antidote to doubt is sustained attention. If you're thinking about whatever—I'm using no-self as the example since that's what I'm talking about—and you're analyzing, "what about this?" and you notice that, simply label doubt as the hindrance. Then bring your attention to something that's happening. It doesn't matter what, but hopefully not the thought, because you get too sucked in. Come back to the breath. If that's too subtle, come back to a sense of your body sitting, a sense of your seat on the pillow, your hands touching—any physical sensation.

Sound, if that's a clear one for you—but if it's a little vague, you might get sucked back into the thought. Come back to your feet walking.

If you can get the attention just to land on something, and as soon as the thoughts come back again, sustain the attention, what happens is the attention deepens, lands in the present moment, and those thoughts just start to fade. You don't have to resolve them one way or the other. You're just coming out and landing in the moment. That's sustained attention. That is the momentary, the practice-level antidote to doubt.

Of course, the big trick is recognizing it as doubt.

On the level of what gives us the energy to do that—beyond the moment-to-moment practice—we have to come out of our usual way of trying to figure things out. This is beyond just doubt. It's a willingness to move from our reliance on knowledge, from our reliance on reasoning, to surrender into whatever's happening without prior expectations. In a way, you could call this faith. Faith is another strategy for being with our experience, one that's different from knowledge.

I'm going to give you two definitions of faith. It's a word that—I don't know how you all relate to it, depending on your backgrounds and conditioning. For me, I didn't have much of a religious upbringing. Being Protestant, we went to church and all, but somehow it didn't seem to stick or really have much impact. So my association with the word faith was more secondhand, more the demand for belief—belief in what somebody told me, belief in a particular doctrine or a particular person. Of course, my logical mind would want proof, but faith seemed to demand following and believing without any kind of proof, without anything to rely on.

The faith I'm talking about in our context of practice is not that at all. It's not blind belief. It is definitely not anything that demands an abandoning of our own intuitive sense of wisdom or understanding. It's not the Jim Jones kind of thing, where you follow the leader and drink poison Kool-Aid and everybody dies. That's the worst connotation of faith, and I'm not talking about anything like that.

Here are two different definitions of faith I've read in various commentaries. One is the drive toward that which cannot be described—that yearning, the drive toward truth, toward whatever you want to call it. The second is that faith is confidence based on verified knowledge. You might call it verified faith. And this is really where this Vipassana practice takes us.

Faith is a kind of combination of confidence and trust. Trust that allows us to be willing to be with our experience without expectation, without need for payoff or justification, without knowing what's going to happen or having a preset idea. And confidence is the strength, the willingness, the fearlessness that lets us meet experience without any kind of promise. It's what lets you sit here and be with an unbearable pain in your knee. There's no promise that anything wonderful is going to happen from that. But there's some confidence and some trust that allows one to do that. Hopefully it's not blind faith. Hopefully it really begins to come from our own verified experience—confidence based on verified knowledge. But knowledge here means intuitive knowledge, not the kind of knowledge I grew up valuing as the highest truth, as the point of safety and the place of finding self-worth and self-value.

I don't know about you, although I imagine many of you, given the training you've had and the jobs you do, have spent a lot of your life acquiring certain sets of knowledge—even just going through regular school. I was really very good at it. I could take in whatever things I was supposed to know: reasons, facts, ways to do things, explanations for what the universe was. Take it in, memorize it, internalize it, spit it out. But also, unknowingly, taking that knowledge as a view of the world—and even more, as a kind of security, a resting place. If I have knowledge, a way to describe a certain event or experience, if I can go out in the woods and name the animals and the trees and the weather patterns and what kind of clouds, then I feel like I have a certain kind of safety, a certain kind of security, someplace to rest.

Sometimes this sense of a body of knowledge—which can certainly be very useful; I'm not talking about throwing out all knowledge—becomes a bastion against insecurity. A way to avoid having to live and dance in what's actually true: the constancy of unknowing, the fact that we never know what's going to happen, even in the next moment. For me, and I'm probably not the only one, certain sets of knowledge can really serve as a comfort, but it's a way to hide. Even without wanting to use it that way, with that sense of security, we really can identify with the knowledge, and it blocks our potential or our willingness to perceive other possibilities, to open to another possibility at all.

There's a story the Buddha told that illustrates this. A widower, a poor peasant, had a young son and lived in a small village of huts. The father had gone away for the day, and while he was gone, some bandits came and destroyed the village, burned all the huts, killed the people. But they kidnapped his son and took him away. The father comes back, finds everything destroyed, finds some bones he thinks are his son's. He weeps, so distraught, so upset, certain this is what happened. He took the ashes and wore them in a little bag around his neck, and was just devastated, unable to recover.

Rebuilt his house and was living, but was just totally miserable—yet had totally bought the story that this is what happened. That became knowledge: these bandits came, destroyed the village, killed my son.

And at some point his son escaped. Late at night, he came back to the village, found the hut, was banging on the door, calling, "Father, Father, let me in." But the father was so caught in his description of what had happened as being truth that he yelled down, "Don't mock me, my son is dead, this is so painful." The boy kept calling, "Father, let me in." And the father couldn't open to the possibility that maybe he was wrong—to the point that he went down and shooed his son away, and they never saw each other again.

It's a heart-wrenching, exaggerated story. But it makes the point of how locked we can get in knowledge, in what we think is a true description. It blinds us to being able to even explore—to even stick his head out the window and say, "Oh yeah, maybe it could be my son, let me check it out."

This is what we're doing all the time. Assumptions of who we are, what Joseph was talking about last night in our assumptions of time, our assumptions of past and future, our assumptions of body—all of that keeps us locked in.

What this quality of faith offers—the confidence to meet what's happening with a trust to enter it unknowing, really fully—is that it lets us meet experience freshly.

What I've found in my practice, and in talking with other people, is that I've approached it wanting to find the answer. What's the truth? I'm basically looking for another explanation, for another set of knowledge, because that's what the mind knows how to do. I think, well, okay, maybe this understanding isn't right, but if I find another perfect explanation, then I can rest in that.

But the more I look, with just the simplicity of mindfulness, into the knowledge we have, the more it seems to break apart. And instead of more answers, we find more mystery.

Here's something from the New York Times a couple of years ago—I just saw an update recently and it hasn't changed that much—from the science section. It's talking about the largest galaxy ever detected, whose discovery was announced last week, which includes more than 100 trillion stars and measures more than 6 million light-years in diameter. The galaxy is 60 times the size of the Earth's galaxy, the Milky Way. Big, big.

This newfound galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump of galaxies, a cluster of some 1,000 galaxies called Abel 2029. We had to name it. What is naming a clump of 1,000 galaxies? What does that do? Do we somehow own it? Do we have it under control or something?

Anyway, this is just leading up to the point. The astronomers hope that further study will provide clues to the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter. Since there doesn't appear to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the huge gravitational forces that would seem necessary to cause all this clumping of galaxies, scientists propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that elude detection because it emits no radiation. And according to their prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe consists of this missing mass.

It's like us. It's the same, actually. What did Joseph say? All our matter is not the size of a particle of dust. But we can't just take that on word value. It's funny, but it doesn't mean anything until we verify it ourselves.

What we need is the faith, the willingness to try, that will keep bringing our attention into our experience—to really look, to really meet it, to really be willing to open into the possibility of the unknown.

And of course, since this faith is based on our verified experience, when you first come to a retreat like this, your first retreat, you can't have that kind of verified experience. The question often comes up: what got you here the first time? It comes up in my mind for anybody who comes on a first retreat.

But there's a quality talked about, that before there can be verified faith, there's a quality of mind called bright faith. In some way, something in us is lit up by a quality we experience in someone else. It might be someone you talk to, and either something they said kind of lit up this something indefinable, indescribable in us that gets us to say, "Well, maybe that's worth a try." Or some quality in the person, something you read, something you observe in how certain people behave—whatever it is. Something got each one of you here.

When there's this quality of bright faith, it's like a brightness, an energetic quality of mind and a willingness to look. And if you came without that, it would really be hell.

Because it would be so hard, especially in the first few days, without something inside of us—that yearning towards what cannot be described—that keeps us looking, that keeps us coming back to the practice, beyond the reasoning intellect.

But this kind of bright faith is not sustainable. It's really based on looking outside of ourselves for verification or for strength or for confidence. And that can't be sustained when you hit a really difficult patch. When you start a retreat and your first really difficult patch comes before any kind of bright patch has arrived, it's really hard, because there's no personal experience yet to give us the confidence with which to meet this, to trust that it's somehow worthwhile.

So this bright faith is going to shift. It's not sustainable. It's going to waver. It's going to fade away. When you hit that space of, "Why did I come here? It's so dreary. It's so controlled. There's so much suffering." That bright faith is really fading, and it fades fast sometimes.

But luckily, I have so much real trust in just the truth of things—that if we simply have enough willingness to keep meeting our experience with freshness, it begins to open up. And in some way we begin to experience for ourselves various aspects, not just of what we've been talking about, but of the truth of how things are.

Just one little experience of sitting with pain, and then seeing that you can just be with it, and all the fear and all the aversion either fades, or you see the difference between the aversion and the pain, and you see that the pain itself is not suffering. Even if it's just for a second, that is an insight, a sense that things are different from how they seem on the surface. And even such a moment can somehow energize us for days, which is lucky, because sometimes we just get a couple of little moments of insight like that, and many more moments of being caught in the seemingly ordinary way our mind has of relating to experience. Because that seemingly ordinary, normal way has been conditioned throughout our entire life, so much more deeply.

What I have deep trust in is that actually the power of truth is so recognizable when we touch it, in whatever form. It's just so obvious, somewhere in our hearts, in our beings, that this is what's true, that it's truer than our ordinary ways of relating. One moment of truth is more than enough to really light up days of seeming to struggle in the mire.

One of my teachers said that a spark of truth can burn up a mountain of lies. It's not like we have to have equal time somehow.

So what begins to happen—and it will happen uniquely for each person—is that you begin to have experiences that somehow show us our ordinary assumptions, which we might not have even known we had, aren't exactly accurate. And it gives us the strength and the courage and the trust to keep going, to meet the new experience with a faith that doesn't need to know what's going to happen.

Gradually, what this quality of faith I'm trying to describe enables us to do, or opens us to, is to much more consciously be able to enter into each moment knowing that we're entering totally into the unknown. Maybe when you came on this retreat there was a sense of that. Somewhere in the unknown—"I don't have a clue what's really going to happen here. It's something I've never done." But what's actually the case is that this is true of every moment of our life. We think we know.

It's funny—I'm talking about opening to the unknown in every moment, and we have this incredibly rigid schedule where almost every moment of the day is planned. If I say, "Two thirty-five, where are you going to be?" you'd answer, "Oh, I'll be in the meditation hall, sitting on my pillow." Maybe. Probably.

It blows me away when I come back from India, which is a wonderful place for much more consciously experiencing the fact that you never really know what's going to happen. No matter what I plan to do when I get up in the morning, the one thing you can be sure of is that's not what's going to happen that day. It's great for that. It keeps us off balance, but it's much truer to how things actually are.

What amazes me is coming home. After a couple of weeks, I have my day book, and I have my hours planned, and I look at it, and mostly that happens. That's what really amazes me. I can tell you where I'm supposed to be on August 15th of next year. And probably there's a good chance that might happen, which is amazing. It's really amazing. But it sustains the illusion that things are under control.

And then it stopped. I said, okay, well, that was neat. That's fine. But what didn't stop was a series of aftershocks, like every three minutes, every five minutes, for the next at least twenty-four hours. And then, with decreasing frequency, for the rest of the retreat. Where I had felt like I really handled it with great equanimity—very present, seeing things change, no attachments—those aftershocks really got to me.

Because the one thing I always felt I could depend on was the ground beneath my feet. You know, the weather might change, relationships might shift, but at least the ground stays still. And suddenly that was gone too. There was nothing solid to fall back on.

This is what practice reveals to us, again and again. We think we've let go of one thing, and then we discover we've simply transferred our sense of security to something else. It's like a game of finding the next resting place, the next solid ground. And mindfulness shows us: there is no solid ground. There never was.

This doesn't mean we live in a state of perpetual anxiety. That's not the point. The point is that our usual strategy—finding something solid, something unchanging, something we can count on—that strategy doesn't work. It never actually provided the security we thought it did. We were always living in this groundless reality; we just weren't paying attention.

When we sit in meditation and experience the body dissolving into sensations, the breath arising and passing, thoughts appearing from nowhere—we're not creating groundlessness. We're simply seeing what was always true. And there's something liberating in that, even though initially it can feel terrifying.

The question becomes: can we learn to be at ease without a resting place? Can we discover a different kind of stability—not the stability of finding something solid, but the stability of being present with what is, however it changes?

By the end of a night of aftershocks every three minutes—and of course the radio kept saying there was a twenty-five percent chance of the big one coming in the next three days, which just puts that thought in your mind, is this an aftershock or is this the big one?—by the end of twelve hours of that, my nerves were a wreck. Every time a shock would start, our heater would rattle loudly, so it couldn't just pass unnoticed. We'd hear rattle, rattle, rattle every two minutes.

I came out of that experience deeply feeling this sense of how unquestioningly I had relied on the earth to be there for me—to be solid, to be someplace I could just rest. The worst that can happen, you think, is you fall on the earth. But to viscerally get it over and over—sorry, not that one either—it really touches into this sense of anattā, of not-self, and the fear that comes from ongoing insecurity. Not quite franticness, but the mind wanting to find somewhere to land. It's not okay hanging out in nowhere, trying to take a stand.

But actually, it's not even the movement. It's not the inability to take a stand that's the problem. It's not the never knowing or the unknown. The problem is that sense of "I" that's there in the midst of the unknown—that "I" arising, clinging to whatever, positing a need for security. The aftershock's not a problem. What it's doing to me is the problem. Where am I going to find security? is the problem.

When we're just opening into the moment as it is, there's no problem. If you had even one moment today where it was just pure beingness—maybe it was hearing, maybe smelling, maybe warmth—where there was no discursive description, no trying to figure anything out, no trying to name the species of bird, just simple being—in that moment, where's the problem? There's no needing to know what's going to happen next. There's no referring back to someone it's happening to. There's no needing to know what happened before. It's just this moment. And in that, without the obsessive, ongoing referring back of every sense experience to a sense of self, with just the pure experience, there isn't any problem. Whatever needs to occur in the next moment, the next moment occurs. If some response needs to happen, that also occurs. We don't need to figure it all out ahead of time.

This sense of pure being doesn't mean—which is one of the questions that comes up a lot—if there's no self, then how am I ever going to do anything? Who's going to do things? We can talk about this sense of pure being and say, well, that's really nice, but what about if it starts to rain and there's lightning and you have to get up and go inside? Actually, the two have nothing to do with each other. There's a sense of being, and then there's a sense of being with lightning, and then there's a sense of a thought arising: It could kill me. I think I'll go inside. That could be done with or without clinging to a sense of self. It can just be clear seeing.

This sense of faith is what can, over and over, give us the confidence and trust to be willing to meet experience with this quality of not knowing. And the quality of not knowing will let us investigate—not with thinking, but with presence—in a much more open way. We look at the data freshly, so to speak, without having interpreted it before we've even perceived it.

When we begin to explore the sense of "I," of "mine"—even the thought of not clinging to something as a sense of I or mine—it can really shake up that sense of deepest resting place. I think that's why, often, whether in or out of formal practice, when in a space of awareness you touch a deep place where there's really a visceral, intuitive getting it—oh, there really isn't any me—often what comes up is fear. It's a kind of natural response to losing something we've never actually had in the first place, but something we think we had. A sense of fear, even terror, can arise.

And that's fine. We don't like fear very much, but the fear itself doesn't mean something's wrong. Often fear, as we touch it in our practice, is really more like a messenger that we're moving into unknown territory. Rather than being afraid of the fear—again, we have to have some confidence and clarity of practice—we can just meet the fear as another arising emotion, be with it, see it come, see it go. We don't have to take it as a messenger of doom. We don't have to take it as evidence that something must be going wrong. Often it means something's going really right, and we're hitting the place of our unquestioned assumptions, which are beginning to break down.

We don't always understand that rationally, but that's the process that's unfolding.

So, to begin to use our practice in this way—I find it really fascinating. It's one of the ways I truly love to explore when I'm on retreat: to consciously use mindfulness to explore the actual sense of "me" or "mine" when it's arising in a moment.

Everything I'm going to say now about exploring it comes from what I've discovered in my own investigations and in working with others. But I'm not sharing this so you'll take it as another explanation. Hopefully it will simply spark your interest to look and explore on your own. And never take any answer that your mind arrives at—"Oh, this is what the self is" or "This isn't what it is"—as a final resting place. If you can keep that interest alive, keep that childlike innocence, that trust, to keep meeting the data, keep exploring without stopping at any assumption that now you know what the self is or isn't—then you can really begin to look.

What we begin to see, what I begin to see, is that what seemed so solid and unquestioned... it's not that we're destroying the ego through our practice or getting rid of the sense of self to substitute something else. It's that we begin to see that what seemed so solid is nothing. There's nothing solid there at all. And in touching a sense of anatta—which is the Pali word for no separate self—and losing the sense of self, we don't actually lose anything. It's not like something changes and we can't function, because it's not there in the first place. It's just that our perception has been inaccurate. We're interpreting perceptions inaccurately, and that's all that's going on.

This is from a man named Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Indian sage who died in the last decade. He says: "My actual experience is not different from yours, but it is my evaluation and attitude that differ. I see the same world as you, but not the same way. Everybody sees the world through the idea she or he has of herself. As you think yourself to be, so you think the world to be. If you imagine yourself as separate from the world, the world will appear separate from you, and you will experience desire and fear."

It really is all our perceptions, our descriptions, and our imaginings—which is so hard to believe. And when we begin to really look and see this over and over, then what's truly hard to believe is how powerful these inaccurate perceptions and imaginings and descriptions are. So amazingly powerful. It takes this willingness to keep looking.

So we look, and we see that when you have this feeling of "I," of "mine"—however it manifests—it might just be the thought, "I'm really hungry." Or it might be, "I'm bored now. I wish this talk would end. I wonder what I'm going to do tomorrow. My knee hurts." It doesn't matter the content. But when we have that sense, when you notice it there, rather than focusing on the object, see if you can—and your mind needs to be somewhat quiet for this, obviously—see if you can turn your attention back on that "I" or "mine." The actual experiential feeling or thought or emotion, whatever it is. In that moment, what are you calling "mine"?

We might be focused on "I'm hungry" and actually be focused on the feeling of hunger or wanting food. But that might not be the actual sense of "I" who is hungry. Sometimes we're so accustomed to that "I" feeling, it just seems like it's always there, so we overlook it. When your mind is a little quiet, it can be really wonderful—I really love this—turning around the attention and seeing, "Well, what is 'I'? Who is 'I'?" I don't mean investigating with thought, but with this sati, this mindfulness, that just lands right on that feeling of "I" to see what it actually is.

We begin to see that the sense of "I" or "mine," the birth of self, is arising and passing moment to moment. There isn't anything lasting that we thought was unchanging. Buddhadasa, the renowned Thai meditation master, says: "The self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind." That's all it is. And in my experience so far—which I've not come to the end of—so far that's really true.

So when there's that sense of "I"—"I'm hungry. I want this. This hurts. I want this to go away"—turn around and see what experience is being grasped and clung to.

Don't even assume it's being grasped and clung to because I say it. Turn around and feel and see for yourself.

Every time that sense of "I" arises, there's a moment of sense contact. Maybe there's a smell. There could be a grasping at that smell. There could be a thought: "Mmm, smells like pizza." And then there could be another thought: "Oh, I'm really hungry." So there's grasping arising with that sense contact. Turn the attention not to the thought of the pizza, but to the "I," and see what it's landing on.

What I find is that each time I do this, it's a different actual momentary experience that is somehow being interpreted as "I." For example, when I say "I'm talking right now," there's this sense of "I." I turn toward my experience, and it's a sort of very vague physical sensation that I can't even quite locate. Sometimes it could be an image. Sometimes it could be an actual sensation of pain. Sometimes it could be a thought. I have a friend who said that often when he'd turn toward his sense of "I," it was as if he had this very subtle mental image of his face, and that would be "I," as if experience was coming out of that. I'm just giving examples—it could be anything.

But turning and looking, what's been really liberating for me is that each time it's something different. There isn't, so far, some thing there, or some emotion, or some experience, or some anything that's "I." And that's what gets really fascinating—to begin to see. If you can see it, if it's something that one can experience right away, it's an arising and passing phenomenon. There's no continuity to it. There's no ultimate solidity. It's clearly not self. So just beginning to explore in this way.

Classically, and Joseph spoke about some of these last night, in Buddhist psychology they talk about what makes up a person, so to speak—the different aspects of experience around which there tends to be this clutching, this identification, which is really just a contraction of grasping around an experience. There are five aspects, the five aggregates, which make up all our experience. These are what we tend to land on as "I" in any given moment.

There's the body, which Joseph mentioned last night, which is obvious—sensations in the body, the whole sense of our body as a whole. What I've found more subtle, which isn't actually body but which I think of as body if I don't look carefully, is the image of the body. There might be a sensation, and over that, subtly, there's an image of me. There's a sense of identification, of grasping—"me," "my," "mine"—and that's "I" in that moment. It can be very subtle.

Often as I'm sitting, there's just sensation and there's no sense of self, no sense of body. It's as if sensations are coming and going in a vast space of awareness. And then there's this subtle background image of my body sitting here—just an image of this body. Not seeing that, in that moment for me, it becomes a sense of Carol, a sense of self. It's as if it's a container placed over an experience that has no containment and no location, but it gives a false sense of container. That's just something to look at.

The second aspect of experience that often becomes the grasping point of self is what is called feeling tone. The other night I spoke about how each sense experience we experience as either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, which can come quite subtly. Usually from pleasant we move right away to wanting more, from unpleasant we move to aversion, and from neutral to spacing out. But often we don't notice that feeling tone because it's quite subtle. This is one of the five aggregates that makes up what a human is—one that we easily fail to notice, that we identify with, that we cling to.

Say there's a pain in the knee, and it's unpleasant. You might really be looking at it, mindful of sensation, really seeing the sensation, and there's not a sense of "I'm that sensation." But somehow there's a real sense of involvement and self-identification there, and you can't quite figure out where. You're clear you're not the pain. Often the clutching is around that subtle feeling of unpleasantness, of pleasantness, of neutrality. I mention this as something else to notice. It creates that real sense of separation. Sometimes we don't notice that feeling at all.

The third aggregate, which Joseph also mentioned last night, is consciousness itself—the knowing faculty, which seems ever-present and very subtle.

And that is easy. I think in some ways that's the last one we identify with. It's the most subtle and the most difficult to see as separate from me. I know hearing. I know that I'm paying attention. I know that there's unpleasant feeling. I know that there's awareness. It's easy to think of that as "I."

So without saying it is or it isn't, just notice if that's where this sense of I or me or mine is landing.

The fourth area is perception, which Joseph talked about again last night, and which is another really fascinating area to explore. Because we can really begin to see, sometimes in simple ways, how easily we identify with our perception, take it as true, and then how something else can come in and we can say our perception was totally whacked out. It had nothing to do with what was going on, but we would have defended it to the death. Yes, this is how it is.

Just a little example. The other night, about two nights ago, I was sleeping with the window open for the first time. And I woke up in the middle of the night with some weird stuff going on in my body. You know, that kind of weird, vulnerable, not quite—you haven't quite put all the pieces together yet—state when you wake up in the middle of the night like that. So I was just lying there. And I gradually became aware of this really loud roaring noise, just so loud coming in. First thought: well, that must be the river. But I didn't really have too much confidence in that thought, in that perception. And it just seemed to get louder and louder, with all these undertones and currents. I thought, I've been here for five days, and this is the third year I've been here. I never heard the river sounding like that. There's no way that can be the river.

And then I remembered when I was a nun for a while in Thailand and I was staying at one place that was in the forest, on a small river deep down in a gorge. And one night, all of a sudden, just like that, this tiny little river got huge. It came all the way to the top of the gorge. It flooded our whole area and it made so much noise. It was unbelievable. So I thought: either there's some weird mechanical kind of plane or tank coming in here, or this river is flooding, and it must be totally up to the porch by now.

And I was absolutely convinced of that, because my perception was that I had never heard the river be that loud. Impossible.

So I finally went back to sleep, checked it out in the morning, walked out. Of course, the river's really loud. I mean, it's been there all along, really loud. I just never noticed it before. Now I can't walk down the road without hearing the river babbling. It's really there. It's really loud. I would have sworn on a stack of Bibles or whatever that that river never made a noise like that before.

So just that willingness to check our perceptions, and where we can be so sure and so identified, and we can be so wrong. That's what we're doing.

And the last area is everything else. I sometimes think that's kind of how the Buddha did it—all these categories, and then there's one that sort of lumps in so much. It's called mental formations. So it includes what we're doing today in the instruction: intention.

Intention is a really interesting one, because you can see how subtle it is. Intention to move, intention to do something, intention to direct the mind in a certain way, intention to come back to the breath, intention to move to hearing. And it's so easy to feel like, that's me. Well, who's meditating? Who's paying attention to the breath? Where does this intention come from, if not from me?

It's a very subtle place of investigation. So again, just look and see when you identify with the intention. If that's you, then where are you when the intention goes away? Sit there and notice the intention to scratch your eyes, like Fred was saying. If that was you, then during those ten breaths when you didn't scratch, you were gone, right? And then you come back again, if that's how intention is us.

But explore it. And that's where I mean don't stop. We turn to intention.

It feels so much like us, there can be a tendency to stop really looking. And then we move into, "Of course it's me. What else could it be? And where could this intention come from?" And we're back into that spinning mind of doubt again. So exploring intention is essential.

The other aspect I want to mention of mental formations is, of course, our old friend thought. Thought is really something. Sometimes we can see thought, obviously—it's a lot of what our practice is. But because it can come so often, and we get so used to it, we sometimes don't notice that the thoughts can turn into an ongoing commentary that is actually making up our sense of self. We're kind of describing ourselves to ourselves as we go through the day, telling ourselves different stories. If you stop and look, you might be telling yourself a lot of different stories about yourself. In a way, we're making it up as we go along.

But if we don't notice thought, there's this identification with certain ones. For instance, some might go through—"Wow, I'm really doing good. I'm really a far out person." Those kind of go by maybe. We don't really identify with them too much. Another one comes up: "I am such a schlump. I'll never be able to do this right. I'm too tight. I'm too this. I'm too that. I'm a failure." Those ones we might really buy into and believe and carry around, just like everything we do—telling ourselves, "I don't wash the dishes right, I made a big clanging noise when I was serving myself, everybody was looking at me, I'm not working mindfully enough, I'm moving too much in the hall." And not noticing all the times in between when these thoughts aren't happening, when there's no sense of self at all, but stringing them together and telling ourselves this self story—it gets really solid.

One time, a couple years ago, I was on a two-month retreat, and it got really clear to me. I had just seen a movie just before the retreat, which—if you can avoid that, or listening to music just before a retreat, I'd advise avoiding it unless you want to really watch the replays for a long time. So I had seen The Fugitive. At least it wasn't too bad of a movie—it could have been worse. But I'd be sitting there and I'd be getting flashes of scenes and dialogue and this and that of the fugitive, not of course in order, jumping forward and back in time.

And then after a while, it hit me. That would go for a while, and then it would switch, and the Carol movie would come on, and there would be flashes of memory and future planning and images of myself and things that happened, forward and back in time. At some point, it hit me. It wasn't like they were correlated, like a simile. They were exactly the same. There wasn't any difference. It wasn't that the Carol story was more real at that moment than the flashes of memory from The Fugitive. Not at all. It was just images coming up and thoughts. But there were particular ones that there was a sense of grasping, a sense of identification around. And so I made that Carol. I didn't think I was, you know—I can't remember his name—but I didn't think that was who I was. I knew that was a movie.

Well, guess what? So's the other.

It doesn't mean that I don't know what happened in the past and that I can't relate. But in that moment, what was really happening was just images arising, thoughts arising, emotions arising, and passing. And whether it was about Carol or what's-his-name, it really wasn't any different.

And that's what we're doing all the time. We're telling ourselves stories. There's thoughts. We don't notice which ones we clutch at and make a story of and the other ones that go by. So pay attention. See which ones

You grasp at a sense of self around certain thoughts while others simply pass by. Just because there's a grasping sense of self around some thoughts doesn't necessarily make them true. I want to point that out.

In fact, often—not with everybody, but for many people I talk to in retreats—the tendency can be to really identify with the negative ones, the negative self-images, the ways we're not good enough, our failings. And if something beautiful happens or we have some beautiful experience, and a thought arises, "Well, I'm really a very kind person," the mind comes in right away: "Don't get too carried away with yourself. Remember when you did this? You didn't give that." And we think, "Oh yeah, that's right. Thank you for bringing me back to truth." Because we're buying into a particular story.

It's all just thoughts. Imagine the freedom, the spaciousness, of not having to grasp and solidify around any of them.

This is another way we can approach exploring the sense of self. The way I've been talking is really the way of precision—being with the breath with precision, bringing your attention precisely into the experience of "I" or "mine." We can also approach it from the way of spaciousness, somewhat like being with hearing. At times we tune into whatever word you want to use—spaciousness, awareness, or emptiness, which is really the more classic term. Things arise and pass. Emptiness doesn't mean nothing is happening, but it's empty of clinging, empty of aversion and grasping, empty of self. And in that openness, without looking for anything—just as Joseph was describing with cars going by, not looking for anything—when the sense of grasping arises, the sense of clinging, the emergence of self, you really can't help but notice it when you're attuned to the emptiness.

I'll give an example. One time I was on a self-retreat in a really lovely spot in California. I was sitting high up on a hill, just as you were doing today, hopefully—just sitting and being aware with my eyes open. Nothing particular, just spaciousness and peace and everything coming and going. Really beautiful, no thoughts of "me," just presence.

Some turkey vultures came flying out, really close because I was so high up. "Oh, that's far out." There wasn't really any clinging, just "that's far out"—another arising experience, spaciousness, peace. Of course, somewhere in it a thought arose: "This is really far out. I'm so empty, I'm so spacious." But that came and went too.

More turkey vultures came, and they started circling. All of a sudden they were circling right over me, getting closer and closer. And suddenly the thought arose: "I'm the thing they're circling. They think I'm dead." I had this moment of genuine panic. It only lasted a moment, but it took everything I had not to stand up and scream, "I'm alive! I'm alive!" It was really interesting.

In that moment, the emptiness, the spaciousness, the no-sense-of-self, the real freedom and ease—it vanished, just like that. Total contraction. Solid sense of me and other, fear, something to do. That's how it is.

When we're letting ourselves attune to the emptiness, when it's present, we can notice it. Sometimes we can't—there's just too much going on, too much clinging, too much stuff. But other times, when it's quieter or there's not a particular identification with anything, we can open up and really let ourselves tune in to the emptiness. Get comfortable with it.

Buddhadasa talks about this often as a way of practice. It's not like we're in total silence, complete cessation of all suffering—I'm not talking about ultimate enlightenment. Just inclining toward emptiness. As he says, we experience many, many moments of this emptiness in our ordinary day-to-day life. Often we just don't notice them, but we can begin to incline our awareness toward them. Not to do anything, not to be "me," not grasping—just to get more comfortable, more content with that ease, with that emptiness.

In that spaciousness, when the sense of grasping at some experience arises and the sense of self is born in a moment, it's really quite obvious. It's not something we have to fight; it's just really interesting to see how it can go from a moment of total ease to a moment of complete panic and fear that I'm going to be attacked by turkey vultures. And the next moment, it can all dissolve again.

So really seeing the arising and passing of this sense of self, not being content to stop anywhere, but keep exploring—watch it come, watch it go.

And in each experience of that, the old conditioning, the old assumptions begin to weaken. And without logically knowing it, we begin to experience much more of an ease with what comes and goes in our life, with what comes and goes in our emotions, with what comes and goes as experience. Just an ease in the dancing with things.

It's not that stuff disappears, but it's that sense of I, that constant self-referencing that begins to ease—that we don't take so seriously, that we see through altogether. And in that comes a real sense of joy and dancing.

I just want to end with this from a Tibetan Lama:

Happiness cannot be found through great effort and willpower, but is already there in relaxation and letting go. Don't strain yourself. There's nothing to do. Whatever arises in the mind has no importance at all, because it has no reality whatsoever. Don't become attached to it. Don't pass judgment. Let the game happen on its own, springing up and falling back without changing anything, and all will vanish and reappear without end. Wanting to grasp the ungraspable, you exhaust yourself in vain. As soon as you relax this grasping, space is there—open, inviting, and comfortable. Nothing to do, nothing to force, nothing to want, and everything happens by itself.

So let's just do nothing.

CHAPTER 277

Mindfulness In Action

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this practical talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most common questions meditators face: how does the precise, concentrated mindfulness developed on retreat transfer into the complexity of daily life? She introduces the Buddha's teaching on clear comprehension (sampajañña), the essential corollary to mindfulness that expands awareness beyond microscopic attention to include the whole context of our actions, speech, and relationships.
>
> Wilson emphasizes the crucial role of intention (cetanā) as the seed of karma and the moment of genuine choice in our lives. She explores the paradox articulated by Padmasambhava: holding a view "as spacious as the sky" while attending to intentions "as fine as grains of barley flour." Through personal stories—including a challenging self-defense course and her unexpected path to teaching—she illustrates how connecting with our deepest aspirations can guide difficult decisions and transform our relationship to action.
> The talk offers practical guidance on expanding mindfulness to include skillful means: recognizing how weather, energy levels, and circumstances affect our mental states; speaking what is true, useful, and timely; and breaking down the walls between "practice time" and "non-practice time." Wilson encourages practitioners to ask: What aspects of life do I consider outside my practice? She suggests simple methods—feeling the breath during phone calls, using bells or environmental sounds as reminders—to weave presence throughout ordinary activities, ultimately imbuing all of life with profound meaning.

Sometimes when I'm just walking down here from our little house, being with the beauty and the expansiveness, the feeling is just so complete and wonderful and mysterious. I was just feeling that now, and I had to say it. It's so hard to come and speak a lot of words, as if somehow the words are trying to point to something that is so ineffable. Sometimes it seems like a real dichotomy.

What I want to speak about tonight is hopefully going to be of practical help in developing and noticing the expanded quality of awareness, of mindfulness. That's what's really important to us when we leave here—in our daily activities, when we're involved in the world of action, of choice, of decisions, of so much coming at us. One of the questions that comes up a lot is: how does this precision with the breath, this being in such quietness, transfer? How is it going to help us? Of course it helps us, but it's not the whole picture.

There are some corollary aspects to mindfulness that we've been alluding to. This isn't going to be new information, but I want to bring it out more clearly because it helps to give conscious attention to these areas in our daily life. In fact, it's what makes this practice really deepen and begin to extend as tendrils throughout all of our activities.

As is fortunate in Theravada Buddhism, everything is broken down into lists and nice, convenient ways of talking about it. It's actually very helpful for remembering because it was an oral tradition for five hundred years, so it seems like that was a helpful way for people to remember.

The corollary to mindfulness—which is bare attention, this nonviolent, open, accepting, clear attention—and concentration, which is that steadiness of mind that connects, the corollary to mindfulness is what usually translates as clear comprehension. Mostly, when the Buddha talks about mindfulness, he would always talk about mindfulness and clear comprehension together.

Clear comprehension, in the various ways I'll point to it, is basically about expanding out of the microscopic experience—not abandoning that, but expanding out of it to the whole context within which we are speaking, acting, being, relating. At first, it doesn't always feel like mindfulness because we're used to that microscopic concentrated form. When you leave here, one thing we don't guarantee much, but one thing I can guarantee is that over time, that microscopic clarity and concentration will go. That's one of the few things we can guarantee. So if that's what we're thinking of as what mindfulness is, and the only way for wisdom to arise in our life, then we're going to be really frustrated and disappointed. It's an important piece, but it's not the whole piece. Even so, we never abandon this piece of the clear seeing, the mindfulness.

The first aspect of this clear comprehension, coming into the world of action, of speech, of choices—and this we've spoken of, but I want to highlight it—is beginning to pay very conscious attention to the experience of our intentions in our speech, in our action. I can't express enough how vital to transformation awareness of intentions can be. It's absolutely crucial. It can change the whole way we relate to our lives.

As Joseph has said often, intention is the seed through which an action has the karmic results for ourselves of being either wholesome—leading to freedom from suffering, to happiness, to peace—or unwholesome, bringing more suffering on ourselves.

But there's a paradox when we talk about this and look at the way we've been practicing here on retreat, where we say: sit or walk, be fully present with whatever arises—wholesome, unwholesome, love, mindfulness, rage, murderous rage, self-hatred, anxiety, fear, joy—they're all the same. Be with them, open to them, don't try to change them. Watch every thought come and go. No thought is more important than any other.

It's pretty natural out of this for questions to arise: well, how do you act? How do you make any choice? What about social activism? What about affecting change in the world if this is the attitude we bring to every experience?

On one side, that's the attitude of wisdom. As Joseph said last night, there are the two sides: wisdom and compassion. That's the wisdom of really seeing the emptiness of things. Where these arising states of mind, especially mental states, do make a huge difference—where they do start to matter—is when a mental state, a mental factor is arising that brings about and informs an intention to speak or act. A thought of anger can come and go. Or a thought of anger can come and give rise to the intention: I'm really going to let that so-and-so have it.

And you can say it, and then you can actually go and do it. So that's more than a passing thought. It's turned into an action. It's become the intention for an action that could bring suffering both to ourselves and another person.

So we have this paradox: nothing matters, and every intention that arises in our heart and mind matters totally in that moment.

There's a saying I find beautiful from Padmasambhava, who is the founder of Tibetan Buddhism, you could say. He expresses this paradox: "Though my view is as spacious as the sky, my actions and my respect for cause and effect are as fine as grains of barley flour."

How do we hold both of those? A view as spacious as the sky—non-judging, non-grasping, non-clinging—and at the same time, such attention, such respect for the intentions leading to action, and such respect for the consequences of acting from either wholesome or unwholesome motivations.

If we didn't have the spacious view, it would be easy to get either incredibly judgmental with ourselves when our intentions aren't so hot, or to fall into a kind of fear of hell—you know, if I did too many bad things, I'm going to go to hell. If you read some of the Tibetan texts, they talk very graphically in those terms. But it doesn't have to be this kind of dread or panic. Rather, it's a real respect that if we act in ways that come from anger, from fear, from hatred, from greed, from delusion, somewhere those results are going to manifest in our own heart and mind, if not outwardly.

And so this willingness, this ability, this interest to bring mindfulness to intention—this is the crucial point where we actually have a choice, where we can affect change in the way we are in the world, in our actions, and in the way we relate to ourselves and other beings. It's the moment of choice. It's the moment of potential transformation.

Without awareness of intention, it can seem that we're just acting habitually, reactively, out of control. If I have a temper and certain things make me angry, it just comes up, I say the thing, I feel bad later, and I keep repeating that cycle over and over. There's no freedom in that. There's no transformation in that. I feel bad later, tell myself I won't do it again. But when the next time happens, without mindfulness, there's no choice, no sense of being able not to do it again.

When there's that moment of noticing the intention, there's a moment of seeing: Ah, that's not so helpful. That would lead to suffering. Maybe I won't do it.

This is called mindfulness wisdom, satipaññā. The mindfulness with which we can notice our motivation, and the wisdom that tells us this might lead to suffering for myself and others. It can just be an intuitive sense—it doesn't have to go into words like that. Maybe it's not such a good idea. Maybe I'll just zipper my mouth and walk out the door before something else comes out of it.

Now, as we've noticed, we gave the instruction to pay attention to intention the other day. And as some people have said, "Forget it, I haven't even noticed that." It's very subtle at times—that sense of just about to. But often, and in daily life you might notice it more this way, intention can manifest as thought. Like what I just said: "I'm going to really let that so-and-so have it." It's a thought, but it's the manifestation of an intention of anger or vengeance or rage. We can use the content of those thoughts to give us a clue about the intention, because the intention actually informs that thought.

If we don't notice the intention, it'll rise again more strongly and lead to speech. And an even stronger intention leads to action.

So we practice having that moment of choice. The mindfulness practice we do here might seem a little like a mindfulness exercise. You itch, you notice the intention, you tell yourself don't lift your arm—and the next thing you know, you're scratching it. You don't know how that happened. Another time you notice the intention, tell yourself don't lift your arm, and then you catch it, as Fred said, halfway up.

That's huge. That's huge, because that moment of catching is the moment of potential for mindfulness wisdom to come in, for us to have a choice.

I hope this leads to understanding why, when we're faced with action, when we're faced with a difficult situation—and of course it's more complicated with difficult situations—but when we have to act, why is it important to be present? Because if we're not present, we might act quite easily, and it might be that the actions are effective in the outer world, getting the result we think we want. But the reactions might actually be increasing pain to ourselves.

I might be getting in big trouble bringing this up as an example, but what if you had a toxic waste dump in your backyard and it was going to hurt your child?

And that's a real situation. Mindfulness doesn't mean we sit and be aware of our feelings, aware that things came about due to causes, acknowledge it's not personal, and conclude there's nothing to do. So what if it hurts our child? It hurts it, but that's what's happening. No—it doesn't stop there.

Mindfulness gives us the opportunity to sit, notice the whole situation, and also notice the emotions that arise in us, the intentions to act that emerge from it. And we can see: there might be what seems like a very good course of action. Perhaps we would move, perhaps we could go and really give hell to the people who created the toxic waste dump, perhaps we can motivate a whole big cause to clean it up—whatever. But if we can keep paying attention also to our own emotions and intentions, we might do the same action in vastly different ways.

We could do what seems like it would effect change out of rage, panic, vengefulness. We might go to the people responsible for the dump and just blast them, hate them, or try to change them out of a really strong will. And first of all, we'd probably be met with a similar kind of energy. But even without that, acting from such deep anger or panic or fear is really harming ourselves. It's like bringing in such a darkness. It's making it easier for us to act from anger, to act from hatred, to act from fear in the future—even if it seems to get helpful results.

Being aware of the intention doesn't mean we don't have to act. But sometimes we can just sit and be with the anger, be with what's happening, and give it time. We can use the wisdom to see if we can find a way to consciously connect with the humanity—as much as Joseph mentioned in his talk last night—to not just act from our immediate reactions, but to find a way underneath. To act from more serenity, from more calm. To find some sense of common humanity with the people we're needing to work with, and see if we can work from a different motivation.

I'm not saying it's easy. And these things are incredibly complex. I'm not trying to say it's simple. But these moments of paying attention—only if we're present do we have the opportunity to act from the wisdom that grows from mindfulness. And to act from a different intention transforms our lives. It's what purifies our conduct. It's what purifies our mind. It's what really—and I'm only speaking for myself now—one of the main aspirations of meditation practice: to really transform myself from a person who tends to act from greed, from hatred, from delusion, to someone who acts with much more awareness, with connection, with compassion. That's the place I have to start before I feel like I can expect that from anybody else in the world.

And we do have a choice—much more than we think. Different intentions may arise, but when we have that awareness and the willingness to look, we do have a choice of how we act. It's quite amazing how much choice we have. Again, I'm not saying it's easy. And sometimes I'll deliberately pick situations to explore that: to see if I can take really decisive, effective action without coming from the habits of rage or the habits of anger. Personally, I find that very difficult.

A couple of years ago, I signed up for a self-defense course for women called Model Mugging. Extremely intense. I know—I can tell you the reasons why, but when I look back now I can't believe I did it. It's set up in five or six sessions, each five or six hours long, deliberately so that it's really intense. It's really meant to push you to the limits of your capacity in whatever way. It's called Model Mugging because they have these guys all dressed up like they're the muggers, with padding all over them—giant padded helmets, padding everywhere. Because what you're taught to do is specific moves: kicking, gouging, all of this. I know, it's intense. But you have to do it at full strength. That's why these guys are so padded—so that you actually have to pull out of yourself the energy it would require to repel an attack.

The reason I consciously told myself to do it—this might seem really bizarre—was that I noticed fear of violence would come up in situations where it was completely uncalled for, just from my conditioning as a woman. I don't even have a history of violence, and I still have this fear that's very ingrained. I would notice that this fear would actually get in the way of my feeling connection and compassion with other people. Walking in the city, I'd see a homeless man and the fear would come up and block my sense of common humanity, my willingness to go over and meet him. I really didn't like that. I wanted to do something to change it. So I chose this course.

I really went into it trying to see if I could find the place of acting very fully without coming from rage or fear. I'm not saying I found that, but it was a very interesting exercise. And I found out later, talking to a friend who did the same course in another state, that the teachers I had actually weren't so skillful because they didn't emphasize that. For my friend, they really emphasized finding that place—when the attacker would come and you'd have certain things you're supposed to do, but they might break out of the script.

So it wasn't really always just scripted, and you had to respond spontaneously. In her class, they really emphasized finding—not coming from terror or anger, not immediately just flailing—but really finding the still place inside that wasn't affected by that terror or anger. Just being patient and watchful, and then responding like a coil spring. The energy comes out and you respond, but it's not hatred or anger. It's just what you need to do to defend yourself. You stop as soon as that's done. You don't keep wailing on the guy. You stop and go call the police. That's how they teach it.

Mine, on the other hand—you get in a circle at the first class and the teacher says, "All right, let's go kick ass." I thought, "Oh, I don't know if I'm in the right place here."

It was an interesting experience. I still think it's possible. I found once in a while, because I wouldn't really get angry—I didn't have that—but I would sometimes get afraid. And I would find that action would come out quite spontaneously. I'm not sure I found the place of real clear decisive action in the face of something that's clearly inappropriate and wrong without it coming from anger. I certainly never felt compassionate toward the guys, I have to say that. But I still believe it's possible, and finding ways in our life to activate that—not just assuming it's too much and we can't do it.

At any rate, in any particular situation when we're confronted with choices and decisions, learning how to tune into intention, noticing how it manifests in you, knowing that it often won't be obvious. Sitting here and there's the intention to scratch an itch—that's sort of obvious, although we often don't even actually notice what's fueling that intention, whether it's desire, whether it's aversion, whether it's restlessness. But it's not a huge big deal.

In life, however, there could be layers of subtlety of intention. For example, at work someone asks you to take on another responsibility even though you feel overloaded, and you agree. Do we notice what the intention is behind it? It could be many things. It could be a real willingness, a real dedication to the bigger picture. It could be total codependence and trying to take care of everyone else, even if you burn out in the process. It could be fear of what people would think, or protecting our self-image, or trying to be the perfect person in all ways. It could be a lot of things.

Some of those intentions won't be conscious to us at first. If we have tendencies of personality or mind that we haven't quite let come up into the light yet, we might not notice them. And so that's what the more clear mindfulness practice is about. Working with intention takes a lot of clarity, but also a lot of honesty. It's not about trying to make ourselves look good to ourselves. It's not about pretending I'm acting from compassion when I really wish this person would drop through a hole in the ground. It's about being really honest and not judging that.

This is where we go back to the spaciousness of awareness. If I want to be compassionate but really I hate this person's guts, it's to be really honest about that without any judgment. And in that honesty, that's the place where we can see the painful, unwholesome mental state. Be with it. Allow it. Don't try to change it, but not act on it. Eventually it will move off and something more profound can take its place.

In our daily life, the one other aspect of intention that I want to touch on—picking up on what Joseph spoke about last night—is intention in the macro aspect. You could call it our aspiration, a sense of our deepest, most heartfelt purpose in this life. This is also spoken of as a real beacon, a real guiding light.

When we need to make choices, we might be aware of our more immediate intention, but sometimes the intention could seem fine and we still have choices. How do we make them? Should I live in California? Should I live in Barre? Should I take this meditation course or not? Should I do this or that?

They both seem fine. Neither one's bad. Neither one's particularly harmful. Having a really clear, heartfelt sense of what our highest aspiration is can guide us through such moments. Joseph mentioned last night the bodhicitta as an aspiration—a sense of real deep commitment to awaken for the benefit of all beings. That might be an aspiration that deeply motivates us as we meet situations in our life. That might not be your aspiration. It's not that there's any one aspiration that it's supposed to be.

But what I've found has been deeply personal in the last few years: the honest tuning into my highest aspiration and really bringing it consciously into awareness, clarifying it, even verbalizing it, truly acknowledging it to myself—and not just once, but when faced with decisions—has been an enormously powerful change of motivation and actually an aspect of transformation in how I live my life, in the choices I make. It's merely bringing that intention to light, that aspiration, and honoring it. That in itself can have a powerful transforming effect, even without knowing how.

In my own experience and in talking with other people, I find often it's something we think we know—what our aspiration is—but we haven't really been quite so conscious about it, haven't quite embraced it quite so fully, honored it really, and honored ourselves by honoring that aspiration.

Another thing that people often say, and I felt myself when this first came into my consciousness: it just kind of arose from nowhere. It's like, "Oh, that's really a powerful aspiration. Who am I to think that I could live up to that?" You know, just a piece of dirt or whatever. But it's easy for that doubt to arise.

The one that first arose—and it might change as our understanding of ourselves and life changes over the years—but what first arose in my mind on a retreat was a deep sense, and it came up in words and surprised me, as though: "I want to serve the truth, the Dharma, in whatever way that needs to happen in my life." And I thought, "Oh." A real, almost a sense of shame came over me. It was really interesting—almost a shame to acknowledge that—and then all the worthlessness and all the feelings of "that's too high an aspiration for someone like you to have."

Now, if anyone else would say that was their experience, of course you'd say, "That's silly. Of course that's beautiful. Anyone can have whatever aspiration." But just to notice: there might be this kind of backlighting of our tendencies. Don't let it get in the way. Really bringing this aspiration up and then using it as a conscious reference point when confronted with confusing or difficult decisions—I found it's been amazing, really fascinating, and powerful in a way that I don't understand, sort of beyond reasoning. The honoring, the acknowledging of the intention, the aspiration itself seemed to begin to change things without my consciously trying to do anything.

So, just as a personal example again: soon after that aspiration came, I acknowledged it. I had no idea what that meant or what I should do, and I didn't try to figure it out or change anything. I was working as a manager then at our retreat center, IMS in Barre. It must have been '83, '84, I don't know. Fine, I just went back to my work, which I also felt was serving the Dharma, helping this retreat center run.

Sometime later, maybe only a couple of months—and I had no sense of wanting to teach at all. It's not sort of... let's put it this way: it's harder than not teaching. A couple of months after that, there was a weekend retreat happening in Vancouver, the other side of the country, and the teacher who was going to teach got really sick and couldn't do it. Everyone else was busy. A couple of other teachers, good friends of mine, decided I should do it, which I thought was not a good idea in any way, shape, or form. And I said no.

And these people—one of them was Sharon, actually—she's not usually pushing. She's usually, "Okay, you don't want to do it, fine." But she wouldn't stop. She wouldn't let up. She kept pushing and talking to me and telling me what to do. Another friend would call me up in California like forty-five minutes a day trying to talk me into it. So they wouldn't let me be. I kept saying, "No, no, no."

And then finally, it kind of arose in my mind: "Didn't you just acknowledge this aspiration a couple of months ago? And that it didn't matter what form it took—you were just willing to do whatever was needed?" It was kind of like Fred this morning. It was kind of like, "Oh yeah... oh yeah, I remember that. Oh yeah." And as soon as that came into my awareness, there was no choice anymore. It was obvious.

It's not that it makes the doing of it easier. Often, when I'm aware of really feeling in tune with my highest aspiration, it's sometimes the harder choice. But the attitude with which you meet the choice is totally different.

I was like a basket case going to do this retreat. It didn't make it all calm and easy. I remember hoping the car would crash on the way to the retreat—but only I would get hurt, not the guy driving—you know, stuff like that. But the attitude is really okay. This is my practice: the fear, the pain, the self-image, all this stuff. This is my practice to be with. And whatever comes up, it's whatever needs to happen. If somehow this is going to serve the truth and also help me awaken to freedom, then it's what has to happen. And it gives such a resolution, a strength of purpose and clarity to go through whatever little blips life happens to send to us.

That's just my little personal example. But what I found is it's not like that just happened once; I continue reconnecting in a really heartfelt way with what my aspiration is, really reaffirming, reconnecting. It's not just a thought, but a whole experiential dropping into what is really true, what is really most profound for me, and not being afraid of that. And it's okay if it changes too—that's how it does, you know, shift over the years. But it's a wonderful reference point for resolution, and it gives such conviction and strength to do things we would never have thought possible, because it was in service of an aspiration or a truth that is much greater than ourselves. It takes us out of personal self-referencing. It takes us out of the comfort zone for sure.

One of my little sayings I say when I find myself in this choice again is: "Do I want to be comfortable, or do I want to be free?" And as soon as that comes up—oh, yeah.

So that's something that's been really helpful to me. And again, working with intention, whether it's in the service of our highest aspiration or even just wanting to be as wholesome as possible in our day-to-day life when it doesn't seem to have a big effect—it's important to have the spaciousness to know that we're not going to always be totally right on with either wholesome intentions or totally right on target with something we do in service of our higher aspiration.

I want to share that because I spent years beating myself up every time I did something I didn't consider dharmic. If I watched some stupid show on TV for half an hour, I'd go, "Oh, half an hour! I should have been meditating. I should have been reading the Dharma. I should have been helping beings or something. Instead I watched MASH for the 55th time." Really, it was a lot of suffering, because I'd sort of do more of the thing I was dreading. It's just like here in practice: when you hate something that's happening in your mind, it keeps coming back. So I'd watch more TV because I hated the way I was feeling about watching TV. It makes a lot of sense.

Have some spaciousness. Have some kindness with yourselves and know that we're going to deviate. It's okay. Partly because there's not always awareness of our intentions, partly because the intentions are so complex, like the example I gave of taking on more stuff at work.

I used to have the impression when I'd go home to visit my parents—we have quite a good relationship—I'm really going home to really be there for them, to really spend time together. Consciously, that was my intention. That's really in line with my highest aspiration. And I'd get there, and within two nights, I'm off by myself. I'm reading. I'm watching videos. I'm doing whatever. They're there in the other room doing crossword puzzles. We're hardly speaking. And it's not angry—we're just separate. And I really did this for years. I'd go to bed, and as I'd go to bed, I'd just be filled with self-recrimination for about twenty minutes.

You know, you're selfish. You're a jerk. You come down to be with them. They want to be here with you. Then I'd go to bed. Then I'd wake up, and the next day would be just the same. Then I'd go to bed filled with self-recrimination again. I couldn't understand what wasn't matching.

And it's partly this: when we have an aspiration and we're trying to force our outer activity to match it, but there's not really either a deep seeing of what's going on in us or an acceptance of it.

So when I finally quit hating myself and just paid attention—when I was watching the video, when I was reading, when I decided to get up and leave the room with my parents—first, I could see that partly I was coming down exhausted. I had really been around people continually, and I needed some space of peace and quiet, which actually my family was giving me. They were fine that I needed that. They were offering me a gift. So I began to take that gift more and not hate myself for it.

And then, when there wasn't that tension, I found quite naturally I would turn off the video or the book and go in and sit down and chat. Because there wasn't that tension anymore. I had accepted my other intentions, and then we finally begin to harmonize much more organically with what we hold as our highest aspirations.

This sense of spaciousness, bringing it all up into the light, not just trying to meet some ideal we've made up—that will never work. We've got to include all of ourselves. And then we can harmonize much more naturally. And we must be willing to bring some consciousness into that process.

I want to share from someone who inspires me greatly. Her name is Sister Phương, or Sister Chân Không. She's the woman who works with Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen Master who was mentioned before. She has been working with him since the sixties in Vietnam, so she was also very active during the Vietnam War, simply trying to help people who were suffering from the war without taking sides, watching friends get killed, herself being thrown in jail, seeing more pain and suffering than I could ever imagine. And that was only in the sixties. She was also kicked out of Vietnam, couldn't go back because she'd probably be thrown in jail. But she's completely devoted to a life of freedom and compassion through her practice, and also one of activism—helping those who are suffering, being actively engaged in working with Vietnamese refugees, working with people in prison in Vietnam.

Having met her, I can say she's one of the most dynamic, energetic people I know. In the time I could think, "Wouldn't it be nice to do such and such," she would have done fifteen things. And there's no hierarchy in her service. She'll either spray out somebody's cabin that has spiders, or be packing boxes of medicine to send to Vietnam, or be collecting money for Vietnamese orphans, or getting up and giving a Dharma talk.

But here's what inspires me: after all these years of deep commitment to her understanding and to activism, it still doesn't come automatically that, faced with a difficult situation, she naturally responds with compassion. What inspires me is her patience and her commitment to work with this consciously.

This is a paragraph from her autobiography. She's talking about the present day, where she's working with news of arrests in Vietnam—monks, artists, nuns, people being thrown in jail. She tries to go through whatever channel she might have access to, any figure in power there, to see if she can get them out of jail:

"Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry, and I knew that I had to do walking meditation. Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities have acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

And she goes on to describe some of the changes she's managed to affect. So it's not easy, it's not simple. But if we can have a commitment to what's truly important for each one of us, that can bring the resolution and the patience to truly act in as appropriate and wholesome a way as possible—ways we might not think we could, just from sitting casually where we are.

So that's working with intentions. The second aspect of this broadening—broadening the field of mindfulness, broadening the field of awareness—is really a sense of spatial broadening. Classically, it's called working with skillful means, the clear comprehension of suitability, of what's appropriate in any situation.

What it means is this: when we're making a decision, choosing an action, we're not only looking at our own intention and its wholesomeness, but we have to locate ourselves and the situation in the context of the whole. It's really broadening mindfulness from the microscopic—how do the sensations feel when I lift my foot—to being aware that we are part of a whole situation. We can't really take ourselves separately.

Sometimes on a meditation retreat such as this, where we're really learning to develop focus, we lose sight of this aspect of clear comprehension of the whole situation. So you find people moving incredibly slowly through the doorway with forty people behind them. We run into this in the three-month course a lot—someone's just going so slowly in the food line. You just want to wake them up.

This is not where our practice is leading us. We're tuning into the whole situation and seeing that what's appropriate, totally appropriate in one situation, could be really not so appropriate at all in another situation. And so we have to bring in a real flexibility, a real adaptability. And again, this brings in wisdom. It brings in mindfulness wisdom, satipañña—mindfulness to notice what we're doing and the wisdom to see what's appropriate in the broader situation.

This highlights the wisdom of impermanence—that what's appropriate in one situation is going to be different in another situation. For example, what we played with on retreat here, talking about balanced effort: at one point your effort, the energy, might be balanced and calm. It's the morning, and there's something difficult going on, and you can just sit and go right into it. There's a calmness and you're present, and it's fine. It may not be great, but it's fine. You can be with it.

Later in the afternoon, it seems that the same painful experience is arising. You try to do the same thing, but you forget to notice that the internal conditions are totally different. The energy is really low. There's a kind of restless, distracted mind. Aversion is coming up very easily. And instead of noticing that things are impermanent, that everything is a result of cause and effect, and that the situation is different now from in the morning, calling for a different response—instead of seeing all that, we just barrel ahead. Both responses could have been undertaken with a really clear, wholesome intention. But if we don't see the bigger picture, our wholesome intention is going to be misguided because there's not the wisdom of seeing what's appropriate.

So that's a lot of what we're trying to bring out in working with skillful means in meditation. Of course, it's exactly the same in our life—seeing impermanence, seeing how we're affected by so many different causes.

One that's really interesting to me, something I've noticed a lot on retreats, is the weather. Not just the obvious—it's cold and I don't like it, or it's hot and I like it or don't like it—but very often when there's a shift in weather patterns on a retreat, like when the barometer drops as a storm's coming, there's a kind of buildup and it affects people's mental states. You just see in person after person over a day or so that there starts to be this kind of anxiety, a kind of pressure building up. And it's so rare that someone actually doesn't take it completely personally. They're finding a story to explain it, and you're saying, "Well, you know, it could just be the weather." And they say, "The weather? Are you telling me that I'm all upset, that I have this fear and this anxiety because of the weather?" We're so easy to think of ourselves as isolated and not really look at the whole picture.

When it was cold here the first couple of days—when I'm cold now, I really notice the kind of, it feels as if the cellular structure of my body changes. I'm sure that's not so, but there's a tightness, there's a resistance. I'm much more aversive. New experiences are not met with an open heart. And as soon as the sun comes out and it's warm, everything's wonderful. Whatever comes up, I'm really ready to be with. I can't really take credit for either one of those. It's just a cause and effect response.

Once I was on a retreat, an Upandita retreat. Upandita retreats give really good stories because they're so intense and you really notice any variation. About a month in—and one of the ways of practice there is to move very, very slowly, like that person in the food line, noting every sensation, every emotion, you're just really there—so it was about a month in and I was doing walking meditation in my hallway. Very slow. It was in Barre in the summer. It was very humid, and it was building up to a thunderstorm. The humidity was hanging in the air so heavily. I felt like I was walking through molasses. I could hardly lift my foot. And the insects, the birds were really still. There was just this pregnancy, this heaviness. You could hardly move. And just silence throughout the building.

And then the thunderstorm let loose, one of these all-at-once torrents of rain, from heaviness to total rain in one second. And so much energy was released, I felt like dancing down the hall.

And I would have thought it was just me, except that right at that moment I felt that change – it's a hallway with a door on either end – at each end the door just flew open, slammed open, and two different yogis, who both the last I'd seen them had been moving as slowly as I, came running down both sides of the hall. I don't know what they were doing. They kind of tore through the hall and out the other door. I thought, what? What's going on? And it was so clear. None of this is personal. We're affected by so many different conditions.

Just to begin to expand our view of cause and effect, of interrelatedness, of situation – to see that. And then we can make our choices, our decisions, a little more intentionally based on what's going on.

In speech, which is a huge area of mindfulness – wise speech, and finding the intention before we speak – I find that really tricky. But in a bigger sense, the Buddha gave the guideline for wise speech of saying what is true and what is useful, so that what is useful is tuning into the clear comprehensions. And also, I would add, finding the appropriate time. I've learned if I want to have a real heart-to-heart relationship talk or do some processing, eleven o'clock at night is really not a good time to initiate that particular occurrence. I learned this years ago, unfortunately, from many experiences. Sometimes we dance and it takes a long time. But really seeing what's appropriate – when to say something to someone when they're receptive enough to hear it, and not when I think they should hear it. And then again, looking at what's my intention. Is it coming from a sense of wanting to be useful? Is it coming from some subtle sense of wanting to get even or wanting to prove I'm right? Just really looking at all of that.

Taking in the wider circumstances doesn't deny using our really skillful mindfulness to come into experience and intention, but it means for sure remembering to widen. Not like a friend of mine who was having acupuncture and, you know, they burn moxa on you and burn it down. The way this practitioner does it, you burn it down until you just feel it burning and then you say, and he takes it off so it doesn't really burn you. My friend was lying there, noting to himself, "burning, burning, burning," but forgot to say anything. And so he really burned himself quite badly because he forgot to just speak. That's mindfulness without clear comprehension. That's not what we want to do.

Clear comprehension of the bigger situation – our interdependence, our interrelatedness, the fact that all the conditions change. You'll notice that now in retreat as we're coming to the last day of practice. I wonder if there's anyone who hasn't noticed a shift in the content of your thoughts, in the kinds of emotions that come up, in the way you relate to each other, to particular experience. I've never known a retreat where that didn't happen. I think it must be almost impossible because the conditions are slightly changing. It's not that you're losing your practice, just the conditions are changing, and then we catch it from each other.

The last area I want to mention, and skillful means brings us to it, is one that people mostly think to ask about. It's called the domain of meditation, but it really means: how do we make the meditation our life, or how do we make our life our practice? If you think of meditation not just as the sitting and walking formally here, but as the attitude of investigation and the attitude of willingness to be present, how can we bring that more fully into our life?

The two things I've been saying before have a lot to do with this – widening the scope and looking at intentions. Thich Nhat Hanh said we have walls in our mind which separate our practice time from our non-practice time. When we're practicing, we practice intensively. When we're not practicing, we practice not practicing intensively. So the trick is how to break down those walls, which are self-created. It's really an attitude.

In my mind, the question I ask is: What am I considering as somehow outside of my practice? What is either too difficult to pay attention to or too familiar to pay attention to or too boring? What part of my life do I let just run on habits? Really question this with yourself. When you go home, really see – is it taking a shower in the morning? Is it all day at work? Is it when we get in a really difficult situation and if I were to pay attention, I'd have to really acknowledge my anger and I'd rather just spit it out?

I see this a lot being with friends who practice and who can really call you on things when you're starting to get really identified. If I'm really getting identified with a point of view and anger is starting to come up, and that person can say, "Hmm, why don't you try being mindful of anger?" – I can tell if it's at that moment outside of what I want to consider practice by whether I want to strangle them or whether I'm willing to come back.

Sometimes that's the worst thing you can say to somebody when they're really caught up. "Don't you think you could be mindful of that?" Find a more skillful way. But help them, because that's what sangha is about—helping each other to wake up, not just colluding in our falling asleep, in our unwholesome patterns. That's not helping us, and it's not helping them.

Our challenge is: Where are we falling asleep? Where do we not think it's worthwhile to pay attention? And again, it doesn't mean that we can only pay attention if we're really concentrated, if the mindfulness has this sparkly, precise, microscopic quality, because a lot of times it won't. But the trick to waking up doesn't take time, and it doesn't take having all these clear qualities of mind. It simply takes remembering. Sometimes this has been called the practice of remembrance, because all we have to do is remember—oh yes, turn my attention around and come back to see what's going on with me.

If I'm sitting in a meeting, for example, paying attention to what's being said, feeling attentive, and I have a kind of generalized sense of being tuned into the whole situation—which includes me. The whole situation isn't everybody else with me somehow shut out of it. The whole situation includes me. And I can be very attentive. I'll notice, even though I'm not microscopically aware, if a feeling of anxiety arises, or a sense of anger, or somehow I just freeze or tighten up. I'll notice that that's happening.

The remembering doesn't take time. It just takes turning my attention inward and feeling that, rather than acting blindly from it. Just feel the anger. Notice it. Feel it in the body. Maybe that means I don't say anything for a minute and let other people talk. But even that can give enough space around it that I can then say something or do what I need to do with more freedom. Maybe it's almost as if here's the anger, and I sort of step over here and then act. That's how it feels to me. It's not denying it, but it's giving us again the space of choice.

When you notice something clutching or grasping in your experience, rather than resisting it, use it as a wake-up call. Turn the attention around. Pay attention. Be present.

You can find all kinds of skillful means for waking up. Thich Nhat Hanh talks a lot about a mindfulness bell—they'll ring the bell every hour, you stop and breathe three times, just come out of the craziness and be present. You can use the telephone, a clock that rings, a beeper watch, ambulance sirens. We can find all kinds of ways to remind ourselves to wake up, to just pay attention. It isn't difficult. It's just the willingness, the commitment.

Sitting every day can really set a tone. It's not that the sitting is going to be so fantastic necessarily, but it makes it easier to remember, to come back. And whatever we're doing, we can simply feel the breath. In the middle of the tenth phone call, getting more and more frantic—just stop. Feel your hand on the phone. Take three breaths. You're present. That can make a huge difference. You can do that many times in a day. It doesn't get in the way of the day. And it totally changes how we relate. We begin to find the awareness of presence in our life easily expanding outward.

You can do this with children. Thich Nhat Hanh talks a lot about this—having the place where you sit or go with the kids as a kind of breathing room.

When you're upset, or you and your spouse are upset, you say, "Okay, I'm going to go to the breathing room" before you have a fight—you go sit and be with the breath, just be with it and calm down a little bit. And then when the children see that, and they've said they want to try, you go with them. Maybe just three breaths, but gently including your whole family, including all aspects of life in a very gentle way in how you wake up.

The last thing I'll say—because I could go on about this for hours—is that there are many ways you can find to use situations to wake up. Seeing the difficult situations, rather than viewing them as a curse, if we can meet them with interest, if we can meet a difficult situation as a way to learn how to shift from habitual patterns of response to a more connected, compassionate level, it changes the whole attitude. It makes it sort of interesting.

This willingness to make every aspect of our life equally important as practice—it might sound a little daunting. But my experience is that it's not mindfulness for the sake of mindfulness, just to somehow say, "I could be totally mindful in a day." It's much more about how, for me, it imbues all the activities of life with quite a depth of meaning. Rather than just doing the mundane things to get on to something important, even the mundane activities, even washing the dishes—in this moment, this is the vehicle for really awakening, for being fully present.

Even if my aspiration is to awaken to serve all beings, washing the dishes in this moment might be the most profound expression of that, depending on how I relate. Our deepest aspiration can manifest in as many different ways as there are people. I'm not trying to find some way that looks right. Using this sense of making our life our practice—even brushing our teeth, it doesn't matter what—I find it imbues all of life with a really profound meaning. And it doesn't mean becoming a contemplative, but it means entering life much more fully.

I want to end with this little statement. This is by a Sufi person from about a thousand years ago:

The true woman or man of God sits in the midst of her fellow men and rises and eats and sleeps and marries and buys and sells and gives and takes in the bazaars and spends the days with other people—and yet never forgets God even for a single moment.

It doesn't have to be a sense of separation between the two. Whatever we do can be practice.

Let's just sit for a couple of minutes.

CHAPTER 278

Precepts: The Practice of Kindness

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers a rich exploration of sīla (conscious conduct) as far more than a foundation for meditation—it is itself a gateway to liberating understanding. Drawing on the Dalai Lama's statement that his true religion is kindness, she examines how the five precepts are expressions of loving-kindness (mettā) and our essential interconnectedness with all beings.
>
> Wilson emphasizes that the heart of ethical practice lies not in blind adherence to rules but in attention to intention (cetanā)—the volition that gives rise to speech and action. She references the Buddha's teachings from the Parinibbāna Sutta on how concentration imbued with sīla brings great fruit, and how wisdom imbued with concentration leads to complete freedom. The Eightfold Path's structure, beginning with wise understanding leading to wise intention before wise speech and action, illuminates how our conduct naturally flows from our understanding.
> Through candid personal examples—from sarcastic humor to childhood unkindness to community struggles with cockroaches—Wilson demonstrates how mindfulness makes the effects of our actions immediately visceral, removing the need for external rules. She explores the boundless nature of non-harming: where do we draw the line when our actions ripple outward to affect all beings? Quoting Thich Nhat Hanh that "mindfulness is the fundamental precept" and the Tao Te Ching on contentment, she invites practitioners to let mindful awareness naturally transform conduct into an expression of deepening realization and love.

I'm having a lot of trouble realizing that this is actually happening, this three-month course. It just feels like another day so far. It hasn't quite sunk in, the enormity of what we're all doing here together. I don't know if it's sunk into you yet. You're a little closer to it now, but not yet. You're still talking and having a good time. You have a nice sit, and it seems so pleasant. And then you go off and play again. But here we are, and it's a wonderful thing.

I want to elaborate a bit tonight on the subject of the precepts, conscious conduct, morality—the term in Pali is sīla, the term that we usually use. Let me just preface this by saying all five of us will be taking turns every night giving talks, and so you're going to hear five quite different ways of expressing the Dharma and our understanding of it and the way it comes out. And then you'll be hearing it in a hundred unique different ways of what that actually means and how it connects to your own experience. They're all quite unique. They're all a different piece of the mandala that is this expression of truth, of Dharma.

I just put that out to say: enjoy the differences, enjoy each piece of the puzzle, and if something doesn't fit for you, let it go. Don't get into a lot of time analyzing how something I said isn't quite the same as something Steve said, wondering who is right and who is wrong, when you actually think it's a third way altogether. You'll make yourself crazy, and it doesn't really accomplish anything, since analysis never gets us anywhere in this practice. Enjoy the dance, the manifestation, and if something seems like it doesn't work for you or doesn't make sense, let it go and just be here for the next thing.

The Dalai Lama has said at times that his true religion is kindness. That really strikes a profound note with me because it is seemingly, on the surface, so simple and maybe almost naive. But for me, when I really explore the aspect of our meditation practice, the aspect of working with conscious conduct, I find that to be a very profound way of expressing the truth of how we relate to life, to ourselves, to other beings.

As Joseph mentioned last night, we cultivate our meditation practice—the formal sitting and walking, the mindfulness from moment to moment—from a foundation of loving-kindness. We're cultivating through the mindful attention clarity, clear seeing of things just as they are, but this clear seeing is imbued with loving-kindness, with open-hearted connection with ourselves, with whatever experience is arising, and with a deep-seated acceptance of ourselves and of whatever experience is arising. Loving-kindness is an attitude that is really hand in hand with our Vipassana practice.

Kindness to others, kindness to the environment. Working with conscious conduct is really an outer manifestation of loving-kindness, of this attitude of kindness. It's an expression on the verbal and active level of this commitment to true kindness.

I just want to name the five precepts again, because they are part of the very basic agreement that we begin our practice here together with, that holds us together as a community. These being: the agreement not to take any life, not to harm other beings. The second one, the commitment not to take what is not freely offered. The third, for the period of the retreat, not to engage in sexual behavior; in our daily life, it's to refrain from sexual behavior that brings harm to ourselves or others or challenges or breaks in on another couple's commitment. The fourth is commitment to wise speech—not to lie, not to deceive ourselves or another, not to use harsh speech or divisive speech, and even not frivolous or gossip speech. Of course, here we're in noble silence, so that helps a lot. And the fifth, not to take drugs and intoxicants that cloud the mind, that cause heedlessness, that impair our judgment.

We say over and over that these basic five precepts, this commitment to non-harming in the most basic form, is the foundation of our practice. But I feel for myself it goes much, much deeper than simply a foundation from which we can just get this right, follow these precepts, and then get on to what's really important—concentration, the mindfulness, let's really get somewhere with our practice.

I feel that the practice of mindful attention to conscious speech and action, non-harming speech and action, is in itself a most profound gateway to liberating understanding. My speech, my action, is an actual expression of the stability and depth of my understanding of our essential oneness, of the love and compassion that is the natural expression of a free mind. By working with paying attention to how I am speaking and acting, how I am relating to the world, to others, to my environment—by nature of the quality of that attention, by the intention to understand and to purify—the depth of understanding then again grows deeper from the attention to speech and action. It's like a circle, but not a vicious circle. It's the other way, a beautiful circle.

So my religion of kindness is far from a naive or simplistic statement. In some ways, I see that it holds all the breadth and depth of the Buddhadharma, of our meditation practice, just looked at from different aspects.

The Buddha talked quite a lot about how morality or sīla, conscious conduct, is the foundation of our practice. He says in the Parinibbāna Sutta—and it's really not just one discourse, it covers a whole period of time before the Buddha's death—he says: concentration, when imbued with sīla, brings great fruit and profit. Wisdom, when imbued with concentration, brings great freedom and profit. The mind that is imbued with wisdom becomes completely free from the torments of sense desire, becoming, false views, and ignorance. It's one of those building block statements that begins with morality as the foundation for the freedom of deep understanding.

Even if we were simply to take these five precepts—not explore them very deeply, or their effect on our behavior very deeply, but simply obey them blindly as some kind of outer rule, thinking, "Okay, I have to do this to get on with my practice," or "I have to do this in order to be here," whatever reason—even with that attitude, were we to simply observe in speech and action these five precepts, it would be extremely powerful.

Imagine if we just never killed another living being. Imagine if no one ever killed another human being. Or we never took another thing that wasn't offered. It's extremely powerful.

It is said that simply by following the precepts, change will naturally arise in our mind, in our understanding. Following the precepts gives power and control to our body, to our expressions in the world, to our actions, to our speech. Some increase in purity and clarity of mind will result simply from this practice, which is obvious, I would think. And also it gives rise to stronger loving-kindness and compassion.

You can see this even when I don't really deeply feel a sense of oneness with all beings, but I still refrain from slapping that mosquito. That has an effect. It just leaves a little space where I might get more of an inkling that we're actually beings here on the same planet, that to that being, life also matters. Simply paying attention to wise use of speech can create, in my own experience, much greater harmony with others and thus a sense of harmony and peace in myself. There's a lot less processing to do if I watch my mouth. And that leaves a lot more space to pay attention to what else is going on and to begin to actually notice our essential interconnectedness.

The Buddha says frequently that by protecting others, one protects oneself. Following the precepts, adhering to these simple rules, is outwardly a way of protecting others from harm, from our unskillful actions. And in that protection of others, we're then protecting ourselves from the direct result of our unskillful actions. For example, sarcastic, angry speech usually gets something similar coming back, just in a simple, obvious way.

It protects us from the remorse of things that we've done either out of hatred or greed or simple confusion, not knowing what was really wise. And this is something you'll probably notice from time to time over the course of these three months. It commonly comes up for us on retreat. Not guilt—not saying, "I was a bad person, I should suffer"—not tormenting yourself with self-judgment and self-hatred. That might happen too. But the remorse, the sense of reliving unskillful things that we've done with awareness, really allowing ourselves to experience in a way the pain that accrued to others and to ourselves from unskillful speech, unskillful action that we might have done in the past.

You might find the strangest little memories coming up. I remember one sitting when I started reliving a way I had been unkind to a friend of mine in the sixth grade. I had kind of blown her off to go be with some other little girls that I, for some reason, had some idea would be more socially advantageous for me to be friends with—I don't know what was going on in my little sixth-grade mind. But I really went through the pain of how selfish and unskillful and insensitive that had been. So it doesn't always have to be the most horrific thing you've ever done. Just the little ones arise, and we see that remorse and that experiencing of pain is one of the effects of unskillful action.

Through our mindfulness, through our willingness to be open to and explore this, that's how we begin to deepen in the visceral understanding of the fact that we're actually not separate. That by doing something inconsiderate and unkind to my friend in the sixth grade, I was hurting myself. Not just in some idea of hurting myself, but an actual visceral experience of pain.

So by protecting others, we're protecting ourselves. It's really quite beautiful, the interdependence there.

But for me, over the years I've been finding that working with conscious conduct has become much more subtle, much more profound than a simple adherence to a set of rules. It gets much more interesting, too, when you're really looking at the subtleties of it.

As you probably know, and which we'll talk about in much more detail in later talks, when the Buddha laid out his teachings of how to live a life of awareness and of freedom within what was called the Eightfold Path—eight aspects of life, of cultivation of heart and mind, the way to live—conscious conduct is three of those eight spokes. But it is not the first three.

The first step on the Eightfold Path is called wise understanding: understanding of how things are. This leads into the second step, which is variously translated as wise thought or wise intention or wise aspiration. And that then leads to the next three, which have to do with speech, action, and livelihood: wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood.

What I get from this is that our understanding—how we understand the world—informs how we think, our intention, and that is what leads us to wise speech, wise action, and wise livelihood. If we didn't have some sense of understanding, we wouldn't be motivated to pay attention to our conduct and our speech at all. Whatever level, whatever degree our understanding is, it doesn't matter. There's some little glimmer there that this is important. Even if the glimmer is simply, "If I yell at people, they yell back at me and I don't like it." That's an understanding of cause and effect and of suffering. And that's enough. Even if it's only, "I really want to do this three-month course. I don't see what my behavior has to do with anything. I just want to sit on the cushion and get really concentrated. But they say I have to do this, so I'll do it." Even that somehow gets us to pay attention.

But on a level that to me is much more interesting and more subtle, we can look at our speech and our actions not only from the effect, the result of what happens when we say something, what happens when we do something—because that's not always in our control—but recognize that the core of our speech, the core of action, is in the intention, the volition that arises, that gives the energy for that thought, for that speech, for that action to occur.

So sīla is actually a morality of intention.

The intention is the place to which we can bring our mindfulness, our awareness and investigation. And that's much more workable and to me quite fascinating—more so than just waiting to see what the result is.

So what do I mean by intention, skillful or unskillful? This we will talk about a great deal, but simply put, there's a volition in the mind, a kind of impulse, that leads to thought, speech, or action. And it can be associated with a whole variety of mental states, states of mind or heart. So the intention to speak could be associated with hatred, with fear, with loving-kindness, with attachment, with generosity, with delusion, with indifference. You get the picture. The outer result—what one actually says—could be very similar and yet be coming from very different intentions. The same with how one acts.

For example, you could act with a really clear intention of compassion, but the conditions in the situation are such that the result is not at all what you would expect to happen. I was reading a biography of Sister Chân Không, and she was talking about having been in jail in Vietnam during the war. After some weeks in a very difficult situation, France had interceded and she was released. In the cell with her, which had been very crowded, there were two young girls, I think around twelve years old, who had been arrested because they were in the wrong place at the wrong time when a sweep was being made of Viet Cong—this was in a South Vietnam cell. As she was leaving and checking out with the head of the jail, she simply said, "You know, they didn't do anything, and this is really a bad environment for young girls. Wouldn't it be a great thing to let them go?" The effect was that the jail chief got really annoyed and said, "It's clear the prisoners are talking to each other. This is a bad thing." And he made the conditions much worse.

We can't control the results of conditions. The place we have to look when working with our morality, when working with our conscious conduct, is in our intentions. What is imbuing the intention with which we speak and act? It's very rich and interesting, I find.

And so you see, when we look in that way, I could be adhering to the letter of non-harming, I could be never taking what is not offered to me, but the intention behind it could be one of pride, or self-righteousness, or a sense of derision at other people who aren't living up to my high standards. Or it could be a real sense of caring. Or it could be a sense of total fear that if I do something wrong, I'll go to a hell realm. There are many possibilities for intentions. And of course, intentions arise anew in each moment, so we're never locked into one unchanging intention—which is a huge relief as we begin to explore why we say and do what we do. We might notice, "Okay, that one was a little ugly, but we're willing to look at it and see that it passes and be more present for the next speech or action."

So working with sila becomes much more profound than following a set of rules of behavior. I feel for myself that if I really practice it with integrity, with a real commitment—commitment to exploration, commitment to honesty, commitment to attention—it becomes a practice of freedom in itself, an expression of understanding and of connection.

I've also been discovering that the more I am able to use mindfulness as the tool to pay attention to my behavior, rather than just blind adherence to rules, the more space there is to really notice the subtlety of cause and effect. My relationship to conscious conduct, my relationship to the precepts, has less and less to do with any set of rules anywhere. More and more, it becomes internalized, completely experiential. I don't really like to use inner and outer as such a dichotomy, but I'm saying inner as opposed to a set of rules.

The relationship to conscious conduct becomes quite experiential. For example, as soon as I move out of harmony, as soon as I speak or act from an intention of anger, an intention of greed, an intention of fear or self-righteousness—as soon as I speak or act from that place, I get feedback immediately. Not necessarily from the other person, although that's part of it, but from my own inner experience. The disharmony, the disruption of connectedness between me and the action and the person, gets much more easily experienced.

For example, I tend to be quite sarcastic in my humor. And the less attention I'm paying to myself—and the more tea I drink—the more sarcastic I tend to get. I'm quite amusing to myself; I'm having quite a good time. If I stop paying attention, at some point I often go over a little edge and say something that isn't at all amusing to the person I'm saying it to. It used to be that I would sometimes be completely oblivious to that. If the person didn't tell me something—and you know how usually people tell you a week later or three years later—I wouldn't even know it. But now it's much more immediate. As soon as it's out of my mouth, I know. Even before the person flinches in some subtle way, I know, because I feel it. It's actually a visceral experience. I think, "Oh, that was really unkind," or "out of harmony," or whatever particular terms you want to use. It's so clear. And it's not an intellectual thing.

I can't actually ignore noticing that anymore. It's easy, of course, to notice it and then, if one has a particular pattern, to simply move on rather than stop and say, "I'm sorry." But I really can't not notice it anymore.

And that's just a simple example. The sense I'm describing is that I don't need to say, "Oh yes, right, I'm not supposed to use harsh and abusive speech." I don't need to refer to the precept, because the experience in itself is one of shattering harmony, of acting as if we are not somehow living in oneness.

This becomes really interesting, because after a while you can't pretend anymore. It requires real honesty with myself. But this is the beauty of mindfulness—it's honest without being judgmental. It doesn't feed into a sense of self-worthlessness or thoughts like, "I'm a bad person, I'm disgusting, how could I say such a thing?" That thought might arise, but we just watch it come and go. That's our mindfulness practice.

What mindfulness does allow us to see, much more potently, is the reality of cause and effect—the immediacy of suffering that arises from speech that does not come from an intention of non-harming, but from an intention of self-aggrandizement or whatever the motivation might be.

In a way, all the precepts really come down to mindfulness. Thich Nhat Hanh puts it this way: mindfulness is the fundamental precept. Think of the precepts as manifestations of mindfulness. Because when you're mindful, you're responsible. And then the precepts are not needed to dictate our behavior. When we're mindful, it's so obvious. We don't have to think about it. It's simply obvious: be kind to one another and to ourselves. There's not a lot more to say.

Just as our wisdom grows through attention to our behavior, our motivation, our intentions—and also through our meditation practice, through our willingness to simply be open and present for whatever happens—through all of this, our understanding of the nature of ourselves, of life, of freedom is bound to grow. We can't stop it, no matter how we try. And we'll try every way we can think of. But as long as we're willing to be really present and open and clear, a sense of understanding and wisdom will continue to develop, broaden, and deepen. It just keeps going on and on.

For me, in working with the precepts, I've found it's the same way. As I pay attention and notice more subtleties of cause and effect and intention, as wisdom develops, my relationship to the depth and profundity of each precept also widens and grows.

And I start to wonder—I do wonder often within myself—where do I draw the boundaries? In seeing more and more how widely my speech and actions affect others, where can I draw the boundary? Do I draw it at myself? At myself and the person I'm directly in relationship with at that moment? Do I draw the boundaries at the family, the community, the state, the world? Do I draw it only with people? What about the environment?

Where does my self stop and another begin? Where do we reach the boundary of the depth and profundity of following these precepts, of seeing how our actions and speech ripple outward and touch and affect all other beings, all other aspects of this universe?

Metta and compassion—loving-kindness and compassion—are described as boundless states. Boundless meaning no limits can be placed on them; you can't come to the end of it, to some place that is somehow excluded from the state of love and compassion. They are expressions and manifestations of the boundlessness of freedom. And if the precepts, if our conscious conduct, is an expression of our understanding, then that too must in some way approach a boundlessness—an understanding of where and how we are all interconnected, and how our actions and speech affect one another.

I'm not going to go through all five precepts, perhaps just the first couple. But I want to share some of the way my mind works when I start reflecting on or paying attention to a precept itself, and how it continues to grow and develop and get broader and broader. There are no answers. I really see how you can't have a fixed rule of how to behave, because it's far too complex.

What do I mean by that? Thich Nhat Hanh speaks a lot about working with conscious conduct. He says it's essential that we not expect to begin by being perfect—because that's very difficult—but that at least we incline our minds in that direction.

Looking at the first precept, not harming other beings, not killing other beings—it's incredible. That one commitment not to harm other beings, how much of our behavior does it involve? And where, in any particular moment, do I draw the boundary? Where do I consciously or unconsciously choose not to see the interrelatedness?

Where do we each make our choices? Because who can do this one perfectly? How can we live in this world, the way it is, without ever harming another living being? It seems almost impossible. Just taking antibiotics is harming those little organisms—except for some of us, because it doesn't work at all.

But boiling water. Driving in a car—I'm really aware every time I'm driving of all the bugs smashing against the windshield. And some people, like the Jains, will make choices that we don't make, wearing masks so as not to breathe in insects, and so forth. There are all levels to how far we take this.

You can see there's no way to make a rule and say, "This is what's right, this means non-harming, and this part's okay." But for each of us, in our own willingness to pay attention to our conduct—and again, here is where it comes back to intention rather than focusing so much on outer results.

Robert Aitken Roshi, a Zen Roshi in Hawaii, says that the practice of peace and harmony is peace and harmony, not some technique designed to bring it about. I think of that a lot—of really bringing my intentions, how I relate to the world, to be those of compassion and love, to try to be peace and harmony, rather than trying to draw up a list of things. "Well, if I never eat meat, that's how I'm not going to harm other beings. If I only drive a car when I have to, that's how I'm never going to harm other beings." It's not an easy answer.

Here at IMS, we've gone through lots of bouts with trying to find our communal relationship to this. And if you think it's hard finding your own relationship to difficult situations, try to do it with twenty-five people. And then every year the group changes and you go through it again.

Or with the cockroaches. You might have a chance to make friends with some of them this fall. I don't know quite how vital our cockroach population is this fall—it varies from year to year. But we've gone through a lot over the years in relationship to our deeply held commitment to non-harming behavior, to a sense of our interconnectedness, to whatever sense each person brings of connectedness or disgust at cockroaches, to our need to abide by health laws out of fear that we're going to get shut down, to our need not to have the yogis be really disgusted seeing too many cockroaches in the wrong places. There's a whole list of where we make the decisions and out of what.

I remember a period just a few years ago where we had sessions of all getting together and doing metta meditation to the cockroaches, asking them to leave because if they didn't, we were going to have to do something stronger. Then we all made a commitment to go home and do metta every day, each one of us, for a certain period of time for the cockroaches. Then we got in touch with some bug psychics in Vermont. We really tried, you know. And it didn't work. It didn't work at all. They were very happy and multiplying.

And it's difficult. When you have to do something that is actively harming another being, there's a certain level where you can't get around that fact. In that moment of doing it—but at least it's done quite consciously, really paying attention to the effects and to the whole rippling impact of what's going on.

So that's just one example, but there are no easy answers in this.

When I first went to Thailand, before I ordained as a nun, I was staying in the temple north of Bangkok where I was going to ordain. It was my first night there, and my hair was very long—I hadn't cut it yet. I was sleeping on the floor of the little hut, the little kuti. I woke up in the middle of the night, and somehow the place was just infested with ants. My hair was filled with ants. They were all over me. And I was new in Thailand. I wasn't quite equanimous yet.

So in the morning, I went to the abbot, a very well-known abbot in Thailand. His secretary, another monk, said, "Oh, no problem." He came running out with a big can of Raid. And I was shocked. I was really shocked. Oh my God. It was just pragmatic.

I ran into the same thing at Plum Village with Sister Chan Khong, where they had some kind of little spiders that really freaked out the guests staying there. And the next thing I knew, she was in there with bug spray. And again, I thought, I can't believe it.

There are no easy answers, but a refuge—my refuge—is in the sincerity of intention, of commitment to integrity, and in the willingness to see as far as possible the ramifications, to be as conscious as I'm able to in this moment. In some moments that's more conscious than others. And then to take responsibility for the action I take part in.

So how do we practice peace and harmony?

It's possible, for example, to be a vegetarian out of a deep respect for not harming animals. And it's possible to be a vegetarian filled with disdain and loathing for the people who eat meat. Not the same thing. That's not practicing peace and harmony exactly. It's possible to really live a non-harming life outwardly and be filled with hatred for the people who are harming. No, that's also not really quite a non-harming life.

This is from Robert Aitken again: "The industrialist says it's a dog-eat-dog world. The bodhisattva does not deny that fact, but only the spirit of such a statement. He or she follows the way of compassion, nurturing all beings and being nurtured by them."

So where do we draw the boundaries? I wonder a lot at the violence in our culture here, and of course I don't know, but I wonder how much of it has to do with the violence on TV, the violence in the movies. It becomes a really deep question for me: if I pay to go to a violent movie, am I contributing to the violence in the culture? I don't know.

Thich Nhat Hanh actually talks about this aspect under the fifth precept—not taking in intoxicants or drugs or substances that cause heedlessness or cloud the mind. Under this he includes paying attention to the shows we watch, what we take in through television and media. And you can really see this. I haven't done this in a long time, but I remember I used to come home from work and turn on the TV, which was total trash, and sit there like a zombie for three hours, like I was stuck in glue, completely unable to get up. I might as well have drunk myself into a stupor. It was just the same effect.

So where do we draw the line? Each of us will find that for ourselves, and for me it's constantly shifting and changing. It's the beauty of mindfulness—that it's just about being awake in this moment. And this moment is constantly changing, so it's not that we can take some static line and say, "This is it." It takes awakeness, awareness, and new integrity and honesty in each minute. The more we do that, the more we become attuned to our essential oneness, and the more natural an expression of non-harming becomes.

The same is true with the second precept: not taking what is not given. It's obviously about not stealing, not taking other people's property. But it's not always that blatant. For example here, what about that really nice shampoo somebody left in the bathroom? Even if you don't know for sure, you think it's been there for a few days, and probably nobody would care. But you don't really know that. Again, look not at the action, but at the intention that's giving rise to the action.

If you turn it around to a more positive expression, rather than not taking what's not given, this precept to me is a way of expressing a deep sense of inner contentment. When I'm deeply in tune with a sense of unity, a sense of innate completeness, I don't need things. I don't need to take anything from anybody. There's not that sense of needy want.

Dogen, the great Zen master of Japan, said, "The self and the world are just as they are. The gate of emancipation is open." That mind of wanting, the mind of greed, of needing—you know, whatever it is: "That zafu, nobody's sat on that cushion for four days now, and I'm sure it's a much better seat than the one I have"—that mind is what shuts the gate of emancipation. And so this not taking what's not given is really a way of opening us to the inner contentment that opens our mind and heart to freedom. Very powerful.

Can enough be enough? Deep appreciation of life, of experience, of this moment, of awareness, just as it is. Not much else is needed. Aitken Roshi says that not only in stealing are we stealing from others—we're stealing the potential of inner peace from ourselves in that moment.

Is stealing part of our economic system? I just read this the other day in the New York Times, interviewing different people with different opinions during that human population conference in Cairo. This was one man's opinion, the president of the World Watch Institute. We're talking about food needs, and he said that we've entered a new era in which satisfying the need for seafood, for example, of the ninety million people being added each year requires reducing the consumption for those already on Earth. Satisfying the demand for grain also means reducing the consumption of those already here.

That really hit me—the sense that every time I eat grain, there's more for me and less for somebody else. There's a direct correlation. If I eat seafood, that means somebody else doesn't get it. It struck me in some way. I mean, that's maybe how it always is, but in terms of population, we're reaching the outer limits. Before, it always seemed like there was so much it didn't matter. Now, it matters.

And so when I pay attention—of course we need to eat—but I certainly begin, hopefully, to pay more attention to how much I eat and how much I throw away. I don't pay as much attention to that as I could, but I am beginning to be aware how vital that is.

Where do we draw the line at not taking what is not given? Who can make that distinction for us?

From the Tao Te Ching: "Be content with what you have. Rejoice in the way things are. When you realize there is nothing lacking, the whole world belongs to you."

In many ways, that's our practice here together. When we can appreciate just what is, we realize that nothing is lacking. The whole world belongs to us. And that's how it is, actually, in every moment. When we can stop just for an instant, just long enough to be fully awake and present right here and now—in that, we touch our essential completeness, our deep interrelatedness, the fact that we cannot speak or act without affecting others, and vice versa.

It's our mindful awareness that allows for this growth in depth and subtlety of understanding, that allows for change. It's not that we have to suddenly start panicking—"Oh no, everything I do affects everyone else in the world, and I have to stop eating! Maybe if I starve to death somebody else can eat in the Horn of Africa!" It's not about that. It's not about guilt. It's not about self-righteousness. It's not about fear.

It's simply to let this tool of mindfulness shine its light on our connections, on our intentions, on our speech and action, with a willingness to simply look honestly. And I think that's enough—that our conscious conduct will naturally become an expression of our deepening understanding, an expression of love, an expression of realization, an expression of our oneness with all beings. And again, lead us into a deeper and deeper relationship with that.

So let's just sit together for a moment.

CHAPTER 279

Precepts: The Practice of Kindness

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this opening talk for a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers a deep exploration of the five precepts (pañcasīla) not as mere rules to follow, but as a transformative practice of freedom and actualized understanding. Drawing on the Dalai Lama's teaching that "my religion is kindness," she illuminates how working with conscious conduct becomes a direct expression of our interconnection with all beings.
>
> Wilson explains that the heart of skillful action lies in intention (cetanā), making sīla a morality of motivation rather than blind obedience. She shares personal examples—from resisting the urge to use someone else's shampoo to navigating institutional decisions about pest control—demonstrating how mindfulness of our speech and actions reveals the immediate feedback of suffering when we act from greed, hatred, or delusion, and the expansiveness that arises when we let go.
> The talk explores the boundless nature of each precept, examining how not killing extends to our entertainment choices and environmental impact, and how not taking what is not given points toward the profound happiness of inner contentment. Wilson emphasizes that this practice requires not expecting perfection but inclining the mind toward wholesomeness, meeting even violent thoughts with compassion. As Thich Nhat Hanh teaches, mindfulness itself becomes the fundamental precept—when we are truly aware, ethical conduct flows naturally from our understanding of oneness.

It feels really different somehow beginning to speak to all of you sitting here at the beginning of a three-month course. It feels quite different to me from the other retreats that I teach throughout the year—I feel quite humbled and very honored to be able to be part of each of your three-month retreat. It's so rare and wonderful in this world to spend time with people who are so committed to bringing some light into their lives and into the world. In whatever way you might phrase that to yourself, it's quite an honor to be sharing this time with you.

I hope we can all keep coming back in our minds during the difficult times, or during the drudgery times, to the immensity of what each of you is doing—the immensity of the commitment that you're making to your path, to your freedom, to your awakening. Because a lot of the time this path is not an easy one. And that's something all of you already know, which makes it wonderful to be spending time and talking with people who already understand that.

When we're leading a retreat with many people who are new to practice, it's quite a shock for them. You might remember your first couple of retreats when you began to get it—that not only is it not easy, it's not a bliss trip, and it doesn't necessarily just go into lighter and lighter modes of being until we float away. We're really opening to the whole picture. So I feel very honored and humbled, and I thank you all for being here, being on the planet.

Tomorrow night, when we formally begin the full retreat, we will do it as we always begin retreats—by the taking of the three refuges and the five precepts. Tonight I want to speak about the precepts as practice, and tomorrow Steve will speak about the refuges.

I want to address the precepts so that when we take them, hopefully it's not another ritual that's nice—where of course we don't want to harm one another, so we'll take the precepts, get them out of the way, and get on with the real work, with what's really important. For me, over the years, working with conscious conduct, with trying to live in this world with an attitude of non-harming, an attitude of connection, has become more and more profound. In some ways, it is becoming the practice—in a way I never would have thought or expected in my early years of practice.

Thinking about why we come here, why we are doing this difficult practice, what really matters—I used to think I was coming to retreat, maybe I didn't put it quite so bluntly, but coming for some more ecstatic states of mind, for some greater depth of seeing and clarity, for greater concentration. All of these are very wonderful, but somehow I was looking for something a little more spectacular than paying attention to my speech and actions.

The Dalai Lama has said that his religion is kindness. For me, that's becoming not just a nice thing to say, but more and more one of the more profound expressions of understanding, of true open-hearted wisdom that I have heard. It's so simple, but to me it encompasses such a breadth and profundity of the wisdom that comes from our practice.

Working with the five precepts, commitment to conscious conduct, is actually learning to actualize the depth of understanding of our interconnection, of our oneness—that who I am and how I speak and act affects all other beings, and vice versa. To really pay attention to how I speak and act in the world is to begin to actualize freedom. Working with the precepts, working with how and why we speak and act, really becomes a practice of freedom, an expression of our deepest possible understanding.

In the way we do this practice, we practice from a foundation of loving kindness, from a foundation of compassion—beginning with the attitude with which we meet ourselves in these three months, with which we meet our experience, the attitude of loving kindness and compassion with which we meet one another, especially with which we meet the staff and teachers. They really need to be met with loving kindness and compassion. This becomes the framework for everything that we're doing here.

I've found in myself that in life or in retreat, it doesn't really matter—since we're in retreat, I'll speak to that. In retreat, for me, it's quite easy at times to lose track of, to lose sight of this broader foundation, this broader attitude of compassion and loving kindness to myself, to others, to experience, or to just paying attention to how and why I do what I do. The intention of practice can subtly turn into one of ambition, or a kind of materialistic attitude that we can bring to achieving certain states, experiencing certain states of mind, or changing the personality in certain ways.

For years I practiced in order to come out and be this certain kind of wonderful, fantastic person—loving and kind and filled with light. And of course, everyone would notice that when I came out of retreat. I'd judge how good my retreat was by how glowing I was at the end. Now, you might come out in a really glowing, loving space. Hopefully, as our understanding deepens, we do become more compassionate. But if our intention is to get that, then we're acting out of greed. We're not acting out of compassion to ourselves—we're strengthening our sense of separation.

Working with the precepts, these five very simple guidelines for behavior: not harming other living beings; not taking what is not freely offered; not misusing our sexuality to harm ourselves or other beings—in the context of retreat, of course, we are being celibate. The fourth is not to use speech in a way that harms ourselves or others—not lying, not using harsh speech, not using speech to divide or create separation between people, and not gossiping or using idle chatter. Luckily, since we're in silence, that's a whole lot easier, at least outwardly and verbally. But we can still look at speech in the little times that we talk here. I think that's one of the reasons interviews can be so intense sometimes—because it's just ten or fifteen minutes that you're really speaking, and so much goes on in that time that you can reflect about for days afterwards. The fifth precept is to really pay attention to keeping our hearts and minds clear, not taking drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind and heart, that cause heedlessness.

Again, here on retreat, that's a lot easier. Even if we only took these five precepts as blind rules, if we didn't really pay attention to why we were doing it but just said, "Okay, I'm going to follow these"—what a difference it would make in the world. It would be so amazing.

That's one of the reasons a retreat space such as this comes to be such a sacred space. We're creating a very protected and sacred space here together simply by observing these five very simple guidelines for behavior. Even if you don't pay attention to why you're doing it, even if we just blindly obey them, we're giving each other such a profound gift: the gift of fearlessness. To know that we can be in this place, not be afraid of one another, knowing that we're not here with any intention to cause harm.

When I come back here after traveling—I live in a little cottage down the road—it's such a powerful experience to feel completely safe, just in the world, so to speak. We leave the keys in the car. I never lock my house, and I never have one thought that somebody is going to come in and take something or trash something. There's just this sense of care, of protection, of fearlessness that we're giving to one another.

The Buddha advocated paying attention to our speech and actions as a deep form of protection for ourselves. There's a real happiness that comes when we are being in the world in a non-harming way. Have you ever noticed that in yourself? When you're being with people and you're not being harsh, you're not taking things, you're not actively wishing them ill—which, yes, sure, that comes up in our minds—but the times that we're not, there's such a happiness that comes from it.

So the Buddha advocated following conscious conduct as a way to protect ourselves from the results of our unskillful speech and actions. Protect ourselves from anger, from results coming to us from others. Protecting ourselves from remorse, for when we've done something unskillful, often it comes back up again in our hearts, in our minds. This often comes up in a long retreat, and we're protecting ourselves from the suffering of that. And by protecting ourselves, the natural result is that we are protecting others. Again, we can't separate ourselves from others.

The Buddha said once that all the joys and sorrows of beings come from their actions. When we are acting with care, from kindness, from a sense of our connectedness, from compassion, we are protecting ourselves from great suffering and giving others the gift of fearlessness.

So even if all we did was relate to these precepts as five rules that we had to follow in order to be here and get on with the practice, even that would be great. But it wouldn't have the profundity, the great depth; it wouldn't be a practice of freedom, a practice of liberation, if that were how we were relating to it.

What makes it so much deeper, what makes working with our speech and conduct so much more profound, is that the heart of an action, the seed of what makes our speech or action skillful or unskillful—skillful meaning leading to happiness, unskillful meaning leading to suffering, not like a good-evil judgment—what makes it skillful or unskillful is that the whole seed of action is in the intention, in the volition that leads to our movement of speech, our movement of action.

So sila, which is the Pali word for virtue, for morality or conscious conduct—sila is a morality of intention or motivation. When we begin to bring mindfulness to our speech and actions, not so much focused on how it looks or on what the immediate noticeable result is, but when we look at the volitional force, the state of mind giving rise to the speech and action, that's where this practice of mindfulness of our speech and action becomes quite profound. And really interesting, too.

I mean, it's much more interesting to look at why I've said something unskillful than to just make another black mark: "Oh, you blew it again. Bad." "Oh, you said the right thing. Good." That's not so interesting. But to see when I've said something that has brought a feeling of discomfort to myself, or I see somebody else flinch—instead of just saying, "Oh bad, you blew it again," I can really look at the motivation behind that action. That's where understanding really begins to percolate, where we really begin to viscerally experience the connection between myself and others, that it can't be separated.

So what makes an action skillful, in the Buddhist way of speaking of action, is if the motivation, the volitional force, is arising from skillful states of mind. In the sort of negative way of phrasing it: non-greed, which is really non-attachment, generosity, inner contentment, renunciation. Or when our intention is arising from non-hatred, which is really compassion or loving-kindness. Or from non-delusion, which is really wisdom, clear seeing, equanimity, awareness of our interdependence.

An outer action might look like we're really doing the right thing. We could obey the letter of the precepts and have our intention be bringing suffering to ourselves. For example, I could not only not take what's not given, but seem to give something in a very generous way, while all my intention is in wanting other people to see how generous I am—which is actually both a kind of greed and a kind of delusion, comparing myself and wanting to look good. So all the seed is in the intention.

There's a little story about a Tibetan practitioner named Geshe Ben. One day he was expecting a visit from a large number of his benefactors. That morning he arranged the offerings on his shrine in front of the images of the Three Jewels—the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha—and he arranged them particularly neatly. Examining his intentions, he realized they were not pure; he was only trying to impress his patrons. So he picked up a handful of dust and threw it all over the offerings, saying to himself, "Monk, just stay where you are and don't put on airs."

When his teacher heard this story, he said, "That handful of dust that Ben threw was the best offering in all Tibet."

It's this kind of examining our intentions that makes bringing awareness to conscious conduct such an exciting and wonderful practice. Rather than just observing rules, we're learning how to practice oneness—how to express, to viscerally experience our non-separation from each other.

When we relate to the precepts with integrity and commitment, I deeply believe that working with them becomes a practice of freedom. You can experience this for yourself, even in very small ways. We don't have to look at the most horrendous so-called breaking of the precepts.

Here's an example. Recently I was teaching at a retreat in New Mexico where there's a group shared shower. Everyone leaves their shampoos, and I was examining them—oh, that looks nice, that looks nice. It's one of my little fetishes; I like to try different shampoos. There was one that looked really interesting, one I hadn't seen before. And there was this moment of the mind saying, "Oh, who cares? No one will know. I'm sure she wouldn't care." How easy it is to just go and do that.

But I noticed it. Sometimes having the precepts as a set of rules can help us wake up. It's like, "Oh right, I'm not supposed to take what isn't offered. That's one of the rules." This can serve as a way to remind us to pay attention. Then, tuning into my own intentions, I could feel viscerally—and in my mind—the feeling of greed, that contraction of wanting, that sense of self quite strong. "I need to try the shampoo." It sounds ridiculous, but sometimes it's the ridiculous examples that help us see what's going on, because I couldn't get too upset about whether I tried the shampoo or not.

Feeling that contraction of self, that sense of real separation and grasping—it was suffering. And in the letting go, in not trying the shampoo, rather than feeling deprived—"Oh, I can't do it because that's what the precept says"—in really letting go of needing that shampoo, there was a movement from grasping and separation into oneness. That sense of contraction moved into expansiveness. And luckily, in that moment, not into a sense of pride (which would have been back into contraction again), but simply into: right, we're all part of the same show here. That isn't mine to take, and I don't need it.

It really was a movement from suffering to happiness, from separation and contraction to a glimmering of the potential of freedom—the spacious expansiveness of a mind not obscured by craving and aversion.

That's just a small example, but we can experience this way of relating to our intentions in countless moments. Even when we don't fully understand our motivation, we have this little list: "Oh, this isn't a helpful thing to do." Then we can pay attention to what changes when we act from skillfulness, from non-greed, from renunciation. It really is an opening into the potential of freedom, of clear seeing. And we have that opportunity over and over, in all kinds of small speech and actions.

This practice of relating to precepts moves from blind obedience or trying to be good into a real movement of the heart, where we get immediate feedback when we begin to move out of harmony with other beings and with ourselves. When we begin to speak or act not from kindness, but from some sense of "me, separate, I need, I'm better than you, I'm worse than you"—somehow needing to be taken care of at the expense of someone else. It becomes immediate feedback, a mindfulness of cause and effect rather than blind obedience to some rule.

Working with the precept of wise speech, of right speech, is in some ways the most tricky, the most difficult. Often I find I haven't had a moment to notice my intention before something comes out of my mouth. I don't know the intention; I don't even know what I'm going to say as it's already being spoken.

I have a tendency toward humor, and at times it can get a little out of control. Over the years, as soon as something that's just a bit unkind leaves my mouth, I can almost feel the flinching, the pulling back of the other person, as I feel it in myself. It's immediate feedback: saying something unkind is harming myself in that moment at least as much—and probably more—than it's harming the other person.

It's an immediate feedback that I've moved out of kindness into self-interest. And right away, rather than going from that into judgment—which is just taking the same kind of aversive intention and turning it back on oneself, and that isn't any better—but instead of moving into judgment, to then begin to explore with mindfulness: Oh, what was the intention behind that? Not with judgment, not with a view to making ourselves wrong, but with a view to understanding.

Very often I'll see, oh, there was some sense of not feeling very good about myself and wanting to somehow be one up. Or sometimes just an exuberance that gets carried away. Sometimes it's just being in a bad mood—all kinds of things. But rather than just continuing the aversion towards oneself, by looking at the intention, by honestly seeing it with mindfulness, that's where we naturally let go of that need to look better, or of the attachment to exuberance and wanting to continue it.

So ultimately mindfulness comes down to be the main precept. In some ways, the only precept we need to really pay attention to. Thich Nhat Hanh says that mindfulness is the fundamental precept. He says, think of the precepts as a manifestation of mindfulness. When you're mindful, you are responsible—and then the precepts are not needed to dictate our behavior.

And that's so true. When we're paying attention, as I was just saying with speech, we don't need to have some list of rules. We know when we're acting from kindness, when our intentions are connected, when our intentions are coming from caring. And we know when they're not. It's really quite simple in that way.

Another aspect of loving-kindness and compassion as the framework for our speech and actions, as the framework for our practice, is that they are ultimately boundless. Compassion and loving-kindness grow and grow, almost spatially in a way, but they're boundless. They're not limited such that certain people deserve compassion and loving-kindness and certain people don't. Or that certain aspects of myself, certain aspects of my experience, deserve to be met with compassion, but others are really no-no, get rid of them. Not at all. So compassion and loving-kindness are boundless, profound—no limits, no separations.

I find for myself, in relating this to working with the precepts, that taking any of the precepts and looking more deeply into my own relationship to that way of being, seeing and feeling the depth of our interconnectedness with one another and with all life in the world—where do we draw the line? Where do I draw the line in working with a precept? For example, in not killing, or in right speech—where does that line draw? Just with the bare outline of what the words say?

The boundaries between self and other just begin to melt away. The longer I've been paying attention to behavior, just to these simple five rules of behavior, the less I can perceive any kind of real boundary. The boundary used to just be me and how I was relating to the person or the animal immediately in front of me. Then maybe to the ring of people I know. Or maybe to the group of all of us here. But because in this culture, in this world, we have so much information about human beings all over the planet, we can't really hide from even the intellectual knowledge that how we act is affecting beings in all parts of the globe. And so where do we draw the boundaries in working with these precepts? Where do we set the limits of our behavior?

I find this a really fascinating area of exploration—one in which there isn't, I don't think, an answer that anyone can say this is how it should be for you. But I've found for myself that it takes away any sense of cockiness I have, for one thing, to continue to explore how boundless each of these precepts is. It takes away any sense of arrogance that, oh, I'm really deeply at heart a kind person, or I'm going through life without harming anybody—I don't really have to pay too much attention to it, you know, I'm a good person. I don't mean to bring in guilt, as in "I'm not a good person." I'm just talking about taking away a sense of arrogance or thinking I don't have to examine this anymore. I don't kill beings. I know I don't kill beings. Let's move on to the second precept. But to really see how boundless it is.

Thich Nhat Hanh says that when we enter a meditation hall, we bring all of society with us. In a way, the suffering, the pain that we feel in our own heart is the suffering of all of society. And in some ways, I feel that's true in our practice here, and that's also how I relate to working with these precepts.

So I just want to give some examples of what I mean by exploring them in this way of boundlessness, because they just seem to get more and more refined. Thich Nhat Hanh, again, in talking about trying to really uphold each of these guidelines of behavior without getting judgmental towards ourselves—it's essential that we don't expect to begin by being perfect, because these precepts are very difficult, very difficult. But we incline our mind in the direction of working towards being perfect.

The Buddha said once, "I say that even the inclination of mind towards wholesome states is of great benefit. If even the inclination of mind is of great benefit, then what should be said of bodily and verbal acts that arise from such states of mind?"

Incredibly powerful, incredibly beneficial. But also to know that we can even just have the intention—sometimes the intention doesn't make it past the thought, but still that's beneficial.

So in looking at the first precept, for example, the precept of not killing, if you just take it as a blind rule without exploring more deeply, is it even possible to live a life on this planet as a human being and not kill? Whenever we drive a car, we're squashing countless bugs. Whenever we boil water, when we take antibiotics, we're killing little bacteria. Where do we draw the line? Each of us has our own area that we're comfortable with. And I find for me, it necessitates keeping looking more deeply. Keep looking more deeply. Because if it's just a blind rule, then I can say, "Well, forget it. I just won't kill the big things." Sizism, you know. But little things that I can't see, then it doesn't matter.

But if we look at it as intention, then it takes on a whole other form. Knowing that I can't drive without killing, but beginning to look at where we can look—at where I act from an intention of aversion or of ignorance, of just not wanting to know. How often do we, maybe we don't deliberately go out and kill things very often, but I find for myself, more often anyway, there will be times when I can see that I just don't want to know.

I've used this example before. If I don't have my glasses on and I go to step into the shower, I can't tell what's on the floor. I can't tell if that little brown dot is just a piece of lint or a little spider. And I can see if I'm in a hurry in the morning, there's part of me that just doesn't want to know. And if I don't take the time to lean down and look, and I turn on the water and I still don't know as it washes down the drain, that doesn't absolve me. That's an intention of delusion, of not caring really, of thinking my own being more important, not feeling the sense of connectedness or caring for life, if that was a spider. And not knowing doesn't save me from having acted in an unskillful way.

So I can pay attention to when I do something like that, even if I still don't know, but there's a feeling of separation. There's that contraction of self, making me more important—my ten seconds of time that I save by not looking down, somehow making me more important, more separate. And there's a real shutting off of the world, a contraction that's actually suffering in that moment.

Of course, there are other times when we do know and it's a real dilemma. And that's where each of us has to look very carefully to consciously do what we need to do.

I know some of you might have been here some years ago when we were having the beginnings of our ongoing relationship with the cockroaches here at IMS. Because in the first years we didn't have any cockroaches for some reason. And some years ago we began to have a real infestation. It's the kind of thing we went through so much trying to find ways to work with it. I remember numerous staff meetings, board of directors meetings, teacher meetings, discussing every which way. We called in insect psychics from Vermont to try and send them out. We all made a vow for some period of time every night—we would all do loving-kindness to the cockroaches, asking them to leave. This went on, I don't know how long—at least a year. And in the meantime, it was really getting out of control, and we run a center that has to be certified by the Board of Health and all kinds of things like that.

So what to do? And as you can imagine, as many people as there were, are, that's how many different opinions there were about what to do. You can see we're faced with these dilemmas in our life. And sometimes we might each meet them differently. So it's to bring in a real awareness of our intention, bring it as much into our heart, into light as we can, and then do whatever our particular decision is at that time.

Another time, I was a manager here, and the house across the street that staff lives in now, we used to rent it to friends. For some reason, the couple that lived there had gone away for a week or two. I went over to get something and the house was just infested with fleas. I walked out and really my legs were covered with fleas just having been in the house for a minute. It was really—you couldn't live there with it like that. So again, it's the dilemma of what to do, who would take the responsibility of calling the exterminators, because that's what it came down to. And I felt that was my duty to do that, and I did. I can't really say what all the karma is, but I felt that was something I had to do consciously, and I had to do it looking at the bigger picture that we were responsible for that building. Other people might have made other decisions.

So there's that level.

Can we live as human beings in the way that we live without ever taking life?

And then there's the level of how do we relate to the decisions that we've made. I've met people who are vegetarians out of a deep commitment from not wanting to kill animals, but who are so enraged at people that do eat meat that the violence they're suffering in themselves—in holding to that view and in blaming other people—that's also violence, that's also hatred, that's also giving rise to the intentions of separation and anger. And really looking at that.

This is from Aitken Roshi: "Practicing compassion goes hand in hand with practicing realization. On your cushions, you learn first of all to be compassionate toward yourself. I can recall occasions when I was sitting in zazen with my mind a turmoil of murderous thoughts and feelings. Perhaps you have had such experiences also. We vow to save all beings, but how do you save the roughnecks in your own mind? Treat them as neighbors who come to the door when you are meditating. Oh, there you are, you violent thought. With this recognition, you are at ease with yourself because you are no longer blindly responsive to your thinking and feeling, and thus you are no longer at the mercy of your karma."

So in a way, greeting the violent thoughts that come, the thoughts of harming, the thoughts of killing—that might seem distant now, but I happen to know from personal experience of people who, well into a retreat, had definite murderous thoughts and visions of people sitting around them, for whatever particular obscure reason it might have been. "Oh, there you are, you violent thought." In that moment, we're meeting it with compassion. In that moment, the intention of violence, the intention of anger and hatred has been shifted to the intention of compassion, to the intention of acceptance.

This is not a small thing. Because each time that the intention shifts, each time we can move from the violence to even the inclination towards kindness, that's the beginning of actualization of understanding. It's a huge thing. And we have many, many moments when we can experience this.

So just with this one precept you can see how it gets very subtle and profound. It also stretches out boundlessly in all directions. How do we define killing?

Thich Nhat Hanh is really wonderful, I find, in the way that he quite naturally seems to see the interconnection of one act with all acts in life. So, for example, something I think about: I wonder if there are ways that I support violence in entertainment. If I go and pay to see violent movies, or if I enjoy watching violent TV shows or reading violent books, is there a way that I am contributing to the ongoing violence and the increasing violence in our culture? I don't know, but it's something that I feel I have to look at very deeply.

Or when I'm too lazy to do some bit of recycling, am I contributing in that moment to killing a portion of our environment, to actually killing some of the sustaining force of nature that supports all life on this planet? I don't know, but it can get very profound.

And talking about vegetarianism again, just the sense of—if I eat meat, because cattle take so much more grain to feed than if the grain was just used to feed people, am I in eating a hamburger actually contributing to starvation in Africa? I don't know if that direct correlation can be made, but that's one way of exploring the parameters of really trying not to have intentions of killing or harming other beings.

I also look at the ways that my mind creates a sense of us and them. Whether the "us" is meditators versus non-meditators, whether "us" is my family versus outside people, whether "us" is two friends versus somebody else who looks dangerous walking down the street.

A couple of years ago, my partner and I were in Thailand and we met a young man traveling who was from Croatia—he was a Croat. And he just seemed like any of the travelers you meet in Thailand from anywhere. We were on the train and he was reading the paper about something going on in Bosnia, some particular battle between the Croats and the Serbs. The Croats had won this particular battle. And in that instant, he changed from being just an average guy. He was cheering the way some people I know cheer football games. He was cheering about how the Croats had won this battle and how great it was. "I just hate all Serbs." This was said with so much vehemence, so much real fear and vitriol and separation. It was shocking to me.

But of course, more shocking is that he was just, you know, in a battle zone. Yet that's not something I'm unfamiliar with. I find ways that my own mind sets up divisions and distinctions between us and them. It creates fear and separation and the need for some kind of action to get what I need and protect myself. Is that promoting violence in the world? Is that promoting harming other beings? I think so.

So it really gets quite intricate. And not to look at any of this with a sense of blame or self-judgment—remember what Thich Nhat Hanh said: it's not about expecting to be perfect. If we don't expect to be perfect, it opens up the range to really be willing to look.

So the second precept, very similar: not taking what is not given. That's the sort of easy way of expressing it, but if we turn it around and make it more positive, to me this precept is really pointing us to the possibility of living with inner contentment—the real sense of knowing that just what there is here is enough. I don't need to take something else to find perfection or happiness or contentment.

Dogen, the great Zen master, said, "The self and the world are just as they are. The gate of emancipation is open." Not taking what is not given turns around to: can we live in this sense of inner contentment? These three months are a great opportunity to play with this idea. Can we live with the understanding that the self and the world are just as they are, and the gate of emancipation is open?

In that space, no thought of needing to take what isn't offered even arises. If I were in that space of inner contentment, when I see some shampoo sitting there, I don't think, "Oh, I wish I could have it, but I can't," and feel deprived. The thought doesn't arise. "Oh, that looks like a nice shampoo"—and it just sits there. There's no sense of neediness because there's not a sense of incompleteness. Again, this is opening to the potential of freedom.

In our retreat here, this inner contentment—it's another way I look at renunciation. We can tend to think of renunciation as deprivation, as a kind of hardship on ourselves. But really, when it's the space of inner contentment, it's the greatest happiness. And that's what we can practice here in not taking what is not given.

You have a lot of chances, even more here than you might have in other places, to look at whether it's possible to find contentment with what is given. That can be the food. It's rare that you spend three months with no control over the food that you're given to eat three times a day. This gets to be a really big deal. It's a lot. And when we're going through a difficult time, food is a great place to displace all that energy.

I remember my first few years of long retreats where I would just be thinking about if only I could have a big chunk of cheddar cheese or something, or a piece of bread—stuff that normally I don't even have to think about. And so much mental energy would go into wanting this piece of cheese or whatever it was. So much suffering.

In a way, as Aitken Roshi says, it's almost like stealing from ourselves in that moment. We're stealing from ourselves the potential for peace, the potential for recognizing happiness in that moment, because we're throwing all our happiness out onto the piece of cheese or the rice cake or whatever your particular mind might dream up about what would make you really happy if you had it.

So that's okay, the mind does that. We have the precept to stop us from actually going into the walk-ins in the middle of the night and taking it. A friend of mine has a great story from years ago. He was manager here about fifteen years ago, so nobody here now is involved in this story. He went into the walk-in refrigerator late at night, and there was a yogi in there with his hands in the dried figs or something like that. My friend said, "Oh, can I help you?" being polite. And the guy says, "I'm just looking for the maintenance office."

Before we get that far—I mean, nothing horrible would happen—but before we get that far, open to the potential for letting go and seeing that it's not deprivation. It's opening us up to the possibility of freedom, you know, to let go of the fig or the cheese or whatever.

It can be hard here, and there's a lot of opportunity for that—with food, with rooms, with your yogi job, with meditation. There's a way we're all giving to one another through our renunciation. And there will be times, believe me, when something is just going to seem like it has got to be fixed, it has got to be given. And if it's not given, I've got to take it because I can't make it another day.

When your mind gets into that mode—we'll talk more about it later—we call it yogi mind. Just give it a couple of days. Don't trust it right away. Don't necessarily believe that's the true path of happiness, whatever that thing is. But maybe then you can remember the precept: "Oh yeah, don't take what's not given."

It's not just a rule to make things easier for the people who run this place. It's a guideline for my liberation. And we can open up and explore in that way.

And again, not taking what's not given—where do we draw the lines in the world? I read an article in the New York Times from a population conference in Cairo, talking about food and the shortages that are coming. And another concern is water. Someone from the Worldwatch Institute was saying that we've entered a new era, one in which satisfying the needs for seafood, for example, of ninety million people being added each year—ninety million people each year—satisfying their needs for seafood requires reducing consumption for those already on Earth. Satisfying the demand for grain also means reducing the consumption of those already here.

So if that's true, it doesn't necessarily mean I should starve myself to death, but to me it does entail looking at that salmon spread I had the other night for dinner. Did I have a choice? Is that actually reducing the consumption for somebody else? There might be times I really need it and times I don't, and I can bring more awareness to that.

Or being out in New Mexico just recently, which is like Los Angeles—it's basically a desert. That blows me away, that Los Angeles is a desert and how much water is needed for how many people there. In New Mexico, water is going to be a major difficulty in the upcoming years, and to have a really nice garden someplace like that literally means taking water from other people when there isn't enough to go around.

So it's not about guilt, but for me it's about really looking at how I use resources, and looking at when I don't examine how I use resources because I just want to be comfortable, or because I can't be bothered—again, delusion—and seeing how different it feels when I do pay attention.

It's not a giving up, not self-denial, not some kind of harshness or self-hatred. You know, "I will never turn the heat on again in the winter because that takes away fuel from other people." That's ridiculous. I couldn't live in this climate if I did that. But when I turn it down a little bit, I can see that that's not a deprivation—that's an actualization of my sense of connection with the earth, with other beings. It's actually a movement of love and compassion, not a movement of deprivation.

It's quite a wonderful way, for me, to look at how I act. It is an actualization of our interconnectedness, of coming out of the obsessive self-referencing that happens when we're going against the precepts. We come out of that obsessive self-referencing into a sense of acting with kindness.

Because at bottom, we all just want to be happy. We're all the same in that. And if I do what makes myself and others happy, life works. If I think I'm making myself happy by taking from others, nobody's happy.

That's the gift of mindfulness—that when we pay attention to what we do and why we do it, we begin to discover that what we thought was making ourselves happy, taking more things, working in this consumer economy that seems to operate by making us want more things... I get the New York Times on Sunday, and it's just page after page of new things to want that we never even heard of before. You can come away thinking, "Wow, I've really got to have that."

Moving out of that sort of self-referencing, thinking that's what makes us happy, and seeing that acting out of kindness for all beings is what truly makes us happy—it's a wonderful, wonderful practice.

I always do this. I only got through two precepts. So just extrapolate to the other three.

For here, sexuality we don't have to work with too much at all—hopefully not at all. We're not working with it while we're here.

I mentioned the four aspects of wise speech. I just want to say them again: not lying; not using harsh or abusive speech; not using divisive speech, like two people talking and putting down a third person, or trying to come between two people out of jealousy or whatever; and not gossiping, just idle and frivolous talk.

One Tibetan teacher, Patrul Rinpoche, says that when you really look at gossip that seems to arise spontaneously and seems sort of harmless, really examine the intention. How often is the intention fueled by craving or aversion or hatred? Or, I would also add, conceit—the need to make oneself feel better or put oneself down. Just look at the intention behind gossip.

So working with our intention, with a real commitment to kindness to ourselves and to others, and using these precepts as guidelines—sometimes I feel this in itself is such a profound practice that it would begin to encompass all the rest. We can really learn how to rest at ease in ourselves, in whatever's happening, with other beings.

And we can feel quite viscerally, actually experience, that when we come into the meditation hall here, we do bring all of society with us. Quite literally, none of us is practicing for ourselves alone. In some way, we're practicing for all beings. We're practicing for the planet. How we really come to understand ourselves in the world is going to manifest in the way that we relate to ourselves in the world—through our speech and through our actions. There can't be a more powerful way to express our understanding than that.

There's one last line from the book: "These five precepts are a vehicle of happiness, a vehicle of good fortune, a vehicle for liberation. Let our virtue therefore be purified and shine forth."

Let us sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 280

Balanced Energy

Carol Wilson · 1h05

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson offers a profound reframing of meditation practice: shifting from evaluating progress to examining the balance of mental factors, particularly the quality of energy or effort (vīriya). Drawing from the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā), she explores how balanced energy manifests as effortless, interested presence rather than striving or pushing.
> Wilson examines the common pitfalls practitioners face with energy—both pushing too hard until reaching exhaustion, and backing off prematurely out of what Chögyam Trungpa called "idiot compassion." She shares personal stories from intensive retreat practice with Sayadaw U Paṇḍita, illustrating how even diligent outer form can mask an inner dryness when we ignore what truly needs attention. The key insight is that genuine interest—the kind we naturally bring to activities we love—generates its own effortless energy and doesn't require artificial cultivation.

> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing when we've fallen out of balance: noticing grimness, self-judgment, and the subtle shift from meeting experience to trying to control it. Wilson introduces the concept of saṃvega (spiritual urgency) as a skillful motivator, distinguishing it from panic or aversion. She encourages practitioners to use both gratitude for this precious opportunity and the reality of suffering as wake-up calls that naturally energize practice, while also knowing when to back off, open to spaciousness, and nourish the heart with what Thích Nhất Hạnh calls "seeds of joy."

Hopefully what I speak about tonight will be in the service of helping us begin to be able to evaluate our practice from the terms of balance rather than looking at it in terms of progress. It's a shift from worrying about what's happening to simply being, able to evaluate what's the balance of mental factors, what's the balance of energy here. It's a really different way to relate to what's going on, and it takes a lot of the suffering out.

This is my only current reading that I can share with you this talk—from the front of a magazine in the supermarket. Cosmopolitan. This is advertising an article which I did not read. It says, "Just when you've found perfect happiness, it's gone. No, but that's not the end. How to get it back." That's not what I'm promising tonight. That's progress. That's not what we're looking for.

So this notion of balance—and specifically I want to talk about the mental factor of energy, sometimes translated as effort. It came up the other morning in the questions when I was here, this question about how sometimes we give instructions for very precise, focused concentration, connecting with experience, and sometimes we talk about resting in spaciousness, open awareness. But the trick is this: open awareness must be vivid, alert, wakeful. And this precise, connected quality, this tremendous energy that we put out, has to also be effortless. How do we do that? That's a good question.

A lot of the ways or models in which one can speak about this practice of insight meditation are ways of looking at balance. For example, for those of you who came to listen to the tape talk last Friday by Sayadaw U Pandita, he spoke about the first of the seven factors of enlightenment, which is mindfulness. Big surprise. But this paradigm, this way of describing our experience as seven mental factors, is one of the ways of looking at our experience, our practice, in terms of balance.

Rather than asking, "Am I having a far-out sitting? Am I feeling happy? Are things really clear?"—or "No, I'm having too much emotion, things are difficult"—really, when you come into interviews, I'll let you in on a secret: we don't really care what's happening. We really don't. What we do care about, often, is looking at how these seven factors of experience, these seven factors of mind, are manifesting. Are they in balance with one another? Are they even present? They are, believe me, they are. But a lot of what we're doing is bringing them into balance with each other. And what particular appearance is manifesting really doesn't make any difference.

These seven qualities: the first is mindfulness. Then there are three energetic qualities, which are investigation—Dhamma investigation, not thinking about things—energy, or sometimes translated as effort, and rapture or joy. And then there are three tranquilizing or calmer qualities: calm or tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. Tonight I want to talk specifically about the quality of effort or energy. But I just mentioned that one way of understanding balance is within these seven factors. It takes a lot of the identification away if you look at your experience in that way.

The reason I like to use the translation "energy" for the Pali word viriya rather than "effort" is because personally, in my experience, I tend to identify more with the word "effort," as if somehow I should be able to control it. In that way, I think it's one of the ways we misinterpret and relate to the quality of energy in a way that brings on suffering—by not recognizing that it's impermanent and that it's not self. For me, it's really easy to identify or take personally, as me or mine, the quality of experience that manifests as energy.

If you keep coming to U Pandita's talks, you'll hear him speak of courageous heroic effort. That's an aspect of it. But if I think I should be putting out courageous heroic effort every moment or else I'm lazy, we run into difficulty when we hit the other aspect of the fact that energy is impermanent and rises and falls.

So how do we come into a relationship that can help us explore what's really happening with an attitude of interested evaluation, skillful means, rather than "I blew it" or "I'm the greatest yogi going"? How do we avoid relating to energy as if it's good and we should push harder and harder and harder until our head is hitting against the wall—in which case we totally give it up? "I'll just give up and take a few days off until it comes back." There's a middle ground here.

And that's what we can learn to work with in exploring this quality of balance—of energy, of effort.

The first aspect I find helpful is learning how to recognize and become comfortable with the experience of effortless energy, those times when there really is this strong, connected quality of energy that is not pushing. It's something Michelle spoke about on Monday: the quality of interest. I just want to make a couple of points about it.

We tend to think, as we know, that when there's interest, clearly the energy is there. It's not such an effort to pay attention. But if we think, "How can I be interested all day in this stuff that's going on?"—it just seems exhausting. Just the idea of getting interested in these things, as if somehow inherently the breath is not interesting or sensations are not interesting. Somewhere we have to crank up artificially this quality of interest, and that takes too much energy, and we don't have energy. So, you know, forget the whole thing.

Instead, we might look at it differently: that interest actually brings the energy, and that each of us has the capability to be really, effortlessly interested for long periods of time. Here we think, "Oh yeah, right. I can't stay with one breath. I can't stay with two breaths."

But how interested are you when you're really involved in working on your computer? I see people just drawn into the computer screen—they can't get away from it for hours. People who might think, "I don't have a very long attention span." Or watching friends watch sports on television. It's actually quite enthralling to me to watch my friends just glued for hours. They're not saying, "It's so exhausting to pay attention to this sports game. I just don't know if I can keep the attention, the interest going." Quite the contrary. If one were to try to start another conversation, it wouldn't even be heard. Total samadhi on sports. It's fascinating to me, actually.

In this country, it's football. In Europe, it's soccer. I remember when the World Cup was happening—my boyfriend's German, so being American, I never would have turned it on. But he's just as into it as Americans are into the Super Bowl. We were traveling around the country teaching, and everywhere we went we'd have to find a television. We were working at a retreat in California in a convent. We had to dig up a television, bring it into the one free room there, and run in and watch the World Cup in between every free moment. And the interest is infectious, because pretty soon all the women who were cooking for us on the retreat were in there watching too. Then one time we came in and they had already turned it on—they'd been into it for an hour before we'd even arrived. Nobody's saying, "I'm so tired of this." It's very enlivening.

I'll tell you a secret: there's not something inherently interesting about soccer or football that we cannot find in the process of our own life here. It is really so much more interesting than a stupid game on television. Why do we find it so difficult to contact this quality of interest, which in itself brings effortless energy? Interest is not inherent in the particular experience, but we relate as if it's so.

We think, "Well, if something's really intense, I'll get interested." Or in our days here—now we'll come back to the retreat environment and out of football—if what's happening in your sitting or your walking or your eating is really different all of a sudden, or intense, or if it meets some idea you have of what's good practice, then we get interested.

But so often people will come in and say, "Yeah, nothing's happening. It's not very interesting."

I'll say, "Nothing?"

"Oh, yeah, well, sure, there's the breath and there's a lot of calm and sensations come and go and thoughts and emotions."

"So a lot of things are arising and passing and there's calmness?"

"Yeah, yeah, I guess there's a lot of things happening, but it's all so familiar. So it's not that interesting."

I read this in a San Francisco paper a couple of years ago. A young twenty-one-year-old woman born with cystic fibrosis—a lung disease you're born with that gets progressively worse; you rarely live much past thirty. At twenty-one, she had a partial lung transplant from each of her parents to keep her alive longer. And she said—it's quite young and naive, but it's so sweet—she said, "It's so nice to be able to breathe like a normal person. I stand up straight all by myself now, and I don't have blue fingers or blue lips. I love air. It's so nice."

Breathing is the most wonderful feeling that I could ever imagine. It's wonderful.

We don't really know if we're ever going to have another breath. And that's just the fact of life. How can it get so mundane to us? It's so easy for us to lose this quality of interest, of connection that brings everything so alive—that then lets the energy, the effort become much more balanced without our striving so hard.

One thing that happens when we begin to experience what's happening as familiar or a bit mundane, not very interesting, is that really the mindfulness, the attention, is just sort of skimming the surface of experience. That's why there's so much emphasis on experiencing mindfulness as that stone that drops in—a stone that drops in, not that's thrown in. It drops easily by itself. Sometimes it just touches the surface and floats a little, and then if you just let it sit there, it'll start to sink. Even that cork. So many people have come and said, "I don't want to be like the cork. I want to be like the stone." No, no. Even if you just let the cork sit, it'll eventually get waterlogged and sink.

But that's a lot of why the emphasis on mindfulness is sinking in, because when there's that gentle connection, the interest comes back. The breath is interesting. Sensations are interesting. Frustration is interesting. Boredom can even be interesting—when there's just that willingness to touch it with attention. That's why we have such an emphasis on the sinking in quality of mindfulness.

And again, that non-discriminating quality that we've mentioned—of not choosing "this is worth being mindful of and this isn't"—because another way that helps us balance the energy through balancing interest is to balance our perspectives, or balance our perception, our interpretation of experience. And again, I've spoken of this, I'll just touch on it, but the balance is not to get so caught in our evaluations of "this is good practice, this is bad, this is a horrible experience, this shows I'm worthless, this is a great experience, this shows I'm really getting it." All this interpretation is what gets in the way of a commonality of interest and a balanced energy.

Because when we define something as painful, bad, not worth attention, or going in the wrong direction, we tend to pull away or get involved in struggle. Immediately the energy gets out of balance. It turns to pushing. Or, "this is good, this should stay"—again, the energy gets out of balance. It turns to "hold on, hold on, make this happen more."

The only energy or effort that we are cultivating, wise effort, is simply the energy to meet what happens fully. To meet it, to sink in, just as it is. That's all. As soon as it tips over into trying to push away or change or hold on to, we've moved out of balanced energy into striving or aversion, and we start to suffer.

So again, one way, another way that helps us come back to balance is to balance our perspective, our perception. And sometimes a little reflection on our experience can help. Because reflection can be helpful—permitted thinking. You get about three sentences to reflect, and then when the first sentence repeats, it's time to stop and reconnect with something else that's happening. But a little balanced reflection can be extremely helpful.

So when you're thinking, "Oh no," as for some reason a lot of people—not everybody, but a lot of people in the last couple of days—are like, "Oh no, it's all going to hell now. And it was going so well." And implicit, even though we say, "Well, I know it all comes and goes and I'm just being with it," but often that nub down there: "What did I do wrong? How can I get it back like it was?" Right away you know you're going to be in unbalanced effort, unbalanced energy.

So a little reflection, just to notice. You can't say, "This is good and this is bad, this should be here, this shouldn't." You can't separate the two. Thich Nhat Hanh has a wonderful way of describing it. He says, you know, we love a rose—really beautiful. Garbage—not worth our attention. But if you have a rose long enough, like those beautiful yellow roses up here, they decay and decay, and pretty soon we throw them in the garbage. And they are the garbage. How can you separate them?

Then we take the garbage, turn it into compost, put it on the flower beds, and it grows more roses. You can't separate this is rose and this is garbage. They're absolutely part of each other.

And it's the same in our meditation. You have an incredibly perfect, brilliant day of flowing clear mindfulness—or whatever for you constitutes a perfect, brilliant day, whatever your mind decides is perfect, brilliant practice. And what happens within probably two days maximum? Gone. Gone. And instead, a turmoil of emotion. Overcome with anger or restlessness, lost in a flurry of doubt or self-hatred or whatever it might be, or just plain frustration.

It's so easy to think those are two separate events, when in fact, we can never trace all the causes and effects, but I would posit from my experience that they are absolutely mutually interdependent—both equally vital aspects of the unfolding of our practice.

We don't get it all one way. And in fact, most of the really deep understandings that have arisen in my mind in practice and in life, the ones that have really served me, so many of them have come out of the most god-awful times in practice.

Because sometimes, if we can get over our "this is bad, make it go away, try, try, try"—if we can just see that this is also an opening into truth—this absolutely dreadful experience of self-hatred and frustration can be the opening into connecting again with the sublime. When we can have that attitude, the interest comes back and the effort comes back into balance. In other words, the effort stops trying to change it and simply meets it. And then the flower opens by itself.

A poem I like that expresses this, from Izumi Shikibu, a Japanese woman of about the tenth or eleventh century:

Although the wind blows terribly here,
the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house.

I love it. As we look up because the wind's blowing and the roof planks are exposed and the house is ruined—just when we're ready to get into a rage, we notice the moonlight streaming in. I feel like that a lot. A ruined house with moonlight streaming in. That's our life. That's our practice.

So we're learning, when the interest is there, how to recognize and become familiar with this quality, this mental factor of effortless energy, of balanced effort. Become familiar. Recognize it. Because in the recognition, it becomes easier to find it again.

I've found that when the energy is balanced like that and the interest comes, it's its own reward. One of the ways I know that my energy is balanced is because I really don't care anymore what's happening. That quality of meeting whatever's happening with a fullness of presence is so fulfilling that I really am not needing for what's happening to be better or worse. I'm not needing for something nice to stay. It just feels so wholehearted.

Recognize. You all have that experience at times. Recognize it. Because it will change. There is no way it's not going to change. It doesn't mean we made a mistake. But recognize it, because when it does change, the way we learn how to come into balance is by falling out of balance. That's something Chögyam Trungpa said once. Balance implies a kind of tilting, right? Balance doesn't imply a static sense—"Oh, I've gotten there, I'm balanced, it stays." We get that sense, what it feels like, that wholeheartedness of effortless energy, and then it tips out. Because we learn to recognize its presence, we learn to recognize when it tilts out and how it tilts out. So rather than blaming, it's information.

One way—and maybe it's the most subtle way, but it's probably the most common—is that in a space of wholehearted effort, just being present, really present, one can put out a tremendous quality of energy in this space of balanced wholeheartedness. And then somehow, slightly somewhere, we don't notice, but the motivation shifts a little bit. It doesn't take much. And the energy that we put out, which was just to meet what's happening very fully, moment to moment—

There can come in just a little bit of wanting to change, or "I meet this so that it can open, so that the process can continue." You know, "I will meet this to control it." Or somehow the mind is just leaning forward a little bit into the future, just thinking how this present space is going to turn into something else.

It can be very subtle. You'll find your own way. But you already have your own ways—you'll start to recognize them. And often we don't notice that first change right at the beginning. It can be a little subtle. But it starts to feel different. The quality of effort takes on a kind of tightness, a striving. A little bit we're falling out of balance, or leaning forward, or looking back, rather than being right here.

And maybe we don't notice that. It still feels like we're putting out a really strong effort. This isn't when we've given up. This is when we're heading towards the beating-our-head-against-the-wall phase. Where it goes from feeling fulfilling, it starts to feel a little strained. We begin to feel frustrated. Self-doubt starts to come in—some kind of "I can't do this, I'm no good," or "this is no good," whatever form it takes. Judgment. And all of a sudden, it's one big drag. We don't quite see how it got there, and it doesn't matter.

But it's interesting to notice, to look back at the motivation, because you can be putting out an enormous amount of effort and energy, but because the effort is tinged with wanting or expectation, we've fallen out of balance. And it leads into such tightness, striving, doubt, frustration—all of those.

So this quality of interest, this really heroic enthusiasm, in some way has to come in a balanced way from within ourselves. Once it's not there, if we don't recognize that and try to come back into balance, it's easy to practice very diligently but in a dead, dry sort of way—meeting the outer form, but the inner connection isn't there. And ultimately, you can't keep it up. It cracks somehow.

I'll give an example. A few years ago, I came here to do a two-month retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, which does require an enormous amount of energy and effort. It's not like you can go into him and say, "Well, I felt a little tight, so I went out for a walk in the woods, and then I took a walk around the pond and read a little bit, had some tea, and I'm feeling much better." He doesn't cut a lot of slack, the way that he teaches.

Now, when I'm in a balanced space, as I said, a tremendous effort can be put out. And I know what that looks like because I've done it before. But at the beginning of this particular retreat, the day before the retreat began, I was flying here from somewhere, at an airport somewhere, and I spoke to my mother on the phone. She told me she had just been diagnosed with cancer and was going to have an operation—a double operation—in about a week. It was a shock. I didn't even know this was in the works. It really hit me.

So I said, "Well, I'm coming home." She said, "No, I don't want you to come. You can't come"—which was not like her. She said, "You have to go do your retreat. It's very important to you. You must go do your retreat." But she was so adamant that I felt, well, she really doesn't want me to come. So I came to do the retreat, which you can imagine I wasn't in the most wonderful space.

So I came and I just started. I would call her every day, and it became clear that the operation went well and things were fine. The call didn't feel like much of a disturbance—I'd call and go right back to the practice. So outer form, I was really matching it: sitting, walking, noting, not moving away from effort. I knew how to make it look right, even to myself.

But there was something so dry and dead. There wasn't the balance of interest and spontaneous connection. I was just trying to match a form. It took me three weeks to realize this. I felt like I was being slowly strangled somehow, until finally one day—I used to always walk in a hall on the second floor of the Catskills—I was walking up the stairs to my place, and this thought came into my mind. But you know those thoughts that you know are more than thoughts? You really believe this one, like the voice from the divine or something. Whatever this says, that's how it is. And this thought said, "If someone else is walking in my place, I'm leaving the retreat."

And I thought, huh, I think I'd really do it too. And fortunately—or not—no one was walking there. But that really woke me up. I said, what is going on here? And it just actually woke me up to the fact that half of me wasn't here. Doing the form without that balance of interest, I could have done it for ten years and all I would do is get drier and drier.

So actually I did leave the retreat and go home, and it was the perfect thing to do. I stayed home for ten days and came back and really enjoyed it—just sank right in, because that sense of split wasn't there. I could be wholehearted.

It's not always such a dramatic thing, but sometimes we fall into ignoring a major issue that's going on and trying to just make our effort, our practice, meet an idea we have. But we can't be wholehearted because we're ignoring some major experience that's happening. So sometimes when you hit that real dryness, open up, pull back. What is going on? Because balanced effort—it's not about how it looks to yourself or anybody else. It's not about matching some ideal experience. It's about that quality of energy and interest that can just meet experience, moment to moment to moment.

Now, on the other side—and I'm going to keep going back and forth because there's never any one way—sometimes we push too hard. The effort becomes dull and dry out of expectation, or out of not seeing something major going on that we need to give attention to. But on the other side, that doesn't mean that at the first sign of something difficult or dry, we go, "Uh-oh, turning into dry, I better check out, I better open up, I better just give myself some kindness." It's not that either.

As we've said with aversion or with sleepiness—as Joseph mentioned the other night about sloth and torpor—the first effect of unpleasant experience or tiredness, low energy in the mind, is that the mind pulls away from what's going on. And if there's a lot of difficulty, it has the effect of withering the mind because it keeps pulling away. And if you just pound at it, pound at it, you do get exhausted. The energy does really drop. It falls down. We get fatigued.

It's said that energy is like a support—it's like it supports a house, holds it up. So when there's energy, you can be with something that's difficult in a fresh, balanced way. You notice, depending on your energy cycle, if you're fresh in the morning and you have a chronic ongoing pain that comes up throughout the day, in a fresh time you can really meet it, be with it, be interested. In a low energy time, it's almost impossible because the energy just isn't there to meet it freshly.

But rather than just give up, we can withdraw from what's difficult—and I don't mean give up, I just mean take the energy away from pounding at the difficult, that "I'm going to be with this sensation no matter what." Pull it away and freshen it. Which, as we've said often, means open up to sounds, open up to seeing if you're outside, take a walk. This is not giving up; it's deliberately doing things that can freshen and bring back some energy, and then meeting what is difficult or tiring. It really helps to have the mind bright, clear, and alert.

But it is important to find that balance of when to keep meeting what's difficult without giving up and when to back off. At the first sign of difficulty to back off is really, as Joseph said, confusing sloth and torpor with compassion. Or another phrase from Trungpa that I love: idiot compassion. It's not really compassion. It's saying, "Yeah, it'll really be hard on me. I'm just so tired. If I keep practicing, it'll just make things harder for me. They say refresh, so I'll just take a five-hour nap and refresh." That's idiot compassion because it actually increases suffering. It doesn't help suffering ease, which is the point of compassion. So it's not necessarily kind to yourself.

Something I've discovered when I'm in this state of low energy, not real interest—but not when you're overwhelmed by something like terror or something really, really difficult to be with, just this sort of "eh, this is just too much, who wants to keep doing this, it's boring, it's not interesting"—

I'll just check out. That's the time to fall back on—not pushing, not unbalanced effort—but to fall back on continuity. I found it's actually much easier to be here 100% than it is to be here 80%. That might sound odd, but look and see.

When things aren't going the way I want, I don't try and change it, but I say, as we've said before, just sit, just walk. When I'm done with the walking, I just go sit. What happens in the sitting is absolutely out of my control. I'm not sitting and trying to get clear or trying to have things be a certain way. But just sit, and if I can, I come back when I space out.

When I get up from the sitting, if you're at 80%, you'll think, "Well, maybe I should have a cup of tea now because that would really kind of soothe me. Tea is so comforting." Or, "Maybe I should do something energetic, like do all my laundry. That would be a good thing to do." On and on, and the energy is just leaking out through the thinking and all the sense doors. "Maybe I'll read the bulletin board for the 450th time today. There just might be a note for me."

If I'm here 100%, I get up from the sitting and I think, "Oh, I'd like to—" but it doesn't matter what you'd like to, because you're going to walk out of this room and start walking and that's it. It actually saves a tremendous amount of energy to just do that instead of letting your mind and body run hither and thither. So you just sit, you just walk. When the walking's done, you just sit. And don't worry about what's happening. That's where all the suffering and strife is—worrying about what's happening. It's not actually in doing the sitting and the walking.

This has saved me in so many periods of boredom or frustration or low energy. I just die into the practice. Now you can see this is just the opposite of what I was telling you a minute ago, right? That's how it works with trying to balance energy or effort. You can't take one thing and say this is how to do it.

On the Sayadaw U Pandita retreat, it looked like that's what I was doing—dying into the practice, sit, walk, sit, walk. But actually I was ignoring something major. Other times, when there's nothing really major going on and I just basically have low energy and would rather not put out any effort, when I just wish things were different—then I do die into the practice. Just sit, just walk, but don't try to be brilliant about it. Just let it happen. And you know what? The energy comes back by itself. The interest comes back.

That's where we can begin to see that energy is simply a factor of mind. It rises and falls. It's affected by conditions. This to me is where it gets really interesting instead of personal. It's affected by conditions.

Skillful means interventions can sometimes change conditions if we do it with a motivation that isn't out of wanting it to be a certain way. For instance, I know with sloth and torpor that the energy's low. If I aim very carefully at the breath or at sensations, if I make the noting quite precise, that takes effort and it brings up the energy. It's just a balanced activity. It's not that I do it because I hate sloth and torpor. If restlessness is there, I know there can be a lot of energy but not enough concentration. I can deliberately cultivate concentration by really coming back to the breath over and over and over without trying to notice too many things. The concentration gets stronger and comes up to balance with the energy, and again the restlessness can shift. That's just two examples. That comes from not identifying with energy, but simply seeing that conditions can change it.

One other aspect that I find very helpful: when it's past the point of skillful evaluation and energy just seems to have dropped out of the bottom and interest is gone, then again we're coming back to wise reflection, which can really be a helpful ally on the quality of spiritual urgency. In Pali, that's samvega. It's a particular quality. It comes from really recognizing the suffering aspects of all life, of our life—not with terror, but with an urge to understand, an urge to be free, or to help other beings, so that this becomes more urgent.

more important than avoidance or denial. Spiritual urgency is a very energizing state. It's not panic. It's not terror. It's not some frantic sense of "Oh my God, I better get out of this quick!" But it's very energizing, helping us meet whatever difficulty is arising.

There are a couple of reflections or contemplations that we can reach into our bag of tricks when energy has gotten really low and you can't generate interest in a balanced way and you don't want to push. One, of course, is appreciation of the preciousness of our current life. Being here on retreat is a rare opportunity, because each of us can consciously reflect on the preciousness of having this time in life, in any one life. The preciousness of having the time to deeply explore what is true, what is suffering, what is peace, what is freedom. That we not only have the time and the health to do it, but that each of us has the interest—which in some ways is the most rare of all.

I think often of being in Bodh Gaya, which as you know is the town where the Buddha was supposedly enlightened. The descendant of the tree under which he sat has a big temple stupa in the middle of a park, and it's a focal point for Buddhist pilgrims from all the Buddhist countries of the world. It's this dusty little village—well, it's not so little anymore, it's really grown—and you can see the interest and devotion that people bring. I also often reflect on the people who live there and run the chai shops, the tea shops, and who do all the things to make money from the tourists, and who maybe have access, have opportunity to hear many teachings and just aren't interested. It's simply not important to them in this life. And here we've schlepped from halfway around the world to go and just sit under this tree. I actually got very inspired, which surprised me because I'm not so devotional, but it was very moving. And the people who live there could care less.

So just to reflect: even though I don't feel any energy, even though nothing's happening in my practice and nothing ever will, still there's this precious opportunity and I have the willingness and the interest to come and put myself here and to stay here. No mean feat. To really let yourself feel the gratitude, the appreciation for that. Not guilt—this is not a guilt trip. We're talking about real appreciation for our opportunities. Often that can bring up, again, energy and interest.

There's a little something I read from Colette, the French woman writer. She said, "What a wonderful life I've had. I only wish I'd realized it sooner." So this is our chance. This is sooner. It's now. What a wonderful life we have.

And then the other reflection—I'm going to condense the three into one—is basically our old friend and inspiration, the fact of suffering in all its aspects. Suffering is a tremendous motivator for urgency, for understanding. Again, not for panic. I'm not talking about panic. But it's what got the Bodhisattva before he became the Buddha. The story is that he lived this pristine life where all death and impermanence and sickness was hidden from him. And he left his palace grounds and went out, and it's called the Four Heavenly Messengers, where he ran into an old person, a sick person, a dead person. He was so shocked, asking his charioteer, "Well, what's that? Does it happen to everybody? Will it happen to me?" Just seeing that suffering, he couldn't rest anymore in a life of pleasure. It woke him up to compassion for the situation of all of us, including him, and to wanting to find the freedom from that pain and confusion. The fourth messenger being a renunciate, which represents a path to understanding.

These messengers are available to us at all times in our lives. I personally find it an enormously helpful and inspiring way to relate to suffering, whether it's your knee pain here, or your frustration, or your boredom, or whether it's in the bigger picture, watching someone else. You can feel when someone here might be suffering. You can see it. Or just looking at nature.

Or I often have to go to a hospital in Worcester to see my doctor, a big teaching hospital. And in some way I love going there. Now this might sound strange, but I love going there because it wakes me up. I just go there and make it a point to really look around, to see people from all walks of life—from young children to the very old, people who don't speak English, with all kinds of suffering and all kinds of responses to that suffering. You can see confusion and terror, or a real spark of light, or someone who's kind to someone else and how much it lights them up. I always come back from being at the hospital feeling much more connected and attuned, and also more resolute in my willingness to meet whatever's arising in my experience—using the experience of suffering in whatever aspect as a wake-up call rather than as something fearful or as something to try to hide from. It helps us see what's really important.

This is a little bit from a man who has a degenerative lung disease. This is my second lung disease story, I didn't realize that. To me, this is really about urgency and seeing what's important:

"Walking anywhere with friends, especially uphill, is an occasion for silence. I cannot walk, talk, and breathe at the same time. Every gram of oxygen must be used for locomotion. There is nothing left over. Superfluity must go. Whatever is extra must go.

This becomes an amazing metaphor. In my life, in my mind, what is superfluous? What is extra? Anger that freezes into resentment, jealousy, greed, gossip, ego clinging, pretense, embarrassment, any form of fixation, running after pleasure, the discursive thought that maintains the storyline of me. These things are very costly in terms of the life energy that it takes to keep them going. They are what conversation is mostly about. I cannot take in enough oxygen to support them anymore, except by holding completely still and doing nothing else.

When the oxygen is diminished below a certain point, you must choose absolutely between feeding all your mental bloodsuckers and taking care of your true business. You cannot afford to keep them around as pets. What an opening, what a discovery follows from that simple realization. Could I ever afford it? Can anyone? What made me think that I could not let go of this expensive baggage before now?"

That's not spoken with a quality of aversion. That's just with the quality of spiritual urgency. What's really important? Is freedom important enough that I can bring my attention—feeling for him the suffering of his lungs, for us whatever happens to be arising? That's all.

And the urgency brings us a resoluteness that we sometimes can lose touch with otherwise. As one of my teachers said, comparing urgency to your house being on fire—which the Buddha also used as a metaphor often—when your house is on fire and someone comes to tell you, you immediately start home. And if you meet an old friend who says, "Hey, let's go have a cappuccino, let's sit and talk for a while," you don't have to stop and ponder, "Well, should I have the coffee, should I go home?" No, we go home. That's the quality of energy that urgency can bring up in us. It just clarifies what really matters.

And so we can use reflection to reconnect with that space, both from gratitude and from suffering as a wake-up call. In some ways we're all here as the fourth messenger—all have, in a way, answered the call of the renunciate to be here for three months, to clear away the complexities of life so we can really explore. In some ways we've each, for now, made that clear decision about what is really important. It's not that you don't each already know for yourselves. So the urgency isn't stirring up something new. It's just a way to help us reconnect with what we already know, at times when we're getting a little lost or a little low in energy.

And of course, it can always flip to the other side. I could just go on forever—this side and this side, this side and this side. Urgency, again, can drift out of balance and backfire. As urgency inspires interest, inspires commitment, inspires effort, an opening to suffering, gratitude—again, it can get to be a little out of balance, both ways. Leaving the comfort zone with urgency waking us up, or opening more to suffering, or really seeing what's so—sometimes the energy and the mindfulness isn't quite as strong as the amount of difficulty that comes in, as we all well know. And sometimes, rather than just being able to resolutely meet what's happening, it's as if we're washed over, overwhelmed.

The suffering just becomes so great that it's as if we're getting sucked into a black hole, just getting lost and spinning. And it's not a matter of "oh, let me just meet this mindfully." It's a matter of simply not drowning anymore.

At that point, what is really skillful before we completely wither is to back off out of skillful means. But in this state of feeling overwhelmed by suffering, it's very hard for most people to trust that backing off is what is skillful. Because usually what most people I know or talk to tend to do is to think, "This is hard, so I must try harder. I must really sit with this. I must really meet this." And so we push and push, and again we start moving into trying to change things. We get grimmer and grimmer, and we think, "Well, if I try harder, then I'll really be with it."

But grimness is not equal to balanced effort. The more grim you are does not mean you're doing better practice. It means, all it means, is that you're grim. That's really all it means.

So when we're getting into that space of "it's too much pain, so push, push, push," the absolutely skillful thing to do is to back off, open up, bring in what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy. He talks about being in Vietnam during the war, working with the social workers, and they're so busy and there's so much death and pain around them and they're so busy working with it. He would say, "I have to remind them to open up, to smell the beautiful smells of the herbs at night, to smell the flowers, to really appreciate the beauty of nature here in Vietnam."

And you can see, we can get so involved in suffering it seems—what do you mean, smell the nice smells of the coriander? People are dying! But it's very important. We need to back off to refresh the heart and mind, which in itself brings back energy.

So bringing in seeds of joy. I don't mean immediately go into some erotic fantasy, but more open your attention to seeds of joy that are present here and now. Smell the mint, as Thich Nhat Hanh says. When we are endlessly exhorting you to open up to sound, that's the way to bring in spaciousness.

I used to, in really hard times in retreat, when I would never go outside because I was just so slow, it was too much trouble—I would just go open the door of the fire escape, my little walkway there in the Catskills, and stand on the fire escape and just be with that big tree that's right outside there for a few minutes. That's all. I'd just be with the tree. I'd quit trying to be mindful or know. Just, ahh. The tree and the sky would bring in a spaciousness, a happiness. It was wonderful. And that was usually all I needed—just enough to balance the grimness, the heaviness, the trying. And with that spaciousness, I could go back to my walking or sitting and just meet whatever was happening.

Sometimes we need a little bit more than being with a tree for a few minutes. Sometimes you really need to go outside. You might need not to sit or walk, but just take a walk. But it's coming from skillful means, not from aversion or "I've had it."

And the catch is this: when you're in this state where you really need the skillful means of backing off, what usually is also happening is strong self-judgment. "I'm not good enough. I'm not doing this right. I'm not trying hard enough." And when self-judgment is happening and we don't see it, you'll never believe that it's skillful to back off because self-judgment is right there to say, "Uh-uh, you're not trying hard enough. You're lazy. You're not doing it right. What did they say about do it 100%? Go, go, try!" You're back in the football game.

Whenever your mind says, in that tone of voice, "You're not trying hard enough," it almost always means back off. But we just don't trust it. So I've learned over the years how to recognize the presence of self-judgment. That's a big step—just recognize its presence and then realize that all your evaluations at that moment are filtered through the lens of self-judgment, and you can't believe them.

So when you feel tight and grim and dour, and you're pushing, pushing, pushing, and you think, "I need to push harder"—just pause. Think, "Oh, maybe I'm actually pushing too hard." And try to open up and back off.

That's how we discover balance: by falling out of it. The worst that can happen is you back off and the energy drops a little bit. So what? Probably what will actually happen is you back off, everything becomes more spacious, and the energy comes up again. The interest comes up. We reconnect with the inner spring of interest and contentment.

Another trick: when you feel that voice saying "push, push, try harder," and you're wondering whether to back off, see if you can notice the intention behind the need to try harder. Is the intention just to meet what's happening? Or are you trying harder out of fear that you're going to lose it? Or trying harder in an attempt to make something happen? Or out of some kind of self-blame—"I have to try harder because I'm so useless"?

All of those are good signs as well. Self-judgment is coloring your evaluation. Back off.

So this is our constant, ongoing challenge in working with balancing energy: how not to get lost in pushing, in expectation, in dry striving; how to bring in spaciousness and nourish our heart; and at the same time, never give up, never abandon energy either.

Something that actually inspires me—I read in the Dalai Lama's autobiography that even now, the Dalai Lama, you'd think he could take it easy. He gets up early and does formal practice of four to five hours a day. I thought, "Wow."

Now, if you're in self-judgment, that will only make you feel worse, so forget I said it. But if you can use it as inspiration—"Oh, there's no way it's ever going to be perfect"—then let go of that and just play with this ongoing balance. Every time we tip out of balance, it's just another way to learn. It's not a big mistake.

This is our ongoing challenge.

CHAPTER 281

Four Foundations of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this comprehensive teaching, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), the Buddha's foundational discourse on the four establishments of mindfulness. She emphasizes that these teachings are not measures of perfection but practical tools for awakening, noting the Buddha's bold opening claim that this is "the direct path for the purification of beings."
>
> Wilson carefully unpacks each of the four foundations: mindfulness of body (kāya), feeling tone (vedanā), consciousness and mental states (citta), and mental objects (dhammā). She stresses that the "how" of practice matters more than the "what"—abiding with ardency, full awareness, and freedom from craving and aversion. Drawing on her experience as a nun in Thailand, including attending autopsies as contemplation practice, she illustrates how body awareness can transform our relationship with physicality and mortality. The teaching on vedanā receives special attention as the crucial link in dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda) where suffering can be interrupted.
>
> Throughout the talk, Wilson emphasizes participatory mindfulness—being fully present within experience rather than observing from a distance. She quotes Thich Nhat Hanh: "You live in the body in full awareness of it, not just study it like a separate object." The teaching culminates in understanding how continuous mindfulness reveals impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and non-self, naturally loosening our entrancement with appearances and opening us to the true nature of mind.

Tonight I want to talk about actually the very basic root of our practice, the Discourse of the Buddha on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness.

But first I just have to share something with you. It seemed to me such a perfect example of how outside of the normal stream we are—or I am anyway. I was watching the news tonight and an advertisement came on that showed a beautiful nature scene and then a beautiful sunset. The announcer said, "How can you put a price on a beautiful sunset?" Then it showed another beautiful nature scene from a distance, a wilderness and a river and a little trestle railroad going over, and said, "Can you put a price on a journey of discovery?" And then it got very upbeat and said, "This is America—of course you can." I thought, we're in trouble.

So countering that way of thinking, I want to talk about the very basics of our practice, the four foundations of mindfulness. Remember this morning I mentioned how the Buddha talked about the leaves in his hand and the leaves in the forest, and the leaves in his hand being all we need to know for freedom. I think this sutta, this sutra on the foundations of mindfulness—or the establishments of mindfulness, or it could be translated as four ways of setting up mindfulness—could maybe be one of the most important leaves as a tool for our awakening. Not as a measure of perfection that we have to live up to, but as tools to help us relate to our experience in a way that can open us to freedom within it.

The Buddha doesn't mince words. This is how he begins: "Bhikkhus"—which means monks, but it also is used to refer to anyone who is on the path of practice—"Bhikkhus, this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbana, namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

So this is serious stuff. And it's also very practical, very simple and basic as a way to practice. He talks about four different areas that comprise the whole of our experience, our mind and body experience, and just gives systematic ways to be aware, to be in relationship to all aspects of our experience—these four foundations. This leads to a penetrating understanding of the characteristics of each and all aspects of experience, of the true nature of who we are, of mind and body. It allows for the unhooking of the mind from attachment or aversion to any and all of these manifestations. And it allows for recognition of our true nature. It's extremely profound.

So there are these four areas which I'll describe, which we're practicing. But it's not just the what—these four, and you should be with them. What's much more important is the how. Throughout the whole sutra, after each specific establishment or domain of mindfulness, he reiterates over and over the how.

What are the four? They're mindfulness of body, mindfulness of vedana (feeling or feeling tones), mindfulness of consciousness and emotions (citta), and mindfulness of dhammas, which is usually translated as objects of mind. He mentions those, but he says it's the how. One abides contemplating each of these—feelings as feelings, body as body—ardent, fully aware and mindful, having put away covetousness and grief for the world. Or you could say having put away craving and distaste for the world. So it's not just glomming on with mindfulness, but in each moment of mindfulness there's ardency, the fullness of energy, fully aware, mindful, without craving and without distaste or aversion. This is a moment of mindfulness. And over and over he emphasizes these qualities.

I want to describe a bit about each of the four foundations. We're familiar with them all. It's what we've been doing. It's just putting it into a more specific context. And really getting it that there's no hierarchy. It's not like if you're doing better you're more aware of feeling tone, and if you're really not doing well then you have to stay with mindfulness of body. The point is it really doesn't matter. It's not the particular foundation or the object of mindfulness that matters. It's the quality of mindfulness connecting with each experience that lets any experience of our life be the potential gateway for the heart's liberation. Anything, everything, if we pay attention to the way the Buddha describes for being present with it.

In mindfulness of body, he actually talks about fourteen different exercises, and within those fourteen there are many, many other refinements. So you can see it's not about trying to get some particular technique. It's just whatever way helps us be present with the body. There's mindfulness of breathing—we're all very familiar with that. There's mindfulness of each of the four major bodily postures: walking meditation, standing, sitting, lying down, and the intervals in between. There's a practice called moving the attention through the body, paying attention to the thirty-two parts of the body, which is a really good way to work with the body if you're experiencing a lot of lust. Because the thirty-two parts go from hair of the head and skin and bone and nails and sinews and pus and blood and spittle and phlegm and the different organs.

And by the time we spend a good long while doing this practice, there's not a lot that one really wants to cling to. But it's not meant to generate disgust—it's simply to see things as they are.

There's clear comprehension, which is what we've been emphasizing in moving through the day: being fully aware of your body, the sensations in your body as you act, whatever it is you're doing. Being aware of bending, washing, stooping, turning, going to the toilet, dressing, eating. Being fully present in the actual sensations, not in a concept about what we're doing. All this is very familiar to you, I hope.

The Buddha gives nine different cemetery or charnel ground contemplations, which I suppose was more possible during his time—sitting in cemeteries and observing corpses in varying stages of decay. This might seem an odd notion to us. But actually, when I was a nun in Thailand, they would let nuns and monks in Bangkok go to hospitals and sit in on autopsies as a way of honoring this aspect of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. I did that a couple of times. They would let us not only sit in the room like a classroom with students, but they also let us go in the back room where the bodies were laid out on tables before the autopsy. We could go right up and just be there.

It's really powerful. It's a very powerful practice for coming up against ideas one doesn't even know one has—perhaps, if you haven't spent time around dead people. I don't know if "dead people" is an accurate phrase, but around bodies that no longer have life in them. Just to be in that, to see how everything looks alive but something's really missing. It's a fascinating place for running up against our fears and attachments and identifications, and even just the questions of what life is. I really found that very powerful. In retrospect, it really puts one's own life and relationship to one's body into perspective.

Another way the Buddha speaks about mindfulness of body is to experience sensations not through interpretation—"pain in my knee," "sinus infection," "clogging in my chest," or even "breath"—but in terms of the four great elements, which the Buddha taught make up both the world and our body: the earth element, fire element, air element, and water element.

Now, this used to drive me nuts. I really thought, "Well, that's just as conceptual as talking about pain in my knee. I'm sitting here wondering, is this water element? Is this earth element?" It didn't seem worth doing. But if you just let the idea sink in, something shifts. The earth element is the sense of solidity—heaviness, tightness, constriction, solidness, weight. The air element is movement, pressure, any kind of motion. The fire element is temperature—coolness, heat, changes in temperature, and also decay. The water element we can feel in the fluids moving in our body, in tears, in saliva. Classically, though, it's described as cohesion.

I just really understood the other day what that actually means, the cohesive quality of water. I was watching someone pour water out of a tea kettle, holding it up high so the water would travel a ways before it hit the pot. It's interesting that the water stays all together in a little stream—it doesn't just go all over the place. "Oh yes, that's cohesion. It holds together." So that quality of cohesion is present in each moment of material physical experience, kind of holding it together. We might not always feel it.

One way this approach—experiencing physical materiality or body sensations on the level of elements—is really helpful is that it breaks down our sense of continuity. It's really hard to identify with "earth element." "My knee is killing me" is a solid "me" thing. But heaviness? Stabbing? Movement, air element, earth element—we don't get too excited about "my earth element is going wild now." It's just heaviness.

Even more, this practice can give us a real sense of interconnectedness. Because it's not that the earth element in this body is sort of like the earth element in the earth—it's the same. Same with the water, same with all of it. We can actually experience that we are nature, that we are part of nature.

I read somewhere recently that in humans, our internal environment is still chemically similar to the makeup of seawater. Even though we came out of the sea as amphibians or whatever, millions of years ago—if you believe in evolution—internally, it's still like seawater. The different salts in the blood and tissues, the liquid in the tissues, the combination of salts and minerals in the cell are still a very similar combination to seawater.

I really like that. It gave me the sense that if we don't just hold on to our concepts about the body, but bring ourselves into experiencing it as it is...

The sense that we're separate somehow from the rest of the world completely goes away. And there are times when we can actually experience it as just a field of arising and passing elements, dancing around.

All these different aspects of being with the body—they're not for the purpose of being a perfect meditator, or because you have to get to some particular experience of the body. For instance, what I just said about experiencing sensations as dancing elements—that's not something you have to try for. Perhaps your experience of the body is one of simple, concrete pressure. That's the same. Pressure is air element, heaviness is earth element, and it's just what it is. It's not a particular experience but the way of being with it.

At the end of each segment in this sutta—each of the segments of being with the body, and all the others throughout the text—the Buddha puts in a little "how to be with it" called the insight section. Because the point of mindfulness is insight. Mindfulness isn't an end in itself.

"In this way, one abides contemplating the body as a body"—or some people translate it "the body in the body"—"internally. One abides contemplating the body as a body externally." And it goes on to say, "One abides contemplating the body in its arising factors, or in its vanishing factors, or arising and vanishing factors." So it's seeing that nothing is existing on its own—the quality of cause and effect, which I'll say more about in a minute. "Or else mindfulness that there is a body is established just to the extent that it's necessary for bare knowledge and mindfulness."

Two aspects I want to bring out of this insight paragraph. Mindfulness of the body, I think, is a good avenue for understanding and experiencing both of these aspects, although we can with all of the four foundations of mindfulness.

This first phrase—"body in the body" or "body as a body"—whichever translation you use, I kind of like that they can't quite decide which translation is accurate, because I can see a good meaning in both of them. "Body as a body" means just that: no apprehension, no interpretation, no big story about my body and what it's like and what it's compared to and what it means. Just body. Materiality. That's it.

"Body in the body" points to an extremely important aspect of mindfulness that sometimes takes us a long time to get. True mindfulness, being with the body, is participatory. In other words, it's not being mindful of the body somewhere over there, from a distance. Being fully present within the experience is really the quality of mindfulness.

Thich Nhat Hanh explains it well. He quotes this same paragraph: "Observe the body in the body, feelings in the feelings, mind in the mind, objects of mind in the objects of mind." He says, "This means that you live in the body in full awareness of it, not just study it like a separate object. Live in awareness with feelings, mind, and objects of mind. When we meditate on our body, we live with it as truth and give it our most lucid attention. We become one with it. The flower blossoms because sunlight touches and warms its bud, becoming one with it. Meditation reveals not a concept of truth, but a direct view of truth itself."

That's the quality of mindfulness I think the Buddha is pointing to—directly being at one with the body in whatever way it's manifesting in any moment. It's not about whether we like it or we don't like it, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant, but just living in full awareness in our body, really embodying mindfulness.

In some ways the body is an easy way in, to get a feeling for this quality of mindfulness, because it's much more tangible. And even so, I noticed today how often I'm as if aware of what I'm doing, aware of my body, but the attention is holding a little way back. There's a line from T.S. Eliot: I don't remember the man's name, but he lived a short distance away from his body. We're like that.

Even though our culture is so obsessed with bodily image—how the body looks, whether the body is healthy—the effect on so many women, at least those I know, is that in trying to have the perfect body, they all hate their bodies. I don't know any woman who could say, "I really like my body. I'm really at ease being totally present and open in the way this body feels in this moment." I'm just saying women because I know women, but I suspect it's much the same with men—for whatever reason: sickness, or the way it looks, or weight.

Participatory mindfulness is not rejecting the body. It's also not attached to the body. And it's not mistaking the experience of the body for any of these ideas and interpretations we have about it. It's just bringing attention to the bare experience and melting into it, letting it be what it is.

Someone told me a lovely quotation from a Zen nun of the last century who said, "I meet life with my whole body." Just that—can we meet each moment with our whole body? This is the quality of mindfulness of body in a moment. And again, there's no clinging, there's no aversion. This is the last line of that insight paragraph.

And she abides independent, not clinging to anything in the world. That is how a bhikkhu abides, contemplating the body as a body.

It doesn't mean independent, not clinging forever—just in this moment, meeting whatever physical experience is arising. In that moment of clear, participating mindfulness, one is abiding independent, without clinging to anything in the world. And in this way, the heart is free.

So that's the first foundation of mindfulness. And as I said, it's got nothing to do with whether the experience is pleasant or unpleasant. A lot of the time it's not pleasant, which is another reason we're often a little bit away from the body.

This brings us to the second foundation, the foundation of vedana, which we call feeling—the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality of experience. I'm going to try to use the expression "feeling tone," because in English we so often use "feelings" to mean emotions, and it gets confusing when we're talking.

We've talked about feeling tone, vedana, quite a lot—just how important this aspect of experience is, present with every moment of contact. A quick review: contact is a sense door—the eye, the ear, the nose, the mouth, the touching of the body, the mind—coming into contact with a sense object: seeing, hearing, thinking. There's consciousness at that moment. When those three come together, contact, there's seeing. That moment of seeing is experienced as either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

And that's just what it is. It's no big deal in one sense, yet it's so key that the Buddha made it the second out of four foundations. He picked it out of all of our experiences to highlight, because as you know, on the chain of dependent origination, the way that suffering arises is created in a moment of mind experience. Beginning with ignorance, going to contact, to feeling—when there's not awareness of the feeling tone, of the pleasant or unpleasant or neutrality, the habit of mind is to go into clinging, or aversion (which is really wanting something else), which leads on to the whole realm of suffering.

We've gone over this a lot, but it's so key because in any moment of this dependent origination arising, in any moment of contact and the potential of suffering, the potential of cutting that chain of suffering, of seeing through it, of being able to just come out of the tangle and rest with things as they are—that possibility is always there if we can be aware of the feeling tone, if we can just be with it as it is.

I know that can sound either simplistic or impossible when the tangle that's arising from pleasant or unpleasant contact has gotten quite big. And it's true: if we've missed the unpleasant and we're way down the road in a whole aura of self-judging, and we don't even know what the unpleasant contact was that triggered it, well, it might not quite be possible to just start noting "unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant" and have the whole thing evaporate. So that's why we have the third foundation of mindfulness, which is consciousness and mental states.

But I want to say a little more about the tangle that's created from the feeling tone when we don't notice it, because actually it often is very possible to cut the whole field of suffering in that moment if we can come back to pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral and just notice it as it is.

I remember one time I was doing walking meditation. I'd been in retreat for quite a while and was moving very slowly—one of those types of retreat where I was just noting every moment. It was summer, and we get a lot of flies here in the summer. We haven't really had a fly plague this year, but sometimes we really do.

I was walking, and a fly kept landing on my face. I would get annoyed and go to brush it off. But because I was moving so slowly and noting everything, it was a lot of work: intending to lift, lifting, lifting, lifting, intending to brush. The fly would be long gone by then. I'd put my hand back down, and then the fly would come back. You know how that goes.

I was definitely getting irritated. The annoyance was building, and I could see I was moving into a state. At some point I remembered: oh yeah, right—unpleasant. It's actually kind of fun with a repetitive pleasant or unpleasant experience, because you can keep coming back to it and explore getting to the feeling tone. So next time you have a repetitive pleasant or unpleasant experience, you can be really happy about it, because then you can explore.

I came right into the little tickle tickle, the little feet—tickle tickle tickle. And once I could feel the tickle, I thought, "Yeah, this is unpleasant." Unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant. And then it got kind of amusing. "Oh, tickle tickle, unpleasant." The whole state that was building up just evaporated. As long as I could stay right with that tickle tickle, unpleasant, unpleasant, there was really no problem.

Granted, it's easier with the little things. But we practice with the little things, and it works the same way with pleasant. Sometimes, for me, this is harder to see—being outside and looking at a really beautiful scene, like a beautiful sunset. It's seeing, seeing, and it's really nice.

And pretty soon, we're either into kind of la-la land, spacing out—maybe I'll take a walk, maybe I'll have a cup of tea, maybe I'll write home—and it just starts escalating. We don't quite realize that we need to simply come in and notice the pleasant. Beautiful, pleasant. Beautiful, pleasant.

That doesn't mean pushing away the beautiful or not appreciating it, but noticing that pleasant quality. Because without noticing it, so easily the mind just moves into its habit of craving and clinging. And then, since it can't have the beautiful scene, it'll start to crave something it can have—like a cup of tea or a walk or whatever it is. Just noticing pleasant, pleasant, and that whole potential tangle just falls away.

You can also begin to see that sometimes we get in a tangle because we don't quite recognize which sense experience is unpleasant. For example, the sound of the shower running here. There might be a time at 5:30 in the morning when you're in your room, you hear the shower running, and you just hear it. It's actually relatively neutral. Nothing much comes up.

The next day, it's 4:30 in the morning. The sound of the shower starts running. And you get really, really annoyed. 4:30! Even if you were already awake. Even if you were already up. I can't take a shower at 4:30. Why are they taking a shower at 4:30? Don't they know it's not shower hours? You get really annoyed, come back into the hearing, and it's not really unpleasant. But we just label it unpleasant, unpleasant—not recognizing that it's actually not the sound at that point. The sense contact that's unpleasant is the idea that this isn't shower hours.

So we have to bring our noticing of unpleasant to land on the actual experience that's unpleasant. You can't just note it randomly—unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant—and not have the note landing on what's actually unpleasant. It doesn't really do any good. I think we do that a lot. We know something's unpleasant, but we don't know what it is.

So the mindfulness is actually meeting what's happening—pleasant, unpleasant. And it all happens so quickly. That's one of the ways we miss this, because it's a very quick experience.

This is from Ajahn Chah, talking about this whole chain of dependent arising and the importance of the feeling tone. He says: "The whole chain of dependent arising—beginning with ignorance, going to contact, feeling, wanting, clinging, becoming, all the suffering—all of these things are simply events in the mind." It's a whole chain, but really, in truth, when you come into contact with something you don't like, there's immediate suffering. That feeling of suffering is actually the result of the whole chain of paṭicca-samuppāda, of dependent origination. But the mind passes through all this so quickly that we can't keep up with it. The changes are happening so quickly. All we know is, "I don't like this and I'm suffering."

He says it's the same as when you fall from a tree. Before you know it—thud—you've hit the ground. But on the way, you've passed many branches and twigs, yet you couldn't count them all. You couldn't remember them because you're falling so fast. That's his analogy for how dependent origination works. We hit something unpleasant or pleasant, we fall out of the tree and hit the ground. We're at the end of suffering, and we don't see all those little links along the way.

One of the benefits of our intensive practice is that—I don't know if we actually fall a little slower, or if our awareness gets a little keener—but instead of freaking out when we're falling, we can kind of notice the branches a little more. So at least you might be able to notice the feeling tone more often and experiment with coming in on it, noticing it, right in the middle of it, and just see what happens. It really can, at times, untangle the tangle.

And then at times it cannot untangle the tangle. That's when we are working with the third foundation of mindfulness: awareness, mindfulness of citta—of mind, of consciousness.

For purposes of speaking about it, we could think of a moment of consciousness as having two components. Consciousness basically means that quality of bare knowing. If there's seeing, just the knowing of the seeing, prior even to recognition. It's not necessarily the perception, "Oh, I'm seeing an apple"—just the knowing of seeing itself. Just the knowing of hearing. Hearing is a good one to play with, this quality of knowing.

The times when you're sitting and there's just sound arising and you don't quite even get to a name for it. Just knowing of hearing. That's this quality of bare consciousness, of bare knowing. It's arising spontaneously when sense objects arise and there's a sense base. We don't have to make it happen. We don't think, "Oh, there was a sound, now there needs to be knowing of it." No, as soon as there was a sound, it just happens by itself.

Okay, that's one component. And it arises together with—and is colored by—whatever mental factor or mental state or emotion is present in the mind in that moment of knowing. So when the Buddha talks about bringing mindfulness to this aspect, he talks about knowing, for example, the mind with lust and knowing the mind without lust. And then he doesn't say we hate the mind with lust and we like the mind without lust. He just says knowing the mind as it is in this moment. So we recognize whether there's craving or no craving, whether there's greed or no greed, hatred or no hatred, love or not love, calm, boredom—whatever any of the mental states are. This is being aware of, in that moment, being aware of consciousness, being aware of mind.

And as we've said, it's so important—not just the knowing, but also recognizing and being present with the mental state, because it colors, in the moment of its presence, the knowing, the recognition. It's like a dye in the water or wearing colored glasses. I was talking to someone today about how sometimes the dye or the glasses are really vivid—you can't miss it. Rage, bright red, we know it's there. Sometimes it's very, very subtle, just barely a tinge of rose, and you can hardly recognize that there's any coloring of the knowing happening. This is when our practice gets more subtle, but we also need to notice that this too is a coloring, an aspect of mind coloring how we know things.

You can see in your own experience how the mental state colors the knowing. I'll take a big example. If you're in love—that state of newness of being in love when everything is so wonderful and everybody that you meet you love and the world is just so beautiful. And six months later, when the whole thing's over and it ended badly, you think, "What did I see in that person?" You can't actually even look at the person and see with that rosy color. In fact, if it still isn't completely over, if it's in the negative phase, you think, "That person is such a jerk. There's not one redeeming quality about them." And in fact, the whole world is bleak and harsh and dull. This is how much the mental states color the aspect of knowing.

So our practice here, the practice of being aware of the mind, aware of the consciousness, in the consciousness—it's the same as with the body, the same as with the feelings. It's participatory. It's not recognizing the contracted mind or the mind of anger somewhere over there. And it's also not pretending it's not here and being taken over by it. It's a very tricky balance that we find.

This is again Thich Nhat Hanh on being with the emotions: "Mindful observation is like a lamp which gives light. It is not a judge. It throws light on our anger, sponsors it, looks after it in an affectionate and caring way, like an older sister looking after and comforting her younger sibling."

Can you relate to your anger like that? Or your lust? Or your contracted mind? Or your self-hatred? Or calm? Or bliss? Or peace? Or concentration? Just shining the light of mindfulness on it, warming it, taking care of it and letting it live its own life. That's all the mindfulness is doing. Not changing or trying to prolong or trying to make something different happen.

And realizing that, as with each of the foundations, it's not about which mind state we're being present with. It's about knowing that no matter what the mind state, no matter what the state of consciousness, it's our avenue in for knowing the nature of mind. Whatever mind state is present, recognize that knowing is also present. And although the way we experience things through the knowing is colored by the emotion, the awareness itself isn't touched. At times in this third foundation, a lot of the time, the mind state, the mental factor, is going to be the predominant aspect. So just being with that as it is, like an affectionate sibling.

Whether it's horrible, beautiful, subtle—not holding on, not pushing away.

At other times, though, the mental states might be quite tranquil, alert, receptive, but not really strong or very much coloring experience at all. And at those times, the knowing quality might be more predominant. Just this fact of simple knowing arising with each arising experience.

So there are times in practice when our mindfulness, our being with this third foundation, can take the aspect of just knowing the knowing. For instance, when we open to hearing, it's a way to help us move in that direction, to get a feeling for that quality of awareness. Because so often with sounds, it's easier to just be receptive and alert without putting on a story, without having a huge reaction, without personalizing. So we simply recognize: a sound arises, immediately there's the knowing of it. Just that. A sensation arises, right away there's the knowing of it. When an emotion arises, there's the knowing of it. At times, this is the aspect of being with the third foundation, and this can be really interesting.

At other times, forget it—that's not what's happening, and we're just being present and accompanying our wanting mind. But we know that all mental states help us see this quality of knowing.

And again, as with feeling, as with body, as with mental states, the object isn't just to be the most mindful person and win the prize. The mindfulness is taking us into the deeper qualities, the deeper aspects of experience.

When we really look at feeling tone, when you really notice it, you see how impermanent it is. Pleasant feeling doesn't last very long. That's our big problem in life—it doesn't last long at all, and we've got to try and get another one. And you might not believe it, but unpleasant feeling tone also doesn't last very long. It might arise again soon, but each instance doesn't last long.

And also, when you're just being with feeling tone, it really cuts through identification. When there's an unpleasant sound—the shower running—and we're really upset, and we get back to simply "oh, unpleasant," very few people can get really worked up about "this unpleasant feeling is who I am, my unpleasant feeling, and I've got to do something about it." It's just so much an aspect of nature. So attending to feeling tone really cuts through the sense of permanence and the sense of identification.

Just in the same way, when we're paying attention to the aspect of consciousness, of knowing and the mental states that color the knowing—and a lot of you have been mentioning it in interviews—it's like one of the benefits of sitting a long time. We can't avoid the fact that mental states are constantly changing. A lot of people have been coming in this week a little thrown back. "I can't believe how quickly the mental states are all changing." And they can go from being really lost in aversion, to the next moment really peaceful, to the next moment really judging, to the next moment starving, to the next moment there's a lot of wanting, to the next moment there's boredom. And we wonder: when does it stop? Where can I rest?

Because the thing is, we want to keep identifying with each one of them. And when they last a little longer, we can sort of delude ourselves. Each mental state feels so real—that's sort of how they trick us. It feels so real, it's got to be me, it's got to be true. And then when the next minute the exact opposite one arises, we think, "Yes, this has got to be me, this has got to be true." And after a couple of hours of that, it starts to feel really flippy. Well, what is me? What is true? We'd almost rather be able to grab hold of some highly unpleasant mental state, but at least we could take a stand on it. "This is me, this is real, this is true"—better than all this change.

And the same is also true with the pleasant. As practice goes on, this gets into the seductions, the corruptions of insight and of concentration. We all at different times get a taste of calmness or peace or some pleasant experience, some sitting that meets whatever idea we might have of what practice is. And this—even though it's obviously all too impermanent—can really be grabbed hold of as "this mental state is what I'm practicing for." Forgetting that there's no such thing as any mental state that's worth practicing for, because they're all going to pass.

The only point of being fully present with our mental states, with our consciousness, is to be able to know it in its true nature—which is that there's nothing here to take a stand on. There's nothing that's going to last. There's nothing that can give any lasting satisfaction. And in the moment of recognizing that, again, as the Buddha says, we're abiding independent, without clinging to anything in this world. That's the purpose of mindfulness, the purpose of mindfulness in all of these foundations.

The fourth foundation, the foundation of dhammas—a word which can be translated in many ways—is usually rendered as "objects of mind."

It's somewhat difficult to wrap up and explain concisely, so I'll simply share how the Buddha talks about it. I'm always looking for the best explanation for this fourth foundation, because the Buddha simply gives a series of lists. He says one is aware of objects of mind in terms of the five hindrances. One is aware of objects of mind in terms of the five aggregates—the five aspects of experience arising in any moment that we call a human being. These are form or materiality, the body, feeling tone (so those are the first two foundations), perceptions and mental formations, and the fifth is consciousness, which corresponds to the third foundation. Some people, in describing this fourth foundation, say that it's a way of talking about perceptions and mental formations, which could be, because perceptions are recognitions, the labeling of things, and mental formations are all the thoughts and attitudes and constructions of mind, volition.

The lists the Buddha gives in this fourth foundation are the five hindrances, the five aggregates, the six sense bases and the six sense objects and the fetters that bind—basically greed, hatred, and delusion—the seven factors of awakening or enlightenment (the seven wholesome qualities that we're developing: mindfulness, concentration, calm, equanimity, energy, investigation, and rapture, all of which we talk about, all being developed), and the four noble truths. It's a lot.

I don't want to go into talking about each of them, obviously, but you can think of it in a way that helps me: not trying to hold a list in my mind, but seeing that this is a way of holding experience, seeing how it functions, how the process unfolds in the categories of the Buddha's teaching.

To give an example using the hindrances: awareness of aversion—that's the third foundation, awareness of consciousness, awareness of mental state. But if you're thinking of it in the terms of the fourth foundation, you could recognize it not just as "oh yes, it's a hindrance" without thinking about it, but recognizing how it's functioning as a hindrance to concentration, a hindrance to being present, a hindrance to awareness. Again, this is not to lead to analytical thinking, but it's a way to see how things work. To see how that anger, that aversion, is actually leading to suffering in this moment is a way of seeing it in terms of the Four Noble Truths, for example. This isn't about getting into thinking about it too much. You can also see how it's describing the process of our experience in terms of the formulations of the Buddha's teaching. It points to discriminating wisdom, investigation of how experience functions.

Very interestingly, the way he describes knowing the hindrances—knowing mental objects in terms of the hindrances, knowing when craving is present—he also goes on to describe knowing the conditions that help craving to arise. For example, a lot of pleasant experience that goes unnoticed. Noticing what feeds the continuation of craving in your experience. Noticing what helps craving to diminish, to be abandoned. And noticing what supports the non-arising of craving.

He's really asking us to look at cause and effect here, to see that nothing is really functioning in isolation. Craving doesn't just drop from the sky out of nowhere and then vanish. It arises from the tendency of mind to move into clinging when meeting pleasant experience and being totally unaware of it. And it continues when that is fed through lack of awareness. When awareness comes in, that favors the abandonment of craving. Continued awareness, continuity of mindfulness, favors the non-arising of craving. This fourth foundation is actually very profound.

The most important point to remember, I think, is that these four foundations cover our whole experience, and there's no hierarchy. They're all just different ways of talking about how to meet this moment's experience in a way that can enable our heart and mind to experience freedom from clinging and identification in that moment. The Buddha repeatedly emphasizes this: being present fully in the experience without adding all the extra of interpretation and story, of me and mine, without clinging.

And mindfulness is not for its own sake. Sometimes we can really get caught in thinking, "If I could just note everything that's happening, then I've got it made. Then I'm the perfect yogi. Then my practice is really going well." And we're getting lost in the technique. It's not about how it looks. It's not about noting everything that happens. It's about this quality of presence with whatever's arising—skillful means to help us awaken. Any of the four foundations is fine, and any aspect is fine.

As Thich Nhat Hanh writes: "When the object of our mindful observation is totally clear, whether it's breath or sensation or anger, when the object is totally clear, the mind which is observing is also revealed in great clarity. To see dhammas clearly is to see the mind clearly. When dhammas reveal themselves in their true nature, then the mind has the nature of the highest understanding."

That's really what we're doing here. We're using the avenue of mindfulness of these four foundations to reveal the nature of mind clearly, to reveal the nature of heart, the nature of reality clearly.

Because when we really look with continuity of mindfulness—and the continuity is extremely important—we see with any one aspect of experience, we see past the superficial appearance. Anything reveals the whole nature of reality.

Take a sensation. Take the breath. With continuity of mindfulness, we see that what at first seems solid breaks down, dissolves into many different sensations. What at first seems like a solid breath breaks into countless sensations, and even these sensations begin to break down, arising and dissolving, arising and dissolving in any moment. It breaks down into elements coming and going. There's nothing really there that one can find that is breath. Breath is a total concept—as is any other experience when we really look at it.

Even an emotion, when we really look with continuity of mindfulness, breaks down from this solid thing into a thought, a physical sensation, a tone in the mind, a different thought, another sensation. It's this whole conglomerate of arising and dissolving experiences we call anger or happiness or whatever. There's nothing really there, nothing solid. In that way, it's unsatisfying in terms of anything I can land on to call "me."

But in seeing this, there's a real freedom. This is how the heart and mind let go of our subliminal grasping and aversion, let go of our clinging to any aspect of experience to make a sense of self, to make a sense of "me," to try and hold on to any aspect of our experience to be happy. In the continual mindfulness—whether it's breath or body or emotions or hindrances, whatever it is—the continuity of it breaks down all aspects of permanence, any aspect of something to hold on to, any aspect of me, of separate self.

And it also highlights the interconnectedness. Seeing that what we call breath is totally dependent on conditions. Without a body, there can't be breath. Without lungs, there can't be breath. Without air, there can't be breath. And dependent on the emotions, the quality of the air, whether we have an infection in the lungs—the breath is changing all the time. All of it is totally out of our control, which is something we notice in every moment. We can't sit down and say, "Now I will have calm breath. I will only have pleasant experience. I will just feel these sensations in this hour." Totally out of control.

What this participatory mindfulness does—it's not that we want to perceive the perfect breath or the perfect sensation—but just by meeting experience over and over and over, these truths become so obvious. On a cellular level, they're already obvious. It's just our hardcore minds that are holding out. They're the last to know what's already true. On some level we're experiencing truth over and over and over, and every now and then a little shoot comes up into the thoughts: "Oh yeah, things are changing." And then we have to keep observing over and over and over, and then another thought: "Oh yeah, I can't control this."

That's what the continuity of mindfulness is doing—highlighting interdependence, emptiness, transparency. Even without our knowing it, the clinging, the aversion, the identification is loosening. We're really experiencing a weakening of our entrancement, our obsession with appearances, with objects, with experience. This entrancement naturally fades, and the mindfulness opens us up to recognizing, as Thich Nhat Hanh was saying, the true nature of our mind that is untouched by appearance.

Whatever's arising in this moment, it's one of the four foundations. It doesn't matter which one. It doesn't matter whether you like it or not. It can be this knee pain, this bliss, this anger, this pleasant feeling. It can be the gateway into the recognition of the true nature of the mind and heart that is absolutely untouched by appearance. And it becomes our direct encounter with reality. That's the point of our practice. The foundations of mindfulness are all our tools for awakening. They're not an end in themselves.

Just to end with Thich Nhat Hanh. He says, "Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking. It is a result of the long process of conscious awareness."

Let's sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 282

Perception & Thought

Carol Wilson · 45 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that "we are what we think" and explores why our unguarded thoughts can become our worst enemy. She investigates two key factors that keep us enslaved by thought: unwise attention (paying attention to content rather than recognizing thought as thought) and misperception (distorted perception fueled by the three root afflictions of greed, hatred, and delusion).

Wilson explains how perception—the recognition and discernment that arises with each sense contact—becomes distorted when colored by afflictive emotions, particularly ignorance. Using vivid examples including the classic Buddhist illustration of mistaking a rope for a snake, she demonstrates how misperception leads to cascading reactions of thought, emotion, and action. She emphasizes the Dalai Lama's teaching that all difficulties stem from mistaken perception, and that the antidote is simply correct perception of things as they are.

The talk addresses how we continuously misperceive our own mind-body experience as solid and continuous, when direct investigation reveals constantly arising and passing phenomena—sensations, perceptions, feelings, and mental formations. Wilson encourages practitioners to bring wise attention to direct experience without preconceptions, noting that when we have a direct encounter with sense contacts rather than dwelling on interpretations, the tormenting power of thought naturally dissolves. She concludes with practical guidance on returning to bare perception as the path to freedom from conceptual proliferation.

Watching you all walk in here, I felt like there were so many different realities walking through the door. The same, seemingly the same experience, but probably so many different interpretations going on.

Tonight I want to talk about perception and the power of thought.

Sharon briefly mentioned this saying from the Buddha a few weeks ago: that we are what we think, all that we are arises with our thoughts, with our thoughts we make the world. Scary, isn't it? He goes on to say, "Your worst enemy cannot harm you as much as your own thoughts unguarded. But once mastered, no one can help you as much, not even your father or your mother." It's a pretty powerful statement.

After sitting here for—how long is it, five weeks?—you probably are getting some taste of how bad an enemy our unguarded thoughts can be, how powerful thoughts can be. Thoughts are amazing. They really do create the world in a very concrete sense. Somebody had the thought, "Let's buy a meditation center," and twenty years later, this is here and all of us are here, as a result of that one thought. It's quite amazing.

And yet we so easily get lost, tormented in our thoughts. How much of your meditation time has been spent in some kind of struggle? And when—say yesterday—that tangle of unbearable experience was brought about by thought, where's that tangle of thought now? What was so difficult about it? Why do those thoughts have so much power to torment us, to assail us?

Because when we really look at thought as a thought, what is it? If you take a really neutral thought—"the carpet is red"—gone. Ephemeral. There's nothing to it.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "Like waves, all the activities of this life have rolled endless on, yet they have left us empty-handed. Myriads of thoughts have run through our minds, but all they have done is increase our confusion and dissatisfaction. When a rainbow appears, we see many beautiful colors. Yet a rainbow is not something we can clothe ourselves with or wear as an ornament. It simply appears through the conjunction of various conditions. Thoughts arise in the mind in exactly the same way. They have no tangible reality or intrinsic existence at all. There is therefore no logical reason why thought should have so much power over us, nor any reason why we should be enslaved by them."

Does that make you feel better? No logical reason.

Well, I want to talk a little bit about some of the—in a way they are logical reasons—how we get so caught in thoughts. Why do we get so enslaved? Two specific areas I want to speak about: unwise attention, which is fueled by misperception.

Unwise attention is basically paying attention to the wrong thing. Wrong meaning it takes us into more suffering. So in thought, unwise attention is getting caught in paying attention to the content, to the emotional story, not seeing thought as thought, not bringing attention right to the bare experience. And misperception is what fuels this unwise attention.

Really, the beginning of our confusion—of not seeing the ephemeral nature of thought and of being so tormented, spending our whole meditation trying to have better thoughts, or no thoughts (that would be the preference, of course, but since that's a rare occurrence, better thoughts would do), and hating ourselves, fearing our thoughts when they're not what we like—it's so much suffering. Of course, the root of it is not seeing that thought is nothing to be afraid of.

But what fuels this on a very basic level, and I find this particularly fascinating, is that the beginning of our confusion is at the level of basic perception.

Perception is this: when there's a sense contact, you hear a sound. The moment of hearing is just hearing. Perception is the recognition, the discernment of what it is. So that's hearing a bell, knowing it is a bell. It involves memory, but it's one of the basic mental factors that is said to arise in every mind moment. In fact, when the Buddha speaks of the five aggregates—the five factors of mind and body that he calls a human being, each arising in each moment—perception is one of these five.

So this recognition, this memory recognition of a sense contact, is perception.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. All of them. That's why there is so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. Mistaken perception is, in a way, on a moment-to-moment basis, at the very root of so much of the following confusion and suffering.

So what does this mean, mistaken perception? Why and how does it happen?

Well, you might have guessed that when our old friends happen to be present in the mind—our old friends the afflictive emotions, our three root afflictions: greed, hatred, and confusion or delusion in any of their manifestations—when in a moment of perception one of these three is present as a mental factor, it tends to distort the perception. And if we're not aware of it, it's really fascinating because we actually perceive incorrectly. From that perception comes more interpretations and emotions, and then we can actually act on that incorrect perception.

For example, in one place that we teach in the desert in the spring, the meditation hall has a big sign on it—it's called "Perceptory." One woman who was obviously having a very bad day told me as she walked up to it, she looked at it, really looked at it, and read "Purgatory." That's just what it said. Mistaken perception, simply clouded.

We do this in lots of ways. When the mind is filled with fear, we can actually perceive a person or a thing that's fairly innocuous as being really fearful or really ugly.

One time I was in the hospital, kind of out of it for a few days. I was under drugs and in a lot of pain, and a nurse came in very early in the morning to wake me up, to weigh me, about six in the morning. I woke up in a lovely frame of mind—angry, but also really filled with fear, this kind of weird paranoia you can get in the hospital. And I visually perceived her as demonic. I mean, she really looked like an evil demon person to me. And once perceived, we act on it. So I practically bit her head off, the poor lady.

The next morning she came, same woman, same time. I was in a different state of mind, and I saw a very nice, scared-looking lady coming to wake me up. And I felt really bad.

But you see, it's not even that we see something and then think about it in a different way. We actually perceive incorrectly. And once that perception has entered incorrectly, it leads to all kinds of actions, all kinds of doing. This is basically how we can, in our actions, get so far afield so quickly.

The examples I have given are ones of aversion, but really the root distortion, the root that leads to misperceptions, is the mental factor of delusion or ignorance. We've talked about craving, we've talked about aversion, we've talked about delusion, but what we can begin to see is that delusion is only another mental factor. Ignorance, delusion, confusion—we can actually begin to recognize it when it's present and when it's not.

It's not like delusion is some massive, monolithic, unchanging state that we're chipping away at little by little and someday it'll be gone. It arises and passes in moments of the mind just like any other state. So it has characteristics: confusion, cloudiness, dullness.

What tends to happen when there's confusion in the mind is we don't recognize correctly. Sometimes we'll just see or hear or feel or think a part of something, and then out of not seeing it all, the ignorance will use memory to supply the rest, but it comes up with an inaccurate perception.

Once I was walking in the woods in Switzerland behind a retreat we were leading, very nice lovely woods, with my boyfriend. I looked over to the side and I saw this huge yellow and white striped circus tent. I thought, that's really weird for a circus tent to be in these quiet woods. And I said as much to my friend. He looked at me like I was really weird. Because, of course, as I looked again, there was no circus tent. It was just a big rock with a little bit of yellow lichen running on it.

That's the way ignorance functions in the moment to give a misperception. We sort of recognize a few things, don't either look clearly or don't have all the information, but ignorance makes up a perception. Well, that one's not too difficult to see through. Some can be much more complicated. But just to recognize the state of the mental factor of confusion itself begins to be very helpful.

This quality of dullness manifests as a kind of knowing that you don't quite know what's going on. One way it can manifest—and this happens to me far more than I care to admit—is when I'm driving somewhere and suddenly I won't have a clue where I am, what part of the world I'm in, what season of the year it is. Often I'll be driving into Barre and I'll have this moment of complete delusion: Is this April? Is this October? It's Christmas time! Then I'll have to look around for clues as to the season, and gradually I'll remember where I'm going and what I'm doing and sort of get back to reality—alright, this is October, we're in the middle of the three-month course. That's delusion, one way it shows up.

The classic example given in the Buddhist texts is a kind of twilight state—really, the twilight zone—where you're walking in a forest at twilight, so you can just see but not quite clearly. In that seeing, you notice something hanging from a tree, and in that moment of recognition comes the perception: a snake. If it's somewhere with poisonous snakes, or depending on your relationship to snakes, that moment of recognition leads to more thoughts—how many snakes might there be, I'd better get out of here—which leads to emotions, to fear. It begins to color the way we relate to the whole forest. We thought it was nice here, but really it's dangerous. It's not good to be here alone at night. In Thailand, this is literally true. To walk in a forest at night without a flashlight is risking your life because there are poisonous snakes everywhere. They won't bother you, but if you step on one, well, too bad for you. So such a perception could genuinely inspire a feeling of danger that we react upon.

Now, if we go closer and really look, the delusion might clear away and we see it's only a hanging vine. That affects the way we think, the emotions that arise, the way we act—we might keep walking calmly—and the feeling we have about the rest of the forest. It's very powerful, this one perception, and it leads into a whole field of reaction. This is the basic way that misperception functions, especially when fueled by ignorance.

The Dalai Lama says the antidote to ignorance is the correct perception of things, because this dispels the visiting obscurations. This sounds easier than we might think—just simply the correct perception of things. That's what our practice is all about here. It's not always as complicated as we might make it. It's simply learning how to have a correct perception of experience, moment after moment after moment. All that matters is just this one moment, having a correct perception.

But this misperception—mistaking a rock for a tent, or a rope or a vine for a snake, not perceiving accurately—this is the basic misperception we are experiencing about ourselves, moment after moment. We're misperceiving our mind and body experience. And this leads to the sense of self, to craving, to aversion, and to all the attendant confusions.

From the standpoint of perception, the reason we misperceive so greatly and so continuously is this: in every mind moment, as we said before, there are a lot of mind moments—seventeen trillion in the blink of an eye. A trillion is like million, billion, trillion. That's a lot. I don't know how many zeros. It's a lot of mind moments. If perception is arising in every mind moment—even forgetting the numbers—it's happening constantly. There's no way we're noticing every single perception that arises. I assume, anyway. I don't speak for everybody.

What we're calling "me"—this perception that seems like a continuous, ongoing self—we can actually begin to notice breaking down as we get quieter, as our mindfulness increases. What we're calling "me" is really a series of constantly arising and passing experiences: physical sensations rising and falling, changing, with perceptions rising and falling; vedanā—feeling tone, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—coming and going; the knowing faculty coming and going with each new sense contact; and any of the mental formations, any emotions. Each of these is just coming and going, coming and going, so quickly, one after the other, not in any particular order. But it's so fast that when we don't really look, it seems solid, it seems continuous.

In some ways, it's like looking at a color photograph under a magnifying glass. This amazed me when I did it just a couple of years ago. I didn't know it was just a series of dots—four or five different colors of dots. That's all a photograph is when you look closely, like those impressionist pointillist paintings where, up close, it's just dots with no recognizable form at all. Then when we pull back, the picture clicks into place and looks completely solid.

So that's our practice: to really look deeply, not to stop at the surface appearance. And it's not easy, because seeing through it once isn't quite enough. How many times are we re-experiencing the misperception, the sense that we're solid, without even noticing?

aware of it in a conscious way. It's a background perception that might be going on a great deal of the time. When we don't really look, when we don't really explore, it's easy to take the perception for granted, just an assumption that this is how it is. We seem solid and continuous.

In fact, it's so obvious that even if intellectually we try to understand the idea of no continuous separate self, the idea of impermanence—and we really can on some level understand it—it isn't quite enough. That's why meditation, this ongoing looking, looking, looking, just to experience what's actually happening, matters so much. The intellectual understanding alone isn't enough to counter the ongoing misperception that we might not even be aware of.

It's so easy to assume that because we perceive things in a certain way, that's how it is. And because we mostly agree on perceptions, that's even another step—we tend to agree, so that's really how it must be. In fact, a lot of people here will mention in interviews that they'll talk about an experience and say, "Of course, I could never explain this to anybody else who wasn't here. I'd sound crazy." Sometimes people even wonder themselves, because the perceptions you're starting to become aware of don't always match the ongoing assumptions of how things are that we've been living with all our lives without recognizing it.

I read one of the little stories by Oliver Sacks, the neurologist who writes about all kinds of different, strange neurological distortions—really interesting. He was writing about a man who was blind. I forget whether he was born blind or became blind very young. Up until his forties or fifties, he was blind and had quite adapted. He worked, I think, as a masseur at his local YMCA and was going to get married. At some point, doctors found out they could do an operation that would remove the cataracts and restore his sight, which everyone was excited about, and which he did.

What was so interesting, really poignant—why Oliver Sacks was writing about it—is that of course, when the bandages first came off, his fiancée and others were there asking, "Oh, wow, what do you see?" Well, of course, he couldn't make any sense whatsoever out of the visual field. It was just this jumble of sight and form, and actually quite scary, because it didn't conform at all to the world as his perceptions had formed it. He had to really work hard at it, and I think over time he got to where he could make some sense of the visual world. But it was never easy for him. In fact, it was very anxiety-provoking.

He would say that sometimes while eating, trying to use a knife and fork in the way sighted people do, at some point it would just get so stressful that he'd say, "I have to give it up. I have to lapse back into my older behavior." Because for him, all the perception and construction of the world was through touch and sound. Shaving in a mirror was extremely difficult, but just closing his eyes and shaving in the dark—no problem. In fact, in some way the quality of his life really deteriorated after the operation, even as he could begin to see, because he never could really make that perceptual shift.

This is so interesting. How I just take for granted that what I see is how it is. It's not true at all. It's not the least bit how it is. But we've gotten so used to these perceptions.

So that's our practice here: to look deeply, moment after moment, into our mind and body experience without preconceptions—or at least noticing our preconceptions—and letting the actual perception of what happens be received without having to twist it to fit a preconceived notion.

There can be times in practice where we literally begin to perceive the body in a different way, where there's just a sense of arising and passing sensations—sometimes slowly, sometimes more quickly, sometimes nothing lasting longer than a flash. Once, someone was describing to Sayadaw a sense of a sensation arising in their arm and moving up the arm, describing how it was moving all over. And he just looked and said, "Nothing's moving. There's not one sensation that's moving all around. It's lots of different sensations arising, passing, arising and passing. We're giving it some kind of continuity with thought. That's an interpretation."

So it's really going back and being with the sense contact, the perception. Sometimes sensations are rising and passing, no longer than a flash. Sometimes there's no outline, no shape to the body, no sense of where the body begins or ends. Sometimes you're just noticing sensation, and then you'll notice an image arise of "knee," and then an image arise of knee in relationship to body, and you become vividly aware: that's all that's happening. A sensation arising in awareness, an image arising in awareness. Just because there's an image of knee, that's not the same as solid body sitting here. It's simply an image arising and passing. And in that moment there can literally be no perception whatsoever of solid body.

Now, a lot of times we don't like this too much.

And in fact, when this isn't a thought, when it's an actual perception, there's no solidity, there's no body one can even refer to, just very fast arising and passing. It can feel quite threatening, and often fear will come up as a result of this shift in perception.

But that's all it is—fear arising. It's as if somehow we're going to lose our body and never be able to come back together again. But I'll say, so far, of all the three-month retreats that I've heard of, nobody has disintegrated into a cloud and not been able to find their body and walk out of here again. Because nothing is actually changing.

Our perceptions can begin to shift when we're just meeting the direct experience. But it's not that the body was solid and now it's disintegrating. It's the same as it's always been—constantly changing. In fact, the Buddha said once that if you must identify with something, it's better if it be the body, because the mind is changing even so much faster. At least the body is changing a little bit more slowly. It was just his way of saying: don't bother identifying with anything.

But this fear comes up as if somehow it's all going to fly away and we're not going to be able to function anymore. Rationally talking about it isn't going to keep that fear from arising. I just want to mention that it's often a normal response. You don't need to believe the fear. That's just another emotion, another mind state arising and going away. With wise attention, you simply notice that fear is fear. Just because fear arises doesn't make it true. Just because a thought arises with strong emotion attached doesn't make that thought more true. "The rug is red" is as equally important a thought as "Oh my God, I'm never going to be able to walk again." A thought is just a thought. The strong emotion doesn't make it more accurate, but we tend to believe it because there's strong emotion.

A friend of mine was telling me once about his experience in a retreat. He was really seeing the non-solidity, and the sense of self-attachment to mind and body was falling away for him. He said—and I loved this image, I don't know if it translates—he said, "It's not that anything's gone away or changed." He said, "It's like a cake that's baked in a pan, and after you've run a knife through and loosened the cake, it's still sitting in the pan, still has the same shape. But if you turn the pan over, the cake just drops out. There's nothing attaching it anymore." He said it felt like that for him. It looks the same, but there's no more attachment in it.

Well, that's how it is for us. We really are already cakes in the pan, and the knife's already been slid under—we just haven't noticed it yet. So our practice is really to bring this wise attention into our experience.

With unwise attention, which we practice a lot without realizing it, it's unwise attention that gives thought so much power. It's what makes thought such a burden. With unwise attention, we tend to isolate either a particular perception or the thought that arises from that perception, and then really dwell on the thought, on the interpretation, on the emotions that might come up—really dwell on it. And it makes it seem true. The more we think about it, somehow the truer it must be. And then we don't even notice, or we shut out, perceptions that don't match. This is unwise attention.

So for example, you can see how we do this in our perception of ourselves. I'm talking more on the personality level here. Think about whatever your most recent perception or description of yourself is, or how you think of yourself over the long term. That description, whatever it is, is bound to be a little bit one-sided and inaccurate. Any description is. But it can become so solidified from a particular perception that's probably inaccurate and then really dwelt on.

I'll give you an example that I had forgotten until recently in my life, but I see how this memory and this perception has colored my relationship to things for years. When I was about ten or eleven, in the fifth grade, I was taken along with some other girls and put in what I think was probably formally called a "remedial gym class." Of course, in the charming way of children—and I know this isn't politically correct, but this is what we called ourselves—we called ourselves "the retard gym class." There were about ten of us, and I don't know what occasioned our needing remedial gym, but for some reason we were in this class.

So the perception was that we were total klutzes, weren't fit to play kickball or whatever we were supposed to be playing with the other girls in the class, and had to go in this special class to learn how to function. That's all I can remember about it. I can't remember at all what we did in this class. But it really solidified my self-perception of being a very uncoordinated person who was no good at sports. And as a result, I came to really dislike any kind of physical games. As soon as the idea—"Let's go play baseball"—would come up, I would freeze inside. The perception would arise: "Well, I'm no good at baseball, and no one wants to play with me because I was in the remedial gym class."

And it's persisted to this day. I didn't even remember about this gym class until this spring, when something brought it up. But any kind of formed physical activity—walking is fine, anyone can just take a walk, that's okay—but anything with some kind of form to it, I immediately have a resistance. And it's very strong, to the point that even if I do the activity, I don't enjoy it. That perception is really set.

So this is how an early perception and the memory of it can really structure our ideas of ourselves. And it's unwise attention to really dwell on it, because what that blocks out, what I don't let in, is all the times that I do physical things and really enjoy it. I really like to swim, I like to take walks, I like to do qigong—if I don't get into comparing it to a form and trying to do it right or to look good. But if I don't notice the times that I enjoy it, I'll only notice the times that I don't, because it fits into all the interpretations that have arisen out of that perception.

We do this in our practice as well. We've made a certain perception and then, rather than let in the perception that's actually arising, we'll twist it, we'll misperceive to try and make it meet our previous ideas. Like that sense of solidity of body—when it goes away, rather than saying, "Oh, the solidity of body wasn't really true," we think, "Oh my God, I'm losing it, something's happening."

Or in another way, often people will report, "My mindfulness is gone. My concentration is gone. I can't hold to any object. As soon as the object comes, I can't stay with it." And we'll question, and we'll find out: of course you can't stay with it, because the object isn't staying. As soon as it comes, it vanishes. But it's easy for people to say, "Oh, I have no mindfulness. I should be able to just glom onto this arising appearance and stay there as long as I want."

So our challenge with wise attention is simply to come back to the direct perception. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, to have a correct perception we need to have a direct encounter. That's all we're trying to do here—have a direct encounter with each of the six sense contacts without preconceived notions. That's our challenge in any moment. Can we let go of all self-definition, all concepts, all explanations, and just be with whatever it is? Pressure, hearing, seeing, thinking, emotion? Can we just be with the sensation in the body without having to have an explanation, without having to understand how it relates to my childhood and its arising because of this particular conglomeration of experiences that I've had, and that if I could really open and get to the bottom of it, I know all my sadness would open up and I would really move in practice? Could we just feel tightness without all of that?

It's not so easy. Who used to go in and report to Sayadaw U Pandita? Really, all he wants is: "Pressure arose. I noted it. After the third note, it passed. I went back to the breath." He doesn't want, "This pressure arose, it's from my childhood, and on and on and on." In fact, after a while, they just look at us as if to say, "Where are you guys getting this stuff? It's so simple. Pressure arose. You noticed. What happened to it? It went away. You make everything so complicated."

We do. And the point is not to note perfectly. The point is that with all our complications, with all our misperception, we're keeping ourselves from noticing the radiance of truth, our own radiant nature.

This is from Huang Po: Can we stop being blinded by our sight, our hearing, our feeling and knowing, and from the conceptual thinking arising from it? When blinded by this, we don't perceive the radiance of the source. When we're not deluded by conceptual thinking, this source will appear like the sun rising through the empty sky and illuminating the whole universe.

Simply being with the actual experience, with the actual sense contact—have a direct perception. This is wise attention. Don't try to analyze perceptions or think about them at all. Just bring wise attention back to the direct encounter. When we try to talk our way out of it or think our way out of it, it's like the mind is a ghost, and it's like a ghost fighting a ghost.

But with wise attention, we can really bypass all the conceptual thinking and come right back to the source of the perception. It just cuts all the extra.

To give you an example: this summer I was staying in a friend's house in Washington State on an island, a lovely place. One evening I was the only one there, and it actually felt quite safe. I didn't have any worry about intruders or anything. But that evening I was in the bathroom washing my face, and I heard this banging noise outside.

Again, the mind colored with ignorance. I couldn't recognize that sound, but immediately the mind had to supply a perception, whether it knew what it was or not. If there was no ignorance, we would just think, "Oh, hearing. I don't know what that is." That's clarity. But instead: "Oh, hearing. I don't know what it is. It must be somebody breaking in." And immediately this rush of fear.

I was trying to just keep on washing my face, but the thoughts were going: "It couldn't be somebody breaking in. I know it's perfectly safe here. This woman has lived here for years. I feel perfectly safe. It couldn't possibly be." And of course, it's like fighting a ghost with a ghost. The fear is just streaming out, getting stronger and stronger. I couldn't bear it. I had to open the door, go out and look. Of course, there was nobody there.

So, okay, nobody's there. I go back in, shut the door again, and the fear starts: "Oh, somebody's breaking in." The thoughts would start. I said, why don't I try what I'm always talking about? Wise attention. I took my attention right back to feeling my hands in the water, feeling the washcloth.

It's amazing. As soon as I came back to direct contact with that moment's contact—because the sound wasn't happening anymore—the fear was gone. Just being with what is. No extras, no interpretation. As soon as a thought would come up—"Yeah, but what was that sound?"—back to the bare perception itself.

With the bare perception itself, we can be free of this tormenting struggle that we have with the sense door of thinking.

So let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 283

Q&A

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this Q&A session, Carol Wilson addresses fundamental questions about meditation practice with warmth and precision. She clarifies the nature of investigation (dhamma-vicaya) as a factor of enlightenment, explaining how genuine investigation differs from intellectual questioning—it's an energetic staying with experience rather than a thinking process.
>
> The discussion explores how practitioners relate differently to pleasant and unpleasant states, particularly when deciding whether to continue sitting after the bell. Wilson encourages examining the quality of mindfulness rather than the nature of what's being observed, while reminding practitioners that guilt is 'extra' and unhelpful. She offers a comprehensive review of meditation instructions, emphasizing the dance between focused attention on breathing and the relaxed awareness of hearing.
> Wilson addresses the balancing of the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā), explaining how mindfulness, energy, investigation, and rapture (the energizing factors) must be balanced with concentration, calm, and equanimity (the calming factors). The session also touches on practicing with persistent difficulties like physical discomfort or environmental distractions, the relationship between contentment and compassionate action in the world, and how strong emotions can arise even after extended mettā practice. Throughout, Wilson emphasizes kind, non-violent attention and the importance of staying close to direct experience rather than getting lost in thinking.

How can investigation happen skillfully without it becoming a question-and-answer process in the mind?

Well, personally, I experience investigation of states as one of the seven factors of enlightenment. Speaking of it in that way, it really has nothing to do with the thinking process at all. It's hard in using English, because as soon as we say "investigate," right away the mind says, "Okay," and starts asking questions. Occasionally, I must admit, if I'm tuning in to my experience and feeling that investigation is low, I might actually frame a question like, "What's going on?" or "What's happening?" just to tune me in. But that's the maximum.

The state of investigation is really a turning of attention to whatever appearance is there because of the sinking in of mindfulness—a sort of energetic staying with it. It's not from thinking. Any kind of understanding arises from that opening up. I might tune in and realize, "Oh, it's a mental state." Okay, that's words, but that's really the result of recognizing, of putting a note on what was pre-verbally recognized. And then in staying with it: Which one? Could this be sadness? Could this be grief? Not through that kind of questioning at all, but just staying really close within it. And so—oh, grief. Stay with it a little longer. Oh, no, sadness. But it's arising out of being with the experience, not from trying to think about and describe.

One student shared that sometimes when she's in a really positive, blissful state during a sitting, and the bell goes, there's a tendency to want to stay with that and keep investigating. But in another sitting where she's equally clear and mindful, yet what she's mindful of is pain, when the bell rings, it's like, "Okay, I'll come back to this later." She feels a little guilty about this.

It's great to notice that. Always, guilt is extra. Notice guilt. Guilt is extra. We don't need it. It doesn't help. So notice that first. Because of course that's our tendency: it's nice, we stay; it's painful, we go. That's exactly that root tendency—avoid the unpleasant and stay with the pleasant. To notice it on more subtle levels is wonderful. Not to feel guilty about it. That you're noticing it is helpful, because it's true that we'd prefer to just be with pleasant states.

For myself, when I become aware at the end of a sitting that the energy is present, the mindfulness is clear, I'm quite with whatever's going on, and I feel I have the energy and mindfulness to sit longer, when the bell goes, that's what I use as a deciding factor—the quality of attention, not what is happening. I kind of just make a pact with myself.

Tune in more to the quality of mindfulness and notice, "Oh, I don't want to be with this pain, the bell's gone, I'm out of here." Okay, start noticing that. Start noting desire to go, or aversion, whatever it is. You might only stay four more minutes. It's not that you have to stay the whole sitting period. But just give yourself a few moments to explore that tendency—"Thank God I don't have to look at this anymore, the bell rang"—to just gently move through that and begin to tune in more to the quality of balanced mindfulness.

And again, that's not to sit and hurt yourself. It's not saying you should sit with pain and cause yourself injury.

I'm not saying that. It's simply that when there's general discomfort but the mindfulness is clear, it's wonderful to notice that process. And if you do get up when things are unpleasant, keep noting as you get up so that guilt doesn't expand. Guilty, guilty—just notice that and stay with your experience. It's okay either way, really.

Since we're at the halfway point of the retreat—or for some of you, the first day—we thought it would be helpful to offer a brief review of the instructions. If you've been here a while, this might be a useful review, or it might not be what's happening for you now. If that's the case: hearing, hearing. Let it go through. Don't get into thinking, "Oh no, I have to go back and just be with the breath." Simply let it come in, let it go out. If something useful sticks, that's nice.

When you sit down, don't just jump onto the breath with some kind of desperation. Let yourself come to an ease of sitting here. Connect with feeling your body, the sitting posture. Let your mind and body come together in this moment, in this posture, in this room. Relax into this moment.

Then, if it's been helpful to you, let your awareness open up to the experience of hearing—how without striving, sounds arise by themselves. They are known by awareness quite effortlessly, and they pass. We're learning to use awareness of hearing to reconnect with a quality of alert yet relaxed awareness: awake presence without trying to do anything.

In the same relaxed way, when one is ready, begin to notice the physical sensations of breathing—in just the same relaxed, non-doing way that we notice hearing. Noticing sensations of in-breath as they come by themselves and go by themselves. Feeling the sensations of out-breath in the same relaxed yet alert way.

Using the mental tool of labeling, wherever you're feeling the breath more clearly —"in" at the beginning of the in-breath, "out" if you're feeling it in the nose or chest, or "rising, falling" if you're feeling it in the abdomen. The labeling is very soft. It's a tool to help connect the attention with the actual sensations. It's not a command. Then simply feeling the sensations of in-breath, the sensations of out-breath.

Throughout the retreat we've been using both the feelings of breath as the primary focus or primary anchor of attention, and also, for some people at some times, the experience of hearing. We use the breath when attention feels scattered, spacey, very unfocused—using the sensation of in-breath and out-breath to aim the attention at the sensations, connect, and sustain throughout each part of each breath, helping mindfulness come to alertness.

Yet at times this quality of precision can turn to clutching or tightness, striving, becoming involved in a struggle to make the breath more clear, to make it better. At times like this, opening to the non-striving aspect of attention via hearing can be very helpful. Just relax and let sounds arise by themselves and the clear knowing arise by itself. Then, when we reconnect with that aspect of knowing, we can come back and bring the same relaxed attention to the breath. So it's a dance.

As the attention begins to feel a bit more settled, we're feeling the breath, noticing when thinking arises, offering a soft mental label of "thinking," and when the thinking vanishes, coming back again to feeling the breath. If you've just arrived, you might want to keep it that simple for a couple of days.

But as the mind settles a bit, for the rest of us, when we're being fully present with one breath, this aspect of choiceless awareness or momentary concentration begins to open up. In feeling one breath, we become aware of a sensation in the body. In the moment of noticing it, if it's stronger than the breath, we give that sensation full attention. Just leave the breath be. Move full attention to the sensation with a soft mental label—burning, itching, tingling, whatever—and explore it with kind, non-violent attention. Simply knowing how the sensation behaves without needing to like it or dislike it or change it in any way. As it lives its life, we come back again to the breath.

In the same way, when emotions, moods, or mental states arise, we notice them. Giving them a soft label or name is very helpful in knowing what's happening without getting lost or identified with it. Happiness. Happiness.

Excitement. Boredom. Grief. Metta. Anger. The soft label, the noticing, the allowing—letting the component parts of the emotional experience simply be, cradled with our loving attention.

So with anger: feeling the physical body manifestations, perhaps there's tightness, tension, burning, contraction. Simply noticing and being with, without an agenda. Perhaps there are thoughts, a story that is bringing up the anger or carrying it further. Notice the thinking and come back to the in-this-moment physical experience of anger. Or notice the mood tone in the mind. As it fades, come back to the primary anchor. Or if you begin to get too lost in the story, make a more clear notation—thinking, anger—but pull out of it and come back to breathing.

Similarly with noting thinking: notice what happens to it. For certain repetitive thought trains, the label can be more precise—planning, fantasizing, remembering. Notice what happens to it and come back to the breath or hearing.

It sounds like a lot all at once, but it's really very simple. Using either hearing or the sensations of the breath to connect with this present moment with alert and relaxed attention, you never need to look for anything else. All other experiences, when they arise, arise by themselves. When there's mindfulness of breath or hearing, you'll spontaneously notice any other appearance. All we do then is simply acknowledge what's already happening and give it full and kind attention. That's all.

Whenever you're confused, there's too much happening or there's nothing else happening—use your friend, your primary anchor, and simply rest in whatever's arising in this moment, the breath or hearing. You don't need to do anything else.

Someone asked about the balancing factors among the seven factors of enlightenment, specifically what balances joy and investigation. Both joy or rapture and investigation of states are two of the three energizing factors, the third being obviously energy or effort. Mindfulness balances all of them—mindfulness is always a balancing factor. And the three calming balancing factors are calm, equanimity, and concentration.

It's a great way to evaluate or simply observe your practice when you're not in a self-judging mode. If you're really energized and there's a lot of joy and investigation, you can work with mindfulness always, and also bring in some more concentration—that kind of sticky steadiness on the object—and equanimity. With joy, we can get really attached to it, so you bring in equanimity by just noting "liking, liking," and that will be fine.

Another practitioner shared that in the last sitting at night, she's usually very tired. She'll go into the driveway and jog a bit where no one can see her, or breathe in some cold air or drink some water. But she finds that still, just a few minutes into the sitting, there's simply no mindfulness and no energy at all to bring mindfulness there. Is there any benefit to sitting where there is no mindfulness?

I personally have vast experience of this exact sitting state, and I hate to tell you that I have found there is a benefit. For myself, often—and it isn't always, and that's what's important to recognize, it's usually not always—from eight or eight-thirty on, my mindfulness and energy just goes down. It's like that in my life too.

I do a couple of things. One is I've begun to sit a half hour, then walk a half hour, which I know is hard if you need to sit in the hall. But if you do shorter segments and alternate, it keeps the energy flowing a bit better.

And I've found that I will almost always sit and walk, at least one sitting or one walking, past the point where I'm feeling like you're describing—especially if it's happening every night, and particularly if it happens early. Because I've discovered, even though it feels like there's no mindfulness and nothing's happening, that by continuing to practice, over time I've actually been able to tell there is some mindfulness there. And certain other of the enlightenment factors are actually being cultivated. For example, equanimity.

This is important. We tend to think practice is all about mindfulness and energy, but it's not. Freedom is possible with no energy. It's not necessary to have this totally pristine balance in every sitting, or else the sitting is a waste of time. But I grant you, it's hard to feel like there's any benefit.

Over time, by experimenting—saying, "Okay, I'm tired now, I'll go to bed," and going to bed really early—I noticed that my mind actually gets duller over time with that approach. And by just pushing it a little, being willing to sit with low energy and not much mindfulness and no sense of inner fulfillment whatsoever from the sitting, I notice a real strengthening of actually all the factors. I can tell that it's going on even through the tiredness. So it really can be helpful.

And then for each of us, there's a point. I hit the point where it's not just no energy—I'm falling out of the chair. And then I'll say, "Okay, time for bed." So I'm not a total Spartan about it, but this approach is useful.

Again, we would like to welcome the people who've come to join us and acknowledge those who've been here.

A practitioner asks about the nature of consciousness and whether such questions are appropriate.

I hear many different questions in your question, which I could not hope to answer all of them. And I'm not even sure which is the heart of your question, which one to come in on.

You're asking whether these types of questions are appropriate. I think certainly they are—if they're coming from your experience, not from something you've read, though even that could be helpful. But I certainly find questions about the nature of consciousness, where thoughts come from, things like that arise in my own practice, as certainly valid questions. Not questions with a final answer—"Okay, where do thoughts come from? This is it. Finished." But more the type of question that leads me to turn my attention around and investigate.

So for instance, what you were saying about consciousness continuing forever, and something about consciousness that is "I" never ending, and how it makes you tired. One thing I'd like to say is that consciousness, as defined in the Buddhist Abhidhamma—that quality of knowing—arises and passes moment to moment. It's not a solid state that, once beginning, never ends, and here we are stuck with no change possible. That would be exhausting. That thought I find tiring. And if that were the case, practice wouldn't be of much benefit, since nothing could change.

So the way consciousness can be investigated is to notice that quality of knowing that arises with knowing a sound, knowing a thought, knowing a sensation—and then to see that as the experience passes, so too does the knowing. Another knowing arises the next moment. So it's a sort of endless process, but it's not a solid state.

And what you said about the thought of it going on and on through reincarnation and rebirth being tiring—I would say that thought, that sense of the ceaselessness of arising and passing, is one of the definitions of dukkha, as described in the First Noble Truth.

It's one of the more subtle descriptions of unsatisfactoriness, of dukkha—this ceaseless arising and passing, arising and passing, of whether it's consciousness or physical sensations or sounds. Of course, it's when there's a sense of me that's identified with it that the ceaseless arising and passing becomes exhausting.

So that's the second piece of what you raised—this consciousness that's "me." I'd suggest looking into that in your experience. Consciousness feels like me in a moment. Don't just accept that that is so, but keep exploring with mindfulness the nature of consciousness in a moment. It feels like me—often that's true. It does feel like me. So too sometimes does a sensation. So too sometimes does volition or pleasant feeling.

Our practice of mindfulness is such that when these questions come up, they're great questions. And in a way, to ask them isn't to get some answer handed to us, but rather a way to bring it up into our awareness and then really look. Next time you're aware of consciousness that feels like me, or a thought comes—where does it come from? Don't think about it, but really look, notice. What happens when a thought ends? Where does the thought begin from? Notice the space between thoughts.

These questions are very important when they're arising from your heart, from your experience. There are no easy answers, but they're in some way the crux, the nub of our practice—to really look at these issues.

A yogi raised a related question about the ceaselessness of it all, describing how challenging it is when there's a ticking clock nearby. She explained her approach: noting "ticking, hearing, aversion," then doing metta, then reflecting on impermanence. She asked how to make friends with something so relentless, how to surrender to it.

You didn't mention noticing aversion and hatred, I said. Do you tune into those also?

She acknowledged feeling oppressiveness.

All the ways you described practicing are helpful. But with something like that, something really oppressing me, I would personally stay with vipassana. I would keep coming in close, right at the ear door—ticking, ticking—really let in the ticking, feel it vibrationally if you can feel it that way. Rather than pulling away even the slightest from it, which is where aversion really spills in and takes over, I would move right to the ear door. Ticking, ticking, unpleasant. If you notice the unpleasant, or if there's already a little tightening in your mind or body, notice that tightening.

The key is really being fully in it. We tend to sort of notice it—you can even make all the notes accurately—but there's a subtle, ever so subtle pulling away from being right in the experience. The clock is a good example because it just goes on and on, but so many people encounter someone or something next to them that is difficult. And really, so often that becomes the catalyst for deep insight, for real understanding of surrender.

The oppressiveness of the clock, that endless ticking—it's similar to the oppressiveness I was speaking of, the endlessness of arising and passing. It's oppressive when we're clinging to a sense of self. When there's no self that is reacting to the arising and passing, it's not oppressive. And you can notice the difference.

There can be a moment—like I noticed the ticking actually, this sitting, and the thought arose: "I wonder if this bothers the yogis, this ticking all the time." And then I went back to whatever I was doing and didn't even notice it for half an hour. Then all of a sudden: ticking, ticking, ticking, ticking. Oh, that's funny. I wonder how Mark feels sitting right here with this ticking all the time. Maybe that's why he's never in the hall. And then I didn't notice it again for a long time.

You can actually play with it. Take it as an example of the oppressiveness of experience arising and passing, and the way to experience freedom—the arising and passing doesn't have to stop. So it could get interesting.

First, I could really feel my body sensations. And I could let it go. And then all of a sudden, it would come in. And then I was noting sweating, and tachycardia. And I would note them all and kind of dissipate in it. But part of me thought that it was too important to let go of.

I got the drift, I think. There were two parts. The first part was just clarifying about intention and thought. So I'm not sure which part wasn't clear, but what I was trying to say is that one way we can notice intention is that often it manifests as a thought. Often it manifests pre-thought, pre-verbal as well. And to make it more complex, technically even a thought arises from an intention. There's an intention before a thought. That's pretty hard to notice, so I didn't talk too much about that.

But when the Buddha spoke about wise thought or wise intention as the second stage of the path, he very specifically talked about unwise intention as thoughts of greed, of harming, of ill will—and wise intention as thoughts of renunciation and friendliness or mettā and compassion. Thoughts of compassion, mettā, and renunciation constitute wise intention. Sometimes that arises naturally, but we can also consciously reflect, which is what I was talking about. Sitting there thinking, "I've got to have this"—well, for example, your second part of your question: "I've got to ask this question." Which might or might not be true. I'm not saying it's wrong, but there's that sense of "I've got to have it." And then the thought arises, "Maybe not. Maybe I can put it down." That was intention.

The second part of the question is quite broad, so I can only just touch on it. It's about whether mindfulness can be a safeguard in daily life, which we certainly hope so. He asked whether when we come in, busy in our daily lives—not in a quiet meditative space a lot of the time—can we put that aside? I can only speak for myself. Also, there are the things that have to do with the Dharma specifically, because those seem to be the ideas and thoughts and reflections that the mind seems to permit a little bit to enter. They seem relevant and not stray thoughts, but thoughts that perhaps are wise thoughts. They're more seductive.

Dharma thoughts are more seductive, definitely. To me, that's sort of a different question. In the state I'm in, sometimes Dharma thoughts are more seductive, sometimes it's "How am I going to juggle these three things I have to do?" But certainly at a certain phase in retreat, as the mind gets more silent, I find this myself: I can really notice other thoughts. They come. You don't hate them, but there's no real hook. Dharma thoughts, however, can be incredibly seductive. We think, "Well, I don't really need to note and notice this because this is really important. I'm describing my practice. I'm describing the Dharma, the truth."

On one level, it might be true practice—but that's not the point. That seduction, that pulling, getting pulled in, is still craving. And so that's the point. It's not whether the thought is good or bad or interesting, but the craving is just feeding more craving. I saw at one point how I had to be really quite ruthless—not angry. Just, "Okay, I'm thinking. This is thinking. It's an incredibly wonderful, beautiful thought, but it's a thought." And as long as I know it's a thought, there's no problem.

As long as I know there's craving, it's no problem.

But what about the rest of our lives? Well, certainly mindfulness is a protection and a refuge. It might not be on such a subtle level as when I've been sitting for seven weeks. I don't notice a thought before it starts very often, and it really varies. Some days I come in and I'm really right here. Some days we come in and we're planning our talk through the whole sitting. The difference is that I simply realize that's what thought is doing. I don't sit here getting really upset with myself on the days there's a lot of thinking.

The way mindfulness is a refuge is that if there's a sense of really being caught, or some struggle, I can call it in quite strongly. Just as you were noticing sweating and tachycardia and various things, I can start noticing and noting and really get to the center of what's happening and rest in that, rather than being confused and upset and wondering what's going on. Sometimes I choose to think about something. Sometimes I consciously decide, "I'm going to think about my talk now for ten minutes."

Yesterday, Sharon suggested that in walking meditation, we note just before the action—so if it's lifting, you note "lifting," then lift, then note "moving," then move. When you tried that and got caught up in the moment of noting lifting, you were actually noticing your intention. This is how complicated it gets when trying to say things to a whole group. What I would say is that I would note "intending" at that point, because that is what you're actually experiencing. The noting, I find, is meant to land on what we're actually experiencing. So if you're aware of intention but trying to note the lifting, there's a kind of leaning ahead in that moment. For you, in that moment, I would note "intending." I don't know the context of what Sharon said or who she said it to—it could be quite different at other moments and for other people.

She was referring to not using the noting after the action. After the action, yes—after the action, it's gone. Usually the noting should be concurrent with the experience, at the same time as the experience. I've personally found that if I try to note "lifting" before the lifting, it turns into a command. I'm kind of giving myself marching orders or something.

It's been said in other contexts by other teachers at this retreat as well—for instance, Michelle said that before you reach for the doorknob... Well, if you find that's helpful. You did find it helpful, actually, but also confusing. Well, you see why. We all have different experiences. Really, again, I think it points back to looking at your own experience, because what can be helpful in one particular phase of practice, as practice shifts—gets perhaps more subtle or less subtle—that same thing isn't helpful anymore. Something's different. So in a way, it's good that you stay really right there with your experience instead of just assuming, "All right, this is going to be good." You really look and notice, "Wait, this is confusing me." If it's confusing you, then I would try to note exactly what you're with in that moment, not try to get too tricky about it.

Have an interesting day. Are there any questions this morning?

You were talking about the civil rights movement. I guess it's hard for me to understand the boundary between contentment and then deciding that a Black person ought to want to sit at the back of the bus—where that boundary is. I understand inner contentment on a mundane level. You have agreements with people, then you walk into the house and it's not the way you like it, and that's something I suffer with too. So it's not just about world change, but this is actually one of my biggest fears about Buddhism—that we'll just be cloistered in this room in a tent with our practice and we'll forget there's a world out there. And it goes deeper, because I think about who's here and who chooses to do this practice. I don't want to make assumptions about who's here, but we do tend to be white, and there's—

Could you all hear her question? It's about contentment, which I can't go to what Steve said last night since I wasn't here, so I can only speak from my own understanding. And her difficulties with the balance between contentment, and does that mean we all just sit here and never take any action in the world, not care about the world.

To me, contentment and passivity are not the same thing. When you describe sitting here and not caring about anything or anyone else and we're all just happy—that's not how I think of contentment. Contentment does not preclude skillful action, or action from compassion, from wisdom, action motivated by love or connection. Those are very motivating energies that actually arise from the contentment of resting in truth.

That sense of inner contentment when we touch the place—it's not a place, it's hard to talk about—but when we are awake in the understanding that we're not a separate being, that there isn't a me that needs to be protected, that is separate from other beings... Or another way of putting emptiness is a sense of inner completion where wanting and fear have no place, they just don't arise. From that place, it's not a place of delusion that sees everything as hunky-dory in the world, thinking, "Who cares what happens to anyone else since it's all empty anyway?" That sort of wisdom that isn't balanced with the connecting energy of compassion.

So in my own experience, take a very mundane example. Let's not think too much about what's going on in the civil rights movement or who chooses to come. Because those are important questions, but they just lead to endless thinking. I want to keep the discussion simple, here in the grounds of our practice, because I believe that all of that can be seen in our own practice here.

Take a more mundane example: you come home and the house isn't cleaned according to the agreement. Or take an even more mundane example—you come in the dining room and someone's taking food before the bell, something really immediate. Inner contentment would mean if I'm recognizing the truth in a particular moment, I could walk in the dining room or walk in my house, be centered in emptiness and compassion, see that things haven't been done according to agreement, and I don't lose it. I don't get filled with hate. I don't get filled with anger because I've been disrespected, because I've been hurt. There's an equanimity of, "Oh, this didn't happen." There might be valid reasons why it didn't happen. I find those out first because I'm in a place of balance and connectedness. There might not be valid reasons—the agreement just wasn't respected because the person didn't feel like it. And even then I wouldn't have to respond from anger or self-protection or hurt. There could be a balanced way to respond.

But that response looks at the whole situation. It wouldn't be, "Okay, you didn't feel like it, so we'll just assume there was no agreement." Metta and compassion look at the whole and what's good for the whole. It's not just self-centered, "I'm happy, who cares about the world?" That isn't contentment to me. That's kind of a pleasant resting place in the moment, but it isn't connected to wisdom, the wisdom of compassion.

The questions you raise about the world are huge questions. I don't know the answers to those, but I do know that the inner contentment of peace does not preclude wise action. It can come from a place that's more connected and loving rather than from a place of frustration, or anger, or our own confusion. That's how I relate to contentment.

Question from the audience

Thank you for what you just said. It was terrific. It applies to me because I've been doing solid metta for two months and I'm feeling loving and nice. But this morning something happened and I'm so angry. I feel that I don't have the mindfulness... There's a huge ocean and my sails are blown off, but I have a navigation of things. Doing metta feels like a band-aid on this huge wound. I am so angry. I want to get even. I want to do something physical that satisfies my bloodlust.

One thing I'd say, Lorna, is don't despair about that. It's true that when you've been practicing metta for two months, the mindfulness is only going into the metta—which is not a bad thing—but it's true we're not practicing vipassana at that time.

And I would not agree that metta is a band-aid. But as you know, part of what happens with metta practice or karuna practice is that at times, as the purification unfolds, the opposite will come shooting up. And as you're experiencing right now, it can happen very suddenly and with great intensity—anger arises. Because we're just with the metta, it sort of blindsides us. If you were doing vipassana, you might notice the beginnings of it. Doing metta, we don't notice that. And so when you suddenly become aware, it's like whoosh—this huge wave, so sudden and so strong.

So first I just want to say, that's not wrong or a mistake. In a way, these difficult aspects get lifted up more via the metta, part of the purification. So don't blame the metta, don't blame yourself. Something horrible hasn't happened. It's like, "Oh yeah, right. We can do metta, but we're not completely living in the divine abode. We can still notice once in a while these other intentions come through." That's not wrong—it's going to happen. And you're right, it's hard after two months to just switch into vipassana with it. It's a little rusty.

I just want to encourage you not to feel that something has failed, not to give up about it, not to let your thinking mind take over with "Oh no, it didn't work, something's wrong." And do try—the thing you will find is that because of the two months of metta, you might have to work a little to get to the mindfulness of vipassana with the anger, but you'll have a steadiness of mind that, once you get there, will surprise you.

So it's okay. Do try to use the steadiness and vipassana with the anger, not the thoughts. Just feel it. You might just be able to hover right there kindly with the murderous rage—whether it's in your body (especially helpful if it's in your body) or in the emotional tone. The vipassana means you don't have to do something about it. You don't have to satisfy the bloodlust physically—and clearly there's enough mindfulness that that's not going to happen. And you also don't have to get rid of it in order to be loving.

Simply use the steadiness and the vipassana to feel the feelings that arise together with the anger in your body. Notice the emotions and just gently, gently, gently let it be there. It's okay that it comes up. It's part of all of our practice. You don't try to metta it away. It's another piece to accept, and that in itself is metta.

So it might be bumpy for a little while. If you can not worry about that, not judge it, and just keep trying to feel it gently with the vipassana—it will of course shift. But yeah, I just want to say: it's okay, don't worry, just a little rocky for a while.

CHAPTER 284

Where Can We Find Refuge?

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this mid-retreat dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common tendency among practitioners: the search for some concrete body of knowledge, specific experiences, or final explanations that will resolve all doubts and provide lasting security. She observes how easily we slip into assessment mode, wondering if we've "got it" or if our practice is going correctly.
>
> Drawing on the Buddha's teachings about attachment to views (diṭṭhi-upādāna), Wilson examines how even verified faith—confidence born from direct experience—can solidify into rigid views that cause suffering. She illustrates this through examples ranging from the nature of the universe (where 99% consists of undetectable dark matter) to the civil rights movement, showing how clinging to views limits our perception and can lead to enormous suffering. The Buddha's teaching on Transcendental Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) reveals that suffering itself can be the supporting condition for faith, which leads through joy, tranquility, and concentration toward liberation.
>
> Wilson calls practitioners toward radical acceptance—a complete surrender into the present moment without trying to control outcomes or manufacture particular experiences. Quoting Suzuki Roshi, she describes this as appreciating ourselves as "a wonderful part of Buddha's great activity, even in the midst of difficulties." True refuge, she suggests, is not found in any view we can cling to, but in moment-to-moment spontaneous awareness where truth is always present.

Where Can We Find Refuge?

Tonight I want to talk about the search for knowledge, or where can we find refuge.

At this point of the retreat, coming up on the midpoint, about twenty people are leaving at the end of this week. And for those who are staying, there's still a real sense that the retreat is about half over. I've noticed in quite a few of the interviews that the mind tends to move into a sort of assessment mode—evaluating, "Well, how am I doing? Have I got it? It's over and I have to leave, and did I really get it yet? Do I understand it all? Will I ever? How is my retreat going? It's not quite going in the way that I had planned." Ha! Big surprise.

But this is coming up a lot, and it makes me reflect on how for many years my own practice was—of course I was practicing to be free from suffering—but in some way, if I was asked, I would think it was for understanding. And understanding, my mind would translate as some body of knowledge, or some specific set of experiences, or some final explanation that was going to resolve all my questions, all my doubts. Everything would make sense. It's really only something to have so that there's nothing to worry or wonder about anymore. Some something, you know. And of course, some proof, at least, that we're getting somewhere other than here, whatever that might be in each of our minds.

And of course, as I'm sure you know I'm going to say, it's just the opposite—that the closer we look to find this explanation, this body of knowledge, this set of experiences that we can use to satisfy our mind that we've gotten it, the closer we look for this knowledge, for something concrete to take refuge in, the more we don't find anything.

One of my teachers would say, "When you don't look, you see samsara. When you look, you don't see anything."

That's really how it is.

This little article—some of you have heard me read this before—to me it's a metaphor of our practice, of our search for some knowledge and understanding. It's a science article about the nature of the universe.

A couple of years ago, some scientists discovered a new galaxy, the largest galaxy ever detected. And by the way, even on the news last night, they were talking about this: there are one hundred billion galaxies that they know of—one hundred billion. And our galaxy, only one of them, has something like one hundred billion stars. It's unthinkable. Anyway, somehow they discovered a new galaxy, the largest one ever discovered, which has one hundred trillion stars—sixty times the size of Earth's galaxy, the Milky Way.

So that just sets the stage.

This new galaxy is located in the center of an even larger clump of one thousand galaxies called Abel 2029. And in studying these galaxies, scientists hope that further study will provide clues to the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter. Because there doesn't appear to be enough ordinary, regular matter in the universe to account for the gravitational forces that would be necessary to clump all these galaxies together. So they propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that eludes detection because it emits no radiation.

According to the prevailing wisdom, ninety-nine percent of the universe consists of this missing mass. Ninety-nine percent. Which means that what is generally thought of as astronomy actually concerns only a tiny subset of particles that happen to be detectable by the human nervous system.

I think it's like that when we begin to really explore our mind-body process. Ninety-nine percent of it, we don't have a clue what's really going on. The more we look for answers, the more we discover mystery, unknowing.

And so what I want to talk a bit about tonight is taking refuge in radical acceptance, radical faith, radical trust.

Once I read somewhere—I forget where—a definition of faith as the drive towards that which cannot be described.

I really like that. It takes faith out of the realm of definition and intellect—the movement of heart towards that which cannot be described.

You'll probably remember when Joseph spoke about faith some time ago, about this aspect of faith first arising in us, which is often called bright faith. That sense of brightness, confidence of heart and mind, almost as if internally something lights us up, energizes us. It brings us to explore. It brings us to practice. It's really a wonderful mental state, a wonderful feeling. And it can come from hearing some teacher, from talking to somebody. It can come from being in nature. It can come from an experience of suffering that one somehow transcends or transforms into something very profound.

I'm sure—maybe not—but at times reflect on the first arising of this bright faith for yourself, because I find that can often inspire energy and confidence. And of course it fades, but it's not a one-time experience. Even here, you can notice often the reawakening of this state of bright faith. I experience it so many times in interviews, talking with people, just seeing the inner light as somebody is opening to a new aspect of how things are. Somebody is letting go of some pain, some long-held idea, some way that suffering is being created. Or when I see the power of metta, somebody's kindness. Just the way that one of you can inspire another one of you. The incredible dedication you're all putting out—really, it's a gift for us as teachers to be able to meet with all of you daily as you go through your process. Even though sometimes bright faith might be the last thing you think is emanating, and sometimes it is the last thing that's emanating, many other times—more than you'd realize—I get such a hit of this inspiration from talking with each of you.

One thing about bright faith, one way that we often can misplace it, is that that first brightness feels like a reawakening in us of a recognition of truth, a recalling us to our truest nature. And sometimes we take that faith, that bright lit-up place, and instead of seeing it as a calling back to our own truth—that we are an expression of truth—it can be easy to direct it outwards, to turn it into blind faith. Faith in the person who inspired it, faith in the teachings. I don't mean that we can't trust people and teachings, but this blind faith that says, "I can only feel awakened and enlivened if my teacher is with me, or if I can somehow hold on to teachings in a certain way." It's again a looking outside of ourselves, a giving away of our own potential to awaken to truth, saying, "I need this other being, this other teacher, this other situation, whatever it might be." And then it turns into blind faith.

Someone told me once about one of her teachers. She said, "You know, I trust him so much. If he told me to jump off a cliff, I would do it without thinking." I thought, oh—that could possibly be blind faith. So blind that it doesn't really look to see what's true in each moment.

So bright faith—never mind blind faith—but bright faith of course is not stable. It wavers because it's at first dependent on something outside. What's wonderful about this practice is that as the faith energizes us and gives us the confidence to sit down and look, then through our own personal moment-to-moment experience, bright faith changes or is strengthened by verified faith. This faith means confidence in what we know to be true through our own experience.

This is what many of us love in particular about the teachings of the Buddha as they are in the Pali suttas. There's that very famous line he said often, ehi passiko—that's Pali, which translates roughly as "you too, come and see." He said many times, don't believe anything just because I say so, just because someone that you respect or revere says so—and he goes through a long list. He says, but if you hear it and it sounds helpful or good, then come and see for yourself. Try for yourself and see what is true. See what leads to less suffering, what leads to more suffering.

So verified faith is what arises out of this seeing what is actually true for ourselves. And something you know from your own experience to be true—anyone telling you otherwise, it just doesn't matter, because you know. You don't get upset about it. You don't get defensive about it. You just know this is true, and I'm sorry you don't know that.

Of course this gets tricky, and that's what I'm going to get into in a minute. It leads me to the radical aspect of faith or trust, because this verified faith so easily—what is true, what my experience tells me is true—so easily becomes faith in what? It can again become faith in something concrete.

I'll give you an easy example of how easy it is to slip from this really radical trust and faith into forming a view, an opinion, and attaching, grasping at that view and mistaking that for truth—which hopefully will make sense by the time I finish this talk.

For example, you might have an experience in the moment: strong pain, the mind suffering, and just simply with mindfulness, being with it, there's an easing of the mental tension. At a point the mind goes into equanimity, and maybe the pain completely goes away. And even before the pain went away, there was an ease in the mind, and you know in that moment: ah, there's a real difference between pain and suffering. Physical pain does not have to be mental suffering. And you know that, absolutely, in that moment. It was an intuitive experience, which of course our mind will then put into words, a way of describing it to ourselves.

So easily that experience can then be taken, remembered, solidified, and become a view—that when pain arises, if I pay attention correctly, the mind will get calm and the pain will go away. So easily we can make that slip, that little movement from just being open to the experience as it is, just resting in that pain with spacious awareness, to holding the view that if I do it right, my mind will be easy and the pain will go away. And then of course, the next time—or the tenth time—that doesn't happen, we start to feel confused or struggling, and there's more suffering. At this point, we've confused verified faith, faith in what we know is true, with attachment to a view. And this is very tricky.

The Buddha spoke about this realm of attachment: when there's contact, there's feeling of pleasantness or unpleasantness, which leads to craving, wanting, and in the next moment it strengthens the wanting into grasping or clinging or attachment—just a stronger movement of craving. He talked about different areas of this, sense pleasures being one, of course. The second area is attachment to views and opinions. He spoke an awful lot about this, so I'm going to return to it a little later.

First I want to say what I actually mean by true radical faith or trust. It's really trust and confidence not that something particular will or should happen, but that truth, that real refuge in the Dharma, is found within this moment, with resting within this particular experience, whatever it might happen to be, just as it is. Faith gives us the confidence that we can truly open and find refuge in this moment, in this experience. And the real faith is that we know truth and freedom is only here, and never anywhere else. We forget it, but that's what faith can bring us back to.

This radical acceptance—I read somewhere once—radical acceptance is radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, as all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways. To let go, to accept, it is necessary only to give up your concerns, your ideas, and your fears. I admit that's not so easy. Necessary only to give up your fears. So what have you been fearing today? Trying to control, not able or even recognizing its presence to radically accept? Because radical acceptance is this faith to surrender completely into this moment—to live consciously in not knowing, not controlling, and not being able to organize things so that they happen the way we think they ought to. And that is scary for us a lot of the time.

We definitely want facts, some kind of certainty. If I do this, then that will happen. Or if I'm sleepy, it's because of X, Y, and Z, and if I do A, B, and C, the sleepiness will go away. And of course, to some extent we need some facts. We need to hear other people's experience. We need some guidance, some idea of helpful ways to practice, something to go on. No question about that. But when we again begin to mistake ideas, helpful suggestions, or how things might tend to happen in the usual sense—when we mistake any of these for absolute truth, this is the way it is—when we begin to try and take refuge in any of these so-called facts, in any of these ways of practice, we're going to find ourselves suffering. We're going to find ourselves in confusion at some point.

Living in not knowing, though, is very unsettling. And generally in this culture especially, I find it's set up in a way to really hide the fact that we don't have a clue what's going to happen in the next moment. Actually we don't, but our culture is set up so we can really avoid facing this for large portions of time.

A couple years ago I spent three months in India. On reflection when I came back, it was so interesting, because something about India doesn't let one take refuge in the assumption that if I plan out the day, that's how it's going to be. In fact, after a while I realized whatever I thought was going to happen that day would be the one thing that probably wouldn't happen. So if I thought I'd get up, go here, go to the post office, go have a chai—probably not. Maybe I'd have the chai. That was usually first on the list. But the other things weren't up to me.

It can be extremely frustrating, and it was for quite a while. And then suddenly I realized: this is just how life is anyway. The only problem is I think I should be able to have my plans work. Give it up. And it got to be very delightful—like just dancing. Get up and make my plans and then throw it all in the air and see what really happens today. It's fun. It's much more enlivening. Much more like I was dancing with life.

When I came back here—and I'm the same way myself—everyone I know has day planners and hour planners. And even more amazingly, most of the time that stuff happens. Like right now, I know where I'm supposed to be almost every day of 1996.

And every other year, that's actually happened. I mean, that is to me the miracle more than anything else. But it can really lull me into this sense that feels like security. It feels like comfort, a sense of somewhere to rest. I can look in my little day book and know where I was on August 15th and where I'll be next August 15th. My life has some order. All's right in the universe, that kind of thing. It seems like a comfort, but really it's a great enforcer of delusion on a big level.

The same tendency goes on here in retreat, or in our minds, on much more subtle levels. I'm sure you've probably planned where you're going to be every day for 1996 too—but not taking it so seriously. Bringing it down right to here, the way this retreat is structured can also give us a false sense that everything is very orderly. We know what's going to happen next. The bells and the time and the meals are served at the same time every day. If it's ten minutes late, it's a huge upheaval. Why was it so odd to come in here and have pumpkins? Because something was different. After six weeks, something was different in here when you came in, because it seemed so worldly. And of course the truth is, who knows what's going to happen in this next moment? When you sit down in your next sitting, when you stand up and go to the next walking?

It's scary to live consciously in this not knowing. It can be scary if we're caught in wanting security, if we're looking for some explanation, some knowledge to use as a final resting place, to take a stand in. I'm not saying to just intellectually tell yourself, "Okay, now I don't know what's going to happen next," and keep reminding yourself until you make yourself totally anxious. That's just another view. You don't really have to do anything except keep paying attention, because our practice is a moment-to-moment experience of this fact. It's a practice of radical trust. And that's why sometimes this practice can be so uncomfortable, why things can feel so scary. When something you've thought—without even knowing you thought it—about how things are gets suddenly blasted apart by an experience, it's like for an instant there is nowhere to take a stand.

I have a friend who described once, years ago, having an anattā experience, an experience of no-self, which many people have. It's not like you have one and everything's over, but we often have little experiences of no-self. He said it was like he went out for a Sunday drive, but then there was nowhere to go home to. That sense of—where's the reference point? We want so much to have one reference point that we can always look back to, to hold on to.

So this radical trust is the recognition that our true refuge, our true home—there actually is always somewhere to go home to. But it's in this very moment, in this very experience, that we can discover our true home: the radiant nature of heart, of mind. As long as we're looking to some set experience, we're missing our true home. But because this home has no description, no particular ways to recognize it always, because it's within constantly changing experience, it's so hard for us. We want to get a handle on it. It's hard to just surrender into this moment with total confidence that this is taking refuge in the Dharma.

As our practice continues—and it's happening for everyone here—we more and more come to trust that this is where home really is. But at times, like my friend's experience, or when we begin to lose our reference points, it can be extremely unsettling. It's like being in an earthquake.

One time, some of us here were teaching and cooking and sitting at Yucca Valley in California. We have a big retreat every spring, and towards the end of this ten-day retreat we had a pretty big earthquake—a 6.1 or something. I'd never been in an earthquake before. The first part was interesting. I was standing outside in the desert at night, and it was just a little scary, but also sort of far out to see the ground roll and everything shake. But then these aftershocks, which are really little earthquakes, kept going every few minutes—every three, four, or five minutes all night and into the next couple of days. It stopped being far out and fun pretty quickly. You're just falling asleep and everything shakes. And of course the radio would always say, "35% chance of the big one," which is really a big help. So you can't just say it's an aftershock—it might be the big one. You have to wake up.

What was interesting to me was to see how, on every level, not just my mind—actually my body felt more jangled and upset than my mind. It was visceral. The body thought it could trust the earth.

to be solid, to be there. Guess what? No.

It was a really interesting experience, and I think for me it was very much an absolute all-senses experience of the fact that there really is no concrete place to take a stand. The scary part about that was I wanted it to be different, of course. I didn't want this to be happening. I wanted the earth to stay like I always thought it should be. And when it didn't, I suffered.

When we start trying to control the results, when this happens in our meditation, so easily we get into manipulating meditation. You know what I mean, I'm sure. Either you've had a really good experience, which immediately the mind translates as "this is how it's supposed to be and I'm doing it right." And then we try to recreate every situation that seemed to have an effect on that particular state—the time of day to sit, what you ate for lunch, where you walked, how long you walked, what you're wearing, your posture, how you hold your head. We try to get back into that good sitting again. Just take three breaths, then let it go, then open to hearing—we get it all down. Or just the reverse, of course, if you had an awful experience, trying to do everything different from whatever led to that.

Without looking at it closely, we really think that we're trying to meditate correctly, that we're looking towards truth. But look at your state of heart, your state of mind, when you find yourself involved in manipulating meditation. Is there a sense of confidence, of trust and openness to the moment, to experience? Personally, I've experienced a contraction, a real kind of tightness, a leaning forward, fearful actually, wanting. It actually strengthens the sense of isolation, of separateness, and quite likely leads into striving, self-judgment, frustration. There is no room in manipulating meditation to recognize our inner radiance. There's no space to recognize that our true refuge is here, because we're so busy trying to recreate whatever idea we have of good meditation that's going to take us to truth.

And of course, this is what can drive us nuts, because we all have the opposite experience. After the manipulation, the striving, the frustration—hopefully before we've completely driven ourselves into a tight mess of suffering—at some point you realize, "Oh, right, just let it go." Just be with things as they are, and space opens up. Peace is possible. There's a sense of ease and happiness. We know that. We all know that, but still so easily we slip out of that knowing.

When we're in that space of acceptance, when we are able to surrender with this trust, with this faith, no matter what's happening, we're open again to the wonder—the wonder of ourselves, the wonder of the world. It's when you walk outside and marvel: how can nature be so beautiful and so fragile and so powerful, so cruel? How can our hearts be so infinitely tender one moment and so unbelievably hardened an hour later?

How can each of us be able to bear the immense suffering that each person bears in their own particular life pattern, and then turn around and be so joyous at something simple like the chickadees landing? It's really beautiful when we open to the wonder in this way.

And that's what this radical trust is—it's the gift that it gives us. There's no one thing we can hold to, but it's the trust that allows us to open into the infinite mystery, the infinite wonder and beauty of life.

I don't mean to be naive or simplistic, suggesting that if we open, if we trust, everything from now on will be wonderful and happy and nothing bad will ever happen again. Of course I don't mean that at all. Because again, that would be looking for some result, for some proof. It's easy to relax into the joyous moments. It's very difficult to find this trust when something difficult is happening.

I thought I'd read this from the Buddha. To me it's an acknowledgement that the difficult is often not what it seems—that even the difficult, when surrendered to, is the opening to truth. This is from a sutta called the Transcendental Dependent Arising. Remember on Saturday, Steve talked about the classical dependent origination, about how ignorance is the origin of suffering, those twelve links. This is another series of twelve links the Buddha gave that starts from the endpoint of the first. Suffering is the first link in this dependent origination. So it begins with what's truly difficult, what we would have trouble opening to.

I'm not going to explain each of these. I just want you to hear that suffering can be the causal condition for something quite other. Suffering is the supporting condition for faith. Faith is the supporting condition for joy. Joy is the supporting condition for rapture. Rapture is the supporting condition for tranquility.

Tranquility for happiness. Happiness is the supporting condition for concentration. That's right—happiness is the supporting condition for concentration, not striving, tightness, or teeth gritting. Happiness is the supporting condition for concentration. Concentration is the supporting condition for the knowledge and vision of things as they really are, which goes on to support disenchantment, dispassion, and the supporting condition for emancipation.

Beginning with suffering. It doesn't say get rid of suffering and then this stuff can happen.

I find this really fascinating. This is a way that views and teachings can be helpful—if they give us some confidence to again look and see for ourselves. So don't believe it. Look and see for yourself. Can we trust in a particular moment that even this suffering can be the seed of opening to truth?

Often in life when something difficult happens, we think, "Oh, this is horrible, this shouldn't be happening." And often when we look back years later, we wouldn't have chosen it, but it actually led to very beneficial effects. This happens a lot in my life.

Just as an example, when I got quite sick a few years ago, it made me look more carefully at how I was living my life. Without actually knowing what I was doing that might have contributed to the sickness, by looking more closely and really accepting the experience as it was, it caused me to make some radical changes in how I was living, how I was relating to my life—changes that have been wonderful and have led to things I could never have imagined.

We think we can plan our life, plan the next five years, plan our retirement. And we do our best. But I've found that what really happens, I couldn't have thought it up in my wildest dreams. And often it's much better than I could have imagined.

For example, I think partly as a result of the sickness and the changes I made, I now live behind a study center in a really cute little cottage that didn't even exist then. I remember about ten years ago, what's now the study center was a farmhouse, and the family that lived there—their dog used to come up here all the time. She was sort of part of the staff. We would house sit for them and take care of their dog when they went away. I have a very clear memory of sitting in their backyard, which was lovely, peaceful. I could never have sat there and said, "Well, in six years this will be a study center, and I'll be living in a cottage that hasn't been built yet back here. That's what I think I'll try and manifest." I couldn't think of that in my wildest dreams. It's amazing how stuff happens.

So we don't really know, but we sure as heck want to know—what's going to happen, what has happened, and how to explain it all. This is where we get into grasping at views, clutching at views. The way it's described, grasping at views is the tendency of mind to think, "This is true, this is how it is. Everything else is false. Every other explanation is not accurate." That's a little hard and fast. But without putting it quite so clearly, we are doing this all the time.

The Buddha talked quite a lot about this, actually—many of his suttas address the dangers and suffering that arise from people clinging to views. Here is one example: "For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions, they wander about in the world annoying people."

You might have thought the Buddha was a sober guy, but he had his funny sides.

Now, mind you, we're talking about grasping at views. Of course we have to hold views and opinions—we couldn't function in the world. But when we cling to them with that attitude of "this is true, everything else is false," it limits our world, it limits our possibilities. We don't even perceive that things could be otherwise.

There are ten million examples of this in daily life. We can see so often how grasping at views causes so much strife and suffering. Politics is a great example. Next week is Election Day in this country, and there aren't actually any big elections. But I notice for myself there are two particular politicians—whom I won't name—and if I just see them come on the TV, I get almost nauseated. There's no way I can hear what they say with any kind of openness. They could say something really great.

All I have to do is see them, and my view is so hardened. "This person is so bad for the country," I think. "I'm right, they're wrong. They couldn't possibly do something beneficial." Cut and dried. Finished.

And I know I'm probably quite mild in this, because I'm not a very politically active person. Just look at what goes on in the rest of the world. But to see how blinding that is, how strong that feeling of "I'm right." Think about the times when you're so sure you're right. How hard is it when someone comes along and says, "Well, you know, that's a view and an opinion. Can you see the other side?" Don't tell me that's a view and an opinion. I know.

Views can be really strong—so strong that they can cut through all kinds of other experience. For instance, the view of being a particular nationality, being American, or the sense of "my country, right or wrong."

There's a kind of funny story. A friend of mine who's German told me he once took some visiting friends in Munich to this big tourist attraction, the Hofbräuhaus, which is a huge beer hall. I don't know if Germans even go there, but all the tourists do. And there are a lot of American soldiers, army people, in Germany. So he was there with his friends when some American army guys—they must have been in uniform—got into a big fight. Punching and cursing, really a very physical fight. And my friend saw the manager or someone tip a note to the oompa band that was playing along this whole time. Immediately, without a break, they swung into "The Star-Spangled Banner." Clearly this was not a one-time event. And as soon as the national anthem started, these guys stopped their vicious fight, stood up with tears running down their eyes—all "my country, right or wrong." Really powerful.

Being attached to views can hide us from the truth. It doesn't let us see what's really going on. I read just recently that in 1988, in the Soviet Union—this must have been after Gorbachev came in but before it broke up—the Soviet authorities canceled all national history exams. They acknowledged that through all the years of lies and changing history to meet the prevailing view of the country, of that particular government, the actual history had become lost. And so they couldn't in conscience hold history exams because they didn't even know what the history was. Interesting. I didn't know that.

And of course, holding to views can lead to enormous suffering. Enormous violence has been carried out in the world because of attachment to views and the fear and anger that comes up when our views are threatened. Many wars are this, of course.

I've been reading lately a very interesting history of the American civil rights movement in the South in the late 1950s and early 1960s, around Martin Luther King, during the time of John F. Kennedy. I was a young girl then, so I didn't really know so much about it. But just to see—it was basically a movement, if you're not American, coming out of the Southern Black churches, joined by some whites, trying to break the segregation. Because at that time, in public places, Blacks had to eat in separate places from whites, sit in separate places on the buses. That was truly how it was.

So it was a nonviolent campaign to break down the segregation laws—by sit-ins at lunch counters, by not using the buses, by Blacks and whites riding together on interstate buses. And it was quite strongly nonviolent, trying to base itself in Gandhian principles. How frightening it was to white supremacists who were relying on that separation, who certainly held the view that it was right, that they were superior. There was so much fear in having that view challenged. There was all kinds of horrific violence—bombing of churches because the movement was coming out of churches, setting fire to buses that people were traveling on, bombing of people's houses, murders, lynchings. All because of having one's idea of how things should be challenged—even though the people in the civil rights movement were in no way physically threatening anybody. They were quite committed to nonviolence.

The power of views. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, you can kill five or ten people with a gun, but somebody really holding tight to a view, if they get in a position of power, has the power to hurt millions of people. Views are so strong.

So that's on the biggest picture. But of course, we have the same tendencies in our minds—to manufacture views and explanations of experience, of how things should be—and often we don't recognize them. So are we willing to begin in our practice to truly look? Not that views are wrong, not that opinions and explanations are wrong—of course not. They're very helpful. But it's important to recognize a view as view, not to mistake an opinion, an explanation, or a view for a totally accurate description of reality.

There's no view we can hold to, that we can cling to forever, that will not bring us suffering and confusion. Any view is relative. See, we're back to the shaky ground again.

We want some view that isn't relative. Are we willing—can we live without holding to any view at all?

This is from Suzuki Roshi, the Zen master. He's dead now, but he wrote quite wonderful things. He says, "I've discovered that it is necessary, absolutely necessary, to believe in nothing." He's being quite radical here. "No matter what God or doctrine you believe in, if you become attached to it, your belief will be based more or less on a self-centered idea." Because of course attachment is self-centered. "So then you strive for a perfect faith in order to save yourself. You will be involved in an idealistic practice. In constantly seeking to actualize your ideal, you will have no time for composure."

I love the way he puts that, because exactly when we've become attached to some doctrine, we start striving to actualize that, we become involved in idealistic practice, trying to get our practice to meet some ideal, and then there's no time for composure.

I really love in my own practice looking at how views form, how I get attached to them, how I see through them, and how immediately the next instant another view comes up. It's really amazing. If we can see through them, it's not a problem.

How often here in the morning question period, or in something we say in a talk, or in instructions—we hear someone else describing something in their practice and immediately, without recognizing it, a view can come up: "Oh, is that what's supposed to be happening? My practice isn't like that." Or, "Oh, that happened to me last week, but now I know that it's supposed to be the way it's happening this week." Or, "Last time I sat, the breath was so fine and refined and everything was quiet, and now I'm just being washed in waves of emotion—this is wrong and that was right." Or vice versa.

It's really great from the side of getting to listen to so many people, because it just makes me see there is no one right way that practice can ever manifest. Everybody's so different. Sometimes right after each other, someone will come in saying, "I'm just having too many emotions. I can't practice because there's too many emotions." And someone else will come in and say, "I can't practice because there's no emotions." Someone says, "I can't feel the breath—there's too many thoughts." Someone says, "I can only feel the breath. I wish I had something else happening." I'm exaggerating a little, but not that much.

And to see how as soon as a certain sitting has clear mindfulness, it's like, "Ah, that's how it's supposed to be." And then it forms into a view. Or, "I'm suffering, I'm struggling," and suddenly there's letting go. "Ah, right, that's how it's supposed to be." Just watching one view fall, another come up. One view falls, another comes up. Really, really fascinating to me.

Even to have the idea that practice means it should be intensive practice—sometimes we have to so let go of the view we have of practice that we wouldn't even recognize what we're doing as meditation practice. That's a real challenge. At different times, each of us might meet a place where what's happening is either so powerful or so intense or so scary that our practice has to take a form we couldn't even think of as intensive practice. Generally, the tendency is to think, "I can't practice, I'm failing." But actually, that person might be meeting the most difficult, challenging aspect of living in trust of anybody here. Who knows?

There's no one view of practice or anything that we can cling to. We can use them, but not mistake them for the truth.

Even the teachings of the Buddha—anything we say—notice how sometimes when we say something and it doesn't jibe with your experience at all, it's really different. How immediately the mind has to either make yourself wrong or make us wrong. There can't be a possibility that sometimes this is true and sometimes that is true. No, no, we've got to find out which is right and which is wrong. And often it's not that way.

The Buddha—this is another thing I love about him—he's not saying, "You've got to only trust me." In a very famous simile in one of his suttas, the simile of the raft, he talks of his teaching as a raft.

While you are practicing, you may hear the rain dropping from the roof in the dark. Later, the wonderful mist will be coming through the big trees. And still later, when people start to work, they will see the beautiful mountains. But some people will be annoyed if they hear the rain when they're lying in bed in the morning because they do not know that later they will see the sun rising from the east. If our mind is concentrated on ourselves, we have this kind of worry. But if we accept ourselves as the embodiment of the truth, as Buddha nature, we will have no worry.

We can think, now it is raining, but we don't know what will happen in the next moment. By the time we go out, it may be a beautiful day or a stormy day. Since we don't know, we appreciate the sound of the rain now. This kind of attitude is the right attitude. If you understand yourself as a temporal embodiment of the truth, you will have no difficulty whatsoever. You appreciate your surroundings and you appreciate yourself as a wonderful part of Buddha's great activity, even in the midst of difficulties. This is our way of life.

We appreciate ourselves as a wonderful part of Buddha's great activity, even in the midst of difficulties. This is our way of life.

CHAPTER 285

Q&A with Carol Wilson

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this question and answer session, Carol Wilson addresses a wide range of practice concerns arising during retreat. She begins with a reflection on gratitude as a practice that opens the heart to both joy and sorrow, noting how conscious appreciation can inspire faith and connectedness rather than dismissing our difficulties.
>
> The discussion explores several key themes in meditation practice. Wilson examines the nature of vedanā (feeling tone) and whether pleasant and unpleasant experiences persist when mindfulness is strong, referencing Ajahn Buddhadasa's perspective that with precise awareness at the point of contact, feeling tone need not arise. She offers extensive guidance on working with aversion, emphasizing the importance of acceptance, grounding in physical sensations, and recognizing the subtle hooks of identification that perpetuate reactive patterns.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's nuanced teaching on working with physical pain, distinguishing between forcing attention onto difficult sensations versus approaching them with balanced, equanimous awareness. She also addresses the skillful expression of strong emotions like anger, clarifying the difference between mindfully acknowledging intense feelings and watering the seeds of reactivity through identification with storylines. The session concludes with a discussion of awakening—not as a state to be maintained, but as a recognition of what is always already true, requiring constant re-recognition and letting go.

So I guess you know today is Thanksgiving, which in this country is one of the big feast holidays, sort of a harvest festival. But literally, it is purporting to be about what the word says: Thanksgiving.

And I know in my kind of upbringing and generally moving around the world, it seems sometimes the Thanksgiving part is sort of lesser and it just becomes a time to get together. I guess the guys watch football. I just heard something on the radio, some commentator bemoaning that he didn't really like Thanksgiving because all people did was get together with your family who gets on your nerves and then watch football. I thought that was really sad.

So anyway, maybe Michelle mentioned this in her talk on gratitude, but something that I find very energizing and really helpful is to just take a few minutes and consciously reflect on all the things I have to be truly grateful for. I don't have to be feeling gratitude at the time—it doesn't really matter what I'm feeling. I just bring into my heart what I feel grateful for. And there's always so much more than I would have expected. Things that I hadn't even been thinking of for ages come popping up.

I find it really quite faith-inspiring and energizing because it in no way belittles the sorrow or the sufferings or difficulties that we experience. You know, that sense of, "Well, I have all this to be grateful for so I have no right to suffer"—about whatever things we're suffering about here, small or large. But it's quite the reverse. I find the gratitude opens up a sense of faith and connectedness that lets me bring more openness and compassion to my suffering and sorrow rather than thinking it should go away. So anyway, I just offer that if you feel so inclined.

We have a few moments for questions if you have any. Really, this is a time for questions about our practice here, what's coming up here, because this is where we are.

Question: Concerning feeling tone, when mindfulness is strong or perhaps pure, are there pleasant and unpleasant experiences, or simply neutral?

I think that's an interesting question. Interesting because from my own experience, I would reply that I still find pleasant and unpleasant experiences, but so toned down, so to speak, because there's no reactiveness of mind, that it does, for me, tend to merge towards neutral—sometimes hard to even tell.

But what I think is interesting is, again, this is from Ajahn Buddhadasa, and he does tend to sometimes go his own way in interpretation. But I found this interesting. He was speaking about dependent origination and the point of contact giving rise to feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant—and that leads into the craving and clinging. And he claims that if we're very mindful and meet the experience right at the point of contact, that pleasant and unpleasant feeling does not have to arise.

So I'm sure he's talking from his experience, and he even acknowledges that a lot of people don't believe him. I'm not saying that's what we should practice for or look for or expect or evaluate our practice by, but I just offer that as another opinion from someone who's quite learned.

Question: What determines whether something is pleasant or unpleasant? Is it the nature of what is felt, or the nature of the knowing?

What determines whether it's pleasant or unpleasant—the nature of what is felt or the nature of the knowing—is said to be karmic. For instance, one experience, say a sound, could at the same moment be experienced by one person as pleasant and by another person as unpleasant, or by the same person as pleasant one moment and unpleasant the next moment. So it's not the nature of the knowing per se, which is just pure awareness, but the karmic conditions that are coming together at that moment. It's a really subtle and interesting subject just to explore. Don't set up a view, you know—"You're doing good if it gets more neutral." Please don't. But just keep looking.

Question: I really appreciated your talk. I was wanting to know about emptiness—what is it? It seems to me when you describe those moments that we all have, of not clinging, not pushing away, those moments that are clean, so to speak—I think you describe that as emptiness. To me, that feels like a full moment, like a complete moment. And what feels empty to me are those times when I get strung out on an idea and then the pleasure of it goes away and I just see how there's no substance to pleasure.

To me, it's one of the reasons this is hard to talk about—because we get caught in semantics. And no word covers all the different aspects or manifestations of this. So yes, I too often experience or could say the emptiness when it's empty of the clinging or grasping of self. Also, there's alertness. There's wisdom in mind.

It is not diluted or zoned out. It could also be described as fullness—a total completion, an inner completion, contentment where nothing outside or extra is needed, nothing to push away.

Emptiness might not work for you as a word. It's just a word. We use emptiness to mean empty of the sense of self. And the way you were also using emptiness—seeing the emptiness of phenomena—is another aspect of it that I didn't talk so much about last night. Seeing the emptiness of pleasure, or the emptiness of anything that we cling to, because it's ephemeral and vanishes. The illusory nature, so to speak, of all experience, because it all goes. There's nothing to cling to. This is another aspect of emptiness, of selflessness, because there's nothing unchanging and self-referencing in any experience at all.

So that's why this is hard to talk about. I personally feel there are no words to use in any aspect of trying to speak about the truth—whether it's emptiness or selflessness or the illusory nature of phenomena. There are no words that can hold it all, because it's beyond words and concepts. We just try to patch it together the best we can and maybe point our awareness beyond the concepts. So it's tricky.

Question: Would we choose experiences that are more neutral if we're mindful?

I don't necessarily think so. That's like saying that somehow neutral is better than pleasant or unpleasant. Again, that's setting up one particular thing as better than another. For me, I find that choices, when I'm mindful and there's some wisdom present, come more out of a sense of the totality of the situation and what's most helpful or appropriate. Not so much about whether it's pleasant or unpleasant—that's sort of not the issue. It's about what seems appropriate. Sometimes what's appropriate might also be very pleasant. Sometimes it's not. That's just not how the decision is made, at least in my experience.

Have whatever kind of day you have. Just know it for what it is with mindfulness.

Question: Can you say something about eating meditation? For most people, certainly for me, there are a lot of thoughts about eating—before, during, after—about how much, how fast. Other than noting and feeling the body, I wonder if there are other ways of working with that.

You're right, eating is an extremely, sometimes very intense activity during the day for many people. It often comes up in interviews. A whole range of stuff can go on, as I'm sure you all know.

There really isn't a magic trick. But part of it, I find, is to go into the cafeteria first with a kind of intention—okay, let me really explore what goes on. Not an intention to somehow change anything. Often some of the difficulty that comes around eating is that people think they're eating too much or too little, or they're wanting to have less greed or less judgment or whatever. So it's a kind of setup before going in: I want to have less of this or more of that. And the eating experience becomes a struggle before it even begins.

So it's a combination of going in with the intention to be mindful, but also with acceptance—just the clear being with what is, without necessarily trying to change. A real acceptance.

Then I find in eating, as in all large activities through the day, that precise mindfulness helps. For example, standing in line, really feeling your body. Use the body sensations to come back to. Standing in line, really feeling the body, really grounding. As you reach your arm, you can note "reaching, reaching" as you reach for the plate. "Touching" as you touch the coldness of the plate and move it back. That helps to stay grounded in the present moment.

And in that grounding, if I'm touching the plate, I'm standing, and a lot of thinking starts, I see myself leaning forward, wishing the people ahead would hurry up—you notice that more. If you're grounded in just the sensations of standing, you notice when you start to lean forward, when annoyance starts to arise. And rather than "Oh, I'm bad, I should be a good yogi and be calm"—

Oh, annoyance, annoyance. Come back and feel the sensations of annoyance in your body. Notice the thoughts. Notice the seeing contact that gives rise. Seeing, it's unpleasant, they're going too slow, annoyance. So you can get closer and closer to the sense door contact. That's the kind of precision aspect of mindfulness.

But in a situation like the dining room, we also need to bring in clear comprehension—the other aspect that goes with mindfulness of being aware of the totality of the situation. Sometimes you'll see someone going through the line looking so perfectly mindful, but so slow. And there's forty people behind them. It's not really a balanced mindfulness. Mindfulness needs to include clear comprehension of the whole situation. So it's like knowing when it's appropriate to go slow, knowing there's a whole situation. Then when you get to your place, if you want to take two hours to eat and feel every mouthful, that's fine. So it's kind of both of those.

And you're right, when you're eating, lifting, you might feel lifting. And then forty-five thoughts between lifting and swallowing. And we didn't notice chewing. Okay. When did you wake up? Swallowing. Right there. Note swallowing. Never mind the thoughts you missed. And if somehow in the swallowing you're feeling really tense, somehow those thoughts you missed brought up tension, then you notice tension, right? Then you don't have to retrace it all, but start where you are. You notice tension, tension, tension—just like that. It takes infinite patience and not any expectations.

A question arose about rebirth—why it gets mentioned so much if it's not relevant to our practice.

You probably should ask Joseph, because you might not have noticed, but I've actually never mentioned it. I don't mean to imply that I don't believe it's true or that it's not relevant. From my own experience, I can't remember my previous rebirth and I don't know the next. So for me, it's on the level of a belief. Deeper than a belief, I have a faith because it makes total sense, but I have no proof whatsoever. And I can't offer you anything stronger than that.

In some way, I have a faith that we just keep going, that rebirth happens because it doesn't make sense otherwise. If I didn't believe that, it would be sort of completely nihilistic—just do whatever you want and this is it. You've got to get out in this lifetime. Doesn't look good sometimes. I'm only talking from me. And I can experience karma within this lifetime, and it makes sense to me that it would continue, but I don't have proof for that.

And as far as belief goes, Joseph says you don't have to believe it because believing anything is only a view. Views and opinions are helpful at times. If we are attached to them, they're hindrances. They can block our freedom, our understanding. And if you're trying to create a view that you want to believe because maybe it would make you feel better, that kind of wanting it is what's going to lead to the obsession of mind.

I don't think something as subtle as rebirth is something we can simply decide to believe or not believe. It doesn't work that way. Somehow the belief has to arise from a faith that emerges from your own experience—and experience can mean many different things.

Personally, I think if rebirth or anything else you hear any of us say engenders a lot of confusion in your mind, it doesn't mean it's right or wrong. But trying to think through it can engender doubt and obsessive thinking, and that experience is not helpful. Doubt is a hindrance. When the mind is caught in obsessive thinking, or wanting to believe something, or becoming upset by what we've heard—at that time of obsession, it's not helpful to keep trying to figure it out. It has simply turned into the hindrance of doubt.

So at that time, really note it as doubt, wanting, obsession—whatever it is—and put it aside. Many doctrines of Buddhism that twenty years ago I couldn't relate to, that made no sense to me—it was true, you don't need them to practice. You absolutely do not need any of these doctrines to practice. We only need to pay attention to what's happening right now, and out of that, understanding will come.

You don't have to try to direct your experience to meet some doctrine you've heard us say. Forget the doctrines. Just bring all your attention to being with present moment experience, and understanding and freedom will come out of that. Whether or not that ever results in being able to take the view of rebirth and say, "Yes, this is true"—if you can leave that aside and just really be with your experience, I think the faith and understanding will come that takes the pressure off of thinking, "Oh my God, only this lifetime—I'm going to make it or bust." A deeper faith will come where you see that is actually an irrelevant thought in some way. And that needs to come from your own experience—it will come from your own experience if you just keep looking.

So noticing doubt, doubt, doubt—any kind of analytical thought can turn into doubt. Just notice that, and recognize that now's not the time. Come back to this moment.

A student asked about working with aversion that seems quite strong—strong identification with a particular thing that keeps triggering the aversion, seeing thoughts of being the victim, but still feeling really caught in it. It could easily last all day. It's really suffering.

When that's going on with me, or any particular thing triggers us and seems to go on for a long time—whether aversion, sorrow, greed—we know we're seeing it on some level. There's some mindfulness, definitely. But it keeps getting triggered. Usually the trigger keeps happening over and over—not something that happened once three weeks ago, but at least the memory of what happened arising again and again.

Can you notice points where it keeps getting re-triggered? Sometimes it's subtle—like it starts, you get into the aversion, then the trigger happens again and it just keeps going, spinning out of control.

I try to come in on whatever level I can at a particular moment. It takes, I feel, a great deal of patience and acceptance that this is happening. It means seeing if there's judging of oneself, thinking that this ought to stop—I'm seeing it, so it ought to stop. I find this is one of the biggest hooks that keeps things going for me: on some level thinking that because I'm seeing it, it ought to stop. By this time in the retreat, enough already—there's no excuse for this to be happening.

Really notice that kind of adds on top of it. It's like aversion to the aversion—multiple layers of regression. And it's actually not the original trigger sometimes anymore. These subtle thoughts of "this shouldn't be going on"—that's actually the aversion of the moment, if you know what I mean.

So I try to come in with attention wherever I can. If it's only at massive aversion, then I do stomping aversion meditation. Aversion, aversion, hating, hating. I hate everybody and everything. And just feeling that in my body. Very important to keep coming back to feeling the experience physically if you can in this moment.

A hundred million times pull out of the train of thought—whatever it is, whether it's about the trigger, whether it's this subtle "why is this still happening," whether it's trying to analyze—all of which takes you out of it. Just come back and feel the aversion for the hundred millionth time. I know this already. I don't need to feel it now. Feel it. That's what's happening.

Land in the middle of it over and over with as much acceptance as you can muster. This is just what's happening. Because what I find is the more I can do that, the more I can accept the whole sordid train of events, the more I land in the middle of it over and over, I start to see what is actually the hook of identification.

It might seem that the identification is with the whole story, but there might actually be one little piece of the experience that the sense of identification is really gripping around. It might be the unpleasantness of the trigger. The identification might be with a subtle thought: "This shouldn't be happening." It might be with a view: "My practice should be better than this by now." It might be that the trigger elicits an unpleasant physical sensation that we don't quite notice, and the aversion is actually being triggered over and over from that unpleasant physical sensation. Do you see what I mean? There are lots of different little pieces, but we have to start by accepting that the whole thing is happening, or we can't get to the more subtle levels of seeing the different component parts and where the identification comes in.

Yogini: Well, with me, the acceptance is really no problem. As soon as I get my balance, I try to just stay with it. What I needed to hear was that mindfulness—just because I'm mindful doesn't necessarily mean it's going to go away.

No. We get caught in that view.

Yogini: I think for me, if I see where I'm identified, great. But sometimes identification can go on so deep that I'm never going to get to it. It's not that crucial to see how I'm identified—that allows advice.

Although in some ways, I wouldn't say identification runs deep. I would just say it arises frequently, moment to moment. It's not some deep thing down there. It's just arising in a moment around a momentary experience. So it's not that it's necessarily so hard to see.

Actually, for me, I'll see the thing that's really hooking me. I can see the different pieces. And if some piece comes up—it's like, "Oh, I'm really angry now"—I go, "Oh, that's where it's kind of poking at me." Just on that level, nothing more subtle than that.

But you make a good point. We think mindfulness often means it should go away, and that's not the case at all.

About aversion to physical pain—it seems like there's fear around it at times, and as she goes into the pain sometimes it gets worse. She could stay with it, stay with it, but it just seems unbearable.

There are many different ways of working with physical pain. And it's very important, as you said, to be not only aware of the physical sensation, but also of the mind's relationship to it.

It's true, sometimes when we move attention into an unpleasant sensation, it gets more intense. That's absolutely true. Sometimes that happens. And the point isn't to bring our attention to it to make it go away. So we see immediately if that was our point, because as soon as it gets more intense, we think, "Oh, pull back, this isn't working."

It's really important in working with pain to find a balance—being able to move into it very gently with calm attention, simply because that's what's happening. Explore the sensations with a balanced, equanimous mind, but notice when the mind is not balanced and equanimous. When there's fear, when there is aversion, when there's this kind of contraction, be able to note and notice that. In fact, in the moment of fear, that's the strongest experience perhaps, not the pain. And they're two different experiences, although they go together. So really noticing the quality of mind that's with the unpleasant, difficult sensation.

It's not necessarily the most skillful thing to just stay with it, stay with it, stay with it. If we're staying with unpleasant sensation and the experience is, "This is unbearable, this is unbearable, I can't handle this"—that's not mindfulness. There's a quality of real aversion, of contraction, of fear in that, which is very important to notice and feel.

In fact, it might be helpful to move away from the pain, to reconnect with either your primary focus or hearing or something else that's happening, to re-establish a more balanced quality of awareness. And then move back to the difficult sensation with a more calm mind. You'll notice then, "Oh yeah, this is more equanimous." And you'll notice when the aversion starts to come in. Notice that, soften again.

I've had sittings where I could sit a long time with strong pain because the mind could go into it in a very calm way and not get really tight. The next sitting, the mind was tired. As soon as I touched the pain, it was gritting the teeth time. And you could sit like that, gritting your teeth and hating it for an hour, but look at what's being cultivated in the mind. Is that mindfulness? Is it equanimity? Or is it subtle aversion and willpower? That's not the point.

So it's either to keep playing, because you can often go into it, notice the aversion, and back out and give it a bigger focus. You don't have to be precise when it gets tight. Really be within the field of the whole room, not even just your body, but the whole room. The pain is there, but there's this much more spacious quality of awareness that can help to ease it some. Go back and forth with that, noticing the mind states.

And of course, sometimes if it's at such a point that you just feel overwhelmed and moving would help, that could be an appropriate time to shift, if that's done with awareness of the intention and quite mindfully. So it's a process of balance.

For all of us, there are times where moving doesn't help, the mind is tight and constricted, trying to open up doesn't help. We're in aversion, and that's our practice. At that moment there's no perfect solution—it's going back and forth between it all.

Okay, time to walk. Thank you.

Are there any questions this morning about practice?

I'd just like you to comment about stomping. On Wednesday you mentioned it, and also at the beginning of the retreat you mentioned going out into the woods when you were very angry one time and stomping up and down. You described it as unskillful.

Did I? No, I don't think so. I mentioned stomping up and down in the woods when angry, and she says I said it was unskillful, which I don't think I would have meant. I certainly wouldn't have meant it was unskillful.

Is that the question?

She sees moving physical expression as being helpful. I certainly never meant to say, and I don't think I would have said, that stomping in the woods when you're angry is unskillful.

When I've mentioned stomping meditation, so to speak, I really mean it. When there's a feeling of anger, for example, that is so strong that trying to sit or walk very slowly downstairs—it just feels like the energy is so powerful. It feels as if you're going to explode or scream or do something unskillful around a lot of people. I've practiced it myself, where I go off where no one's around and I really am stomping up and down, and I am aware of anger. There is a modicum of mindfulness there, in a broad sense. Not like noticing the perception that gives rise to unpleasantness, that gives rise to anger—we're not on that level. But there's a feeling in the body that's unmistakable, and I feel my foot hitting the ground. You're present, and anger, anger. I might just be stomping, screaming inside, anger, anger, anger. And it calms down a little bit. So that's what I mean by stomping, and I don't think it's unskillful. It's much better than just imploding and trying to pretend you're sending loving-kindness to all beings. It's acknowledging what's happening. Sometimes I do find it useful to move the energy. It's so big there's no choice, so we walk more briskly, go where there's no one around.

Trish's question follows on this, talking about how Thich Nhat Hanh will say that by expressing anger, we're sort of watering the seeds, and the anger gets stronger and stronger.

I would say that is true, and I would make a distinction between the two things we're talking about here. When I talk about stomping, as I said, it's still with some mindfulness. I'm not stomping saying, "Right, that person who made me angry is wrong, I'm right, let's get it going, let's do something." That is nurturing the seeds of anger. That's being caught in the story, identification with right or wrong, "I should be angry," or hating yourself for being angry. And it's expressing it physically but not with mindfulness—it's feeding it. I would call that watering the seeds of anger, and I've seen that in myself.

One time, I remember on a retreat, I was very angry at someone over something that happened. I was feeling the anger, and it felt mindful, but there was real identification. I just kept going over the story: "Yeah, I should be angry, and that was wrong of him to do." At one point, I noticed the anger was just getting stronger and stronger each time I recommitted to the fact that I was right to be angry. "I deserve to be angry. This is really a rotten thing to have happened." That's definitely watering the seeds of anger. I could feel it sprout.

Stomping is different. It's bringing mindfulness in on whatever level we can, but to the experience of anger itself. Yes, anger is present. Don't pretend it's not present—that's not mindfulness. Thich Nhat Hanh also says you have to treat your anger with gentleness, with kindness, like a younger brother or sister. You can't treat your anger with violence. There's always something for both sides, but it's about finding the balance in mindfulness of truly acknowledging what's happening.

With total acceptance and non-violence, if anger is happening, we need to truly acknowledge it. We can't pretend it's not there. But with mindfulness, we're simply acknowledging anger itself—its presence, its physical expression in the body, the pain, the images in the mind—what's happening in this moment. Feeding it, watering it in the way Thich Nhat Hanh spoke of it, is getting really identified with feeding the story, keeping it going, acting it out, and then actually doing something out of the space of "Yes, this is justified." Or its opposite: "I hate myself."

Do you see the difference? One approach is bringing in mindfulness in whatever way we can—whether precise or vast, it doesn't matter. The other is simply diving into the experience and saying, "Yes, let's really get going on this anger." This is our delicate balance in practice: not to suppress, not to pretend that something unpleasant isn't there, and not to fan the bonfire and let it really take over. It's a balancing act that we're all dancing all the time. It's tricky.

A question arose about awakening: Is awakening a state that one reaches, or is it a state to be constantly maintained? Is awakening something we're all experiencing moment by moment? When one is awakened, does one still practice?

There are many different ways this could be answered, so please don't think I'm giving a definitive answer. There's a Tibetan saying I like: it's easy to become awakened, but it's hard to stay awakened.

Sometimes I think it could be said like this: first of all, awakening is not a state, not something to be maintained. That would imply a conditioned state—that if you set up the right conditions, you can hold those conditions and that state will remain. Forget it. There isn't any such state. In a way, the whole talk about becoming enlightened can imply we're going somewhere, and when we get there—plop—here we are, all the work is done.

When you read the suttas, the arhats seem to be in that state. Perhaps so. None of us here are there, and it's not the sense of anyone I have met that they feel their work is finished, that there's no more need to practice, that they've got it.

My experience is on a much more different level from the arhats—we won't even talk about it in the same breath—but there's a sense, not of some state to get to, but of a recognition of something. It's not even a thing. It's what is always true, what we truly are, only we don't recognize it. The potential of recognition is here now, always. It's not somewhere else. It's never somewhere else. The whole problem with craving is that it takes us away from right here, which is the only place and time to recognize our potential of awakening.

I personally feel that recognition is possible in many moments, and we forget, we lose it, we can't remember. The times when there's an insight of anything—"Oh, that's so obvious! That's so true!"—we've all had that. "I'll live like this now, forever." It's so clear. And how long before the next moment comes along? Even though it was so clear, we can't by will make it happen again.

So that's the dance. I think it's the dance. The whole practice is one of constant re-recognition and letting go. But there's no state to maintain.

Another question arose about thoughts—when you have one thought that leads to a whole series, as they do, and you wake up to find yourself at the end of the series, how useful is it to trace the thoughts all the way back to the first thought that triggered it?

It can be interesting. Overall, I don't know how useful it is. I have found it at times interesting just to see how far we can get, how really disconnected we become in our thoughts from present moment experience. Finding yourself on the coast of Mexico in your imagination and wondering how you got there, then tracing it back to the fact that your little finger was cold—that can be interesting once or twice, just to see the way things work in this mind.

Or if I'm waking up in the middle of something very emotional or difficult, sometimes tracing it back reveals something: "Oh, there's something difficult happening here and now, and I've projected it into this thing that happened ten years ago." That I sometimes find useful or interesting.

But I really want to qualify this, because it can turn into a kind of "how can I amuse myself" mind game—let's trace back all the thoughts. And it is ultimately just more thinking.

there isn't any perfect way. And it's all going to be precise and it's all going to match up perfectly. And if we could not really let go of thinking it's all going to be perfectly matched, always precise or always general or whatever.

Sometimes, and this is my opinion, only my opinion, we can get a little sidetracked into trying to make the reports so precise and perfect that more emphasis gets put on trying to describe it accurately to the teacher. Yes, it needs to be somewhat clear, but too much emphasis and energy and concern and desire can go into trying to make the report accurate. I don't think personally that that's as useful as being precisely with your experience. That's where the understanding is going to come.

So I would say, in terms of which is the priority, the precision with the experience is primary. And then sometimes when we describe it to teachers, it may sound general or not quite adequate. That's okay.

The other thing is that sometimes the experience is quite precise. And we don't always know. There may or may not be a sensation in the right or left part of the nose. In some moments, at some times, with some levels of concentration, there isn't that much data there. There's just, there's smelling.

So don't assume that the experience always needs to be precise. It may or may not be. Sometimes there's just a general knowing of smelling without a lot of detail about what's happening. And that's what's happening. If you look and there's not a lot of data, that's what the experience is. Sometimes there is a lot of detail, and then that's what's happening.

One more thing about the labeling: the labeling is really not meant to stand for or capture the experience in all of its intricacy. It's just meant to support the mindfulness. So if the label is general and it's doing its job of pointing the attention, of pointing the mind, of cultivating the simple knowing of what's here, that's enough. The label has done its job. It doesn't need to capture everything.

And I found for myself there are times when you can be with a sensation and you just know it's burning. And you can tell it changes to tingling. You're not thinking about that so much. But there are times, as Steve said, where you might almost be in a pre-verbal state where that part of the mind that's very verbal, very rational, very adult, isn't working so well. Maybe somebody noticed that during this retreat. And when it's not, don't worry about it.

To be really with the sensation, there are times I'll just note "sensing," because it's not worth moving away from the experience to try and find the perfect word. So if I'm in a state like that—first of all, none of us is Sayadaw U Pandita. We're not going to challenge you harshly for coming in and not describing whether you felt the sensation in the left nostril or the right nostril. You can say, "I felt I was with it, but somehow today the words were not clear." And that's actually a clear perception. When you can say that, it's different from coming in and saying, "Well, I don't know, it was some kind of sensation, I wasn't really there with it." Those are two different experiences, and you can describe them differently.

It's not always going to be so precise. And you don't have to later make up some precise words in order to tell us about it if that isn't really accurate to your experience. Most important is to just try and convey your experience as close as you can to how it was at the time. Words will not always be so accurate, because we're really trying to convey something that's beyond words.

And in the same vein about smelling and hearing—you're right, "smelling" and "hearing" is not that precise, but I think it's helpful because it is bringing our attention to the process. Which is the point. So if I'm just noticing "smelling," it's not as precise as "acrid, bitter odor that reminded me of a chemical explosion in the fourth grade." But it is more important to be with the smelling aspect, with the process. Actually, being a little less involved in the content is fine. All that's really happening is the six sense experiences. So just resting a little more generally is really okay. It's really okay. And don't worry so much about getting it precise to describe it, either to the teacher or to yourself. Sometimes the words aren't there. It's really okay.

CHAPTER 286

Birth and Death of the Self

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates what she considers the Buddha's most essential teaching: that nothing whatsoever should be clung to as 'I' or 'mine.' Drawing extensively from the teachings of Ajahn Buddhadāsa, the influential Thai forest monk who helped bring these teachings to lay practitioners, Wilson reframes anattā (non-self) not as an abstract philosophical concept but as a simple, observable aspect of moment-to-moment experience.
>
> Wilson introduces Buddhadāsa's accessible language of 'I-ing' and 'my-ing' to describe how the sense of self arises and passes away hundreds of times daily through the process of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination). She guides practitioners to investigate where self-grasping actually occurs—often not in raw sensations but in mental images, thoughts about the body, or the subtle clinging to pleasant vedanā (feeling tone). Through vivid personal examples, from vultures circling overhead to horses in a distant meadow, she demonstrates how quickly the mind grasps at selfhood and how natural it is to rest in spacious awareness.
> The talk offers practical instruction for recognizing both the presence and absence of self-clinging. Wilson encourages practitioners to turn wise attention directly onto the experience called 'I' whenever it arises, discovering it to be merely another changing phenomenon—a sensation, contraction, or thought. Equally important is learning to recognize and trust the peace of non-grasping, the natural spaciousness of awareness when empty of 'I' and 'mine,' which she calls 'the sky yoga of non-grasping.'

In one of the suttas, someone asked the Buddha to summarize in one phrase what it is that liberated ones know, or how it is that liberated beings are. The Buddha answered that what they know is that nothing whatsoever should be clung to. He went on to say that those who have heard this phrase have heard every phrase of the teaching, and to have put it into practice is to have done every practice. Nothing whatsoever should be clung to.

In a way, this is one way of describing what I feel is the core, the pith teaching of the Buddha—the main, or actually only, thing we really need to know in our practice. That's the understanding of no-self, or of emptiness. I want to talk about this root teaching tonight, hopefully not in a theoretical way at all. I want to talk about it because it's very wonderful; it's the closest teaching to my heart.

I know often when we mention no-self, there can be a little sense of "oh no"—the heart kind of drops. "I never get this. It's too complicated for me. I'm not there yet. It makes me crazy to try and think about this." The mind goes off with all these "what ifs" and "if there's no self then..."—fill in the blanks. So hopefully my intention is not to engender a sense of confusion but to help point to the fact that this is actually not a complicated teaching at all. It's the most simple expression of how things are. I actually think that we miss it because it's so simple, and we get so involved in thinking about it.

What I hope to do is invite us to inquire in our practice, first into the sense of self when it arises, and also to recognize and explore the sense or feeling of emptiness, or simply non-self.

I'm going to be referring a lot to Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful Thai monk and meditation teacher. He died in 1993. He was sort of a radical in the Theravada tradition—which in the sum of all of Buddhism isn't too radical—but still, he synthesized different traditions and produced some wonderful writings on the understanding of emptiness, or sunyata, which is mentioned in the Pali texts, believe it or not. He talks very simply about the sense of emptiness as being the experience of a moment when it's empty of self, empty of the sense of "I" or "mine."

I want to invite us to explore both the presence of the sense of self and the absence of it. We can sometimes worry that it's too complicated for us to understand this. In fact, I just read something about Buddhadasa—he was quite old when he died, so he started teaching as a young monk in the 1930s in Thailand. At that time, apparently, it was felt that the teachings on emptiness or no-self were too complicated for lay people, so they weren't taught to them. Lay people couldn't get that, it was thought. Buddhadasa, feeling quite rightly that this was the core liberation teaching, began teaching it to lay people, because freedom is what this practice is about. Any of us with wise attention can understand and experience this. He began teaching it to lay people, and now it's much more commonly taught.

The Buddha also taught sunyata—emptiness, non-self—to lay people. In fact, I read another sutta where one of his prominent lay followers came to him and said, "Give us one teaching that will be to our benefit for a very long time." The Buddha gave him the teaching on emptiness. He said, "Really contemplate emptiness." And just like many of us, this layman—Damodina was his name—said, "Oh no, that's too hard for us. We're too involved with our homes and our children. We're too busy enjoying sandalwood paste and wearing perfumes. We can't be expected to understand and practice this. Give us something easier."

I guess we don't change much. But the fact remains that when the Buddha was asked for a teaching that would be of benefit for a long time, this is the one he offered. And as he said—not in that sutta, but in many others—if it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so. He never put out something that was beyond our abilities or understanding.

This emptiness, this freedom from the sense of self—it's not, in fact, an esoteric or abstruse or rare experience at all. It's so normal, so natural. It's simply a mind that's undistracted. As Joseph spoke of last night, the nature of mind when not distracted is simply pure awareness. Buddhadasa calls it sati-pañña, mindfulness-wisdom. There's nothing more normal and more natural.

Many times in a day, this is our conscious experience if we would just notice it with awareness—simply moments when there is this natural ease of being, natural awareness with no giving rise to a sense of I or mine.

The thing is, so often we don't notice this, because it's not always so spectacular. We tend to get much more involved in the distractions. We can tend to think the distraction is that loud sound, or this unpleasant emotion, or these obsessive thoughts that keep coming, or this pain in my knee, or just that creak of the floor. We get involved in the distractions, the emotions, whatever.

But what we need to recognize is it's not the appearance or what's arising that's the distraction. The root of all distraction, the root of all the resultant suffering, the root of our fear of pain and our yearning for pleasure is simply this false clinging that we call the sense of self—this false view of a someone here who is experiencing and keeping notes on it all.

Buddhadasa translates two Pali words in a way I particularly like. For the momentary experience that we call "me" or "mine," he calls it "I-ing" and "my-ing." In a moment where there's born the sense of I, it's I-ing. When there's born the sense of mine, it's my-ing. I love that—it's really nice.

Because these are born many times in a day, unexamined we take them for granted. It feels like, it seems like, this sense of I or mine is an ongoing, ever-present aspect of our experience. Even at moments when it's not present, it's easy to overlook and then in memory say, "Well, I wasn't noticing it then, but of course it was there. I just wasn't thinking about it." That's right—you weren't thinking about it, but it wasn't there.

So without investigating, it seems real. One of the traps I think we fall into in exploring the teachings of no-self is that rather than turning the discriminating awareness of investigation onto the experience of "me" itself, we tend to start thinking about it—thinking about how can there not be a self, I'm sure there is a self. The more we think about it, the more solid the sense of self seems, which only goes to support our idea in the first place.

What I personally find very interesting in my practice, what cuts through over and over again this unconscious belief in the ongoing nature of self, is when you recognize the presence of the feeling of I or mine, very simply turn the attention onto it. Bring the quality of investigation—not investigation of thinking, but of satipanya, of mindfulness wisdom. Turn it onto that experience that we're calling I or mine. And what do we find?

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Is the mind real? It is but a collection of states, each of them transitory. How can a succession of transitory states be considered real? Even the basic idea 'I am the body' is a mental state and does not last. It comes and goes like all other mental states. The illusion of being the body-mind is there only because it is not investigated." Only because it's not investigated.

So when we do begin to investigate quite consciously, what do we find? Well, I'm going to tell you, but don't take my word for it, please. Continue to investigate each time you notice the feeling of I or mine arising.

We find that the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. It's that simple. Merely a condition that arises and passes—admittedly rather frequently—but that's all it is. And we can experience this with awareness over and over and over.

You can see this well with any sense door contact. This is the dependent origination we've talked about. There's the contact of a sense door, a thought, pleasant or unpleasant, the craving that arises. When that craving strengthens to grasping, there's the sense of I or mine, and it strengthens into becoming something.

So the thought arises: "Hmm, concentration could be a little better." It could just be a thought that comes and goes. If there's a little clinging, it strengthens into grasping and immediately is born: "My concentration could be better." Strengthening even further into becoming: "I'm not doing so well in my practice."

Now we often notice the suffering effects of clinging—in that case, had the thought just come and gone, no problem. But what we can also do is consciously begin to notice, explore with attention, that feeling of self that arises together with that grasping. It's not just the grasping, but suddenly "I" has become quite strong and separate. "You" or "a meditation" or some other has also become quite strong and separate.

We can feel experientially, in some way, that we can direct the attention to what we're calling "I." We don't have to just leave it some nebulous "Well, there's I" but don't really look at it. That's what makes it seem like a solid thing.

When you really look, what do you find? Well, there's a feeling of grasping. Maybe there's a kind of almost physical sensation internally of contraction or restriction or clutching. You might notice just a narrowed down, restricted consciousness.

So notice it the next time that a sense object comes up and there's some clinging arising in the mind. It can be as simple as, "Hmm, I wonder what's for lunch tomorrow?" And the mind just moves right into that, and you notice the clinging, you notice the wanting and the sense of distance. But also notice how "I" have become very solid. And then see—what are you calling "I" in that moment?

Buddhadasa calls this birth. This emergence of "I." I as the hungry person. I as the bad meditator. I as the lonely person. I as whatever. And so there's birth and death. We're being born and dying hundreds and hundreds of times in any one day. We can notice this sense of birth, and we can notice when this particular becoming dissipates, when it fades away, when I'm no longer the hungry person. That's gone. There's no more clinging in the mind.

And this, I think, is a very important point—to maintain the alertness of awareness, because at the point of the dissipation of that particular birth, whatever it might be, often that's a moment when there's just emptiness. Joseph spoke last night of shifting our reference point of practice to really cultivating the mind of non-attachment. When a particular self dies, often in that moment there's just that purity of awareness that is the nature of what we are—the mind of non-attachment. Do we even notice that? Or do we tend to dull out, wait for the next birth, wait for something to happen again, even if it's unpleasant—wait for a new birth and just miss the spaciousness, the real true happiness and peace of a mind of non-attachment?

Well, we usually don't have to wait too long. And it's really interesting to watch how, out of just clear alertness and peace and awareness, the birth of self can be so sudden and so strong. It's really quite funny, if we could look at it that way.

I'll share a story that illustrated this for me very strongly. I was on a self-retreat in California in a very beautiful environment, sitting outside on a bench up high, looking down over a very spacious natural view. With my eyes open, I was sitting and feeling just very spacious, peaceful, aware—not much thought, not much construction, no sense of me or mine, just being.

I was noticing different animals. There was a little skunk, and it was in a place where they have herds of white deer, so you could see them way down below. It was quite lovely, just watching coming and going. Some turkey vultures were swooping down and circling, and there was just that sense of being one with nature. Buddhadasa really encouraged this as a practice—to spend time in nature. His whole monastery, Suan Mok, in southern Thailand, is a huge forest monastery of some three hundred acres. I spent some time there when I was a nun. His philosophy really was to just let people go live in nature, and the mind and the heart quiets until one realizes one is one with nature. The sense of clinging to self tends to dissipate.

Well, anyway, so that was my experience at that moment. But the birds started coming down from some trees near me. I thought, "Far out, they're really close! I've never seen them so close." And then they were circling. And then suddenly this thought arose in my mind: "Oh my God, I'm what they're circling."

And so fast—I mean, panic. Total panic arose in an instant. Definitely a real grasping of that thought, and that panic itself. I came very close to leaping up and screaming, "I'm still alive! I'm still alive!"

It was hugely amusing, even at the time. But it doesn't take much to come out of that peace, that spaciousness, into the grasping of self.

Just for a moment, I'd like to mention the various aspects of experience in which clinging or grasping arises—the various aspects of experience you could say we identify with. None of this is news to anybody. But this is not to make a list in your head. Rather, it's to encourage turning wise attention onto both the object or experience that is grasped, and also that sense of "me" or "mine" in the feeling of the grasping.

Of course, one of the big areas of experience is that of our body, our physical sensations. When we're in the realm of thinking about it—the realm of view or opinion—then the sense that "I am my body" might, in one way, be something you could argue against. Obviously I'm not my body, because the way I look now is very different from how I was when I was ten days old. You couldn't even say it was the same. We've got endless rationalizations about how I'm not the body. We can have various organs missing and that's gone, and you think, "Well, that doesn't seem to affect me. I guess I wasn't that."

But that's all rationalization, I would like to say, in my particular experience. Without really examining when it's present, the sense "I am the body"—that's where we can see what we're really doing, calling in our experience "I" or "mine." And when we look, the sense "I am the body" breaks down every time. All we need to do is look, not take it for granted, not think our ideas about it are enough. Because in most cases, our ideas about it are not enough.

We don't sit here and think, "I am my body." It's not quite that clear. But when there's a physical experience and that sense of "I," look—bring the wise attention to the experience itself and see. The idea of our body may be, "My knee hurts." But when we really bring attention in a sitting, there's no knee, there's no "my"—there's just bubbling or vibrations or tingling. And even those words are concepts.

Then I'll notice a mental image of a knee, or a thought: "That's my knee. What's going to happen to it if I don't move?" And often, if I'm not paying attention, that image is actually where the grasping of self comes. That grasping at "I" becomes this image of a knee, or this person who has a knee. If I don't notice that it's not actually the sensation that's being grasped at all—it's the mental image.

I notice this really often when I'm sitting. There's just sensation, sensation, and then a flash of an image. Maybe it's of my whole body sitting, maybe it's of my face, maybe it's of the body part—doesn't really matter what. If I can just notice the image—seeing, seeing, it's just an image—then it passes. But often if I don't notice it, there's a real kind of grasping at it, and I think I'm identified with the sensation. I keep looking at the sensation, I just see bubbling. Clearly, I don't feel grasping around that. But there's still a sense of self.

That's why it's so important: when I notice the sense of self, don't just say, "Well, I'm not clinging to this bubbling." Turn around and bring wise attention to the sense of "I" itself. And often I'll see, "Ah, I'm identifying with this image, or this thought of body, or something like that." It's often much more subtle than we might think.

I think, "I'm so hungry." But when we really bring attention to hunger, sometimes it's hard to even find it physically. It's a funny thing. All you can find is little movements or little bubblings or something. You go, "Why is this bothering me? There's nothing even here." But again, turn—don't just say, "Well, I guess I'm not attached. There's nothing going on." Clearly something's going on. Turn again to the sense of self and see where it's landing. Where's the grasping? It might be an image or a memory or a thought of the future.

So I started this by saying a sense of identification with the body, and often it is around a particular sensation, but often it's around a thought or an image. When we really bring attention to the body in meditation, all there is is sensations coming and going, coming and going. There isn't anything solid. And when we say, "Oh yes, don't tell me there's nothing solid—in my experience there's something solid," that's an idea.

That solidity is an idea. If we really experience it, it's just a moment of sensation, another moment of sensation, and the thoughts make it seem solid.

So just noticing as it comes and goes, comes and goes, and noticing the thought. Not trying to change anything. Just noticing where this grasping is arising. What's it grasping at? Where's this birth of self arising in that moment?

And again, if anything I'm saying gets you really confused, just don't even think about it. Seriously, thinking about it only leads to more confusion. Just bring your attention back to that experience of: who's confused? What's that feeling of confusion? Turn around and feel the sense of "I" in that.

So there's body. And of course, there's vedana, the feeling tone—the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Now, we've talked about this a lot, so people here are getting quite subtle in noticing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. And even if you think you're not subtle in it, even noticing it is subtle. I mean, how many people on the street could you stop and say, "Now, is your experience as you put your foot down pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral?" They'd look at you like you're nuts. But we're actually noticing it quite a lot.

And it's interesting to notice because this is, again, another aspect of experience that can easily be clung to. That feeling can give birth to that sense of "I" or "mine." And it can be easy to miss that it's the feeling tone, especially when it's pleasant.

So for example, if you have a sitting where the breath is smooth and calm and the mind stays there fairly easily—of course we like it. And you really are noticing the smoothness and the calmness. In your mind you're saying, "I know this will change. I know I like it, but it's okay. I know it will change." And it does change. And we're distraught when it changes, even though we thought we had it all set up. We could see, "I know I'm not this breath," and that's really clear. But sometimes we miss the fact that the grasping was around the pleasant feeling. And so the sense of self, the birth of "I," was happening in each moment of grasping at that pleasant feeling without quite noticing it.

This might seem a little subtle, but it's really important because that's the place where the birth of self happens quite a lot. Buddhadasa gave as one of his ways of helping us see through the illusion of self: keep investigating at this point of vedana, especially at pleasant feeling. Apparently he was really big on exploring the illusory nature of pleasant feeling. By "illusory nature" we mean it comes and goes. He talks about it like wave-like nature. There's a nice physical sensation. It's pleasant. The pleasant feeling kind of comes up like a wave, and it's really nice, and then it crashes like a wave and it's gone. Just keep noticing this over and over and over.

He sounds sort of uncompromising, but I think it's often true. He says that in contemplating how pleasant feeling arises and disintegrates, arises and disintegrates—just noticing the impermanence of all these aspects of experience, as Joseph said last night, but especially with pleasant feeling—it can begin to undercut what we've talked about so much, but we still get caught in it: that underlying belief that really the way to value life is by how much pleasant feeling it affords us.

As Buddhadasa points out, how many of your decisions, how many of the things you do—the jobs you have, the place you live, the people you hang out with, the people you get involved with, just the choices we make—how much of those choices, when we're not paying attention, are driven by what we think will afford us the most pleasant feeling? It's really quite interesting when you look at it.

And of course the mind says, "Oh, that's enough. I don't want to look at that. Don't look at that one anymore. Thank you very much." So of course we're having to look at that here. That's the whole setup. That's why, I'd just like to point out, it gets so difficult sometimes. And sometimes there seem to be waves—waves in yogi land of difficulty.

I almost think it's contagious, you know—waves of difficulty in the form of suffering. And how much of the suffering, indeed all of the suffering, arises because there's the birth of "I" in that moment. How much of it revolves around the simple fact that we are being united with unpleasant feelings and we cannot change that. Just that simple. The arising of the birth of "I" and "mine" around wanting pleasant feeling—it's really amazing when we look at it closely. So this is a quite important arena where the self is born.

And of course, there are thoughts and emotions. This is something we've talked about quite a lot. Thoughts are more difficult in a way because the birth of a sense of self can come so quickly with them. Thoughts and emotions are so complex, feeding into each other in ways that make it quite difficult to catch the moment of birth. But we can at least notice after it's born. We can feel its presence. And rather than hating it or thinking something's wrong, we simply turn attention to the birth, to the sense of self itself.

I remember an example from when I was sitting a couple of years ago—just such a simple, mundane little thought giving rise to such solid clinging to "me." I was doing walking meditation, present, nothing special happening, just awareness. I felt an itching and ran my finger under my turtleneck, aware of the sensation, noticing it. And in that running of the finger, there arose a kind of memory—a body-visual memory of many other times doing that same movement. It just felt so familiar. Then mental images flashed through: my body walking, what I was wearing. And then I thought, "Gosh, I wonder how I look. I bet I look like a real schlump, the way I schlump around here during walking meditation."

That was all it took. That was a flash—less time than it took me to describe even one of those pieces. And suddenly there was this strong birth of self and other, discomfort, self-consciousness, aversion. The whole story. It doesn't take much.

I'm not saying this to be discouraging. No, I'm trying to be encouraging, because then we can realize how subtle and quick it is. Rather than thinking, "Oh, I'm never going to see through this, it's too much," we can recognize: no, no, there are so many opportunities. It's true. There are just so many opportunities. And it's only moment to moment.

Sometimes I used to find myself sitting back, waiting for the big flash of no-self that would somehow end all sense of self forever. Of course, I was positing that there is a self, and that this flash of no-self would somehow uproot it and throw it away, and then I wouldn't have to deal with all the suffering anymore. I'm still waiting for that particular experience to happen. But along the way, in the twenty-some years I've been practicing, there have been an infinity of moments of seeing through this birth of the sense of self.

It's not something to be gotten rid of. It's simply to be seen for what it is. Any moment when we are aware of the sense of "I" or "mine" being present is a moment when we can meet it with wise attention and recognize: "Oh, it's just a momentary experience." It might be a sensation, it might be that sense of clutching, it might be clutching at an image. It's something slightly different each time I turn my attention to it. And whatever it is, it's no big deal.

Because all there is to experience is the six sense doors: touching, tasting, smelling, hearing, seeing, and mind—the big one, of course. Even what we're calling "sense of self" is nothing other than one of these sixth sense experiences, and it might be a slightly different one each time you investigate it. Really noticing this helps to break down any underlying sense of unchanging nature that the self might seem to have when left uninvestigated. When investigated, there's nothing really there. When uninvestigated, "I" am so solid—there's no way I could not be here.

With emotions, similarly, we've talked a lot about their impermanence, watching them come and go. Even when you feel, "I've been so sad all day," really noticing the gaps in that experience. All of this helps to break the sense that "I am my sadness, I am my grief, I am my excitement." But I'd like to add another piece: we can tend at times—or I can tend anyway—to think that it's the presence of the emotion itself that's the problem. Of course, I only think this when I'm somehow grasping at that emotion or grasping at wanting it to go away. We assume it's the emotion itself that's problematic. But we can begin to notice what happens when sadness comes, for example.

It could be anything. There are times when it's simply sadness, full presence, awareness, feeling it fully. I don't mean noting while the sadness is over there in the corner somewhere. I mean really being in the middle of it, except there's nobody there in the middle of it. It's just sadness, fully felt.

And many people say there's no problem with that. You couldn't even say it's unpleasant—it's just what it is, sadness. And then at some point, that sense of clinging arises and it becomes "I who am sad," or becomes "my sadness." At that point it becomes problematic. At that point there's some extra twist, and the suffering begins.

So in exploring or investigating what I'm calling sense of self, we can notice when we're suffering in an emotion. We notice not only the emotion itself, trying to accept it—we do all our little tricks, first to get rid of it and then to try and accept it and try to remember, all the stuff we do. But also turn attention to the feeling of "I" in that sadness. It's part of it. And it feels different when "I am sad" than when sadness is simply arising. Just sadness. It feels different. Simply begin to notice that difference. Give it attention. We can see the birth of "me," the birth of "mine" in the sadness or the happiness or the stillness or the peace.

Just two other areas I want to mention quickly that we very often identify with—by identify, again, I mean this clinging of self around experience. Because they're so subtle: that of intention, obviously, and that of consciousness, the knowing itself.

Again, not to think about these, but one of the reasons we bring into the instructions noticing, before big movements, that intention—because when we notice the intention, we see how fleeting it is, how fast it is, and how subtle an experience. But we also clearly see as it comes and goes, it's so clear it's not me. There's no grasping at it. That's why it's fun for me—I like it when I start having an itch in a sitting, because I can just watch the intention to lift my arm come and go, and come and go, ten or twenty times. And I really like that because each time the intention comes and goes, it's just so clear that it's another arising appearance that's conditioned by not liking the itch, and that's all.

When we don't notice intention, that's when we really easily think, "Who moved? I moved. Who noted? I noted. Who's eating? Who's standing up? Who came here? I." But it's just grasping around intention.

Also with citta, consciousness, the experience of knowing itself. Last night Joseph was talking about the natural nature of mind, simply of awareness, and how spontaneously appearances arise and are known, quite effortlessly. And my mind, of course, in its more grasping mode goes, "Yes, sure, spontaneously known—by whom? By me." Clearly I am knowing and recognizing these appearances when they arise.

A lot of that is because the sense of knowing, the experience of knowing, is quite subtle and hard to notice the coming and going of it. And so it's very easy to identify with it, to grasp at it as me, because we don't even recognize its presence in the first place, never mind that it's coming and going. It's hard to even recognize its presence in a moment. And so we easily develop a sense of grasping, a birth of self around the knowing itself.

What I find with both of these two—intention and knowing—what even complicates and strengthens the sense of self further is that because these are very subtle and hard to notice, and to notice the grasping, we then tend to think about it. So for example, with that example of grasping at the knowing itself: "Who's knowing? I'm knowing." And then hearing what I just said, my mind would start to go, "What do you mean, the experience of knowing? It comes and goes? What do you mean it comes and goes? I don't notice it coming and going. How can it come and go? How can it even exist?" And the more I think about it: "How can you say that's not me? It feels like it's always ongoing."

The mind just takes off like that. And the end result is that the birth of self is happening at that point—around the thinker, around the analyzer. By the time we've thought that through, I feel really much more solid than I did before I started that line of thought. And so that tends to reinforce the sense that the line of thought is true, because the more I think about it, the more solid I feel.

I don't know if this makes sense, but I've been noticing this in myself. If I think about intention, if I think about consciousness or awareness, I feel really solid—because there's a clinging to the thoughts themselves.

That's why it's so important in this whole area to simply use wise attention, wise discernment, and come right back to the feeling of "I" itself. It's not like you have to untangle everything. I have spent a lot of time working my mind into a feeling of near-collapse, trying to understand what no-self could be, or how could I not exist, or how can awareness not be me when it so obviously feels like me. I would just bring my mind to the point of implosion, and I would feel really solid. I wish I could spare you all that, because it never led anywhere.

But at that moment, you don't have to backtrack. When you feel like you're going to implode, simply turn the attention onto "I." What am I calling "I"? And all I feel in that moment is—oh, tension. That's it. Or contraction. Or mental image. Or a thought. I'm not trying to simplify. It really is simple. It just takes the cutting through of wise attention and wise discernment. Simply come back to see what's happening right now.

So we don't have to get rid of some idea of self. By coming back with wise attention each time that we're aware of a sense of self, we see its illusory nature over and over and over, or its transient, its changing nature over and over and over. And it becomes easier not to get so caught in these ideas, or even in the sense of self. We don't have to fight it. It's just another arising appearance.

So often when I'm on retreat—not in my daily life, but when I'm on retreat—I think I mentioned this one morning, one of the notes I'll be making is: seeing, seeing, hearing, thinking, ah, self. What I'm doing is landing with my attention at that moment on what feels like me. And sometimes it's an image, and sometimes it's a sensation. It's never anything very out of the ordinary. And it's always a different experience. It really breaks up the attachment to this idea. And it becomes much easier to incline towards stillness, to incline towards the mind of non-attachment, the mind of pure awareness.

This poem has that feeling of stillness to me. It's called "The Desert Has Many Teachings," from a woman from thirteenth-century Germany:

In the desert, turn towards emptiness, fleeing the self. Stand alone, ask no one's help, and your being will quiet, free from the bondage of things.

I don't think this woman was ever in the desert—she lived in Germany in the thirteenth century. But I really like that. Turn towards emptiness. Stand alone. Ask no one's help. And your being will quiet, free from the bondage of things.

It happens quite naturally. The sense of self becomes merely another appearance, coming and going, that we don't need to fear, we don't need to hate, we don't need to get caught in. It arises due to conditions and passes when those conditions change. And as Joseph said last night, over and over: all conditions change. There are no conditions which do not change.

Buddhadasa—again, I thought this was funny. He gets so emphatic.

He went back to that phrase: nothing whatsoever should be clung to. And then he added: as I or mine. The core of the Buddha's teaching.

And then he expands on it like this. He says, "No one"—and he writes underneath it, "that means no exceptions"—"should grasp or cling, give rise to ego consciousness, to anything"—"that means no exceptions"—"as being I or mine." No exceptions. No one should cling to anything. That means anything. No exceptions.

Not because to cling to anything is bad, but because it's the root of all our suffering and confusion. And because in the not clinging to anything is this vastness, this peace of just being, of awareness—the peace of non-grasping.

It doesn't have all the intensity of our high pleasant experiences. The mind and heart, I think, need to be a bit refined to even think the peace of non-grasping sounds like a good thing. That's why we sit for three months. I actually think that now, watching the incessant arising of the grasping of self and its death and its birth and its death, the peace of non-grasping sounds pretty good. And it's wonderful. And it's not something that is foreign to any of us.

So that's the other side of bringing investigation—investigating what we're calling self in any moment, but also to notice the peace of non-grasping when we can recognize it.

"If at any moment any person has a mind empty of clinging to I and mine, even if only for one instant, that means the mind has realized emptiness." That's Buddhadasa again. Even for one instant. True, it's not the emptiness of total liberation, nibbana, where the sense of grasping will never arise again, but still in that moment where there's no clinging or grasping of I and mine, the mind is pure, radiant, and at peace. And we, each of us, experience this over and over.

So the other aspect of our practice that I feel is so important is not to overlook these times, to learn to recognize them. Clearly, you can't recognize it with grasping, right? Because as soon as we're grasping, the mind of non-grasping is not accessible. So simply to notice with awareness, recognize the mind of non-grasping. We tend often to skip over it. It's as if—I notice in myself—as if the mind is more comfortable relating to things, relating to objects, relating to experience, liking it, disliking it, analyzing it. It's more doing. Of course, I'm more there then.

But we can consciously begin to recognize these moments of emptiness—many times a day, nothing so exciting, no big bang—just recognize and consciously meet with awareness these moments of non-grasping of self, so that we gradually learn to be comfortable, to trust this pure awareness, to actually be content with the peace of non-grasping.

I read somewhere a reference to "the sky yoga of non-grasping." I really like that image—the sky yoga of non-grasping. And I've found a helpful way to practice at times to help me tune into this mind of non-attachment. It's the metaphor of space. I guess that's why I liked the idea of the sky yoga of non-grasping. Joseph talked about shifting our reference point to the mind of non-attachment rather than being so focused on objects, on appearances. And I found tuning into space or silence a way that helped me just to loosen up the fixation on changing appearances.

So notice when a thought arises the space around it, the space before it. When the thought ends, rather than immediately clutching back to the breath so that there should be no space without things arising, just notice the space. Notice the emptiness, the silence, and let the breath arise by itself or whatever else comes next. The space as an emotion dissipates—just notice the silence, the space. In between breaths, in between actions. We're always filling up our time. Sometimes I would consciously make space in between when I end a sitting and I get up to walk. Just a space. And just notice the space, the silence.

Not spacing out—I'm not talking about that. The space of awareness where there's a vibrancy, a wakefulness in the silence. And don't make much of it. This is just like a metaphor to help tune into the mind of non-attachment.

And it's interesting—that's why we talk about hearing. We've been using hearing as one of the anchors because it can help tune us into this sense of spaciousness. We tend not to get so involved with sounds. We don't make another one happen. And we can notice the space in between, or the silence.

When we can bring the sense of space to an experience, you see the difference. When we're really fixated on, say, a difficult emotion—we're fixated on that—it's so much more difficult. It's so much more suffering than when we can just open up and have space around it. When the mind is restricted, the object takes up the whole field.

I remember one time the house I'm living in—there didn't used to be a little house next to it, which there is now. And in that period between when there wasn't another house and when there began to be another house, my sense of space got completely encroached upon. Because I would sit at my kitchen window and look out at the woods, and that's where the house was being built, right in that view. So it got to where there were only four little stakes in the woods where the house was going to be. And I would sit at my window and all I could see were those four stakes, nothing else. And there was aversion and anger and all the different feelings. I got really miserable sitting at my kitchen table until finally I saw what was happening.

Which is interesting. As soon as I saw it, I said, "This has to stop. I can't live the rest of my life here doing this." And I just opened up the space. And it's interesting—it just stopped being a problem. The fixation makes it so much more real. The sense of space around something makes it much more workable.

We can all practice that here with things that arise. You can see some little thing drives you nuts. And when you can just expand around it, it still might be unpleasant, but there's not that fixation of self on it.

It isn't always easy to maintain the sense of spaciousness. The energy needs to be balanced—the concentration and mindfulness. When they drop, being spacious turns to spacing out. And that's when we need the precision of technique, you know, to come back and feel the breath, sensations, use the noting, use connecting with objects and appearances, notice beginnings and endings. It wakes us up, brings vibrancy again.

But another thing I've noticed in myself is that tuning into space sometimes gets uncomfortable. My mind gets a little restless. It wants something to focus on. I was again sitting in California in a different place, and when I noticed this, I was sitting with my eyes open again—very broad vista, meadows, rolling hills—just sitting, spacious. And I was consciously tuning into space.

There were four little horses. I mean, they were so tiny. They were so far away, such an insignificant part of the vista. And I would notice as I would open to spaciousness, I could just be vibrant in that for not very long, and then almost as if by reflex, the mind would get uncomfortable or restless, and it would zoom in on these tiny little horses and sort of fixate on them, as if looking for some kind of stability or security. And, you know, I could sort of see the rest of the spaciousness but not very well.

This happened over and over and over. I found it really fascinating because I could correlate it to my experience in meditation—of how just resting and trusting that spacious quality of awareness, the mind has kind of a knee-jerk reflex to want to fixate on things. It's kind of hard to trust, to relax, to not need something happening, to not need to have the birth of an "I."

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, we're afraid of nothingness. And because we're afraid of it, the mind clings to a belief in a permanent self. And that's what's so strange—we're afraid of nothingness. But seeing through the sense of self isn't nothingness. It's not annihilation. It is the entryway to a peace and a happiness that all this grasping of self can never, ever give us. All it gives us is confusion and suffering.

And it's not passive, it's not unfeeling, it's not uncaring or life-negating. It's the doorway to freedom and true compassion. As one Tibetan teacher said, once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything harmful. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously.

So in some ways I think this is our root practice. Just play with it. Exploring the sense of self. Letting the awareness, the mind, incline toward space. Noticing emptiness. Noticing when it is empty of I-ing and my-ing. And just notice that. That's all.

There's nothing to lose except our suffering.

So let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 287

Q&A

Carol Wilson · 48 min

> In this intimate question and answer session, Carol Wilson offers practical guidance on a range of meditation challenges that arise during intensive retreat practice. She begins with mindful eating, emphasizing the importance of setting intention without trying to force change, using clear comprehension (sampajañña) to be aware of the totality of each situation while staying grounded in physical sensations.
>
> Wilson addresses the challenging topic of working with persistent aversion, describing her approach of 'stomping meditation' when emotions become overwhelming—acknowledging strong feelings with mindfulness rather than suppression or identification. She makes a crucial distinction between expressing emotions with awareness versus 'watering the seeds' of anger through identification with stories. When discussing physical pain, she emphasizes finding balance between moving toward difficult sensations with equanimity and recognizing when the mind has become contracted with fear or aversion.
> The talk also explores questions about rebirth and Buddhist doctrine. Wilson shares her personal approach of holding teachings like rebirth as faith rather than belief, noting that clinging to views—even Buddhist ones—can become hindrances. She encourages practitioners to set aside doctrines that create confusion and simply attend to present-moment experience, trusting that understanding will arise naturally. The session concludes with reflections on awakening as ongoing recognition rather than a fixed state, and guidance on balancing precision in practice with acceptance of more general, even pre-verbal, awareness.

You could all hear that, questions about eating. Some magic trick other than paying attention and noting what happens. Would that there was.

You're right, eating is an extremely, sometimes very intense activity during the day for many people. It often comes up in interviews. A whole range of stuff can go on, as I'm sure you all know.

There really isn't a magic trick, but part of it is going into the cafeteria first with a sort of intention. I set my intention: okay, let me really explore what goes on. Not an intention to somehow change. Often some of the difficulty that comes around eating is that people either think they're eating too much or too little, or they're wanting to have less greed or judgment or whatever. So it's a setup before going in: "I want to have less of this or more of that." And the eating experience becomes a struggle before it even begins.

So it's a combination of going in with the intention to be mindful, but that also means acceptance—just the clear being with what is, without necessarily trying to change. A real acceptance.

And then I find in eating, as in all activities, all large activities through the day, that the precise mindfulness helps. For example, standing in line, really feeling your body, using the body sensations to come back to. Standing in line, really feeling the body, really grounding. Reaching with the arm, you can note: "reaching, reaching" as you reach for the plate. "Touching" as you touch the coldness of the plate and move it back. That helps to stay grounded in the present moment.

And in that, if I'm touching the plate, I'm standing, and a lot of thinking starts, I see myself leaning forward, wishing the people ahead would hurry up—you notice that more. If you're grounded in just the sensations of standing, you notice when you start to lean forward, when annoyance starts to arise. And rather than "Oh, I'm bad, I should be a good yogi and be calm," it's just "Oh, annoyance, annoyance." Come back and feel the sensations of annoyance in your body. Notice the thoughts. Notice the seeing contact that gives rise. Seeing, it's unpleasant, they're going too slow, annoyance. So you can get closer and closer to the sense door contact. That's the kind of precision aspect of mindfulness.

But in a situation like the dining room, we also need to bring in clear comprehension —the other aspect that goes with mindfulness of being aware of the totality of the situation. Sometimes you'll see someone going through the line looking so perfectly mindful, but so slow, and there's forty people behind them. It's not really a balanced mindfulness. Mindfulness needs to include clear comprehension of the whole situation. It's knowing when it's appropriate to go slow, knowing there's a whole situation. Then when you get to your place, if you want to take two hours to eat and feel every mouthful, that's fine. So it's kind of both of those.

And you're right. When you're eating, lifting, you might feel lifting, and then forty-five thoughts between lifting and swallowing, and we didn't notice chewing. Okay. When did you wake up? Swallowing. Right there. Note swallowing. Never mind the thoughts you missed.

And if you somehow in the swallowing you're feeling really tense, somehow those thoughts you missed brought up tension, then you notice tension, right? Then you don't have to retrace it all, but start where you are. You notice tension, tension, tension. Just like that.

It takes infinite patience and not any expectations.

Questions about rebirth and the kind of, he gets obsessed, would like to believe it, doesn't really, why is it mentioned so much if it's not relevant?

You probably should ask Joseph, because you might not have noticed, but I've actually never mentioned it. I don't mean to imply that I don't believe it's true or that it's not relevant. From my own experience, I can't remember my previous rebirth and I don't know the next. So for me, it's on the level of a belief. Deeper than a belief, I have a faith because it makes total sense, but I have no proof. And I can't offer you anything stronger than that.

You're right, in some ways. Well, I do know—in some way I have a faith that we just keep going, that rebirth happens, because it doesn't make sense otherwise. If I didn't believe that, it would be sort of completely nihilistic—just do whatever you want and this is it. You've got to get out in this lifetime. Doesn't look good. For me, I'm only talking for me. And I can experience karma within this lifetime, and it makes sense to me that it would continue, but I don't have proof for that.

As far as belief goes, Joseph says you don't have to believe it because believing anything is only a view. Views and opinions are helpful at times. If we are attached to them, they're hindrances. They can block our freedom, our understanding. And if you're trying to create a view that you want to believe because maybe it would make you feel better, that kind of wanting it is what's going to lead to the obsession of mind. I don't think something as subtle as rebirth, we can just decide to believe it or not. It doesn't work that way. Somehow the belief has to come out of a faith that is there, that arises from your own experience. And experience could be many different things.

So personally, I think if with rebirth or anything else you hear any of us say, if it engenders a lot of confusion in your mind, it doesn't mean it's right or wrong, but to try and think through it can engender doubt and a lot of, as you say, obsessive thinking. And that experience is not helpful. Doubt is a hindrance. And at that time, whatever it is—rebirth, karma, not-self, whatever it is—when the mind is caught in that obsessive thinking, or wanting to believe it, or hearing it's making us upset, at that time of obsession it's not helpful to keep trying to figure it out. It's just turned into the hindrance of doubt. And so at that time, really note it as doubt, wanting, obsession, whatever it is. Put it on the side.

Many things, many doctrines—I use that word—of Buddhism, that twenty years ago I couldn't relate to, made no sense. It was true, you don't need it to practice. You absolutely do not need any of these doctrines to practice. We only need to pay attention to what's happening right now. And out of that, understanding will come. You don't have to try to direct your experience to meet some doctrine you've heard us say. Forget the doctrines. Just bring all your attention to being with present moment experience. And understanding and freedom will come out of that.

Whether or not that ever results in you being able to take the view of rebirth and say, "Yes, this is true"—if you can leave that aside and just really be with your experience, I think the faith and understanding will come that will take the pressure off of "Oh my god, only this lifetime, I'm gonna make it or bust." A kind of deeper faith will come where you see that is actually an irrelevant thought in some way. And that needs to come from—it will come from—your own experience if you just keep looking. So noticing doubt, doubt, doubt. Any kind of analytical thought can turn into doubt. Just notice that, okay, now's not the time, and come back to this moment.

Okay, it's time for me to go talk and for you to go walk.

Do you have any questions about your practice this morning?

There's a lot of aversion.

You mean like a lot of different things that happen trigger the aversion? Is that what you mean?

If it was one thing, it would trigger it, but there's strong identification with that. That's why there's all this reaction. Most of the thoughts, even if they—

But you see it, you're mindful of it.

Still it's—

It's painful.

If you couldn't hear the question: How do we work with aversion that seems quite strong, with strong identification? A particular thing keeps triggering the aversion, but there's a strong identification with it. We see it, we see the thoughts of being the victim, but we still feel really caught in it. It could last all day easily. It's really suffering.

When that's going on with me, or when any particular thing triggers us and it seems to go on for a long time—whether it's aversion, sorrow, or greed—we know we're seeing it on some level. There's some mindfulness, definitely. But it keeps getting triggered. I assume the trigger keeps happening over and over. It's not like it happened once three weeks ago. At least the trigger might be a memory of what happened, arising again and again. Can you notice points where it keeps getting re-triggered? Like it starts, you get into the aversion, then the trigger happens again and it just keeps going—spinning out of control.

So I try to come in at whatever level I can at a particular moment. It takes, I feel, a great deal of patience. Acceptance that this is happening. Seeing if there's judging of oneself—that this ought to stop. "I'm seeing it, so it ought to stop." I find this is one of the biggest hooks that keeps it going for me: on some level I think because I'm seeing it, it ought to stop. "By this time in the retreat, enough already. There's no excuse for this to be happening."

Really notice how that kind of judgment adds on top of it. It's like aversion to the aversion, in multiple regression. And actually, it's not the original trigger anymore sometimes. It's these subtle thoughts—"this shouldn't be going on"—that become the aversion of the moment, if you know what I mean.

So I try to come in with attention wherever I can. If it's only at the level of massive aversion, then I do stomping aversion meditation. "Aversion, aversion. Hating, hating. I hate everybody and everything." And just feeling that in my body. It's very important to keep coming back to feeling the experience physically, if you can, in this moment. A hundred million times, pull out of the train of thought—whatever it is, whether it's about the trigger, or the subtle "why is this still happening," or trying to analyze. All of which takes you out of it. Just come back and feel the aversion for the hundred millionth time. "I know this already, I don't need to feel it now." Feel it. That's what's happening. Land in the middle of it.

Over and over, with as much acceptance as you can muster: this is just what's happening. Because what I find is that the more I can do that, the more I can accept the whole sordid train of events, the more I land in the middle of it over and over, I start to see what is actually the hook of identification.

It might seem like the identification is with the whole story, but there might actually be one little piece of the experience that the sense of identification is really gripping around. It might be the unpleasantness of the trigger. The identification might be with a subtle thought: "This shouldn't be happening." It might be with a view: "My practice should be better than this by now." It might be that the trigger elicits an unpleasant physical sensation that we don't quite notice, and the aversion is actually being triggered over and over from that unpleasant physical sensation—we just don't quite see it.

Do you see what I mean? There are lots of different little pieces. But we have to start by accepting that the whole thing is happening, or we can't get to the more subtle levels of seeing the different component parts and where the identification comes in.

"Well, I think with me, acceptance is really no problem. As soon as I get my balance, I try to just accept it. What I needed to hear was that mindfulness doesn't necessarily mean it's going to go away."

No, it doesn't. We get caught in that view.

"Right now, I think for me, if I see where I'm identified, great. But sometimes the identification runs so deep, I'm never going to get through it. It's not that crucial to see how I'm identified."

Although in some ways, I wouldn't say identification runs deep. I would just say it arises frequently, moment to moment.

It's not some deep thing hidden down there. It's just arising in a moment around a momentary experience. So it's not that it's necessarily so hard to see. Actually, for me, I'll simply notice the thing that's really hooking me. I can see the different pieces. And if some piece comes up—like, "Oh, I'm really angry now"—I go, "Oh, uh-huh, that's where it's poking at me." Just on that level, nothing more subtle than that. But you make a good point. We often think mindfulness means the experience should go away, and that's not the case at all.

A student asked about working with aversion to physical pain—how there seems to be a lot of fear around it, and how sometimes when moving attention into the pain, it gets worse. Even when trying to stay with it, stay with it, stay with it, it just feels unbearable.

There are many different ways of working with physical pain, and it's very important, as she noted, to be aware not only of the physical sensation but also of the mind's relationship to it. It's true that sometimes when we move attention into an unpleasant sensation, it gets more intense. That absolutely happens. And the point isn't to bring our attention to it in order to make it go away. We see immediately if that was our intention, because as soon as it gets more intense, we think, "Oh, pull back, this isn't working."

So it's really important in working with pain to find a balance—being able to move into it very gently with calm attention, simply because that's what's happening. Explore the sensations with a balanced, equanimous mind, but notice when the mind is not balanced or equanimous. When there's fear, when there's aversion, when there's contraction—be able to note and notice that. In the moment of fear, that's perhaps the strongest experience, not the pain. And they're two different experiences, although they go together. Really notice the quality of mind that's with the unpleasant, difficult sensation.

It's not necessarily the most skillful thing to just stay with it, stay with it, stay with it. If we're staying with unpleasant sensation and the experience is, "This is unbearable, this is unbearable, I can't handle this"—that's not mindfulness. There's a quality of real aversion, of contraction, of fear in that, which is very important to notice and feel. In fact, it might be helpful to move away from the pain, to reconnect with either your primary focus or hearing or something else that's happening, to re-establish a more balanced quality of awareness. Then move back to the difficult sensation with a more calm mind. You'll notice then, "Oh yes, this is more equanimous," and you'll notice when the aversion starts to come in. Notice that, soften again.

I've had sittings where I could sit a long time with strong pain because the mind could go into it in a very calm way and not get really tight. The next sitting, the mind was tired. As soon as I touched the pain, it was gritting-the-teeth time. And you could sit like that, gritting your teeth and hating it for an hour, but look at what's being cultivated in the mind. Is that mindfulness? Is it equanimity? Or is it subtle aversion and willpower? That's not the point.

When it feels like you can't move away, you can often go into it, notice the aversion, then back out and give it a bigger focus. You don't have to be precise when the mind gets tight. Really be within the field of the whole room—not even just your body, but the whole room. The pain is there, but there's this much more spacious quality of awareness that can help to ease it some. Go back and forth with that, noticing the mind states.

And of course, sometimes if it's at such a point that you just feel overwhelmed and moving would help, that could be an appropriate time to shift, if that's done with awareness of the intention and quite mindfully. So it's a process of balance. And for all of us, there are times where moving doesn't help, the mind is tight and constricted, trying to open up doesn't help. We're in aversion. And that's our practice at that moment.

There's no fixed approach—it's going back and forth between it all.

Okay, time to walk. Thank you.

Any questions this morning about practice?

A participant asks about "stomping meditation" mentioned earlier in the retreat.

I'd like to clarify what I meant about stomping. And also, you mentioned that at the beginning of the retreat I described going out into the woods when very angry and stomping up and down, and that I called it unskillful. Did I say that? I don't think so—I certainly wouldn't have meant it was unskillful.

When I've mentioned stomping meditation, so to speak, I really mean it for those times when the feeling of anger, for example, is so strong that trying to sit or walk very slowly downstairs just feels impossible—the energy is so intense that it feels as if you're going to explode or scream or do something unskillful around a lot of people.

I've practiced this myself. I go off where no one's around, and I really am stomping up and down, and I am aware of anger. There is a modicum of mindfulness there, in a broad sense. Not the refined awareness of noticing the perception that gives rise to unpleasantness, that gives rise to anger—we're not operating on that level. But there's a feeling in the body that's unmistakable, and I feel my foot hitting the ground. You're present. Anger, anger. I might be stomping, screaming inside, anger, anger, anger. And it calms down a little.

That's what I mean by stomping. And I don't think it's unskillful. It's much better than just imploding and trying to pretend you're sending loving-kindness to all beings. Just acknowledge what's happening. Sometimes I do find it useful to move the energy when it's so big there's no choice. We walk more briskly, go where there's no one around.

Another participant raises a related question about the expression of strong emotions, particularly referencing Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching that expressing anger waters the seeds and makes it stronger.

I would say that's true, and I would make a distinction between the two things we're talking about here.

When I talk about stomping, as I said, it's still with some mindfulness. I'm not stomping while saying, "Right, that person who made me angry is wrong, I'm right, let's get going, let's do something." That is nurturing the seeds of anger. That's being caught in the story, identification with right or wrong—thinking I should be angry, or hating yourself for being angry. That's expressing it physically but not with mindfulness; it's feeding the anger. I would call that watering the seeds of anger. I've seen that in myself.

One time on retreat, I was very angry at someone over something that happened. I kept feeling the anger, and it felt mindful, but there was real identification. I just kept going over the story: "Yeah, I should be angry, and that was wrong of him to do." At one point, I noticed the anger was just getting stronger and stronger each time I recommitted to the belief that I was right to be angry, that I deserved to be angry, that this was really a rotten thing to happen. That's definitely watering the seeds of anger. I could feel it sprout.

Stomping is different—it's bringing mindfulness in on whatever level we can to the experience of anger itself. Yes, anger is present. Don't pretend it's not present.

That's not mindfulness. Thich Nhat Hanh also says you have to treat your anger with gentleness, with kindness, like a younger brother or sister. You can't treat your anger with violence.

There's something here for both sides, but it's about finding the balance in mindfulness—truly acknowledging what's happening with total acceptance and non-violence. If anger is happening, we need to truly acknowledge it. We can't pretend it's not there. But with mindfulness, we're simply acknowledging anger itself: its presence, its physical expression in the body, the pain, the images in the mind that are happening in this moment.

Feeding it, watering it in the way Thich Nhat Hanh spoke of, is getting really identified with the story, keeping it going, acting it out, and then actually doing something out of the space of "yes, this is justified." Or it's not—we hate ourselves and beat ourselves up for being angry. Do you see the difference? One is bringing in mindfulness in whatever way we can, precise or huge, it doesn't matter. The other is just diving in and saying, "Yeah, let's really get going on this anger."

It's our delicate balance in practice—not to suppress and pretend that something unpleasant isn't there, and not to really fan the bonfire and let it take over. It's a balancing act that we're all dancing all the time. It's tricky.

Someone asked about awakening—is it a state? Like one pops into it, or is it something to be constantly maintained? Are we already awakened and experiencing it moment by moment without knowing it? When one is awakened, does one still practice?

There are many different ways this could be answered, so please don't think I'm giving a definitive answer. There's a Tibetan saying I like: it's easy to become awakened, but it's hard to stay awakened.

Sometimes I think it could be said like this: first of all, awakening is not a state, not something to be maintained. That would imply a conditioned state where if you set up the right conditions and hold them, that state will stay. Forget it. There isn't any such state. In a way, the whole talk about becoming enlightened can imply we're going somewhere, and when we get there—plop—here we are, all the work is done.

When you read the suttas, the arahants seem to be in that state. Perhaps so. None of us here are there, and it's not the sense of anyone I've met that they feel their work is finished, that there's no more need to practice, that they've got it.

My experience—on a much different level from the arahants, we won't even talk about it in the same breath—is not of some state to get to, but of a recognition of something. It's not even a thing. It's what is always true, always what we truly are. Only we don't recognize it. The potential of recognition is here now, always. It's not somewhere else. It's never somewhere else. The whole problem with craving is that it takes us away from right here, which is the only place and time to recognize our potential of awakening.

I personally feel that recognition is possible in many moments, and then we forget, we lose it, we can't remember. At times when there's an insight of anything—"Oh, that's so obvious, that's so true"—we've all had that. "I'll live like this now, forever," you know, it's so clear. And how long before the next thing comes along? Even though it was so clear, we can't by will make it happen again.

So that's the dance. The whole practice is one of constant re-recognition and letting go. But there's no state to maintain.

Someone asked: when you have a thought that ricochets through a whole series of events and you end up thinking, "Where did that come from?"—how useful is it to actually trace it back to its source, the trigger, which takes quite a bit of effort and is itself thinking? But sometimes it can be quite interesting.

It can be interesting. Overall, I don't know how useful it is.

I have found it at times interesting just to see how far we can get and how really disconnected we are in our thoughts from present moment experience. So for instance, finding yourself on the coast of Mexico and wondering how you got there, then tracing it back to the fact that your little finger is cold. It can be interesting, once or twice, just to see the way things work in this world.

Or if I'm waking up in the middle of something very emotional or difficult, sometimes to trace it back and see, "Oh, there's something difficult happening here and now, and I've projected it into this thing that happened ten years ago." That I sometimes find useful or interesting.

But I really want to qualify this, because it can turn into a real "how can I amuse myself" sort of mind game—let's trace back all the thoughts. And it is ultimately just more thinking. So I would say with great caution, occasionally it can be useful and instructive. If you're doing it more than really occasionally, look at the motivation. It's just another way to pass the time and not feel the pain in the knee. So I would just check that out. And I don't think that's just earlier in the retreat—that's still happening, isn't it?

One yogi asked about something from an earlier talk where I spoke about sensation in the knee, but also how we might have an image of that. What I was saying—I didn't mean to imply that only because of the image of knee is there discomfort or aversion or reaction. What I was trying to say is that there's sensation, unpleasant. We might be identified, or the grasping of self might be around that sensation. What I've found for myself is that quite often there is an image as well as the sensation—an image that's fleeting or often not noticed—and that the real identification, what I might be calling identification with the body or that sensation, is actually in that moment the contraction of sense of self around the image. And I often don't notice the image. I don't mean to imply that if you notice the image, that necessarily means there's no identification or reaction to the sensation either. Both could be present.

In addition to that, this yogi mentioned the wind blowing that morning. Obviously hearing it and noticing, it was very difficult not to conjure up images of the trees and the snow and the area. He kept noting and seeing images, and it kind of dissipated a little bit, but it felt like it was just back and forth. Is that useful or a problem?

No, it's just what's happening. I think the only reason it would so-called take us away to be in the image is if we don't realize it's seeing and we're sitting here really thinking we're in the trees and the snow. But when you know this is hearing, you know this is seeing or imaging—that's just what's happening. There's hearing arising, there's seeing arising. There's no problem. One isn't better, just as long as we know what's what. No, it's not a problem.

Another yogi brought up a tension he perceived: A few days ago, someone said they can't find enough words for labeling. And I said that sometimes it's recommended to label as if you were a child, meaning non-verbally. There are some kinds of practice happening that way. On the other side, the teachers always point out how extremely precise you can be.

What I would say is this: The sensation must be very precisely experienced, but the labeling may be quite general. The precision is in the knowing, in the direct experience—not necessarily in finding exactly the right word. This means one thing: before you come to teach and report, you have to do the work of actually experiencing. If you wouldn't report, if this all would have been non-verbal, that's fine. And when you just label "hearing" or "smelling," this is more of a stress on the process, on the nature of this sensation. It doesn't need to be "the smell in the right part of the nose or the left part of the nose." The discrepancy you're sensing between precision and being more general—that's actually not a real discrepancy. The precision is in the experience itself, in the quality of attention. The label can remain simple.

You notice you don't like it, right? There's a lot of ways I could go with this. The first thing that comes out of me is... there isn't any perfect way. And it's all going to be precise, and it's all going to match up perfectly. And if we could just really let go of thinking it's all going to be perfectly matched, always precise or always general, or whatever.

Sometimes I think—this is my opinion, only my opinion—we can get a little sidetracked into trying to make the reports so precise and perfect that more emphasis can get put on trying to describe it accurately to the teacher. Yes, it needs to be somewhat clear, but too much emphasis and energy and concern and desire can go into trying to make the report accurate. I don't think personally that that's as useful as being precisely with your experience. That's where the understanding is going to come.

And I've found for myself there are times when—your first part of the question—you can be with a sensation and you just know it's burning. And you can tell it changes to tingling. And you're not thinking about that so much. But there are times, as Steve said, where you might almost be in a pre-verbal state, where that part of the mind that's very verbal, very rational, very adult, isn't working so well. And maybe somebody noticed that during this retreat. And when it's not, don't worry about it.

To be really with the sensation, there are times I'll just note "sensing." Because it's not worth moving away from the experience to try and find the perfect word. So if I'm in a state like that—first of all, none of us is Sayadaw U Pandita. We're not going to cream you for coming in and not describing whether you felt the sensation in the left nostril or the right nostril. You could say, right?

And you can say, "I felt I was with it, but somehow today the words were not clear." And that's actually a clear perception. When you can say that, it's different from coming in and saying, "Well, I don't know, it was some kind of sensation, I don't know, I wasn't really there with it." Those are two different experiences, and you can describe them differently. It's not always going to be so precise. And you don't have to then later make up some precise words in order to tell us about it if that isn't really accurate from your experience.

Most important is to just try and convey your experience as close as you can to how it was at the time. Words will not always really be so accurate, you know, because we're really trying to convey something that's beyond words.

And in the same vein about the smelling and the hearing—you're right, smelling and hearing is not that precise. But I think it's helpful because it is bringing our attention to the process, which is the point. So if I'm just noticing "smelling," it's not as precise as "acrid, bitter odor that reminded me of a chemical explosion in the fourth grade." But it is more important to be with the smelling aspect, with the process. Actually, being a little less involved in the content is fine. It's just all that's really happening is the six sense experiences. So just resting a little more generally is really okay. It's really okay.

And don't worry so much that we have to get it precise to describe it either to the teacher or to ourself. Sometimes the words aren't there. It's really okay.

Okay, it's time to walk. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 288

Living Our Deepest Purpose

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this inspiring talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common pitfall in meditation practice: becoming so focused on precise, microscopic mindfulness that we lose sight of the larger purpose of awakening and freedom of heart. She introduces the Pāli concept of sampajañña (clear comprehension), which traditionally accompanies sati (mindfulness) to create a more complete practice called sati-sampajañña.

Wilson explores the four aspects of clear comprehension, particularly emphasizing awareness of our deepest purpose and the appropriateness of our actions within the bigger picture. Drawing from her own experience—including a pivotal moment when she recognized her life's dedication to serving the Dhamma—she encourages practitioners to honor their profound inner aspirations rather than dismissing them with self-doubt. She illustrates how connecting with our true purpose can transform decision-making, using the example of overcoming fear to teach her first meditation course.

The talk offers practical wisdom for integrating practice into daily life, from chopping vegetables mindfully to navigating major life decisions. Wilson emphasizes that awakening can happen anywhere—not just in Asia or on retreat—and that even mundane activities like cooking can become avenues for profound insight. She encourages practitioners to appreciate the rarity of their commitment to the Dhamma, drawing on teachings from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche to remind us of the precious opportunity of human existence dedicated to truth.

I was really happy last night when Joseph ended his talk by reminding us all that the purpose of our practice is freedom of heart, of mind. Really, the purpose of our practice is awakening in each moment.

Sometimes I think it's possible for each of us at different times to become a bit myopic in the way that we practice, to be a bit narrowly focused. By really narrow-sighted or close-looking, I mean we can get into thinking in the moment that our practice is about just getting clearer and more precise noticing of everything. We can really work ourselves into quite a snit, trying to get each sensation a little clearer, our noting a little more precise. Sometimes I know for myself, at the end of a retreat or in the middle of a retreat, it somehow seems like the whole reason for my practice has become to be a really good meditator. I kind of lose sight that there's actually a larger purpose than just being the best possible yogi going.

Sometimes people have said to me that they feel their mindfulness is quite good, but somehow they're feeling more disconnected from others or from the situation—somehow very mindful but also rather separate. That's in the moment-to-moment picture. And in the bigger picture, somehow we've learned how to be very mindful but we feel so rarefied, so sensitive. How can we possibly not only carry this into life but actually live a life in this world? Somehow, the more we practice, the more we wonder: are we practicing to avoid life? Is that what it's about?

Obviously, I'm not going to say that's what it's about. I think it's just the reverse. There's a Sufi saying that the true man or woman of God—now substitute for God our Buddhist lingo; you can substitute Dharma or truth or awareness—sits in the middle of her fellow men or women and rises and eats and sleeps and marries and buys and sells, gives and takes in the bazaar and spends her days with other people, and yet never forgets the truth even for a single moment.

To me, that really inspires me. That's, in a way, the way I think of practicing: to be able to live fully in the midst of the world, without aversion, without avoidance, and yet to stay connected with truth, never forgetting it for a single moment.

So tonight in speaking I want to highlight an aspect of mindfulness that we've mentioned but not talked about a whole lot—one that I think helps in broadening our perspective, in bringing us out of this sometimes sense of being a little too rarefied, a little too separate. It's this quality called in Pali sampajañña, translated in English as clear comprehension. Often when right mindfulness is spoken of, it actually means the combination called sati-sampajañña: mindfulness and clear comprehension.

We've often been speaking of mindfulness, sati, as this quality of very clear connection, knowing what's happening, very precise, and of course non-coercive, non-judging. As we practice in this way, our mindfulness can get quite microscopic. It gets sort of mixed with all the other enlightenment factors—with the kind of starry glitz of concentration sometimes, with the real calmness of tranquility and equanimity, with the energizing factors. All of those are together, but I find we can often think that if we don't have all that intensity or the starry quality or the microscopic precision, we've lost or abandoned mindfulness.

What clear comprehension does is bring mindfulness into a wider focus, because actually we can get so precisely microscopic and be quite out of balance. It's fine when we're just sitting on the cushion; it's absolutely appropriate. But when we move out of the isolation and are engaged in any activity where we need to interact with others, make choices or decisions, or even—God forbid—speak, then we move out of this kind of secluded microscopic quality of mindfulness and need to bring in the aspects of clear comprehension.

These, of course, in the classic Theravada way, are broken down into four different areas. The two main areas are awareness or clear comprehension of our intention or purpose, and of the appropriateness or wider suitability of an action—looking at what we're doing in the context of the bigger picture. This seems obvious, but sometimes we have to bring it in consciously.

I think a good place to look at this might be in your yogi job meditation. It was brought home to me quite clearly a few years ago when I took the job of vegetable chopper, which is a really great job. It can be lots of fun, and it requires a lot of interaction, a lot of cooperation. I could really see the difference between when I was trying to hold on to mindfulness in the very precise, focused way—kind of a samādhi concentration mindfulness, just chopping the carrot, feeling every sensation of movement of the hand and chopping the carrot—and, you know, ten minutes later you've chopped one carrot. Meanwhile, everyone else has to work like mad because you're going so slow. You're not getting the work done, and there's something lacking in this, not really taking in the whole picture. It can feel that to let go of that and open up is losing something. I could tend to hold on tightly to my idea of mindfulness and concentration, but in effect not be appropriate in the situation.

To bring in clear comprehension means to broaden my sense of purpose. The small purpose is to be as mindful as possible, to get good meditation. Let go of the small purpose and open to the larger one: we're all here together as a group to do this job, to cut up the vegetables in order to help the cooks serve all the yogis lunch. It's actually quite a lovely purpose. And to let go of my sense of being just one separate person and see that I'm part of a continual flow and change. The situation is always changing. When you can let go of the intensity, the inward focus, and really begin to move and shift with the flow of things, you can see that if someone else has a lot to do and I'm finished, you don't just walk out and say, "Good, I'm done." You help the other person because it's not just my job or your job—it's our job. And to see that what works one day, the next day the situation might be totally different. Or I come in with a particular preference—I'll do anything but I don't want to have to peel the beets—and I need to be able to let go of that. If I get there and I'm handed the beets, can I just let go and peel the beets and actually enjoy peeling the beets as part of the larger purpose of what's happening?

It went from a feeling of trying to hold on tightly to some form of meditation to get somewhere, to a real open-flowing sense of connectedness. What I found in that ease is that true mindfulness and concentration actually developed much more naturally without this sort of artificial separation, without this forcing to be microscopic. What I thought was letting go of mindfulness to open up to the big picture, to the whole shifting situation, was actually a deepening into the broader qualities of mindfulness.

And this is really, to me, what our practice is about—not to just get stuck in trying to be microscopic. So on a retreat level, that's an example of the difference between sati just on its own, just the microscopic precision, and sati combined with clear comprehension of purpose and appropriateness or suitability, matching our actions and decisions to what's actually happening in the bigger picture.

So I want to talk a little more about each of these areas.

This first area, clear comprehension of purpose, of course on the moment-to-moment level, is what we've talked about often: knowing our intention before we take an action, before we say something. This is obvious. And when we're in tune with, able to notice our intention, as many of you have noticed through practice, that moment of noticing intention gives us a moment of choice. Do I really want to do this? Is this really going to be beneficial action—beneficial for myself, beneficial for others? And it's wonderful to have that moment to reflect.

On a larger, more overarching level of our experience, this clear comprehension of purpose can refer not just to the momentary intention as it arises prior to each action, but also to a larger sense of what is really my truest, my deepest purpose in this life, in my life. And I have personally found that consciously tuning into this—what is my deepest purpose—being willing to clarify that for oneself, becomes a very powerful and inspiring beacon in our life.

Without a sense of what is really my deepest purpose, I can take decisions haphazardly: well, this feels good, or I don't know, this kind of has the right feel, or maybe this would be good. But we're just acting at random, and our energy can get a bit dispersed. There are so many possibilities that we are confronted with, especially in our culture. Where to work, where to live, should I move, should I switch jobs, should I switch relationships? It's just endless in our culture. And to have a deep sense, a guide light of what is really most deeply true for me in my life—I have found this really inspiring, very profound. It can be a powerful cause for transformation in our life and how we live our life.

And it's interesting, because I've found in myself and also in speaking with other people—often here, actually—that someone has had a very profound and touching moment, an inner sense of something that's deeply true for them, which I would call getting in touch with their truest purpose, their deepest purpose. And people tend to be almost embarrassed, very shy to say so. What I've often found—I found it in myself, and when I hear it in others I feel really sad—is there's often a sense of: who am I to dare to have a really profound purpose, deeply connected to truth or to serving beings or to whatever it happens to be for you? I'm not saying there's a right purpose.

But for example, when it first came up for me consciously, quite some time ago, I was on a short self-retreat. Out of nowhere—I wasn't sitting there thinking, what's my deepest purpose in life? I was just following the breath—out of nowhere came a very deeply felt sense: my life is really about serving the Dharma, and I dedicate my life to that, whatever it means.

And I thought, where did that come from? And the next moment was: who do you think you are? You little twit.

It was really interesting. Those two voices clearly came from such different places. One of them was just the usual self-judgment, the second one. The first one felt very profound and didn't feel like Carol persona at all. It was very moving, and I could tell there was something true about it. It was also very scary, and immediately: well, what does that mean? How can I do that? I'm planning out the next ten years.

What's interesting is, forget all of that. You don't have to plan out anything. But when it comes up for you—and sometimes we can just connect with our real inner purity, which is there for all of us and will manifest in probably a slightly different way for each one of us—when we touch that, when it arises, I beg you, really honor it in yourself. Never mind all the voices that say you have no right, or you have nothing to offer, or it's too scary, I might have to change my life. It's true, we might have to change our life. But that's not so bad sometimes. And we don't have to know any of that ahead of time. In fact, we can't.

But to really honor, amidst all the multiplicity, that depth of beauty and commitment, that manifestation of truth—once you consciously acknowledge it to yourself, it can become a conscious reference point when you need to make decisions, either life-changing decisions or smaller decisions. Granted, I don't mean every time you're trying to decide what to have for dinner: well, my purpose is to serve the Dharma, should I have French fries or baked potato? I'm not talking on that level. And I made myself crazy like that for a while, so I hope you'll spare yourselves.

But in seemingly big decisions, when we remember our purpose—and not just something in the mind, but reconnect with it in our hearts—actually the decision becomes obvious. And it's very energizing.

It takes out a lot of confusion.

I've told this story many times before, but it's such a good example that I will share it again. Sometime after this sense arose that my life was about serving the Dharma, I actually forgot about it. I was a manager here at that time—this was some time ago, 1984 I think—and I wasn't thinking about anything in the future. I was just here to practice, and that was it.

Through a series of circumstances, a weekend meditation course needed to be taught. It was all planned, and the person who was going to teach it got sick. No one else could do it. A couple of friends of mine here, other teachers, decided I should go do it. I thought that was a really bad idea. A very, very poor idea. And I basically said, "No. No way."

These two friends embarked on this campaign of intimidation to make me do it. They just wouldn't stop. It was interesting because one of them—it was not her personality to be pushy. And they just kept at me. I was saying, "No, no."

Then suddenly this memory came up. Oh yeah, right. My purpose in life is to serve the Dharma. And I don't get to choose really how that's going to manifest. It doesn't mean the way I like it. That's not part of the contract necessarily.

As soon as I remembered that, it became so clear that my intention in saying no was totally fear—self-preservation and avoidance of humiliation. That was basically my reason to say no, and it doesn't stand up under scrutiny. There was really nothing else to think about, so I said, "Okay, I'll do it."

It was such a lesson. The fear didn't go away. The whole flight—it was in Vancouver—the whole flight from here to Vancouver was horrible. I was just in terror. Up until the moment I started teaching, and then somehow the Dharma takes over. It's really amazing.

But the lesson was that once it was clear how my action would align with my purpose, then everything else that arises from that decision—the fear and the panic and all of that—is clearly part of practice. It's what I can use to grow, to understand the emptiness of fear, to realize that fear doesn't mean I can't do something. It was so empowering to know that once I'm in alignment with my purpose, everything else is okay. That doesn't mean everything else is comfortable.

In fact, I often ask myself now when I'm wavering about something: Do I want to be comfortable, or do I want to be free? As soon as I phrase it that way, again, it's kind of, "Oh, okay, can't really hide from this one." It's obvious.

So it's just a little experience, but it's a way of seeing that when you acknowledge to yourself what's truly valuable in your life, and you reconnect with that, it is a powerful force—both energizing us to do things that are of value to ourselves and others, and also a force of transformation in how we live our lives.

One teacher said once that in every moment of activity, we are committing ourselves to something. It's a question of what. Are we willing to look?

We shouldn't use this, though, as another way to beat ourselves with a club because this particular activity is not serving the Dharma. It's not another way to make ourselves wrong or bad. But it's a way to deeply inspire us, to keep our connection to truth alive in our lives. It's really a wonderful help in this.

Of course, we need our practice, the mindfulness of being present, to even remember to question our motivation.

And we need the aspect of mindfulness that is non-judging, that is willing to honestly see why we're doing what we're doing and not to judge it.

This tuning into our deepest purpose has to be what's really true for us, not some idea of what we wish. For a while—really some years, I think it was actually before the story I told—I had this sense that I should live a very dharmic life, whatever that meant. It wasn't clearly defined. But that "should" is always a kind of giveaway. If you tune into your purpose and it comes out as "I should be like this," watch out. Because it often means it's an ideal that we try to live up to by judging ourselves or trying to twist ourselves to fit an outer ideal.

When I had this idea that I should live a dharmic life, every time I would go to a movie or watch a TV show or just waste time—not somehow be studying or practicing or going out doing good or I don't know what—and it was a lot of my time, believe me—every moment that I felt I wasted, I would berate myself so heavily. It was as if I was walking around with this weight of guilt all the time for not being pure enough, not being dharmic enough. It's horrible. It is not a helpful way to live. This is not what I'm talking about.

But I found that when we really tune into our purpose in a genuine way, with compassion, with mettā for ourselves, and with mindfulness, then the times when we deviate, we see it, we accept it. Because of course we're going to deviate. You may have noticed that this happens sometimes here in your practice. I mean, even with big intentions. "I'm not going to look at the bulletin board again until tea time." Clear intention, and you walk out, and the next thing you know—"I know I don't have interviews today, but let's memorize everybody"—how did I get here? Clear intention, but we forget, and we deviate. It's okay.

I remember one retreat I was teaching in California. It's always embarrassing when you make your intentions out loud. We were sitting at the table at lunch, eating pieces of watermelon off a platter, and I said, "Okay, this is the last piece—it's really making me sick." Of course, a minute later I was eating another piece, and all the other staff people gleefully said, "Ah, look at you! You just said it was making you sick. So much for your intentions."

We're going to deviate when there's not awareness of our intention. We're back with habit. Often, as well, many of our decisions are incredibly complex. Even being able to tell what our motivation is for entering a particular relationship—my God, how complicated is that? Or for leaving a relationship. Or just some of the complicated things you might have to do in your job. Of course there's a multiplicity of purposes and intentions in something like that, not to mention the subconscious ones that we might not be able to tune into. So not to blame, but simply to pay attention with a kind of kindness.

What I found has happened for me over the years is that when I finally stopped beating myself up for not being totally pure and dharmic in every moment of existence and said, "Okay, you want to watch a really stupid show on TV? Go ahead, watch it with all my love, watch this show"—and then watch it with attention—about halfway through I'd go, "You know, this is really stupid," and I'd turn it off. The interest was just gone. And I found, just as you find in your practice here, that the purpose, the deepest purpose, begins to come in more naturally. Our actions and choices begin to harmonize much more naturally.

So here, for example, our purpose might be to be a good yogi, to be mindful, or it might be to have good sittings, it might be to get back to that bliss—whatever our purpose is, let's be honest about it. And you're there for a while, and then of course the next day you're just overwhelmed with thoughts and emotions and it's gone. I know everybody here has had this experience, and it just feels like it's all gone down the drain, whatever our story is about it.

What's so interesting—and I've noticed this in talking to a lot of people just in this last week or two—is that we're really starting to get it. At first we start fighting: "Oh no, the thinking, the emotions, I've got to get back to how it was before, get back to the breath, get back to the breath." But we've started to learn that the forcing of motivation doesn't work. And time after time, people have said—sooner now, much sooner—they're giving that up and saying, "Okay, agitation. Okay, restlessness. Okay, endless thinking. That's fine." And lo and behold, with much less struggle and much sooner than expected, the mind and heart come back into balance. All of a sudden there seems to be mindfulness, there seems to be energy, there seems to be a modicum of equanimity, and we think, "Where did this come from? I didn't make it happen."

But it comes much more naturally, and in that we develop a much deeper faith and trust that when we fall out of our purpose, we don't have to panic. The times of connection with it have so deepened our understanding and the power of heart and mind that we come back into balance much more naturally and easily. And just as this happens day to day on retreat, it can happen week to week or year to year in our life.

And yet, we do need to actively keep coming back to stay in touch with our purpose. There are so many things that come up in our lives, so many possibilities pulling us in so many directions.

I can't remember if I've read this before, but I love this verse from the Japanese poet Izumi Shikibu, expressing the different pulls on our hearts, on our intentions:

Although I try to hold the single thought of Buddha's teaching in my heart, I cannot help but hear the many crickets' voices calling as well.

Just lovely. I try to hold a single thought of Buddha's teaching, but I cannot help but hear the many crickets' voices calling as well. I love it because we also hear the beauty sometimes of the crickets' voices—not hating them. And we will move in different directions. But when we can hold our purpose with deep love and connection, with real trust and faith in the purity of the Dharma, and in the understanding that we ourselves are manifestations of that purity, then again and again our purpose will resurface easily, and we'll reconnect with it.

We do sometimes have to actively find ways to help us reconnect. One I want to mention, because it's been coming up in my heart a lot these last few weeks, is sangha—we help each other reconnect. Sometimes in the silence here, simply by seeing another person's commitment, you don't know what's going on inside them, but when we're in one of those "I've had it, I'm out of here, why am I doing this?" moments, just seeing somebody else, it's not that we want to mimic them, but it retouches that place of faith, that place of trust in us.

Finding, or having the good karma to connect with, even from a distance, really wise beings—to connect with teachers or beings who are somewhat awakened—has been an incredible good fortune in my life. Some of the teachers I've been with... I remember one time I flew across the country for a weekend to be at a huge symposium with the Dalai Lama, something like six thousand people. It's not like we were having some personal connection, but just being in the presence of beings whose lives are so clearly dedicated to awakening and to the service of others. It doesn't have to be particularly Buddhist, but to let that in, to even search it out at times, can so deeply awaken and reconnect us to that place of faith, of inspiration. It doesn't mean we have to follow that teacher—I don't mean that. But just to be with other wise people, other people committed to a path of awakening, committed to a life of compassion, to me it somehow bypasses the rational and awakens quite deeply a resonance with my true purpose in life.

There's a Tibetan saying that if you look into the essence of devotion—and devotion here can mean faith in the Dharma too, it doesn't have to be personal devotion—if you look into the essence of devotion, you meet naked awareness directly. They feed each other. So in moments of just sitting with a really peaceful or wise or compassionate being, it can touch that in us, reconnect us.

And at different times each one of us might be that wise or awakened or compassionate being. We don't have to be it every moment, but we can be it for each other at various times. It's such a gift for us as teachers being able to share this time with you, because at times each one of you is lighting up—a little Buddha, a little awakened being. You usually don't know it at the time, but there's a sense of little rays coming out. I'm exaggerating, but there's a sense of purity just manifest, and it touches all of us in silence or in speech, whether we know it or not, and it deeply helps us continue on this path.

One of the reasons we all talk so much about our practice time in Asia is, I feel, in this light. In Asia you have a combination. First, I don't know if there are more wise beings, but at least up until recently, Asia has been more supportive of a really spiritually dedicated life. Being in Thailand or Burma, you feel the incredible faith of the people in the Dharma itself, and that faith manifesting as such generosity to support anyone who is so committed to Dharma that they will dedicate their lives as a monk or nun. Even people who might come to sit in a monastery for five days would be supported. There's such faith.

I want to say it's pure—of course it's not always so pure, it's contaminated with all the kilesas just like we are—but it's so alive, and you get the sense of yes, this is really true. It is possible to live like this. To come in contact with teachers and nuns and monks and renunciates who have dedicated their lives to awakening in a very conscious way, it's so inspirational. Combined with a simplicity of life in Asia—I find simplicity in my life makes it much easier to even remember that I would like to connect with my deepest purpose. It's easier to remember when I'm not running around trying to do ten different things in ten different places in one day, on the highway every fifteen minutes. It's easier to remember.

But it doesn't have to be Asia. I want to bring that out. I remember myself in the first three-month retreats I did here—well, actually my first practice was in Asia, so I guess I already had that hit of "Asia's so wonderful for practice." But often people think, "Well, if I really want to do it, I have to go to Asia." That's baloney. The truth is everywhere. There are wise beings, committed beings everywhere—all sitting here in this room. It's not about where; it's about finding our purpose and finding ways to keep connecting to it.

One of the people I really hold in my heart as someone who inspired me deeply, though I didn't realize it at the time, is my piano teacher from junior high school. She was a woman about my grandmother's age who was a Christian Scientist, which I didn't know anything about. I'm sure I still don't really understand it. But what I got from her was that she really, deeply in her life, was trying to live truth. And to her, truth was really manifested as love. The phrase "God is love" is what she based her life on, and she truly lived that way—a struggling person who was dedicated to living a life of love.

And it was a revelation to me that this was possible—that people lived so sincerely, and it wasn't some kind of hokey idea, but that someone could dedicate their life to living that way and just be a normal person. I still know her, actually. She's ninety-two now, living in Maine. She's gone through hardship, like everyone. But just that depth of commitment deeply inspired me. And I think we can find that really all around us when we look.

So looking to awakened people isn't about restricting ourselves to some sense of elitism. It's more about opening up to seeing the beauty and truth everywhere in life.

And yes, it's true that as we tune into our deepest aspiration and begin to use that as a beacon, a guideline in making choices, there might be changes that come in our life. When we think of it from now—oh my goodness, will I have to give up this or that? How will I be able to keep doing whatever it is I'm doing?—it can be scary or overwhelming. I hate the thought of this. I don't want to live like a nun in Thailand. Get over it. It isn't like that.

I've found for myself that whenever I've made a decision out of really tuning into my commitment to serve the Dharma, and it's not too egocentric, the decision at the time might feel like giving up. Often, when I look at how I've lived my life now, on one level it's amazing. I feel incredibly blessed in the life that I have. I could never have imagined this. On the other hand, it's also meant that I'm on the road most of the year. I have very little feeling of a settled home life. I've not had children, and I'm clearly not going to have children or any kind of family life in the normal sense. At times I could look at it and say, well, that's really a huge renunciation, something I really gave up.

But it happens so gradually that there's no sense of renunciation at all. It's really that things that distract us from what's truly important just sort of fall away. And I mean, this looks different for everyone. I'm not upholding the way my life has been as the way it should be—I only have myself to use as an example. But it doesn't feel so much like renunciation as like an opening to such a greater possibility, to be able, from time to time, to connect with truth and inspiration.

A friend of mine told me—this is a paraphrase—about Anandamayi Ma, an Indian woman saint, a great saint of the last century. Some people were coming to her and really lauding her for being such a great renunciate, for having given up the world and for living so simply. And she just started laughing and laughing and laughing. They said, "What's so funny?" And she said, "You're the ones who are the renunciates. In living the life that you're living, you're giving up the great joy of living in God's presence. You're the renunciates."

And it's really true, in whatever words, in whatever way we contact that in our life.

So we needn't have some harsh ideal of how one should live. We can contact the presence of truth living life in any form. There's a poem by Rumi—the last two lines I love: "Let the beauty you love be what you do. There are hundreds of ways to kneel and kiss the ground."

Whatever we do in our life, when it can come from this connection to what is truly valuable, what is our true purpose—having children, washing the dishes, raking the lawn, cleaning the sewer—it doesn't matter what we're doing when we're doing it with an attitude of: How can I awaken in this moment? How can this activity be in the service of awakening and of compassion for all beings, as Geshe Rapten said?

To me, this is what clear comprehension of purpose, of deeper aspiration, brings into our life—this overarching sense where truth begins to shine through all aspects of life.

And this brings in the last two parts of clear comprehension, which begin to develop naturally when we meet life with this clear sense of purpose. They're really the aspects of making our life our practice, and recognizing truth or reality or non-delusion everywhere. The insights we have aren't just some isolated "Ah, anicca, yes, everything comes and goes"—precisely noticing the ending of sensation and the beginning of the breath on the cushion. Rather, these insights translate into our life. We begin obviously to see truth everywhere when we have this sense of overarching purpose, because the truth begins to shine out everywhere. Not just in Asia, not just in spiritual situations, not just when we're on retreat.

Because we begin to look with the eyes or listen with the ears of truth. And the truth shines everywhere. It cannot be hidden. All of life, even the most difficult circumstances—perhaps in a way especially the most difficult circumstances—become the avenues for awakening.

Sometimes on leaving a retreat, or even during a retreat, we find that we're so much more attuned to the suffering aspect of life, the impermanent aspect, and it can feel a little overwhelming. I remember once at the end of a three-month retreat, for some reason I decided to go to the mall in Worcester and walk around. I don't know if it was good or bad. It was a suffering experience, for sure. I just felt it—the suffering on everybody's face.

But that suffering doesn't have to be a bad thing, because I found that really it's the avenue into connection with all beings, the avenue into compassion. When we close down, hating the pain, we're separate. But when we can look through the eyes of truth to see that yes, this is a suffering being, this is a suffering experience—mine or another's—when we open to it, it's actually an avenue in. It's a connection to all other beings, an avenue into our interconnectedness, our non-separation.

This can happen spontaneously, as this man was describing. It can also happen through reflection, through consciously bringing in this non-delusion. Once I was in the hospital, lying there in a lot of pain, and it's easy to start feeling rather self-centered and caught up in one's own story. I noticed this happening, and I consciously began to expand, to reflect. I was in a room with three other women, old women, all suffering—actually a lot more than I was. And I just started: oh gosh, just in this room, the four of us. And how many people, how many rooms, just in this hospital? And how many hospitals just in this little area of a few towns—there's five or six, just in this little area. I kept expanding out into really an infinite number of people in pain in hospitals at that moment, or at this moment. It started as a somewhat intellectual exercise, but before long my whole sense of self-concern and isolation had vanished, and I felt this really loving connection with all beings. Sometimes it's all beings in pain, sometimes it's all beings in joy. But whatever the situation, it can consciously be an avenue into interconnectedness.

The truth shines everywhere, no matter what we're doing. We can really use this.

One other little story, just to illustrate that no matter what we're doing, in this moment we can awaken. There's a book of poems by the nuns who were women practitioners at the time of the Buddha, containing little stories of each woman's life and what led to her poem. There's one woman whose name they don't have—she's simply called "an anonymous wife," the wife of a Brahmin in Vesali, where the Buddha spoke often. She was quite devoted to the Buddha and wanted to become a nun, but her husband would not allow her to. You had to have your husband's permission, and theoretically husbands had to have their wives' permission too, just so you know it was sort of fair. But her husband didn't give her permission.

So she kept up her duties, her obligations as a Brahmin wife, while continuing to be sincerely devoted to truth. And it's said that one day while she was cooking the curry in the kitchen, the vegetables caught fire. With a real loud crackling fire, the whole meal just burned up. And in that moment of watching the whole meal go up in flames, she had such a deep insight into impermanence that she became free—a third stage of enlightenment. Third stage, mind you, not just the first.

So you could even be burning your food and that could be your avenue for awakening. It really isn't the activity; it's the attitude we bring. Nothing is too mundane.

In tuning into this broader aspect of clear comprehension—a sense of your deepest purpose—I'd really encourage you not to be intimidated. Connect with what that is for yourself, and don't undervalue, don't underestimate the strength of your commitment. I know you know all the moments you haven't been wanting to be mindful, all the times you've wished you never set foot on this path. I realize we have those moments. But I hate to tell you: it's too late. You can't turn back now. We cannot go back to ignorance. And it wouldn't be so good if you could, really. It wouldn't be so good.

But don't underestimate yourself. I just want to share this, from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "Ask yourself, how many of the billions of inhabitants of this planet have any idea of how rare it is to have been born as a human being? How many of those who understand the rarity of human birth ever think of using that chance to practice the Dharma?"

How many of those who think of practice actually do? How many of those who start continue? How many of those who continue attain ultimate realization?

I just want to stop here and say all of you are continuing. All of us are continuing. So don't be saying, "Yeah, I'm back there in the beginning, I'm someone who doesn't appreciate." Appreciate the depth of your commitment. Who would have thought, at your first weekend retreat or the first sitting group you went to, that you'd end up at a three-month course? That depth of commitment just creeps up on us. But it's here now for each of us.

As long as you fail to recognize the true value of human existence, you will fritter your life away in futile activity and distraction. When life comes all too soon to its inevitable end, you will not have achieved anything worthwhile at all. But once you really see the unique opportunity that our human life can bring, you will definitely direct your energy into its true worth by putting the Dharma into practice.

I just want to express my sincere gratitude and appreciation to all of you for being some of the rare beings who are putting the Dharma into practice, who are realizing in your action, in your speech, in your thoughts, in your intentions, the real value of the truth and of a human life—and are being part of the rare inhabitants of this planet who let the truth really shine through and light up the world for everyone else.

It's been a real honor for me to be able to share this time with each of you. And there's nobody here who isn't exhibiting that quality of deep purpose and commitment. Whether your little mind wants to let you believe it or not, it's really true.

So thank you all from the bottom of my heart.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 289

The Habit of Mettā

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this opening talk from a loving-kindness retreat, Carol Wilson addresses fundamental misconceptions about the nature of mettā (loving-kindness) and guides practitioners toward understanding unconditional love as distinct from both passionate attachment and passive sentimentality. She clarifies that true mettā springs from wisdom rather than delusion, enabling us to meet all experience—beautiful and difficult alike—with courageous, open-hearted presence.
>
> Wilson examines how our habitual patterns of grasping at pleasant experiences and pushing away unpleasant ones create an illusory sense of fragmentation and separation. Drawing on insights from Buddhist psychology and citing the poet Rumi, she explains that our deepest yearning for completion and connection is actually always accessible when we recognize that our sense of disconnection is created moment to moment through misperception. The practice of mettā helps us see through these thought-forms that obscure our natural radiance.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with difficulties that arise during meditation—physical pain, aversion, doubt, or restlessness—by turning loving-kindness toward these very experiences. Wilson emphasizes that when we fully connect with any aspect of our experience through mettā, we touch the interconnectedness of all life. She quotes Shantideva's teaching that genuine loving-kindness is as natural as feeding oneself, arising without expectation of return. The Dalai Lama's observation that compassion is the basic human quality reinforces this understanding that mettā is not something we acquire but rather our true home that we learn to recognize and trust.

I'd like to ask you, just as I begin the talk tonight, to take a moment to reflect quite deeply on what your purpose is in being here, what brought you to come to this retreat. And I mean really your deepest purpose, not the most superficial one that comes to mind—not "Well, I had nothing else to do for 10 days, and this was cheaper than Aruba." But really, in your heart, the deepest reason you come to attend a loving-kindness retreat.

And when we say in the instructions to wish yourself what is most true for your deepest happiness, what really comes up for you? What would that look like? Your deepest, most profound happiness. Your truest well-wishing for yourself. Don't be hesitant or shy—whatever it is, whatever form it takes in your mind or heart, don't be shy that somehow you don't deserve to experience that, or that it's for others but you're too blighted to be able to wish such happiness for yourself.

I feel sure in my heart that whatever words each one of us might use, on some level what we are all united in wishing or searching for is a sense of truth, of deep connectedness, unity, wisdom, love—whatever word you might want to use—inner completion. In a way, all beings are one, are interrelated in this as our most profound yearning. Although the explanations and words we give to it could be quite different depending on our own conditioning.

And why is it such a yearning? Because for many of us—I would never say all, but for many of us—what we actually experience at times, and maybe much of the time, is just the opposite: a sense of disconnection or fragmentation, separation and fear of other beings, yearning to be accepted, yearning to know love, to be loved, yearning to know how to truly love another being or to truly love ourselves, to accept and feel no longer fragmented within ourselves.

I think one of the roots of this dichotomy—that while we're yearning for completion we're experiencing fragmentation—is something that the loving-kindness practice can help us to see through and heal. At the core of our being, we don't really know or trust that we are already complete. Our sense of fragmentation is an illusion, brought about as a trick of our ideas, our interpretations, our misperceptions of ourselves, of others, of reality. Mettā can help us begin to see through these thought forms, see through these ideas we have about what happiness is, what peace is.

Mostly what we tend to do is to either look to someone or something outside of us to give us somehow love or happiness or peace. Somehow if we could arrange things in a certain way, then everything will be okay.

I read a couple of years ago in a news magazine a report on a particular Oprah Winfrey show where she had a group of five widowers—men who had been married and whose wives had died. She was doing a sort of takeoff on the movie Sleepless in Seattle, where a woman got together with a guy who was on a talk show saying how he was looking for his perfect mate. So Oprah Winfrey did a talk show with these five eligible widowers, and they had kids—you know, it makes them more reliable. They didn't get divorced; their wife died. It was sad, but you could trust that they really wanted to be married. She just kind of had this show introducing these guys. And in a week, she received 60,000 letters from people who were interested in getting together with any particular one of these five men.

It really hit me somehow. It resonated—our loneliness and our yearning that somehow that guy on the TV show is going to make it okay, is going to bring love, a sense of richness, of fulfillment. And it would bring richness, perhaps, but it's not going to bring total inner contentment. Yet we posit it out there somewhere.

Or we do the same thing internally. And most likely, it may have even come up today in your retreat—if not, it might sometime in the next ten days—where we think, "If only this particular state of my body would stay this way for the rest of the retreat, the sitting is comfortable, then I can really get cracking, then I can cultivate some loving-kindness. If only this noise would stop, this fly would go away. If only this sense of lightness and happiness would stay. If only I could arrange my pillows in a certain way." Then happiness would be accessible. Then I could get in touch with loving-kindness.

It's really just the same thing: waiting, looking internally, trying to arrange conditions; externally looking for confirmation, trying to arrange conditions. We don't even know what true happiness is. And I think this is one of the sources of our continual yearning and our failure to recognize the fact that true love, connectedness, feeling at home is from within and is always accessible to us.

So there are a couple of misunderstandings I wanted to speak to tonight. One is actually the nature of love—real love, unconditional love. And the second is how practicing mettā can help us see through our habit of seeming fragmentation. We'll be talking more and more about that through the whole retreat, of course, but let me say a little bit about the nature of mettā.

I know for myself, before I had really practiced loving kindness in depth—just little bits here and there—when I would think of what unconditional love must be, I found my ideas about it were really colored by what I grew up with in this culture. So boundless love, undiscriminating love, moving in all directions, touching all beings—I would imagine something really ecstatic and blissful, which sometimes it can be, really passionate, almost kind of blind.

I could see that this comes from what's been drilled into my mind and heart ever since I was little about the nature of love. True love, the great loves: "I would die if you leave me. I would do anything, anything, in order to have you with me." That kind of love. Romeo and Juliet—if we can't be together, then let's just both die; nothing else is worth living. This sense of real passion and love.

Obviously—maybe—I think it's obvious that this is love with attachment. Sometimes it isn't always so obvious to us. That's part of our problem.

A friend of mine pointed out to me a couple of years ago, and I looked it up tonight to be sure it's true, and it is, that passion actually comes from a Latin word that means to suffer. And of all the different English definitions of passion, only the one that means "ardent affection" was number five. The others all had to do with suffering. Ardent affection, affection with attachment, is also suffering. Only sometimes we forget to notice that. So that's not what loving kindness is.

Another misconception we might have is more on the softer, sentimental side—everything lovely and rosy. I couldn't remember the name of this movie; I just flashed on it tonight. These are really the stories of our culture—movies and TV and books. It was about two lovers, and I just remember this one scene: beautiful Mozart piano sonatas playing in the background, and they're romping through flower fields, and everything's hazy, and everything's beautiful. That's another way we sometimes think of love. Everything's nice, everything's roses, nothing unpleasant ever happens.

This is also not loving kindness. This is a really limited idea—kind of passive, no shadow allowed. I've spoken with many people who, in just hearing about loving kindness or reading a little about it or having it introduced very briefly in a retreat, feel that it's very passive, very one-sided and wimpy. It's just coloring everything, only looking at the bright side, not coming to grips with how things are.

This is also a misconception. This is not true at all. Because that would be springing from delusion. And metta, loving kindness, springs from wisdom—from knowing, seeing, experiencing ourselves, life, reality, as it is. That includes the beautiful, it includes the difficult, it includes the whole show.

The heart that is imbued with loving kindness, that comes to recognize it, can be willing and open to connect with ourselves, to connect with others, to connect with all experience, even when that may be difficult. In fact, it's one of the most courageous and powerful acts of heart that we can do. There's nothing wimpy about loving kindness. Unconditional loving kindness, unconditional well-wishing.

At times it can feel very blissful, very broad, spacious, connected—but it's not always strong emotion. That's another misconception. Sometimes it's just very simple connection of friendliness, of caring, just the natural response of the heart to ourselves and other beings: just to connect, to be present.

There's a lovely saying from Shantideva, who was a great Buddhist teacher of India—I'm not sure exactly when, around 900 A.D., something like that. And this to me embodies the simplicity of loving kindness: "Even when I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises. It's just like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return."

Just the spontaneous movement of heart, of mind. Loving kindness is just like having fed myself—no big deal. It doesn't even arise to think of something in return. It's just the natural response of acceptance and connection to whatever is arising in ourselves, in our hearts, and in another being in their hearts, without judgment.

Loving kindness does not make difficulties or unpleasant situations vanish. I'm sorry to tell you if you thought that's what was going to happen in these ten days. I bet you found out already.

You think maybe tomorrow that'll start. It does not make difficulties vanish, but it softens our heart, it softens the mind so that we meet the difficulties with a willingness to connect rather than from our habitual reactive mind. So in this acceptance, this softness—this is the ground for discriminating wisdom to arise. Rather than a knee-jerk reaction of "I don't like this, get out of here," there's a real soft presence, and from that we can make an appropriate decision.

One of the examples the Buddha gives in his mettā-sutta discourse is that just as a mother loves her only child—that sense of a good mother who loves her only child. I know sometimes our culture doesn't quite grok that, but it's possible: that sense of unconditional love that would do whatever is for the good of the child, which sometimes means tough decisions. It's not necessarily wimpiness. Out of mettā, out of clear seeing of the non-reactive mind, true discriminating wisdom can arise. It's quite different from everything in that soft focus that needs to hold all difficulties at bay.
