So when I say the heart of mettā, the non-reactive, soft, open heart does not respond from habit—what habit of heart-mind am I referring to? That's the next thing I'd like to speak about, because it's this particular habit that fosters and keeps us locked in our pattern of fragmentation, of separation, of liking and disliking, of fear and loneliness. So how can mettā help us see this habit and also begin to see through it?

As I'm sure you've already seen today, and as you'll see more and more over the next ten days, as we continue this basically simple practice of cultivating loving-kindness—just saying some phrases, coming back to those phrases and a sense of ourselves and another being, our benefactor—it should be very straightforward. We're here with good intention. But somehow, the whole show of our experience—the beautiful, the atrocious, the boring, the whatever—it all manages to come springing up as we just quietly sit here trying to say four phrases.

And we get to discover, not only in the fact that all this stuff comes up, but in the way we spontaneously relate to it—we get to discover how we are either perpetuating our sense of separation and fragmentation or learning to see through it to the unity, the connection that's our real and natural home.

So first: how is this illusory perception, this interpretation, this idea of separation, of needing completion elsewhere, of needing love from some situation—how is this being created? Because it's created moment to moment. It's not a cloud sitting over our heads. It's just a moment-to-moment creation.

This is from John Donne, the English poet: "I throw myself down in my chamber and invite God and his angels hither. And when they are here, I neglect God and his angels for the noise of a fly, for the rattling of a coach, for the whining of a door."

Get a sense of what he means? With all our good intentions we sit down to invite loving-kindness in, but we'd much rather get all worked up over the buzzing of a fly. It might be a black fly. It might come and land on me. I'm allergic. I get these horrible welts. I can't just sit here and be fresh meat for these flies hour after hour. It's beyond human endurance. And we can go like that. How long can we go? Oh, yeah, right. All right. May I be happy. May I be peaceful. May I be free from difficulties.

Reflect on your various experiences today. Not big adventures, just the little things that have come up in your mind, in your experience as you're sitting, as you're walking, as you're eating, as you're doing the movement. All the times that there was a sense of ease or comfort, physical or mental, that the phrases were flowing—perhaps there was a sense of warmth and connection, or maybe we were just in a pleasant fantasy, but at least the hour passed quickly. Or the other times: the body's restless, irritable, jumping out of your skin. If you hear one more cough, you're just going to lose it. If you have to say this phrase one more time with your heart feeling like a stone, you're just going to scream. The stupidest practice you ever heard of.

How did we meet each of these experiences when they arose? Because this is really the crux of our experience—whether it's one of fragmentation, of difficulty, of separation, or whether it's one of connectedness, of loving-kindness, of presence.

The attitude of heart, of awareness, of attention that is mettā, that's loving-kindness—is also acceptance, patience. Both of these are aspects of loving-kindness. So in a moment of mettā, of patience, acceptance, a moment of pure awareness is very much the same as in the vipassanā practice, the mindfulness of what is. We would meet whatever was arising—happy feeling, pain in the knee, buzzing of the fly, feeling of mettā—whatever arises, we would meet with an open-hearted sense of presence without hesitating, without discriminating: this is good, this is bad, I like this, this can go. Just meeting what arises with presence, with openness, with a relaxed attentiveness.

In that sense of full presence with open acceptance, there is no fragmentation in that moment. There's just what is. And whether what is is pleasant or unpleasant doesn't really matter.

In that moment, we're experiencing our wholeness, our unity. That sense of presence, of acceptance, of open-hearted connection, of friendliness—that is metta in that moment. And I'm sure you've all had moments, perhaps many of them, even today, where that was your experience.

But without paying attention, our habitual response tends toward fragmentation, confusion, separation. More habitually, if it's pleasant—the body's comfortable, things are going the way we think they should, we're feeling a nice warmth in the heart, the hour passes quickly—we think, "Ah, this is good. This is right. This is how it's supposed to be. I'm doing the practice correctly."

Then the next sitting, your knee is hurting, your back is itching, you're really irritable, you can't seem to keep your mind on the idea of metta or even remember the phrases, never mind bring your mind back to them. Do we meet that with the same open-hearted acceptance? Or is there some sense of, "No, definitely something's wrong. I'm not in sync. I'm not doing it correctly. It's a mistake. I've got to get rid of this pain, get rid of this fly, get rid of this mind, get rid of this thought—get rid of whatever—in order to get back to any possibility of cultivating loving-kindness, any possibility of happiness."

This is from Mark Epstein, a psychiatrist who's also been a Buddhist practitioner for many years. He wrote the book Thoughts Without a Thinker:

"My experience as a psychiatrist trained in Western medicine and in the philosophy and practice of Buddhism has given me a unique perspective. I've come to see that our problem is that we don't know what happiness is. We confuse it with a life uncluttered by feelings of anxiety, rage, doubt, and sadness."

If I wasn't really thinking about it, that would sound good to me—a life uncluttered by anxiety, rage, doubt, and sadness. I'd say, "Yeah, that sounds like happiness." But he continues: "Happiness is something entirely different. It is the ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning."

The ability to receive the pleasant without grasping and the unpleasant without condemning. This habit of our mind, of our heart, is so deeply embedded that half the time we don't even realize we're doing it, and we're evaluating our entire world through it. We want the pleasant to stay and the unpleasant to go away, and we evaluate all of life in that way. I'm not saying that the longer we practice we won't know the difference between pleasant and unpleasant. But this confusion, this deeply held reaction of pushing away the unpleasant and holding on to the pleasant, of thinking that if we can arrange our world—internally or externally—correctly...

When you really think about it, what are we looking for? On some level, and I keep finding it in myself in more and more subtle ways, I'm somehow buying into the idea that I'm eventually going to get it so that only pleasant things happen and nothing unpleasant comes up anymore. Forget it. There's no way, because that's complete delusion. That is not the way the world is.

This is one of the basic confusions on which we base our interpretation of who we are and what happiness is, and it keeps us looking in the wrong place. This confusion does not recognize the fact of impermanence—that everything changes, that pleasant comes and it goes, unpleasant comes and it goes. To think that we can make the pleasant stay is to completely ignore a basic fact of everything in our life. And to fear the unpleasant so much, to hate it so much, is also overlooking the fact that it's going to go too. It's simply in the nature of life that everything is evolving, that winter turns to summer. We're happy when that happens. Summer turns to winter—well, it has to happen. We don't really fight it so much, although I know every November I start to say, "Oh, this is depressing, it's starting too soon." How many years do we have to live before we really open to each phase of change?

It seems obvious if we look at the world that everything is in flux. The tides come and go, the moon waxes and wanes, our breath comes in and goes out. Life is all about expansion and contraction. There are times of health and times of sickness, times of birth and times of death. There are phases in my life when I look around and all I see—my mind is focused on the happy—couples getting married, people having babies, everyone flowering. And then there are other phases when I look around and I see couples breaking up, people getting sick, a lot of sadness. They're both there all the time, and in each of our lives we're going to experience this constant ebb and flow.

But somehow, deeply ingrained, there's a little seed of denial of this, a sense that somehow maybe I can lick it. We don't say it so crassly because it sounds ridiculous, but I keep finding myself, even in deep meditation, with this subtle sense of, "If I could just manipulate it a little bit, it would be more pleasant, thus better." And this is not freedom.

This sense of needing to push away the painful, the unpleasant, the difficult; this needing to pull in what is pleasant—this is exactly what keeps us feeling separate from ourselves, fragmented in our experience, fearful and separate from others, or needing others to validate us.

but simply boredom, sleepiness, or grief, or fear, or restlessness, or doubt, or any of the whole range of experience that comes up—none of it is actually, as we open our practice, an obstacle to happiness. It may seem an obstacle to happiness, it may seem an obstacle to practicing loving-kindness at first, but this is really what's revolutionary about our practice, about the non-discriminating, boundless quality of loving-kindness. Because when we're cultivating loving-kindness, it can meet anything with this open-hearted acceptance, this quality of patience, this quality of connectedness.

Oh, we may try to control even the weather. We may think there's something wrong when spring is so beautiful here but the black flies are so obnoxious one can hardly stand to walk outside. But that's just how it is.

I was in a cathedral town in Germany, and just this little vignette comes up in my heart a lot as a sense of holding both aspects of life and not trying to control it or just have it one way. It's Ulm, the town of Ulm. We were passing by a shop—a door with a big shop window on each side. We came to the first window, and it had all statues of the Madonna. It was a real Catholic town. "Oh, this is nice," I thought. "Sort of a spiritual icon shop." Then we passed the door and walked to the other window, and it was all beer steins and guns. I thought, "That's really interesting. Get it both in the same place." You don't have to experience a sense of separation about it. Well, that's how it is.

When we're not really getting it—that pleasant and unpleasant both are our life, and that we cannot control the change—when we're not really getting it, then the kind of happiness we're trying to build is really fragile. It's predicated on an impossibility, basically.

This fragile sense of happiness—you might know it. To bring it into retreat: if you're sitting and having kind of a peaceful, nice sitting, there can often arise a sense of, "I hope nothing happens. I hope that obsessive thought doesn't come back. I hope my knee doesn't start hurting. I hope they don't ring the bell yet—I'm just getting into it." Already it's gone, that peaceful happiness, because we're trying to hold on to it. It's so fragile.

Any happiness, any sense of peace, any sense of love that's predicated on conditions that can change is not true happiness. It's not unconditional loving-kindness. In true loving-kindness there is no fear of losing it, because it's so clear there's nothing to lose. True loving-kindness is that outflowing movement of well-wishing—like Shantideva said, it's like feeding myself. There's nothing to want.

And you can feel the difference. When this habit, this sense of just peaceful presence with what is, open-hearted acceptance, warmth, loving-kindness—there's no fear in that. There's no iota of "I need something back." And we can feel when it starts to shift. All of a sudden, "What if?" comes in. Or "Maybe..." Or "How can I keep it going?" And it's already subtly begun to shift.

That's okay. Because these habits of attraction, attachment to the pleasant, aversion, fear, pushing away the unpleasant—these are the habits that keep us confused. They also happen to be the near and far enemies of loving-kindness. Steve will talk more about it tomorrow; I'll just mention it.

We say "near enemy." The near enemy of loving-kindness is love with attachment. Near because we can confuse it. We think it's just loving-kindness—friendliness, warmth, outpouring, connection. And we might feel connected, but suddenly there's this little "I need," "I want," "What am I getting out of this?" that slips in. It can be very subtle. It's natural that it comes up when we're practicing loving-kindness. It's not a mistake.

And the reverse, the aversion, the not liking—that's the far enemy. Much more recognizable, obviously. It's clear when we're hating something, when we're pushing it away. In that moment, we're certainly not experiencing open-hearted acceptance. It's just the reverse.

But just because we might be caught, in a particular moment, in either the near enemy of wanting or desire or yearning, or the far enemy of "I hate this, I want this to go away, I can't wait for this to leave, it's a total obstacle to my practice"—or any of the whole range in between:

And so this is often when we feel that we're drifting away from being able to say the formal phrases—because irritation has come up, or pain in the knee has come up—and we feel split. Actually, this is also a moment when we can strengthen and cultivate a quality of loving-kindness that manifests as connection, patience, and acceptance.

I'll give a couple of examples. Say you're saying your phrases and pain in the knee comes. At first you can just notice, okay, that's painful. And you can come back and continue with the phrases in the sense of loving-kindness for yourself. There's no feeling of split. There's no problem. But after a while, the pain gets stronger and the mind says, "There's no way. What do you mean, 'may I be happy'? I'm sitting here in agony. I've got to do something to get rid of this." And you get this feeling of split. To say the phrases, say to your benefactor, just feels ridiculous at that point.

You can actually take the loving-kindness and turn it onto the experience, say, of the pain in the knee. In a way, you can take your attention, gently move it to the pain, and send the phrases to the pain. Now, at first this will feel like a gimmick. And it will be, because underneath will be: "If I really send loving-kindness to this pain, obviously it will soften and go away, because that's what loving-kindness does—it makes everything nice." So we'll try that for a while, and then we'll try all our other bargaining tools, and we'll say, "Well, this isn't working, forget this."

And then we'll begin to see that what's really the problem is the aversion. With loving-kindness you can then say, "Okay, this is aversion. Can I connect my attention with this too?" And when you really connect, simply allowing aversion to be present and feel it in your body, allowing the pain in the knee to be present and feel it in the body—that moment of connection, of kind acceptance, that is loving-kindness.

And you can tell when it happens because the feeling shifts from one of "May you be happy, may you be peaceful, may you go away" to... "Oh, yeah. Things are just as they are. And it hurts, but it's okay." There's this immediate sense of connectedness, of spaciousness, and there's no longer that sense of being in conflict or fragmented. It's really quite miraculous, even momentarily, to experience this.

Another example which happened to me recently is feeling very tired, heavy, physically uncomfortable, and aware of it—but not really meeting it fully with this open, full, connecting attention. Sort of, "Yeah, yeah, tired... may I be happy, may I be peaceful... I'm so tired... may I be happy, may I be peaceful." And finally turning around and going, "Okay, really feel tired," and meeting it with a fullness of loving attention, without judgment, without wanting to change it, without interpreting it in any way—simply being fully present.

That moment of connection changes everything from feeling tired, contracted, separated, disgruntled, to feeling tired but no longer contracted, disgruntled, or separated. It's like, "Oh yeah, right. This is just tiredness." That sense of connection then immediately moves—when I no longer feel fragmented because I'm denying a part of my own experience—immediately, without even thinking about it, the next thought moment was, "Wow, what a beautiful day this is." And then a smell of the lilacs, and then an appreciation of the sunshine, and then a feeling of tiredness.

The sense of the interconnectedness of all is again loving-kindness, both an expression of it and a result of that connection with just what is in a moment. And with loving-kindness, we only need to connect with totally one aspect of our experience in any moment to see that it spreads out and connects us with all.

John Muir said once—and this is from the Wall Street Journal, which I also thought was interesting—John Muir once said, "I find that if I touch anything, it's connected to everything else in the universe." It's very much like that in our loving-kindness practice in meeting the difficulties that arise in our experience here. When we truly touch anything—a knee pain, a feeling of happiness, a feeling of loving-kindness for the benefactor, our disgruntledness, our annoyance at the sound of a fly—when we truly touch it with fullness of presence, with loving-kindness, in that moment, for that moment, we're healed from our false sense of fragmentation.

That total presence, nothing left out of our experience, nothing that needs to be denied or hidden or kept away in order to be happy. When we're fully connected with ourselves through loving-kindness, we are fully connected with all life, with all beings. Any moment of full connection is our avenue into recognizing this interconnectedness, which is the truth of our life at all times.

And our journey together in these ten days—a great part of it is cultivating formally the heart space of loving-kindness so that we trust it, so that we recognize it more, so that we don't need to worry that it's fragile. It's stronger than anything else that our mind and heart can throw up at us, although we might not believe that yet. Because another part of our journey is to meet with this loving-kindness all the other stuff that the mind and heart does throw up at us. It's not only not a mistake—it has to happen in this way.

As the metta strengthens, as you continually develop your intention of loving-kindness with each phrase, with each mind moment of turning the heart to loving acceptance, each moment that metta strengthens, there's less fear, there's less need to keep the darkness, the shadow, that we fear away. And so, as a natural result of our loving-kindness practice deepening, all the other stuff starts to come up into the light.

It's not only not bad, but this is where we'll begin to really trust the power and depth of metta—that it really is our true home. Our fears, our self-hatreds, our fears of others, our grief—all these things are part of our field of experience. They all come and go, but we don't have to live there. We can really come to trust that metta cannot be distorted by anything that arises. In fact, meeting these difficulties will only strengthen our trust.

This is a poem from Rumi:

"This being human is a guest house, every morning a new arrival. A joy, a depression, a meanness, some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor. Welcome and entertain them all. Even if they're a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still treat each guest honorably. He may be clearing you out for some new delight. The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in. Be grateful for whoever comes because each has been sent as a guide from beyond."

I'm not saying that every moment we're going to manifest that attitude. But just to bear it in mind—this really is the attitude, the welcoming attitude of metta: that love is stronger than pain or fear or disturbance, and we don't need to be afraid of anything that arises in our experience. It may shake our concentration, we may waver for a while, but then when we can turn around and meet it with the gentle strength of acceptance, of patience, the connectedness of loving-kindness, we'll see that it really was a guest that perhaps is sweeping us clean for new delights. It's nothing we have to run from. It's nothing we have to shut out. The shutting out is the fragmentation. The shutting out is what blinds us to love and happiness. We don't need to do that anymore.

As the Dalai Lama said, he believes that little children are born free of any religion or ideology, but not free of compassion. He believes that compassion and love is the basic human quality. With our practice together—the concentration practice of metta and the willingness to see that everything else that arises is part of the path, that even the intention to be willing to greet our difficulties with love, even though we can't do it, we still might have that intention—this is beginning to really clear our hearts from our sense of being so isolated and allowing us to trust from our own experience much more deeply that love and compassion really is the basic human state.

The Buddha said often that the mind is naturally radiant and pure. All these other things that come really are guests, just as Rumi said. So what we're doing is learning to strengthen our recognition, our familiarity, our at-homeness with an aspect of this radiant purity—with loving-kindness, which is an expression of our completion, of our unity.

And it takes great courage to do this. Each one of you here, to meet everything that arises with this attitude, with this intention, to let stuff that we've been trying to shove down into the sewers for ages—maybe we don't even know we're doing that—to let it come up and try to greet it with warmth of heart takes incredible courage, patience, and real compassion for yourselves. So have a real sense of kindness toward yourself, because there'll be many times when we feel like loving-kindness is the furthest thing from our experience. "What am I doing here? Who am I kidding?" Let that doubt come and go. The fact that you're still here, the fact that you have this intention, is bearing fruit in a really beautiful way. We often can't tell in the middle of it. But really, ultimately, love and compassion is stronger than fear, or hatred, or anger, or self-judgment.

And what's even nicer is that it's contagious—that you'll all catch it from each other. When you're having a hard time, someone will walk by, and just the air of calmness, of peacefulness, elicits that same thing in us. It's really quite wonderful.

I just want to close with a little story that Daniel Goleman recounts in his book Emotional Intelligence about the contagiousness of our peace, of our love.

It was early in the Vietnam War, and an American platoon was hunkered down in some rice paddies in the heat of a firefight with the Viet Cong. Suddenly, a line of six monks started walking along the elevated berms that separated rice paddy from rice paddy—those little mounds you can walk along. Perfectly calm and poised, the monks walked directly toward the line of fire. And this is a quotation: "They didn't look right. They didn't look left. They walked straight through," recalls David Bush, one of the American soldiers. "It was really strange, because nobody shot at them."

And after they walked over the berm, suddenly all the fight was out of me. It just didn't feel like I wanted to do this anymore, at least not that day. It must have been that way for everybody, because everybody quit. We all just stopped fighting.

Metta, compassion—these are perhaps the most courageous and strong mental heart states that we can experience. And they are our true home. And they are contagious.

So let's all catch it from each other.

CHAPTER 290

Near and Far Enemies of Mettā

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that often arises during intensive loving-kindness retreats: how does mettā practice, which can initially seem dualistic, actually deepen our experiential understanding of selflessness? Drawing from her own journey—including initial skepticism about mettā as an "aversive type"—she reveals how the brahmavihāra practices and vipassanā represent two gateways to the same ultimate truth.
> Wilson examines the near enemy of mettā (attachment) and the far enemy (aversion) not as problems to eliminate, but as powerful teachers. She explains how in moments of pure loving-kindness, the "empty nature dawns nakedly"—there is no attachment, no aversion, just boundaryless, centerless awareness. Through vivid personal examples—from missing an elephant walk by while consumed by craving, to watching mettā for a friend slide into conditional attachment—she illuminates how craving creates tunnel vision and distorts perception, while aversion causes contraction and separation.
> The practical heart of the teaching emphasizes that every moment of sincere well-wishing, even without feeling results, cultivates pure intention and weakens habitual patterns of grasping and pushing away. Wilson shares how mettā practice has transformed her daily life, naturally arising to meet aversive reactions with spacious acceptance. She concludes with the inspiring words of Etty Hillesum, who maintained loving-kindness even in Auschwitz, pointing to our deepest human potential for freedom.

The question has come up a couple of times, at least that I'm aware of in this retreat, and it's one that I held myself when I first began doing intensive loving-kindness practice. The question is: how does this practice, which can seem somewhat dualistic or somewhat self-centered or "me and others" centered, deepen our understanding or our resting in the truth of selflessness, the truth of no separate self?

Some people have noticed how in the beginning it seems like we're cultivating a sense of "me" sending mettā to "you," and it can seem quite dualistic. Before I had practiced mettā intensively, I think I had a little bit of a bias against it for that reason—which was totally in my head, based on projection and not knowing what it's about, because you can only know by doing it. There was also the fact that mettā is a very helpful practice for a personality that has a tendency toward aversion. And for that reason, a personality with aversion tendencies doesn't really want to do mettā, because it's counter to what seems comfortable and normal and the natural way to be. I'll talk about that a little later.

But what I want to talk about tonight is one of the ways that I found, to my surprise and in quite a profound way, that the practice of loving-kindness as we're doing it here, very formally, is actually a manifestation of truth, of our true nature, of selflessness. It also deepens not our intellectual understanding but our experiential understanding of interconnection, of selflessness. Actually, they each lead into the other.

An Indian sage once said that to be on a wisdom path—which you could say Vipassana is—is to know. And the more that you know the truth, the more you love. To be a bhakti, being on a devotional path, is to choose the path of love. And the more that you love the truth, the more you know. I found for myself that this really rings true. Whichever form of practice I might be doing, whether it's insight practice or the Brahmavihāra practices, they are like two gateways that come around to the same ultimate truth. No surprise, really, since what's really true is what's true—any real practice is going to take us in that direction.

Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, who died recently, was a great Tibetan teacher. He said once that the supreme method to quickly become at home with the radiance of our true nature, the supreme method for quickly recognizing and coming to rest more easily in that radiance, is devotion and compassion. And that's really what we're practicing here: devotion as mettā, and compassion, which we'll move into as karuṇā.

You could explore in your own experience a moment when your heart or mind really does feel overwhelmed or filled up with this love, this devotion—not to a particular being necessarily, but just the boundaryless energy of loving-kindness. If in that moment we were to look inwardly, to bring in mindfulness to explore or learn to recognize what it is that we're experiencing, we would really see—this is again from Tulku Urgyen—our radiant nature, much like the image that Michelle used the other night of the sun unobscured by clouds. It can often feel like this in a moment of mettā: just this beaming radiance, this joyful energy. And in that moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly.

What does that mean? In the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly. What's different? How is that moment somehow different from other moments when you don't feel this boundless love? What is it that's different?

If you look carefully, one of the things you'll notice is that in that moment of purity, of boundless love, of compassion, of the empty nature dawning, there is absolutely no attachment and no aversion present in the heart or mind. I want to emphasize tonight that I'm really talking moment to moment, because moment to moment we can all experience these things. If we envision that it has to be endless moments of love streaming out in the empty nature, then we all say, "Well, forget it, I don't know that experience." We're talking about one moment here of loving-kindness arising. That is an experience all of us can have. And I don't care who you are—in our daily life too, it's an experience we can all have. What we can do here is begin to explore more what that's about.

So when we say the empty nature—no attachment, no aversion, boundaryless, centerless—whoever it is, it might be me sending mettā to my benefactor, in that moment of boundless love there's not so much thinking about "me" sending something "there." There's a kind of centerless, boundaryless experience. And when we say it's the empty nature, empty doesn't mean dead or dull or blacked out, nothing happening. Empty of separate self. Empty of separation. But it could also be talked about as fullness, as a sense of inner completion, where absolutely nothing is lacking and absolutely nothing needs to be pushed away or shut out of the experience to make it better. In fact, the concept of something lacking or needing to be pushed away doesn't even occur, because it's so obvious in that moment that it's just all there is. It's perfection. Whatever word you want to use—just simple completion. The radiant nature of who we really are.

In Vipassana practice, one of the ways that we come to this understanding of our radiant nature, of the transcendence of being caught in attachment and aversion, is really by looking at the nature of arising experience. For example, really noticing the impermanence of all things that arise; the suffering nature, because things change, because we get attached to things that change, and nothing is wholly satisfying; and again, the selfless nature.

In looking at these aspects of our arising experience—whether it's the breath or emotions or a sound or a relationship or anything—the bonds of attachment and aversion, the suffering of those, become more obvious, and they gradually begin to loosen their grip. A little bit, a little bit, a little at a time.

In working with the brahmavihara practice, I find it comes to the same understanding from a different route. It comes not so much through the suffering route—you might be surprised to hear that after these few days, that this isn't really a suffering practice. Compared to Vipassana, though, it isn't. We'll check in again after ten days. Whereas Vipassana kind of goes into suffering, this slightly moves away, eventually.

But in a way, with metta or any of the other brahmaviharas, we're coming to discern and really strengthen in the wisdom, in the intuitive wisdom of non-attachment, of selflessness, of no separate self, through experiencing over and over and learning to trust that experience of these boundless states of heart and mind. So rather than looking at and seeing the unsatisfactory nature of everything through metta, we're actually experiencing a state of heart that approaches—that is—boundless in itself. It's a manifestation. Metta, karuna, all the brahmaviharas are manifestations of the wisdom of no separate self, of selflessness. Because true metta cannot arise if we're clinging to any particular need one has for oneself. If you're clinging to any sense of separation in that moment, true metta doesn't quite arise.

So we're coming to more deeply experience the truth of selflessness through experiencing a happiness of metta, of the other brahmaviharas—a happiness that comes from living in this truth of selflessness, from living from our radiant, pure nature. And we experience every little moment of metta, even if we don't consciously recognize it. It's like we're tasting a happiness that is much deeper and much more fulfilling than the happiness of getting what we want, or managing to have only pleasant experience, getting rid of what we don't want.

And that's why metta becomes such a happy practice. It doesn't mean only pleasant things happen. It means we're beginning to learn how to recognize, cultivate, and rest more and more in a happiness that is much deeper and much more fulfilling than our ordinary happiness that comes from attachment and aversion. Until we experience something that is more arising from wisdom, we think getting what we want is really the highest happiness.

So in cultivating the loving-kindness practice and saying all these things, this really arises out of one's own experience in a very moment-to-moment way, where we not only get more and more in touch with these boundless qualities of heart and mind—and in the beginning it sounds like, "Oh yes, boundless, oh yes, metta-filled," as if they're really kind of talking in hyperbole, a bit of an exaggeration, but it sounds nice—but actually it's not an exaggeration at all. We're trying to describe accurately an experience that is much stronger than anything we might have imagined, but at the same time more simple and direct. It's not about living in ecstatic bliss all the time. It's much more a kind of moment-to-moment connecting and friendliness.

So one way that I find the practice of loving-kindness strengthened and really began to build a stronger confidence in the truth of selflessness is, as I've described, resting in these boundless states. But another way surprised me even more, because I really did have this bias that only Vipassana gives wisdom and metta is really nice and these states are really nice, but it's not going to really strengthen my understanding in any way.

What it did do, though, and continues to do in my daily life, has helped me see through much more profoundly than I had before the so-called obstacles to loving-kindness—which happen to be exactly the things that keep us from recognizing our intrinsic radiant nature: the so-called near and far enemy, attachment and aversion. And as you've noticed, they come up a lot in this loving-kindness practice. Rather than that being a problem, it became quite liberating—not exactly the word I want, but a really profound teacher. Because in the way that they came up, and in the way that the metta begins to strengthen to meet these qualities of attachment and aversion and also to open up and disclose their nature more clearly, I learned an awful lot about them. And the metta also begins to become stronger than attachment and aversion, than these habits of mind. It's really been a wonderful practice, and it's had effects in daily life much more than I had expected—and again, on a much more simple level.

So I want to talk a little bit about how in this practice we can begin to recognize and use and explore when these near and far—I want to use "obstacles" instead of "enemy," since enemy definitely has a bit of a connotation of aversion to it, and we don't want to cultivate aversion to aversion. Not so helpful.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Indian wise man, said once: "The obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain." It's really true. These are the two obstacles that, when we're caught in them—when we're caught in desire for pleasure, when we're involved in fear of pain—it's those very activities of looking for pleasure and pushing away pain, the activities themselves, that keep us blind, that keep us from recognizing our inner completion, our potential for happiness here and now.

And so it's really a wonderful gift that they're brought up so strongly on a retreat like this, and that they're brought up in a metta space that actually allows us to meet them more fully and with more friendliness.

So I want to talk a little bit about each one of these, starting with the near obstacle of love with attachment—or simply lust, desire, attachment. And I want to talk about these pretty much as we can experience them arising moment to moment. This is not meant to be theoretical, but as something that we can experience as we sit and walk and pay attention. And in a way, it's a sort of Dharma 101—this is the basic gist of any dharma understanding: the suffering that comes from desire and aversion, that these are the two main things that get in our way of experiencing freedom.

So love with attachment, desire, lust, or a more subtle sense of clinging is basically looking outside of ourselves, looking outside of the totality of present moment experience, looking for something else to somehow bring us completion, fulfillment, happiness. I mean, that's so obvious, but that's really what we're doing over and over. And as I've said, the great revelation of loving-kindness is that that completion and happiness we're looking for is already here, always, and only right here. The more we experience metta, the more we might come to trust that—to see that we have a home that is complete, that can bring us happiness right here, right now, in this moment. Nothing needs to be added.

The real mystery is why, even if we just taste that for an instant—in that moment it's so obvious—why in the next moment are we again yearning and looking outside, somehow trying to complete ourselves again? It slips away so easily, and again we're in that desire, that subtle yearning, not realizing that it's the desire itself, the wanting, the needing itself, that's blinding us to the potential for completion and peace right now.

So when this comes up in your experience here—I'll talk about it on a more gross level first, and then on the subtle levels of how metta shades into attachment—but when it comes up and you realize you're in some kind of clinging, some kind of attachment, don't hate it. Let the softness of metta allow you to move toward it and explore it. What is the experience of clinging or attachment in a moment of your experience?

The first thing I think it's really important to remember—it's obvious but we forget—is that the clinging is arising about something that's happening right now. It arises when a pleasant experience comes up. Maybe there's a pleasant feeling in your body, or a pleasant sound, or a pleasant sight. Maybe there's a pleasant emotion like metta. Maybe there's a thought or a memory that comes up and feels pleasant. Any of these things arise in this moment—a pleasant memory, anticipation of something pleasant when you leave here. And without noticing that pleasant experience now, the mind, the heart, the energy all sort of flow toward that pleasant experience.

Without recognizing it, you think, "Oh, when I leave here, I'm going to go and do this and see this person. I'm going to be so loving. I'm going to go patch up this quarrel." We get into the whole story without realizing that it's all a reaction to a pleasant thought arising in this moment. If we can even recognize that—oh, right, fantasizing is pleasant—and just stay with feeling the pleasantness, that's fine. Nothing wrong with that. But we tend not to notice that and fly off into getting really involved in how to get more of the pleasant thing, how to keep it going, what we're going to do about it. We get all into the story.

The second aspect is to recognize when clinging or attachment is present, whether or not you recognize what it's attached to, but that it's happening now. Look and see what's the nature of your experience in that moment. How does attachment function? Because one of the misrepresentations of attachment or desire is that without really looking at it carefully, it has a sort of connotation of pleasure with it. We keep getting into that pleasant fantasy because somehow that pleasant feeling is enjoyable. We can almost associate the wanting itself with a kind of pleasure. So it's really helpful to come back and look at what's happening when there's a moment of attachment going on in your mind. It's not evil, but it isn't really all that it's cracked up to be if we stop and look at it.

In a moment of getting lost in wanting, or wanting to hold on to something pleasant that's here, the first thing it does is create a kind of tunnel vision. Have you noticed that? If you want something, the mind gets completely moved toward that, focused on that, and everything else you either don't notice or it's in the way. It's amazing how much we cannot notice when the mind is gripped in craving.

This winter I was in Thailand, and there was a little vignette that illustrated how strong craving's tunnel vision can be. I was standing on a narrow little road through a small town. There was traffic—some bicycles, motorbikes, cars—just one lane, kind of dirt, with stores on either side and a lot of people. Fairly busy. I was standing just close to the side of the road. I can't remember what I was looking for, but I suddenly had to look into my passport pouch. I think I was looking to make sure I had my traveler's checks or something. I was totally consumed: I've got to see this, I've got to do this right now.

Traffic was going by, and suddenly something caught the corner of my eye. About as far as from me to that wall, an elephant was walking by, driven by two little boys who didn't look like they really had it under control. The elephant had passed me and I didn't even notice it until it had gone all the way past me—and it was in my field of vision from the front. I was so engrossed with looking for whatever I was looking for.

When I looked at it, I mean, it's huge. The vibrations of it are amazing. I don't know how I could have missed it. And it was scary too, because he was veering from one side of the street to the other, and there wasn't really anywhere to go, so I just kind of jumped out of the way. But I thought, wow, when you talk about the elephant in the middle of the room that you don't see, it's really possible.

So clinging and attachment can really give us tunnel vision like that, and it does it in subtle ways all the time.

Another thing it does is distort our idea or perception of the thing we're attached to or craving. You know when you first have a crush on somebody and there's that real surge—there's love, but there's definitely attachment. It's as if they're the most incredible being you ever ran into on the planet. How wonderful they are. And if that's a crush that doesn't really mature into anything, six months later you run into that person and you go, "What was that all about?" You can't even connect with all the incredible qualities that the mind of craving had projected onto them. This is how craving distorts. The thing craved becomes so incredible.

So check it out—the wonderful, beautiful fantasies that are coming up of what you're going to do the first day you leave here. Go ahead and do them, and check out if the pleasure that comes from those activities comes anywhere close to the projected incredible nature of those activities now. Maybe it will. In all my years—twenty-five years of practice—I've never had a time where what I thought I was going to do was remotely as pleasurable as I imagined it to be. Other things might have been better, more pleasurable, but the projection of craving really distorts.

And the last thing I want to say about craving, which is somewhat obvious, is that as soon as there is attachment or craving, there's separation.

Because obviously, as soon as there's craving, there's a sense of incompleteness. And our essential peace is shattered—not by the lack of that thing, but by the perceived need for it, by that movement of leaning out, of craving itself. Explore this whenever any kind of attachment or craving comes up.

Another simple example: recently I was on a night flight to Germany or somewhere, and I boarded the plane and was sitting in my seat waiting while people boarded. I can never sleep sitting up on a plane—only if I ever happen to get the whole row to lie down, which hardly ever happens anymore. I was sitting on the aisle, on the edge of the middle row, and it was getting near the end of boarding time. I was quite happy just sitting there, very at peace. Then I suddenly noticed, "Oh, nobody's sat in these rows yet, and there's not that much more time."

My peace was totally shattered—from just sitting there quite at ease, I got really tight, really fretful. Instead of being able to just read my book, every person who came in, I tightened and watched where they went. They went past, and aversion would come up. Every person who entered the plane was my enemy. It was so unpleasant.

I managed to notice how unpleasant it was at the time, which is a great victory for mindfulness, because we often don't even catch what's going on. I just sat there, and even noticing it didn't help—I couldn't go back to my former state of peace. I was locked into "Maybe I'll get to lie down. Wouldn't that be great?" I did get to lie down, actually, so that was a nice end to the story. But just to see how the lying down wasn't that important, to have one's peace shattered like that for nothing—just a thought arising in the mind and this clinging to it, and so much suffering dependent on it.

Well, that's how much fun it is to be lost in attachment or craving or clinging. But it's such a strong habit when pleasant experience arises. I'm not saying this to make us hate it or think it's bad. Luckily, when we're practicing metta, it allows craving to come up into the light, and we can recognize it and work with it in a much softer, more accepting way.

On the gross level, like I just described with the plane, that's not masquerading as metta. You would not call that form of attachment the near enemy of metta. It's got nothing to do with metta—it's just craving, plain and simple. But on a more subtle level, and this will come up a lot in retreat, there's just plain craving. The mind's sick of the phrases, sick of sitting here, so something will come up to crave that seems to offer peace, and we get fooled by that over and over again.

But another, more subtle way that craving comes up in a metta retreat is in the form where attachment is masquerading as metta. It's a little more difficult to see because they're closer together. We don't often notice it at first, which is okay, because we begin to notice it after a while.

They're similar in that metta and attachment both follow very closely on pleasant experience. We don't usually get attached to really unpleasant experiences—although there are ways we can, but I don't want to go into that. Usually both attachment and metta follow on very pleasant experiences. The pleasantness of attachment, though, has conditions. And so while the pleasantness of attachment can seem to simulate metta for a while, it has conditions, and when we hit the limit of those conditions, suddenly the pleasure's gone out of it, and we begin to suffer. Metta can easily slide into this form of attachment because they're both so associated with pleasantness.

A very simple example: I was on a self-retreat last year in a beautifully landscaped place in South Africa, and on one of the walks they had huge iris bushes lining both sides of the path. I'd been there quite a while, and occasionally there'd be one or two irises on a bush. But one day, after a lot of rain, I came out early in the morning. The sun was just coming up, and all the bushes were filled with these beautiful, delicate, little whitish-lavender iris flowers. It was breathtaking.

I had just a moment of real awe and appreciation, that upswelling of love and connectedness to nature and the world. That's metta too—it doesn't always have to be directed to a person. It was lovely: a feeling of real connection, pleasant appreciation, and just exquisite beingness for a few moments.

And then it suddenly started to shade. "This is really beautiful. I bet it won't be here tomorrow. I wonder if I could take a photo. I'd love for my mother to see this." Why? I don't know why my mother had to see that. But it started shading into "How can I hold on to this? It's so beautiful." Of course I could take a photo, but I don't have a camera.

How could I get a camera? Who do I know here that I could borrow a camera from? And the mind starts going. What had seemed like—what had been—a real metta experience, and what I still was thinking was pleasurable, was actually shading into attachment from the pleasant. And they feel similar.

Experientially, metta is a real outpouring, a real outflowing of energy. If you're feeling a sense of coming from me, it flows out towards and into whatever it is that the loving-kindness is connecting with. It flows into it, around it, surrounds it, completely meets it—but with no hesitation, with no discrimination, with no conditions. Just an outflowing connection.

Attachment can sort of feel like this. It starts with this outflowing, moving toward, but at some point it hardens. For me, I can feel a sense of contraction, or as if I've hit some kind of hard wall—but it's really a contraction, and somehow wanting to pull it back towards me. That's where the feeling of metta changes when it turns to attachment. But in the beginning, they can kind of masquerade as each other.

What's also interesting to see when the attachment begins to take hold is that it can feel like—it felt like—the attachment was to the image of the irises, wanting to perpetuate that. But if you look really closely, the attachment is more to the upwelling of pleasant feeling itself, just wanting to keep that pleasant feeling going. Looking at the irises was bringing an upwelling of pleasant feeling, and at some point clinging to that pleasant feeling came up: What can I do to keep having this sense or experience of seeing irises, seeing irises?

So that's how attachment can drift into metta as the near obstacle. Because metta itself, when we're experiencing it, is definitely a pleasant experience—extremely pleasant at times, which is great. We're not saying no pleasant experience should happen. But when there's real pleasant experience and then somehow our awareness drifts away a little bit, the mindfulness drops down, just a moment of not being quite deeply present with the metta and the pleasantness, without being present with the intention of wishing well—we can start to focus a little bit more on the pleasantness without realizing it, and subtly attachment starts to come in. How can I have more of this pleasantness? If the mind would be so clear as that, then it would be good—we'd know right away attachment was coming in. But it takes more sneaky turns, of course.

I know when I first noticed how this would happen, I was sending metta to a dear friend, just feeling the love. It was coming very easily, just flowing. And all of a sudden little thoughts would come in: I really haven't seen her much lately. It would really be nice to see her more because she's so wonderful—and may she be happy. How come she doesn't call me as much as she used to? It took a while, because it was subtle, to see that somehow we'd hit up against a condition, that somehow it was so pleasant sending her love that the mind wanted more pleasantness.

So it can be very tricky. It feels like metta, but it hits the condition. This is not bad or a problem. I actually came to think that it was really far out that this would happen. And I found it happened in this subtle way the most with the people I'm closest to, obviously, because with the people I'm closest to it's really easy to feel, at times, a really boundless well-wishing. It's so easy to wish them well. And of course it was so easy to drift into all the conditions because I do know them so well. The two are very closely linked.

That's why sometimes we say that choosing your mate, or someone you're very close to in that way, as the benefactor category or the dear friend is a little bit fraught with complications—because it'll merge over either into just wanting more input back, or into sexual attraction, or maybe into difficulty. But once we really get a feeling of what the metta is, I found it very enriching to play with moving into sending loving-kindness to my partner, or my mother, or my sister, or someone I'm very close to. It can get more complicated, but it got really interesting to see the difference when it shaded over into attachment. And after a while, what had seemed subtle became glaringly obvious.

With my partner, I could be imagining him in a situation, really sending loving-kindness, and suddenly the situation would slightly shift. What I'd been saying with all the love in my heart—I was saying exactly the same words, but the tone, you know, it had just come from underneath, and I was saying it in order to get a certain response back. And it's worlds apart once we tune into that difference.

You can experiment with this in your life too. I went home and would actually do this when we were having, not a hard discussion, but just in little situations where I'd want to say something. If I really connected with metta and said something like, "It's really hard for me when you don't wash the dishes," but I was connecting with metta—which meant I really wasn't wanting something back, I was communicating from this space of love—that would be felt. And if I said exactly the same thing, exactly the same thing, trying to fool myself that it was from the space of metta, but it was really from the space of, "You stupid jerk, why don't you clean up the dishes already?"—that's what was felt, even though the verbal communication was identical, and even though I was fooling myself.

So the chance to notice how we slide into the near obstacle here is a wonderful opportunity. It's not a mistake. It's not something wrong that's happening. It's a chance to see: Oh yeah, this is attachment. This is how it feels.

Let me stop, come back, reconnect with myself, with the being I'm sending loving-kindness to, reconnect with their wonderful qualities, reconnect with the feeling of metta itself, and to do this over and over and over.

Just a couple of other ways that attachment masquerades as metta in our practice, other ways it manifests, is as attachment to the practice itself. I think this is pretty common, where we get attached to the pleasantness of the metta feeling, and instead of just being able to sit back and offer the well-wishes with the purity of intention, completely letting go of wanting to get anything back, we say the phrases, we mean it, but the meaning should manifest by letting us feel the nice feeling of loving-kindness. And if we don't feel that nice feeling, there's a little sense of hitting up against a wall. It's really hard to just keep saying these well-wishing phrases and not get a nice feeling to go along with it. It's hard to trust that.

And when the nice feeling comes, it's quite easy, rather than just settling back and letting it move by itself, to grasp on, to push it along, to lean into the next moment. Or the same with concentration—to try and push into the phrases or try and get deeper, try and get more concentrated, but there's a wanting there, a leaning off balance.

Another way that attachment comes in is when we move out of the purity of our simple well-wishing and somehow get involved in wanting to effect change in the person we're sending metta to, which might be ourselves or someone else. Either wanting our metta to help them, or wanting our metta to make ourselves feel better—"if I send myself enough metta, I'll stop being such an aversive person"—or just some subtle way we're moving out of the simplicity of intention into attachment to results or affecting change.

If you notice this, it's very simple to reorient. You say, "Right, just come back. What does it mean, may I be free from danger? What does it mean, may you be healthy and strong?" Just the sincerity of that wish without trying to make it be so. That continual reorienting keeps us in the purity of intention, because that's all we're really cultivating—the purity of motivation. Whether the feeling comes, whether anyone else feels it or benefits, whether we change or anyone else changes, is totally outside of anything we can control or need to control. All we're doing with this practice is cultivating, moment by moment, a purity of intention of well-wishing to ourselves or to others.

What's so amazing is that the practice takes care of itself. Without our knowing how it works, it does itself, which is really nice. If we could just keep our fingers out of it and quit trying to manipulate it, it actually works very well.

Now I don't have so much time left for aversion. I did desire first this time because I usually get really into aversion. There's always time for aversion. Aversion is my friend.

Aversion doesn't really slip up as much as attachment—it's much more noticeable. The far enemy, rather than being similar to metta, is really quite the opposite on a moment-to-moment experiential level. So again, how do we experience aversion? It's always here and now. By aversion I'm talking about the whole range: just the subtle pulling away to anger, rage, fear, irritation. All of these are aversions.

Technically, in a moment of experience, the way aversion functions is just the opposite of craving. There's an unpleasant sense experience—maybe a physical experience, a smell, a sight, a sound. It might be an emotion, an unpleasant mental image, an unpleasant thought just passing through, arising in this moment. And in not noticing its unpleasant nature, or not realizing that by noticing it we don't have to give in to habit, the tendency of our heart-mind energy is to bounce back, shrink back, shut off and contract against that unpleasant experience. It might try to push it away by lashing out in anger, or it might contract as in fear. But in any case, the effect is one of pulling back, closing down, bouncing away from the experience. And it's always something happening right now, even if we're locked into feelings of hatred and anger about something that happened ten years ago.

Again, that moment of shrinking away, not being noticed, feeds on itself. That moment's unpleasant. Then the next thing arises—the same thought, "Yeah, and he said this ten years ago"—that's unpleasant. We're already in a contracted state, so we pull back a little stronger, contract a little more. It feeds on itself. You know how if you wake up in a bad mood, it just seems to go downhill from there until the slightest little thing can make you ready to scream, because it builds on itself.

But even if it's about something that happened ten years ago, we get lost again into the story, into the projection, into the imagination, into past or future. It's really only about thoughts, emotions, sensations, sense experience arising in this moment, because that's all there is. So if we're caught in "Oh, I can't believe he did this"—that's a thought arising right now. We can notice it. We can notice its unpleasant aspect. We can notice the flinching away. It doesn't have to build.

Now that's mindfulness practice. But sometimes when we're really getting lost, it's helpful to bring that inquiry in, to see: what is it that's arising now that's feeding this continual getting lost in aversion?

The result or effect of this flinching back is that because the attention isn't really meeting the experience, there's no way we can actually know or understand that experience clearly. We can't know something that we're not really meeting with fullness of being, with fullness of attention.

This is how metta works as just the opposite. An unpleasant experience can arise—say it's an unpleasant sound—and we shrink back. There's a moment of aversion. And that shrinking back is itself unpleasant, so that's another unpleasant experience. Then we bring in metta, just the simple feeling of metta: "May I be free from suffering." The experience of metta is just the opposite of that shrinking. The energetic feeling is that it flows out, into, around, surrounds, and meets that experience quite naturally, quite gently, but without any kind of discrimination or hesitation. Where instead of shrinking back, metta just opens up the field.

So what had been something we needed to hide from—and then we don't see clearly at all the whole situation—the metta lets us meet it in a very kind, gentle way. Then our whole perception of things expands, broadens. Before I had practiced metta a lot, being an aversive type as I said, one sees quite clearly. Aversion has a way of being quite discriminating and thinking it sees things clearly, which some things it does. But it can tend to think it's seeing everything that clearly, which it's not—especially the thing it's aversive to. Metta balances that out. It can include the aversion, it brings the energy fully into meeting the experience, and it broadens everything.

I'll give you an example of when I first noticed how the aversive mind works. Having an aversive tendency doesn't mean you're going around locked in rage all the time. We're just talking moment to moment. I was on a ferry in Thailand one year, and it was a beautiful day. Sunny, lovely, the water was calm, just sitting on this ferry with a lot of people. Basically, it was an extremely pleasant experience. But there was one person, a tourist, who was really making a spectacle of herself. Out of all the pleasant experience, my attention was consistently drawn to the one unpleasant thing, which it would then expand on. It would shrink back: "She's probably American. You can always tell Americans when they travel. It's embarrassing to be an American." And there weren't that many other Americans. "I'm sure they can all tell I'm American too." I would just keep being drawn back to this person.

I thought, "Ah. There is an abundance of pleasant experience here, and the habit of this particular mind is to fasten onto the aversive, keep shrinking back, and then just build on it until I'm really suffering enormously."

What the metta does—and after we've been practicing it intensively, you find what it does in daily life—is that without even thinking about it, it comes flowing in. It meets these things: "Oh, well, she's just sort of ignorant. It's too bad she's making a spectacle of herself. I hope she doesn't get into any trouble. And it's really a beautiful day." Where that would have sounded really false and hokey to me some years ago, this is now just quite a natural experience. The metta balances out the shrinking back of aversion, and it is a much more inclusive, clear-seeing state. It doesn't make that sense of separation —"the rest of us are okay, she's a loser." All of us are here together. She's acting like this, I'm acting like that. There's no judgment, and there's connection with the whole thing.

I find this happening over and over and over, not just on retreat but even more surprisingly, in my daily life. I think the reason for this is just that strengthening of intention that we are cultivating on the retreat here, even when you don't feel any particular result happening. Like talking to someone today who said, "For three days, nothing. You just do it, do it, do it, and nothing's happening. Dry, dead, awful." We all have that experience. Then you might do something to shift it, but the next day somehow it breaks open and we think, "Wow, how did that happen?" We want to pin it on maybe having taken a walk or having done something different. We just tend to write off those three days. Why?

We didn't feel anything. We expect immediate feedback. But every moment that we are consciously saying the wish—may I, may you, be happy and peaceful—that is a moment of pure intention. Even if you don't feel it, there's a purity of intention that even allows the mind and heart to say that. And it's also a moment where aversion is not being cultivated.

All those other moments—gee, I hate this, why can't it be better, why are they acting like that—all those moments of aversion are being strengthened and cultivated, and that habit is getting into a stronger groove. Every moment that you sit here and really say, "May you be happy and peaceful"—I don't feel a thing—"May you be happy and peaceful"—what's the use of this?—"May you be happy and peaceful"—every moment that you're saying that, that is a moment of pure intention.

And it seems like magic when all of a sudden it comes shooting out in our life. But it will, because it's just the law of things that intention is really the seed of karma. We're cultivating that in a very powerful way here. And sure, we'd like to have the dessert. We'd like to feel really wonderful all the time, and we'll have moments of that. But I would guess that even if you don't feel ecstatic all the time here, you might find that this has a much more powerful effect than you would expect in your daily life. On a much more simple level, just balancing out the feelings of attachment and aversion that create the sense of separation, finding that the power of metta just naturally flows out of our heart and we're again connected.

I really do find this happening a lot, which is a revelation for someone who's used to the mind just saying, "That's no good, that's no good, that's no good, this is okay." Because that's no good. Well, you know what? It's fine. And this is fine. I'll be somewhere and my mind will start judging: "Ah, the people in the dining room are so annoying. How can people be like that when I'm on retreat?" And the next thought that comes is, "Isn't it wonderful that all these people are here with such sincere intention?" And then my mind goes, "Who said that?" But it's true. And that connection is really there.

After you begin to trust this a little, there'll be times when it doesn't come quite so spontaneously, but you can remember that it's possible and simply say, "Oh, may I be happy." And you know what? That feeling of outflowing acceptance comes up. It's really amazing. And in many ways, it's much more simple than we would expect.

The Buddha said that what the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that the mind will naturally incline. So what we're doing is just helping the mind and heart naturally incline towards the connection of loving-kindness, and later of compassion and the other brahma-viharas. Think of all the time we've spent inclining to attachment and aversion. It's a lot of time. So it might be heavy going here sometimes because the mind is strongly used to inclining to attachment and aversion. Of course a lot of it's going to come up.

But the power of metta is that we meet even the attachment and the aversion with the outflowing kindness of metta. Attachment and aversion don't have to be enemies. And each time that we can do this, that inclination of heart towards loving-kindness, towards resting in our radiant nature, is strengthened. Now we don't get a little balance sheet so we know how far we've come, but you can really experience that in your lives.

And it is possible—I mean, there are rare beings who seem to be able to manifest such a power of this loving-kindness, even in situations that seem unbearable, and that's so inspiring to us. I think not because it seems impossible, but because somewhere in us we know that's really the truth. It's so inspiring to me to read about or meet someone who actually manifests that, because it touches in me the place that knows: yes, this is possible, not just for that person, but for me and for everybody.

So I just picked this one up tonight. I hadn't read this in a while. It's from a woman named Etty Hillesum. She was in the concentration camps during World War II. She died in Auschwitz. A young woman—these are her diaries. This is towards the end of her diary.

All I wanted to say is this: the misery here is quite terrible, and yet, late at night, when the day has slunk away into the depths behind me, I often walk with a spring in my step along the barbed wire, and then time and again it soars straight from my heart. I can't help it. That's just the way it is, like some elementary force—the feeling that life is glorious and magnificent, and that one day we shall be building a whole new world. Against every new outrage and every fresh horror, we shall put up one more piece of love and goodness, drawing strength from within ourselves. We may suffer, but we must not succumb. And if we should survive unhurt in body and soul, but above all in soul, without bitterness and without hatred, then we shall have a right to a say after the war.

Amazing. This is our potential.

So let's just sit together for a few moments.

CHAPTER 291

I'm Right, You're Wrong: Attachment to View

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this profound exploration of aversion (dosa), Carol Wilson examines how this root of suffering manifests across a wide spectrum of mental states—from subtle irritation and resistance to intense rage and terror. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that afflictions are abandoned not through willpower but through wise seeing, she guides practitioners toward making friends with these difficult experiences rather than fighting or suppressing them.
> Wilson illuminates how aversion arises from the fundamental misconception of separateness, explaining how the pulling back from unpleasant experience creates disconnection and perpetuates suffering. She offers practical guidance for working with aversion at the level of sense contact, noting how unpleasant vedanā (feeling tone) triggers reactive patterns before we're even aware of them. The talk addresses how cultural conditioning leads us to judge aversion as bad, making it harder to investigate openly.
> The teaching emphasizes that mindfulness must match the intensity of experience—from precise noting of subtle sensations to what Wilson humorously calls "stomping meditation" for overwhelming states. She shares the insight that recognizing aversion as an impersonal, conditioned tendency rather than a personal failing brings tremendous lightness and freedom. Whether we're dealing with physical discomfort, emotional pain, or the background irritation of ongoing unpleasant experience, diving into the wave rather than running from it reveals the gateway to liberation in each moment.

Or meeting aversion with wisdom and compassion—mostly our own aversion we'll be talking about.

Of course, of the three roots of suffering—greed, hatred, and delusion—the roots of suffering that arise in our own minds, aversion is probably the easiest to recognize as a source of suffering. I don't mean that we always recognize when it's present, but we recognize that it leads to suffering, especially when it's present in other people.

Lately I've just felt bombarded, as we are sometimes, by periods where you hear of suffering in friends, the amount of hatred and wars and terrorism going on in the world. And realizing that we can't hold ourselves separate from that. When we begin to practice, to look inside our own experience with compassion and honesty, of course we see at times the same roots of suffering—of anger, of fear, of terror—in ourselves. This should actually be an awakening experience, something that we meet with compassion and gratitude to see. I feel that deeply.

But often the amount of suffering that we see in the world from aggression, from fear, rebounds onto how we meet the experience of our own fear and aggression and aversion. We think: "It's really bad. It shouldn't be happening." Or "I'm really bad. I shouldn't be happening." Or "You're really bad for making me feel this way. You shouldn't be happening." Or in fact, "None of this is happening and everything's fine." All the gradations of that just keep us in an endless cycle of not really opening to what is happening in the moment.

This makes it hard for us to really make friends with all the experiences of aversion, which to me has been one of the most freeing aspects of my practice in the last few years—making friends with aversion. And as with all friends, we don't always like them. But we are willing to be present and open with them and see what's really going on.

We can't hold aversion away by an act of will. I'm sure some of you have tried: "I will no longer get upset at this situation. It doesn't bother me." And it doesn't work.

The Buddha said—and I think this is a really important remark—that our afflictions, really our roots of suffering, are abandoned neither through speech nor through the body by actions, but only through wise seeing. So we can't decide through an act of will, "I will no longer get angry. I will no longer feel afraid." We can restrain our actions in speech, and that's a good thing. We don't want to denigrate the importance of that. But that's not freedom. It leads to freedom, because the restraint of acting allows us the space to really use our wise attention to explore what's going on in this experience that we call aversion.

I'd like to investigate together, starting tonight, and depending on how it goes this might continue into next week—I could talk a long time about aversion—to investigate, to bring wise attention and interest to this aspect of the deluded mind.

Now, aversion is a word in English that covers a wide range of mental states, states of mind and heart. Let me give you some examples: ill will, irritation, boredom, resistance, denial, impatience, annoyance, anger, rage, guilt, depression, sorrow, dislike, self-hatred, self-judgment, regret, violence, aggression, cruelty, fear, anxiety, terror, holding a grudge.

What was your reaction to hearing all of that? It's like, "Oh God, give me a break." Already, all of our conditioning—partly cultural and partly personal—around the whole experience that we package up and call aversion can easily begin to seep in as soon as we even recognize some form of dislike or rage or annoyance or fear or self-judgment or whatever is present.

So I think to begin with, it's really important if we can hold this investigation—now and in your practice—of these various mental states in the frame of the non-deluded heart and mind. Not from the framework of "I'm such a bad person, I've got to uproot this, they're disgusting," but rather from the framework of: How does this state of heart and mind function to obscure the radiance of our pure nature? It's not that they're horrible. It's that these states actually function in a way that obscures our basic purity, the innate wakefulness of mind.

The image that's always given is of clouds covering the sun, and we spend our time fighting the clouds. So we can begin to investigate the clouds from the framework of knowing they're transitory visitors, rather than from the framework of thinking this isn't a transitory visitor—this is really my true nature finally coming out in the light of awareness. It feels like that sometimes, doesn't it? The more I look, the more anger and fear I see. And if I look more, I'm afraid I'm going to hit the bottomless well.

Remember, Nyoshul Khenpo, a wonderful Tibetan teacher, says that the way that conventional meditation practices work, one of the main ways they work, is to uncover our innate wisdom and purity by recognizing the obscurations that hide our innate wisdom and purity—recognizing these obscurations for the changing, insubstantial appearances that they are. And once we recognize something, in a moment, as a changing, insubstantial appearance, it no longer needs to block this innate purity. What's always been here can be revealed. This is on a moment-to-moment basis.

So not holding aversion as personal. I know this is hard sometimes to believe, but it's just arising due to ignorance present in a moment and fed by conditions, as is everything else. We can begin to look at it from this perspective—the ignorance of not knowing in a moment things as they are, thinking that somehow I am separate from experience. And so this unpleasant experience that's arising, I can hold myself separate from it, either through aversion or through fear or through anger. We don't think that so clearly, but that's the sense of delusion that aversion arises from.

Joko Beck says, "Our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate." It certainly looks as though we're separate. I feel separate from you. It looks that way. And as long as we think we're separate, we're going to suffer, because we feel we have to defend ourselves, we feel we have to find something out there in the world to make us happy. Aversion arises from this misconception that if I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant experience that's happening right now, I can be happy. And just like desire—how the desire itself sends us on the cycle of suffering—so too does the aversion, the fear, the pulling away. It actually elicits a sense of disconnection and continues and strengthens the disconnection, because the more we pull back, the more disconnected we feel. We think, "Oh good, I'm getting away from this. This is making me feel disconnected." We pull back more, we feel more disconnected, and it just starts a whole cycle.

Before I want to go into the details of how we actually notice in a moment the experience of aversion, I want to mention that each of us might recognize the strength of whatever cultural or personal biases or beliefs we bring to the experiences of the whole range of aversion—of anger, dislike, fear, boredom. As I said, mostly unpleasant things we tend to consider as bad or wrong. Most forms of aversion are quite unpleasant, so they're bad or wrong. And societally, culturally too, because the expressions of anger and fear are so harmful, it's quite easy—without even realizing—to hold the belief that if we're really a spiritual person, we wouldn't be experiencing this anger, this fear, this murderous rage over such a petty thing as somebody breathing loud or opening a window. And then we're really disgusted at ourselves, and we can't just bring an open-hearted investigation to the experience. So there's the societal or cultural assumption we might bring, that aversion is bad.

Coupled with this, you know, the energy sometimes of anger is really kind of cool. There's a way that when we really are angry and it's so clear it's the other person's fault, it's a lot harder to just look at the anger. It's so much more fulfilling to really cruise on, "I can't believe how incredibly insensitive..." or "I feel really compassionate for that poor fool, but somehow..." We cruise on the anger, or we deny it altogether, or we suppress it. And of course, we all know how that explodes.

I heard something on the news the other day—sort of a combination of pretending we don't have anger or negative feelings, but at the same time using them in a way. They were talking about a new cosmetic treatment for wrinkles that both men and women are using. It's a facial injection, temporary, called Botox, which stands for botulism toxin. Believe it or not, people are injecting—and if you don't know from English, botulism is a food poisoning that's deadly. People are injecting botulism toxin in their face. What it does is temporarily paralyze some of the muscles. This is serious. It started just for wrinkles, for cosmetic reasons, but they found out a really good side effect is that the muscles it paralyzes are the ones that let you frown. So when you've had one of these injections, you can't really frown. High-powered lawyers and bankers and stockbrokers are taking these shots—I swear, I heard this on the radio—so they can go into high-powered meetings and their face won't give away what they're feeling if they're frowning or upset. This is our culture. We are products of this culture. So we have to take our conditioning seriously. We do it to ourselves in a way.

Our freedom rests not in suppression or denial or acting out in order to really allow the feelings, but in bringing an open-hearted, mindful awareness to just what is happening right now, whether it's just a little annoyance or you feel swept away in rage and fear. Presence here and now is the point of freedom.

So just to begin by looking at what is going on in the moment of arising aversion, in any of those forms. It's so amazing to me—it's what I love about this practice of moment-to-moment awareness—that even the hugest patterns of our mind can be discovered in how we're relating in a moment. So starting from a moment and then expanding it.

When aversion in any form arises, it's arising as a state of mind and heart in this moment, as a response or reaction to one of the six sense experiences that's arising in this moment. Whether it's sight, sound, taste, smell, bodily feeling, or the sixth sense—the mind, a thought, another emotion—one of those arising in this moment that we experience as unpleasant, probably without really noticing the unpleasantness, maybe without even quite noticing that whole sense contact altogether.

We experience unpleasantness without real awareness, and the natural response, the conditioned response for most people in the world in a moment of unpleasantness, of dukkha, is pulling back. It's natural. We're not bad because that happens. It's just natural. That pulling back is the movement of subtle aversion.

And again, just as Michelle was talking about in the dependent origination, that moment of noticing—contact, feeling, craving; contact, feeling, aversion—it can be the case that if the sense contact is mild enough and our awareness is strong enough, and both those happen at the same time, then in noticing contact and unpleasantness, the pulling back doesn't go anywhere. It's just that.

But what often happens is in that pulling back, we don't quite notice it. And it's as if, instead of awareness connecting with what's happening, there's a little gap. Just a little gap. And into that little gap can rush all the furies. It almost doesn't matter how mundane the particular unpleasant experience might be or how really intense. In that unseen pulling back, it can go into murderous rage or total self-judgment or terror. But it's all an effect of just the continual pulling away from experience, cringing back without noticing it.

Even fury or terror at a memory of something that really happened ten years ago is still a response, a reaction to that thought arising in this moment. To me, when I remember this, it's really helpful because I know that since the initial impetus for the strength of the aversive reaction is arising in the moment, so too that's the place that I can rest with mindfulness. At least that's the place I can try to enter with mindfulness—rather than try and figure out what's going on, to bring awareness into my present moment sensory experience, any of the six senses, and see if I can just notice what's happening.

Now, it's not always easy, I acknowledge that, because it goes so fast from a subtle pulling away to a really big story. Just the sound—I'm very sensitive to cold—just the sound, if I'm sitting in a room in the winter, of somebody opening the window. That's already an interpretation; it was just hearing. And the pulling back, and the aversion, and the thought: "Now I'm going to be freezing." Just into the whole cycle of them and me and my past. Finally, if I bring my awareness to the moment, there's just hearing. Unpleasant. Or I'm really cold. There's goosebumps. But I just bring my experience to that. It's, "Oh, cold feeling. Unpleasant."

Without bringing the awareness into the experience, I can go back and relive the past ten years and the next one hour and really get worked up. And as you know, it can really go on for a long time if we don't think to bring the mindfulness to meet what's happening at the point of contact.

This is the first ally, the first form of presence—to see if we can bring awareness to what's happening right now on the sense contact level. What's the unpleasant experience that's fueling this? It's always our way back into clarity, strength, and awakeness.

It's not always that easy. If we don't notice right away, as the disconnection increases, as the mind begins to spin, we start being aversive not to the original contact but to the experience of anger or fear or annoyance itself, which we experience as unpleasant. So then we begin to pull back from the second level of experience—from the aversion, the fear, the annoyance itself—and we pull back and that gets stronger, and we pull back and that gets stronger.

If we have no awareness at all, that's the point where we say something or do something or strike out, often reacting by this point to something that's not even happening anymore. We don't even know what started the cycle. We're responding to somebody who's walking so slowly and mindfully that it's driving us crazy, and they're going through the door slowly—and that's not what triggered it at all. But we don't know that anymore.

Dan Goleman, in his book Emotional Intelligence, describes various scientific psychological tests that showed that the physical reaction of anger, the physical effects of anger, lingers much longer in our experience than the mental effects. This is actually in line with what the Buddha said. He said one time, if you must identify with some part of your experience, it makes more sense to identify with the body because that doesn't change nearly as quickly as the mind. He wasn't advocating identification with the body. He was just pointing out how quickly the mind changes.

And we can see this. In a way, Sayadaw U Pandita used to call it the physical residue of anger. It feels like black ash, just dark ash lingering in our body. And the mind could have moved on and be quite okay. But there's still this physical agitation, and so the next unpleasant thing that arises doesn't need to be nearly as strong for our reaction to get kind of amped up. If there's some ongoing unpleasant experience, even as it goes away mentally, we're still with the physical residue.

If we haven't noticed that, we get into a real cycle. Have you noticed sometimes you think you're really managing your aversion, the anger, the annoyance, the fear—think it's sort of under control—and then some little thing happens and you just go over the edge? You think, "What? Why? I've been on top of it all day." But sometimes we don't quite notice that physical residue.

A friend told me a story that was kind of funny. He was at some public place like Disneyland or Universal Studios, standing in line at a fast food place to get a soda. He had to wait and wait and wait. The man in front of him was getting more and more agitated and impatient at having to wait for his coffee. By the time he got to the clerk, he was really agitated and, I guess, unfriendly. So my friend, in the spirit of helping, tried to say something soothing to this man. You know how well that goes over in your own experience. Of course, the guy got really agitated, got his coffee, stared at my friend, and stomped out of the place.

My friend got his Coke or whatever and was walking out. Just as he came out, he saw across the whole wide area of these little tables—where you'd stand and drink your coffee—the man that had been in front of him. He was just standing there looking calm. But just seeing my friend walk out, he got so agitated again that he spilled his coffee. Just that sight got all that aversion going again.

So it's easy to bring mindfulness into the point of sense contact when it's a small thing, when it hasn't had a lot of time to expand. But a lot of the time it's going to expand. And still, what's really important is to be willing to bring our awareness into the experience—the physical-mental gestalt of the mental state of aversion or fear or whatever it is—however we're experiencing it in that moment.

A friend of mine, she's sitting here actually, told me a really great image. She describes how she has two grown sons who, whenever they go to Hawaii or someplace where there's really big surf, are always trying to explain to her how the safest way, when a huge wave comes, is to turn around and dive into it. She says, "I know intellectually that's the place of ease, of safety, but I just can't do it. So I see the wave coming and I always turn around and run, and it clobbers me."

It's the same with difficult, aversive, fearful experiences. We want to run from the aversion. We want to run from the whole experience. And that's actually what lets the wave get bigger and bigger and bigger. The place of freedom is if we can remember to just turn around and dive in. What is going on with this wave?

It's not always easy. She said once she's been able to do it. We'll be able to do it more than that when we start to learn that we don't have to be afraid of the aversion or afraid of the fear. Sometimes it's so big that we think by diving in there's no mindfulness at all. At first you can dive in and just be with the sensations. How is fear manifesting? Name and note the sensations in your body. Notice the waves in the mind. The same with aversion, the same with anger.

A lot of times, the fear in a retreat situation is, "I'll lose my mindfulness. If I really go into this, I'm just indulging, I'm just wallowing, I'm just dwelling, and it's bad karma, so it's better if I don't." It's another way we have of thinking, "I'm creating bad karma, so it's better not to feel this." Instead, it comes from behind and knocks us over.

It can get to the point where it really feels like there's no mindfulness at all. But still, you can just let your awareness get so big that you're simply feeling and letting the waves of energy—of anger or fear—move through you.

I know for myself, I've developed what I call stomping meditation. It's hard to sit when it's that strong. I remember one time I was on retreat here when I was a manager, and we would get two or three days to sit. Very cherished, because it was hard to make the time. I began one of my little cherished three-day blocks of sitting, and somebody, who should have known better, came to me at the beginning with some big problem, something they wanted me to do during my retreat. And I got so...

I was furious to have my retreat interrupted by someone who should have known better. And I would sit with it and become more and more convinced: I'm really right. They should have known better. It really was wrong of them. I got so angry that sitting there, noting "anger, anger, anger, anger" – a lot of times, that's what people seem to think it's like to be mindful of anger. You sit: anger, anger, anger, anger. Burning, burning, burning, burning. And when it's not like that, you come and say, "You know, I'm just getting lost in it." Hey, sometimes it's really big. The mindfulness just has to get that big too. It's not going to be refined. It's not going to be precise. Sometimes you just can't sit – the energy is so big.

What I noticed with this particular time is that I was indulging. Now, indulging doesn't mean feeling the anger. It means indulging in how right I was, how justified the anger was. But I watched myself indulging, and I noticed that the more I kept on that train – I'd feel it in my stomach, all the agitation, then get into the story of "Yeah, he was really wrong, yeah, that's really..." – this sense of letting it happen but feeding it got it stronger and stronger and stronger. That's where I really learned that expressing anger isn't necessarily the key to ending it. In this case, it was the key to keeping it going for as long as I cared to.

Until it finally got to the point where I developed stomping meditation. I went way out where no one would see me and literally stomped up and down, internally yelling, "Anger! Anger! Anger!" That was as precise as I could get. But it was good enough – feeling it, really just letting that energy rip through the body, not trying to contain it, not trying to be precise. That's also mindfulness, you know. Mindfulness comes in many forms, from very micro-precise to really, really big – just knowing what's happening with a clear, open-hearted attention.

So you might stomp for a minute, you might stomp for an hour. It doesn't matter. At some point, of course, it begins to shift and I came a little bit more into balance, seeing what was going on. That's just as valid as being able to bring mindfulness right into that point of sense contact and unpleasantness. It's just matching the quality of mindfulness to the quality of experience – diving into it, no matter how little or big it is, without being afraid.

Now sometimes the experience of aversion, whether it's in the fear mode or in the annoyance, irritation, and anger mode – the source of it isn't always so obvious. And still, it can be a really strong experience throughout the day. Have you ever noticed when you go through a whole day, or what feels like an eternity, and suddenly you realize there's been a background mood – basically of total irritation with everybody and everything – the whole day, and somehow you didn't notice it? Which, of course, once we notice it, we wonder: How could I not? And you can't really pinpoint it at that moment.

But I've discovered that still, quite often when you notice that, not always but often, if you again dive into your mental-physical experience in the moment, there's some relatively subtle and not even that unpleasant experience happening – but sort of a repetitive experience that we don't quite let in, or we don't quite let in the unpleasantness in a clear way.

For example, I've noticed in my daily life, when I'm physically tired – and this isn't that subtle, but it took me a while to notice it – when I'm really physically tired, it's unpleasant. My body feels unpleasant when I bring my attention to it. So of course our first line of reaction is, "Well, then don't bring your attention to it, you know?" So I don't bring my attention to it, but it's still physically unpleasant. And by not bringing my attention to it, there's this little, almost constant aversion going on, which then manifests as a negative reaction to the people around me, or to what somebody says, or to something that normally wouldn't bother me. I'm really aversive. And it's not actually to what's out there. I need to turn around and notice: Oh, yeah, I'm tired. The body's hurting. Oh, that's what's going on.

Once, a couple of years ago, I gave that example and a friend said that he started paying attention after that. He noticed that all day he'd been feeling a little off, and at the end of the day he realized: Oh, my clothes are a little too tight. Just a little thing, you know, that we don't notice. If we were to notice it, it's like, "Oh, okay, unpleasant. No big deal." Or – and this is a little apt at the moment – some sound, like an ongoing, monotonous, grinding whine.

Lasting most of the day. And we start by bringing our attention to it, saying, "Well, that's okay. It's not so bad. That's enough of it already—I don't need to pay attention to it anymore." In, out, rising, falling, aversion to aversion to aversion. But we can just come back and notice: oh, yeah, monotonous grinding whine, unpleasant. Don't be afraid to keep turning into the experience and being there. We don't have to be afraid of unpleasant experience. Moving in is the point of liberation. You may get down on your knees and thank those guys by the end of this retreat, because it was your point of liberation. It could be.

I'm not trying to make light of it—it's definitely, for most of us, extremely difficult to be able, or even willing, or to believe that it's worthwhile to rest with ease, fully and openheartedly, in the midst of a difficult or unpleasant experience. All our training has been otherwise. So whether it's an unpleasant sound, or our clothes are too tight, or the body is tired—or whether it's really strong and unpleasant, a huge rage, a huge terror, some memory that elicits something really powerful—the whole range, it is difficult to trust enough that I can rest at ease in the midst of this.

Or as Joko Beck says, can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and the unpleasantness? Not to make the confusion and the unpleasantness go away. Just a willingness to say, "This too—this is the truth of this moment." Whether it's the initial sense contact or a whole reaction doesn't matter. Just to rest at the moment we can recognize that confusion or unpleasantness is present. You don't have to analyze it all the way back to the beginning. Can I find, for a moment, the willingness to rest here? That's the gateway to freedom in this moment.

It really doesn't matter. You don't have to be filled with bliss to open to truth, to open to emptiness, to open to compassion. Believe me, a moment of aversion can really serve us. You can welcome your moments of aversion. It does help to bring a little lightheartedness to it.

For me, when I began to recognize that the aversive tendency of mind is just a conditioned reaction and not take it so personally, it brought such a lightness and spaciousness that aversion isn't any more difficult as an experience. I don't judge it more than I judge greed, or sleepiness, or happiness—if I'm awake. It's really possible.

I remember the first time, years ago, when we would play the Buddhist parlor game of "Are you a greedy type, an aversive type, or a deluded type?" I'm not going to go into much detail, but we all experience all of it, believe me. Some minds simply have more of a tendency for aversion to be the reactive response. Some tend more towards greed. Some tend more towards delusion. The first time someone said to me, "Oh, you're clearly an aversive type"—which had never occurred to me—out of my mouth, without a thought: "Oh, I don't like that." And I thought, oh, maybe there's something to it.

It was years later when I really began to notice, without any judgment of it, that the way this mind is conditioned really is that if I scan a room or scan a situation, the mind is just drawn to whatever is unpleasant. It's just what it does. And I don't have to take that personally. It doesn't mean I'm a hateful, angry person. It just means this mind is going to scan the territory for what it doesn't like.

If I can just keep my mouth shut for thirty seconds and know that anything new anyone presents—like in a meeting, if someone says, "What about this idea?"—my mind immediately goes, "No, that's no good," for ten different reasons. If I can just notice my mind do that, let it do that, then it automatically broadens. Oh yeah, there are some good aspects to that. Oh yeah, that's beautiful over there. It's not a complete cutting off of beauty; it's just the tendency. And it's no worse and no better than the conditioning of mind that always goes to the beautiful and gets attached. It's just different conditioning.

In fact, I've been finding it quite humorous. It just isn't personal. We don't have to take it on as a statement of who we are. Once I really started noticing that, it just cracks me up a lot of the time. And as soon as it cracks me up, it's not personal anymore. The mind opens up, and I can look at a situation with more balance, whether it's internal or external.

I mention this because it's a way of trying to bring some wisdom and some compassion into your experiences of aversion, in whatever mode they arise.

And if you're taking it as really personal, that balance isn't going to be possible in that moment. In a moment when we're really identified with aversion—whether it's fear or whether it's anger, it doesn't really matter—you'll start to notice that the mental state of aversion itself actually colors our perception of what's happening. Have you noticed that? When you're angry at someone, they look really ugly. When you're in love with someone, they're so beautiful.

This effect is especially increased by concentration. When your concentration is balanced with mindfulness, great. But sometimes concentration can get really strong and the mindfulness—the knowing what's happening—slips away. Aversion might, for example, slip in there. So you're really concentrated and a sound goes off, and it feels like a gunshot went off next to your ear, and you react as if that's what happened. You don't even really know what the sound was.

Or more often, the aversion is projected outward in a way so that we perceive and experience, particularly with other people, how they look or what they do or what they say. This is one of the reasons we ask you not to write each other notes during retreat. You think you're coming from real clarity, and actually streams of aversion are going through it. We just don't see it.

A woman told me—it's really a perfect illustration of how this works—someone who, by her own admission, experiences aversion as a reaction to situations quite frequently. She was describing how it worked: she would notice a person come in looking really down, frowning when he looked at her, and she would just get triggered into waves of anger, aversion, reactivity to this person, building up the whole story.

She's been a really sincere practitioner of mindfulness, genuinely wanting to look at this stuff, not just suffer in it. So she would begin to dive into the wave rather than just riding it—rather than following the thoughts of "What's the matter with them? What have I done that they're so angry with me?" She learned to ride the wave of her own experience and really begin to see that the initial trigger, the initial unpleasant sensation, was the sight of the frown, and that was unpleasant.

But what was really keeping the whole cycle spinning, as she brought her attention into her own experience, was that the frown actually triggered her own feelings of worthlessness, inadequacy, not being loved, loneliness—the whole litany. That is actually a much more unpleasant feeling than the sight of the frown, but not recognizing that this is what's keeping the whole cycle of aversion and anger going. It's not the guy frowning. It's the feelings of her own inadequacy and fear that are unpleasant.

As soon as she recognized that, that's the place of freedom. Then it was so clear. She said, "That guy—he wasn't even looking at me when he was frowning. He wasn't even thinking about me. It was something he brought in with him. He had a fight with his wife." It was just so clear that from her own feelings of inadequacy and shame and worthlessness, she'd projected a whole story out onto the world.

The point of freedom is always diving in. And often we'll see that the trigger really isn't the same sense contact we thought it was, but something actually much more difficult to be with—yet much more freeing once we face it. So: what's happening now?

Mark Epstein says, "It's our fear at experiencing ourselves directly that creates suffering."

Let me read you a story from Michael Crichton. This is a true story. He's talking about his own traveling experiences. He was on a safari with his wife in Africa, where you hire a guide and sleep in tents and go all around taking pictures of animals. They were in their tent one night, and just before they camped, he'd said to the guide, "I'm a little afraid of elephants." The guide said, "Don't be. There are no elephants for miles. There haven't been. Don't worry about it."

So in the middle of the night, he and his wife both woke up startled—huge noise, crashing, banging outside the tent. He said he was just lying there paralyzed, thinking, "Oh my God, it's an elephant, it's an elephant," totally frozen. Finally it just got so bad he couldn't stand it anymore. So he picked up his flashlight.

Unzipped the tent flap, shone out the flashlight, and it shone right—he said—on a huge brown eye. And he said, "Oh, it's an elephant." At that point, he said, he zipped up his tent flap, lay back down, and went right to sleep.

The next morning, he was reflecting on it. And this is the interesting part—his reflection. He said, how was it that I was so hysterical? And as soon as I saw what it really was, I just went to sleep. At first, he thought it was something peculiar to himself. But then he realized we're all that way. We can work ourselves into a hysterical panic over possibilities that we won't look at. What if I have cancer? What if my job is at risk? What if my kids are on drugs? What if I'm getting bald? What if there's an elephant outside my tent?

And the hysteria goes away the instant we are willing to hear the answer—even if the answer is what we feared all along. Yes, you have cancer, but now you know what's happening. Yes, your kids are on drugs. Yes, there's an elephant outside your tent. Now the question becomes, what are you going to do about it? The subsequent emotions may not be pleasant, but the hysteria stops. Hysteria accompanies an unwillingness to look at what is really going on. It actually promotes the unwillingness to look. So whether the hysteria is fear or anger, it actually keeps us from looking at what's really going on. We feel we are afraid to look, when actually it is not looking that keeps us afraid. The minute we look, we can cease being afraid.

That's really a great summation of the power of mindfulness: it's not looking that keeps us afraid.

I do want to acknowledge there are times with fear especially—or really strong anger—when the energy of it is so intense that we actually can't get mindfulness there at all. It's way beyond. There are times for that. We'll talk about this in other talks, but sometimes the thing to do is to back off altogether, to take some walks, to not try to keep focusing because the energy is just too strong. So just remember that this can be the case. But usually you've pushed yourself a lot to get there. So at the first feeling you have that maybe it's too strong, try diving in first. Because so often it's really the not looking that keeps us afraid.

Sometimes, talking so much about aversion or really opening to it as much as you have to in practice—because it's a lot of what comes up—it can feel like it's boomeranging. There are times when you come in and say, "I just feel like I'm a hundred times worse than I was when I started this practice, just filled with fear and aversion and negativity and whining and irritation and judgment." And it's just, as I said, really important to find ways not to take that personally and to know that we have to see it. It has to come up into our awareness. That's the first step of becoming free from the grip of fear, from unpleasantness and all the ways that we hide from unpleasant experience.

Not until we are completely liberated are we going to be going along with no grasping and no aversion. And if that's what you're holding as the way you judge yourself, please throw it out the window. Don't think that you're getting worse because you're seeing more difficult aspects. The power of mindfulness is that it gives us enough courage, it gives us the heart, it gives us the balance to be able to see the obscurations with more and more space. The seeing of them is the start of being free from them. Please don't let yourself get into some kind of endless regression—aversion to aversion, judging yourself and judging the practice and judging. Just wrap it up in one big ball of negativity and simply feel what's happening in your body. Quit trying to figure it out.

Another couple of more subtle ways aversion might manifest. One is as resistance. And I know for me sometimes this is quite hard to catch. It's easy when it's the two-year-old mind throwing a tantrum: "I can't, I don't want to do this and you're not going to make me. I will not come back to the breath. I will not walk slowly." That's obvious. But sometimes resistance is much more background until we notice it.

I was sitting last fall for quite some weeks, and I kept moving into this mental state that I was calling doubt. But I was doing mettā, and I would get into this state of, "Well, what good is sitting here sending mettā to everybody? I should be going out and doing something to ease suffering in the world." You know how the mind can get on that track.

I might as well just go home. Now, home for me is a five-minute walk through the woods. So to have the thought "I should just go home" a hundred times a day and not act on it was really interesting. And it would pass. It took me ages, it seemed, before I quit believing this whole story and recognized, "Oh, it's just the mental state of resistance." As soon as you notice it, it's really like the elephant in the room—but it's more subtle, more background.

Someone described resistance to me once as something so comfortable it was like wearing an old blanket for protection. I've noticed that in me, resistance is a way to keep things a little bit at a distance. You don't quite notice that's what's happening sometimes, but it keeps that sense of disconnection going.

One other way that aversion manifests—one we sometimes don't recognize—is as desire. Did you catch that in the little line Michelle read the other night from the sutta about the two darts? She read it, but I just want to emphasize this one piece. Remember, it was about when you have an unpleasant physical feeling, and the unawakened person then meets that by shooting another arrow into themselves: "I'm so bad for having this unpleasant physical feeling." Or it can be mental: "I'm feeling fear, and that really shows what a bad person I am"—another dart.

But this is the piece I want to emphasize: Someone who's untaught does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sense pleasures. So in that person, an underlying tendency—not even quite conscious—to lust after sense pleasures gets settled in, comes to underlie the mind.

Do you get a sense of that? It's like when there's something unpleasant, without realizing it, the pattern of mind that gets deeply conditioned is: the only thing I can do is go after something pleasant. And often we don't realize that this wave of desire—whether it's you suddenly going off in fantasy over and over and you can't figure out what's happening, or suddenly you're so hungry you've been going along fine and then you have three helpings at lunch and ten chocolate chip cookies and can't quite figure out what's going on. You're looking at craving, you're being really good, you're noting craving, you're noting desire. But sometimes you just need to open up, back up a little, and notice if there's maybe something unpleasant going on. Again, it could be some ongoing physical thing, or often some subtle unpleasant mental state we don't quite recognize. And that leads to just a wave of desire.

In my life, I've gotten to notice this. I'll be driving along somewhere, just going home, and suddenly it comes up: "I've got to go into town and get some cookies. I've got to get some ice cream." And it just feels like this physical impulse—I've got to do this, this hand reaching out. I've learned to recognize it because I'll be asking, "Why? I buy it and then I don't even eat it half the time." And I'll realize: I don't actually want that thing. It's the underlying tendency to avoid the unpleasant. So I'll just come back and ask, "What's going on?" Oh—I'm lonely. Okay. It's quite okay to be with loneliness. The ice cream really doesn't hide it anyway.

My first three-month retreat—I'm saying this so that you don't have to do it—I unfortunately had a car. Somewhere around November, I really didn't understand what was happening, but in retrospect I was filled with this emptiness, this loneliness. It seemed unbearable, mostly because I didn't notice what it was. I went into town. I got a really big bag of chocolate chip cookies. I went back to my room and quite mindfully ate about two-thirds of the bag—which, I don't normally do that. For me, that's really quite unusual behavior. It took me two-thirds of the bag to notice that the cookies were dropping past the empty place and not filling it up. It was a physical experience. Finally a light went on: "Oh. Okay, I guess I'll put these away and just feel this empty place."

Oh yes, loneliness. It's painful. It's scary. And it's okay. It's just what it is.

The opening to truth—however truth is presenting itself in this moment—is what frees our heart and mind from fear, from selfishness, from aversion. Only what's happening in this moment is our avenue to truth. It doesn't matter whether we like it. Awareness doesn't care whether experience is pleasant or unpleasant or neutral, whether we like it or don't like it, whether it seems spiritual or not.

Whatever is happening, if we can have the faith in ourselves, the confidence in the power of awareness, the power of mindfulness to meet what's happening—even if only for a brief moment—then something becomes possible. If we dive into the wave, there's the possibility to recognize, just for this moment, our innate purity. Rather than fighting with the clouds, rather than getting clobbered by the wave, we meet experience directly.

And if we don't recognize it? That doesn't matter, because there's the next moment. There's this moment. There's always only this moment.

When we begin to believe that we can make friends with all these aspects of aversion, that's the beginning of a way into a really deep connection with ourselves, with life, with recognition of freedom. We no longer need to fear the unpleasant or let our reaction to it continue to block our awareness of the radiance of truth, of our true nature.

CHAPTER 292

Working with Aversion

Carol Wilson · 1h05

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines dosa (aversion/hatred), one of the three root defilements, with characteristic honesty and humor. Rather than approaching aversion as an enemy to be conquered, she invites practitioners to investigate it as an obscuration of our essential peace—a conditioned response arising from the fundamental misconception of separation.
> Wilson maps the full spectrum of aversive states: irritation, boredom, resistance, impatience, anger, rage, guilt, fear, anxiety, self-judgment, and depression. She explains how aversion functions as a disconnection from present-moment experience, creating the very separation that causes our suffering. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "hate never yet dispelled hate," she explores how aversion distorts perception, impairs judgment, and can snowball through accumulated physiological and mental reactions.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's discussion of subtle resistance—that comfortable, familiar stance of holding ourselves slightly away from experience that we may not even recognize as aversion. She shares personal examples, including her tendency to avoid difficult conversations and how fear operates even in small daily choices. The talk offers practical approaches: meeting aversion with mindfulness at whatever level is accessible, deliberately balancing perception by noticing what is not wrong, practicing mettā (loving-kindness) beginning with oneself, and cultivating patience as genuine connection rather than mere endurance. Throughout, Wilson emphasizes that recognizing our Buddha nature—our essential peace unmarred by these passing states—is available in every moment.

Tonight I'd like to share some observations and have us investigate together one of the three main aspects or manifestations of the deluded mind. This particular manifestation is what in the Pali is called dosa, translated as hatred or our friend aversion—one, I am proud to say, of the few subjects on which I am an expert.

I think it's really important in speaking about this that the mood I'd like to hold is not one of "we hate aversion and we have to get rid of it," which is often the way we greet this particular visitor. Rather, I want to hold this exploration of this aspect of suffering, this aspect of the so-called deluded mind, in the context of our potential for freedom and peace. We can realize that aversion in all its many forms and grades is not who we are. It is not our personal possession, and it's not a sign of personal failure—that you're an evil person when you experience it. We need to really be able to recognize that it's simply an obscuration of our essential peace. In that way, rather than hating and fearing it, we can get interested in understanding: How does this manifest? How does it function to keep me deluded, to keep me lost in suffering, to distract me from essential peace?

Here is a brief list of some of the manifestations of dosa: aversion, ill will, irritation, boredom, resistance, denial, impatience, annoyance, anger, rage, guilt, dislike, hatred, depression, sorrow, regret, violence, aggression, cruelty, fear, anxiety, terror, self-judging, self-hatred—and anything else you can think of in your own experience.

I really want us to look at this with the intention to understand rather than to judge, because it's really very interesting. Aversion—and I'm going to use "aversion" instead of dosa as shorthand to cover all of these aspects—arises due to ignorance. A definition of ignorance is not knowing things in their true nature. A lot of times we think of ignorance as "I'm stupid, I can't do it right." But think of ignorance in a more open way: simply not knowing things in their true nature. This is actually why aversion arises in any moment.

Joko Beck says that our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate. And certainly it looks as though I am separate from other people and separate from all phenomenal existence. So as long as we think we're separate, we're going to suffer. We feel we have to defend ourselves. We feel we have to find something in the world that will make us happy.

Aversion, in whichever form, arises in a moment from this misconception that somehow I'm separate. If you look at it, whether it's aggression or fear, there's somehow the perception that I'm separate from this painful experience and somehow I can hold myself apart from it—that somehow we can get it out of here, and I'll just continue on my happy, merry, separate way. Except that we're miserable instead of happy and merry.

In the moment, aversion arises from this misconception of separation and also functions to strengthen it, because it pulls back from experience and in fact creates that very separation that is the cause of our suffering. And so it continues in this cycle: ignorance, confusion, aversion, separation, more ignorance, confusion, separation.

Thinking that ignorance is the cause of aversion, maybe we can hold our investigation of aversion in this attitude of interest. How does that work? How does it work to keep the cycle of suffering going? How does aversion function in a way that keeps this sense of separation feeling so real? How does it keep me distracted from resting at ease in whatever arises?

One of the famous quotations from the Buddha: "In this world, hate never yet dispelled hate. Only love dispels hate. This is the law, ancient and inexhaustible. You too shall pass away. Knowing this, how can you quarrel?"

I wonder, if you're really being in touch with yourselves, how does our heart or mind—or rather our conditioning—relate to this statement? "Only love dispels hate. We will pass away. Knowing this, how can you quarrel?"

When I really look, I can find mixed responses, and I start with this because I just want us to be aware of our conditioned views around anger, fear, aversion. When I hear this in one way, I think, "Oh, that's beautiful. That's wonderful. That's a really beautiful ideal and a great way to live." And then I come down to myself and go, "Possible? Forget it. It's really nice, but it doesn't seem too rooted in my experience of what is possible."

It's helpful to realize that the Buddha isn't given to making nice metaphors that aren't related to our experience. He's talking very literally here: that hate never dispels hate, that love is the strongest power. How can we, no matter what, hold on to annoyance with another? Can we even let that in as a possibility—that it's not just true for the Buddha, it's true for all of us at any particular moment?

Not to hold this up as an ideal that if I don't do this, therefore I'm bad, awful—we call this aversion, this particular form of thinking. Not to hold it up like that, but to open into our minds and hearts the possibility that for me too, in this moment, I might be able to recognize that.

And so with that in mind, we begin to explore our attitudes towards aversion, towards fear, towards pulling away.

In another place, the Buddha said that lust, hate, and delusion—think of hate—is a maker of measurement in the mind, meaning that hate imposes limitation upon the range and depth of the mind. Quite literally, the natural mind and heart is unbounded. So think about when we're caught in a moment of aversion in any form—the experience is quite distinctly one of constriction, one of separation. The sense of heart-mind unbounded is not there. Can we also let in the possibility that the heart and mind that is unbounded is actually our truest and natural state, not the constriction of fear and separation?

This certainly has not been the conditioning that I grew up with, or that I find prevalent in the world around us. I don't know about you. Where I grew up—I mean, actually kindness and generosity was the baseline of my family. It wasn't a horrible, violent family. But what I really learned, when I look back—because I see it with me now, I don't have to look too far back—is that discussions can start out amicably, but when it really comes down to the nitty-gritty and there's something I really want, the person who gets the loudest and the angriest wins and gets what they want. That kind of adage that there is in this culture: the squeaky wheel gets the grease. We see that happening all the time. Last year there was a book on the bestseller list called How to Argue and Win Every Time. It was on the bestseller list in the New York Times, and the subtext was "ways to win arguments at home and at work." That's really, you know, when it gets down to it—forget this nice loving-kindness stuff and get to the point.

And when someone does act, really, from a heart and mind unbounded, it's so inspiring to us. First, because unfortunately it's much rarer than "how to argue and win every time," but also I think it touches that place in us where we know this is really the truth. This is really a potential for us. And I think maybe that's why little news stories about such people can get national airplay—because in some way it's touching that place in all of us that knows love is really stronger than hatred.

I won't read this whole article. This was just in the paper this week. The gist of it is about a man who's in his thirties, and when he was ten, he was kidnapped by somebody and shot and left for dead. There was a grudge against his father. He lived, though the man didn't know it and abandoned him. This boy was found and survived, although he's blinded in one eye from the bullet. They never found who did it until recently, when the sheriff—the same police officer who was on the case then—was still working. He always had a suspicion who it was. And the person he thought it was turned up in a nursing home, really an old, decrepit man who was dying. In fact, I think he just died when this article came out. The police officer went and talked to this man, who was dying and lonely and completely miserable, and he admitted that he'd done it.

The man who was shot had completely forgiven this man already. And he became his only visitor at the nursing home. He would go and visit him every day until he died. This is just one thing he said—he was blinded in his eye, but he said he did not feel that he had been permanently traumatized, adding that he bore no ill will toward the man who had kidnapped him and left him to die. "It was not hard for me to show compassion given his circumstances," said Mr. Carrier, who is married, has two daughters, and until recently worked as a youth minister. "I moved on. This event did not haunt me all my life." And he goes on to say, "I'm glad he was able to put the past behind him." He went and really kept trying to help him know that he was forgiven. "I tried to let him know he had a friend."

It's just very touching. Very sweet. And this man's not making some big deal about it. He's just very matter-of-fact. That's our potential in any particular moment. We get plenty of moments here to work with it—that's one of the functions of a retreat.

So what I'd like to do for a few minutes is just talk about some of the ways that aversion arises in our experience here, just so we can recognize and begin to see how it functions, without prejudice, without thinking, "Oh God, the hated enemy"—just to explore it.

I think the first and most important thing to recognize is that in whatever form we're experiencing aversion—from very mild to very strong anger or terror—no matter what the content is, it is a mental state that is arising always, here and now, as a response to a present moment sense experience. In other words, either a sight, a sound, a thought or emotion, a physical feeling in the body, a taste, a smell—any of the six sense experiences—an unpleasant experience that's arising in this moment.

We're lost in fury at something that happened ten years ago or that might happen ten years from now. What's actually happening is a response of aversion to an unpleasant thought in this moment. I find that very helpful because it takes me out of getting lost in content and into being able to see what's happening right now that's causing this explosion of story.

Once we can recognize that—and of course it's easiest with little things, smaller versions, don't pick the biggest one in your day—see what happens when you can notice the sense experience arising, when you notice the response of aversion. What's actually going on? There's contact. Say there's an unpleasant sound. There's the sense contact, hearing, the unpleasant feeling, and the aversion is the mind, the attention, the energy as it were, flinching back, just ever so slightly, disconnecting from that particular sense door experience. It really, literally feels like a gap between attention and the particular object of experience. So it is actually a disconnection. That's why it feeds the sense of separation—because what it does is pull back from experience and not be able to connect.

And of course in that gap, which takes absolutely no time, this whole surge of associated thoughts, emotions, other sense experiences, memories, and reactions, fueled by the aversion, can just come flying up and the whole thing cycles into a much stronger experience.

A slight example: unpleasant sound, the window being opened. We look up and see an unpleasant sight, and immediately just thought—that sound, that's just like what my mother used to do. Every time I just got comfortable, she'd come in and throw open the window. She had no respect for what I was thinking, and that's really affected me my whole life. And then you have a glimpse of that person again, so there's another seeing contact, and then a wave of rage. What had just been an unpleasant sound, an unpleasant sight, gets completely blown up out of context. There's a whole story, a whole spilling of unpleasant experience. That particular person gets so categorized by our mind, they become the demon of the ages. And there is, at this point, no seeing clearly. There's no wisdom, there's no sense of just knowing what's happening. And it can go on, as I'm sure you know, for hours—something that was really quite minor in the beginning.

One moment of disconnection, and we don't notice that. Another moment of disconnection, and we don't notice it. And pretty soon, we can be really in rage or terror about something that isn't even happening, that maybe never happened, or that maybe will happen ten years from now. If this keeps going, I'll end up in whatever—if this is how I keep behaving—and on and on and on. Completely out of touch.

And if we don't recognize what's happening at some point, then the mental strength of this leads us to unskillful conduct. We say something, we do something, we write something. Here we don't do too much—the worst we do maybe is write a note, which can elicit a lot of pain. But out in the world we can do a lot more than that. All I'm saying is once we get out of touch, then we continue to respond, not being able to see clearly what's actually happening.

This is really where mindfulness is always our strongest protection. I'll keep coming back to mindfulness, but I'll talk more about the way aversion works. In that moment, at any point in that process, if you can remember: however strong this feeling of fear or aversion is, it's arising right now in response to an unpleasant, difficult experience right now. Can I bring my mindful attention in and connect either with that sense experience—the coolness of the air on your skin if it's from the open window, or the sound if it's that which is eliciting it, or the sight of a person if it's that sight that keeps triggering it—right to the sense door, or else come and feel the sensations in your body, just being with the unpleasant, the aversive feeling itself?

Because as soon as we're doing that, we're countering the disconnection of the aversion. Again, the heart, the mind, the attention is connected with present moment experience. That's the protection of mindfulness. In a moment of mindfulness, there's complete connection with what's happening. And in that moment, there's no room for greed or aversion to arise. There's just what there is. Coldness, unpleasant. Sound, unpleasant. Sensations, unpleasant. Thought, unpleasant.

Just there, what there is. In that moment, the mindfulness is a protection. It's always our ally. It can always be accessible. It doesn't have to be precise. But we must recognize any form of aversion as a disconnection and call on our ally of mindfulness to connect again in this moment. It only takes that moment to reconnect, no matter how far and how long we've been gone.

And I know it's not that simple. I mean, it's simple when we're aware of it. It's simple when it's a little thing. I know very well that a lot of the time it is far from being that simple. When I'm totally caught in fear, I can't simply reconnect—"Fear, fear, fear. Oh yes, fine, that's right." It doesn't work that easily. But that doesn't mean to give up on it.

In Daniel Goleman's book Emotional Intelligence, he has a section where he's talking about anger and aversion, citing several physiological studies. I don't have all the science precisely, but I can give the overview. When something unpleasant happens and brings up a reaction of anger in a person's mind, it has a corresponding physiological, physical response—which is hardly news to any of us. We didn't need a study to know that.

What these studies then showed, and this is also what the Buddha said, is that the experience of anger might pass fairly quickly from the mind. But the residue of the excitation in the body, of the hormones releasing, takes longer to fade from the body than the angry experience does from the mind. The Buddha also said this—that the mind changes so much more quickly than the body.

Because of that, and this is what we can experience here as part of how the yogi mind works, if we're triggered by anger, the aversive, difficult experience passes, but the body is still slightly reacting. Then another unpleasant thing happens, there's a reaction in the mind of anger, and physiological stimulation comes into the body. But the body is already still a little bit triggered, so the response is even more intensified.

By the time the cycle keeps going, you can think in your mind that unpleasant things have come and gone, that you got angry but you relaxed. And then all of a sudden, one little incident happens—what we call the straw that broke the camel's back—and we just explode in rage or fury. Sometimes we don't even know why. But it's because there's been this snowballing effect, so that by the end, a little unpleasant experience that we haven't been mindful of can really elicit a huge response.

A friend of mine was telling me a good example of this. He was at some sort of amusement park, Universal Studios in Hollywood I think. He went into a fast food place and was in line to get a Coke or something. The man ahead of him was really in a hurry and very impatient—you know that kind of feeling when you just have two minutes and you want to go have some fun again. The people were slow, the waitress was slow, and this guy was just really angry and impatient and hyped up. So my friend tried to say something very nice and soothing, which you know how well that goes over with a stranger. The guy got really, really aversive and angry at my friend, got his coffee or whatever, and stomped out.

Then my friend waited in line, got whatever he wanted, and after some minutes went back outside. The man was standing way across the area where you stand at those little tables and drink your coffee. He seemed like he'd sort of calmed down, but just the sight of my friend walking out the door so upset him that he got completely jangled and spilled his coffee. My friend could see this, and he thought, this is the kind of way that without awareness, aversion just builds on itself, and we find ourselves really reacting off the wall without knowing why.

So that's one way anger can build and get out of control. Another way I've noticed is that we can find ourselves at the end of the train of ongoing, building anger without realizing how we got there—incredibly negative, or suddenly in a long, vitriolic chain of self-judgment with really no idea how this arose.

I often find it helpful to step back and give a big picture, because what can happen is you could be having an ongoing, very mildly unpleasant experience. I've noticed when I'm physically tired, which can of course last all day, that when I tune into my body, it's very uncomfortable. There's pain, but it's very low grade. It doesn't call my attention unless I deliberately look at it.

But it's unpleasant. And so it can be arising many moments during the day, and when I don't notice it, when I'm just not aware of it, there's slight aversion, slight impatience, slight annoyance—that's so quiet I don't really know what's going on until suddenly I just turn around and snap at somebody. Or I sit down and notice that my mind is in a litany of everything horrible and selfish I've done since I was ten years old—I didn't go to this party with this friend of mine—really with hatred. And I think, "Whoa, what is going on?"

When I look, I see: oh, my body hurts. It's just mildly unpleasant. But the ongoing nature and the unseen quality of it can lead to a whole mood of actually a lot of unpleasant aversion or fear. As soon as I notice it, recognize it, land the attention—"Oh yeah, tiredness, tiredness, tiredness, unpleasant"—it's just that. It doesn't have to lead into this whole taking us away. But again, it means the willingness, the ability to connect with what is unpleasant.

So that means the wisdom to know that ultimately we are not separate. If somehow there's still the underlying belief that I can really be separate from this unpleasant experience, then we'll keep trying all the manipulation to make that happen. So really what it takes is a seeing of: all right, unpleasant. It's just what's happening. And in that can be the freedom from getting so lost in the aversion.

And then, of course, there are the times when whatever's unpleasant is going on is far less genteel, and the response is definitely not one of just noticing subtle sense experience arising and passing. You can still bring in mindfulness—just don't worry about being too precise.

I noticed this some years ago. I was beginning a few days' retreat when I was manager here. It's really hard when you're working here, when I was managing, to even get three days in a row to sit, even though you're supposed to have five a month. It was very hard to do that. It had been two or three months and I was really holding on to my three days.

And someone—we won't say who, but someone who definitely should have known better—waited until just as I was going into sitting to bring up something that they said was really urgent, that couldn't wait. I had to, during my sitting days, meet with somebody and interview somebody, all this stuff. I just got furious. The kind where, of course, one is right. The self-righteous kind, where obviously they should have known better. The kind of anger that really justifies itself and just grows and grows.

Then I went on with my sitting, and it was really interesting because as I paid attention, I learned something in a way that I've never been able to ignore again. As much as I believed and acted out the anger, I wasn't really doing anything other than saying, "Yes, it's true, he's a jerk, he should know better," and all these things. "I can't believe it." Writing letters to him in my mind and actually storming into his room and telling him what I thought of him. The more I did that with some mindfulness, the more I saw that this was not releasing the anger. I think I really got it that it's a false concept that if I really let it out, it releases it. It just got bigger and bigger and stronger and stronger until it was like a black fire burning in my gut. So painful and unpleasant.

Until finally I gave up. I mean, I gave up thinking I could do something about it. And I just went out and said, "Okay, I'll just be with anger." That's when I learned about stomping meditation instead of walking meditation. I went way out in the backfield and I was just stomping, stomping. Anger, anger. That was as precise as I could get with mindfulness. But it was good enough.

I stomped for a while, an hour or so, and then gradually it becomes walking. And huge anger becomes burning and tightness and black ash in my stomach. I really learned, first, that it is possible to be with anger. It doesn't feel good. There's nothing pleasant about it. It's not like I came out of that like, "Yes, I'm really a great yogi." It felt bad from beginning to end. But I really saw the suffering and the nature of separation in the experience of aversion that strongly.

This is again Joko Beck. She says, "Can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and the unpleasantness?" That's what's so hard. Can we just find in ourselves the willingness to rest in the confusion and the unpleasantness? She calls it letting the mud settle without having to do something right away. It's hard, whether the confusion is anger or fear. And all that is, is mindfulness. So we just do the best we can, but finding how to rest in it.

It is difficult. And the other form of aversion that is fear—one of the things that makes it difficult—our fear of experiencing the unpleasant, our projection of how bad it's going to feel to be with this unpleasant experience, is already aversion. It's the fear, and that's what keeps us holding life, holding experience at a distance.

We can go to incredible lengths to avoid an imagined unpleasant experience. I don't know if you've ever noticed yourself doing that here. I do it a lot in my daily life. When I notice it, it's really helpful, because the fear of unpleasantness causes me to subject myself to so many contortions and so much more difficult and unpleasant experience than just meeting the original unpleasant experience. It's quite amusing, actually.

Just a recent example: some months ago a very good friend asked me if I would come teach a weekend with him in Canada at a certain time next year. I knew the minute he asked me that it was not going to be possible because my schedule was really packed. I knew that. But he was really trying to talk me into it. He's a very good friend. I never see him. I hadn't seen him for three years. And so right away, this coagulation of fear arose: If I say no, I'll feel badly because he'll feel badly, and he won't like me anymore, and he'll think I don't like him.

So I stalled. That was months ago. And I went through all kinds of contortions, trying to shift around all these commitments I have for next year to find a way to fit in flying up to Canada for this particular retreat at this particular time—even though I already feel overextended, and I'm really working to find balance in the way that I teach, and I get really stressed. Even with all of that, I went to huge lengths to try to switch everything around in order to avoid the projected unpleasant feeling of his disappointment and being mad at me. It's ridiculous, really. And it turned out to be impossible—I couldn't do it. So then for the last three weeks I've been putting off calling him to tell him. Every day I think, "I've got to call him." And fear comes up, fear of how he's going to feel, and then he's not going to like me, and oh no, another person doesn't like me, I can't make the world happy. Every day I have this thought. And so there's this heavy... it's ridiculous.

Finally, last night, I got home from talking in Cambridge. I got home at midnight, and there's a message from him on my machine. I thought, "No, I've got to call." His message said, "Please call before nine in the morning." So I called him. I was trapped, no way out. It was totally pleasant. He completely understood. It was lovely to reconnect. None of the unpleasantness that I projected even happened. I submitted myself to four months of ongoing unpleasant experience to avoid that moment that didn't even turn out to be unpleasant. It's insane. This is really ignorance at its highest pitch—separation, disconnection with reality.

And if I would just meet a moment of fear, we would save ourselves months of suffering and torment. So think of that next time you find yourself going to some incredible contortions here to avoid the pain that's going to come in the next moment, or the next sitting, or the next time you hear that sound. Just dropping into the experience will save you all that grief. I wish I could just pass it on to myself.

So not only does aversion separate us from experience, it completely distorts our perception of reality. It distorts our judgment. When we're in fear or anger or aversion, we can't make any kind of balanced, clear decision because we can't come from knowing what's really true. Really, once I'm done with the fear of what my friend was going to say, knowing him all these years—did I really think he was going to blast me and hate me because I happened to be busy a particular weekend next year? Of course not. That's ridiculous. But the fear, the separation from experience, completely distorts our judgment. So we can find ourselves doing all kinds of unwise things and really not knowing it.

Okay, that's kind of broad and obvious. Well, it's broad—maybe it's not always obvious. I want to mention another manifestation of this aversion, which you think of as holding back from experience, that's very prevalent. It's been coming up a lot in interviews. But it can be much more subtle, so sometimes we don't recognize it. And it's the form of aversion that we would often call resistance.

Resistance just means, "No, I just don't want to be here with this"—whatever this is.

Sometimes resistance is really obvious. The two-year-old throwing a tantrum: "No, no way, I don't want to walk now and nobody's going to make me." That's obvious.

But sometimes—and someone brought this up in a really clear way today, I really liked the way he talked about it—sometimes it's a very soft and quiet but pervasive background mental state of resistance that's actually coloring our perception of anything arising in the moment. We're not really recognizing it because it's not hard, it's not harsh. In fact, as he was saying, often it's a stance, a mental state that has become very familiar to us throughout our life. Maybe for some of us resistance has been, as it were, a protection against pain and suffering that perhaps as a child was actually too great to think we could bear. Even without that, we just have developed a stance of holding ourselves a little bit away from experience, feeling that it's a protection, a friend.

And so when this mental state, this pervasive mind state of resistance arises, we might not recognize it as such. But how it actually feels is really comfortable—like an old friend. Or as this person was saying, it's sort of like wrapping yourself in a warm old blanket. You know, you just think, "Oh, I just don't think I'll sit right now. I don't really think I need to pay so much attention to the breath or noting. I'll just kind of sit and be at ease." And it just feels kind of nice and comfortable. But if you could really notice it, it's resistance. It's a form of aversion. The effect it has is of just keeping attention a little bit removed from experience.

So you might find, trying to meet the breath, that because there's no big thing going on, you just can't quite get there. You try to notice sensation—you're aware of it, but there's really this feeling of disconnection. The energy isn't quite there, and you can't quite figure out what's going on.

Again, open up. I'll often just ask myself, "What's happening now?" And then in this big background picture, I'll notice: oh. I just kind of don't want to be here. I just don't want to be feeling my mind and my body. It's that simple.

And rather than try to push through it, simply turn around and notice the resistance. Actually, if you use noting, note it. If you're not using noting, really notice it. Let that be the place of connection. Resistance, resistance. Just kind of let it wash through and really feel it. And again, it doesn't have to be unpleasant even. It's almost like, "This is my old friend, I don't want to let go of this." But at least we're noticing, we're connecting, and the resistance is not being fed.

One other way that resistance often manifests—and in this way can be unrecognized—the Buddha said, using this phrase, "an untaught worldling" (that's people who don't really look at how the mind is working): "An untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness." Therefore, one proceeds when faced with painful feelings to look for and enjoy sense pleasures. And in doing that, the tendency of the mind and heart to lust, to grasp after pleasant feelings, comes to underlie the mind, comes to be a sort of underlying pervasive tone in the mind.

And so sometimes we might notice—we don't actually notice aversion—we notice we're getting lost over and over again in pleasant fantasy. And you really notice it, you notice the pleasantness, and you come back and you get this feeling something else is going on but you don't know what. Or sometimes it's not even just as simple as pleasant fantasy, but we find ourselves actively going after pleasure. Somehow food, the pleasantness in food, suddenly assumes a tremendous importance on a particular day, a series of days. Or we're just lusting after reading anything. You know those times when you just read the toilet bowl cleanser over and over and over? Anything, for some reason. Some pleasant hit, but we don't quite realize what it is we're doing.

At times it is wanting pleasant. At times, again, back up and look a little more broadly. It might be a manifestation of resistance, a slight holding ourselves away. There's something going on that's difficult or unpleasant to be with that we're not even aware of, and it's manifesting in this restless search for pleasure.

And really that's why we're so lucky to be on retreat, because I feel in life we do this a lot. Ever find yourself in the car on a quest for ice cream or cookies? Or you go out to do an errand and suddenly you must stop in the bakery and get a cookie.

And I'll check in and ask myself, why? I'm not even hungry. I've really learned to do this now, because nine times out of ten, some vague unpleasant or unhappy memory has come up, or some emotion, some longing, some loneliness that I didn't really notice. And it channels into this impulse: well, let me just get something sweet, and then I'll be happy again.

I actually learned this during the first three-month course I ever sat. I hope to save you from doing this. It was well into the course, sometime in November. It's the only time I kind of broke retreat. I had a car here, and I went into Barre and bought a big bag of chocolate chip cookies. Not the good kind—you can't get the good kind in Barre, so don't even go looking, because you won't find any. This was a really bad thing I did, so don't think about it.

But I brought the cookies back to my room, and I started just eating one after the other after the other. I don't normally binge; it wasn't a typical thing for me. It took me two-thirds of the bag to notice what was actually happening—this empty, gnawing, lonely, fearful feeling. Each cookie I ate, I was hoping for it to drop into that feeling and fill it up. But it missed and went to my stomach. And then my stomach started really hurting, and I thought, oh, I get it. These two don't connect at all. Eating cookies doesn't help this feeling.

It was a major learning. Being with that feeling, with nurturing mindfulness—that's what was actually helpful. I could be with it, just hang out in it. It's okay. That's where the wisdom comes. That's where the freedom comes. So I hope I've saved you from having to learn that lesson the same way.

And then the last aspect of aversion I want to talk about—one that can easily arise even in just beginning to look at your experience here. Whenever we begin to think about a particular phenomenon, whether aversion or clinging, we become aware of how often it's actually arising, more than we ever noticed before we were mindful. It's easy to let that aversion turn against oneself and become quite judgmental, quite self-critical. "Oh no, I didn't realize how completely hateful I am as a person." Or "My practice is really awful because look how much I'm getting caught in this. She said be mindful, and I'm mindful, and it doesn't go away—it just gets bigger." Sometimes there's even a real fear: "All this aversion, this fear is generating more negative karma." And so there's resistance to being with it at all.

Just recognize that any form of judgment toward self or others is simply another form of aversion, another pulling back from experience. You don't have to believe it. Judgment is not an accurate evaluation of who you are or your experience—almost never. It only increases the cycle of distortion and denial.

I say this because the thing I've found most helpful in learning to understand these patterns, to feel a lot more spacious around the tendency of the mind to get locked into aversion or fear, is to make friends with it. See the judgment as just judging—don't believe it. Okay, it's just another arising condition, the lesson of anattā. It is not who I am.

As soon as I can see aversion arising due to conditions—the conditions of this particular mind—there's so much space around it. And in that space, it's become really fascinating to explore, to see just how a mind that has a long habit of aversion actually works. It brings in a lot of humor, a lot of lightness, and more and more sense of impersonality.

So let me share with you some of the things I've seen about how that conditioned, aversive mind works. Not everybody is the same, of course. When I said I'm an expert on aversion, it's because—well, we joke around about the different personality types, how some people's conditioning tends more toward aversion while other minds go more easily toward greed, and some more easily toward delusion. We don't get away with anything—we all get all of it, don't worry. But some of our minds tend more in one direction than another.

This way of talking about things can be useful if it helps you see how the mind is working. It's not useful if you're going to start identifying and typing yourself and making yourself crazy. But in that way of looking at experience, my mind is definitely a classic aversion type. They say, for example, if you want to check your type: when you walk into a room, what do you notice first?

Aversion types will walk in—if you're traveling with someone, going into a hotel room together—and I'll immediately notice what's wrong with that bed. It's kind of sagged. It's too close to the bathroom. The mattress looks a little lumpy. That one's near the window—I'll take that one.

My friends who are more greed-oriented would walk in and say, "Oh, that's a beautiful bed. The light from the window is really nice. It's sitting very lovely. I like the sense of space around it. And this area over there—I'll take that one."

We both focus in on the same bed, but one from what's wrong and one from what's nice. And the delusion type just wouldn't really notice. So my advice is to travel with a delusion type. It works out really well.

I can see I'm not going to get through all this tonight. I didn't want to leave you on a totally depressing note—I did have some things prepared about working with aversion, but I don't think we're going to get to them. I'll have to continue next time.

I just want to continue this train of thought because it's gotten really interesting to me. It's lightened things up completely to notice that what happens in a mind conditioned to aversion is that given a whole field of experience, the mind will go right to what's unpleasant.

I was on a ferry in Thailand a couple of years ago. A beautiful sunny day, lovely water, just about an hour ride to get to this beach. Everything was pleasant—with my friends, sitting up in the sun, looking down at the water. There were a lot of people on the ferry. And I completely zeroed in on one woman who was really making a spectacle of herself. And my mind said, "She's obviously American. Americans are always the ones. People hate Americans when they're traveling. Everyone can tell I'm an American too." And I went through this whole thing. She was American—it was true. And over in Thailand there aren't that many Americans, more other nationalities. But anyway, I pulled back and noticed this. Actually, there was so much pleasant and neutral experience happening, and that unpleasantness was really minor. But this mind just goes right for that, and then pulls back and separates from everything else, and the whole story builds up. It's quite amusing if you can just see the mind do that.

I've also noticed that if anything new arises in experience—something new, unexpected, some change—if you come and ask me, "I have this new idea for something," the immediate response, before it even bypasses conscious awareness, is no. It's no good. I don't like it. It's not going to be as good as it is now. Even if how it is now is horrible.

I've learned this about my mind. If I can keep my mouth shut and let it go—"No, that's no good, it stinks"—and then, okay, that's done with, I can evaluate in a quite balanced way. Yeah, maybe that would be nice. Really look at it.

If we believe or get reactive to that aversion, then right away we're caught in it, and I have to defend why it's a bad idea. Or then I have to let down and say, "Oh, I'm really sorry, I'm being a jerk," and then I turn the negativity against myself. But if you can just see it without reaction, there's space again. You don't have to buy into it.

And underneath that, you begin to see that what triggers the negativity is actually fear. Anything new coming into my experience elicits fear. Nothing to do with rationality. It's very slight.

Don't even notice it. As soon as I can see that, it's okay. Unseen, it triggers a whole solidified reaction.

And it can be so subtle. I noticed the other morning, whenever I fill the tea kettle to heat the water, I invariably put in way too much water, and it takes a lot longer to heat, and I'm always in a hurry in the morning. Franz is always saying, "Why do you put in so much water? It's obvious, it's too much." I noticed the other morning—it's fear. I put in the water, I can tell it's enough, and then I think, "But it might not be enough. And then I'll have to heat up some more." So I throw in another bit of water, that whole extra bit is too much, and I have to wait the extra time. Every single day I do this. That level—just a little shoot of fear—it's fascinating. It doesn't have to be any judgment, but just to see how the mind works. And then it's operating in a ground of freedom, in a ground of anatta, in a ground of selflessness.

I'm really not going to be able to finish this tonight. I think I'll continue next time because I don't want to just leave you with, "Here's all the ways we're aversive—go deal with it." I'll give a very quick summary of how to work with it.

The first and always resort, our greatest protection, is mindfulness. At whatever level you can bring the mindfulness in, because it's connection. Whether it's to the immediate sense contact that's eliciting the reaction of aversion, whether it's on the broad level of stomping, stomping, anger, anger, or whether it's in the subtle background sense of a flavor of resistance or denial in the mind that you can't really touch but you can intuit, you can feel—all of those levels of mindfulness are helpful. They connect us with reality, take us out of identification with the negativity.

A second mode of balancing is something I talked about last week in wise attention: to see when we're hopelessly caught, or you can't really tell where you're getting caught in the negativity—you just know it feels too big or too confusing—and that's to deliberately balance your perception, to bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy. For example, I notice myself thinking on retreat at the end of the day, "This has been a really crummy day. I feel rotten, my practice has been awful, the people here are a pain in the neck, this has just been horrible, the weather is bad." And I'll just stop and say, "Okay, balance. Deliberately notice what's not wrong." Almost like counting my blessings. At first I have to stretch a little bit. "Okay, I have a nice warm bed to lie in on my break. I have my health. Actually, it's lovely to be here." At first it feels forced. Pretty soon it's just flowing—all the beautiful and pleasant and all the grace in my life. And it really balances the coloring of unpleasantness. Or just open from the physical to hearing, to seeing, or go take a walk. All the different ways we've talked of backing off, balancing perception.

The third, and this is what I want to talk about more next week especially, is to work with the metta practice. The Buddha talked about five different ways of working with annoyance or a grudge you hold against somebody when you're caught in it. And the first one is to practice metta. Practice metta to yourself. And then to the person or the thing you're upset with—but I would really advise to yourself first, so it's not this kind of, "I hate this person's guts—may you be happy, may you be peaceful," and fooling ourselves. Open to your own pain. The metta does not deny that. It actually gives it the ground of acceptance so that rather than judging ourselves for not being perfect, there's a sense of metta, of acceptance, of just who we are that gives an open-heartedness and strength and courage to then be with whatever it is that's difficult.

And the fourth is—again, I don't mean to make this sound like a last resort—but again, it's patience. Not the patience of, "Oh God, all right, until it's over." But again, it's connection to just be with things as they are, to give up any expectation, to give up any sense of what should be happening, or wishing that things were other, just making friends with the experience of fear, aversion, whatever it is, as it is in this moment.

All of these are aspects of wisdom, because these are ways of connecting, of really knowing what's true rather than being lost in the aversion which keeps us from knowing reality as it is. The connection again accentuates, lets us re-recognize our essential completion, whether it is with fear or aversion or self-judgment or knee pain or beauty or joy. So this aspect of patience, of just being with what is, and giving up any grandiose thoughts of getting somewhere, is actually a great manifestation of wisdom.

I'll end tonight by saying that I don't mean to make it sound simple. Aversion, dosa, fear—these are very difficult states to recognize, to be with, to have spaciousness and kindness toward ourselves and them when we're experiencing them. Please don't judge yourself or think that if we could really see this clearly, it's all going to go away.

And on the other hand, we don't want to make such good friends with our aversion and fear that we actually think, "You know, it's really not too bad. In fact, it's kind of serving me, this aversion. I think I won't really do too much about it. I'll just wallow in it a little bit."

I'm exaggerating, but there's a way we cannot quite summon enough—I would say commitment—in ourselves. Commitment not to hate ourselves, not to think we've got to uproot this with a pickaxe, not to think it's never going to arise. But the commitment to keep meeting the unpleasant with a willingness, as Joko said, to sit in the middle of it. Not to feed it, not to push it away, but to really let ourselves just sit there with mindfulness, knowing that our greatest purpose is really liberation.

And in order to come to freedom, it's only in this moment, going into the experience in this moment, rather than trying to avoid it in any way.

This can take great courage. It can sometimes be discouraging because it's moment after moment. But you can turn that around and say, "Okay, this moment I got lost. Now this moment, there's a new opportunity."

I'll close with this from Yoshio Kenpo:

"The essence of awakened enlightenment, Buddha nature, is present in everyone. It can't be changed or degenerated, no matter what we do."

And that's really good news.

"Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore or overlook it are deluded."

This recognition of our true nature is the borderline between Buddhas and ordinary beings, and it's the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives.

So every moment is a new crossroad, a new opportunity to recognize our Buddha nature.

Let's just take a moment.

CHAPTER 293

Perception and Thought

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines why thoughts—which are inherently substanceless, "less than a cobweb"—come to have such power over us. Drawing from Buddhist psychology and her own meditation experiences, she traces how suffering arises through the combination of misperception (saññā) and unwise attention, leading to the proliferation of thought known as papañca.
> Wilson explains how the three roots of unwholesome action—greed, hatred, and delusion—distort perception in each moment of consciousness, causing us to perceive what is not actually there. She shares vivid personal examples, from perceiving a nurse as demonic while in a fearful mental state, to mistaking fireworks for warfare in Vancouver, illustrating how misperception leads to solid-seeming conclusions and reactive behavior. The talk explores how papañca is fueled by three factors: wrong view (the basic sense of self), craving (which "puts feathers on the object craved"), and māna (conceit and the comparing mind).
> Referencing the Buddha's teaching "In the seen there is only the seen, in the heard there is only the heard," Wilson invites practitioners to recognize that everything beyond bare sensory experience is interpretation—"we're making it all up." Through direct encounter with experience, moment by moment, the seeming solidity of thought dissolves, revealing that thoughts need not enslave us. When we understand a thought as simply a thought, arising and passing in awareness, we discover the liberation inherent in wise attention.

I want to speak about the nature of thought and how we tend to get wrapped up in something that is so completely ephemeral—how much of our experience at times in meditation comes to seem like a battle with this experience of thinking, with the process of thought.

So often it's almost as if someone will come in and evaluate their practice by how many thoughts they had or the quality of the thoughts, and thinking assumes this incredibly solid, suffering aspect of experience. How does it come to be that way?

Certainly thought is useful. We wouldn't deny that if we understand the nature of thought, we can certainly use it. The process of thought, of course, got each of us here. Without thought, these noises I'm making with my mouth wouldn't really be able to make sense when they come into your ear. It's quite amazing, the process of thought. But how does it come to be such a struggle?

Because if we really look at a thought, just the thought itself, what is it? How much substance does a thought have? How much power does a thought have? If you're looking at the thought itself, it's nothing. It's less than a cobweb. There's just nothing there.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche says: "Like waves, all of the activities of this life have rolled endlessly on, yet they have left us empty handed. Millions of thoughts have run through our minds, but all they have done is increase our confusion and dissatisfaction. When a rainbow appears, we see many beautiful colors. Yet a rainbow is not something we can clothe ourselves with or wear as an ornament. It simply appears through the coming together of various conditions. Thoughts arise in the mind in just the same way. They have no tangible reality at all. There is therefore no logical reason why thought should have so much power over us, nor any reason why we should be enslaved by them."

Helpful, right? No logical reason when you look at it, because there's nothing there. Once we recognize that thoughts are empty, the mind will no longer have the power to deceive us. But as long as we take our deluded thoughts as real, they will continue to torment us mercilessly, as they have been doing throughout countless lifetimes.

It feels like that sometimes, doesn't it? It feels like just in the five weeks here, you've gone through countless lifetimes of thoughts tormenting us.

So I want to talk a bit tonight about directing our attention to thought itself and seeing some of the ways that it seems to become so solid. The obvious way we get enslaved is through a combination of perceiving wrongly and unwise attention. In other words, we don't look at the thought itself, but we get completely seduced and believe in the content.

Why is the thought of judging so painful? Just "I'm a stupid jerk"—there's nothing to that. If you see it just as thought energy... We really give it power by identifying and grasping at the content, and then we suffer. And we don't seem to notice that the content can be totally opposite from one thought to the next. We still continue to get seduced in this way and really suffer.

A friend told me he heard Andrea Levine say at a workshop, speaking about the unreliable nature of our thinking mind. She said, you know, for example, your mind will say, "Oh, have another piece of chocolate cake. You'll really like it. It'll be good for you." So you eat it. As soon as you've finished: "I wouldn't have done that if I were you. It's not really so good for you. You're really kind of giving into craving." And we believe in both. And we suffer.

Really, one of the revelations of our continued exploration in practice is that we don't have to be afraid of thinking. You don't have to make the ending of thought the goal of your practice, the ideal of freedom and peace. First, that's a waste of time—it won't last even if you do manage to get there. And second, it's still giving thoughts this power.

So can we begin to just explore their ephemeral nature instead?

One way to start at the very beginning of the arising of a thought—one way that we get so far afield from just the basic simplicity of experience, "you're a stupid jerk," a thought arising, gone—is through misperception.

I know Joseph spoke a little bit about the factor of perception in his talk the other night. Perception meaning, quite specifically in Buddhist psychology, this quality that arises in each moment of consciousness of recognition, of discernment. It involves memory. So, for example, there's hearing, and it can be like a quick moment pre-perception, and then—ah, the bell. Even the words "the bell" might not form, but there's a knowing, a recognition: that's a bell, or the bell. Or you might recognize it's a bell, but not the bell. It's a different bell, and I don't know which bell that is. But you still recognize the general quality "bell." Or if we're really clear, if there's no delusion in the mind, there could be a sound, and we recognize: I don't know what that is. That's also, in a way, perception.

One of the ways that we get so lost in thinking begins with misperception—perceiving wrongly. The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties stem from misperception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge. That's exactly our whole practice. The whole emphasis of mindfulness is on direct experience, and each moment of direct experience cuts through misperception.

So I'll give some examples of what I mean. How do we misperceive? It's one of the ways that our old friends—greed, hatred, and delusion—manifest in our moment-to-moment experience. If any one or some friendly combination of these three is present in consciousness in a moment of contact, in a moment of perception, and we're not aware of it, it can completely color or distort the perception so that we actually perceive what is not there. This is one of the functions of ignorance. Our perception is distorted through the lens of whichever one of these kilesas, these torments of mind, is present.

Here's an example—this happens in our life all the time. What's scary is that mostly we don't recognize it. We really think, "This is how I'm seeing things."

One time I was in the hospital. I'd been there some days, and they give you drugs because I was in a lot of pain. After some days I started to get into a weird mental state. I later heard there's something called ICU psychosis, where your mind is just a little gone for a while. Well, I was in this incredibly fearful, aversive mental state, not quite recognizing it. And a nurse came at six in the morning to wake me up and weigh me—very important to know how much I weighed. I woke up totally in fear and anger, and I visually perceived her as demonic. I mean, her face, the way she looked—like an evil demonic creature. Which is how I responded to her, because we respond from how we perceive. This is the way misperception continues. I think I really yelled at her and pushed her away.

The next day, when I was in my more normal state of mind, the poor same lady had to come and wake me up at six o'clock to weigh me. And I could see she's a perfectly nice-looking lady—only she looked really scared on this day. And I felt really badly.

If I hadn't seen her the second day, though, really how I saw her that first day was how she was. We really believe—we don't know this misperception is happening. What's scary is how much this is actually going on in our experience, and it leads us to all sorts of action.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, "When you look at a pencil, you perceive it, but the pencil itself may be very different from the pencil in your mind." This is the basic misperception. And it can be through any of the kilesas, but of course the root distortion, the root cause of misperception, is confusion or ignorance, delusion—just not seeing what's there.

It can seem relatively benign. We just see something, don't really recognize it, but instead of knowing we don't recognize it accurately, the mind sort of reaches into past memory and makes something up—that that must be what it is.

I remember once I was walking up on Hoes Hill Road, on the dirt road off of that, and I looked over to the side in the woods. I saw this kind of cliff with a lake of snow, melted snow, at the bottom. I got really confused because, you know, I've lived here for twenty years and I'd never seen a cliff down there right off the side of the road. I started getting extremely disoriented and confused and upset. Then I stopped, went back, and looked again. It was just a puddle with reflections from the trees and the sky in a certain way that, unrecognized, my mind just made up into the closest thing it could get to. That's the way delusion or ignorance functions to distort perception.

And it can take us much further than that.

I was in Vancouver teaching a course, staying alone in a friend's apartment. I was reading at night a book about the civil war in Beirut, and just as I was going to sleep in this unfamiliar apartment, I started hearing these big booming sounds going off. There was no holiday or anything, and these big explosions kept happening. First I just went and looked out the window, couldn't see anything. And then I thought, well, it's mortar fire, it must be, because it's not a holiday.

My mind went into this whole thing: just because it's Vancouver doesn't mean that something like that couldn't happen. What makes you think it only happens in Beirut? What makes you think you're safe just because you're in the West?

I kept running from window to window. I actually turned on the radio and tried to listen to see what was happening. And then because nothing was on it, I thought, well, they always go to the communication centers first and they're lulling us into being relaxed. Really, they've taken over—I don't know who "they" even were—but they've taken over the city. This went on for twenty minutes or so, and I was working myself into quite a state.

Finally—I never actually saw it, because if I'd seen what it really was, it would have broken through right away—I went out to the front room and looked over toward where the World's Fair had been some years ago. And it just clicked. I said, "Oh, I bet there were fireworks," even though it was no holiday. I just knew it was fireworks. It's that kind of sound. And the whole thing dropped away.

It was funny, you know. I could laugh about that one. It didn't go any further. But that's how a misperception—and we really think we know—leads to action, to not seeing clearly. The thoughts that come out of the misperception are very strong and solid. We really identify with them and we act. This is our basic delusion.

It's fine when we can recognize it. It's great when we can recognize it. Would that we could recognize it more often than we do.

The delusion part is that sense of not being able to recognize, not being able to know something for what it is—like being in a fog. Or like times, I don't know if it happens to you, but it happens to me a lot: I'll be driving and just all of a sudden have a moment of complete blankness where I don't know where I am, what country I'm in, what season it is—just completely blank. I could look around, and even though it's Barry, I can't recognize anything. It can last for a moment or two until I can find something in that present moment to glom onto. "Oh yeah, oh yeah, right, this is the white car. That belongs to IMS. I must be here now. That means it's the three-month course"—some line of logic like that.

That's just a moment of delusion. Unrecognized, what it leads to is wrong view—misperceiving and then acting on it, as I did when I was in Vancouver.

And of course the basic wrong view, the basic misperception that underlies most of the confusing and painful things that we get ourselves involved in through thought and through action, is the misperception of ourselves. It's the misperception of our moment-to-moment experience that gives us the perceived sense that we're solid, we're separate, we're sort of unchanging through time.

While some perceptions are easy to see through—like the puddle in the woods or the war in Vancouver—some perceptions are much more difficult to recognize as inaccurate. One of the reasons our misperception of ourself is so difficult to see through is because things are happening so quickly. That's why there's such an emphasis, I think, on the insights into anicca, into impermanence. Because when things happen so quickly, it seems solid—like if you spin a torch really fast at night, it looks like a solid circle.

So it might be fine that Buddhist psychology tells us there are seventeen trillion mind moments in the blink of an eye, and that they're all discrete, happening one after the other. And that what seems like a solid body I have, continuing in time, is actually just a series of elements arising and passing, arising and passing. Or that what we call our whole sense of "me" is just a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste, a thought—just happening, arising and passing so quickly.

But that doesn't really help us that much, to read that or to be told that. I can say, "Yeah, that makes sense." But my perception, moment to moment, is that I'm really solid here. And I can feel like I extend back in time as far as I can remember.

So if we don't really look, we find that even if intellectually we want to believe something other, the inaccurate perceptions that are happening—that we don't recognize—are actually forming the assumptions and conclusions we draw about who we are, about our moment-to-moment experience.

Again, that's why our practice is about direct encounter—directly meeting experience over and over and over, without assumption. And it's not so easy, because a lot of the time we don't even know we're making any assumptions.

Intellectually, I find it helpful to know this stuff, but it's never really cut it as far as any sense of freedom. It's taken this continual looking, looking, looking, until suddenly we see: oh, things aren't the way I thought they were at all.

This is from Oliver Sacks, the neurologist. He's writing about a man who was in his fifties and had been blind since he was about five, and had adapted quite well to his life.

He lived by himself, was engaged to be married, worked as a masseur, and was quite at ease getting through the world. His mode of putting the world together was through touch, of course, and he was quite competent and at ease in that mode.

When he was about fifty, doctors found that they actually could do an operation that would give him some sight. His family, his fiancée, everyone was all excited about this. They did the operation on one eye, and everyone stood around waiting for the great unveiling when they took off the patch, just so excited about how happy he was going to be to be able to see.

This is Oliver Sacks: "Virgil told me later that he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, all meaningless, a blur. Then out of that blur came a voice that said, 'Well?' Then, and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this blur, this chaos of light and shadow, must be a face—the face of his surgeon."

He only realized that because he knew that voices come out of faces. So that must be a face, but it didn't coalesce into any sense.

Oliver Sacks goes on: "For those of us who are born with sight, we can scarcely imagine his confusion, because we who are born with a full complement of all the senses and correlate these together constantly, we create a sighted world from the start—a world of visual objects and concepts and meanings. When we open our eyes each morning, it's upon a world we have spent a lifetime learning to see. We are not given the world of sighted objects. We make our world through incessant experience, memory, and reconnection. But when Virgil opened his eye after being blind for forty-five years, there were no visual memories to support a perception. There was no world of experience and meaning awaiting him. He saw, but what he saw had no coherence."

His nerves were working, his eyes were working, but his brain could make no sense of the visual input. As Sacks continued following Virgil, it got a little better, but not much. In fact, his life was actually much more difficult for him after he got some sight back. It would be so exhausting trying to make sense of the world through sight that he would often just close his eyes and go back to eating with his fingers or shaving in the dark, because he never really could make a lot of meaning out of the world of sight.

I love that example because it helps me break down this sense of how assumptions I make—that things are the way they appear to be—operate without my even realizing I'm making that assumption. We take these perceptions for granted until something gets us to really look.

Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "We don't wake up because we have not really understood that we're dreaming, and we are renewing the dream from moment to moment."

So our practice, the practice of mindfulness, is to get us—as Thich Nhat Hanh often says—to look deeply. To look past assumptions, to even look past what we think the recognized perception is, and just meet the bare experience: the sight, the sound, the thought, the sensation, the smell, whatever it might be.

When we can look deeply without believing all the thoughts and conclusions and assumptions that seem to make reality so solid, when we can just keep meeting experience, then some of these assumptions about how things are, about how we think we're perceiving our experience, begin to break down. And that's what's happening in its own way for each person here, whether you believe it or not.

Sometimes it's dramatic. I know different people have brought up this sense of, "Well, if the sense of impermanence is supposed to be this arising and passing of elements—sensations just coming and going..." I get from a lot of people a sense that this is what we're supposed to experience to really know impermanence. And it's true—it's one experience that does bring in more of a sense of impermanence, because you really see that there's no solid connection.

But it also happens in other ways. It happens in seeing the impermanent, ephemeral nature of emotions, of the sense of self. It happens when we see that we're sitting in what feels like "my knee is killing me," and when we really let go of that idea and just note the arising appearances. There's sensation, there's unpleasant, there's a thought "my knee," and actually there's no sense of where knee actually is. Then there's an image of me with my knee in it that arises, and then, "Oh yeah, my knee." This coming and going of different sense experiences that, without examination, we put together into one gestalt: "This is my knee and it's killing me."

And there are many other ways. Look for yourself. With any of the sense experiences, notice how our assumptions begin to break down. Sometimes it's exhilarating. Sometimes it's really scary. Sometimes it's very disorienting. A lot of the times when you feel like you're breaking into new ground, so to speak, this is what's going on. In some way, an unquestioned assumption is being challenged, and we don't have a new one yet to put in its place to make us feel comfortable.

Our sense of self-image, especially when we're suffering from it, arises in very much the same way. We isolate a particular perception—whether it's a thought or a felt sense, or we look at ourselves in the mirror, whatever it is—we isolate that particular perception, all the thoughts and conclusions that come out of it, then we dwell on it, ignore any perception to the contrary, and it seems really true. That's when thought is a burden. That's when we're really enslaved by thought.

So notice when we're doing this. For example, some people will often say, "My concentration is no good, I can't stay on the breath." That's a particular experience, a perception, a conclusion. Any other perceptions that would challenge it are not noticed, and this self-image of "my practice stinks, I can't concentrate" is carried around, and there's a lot of suffering from it.

Quite often when we talk about it, what emerges is that you can't stay on the breath because so many different experiences are coming and going that actually impermanence is just streaming as experience. But we're trying to make it permanent and stay on the breath, and you just can't do it.

You can't actually fight the fact of impermanence happening. So it's simply a matter of switching the perception. "Oh, in fact, my practice is really good—I'm seeing impermanence!" And then that changes too, and we keep looking for impermanence instead of recognizing, "Well, things are quiet now. Just stay on the breath."

This same dynamic plays out in the whole perception of who we are in our lives. "I'm such a negative, aversive person." You might have ten, twenty, thirty thoughts that are kind, that are generous. You might have all these really loving impulses. And then one selfish, aversive thought comes up—and that's the one we notice. The rest are ignored, totally not identified with. They have no reality. But this one negative, aversive thought? This is true. Our self-image becomes wrapped around it, and there's no balance of perception.

This is one of the ways we become enslaved by the content of thought—by picking out a particular perception, ignoring all the others, and then dwelling on it. The perception itself might even be somewhat accurate, such as "that was an aversive thought." But it's just a thought, and we don't recognize the extra identification with it, the way the mind perceives it, takes it, and runs.

So this is the next aspect of thought I want to explore: starting from the mistaken perception and believing it, dwelling on the conclusion—which is powerful enough on its own. As Nisargadatta says, "The world appears to you so overwhelmingly real because you think about it all the time. If you stop thinking of it so much, it will dissolve into thin mist."

It's not the thoughts themselves. They can come and go. They dissolve into thin mist all by themselves. It's this holding on to the conclusions and then building on that with a sense of self that makes the world so real. So there's an inaccurate perception, a description of it, a conclusion fueled by the mental state—greed, hatred, or delusion coloring consciousness in that moment. And then there's this quality we call proliferation, where the mind just takes that perception and runs with it, far and fast, like the way my mind could go from "boom" to a war in Vancouver to turning on the radio in ten seconds.

This process, as you know, is called papañca—one of my favorite Pali words. I just love the way it sounds. Papañca. It's defined or described as not the misperception itself, but there's a perception, and then, the texts say, "what one perceives, one thinks about." It's just natural that thoughts arise accompanying experience—"this is the bell, that means it's the end of the sitting," or "does that mean it's lunchtime?" Those in themselves are not a problem, just thoughts arising, then associations.

But out of this, proliferation is manufactured when there is in the mind one or several of the disturbing mental factors—which I'll discuss in a moment. There's the perception, there's association, some stray thoughts, and all of a sudden this energy of craving, of comparing, of a sense of self comes up, and whoosh—it's turned into what the texts call "notions that assail and overwhelm a person." We're just beaten back, it feels like, by the power of this proliferating mind. Or it's called "the tendency of imagination to break loose and run riot." These descriptions are from the old commentaries.

And I would say it isn't even so much that the mind runs riot—the problem is that we believe it. The mind is breaking loose and running riot, and we're sitting there going, "Yeah, that's really the way it is." And then we are so far from being in touch with reality that we don't even know it. That's how suffering really happens. Boom, and we're at war.

Or here in retreat, as some people describe it: you're just sitting there minding your own business, somebody walks by, and so fast come all our associations with them, with ourselves, what we think of them, what we think of ourselves. Maybe we've never spoken to this person, but we really know what their past was like, what their personality is like, what their practice is like, what's going to happen to them in the future. As someone said to me the other day, "We really know it." We really think we know it. Things feel solid.

And what really happened in that moment? Very little. There was seeing. There was pleasant or unpleasant. And there were some thoughts. That was it. But out of that, so quickly, a whole solid reality arises. This is the process of proliferation. Seeing it is enough to cut the power of believing it.

It's fueled by—in the classic commentaries, they talk about three mental factors that tend to really fuel this proliferation. I just want to give examples of these, though I think there are really more, and you'll recognize them for yourself. I love seeing this process happening. It's not like we have to hate it. Once you see it happening, it just becomes really funny to observe how we are living in this totally mind-created world most of the time. It's much simpler than we actually think it is.

The first fuel is wrong view—the basic sense of self. This is obvious, because most of our suffering and misperceptions and identification is fueled by this. I'll just give one example, since it's always at the bottom of everything. One of my teachers said, "When the 'I' thought arises, in the twinkling of an eye, whole universes are created." This is really true. You could just be seeing, but as soon as there's "I'm seeing that," in a minute whole universes arise.

Here's an example of how just the subtle sense of "I" can lead into a whole papañca, even without any big story. This winter when I was sitting, I remember doing walking meditation, pretty focused. I just stopped and looked out the window when I got to the end of my line, and it was snowing—as it seemed to always be snowing. It was very present, but there was just this subtle sense of "I." I guess I wasn't even aware of it, but there was seeing, perception of snow. And then with that little sense of self came memory of snow in the past and how I felt about snow, the different times there had been snow in my childhood, and projecting snow into the future. Each thought itself was pretty light—there wasn't a lot of craving or aversion—but there was that subtle sense of self. And it went into this whole papañca about snow, basically about me, just from that seeing, just from that simple sense contact. It's not a huge experience of suffering or anything, but it's definitely getting involved in story that isn't happening at all. There's just seeing and thinking happening.

The second energy that really fuels this proliferation is—big surprise—craving. This can also be really fun to watch, because of how it works. There's a saying that craving puts feathers on the object that's craved. The craving actually invests the thing that the mind is craving with desirability, with a sense of pleasurableness that might not actually be there in the particular experience at all. And then we just get lost in a whole proliferation of thought about it.

For example, again while I was sitting last year, this thought kept coming into my mind—an image of a street corner in Bangkok that, for some reason, every time it arose, the mind was colored with craving. I would go into this whole yearning for this street corner in Bangalampu that has absolutely nothing attractive about it. I don't care if I never see it again in my life. I have no idea what would seem so pleasant about it. So I could really see the process of how the craving feeds papañca in this moment. The image would come up and it would look so pleasant, so attractive. This yearning would come—I was in South Africa at the time—and I'd think, maybe I can change my flight and go back to Bangkok. I'd get into a whole thing about how I was going to call the travel agent, and this would go on for five minutes. Then suddenly: wait a minute, I never want to go back to Bangalampu, I don't want to change my flight. And it would stop. But it kept happening over and over and over. It was really a perfect example of how it's the craving itself that gives the sense of attractiveness to the particular object. And if it's strong enough, it could have led me to change my plans, to actually try to go back there.

Papañca doesn't just have to mean thoughts, you know. If it gets strong enough, it can lead us into all kinds of action. Those times when you're sitting in your room and suddenly you have to leap up and run out the door—to look in case you got that note you've been waiting for, or check the mail, whatever it is—the craving got so strong that it leads to action.

I was walking again this winter, and it was so strong. About half an hour previously, I'd been in one of those spaces where I just want to be on retreat forever—it's so wonderful, this is really it, you think you'll give up your life and stay on retreat. And I was walking, and a thought of my parents came up, a very loving thought, like an image of them, and a sense of wanting to see them. It got so strong so quickly that I was about to stop walking and go to the phone and make a reservation. It was really strong, so strong that it brought me up short. The only thing that stopped me was remembering that half an hour previously I had been so into the retreat that I never wanted to stop. So I thought, maybe this will pass too. But that's the strength of it.

of the proliferation of mind when we don't see it. The thoughts become a totally solid world.

So this is a really important thing if we can remember it: just because a thought arises together with a strong emotion, it doesn't make it true. And the stronger the emotion doesn't make it more true. Really, they have very little correlation—whether something is true or accurate and how strong the emotion is. I found that really helpful, if I can remember it.

The third mental factor that feeds proliferation—and this is very strong and also very subtle—is what is called mana in Pali, translated usually as conceit. I was just flipping through the references to it in the Majjhima Nikaya, and usually when it's referred to there, it's referred to as "the conceit I am"—that really subtle underlying flavor almost, or scent you could say, of a sense of self. That's the very subtle part.

But there's another aspect that is not so subtle, that most of us experience really a lot. And that's the mind of comparing—the sense, actually it feels constant sometimes, of comparing every body or every experience to something else. Either it's better than I am, or it's worse than I am, or we're the same. This mental quality of comparing is one of the strongest impulses for a huge amount of proliferation and an equally huge amount of suffering.

I don't know if you've noticed how unpleasant the sense of comparing can be, but it's helpful to really notice it and notice what's actually happening.

We can compare with others. That's obvious. Just that sense of walking and somebody walks past, and the comparing mind cannot let that happen without making a comparison. Better, worse, faster, slower, about the same. And of course it's endless, because we have to figure out comparing ourselves with every other person here. And since everyone changes from day to day, then we have to do it every day. We have to constantly reassess where we are on the scale of comparing. I mean, if you're really bored, okay, it's something to do—it'll keep your mind busy. But it's a lot of suffering. To just be, without seeing, is a lot easier.

We can also compare to the past, either to our own past experience, to memories. I remember, again, I was walking—I seem to notice a lot of this stuff when I'm walking—and was just aware of tightness. And then a memory arose of a walking period on another retreat, and it wasn't tight. That was all. That could have been all. Except then the mind says, "Yeah, it's really tight now. That other time was better. In fact, your practice stinks. How come you're so tight?" And then into the whole "I'm no good."

And in fact, if you notice, the whole sense of worthlessness, unworthiness, all the judgment—comparing is a really rife pool, you know, to breed the sense of unworthiness, the sense of worthlessness. Or if it happens to come up by itself, comparing is a really good way to strengthen it and keep it going. So to notice comparing is really, really helpful.

We can also compare to some image or ideal we have of how things should be—to something you heard in the instructions, to something you read, to something you didn't even read but you think maybe you read, but that's how the practice is supposed to be. Whatever it is, comparing is of course very subtle at times, but it's a really strong way to solidify the sense of self.

One teacher I was reading said that comparing arises when the mind fixates on differences. She was asked a question: "Why do people take this apparent world to be so real?" And the answer was: because they concentrate, they really focus on things, on specific things, and see differences, see diversity rather than unity.

It's not to say that seeing things necessarily means a sense of separation. But there is a way in comparing where we're really focused on this as compared to me. We're really seeing differences. And in that, there can only be a stronger sense of self and a stronger sense of separation.

But I noticed once, and I don't know if this will make sense—I really liked it. It was like a little insight that even when the mind is caught in delusion, there's a way that the ultimate truths show themselves.

I was noticing when I was in a really strong comparing mode, where if anyone would walk out of a door, there would be some judgment. They walk too close—they have no respect. They walk too fast—don't they know what's going on here? They walk too slow—they have no clear comprehension. Whatever it was, I suddenly realized it was totally self-centered. There's this sense of an unchanging reference point.

But the fact of total interdependence was really clear, because anything anybody did completely affected me. There was actually no way that anything could happen anywhere within my sense perception that I didn't feel a relatedness to it. It was just deluded, because all the relatedness was: how does it affect me, solid little me. But still, hidden under it was the sense of the interconnectedness of it all.

So somehow that quite amused me. And it also, in a strange way—this is sometimes how my mind has to find hope—that even when I'm totally caught in comparing and self, there can be a way to see through it to the fact that yes, we are all interconnected. I just have to see that I'm not the center of it all.

Looking at impermanence, awareness of impermanence, is what breaks down the comparing mind. On a logical level this makes sense, because in one way you see there's nothing solid to compare to. Either on the end of who's the better yogi—well, it's constantly changing. As I said before, there's no solid reference point externally, so to speak; it's always changing. And internally, there's no solid reference point to come back to for myself either.

Because just something as simple as: do I walk fast or slow? Some days fast, some days slow. Is my practice the way I like it? Some days yes, some days no. Some days it's the same, but the way I like it changed. So there is no really solid reference point. And the more we see that, any sense of comparing—there is no sense in it. So it starts to fall away.

Another thing that's helped me when I notice the comparing mind is strong: the most helpful approach is just to notice "comparing" and see if you can see what's actually happening. Often it's triggered by seeing. So a good practice at times when you feel pretty trapped in it is to deliberately just notice seeing, especially walking around, around other people.

For me, the dining room practice is really a great place to play with seeing how the comparing mind functions, and also to notice the peace on the odd moment when it's not there. It's like, oh, there's just what is. I don't have to do this relentless counting up and comparing—just tasting a bite.

I've found when the comparing is strong and when there's walking into the dining room with a really solid sense of me, kind of being barraged by all the activity and this constant measuring of this against me, this against me—that if I turn into a really open kind of practice, where instead of being so involved in my sensations or really careful with lifting, moving, placing, I actually open up and start being very present with hearing, with seeing... If I do that for some moments, sometimes the sense of solid Carol, or even a reference back to Carol, goes away, and there's just seeing and hearing. If there's a loud noise, there's just hearing, just sensation. And quite by itself, the reference point of me and them—who's that jerk who dropped the plate? Don't they know how to be mindful?—falls away. There's just seeing, hearing, sensing, emotion. And it all gets a lot lighter. The sense of separation tends to go away. So that's just something you might play with if you're noticing dining room practice is getting difficult.

All of these aspects that drive papañca tend to feed into strong storylines which contribute to maintaining our false assumption of self, the false assumption of me. One of the ways we can begin to notice that the sense of a continuing me is created is actually through our thoughts—this running commentary that you might have going all day. Or not even the running commentary, but the way we take perceptions, make a conclusion, and then tell ourselves stories, describe ourselves, describe our experiences, make comparisons, all day long. Unless we really look, it can feel as though it's the same me. The same me is telling this story as was telling the one yesterday. But if you really look, they're completely different experiences.

So we can begin to see how a sense perception, whether it's accurate or not, can lead into a whole proliferation based on craving or sense of self or conceit or comparing—that we end up becoming. This whole process of moving from bare perception to becoming this quickly is really quite often at the basis of our sense of self. It's one of the ways thoughts seem so solid, one of the ways that thoughts can really be a strong suffering aspect of experience, where we can feel really enslaved—unless we look. And in the looking, that solidity just vanishes, and a thought just becomes a thought.

A simple example: when you're walking or sitting and you're really present, it's pretty common for, at some point, the thought to arise, "This is it, now I've got it," or "I'm doing well, mindfulness is strong, I'm a good yogi"—whatever the story is. And as the papañca runs, and it doesn't have to be strong, we pick out all the perceptions that affirm that, all the past wonderful things we did in our life, all the times we were successful, all the times people liked us. We imagine into the future how we're going to inspire, how our friends are going to be awestruck when we return home in a radiant halo glow. They'll just say, "Oh my God, what happened to you? It's amazing."

And then, of course, we catch this. And the next thought is, "Oh my God, what an idiot I am. So self-centered." And then just the reverse—everything we ever did wrong, everything we started and never finished, all the ways we've never been able to function in any kind of clear way, and on into the future where we come home and our friends say, "You went for three months and you're worse of a mess than when you left." It's possible.

And we get involved in each of those, and we don't stop to look—it's just thoughts. Joseph has this saying I really love: "We're making it all up." And it's absolutely true. We're completely making it up.

You know that pretty well-known sutta where the Buddha is talking to a man who has very urgently said, "You've got to teach me right now, I have no time." The Buddha was on his way to alms round and he didn't want to. He said, "I'll do it when I come back." And the man asked three times, so he gave him this very pithy teaching which says: In the seen there is only the seen. In the heard there is only the heard. In what is sensed, felt with the body, there is only that. In what is cognized, known with the mind, there is only what is cognized. That's all.

It's very pithy. Can you imagine actually living like that? Everything else is interpretation. It's helpful that we often have the same interpretation, because then we can sort of function together—the interpretation of what a retreat means. It's helpful we all more or less agree on that. And who's in which role, that we come in here and we know who's supposed to talk and who's supposed to listen, or it could be really confusing. And we know that's only for this moment. If I thought I'm supposed to talk, that's my role all the time, I have to talk every minute, be giving dharma talks—I'd be insufferable.

So it's helpful interpretation, but what our practice is doing is helping us come back to absolutely the bare experience, seeing that we're making everything else up. This can be scary, but it's incredibly liberating. Experiment with it.

One time I was sitting in my room, and I heard crickets outside. Usually, and it did then, this brings up a whole welling of nostalgia and poignancy—fall and endings of things and sadness and loneliness, the feeling of "I could die here and no one would know for three days." It was really going down that road. And I said, okay. I'm making it all up. A thought is a thought. Let me deliberately shift it.

So I went back to hearing, hearing the crickets. And I thought, "Oh, isn't that lovely? The sound of the crickets, to be here in this beautiful spot in nature." And that felt forced, okay? I was doing that on purpose. But that's as far as I did on purpose.

And then the whole papañca just took off. "Isn't it wonderful? Life is so great! Here I am at this retreat center, and I have the opportunity to sit with all these other wonderful people." And it was just as real as the one before—which is to say, neither of them was real. It was just the mind making up that particular story, that particular sense of self.

Lily Tomlin said, "I always wanted to be somebody, but I should have been more specific."

So that's our job. Let's be a little more specific. Let's just notice what's really happening as opposed to what we think is happening. And then, if we know it's thoughts, it's nothing to be afraid of. It doesn't have to be an enslavement. When we understand that a thought is a thought, it's so liberating to have the sense that it's okay if thoughts come. It's okay if they have a little zing to them. But then we can just bring our attention back: a thought is just a thought. In what is cognized, there is only what is cognized.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "To have a correct perception, we need to have a direct encounter."

So that's our practice—the wise attention. Moment by moment, let's have a direct encounter, either with the perception that's giving rise to the thought, or if that's already gone or you can't notice it, with the thought itself, just the quality of thought arising. Its ephemeral nature. Notice the space around it, the space between thoughts, just so it doesn't have such a sense of solidity. Don't try to fight thoughts with thought. It's like a ghost fighting a ghost. You don't need to fight the mind with the mind. All we need is to bring attention onto the thought itself.

I just want to end with this from Huang Po. He says that we tend to be blinded by our sight, our hearing, our feeling and knowing, and the conceptual thinking arising from it. When we're blinded by this thinking, we don't perceive the radiance of the source. But when we're not deluded—when there's just the sight, hearing, feeling, and knowing, when we're not blinded by all the conceptual thinking—this source will appear like the sun rising through the empty sky and illuminating the whole universe.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 294

Wisdom and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 20 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that often arises in insight meditation practice: if everything is empty and impermanent, what's the point? She responds by highlighting the Buddha's teaching that liberation requires two wings—great wisdom and great compassion—and that these are not separate but intimately intertwined.
> Wilson examines how the wisdom of emptiness, impermanence, and non-self translates into the world of action and relationship. She focuses on intention (cetanā) as the crucial meeting point where understanding and compassion converge. Drawing on the Noble Eightfold Path, she explains how right understanding naturally gives rise to right intention, which the Buddha defined as renunciation countering greed, mettā countering ill will, and karuṇā countering cruelty. These wholesome intentions then shape our speech, actions, and livelihood.
> The talk offers practical wisdom about examining our motivations honestly. Wilson illustrates how the same outward action can arise from vastly different intentions—fear, compassion, self-consciousness, or anger—and how karma is determined not by results but by the quality of intention behind our actions. She encourages practitioners to recognize that compassion and loving-kindness are our true home, the natural expression of clear seeing, rather than the kilesas we've grown so familiar with. This teaching invites us to feel at home with wholesome mind states and to understand that the inner work of watching our intentions with honesty is itself a powerful contribution to the world.

Tonight I want to speak about compassion and wisdom.

A lot of the emphasis in this particular style of practice is on the development of wisdom, on the uncovering of the nature of things as they really are. And sometimes questions come up, both in interviews and in our hearts and minds: What's the point of it? When we come to the place of emptiness, where all things arise and pass, when we emphasize so much in our practice that we're not here to achieve any particular state of heart or mind, that we're not here to change anything, that it really doesn't matter what's happening—the question comes up: Well, I didn't come here to stay the same, really. So what are we doing this for?

I'm being a little facetious, but the question does come up in that way. It's easy at times to forget that the Buddha's teaching is comprised of two wings—a bird has two wings to fly—that of great wisdom and great compassion. So I want to speak a little tonight about how they come together, with the emphasis more on compassion. This is really just an introduction.

The wisdom of emptiness, of no separate self, of impermanence—that there's nothing to cling to—this experience of liberation through non-clinging is really in some ways the crux of what we speak about, of what our practice is about. And in a moment of that experience, or really more in the moments after that experience when we're thinking about it, or thinking ahead to what it's going to be like in daily life, questions come up about the world of action. How does this wisdom of emptiness, this freedom of non-reactivity, manifest in the world of choice, in the world of interrelationship with other beings, in the world where we have decisions to make and actions to take? How does wisdom translate?

It's here that the second wing of compassion comes into flower. We need to really see and understand the importance of this, because the natural expression of wisdom is love and compassion. It's almost not something we have to crank up. In a moment of knowing things as they really are, deeply, the natural manifestation of that is love and compassion. Sometimes one side is highlighted, sometimes another in our experience, but a really rich, developed wisdom will have both aspects.

We can see in ourselves times when the impermanence, the emptiness, the no-self is really strong. There can be a real peace, a loveliness in that, a sense of freedom, but it can also feel somewhat cool, a bit removed. Not indifferent, but you could see how it could go in that direction. And then on the other side, there are times when we're just practicing karuna, compassion, or metta, loving-kindness. A lot of the questions that come up around that are: Well, this is nice when it's working. It feels lovely. It's a really good mental state—which seems to be fostering the sense of self. Or: Metta is just seeing the nice side of things. I've had people actually say to me that they are resistant to the idea of metta because to them it gives the sense of being a wimp—you just love everything, you accept everything, you forgive everything, and you just let people walk all over you.

We can see how both of these are exaggerated, but also how a true, deep, rich freedom of heart and mind encompasses both.

One place where wisdom or understanding and compassion or metta come together is in this aspect of mind: the mental factor of intention. I really love the way the Buddha put these things together. He had such an incredible mind.

When we're sitting, when we're walking, when we're here on retreat and to a great extent insulated from having to make any huge decisions—certainly any life decisions; we wish, we beg you not to make any life decisions while you're here—then you can sit and walk and watch every state of mind and heart come and go and really see that none of it is who you are. A moment of aversion, a moment of love, a moment of reactivity, a moment of boredom, a moment of wisdom—all are empty. They can all come and go, and the vivid, awake nature of mind doesn't care. Awareness doesn't really care what's arising within it. It's untouched, unstained, and we can experience that.

But where these states of heart and mind, where the way we understand reality, ourselves, and the world does begin to matter, does begin to have an effect, is when these states of heart and mind become the factors that give rise to intentions.

As you know, we've spoken of intention. It's this inclination of mind that gives rise to action, that gives rise to speech. It often manifests as a thought, but not always—that little "about to" that we've been talking about through the retreat, that you've been noticing and experimenting with in your sittings and walkings.

Intention, of course, doesn't arise without conditioning. It's conditioned by the previous moments and by whatever state of heart and mind is accompanying it. This is where the state of heart and mind that's giving rise to intention does begin to matter. When the Buddha speaks of karma, wholesome and unwholesome karma, the word karma translates simply as action. And as we've said, the seed, the heart, the strength of all action is not in how it looks or in the result that comes from the action or speech, but completely in the intention that gives rise to that action. That's why we give so much emphasis to beginning to be able to even notice that there's an intention at all before an action, and then noticing what actually is the nature of that intention—what states of heart and mind are giving rise to it.

This volition, this impulse, is the crux of what is creating wholesome or unwholesome karma, actions, and results in our own lives and in the lives of others with whom we come into contact.

So, for example, the same action that from the outside might look identical could be motivated by many different intentions. And we, looking on from the outside, can never really know what somebody else's intention is—unless we have developed the psychic power of mind-reading, which some people think teachers have cultivated.

Once when I was in Thailand, staying in a monastery in Bangkok that many Western monks would come through to get their visas, a number of them arrived from a forest monastery in northeastern Thailand. They were convinced that their Ajahn could read their every thought, even when they were in Bangkok. It was really interesting, because they were so paranoid about it. It wasn't like, "Oh, he can read my mind, so I'll maintain perfect sila." They did maintain their conduct, but with this total paranoia. Very interesting.

From the outside, though, we normal worldlings cannot read each other's minds. But what we can do is look in our own mind and heart and see what intention is giving rise to an action. This is a different way of looking at our activities from what we're normally used to in daily life. We tend to judge an activity by its results. Was it a good thing to do? It was if it got the results we wanted, or if we came off looking good, or if people feel good, or whatever. But you could do something with a really clear intention that doesn't turn out the way you want. And in this aspect of karma, that's not what matters. It's the intention.

So if you get up now and start coughing and run out of the hall, there could be numerous intentions giving rise to that action. It could be one of total terror—that you look like a fool and have to get out of here because people are going to hate you. It could be real compassion, just genuinely feeling like, "I might be bothering people, I might upset the talk," and so you leave. It might be self-consciousness. It might be anger. It might be relief that you can get out of here. It could be a lot of different things. And the action looks exactly the same.

Knowing the importance of intention, seeing how the Buddha placed this in the second step of the Eightfold Path, you see how significant it is. The first stage of the Eightfold Path is right understanding or wise understanding—the beginning of the path, how we understand ourselves, how we understand the world, which of course is deepening and changing throughout our whole practice. But we begin with how we understand things, how we understand the world. And that leads into the second step, which is variously translated as wise thought, right thought, or right intention.

How we understand ourselves and the world gives rise to how we think about things, our intentions, which lead to the third, fourth, and fifth stages of the path: right speech, right action, and right livelihood. So it's right at this crux of intention that wisdom and understanding intersect with all the choices, all the actions, all the ways that we as active, connected human beings are and act in the world.

When the Buddha spoke about right thought as this second stage of the path, or right intention, he was very clear about what the three so-called right intentions are. And the point I really want to make clearly tonight is that these right intentions arise naturally through our understanding, through the wisdom that arises from mindfulness. It's not some fluke that happens simply from paying attention.

The three right thoughts or right intentions the Buddha spoke of are: renunciation or generosity, counteracting the tendency to greed; metta or friendliness, counteracting the tendency to ill will; and compassion, which arises out of clear seeing and counteracts the habit of cruelty.

I want to speak tonight about this way of looking at compassion—that it is the natural manifestation of a heart and mind of understanding. It is much more the manifestation of who we really are than all these kilesas we talk about so ceaselessly, that we've made such friends with, that we feel so much at home with: greed, hatred, and delusion. It's time for us to really recognize that compassion, loving-kindness, and generosity are our true home. These are really the intentions that arise out of clear seeing. And we can begin to feel more at home with these, recognize these, rest in these, and not think it's some mistake when they happen to arise in our experience.

It's true that the seed of intention ultimately flowers—or as Ruth Denison describes karma: you don't get away with nothing. At some point it manifests. And we can see this in the world, God knows, in politics with all the rhetoric. Oh, because we just had the election—you all are really lucky you haven't had to listen to all this stuff for a month. Just rhetoric, rhetoric, rhetoric. And I really think many of the politicians believe what they say about wanting to help the country and show kindness to all beings. But when we see where the actions actually lead, at some point it's quite obvious what intentions are actually guiding decisions and behavior.

I don't want to just dump on the politicians—it's not like they're the only ones on this planet. But friends, good friends who do a lot of environmental work, will talk often about starting with really clear intentions of caring for the planet and running into so much suffering, so much delusion, so much greed, that the motivation naturally turns to frustration and anger. They may continue to act with great energy and caring, and the actions seem good in themselves, but because the intention starts turning to anger, the people themselves—it's as if the anger begins to eat them up.

And in this way, an intention, even if the actions are for the good, will flower. We can't really hide from it.

So what we do here—and this is what I mean by let's not just pick out the politicians—is we look in ourselves. Someone said to me on a retreat last year, I think during one of the periods when Bosnia was really strong in the news, and it's a valid question. It was a question really: What good are we doing here? Sitting here watching our minds, our thoughts, our emotions come and go, the breath come and go, cultivating thoughts of goodwill and compassion—just sitting here safe and secure. What good is this doing anybody when people in Bosnia are killing each other?

In the past I would have thought my answer was a nice rationalization. I really believe it's true now—not as a start, but as something fundamental.

To begin with, what we're doing is very powerful because we're bringing all our care, our honesty, our compassion to ourselves, to look with great honesty at why we're doing what we're doing—just in our little actions day to day here. And we discover both great wisdom, great compassion, great love. And we do run into our old friends, the torments of mind, from time to time.

And we see, when we look deeply, there's a level on which I'm not really any different from somebody in Bosnia or Rwanda who really loses it and kills somebody. I mean, how many of us have had really serious murderous fantasies here?

CHAPTER 295

The Joy of the Way

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> Drawing from the Dhammapada's invitation to "know the sweet joy of living in the way," Carol Wilson offers a deeply encouraging teaching on how the Buddha's path is fundamentally one of happiness. She addresses the common difficulties that arise in the final days of long retreat—whether clinging to peaceful states, feeling discouraged by persistent conditioning, or confronting unmet expectations—reminding practitioners that these challenges signal opportunities to investigate clinging rather than signs of failure.
> The heart of this talk explores dāna (generosity) and sīla (ethical conduct) as complete practices of liberation in themselves, not merely preliminary supports for meditation. Wilson shares vivid stories from her time as a nun in Thailand, illustrating how generous giving and receiving dissolve the sense of separation and actualize the "heart and mind of non-clinging." She offers practical guidance for working with generosity as a moment-to-moment practice: purifying intention before giving, being fully present in the act, and learning to receive openly as an expression of interconnectedness.
> Wilson emphasizes that conscious conduct springs from compassion and strengthens our understanding of oneness with all beings. Referencing the Sallekha Sutta's teaching on effacement, she highlights how the Buddha placed wholesome speech and action among the most powerful means for eradicating mental defilements. The talk concludes with an invitation to consciously reflect on our kind actions—not from conceit, but to gladden the heart and strengthen awakening. This accessible teaching reminds us that the path of freedom is available in every moment through our simplest acts of care and generosity.

Tonight I want to talk about the happiness of the path.

A short excerpt from the Dhammapada: "By your own efforts, waken yourself, watch yourself, and live joyfully. Follow the truth of the way. Reflect upon it. Make it your own. Live it and it will always sustain you." And from another line in the same Dhammapada: "Know the sweet joy of living in the way."

Sometimes the fact that we're really on a path of happiness gets a little lost. We forget. And I know that the last week or so of a long retreat can at times be quite difficult, for different reasons. I'm putting this out because I want you all to know it's normal if you're feeling that sometimes things seem more difficult than they have been.

Sometimes it seems difficult because actually things are going really well and we like it and it's tranquil and peaceful and there's so much insight, and the thought comes: "How can I hold on to this when I leave and I get busy?" And sometimes it's just the reverse—that we begin to see how strongly our old familiar conditionings and patterns can come popping up at the drop of a hat, so to speak. And we can feel rather chagrined at times. "Well, what was the point of all this? Here I am, just the same me." In fact, we can get quite wrapped up in that. It can seem rather discouraging.

Or a third possibility is we're coming up against some last view we were holding of what freedom really should look like and what should have happened by now. And it didn't, obviously, whatever it should have been. If there's still some holding to that view, for all of these reasons, it can seem a bit bumpier, a bit more difficult at times in this last week.

Again, none of this stuff happening needs to be a problem. None of it's a mistake. Of course the same conditionings arise. If you keep paying attention, you'll see that there is actually the potential for meeting them with a lot more wisdom, a lot more spaciousness. You just don't remember, really, what it was like the first week of the retreat. You won't remember that until your next retreat, the first week, and then you'll go, "Oh yeah." So even though it might feel the same, it's very different.

I'm bringing that up because sometimes in this, we begin to engender a sense of struggle. Remember, if anything arising is a problem, it's not the thing in itself. It's because somehow we think it should be different. Just take the conflict not as a sign that something's wrong, but as a signal to look: Where's the clinging in this moment?

Simeon the New Theologian said once that the more a person enters the light of understanding, the more she or he is aware of her own ignorance. Think about that. It's true, and it's not a bad sign.

When we're in the phase—which can last a long time in our practice—where we're seeing and feeling the painful nature of clinging, the completely ephemeral nature of pleasant feeling, it feels like we really know: clinging is bondage, the heart of non-clinging is freedom, there's nothing to cling to. And we turn around in a moment of awareness, and just some pleasant thing arises, and we're gone out of our walking path and out the door. We don't even know how we got there. Well, how did that happen? I'm so clear that clinging is bondage and there's nothing worth clinging to. Why am I gone so quickly?

We can get wrapped up in discouragement at that if we don't see that that's just another identification. We can look at it a different way: the craving came up, it's strong. We learn to respect—a healthy respect—for the power of habit and conditioning. It really eases our way in this life. And you can also see that as strong as that craving came up and drove us, just as quickly the awareness was there and cut through the whole dynamic again.

Just as craving can arise and drive us, so too can awareness, connectedness, resting at home in the nature of mind be present just like that. And at times we have a choice in how we view our practice—whether the glass is half empty or half full. So in this, I want to remind us to notice how quickly, how easily, how immediately wakefulness is again present. And recognizing the power of our conditioning is the beginning or the middle of our becoming more free from it. It's not that we're worse than ever.

So this is just the preamble. What I want to talk about is really our path—the path that the Buddha has given us as teachings. It is a path of happiness, and we can forget that the path he showed us is much more vast than a meditation retreat. As vast as our meditation practice is, as vast as the Brahma Viharas are, and all the ways we can learn to be present with mindfulness—as vast as all this is, a retreat is only part of our path.

When the Buddha would give his teachings, he didn't simply start with meditation practice. He always talked about three aspects of our path: dana, sila, bhavana. Dana being generosity, sila being ethical or conscious conduct, and bhavana usually translated as mental development. You could say our formal meditation practices come under bhavana.

I'd like to talk a bit tonight about the first two aspects of this path, because I think sometimes we acknowledge that they're important, saying "yes, yes, they're important so that we can have a little peace, so that we can meditate." But seeing that dana and sila are in themselves paths—ways of living that bring deep peace and happiness—is essential. Each of these, and this is my opinion now, are practices of liberation, of freedom, of actualizing the heart and mind of non-clinging, of realizing through speech and action the wisdom of compassion.

The Buddha said over and over that there's no higher happiness than peace. The peace of a heart of non-clinging, the peace of resting in the clear, vivid wakefulness that is our birthright. That's the peace of what you could call emptiness. It's also the happiness of metta, the happiness of compassion—two sides of the same coin.

And everything the Buddha taught, if we really read or listen to his words, it seems like—okay, this is a generalization—but it seems like he really wasn't into fluff. He said, like he said over and over, "I teach one thing and one thing only: suffering and the end of suffering. The sure heart's release." If you think of that and then see how much he emphasized the teachings of dana and sila, you realize that these weren't secondary instructions—as in "I'll teach the laypeople dana and sila because that's the best they can do, and save the good stuff for the monks." Sometimes it might feel like that, actually.

When I was in Thailand, it was interesting to be in a country where Buddhism is the main cultural context, because you can get a feeling both for the depth of understanding of how it's practiced, but also—as with any formal religion—I shouldn't say any, but from what I've seen of the formal religions in this country, especially Christianity and Judaism, similar to Buddhism in Thailand, it is met and understood on all different layers of wisdom. On the deepest layers, of course, there is the practice of freedom. But on the layers of just taking it in as culture, many of the Thai people are really quite wonderful in working with dana and sila. Yet I would get the sense when I was there as a nun, even speaking to people, that the dana culture, while quite inspiring, didn't quite have the depth—it was sort of, "the best I can do is be generous; you do the meditation for me." People would actually say that.

I think this really downplays the depth of the practice of dana and sila. Because if we look at them deeply, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, if we really inquire into these two aspects of the Buddha's teaching, we can see that besides being a way of living happily in the world with ourselves and one another, they are also moment-to-moment actualizations of a heart and mind of non-clinging.

Living happily, experiencing joy, gladdening the heart—I don't mean the specific mental factor of rapture, but a more broad feeling of gladdening the heart, of happiness—is actually very important in our practice, on our path of awakening. We've talked a lot about dependent arising, beginning with ignorance and going through all the cycles and ending with suffering. And there's another, called the transcendental dependent arising, that begins with suffering and then proceeds through to awakening with different steps. Suffering gives rise to faith, and faith gives rise to this joy, this gladdening of the heart. And this is a supportive condition for awakening.

So we've gone on a lot about how suffering is a supportive condition for awakening. But it is important because it brings faith, because it brings gladdening of the heart, which then leads on to tranquility, and then happiness—a kind of lightness—which then leads to concentration, knowledge and vision of things as they are. I'm not going to go through all of them—disenchantment, dispassion, emancipation. But the point I'm trying to make is that living in a way, relating to ourselves and one another in a way that brings happiness, is not just about holding on to pleasant feeling. This gladdening of the heart sets the conditions for awakening.

The practice of dana, of generosity—the Buddha emphasized this very strongly. It was usually one of the first things he taught, especially to laypeople. For me, it continues to take a lot of very deep inquiring into it and paying attention to the effect of generosity in my heart and mind. I think I'm only just beginning to appreciate the power of generosity as a practice of liberation. And along the way, it brings so much happiness, so much joy into our lives.

In fact, when I reflect on generosity and on how in the Buddha's teachings nothing he taught was extra, nothing was extraneous, I have a huge amount of respect for how he set up his sasana, how he set up the way that the nuns and monks and laypeople related to each other—because it was totally based in generosity.

From, of course, it's clear for the nuns and monks—they were completely dependent on the generosity of lay people for food, for their requisites, for any kind of place to stay. And a lot of the strict rules that were laid down would ensure that this sense of connection to the lay people through generosity couldn't be broken.

Just a simple example: you can't keep food overnight. So you get enough food for that meal, that one meal for that day, and if there's anything extra, you give it away. There's no holding on, so that each new day becomes another day where the different groups of people meet each other through generosity.

In the monasteries, it's really something to see. When I was a nun in Thailand, at the monasteries I stayed at, the monks would go out on alms round, but the nuns didn't so much. The one place I know where a nun did go, she didn't receive as much. The monks would get huge amounts, and the nuns not so much because the lay people weren't really used to nuns coming around.

At one place I stayed in Bangkok, which was in a very wealthy area, the amounts were enormous—really unbelievable. On the Sundays, which are sort of like a church day here, rather than going on bindabat, the monks would all sit on a curved stone wall, and lay people would come, much like going to church, bringing food to the monks, hearing a talk from the Ajahn, eating all the leftovers, having a big picnic together—like a social, really a very nice gathering.

The monks would be sitting there, and part of the dana is also receiving, so they don't say, "No, I don't want that, take it back." By the end of all the lay people bringing their food, these monks would have a pile of little plastic bags of curries in front of them. I mean, I'm not kidding—it would be this high. Huge amounts of food.

Well, that food would feed everybody in the wat. After they took what they wanted, they sent it all back to the middle, and I was the only nun there, so it would go to me, and then to all the young boys, the temple boys, all the lay people who were there, then any visitors. After that, we'd pass it on to all the dogs and the cats and the chickens, and nothing goes to waste. It's really quite a nice system.

And on the other aspect of it, the lay people receive the generosity of the monks and nuns because it's so clear—the Buddha, from the very beginning, as soon as any of the nuns and monks had reached levels of understanding, immediately sent them out to teach. Go share this with all beings. That's the point of this. So it's this way he set up the sasana in this symbiotic relationship based on generosity of heart.

And it's really giving everybody—not saying you have to be generous, you have to be nice—but giving people every day the opportunity to practice through action the heart and mind of non-clinging. Because that's what generosity really is. It's both aspects: the emptiness of not holding on and the fullness of metta, the generosity of heart that freely gives whatever is needed.

One of the things I really learned about generosity from my time in Thailand was the power of joy that living and acting from this deep commitment to generosity brought to people there.

At one of the temples I stayed at, a small one way out in the woods, all the temples of course are completely supported by the generosity of lay people. At this particular temple, the number of monks and nuns fluctuates all the time because the way these temples operate is also on generosity. You don't call up and make a reservation and they say, "Let me see if I have room on this day." People just show up. And when you show up, they find somewhere to put you. And it's not like, "Here's another one, where are we going to put her?" There's this happiness, this welcoming.

So this place I was staying, Tam Tong—on the nuns' side, it was back in the woods, nuns on one side of a river and the monks on the other. There were just five or six little kutis, little huts for the nuns. This was the practice area, the silent area. When I showed up, a foreigner, they really went out of their way to be kind, and they gave me a little private hut. That was fine for some time. There were just as many of us as there were huts.

Then one day, maybe five or ten nuns showed up. And without a murmur, the first woman to give up her hut was the head nun, a young woman who was very committed to her practice, very inspiring. She was the only person there who spoke English, and I actually got to know her some. Instead of saying, "Oh well, since I guess I'm in charge, I have to give it up," she was so happy. She'd have nuns come and stay in her hut. All the other nuns doubled up, tripled up, quadrupled up in these tiny little cottages.

But me, of course—they never even thought about it because I was the foreigner, the guest. I should be treated special. So I always had a hut by myself. But it wasn't just the ease. It was the joy that would come from this experience.

This not even thinking about the quality of giving.

And I reflected at the time both on how constricted I felt. Gee, I hope they don't put somebody in with me—that was really my thought. Oh, I wish I too could be generous. The feeling of constriction I felt, and the happiness I could see in the other nuns.

I thought back to the times I was on staff here, when the place was really full and overflowing. We didn't have a stampede of who was going to give up their room so more yogis could come and sit. I'm not saying we should, but I just really did contrast the difference in attitude. And I felt, who's happier? Who's more at ease here? Who's actually learning to live from compassion and non-clinging through this generosity?

Everywhere I went in Thailand, there were just innumerable examples. I had to stay in the city for a while, in Chiang Mai, going to physical therapy every day. A young woman, a nurse, took me into her home—begged me to come, would have been insulted if I didn't—and insisted on getting up every morning at four to make me breakfast. I was wishing she wouldn't do it.

And this is where I learned the other aspect of the joy of generosity: to be the open and connected receiver. She was acting out of real connectedness and love. When I would say, "No, please don't do it," it was like a block to that connectedness, to the movement back and forth of metta and of generosity. When I could just open up and really receive—not in an "oh, I'm so glad she's taking care of me" way, but simply feeling the love and the generosity coming from her—it was transformative. And it wasn't really for me. Being a member of the Sangha, you remember that you're always simply a representative, and what's done for you is done for the Dharma, not for you as a person so much. Receiving in that way is extremely powerful. You see that it's not about this person being generous to this person, but about the flowing energy of compassion, of non-clinging. It was a wonderful experience of the joy of generosity.

Often I've seen that the poorest people are the ones who can be the most generous and have the most joy in that generosity. Recently, in April I think, at Yucca Valley, we were watching a video called Home to Tibet about a Tibetan refugee who lives in western Massachusetts. He's a stone mason—he builds stone walls, so you can see why living here is a good place for him. In this video, after many years living in America, he was going home to Tibet to visit his family, whom he hadn't seen for so long. An American couple went with him and secretly filmed this reunion.

I don't remember the whole thing, but I remember him getting back to the small village where his sister lived with her family, and of course how happy and sad the whole reunion was. But also his being somewhat shocked to see the hardships of their life and how old his sister had come to look. You could really see the two of them together in the video, how much she had aged. You could feel the sense of the hardships—just barely having enough food, very severe living conditions.

At some point towards the end—I forget the details—but I guess he had brought a lot of gifts and also some money. The sister, now having a little bit of money, was so happy, radiant with happiness. Because since she had just enough to eat, she could take this money and finally make offerings to the monasteries and monks near her, whom she felt as her spiritual support.

Seeing her, it was so clear this wasn't a "should"—not "I haven't paid my dues and I'm going to the hell realms." This was a source of such joy for her. You could see it radiate. It was so powerful to see, and to see in that moment that generosity is so clearly a liberation practice. Someone in that state—there wasn't any holding to something for me, no sense of separation, but just that joy: what I have is yours. It was really beautiful.

Metta is a kind of generosity—generosity of the heart, you could say. Just that straightforward well-wishing that wants nothing back.

Generosity can be quite spontaneous, as in some of these examples. And like everything else, we can bring our mindful attention to this area of generosity and really explore consciously how it works and what the effects are. During one of the times I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, the monk who was with him, Sayadaw U Janaka, gave this wonderful talk on dana and some of the ways we can work with it. I want to share some of what he said then about working with generosity.

Again, aside from it being a practice of happiness and a nice thing to do, if we really look deeply in a moment of true generosity, we see that first it's about intention—not about just how it looks. As they say, not to give with resentment, not to give detesting the gift or those who are receiving it. It's possible. "Okay, take it then, you stupid jerk." That's not what we're talking about in generosity.

One could give millions of dollars that way—to look good, or to get something back, or for tax purposes. I don't know. But it's really about looking deeply at the intention, at the motivation. That's the heart of generosity.

And when we look, we can see how obviously an action of generosity brings a sense of unity, a sense of connectedness. That's why it's often said, if you're feeling difficulty with someone, try giving them a gift—a real heartfelt gift. Because to do that, there has to be a sense of connection. To really give from that space of letting go, there's a sense of connection, and that helps. That brings us together again.

So working with dāna as a practice of freedom, a moment-to-moment practice of heart, of non-clinging—starting with the volition. That sense of: can I give this without wanting anything in return? Even recognition. Even having the person know, "It is I who gave this." How interesting it is. There can be just such a little sense of confirmation we need back. But remember, it's a practice.

And as with every wholesome act, it is accompanied by compassion. Compassion is the root cause of every wholesome action. So in a way, both dāna and sīla basically spring from compassion, and as such strengthen our understanding of connectedness.

These are the steps that Sayadaw and Jan Panika talked about. In deciding to be generous—whether you're giving a thing, whether you're giving of your time, whether you're just giving energy, a willing ear to listen, it doesn't matter what—pay attention to the volition. Let the volition purify, because of course often we have very mixed intentions when we go to give. So just let it settle and see what our intention is. Purify.

As Robert Aitken says, with every generous act, let it be the generous act of the bodhisattvas. At our deepest level, our intention can be: with this act, may all beings be free from suffering. That's one level, but any level down to simply "can I give it" works as well.

See and abandon the clinging to that thing—whether it's your time, whether it's an object, whatever it is, whether it's service. Can we look at our intention and see and abandon the clinging to it?

Sometimes, of course not always, we find that the giving is face-to-face, hand-to-hand. If it's your time or energy and you're doing something with a person—face-to-face. Or if you're actually handing somebody an object—hand-to-hand. This isn't always possible or even advisable. But if that is the case, to do it hand to hand, to really be there with full presence and commitment, is a very powerful way of inhabiting the act of generosity.

I got a good lesson in this from Sayadaw U Pandita about the powerfulness of this interrelatedness in generosity. I was giving him a book, which I think I had had somebody else buy for me since I was on retreat. I had inscribed it but had them give it to him. And when I went in for my next interview, he took the book and basically told me: there's the book, pick it up and you give it to me, face to face.

And it was really lovely, because it wasn't like he said, "Okay, thanks," and put it down. He was really there—one hundred percent present with a really open heart, really a mettā heart. I could feel it, just really honoring that intention of generosity. And that made me be there, fully present.

I could see the ways that sometimes I might want to just give something and not really quite own it—all those feelings of "what if they don't like it?" or "what will they think of me?" or "is it good enough?" None of that has anything to do with generosity. Generosity isn't about the bigger the better. It's not even about the person having to say, "Oh, aren't you incredible? This is the best book I ever received." It's simply about that intention of connecting, of mettā, of letting go.

What he was doing was really teaching me to inhabit fully, with mind and body, that act of generosity. It was very powerful.

And so then, whether you're face to face or not, give with your attention fully focused on the act of giving. Of course, again, we're fully inhabiting it. This strengthens the power of the volition of generosity. It strengthens the compassion. Rather than, "Oh, okay, here, take it and I'll be on my way."

Just be fully present. And then afterwards, continue to pay attention, because often we notice how we do something really wholeheartedly and then, "Ah, gee, but maybe I could have used that." Or, "That was good, but maybe I could have done something else with my time." These little regrets can come in. Just be mindful of that. So we purify the volition beforehand, we purify the volition afterwards.

And then, as with all acts, being aware of the broader context—that whatever giving or doing is not just to satisfy our own need to give, but that it is truly useful, that it's in a context where it's helpful. For example, if I have a friend who's manic depressive and she's in a really manic stage spending all her money, my idea to give her a gift of a lot of money at that time might not be very skillful. It might be much better to wait until she could use it in a healthy way. It's simply putting the generosity in a context of what's really helpful.

And then I added this last one, which I mentioned before: allowing oneself to receive in a very present, wholehearted, and open way. Because when we receive in this way, we are also moving out of our self-cherishing. When people give you a compliment and we want to deflect it, that's really self-cherishing. It stops the connectedness. Or when in Thailand, if you just talked about money, I had so much more at home—even here I don't have much, but compared to there I had much more than the people giving. But to say, "No, no, don't give me anything, I'll go out and buy an omelet," really stops the whole flow of compassion and connection.

So practice receiving generosity in a really open-hearted and present way. It's a wonderful practice of liberating ourselves from our sense of self-cherishing, from our sense of separateness. If you're really receiving someone's compassion and generosity, I guarantee you're not going to feel separate. And that is really the practice of compassion and emptiness. And it's joyful besides. It's a really beautiful way to live.

Even years later—for instance now when I'm talking about the time in Thailand—just the memory coming up of the joy and the incredible generosity of the people brings up in me such a happiness, such a joy. It brightens and gladdens the heart in this moment. It's really karmic fruit. When we talk about karmic results, we tend to often look at, "It's so bad, so this is my result from that," and then we rebel against it. But these moments of happiness are also karmic results of that generosity at that time. And so over all these years—it's been a long time—I can feel just the same strong sense of oneness with these people as I felt then. And the happiness and gladdening of the heart leads one into the ability to be more awake, more present, less clinging.

So we practice, and sometimes it might seem like a practice of generosity, but it moves from practice into such a natural way of being that one doesn't even think of it as generosity anymore. It's just of course. As Shantideva put it, who wrote the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life: "Even when I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises. It is just like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return." Just that. You couldn't even call it generosity. It's just like having fed myself. The actualization of our oneness. It's the beginning of our practice and it's also the pinnacle of our understanding.

Sila is much the same way. I'm not going to talk as much about sila—I know Steve talked about it quite a bit the other night. I just want to emphasize these two aspects: the happiness it brings to our hearts and minds through our commitment to ethical conduct, and that just as with dana, attention to our speech and actions is not only laying a foundation for our awakening, but is a moment-to-moment practice of freedom and compassion.

Really, commitment to conscious conduct is an act of compassion towards ourselves and all beings. It's an actualization in speech and action of our understanding of our oneness with all beings. Even the smallest act of kindness, even the smallest act of non-cruelty, of care, of carefulness with our speech—it doesn't have to be amazing renunciations—but even the smallest act of care with our action and speech is an expression of compassion, of our understanding that we are all one.

And again, I find that by really investigating with care why we do what we do, why we say what we say, and the effects—again without judgment, but with interest and investigation—what are the effects on ourselves and others of what we say and do, all we have to do is pay attention. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, mindfulness is really the only precept. Because if we're really mindful, we take care, we're responsible. And as soon as we're paying attention, we can't help but notice that anything we do that comes from cruelty, from carelessness, from anger, has such a strong effect on ourselves, sometimes even stronger. As soon as I see—usually I have to say, for me it's usually going to be wrong speech—it's out the mouth.

It kind of missed the censor. The words didn't even show up on the screen, and it's out the mouth. Hopefully you won't discover this happening to you next week.

So when that happens, it's gotten to be so much that I just have to see the slightest ripple on somebody's face and already I feel reverberations that are so painful. It's not even something—it's not an idea. It's so obvious that carelessness which brings suffering to somebody else is immediately the same suffering, or even more, that I'm feeling. There's no way to separate it.

So when the Buddha talks about protecting ourselves to protect others, we often speak of paying attention to the five precepts—just the five basic lay precepts: not killing, not taking what's not given, not hurting ourselves or others with our sexuality, not lying or speaking maliciously, and not using drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind. Just those five. It doesn't seem like a lot to ask, but as Steve said the other night—what did he say? Some huge number, right? Ten trillion or something actual rules that it turns into.

But if we don't think of it as rules, if we just think of it as paying attention, it's so obvious that by protecting ourselves from the pain of remorse, from the pain of disharmony, we're protecting all beings.

I know that often when morality is spoken of or thought of, we begin by thinking of it on this level as a foundation for practice. "The bliss of blamelessness" is a phrase that's often used. And I'm sure you can all relate to those times sitting here when some unskillful thing we've done in the past—whether it was yesterday or when we were five, whether it was something seriously awful or just some slighting comment we made to a third-grade companion that we know hurt their feelings—comes to mind. I've gone through agony over stuff like that, really feeling the pain, the remorse that comes from unskillful, uncaring conduct. We can all relate to the bliss of blamelessness, the happiness of simply not making waves in the world.

That is, of course, one level of working with sīla—just the bare basis so we can have a relatively calm mind to then get on to the real stuff: the mental development, the samādhi, the wisdom. But thinking about what we do when we can't hold on to the samādhi four weeks from now, three months from now, in the middle of New York City, trying to walk down the street—lifting, moving, placing—what about my nice samādhi? Forget it.

But we can pay attention to why we're doing and saying what we're doing and saying, walking down the streets of New York. Do we say, "This is my right of way, you move over, buddy," in our mind? Or can we just step aside with a real sense of connection and kindness? Nobody else even knows it's happening. What's the difference in the effect on our heart and mind? The difference between conflict, separation, fear, holding my space—and spaciousness, connectedness, a heart and mind of non-clinging, compassion.

I feel very deeply that paying attention to sīla is a very profound path of liberation. And the Buddha spoke of it in this way. There's one sutta called "Effacement"—really about erasing all the kilesas, you could say. It describes different ways of radically removing these kilesas, these torments of mind, which is another metaphor for freedom. And he says in this sutta, "I say that even the inclination of mind towards wholesome states is of great benefit." Just the inclining of the mind. "So what should be said of bodily and verbal acts conforming to such a state of mind?"

The power of bodily and verbal wholesome actions is so strong that he then goes through—I'll spare you the list—but it's a list of forty-four different ways that contribute to this complete eradication of the defilements. And each of these forty-four, he goes through in about five different ways, but it's the same list. The first on the list is non-cruelty, or compassion, because compassion, as I said, is the root of all virtuous action. And of the first fifteen on this list, thirteen deal with simply wholesome speech and action—just the basics: non-cruelty, non-killing, non-lying, non-malicious speech, all the basic precepts.

He's saying these are ways to completely eradicate these torments, these defilements of mind. He's not saying this is just a nice thing to do so that later you can get enlightened. These are first on the list.

So here it's really saying that not only does conscious conduct—acting from our sense of oneness—bring happiness here and now, it is also a very powerful path of freedom, of touching through our actions that place of pure awareness, of non-clinging, of non-separation. Because in order to act from compassion, from any of the precepts, we're acting from compassion. And every action of compassion further strengthens our living experience of our oneness, which again deepens our understanding of emptiness. It's like a whole cycle that keeps going.

And another thing I think we sometimes overlook is the gladdening of the heart in the present moment when we are acting from non-harming.

This is very powerful. Again, it's the same as with generosity. An act of non-harming plants what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy—seeds that can ripen at any time, that gladden our heart in the present and in the future.

This can arise spontaneously, but it's also something we can call on as a skillful means, in or out of formal practice, to help us become more connected to ourselves, to others, to our experience in this moment.

I'll give you an example of a spontaneous arising just the other day. Out of nowhere, a memory came of years ago—twenty years ago—when I was working in a sheltered workshop in North Carolina with severely mentally handicapped adults. It was a place where people would come during the day and do some kind of little task, like putting two nuts in a plastic envelope, and then someone else would staple it. That was actually a complicated job for those folks. I was one of the instructors there. We'd just spend the day with the people, and it was intense. I won't get into the whole story, but it was intense.

This memory came back of one day—because I really came to love the people in the workshop, the people who came every day. There was one day in particular that came up in my mind. When I walked in, a lot of the different people, for some reason, were all coming up and hugging me. It was just a happy day where the sense of our togetherness and the kindness that I had been able to offer—I mean, I wasn't trying to be kind, it just came out of me because I felt connected to the people—was coming back to me. The sense of connectedness was palpable, and it was a really happy day. I can see all the different people now. Just the memory of that brings up again such happiness. It lightens and gladdens the heart. It brings in a brightness, a faith, an energy. And then from that, if there's something difficult going on, it's a little easier to open to it. If there's nothing special going on, it's a little easier to have energy to be with it. This is how seeds of joy can really strengthen our awakening, our intention.

So that's spontaneous. Something we might not always think to do, but that is actually taught as a skillful means, is to consciously reflect on our kind, our ethical, our non-harming conduct. I know it feels a little egotistical maybe to us. We tend to consciously reflect on all the bad things we've ever done—we do that very well. We can, at the drop of a hat, list off forty-five horrific things we've done in the last three days. And we feel like that's good practice, that's being honest. But if we say, "Sit and really reflect, feel in your heart all the kind, compassionate, non-selfish, non-self-cherishing things you've done," we feel like, "Oh, that's so pompous. That would make me so conceited."

But it's a very skillful thing to do. Again, not with clinging. Not with a lot of identification—"Aren't I incredible? I've done all these things." But just as I was describing that memory from the workshop, just feel the happiness of an act of oneness, of compassion. Because when you're really acting in that way, there's not a lot of "me" there. It's just doing the obvious, doing what needs to be done, what doesn't harm. And that is a very helpful way to bring some joy into our experience in the present moment—not to hold on to pleasant experience, but to gladden the heart, awaken the energy, reconnect us with the fact that we are all one, that the root of all conscious action, all wholesome action, is compassion. And each time we can speak or act from that, we're strengthening our understanding of emptiness.

This doesn't take huge concentration. It doesn't take powerful meditative states. It doesn't matter if all of our beloved psychological tendencies and patterns are still with us. Practicing with generosity and with sila is accessible to us in every moment. And when we forget, okay, the next moment is accessible again. And it's a moment where we have access to the twin wings of emptiness and compassion through very basic everyday activities.

I really think it's wonderful—the vastness of this path and the depth of this path that the Buddha has given us. And it really is, I think, a path of happiness and joy. Not that we don't experience sorrows. In fact, we're more present for all the sorrows of the world. But we're also more present for the joys. And the greatest joy is just that of being so awake and alive that we're really present in this moment. Joyful, sorrowful, whatever it is, we're not afraid to face it.

So I just want to end with a poem that expresses to me this quality of joyful presence in life, from E.E. Cummings:

I thank you, God, for most this amazing day, for the leaping greenly spirits of trees and the blue true dream of sky, and for everything which is natural, which is infinite, which is yes. I, who have died, am alive again today. And this is the sun's birthday.

This is the birthday of life and of love and of wings, and of the gay great happening illimitably earth. How should tasting, touching, hearing, seeing, breathing—any lifted from the know of all nothing, human merely being—doubt unimaginable you? Now the ears of my ears awake, and now the eyes of my eyes are opened.

Our Highest Purpose

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this closing talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the crucial transition from intensive practice back to daily life. She challenges the common misconception that formal retreat is the "real" practice, reminding practitioners that every moment is practice time—only the form changes. Drawing on her own journey, she shares how she once mistook the glittery qualities of concentration and precise mindfulness for wisdom itself, when true practice lies in meeting each moment with presence of heart and mind.
> Wilson explores the four aspects of clear comprehension (sampajañña), particularly emphasizing clear comprehension of purpose—connecting with one's deepest aspiration. She describes how this sense of purpose, once honored rather than dismissed by the critical mind, becomes a guiding light through difficult decisions and life transitions. The key, she suggests, is watching ourselves "with the intention to understand rather than to judge," as Nisargadatta Maharaj taught.
> The talk also addresses clear comprehension of suitability—recognizing that we never exist in isolation but are always in relationship with circumstances, environment, and other beings. Through personal stories and practical examples, Wilson illustrates how mindfulness without this broader awareness can leave us "completely oblivious to what's going on around us." She concludes with an invitation to recognize that each person is a unique manifestation of Dhamma, encouraging practitioners to find their own way to "kneel and kiss the ground" in service of awakening.

Tomorrow our practice changes form. And it's an interesting time. It can be easy, actually, in all the different things that come up in this change of form, to at times get into various spaces of clinging to the particular form of practice we've been cultivating these three months.

I know I've spent a lot of my practice years mistaking the form of the practice for the heart of the practice, for the heart of awakening, and feeling that when one retreat was over I would madly begin planning when I could do the next retreat and forget that this whole part of my life that's not called formal retreat is actually practice. There's no such thing as a moment that's not practice time. It's just about changing the form.

It's easy to mistake the kind of glittery, microscopic, really precise, really far-out qualities of mindfulness, concentration, clarity—it's easy to mistake those for wisdom. They might help awaken our heart and mind at certain times, but if we try to hold on to these particular conditions, we're just getting stuck and clinging again.

And so part of the grace of our shift of form is to see what practice is about. What's the heart of the practice about for you?

The two aspects that helped me the most in my life are very basic and simple: the aspects of wisdom and compassion, the Dalai Lama's statement that my religion is kindness. Couldn't be more simple. And to meet every aspect of my life, each situation, holding the question: How can I awaken in this moment?

Not to try and hold on to whatever insights have arisen in some form so that then I can click through the roster in my daily life and haul out the appropriate insight at the appropriate time and apply it in a given situation—but to trust that when we meet each moment with a presence of heart and mind, all the wisdom and understanding arises in that moment to meet that situation. Whatever we've understood, all of our wisdom and love is present, arising in a moment of our life. We don't have to hold on to it, which is good since we can't, because there's only arising moments. There's only our daily life.

I want to read from Bo Lozoff, who started the Prison Ashram Project quite some years ago. He does a lot of wonderful spiritual work, not particularly Buddhist. This is from the newsletter he sends out from the Human Kindness Foundation, called "A Little Good News."

"Everyday life is all we've got. The deep, wonderful secrets of life, the mysterious presence of the divine, the joy of cherishing each other, the beauty of nature, the satisfaction of helping out, our journey into the ageless wisdom—all exist only in our everyday life. There is no bigger ball field on which to find meaning. It's either right here today or it's nowhere."

And he quotes Jesus as saying, "The kingdom of heaven is within you. I tell you, the kingdom of heaven is at hand." At hand—not after the revolution, not when the next golden age brings worldwide peace and harmony. Here, now, you, me, our kids, in the middle of the ghetto, in the middle of prison, in the middle of our endless details, our ceaseless worries about the future.

"How many simple, peaceful, truly happy adults do our kids get to see? How many adults are deeply content with their lives and enjoy what they do? How many are happy about getting older and unafraid of dying? How many are relaxed and calm, with time to take off from work every now and then in order to mentor a young person? We seem to be knocking ourselves out in pursuit of a vague image of success and meaning, while the real quality of our everyday life with our families and communities steadily declines. We're asleep at the wheel, swept up in a fitful agitated dream, and we're missing some gorgeous scenery which only passes by once.

"When the Buddha experienced his great enlightenment, he got up from where he had been sitting and walked toward the village. The first person who saw him was awe-struck by his radiance and power. The man approached him and said, 'Sir, what are you? Are you a god?' And the Buddha said, 'No.' And he kept asking questions. And the man said, 'Well, what are you then?' The Buddha replied, 'I am awake.' And then he spent the rest of his life making it clear to us that we can awaken too. The joy is right here. We just need to wake up to it."

I think that's a beautiful expression of the purpose of practice. Not to be some incredible yogi.

I just heard on the radio that the oldest standing record in the Guinness Book of World Records dates from the time of Jesus—some monk in Syria who sat on top of a pillar for forty-five years. They don't have a record of why.

That's the potential for our life. I don't think that's what practice is about.

The form practice takes might be becoming a monk or a nun. It might involve doing an awful lot of intensive practice. It might involve not doing much intensive practice at all. But the form isn't really the point. The point is waking up. And through our awakening, we touch and communicate that potential of living in truth to every person we come in contact with, whether we know it or not. If we are really committed to this in ourselves, it truly has an effect on the world.

So in some ways, this changing form that we're entering is the most important aspect of our practice. And I know for me, for years, it's been so easy to not give it the quality of care and attention that I give the rest of formal practice. Why? Because in some ways it's difficult. It's not an easy time.

I want to talk about the broader aspects of mindfulness that can help us—intellectually help us—to stay awake in this period. Also to let go of, as we constantly must, the ideas we're still holding about how practice should look, what it means. Because when we find we can't hold on to them, does that mean practice is gone? We can see that practice can be broader and broader and more vast. It's just a constant letting go into the vastness.

Much of what we've discussed regarding mindfulness on this retreat—sati, the Pali word—has been the precise mental factor of mindfulness: knowing fully what's happening. We've worked a lot in this way of moment-to-moment continuous mindfulness, and we've developed it very strongly.

Have you ever noticed in your own practice here when you felt really, really mindful and at the same time completely oblivious to what was going on around you? This is what we call mindful, but lacking the broader element of clear comprehension.

I'll tell you a really embarrassing story. I wish it didn't come into my mind just now, but it did. Years ago, I was practicing here, a long time ago, walking very carefully, very present, really inward, really noting. I came to the coat room, took off my shoes, bent down to pick up my zafu—that's how long ago it was—and started to walk into the upper walking room. I completely didn't notice there were steps. I just walked right off the top step and fell on my face at the bottom. Of course, there were a lot of people walking in that room. I didn't hurt myself, only my self-esteem.

That's a good example of mindfulness that lacks clear comprehension. I think we do it a lot. We wonder why we come out of retreat and literally cannot do two things at once. I remember my first three-month course—I was working in the kitchen, and one of the teachers had just been sitting for a while and came in to get something to eat. They made such a mess all over the place, didn't clean it up, talked a mile a minute, and walked out. I thought, my goodness, is that what we're heading for?

I realized we can get so concentrated, so into the microscopic mindfulness, that we skip the fact that we're not isolated. We're part of a bigger picture always. We're never separate.

On the conceptual level, there are ways of talking about clear comprehension that help us understand how practice is much wider. Clear comprehension comes into play when there are choices, when we realize we're in relationship to experience and other people, when we have decisions to make. There are four areas, which I might not get to all of them.

The first is called clear comprehension of purpose. I have found this to be one of the most helpful aspects of attention, of inspiration, of really forming a guidepost in my life. It has a lot to do with what Kamala was talking about last night—aspiration.

Clear comprehension of purpose on one level is about intention. We've talked a lot about the importance, when making choices and decisions in our life from little ones to big ones, of bringing our awareness to the intention, the motivation for that action. Obviously this requires mindfulness—remembering that there is an intention, and that if we looked, we might notice it. The awareness that noticing intention often gives us a moment of choice, in little things and in big things. Do I need to go get an ice cream now? Maybe yes, maybe no, but we can notice why.

That's the micro level. On the macro level, clear comprehension of purpose is aspiration in a much larger sense—what Kamala was speaking about last night. Getting in touch with what is your deepest aspiration, what is the deepest purpose in your life? As Bo was writing about in his letter: What is your life about?

By consciously bringing this into our heart, into our mind, by affirming it to ourselves consciously, it has an amazing power of consolidating our restless, diffuse energy. It gives us a real sense of focus, a light, a beacon to refer to when we have important decisions to make.

It's really a very powerful thing. Often, in talking to people—and it was like this for myself for a while—we can tend to just not even think about this at all. Or if we do, it's on an intellectual level, still coming from a place of identification with our worthlessness or our sense of "I don't really have any skills" or "there's nothing I can offer the world"—whatever our story is. Which is all an ego trip.

By holding on to this belief—"I'm not a person who's worthy enough to have a really deep intention to guide my life, that's for other people"—we're denying the beauty and truth that each one of us is. In our own unique way, we all have something completely different to bring to the world. And we don't have to be somebody special to get in touch with that. It's true for all of us. We don't have to deny that to ourselves.

Although often, I know when I first began to feel a sense of this arising in my heart, the first time it came to me, I think the way it was phrased was, "I'm here to serve the Dharma, whatever that means." And immediately, the critical mind comes in: "Who do you think you are? Give me a break." You don't have to listen to that. It'll do its thing, but we have a choice. Do we want to identify with the small fears and limitations that we're used to identifying with? Or do we want to say, "Okay, thank you for your opinion. The Dharma is greater than me or my little fears, and I don't have to know how my purpose or aspiration is going to manifest." Not only do I not have to know—I don't know. And we won't know. We never know what's going to happen.

So it's being willing to simply honor the depth of each of our commitment, in whatever form that takes for you. There isn't a right form. For some people, bodhicitta—the sense of one's whole life being practiced in order to awaken the heart of enlightenment, in order to help awaken all beings—that's a wonderful aspiration. But it might not be your aspiration. What's important in this is not having a sense of should, another intellectual overlay: "That sounds good, and I should live up to this ideal, and I should want to awaken in order to awaken all beings." That's not what I'm talking about. I'm talking about really honoring the deepest truth in your heart and mind—what brings you to practice, what guides you in your life.

Give it some time to tune in, to intuitively see what arises. And when it comes up, like that time it came up for me, it was out of the blue. It was so not my usual train of thought that it really caught my attention. Once you know—and it might be changing—but if I hadn't had that particular conscious acknowledgment of a sense of my deepest purpose, I know I would never be here now. I never would be teaching.

Because that sense of honoring one's purpose is what will take us through difficult decisions in our life—when we come to crossroads, when we come to turning points and we're trying to make decisions. It comes up often. People will say in retreat, "I have to either take this job or move here. I have to either sit for another year or go back and visit my parents." The choices are endless. And they'll say, "How can I decide? I list the pros and the cons—they're all just thoughts. I have emotions about them both ways—they're all just emotions. They come and go. How can one make a decision that has any kind of basis?"

And it's true, it's hard. What I found is that the sense of one's deepest purpose comes in thoughts and emotions, but it has that deeper intuitive feel, that sense of trust that somehow moves beyond thought and emotion. And then, when one is faced with a decision—should I do this or should I do that?—that sense of purpose can guide us.

The first course I ever taught, I wouldn't have done it. I was dragged kicking and screaming. Going by my habits and by what kept me comfortable and what I felt at ease doing—what would we do? We would never grow. We would stay in our own little limits. I never would have gone to be teaching meditation in a million years, sitting up in front talking to people. It's totally not my personality. I like to go hide in the corner.

I would say, no, no, no, no—until this popped into my mind: "Oh yeah, that's right. My deepest purpose is to serve the Dharma." I don't necessarily get to choose what that looks like. It doesn't mean I'm always going to like what the choices are. But once it's clear to ourselves and we have a sense of alignment with that—as soon as that came into my mind, there was no more wavering. It was clear that's what needed to happen.

It really helps, because otherwise we just stay in our habit patterns. It might be comfortable, but it's not necessarily about freedom. One teacher said once, "In every moment of activity, we are committing ourselves to something." It's a question of what. Are we willing to really look?

This isn't with a heavy judgment. It's just with the honesty of mindfulness and wisdom—of satipañña. Really look at the choices we make day to day, the big choices, and what we're actually committing to with those choices. We have to be willing to look with honesty and with love. Because otherwise we'll go, "Right, you're committing to greed. Once again, you've blown it. You thought you were here for the Dharma, you thought you were here for awakening, and all you're doing is feeding your face." Then, "Now I'm committing to aversion because I'm filled with self-hatred"—and you can really get into that cycle.

So this willingness to look has to be with satipañña, with wisdom, with mindfulness, with compassion for ourselves. But once we're willing to meet our life like that, willing to honor—an intention to honor—our deepest commitment, not expecting we're going to do it every time, but once we can let that light shine... we really are shining our heart, shining our mind. Once we can honor it to ourselves, it strengthens the depth of our commitment in a really profound way. And I found it helpful to keep bringing that into consciousness over and over, this willingness to look. Because things change. The commitment changes. And our life changes to go along with it.

So on the macro level, clear comprehension of purpose is getting in touch with your deepest aspiration and honoring the depth of it, and then bringing in our mindfulness practice of remembering to see why we're doing what we're doing—but to see it with kindness.

From Nisargadatta Maharaj: someone asks him a question about mental suffering, how to set right a tangle which is below the level of consciousness. And he answers, "By being with yourself, with the 'I am,' by watching yourself in your daily life with alert interest, with the intention to understand rather than to judge, in full acceptance of whatever may emerge because it is there. This is the great work of awareness. It removes obstacles and releases energies by understanding the nature of life and mind. Intelligence is the door to freedom, and alert attention is the mother of intelligence."

That one line I love: "By watching yourself in daily life with the intention to understand rather than to judge." If we can meet ourselves with that attitude, notice our intentions on the micro level and on the macro level, in order to understand, not to judge—I found that once I could bring that attitude in, my actions, both big and little, began very naturally to harmonize more and more over the years with the deepest level of what's most important for me.

Now, when I was scrutinizing my life with the intention to judge rather than to understand, that didn't happen. For years, way before I had this first sense of my deepest purpose, I was really quite devoted to practice, to the Dharma, but my attitude was:

every time I did something that I didn't consider dharmic—which, let's face it, is most of the time, because my idea of dharmic was pretty narrow—I'd get out the whip. Any time I turned on the TV, or went to a movie, or read a mystery novel, or just sat and zoned out. In other words, if I wasn't reading the Dharma, or practicing the Dharma, or being the most loving bodhisattva on the planet—and most of the time I wasn't—I was a failure. A dharmic failure.

This makes it really hard. Dharma almost becomes our enemy, and there's this sense of just being a failure all the time. And most of life comes outside of practice. When I quit trying to force myself to always live a so-called dharmic life and just paid attention—as Nisargadatta says, with the intention to understand rather than to judge—I'd see why I would so-called deviate, with a lot of understanding. And actually it got to be not such a problem.

So if I watched some stupid TV program, okay, that's not the end of the world. It doesn't mean I'm a failure in life. And I could see the conditions. I was working in this sheltered workshop I mentioned before. I was completely exhausted mentally and physically every night by the end of a day working there. I was basically useless for any kind of human activity that required energy or intelligence or communication. I was a vegetable. So every night I'd just sit there like a vegetable, beating myself up for being a vegetable—until I could finally see: "Oh yeah, cause and effect. You spend a day like this, what do you expect?"

And then the softness comes in. There's no sense of judging, and it becomes the practice. In that, I found that what had felt like a struggle to try and make my choices fit some ideal—which is another way to use our aspiration against ourselves—instead, quite naturally, extraneous things began to drop away.

For example, if I was watching a really stupid TV program without judgment and just paying attention, after five minutes I'd go, "This is really stupid," and turn it off. It didn't really take any struggle; it was just obvious. I know this sounds funny, but somehow accepting what's happening makes it a lot easier. And we have a real multiplicity of possibilities in this life, in this culture. Our practice becomes more inclusive. Everything becomes included rather than shutting things out.

This is from Izumi Shikibu: "Although I try to hold the single thought of Buddha's teaching in my heart, I cannot help but hear the many crickets' voices calling as well." We can appreciate the crickets' voices calling. Sometimes they're beautiful. We don't have to hate them. We don't have to try and make ourselves deaf.

When we have this inclusive attitude, when we're in harmony with our experience, then our deepest aspiration comes to the surface more and more easily. It becomes a joy to live from that rather than a duty.

It's true that sometimes when we get in touch with our aspiration, when we feel it almost reverberating through our heart, through our body and mind, there are times it can be a little fearful. Often the thought will come up—and it would for me—"This means my life might have to change," or "It means I might have to give something up." And that's true. Our lives will probably have to change. But you think they wouldn't change anyway? They're going to change no matter what we do. Still, there's definitely a sense of, "Oh, what about..."—whatever your particular "what about" is.

Over the years—it's been some twenty-five years now since I was first introduced to the Buddha Dharma, to this practice—there have been amazing changes in my life. A lot of activities that I thought gave me pleasure, a lot of dreams I might have had about what I thought would be the happy life for me, or what I thought would make me happy, or what I thought life was worth living for—maybe a lot of those things never manifested.

For some reason the other day, I was reading a few little notes I took during a retreat I was sitting six or seven years ago. There was one page that quite surprised me. I had been teaching for three or four years at that time, and I could see in reading it that there was much more of a sense of struggle still going on—trying to find my relationship to teaching and to the demands that this lifestyle was making on my ideas of what I thought would make me happy in life.

I wrote in one place that I saw my idea of renunciation was really changing. It's easy for me to think of renunciation as living a simple life, or being a nun again, or a monk—we give up a family and sit a lot. Renunciation going in the direction of simplicity. What I was seeing at that retreat was that what I was really having to renounce was my ideas about what I thought my life should be about and what I thought would be a happy life—which actually meant my life moved towards more complexity, not towards more simplicity.

Could I find a balance with that? Could I give up ideas of having just one place to stay in and not traveling, or having a family, or choosing a location that wasn't quite so cold, or whatever the particular idea was? But I thought it was quite poignant that renunciation can take a different form from what we think. Little deaths all along the way to my particular idea of what Carol is or how Carol should manifest. And then in that, the surrender to one's aspiration has space to manifest in ways one could never imagine.

So yes, our life might change, but it's little by little over time. There is no way that I could look back and say, "Oh, I wish something had happened differently." Every falling away, every sense of renunciation might have a little sadness, some grief in it at the time, but it's always been an opening into something so much more connected, so much more alive in the truth—something we can't imagine from where we are now. So it's really a lot about trust. And it gives us a power to concentrate our dispersed energy—not just floating here and there—but to really focus our energy, just like concentration does, and do things one could never imagine.

Think of ten years ago. Most of you—did you imagine you could sit a whole three-month course? Forget it. Impossible. And now it's like nothing, right? You could start another one tomorrow. So that's working with purpose, with aspiration.

The second aspect of this clear comprehension, this broadening of our mindful awareness, is to see that we're not acting or existing in isolation—which of course isn't news, but it's easy to forget. And even with this sense of purpose, everything has to be adapted to the particular situation, to the particular moment. This is what we've been hammering at when we talk about skillful means. What is skillful means one moment, we just do out of memory the next moment, and it's totally inappropriate.

So this second aspect of clear comprehension is called clear comprehension of suitability—really seeing cause and effect, recognizing that conditions change, that what's suitable one moment is different. Something else is appropriate in a different moment when the conditions change. It's what Ram Dass calls "knowing your zip code." And if you don't remember your zip code, if you're American, then tomorrow it's time to start putting it back on again, knowing where you live.

This is another piece that we're often missing when we feel like we're so mindful. Sometimes people say, "I feel like I've been practicing a lot and I'm really mindful, but I feel like I'm getting more self-centered, more self-involved than when I started practice." And there can be phases like this, you know. We're so engrossed in the sensations in our big toe or in our particular emotions, and that's totally appropriate deep in a three-month retreat. But then we have to expand and realize that we are always in relationship with the environment, with other people, with the weather, with animals, and that our clear comprehension, our mindfulness, has to include all of this—what's appropriate.

A friend who went to acupuncture one time, and the acupuncturist was burning moxa. You know, they burn moxa down to your skin, and then when you just begin to feel it burn, you tell him and he takes it off so it doesn't hurt. So this friend was lying there in his mind noting, "burning, burning, burning," but he didn't say anything. So he really got a burn. This is lacking this particular aspect of suitability. What's happening in the bigger picture?

This takes us out of our sense of separation—to notice impermanence, to notice cause and effect, to notice that there's no separate independent individual self ever. We can never act independent of circumstances. We can't exist independent of circumstances. We're affected by the weather. Have you noticed that? It's really amazing, isn't it? As if somehow we're separate from the weather. I used to get on retreats really annoyed. "I don't want to be depressed just because the weather is so gloomy. It's got nothing to do with me. I'm stronger than that." Forget it. We are the weather. There's no difference. We can't really expect it to be otherwise.

You notice, I'm sure you've noticed this, in the last two days as it comes close to the end, that you pick up each other's energy? Have you noticed that at all? It's like moving through the building. Actually, it's a little less this year than some years. Some years it feels like the windows are going to blow out of here by this day. But it's sort of circling. The staff feels it very strongly and we don't always realize what it is. And just talking to different ones of you, just feeling the energy as I walk through the dining room, there's no way one can be immune to it. We try, you know, but it doesn't work. So it's simply acknowledging that we are in the middle of a bunch of causes and we're feeling the effects at this moment.

So, for example, when you start talking, it's not that we just say what's true, but also what's useful. And that takes having a bigger view of the whole situation. Saying what is not only true and useful, but tuning into the receptivity level of the other person. And you'll see that a lot when you leave here and someone says, "How was your retreat?" And you start out on a three-hour discussion of the first week, and after two words, you can see they're gone. That's really where we pay attention. What does this person really want to know? What's really the level of receptivity here? What's skillful?

Or the kind of deep discussion you might have in a relationship about some difficulties. I learned a long time ago that starting one of those discussions at midnight was not a very skillful idea. And in the morning some things can be discussed in a very helpful way. So it's really paying attention to cause and effect. The behavior that's appropriate here will get you in a lot of trouble walking down the streets of New York City. Maybe not in New York City. In some places.

So this is just noticing cycles of cause and effect, cycles of change, that who we are affects everyone else, and everyone else affects who we are. You know Thich Nhat Hanh's story, although I've often wondered how he knows this. The story of the boat people during that period when there were so many people escaping from Vietnam in fishing boats, just really packed fishing boats with a couple hundred people on little boats.

And a lot of those boats were attacked by pirates. Many would run into heavy storms, and of course they were way overloaded. What Thich Nhat Hanh says is that from talking to so many of the boat people, he found that the boats that came through the difficulties the best were the ones in which there was just one calm person on board—someone who could stay calm and meet the situation with clarity, with centeredness, with presence. That calm would affect other people and begin to radiate out, and there would be enough centeredness and balance to come through the difficulty.

What I wonder is, how does he know that if the other ones didn't come through the difficulty? But I think the point is well taken. If we can, in a difficult situation, be that one calm person—if we can meet a situation seeing it as it is—then we have the intelligence that comes from awareness, the adaptability, the skillful means that arises out of being so present in that moment to meet the situation appropriately. That's exactly what we've been practicing here with our practice all along. What's skillful in this moment? It might have been skillful yesterday, but we can't just do it from memory. We have to look fresh in this moment. The conditions are different. So that's the clear comprehension of adaptability.

And when we have these two—the overarching sense of aspiration, of purpose, commitment to that, commitment to look; and the presence of mind of suitability, of adaptability, that ability to be fresh and aware in each moment—then the other two aspects of broader awareness, of clear comprehension, follow naturally. This is really about our life becoming our practice, the whole of life becoming a domain of meditation, our whole life becoming lit up with wisdom, with non-delusion. These two naturally follow from the others.

So really, can we bring in the attitude of meeting our life as practice and see what aspect of life we somehow hold outside of being important or necessary to be present and awake for? When I hold the question in my heart, "How can I awaken in this moment?" then I need to look: what particular moments do I always forget to ask that question?

In one of Alexander Solzhenitsyn's books, The First Circle, he has one of his main characters talk about what he calls "the final inch." I haven't read this for years, but it's always stuck in my mind. The First Circle was a gulag prison for hotshot scientists who were set to work on very esoteric projects. This character's premise of the final inch is that people work really hard, really diligently, with a lot of care on something that's very complicated until they're just almost finished—just that final inch to go. And then somehow the care or the attention or the constancy falls down and we tend to get a little careless.

It's so easy to do that. It's easy to see how we do it on a retreat. Someone today gave me a great example in an interview of how we do it in daily life. She was describing being so mindful while eating and then noticing how the last couple of bites she'd really hurry through, and the mindfulness would fade away. Really seeing with wisdom that it's because the pleasantness, somehow she knew the pleasantness was about to end, and there's a clinging there and it's painful, so we hurry through it and don't really pay attention. That's how I think of this final inch.

What are the things that are a little difficult, a little uncomfortable, or maybe so pleasant that we really don't want to have to bring in mindfulness? That's where I fall down. Things will be really smooth, really equanimous in my mind, and I think, "Well, I don't really have to pay attention now. I'm just cruising. Equanimity is firmly established." Which maybe it was for a couple of moments, but not for two weeks without attention, I don't think so.

Just look in your life. What are the areas that are somehow outside the domain of awakening? And again without judgment, just bring some awareness to them. Remembering that our practice is not an activity; it's an attitude with which we meet our lives.

This is from Geshe Raptin, and it really inspires me—his way of meeting his life: "All actions, even the most simple, are for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings." Not a should. But if I can imagine washing the dishes with that attitude—all actions, even the most simple, for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings—there's no action that cannot be used for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion. I mean wholesome actions, okay, I don't know about really unwholesome ones. But with that intention, it doesn't matter how we manifest in our life—whether we're, as Kamala said, changing the diapers, whether we're washing the dishes, or vacuuming, or working for seva, or teaching school, or raising a family, or meditating in Burma. It's not about there being some right way to manifest.

But can we bring this attitude? This is one way of expressing it. I'm not saying it should be expressed for anybody else in this way. But when we can meet the actions in our life, even the most simple, with the question, "How can I awaken in this moment?"—that's the attitude of our deep practice. The form it takes has many, many possibilities.

And when we meet our life in this way, everything we do begins to be shot through with wisdom, with truth. The aspects of impermanence, of the unsatisfactory nature of things—they become more apparent at times. Also, the fact that we're not separate autonomous beings, as I was saying in the area of adaptability, becomes more obvious. Sometimes we might bring it in consciously, reflect on impermanence, reflect on suffering, reflect on anatta. But if we're just meeting each action of our life with this intention to awaken, then without it being such a formal thing we have to try and make happen, just by itself the truth begins to shine everywhere. It shines in your heart. You notice it in other people—and not just in so-called spiritual people, but we see it everywhere, because that's really what life is. And as we begin to wake up to it in ourselves, we see that it's always been everywhere. It's just somehow our own shutting down to our own pain, our own fears, that keeps us from seeing that truth is everywhere.

You might notice when you leave here that we're a lot more open, a lot more sensitive. So the truth is beautiful. It's also a lot about seeing impermanence and suffering and having an open, compassionate heart. I remember after my first three-month course, for some unknown reason, a couple of days after it ended, I went to a big mall in Worcester. Worcester's not a cheery city—I don't know if you spend much time there. I'm sure there's happy people in Worcester, but it's not one of those cities that lights me up to go into. And I remember walking through this mall just wide open, and it's just something... you could feel the kind of suffering in people's faces. That kind of numbed out look was really what I remember. In some ways it was devastating. It was devastating because I wasn't locking around it. In other ways, it was really connecting. We're so much more sensitive, but we're so much more alive. We're so much more present in life.

That didn't lead me to hate Worcester or hate those people or think I can never go out in public again. It was just a sense of the poignancy of our life and a much deeper connection. And I find when I'm willing to at least have the intention to meet life this way—of course we don't do it all the time—but I find that the situations around me really become tools to wake up. This I can do consciously if I'm feeling shut off, or it happens spontaneously when I'm more open and vulnerable, as in that mall.

So for example, when I go to see my doctor in the teaching hospital in Worcester, I really like going because it's a huge hospital and all kinds of people come there with all kinds of problems. Poor people, a lot of people who don't speak English, little kids in wheelchairs—just the whole range. And I love going there because it wakes me up. Because I really just try to be open and try to look at people and try to just let it in. And I come away feeling so much more alive in my heart and connected to the world. It might sound kind of weird, but it's really a way of waking up.

The hunting season here, this deer hunting season—I think it's amazing that it happens every year during the three-month course because it touches so many different aspects of life. We tend, well, many of us tend to get really identified with the beauty of the deer, their helplessness, and the hunters going out shooting always feels so violent and so harsh. I remember once I was driving with a good friend who was very intense and very exuberant and very expressive. She was driving the car and we're going down Pleasant Street out there during hunting season, and some hunter was crossing the road. She goes, "Oh, those hunters! They make me so mad. I just want to take this car and run them right over." That's just how she is.

And I said, "You know, I wonder about the quality of the energy you're expressing—how different is that from the hunters going out killing the deer?"

And she said, "Oh my God, you're blowing me away!" It was so funny. She had never thought of that. But it's true—can we take in the whole picture?

There's pain and there's fear—and can we have compassion? Many of the hunters actually need the meat to eat. And in fact, we need equanimity because this is how the world is, even as we still have our opinions. Can we be connected with the whole picture? Feel the suffering, feel the beauty, feel the compassion, balance it with equanimity. I think it's a great practice, and it can wake us up.

Notice times when you're feeling really separate. Sometimes we can consciously extend our awareness to include the whole picture.

An example of this: one time I was riding on a train in India, on a sleeper—a second-class sleeper where there were just benches, really, two on each side of a little compartment. I mean, you just pull a curtain over it. For some reason, I had one top bench, and usually they try to put women together, but I had three Indian men in the other three spaces. I was traveling alone and I wasn't particularly comfortable.

During the day, of course, there are forty-five people sitting on the benches. But at night, when you own the bench that you bought with your ticket, the other people have to leave—which it turns out were all the men's families, their wives and children and in-laws. God knows where they went to sleep, but the men each got a bench, and me.

So I was lying there. They were perfectly nice; they didn't bother me. But I was feeling such a sense of separation. These guys, leave me alone. What are they doing here? It was me and them. It was a very uncomfortable night.

Then in the morning, I noticed what my mind was doing. Without actually saying anything, I just shifted it and said, Okay, why don't I think of us in the compartment instead of me and them. That's all I did.

The day comes, we all sit back down again on the bottom benches, forty-five people come back in the compartment. But because I was thinking us—that's all—something shifted in my vibe, and it really turned into an us. They started being very friendly, went out and bought me little snacks. I got to taste chai and little pakoras. They wanted to show me Indian snacks, and we had very nice conversations. The only difference was my inner attitude—that this happened in the morning and not the night before. Just the shift from me and them to us.

We can do that consciously at times, and it's amazing the power it has. So just in little ways like that, using the situations in life to wake up rather than just reacting—this is a curse, this is a blessing—no, this is a chance to wake up in this moment. And that's all we have, just this moment. And then the next moment, in case we spaced out the last moment. Here we are again, this moment.

So just in these days in your life, please don't undervalue yourself. Know that you, just as you are, are a unique manifestation of truth, of Dhamma—however you express it in your life, and we'll all express it differently. You know that verse from Rumi: "Let the beauty you love be what you do. There are hundreds of ways to kneel and kiss the ground." Each of us will do it differently. So find your own way to kneel and kiss the ground.

I want to close with this quotation from Nyoshul Khenpo: "Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who overlook or ignore it are deluded. This recognition is the borderline between Buddhas and beings."

And this recognition is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives. Every moment of our lives, we can recognize our true nature.

CHAPTER 297

Mettā as Liberation: Recognizing Our Intrinsic Connectedness

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson dismantles common misconceptions about mettā (loving-kindness) practice, revealing it not as a mere feel-good exercise but as a powerful path to liberation. She explains that mettā is an actualization of the deepest truth of existence—that there is no separate, alienated, independent existence. Through this practice, we consciously recognize the living fact of our connectedness to all beings.

Wilson examines how our habitual patterns of aversion and attachment function as obstacles to recognizing our intrinsic wholeness. Drawing on teachings from Nisargadatta Mahārāj and Ajahn Sumedho, she illustrates how fear and desire create the illusion of separation, while mettā meets all experience—pleasant or unpleasant—with spacious acceptance. She shares the remarkable story of Chris Carrier, who forgave the man who had kidnapped and shot him as a child, demonstrating the boundless potential of mettā practice.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with the "near enemy" of mettā (attachment masquerading as love) and the "far enemy" (aversion). Wilson emphasizes that mettā practice is about cultivating purity of intention rather than controlling results, and that each moment of goodwill—even lasting just a finger snap—strengthens our capacity to live from a place of ease and connectedness. Through Rumi's poem "The Guest House," she invites practitioners to welcome all experiences, including difficult emotions and self-judgment, as opportunities for deepening the heart's capacity for acceptance and liberation.

For some years in the beginning of my practice, I felt a little bit resistant to doing a long period of intensive mettā practice for two reasons.

One of them being that, especially in the beginning, it's so much work. I don't know if any of you have discovered that today—over and over, the same phrases. Sometimes it feels like digging a ditch. And the second reason is something that Sharon mentioned: my misconception that it's nice, just sort of a feel-good practice, but I'm really after enlightenment and freedom. So it's nice to feel good, but I want to get to the root of things.

I'm happy to report that that was a misconception. You're not wasting your time doing mettā practice. In the beginning it is a lot of work—that's just the facts of it. But it gets better. It ends up being a lot easier, actually, than vipassanā. But it's not just a feel-good practice by any means. It's actually a way of bringing more consciously into our experience the visceral fact of our intrinsic connection to all beings, to all creation.

Mettā is an actualization of the deepest truth of our being, of this universe: that there is no separate, alienated, independent existence. There's no way that we can live in isolation and separation. It just feels that way. And so what mettā is actually helping us do is function as a conscious tool to help us recognize, over and over again, the living fact of our connectedness. It helps us recognize and learn to rest in this truth, to be nurtured in and to really trust this truest context of our heart and mind.

Mostly we trust our aversions and our attachments and our fears. And mettā is a nice idea. But what we can learn is that mettā is really an expression of the deepest truth. Our attachments and fears and aversions and confusions are just that—confusion.

This is from Joe Goldstein: "Our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate. Certainly, it looks as though I am separate from other people and other phenomena. As long as we think we are separate, we're going to suffer. We feel we have to defend ourselves. We have to find something in the world that will make us happy." And we do this with passion—we defend ourselves and look for something in the world that will make us happy.

What mettā helps us do—the practice itself, in two ways—is counteract this. It helps us begin to and continue to deepen in the recognition of what it feels like to know that we're not separate and to trust that. And in the process, this practice highlights the ways that we get sidetracked into defending ourselves and looking for something in the world to make us happy. Those ways of getting sidetracked are the experiences that function as seeming obstacles to recognizing our connectedness, to living in a state of real happiness, of real ease in the world with others and with ourselves.

We really do look very hard for something in the world to bring us happiness. How do we do that? Just think of all the ways in your life that you're looking for something inside or outside to bring happiness. And then think about what is the happiness that you're actually looking for. Both of these are important to recognize.

I read a couple of years ago an article about an Oprah Winfrey show that was a takeoff of this movie Sleepless in Seattle, which was about a man whose wife had died. He had a son and he was very lonely. Somehow he was on a radio call-in show, and a woman on the other coast heard him and knew this was the man for her, even though she knew nothing about him except for that. And then the whole wonderful, happy-ever-after story went on from there.

On this Oprah show, apparently she had five men just like that whose wives had died and they had young children. They were all very respectable—doctors or lawyers. And so they were on the show, and then she invited any woman who was interested to write in. Two weeks later she came on and she had received 60,000 letters from women—serious letters.

I'm not making fun of this because this is what we do. Relationship is wonderful. There's a lot of joy in it. But to look, to think that anything out there so unknown to us is going to do it for us—this is a source of great confusion and separation and suffering. Because if I need someone from the Oprah Winfrey show, that means that until I get that, I can't know peace.

I can't know happiness. Or we look inside, believing something in ourselves has to change in order to be happy. We have to change our hairstyle, change how we look, get a better personality, whatever. Internal, external, changing conditions—as long as we're looking there for happiness and love, we're creating in that very moment the experience of separation and alienation.

So what is metta? What is this loving-kindness? And again, we can so easily get caught up in our cultural ideas about love—just the obvious ones, and you each might have your own little twists on them. One is that love is a grand passion, and we can take it out of just the realm of being focused on one other person, but you might find that bias comes into our ideas about loving-kindness. If you're not feeling a total, ecstatic, unitive experience, if tears aren't streaming down your face, if you're not at one with all existence, the metta isn't really working. That might happen sometimes. You might feel that. I promise it won't stay. Because that's not what metta is about. It's an aspect of it.

And then there's the other side—the sort of soft focus, sugar-coated version. What Sharon was talking about: the fear of people thinking metta is just too mushy and not for the real world. I get images of some movie a long time ago where there was this Mozart piano sonata, and all I remember about it was these two beautiful lovers romping through fields of flowers. I have no idea what else happened in the movie, but that's like one image of metta that is just too sickening to hold up. And that's where I've run into a lot of people who do avoid practicing loving-kindness because they think it leads to weakness and passivity and not seeing clearly.

True metta, of course, is none of these things. It's at once so much more simple, basic, and down to earth, and so much more courageous and profound than any of these ideas we might have about it. The Buddha called metta deliverance of the heart, and it springs from wisdom and clear seeing, not from blindness. It can be as basic as a simple good wish for oneself or for someone else. A simple wish for someone's happiness that doesn't set any conditions or want anything in return. That's simple. Just a generous movement of the heart. We experience that all the time. That's metta.

And it has courage, a moment of metta, because it's not blind. It sees whatever is painful, difficult, or unfortunate—if anything, more clearly than when we're caught in our reactions. And yet, even though there's difficulty, the heart does not react with closing down, separation, or judgment. Even though we see the difficulty, the pain, the confusion more clearly, there's still the connectedness of energy, of heart and mind. There's still the capacity to wish another well, or to wish ourselves well—even if we don't like or approve of what we see. It's a radical shift in our understanding of freedom and happiness.

And I believe we all have the capacity to be as courageous as this man—maybe you read this in the newspapers last fall, it was all over the news—a man in Florida named Chris Carrier. He recently went to visit his ailing elderly friend at a nursing home, took along some gifts, comforted the man, made sure that he was warm and well taken care of. It was the last time he saw his friend, who died later that night.

The friend, David McAllister, was a blind, frail, and lonely seventy-seven-year-old with no one to look after him. He had also recently confessed to abducting, stabbing, and shooting Mr. Carrier in the head and leaving him to die twenty-two years ago, when Chris was nine or ten years old.

Mr. Carrier says he was blinded in his left eye as a result of the shooting, but he said he did not feel that he had been permanently traumatized, adding that he bore no ill will towards the man who had kidnapped him and left him to die. "It wasn't hard for me to show compassion given his circumstances," Mr. Carrier said. He was married, had two daughters, and until recently worked as a youth minister. "I moved on. This event did not haunt me all my life. I'm glad he was able to put the past behind him."

It's in the news. Yes, it's unusual. And I'm not saying that's how we should be. What I'm saying is that potential of freedom from hatefulness and revenge, that potential of being able to meet even that amount of horrific behavior with compassion, with an openness of heart—that's the boundlessness of metta, of loving-kindness. And that boundlessness is not reserved for just an occasional person. Of course, that might not be our experience. Maybe never, maybe not most of the time, but it is our potential. And we can each experience moments of that. We don't have to start with such an intense experience.

What our practice here this week, in however long you have, what it's helping us do on a moment-to-moment basis is learn how to meet whatever arises in our experience—in our body, in our mind, internal, external, beautiful, ugly, fearful, enticing—to learn how to meet what arises with this open connectedness of heart and mind. A connectedness that sees clearly and allows it to be just what it is. A space of heart and mind that does not have to create separation in order to protect ourselves, does not have to look somewhere else for something happy in order to find peace. We discover that the capacity for love and peace is boundless in each of us, and nobody else can stop it in us.

It's not dependent on having someone love us or having perfect circumstances in our life. It's something that each of us can open to and recognize over and over, learning to trust it and living our lives more and more from this potential. No one else can stop us from recognizing this potential.

What does seem to stop us is simply our habits of mind and heart. They're simple—incredibly deep-rooted, but simple to talk about—these habits of how our mind and heart respond to situations in ways that create the sense of separation and isolation. As Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "The obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain." We're talking about our old friends: attachment and aversion. You can't get away from them in any talk of basic Buddhism that you ever come to. Why? Because that's the root of our sense of seeming separation, of pain and fear and confusion. It's very basic, but it's very deep-rooted.

Each moment of metta, of open-hearted connectedness to whatever is arising, is actually cutting through these habits of attachment to pleasure and fear of pain. As the metta practice continues, though, you may have already noticed this today. If not, you'll probably notice it happening at some point during the next few days. We might have the idea that we just progress in metta—metta, metta, love, love, openness, openness—and that just gets stronger. But there's a possibility that you might experience from time to time that aversion and attachment seem to be blossoming. They get highlighted with this practice.

It's easy to feel, "I came here to practice loving-kindness to myself, and instead I'm sitting here saying, 'May I be filled with suffering.' 'May I be happy'—fat chance. 'May I be healthy'—in some other life. What is going on here?" It can seem as though aversion or clinging is being cultivated. It's not that they're being cultivated, but the development of the intention of loving-kindness, the meeting of experience with openness, the non-discriminating quality of metta actually begins to highlight these confused ways that we respond to situations. It lets us begin to see more clearly how the aversion, the fear, or the attachment functions in our experience to create a sense of separation.

This is really great to see, because once we see it, we're not so seduced by these states of mind and heart. We see them for what they are. We don't have to hate them, but we don't believe them so strongly. And this is where we then, almost despite ourselves, begin to trust more deeply in the connectedness.

Is this familiar to you—what a habit of mind it is to meet most situations with either attachment or aversion? I noticed this when I sat last year for several weeks. One day it really struck me how habituated my normal mind was, when I'm not paying attention, to constantly evaluate, to assess every situation and meet it with "this is good, this is bad, I like this, I don't like that."

I noticed this, and it's really apparent on retreat because although we're not communicating verbally, something happens with every single person who comes into our field of vision or crosses our walking path. I noticed one day that everybody who came in, there was this assessment: "They look nice. They look good. I want something from them. I want them to notice me. I want them to like me. I want them to think I'm really looking like a hot shot yogi." Or I don't like something about them, and so what I want is to create distance—keep that person far away from me. Or somehow in the assessment, some fear would come up. "I want them to like me, but they're not going to like me because they're so much better than I am." And so there's fear, and their presence becomes a threat.

This is an exhausting way to live. But I noticed it was extremely rare that if I wasn't paying attention, this wasn't just what happened. To bring in a moment of metta—just a person walks across, the assessment doesn't have to happen—it's simply, "Ah, may you be happy. May I be happy." Just a simple outflowing of energy, of connectedness. Just as you are, just as I am, that's fine. It's such a relief. It's so simple. It's so connected. There's just no problem in that moment. And there's no need for the sense of separation to be created.

So I want to speak a little bit about recognizing how these two very common energies—aversion or fear and attachment—function in a moment of experience to create a seeming sense of separation, how they seem to block the heart flow of connectedness, how they block our recognition of the fact that we are and always have been perfectly complete and at ease.

Aversion, which ranges from simple dislike to pulling back to anger, rage, grief, fear—all of these stem from the misconception that somehow I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant or painful experience. That's an almost literal description of how aversion or fear functions in a moment of experience: "I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant or fearful experience."

Something arises in this moment. When we experience aversion or fear here on the retreat, let's just keep this very simple to the moment-to-moment retreat experience. When aversion or fear arises, it's arising as a response to an experience that's happening right now, in this moment. It might be an unpleasant physical sensation, or a sound that's startling or unpleasant, or a smell, or a sight. It might be an emotion, a mood. It might be a thought that's really unpleasant or scary or painful. It might be a memory. Even if it's a memory of something that happened ten years ago that's painful, it's actually the memory as a thought arising that's unpleasant in this moment.

And this misconception that I can keep myself separate from it manifests in that moment as the energy, the attention, the heart and mind—you can almost feel it flinch back, pull away from that experience. And in that, there's immediately created a sense of separation. Because of this sense of distance, of separation, more ignorance arises, because when we're pulling back, we're not actually able to recognize clearly what's actually happening. So, for example, it might be an unpleasant memory, and then, "Oh, I don't want to feel that, I don't want to know that," and the mind just starts taking off, and the unpleasantness, the fear is increased a thousandfold.

Metta is just the opposite of this. It simply doesn't discriminate; it doesn't say this is bad, this is good. It simply flows in, around, includes and accepts the experience of that memory just as it is. And in that connectedness, we see it much more clearly. "Oh, it's an unpleasant memory." It's still unpleasant. But the whole extra story and the whole sense of separation and fear just gets cut with the clear seeing and acceptance of metta.

Let me read you a story that's an example of this, from that well-known Buddhist writer Michael Crichton. He's talking about being in Africa on some kind of safari, in a tent with his wife and a whole group of people. They were in the tent at night, it was dark, and he wakes up—they both wake up—and there's all this crashing and banging and huge noise outside the tent. He's lying there, and it sounds like an elephant. Even though they said there were no elephants, it sounds like an elephant walking right by the tent. He went into a total panic, just lying there not knowing what to do, and the whole thing was just taking off for ten, fifteen minutes, I don't know how long. Finally, he just couldn't stand it. He took a flashlight, unzipped the tent, looked out, shined the flashlight out, and it was shining right into the big, huge eye of an elephant, maybe ten feet away.

Well, as soon as he saw that, all the panic disappeared. He was like, "Oh, it's an elephant." Zipped up the tent, went back to bed, and fell right asleep.

And this is what he says about that. He says he had really slept well when he stopped worrying, and he was very impressed with the instantaneous flip in his own emotional state—from barely controlled hysteria to a detached calm once he saw the giant eye. How had that happened?

He reflected on it and said, "I realize later we're all like that. We can work ourselves into a hysterical panic over possibilities that we won't look at. What if I have cancer? What if my job is at risk? What if my kids are on drugs? What if I'm getting bald? What if an elephant is outside my tent? What if I am faced with some terrible thing I don't know how to deal with? And that hysteria goes away the instant we are willing to look, to hear the answer, even if the answer is what we feared all along. Yes, you have cancer. Yes, you're going bald. Yes, there's an elephant outside your tent. Now the question becomes, what are you going to do with it? Subsequent emotions may not be pleasant, but the hysteria stops. Hysteria accompanies an unwillingness to look at what is really going on, and it promotes an unwillingness to look. We feel we are afraid to look, when actually it is not looking that makes us afraid. The minute we look, we can cease being afraid."

In an odd way, he's describing an aspect of metta—the willingness to just be with whatever it is that's presenting itself. We don't have to like it. We don't have to approve of it. But just in the being with it, the hysteria stops.

And we can meet what's happening with a sense of wholeness, of completion, of ease. The sense of separation doesn't come from the fact that there's a difficult experience arising. It comes from getting lost in that fear, that aversion, that reactivity to the difficult experience.

And obviously—and you'll see this probably quite a bit here on this retreat—the difficult experience isn't always an elephant outside somewhere. A great deal of the time we take that unwillingness, that sense that if it's unpleasant it's a mistake, it's bad, it's wrong, and we turn that negativity against ourselves.

Our old friend self-judgment can be elicited at times quite strongly for some people when working with sending loving-kindness to yourself. That sense of, "I don't deserve it. How can someone who's so fill-in-the-blank deserve metta?" And it could be anything that we're judging about ourselves—whatever we cannot accept. The way our bodies look. If we have some illness, if we have some disability, something we see as weakness. Certain emotions that we're experiencing that we judge ourselves for: anger, grief, sadness, rage, pettiness, jealousy, self-judgment itself. Patterns of our personality. We anger too easily. We're not as generous as we would like to be. We find that we're selfish. We find that hatred comes up.

Whatever it is, it really doesn't matter what it is. This sense that when these particular aspects of our physical, mental, emotional experience arise—aspects that we dislike or fear or judge so harshly—they're not okay. When they arise, often our deep-rooted pattern of flinching back, pulling away, creating distance is so strong that we pull back from the thing we're judging in ourselves. Say, for example, jealousy. We pull back so quickly that it's almost below the level of consciousness. Jealousy might come up, and I've pulled back and reacted and started judging myself about it before I even consciously acknowledge, "Oh, jealousy is present." And in that pulling back, that sense of separation from ourselves, that sense of incompletion, that sense of needing to somehow fix ourselves, becomes so strong. And it's actually in the service of denial—of simply not feeling the jealousy.

So our practice of metta is this: if jealousy arises or self-judgment arises or anything in our experience that we judge as not being okay, the metta simply meets it with an outflowing quality of spacious acceptance. Because as Jung said, the parts of ourselves that we do not accept will become hostile to us. Metta functions by bringing all the parts of ourselves that we don't accept up into the light. It's not always a pleasant experience, definitely. There's a reason we're not accepting these parts—we don't like them.

But what metta does, as Ajahn Sumedho describes it: with metta, one isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. In other words, we're not saying, "I'm sending loving-kindness to myself because I'm such a wonderful, perfect, ideal person." Actually, the metta gets stronger as we open to and accept all the little warts that we don't like so much. He says, "Metta isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, thing, person, or in oneself. Witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it."

I love the felt sense that gives me. Thinking of myself, something I really detest about myself arises very clearly. With metta, with the heart of metta, we witness it in all the space of an open heart without creating anything around it. No ripple of aversion, no ripple of "Oh, that's okay, I'm really okay anyway." It's just what it is. It arises into the space of metta, it lives its life, and it passes.

The field of metta, as Sharon says, is like the sky—you can throw anything into it and it doesn't disturb it. The field of metta is undisturbed. A beautiful quality arises, we see it as beautiful, we don't create anything around it. An unpleasant quality arises, we see it as unpleasant, metta doesn't create anything around it. There's space for it all to arise, be met with clarity, with greatness of heart, and non-reactivity of mind.

Acceptance, kindness, and patience are three aspects of metta that it's very helpful to remember, especially when we find we're getting caught in aspects of self-judgment. This is where metta begins—by befriending all these little things or big things that have been kept in the dark. When they come up in our practice, and they will, it's not a mistake. It's because the metta is strengthening and deepening. Our heart becomes more courageous, more able to allow these difficult experiences to arise, because our deeper understanding and faith in our connectedness, in our intrinsic wholeness, is getting stronger and stronger. We know that can't be blasted. It doesn't matter what arises, and so we can greet it.

We can greet it as Rumi talks about in "The Guest House":

This being human is a guest house.
Every morning a new arrival.
A joy, a depression, a meanness,
some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor.
Welcome and entertain them all.
Even if they're a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still treat each guest honorably.

He may be clearing you out for some new delight. The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in. Be grateful for whoever comes, because each has been sent as a guide from beyond.

Many hidden joys and sorrows will come up. We're not going to have perfect, balanced metta with each of them, of course. But each moment—just in a moment—that there's the intention to connect with and accept and be kind to whatever's arising, that is a moment of metta. That strengthens our understanding of our connectedness.

So that's noticing how aversion, fear, and anger work to hide our sense of connectedness. This is called, in the classical terms, the far enemy of loving kindness. It's the far enemy because it's really the opposite. It comes up a lot in the practice, and it's pretty easy to notice. You know when you're caught in fear and aversion. You don't tend to confuse it with loving kindness.

Now attachment, clinging, the subtle quality of desire—this is sometimes called the near enemy of loving kindness. The near enemy, because at times, not always, but at times we can actually confuse the experience of attachment for metta.

Let me describe that a little bit. Recognizing in the moment of your experience how attachment or clinging arises and how it functions is pretty simple, pretty obvious when we're paying attention. Just as aversion or fear arises with an unpleasant experience, attachment arises with a pleasant experience. A pleasant sound, a pleasant sight, a pleasant emotion, a really nice thought about something pleasant that might happen ten years from now—but it's a thought arising in the moment, and there's this pleasant feeling that goes along with it.

When we're not paying attention, we tend to think, "Yes, this is right. This is good. This is happiness. This is how life is supposed to be." And there's just this subtle movement of energy, of mind, of heart towards that—or not so subtle. And if we're not noticing: "What can I do to make this stay forever?"

Now, I'm not saying that a pleasant experience isn't a kind of happiness—certainly it is. But it has conditions, the main one being it isn't going to stay forever, no matter what it is. And when we don't see that, what was actually experienced as happiness becomes the cause for greater suffering in the form of this delusion of separation, of needing something for love, needing something to complete me. In its grossest experience, as soon as the sense of wanting arises, we're caught in a sense of separation.

I'll give you an example. On a gross level, you wouldn't confuse this with metta because the suffering is obvious. I was getting on an airplane for an overnight flight, which I'm not fond of because I really can't sleep sitting up. I never sleep on those flights. I was on the aisle of one of those middle rows, and about ten minutes before I knew they were going to close the doors, I suddenly realized nobody had sat in the other seats. That was a moment of "Oh, that would be nice"—a moment of pleasantness.

And immediately, immediately, it turned to such suffering because of the grasping. How can I hold on to this? I've got to keep those seats. All my senses were strained. Everybody who walked through the door of that plane, my attention was just glued to watching where they were going, tightening. Hatred if they started to come down that row. Everyone on the plane became my enemy. It was a most unpleasant experience.

This, in its gross form, is how clinging works. It was just a pleasant sight, a pleasant thought—maybe I'll get to lie down—and it immediately created a sense of separation, suffering, and neediness.

It's a happy story because actually nobody sat down next to me. I got to lie down, and I also got to say, "Oh well, may everybody on this plane be happy."

So that's clinging on a gross level. We all know it. It's suffering. We wouldn't fool ourselves that it's not. But attachment often arises more subtly. Attachment and metta both follow on pleasant experience—they both arise in pleasant experience.

So we associate attachment with pleasant experience, but it has conditions. Metta also, when you're experiencing metta, is very pleasant. And it becomes more pleasant. And it's so easy for the attachment to slip in there and not be noticed. We can still think it's the metta functioning.

A couple of examples. Once I was on a retreat in a beautifully landscaped place in South Africa, way up in the mountains. It was really very exquisite. There was a circular walk lined with huge iris bushes. I had been there some weeks, and one morning I came out early just as the sun was coming up, which was my favorite time, with all this mistiness. A really beautiful spot. And all those bushes had suddenly bloomed that morning—this exquisite, very pale lavender white. The beauty was overwhelming. I can feel it now.

In that moment, standing there, there was just a sense of real appreciation. A sense of metta, really. Appreciation and connectedness to nature, to beauty, to the world. There were no thoughts. That's a moment of absolute connectedness—metta, no separation. Just as it is. A moment, two moments, three moments.

But the mind cannot leave well enough alone. After some moments of looking, this thought came in: "They won't still be here tomorrow. Maybe I should get a camera and take photos. Then I could show my mother—she would love to see this, she loves landscaping. I could show my friends. I could remember it."

I sort of noticed what was happening, but not really. It was masquerading as still appreciating with this loving, connected heart the beauty of the situation. But actually clinging had come in, and I was trying to hold on to it. Thinking I was enjoying just being present with metta, I was actually caught in clinging, in attachment. It took a little time to recognize, until I realized I had started running around—"I think I have a friend I can borrow a camera from"—and in fact, with all that beauty there, I was completely separated from it, running around like a nut looking for a camera so I could hold on to how beautiful it was.

This is what we do. It's not the irises that were the cause of the clinging or the attachment—it's the upwelling of pleasant feeling. It could have been anything. The irises, a nice thought, a pizza for lunch. It really didn't matter what it was. The attachment comes in to that upwelling of pleasant feeling. And if we're not alert, we might not notice it.

So metta, at times—in the times when all the shadow stuff isn't coming up—can be extremely pleasant. It's beautiful, that sense of connectedness, of completion, of easiness, of no need to shut out any experience. And it can easily drift into attachment.

I was sending metta to my dear friend, and I noticed suddenly, "Oh, we don't see each other as much as we used to. May she be happy. May she be free. How come we don't see each other so much? May she be free from danger." And then kind of back and forth, and suddenly there was just this little bit of longing. Sometimes longing can have a little edge of pleasantness, and you can keep going with it for a while and not quite recognize it's not metta—it's attachment.

That's attachment functioning as the near enemy of metta. It's not bad. It's not a mistake. We notice it because as you keep paying attention, after a while you notice it doesn't feel connected. And that's the difference. "I really would love for us to spend more time together"—it sounds connected, but it's actually creating this sense of separation. "I need to see her."

I need to be together. I need something from her in order to be complete. Whereas loving-kindness is just this outflowing of "may you be happy"—it doesn't matter if I never see or hear from you again. It has nothing to do with that. It's just a total wishing of well-being and happiness. And in that, we are perfectly happy and complete. It doesn't matter who you're sending it to—yourself, your friend, a benefactor, an enemy when we can get to that. The experience of metta itself is complete and connecting.

So knowing that attachment can masquerade as metta doesn't mean we then pull away from everything beautiful. Not at all. It's a great opportunity to learn the difference. At that point when I noticed I was getting into "how can we spend more time together," I brought my attention to my experience, felt the neediness, the separation. "Oh, this isn't metta." And you simply reconnect with the person's beautiful quality, reconnect with the phrase. Again, establishing that intention.

Metta is a practice of purity of motivation. It's not about results or controlling the results. And that's another way attachment can slip in and masquerade as metta—in how we're relating to the practice itself. I would find myself getting caught in this so often. "How am I doing? Am I feeling it yet? Is this really metta? Is this strong enough?

No, not really good enough, okay. Really feel it—may I be free from suffering! May I really feel it for him." And we're leaning into it. Or maybe we'll say, "Okay, it doesn't matter if I don't feel it, but if I really drop into each phrase, I'm going to get really concentrated. How concentrated am I?"

This is attachment slipping into the practice. If you're leaning forward a little bit, doing a kind of check—how good am I doing, how strong is the feeling, comparing it to yesterday, comparing it to someone else—you're slipping into attachment. Remember, all we can do is establish in one moment the purity of our intention, of our motivation. I wish to wish myself well. I can't control the results.

One other way the practice sometimes leans into attachment: we hear the phrases as trying to change how things are. For instance, if I'm sick and I'm saying "may I be healthy," that can just be the pure motivation of caring for my body—or it could be "may I really get healthy, I hate this sickness." Or for someone we really care for who's having a hard time, when we're saying "may you be happy," there's that subtle moving into thinking if I do this, maybe it'll change their unhappiness. Maybe it will, and it would be great if it does, but all we can do is cultivate the purity of the well-wishing.

If you find yourself sliding into frustration, or leaning forward, or feeling somehow out of sync, you might check and see if the practice has started focusing on results rather than simply resting in the intention to connect, to wish well. If we can just rest in that intention, it takes a lot of pressure off. We realize it's all out of our control how it goes. All we do is when we notice we're off anywhere else—oh, okay, come back. Connect with myself, connect with the benefactor, whoever you're sending it to, and just gently, delicately drop into your heart with the next phrase. That's all. You don't have to go anywhere beyond that. In any moment we can just come back and do that. We're cultivating metta. We're cultivating this quality of loving, accepting connectedness.

It sneaks up on us. A lot of the time, we really don't notice that anything is happening. But each time we repeat the phrase, each time we connect with whoever we're sending it to—even when we don't feel a thing—that is a reinforcing, a strengthening of that intention of heart and mind. And that's all we have to work with. The intention of metta is what counteracts the habits of ill will and greed, the habits of seeming separation, confusion, and suffering. Each intention of metta allows our faith and trust in our absolute connectedness to get stronger.

I want to end with something the Buddha said. He said, "If just for the lasting of a finger snap, a person indulges in a thought of goodwill, or gives attention to a thought of goodwill, of metta, just for the lasting of a finger snap, such a person is called a bhikkhu"—which means someone who is really devoted to the practice. "Not empty of result is her meditation. She carries out the teaching. She responds to advice. She does not eat the country's alms food in vain. So what then would I say of one who makes much of such a thought?"

It's so powerful.

Just for a finger snap. Think how many finger snaps you've cultivated thoughts of goodwill already today. We have no idea of the power of that, but it's immense.

In these moments where we consciously recognize that metta, that open acceptance, over and over, we really experience the potential to live our life in another way—in another way altogether. To find an ease and a happiness of heart and mind that is not dependent on any changing circumstance.

This is really how the practice of metta opens us to true liberation of heart and mind.

CHAPTER 298

Getting Off The Hamster Wheel

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental question that arises early in meditation practice: why do we want to be aware? She examines how our deeply ingrained habit of equating happiness with pleasant experience keeps us trapped on a "hamster wheel" of dissatisfaction—constantly chasing pleasure and fleeing from discomfort, yet never finding lasting peace.
> Drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the Two Arrows (or Two Darts), Wilson illuminates how we compound our suffering through mental reactivity. When we experience physical pain, we add a second arrow of worry, resistance, and interpretation. She explains that an awakened person experiences the same pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings as anyone else—the difference lies in not creating elaborate stories around these experiences. Through vivid examples, including being stuck in Boston traffic and Michael Crichton's encounter with an elephant outside his tent, she demonstrates how meeting experience directly dissolves the hysteria that accompanies our unwillingness to look at what is actually happening.
> Wilson offers practical guidance on working with mindfulness as "bare attention"—bringing awareness to actual sensations rather than our interpretations of them. She emphasizes that mindfulness is non-judging and non-discriminating, meeting each moment with kindness. This quality of attention, combined with concentration, allows us to step off the hamster wheel at any moment and discover that peace, happiness, and our capacity to love are always available. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Happiness is available, please help yourself"—our practice simply teaches us how to recognize what has always been here.

Today in one of the groups a question came up which I feel is very important, one that arises at some point at the beginning of every retreat, especially if you haven't done a lot of this form of meditation practice before.

The question is very basic: Why do we want to be aware?

I think it's a crucial question. Because often, though not for everyone, after two days of being aware, what we're aware of seems to lack depth and profundity and great insight. It veers towards the mundane or the uncomfortable. I find myself often in retreat asking, "Why? Why is feeling the breath going to liberate my heart? How does that work?"

I want to talk a little bit about that.

If you reflect for a moment on why you came here, just let yourself feel again what it was and is that brought you to such an endeavor as a ten-day silent retreat, whatever words you might put on it. We would all probably have different ones. My guess—of course I can't know—is that in some form each of us would be looking, in our own way, for what we might call happiness or peace or an open heart, or to live with more love and compassion, more connectedness, more joy, whatever way we would describe it.

And instead we might find ourselves confronted with restlessness, boredom, out-of-control thinking, an occasional moment of breath, dissatisfaction, doubt—whatever might come up. Our tendency at that time is to think, "Well, this certainly isn't the happiness or peace I came for. It seems to be going in the other direction."

So how do they come together?

I'm sure some of you have heard this before. One of the things that supposedly motivated the Buddha to teach after he was awakened was that, in looking through the world, he could see that every human being—all of us—are one in our heartfelt desire to be happy, whatever that means for us. That's part of what connects us as human beings. And the sadness, what moved the Buddha to compassion, was seeing that in our very sincere efforts to be happy, no matter how twisted they might come out, because we don't really understand true happiness, we do the very things that keep us spinning in dissatisfaction and anguish and unhappiness.

It's like a hamster spinning on a wheel—the faster we go trying to be happy, the more oppressed and unsatisfied we feel. Until we stop for a moment and take a look, we don't see, we can't understand what our confusion is, how we're misinterpreting our experience, misinterpreting the nature of happiness.

Einstein once said that everything in the world changes—everything changes except one thing: the way we think. We need to find a new way to think.

So that's what we're here for, in some ways. To begin to explore how the ways we think about ourselves and the world might not be accurate. And to begin to discover how to experience ourselves moment to moment in a way that is accurate, integrated with truth, in a way that allows us to rest at ease in the nature of our true hearts.

Put very simply, breaking it down to bare bones, one of the main ways we tend to misinterpret or misconstrue happiness is that we tend to think—and we don't often realize this is what we're thinking—that happiness is equivalent to pleasant experience. If I have a pleasant or enjoyable sensation or thought or emotion or smell or whatever, then that's happiness. Which it is. It's a moment of pleasure. There's no question about that. But how long does it last? It's a moment of pleasure, but it's not the happiness of peace. It's not the sure heart's relief that the Buddha was talking about.

So without realizing it, we can end up spending our lives looking for pleasant experience. When pleasant experience comes, we do everything we can to make it stay. We try to arrange and rearrange our lives to get more pleasant experience. And when painful, difficult, unpleasant experience comes, it means we did something wrong. We blew it somehow, because happiness is more and more and more pleasure.

In trying to create a life like this, often without realizing we're doing it, this chasing after pleasure and running from what's unpleasant is what has us running on that wheel like a hamster. And even with our best intentions, we think, "I'm a good person. How come things aren't working out?" Because our understanding of what's going to make us truly happy is skewed. We can find ourselves in really unhappy circumstances and not know how we got there.

An example that felt so sad to me: I read an interview a few weeks ago with Marlon Brando. He said, "I never was a good father or a good husband."

I was always busy with my own life. Now I am a guilty old man who feels ashamed of his life. Besides food, there is nothing else in the world for me. That's the only thing in my life. I know this eating will kill me, but I just can't stop."

It's so sad. And not like, "Oh, he's some kind of weirdo." I can see in myself how easily I can get lost in following whatever he was following in his early life to give him pleasure. It's not making him happy now, and what's left? The pleasant experience of eating.

We're a society that has some extremely addictive tendencies. And it's played on, of course, by the media and advertising very strongly. In some ways, when I've been overseas or in Asia, I notice that the same tendencies of mine are everywhere. I'm not saying only Americans—remember, the Buddha was an Indian man who lived 2,500 years ago. It was the same story. But it definitely seems to me, in my experience, exaggerated when I come back to the States. Just want, want, want, want. And then we suffer so much.

In our lives, whatever it is we're chasing after to give us more extended pleasant feeling—whether it's more money, more fame, a better job, a better house, better friendships—not that there's anything wrong with any of those things per se. It's that feeling that if I have this pleasant thing, I can keep it, and then I'll be happy. That leads us to fear and deny any unpleasant aspects of experience, which of course is going to happen.

We so easily bring that into the retreat here. Just look at your experience through the day. What do you find yourself looking for that would be a "good retreat"? You probably don't think, "It doesn't matter whether I have a lot of back pain or I'm really in bliss. I'm happy with whatever comes up." When you have a somewhat quiet sitting and the next one your mind's all over the place, it's rare—and I don't mean just if you're new to this either—it's rare to sit there and go, "Fine. Peacefulness, distractedness, it's all one in the Dharma."

And we laugh. It's almost like not a possibility. But that is the way of peace. That's the way of true freedom. If we come to the retreat looking to create some other reality than the one that's here right now in this moment, then we're jumping on that hamster wheel and running as fast as we can.

The secret is that we can just step off that wheel at any moment. Because the secret of freedom and the secret of our practice is that it really doesn't matter what's happening in your experience. It really doesn't. We use tools and we use technique, and I'll talk more about that, but the end result isn't to become a perfect breather or a perfect sitter or the best walker or to be able to sit down and never have a thought. Those are all experiences that come and go. Even if you had a whole sitting without a thought, so what? I bet when you stand up, there'll be a thought. Sooner or later, there'll be a thought. So what? That's not the point.

What we miss by getting so involved in our reaction to experience—wanting the pleasant, fearing the unpleasant—what we miss is the fact that real ease of heart, happiness, peace, connectedness with ourselves and all life is our natural state. It's our birthright. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Happiness is available, please help yourself."

But we don't know how. And that's what's such a mystery—because it's so available and we don't know how to recognize it. When we can, for just a moment, stop becoming so involved in our reactions to experience and just be with what is, very connected to it but without wanting it to stay or wanting it to go, just being with it—in that moment, we step off the wheel. In that moment, peace is available. Happiness is available. But it's not the happiness of necessarily ecstasy or a pleasant experience. It's just the happiness of peace, of connectedness, of acceptance of things as they are.

I'll give an example. Experience doesn't change; our relationship to it does. Being in a traffic jam.

Once—it's happened more than once, but this particular time—I was on the way to the airport in Boston very early in the morning, about six o'clock, to catch a flight to California that would connect to a flight to Bangkok. That's worse than missing a direct overseas flight, because if you miss the connection, you really miss everything.

We were cruising along, and in Boston, to get to the airport, you have to go through this increasingly narrow funnel of highways—six lanes down to one lane into this tunnel. Once you're committed to that way, there really isn't another route to the airport. We had just pulled off onto the exit that starts the maze of roads into the tunnel when everything stopped dead. You know those traffic jams where you're not even inching forward? You're just stopped. You turn off the motor. You can't go back, you can't go out, you can't go anywhere.

We sat there for twenty-five minutes. And I really watched my reactions—there wasn't much else to do. I went through the whole gamut. "Oh, it's fine, it's fine." I'm not calling this acceptance. I'm calling this pseudo-acceptance. "It's fine, no problem. We'll just sit here." Five minutes. Ten. Fifteen. Now it's getting a little too long. This isn't okay anymore. The nervousness, the impatience—what can I do? Well, there's nothing to do. The whole anxiety. This is running on the wheel. This is suffering.

And finally I said, you know what? If I miss the flight, I miss the flight. That's all that happens. It's just what it is. And the whole extra fell away. For some moments, it was quite okay. I'm not saying it falls away once and that's it, folks, we're done. No, we keep practicing moment by moment by moment. But really, all the suffering, the fear, the nervousness—it was just gone. My friend and I started to have a nice conversation. It was quite amazing to see the difference.

That was some moments—five or ten—and then, as often happens when you stop getting so upset, the traffic started moving again. I made all the planes because they were late, and it was a nice ending. But to see that in that moment—it was not like a transcendent experience of leaving my body or being in a state of bliss. We were just sitting in the car in the traffic jam. Very ordinary. And in that ordinariness, we can find a real peace of heart and happiness.

This is one aspect, we could say, of freedom. I'm not saying it's the ultimate, absolute nibbāna, but it's an essence, a taste of freedom and peace that is accessible to all of us in any particular moment of our experience. It doesn't matter what's happening. It could also happen in a very pleasant experience, where the stepping off is to let go of our trying to hold on, knowing that this is really groovy but it's going to end sometime—and that's okay too.

The Buddha said once, "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by me, namely liberation through non-clinging." It's not so exciting as we might be looking for. We just stop trying to control everything and become really present with things as they are.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, our capacity to wake up, to understand, and to love—what you could call our Buddha nature—is always here. So our practice, this technique of vipassanā, is not to create some alternative reality. It's to help us learn how to recognize this potential to understand and to love that's always here. And because we're so used to not recognizing it, every single moment is another chance.

The day might have seemed really long and dreary sometimes. How many moments do I have to keep paying attention? It's wonderful, actually. I should have figured out how many seconds there are in a day, because every one of those is an opportunity to step off the wheel and recognize your capacity for peace, your capacity for love, your capacity for understanding. It doesn't matter what's happening. So when you get really disgruntled, when you're really fed up—fine. That's a moment to notice. Capacity for freedom.

It's great because there's nothing that has to block this. And once the question was asked: if it's so easy, how come we don't recognize it? If it's so simple, how come we have to sit through this long and sometimes grueling form of practice? How does doing something as mundane as being aware of our breath, feeling the sensations of our footsteps, noticing the pain in our knee—how does that help us wake up to our potential for happiness?

One of the reasons we don't recognize this potential is what I mentioned at the beginning, and I want to elaborate on it now. Our habits of reactivity to pleasant and unpleasant are so deep, so ingrained, that we don't even recognize when it's happening. For example, when we have a pain in the knee, we can become so involved in thinking about how it's going to be for the rest of the sitting, wondering what it means, wondering how we can fix it. Perhaps wondering if the teacher sits in a chair because she hurt her knee from sitting too long. I didn't, so I'll tell you right now. All of that thinking—"I can't bear it"—none of that is being mindful of the pain in the knee. None of that is actually being connected with mindfulness to the bare experience. And we don't even recognize this because we're so used to confusing our interpretation with reality.

The paradox of recognizing the potential for ease and peace in any moment is not that it's far away or somewhere else. It's that this Buddha nature, this resting at ease in whatever arises, is so close that it requires an immediacy, a totality of presence and attention to recognize and rest in it. Any reaction of mind—whether pulling away from unpleasant experience, or trying to lean forward and hold on to pleasant, or just zoning out and not connecting at all—any of those reactions actually pulls us back. I feel it almost physically, this pulling back from the immediacy, the totality of experience, and so we don't recognize. We don't even realize sometimes that we are not wholly present.

When we talk about concentration as a bringing together, a unifying quality of mind and body, it's not just that it's a nice state. It's not just that it helps us focus. This unification is what lets us really rest in the present moment. It's what lets us be totally here. And so our practice becomes, moment to moment, learning how to open into and accept whatever experience is arising right now—because that's all there is. In learning how to be fully present with kindness, we're learning how to accept and open to ourselves and to all of life. We're learning how to be free.

This habit of not liking unpleasant, liking pleasant, and ignoring neutral—did you even know that there were neutral experiences? They happen a lot. We tend not to notice them at all. This habit is so deep that we don't even realize it's only a habit. As I said before, it's very common to evaluate our experience by how pleasant it is, and if it's unpleasant, we assume something's wrong. If you're sick, you've somehow broken the fabric of harmony in the universe—as if we're going to live our lives without ever getting sick. And I suppose we're going to die without ever being sick too? Or somehow if we can get the perfect balance of health, we'll never die. There's some element of denial, I think, in this attitude.

But I want to talk specifically about how this works, this relationship to pleasant and unpleasant, and how it blinds us to the potential for peace. The Buddha describes it—and I hope this is helpful because I think it's very elegant. He asks: what's the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened person? He says an unawakened person experiences pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling, and neutral feeling. An awakened person also experiences the same three: pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling. So what makes the difference between them?

This discourse is called the Two Darts, or the Two Arrows. He says when an unawakened person experiences an unpleasant physical feeling—pain in the knee, for example—he worries and grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he weeps and is distraught. Thus he experiences two kinds of unpleasant feelings: unpleasant physical feeling and unpleasant mental feeling. He says this is like two arrows. It's as if a person were shot with an arrow, and then with the beating of the breast and the worrying and lamenting, it's as if he shoots another arrow into himself. Thus, instead of suffering from the pain of one arrow, he suffers from the pain of two.

How often are we shooting that second arrow at ourselves?

But then he goes on, and this is what I find so elegant. An unawakened person, he says, in experiencing an unpleasant feeling, knows of no other escape from painful feeling than to look for a pleasant sensual experience. If you have a pain in the knee, you look for some pleasant feeling. If you can't move, then you might create a pleasant mental fantasy—something pleasant to get away from the unpleasant. This creates an underlying tendency, which is where we fall into the deep habit of resistance and reaction to unpleasant, and of real greed. The translation uses the word "lust"—a real yearning, a holding on to the pleasant. And so an unawakened person becomes caught.

in sort of this duality. As soon as there's unpleasant, there's a resistance, and then a trying to go for the pleasant. And we're back on the hamster wheel.

The Buddha says the difference with an awakened person is they experience the painful, unpleasant sensation, bodily or mentally—and that's all. They experience it. They don't grieve and lament and beat the breast. And so there's not created the unconscious tendency to resist the unpleasant and hold on to the pleasant. And so there's peace.

Or as Ajahn Sumedho wrote once, one is able to witness the pleasant and the unpleasant without creating anything around it. It's just what it is.

Now granted, this might not sound really exciting, but it's extremely wonderful. It's just what it is. The reaction and the interpretation is what creates and maintains our dissatisfaction with ourselves, with our experience, with our life. And without experiencing this for ourselves over and over, it's really hard to trust, to have the faith that when something arises, pleasant or unpleasant, we just really be with it. We just open to it without resistance or clinging.

It's almost counterintuitive. Oh, pain in the knee? Let me just open into it. It's not our normal reaction. But we offer it as a radical alternative to these underlying tendencies the Buddha was speaking about—to simply meet the experience of this moment. Only this moment. You don't have to look beyond this moment. Simply meet this moment's experience just as it is, without judgment, without making up a big melodrama about it, simply being present with non-judging attention.

This is radical. Be with things just as they are. But it's the path of freedom. I'm not saying it's easy. Sometimes it's our fear, our habit of not meeting experience, that makes it seem as if it's impossible. When we actually just meet what's happening, it's just the dark. It's just a painful sensation. That's all. The interpretation is all the suffering.

An example. This is from Michael Crichton—he's a great Buddhist author. You might not have known that. He was writing about one time when he was on an animal safari in Africa, staying in tents with guides who knew the bush and everything. He was in his tent in the middle of the night with his wife, and there was a huge banging noise and brushing and rustling. He woke up just petrified. He's lying there thinking, "There's elephants out there." The guides had said there's no way elephants were in this area—they hadn't been around for a long time. But he was just lying there, and his wife woke up, and they're both terrified and shaking, creating all these ideas in his mind.

Finally, finally he said, "Okay, I'll get up and look." He creeps to his tent and unzips it, looks out—huge brown eyes, an elephant, right outside the tent. And he thought, "Ah, there's an elephant." Zipped up his tent, went back into his sleeping bag, and went to sleep.

This is what he said about it the next day. At first he was a little surprised that he got so calm and went to sleep after he saw what it really was. But he said later he realized we are all like this. We all can work ourselves into a hysterical panic over possibilities that we can't look at. What if I have cancer? What if my job is at risk? What if my kids are on drugs? What if I'm getting bald? What if an elephant is outside my tent?

And that hysteria always goes away the instant we are willing to hear the answer—even if the answer is what we feared all along. Yes, you have cancer.

Yes, your kids are on drugs. Yes, there is an elephant outside your tent. Now the question becomes: what are you going to do about it?

Subsequent emotions may not be pleasant, but the hysteria stops. Hysteria accompanies an unwillingness to look at what is really going on. It promotes an unwillingness to look. We feel we are afraid to look, when actually it is not looking that makes us afraid. The minute we look, we cease being afraid.

And I love that. It doesn't mean that when we look and cease being afraid, everything is wonderful. But it means we're connected with things as they are. And in that moment, intelligent action is possible. Opening again to life, to ourselves and others, is possible. Compassion is possible.

This is the way of the compassionate heart and freedom. It transforms our life by transforming how we relate to our life, not by necessarily changing the outer circumstances. No amount of meditation is going to stop illness. No amount of meditation is going to make everyone we know happy, or stop sorrow and loss and death and conflict. Nothing is going to give us constant bliss. And that's not what this meditation is about.

But the meditation we're practicing here gives us the tools, on a moment-to-moment basis, to learn how to come out of a life of blind reactivity—to really drop that being afraid to look that keeps us being afraid to look—and just look. Whatever we see is just what it is. And this opens us to a life of great compassion and connectedness to ourselves and others.

The main tool we're using here is mindfulness—mindfulness combined with concentration. I'm going to mostly talk about mindfulness now.

Mindfulness is a quality of attention, an energy of focused awareness that arises on a moment-to-moment basis, one that we can become familiar with and experience consciously. I want to describe some qualities of mindfulness.

Perhaps the most important: we sometimes call mindfulness "bare attention." It's bringing our awareness to the actual experience of something, as opposed to all our ideas about that experience. It actually makes things very simple.

For example, when we talk about feeling the breath, we might ask: can you describe what you feel when you feel the breath? And you begin to see how difficult it can be for us to know what the bare experience is. Because we can go through the whole range —"The breath is like a waterfall, and I feel it flowing down in sparkles, moving in and out." That's an image. That's a thought. Which is fine if you know it's an image or a thought, but it's not the sensations of the breath.

Then we might say, "Okay, I feel the stomach moving against my clothes." And in a way, that's what we feel—but that's also an interpretation. Because when your eyes are closed, you're not really feeling stomach or clothes. You might be feeling pressure, or scratching, or tension, or tightness. Even these are words we put on the experience.

But how can you actually feel "t-shirt"? What does t-shirt feel like? What even does t-shirt mean when you come to the bare experience? All I can say about t-shirt is: image in my mind—that's seeing. I can feel a kind of warmth and scratchiness—that's the experience of touching. I can look and see a color I call lavender—that's seeing, and also thinking. The t-shirt is just an idea.

The power of practicing bare experience is simply this: the ideas aren't bad, but we bring our attention to the actual experience, over and over. This begins to cut through our habits of reactivity and allows us to just be with what is. Being with the breath in that way. Being with sensations in the body. Later, being with emotions, being with sounds.

So mindfulness has this aspect of bare attention—the experience, the sense experience itself. Feeling, hearing, tasting, touching, seeing, smelling, thinking.

That's all. Just the sense experiences, including the mind of thinking.

So there's the bare attention, and there's also the quality of mindfulness that is absolutely kind, non-judging, non-discriminating. With mindfulness, with the breath, a breath starts. We don't say, "Well, I don't really like this breath too much. It's a little rough. I'll wait for the next one." We feel the sensation; the attention is there. Non-discriminating, non-judging—it's just what it is.

With the breath, that might be easy. But when we begin to open up to sensations in the body, we see how this discrimination slips in. We feel the breath. "That's painful. A little too painful. I think I better just stay with the breath. I need to develop a little more focus before I feel that." Or certain kinds of cramps—I remember one time a friend was saying, "Well, I have these cramps in my stomach." "Oh, I'm really familiar with them. I get them all the time." So what? They're happening right now. But often we think, "That's familiar, I don't need to pay attention to that." Or we can easily think, "This is more pleasant," and without even knowing it, we just slip over and pay attention to the pleasant. Or the unpleasant—we can have a bias either way. But mindfulness doesn't discriminate. It meets whatever is happening in a very kind way.

Let me give an example of how this really cuts through our suffering, our interpretations, the confusion we place on reality. This is a very common experience. A yogi on retreat last year, in Barre, a retreat just like this, told me this after she'd been going through it for a few days. It's always nice when you go through it yourself and come to understanding from your own experience.

She said there was a repetitive noise in the hall—I think it was probably the ticking of a clock, though she didn't say. She'd be sitting there quietly, being with her breath, feeling very calm, and then hear the noise. Hear the noise. And she first became annoyed, then became just filled with rage and anger. "That noise is just destroying my concentration. It's ruining my practice." She was having a miserable time for days, until finally something—of course, we'd been saying it all along, but we always hear it when we can hear it—she heard one of us say, "When you become aware of the experience of hearing, just be with the bare experience of hearing."

All of that—"Why is that noise in here? How dare they put a clock in here! It's ruining my meditation, my concentration is shot"—none of that is the bare experience of hearing. So she said, "Okay, let me try it." When the tick would come, attention right with ticking. Not even saying that, just right there with the hearing. And she said the whole suffering just died away. She became very peaceful and calm. There was just sound arising. And she said, "You know what? That clock wasn't bothering my concentration. My mind was disturbing my concentration. It had nothing to do with the sound."

This is really how coming back over and over to just the simple experience can help us—unknown to us how it even works—come to deep insight about the nature of our experience in any moment, and how suffering is created, so much of it, by our mind's reactions. And how just a moment can cut through it all. Which is really lucky for us, that it only takes a moment of connection to cut through it all, because we've spent an awfully long time building it up.

One reason retreats can be so uncomfortable is because we're cutting through our habits of mind. And as we know, habits might be really bad for us, but they can also be really comfortable. It's really hard to break a habit, no matter how destructive it might be. And our habit of reactivity—judging pleasant and unpleasant and neutral—is very deep.

So when we say, "Please come to the sitting and just stay here until the sitting ends," part of the reason for that is because it helps you not give in to the habit. Even if the reason you stay is simply shame—you don't want everyone else to know you got up and left. And believe me, that comes up at times. That has served us all at some point.

Sooner or later, you get over the shame, and there's nothing to do but come back and pay attention to whatever it is that's bugging you. And that's the moment when it's possible to say, "Ah. Oh, that's just an unpleasant feeling. It's just vedanā. I don't have to shoot the second arrow. That's just somebody clearing their throat. It's just hearing. I don't have to construct a whole reality around that." And if we don't make it in that moment, we get another moment to try again.

Tomorrow, as we begin to expand the instructions to include physical sensations in a broader way—not just waiting for the really intense ones, but any physical sensation—you'll see that this is a fertile ground for exploration. Physical sensations are a good place to investigate the quality of attention and the difference between this non-judging, kind way of being with experience versus how different it feels when we flip into being identified with or caught in the interpretation or the reaction.

For example, the breath. It's been nice and soft and calm, and then you sit down and all of a sudden it's tight and constricted and you can't breathe deeper than here. How easy is it to build up a whole life history around that? It's not just tight and shallow—it's a sign of my ongoing constricted heart, my shallowness of emotions, my inability to do anything right, my inability to relate to other people, my type A personality, my great ambition, my driving inconsideration for others. No wonder it's torment! We come back and there's tightness, and instead of recognizing that that's all it is—just tightness—we shoot about twenty-five arrows of everything that's ever been wrong with us. Pain in the knee, pain in the back, anything it might be.

It's interesting to watch before it gets to be really strong, unbearable pain, because granted, it's very difficult for us to be at ease in the midst of strong and ongoing pain, whether physical or emotional. It's possible, but it's difficult, and it's not the best place to start learning. The place to start learning is with the little, nudgy ones. So when you feel a little nudge in your back and you think, "Well, I won't pay attention to that until it gets worse," you're losing a really good opportunity to practice mindful awareness.

Instead of doing all the things we usually do to avoid discomfort, bring your attention gently into the unpleasant feeling itself. This is mindfulness. Don't even call it pain—I find as soon as I say "pain," I've got a whole idea around it. This sensation: what does it really feel like? Is it tingling? Is it burning? Is it heat? Can you just get interested in the actual experience? This affectionate curiosity brings in the kindness, brings in the undiscriminating quality of mindfulness, brings us right into bare experience.

And then you can see the difference when there's just a moment of resting at ease in that unpleasantness, and then you feel, "Oh my God, but there's forty-two more minutes to this sitting. I don't think I can make it." That is the second arrow—fear, projecting into the future, tightness, aversion.

Aversion or fear, in my experience, really arises from the mistaken belief that somehow I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant or painful experience, that some way I can avoid actually being fully present for it. And in fact, if you notice how your attention behaves in that moment of "Oh no, I can't stand this for forty-two more minutes," your attention has actually pulled back. I feel it almost physically, as if pulling away from the experience of the pain, so that we're actually not connecting in that moment. And thus our experience of life when there's something unpleasant becomes an experience of unconnectedness, of separation, because that's what we're actually doing—we're pulling away from experience.

Now, if that worked, if substituting pleasant experience when there's something unpleasant actually worked as a strategy all the time, that would be okay. But obviously it doesn't, or none of us would be here. What brings us back into peace is actually going back and connecting with the experience.

A small example: sometimes when I sleep funny or something, my neck goes out and I'll have a strong headache that goes on all day. And I feel from that sort of disconnected and spacey—today's been a day like that. And I do what we often do when we think we're being mindful of something unpleasant. There are lots of ways we can kid ourselves, like, "Oh yeah, headache. I acknowledge it. There's a headache."

You feel it, sort of feel it. Call it a sideways glance. You know it's there, you let yourself feel it for a second, and then kind of pull back and pay attention to something else more compelling. And the headache just kind of goes on and on. And we start to feel really not that present, not quite connected, not so alive.

Because the problem is we can't shut down selectively. When we shut down to anything, we're shutting down globally. When I shut down to my headache, when I pull back from that, I'm pulling back from everything. I do feel disconnected, but it's not because of the headache. It's the pulling back.

Just before I came in here tonight, I was standing right by our apartments looking out over the desert, and I saw a coyote wandering around, actually very close to the first little road you come to when you're going down into the desert. I got totally engrossed in watching it, so that I was completely unified and connected in that. Watching him for about five minutes. He didn't seem to see me at all, just meandering around. And then he turned and started toward me, almost came up the hill. And then I saw him look up and see me. He literally went like, "Oh my God, what's that?" and turned around and went in another direction. Just then Franz was walking in from the desert, and the coyote saw him—"Oh my God, there's another person!"—and went off in yet another direction.

I got really happy, very connected. And then I saw, right. I connected with my head. Oh yeah, right. There's a headache here, and I've been avoiding it all day. Boom. So the coyote, the connection that I felt, brought me back into connection with the headache, and again I'm present. Sometimes you might connect with something else, and then that lets you come back again to the difficulty. But there's no way we can avoid it and really be open and present in our lives.

So in learning to bring this mindful awareness to pain, it's just this: how can we soften into the bare experience? Not bargaining—"I'll pay attention if you go away in ten minutes. I'll pay attention if I get a really good insight from this." Any bargaining has an edge of aversion. The sideways glance isn't quite there. Gritting the teeth and enduring it, the willpower, is also not the gentle strength of mindfulness.

And one other relationship we can sometimes develop in practice toward pain—physical and emotional pain and suffering—is that we make it better than pleasant. I've often had people come and say, "Things are too nice. The practice is too easy. I must be doing something wrong." Whatever's happening is okay. Just as the difficult is totally fine, so is the not difficult. It's not that the more I suffer, the better I'm doing. Just as it's not the less I suffer, the better I'm doing. It's neither of those. Can we just throw those out the window and simply be with what happens without preconception, without pre-judgment? That's our practice. Participatory, fully present in whatever's happening without needing to judge it.

Obviously this requires infinite patience. And patience actually arises from the wisdom of seeing things as they are—seeing that in this world, as we open to our moment-to-moment experience, we learn to open and embrace the whole show. That there is no happiness that does not sometimes turn to sorrow. That everything in the world is in constant flux, ebb and flow. The seasons. Day and night. The setting sun, the rising moon, the tides. Periods of health, periods of sickness. Periods of great happiness, periods of great sorrow. Periods of really nice, peaceful breath, and periods when you can't stay with more than two breaths if it meant your life.

Everything's in constant change, and it's also completely out of our control. If we could really get that—that we can't make things stay the same and we can't control what's going to happen next—can you imagine how much more at ease we'd be in our lives? If we could just meet what happens without needing to know what it's going to be?

So what happens with this practice is that we learn to hold both of these. And it's not easy. To be able to be with great suffering is what opens us to the joy and the beauty and deep compassion. We can't have one without the other. Sometimes it's hard to hold them both.

This is from a woman named Etty Hillesum, a young Dutch woman who was writing this from a pre-concentration camp in Holland in World War II: "It is possible to suffer with dignity and without dignity..."

I mean, most of us in the West don't understand the art of suffering and experience a thousand fears instead. We cease to be alive, being full of fear, bitterness, hatred, and despair. God knows it's only too easy to understand why.

We have to accept death as part of life, even the most horrible of deaths. And don't we live an entire life each one of our days? I am in Poland every day on the battlefields, if that's what one can call them. I often see visions of poisonous green smoke. I am with the hungry, with the ill-treated and the dying every day. But I am also with the jasmine and with that piece of blue sky beyond my window. There is room for everything in a single life—for belief in God and for a miserable death.

When I say I have come to terms with life, I don't mean I have lost hope. What I feel is not hopelessness, far from it. It's a question of living life from minute to minute and taking suffering into the bargain. And it's certainly no small bargain these days. Suffering has always been with us. Does it really matter in what form it comes? All that matters is how we bear it and how we fit it into our lives.

And that's the koan for all of us. It's not that we only open to suffering, but when we can open to the difficult—that's the reason we sit with these little nudgy pains—we find that we can use our own particulars of suffering. They don't have to be grandiose. But when we can be with our own difficulties, this is what opens our heart to the vastness of wisdom and the action of compassion that lets us be fully present for the joys and sorrows of others, that lets us live a really full and joyful and peaceful life, really awake and intimate in our life, but not caught in this blindness of reactivity.

So that we can live a life that's really heartfelt, filled with compassion, unafraid. We don't have to say at the end of our life what Marlon Brando did. We don't have to say with Colette, "What a wonderful life I've had. I only wish I'd realized it sooner."

A wonderful life includes all aspects. And what we're doing in this practice, as Joko Beck says, is moving from a self-centered view of life and practice to a life-centered view of life and practice. We're part of life, but we're not the central focus.

Introductory Remarks at Mettā Retreat with Sharon and Sylvia

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this opening talk for a mettā (loving-kindness) retreat, Carol Wilson, alongside teachers Sylvia Boorstein, Sharon Salzberg, and Myoshin Kelley, welcomes practitioners to what she describes as a homecoming—not just to the retreat center, but to our truest selves. Through a deceptively simple story about a flight attendant encounter, she illuminates how the relaxed, clear mind naturally recognizes our genuine connectedness with all beings, spontaneously giving rise to kindness and compassion.
> The talk establishes the foundational framework for retreat practice through the formal taking of the Three Refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the Five Precepts. Carol explains these not as rote traditions but as profound reaffirmations of our commitment to awakening and our confidence in the potential for liberation that exists in every moment. She emphasizes that taking refuge in the Buddha means trusting in our own capacity for awakening; refuge in the Dhamma means opening fully to truth in the present moment; and refuge in the Saṅgha honors both awakened beings and our community of practitioners supporting one another.
> The five training rules of non-harming—abstaining from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, harmful speech, and intoxicants—are presented as ways to create sacred space and cultivate fearlessness within the community. Carol encourages practitioners to observe their own minds when impulses toward harm arise, noting that harming others inevitably harms ourselves. The talk closes with guidance on using breath awareness as a foundation for the mettā practice to follow, inviting practitioners to simply arrive and settle into presence before the formal loving-kindness instructions begin.

Welcome to this retreat. My name is Sylvia, and this is Sharon, and this is Carol, and this is Myoshin. It's a great honor and pleasure for all of us to be here. Thank you very much for coming.

It's a very great pleasure—the biggest probably for any of us—to be able to teach. So it's a wonderful gift that we all give each other by coming here to practice together.

It would be wonderful for me to know for how many people this is their first time here. Welcome. And for how many people their tenth or more. Welcome. And everybody else in between.

I realized as I came in that because I couldn't be here last year for this course, it's been two years since I was here in February. Some of us were here together at that time. And I realized two things: I realized how happy I was to be here, and how it really seems like yesterday that I was here. I'm quite sure that both of those have significant meaning.

As I listened to the instructions, which were really wonderful and very complete and certainly showed a lot of thought about all the kinds of questions that could come up in people's minds—they're really very well thought through—I thought perhaps for people who haven't been here before, it really seems like you've come far away from home, because we have quite a particular way in which we live and practice together. So I thought it was important also to say that my sense of what we've all done is that we've actually come home. We've begun to come home.

I just arrived, as all of you did today, and when I set out from California this morning, I had been looking forward very much, as I'm sure you all have, to coming here to this time to practice. I felt excited in the way that I feel about coming home to a place that's been so special to me, where I've done so much of my practice and spent so much time.

Of course, we start out with trusting that we can be at home to our truest self wherever we are. We don't need to be in this certain place. But it's very wonderful to be in this certain place.

I wondered about how all of us would teach tonight because we hadn't planned who would make welcoming remarks and who would give the instructions, since we'll all take turns through the week. But I thought to myself, what if when I arrive, everyone says, "Why don't you make the opening remarks, Sylvia?" So I thought, I hope something really interesting happens on this plane so I can tell a story that will be a Dharma story, something I can teach about what we are doing here in terms of our practice. Then I wouldn't have to say something as vague or as broad as coming home to ourselves. What could happen on this flight that I could teach about? The truth of the natural mind at ease, manifesting itself with kindness and compassion for all beings. So may a story happen.

That's called intention practice, by the way, where you begin a sit or a walk and you say, "May it happen that I have the clearest understanding of whatever." So I said to myself, may it happen that there's a story.

You may know that the weather on the West Coast has been very tremendous for the last several days, and so there was some question about whether planes would fly. But in fact, my plane took off exactly on time in a torrential rain. It wasn't a difficult takeoff. It took off through this torrential rain and very shortly was above the clouds, bumped a little bit, and then smoothed out.

So I thought, well, I guess I could teach about that—that we all come from lives that are tremendously busy and complicated, and we come to a place here where it's less complicated and less busy. We have the opportunity, the habits and style of living, and the techniques of practice that allow the heart to come to a place of some steadiness and some increased malleability, some spaciousness of vision. Just as I at 35,000 feet could look out and see a very large terrain.

I could tell the metaphor of coming through the confusion and the clouds and coming to feel quite relaxed with a broad view of how things are, with a clear mind.

But then I thought, well, that's not much of a story. And in fact, I flew across the whole country and nothing much happened. I was all right; just nothing much happened. I did some embroidery. I listened to some tapes and did some embroidery.

Not long before we were landing, one of the flight attendants sat down next to me for a little bit of time and said, "I've been looking at your embroidery." We had a little talk about embroidery. She said she used to do that kind of handwork, but her job was very busy, so we talked about her job as a flight attendant. Then I said, "Are you based in San Francisco?" She said, "Yes, I am." And I said, "Oh, do you know so-and-so?"

who's a flight attendant on this particular airline, who sits quite regularly with me at Spirit Rock. And she lit up and said, "Oh, yes, of course I know her. We've known each other for thirty years. We've been flying together." And I heard that she had gotten married, and I said, "Yes, she did." We both shared some great happiness, mudita, about the good fortune in her life—that we both knew this person who had met someone really wonderful and was happy.

We said to each other, you know, you don't have to talk very long to anybody to realize the lines of connection. There are not that many degrees of separation. All of a sudden, the person goes from being someone you don't know at all to being someone who knows someone you know. And if we're awake, we realize that we're all connected, that we all know each other, and that we can share happiness together about someone else's good fortune.

So we talked about that a little bit. We had this little dharma discussion without calling it that.

Then the pilot announced that we were about to start landing. He said, "Anybody who needs to get up now"—which is a euphemism for use the restroom before we need to fasten seatbelts—"do it now." So I said I needed to get up. She looked toward the back of the plane and said, "Oh, there's a very long line back there. Come with me. I'll escort you through first class." You can't normally go up front, you see.

If I retell this as a dharma story, it's the most mundane of stories. I flew across the country on an uneventful flight and I got to use a restroom when I needed it. That's the whole story.

But the metta story is this: when the mind is relaxed and clear, it recognizes that we are genuinely all connected to each other. And then we care for each other with kindness and compassion, and we take special care. If the whole world realized this, the whole world would be changed.

This is what we are here to do this week. We are here to discover our capacity to recognize that all beings are our kin. We may not know their names, may not even know what they work at or who they married, so that we can't rejoice or feel compassion for particular events in their lives. But we can touch that level of intimacy—recognizing that we are all human beings sharing a life of feelings and challenges—and we can all really take care of each other.

In the ten minutes that remained, strapped back into my seat, I read some of the mail I'd brought along. I had a letter from a student who said, "I've just seen Titanic." Everybody saw Titanic. I haven't yet, but she said, "At first I subjected it to a tremendous"—I wasn't sure exactly what that meant—"and when I did that, I didn't think it was so special." But she said it stayed in her mind for many days afterward.

She realized what stayed with her was thinking about the different ways people related to each other in the film during a time of catastrophe, a time of imminent death—the ways in which people either took care of each other or didn't, were able to be at ease with the moment or in terrible suffering with it. She said, "I guess what I came away thinking about is: I don't know how I would be when the chips are down."

That was really the end of the letter.

We don't any of us know, of course, how we'll be when the chips are down. But there are two ways to think about that. One is to realize there's a whole continuum of ways to be—from a particular person engaged fully in a particular life, to a person fully aware of interconnectedness with all beings and in the service of all beings. We are always living both of those lives, moving back and forth in a way that's wholesome, I hope, and balanced. And we are facing ourselves more and more, as we do this practice, in the direction of being aware of that connection with all beings—remembering our story, touching more and more into the great pleasure and happiness of interconnectedness. That's what we are practicing as we do metta. All of our practice is really on behalf of all beings.

And then the other piece: the chips are always down. We don't really need to wait for catastrophe. I trust that we will not, any of us, wait for the catastrophes of life to discover the parameters of our heart. Every moment of our life becomes a practice session for discovering that we can really be ourselves, awake in our life, remembering our life, and knowing that our life—as everyone else's—is in the service of all beings everywhere.

So my great hope for all of us is that our practice together this week should be in that spirit. My great gratitude again—all of us are tremendously grateful to you for having come to practice. Everybody shares with me the wish that everyone's practice be greatly fulfilling and gratifying.

Where do you tend to go mentally, physically for refuge? What do you turn to? Do you turn to physical stimulation? Do you pick up the phone? Do you call a friend? Do you go to the movies? Do you eat some chocolate? I know chocolate ranks very high—we were having this discussion today about how good chocolate is for you. I'm not saying any of these things are bad. I'm simply inviting you to look and see where you go for refuge. Do we find that we go to fantasy in the mind, or do we withdraw into some kind of fear or negativity, some kind of mental or emotional movement of separation, of protection, a moving out of the present moment? Just not to judge, but to notice—as Sylvia said, when the chips are down in a little way, where do we go for refuge? Because what we do when the chips are down in a little way is going to be indicative of what we're going to do habitually when the chips are really down and they're not going to come back up again.

So taking the refuges invites us to examine what's really our refuge. The Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha—the Buddha meaning not the Buddha as a historical person, but as a representative of the fact that as a human being, the potential of each of us is to awaken fully to the peace, the happiness, the ease that is our true nature. Right now, in this moment, that's your potential. You don't have to be different from how you are. If you really believe that, begin to have confidence in that—that's what taking refuge is. A re-commitment to that truth, a re-honoring in your heart: yes, my potential is to awaken, and I'll take refuge in that. Taking refuge in the Buddha.

Taking refuge in the Dharma is also another way of honoring our commitment to take refuge in truth. Dharma can mean the specific teachings of the Buddha, the path, and for some people the specific teachings are very helpful to turn to, to bring some inspiration, to trust. But dharma also means the truth of how things are, the laws of nature, what is actually really true. What am I really? And that is only discovered when we are willing to take refuge fully and completely in this present moment, no matter what's happening. When we can honor the fact that our freedom of heart and mind is accessible, recognizable, when we can open to and take refuge in this moment—that's where we discover love and compassion for ourselves and our connectedness to all beings.

It's a hard practice. There are a lot of moments we don't really want to take refuge in. It's hard to believe that this is really where the truth lies. And so the formal taking refuge in the Dharma, refuge in the truth, saying that is a way of really bringing up that confidence, that motivation of reminding ourselves what's really important.

Taking refuge in the Sangha. Sangha means community, as most of you know. Originally its meaning was the community of awakened beings. It doesn't have to be someone we know, but just to know that such beings are on the planet is a very powerful reinforcement—for me—of the fact that I can trust that I'm also a human being. It takes me back to the first refuge, and that as a human being I have the potential to awaken as well, in any moment. Which takes me back to the second, taking refuge in the Dharma. They all cycle around.

But also taking refuge in community is taking refuge in the community of all of us who have come here with this sincere and profound intention to awaken our hearts more deeply to our interconnectedness, to live more fully from the metta, the loving-kindness and the compassion that arises naturally when we recognize our true nature. So the fact that all of us are here with this intention—in some form, in your own words—this intention to awaken, to nurture the love that we are, is an enormously powerful support for each of us and really for all the world.

And there will be times when the other people drive you crazy, of course. But there will also be times when we're just so grateful—when we're having a hard time and we're so grateful for all the other people who are going through this with us, when someone else's strength turns out to be our strength. We really see how connected we are on that level. And that's a way of taking refuge in the Sangha, refuge in the community.

For me, when I'm on retreat—and even when I'm not, but definitely when I'm on retreat—I begin every day by taking the refuges, and sometimes every sitting. And sometimes when I'm having a hard time, I take them in the middle of a sitting or in the middle of a walking, because it's a way of consciously reaffirming my commitment and reestablishing my confidence in the possibility of this—for me and for all beings.

So in a moment we will take the refuges together, if it feels appropriate to you. It's not about becoming a Buddhist, but about really reaffirming why you're here, to yourself, and letting yourself feel the depths of the truth of that. It's not an idle rote thing that we say. It's also about creating a sacred space.

We have come here from our daily lives. We're not different—it's the same mind, the same heart. The things that come up here are the same things that come up in our daily life. But what we're doing, both with the way we've set up the environment here, taking the refuges, and also with the precepts of non-harming behavior—what we're doing is creating a sacred space. A space where we are reminded, over and over, of what's really true and what's really important.

It's a little sad to me that we need to consciously create a sacred space out of our society and out of our life to be reminded. But that's how it is. It helps. After a while, we take that reminder with us in our hearts. But it's a lot easier when we have a space that continually helps us remember.

So another way of creating this sacred space, this sense of safety, and also a way that we work together as a community, is to make a commitment for the time that we're here to non-harming speech and action—to really give care to how and why we do and say what we do and say, so that the intention for our speech and action comes from a real commitment to non-harming. Not out of some blind obedience to outer authority, because that's an intention born more of fear. I'm talking about non-harming behavior that comes from the inner intention of love and respect for ourselves and for all life. That's really the manifestation of an awakened heart.

So by having an agreement to abide by five very basic aspects of non-harming speech and action, we're reinforcing that inner sense of connectedness to one another.

And pay attention. It's not that if you break one of these precepts, it's horrible and we throw you out of here on your ear. It's not a matter of once you've taken these precepts, that's it—you have to abide by them or you're failed, you're doomed. Because they're so subtle when you look at them that we all have ways we're stepping over the boundaries, often. The point is, in this retreat, just pay attention.

So if you find you're wanting to harm somebody, or an animal, or you find that you want to take something that's not freely given, or in fact you did take something that wasn't freely given—don't just sit and hate yourself. That doesn't help. But pay attention. How and why did you do it? And what's the effect on yourself and on others afterwards?

If you really pay attention, you might start to see that when we do something that harms another, physically or verbally, it's also harming ourselves. I've never been able to do something harmful that I didn't really suffer from, if I was awake and paying attention to my experience. It's back to what Sylvia was saying: we can't separate. You can't even say that's your pain or my pain, because it's so mingled. It's just pain caused by carelessness, really.

So we ask everyone to agree to pay attention to and live by these five training rules, they're called, for the opening and awakening of each of our hearts, as well as for creating an atmosphere of fearlessness. Fearlessness meaning we each know we have nothing to fear from one another.

Isn't that a wonderful way to live? It's so rare in our culture. No one here is going to hurt you. No one's going to steal anything from you. No one's going to speak harshly. It helps that we're in silence—it really helps. But that gift of fearlessness is a wonderful gift, and it allows us to let the process of the meditation happen. We're here on a metta retreat this first week, developing loving-kindness. Well, if you've done it before, you know.

If you haven't, you might be surprised to find out that loving kindness isn't the only thing that's going to arise in your heart and mind. I guarantee—that's the one thing I can guarantee—something else will come up at least once that won't be so pretty. And the space of fearlessness is what allows us to open to this. Opening to the difficulty with loving kindness is the loving kindness practice.

So the five training rules are precepts. The first one is not to kill or harm any living being—not just people. It includes insects. But you're lucky it's February. You're not going to be too taxed on that one. Come back in May with the black flies and try it. Then it's really a precept.

Not to harm any living being. And here, we're pretty safe. We won't do that. But just watch when your mind wants to harm someone or yourself. Remember, you're included as a living being. Just watch and pay attention and see what happens, how it feels when wanting to harm comes up.

The second is not to take what is not freely given, not to steal. Again, in the big ways, of course, we're not going to do that. But look at the little things—when you just really want some food that's not offered. You know, you go through all these mental machinations figuring out how you can get it, how no one will know, all of this stuff. Stop a minute and notice what's going on in your heart and mind. Do you feel good? Do you feel connected to other beings? Are you manifesting loving kindness? Or are you really suffering? And is getting that cheese going to be what alleviates the suffering? Or is letting go of the desire and just being again in the sense of non-harming, not taking what's not given? Explore that.

The third, in lay life—in other words, in your daily life—is not to harm ourselves or others with our sexual activity. Not to intrude on another relationship, committing adultery. Not to be in abusive relationships, not to use sex for power trips or whatever. It's a big one. In terms of the retreat, we agree to not engage in any sexual activity. This is really similar to being in silence, so that we're using our energy for cultivating concentration, loving kindness, and investigation rather than just moving the energy off in other directions. So for the purpose of the retreat, we take a precept of remaining celibate.

The fourth training rule is not to use harsh and abusive speech, not to lie, and not to gossip or be involved in frivolous speech—all of which is subsumed under noble silence. And this is really one of the treasures of these retreats, to be able to spend a week or two and a half weeks in silence.

Is there anyone here who's never done a retreat before? A few people. If you've never done one before, sometimes the idea in advance of staying silent for so long can be a little daunting. And there are times when it's difficult. Admittedly, there are times when you're longing to talk. Again, as with all of these training rules, rather than getting upset about it or blaming yourself or blaming the rule, look and see what's really going on in me right now that needs to go and talk. What is it that I'm either wanting to communicate or wanting to get away from?

But most people find after a couple of days that the silence is a tremendous gift. It's really wonderful because there are times when you don't want to have to be nice to anybody. You don't have to smile. You don't want to have to be involved in social amenities. You just want to be with what's going on. And here you have the freedom to do that. You don't have to worry that you're insulting someone if you sit down next to them and don't acknowledge them. Please don't. Really let the silence be a support for your practice. It's a tremendous support.

And there's plenty of harsh and abusive speech that might go on inside your own mind.

So you can just notice that.

The silence also includes not reading and not writing. These activities can be very helpful, of course, but for the most part, the real insight and the real cultivation of metta comes from being fully and totally with our own experience. Even reading Dharma material can be a way of moving out of our experience. Or you can end up trying to make your experience match what you've read, or what we say, for that matter. Don't. Really trust what your experience is as it unfolds in the moment. It will unfold slightly differently for each person. Trust that. Honor your experience. So please don't read or write.

The fifth training rule is not to take drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind and the heart, which is rather obvious since we're here to cultivate open-heartedness and clarity.

So we'd like to formally begin the retreat. I'll say the refuges and the precepts and ask you, if that feels comfortable, to repeat them after me. We'll do it in English. If you don't want to say it out loud, it's fine to just do it inside. We do the refuges three times—maybe one of the three times you'll be here for it. That's how I think of why we do it three times traditionally. The precepts we say just once. And again, really let yourself feel these in your heart. Don't let it just be rote.

I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the Dhamma. I take refuge in the Sangha.

For the second time, I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the Dhamma. I take refuge in the Sangha.

For the third time, I take refuge in the Buddha. I take refuge in the Dhamma. I take refuge in the Sangha.

I undertake the precept not to harm living beings. I undertake the precept not to steal. I undertake the precept to remain celibate for this retreat. I undertake the precept not to lie or use harsh or abusive speech. I undertake the precept not to use drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind.

By the way, that last one does not include any particular medications you're needing to take for physical or mental conditions. We're talking recreational.

So thank you. That is the formal beginning. We have now entered the noble silence and the beginning of the retreat.

We'll have a short sitting together. If you would like to stretch a little or stand up for a minute, please go ahead.

Tonight we're not going to begin the metta or loving-kindness instruction, but just have a short sitting of following the breath, letting ourselves arrive here. Bringing in a little calmness, a little centeredness. If you find you get up earlier tomorrow or stay up later tonight and want to sit, quietly stay with your breath. Let your mind come to a little bit of centeredness, of presence.

Let yourself sit as comfortably as you can, but also in a way that's erect—finding that balance between being upright yet also relaxed, not tense. The posture will really reflect the quality of the mind. Keep your back straight, whether you're on a chair, a bench, or a cushion. Place your hands any way that's comfortable.

Most people find it easy to meditate with the eyes gently closed—not tight, not squeezing, just relaxed and closed. But if you're used to sitting with the eyes open and unfocused, that's also fine.

So if you want, just let your eyes gently close. Take a couple of quiet but slow, deep breaths and let yourself feel the breathing. Nothing special—just breathe in, and on the out-breath, let yourself, your body, relax. Come to a sense of presence in the physical body as you sit here. You might feel a sense of your posture, maybe your sit bones on the cushion, your knees, perhaps the erectness of your spine. Notice how your shoulders are resting, your hands.

Come to a gentle sense of presence in your physical body, a sense of sitting here—relaxed but awake. Within the field of your physical experience of sitting, begin to notice the feelings in your body as the breath comes in and goes out.

Nothing special, no big deal. Just feeling as this breath comes in, as this breath goes out. Feeling as this breath comes in, as this breath goes out.

You might feel it in the nose. You might feel the rising and falling of the abdomen or the chest. Wherever you feel it is fine. But let all your attention softly rest in this in-breath and this out-breath. The sensations arising.

And don't worry when your mind wanders off. But as soon as you notice you're thinking about something, just let it be and come back to feel the sensations of this next breath. Just gently and easily, but with commitment.

Don't try to create anything special. Simply feeling this in-breath, this out-breath. Meeting each breath freshly. Starting over with each new breath—nothing to hold on to, nothing to look forward to, resting at ease in this one breath.

During the whole retreat, always feel free to come back and rest in the breath as a way to gather your energies or simply bring in some relaxation if you find things getting tough. And we'll talk more about that as the week goes on.

So tonight, please, if you can, take rest.

CHAPTER 300

Five Hindrances in Mettā Practice

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this intimate dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a question that often arises by the second day: how is this practice actually an act of kindness to ourselves? She explains that each phrase of loving-kindness plants a seed that breaks down our illusion of separation and counteracts the deeply ingrained habits of mind that keep us confused and distant from our "true home" — the heart of connectedness that manifests as mettā and compassion.
>
> Wilson offers a detailed exploration of how the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇā) appear specifically within mettā practice. She distinguishes between desire as the "near enemy" of mettā — a state that can masquerade as loving-kindness while actually being wanting — and aversion as the "far enemy," the more obvious opposite. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, she clarifies that mettā does not mean liking everything, but rather "witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it." This connected, non-judging attention is itself an expression of mettā.
> The talk includes practical guidance for working with each hindrance: how wanting concentration or wanting the mettā feeling can hijack our practice; how sleepiness naturally arises from the calming quality of concentration practice; how restlessness might manifest as endlessly tinkering with phrases; and how doubt often disguises itself as intellectual analysis comparing mettā to vipassanā. Wilson emphasizes that recognizing these hindrances without judgment, then gently returning to the phrases, is itself the practice — reminding practitioners that "what the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline."

So sometimes about the end of the second day on a metta retreat, once in a while people will ask us, "Remind me again how this is being kind to myself?" Because certainly you're a rare person if you haven't discovered by this time that many, many things arise in our mind and body. And many, many of them are not metta.

Even if you've done loving-kindness retreats before, we kind of tend to forget. But if you haven't, it would really be normal not to be expecting such a variation. And I know how much of the stuff that comes up is difficult, painful—pain in the body, really deep emotional pain sometimes, some that's not so deep but that's really quite painful nevertheless, just basic aversion or sleepiness or restlessness.

So I just want to reiterate that actually we don't recognize it in the middle of the retreat, but it really is an act of deepest kindness, of ultimate kindness to ourselves to be willing to practice in this way. Because with each phrase that you plant that seed, that you drop the phrase into your heart, that you repeat it—each phrase is a moment of breaking down our dream, our illusion that we live in, of separation, of isolation, of neediness, of loneliness.

And each time that we make that intention to cultivate loving-kindness by saying the phrase, we are counteracting the habits of our mind, the habits of our heart that are keeping us confused and in delusion, that are keeping us away from our true home.

St. Augustine said once, the reason why humans behave as they do is because they are not living in their true home. The context of the heart of connectedness that manifests as metta, as compassion—that's not some weird altered state we have to create. That is our true home. And we're not living there. We think greed and aversion and restlessness are really who lives here. We don't recognize that that's not our true home. And the heart of kindness, the heart of non-judging, the heart of compassion really is our true home. So what we're doing really is an ultimate kindness.

However, we don't get the instant results that—I don't know what it is—I think it's so deeply inbred in us in this Western culture that even when we think we're being patient and taking the long view, we're not even close. The long view is three months. That's the long view. Let's read the Buddha. He's talking about eons and eons and eons. I'm not saying that's encouraging. I'm just trying to give a comparison for what could be the long view. Three months isn't it. Seven days isn't it. That's not to be discouraging. That's so that we don't have completely unrealistic expectations—think that because anger is coming up in my mind on the third day, I'm wasting my time here, I might as well go home.

But that these difficult states of mind and pain in the body come up, that's normal. It's part of the practice. It's not a mistake.

One of the ways you could look at the formal practice of metta as we're doing it here is that part of what we discover is a moment-to-moment training in seeing how we create with our mind the dream, the illusion of separation, of alienation, of suffering. It's not that this sense of being separate, this sense of loneliness, this sense of neediness is some big thing that's in us, that's hanging there, that we have to chip away at. It's only this moment. And the sense of separation, the sense of distance, our sense of suffering, of fear, of neediness, is created in the moment by how the mind and heart responds or reacts to whatever particular experience is arising.

Now to me, thinking of my experience or looking at it in this moment-to-moment level is enormously freeing because it takes a huge load off—that I somehow have to undo the whole last forty-nine years of my life and make sure I never in the future, for however long, make a mistake again, both of which is obviously impossible. I can at least pay attention to this moment sometimes. Sometimes. But that at least seems within the range of the doable, to pay attention to how the mind and heart is reacting in this moment to whatever's arising.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, one of my favorite quotations, said, "The obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain." Sound familiar? Desire for pleasure and fear of pain—desire and ill will, right?

Greed and aversion—the first two of the five hindrances. It's not that they're evil. But when we don't recognize those habits, when those habits basically run the show, run our life—even though we think that desiring pleasure and fearing pain is what's bringing us happiness—those tendencies are actually what's perpetuating, moment to moment, our sense of isolation, of neediness.

One of the reasons that metta practice, and vipassana practice too, can be quite uncomfortable at times is because they're working from different angles on the same thing. We're counteracting very deep habits. And as you know, breaking a habit doesn't feel good a lot of the time, even though we know that once the habit's gone, or it's a lot less, we're a lot happier. But in the meantime, the habit is what's comfortable. The habit is where our mind naturally goes.

So it's natural that as we deepen in this practice—and I know you might not feel like you've deepened at all, but don't go there. That's a completely irrelevant judgment that the mind makes based on some made-up idea. You are deepening. You're still here. You're still doing it. It's deepening. You say, "I'm not deepening because more aversion, more greed is coming up." No, that's proof that it's deepening. Because as we continue strengthening the intentions of loving-kindness, each time we say the phrase, it's as if the obstacles get highlighted. I know I rather naively thought they would just vanish into the background, but they get highlighted. One of my teachers used to say that as the light of awareness shines, all the snakes come up out of their pits. And there are moments when that really feels like what's happening.

There are also plenty of moments when it's not like that at all—the goodness, the connectedness, the sense of non-judging. It's important to notice those moments too. For neither of them do you need to take credit, which makes it a whole lot easier. You only have to notice them.

So it's natural that the obstacles get highlighted. One model for understanding some of the difficult states that come up is the five hindrances, which I know, if you've done any meditation in this style before, you're quite familiar with. In metta practice, sometimes we forget to notice them. They come up in just the same way, with just as much strength as they do in vipassana practice. They might manifest in a slightly different way, and I'll talk about that at times. Also, because the practice is a little different, we don't always notice them as quickly as we might in vipassana.

The challenge for our hearts—really, how to meet these difficult emotional and physical states in metta practice—is not to think, "Well, I can't do metta because they're here," or "These are obstacles." The key is simply the recognition of desire, for example—the first hindrance—the recognition of it rather than being driven by it, and then how we meet it with our attention. That's how the metta continues: in the recognition and the meeting of what's arising with clear, non-judging attention. That's really metta. I think Sharon said something like that last night—that really connected, non-judging attention is an aspect of metta.

So when you're feeling really sleepy, or really aversive toward yourself or something that's happening, or filled with doubt, recognizing it is essential. And then notice what's the habit of how your awareness greets that. One way is what Sharon said last night—how we think, "Oh, great, come in, you live here, settle down." Suzuki Roshi once said, "In zazen, leave your front door and your back door open. Let the thoughts come and go. Just don't serve them tea." So that's one way we greet them: "Oh sure, it's your house, it's your home."

Another way is the opposite, which in my mind is personified by an old blind Swami I met in India a few years ago. I was staying in a small ashram, which was just rooms built around a kind of concrete courtyard. There was this really old Swami, a renunciate dressed in orange, a little crazy, whom they had taken in off the street and were letting sleep on a bed in that courtyard. When we arrived in the afternoon, he was just lying there, seeming out of it.

In the middle of the night, like two in the morning, the whole place started reverberating with these huge banging sounds. It just rattled everything. And it would go on for ten or fifteen minutes. You'd bounce awake, and then it would stop. You'd fall back asleep, and in another couple of hours, it would start again.

The next day, I came walking back at some point and the Swami was actually up. I saw that he was the one making those sounds. He had this huge piece of rope—like a big length he'd made himself out of old little pieces of cloth woven together, so it was very thick and frayed at the end. He would just be lying there, seeming out of it, and suddenly he'd leap up, grab this rope, and start whacking the floor with all his strength. He'd just go at it for five or ten minutes, and then he'd lie back down again.

After a couple of days, I asked one of the young guys who lived there, "What's he doing?"

He said, "Well, you know, he says when he's meditating, evil spirits come and disturb his meditation. So he's getting rid of them."

That's the second option, which I also don't recommend.

But look and see. We often engage in either whacking the unpleasant visitor or whacking ourselves for having the unpleasant visitor. Not mettā. Definitely not mettā.

So I'll talk a bit about these five hindrances in the context of the mettā retreat. Recognition is very important.

The first two hindrances, of course, are desire—or sense desire—and aversion, ill will. They're the first two of the hindrances, and they are much larger than just hindrances. They're really the key to how we keep ourselves suffering and in delusion. But in mettā practice, these two states of mind, states of heart, have a very specific relationship to the mental state of mettā.

Desire, clinging, is called the near enemy of mettā. And ill will, aversion, fear, is called the far enemy.

What does that mean? Near enemy means it's a state of mind or heart that can fool us. It can look like mettā, and we can actually think that we are cultivating mettā or feeling mettā when we're actually in wanting. Just logically hearing that, we think, "But they're not the same at all." It's really quite interesting how that happens.

If you look at the two states, they're almost opposites of each other. Look at desire in your experience when you start wanting something—whether it's some little thing like wanting the bell to ring or something special for tea, or something huge like wanting a particular relationship, wanting something major to happen in your life. Looking with your attention at the state of wanting itself, the essence of desire is separation. The sense of desire is that I am somehow separate from whatever it is. There's a sense of neediness for completion, for wholeness, for collectedness. Something is lacking and needs to be acquired or held onto. It's actually the energy of the craving or desire itself that creates and sustains this sense of inadequacy, insufficiency, neediness. But we often don't recognize that and just think, "If I had this thing, then I'm whole again."

So the whole essence of desire is separation, insufficiency, while mettā is just the opposite. Mettā is the clear connection without judgment, without creating limitation, without creating separation. It's a simple example of how desire really disturbs our essential completion, our essential peace, but we get sidetracked by it. Mettā recognizes things as they are—a sense of friendliness, a sense of connectedness, a sense of no problem, really.

I'm on airplanes a lot. On one overnight flight, I was sitting in the middle row, and about five minutes before the doors closed, I suddenly noticed no one was sitting in the rest of the row. I had been sitting there quite peacefully—no problem, no wanting, no aversion, just at ease—until I noticed that. The pleasant thought arose that maybe I could lie down, and I clung to it.

In that moment, what had been quite peaceful became really antsy, anxious, nervous. Everybody who walked onto the plane, I was really focused on them, and I wasn't with mettā, I can tell you that—until they walked past my aisle. Then it was, "Ah, may you be happy," you know.

What had been a very peaceful situation became one where each person was evaluated, judged as my enemy, as a threat until they passed—and then they were okay. I was really, at least, noticing this as it happened. That's about all I can take credit for. But it was a really uncomfortable state.

Contrast that to the state before, where I'm just sitting there and when people come in, it's just me, just them, no problem. Me as I am, they as they are. Nothing needs to change. Nothing needs to happen. We're just right here. There's quite a sense of peace and connectedness. That's the difference between mettā and clinging.

When looked at that way, you think, "How could we confuse them?" Mettā is a divine abode. We talk about the four brahmavihāras: mettā, compassion or karuṇā, sympathetic or empathetic joy, appreciative joy, and equanimity. Divine abodes—limitless, boundless. Well, I'll tell you, the state of desire is no divine abode. And I think that's something we can really discover for ourselves in the next two hours.

So how do we get confused? Because we do.

It really is fascinating if you can take the personal out of it—fascinating to explore in your metta practice that shifting sand between the sense of friendliness and connectedness, and then subtle wanting, and then blatant wanting.

One thing is that craving, clinging, wanting as a habit arises as a result of connection with pleasant experience. When we're not paying attention and it's really pleasant, the habit of our mind is to want more, or hold on to it, or keep it going. And in the practice of metta, to begin with, we're saying deliberately focus on the good, on the beautiful in someone. So even if you're not feeling anything you would remotely describe as metta—that doesn't mean you're not experiencing metta, but you're not feeling some huge upwash of beautiful, pleasant energy—you're still focusing on the good in someone. It's very easy for that pleasantness, when we don't quite notice it in a moment, for clinging and craving to start coming up.

A simple example. I noticed on one retreat when I was with the friend category, I'd be sending metta to her. This is a pretty happy person, and so I'd be feeling happy. I'd be feeling, "Yeah, she's really nice. She's so great. Why don't we see each other more? That would be really nice, to see her more." Before I knew it, I had a whole story about when we could get together and how we could see each other and maybe I'd go call her and... That's not metta. That's wanting.

And that was relatively easy to notice. Sometimes it would move from one pleasant thought into another pleasant thought, into another pleasant fantasy. We don't really pick it up. And suddenly we're into a full-blown attack of wanting, where it's really the hindrance of sense desire. Nothing to do with a dear friend, nothing to do with anything you could remotely call the metta practice, but we're just gripped. How did I get here? I was so diligently sending loving kindness to the benefactor, and here I am off in Bali, skin diving. How did that happen?

So of course there's nothing to judge or get upset about. It's interesting. When you notice—say when I noticed, "Oh, I'm off, and how am I going to get to see her?"—rather than going, "Oh no, get back to the metta," just for a moment, notice the wanting. That leaning forward, the tightness, the sense of neediness, however you're experiencing it, so that we really recognize that it's not metta, and we really learn to recognize it. And then, not with any harshness, put it down, gently come back and refocus. In that case, I refocused on the friend, and I came back and simply offered the next phrase as a gift. So it's the starting over, over and over, but noticing the difference. And then you start to notice sooner. You'll think you're in the metta and you've just a little bit slid into wanting, but you'll pick it up sooner because it really is a different experience.

So when there's wanting as the hindrance, when it's just full-blown, eventually you'll notice that you're just wanting a different seat, you're wanting different food, you're wanting different weather, you're wanting different people sitting next to you. That's the classic hindrance that we talk about in the first days of a retreat. With that, it's simply a matter of noticing it, really noticing it, naming it, recognizing it without judging. You can take what I call a few minutes of a Vipassana break, a mindfulness break. If it's really strong, just bring your mindfulness to your body and your breath and just be with that feeling of wanting, so that you're not pretending this elephant in the closet isn't there and in some tiny little voice saying, "May I be happy, may I be peaceful," while really filled with lust or something. This is what's happening. Let's just feel it for a moment. And then from within that, you can reconnect with the next phrase, with the intention of loving kindness.

There are a couple of specific ways, particularly in the metta practice, that are a bit more subtle than this, more like what it was with my friend, where the metta gets a little co-opted by the wanting, where the wanting really is masquerading as metta.

One way is that we are doing our practice very diligently, repeating the phrases, but subtly or not so subtly, our motivating force is really wanting the metta feeling. And this is pretty hard not to fall into sometimes. We really want some kind of good feeling. I mean, why the heck would we be here if we didn't? I didn't come here to feel nothing and say these phrases for seven days. Of course we want some metta feeling. We just need to recognize it and realize that's not the metta practice—to be sitting there going, "May I be happy. Do I feel it yet? May I be peaceful. Do I feel it yet?"

So if you notice that happening, recognize it. Come back. Or we get into wanting concentration. And there's a way with both of these where it's almost as if after every phrase or after every set of phrases, we're subtly checking back.

Am I more concentrated than before? Do I feel it a little more than before? Do I feel a little more connected than before? And if you start to feel that you're leaning forward, that's often a sign. If there is a nice feeling, which sometimes comes, you'll know that you got into wanting rather than just being with the metta feeling, because when it goes and you're really frustrated, that's always a sign that we were deep in the wanting.

None of this is with judging. This is simply to see what's what, to see where we suffer. And metta, just that simple connectedness—no feeling, it doesn't matter—but metta is not about suffering. It can connect with suffering. It's not about hiding suffering. But when we're really in that connected, present moment of metta, it's not going to cause us suffering. Wanting, expectation, ambition, holding on—these are going to cause us suffering. And all we have to do is keep noticing to see the difference.

One other subtle way that at some point most of us get into in the metta practice: in saying the phrases, whether to ourselves or to another, there's a subtle shift where we're not just saying the phrase as an offering of the heart—we're wanting something to change. I really want that person to be happy. It often comes up with phrases like "may you have physical happiness" or "may you be healthy," and if the person isn't so healthy, you notice that dichotomy more easily. But it's quite easy to slip into. In one sitting, you can go back and forth between the simple intention and suddenly leaning forward—you know, if you just did this, you would be happy. Or for ourselves, of course: may I be happy, may I be happy, may I be happy.

So it's just to notice when it's moved from the simple intention of well-wishing, the simple intention of friendliness, to wanting some result. It's also common, if you've spent a few days on the benefactor or your friend, that people want to go home and see if they noticed anything, if they're feeling better, more happy. Just notice. Of course we're interested. But don't be doing it for that, because it gets into the wanting.

These are some of the ways, especially in metta practice, that the near enemy can masquerade. But as soon as you notice it, it's no big deal. It's so obvious once you notice it that we wonder how it masqueraded—until the next time.

The far enemy, well, that's more obvious. The far enemy is more obviously opposite: aversion, ill will, all the gradations of that, including fear. But again—and this is sometimes not what people expect when they begin a metta practice—because ill will and fear really are obstacles to the perception of our true being, and they are kind of the opposite of metta, it's quite common that they begin to come up rather strongly at various periods in our loving-kindness practice. And often the person experiencing it interprets this as blowing it in some way. But you're not. It's an almost inevitable part of an intensive loving-kindness practice. If there are habits in our psyche of fear or ill will or irritation—and I suppose it's a rare being who doesn't have some habits of those—they're going to arise.

And so, again, our challenge, our practice, is not to get caught in hating them or blaming ourselves or going into a real downward spiral of self-judgment. This is really common on all retreats, but in metta practice sometimes it seems highlighted—where sending loving-kindness to oneself encounters the endless list of what's wrong with us, and the inability to really feel loving just proves what we always suspected. I don't need to say more. And from that, every unpleasant experience becomes further proof.

So I think it's helpful to take a moment, as we did with clinging, to see how aversion is experienced in the moment, to have a sense of how ill will or fear really functions in the moment. We're not talking about our big psychic patterns, but just how these states arise in the moment to begin with.

Just as clinging or craving arises when we come in contact with something pleasant and we're not particularly paying attention, when some unpleasant thing—a sight or a sound or a thought, or a physical sensation in our body, like sleepiness, which is physically unpleasant—when that unpleasant experience arises and we're not particularly noticing, it gives rise to aversion or fear. And what is that? It's a pulling away. In that moment, it's a disconnect from the reality, from the simplicity of that moment's experience. Ill will or anger is sort of like "no," lashing out, "get away." Fear is more like pulling back, retreating. But it's a disconnect, energetically.

If you tune in—say you have a pain in your knee and you notice aversion to it—you can almost feel how your attention pulls back. Sometimes our whole body pulls back like that. And of course, because of that, we're not going to see clearly what's actually happening in that moment, because we're not connected. And that is the moment.

It's unpleasant. We pull back. That moment of disconnection, that space, is all that our patterns of mind need to rush in and say, "Yes, you are sleepy. You are really hopeless. You slept for a week before you came here so you wouldn't be sleepy, and here you are sleepy, and that just proves..." And there you are, back on the downward spiral.

If we don't recognize, "Oh, this is just aversion arising," or if it's fear, we project it into the future: "I'm sleepy now. I've been sleepy the last sitting. It follows that for every sitting from now on, I'm going to be sleepy. And it's unbearable. There's no way I can do it." And then again, the spiral starts.

The more this happens, it's as if we're wearing colored glasses. Every experience that arises, once we start to fall into whatever pattern of negativity is our common one—whether it's judging ourselves, hating ourselves, fearing the future, getting angry at everyone else, whatever our particular story is—once we start believing it and not recognizing it as aversion, we get farther and farther afield from the reality of what's going on in this moment. Each moment of fear, aversion, negativity just feeds the next.

I've learned to recognize when a worthlessness pattern is operating in my mind. Any perception that comes up—a sight, a sound—when that worthlessness pattern is really strong, is interpreted in such a way that it confirms I'm worthless. It could be anything. And it gets to be funny when I notice it.

A small example: I could come down the stairs outside, and you know those rows of clips where you put notes? Usually I look and think, "Oh good, no notes. That means everyone's fine." That's a normal response, right? When worthlessness is on, I'll come down, there are no notes, and I'll look and think, "Oh my God, nobody likes me because I'm useless." That level. And when I see that, I can just laugh. It's just what the mind does.

But when we don't see it, that's another unpleasant experience that we didn't recognize. We pull back, and we're completely disconnected from reality in not much time. We wonder, "How could anyone...?" We look at ourselves and think, "I'm not that bad of a person. How come I feel like this about myself?"

This is where metta comes in. With any unpleasant experience, it doesn't have to be turned in on ourselves, but that's a significant way that the hindrance of ill will arises in a metta retreat. It could also be the lashing out where you're just hating everybody who comes into your field of vision or your field of hearing, or the weather, or maybe you've just picked one pet peeve, but it's really taking over.

I notice when I'm on a retreat and I suddenly have to write a note to the cooks—for the good of all beings—and they need to hear it. I start paying attention to the quality of energy that's convincing me I need to write the note. And now I know enough to say, "Okay, that means you don't write that note for three days." Because by that time, the urgency is gone—it was just the hindrance of ill will.

You could pay attention to this. If you urgently have to write a note to the maintenance people or the snow shovelers, if you have a brilliant idea for how the place could run better, why don't you wait till the end of the retreat and see if it still feels so brilliant? Maybe it is brilliant, but then it will still be brilliant at the end of the retreat.

Metta really is the antidote for fear and ill will. Now, the mind of ill will—and I can say this from experience—doesn't want to hear that, or doesn't believe it. Often, when one is sort of comfortable in a negative way of looking at things, or it's just a strong habit of mind, it will come up when you do metta, so metta is difficult at that time. And that's when you'll hear yourself say—I've heard myself, I've heard a lot of people say—"I hate metta. I hate practicing metta."

I'm not going to do it. And that's because it's going against a strong pattern.

We often have—and again, it's this kind of habit of ill will speaking—a mistaken concept about how metta is the antidote to ill will. This is often what the resistance, the intellectual resistance, is about. I think Sharon alluded to this the other night, when we think of metta as being stupid. Oh, I see these really difficult, painful, horrible things in myself, but I'll just say, "May I be happy, may I be peaceful," as if just covering it over, suppressing it, or pretending it's not there. Or in somebody else, it's even more obvious. They have this really harmful thing that they do, and I'm just going to say, "May you be happy, may you live with ease," and completely ignore that. That's stupid. That's naive.

But that's not metta. That's what we often think it is—just a covering over.

Or the other thing that we can quite fall into is almost the opposite: thinking that I have to really love that person, I have to love their stupidity, I have to love my pettiness. "Really, you're wonderful, and so is your pettiness." That doesn't seem realistic either. So we're kind of in a quandary. That's not metta.

Metta is simply, clear-eyed and clear-heartedly, with the attention connecting with what's happening—without judgment, without expectation. Just connecting. You don't have to love it. You don't have to think anything about it. In fact, don't think anything about it. Just connect.

From Ajahn Sumedho—do you know who Ajahn Sumedho is? He's an American man who ordained as a Buddhist monk in Thailand with Ajahn Chah, the well-known forest monk and meditation teacher. Ajahn Sumedho has been a monk about thirty years. He lives in England now and is the head of the whole Western order of Buddhist monks and nuns in this tradition. He's very down-to-earth and simple in the way he describes things. He says, talking about metta: "Metta does not necessarily mean liking anything at all. It means an attitude of not dwelling on the unpleasantness or fault of any situation inside or outside of oneself. Now with metta, one isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, a person, or oneself. You're witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it."

I love that. This witnessing, connecting with the unpleasantness, and you don't create anything around it. Just let it be in the light of awareness. You simply don't get into thinking, "I hate it, I hate it, I don't want it."

This is metta. I don't think that's easy, but doesn't that seem a lot more doable than loving everything that's really hard? It's the power of non-judging, unlimited, kind attention. That's really what metta is. It's so much more simple and so much more powerful than our ideals about it might have us believe.

So really, whether it's a pleasant experience or an unpleasant experience or neutral, it doesn't matter. This is really where metta leads into wisdom. The attitude, the connectedness of heart, of attention, of mind, of metta, automatically opens into wisdom. This is something I didn't really believe until I practiced it quite intensively, but it seems to.

When we allow, as Sumedho was saying, just that connecting with the unpleasantness or the pleasantness—don't create anything around the pleasantness either, such as "Isn't this wonderful? Isn't this great? How can I have more?"—just what it is. When we really allow that, the inclusiveness, which we would call metta, that sense of acceptance, that sense of all-inclusiveness, that sense of limitlessness, naturally arises. It's not that we have to try to feel inclusive about that person, this aspect of myself, that experience. But simply by steady, connected, non-judging attention in various ways, the connectedness, the inclusiveness, the lack of limits becomes apparent.

Let me read you this poem that I really like.

To me, it really expresses this—the willingness to come back and meet with unflinching kind eyes something that's a little difficult or unpleasant—and how that opens into connectedness.

It's by Mary Oliver, called "Singapore."

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there washing something in the white bowl. Disgust argued in my stomach and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it. Kingfishers say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings. Rivers are pleasant and, of course, trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face. Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together and neither could win. She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem, but first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She's washing the tops of airport ashtrays as big as hubcaps with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life, and I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen, but maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. And neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth, the way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

So much more simple and so much more vast and powerful than anything our complicated minds could make up. We just really need the willingness—the faith, really—to trust enough to keep practicing and not be discouraged when we're caught in wanting, when we're caught in aversion, when we're caught in complete boredom because nothing is happening. We don't know. It's so much vaster than we can know. So it's really an urge to keep going.

I need to mention the other three hindrances. But first I wanted to say that sometimes people feel a strong urge to stay with themselves as they're practicing the method, to stay more with themselves than going through all the categories as quickly as we are—which is fine. But it's common to feel that it's somehow wrong or selfish or greedy. We should be sending it out to all beings, and here I am just sending it to myself. Don't believe it. Because again, just like in that poem, if you can really touch your own experience with loving-kindness, it expands outward, past the limits. It doesn't stop at some made-up idea of the edge of my body with everything out there being separate. So please trust yourself to keep going if you feel drawn to send it to yourself, and you'll see that ultimately the illusion of separation begins to break away. Even against all your best efforts, you'll find metta leaking out to other people, even when you didn't intend it.

In one of the groups, I mentioned that sometimes, if you're having trouble connecting with phrases to yourself, or it feels like too much wanting, you might use a phrase somewhere along the lines of, "I love and accept myself just as I am," rather than trying to make yourself feel something different.

Now, the other three hindrances, just to mention: sloth and torpor or sleepiness; restlessness and agitation—that physical restlessness where you just can't sit still—and obsessive worrying spinning in the mind; and doubt. Just as in a Vipassana retreat, they arise sometimes very strongly in a metta retreat.

One thing I've noticed, because of the nature of metta as a concentration practice where we're not investigating so much other things that arise—you notice you're thinking, and you just come back to the phrases, you don't necessarily name what's happening at first if you can just come back—sometimes that's fine. There's a little anger, a little restlessness, you notice it, you come back to the phrase, and it's gone. Fine. But sometimes, because we didn't notice, all of a sudden it wallops us over the side of the head. You'll just be in a frenzy of doubt, for example, and not know how you got there. So if that happens to you, you're not doing something wrong. As soon as you can recognize it, recognize it. That's the main thing.

Again, because this is a concentration practice—we're coming back over and over to the object or focus of the phrases and the person we're sending them to—that concentration is one of the calming factors of mind. Investigation, which we're not doing as much here, is more energizing. And so in the early days of a concentration practice, you can be really right there with your phrases, feeling quite connected, and the next thing you know, you're nodding off. You don't quite know how that happened. It's just because the calm and the concentration got stronger than the energy. That's all. No big thing.

So when you notice that, do the usual things. One is to really aim more clearly at each word in the phrase. That action of aiming, called vitaka in Pali, is actually the mental antidote to sloth and torpor. It's not hitting it with a sledgehammer—it's just gently aiming. May I be free from danger. Just that little extra energy can sometimes wake us up, balance the concentration, and you're back in business.

Sometimes, of course, you're too far gone, so the usual things apply: open your eyes, look at the light, stand up. Sometimes changing the speed of the phrases can help you refocus. If they've gotten into a lullaby modality and you're singing yourself to sleep, you might want to vary the speed in how you're saying them. But it's really important not to get into judging about this—it's just a natural effect of the practice at times for everyone.

The opposite, restlessness and worry, is again recognizable: too much energy, not enough calming, not enough concentration or focus to balance it. Sometimes you feel like you need to walk more, just walk off the energy. One way we sometimes don't recognize restlessness in metta is that we find ourselves ceaselessly tinkering with the phrases or with which person to send them to. If you find you have seventeen phrases, or your phrases have become paragraphs, or you're changing them all the time—that doesn't feel right anymore, let's try this—or you've been through thirty-five different friends, I would at least suspect there could be some restlessness. And if you can name it as restlessness, rather than thinking, "Oh, the method hasn't clicked yet," that can be really helpful. Oh, restlessness. Okay. Simplify. When you feel restless, don't complicate—simplify. Go back to only four phrases, or cut down to two phrases. Go back to only one friend and just stay very steady, very simple on the phrases.

And doubt, of course, is very interesting. We know how to recognize it: I can't do this. This is stupid. We're used to that, I assume, if you've done meditation practice before. One interesting way doubt can arise—if you're new to metta but you're used to practicing vipassana—is that it takes the form of criticizing and analyzing the metta practice and comparing it to vipassana. Well, what about mindfulness? What about wisdom?

What's the point of this I and you? I thought there was no self, and here we're going "may I be happy, may you be happy." All we're doing is reinforcing... And you're thinking about all the precepts, all the things you learned from mindfulness retreats, and how metta is just the opposite, and you're completely lost in thought, thinking that you're analyzing the practice. This is major doubt. And it's very, very helpful to notice it and name it.

You'll never think your way into deciding which is better—mindfulness or metta—or whether you're doing it right, or whether metta is really emphasizing a sense of separation by the use of these words. Thinking will never get you there. And so, as with any doubt, recognize the hindrance of doubt as just this spinning in the mind. The recognition of it is, Oh, okay, that's doubt. You put it down and simply connect your attention. That's the antidote: connected attention. You come back to the phrase and it's sort of like, "Okay, just do it."

We're not giving up our discriminating wisdom here. It's not that we just blindly, for the rest of our lives, believe anything that's said. But it's in that famous sutta where the Buddha said, "Don't believe it just because I tell you, but try it and see for yourself."

Well, that second line is really important: try it and see for yourself. As long as we're spinning in doubt, we can't try anything, because we'll never do it. So you have to recognize, "Oh, doubt." Okay, just do it. And at the end of the retreat, definitely evaluate. See what your experience is. Of course you'll evaluate. See if it's useful. See if it's true for you. No question about that. But it's impossible in the middle of it—you're just in doubt.

So noticing, not judging it, but having the commitment to try the practice: "Oh, that's doubt." Recognize it, center in your body again, and then just start by focusing on the next phrase. And you might notice—I've noticed—that doubt rarely comes up when you like what's happening. It often comes up when what's happening isn't meeting your expectations. So that's just a little piece that you might not completely believe the doubt next time it comes.

One of my favorite lines from the Buddha is: "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." That's actually, I think, a very deep statement. So what we're doing here, each moment that we are planting that seed of intention, of friendliness, of connectedness, of loving-kindness—each moment that we actually say the phrase, in that moment that's what we're dwelling upon.

And if you think about what our mind dwells upon left to its own devices, what it naturally inclines towards left to its own devices—I don't know about your mind, but I can tell you in my mind it's not a pretty picture. To really have the sense that we are affecting a change as to where the heart, the mind, will naturally incline through this practice—we really are. And so that helps me enormously in those dry times when it seems like nothing's going on. But if I can just summon up the willingness to offer the next phrase, it's a very powerful act of kindness, of wisdom, and of really coming out of our dream of separation, of fear and neediness.

CHAPTER 301

Basic Goodness

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses the fundamental human predicament: we want to be happy but don't know how. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the Two Darts (or Two Arrows), she illuminates how we compound our suffering by adding mental reactions to unavoidable pain. When unpleasant sensations arise, we don't simply experience them—we worry, resist, and create elaborate stories that multiply our distress.
> Wilson introduces Chögyam Trungpa's concept of 'basic goodness'—the natural peace and ease that is always available but obscured by our habitual reactivity. She explains how our deep conditioning to chase pleasant experiences and avoid unpleasant ones keeps us spinning on what she calls 'the hamster wheel' of dissatisfaction. Through the practice of wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), which she beautifully describes as 'an active quality of mind that is nurturing and supporting,' we learn to meet each experience with bare attention—fresh, non-judging, and wholehearted.
> Using vivid examples from traffic jams to retreat hall clock-ticking, Wilson demonstrates how liberation comes not from changing our circumstances but from transforming how we relate to them. She emphasizes that meditation doesn't create special states but rather reveals what Thich Nhat Hanh calls our Buddha nature—our capacity to wake up, understand, and love. The talk offers practical guidance for working with physical discomfort and pleasant experiences alike, showing how both become gateways to recognizing the peace that, as the Dalai Lama suggests, can only be known in the present moment.

Last night in her opening talk, Sharon said a great thing that one of her teachers told her: the Buddha's enlightenment solved his problem, and now it's up to us to solve our problem.

I thought I would talk a little about the first question that comes up: what actually is our problem? And then how does this practice help us to solve it? I don't claim to answer all of that in one talk, but we'll just begin the process, hopefully.

Actually, I think our problem is very simply put: we want to be happy and we don't know how. We think we know how, and that's the problem—because it doesn't work. Until we stop and really pay attention, we don't realize that it's not working. We don't even know what we're doing, never mind that it's not working or how.

So what our practice is about is stopping and taking a look at what's really going on, as opposed to what we think is going on. There can be a wide difference between those two things in any given moment.

It's said that one of the things that motivated the Buddha to teach, rather than just hang out in Nibbana for forty-five years, was that by looking through the world, he could see with his omniscient Buddha eye that everyone is united in wanting to be happy—but that we do just the things in pursuing our happiness that keep us spinning and suffering. The very things we do to be happy are the things that keep us lost in confusion. And so he taught out of great compassion.

We get so hooked into somehow trying to manipulate, control, and rearrange our environment—our outer environment, our inner environment—to manage experience in such a way that we'll finally hit that place of lasting happiness. And the cosmic joke, in a way, is that this very trying to manipulate keeps us from noticing the fact that basic peace and ease, basic goodness, as Chögyam Trungpa calls it, is actually available. It's who we are, here and now, in this moment, in every moment. We don't know how to notice it. We don't know how to recognize what's really true.

What we're actually running after, trying to find, is already here. But it's not what we think. We're looking for some big goodies, some final blast, some incredible bliss, some pleasant experience that never goes away. And when that doesn't happen, we don't remember to turn around and notice that peace. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, peace is available, happiness is available—please help yourself. But we keep going, "No thank you, I think I'll look over this way and see if it's somewhere else."

Trungpa's phrase is "rediscovering our basic goodness." That to me is really what our meditation practice is about—not to create some special state, not to become Olympic meditators, but to rediscover our basic goodness, which is available in each and every moment of experience. So we've got to learn how to notice that, how to see it or hear it or feel it or be it.

What stands in the way, seemingly? Just think about today, because a day here is a microcosm of our life. Whatever tendencies of your mind are happening here, they didn't just arise for the first time today. I really will bet that for anybody. This is a microcosm of our life.

Have you had an experience today of being totally at ease, at peace, at one with whatever happened throughout the whole day? No. You might have had some moments of that, and that's really important to notice. But when you think about it in the normal way our mind thinks—well, what was in the way today? Why wasn't I happy? What was the problem?—there's a whole variety of things. I was sleepy. My knees hurt. I kept having this unpleasant memory. It's not nearly as nice as it was two days ago. I should have come to another retreat because I have all this unfinished business at home. Or I had a headache. Or I didn't bring the right pillow. Whatever it happens to be.

We really get involved in thinking that these particular things are our problem, whether it's an internal experience of pain or sleepiness or boredom or restlessness, or the externals—the person sitting next to me is the wrong person to be sitting next to me, whatever it happens to be.

This is where we get so lost. We get so entranced by our reactions to experience that we mistake the reactions for what's real. We pay so much attention to our reactions that we don't know how to turn our attention back to simply rest at ease in whatever's arising.

At the root, one of the deep patterns underlying this—Sharon mentioned it last night, and I want to talk about it a little—is that deep misunderstanding that we often don't even recognize: that pleasant experience is what's going to give us happiness, that unpleasant experience is what's causing our suffering and is bad or a mistake, and that neutral experience—we don't even know what's happening, so we make something up. The thing is, we make something up whether there's pleasant or unpleasant experience too. We're making up the stories about what's happening continually. And when we don't recognize it...

What we can end up doing—in a day here or in our lives—is spending our life chasing after pleasant experience: a pleasant sight, a pleasant sound, a pleasant thought, a pleasant emotion. Running away, doing everything we can to avoid or change or get rid of the unpleasant.

And certainly, if we have a choice, no one here is going to say, "I think I will take restlessness and a pain in the knee as opposed to bliss, because I really don't care—I can't tell the difference." We're not talking about moving in that direction. But if you need the bliss to be happy, and if you can't have sleepiness and find peace, then we're in big trouble. Because meditation doesn't mean that we get more and more pleasant experiences, like we're heading to some dreamland of constant pleasure and no more unpleasantness and no more boredom.

But isn't it easy to see how we slip into evaluating our experience in this way? And in our life, without realizing it, this is what can guide so many of our choices, our decisions. With all good intention, really trying to be happy, really trying to do what seems most important in life, we can end up so far from where we ever meant to be, or what we ever thought was important, and not quite understand how we got there.

This really moved me. It was an interview with Marlon Brando in a German magazine, which a friend translated for me. He says, "I was never a good father or a good husband. I was always busy with my own life. Now I'm a guilty old man who feels ashamed of his life. Besides food, there is nothing else in the world for me. That's the only thing in my life. I know this eating will kill me, but I just can't stop."

It's intense. This was a couple years ago, so change is possible—I actually read he was doing better somewhere. But that's an extreme of a state we can all get into by pursuing what we think is the best, while underlying it is the tendency to go after what is pleasant. Whether it's more money, a better career, or having people think well of us so we have a nice feeling about ourselves—whatever it is. Always looking for some reality other than this one in order to make things okay, in order to find ease, in order to find peace.

And we bring that tendency here, of course. In doing that, if we don't stop to notice it, we're missing the truth. We're missing the secret. The secret of happiness, of our meditation, of happiness today in this next sitting, is that it really doesn't matter what's happening.

See if you believe that.

It really doesn't matter whether you're sleepy or whether you're really concentrated. You believe that? It really doesn't matter. But when we get lost in our reactions instead of being fully open-hearted and lovingly present with what is, that open-hearted connection allows any aspect of our experience to be the avenue in to re-recognizing our basic goodness—because it's always here. The only thing we have to do to recognize it is be fully present, awake, and non-judging in whatever's arising. The moment we're off into wanting something else, into pushing away experience, into getting lost in interpretation and extrapolation, what that's doing is just taking us out of being awake and present. And so we just can't recognize what's always here—that basic ease.

Here is an example of how ease, this natural peace, is available. It's a very simple example of being caught in a traffic jam.

I remember one time I was on the way to the Boston airport early in the morning to catch a flight to Thailand or somewhere—some flight where you have to make connections and go overseas. It was real early, like six in the morning, and if you know Boston at all, to get to the airport you can come from all directions, but you end up funneling through this one tunnel. About ten different routes come down with not much form or structure into two lines going through this one tunnel.

We were flying along at six in the morning, and just before we were coming off the highway onto the exit—which still is about a mile down and around to get to the tunnel—everything stopped dead, just as we got into the line to get off. It's the kind of place where there's nowhere to go. It stopped dead. It's not like there was another route to take, because you have to go through that tunnel unless you have an extra hour to go back around from the north, which we didn't.

It was really interesting to watch my mind, which of course didn't say, "Oh well, let's just rest in natural great peace here until the traffic starts again." That's not our first usual reaction, although it can become that. I fretted. I pretended that my first reaction was okay: "Oh yes, it's fine. Let's just hang out. It's nice." And underneath: "Let's go, let's go, let's go. It's been twenty minutes now. I'm going to miss the flight."

Until the point when I actually consciously took my attention and turned it around onto my experience and met it fully. Oh—anxiety, tightness. Pretense of being okay. But let me feel what's really going on. And in that willingness—this is our mindfulness practice—to simply be fully present with that, without making a story, without projecting into the future, just feeling that anxiety without adding to it: "Oh, okay. It's just what it is." It stops defining our experience, and we can recognize the vastness of ease of heart that is always accessible.

It's like: okay, the worst thing that can happen is I miss the flight. I mean, in the big scheme of things, so what? I don't know any flight that is that life-and-death—that I've ever taken—although they all feel that way. And when I really saw that...

The situation didn't change, but the sense of really resting at ease, of reconnecting with natural peace, was absolutely palpable.

I'm not saying that's a steady state. The very next moment, it's easy to lose it again because we're so inured to getting lost in our reactions. So our practice is simply to recognize the difference between the reactions and what's actually going on, and just rest in what's going on. In that, peace is always available. Learning to trust this is what allows us to open fully into experience, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

There's a passage from a Tibetan text that speaks to this natural peace:

Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that it is never impaired or improved in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease in whatever happens.

I love that last line: resting at ease in whatever happens. Participatory in whatever happens, not standing five feet away. That's our challenge. That's our practice.

When we recognize this even for a moment, there's the potential of finding our true refuge, our true home, once again—even if only for a moment—within the headache, within the back pain, within the fear. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, our capacity to wake up, to understand, and to love is our Buddha nature, and it's always here. Or as the Buddha said, "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata, namely liberation through non-clinging."

That moment of recognizing our basic goodness—we recognize it because the heart is not clinging to wanting things to be other. And we're awake. You have to be awake. You can't be totally zoned out and non-clinging. You have to be really awake and connected. That's the undercurrent. So we're learning both of these: how to be awake and how to recognize that quality of non-clinging.

So how do we get so sidetracked? Why don't we recognize this deep habit? As I said, it's really around being so caught in our reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral that we don't even see that we're evaluating all experience through that filter.

There's a wonderful sutta from the Buddha that I really like because it explains what keeps our suffering going. It's called the Two Darts—like arrows, two darts. Someone is asking him, essentially, what's the difference between an awakened being and ordinary beings? His words for ordinary people is "an untaught worldling." That's us. We're getting a little taught, but we're worldlings anyway.

He says that we experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. And an awakened person experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. So what's the difference? It's really interesting to hear that, because somewhere in the back of our minds, don't we think that the Buddha didn't have problems? He didn't have pain. You transcend that.

But he said the difference is this: when an untaught worldling experiences a painful bodily feeling, a painful sensation, he worries and grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he weeps and is distraught. Thus he experiences two kinds of unpleasant feeling—unpleasant bodily feeling and unpleasant mental feeling.

It's very basic, but so true. He says it's as if a person were hit by a dart, pierced by an arrow, and following that first piercing, he is hit by a second arrow. That person experiences pain caused by two arrows. And that's what we do. In a similar way, when we have a painful or unpleasant feeling—physical, mental, or emotional—we add to it by sticking ourselves with another arrow. And then of course we judge ourselves for that, so we stick ourselves with yet another arrow. He only mentioned two, but we can really go on and on down that road.

Being touched by that painful feeling, he resents it. And because we resent the unpleasant, we go looking for something pleasant. We get caught in lusting after some pleasant experience to escape the unpleasant one, and that becomes our pattern of mind.

When an awakened person is touched by a painful feeling, he experiences a painful feeling—that's it. When he experiences a pleasant feeling, he experiences a pleasant feeling—that's it.

It's so simple we can't stand it. So we're hit by one dart and we don't add another one to it. That's the difference. That's really the difference. It's not so complicated, but it's not easy.

So our practice isn't to say, "Okay, from now on, no more reactivity." That's already sticking yourself with a dart. Our practice is to learn how to see how this is happening. And it becomes fascinating rather than blameworthy. Like, "Wow, that's amazing. I can't just hear an unpleasant sound. I've got to bring in my past, my future, everything that's going to happen, what's wrong with all the other people here, and get into a complete knot of pain and aversion and everything else that goes back to my early childhood." We laugh, but we do it, and it's immense suffering. We're not choosing to do it, God knows. But it really helps to begin to see what's actually happening here.

A good example: a few years ago someone told me this in an interview. It was after quite some days of the retreat, and she said—it's always nice when you hear the story after it's been worked through because you really see the power of understanding what's really happening to bring us back to peace. She said it was a metta retreat, actually, and she was starting to feel really concentrated, a lot of metta, and then she started to notice some ongoing noise in the hall, kind of a repetitive, ongoing noise. She didn't say what it was, but I actually surmised she was sitting in the front row, and if you get really quiet, you can hear this clock ticking. I think that's what it was, but she didn't say.

She said she went through days of so much anger and aversion. This sound was ruining her meditation. It was ruining her concentration. It was ruining her metta—implied but not said. She didn't go on, but I can certainly extrapolate all the things that would come out of that: "I can't believe the teachers are so insensitive as to have a clock that ticks. Don't they know how sensitive..." It just goes on and on, whatever your proclivity is.

And then one day she said she heard us say for about the ten millionth time, "When an experience arises, bring your kind and full attention to the bare sense experience itself. So hearing—bring your attention to hearing." So she said, "Oh, maybe I'll try that." Brought her experience right into the hearing, without holding back, without making a story, just meet it fully. And she said, "Oh, hearing. It's unpleasant." That was it. She said, "Oh! The sound wasn't disturbing my concentration. My mind was disturbing the concentration."

Or Ajahn Chah had a great line: when the sound arises, it doesn't disturb us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound. All that suffering—that's the second dart. That's the second arrow. It's all extra. Once we can learn how to bring wise attention to what's really going on, that's where the skill of our practice comes in. That's where we are developing here with mindfulness the tool of wise attention to help us see what's really happening.

It's often counterintuitive because, as I describe it a little more, you'll see—especially if something's unpleasant, the wise attention says, "Bring your full-hearted, no-holding-back awareness right into the experience, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant." And what we feel is our intuition saying, "Let me get as far away from this as possible." The thing is, that's not our intuition. That's our habit that says pleasant is good and unpleasant is bad, and I have to somehow control this—which we can't.

So it's a little counterintuitive, but it's radical. It's a radical change because as soon as we give up fighting and controlling and manipulating, just drop into that—"Oh, hearing. Unpleasant."—I mean, it doesn't work like a charm every time because we have to be really wholehearted and awake. But when we are, there's that moment when it all just vanishes and there's hearing and unpleasant and that's it. Natural great peace. Our basic goodness.

So our path of wakefulness and compassion to ourselves and others is not about cultivating some really far out, incredible state of mind and heart that's going to last us for the rest of our life. It's transforming our life by transforming how we relate to our life. And the little things that happen here are the stuff of our whole life. It's just in this little microcosm.

No amount of meditation is going to stop illness, old age, disease, and death. It's not going to stop separation and loss. No amount of meditation is going to make everything in the world hunky-dory, get rid of injustice and poverty. It just doesn't happen.

But what meditation does, what mindfulness practice does, is give us the tools to see clearly, to meet our experience wholeheartedly, and to come out of a life of reactivity, dissatisfaction, and fear into a life of wholehearted connectedness—to ourselves, to others. It offers us a life that allows us to trust in the true potential of resting at ease in whatever arises, rather than thinking we have to manipulate and control and keep everything at bay. Because that is such a difficult and tension-producing state.

Our basic tool is mindfulness—wise attention. Learning how to pay attention and what to pay attention to. How do we pay attention in a way that keeps us coming back to clear knowing, to clear seeing, to openheartedness? How do we meet this moment with balanced awareness, as Sylvia said this morning? That's really what mindfulness and wise attention are about.

This word, wise attention—the Pali word for it (Pali being the language the first Buddhist texts were written in) is yoniso manasikara. You don't have to remember that, but I'm mentioning it because I was talking to Andy Olenski, the executive director of the study center. He's a Pali scholar—if you didn't know, he's our resident Pali scholar, so we always go to him for his very insightful translations and history. I asked him how he translates yoniso manasikara, and his answer is very interesting.

The word yoniso comes from the Pali word for womb. So he translates it as womb-like—nurturing, protecting. Mana is mind, and kara is from the same root as kamma, which means action. Taken all together, he puts it as "an active quality of mind that is nurturing and supporting." I love that.

If you can get a sense—not think about it, but get a sense—of bringing attention to any experience with that quality... It's active; you really connect with what's happening, but in a way that's nurturing and supporting, supportive of being fully present with an open heart. That's the quality of mindfulness: an active quality of mind that meets the experience fully, but in a way that is nurturing, non-judging, non-reactive—that supports our open-hearted presence.

Hopefully this isn't just intellectual, because it's so important. You can take the words in, but then really play with that quality of attention in your experience—in the attention you bring to the breath, the attention you bring to your steps in walking, or as we open up to physical sensation, emotions, whatever is arising. This quality of nurturing, active attention.

This quality has a couple of aspects that help us really be with the experience rather than our interpretation of it. The first aspect we call bare attention. That's really seeing the difference between a sound and all the mental extrapolations that go on with it. This seems obvious when we're sitting here talking about it and we're not caught up in something. But really watch, with your breath, the difference between bringing that full, open-hearted attention to the bare experience of sensation without confusing it with the interpretations and stories we tell about it. It's very interesting to begin to see the difference.

It's like bringing a sense of wonder, of freshness, no preconceptions. Someone sent me this birthday card last year—I don't know if you can see it. It's a picture of a little baby with wide eyes and an open mouth, like, "Wow, what's that?" That's the kind of attention. Not, "Ah, another breath." But rather, "Oh, this breath!" It's tight, it's controlling, I can't really get it deep—and then the story begins: it really shows what a shallow person I am, it's all tight... But no. It's just sensation. Wow, what's that sensation?

And not, "Now it's deep. It's flowing like a waterfall. I'm connecting with all the molecules of air in the universe. This really shows my sense of oneness, and it's good. I've been doing my yoga and it's really bearing fruit." No—it's just sensation. There's just pressure, or coolness, or tingling.

And then we often get into the neutral territory, where it's like, "That's not very interesting. I've got to spend all day with in and out, in and out, pressure, tingling, coolness. Where's the fruit of this? I didn't come here for that."

Pressure, tingling, coolness. Pressure, tingling, coolness. But each time it's a fresh pressure, a fresh experience. It's not like last time it was pressure, tingling, coolness, so now I know this next time it's going to be pressure, tingling, coolness. Just meet it with this freshness, this bare attention, and in that moment, what's the problem? Whether it's tight, whether it's loose, whether it's pressure, whether it's tingling—it doesn't matter. That quality of open-hearted attention is all we need. In that quality, we are able to recognize again our basic goodness, open to discover rather than to judge.

And really, for those of you whether you've been on the metta retreat or not, perhaps you can get a sense of how this quality of mindful attention is actually imbued with metta. Metta has the qualities of inclusiveness, non-reactivity, real connectedness, real kindness, non-judging. That's the way we meet each experience—non-manipulating and inclusive.

This brings us to the next aspect: meeting the bare sense experience itself without discriminating. As Sylvia said this morning, this is where the instructions start to sound paradoxical, because we're saying just come back to the breath. And in this, that is a discrimination. It's saying, for right now, I'm choosing the breath as more important to pay attention to than anything else. But if you can see that this is a skillful means only, meant to bring in a steadiness of focus, as she said this morning, so we can then open to everything else—don't get into the habit of thinking somehow the breath is a superior experience to knee pain. It's not. But we need to develop some steadiness of attention to be able to open to knee pain or bliss or boredom or excitement, to be fully present with the bare experience and able to tell the difference between it and our reactions. So that's why we need some steadiness of mind. But in this quality of open-hearted, wise attention, it's also non-discriminating.

As you'll see when the instructions go on, we're with the breathing, and a knee pain arises. We don't say, "Knee pain—I don't want to really be with that. I think I'll just stay with the breath until something nice comes along." It's not like, "Well, I've seen that knee pain before. I know all about it, so I don't really need to investigate it. I think I'll just hang out here in the breath." You see, our discrimination will generally come from this sense of going to what we like and avoiding what we don't like. Or if you have a perverse mind that's drawn by the unpleasant, the reverse—going to what we don't like and ignoring what's pleasant because it's somehow a mistake. Either one, it doesn't matter; one's not better than the other. But the quality of open-hearted mindful attention doesn't discriminate. Something arises, fine—meet it fully, no judging. It goes away, fine—it's gone away.

Now, can you imagine that with no matter what comes up? No matter what? No exceptions. There are no exceptions. Some great, incredible meditation experience is not an exception. Some really awful pain, some really yucky emotion is not an exception. Whatever arises, we learn how to meet it just as it is in this moment—open-hearted, no judging—notice what it does, notice the reactions of mind without believing them, let it go when it goes.

It's quite a challenge. We're just not used to it. We're afraid of the difficult. We get really lost in the pleasant, of course. That's what we do. And so a lot of the form of the practice and the concentration is to help us cut through these patterns of discriminating and just rest at ease in whatever arises. Just what presents itself.

This cutting through our basic habit is one of the reasons I feel retreats can be so uncomfortable. You know how it is to break a habit—even though the habit itself is engendering suffering, it's comfortable, it's familiar. And quite a few people have said in groups that in moving into some experience or some space that's unfamiliar, even though in itself it's not particularly unpleasant, just the unfamiliarity brings up a real thrill of fear. And that fear in itself is interpreted as, "Oh, something's wrong. I better fix this"—because that's how we respond to fear. So a lot of the way the retreat is structured, the way we keep saying just meet what's happening, is breaking our habit of avoiding the unpleasant by moving into it. It's breaking our habit of holding on to the pleasant by allowing it to go away. And at times that's very uncomfortable. But that's okay.

So, bringing our full, gentle attention to the experience just as it is. You'll see with physical discomfort—that's a really good place. We haven't talked about it yet, but either tomorrow or the next day, that's where we'll go with the instructions in the morning. That's a great place to really watch and notice the difference between the bare experience, the physical discomfort, the sensations, and all the response and reaction of heart and mind around it.

And to see how intertwined they can get. To see how hard it can be to tell the difference. Because in my experience, as soon as I label something "pain," there's already a whole lot of baggage connected to the way I perceive that experience.

So when I have a sharp feeling in my knee, if I move my attention there and notice, "Oh, sharpness," that's one thing. If I move my attention there and think "pain," there's already a mental reaction of fear, of holding back, of judgment, just in the way I label it. You see how subtle it can get.

It's not about judging ourselves that this happens. It's more about using the discomfort—not to martyr yourself. In this practice, we're not glorifying discomfort either. I'll talk about the comfortable in a minute. It's both. But to be able to just move toward the discomfort and see if you can, just for a moment, touch it lovingly with attention, just as it is, free of preconceptions. It's not easy.

Pain in the shoulders translates as tension, which translates into the way I live my life and all the things I have in my job and the way I respond to myself and the way I hold back from other people and how shy I am—on and on and on—when it's just, you know, tightness or pressure.

I've experienced headaches since I was a teenager. From time to time, I get really debilitating headaches, not migraines, but the kind where I can't really function too well. I can sort of deal with other pain, but headaches—I always really hate them. They're such a veil on experience that I would just be lost in some kind of aversive snit whenever I had one. There was no sense of being able to see through it. It colored the whole world.

And just in the last few years, I've really been able to experience this differently. Some days when I'm teaching, I wake up with one of these throbbing headaches, and I watch my reaction: "Oh no, how am I going to get through the day? I have to talk to people all day. I have to be nice. I can't be snarly. I can't be in an aversive snit." And I watch myself projecting that headache and how I'm going to react and everything that's going to happen through the whole day—all within the first two minutes of the headache coming on.

We do that, don't we? You have a pain in your knee and you're already in the hospital having arthroscopic surgery, and it's only been two minutes. What are you going to do with the rest of the day? It can only go downhill from here.

To watch all of that, and then deliberately bring my attention to the actual sensations—it's so amazing because they're just what they are. "Oh yeah, this throbbing and tightness." And when I'm really present with it, that's all it is. I pull back a little bit, and in comes: throbbing, tightness, "Oh my God, how am I going to get through the day?" Oh yes—and aversion and fear. Come back to the throbbing and the tightness.

Now, it's not magic. It doesn't make it go away. And a lot of times people get into evaluating. It kind of slips in: "If I'm really mindful properly, the unpleasant thing is going to go away." Sometimes it does, and sometimes it doesn't. Eventually it always will, but not on our time frame. And that's not a way to evaluate the practice.

But I've really come to where I can have this throbbing headache and at the same time be in touch with basic goodness—with the fact of our basic okayness, no matter what's happening. We can really connect with that in ourselves. And we can use our little pains here to just experiment with how to do that, how to tell the difference between the second arrow and the simple, bare, unpleasant sensation.

So that's why when we say, "If you have a little unpleasant sensation, don't move that first second"—what you're really doing otherwise is depriving yourself of an opportunity to discover that peace is available. It's not about being macho. It's not about winning an Olympic gold medal in the longest sitting you do here or the slowest walking. It's not about that. It's about using whatever arises as our opportunity to touch basic goodness, through the avenue of opening into it just as it is, rather than getting lost in the second arrow and all our stories.

I just want to give an example of how we do the same thing with the pleasant, where we mistake the pleasant feeling—we get entranced by it. In fact, we get so entranced we often don't even notice there is any pleasant feeling, and we think the thing that is pleasant is the best thing that ever happened. We believe our happiness depends on holding on to that forever, because we don't know how to see what's really happening: a sense experience, pleasant, clinging to the pleasant, and thinking, "Now life is great."

This is a story from the Buddha's time that I really like. It shows this beautifully. The Buddha had an attendant for the last twenty-five years or so of his life named Ananda, who was a monk.

Apparently, he was a wonderful attendant and very loving—just very kind, very supportive of all the people who came to the Buddha for teaching, really trying to help them gain access to the Buddha. He was simply a kind person.

So in this story, Ananda was sent on a mission by the Buddha, and he passed by a well near a village. There he saw a young outcast woman. In India, they have these different castes, with the lowest caste being the untouchables. There were all these rules that you wouldn't take any food from an untouchable, you wouldn't go near them, and so forth.

Ananda saw her and asked her for a drink of water—it's permitted for monks to ask for water, though they can't ask for other things. And she said, "Oh monk, I am too humbly born to give you water to drink. Don't ask any service of me lest you be contaminated, for I am of low caste."

And Ananda said, "I'm not asking for your caste, I'm just asking for water."

Her heart leapt so joyfully. She gave Ananda water to drink, he thanked her, and went away. But she followed him at a distance. And she heard that Ananda was a disciple of the Buddha. So she went to the Buddha and said, "Oh Lord, help me and let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells, so that I may see him and minister unto him, because I love Ananda."

And you see what happened. The Blessed One—thus the Buddha—understood the emotions of her heart at once and said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you do not understand your own sentiments. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice towards you, and practice it towards others."

You see the basic mistake that we always make. There was so much pleasure, so much happiness at his kindness, and immediately we make the leap from the pleasant sensation to the thing that engendered it. Now I have to have Ananda for the rest of my life because I feel so pleasant—because he took water from me!

And really, that's how we mess up our lives, isn't it? Somebody does something nice, and so I've got to have this person, I've got to have this thing, I've got to have this car, whatever—and I'll do anything to get it because it's going to make me happy for the rest of my life. And it's just pleasant feeling.

Which again, it's sort of like the breath—just tingling and pressure. "Oh, I like..." But it's a much better story, isn't it? "Ananda is so wonderful. Let me minister unto him. Let me follow him around." Pleasant feeling, you're saying? It's just pleasant feeling? I'm just attached to pleasant feeling? That doesn't make such a good story.

Are we willing to give up the stories in order to touch our peace? What's interesting is that a lot of the time, no, we're not. We'd much rather hold on to the story, even though it keeps us spinning. Running after the pleasant—the image that always comes to me is like a hamster on one of those hamster wheels. We're running, running, running. And the faster we go, the more dissatisfying our experience becomes, because we never get there. Even if we get something pleasant, sure, it's nice. No one's debating that. But it doesn't last. So then we have to run after something else, and something else. Run away from the unpleasant.

But sometimes we don't even know it's a story, or we do know but we can't quite put it down yet. So that's okay. That's why we practice. And that's the power of this aspect of mindfulness, or wise attention—okay, in this moment I can't put down the story, but now there's the next moment. And you don't have to think about it or figure it out. Just bring your attention to the bare experience that's happening, and everything else takes care of itself. You'll notice if it's pleasant or unpleasant, or you'll notice that there's a reaction, or you'll notice that there's suffering. Or you'll just be able to touch that breath—and there's no big bliss, there's no big story, it's just simply what it is. And in that, we can again rest at ease in whatever arises.

I think really the reason we don't recognize it so much is because it's so simple and so close and so present—just this total awareness, total presence—and we're looking for fireworks. Through these days, through moments, little moments when you're feeling really present and awake, there's no problem. But nothing special is going on.

You're having a cup of tea, or you're just feeling a breath, or just feeling your foot as you take a step, just lying down in bed, brushing your teeth, whatever it is—but one of those moments where you're really exquisitely present, and that's all. Let it in. Learn to begin to recognize it, because these are the intimations, these are the guideposts that will bring us more deeply to trust and rest in the peace that can be available when we stop manipulating and fighting and trying to control.

The Dalai Lama said, "Why do we endeavor to discover the present moment? Because it is the only place where you will know love." It's the only place where we will know love. It's the only place where we can awaken to the true potential for peace and ease, no matter what's happening.

So that's our practice.

CHAPTER 302

Five Hindrances

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson reframes our relationship with the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa), teaching that these challenging mind states—sense desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā)—are not obstacles to eliminate but opportunities for deep understanding. She suggests we are often "hypnotized" by pleasure-seeking and pain-avoidance, and that practice is about "de-hypnotizing" ourselves to recognize our innate wholeness.
> Wilson offers practical guidance for working with each hindrance through mindful awareness rather than suppression or identification. For sense desire, she encourages staying present with the physical experience of wanting itself, noticing how desire creates a sense of separation and incompleteness. For aversion in its many forms—anger, fear, boredom, irritation—she teaches bringing attention directly to the sensory experience that triggers the reaction, or to the bodily sensations of the aversion itself. Drawing on teachings from Thich Nhat Hanh about "sponsoring" anger with mindfulness, she describes how awareness can transform these energies.
> The talk connects these practical instructions to the Four Noble Truths (cattāri ariyasaccāni), showing how the hindrances become our "practicum" for understanding suffering and its cessation. Rather than the cause of suffering being these states themselves, Wilson clarifies it is our relationship to them—the thirst (taṇhā) for things to be different—that creates unnecessary pain. She concludes with Dogen's reminder that truth can only be found right where we are, in whatever arises.

And what's been your experience today? Probably not nothing, but maybe not what you think you came here for either. Perhaps some peaceful, happy moments, maybe some lovely moments, maybe some turmoil, maybe some boredom, maybe some aversion. Perhaps a lot of sleepiness, a lot of restlessness, maybe fear, maybe desire. Not nothing though—but maybe not what we're looking for.

I saw an ad recently. Actually, it was in the Northwest Dharma News, which really surprised me. The ad says, "Deepen your meditations"—which immediately would pull the eye. "Improve concentration and absorption. Dissolve distractions and inner chatter." It's an advertisement for a clinical hypnotherapist. This is in a Dharma newspaper.

That's one way to go. It's not this way.

Actually, in my opinion, a lot of us walk through our life as if we're hypnotized. We're hypnotized by the lure of pleasure, by the hope of the next thing making us happy and being better. We're hypnotized by our fear of the unpleasant, of things not turning out the way we want. And in this cycle of trying to maintain that dream, we actually hypnotize ourselves into a dream of separation and alienation—the sense of loneliness, the sense of needing something somewhere else to fulfill us and make us happy. It's not the truth of things. It's really almost as if we hypnotize ourselves into it.

So I'm here, and I hope you're all here, in some way to de-hypnotize ourselves, to wake us up to aliveness, to presence, to really being fully awake in whatever life brings us in the form of our mind and body experiences in this moment—because that's all we have.

Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche once said that the main purpose of these Dharma teachings is twofold: one, to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind, and two, how the deluded mind works.

So we're getting to see a lot of the second one. That's not a bad thing, because it serves as our tool. Exploring how the deluded mind works is actually our avenue into recognizing the nature of the non-deluded mind. And by mind in the big picture, I don't mean particularly thoughts and emotions so much as the nature of awareness or consciousness itself, or even beyond that—the sense of purity or radiance of our non-deluded mind, our innate wholeness or completion that we don't recognize when we're hypnotizing ourselves into thinking we need something somewhere else.

What's so amazing is this one line from a Tibetan text: the non-deluded mind is actually liberated by simply resting at ease in whatever arises. Resting at ease in whatever happens. That's our practice, and that's a huge challenge.

Because mostly, did you come here to rest at ease in restlessness? Was that your idea when you came? "Let me just find that place of harmony within intense sleepiness and grumpiness—that's the point of my practice." Well, guess what? That actually is our practice.

Now, if we put that in the brochure, we might not have 140 people here. But that's actually what we're given to work with. And it's not a mistake. It's not something we have to get rid of.

Early in a retreat, we get a lot of chance to explore how the deluded mind works. Our tool is mindfulness. And these things that are arising—these emotional storms, the sleepiness, the restlessness, the desire, the aversion, the boredom, the frustration, the doubt—these are our practicum in the Four Noble Truths that Gil was talking about last night. The Four Noble Truths make a lot of sense intellectually, but they don't do us much good until they become our visceral experience of life.

Tonight I want to talk about some of our friends that we might call the workings of the deluded mind—particular states of mind and heart that we always discuss early in a retreat because they visit just about all of us strongly in these first days. These are the states of mind of sense desire, aversion, anger, fear, sleepiness, tiredness, restlessness and worry, and doubt. You probably recognize at least one of these from sometime today, or maybe yesterday.

These are our friends. Rather than being a problem that we have to get rid of, our challenge is to bring the attitude of awareness and understanding that their presence is actually how we can experience the Four Noble Truths: suffering and the cause of suffering. And the cause of suffering is not the presence of any of these states. The cause of suffering is the relationship of our heart to the presence of these states—the thirst for it to be different. Aversion, or wanting it to go away, is similar. It's like the flip side of the thirst for it to be different.

The ending of suffering doesn't mean that state goes away. It means we find that place of resting at ease in whatever's happening. We let go of the thirst. And the practice we're doing here—the tool, the coming back over and over with clear, kind, non-judging attention—is the path that we're using to recognize over and over the qualities of the non-deluded mind.

So, and I really mean this: when sleepiness comes up, when sense desire comes up, if we can meet it with this attitude of willingness to fully be present and understand suffering and the end of suffering in this moment, it becomes our avenue of liberation in that moment. It really does. And don't just believe me—try it the next time it comes up.

In the early days of a retreat, these five particular states tend to arise in varying degrees of strength for most anyone. But what I say about working with these states is true for any difficult state of heart or mind, and also pleasant states of heart and mind. These tend to come up really strongly in a retreat, and not always just the first day. Sometimes as the retreat goes into the third, fourth, fifth day, sense desire or aversion or restlessness might actually seem to increase. And you can wonder, what's going wrong? I thought it should be getting better, and instead it's getting worse. That's our value judgment based on the deluded mind.

I have a teacher who used to say that mindfulness is like a light. We're shining the light of awareness without discriminating on whatever's arising. So for example, when we say in the instructions, "be present with sensory experiences," we didn't say pay attention to the ones you like and pretend the ones you don't like aren't happening, or go into a fantasy in order to avoid it. I don't recall that being the instruction. It's whatever arises, you meet it with full attention. You don't stop to check out first whether it's worth attention. You just go there.

This is the non-discriminating, vast quality of mindfulness that begins to break down our unconscious suppressions. And so, as one of my teachers said, as the light grows stronger, all the snakes start to come out of their holes. That starts to happen. And it's not that something's going wrong—it's actually that awareness is getting stronger. Another happy thing to know.

I know it seems like we just keep talking about suffering, but do you notice how happy it makes us? That's some of the paradox of this practice. The stuff comes up and we go, "Oh yeah, great, another snake. Let me meet it with mindfulness."

So the challenge of our hearts, of our practice, is to begin to notice not only what state of heart and mind is present, but how we're relating to it. Because without awareness, we relate out of old habit patterns. And that's where we get caught in the cycle of unnecessary suffering.

All of these are frequent visitors. Desire and aversion particularly are deeply, deeply ingrained habits of our conditioned mind. That's what I opened with in the beginning—it tends to be our default stance, how we're going to be happy in the world. So it's important to begin to notice them.

Notice overall how we react when any of these states—sense desire, aversion, sleepiness or sloth and torpor in the lingo, restlessness and worry, or doubt—arise. There are two sort of common ways we relate when we're asleep.

One is that we're so familiar with them, we think, well, this is really who I am. They belong here. It's like a friend of mine was telling this story. He was living in a pretty ritzy area of Hollywood, one of these houses with electronic gates and surveillance. And somehow somebody got through all that and just walked in the door—a guy who looked like a homeless person, or kind of an alcoholic or something. He just walked in the door. And my friend was really shocked and said, "What are you doing here?" And the guy said, "Well, I live here." And just for a moment, my friend said, "Oh, does he?"

We kind of do that. Sense desire, aversion—welcome, make yourself at home, run the show. This is really what it's all about.

Now, the other reaction, especially in meditation when we're a little more aware, I think is maybe the most common, and it's a pretty suffering reaction.

I'll tell you a story to illustrate it. Recently, Franz and I were in southern India staying in a small ashram—a very quiet ashram, which is unusual in India. There were several rooms, maybe ten or fifteen, arranged around a central courtyard, with a few rooms just off the back.

In the central courtyard, a really old swami, an old man dressed in orange, a sadhu, was staying. They were sort of taking care of him. He spent most of the day lying on his bed or sitting on his bed in this courtyard. At some point late in the first day we were there, I was just walking by and he sat up. He had constructed for himself, out of all bits of cloth and twine and rope and I don't know what, a huge kind of—I don't know, it was sort of like a big piece of rope, about a meter long and at least as thick around as a thigh, really big and heavy. He'd constructed this out of all these bits of things, frayed on one end with a little handle on the other. I have to show you—so he would all of a sudden sit up in his bed, grab this thing, and just whack it on the floor with all his strength on this tile floor. It made an incredibly loud noise that reverberated through the whole ashram. Really, really loud. He would sit there and just whack about ten times, and then he'd lie down again. Half an hour later, he'd suddenly jump up, whack, whack, whack, and then he'd lie down again.

Finally I asked somebody who worked there, "What is he doing?" And he said, "Well, he sort of has inner visions. He thinks evil spirits are coming to disturb his meditation." I thought, I can relate to that.

That night, about every half hour all night—clearly there were a lot of evil spirits around that night—every half hour, whack, whack, whack. I was in the back. I couldn't imagine what it was like for the people who were right around the courtyard. It was incredibly loud.

So that's another way. I think a lot of us might engage in that. Sleepiness arrives—whack, whack. What's that doing here? Or maybe you actually turn it on yourself. Whack, whack. I'm so sleepy. We got really tickled. We had visions of everybody in the ashram picking up this thing at the start and just traveling from room to room, whack, whack, whack, all the way down.

I do not recommend that. That is not really the way of practice. But it is one we can easily fall into. The evil spirits have come to disturb my meditation, and if I can get rid of them, then it'll be hunky-dory. Then mindfulness can really get going. Then I can find some peace.

Our challenge is actually to shift our relationship from such total welcoming that we identify completely with the state—not into total hatred and pushing it away—but to shift the energy into the power of recognition, of full presence with it just as it is. Without hating, without identifying, without getting lost in all the stories and the past and the future, but simply recognizing what's happening in the moment. This is desire. This is aversion. What is the experience of it as it's happening right now? So that all the energy comes into awareness and presence rather than feeding reactivity, fear, and clinging.

I want to talk a little bit about helping us recognize and be present with each of these five energies. Hindrances is the classical translation of this grouping of five, but I think it's a little bit unfortunate because it has such a negative connotation. If you hear "hindrances," the next thought is, well, if they're hindrances, let's get rid of them—and we're caught in the whacking again.

But I read a definition once that described them as emotional and intellectual veils that obscure the nature of mind when we're not aware of them. That's different from being intrinsically a hindrance. When we're not aware of the presence of these states, they function as veils that obscure the pure nature of mind, our intrinsic wholeness. When we are aware of them, they're just what they are. No problem. Really no problem. And that's something we can each experience over and over again until you really know and trust that for yourself.

So to talk a little bit about each one.

Sense desire—that's fairly obvious what it is. I want this. I want that. I want a better cushion. I want something different for lunch. I want the weather to change. I want the person next to me to stop moving. I want something different to happen in the sitting. I want the person leading metta not to be leading it. I want metta now instead of later. I want a new job—whatever, whatever.

As one friend of mine said very succinctly: I want, I need, therefore I am. It feels like that a lot of the time. Things are a little boring—let's go into a fantasy. Let's whip up desire, in fact, if things get peaceful. And this includes meditative experiences. It includes wanting your breath to be different, wanting to be concentrated, wanting anything at all.

It's really fascinating when we begin to shift our attention from being caught up in the content of desire, which is mostly what we do. We focus on what I want, how can I get it, how much better everything will be once I do get it. Isn't it amazing how, underneath each thing we want—unspoken, because if we really looked at it, it wouldn't make sense—there's a sense that if I get this, everything's going to be okay. I'm going to be happy. This is going to do it for me. Whether it's a rice cake or having a baby—whatever it is, in that moment, they're equally important. Because it's not the thing; it's the desire.

And it's so seductive. We get entranced by it. We think it's leading us into the happy, perfect world. But what is it actually leading us into? More desire. It feeds on itself. It seduces us into wanting more because, obviously, either we don't get the thing and we're miserable, or we do get it and the rice cake is gone—and then what? If only I would have put peanut butter. Oh, but there's apple butter and I already ate my rice cake. I could have had apple butter on it. Now what am I going to do? It's just endless.

So what we do with our attention is simply begin to notice the presence of desire itself. Take the attention off the object of the desire and put it onto the experience of desire in the moment you're experiencing it. This is the power of naming, of recognition—the power of mindfulness. It begins to break the spell, because somewhere in there, it's almost as if we unwittingly think desire is pleasant. But if you stop and really tune into desire, I personally don't find it so pleasant.

Try an experiment the next time strong desire comes up while you're sitting or walking. Just keep sitting or walking. The Buddha used to say he'd do this with fear, but you can do it with desire. When strong desire comes up, just stay in whatever posture you're in when it arises. Keep staying in that posture and keep paying attention to the experience of desire itself until it goes away. I promise it will go away. I don't promise how long it will take. I don't promise it won't come back. But it will go away, because everything goes away eventually.

And what do you begin to discover when you bring your attention to the experience of desire in the moment it's happening? I'm going to share some things, but I really want you to look for yourself. Don't believe me. Just take what I say as an incentive to explore it for yourself.

Notice what it's like in a moment when you're just present—sitting, walking, eating, whatever—no desire, and boom, desire arises. "I need seconds." There's that scraping of the spoons on the bottom of the pan, and what if there's no seconds? "I need seconds right now."

Notice the difference first. It's like the presence of desire shatters our essential peace. We're just at ease, present with whatever's happening, and suddenly, "I've got to have seconds." Don't focus on the seconds. Don't judge yourself for the desire. Just feel it. Tune into your body. Use your physical experiences, as Gil was saying this morning, to ground in the experience. What does it feel like?

For me, desire is really an unpleasant experience. It's almost as if internally I'm clutching, I'm tight, I'm clenching, I'm completely shut off in a way. So that's the thing desire does—it creates a sense of separation. Whereas before there was an essential peace, a feeling of wholeness that I wasn't really aware of, the moment there's desire, there's me separated from what I want, separated from everyone else who's actually become my enemy if they might get to the seconds before I do. There's a real strong sense of separation and neediness that's set up.

And it seems to us that if we can satisfy the desire, then the neediness is gone. Again we're complete. Again we're whole. But it's tricky, because it's the desire itself that's setting up that sense of incompleteness, that sense of neediness, that sense of needing something to fill up the space so I can experience essential completeness.

So play with staying in the posture and notice. Just feel desire—tightness, burning, burning, tightness. Keep noting. Just hang with it. See what happens. Notice as it fades. And keep noticing after it fades, because often what you'll find is, "Ah, peace." And that's really so often what we wanted all along. If we get the thing, there's this sense of peace, this sense of presence, this sense of completeness again. But it's because the desire goes away, not so much that we get the thing. We're no longer caught in the desire.

Once we're just with the experience of desire as an experience, not something that has to drive us, then it's okay. We don't have to be afraid of it. It's going to come up. Sense desire comes. We don't have to let it run us.

So that's just beginning to tune in to sense desire, to craving—to see how, if we're not aware of it, it actually feeds and sustains itself and keeps us moving from this sense of inadequacy, of not-enoughness, of incompletion. Whereas all we have to do is bring our attention to it and we're home again.

It doesn't mean we never go eat. It doesn't mean we never go do anything. But it doesn't have to be from this thirst. As Gil translated taṇhā last night—this thirst, "I've got to have this or I'm going to die." So sure, the bell rings for lunch, you're hungry, you go to eat. That's normal. That's not the same kind of sense desire as this thirst. You're tired at night, you're sleepy, you want to go sleep. Fine. That's fine. It's not this thirst that runs us.

So that's the sense desire of the hindrance. And that's what we can really begin to tune into—the desire itself, rather than the object desires.

And it's the same for the opposite, so-called opposite—the second of these states of mind that obscure our intrinsic completeness when we're not aware of them. That's the one called aversion, which has a broad range of gradations of emotion that go along with it. There's your basic, "I don't like anything or anybody."

which can arise very easily at this stage of a retreat. And if you don't recognize it, you really get caught in the story about what's wrong with each person who happens to move through your field of perception. With this many people, you can really get into it.

So there's that basic irritability. But aversion can also extend to the level of murderous rage. It includes self-judgment. It's also slight irritation. It's also boredom. And it's also fear. The reason all of these can be grouped together under the big label of aversion is because the function of aversion in one moment of experience—the way it works, the way you can notice it when you're paying attention—is that it always arises in response to something unpleasant that's happening in your experience right now.

Take the cold, for example. The physical sensation of cold that you might experience as unpleasant—you may not even be aware of that. Aversion functions as the attention of the mind pulling back from that, disconnecting from it, so that the experience is one of disconnection. Literally, your awareness, your attention, is not meeting what's happening. We pull back from the cold, and into that space can rush all the forms of reactivity—from fear: "What's going to happen? This is only the third day and it's going to get worse. I've used up all my clothes. When are they going to do the laundry? Where am I going to get more blankets? What about the next retreat? There's even more people..." And it just goes on. Or it can turn outward into real anger and rage, usually at people, because we know getting angry at the weather is kind of useless. But if we get mad at somebody, maybe that would do something.

Even boredom is a slight pulling away. We're bored because we're not really connected with what's happening. If you've had the experience where sometimes the breath is just fascinating and other times it's really boring, do you think the breath is that different those different times? It's really the quality of connection of attention.

So all these forms of aversion are a pulling away. And because we really aren't alive, embodied, connected in our life, the experience of being separate, alienated, disconnected gets stronger. Irritation and anger and aversion have a way, when unrecognized, of really feeding on themselves. The cold is unpleasant, and we get irritated. Actually, the experience of irritation itself is unpleasant. So we don't really want to know that, and we get more irritated. Before we know it, sense experiences happen that we're not even aware are happening. We react to that, and it just goes in a really long chain.

Franz told me a story once about how we can get caught in this chain of reactivity and anger if we're not aware of it. He was at Universal Studios or some big theme park where it's always crowded, waiting in line at a fast food place for coffee. Everyone had been waiting for a while. The man in front of him was very impatient, had clearly been waiting and didn't want to be waiting. You know how that is—he was sort of hassling the clerk, who was harried and just trying to serve people their coffee. I don't know exactly what Franz said, but it was something meant to be soothing and relaxing. Now, you know how it is when you're irritated and some stranger comes up and says something soothing and relaxing. With what an open heart we tend to greet that kind of thing. And that's about how it was greeted. The guy stormed out.

Franz got his coffee, walked out. He said as he walked out—this was maybe five minutes later—the man was across the way at the tables, holding his cup of coffee. Just the sight of Franz... he got so agitated that he spilled his coffee.

That's the way it is when we're not aware. It's as if aversion—the same with desire—becomes a filter, a veil through which we're viewing all of our perceptions, so that just the sight of this person walking out is seen as an irritating perception.

So our practice is, rather than letting ourselves be caught in this and spending the day or the retreat judging everybody and everything—and then turning around and judging yourself for judging everybody else—to notice: "Oh, I think aversion might be arising in my mind and heart in this moment. Let me bring my attention to it."

This is really a powerful shift. This is what the practice is about. It's not necessarily pleasant, but this is the transformative movement—from being caught in the suffering to seeing that the cause of suffering is the way we're relating to the experience. We don't have to say that if we see it, the aversion goes away. But we can tune in, really look at what's happening, rather than believing the veil of aversion.

There are two ways I'd like to suggest for doing this. One is—and this is before you're in really murderous rage—

Because at that point, subtlety isn't going to cut it. But in the beginning, when you're in that state where you notice that everyone who comes by just seems a little schlumpy today, everyone just seems a little more rude and a little less mindful than usual—after a while, you start to notice aversion.

The first step is to bring your mindful awareness with wise attention. Recognize that aversion is present, but come back to the immediate sense experience, because what's happening is we're not meeting it directly. If you meet the experience directly, then often that mindful awareness cuts through the field of aversion and we're just present again.

A really simple example. A couple of years ago, a woman was on a long retreat at IMS in Barre, where I was teaching. She was sitting in the front row. She told me this story after it was over. She said there was some repetitive noise in the hall—I think it was the ticking of the little clock we had. It's really quiet, but when everything gets very still, you can start to hear it. And she said this repetitive sound was driving her crazy. She was just getting lost in anger every sitting. It was ruining her concentration.

We kept talking about mindfulness, wise attention. When you hear a sound, bring your attention to the sound. When you feel a sensation, bring your attention to the sensation. You notice anger, bring your attention to the sensations of anger in your body. So after about four or five days, she said, "Oh! I get it. They're saying when you hear a sound, bring your attention to the sound. Let me try that."

Which she did, because what aversion does is prevent you from actually meeting the sound that's triggering the aversion. We hate it. We pull back. We think somehow we can keep ourselves separate from this unpleasant experience. And we get lost in it instead. So when she brought her attention right to the sound, there was hearing. There was the sound. That was it. It was like a light bulb going off. She said, "Oh. There was no problem. The sound wasn't bothering my concentration. My mind was bothering my concentration. The sound is just a sound."

As Ajahn Chah used to say, the sound doesn't disturb us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound. The sound is just happening. The sound could be a sight. It could be somebody walking by. It could be an unpleasant physical experience. It could be the cold.

So the first way of meeting the aversion head-on is to bring our attention into the actual sensory experience, see what it actually is, as distinct from all the hoo-ha about it. And this can be amazingly powerful.

This is from Phil Jackson, the coach of the Chicago Bulls basketball team. He's a meditator:

"Little by little, with regular practice, you start to discriminate the basic sensory events from your reactions to them. Eventually, you can begin to experience a point of stillness within. As the stillness becomes more stable, more accessible, you tend to identify less with fleeting thoughts and feelings, such as fear, anger, or pain, and experience a state of inner harmony regardless of changing circumstances. For me, meditation is a tool that allows me to stay calm and centered—well, most of the time—during the stressful highs and lows of basketball and life outside the arena."

This is just to show you don't have to be passive. He continues: "During games, I often get agitated by bad calls. But years of meditation practice have taught me how to find that still point within so that I can argue passionately with the refs without being overwhelmed by anger."

It's possible. That's what's so great about being able to bring mindfulness to the actual experiences. We have, in that point, a moment of choice of how to respond—with both desire and aversion.

Without being driven, you see the state, you come to the actual sense experience, and there's a moment of trust. Yes, I think I will go get that, but it's not out of thirst. Yes, I will argue passionately with a ref, but I don't hate his guts. There's a difference.

So that's the skillful means when we even have a clue what the sensory experience is that's eliciting our aversive response. Often, though, it's way down the road and you have no idea what triggered it. You just know that there's really strong irritation, anger, or fear. At that point, the practice becomes recognizing and bringing our awareness into—using the body again—the state of anger, fear, or irritation itself. As distinct from all the thoughts and stories and past and future and "what if." Feel it, just as with desire. Bring your attention into your body. Let yourself burn with anger if that's what's happening. Let yourself feel the contractions, the palpitations, the heat. Use the noting as a way to keep your attention moving into the actual experience.

This is the middle way of our Buddhist practice. We're not suppressing—"Oh no, I shouldn't feel anger, I shouldn't feel desire, those are bad." We really let ourselves feel it, but with awareness. And we're not jumping on the train and letting it carry us—"Yeah, I am angry, and I have a right to be angry, and that person is really wrong." Maybe they are. At this moment, as far as practice goes, that's not the point. The point is to learn that we can be in the midst of anger, boredom, desire, and find that place of resting at ease that does not have to deny or fear the experience. It's wonderful to know that you don't have to be afraid of anger because you don't have to be driven by it.

It's not always neat and tidy here in the meditation. I've done plenty of what I call stomping meditation when I'm really angry. It's not "lifting, moving, placing... anger." It's not "in, out... anger." It's truly stomping—anger, anger! I'm so angry! I hate everything and everybody! Just let it move. But there's still mindfulness there. It's not that I'm going out and telling everybody why I hate them and what's wrong with them. I'm just letting myself be with the anger. And it shifts. It moves. You just see that it's strong energy. We don't have to suppress that energy. It can actually transform through the power of awareness and become available for our practice.

It's also nice to begin to experience the presence of aversion, judgment, irritation, frustration—rather than as a problem—as a signal. When I start to experience that as a signal: "Ah, what's going on right now that I'm actually trying not to acknowledge?" And the anger says that it's unpleasant, and what I'm trying not to acknowledge is for sure going to be unpleasant. But once I really meet it with awareness, there's this sense of relief. "Oh, okay. It's loneliness. It's this aching emptiness." But touching it with awareness, I can be here. Once again, I'm whole. I don't have to build up the structure of fear and avoidance in order not to feel something. That's actually much more exhausting.

So desire, sense desire, aversion in all its phases—recognizing, not being afraid of it, but coming into feeling it as it's manifesting here and now. Use your body to ground yourself rather than getting into the stories. Come into the sense experience that's eliciting the desire, that's eliciting the aversion. And again, you're present in that moment, just resting at ease in whatever's arising.

I talk the most about those two because they're much more than just states that arise early in a retreat. Desire and aversion—along with confusion, delusion, not knowing what's what—are really the underpinnings of our continuing to cycle in states of suffering. So they're really important to explore. And they're not going to just go away once you see them. Don't worry about that.

Make friends with them. Not like a friend of mine—oh, I should say this. This is from a friend from Massachusetts who likes to talk about this kind of, you could call it, deluded compassion. You know, "I should be nice to myself," or sort of massaging the defilements. That's not what I mean.

So when I say make friends with anger, it's not like, "Yeah, come on, let's just be angry whenever we want." Make friends in the sense that Thich Nhat Hanh talks about: sponsor your anger with mindfulness. It's really lovely. The important thing is to bring out awareness of your anger in order to sponsor it. Then the anger is no longer alone—it is with your mindfulness.

"Anger is like a closed flower in the morning. As the sun shines on the flower, the flower will bloom because the sunlight penetrates deeply into the flower. Mindfulness is like that. If you keep breathing and being mindful and sponsoring your anger, mindfulness particles will infiltrate your anger." You didn't know it was little particles, photons. "When sunshine penetrates a flower, the flower cannot resist. It has to open itself and show its heart to the sun. If you keep breathing in your anger, shining your compassion and understanding on it, your anger will soon crack and you will be able to look into its depths and see its roots."

And once we begin to see the roots of a particular anger, it shifts. It doesn't have power over us anymore, but we don't have to hate it and fear it. The power, the transformative power of mindfulness.

So just a word about the other three: sloth and torpor—sleepiness—and worry and restlessness, and doubt. The trick is working with skillful means. Skillful means is really a way of discovering what helps us bring a kind and balanced awareness to these states, not getting lost in them but also not hating them and trying to get rid of them.

With sleepiness, I find this particularly challenging and delicate because we have all kinds of ways to help us be more aware when sleepiness arises. Skillful means really comes from your intention. For example, as I said the other day, if you're really sleepy, stand up. If that comes from the intention to be as aware as possible and feel the state of sleepiness, fine. But the same action can come from the intention of, "I really hate this. It shows how bad I am. I better stand up and get rid of it." It looks the same, but you're really cultivating aversion. So skillful means is something we all play with—how to bring in the most skillful way to be present, not out of aversion, but out of a commitment to being awake.

Being awake sometimes means being awake to the experience of sleepiness. I personally have spent uncounted hours of my life working with being aware in the state of sleepiness. It's not easy, but it is possible. And I've actually come to have a deep knowing that it's worth it.

For years, every night on retreat at eight o'clock, I'd be just falling out of the chair, falling off the cushion, and the mind goes, "What is the use of this? This is totally stupid. If I would just go sleep, then I'd feel better." At some point there definitely is a point at night when you're really tired and need to go to sleep. But eight o'clock wasn't really it—that was a little early.

It took me years to see that actually, through that period, there would be moments of sleepiness and moments I could bring my attention there, that the mindfulness and the concentration and the equanimity were strengthening through that, that each day it was growing stronger. Even though in the sleepiness you don't get the goodies—you don't feel like it's so clear, it's not fulfilling—still those things are developing. So it's really important just to notice that, to be willing to at least open to exploring the state of sleepiness before you just check out.

Now, early in a retreat it's true that most of us come in from being busy. This is such a change that in the early days, for many people, there's a real physical and emotional exhaustion when a little extra sleep or an occasional nap really helps. You don't have to torment yourself.

But if I pay attention when I take the nap and when I wake up—if I wake up and I'm really feeling refreshed, present, alert, more balanced—then it was helpful. And suddenly there comes a day when I wake up from the nap and I'm actually feeling worse, more out of it, more spaced out. I realize, "Oh, I need more sleep." No, I don't need more sleep. I need less sleep. I was actually just sleeping out of fear rather than out of tiredness.

One thing on retreat: don't worry about "I better sleep now in case I'm sleepy later." What do you have to do later? Any time of day or night, we're not going to come looking for you. You can go take a nap. So it's really about paying attention to what's happening right now.

With sleepiness, one thing about it is we take it so personally. Gil was saying in his story last night—that was perfect. He's such a horrible yogi because he got up at two and was sleepy at four in the afternoon. And it's pathetic how long it takes us to say, "Oh yeah, duh, it's normal I would be sleepy now." It's taken me years to accept that my particular energy field runs low and the first three weeks of a retreat I'm going to have a lot of sloth and torpor. It's just how it is. This is for me—I'm lower than any of you, energetically. And then all of a sudden it goes. For you it's probably only two days. But the sleepiness isn't personal.

Sometimes it's actually an imbalance of energy. For some people, the sitting is very calming and concentrating—these are calming factors—while walking brings up energy. Sometimes people get the feeling that the sitting is really nice, really calm, they feel really present, really tuned into the breath, and suddenly they're asleep. They don't know how that happened because they were really concentrated. It's because there's an imbalance of concentration and energy. At that point, we would say, "I don't care how nice and calm your sitting is. Get up and walk." Because we need to balance the calming factors with energy. Walking, or using the noting a little more clearly—these take effort, but they bring energy.

Now, one thing about sloth and torpor: if you think you're not in sloth and torpor and the idea comes into your mind, "Maybe I could stand up, maybe I could note more vigorously," and your mind goes, "No, I don't need to do that"—our teacher Sayadaw U Pandita used to say sloth and torpor hates effort. So that's a sign. Something like, "I could stand up." "Nah, I don't need to do that. I'll just watch it." Stand up.

But you can get interested in the experience of sleepiness itself rather than hating it. That's another thing I've done. I spent years actually not nodding when I'm really sleepy because I was completely filled with the tension of trying not to be sleepy, of hating the sleepiness. This is tremendous suffering and completely unnecessary. It's just a state of body and mind that comes and goes. Recognize it. Bring your attention, maybe not to the breath, but to the sensations of sleepiness itself with awareness. And when that's not possible, open your eyes. Stand up. Do more walking. If you're having real sleepiness, do more walking than sitting for a while until the energy comes into balance.

But don't take it personally. Even sometimes later in a retreat, sleepiness comes up and you know you're not really tired. It can function as a kind of resistance to something that's about to emerge. But even then, don't take it personally, because we're not doing it on purpose. And you still treat the sleepiness in the same kind but attentive way.

The flip side of sleepiness—and what's so strange is sometimes you can be sleepy one minute and then restless the next—is restlessness and worry. Restlessness is the physical opposite of sleepiness: too much energy and not enough calm and concentration, where you just want to jump out of your skin, changing position every two seconds. And worry is the mental component of that.

cyclical thinking, over and over—what about this, and what about this, and what's going to happen—and then it starts over again. It's an extremely unpleasant state. Recognizing it rather than going down the road of trying to figure it out every time is very helpful.

With energetic restlessness, sometimes it's helpful to get really big with your attention. Rather than trying to focus in on little sensations—that's like taking all this big energy and trying to put it in a little box. It feels like it's going to explode. Let your awareness get bigger than the room, as big as the desert. In fact, walk out in the desert and let that be your awareness, and just let all the energy move in that big space. It's not such a problem. If you're sitting and it's unbearable, stand up again and let your awareness get really big.

With the worrying mind, sometimes the opposite helps. Just don't pay attention to those thoughts. They're there—don't try to make them go away. But really see if you can get interested in your breath, sometimes counting one to ten, and whenever you lose track, starting over again at one. You're not trying to get anywhere; it's just a way to corral the energy. What that does is raise the level of concentration and calm, which can then balance the energy. So that might be helpful. And again, recognizing, not taking it personally.

The last, and perhaps most interesting and elusive, is doubt. Now, doubt is obvious when it takes the form of: "What am I doing here? These guys up there don't know what they're talking about. This is the stupidest thing I ever did in my life." Or: "I can't do this. Everyone else is doing so great, and I am failing miserably." All those thoughts.

Doubt, though, almost always arises when we don't like what's happening. Let's just notice that. Have you ever felt doubt in the moments when you're taking a step and the world is beautiful and you're so present? Do you doubt at that moment? Not usually. Usually it arises with one or more of the other hindrances. And that's kind of the downside—they can come together. We don't always get them one at a time.

So doubt is obvious in those forms of thoughts: I can't do this, they can't do this, nobody can do this, the Buddha couldn't even do it. But another form of doubt that we sometimes don't recognize is analytical thinking. "Well, Gil said this, Carol said this, Jack said this—they're all a little different. Now I wonder if I tried this, would that be better? If I tried that? What about that Tibetan teaching? Let me really think, maybe I can figure out how this works and then I could apply it." And it seems like we're really thinking about practice in a useful way. But if you notice what's happening after a while, you haven't felt the breath, you haven't felt your body, it's been forty-five minutes and you're getting completely disconnected from experience. It feels like you're thinking about practice, but it's just spinning. This is also doubt, and this is a way we can get fooled.

I want to say also about doubt: it doesn't mean suspending our discriminating wisdom. Because the antidote to doubt is to just do it—connect your attention to something that's happening now. Sustained attention is the antidote to doubt. So when you're spinning in all these thoughts—"I can't do it, no, no, no"—just feel the breath. Just feel a sensation in your body. And then notice the next sensation. Notice the next breath. And pretty soon, as the attention continues to be sustained, the doubt is gone.

Now, I want to say that doesn't mean we don't have discriminating wisdom, because it's something we could get up here and say: "Just do it. Don't have any conflicting thoughts about it."

You've got to believe everything we say. You don't. As the Buddha says—and I think there was a quote on the first night that was so beautiful—he said, don't believe everything I say. Try it and see for yourself.

Now, the trick is we've got to try it. And thinking about it is not the same as trying it. So really bring your attention, connect, do the practice. And at the end of the retreat, yes, give yourself space to really evaluate. Notice how it affects your life. See if it's useful for you. See if it's appropriate for you. Don't just believe it—but you'll never know if you don't do it.

You might in the middle need to take a few moments to evaluate, but I can tell you that in the middle of a retreat, you really can't tell what's going on. Even in the middle of our own retreat, we can't tell what's going on, because you don't really have the whole picture. Each thing that's happening is looming so large that you can't really evaluate in the big picture. If you're really filled with doubt, come talk to one of us. We won't say "just do it." We'll let you talk about it. But the antidote is sustained attention. Try that, noticing you can evaluate later.

So these are the five: sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness and worry, doubt. Recognize them, bring kind attention, be willing to be in the midst of them without fear and without needing to jump on the train. And each one, really, in the moment that we can meet it that way, becomes in that moment the avenue to liberating understanding.

From Pema Chödrön: Without the hindrances, would the Buddha have awakened? Would he have attained enlightenment without them? Weren't they his best friends, since they showed him who he was and what was true? Meaning he wasn't them, and he had to really look at them to see that. All the hindrances point the way to being completely awake and alive by letting go. When we wake up, we can live fully without seeking pleasure and avoiding pain. We can let ourselves feel our emotions as hot or cold, vibrating or smooth, instead of using our emotions to keep ourselves ignorant and confused. We can give up on being perfect and instead experience each moment to its fullest.

And as Dōgen said, if you cannot find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?

CHAPTER 303

The Five Hindrances

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa) that commonly arise during meditation practice: sensual desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). She frames these challenging mental states not as obstacles to be fought, but as veils that temporarily obscure our innate clarity and peace—much like clouds passing before an ever-shining sun.

Drawing on teachings from the Dalai Lama, Thich Nhat Hanh, and Korean Zen master Chinul, Carol emphasizes that our original nature is "unstained, whole and complete in itself." She offers detailed practical instructions for working with each hindrance: recognizing and naming the experience without judgment, turning mindful attention to its physical and mental manifestations, and allowing it to arise and pass without suppression or indulgence. Through a personal example of working with fear, she demonstrates how direct, curious attention can transform difficulty into an avenue for clarity.

This talk provides both newcomers and experienced practitioners with essential tools for retreat practice and daily life. Carol's teaching reveals how the very presence of these "torments of the heart" can become catalysts for awakening—the ordinary pain of life being sufficient for enlightenment when met with wisdom and compassionate presence.

In the beginning of a retreat, as all students know and as new ones have surely discovered by now, there are several very strong, very familiar emotional energies that arise in our experience. Although they're impermanent, our experience doesn't always seem to indicate that—especially in the early days.

These five emotions or energies are what the Buddha called the five hindrances, and I want to talk about them tonight. I'll name them briefly and then put them in a larger context of our practice before speaking about each one specifically.

These five very powerful and very common energies can take over our experience, especially in the first days of a retreat. The first is the energy of wanting, of craving something. The flip side of that is aversion—anger, hatred, rage, or fear. The third one, which has been mentioned a lot already here, is sleepiness. The formal English name is sloth and torpor, which is just so perfect. The fourth energy is that of restlessness: physical restlessness and mental agitation or worry. And the fifth one, which usually comes along with any of the others, is doubt.

Before I go into them specifically, I'd like to talk about the larger context of why we are here. What's the purpose of meditation? And basically, why do we come and sit and walk in order, it seems, to experience the most unpleasant and difficult inner circumstances possible? What's the point?

The Dalai Lama said once, at a conference I attended, that it's crucial to investigate what the true nature of happiness is, what the true source of peace is, so that we can develop a peace that will last. Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. Peace must first be discovered within ourselves, and then gradually it will expand to include our family, our community, and the whole planet.

To me, that's the very real purpose of this practice of meditation: to discover the fact that peace is already here within ourselves, within our experience at the present moment. Peace is a manifestation of our true nature, from which we're never separated. But somehow, somewhere, we don't know how to recognize this. We seem to have lost touch with it. We don't know how to pay attention in the correct way to recognize what is true. We keep getting distracted, confused. We look in the wrong place, identify with the wrong things.

This is from Chinul, who was the person who brought Zen to Korea. He says: "It's tragic. People do not recognize that their own minds are the true Buddhas. They do not recognize that their own natures are the true Dharma. They want to search for the Dharma, yet they still look far away for holy ones. They want to search for the Buddha, yet they will not observe their own minds. I hope that you who cultivate the path will never search outside. The nature of the mind of the heart is unstained. It is originally whole and complete in itself."

That's us he's talking about—that the original state of our mind and heart is unstained, whole and complete in itself.

There are many different ways to talk about how we lose sight of this completeness, why we don't recognize our unstained nature and instead feel like we're in an ongoing struggle with sleep or anger or desire. One simile for how this happens—it's rather simplistic, but it helps me put my experience in perspective—is to think of our original, unstained nature as the sun, which all day, every day, also at night, is shining brightly.

Various clouds at various times come over. Sometimes they're really wispy and we sort of see through them; they're no problem. Sometimes they're really thick and dark and strong, and we get so affected by the clouds, so involved in reacting to them, that we completely forget the sun is still shining. Even if we don't see the sun directly, there's still the evidence of it in the fact that there's light, that we can see things. But for us, it's just this struggle. We like the clouds. We don't like the clouds. We wish they were different. We're scared they'll never go away. That becomes the limit of our experience, and we get lost in that struggle.

In a way, that's how I can relate to the experience of these five hindrances—these five particular emotions, these mental and physical experiences that arise for us frequently in our life and in our practice. Sogyal Rinpoche refers to them as emotional and intellectual veils that obscure the nature of mind.

And so I see, in a large way, our practice here, our practice of meditation, as cultivating a non-distractability of mind so that we can recognize and understand these veils, these clouds, for just what they are. We don't have to hide from them. We don't have to fear them or get lost in them. And at the same time, because we see them as they are, we also don't lose sight of the fact that the sun is still shining—that our pure nature hasn't gone anywhere.

And it doesn't mean the clouds have to go away.

The other thing that I really like about the way this process of investigation—of learning to see what's really true—works is that quite literally for me, the actual presence of one of these torments of the mind or disturbances of the heart (I like those better than "hindrances" actually; they don't have to be hindrances) becomes our avenue into clarity, into understanding. When one of them is present and there is the interest, the curiosity, and the non-distractability of mind to really see it for what it is, it actually becomes our gateway. Often the presence of one of these difficult states can be the catalyst, so to speak, for a moment of awakening, of seeing clearly what's true.

I'll give a very simple example of how this can work. It's not big lights going off—it's just very ordinary experience. The other night, as I was in bed, not yet asleep, for some reason fear just arose in my experience. And that's one of the things about these energies: they're not personal. They arise due to conditions, they last for some time, and they go away. Every single one of these goes away. It really doesn't last so long when you pay attention.

So fear arose as I was lying there, and it was a really great chance, on reflection afterwards, to observe both how we get lost in these experiences—how they cloud our perception of reality—and also how the ability to be fully present with it as it is opens up a whole other possibility.

At first there was this sensation of fear, and I got lost in it. When we're lost in these emotions, they cloud how we perceive our reality until it kind of fills up the whole screen. So I was lying there with this fear, which I was aware of, and there was a sound. I jumped and immediately said, "My God, a gunshot! I wonder what's going on." It went into this hole. I didn't stop and rationally think that there wouldn't be a gunshot. It was just—and watching the waves of fear—another sound: "Oh, an explosion! What's going on?" And there would be this other big wave of fear. That's one way that we get blinded and distort what we think is true: just completely going with that energy, that emotion, and it fills up the whole world. It distorts everything we perceive. It defines our reality.

The other way that we get equally enmeshed is by resisting or denying. I could have laid there—which wasn't the way I went that time; we usually do one or the other—and said, "It's ridiculous to be afraid. There's nothing to be afraid of." Which is also taking it very personally. Someone of your age, at night, with all these people around her—and it could go on and on about what are you doing being afraid, you're just a big sissy, or it's due to my conditioning, or this happened when I was a child. We get into a whole analysis of it, which I've done at other times, and we're also equally in the grip of it. It's just as much filling up the screen.

Both of these ways of reacting—really going for it or denying and pushing it away—keep us identified. And also, incidentally, they empower the emotion so that it really starts rolling along. This is how we usually deal, because it's very deeply conditioned in us. It's a deep force of habit to either resist and deny, take it personally, or get really lost in it. And that's how we suffer. That's how we're blinded.

Now this experience was kind of going back and forth, because after the sound —"Oh, it's a gunshot! What's going on?"—I again recognized fear. And as I'll describe as we go along, what we do is take our mindful attention and simply turn it on the experience of fear itself, without analyzing, without questioning, without judging it—simply being with fear. Feel it in the body, explore the thoughts that come, but come back and just be with the fear.

And it's so interesting: just being directly with the bare experience itself, without expectation, it suddenly opens up into a really clear space. And without looking, my mind goes, "Oh, that sound was just a cabinet slamming in the next bathroom." Suddenly the mind would clear up: "Oh, that was just the bath water running in the bathroom in that apartment behind me." In that space of directly being with the experience, clarity opens up by itself. It comes on its own. And it's so clear it's not personal.

There's one Indian teacher who describes it—and I think it's such a perfect description of how this distorts reality—"We miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination." It's kind of shocking how much this is what's going on.

In seeing things just as they are, in the willingness to simply be present in the midst of experience, a natural peace can emerge even though the experience might still be going on. For instance, the nature of fear is fearful.

I mean, fear is never going to feel happy. The nature of fear is fearful. But even in the midst of that, when there's a calm presence, there can be this opening into seeing that the picture is really much, much wider. Even though fears are rising, there's a huge space of emptiness and calmness around it or within it, however you might happen to experience it.

This is just a small example of how mindfulness—the power of the attitude of okayness and patience and curiosity that James spoke of last night—can transform what is a difficult or confusing experience into one that has the potential for opening us to reconnect with what is true.

I want to speak more specifically about each of these energies, mostly to help us recognize them. Which might sound silly—we all know these states all too well. But when we're in the middle of them, perhaps the most important piece that helps with not identifying, that helps with seeing what's true, is the simple recognition of what it is that's happening.

This first one, craving, this quality of wanting. It's not just a neutral need like knowing that you're hungry and needing to go eat. And it's not so much a desire that's skillful, that's associated with intentions such as compassion—for instance, the desire to save a sick bird, motivated simply out of compassion. We're talking here about real craving. And we experience it in our lives pretty continually. Whatever it is—a new car, a better job, the perfect place to live, the perfect relationship.

What's interesting is when we come on retreat, the same quality of craving, the same degree of energy can go into trying to find the perfect sitting position. The perfect chair or the perfect zafu. It can go into scouting through the whole desert to find the best walking place so that your walking period is really pristine and clear. And we can suffer enormously. It doesn't matter what the object is. It's this quality of obsessive craving.

Our tendency to get lost in this is so strong that usually what we do is project it out into the environment, into the object, so that we become completely absorbed in it. "If only the weather were different, everything would be okay." Well, the weather changed today. How long was everything okay? It just isn't where peace lies.

In our continuing to project the energy out and look to different objects to give us that peace, we just keep on going. Okay, now it's warm, but something else comes up. Perhaps it gets too warm, or perhaps the food wasn't right today, or perhaps you wish you'd brought some different kind of clothes. On and on and on. It's endless. This quality of craving is endless when we don't stop and look at the energy of desire itself.

It's really a kind of suffering because we feel so discontented, so much needing something that isn't here. And it's this constant looking outside for peace that keeps us from seeing that peace is right here all the time.

Craving is really a very key part of the Buddha's teaching. It's one of the linchpins of how our ignorance is perpetuated day to day. So I could talk on and on about this. I'm just introducing it very lightly here.

One yogi said at a retreat, commenting on the endless quality of craving—she got so fed up with just seeing it arise over and over—she said she decided she'd try and satisfy every craving that came up and see if that wore it out. She came in sheepishly a few days later and said, "Well, it only got worse. It didn't help at all."

When we are caught in it here, it might take us some time to recognize. But at some point, after we've gone through "if only I had this, if only I had that, if only this were different," suddenly—oh, this is desire. This is craving. This is a very key moment, this point of recognition, of being able to name what it is that's actually happening.

Craving is an actual experience in the moment. Being able to take the attention, the mindfulness, and turn it onto the craving itself—this is really the key tool of mindfulness, one of the key things we're learning how to cultivate here in this practice. It's really so for anything that's going on: learning how to give bare attention to the experience.

You're going desire after desire, and there's something subtly pleasant about desire when we're not paying attention. Notice how you can get into a food fantasy, say, and go on and on, and it feels really pleasant—much more pleasant than sitting here and being with the breath. But when you wake up and here you are again, what's the actual experience? Did that bring you ultimately more pleasure? Or does it make everything else more unsatisfactory?

So anyway, when you notice that desire is happening, naming is extremely helpful. Use this soft mental label: "desire, desire, desire," and keep on labeling very softly for as long as it's there. Most of the attention then being—you're not taking a sledgehammer and going, "DESIRE, DESIRE!" You're simply acknowledging in a very non-judgmental way that desire is what's present right now. That's all. There's no shame, there's no judgment. It's simply an arising energy. So it's very soft.

And then take your attention and explore the experience itself. For instance, there's a kind of quality of desire in the mind, the emotional quality. And then what I find for myself—by far the most helpful way to stay grounded in the actual experience of desire—is to turn the attention onto the physical manifestation of it. Explore: what does desire feel like? Sitting here, not thinking about what I want, not getting into the story, but turning around and feeling desire. When I feel this, I feel a kind of tightness, a constriction, a pressure, a heaviness, almost a kind of leaning forward. You can change the note at that time from "desire" to "heaviness," "constriction," "tightness," "burning." Very simple. Very direct experience. It's not complicated. Really with an air of curiosity: Well, what is desire? If it runs so much of my life, why can't I explore it and see what this thing is?

One thing you might discover—actually, I'm pretty sure you'll discover it—is that the actual state of desire itself is not so pleasant. This kind of yearning is physically unpleasant for me, this yearning for something else. It's rather unpleasant. And we begin to see why it is that we get so intent on achieving the object of the desire. Because what happens when we get that? Ah, peace. Everything's okay.

When you're noticing and being mindful of desire, just staying with it, staying with it, letting it do whatever it does without suppressing it but without feeding it by going and getting something—what do we find? Suddenly, at some point, without doing anything other than being with it, the desire goes away. And it might be ever so briefly, but notice the experience: when the desire is gone, it's just the same as if you'd gotten what you wanted. It's "ah, peace." The desire is not present.

It's kind of a clue that we see that what we're really desiring isn't so much whatever it is out there, because that can keep being replaced with something else. It's somehow the sense of completeness that we yearn for. The sense of peace. The sense of unity, of oneness. And that's already here. That's already here. Turning our attention onto the process of desire—it's really the process of desire that is one of the things that fools us. One of the things that keeps us looking away from what's already here and always true.

Part of why we cultivate attention to the breath is simply to develop enough focus and non-distractibility of mind and heart, of attention, to be able to stay with a more complicated and difficult experience like desire and see it for just what it is. It's really fascinating, the process. And it might sound complex, but we'll all have plenty of time to explore it and to see how it works and just what the experience of desire is for you. Don't take my word for it. Really look and see for yourself.

The second torment of the heart, or hindrance so to speak, is the flip side of desire. It runs a whole range. It stems from wanting to be separated from what is unpleasant, just as desire is wanting to come together with what we experience as pleasant. Aversion has a whole range from mild dislike, a kind of irritation or annoyance, to real anger, to uncontrollable rage. It also includes boredom, which is a sort of slight aversion to what's going on and an out-of-touchness with what's going on. And it also includes fear, which is a kind of retreating aversion—whereas anger is going outward, fear is pulling back.

When we begin to see how aversion manifests, or anger or fear, in our experience, it's pretty obvious that it's unpleasant. Anger especially is a kind of burning for me in the heart, and it leaves an impression, a sort of physical impression in my being, even long after it's passed on.

Again, when we're not noticing the presence of the energy of anger or fear or aversion itself, it tends—one moment of aversion tends to condition the next—so that it starts really spiraling in a way that it can get out of control, really just seems so huge. Or again, we can project it outwards onto our experience. Where what's really happening is just the arising of aversion in the mind, what we experience is that everything that comes into our awareness is disgusting and aversive.

And if we really think that's true, it leads to a lot of suffering.

I know one retreat I was on, I saw this very clearly. I was sitting in the dining room, and this is what's so tricky—I thought I was really calm and clear. And yet somehow everyone who walked by was sloppy or unmindful or making a lot of noise or wearing a stupid outfit or showing off their slow walking or something. And these were friends of mine. I knew all these people. It took ten or fifteen minutes of this before I saw, "Oh, I guess this is aversion."

At that point, the willingness to shift attention from what was wrong with everybody who came by to the experience of aversion itself—in some ways it's a huge relief just to know what's really going on. It isn't pleasant. Again, as with desire, the experience of anger and aversion in our own mental and physical process isn't pleasant. And it's easy to see why we tend to go with the outer projections of it. This is not to deny that things can happen that are really off, or that people do things that are genuinely harmful. But it's still important to know in ourselves what the experience of aversion is, what the experience of anger or fear is.

So again, it's the same—that ability to name is so powerful. It takes this experience of anger, fear, or aversion out of the realm of the magical, where it's kind of controlling everything. Like this fear I was in the other night—it could have seemed like a magical experience that turned the most mundane into the most horrific things. The naming of it as fear has a huge effect of helping us not identify with it and being in the actuality of the moment. And not take it so personally.

So when you're aware, whether it's just as anger, aversion, or fear is arising, or whether it's three days into it, it doesn't matter. The moment that you can name it is very important. And continue just naming: "This is aversion. Aversion. Anger. Anger. Anger." It doesn't matter how long. Most likely, if you're just present with it, it's not going to go on all day. It'll pass. It might come back again, but it'll pass. And it's really important to see that discontinuity—that also takes away a sense of power we can give to these states of mind.

As you're naming, turn the mindful attention onto the actual experience itself. It's very helpful to notice how it's manifesting in the body as well as in the mind. And this is a very delicate line that we're walking, a very delicate balance of not suppressing it —"I'm not angry. There's no aversion. There's no need to have aversion. Everything's fine." That doesn't help. And not really getting lost in it, indulging it, as I was when I was just blaming everybody that walked by and taking that to be true.

A very delicate line of allowing the full manifestation of the fear, the aversion, the anger in the body. "Anger. Tightness. Burning. Burning. Burning. Burning. Burning." It's okay if it's burning for fifteen minutes. It's unpleasant, but that's just what's happening. That's where we bring in the patience, the okayness, the equanimity. At some point, we start to see its true nature—that it does pass, and it isn't personal.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh on being with anger, this line of balance: "The Buddhist attitude is to take care of anger. We don't suppress it and we don't run away from it. We just breathe and hold our anger in our arms with utmost tenderness. Becoming angry at your anger only doubles it and makes you suffer more. But on the other hand, if you just leave it alone, it'll become destructive and run wild. You can say and do angry things. Or if you don't say or do angry things, it will continue to destroy you inwardly. So the Buddhist practice is to recognize your anger as anger."

I like that image—we recognize it, but the recognition is a holding it in our arms with care. We don't hate it either.

This is hard for us. It's not an easy thing to do, and we'll all get lost one way or the other many, many times. This is fine. This is how we learn. Please don't set up some ideal of perfection, thinking, "I notice anger the moment it comes up and then it's all clear."

It's not like that. It's a practice. But that image of recognizing anger and cradling it in your arms really helps give me a sense of the balance involved.

When we're exploring anger, fear, desire—any of these emotions in this way—what I find is that it begins to open up a huge space around them, so that we no longer need to fear their arising. I know there have been times when I've been sitting under a tree, living in dread that aversion is going to come back. It's so pleasant now that it's gone. But learning to simply be with these energies as they are can open up a vast space where we don't have to be so controlled by them. We don't have to fear their presence so much. Instead, they can become a signal for us to pay attention and wake up.

Without this capacity, these energies really do tend to control our experience, even in small ways. A friend of mine was telling me the other day that he'd been in a fast food restaurant and had a little interaction with the man in front of him—pretty mild, but the man clearly got very irritated at him. Later, as my friend walked out past one of those stations where you put in the ketchup and cream for your coffee, he passed at a distance. This man caught sight of him, and just the sight of my friend got him so upset that he spilled his coffee. Just so irritated. What's really going on there? If we have the ability at the time of that first irritation to simply be with the anger, we don't have to keep letting it be re-energized by every sight, every sound. It might be unpleasant, but it's workable.

Sloth and torpor is the third hindrance. I know a lot of you are quite familiar with this by now. It's the falling asleep syndrome, whether you're on the zafu or walking. It's also a kind of dreamy, hypnagogic state that you can slip into—sometimes very pleasant and seductive. Often it's much easier to dream your way through the sitting, or it can even feel like a sort of clear space, much more pleasant than coming back to the breath or the body. One of our teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, describes sloth and torpor as being like congealed butter—the mind is like congealed butter, with no flexibility whatsoever. Someone said today that the experience of trying to practice with sloth and torpor is like walking through mud.

Again, recognizing its presence is the first important step. The second one that has been most helpful for me is not taking it personally. It took me years and years not to take sloth and torpor personally—as if it was somehow a sign of deep personal failing that sleepiness arose in meditation and the mind wasn't crystal clear. Saying it aloud, it sounds crazy, but I know from talking to people that I'm not the only one. I know practitioners who've gone through literally weeks of deep inner torment during a three-month course because sleepiness was arising.

So it's really interesting to look at how much we get caught by our reactions to a particular energy. What is sloth and torpor? It's an imbalance of energy. The energy we have is always going to fluctuate. We come into a retreat having been really buzzy, really tired—what do we expect? That we're going to sit down and be incredibly crystal clear? Everything is a result of conditions. Nothing exists on its own. And the conditions of most of our lives mean that in the first few days of retreat, it's almost inevitable that at some point the body is going to be really tired or the mind really sluggish. Once in a while that doesn't happen, but it's a common experience, and it's not personal.

At other times in retreat, this sleepiness or dullness of mind arises because there's an imbalance between concentration and energy. It's possible to be really concentrated, but if there's not enough energy in your system, you think you're concentrated—and you are—but the next thing you know, you're waking up, and you don't know how that happened. So it's not personal when you start to see that it's simply the way different mental factors come together in our experience.

Sometimes a real dullness or sleepiness of mind will also come about as a sort of unconscious resistance to some difficult experience that's about to surface. You can't do much about that. You don't know what it is, and you can't make it hurry along. That's not helpful.

In all of these cases, the only obvious thing to do is recognize it: "Oh yes, sleepiness, dullness." Name it with kindness, without judgment, with affection—simply noticing its presence. Then, as skillful means, there are different ways we can bring up the energy, balance the system. These methods won't always make us more alert. And if we're using skillful means but with a motivation of aversion—"I hate this sleepiness, so I'm going to really note it until it goes away"—well, once in a while that might work, because anger and aversion are actually quite energizing.

But you've just moved then from sloth and torpor to aversion, and some people actually prefer that one. We all have our favorites.

But if you can just notice the tone with which you're labeling, you can pretty soon catch on if that's your motivation. And then, as a skillful means without aversion, you can really begin to note and label and explore the experience of sleepiness itself, or dullness itself. It can actually get really interesting. How do you know that you're sleepy? What are the physical sensations of sleepiness? Try to be really accurate in labeling it and in noticing it, because that takes a little energy to do. And instead of using up your last vestiges of energy by doing it, what actually happens is it brings on more energy.

But again, Sayadaw U Pandita says that sloth and torpor hates effort. You know, the mind says, "No, if I really note this it'll just make me so much more tired." It's not like that. So when you notice you're sleepy, if you really investigate—what is it? Is this kind of heaviness? Heaviness, heaviness. You notice a kind of grittiness in the eyes maybe. Grittiness, grittiness. Dropping. Nodding, nodding. And then when you can't note anymore, you know that the mindfulness has slipped away again. That's okay. So when you wake up, even if you're only awake for two minutes of that sitting, that's still two minutes of presence. That's better than if you were sleeping the whole time. You have to kind of look at the positive side. You can tell I've spent a lot of time in sloth and torpor.

I'm being a bit silly, but actually this real investigation at times brings a real energy into the mind. The mind kind of opens up and the energy comes back. It's really quite amazing, because one of our problems with these states is that we think they're going to last forever. When you're in sloth and torpor, if you knew it was going to go away in fifteen minutes, you wouldn't really be so upset. But somehow if you look at what's the assumption underneath the aversion, the assumption is usually, "This is how I'm going to spend the rest of my life"—or at least the rest of this retreat, or even just the rest of this sitting. How about just taking things moment to moment? In this moment, exploring the actual experience of tiredness, of sleepiness—it's not so bad. It might be a little unpleasant but it's kind of interesting, just seeing it for what it is.

Now, I know that there are times when this is way beyond the pale, and the ability to even make a label of sleepiness is not there because it's way too far gone. Again, without aversion to it but simply as a way to balance the energy, all the things we've mentioned before can help. You can focus a little bit on your posture—just sit erect, not in a forced way, as someone else said today, but more subtly, feeling your spine, tuning in inside. You can open the eyes, focus them down, not looking around. I've found that light, bringing in light, somehow energizes the system. Standing up can help. Something that the Buddha spoke of in one of his discourses, although it hasn't worked for me, is pinching your earlobes. But if the Buddha said it, it must work for some people. If I'm having a long wave of real dullness, I might tend to walk longer because it's often easier to be present in the walking.

And again, noticing how and when this state of dullness and sloth and torpor dissipates. Because it will. There's no way it's going to last forever. Often we don't notice the endings of things, or we forget, and like six hours later we remember, "Oh yeah, I was so sleepy this morning. I wonder what happened to that." So simply noticing that things end also helps us experience the fact that it's not ourselves, that it's really quite an impersonal energy.

The flip side of this is restlessness in the body—that you just can't sit still, you just want to jump out of your skin and run screaming out of the hall. Or the corollary in the mind: a spinning, circling kind of thinking that's clearly not going anywhere, but the mind is just running at the speed of light. You can't really focus on anything, can't really settle on anything. It's the most uncomfortable experience.

And again, to recognize it for what it is. It doesn't make it go away. It doesn't make it more pleasant. But it really helps us to just be with what is. In the physical realm, you might notice you're changing posture, changing posture—this is wrong and that is wrong. Suddenly to notice, "Oh, this is restlessness." What it does is really widen the frame. So instead of focusing on this particular little pain, that particular little nudge, and this particular discomfort, there's a whole wide sky of consciousness, and within it is all the experience of restlessness—coming and going, coming and going, coming and going.

If you really widen—it's almost, you can imagine doing this—widening your consciousness so that it's as wide as the sky. Within that, the restlessness can arise and pass, arise and pass. It's uncomfortable, but it can come and go. If you try to really focus down physically, you find it can increase the restlessness. Just as you find if you move and keep moving when you're restless, what happens is you get more restless. You think, "If I don't move this leg, I'm going to die." But once you move this leg, then suddenly you have to move that toe, and suddenly you have to move your shoulder, and it just kind of escalates. So sometimes just play with it. This is for physical restlessness—widening the scope and just letting it all come and go. As Jack likes to say, you know, die of restlessness. Be the first person to die of it and just see what happens. Chances are you won't die.

Now for mental agitation, this just spinning, spinning, spinning of mind—sometimes it's very helpful to simplify. Don't try and follow every thought and note every thought and get to the root of things. You're just exacerbating the restless energy of mind. It can be very helpful to simplify. Just go back to the breath. I know all these thoughts are running around. We know they're there. Just let them run around. Go back to the breath, sometimes even counting the breath, just from one to ten, one to ten. Get very simple. This can sort of calm us down enough to be there, at least to know that that's what's going on.

Again, restlessness is another imbalance of energy. It's like way, way a lot of energy and not enough balanced with concentration and calm. This coming back to the breath, and just being simple, just counting one to ten, is bringing in focus, one-pointedness of mind, and this can help to balance this out-of-balance energy.

And the last one, a very interesting quality of mind, is that of doubt. Doubt can be experienced usually as thinking, and it often arises from too much thinking, and it leads to more thinking, and so it just escalates itself endlessly. Usually it's not that hard to recognize. We often get so caught up in the analyzing that we forget to recognize it. And it manifests just very simply as: "I can't do this. It's impossible. This is the stupidest thing. This is the wrong time. This is the wrong meditation. These are the wrong people. My back hurts too much. The weather's bad. It's just impossible." Just like that. So it's self-doubt, doubt in the meditation, doubt in whatever.

What's so insidious about doubt is that when it's present and we're caught in it, when we don't recognize it, it makes it impossible for us to actually wholeheartedly pay attention to what's happening right now. Because it just starts escalating. We don't believe in the efficacy of that. So we start trying to figure out, "Well, gee, maybe this is the wrong time. Maybe it would be better if I came next year. And it's the wrong time because I was sick two weeks ago and my energy's kind of low. Or maybe it's not. I don't know. How would I know that?" And you just start going on and on. Meanwhile, any sense of mindfulness or presence is out the window. It's very tricky.

Doubt, you'll also notice, tends to arise almost always when any one of the other hindrances is present in a strong way. So we get lost in aversion. We're having a lot of aversion, a lot of sleepiness. Almost always: "Oh, it's too much sleepiness. I can't do this. I should go home. I should never have come."

And then we're into what we call a "multiple hindrance attack." And that's usually how they come—it's rarely just one.

So with doubt, it's very important to recognize it, to name it as doubt, and to continue naming it and not get caught or sucked off into the content. And mind you, the content will be very enticing. It'll really be quite seductive.

I think one of the reasons that it can be so seductive is because noticing doubt and naming doubt and not giving into it as a hindrance is not the same thing as having to accept everything on blind faith. We are a very skeptical culture, and most of us are so taught that we're going to come to understanding through reasoning. I know for me this is very deeply engrained in an unconscious way. And so to be able to wholeheartedly say, "This is just doubt, doubt, doubt," and not somewhere get seduced into the "yeah, but"—it goes against so much of my conditioning that it's easy to get caught up.

I do want to say that recognizing doubt, continuing to note it, not getting sucked into the content is important. And it doesn't mean that you're giving up your own initiative. It doesn't mean that you have to accept everything we say, or the Buddha said, or anyone says on blind faith. One of the basic teachings of the Buddha was: don't believe anything just because I say it, or just because you hear it, but try it and see for yourself if it leads you to less suffering, if it leads you to peace.

So that's very important. But again, he said, "Try it and see for yourself." If we're spinning in analyzing, we'll never have the chance to try it. So when I'm really hooked on a particularly seductive doubt in retreat, I'll acknowledge it and say, "Okay, not now. At the end of this retreat there'll be plenty of time for reflection and for seeing how this is affecting my life." It certainly is not putting aside our own understanding. But if every time something's difficult we get caught up in analyzing it, it's just going to be tremendous suffering, and we'll never be able to simply see what's going on now.

The antidote to doubt in meditation is sustained attention. Because when doubt is going, you just can't focus. So keep on noting: doubt, doubt, doubt, doubt. And then really connect with something that's happening—your breath, a sensation in the body, another emotion, whatever else is arising next. Really notice it. Connect with it. And you might find you forgot that doubt was going on.

So these are these five energies. I know it's a lot, talking about them all like this, but the way of working with them all—aside from a few little tricks for each one—is basically this naming, this affectionate curiosity, just exploring the actual experience of it. And they really do lead us into an opening that helps us see what's true.

Mindfulness is a huge ally in this. Thich Nhat Hanh likes to talk about how a rose becomes garbage when you throw it away, but then we use the garbage to make compost and that turns into another rose. And how can you separate any of it out? I really feel in just this way, any of these energies can become a vehicle in that moment for our greater understanding, can become a vehicle for awakening to what is true—when we can name them, explore them, have some balance of equanimity with them, and let them come and go and open into what's really happening right now.

Often they'll be overwhelming. We'll get really lost and the mindfulness is not there. This is okay. These are strong habits of our mind. But more and more often you'll find that it's not so. You'll be in the middle of some kind of mental rampage of restlessness, and suddenly out of nowhere: "Oh, restlessness!" And there's a sense of just releasing—these physical sensations, mental reactions, emotional overtone, coming and going—and it changes.

Even within that, there can be the realization that this is not who we are. That there's something much vaster and always present that is not in the least bit affected, that actually is not even separate from the restlessness. We don't have to hate it so much.

I really feel like it's not a mistake that these energies come up so strongly in the beginning of practice. Because if they didn't come up, if we just came and sat in bliss the whole time—well, if it stayed like that for the rest of our life, that would be okay. Since most likely it doesn't, or won't, then the fact that these difficult energies come up is really a gift. Because how else are we going to be able to discover what they really are and that it's not who we are? How else can we discover how we get blinded by desire, by aversion, by restlessness or doubt or sleepiness? How do we get so caught in them that we get so busy fighting them that we forget that peace is accessible right now? That the sun is always shining in our heart, and that we can contact that, that we can recognize that more and more when we don't have to fear difficult or unpleasant experiences that are arising.

I'd like to close by reading my favorite quotation from Ajahn Sumedho about working with these hindrances:

In life, wisdom arises within us when we understand the things we are experiencing here and now. You don't have to do anything special. You don't have to experience all kinds of extreme pain in order to transcend pain. The pain of your ordinary life is enough to be enlightened with.

So let's just sit together for a couple of minutes. Whatever is arising right now in your experience can be the gateway to truth—if we can simply trust that enough.

CHAPTER 304

In The Seen, There Is Only The Seen

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson guides practitioners through the fourth foundation of mindfulness—the contemplation of mental phenomena—with particular attention to how thoughts construct our sense of self and reality. Drawing on the Buddha's concise instruction to Bāhiya in the Udāna, "In the seen, there is only the seen," she illuminates how we habitually add layers of interpretation, memory, and projection onto bare sensory experience, creating suffering through our attachment to these mental constructions.

Wilson introduces the Pāli concept of papañca—the proliferation of mental projections that distort our basic perception when filtered through craving, aversion, or delusion. She offers vivid examples from her own experience, including misperceiving a lichen-covered rock as a circus tent and seeing a nurse as demonic through the veil of fear. The talk explores how attachment to views and opinions, which the Buddha identified as a major cause of suffering, freezes our experience and blocks the freshness of each moment.

Practically, Wilson encourages meditators to notice how thoughts continuously construct an identity story throughout the day, and to recognize that these self-descriptions are constantly changing rather than solid. She suggests that when suffering arises in meditation, we can ask: "What view am I holding?" The talk concludes with the liberating possibility that releasing our grip on mental constructions doesn't lead to nihilistic emptiness, but opens us to our fundamental interconnectedness and the natural arising of compassion and love.

I'd like to wish you all a happy Easter Sunday, this day of death and transformation, which is a wonderful thing to be aware of—not just on a retreat, of course, but any time in our life. To be aware of the fact that really every moment of our life is a moment of death and transformation. And that's not a scary or a sad thing. It's actually an incredible gift of being able to surrender into the newness of each moment, into the unknowability of what's going to happen next. And the only way that can happen is if we're willing to let go of whatever ideas and perceptions and concepts we've constructed about the meaning of this moment. That's not so easy.

What I want to speak about tonight is just that. We're slowly working our way in these talks through the four foundations of mindfulness. Ana spoke about awareness of aspects of the body, which is the first foundation. Jack spoke about mindfulness of feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—which is the second, and of emotions, states of mind and heart, which is the third. Tonight I want to speak in part about the fourth foundation, which is more contents of mind, or our old friend and sometimes foe: thoughts, the process of thinking, which is really such an amazing, fantastic tool, isn't it, thought? And at the same time, when it's not a tool, when it's in charge, it's a horrific master. It's just torment. And it all comes down to our being able to bring wise attention to the experience of thought itself.

Once we understand thought as a thought, it's really no problem. So how come we're so tormented by our thought processes? Just talking to people in the last couple of days—it's not just our thought processes that torment us, but they can really do a good job of catching us up.

Beginning by just looking at thought itself: in the meditation that Jack led this morning, that sense of the vastness of mind, as vast as the sky, things, sensations, sounds, thoughts arising and passing—did you have a moment where there was just a thought coming and going like a cloud, just empty, transparent nature, nothing to it? What's the problem?

Well, all thoughts are just that transparent. There is no thought that is anything more than a thought. They're like nothing, like that rainbow the other day. Beautiful, incredible, we've got all our reactions, and it's just ephemeral. It comes with conditions, the conditions go away, and it's gone. Thought is just the same.

So how do we get at times so completely caught up in this? Mark Epstein's book, the title of it, is Thoughts Without a Thinker. That's all you need to know. The thoughts aren't the problem; it's the thinker that we construct out of thoughts that seems to make it a problem.

How can we relate to thoughts with wisdom, from wisdom, rather than making our meditation into some kind of goal where the fewer thoughts we have, the better, or thinking we have to change the kind of thoughts we have? Or don't you have those certain thoughts that you're really afraid to have come up? It's like, "Oh no, anything rather than that thought. I can't bear the road it's going to take me down." But it's not the thought. It's all the constructions around it.

This is another really important thing, if you can really believe it: just because a thought arises frequently and together with a lot of emotion or force doesn't make it more true. It doesn't make it more accurate. It just makes it more forceful. There's more of a tendency to identify with it. The thought is me, or it's about me, or it says something about me, or I have to own it. And that's where the suffering comes.

Back to this thoughts without a thinker. One of our colleagues, Joseph Goldstein, has a great line, which if you really could apply it, you'd see that it's not the thoughts. He said: take a sitting and imagine that every thought that arises in your mind comes from the person behind you. It really changes it, doesn't it? "My, what a sicko that person is!" But since it's them and not me, it's really not a problem. If you can relate to your thoughts in that way, you're back in space.

When there's the space, when the thought's just a bird flying through the sky, fine. Then you're really recognizing the nature of thought, and then there's no problem. Thought arises like sounds arise, no problem.

Of course, the rest of the time when it is a problem—that's what I want to talk about now for the rest of the talk. If you can hang out in open sky mind, do so, please. You don't need to get into all this deconstructing where we get caught in thought. But for the times that we are caught, I'm going to talk about some helpful ways to bring in our awareness that might help to deconstruct where we're caught.

Hopefully this won't be thought-provoking, but will be a guide for how to pay attention to what's really happening as opposed to what we think is happening. Sometimes those two things are worlds apart—what we think is happening and what's really happening. Our practice is to recognize what's really happening.

One place that these two things, what's really happening and what we think is happening, begin to diverge is at the point of basic perception.

So I'll explain what we mean by that in Buddhist psychology. We've talked about—Annas especially has discussed—the five sense experiences and the sixth sense experience, which is the mind. There's seeing, tasting, smelling, feeling, sensing, hearing. And the sixth sense door is the mind, so thoughts and emotions.

These basic sense experiences—a sight, a smell, a taste, a thought, an emotion, a sound—that's all that's happening, over and over, in all different orders. That's all that's happening. And in a moment of its arising, say a sound, what we call perception is that first recognition: "Oh, that's a bird call," or "That's a car." It doesn't even have to be in words, but it's that perceptive recognition. It's based somewhat on memory, so of course it comes out of our past experience. For instance, sometimes there will be a sound and you hear it, but you don't know what it is. There's that moment of no recognition. Perception hasn't come in yet.

Now, what often happens at this point of perception is that we actually recognize incorrectly. There's a sound and we don't know what it is. Well, we don't like to not know what it is, so we just make something up. And we don't necessarily know we're making it up. This is really a function of delusion operating in that moment.

I'll give an example. A few years ago, Franz and I were walking in the woods in Switzerland. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw a big yellow and white thing. Immediately my mind said, "Oh, that's a yellow and white striped circus tent." I said to Franz, "That's odd, a circus tent here in the woods." He looked at me like I was out of my mind. Because it wasn't a circus tent. I had just taken in some visual perception without really turning and meeting the experience, and my mind put together "circus tent." When I turned and looked, it was a big rock with some streaked lichen, some yellow and some white. It didn't bear any resemblance to a circus tent as soon as I actually looked at it.

That's an easy misperception to correct. You just turn and really look. I had Franz there to say, "Are you nuts?" which made me turn and really look. But a lot of the time we don't realize that we're doing that.

There's the classic Buddhist story about walking in the forest at twilight and seeing something hanging down. Immediately the mind goes, "Snake!" You've heard all the stories about people being bitten by snakes in Thailand if they walk out at night without their flashlight. You know there are poisonous snakes. Fear arises, a sense of vulnerability and unsafety. We react both with thoughts constructing the story and with the appropriate emotions—all our memory, all our history in relationship to snakes, everything we've seen or ever had to do with snakes. Until someone comes along with a flashlight and you see it's a vine. "Oh, okay, excuse me," and all that vanishes. But until we know, we are basing our whole perception of reality on that one basic misperception.

So this happens when there's ignorance and we don't have all the information. It also happens when our perception, the way we're meeting experience, is veiled by a state of mind—specifically our friends craving, aversion, and self-identification. Comparing is a form of that.

There's a great word for this in the Pali language: papañca. I love the definition in the commentaries. It means that the projection of the mental state distorts our basic perception so we don't see what's really happening.

For example, once I was in the hospital, very sick, in a lot of pain. A nurse came and woke me up at five in the morning to weigh me. I had to get out of bed so she could weigh me. Very important. I'd been there two days—what, had I lost twenty pounds? I was actually seeing her visually through the mental state of fear.

I visually saw her as sort of demonic, and I reacted—the poor lady—I reacted in that way through the veil of fear and aversion, seeing this really distorted-looking woman. I just lashed out at her.

The next day, five in the morning, the same lady was on the same rotation. She comes to wake me up. But I didn't have that veil of fear and aversion, and I just saw a very nice-looking, somewhat nervous woman kindly waking me up. I was seeing clearly then.

So it's at this level where, when we're not aware of the mental state, it completely distorts our reality and we don't know it. This papañca—the projection of the mental state distorting our perception—is further fueled by the resultant emotions, the thoughts, the descriptions, the reactions. It just takes hold and runs. In fact, they say these are "the notions that assail and overwhelm a person." Or as the commentary says, papañca is "the tendency of the imagination to break loose and run riot."

Can you relate? That's what's going on half the time. And we wonder why we feel a little out of sync with things, why we're a little out of sync with ourselves—because we're way down the road from the basic perception.

This distortion can happen through fear, and it can happen through craving. Like that incredible story the other night about the man with the weather balloons. He didn't just recognize a pleasant thought; with his view distorted by craving, he really got out there, way down the road.

You can see this phenomenon we often talk about in retreats: either vipassana romance or vipassana vendetta. The mind becomes veiled with craving, with desire, or with hatred, vitriolic judgment and hatred. With romance, you'll see at the end this person who will "stay nice forever"—the most incredible person. Everything they do is just so right on. You can't believe such a specimen of humanity has landed here, right here, sitting next to you. It's unbelievable! And if you met the person two months from now in Safeway, your mind would kind of go, "Yeah, they look nice enough, but what was that about?"

There's a Tibetan saying that craving puts feathers on the object. It decorates it up.

So these are very simple ways of understanding what we call papañca. The actual perception is not accurate. We don't recognize that because we're not even paying attention at the level of perception. And we are off and running.

That's one of the ways our constructions of thought operate—because what happens out of papañca is we construct a whole world of description and thought and knowledge: who we are, who you are, what the world is like, all based on our perceptions. And this can lead into forming what we call views and opinions.

Any sense of recognizing any views or opinions arising in your experience in the last couple days? No, none at all? Sure.

These views are based on our perception. And once we've formulated a view, it's fine if you notice it—just like any thought, it's fine, no problem. But when we don't notice it, attachment to views becomes one of the big areas the Buddha spoke about as a cause of our suffering.

When he talked about attachment or craving, he talked about sense desire, which we've spoken of a lot as a big area of attachment. The second one he talked about is attachment to views and opinions as being absolutely suffering-inducing and confusion-inducing.

What we do is construct a view, a description, that explains things based on our perception. And once we're attached to that view, it's as if all of our mindful awareness is shut down. We don't even let in perceptions that counteract the view. We don't even notice them. And should you happen upon someone whose view is different, it can really lead to conflict.

The example Jack gave last night: the experiment where they put their hands into hot and cold water, and then put them into warm water. Well, imagine if that were two different people. They put their hands into the same bucket, and one says, "No, it's really hot." The other says, "No, it's really cold." And they're both absolutely convinced, due to their experience, that that's how it is.

Now, you could notice that's a view based on conditions and say, "Oh, that's interesting. You feel it as hot, I feel it as cold. That's interesting." How many of us can do that? How many of us didn't argue?

You're kind of weird. I am freezing in this bucket. This is attachment to views—when we don't realize it, it brings us into great conflict with other people, with ourselves, with our own experience. It's one of the ways that thought gets frozen into a construction that causes suffering. And it's easy not to notice until you actually notice the view.

A really good place to explore view is in work meditation, particularly if you have a job where three or four of you are doing the same task. A few people have mentioned to me noticing that clearly there's a best way to do it—and it's theirs. Luckily we ask you not to talk, because it can really come to blows.

You know the story of the two foreign monks in Burma? One was really hot and kept turning on the overhead fan, and the other found it noisy and distracting and kept turning it off. They actually did come to blows over this fan. They both got kicked out of the monastery.

So look in your work meditation. We can still prefer our own opinions—we're not saying we can't tell what our opinion is. Of course it's better if you line the things up like this, and you wash this first, and you dry it in this order, and you do the dirtiest things last because it gets the water dirtier, and anybody could tell that's how it's supposed to be. We can notice that without attaching to it as the only accurate description of the world, the only possibility.

Work meditation is a wonderful place to see if, as Pema Chödrön says, you can even let in the possibility that maybe this is just an opinion. It's not so easy.

I think I'll read what she writes: "When you are in meditation, you could begin to notice your opinions just as you notice thinking. This is an extremely helpful practice because we have a lot of opinions and we tend to take them as truth. But actually, they're just our opinions. Opinions are opinions, nothing more or less. We notice them, we can label them as opinions, just as we label thoughts. By this simple exercise, we are introduced to the notion of egolessness. All ego really is, is our opinions, which we take to be solid, real, and the absolute truth about how things are. Even to have a few seconds of doubt about the solidity and absolute truth of our own opinions, even just to begin to see that we do in fact have opinions, begins to introduce us to the possibility of selflessness, of egolessness."

Now, we often actually don't like the possibility of being introduced to the notion of egolessness. We like our opinions because they're so obviously correct. It's really hard to make that space.

Here's an example from IMS: the power of our opinions about healthy food. This can be a big one. Take the notion that white sugar is not healthy—a lot of people might agree with that. We have a retreat at IMS in Barre every summer for young adults, young people between twelve and eighteen. One year, there were two or three kids from the inner city eating a diet very much like what we serve here—not much sweets, no white sugar or refined food at all. These kids were basically used to eating fast food and junk food. And it wasn't just a preference; they actually physically began to be ill, like withdrawing off of something, because there was no grease and no white sugar. The body can't just adjust like that.

So the teachers—I wasn't one of them—went to the cooks and said, "Look, you've got to put out some sugar for these kids." But the particular cooks at that time were so into their healthy food that they just couldn't do it. They finally prevailed on them to give the kids a little secret stash of white sugar, but they had to hide it. I thought, you know, that must have been so weird for these kids.

But this sense of not being able to expand beyond our view is a way that we use thought to freeze the world. And we don't just do it in things like food. A great way you can begin to explore views, attachment to views, and the way it freezes and solidifies experience and creates suffering is to notice what opinions may have arisen about what good meditation is in the days you've been here. Or if you're leaving, or even if you're not, as you approach the middle or the end, there might be some slight view arising as to what was supposed to happen and didn't—and how you feel about that.

It's really helpful to notice a view and notice how, when we're attached to it, we almost deny the perceptions that counteract it. And nowhere is it so obvious as in a group of people like this with opinions about what good meditation is. The questions in the morning in the hall—isn't that a great place to find out what your views are and how they get triggered? You hear someone crying, having a lot of emotion, and you're cool as a cucumber, and the view could go either way.

My God, what's the matter with me? You know, Ajahn Chah says, if you haven't really cried, you haven't really meditated. That is a line guaranteed to send about half the people through the roof and the other half to say, "Wow, I'm really doing great." It's a view either way. Sometimes you cry, sometimes you don't. One isn't better than the other. It's all about just being present for what's actually happening, free of the interpretations we put on top of it.

So you'll hear someone say it's better to just be with the breath, and anything else that comes up is a distraction. The more you're with the breath, the better you're doing. And the next person will say, "I'm not doing well because I'm hardly with the breath. There's thinking and emotions and sensations and sounds, and I'm noticing it all really clearly, but I should be with the breath."

There was a woman once at a retreat a few years ago who came about the fifth day and said she had been in absolute agony—not physical agony, though it was hurting because sitting cross-legged was really painful for her—but absolute despair because she couldn't do the practice, because she couldn't sit cross-legged. About the fifth day, she looked up at me and said, "Oh, Carol's sitting in a chair. Maybe you can do the practice and sit in a chair." Five days to let in a perception. And she's not unusual. That's just one particular story. I've known times when people go for years and suddenly say, "Oh! You mean just being with whatever's arising is okay? It's okay to feel anxiety? It's okay not to feel anxiety? It's okay to just be with the walking? It's okay to be with the breath? It's okay not to be with the breath? You mean it's okay that it changes?" Whatever. It's fascinating.

And you don't have to listen to anyone else, because what I notice for myself is that as soon as I have one particular experience—a good experience, and a good experience usually means you like it, right? Have you ever come out of a sitting that was really unpleasant and said, "Wow, that was really a good meditation"? Probably not. Do you detect a little bias? There might be some bias going on in the way you evaluate meditation.

What's good practice? Notice how something happens that's completely unexpected—some strong energy movement, for example. It never happened before. You don't know what's going to happen, so you're really there. You're present. There's no expectation. There's no view or opinion. It's like, wow. And the next sitting, can you bring that beginner's mind? It's hard. The first twitch, and you're like, "Ah, here it goes again. Last time it was like this, this is what's going to happen." Or there's no twitch, and it's like, "Oh no, now this is really boring. Where's the juice? Where's the movement?"

That our mind does this is fine. It's no problem. It's just what it does. If we're aware of it, then it's just thoughts—it's funny. If we're not aware of it, we've solidified our experience. There's no freshness. There's no beginner's mind. And guess who's suffering?

That's a sign. When I'm suffering in meditation, one thing I do is ask, "What's happening now?" Often it's because I'm just not letting myself be with what's happening now. Or, if I see I'm really feeling what's happening but I'm still suffering, I back up and see: What's the view I'm holding to? What do I think should be happening? That's a real way in to see the view you're holding.

So, looking in your meditation, notice how thoughts coagulate experience into view and freeze it. And even though it's suffering, our tendency is to keep doing it because overall, we don't like shaky ground. Without a view, an opinion, a description that explains everything, we feel unmoored. We think, "Okay, now I know what that's about. Now I know what meditation is like. Now I know what sadness feels like. Now I know how to work with pain. Now I know what impermanence is like."

So often people come after sitting for years, and I say the same thing to myself: "This is coming up again? I dealt with this in my last retreat. I dealt with this in therapy. What's it doing coming up again? I had it all figured out." It doesn't work that way. But it's almost as if we want to freeze experience because even if it's a suffering description, at least I'm familiar with it. I know where I stand. And I'd rather have concrete tight around my ankles and feet than to be able to dance in the mystery of constantly arising and passing experience, of never knowing what's going to arise next. We find it comfortable, but really it's not, if we really look.

Our whole practice is about actually looking instead of just coasting on our ideas and interpretations. Never take anything for granted in this practice. Never assume, "Now I know how this is." Look again. It's different now in this moment than it was in the last moment.

The Buddha said once, "Let one, calm and independent, not desire any resting place." Can you imagine that? Not desire any resting place. It sounds sometimes a little scary. I mean, we want a resting place. If there were one, and we could get there and rest, that would make a lot of sense. But because every moment is opening fresh and new, there isn't really a resting place that stays a resting place for more than this moment.

If we're not desiring a resting place, when we talk about taking refuge in the Dharma, taking refuge in the truth of this moment, for this moment, right here and now, whatever's happening—that is our resting place. But the challenge is, it's our resting place now, and when it changes, we don't hold on because there's a new resting place, a new resting place.

When we stop fighting that, it's just a dance of joy. It's like we're really living in harmony with life as it is. Thoughts are a part of that. When we see them as thoughts, they come, they go. Our descriptions of ourselves are constantly changing. But when we don't recognize that, then often one of the ways we try to create a resting place, a safe ground, is through our descriptions.

Just as I talked about our descriptions of our practice, the views we make of our practice, we do the same thing through thoughts. Thoughts is one way—that's the way I'm talking about tonight. We do it in our descriptions of who we are: our self-identity, our life stories, our moment to moment stories. Paying attention through the day to thoughts in this way, do you notice how you're sort of telling your identity story to yourself all day long? And without looking, it really feels real, right? Well, this is who I am. I recognize this story. It feels comfortable. It's awfully painful, but it's comfortable. I know it. It's safe somehow. And again, we don't like that shaky ground.

Do you remember, those of you who were here that year, when we had the earthquake?

And then the earthquake was okay, but it was the ten million aftershocks that went on all night and all the next day. It was just physically, cellularly unsettling. It was a great teaching for me because I realized, oh, I always thought the earth was at least my solid ground. I guess not. I'm still holding on somewhere. Can I just go and dance? No, not too well.

So in a way, noticing through the day—pay attention tonight and tomorrow to the way that thoughts are constructing what seems like a solid, recognizable self. Me, my story that goes on. But really look, because what's fascinating is when we look, we see that there is no one story even. How many different "you" stories have you told yourself today? Really notice.

Because what we do is we have a view, an opinion of who we are—our basic story. "I'm a worthless, no-good meditator." That could be your story. Or your story might be, "I'm really hot stuff. Occasionally I don't do too well, but mostly I really got it together." Most people don't seem to believe that story, but some people do, and it really doesn't matter which one you believe. But notice—instead of buying the story, don't take it for granted. Pay attention.

Notice how from a basic perception, a basic sense perception—remember, all that's happening is the six sense experiences over and over and over, including thought. That's all that's happening. Everything else we're making up. This is really a radical aspect of awareness.

There's a sutta of the Buddha's that I really love because it says this quite directly. It's called the Advice to Bahiya of the Bark Cloth. Bahiya just came and stopped the Buddha on his alms round and said, "I'm in a real hurry. You've got to give me the basic teachings in five minutes." And the Buddha kept trying not to. "You just wait here. I'll go do my alms round. I'll have breakfast. I'll come back." But Bahiya just kept asking until, on the magic third time—usually if you asked the Buddha something, he would refuse twice, but then if it was something grantable, he would grant it on the third time.

So the Buddha gave him just this very succinct teaching. He said, "Okay, in the seen, there is only the seen. In what is heard, there is only the heard. In what is sensed in the body, there is only what is sensed"—so that includes the other physical senses—"and in what is cognized, the mental realm, there is only what is cognized. That is all."

That's all. It's so simple we can't stand it.

So you're out walking and somebody goes by looking really fast and spaced out and unhappy. And immediately you think, "Huh, I'm not doing so bad. I'm really feeling my sensations here." Now already we didn't notice what actually happened there. Seeing—seeing is all that was happening. Seeing, then a perception of a person. That was the perception: person walking quickly, looking unhappy. Then comparing arose in the mind. "I'm doing better than that person." And comparing is one of the big energies that gets papañca going.

So from that basic seeing, pretty soon you've become a high lama in Dharamsala. The Dalai Lama is consulting you about how to relate to the Chinese. This might have taken thirty seconds. Memories of all the past things in your life that really went well are coming up.

Selective memory, selective perception. You just notice all the things that feed that particular sense of self, and it feels like, "Yeah, that's who I am. That's true."

And then the next moment you trip over some cholla. You think, "God, am I unmindful or what? I'm really incredibly arrogant and conceited. Maybe that person was walking fast, but at least they probably knew what they were doing. Here I am making a fool of myself, stumbling over the cholla." It reminds you of fifth grade when they sent you to the remedial gym class. "I can't even walk properly. And that's showing up in the way I do the walking, just as it shows up in how I do the meditation and everything else."

This is in a five-minute period. Selective memory, selective perception—that other stuff didn't really happen. All those positive things, they didn't happen. That was just warped arrogance and conceit. And this feels really true.

Then five minutes later, the lunch bell rings. Both of those are forgotten. There's just hunger sensations and moving. "I have to wash the pots. I hope they didn't make a mess today in the kitchen." And now "I'm the pot washer."

Without examining it, we would say all of that was a steady stream of me, I, my self-story. But it's completely changing. There's not some solidity there. Each is a use of thoughts running off of perception and creating a description. It could be a viewer opinion or a description of the world that's unquestioned when we don't bring our attention back to what's really happening in this moment.

It's so fascinating to watch this once you just tune into it—how any basic sense experience can be the cause for a whole construction of a view and story of self. Just hearing the rain on the roof the other day, I could have gone back to my whole childhood and the smell of the desert and the sense of being cozy in a hurricane, and on and on.

Five minutes later, you can do this consciously sometimes—play. Take the same sense data. Bring up a memory or a feeling. Let the thoughts run. Notice how the emotion congruent with that story will come up and be real. "Oh, I feel so cozy. I had such a nice childhood. Isn't it lovely, all of the sangha here together in this room, the rain on the roof?"

And then switch it. "It's cold. It's so bleak. It's just how my heart feels—bleak and cold and barren like the desert. And here we are, 150 of us not speaking, not looking at each other." And you get so incredibly depressed you want to run out of here screaming.

The feelings, the emotions are just as real. The thoughts are thoughts. It's not like one is more true than the other, not necessarily. So you cannot think you have to believe either one. But like Pema Chödrön said, just maybe make this much space—maybe this is an opinion, a description, a view.

Even our really painful stories that come from our experiences in life—you know, they explain, like the story Jack told last night about the little girl whose father left her. There's always the possibility there's another explanation. The same so-called facts could have a different story, a different explanation. We may or may not ever know the right one. But just holding the possibility that the thought construction isn't so solid opens up a potential for enormous freedom in our lives in the moment.

One of the ways we can play with that is back to the advice to Bāhiya: to come into our basic experience in any particular moment. Really see what is it that's actually happening right now. You don't have to understand it.

You don't have to have the whole story. You don't even have to name the emotion. You're walking in the desert, you're in that story, you're feeling like you're totally worthless. In the seen, there's only the seen. What's actually true right now? It might be sensations in the foot or the body. It might be smell. It might be hearing. It might be thinking. Thinking is true, but that doesn't mean the content is true.

It's like Munindraji used to always say: a thought of your mother is not your mother. It's a thought. There's a big difference there. So the thought might be "I'm completely worthless." It's a thought. That might be what's true in the moment—that there's a thought arising. Or a taste. Or an emotion.

But to have that radical simplicity that the Buddha was talking about to Bāhiya—that we are willing to just let go of our attachment to the construct and drop into whatever's presenting itself as sense data, as perception in this moment—that is, in that moment, a potential for enormous spaciousness and freedom.

It doesn't mean we can't use our concepts, our thoughts, our psychological understanding. We can use them when we don't have to be gripped around them. We say, "Well, maybe this is right. Let's try it on." Sort of like scientists with a hypothesis. They try it on until some data comes in that doesn't match it. And then they go, "Oh, maybe that wasn't correct"—if they're good scientists.

So we're doing the same thing. Instead of freezing it and saying, "Now I've got it," we recognize: we've never got it. We keep meeting new data in every single moment. That's the radical simplicity of this practice.

When I say this can open us to enormous freedom, I imagine everyone here must have had some moments of that during this retreat. We often don't notice them—where you're not particularly spinning out some big description. It might be there, but you're not really caught in it. And there's just what's happening. Maybe you caught a whiff of the creosote walking through the desert and it's just the smell. It's just so pure. Or just a sensation when you're walking. Or the taste of the tea. Or the sound of a bird. Or the smoothness of the breath. Or a moment of sadness. Just a moment of sadness. Or a thought going through the sky of your mind. "Ah, it's just a thought."

The simplicity of pure presence without all the falderal that we add on top of it—the layers that hide the basic experience.

Of course, not every moment is going to be, "Oh, just seeing, smelling, thinking, tasting. No constructions whatsoever." We're still functioning. Sometimes people think, "Well, if that's all there is, how can I do anything? How can I work?"

How can I find my way home again? What we're doing is trying to let go of some of the glue that keeps us suffering, and then we can use the concepts. As James used to always quote Ram Dass: "Know your zip code." We know our zip code, but we don't think we are our zip code. Who are you? "I'm 01005." Who are you? It's the same with all of our mental constructions.

So when we talk about wise attention, it's being able to take that advice to Bahiya and know just what's happening—to come to rest in that, as opposed to jumping into and buying all the interpretation. And it's really interesting to watch when we don't do that.

I'll describe an experience I had, because it's fascinating to me to watch the mind do this. I was sitting once, and I'd had bronchitis a couple of times in the past year. The first couple of times I didn't really do anything about it and got really sick. So I was on a long retreat, pretty calm, and I was just being with bare perception. I started to realize I was noting: tickle, tickle, tickle, tickle, cough, tickle, cloudy, cloudy, heavy, heavy. Then the thought arose: "Oh my God, I've got bronchitis." And I was like—whoosh—into this total panic. What am I going to do? I'm on retreat. No, no, no. I've got all this work I have to do. I have to teach all these retreats. I can't afford to be sick. The retreat's about—I was just gone.

Luckily, I'd been sitting a while. I had some presence, and I said, "Oh yeah, I think this is panic." Okay, what's happening right now? Panic. Feel the sensations. Oh, yeah—tickle, tickle, cough, cough, tickle, tickle. And it was just gone with that. Then I watched the mind choose to go back into panic. Let me just get into the whole story of what might happen. Oh my God, I've got bronchitis.

Ajahn Buddhadasa has an expression he uses in a different context: volunteering for suffering. I felt that's what my mind was doing. I could stay with bare experience, but who wants to suffer? Me. Let's go into this story. Oh my God, I've got bronchitis.

Coming back over and over, after a while it was so much more obvious. There's peace in this. It doesn't deny that it was bronchitis. It didn't keep me from recognizing it and acting appropriately. The difference between just being with the sensation and the panic is that in the panic, I wasn't actually with the experience of the bare sense data. I was with the thoughts and the construction and the future and the past, drawing up all the selective memory—not with awareness. That was the truth of things.

So once I could come back and just be with the bare experience—okay, this really feels exactly like it felt a year ago. I think if I go to the doctor and get an antibiotic, that'll keep me from getting really sick. I'll do that. I did, and I got fine, and I didn't get really sick. So it doesn't keep us from acting intelligently. In fact, we act more intelligently, because I could have seen myself running around for days—oh my God, I've got bronchitis—and not really doing anything with any intelligence.

I think of this a lot: volunteering for suffering. Being willing to meet experience with that radical simplicity the Buddha spoke to Bahiya takes a trust that actually, out of that, the appropriate response can arise. We have a better chance of recognizing what's actually happening when we're really turning around and meeting the experience, as opposed to constructing all our thoughts and imaginations and fears about it.

And there can be—often people say, when we talk about thought and attachment to views and descriptions as our self-identity, and people just approach the possibility of looking at that without taking it for granted, recognizing that it's just a story, that it's really as simple as the Buddha spoke to Bahiya—there can actually be a sense of, "I don't want it to be that way." Almost a sense of going back to that shaky ground, back to that death and transformation moment by moment, back to that wanting someplace to recognize ourselves.

But there is an ongoing natural letting go as we pay attention—not this letting go that we say is letting go but is really pushing away, throwing away, pretending something isn't happening. That's not letting go.

That's aversion. True letting go is when something really just falls away without will. We simply let go of the holding.

Throughout my whole practice, I've seen stories of Carol—levels of self-identification, aspects of personality, memories of who I thought I was. As I begin to see that they're nothing concrete, that they're nothing that isn't changing, the sense of identification with these different levels starts to go, little by little. And sometimes it really can feel like a little death.

I remember times in retreat where I would—okay, I was amping it up a little bit, some of it was the story of Carol, you know, letting go of her personality. But there really can be a feeling of, "Oh, that part of who I thought I was is going away." Really, it's not going away. It was never really there. But what's happening is we're seeing through what we thought was there. It feels like aspects of our personality, our self-story, are going away. And it's okay to feel a little sad about that.

I remember times in retreat where I would do a little puja, a little acknowledgment of, "Okay, that part of Carol's story might have to go now. And I feel like I'm going to miss it." But you know what? When it's really gone, we don't miss it. Because any construction of thoughts that we're holding to creates a sense of solidity, and actual fear comes from wanting to hold on to that. When we can truly let the construction go, we're not left in some nihilistic nothingness. It opens us up—it's the doorway to recognizing our vastness. It's a little bit what Wes was talking about in his talk the other night, seeing that we are nature.

As John Muir once said, "I find that if I touch anything, it's connected to everything else in the universe." Anything. The twitch of an eyelid. A feeling of helplessness. The sound of a bird. The sadness at some idea of some part of my personality going away. The judgment that I shouldn't feel that sadness.

When we meet it, like the Buddha said to Bahiya, with that radical simplicity, we find that rather than nihilistic nothingness, it's our avenue into recognizing our vastness—that we are connected, we are part of everything in the universe. And when we're resting even in that moment of simplicity, like when you just heard the bird, just the vividness of that. Or the smell of the creosote, or the sunset. Not all the stories about sunset, just the seeing. Or the tea. Or the sadness.

When there's just that—that moment of total presence—that's our opening into real peace. That's our resting place. Not the thing itself, because that's definitely going to change in the next moment. But that ability to bring awareness to whatever comes in its place—that's where we begin to find our real resting place.

And out of that, we find not this kind of indifference—"it doesn't matter what thoughts come and go, nothing matters, nobody matters, it's all just empty." Rather, from that place of connectedness, kind attention naturally expresses itself. Our connectedness manifests in actions of generosity, love, and compassion. It's just natural. In that place of nothing to protect, no construction to hold onto, of openness, we're open to really seeing what's true. And the natural expression of that is to feel, to know, and to act from the compassion and love that comes from knowing our interconnectedness.

I'm going to close by reading a poem that I really love because it expresses this to me—this sense of recoiling from something we don't like, something that doesn't meet our ideas or the way we want things to be. And how just the quality of bringing our attention to what is opens up the vastness of the universe in this one experience, and the experience of love and compassion.

This is by Mary Oliver:

In Singapore, in the airport,
a darkness was ripped from my eyes.
In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open.
A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.
Disgust argued in my stomach,
and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.
A poem should always have birds in it,
kingfishers say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.
Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees,
a waterfall, or if that's not possible,
a fountain rising and falling.
A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.
When the woman turned, I could not answer her face.
Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together and neither could win.

She smiled and I smiled.
What kind of nonsense is this?

Everybody needs a job. Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem, but first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She is washing the tops of airport ashtrays as big as hubcaps with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life. And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen. But maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it?

Of course it isn't.

Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

Let's just sit quietly for a minute.

CHAPTER 305

Loving Aversion

Carol Wilson · 42 min

> In this guided mettā (loving-kindness) meditation session, Carol Wilson leads practitioners through the classical progression of the practice, beginning with oneself and moving to the benefactor category. She offers practical wisdom on selecting the right person for each category, emphasizing that the goal is to find whoever most easily opens the heart rather than proving one's spiritual advancement by rushing to difficult people.
> Wilson addresses common challenges that arise in mettā practice, particularly the near enemy of loving-kindness—love mixed with attachment, lust, or wanting. She explains why it's important to choose a benefactor without romantic or sexual complications, as these feelings can obscure the pure quality of mettā we're trying to cultivate. For those who struggle with self-directed loving-kindness due to self-judgment or self-hatred, she suggests starting with an easy person and "boomeranging" the mettā back to oneself at the end.
> The teaching emphasizes that mettā phrases should be generic enough to extend to all beings, and that practitioners have permission to find their own phrases and rhythm. Wilson clarifies that we're not trying to change anyone or produce specific results—the practice is simply an offering of open-hearted affection. She guides practitioners through connecting with wholesome qualities in themselves and their benefactor, using either felt sense or mental imagery, before offering the traditional phrases of well-wishing.

We continue with the guided loving-kindness practice. Our intention is to take you through the classical categories as metta is traditionally taught, allowing you to choose for yourself how to practice in whatever way is easiest for you. By "easiest," I mean using whichever person—whether it's yourself, a dear friend, a mentor, or any of the categories—most readily evokes feelings of well-wishing, friendliness, and connection in your daily practice.

There's no need to be in a hurry to move from that person to the most difficult person, as if somehow to prove to yourself that you've gotten it down. It doesn't work that way. If you were to simply stay for six weeks with yourself and the person that's easiest, that would be a very helpful way to cultivate loving-kindness practice. But we want to present to you the whole breadth of the classical teaching, and that's what we'll be doing over these evening guided metta sessions.

You'll also notice that each one of us does it in a slightly different way. Our phrases will probably each be a little different. Rather than taking that as a sign of confusion, you could take it as a sign of permission to be creative in your own method of practice. Find the phrases that work for you, that have the most ability to connect in your heart with what you're wishing.

One thing to keep in mind: if you do make up your own phrases, they should be fairly generic. As a friend of mine says, "May I have more hair" doesn't really translate to all beings. You get the picture. "May you be free from danger"—that can translate to all beings.

I know Joseph began with having you pick any being that really opens your heart and is easy for you. Tonight I'm going to start with the classical way, which is with yourself. After about fifteen minutes of sending loving-kindness to yourself, we'll move to the category classically called benefactor or mentor. This is someone who has done a lot for you, who really inspires you, or for whom you feel much gratitude. The traditional examples include a teacher, a mentor, someone who has helped you.

If a person like that comes to mind, you might have to try a few. Sometimes the most obvious person doesn't really work if there's a little other stuff on the side—you think it doesn't matter, but it might get in the way. You never know; it's a surprise. So I like to say you may have to audition a few benefactors. See which one is easiest—not who you should be able to feel it for, not who deserves it, but who is doing you another favor by being the person that lets you offer this gift of well-wishing, this generosity of heart.

If you have someone in that category, it should be someone for whom there isn't going to be any sexual interest likely to arise, because obviously that complicates the issue. This is actually a very important piece, because we're trying to practice in the way that's easiest. The near enemy of metta—the state of heart and mind that we can actually confuse for loving-kindness—is love with attachment, or lust, or wanting. If there's someone for whom the real, true well-wishing can easily slide into wanting something back, it makes it harder to really come to rest and find your home in this mental state, this heart space of metta. So pick someone more or less uncomplicated.

Sometimes people can't find someone who would classically fit into the benefactor category. In that case, use the person Joseph brought up last time—someone really easy, like your grandchild. Some people even use their pets. It's whatever really lets you offer this gift of caring. That's the purpose.

And of course, with ourselves—well, that's complicated, but we start with ourselves. If it's dead, if it's flat, that's okay. If it's worse than dead and flat, that's also okay. Just gently keep coming back to yourself, and then when we're ready, we'll move to the benefactor or the easy person for you. In your daily practice of metta, if yourself really brings up a lot of self-hatred, judgment, or anger—nothing even close to metta—then start with the easiest person and try at the end to boomerang it back on yourself a little bit. You're learning to play with this.

So sit in a way that's as comfortable as possible, so you're not putting any extra strain on your body. Take a couple of deep breaths. Just let out any tension, any holding, any expectations. See if you can come to a sense of relaxed presence in your sitting, with your body, with yourself right now.

Take a moment to consciously reflect on some of your good qualities. This is a very skillful act—whether it's some kind or generous action or speech that you've done, or just one of your wholesome qualities. This isn't to bolster ego. This is really to open our hearts to the fact that we're worthy of loving-kindness, just being who we are right now in this moment.

As you bring something wholesome about yourself to mind, let it in.

Open yourself to appreciate that the way you would appreciate it in someone else who's dear to you.

And then take this sense of appreciation, however mild it may be, even if it's only a thought, and open it into yourself. Connect that appreciation with a sense of yourself—whether it's a felt sense of your body as you sit here, connecting with yourself physically here and now. If you're more visual, then bring into your heart and mind a mental image, a memory, a memory of a photo of yourself. Connect that appreciation with a felt sense or image.

And when you're ready, begin offering to yourself the phrases that you have been using. I will one time give an example of the ones I use, but then let you find your own words and your own rhythm:

May I be free from inner and outer danger.
May I have mental happiness.
May I have physical happiness.
May I live with ease of well-being—or may I care for myself happily.

Just offering the phrase one at a time to yourself as you would offer a precious gift. Not trying to feel any particular emotion, but simply the offering of a generous heart.

Don't worry about how much your mind wanders off. When you notice you've wandered, you don't need to investigate where it's gone. Simply take a moment to re-connect with the sense of yourself or the image. And when you feel here with yourself again, then offer the next phrase, gently, steadily.

Now bring into your mind, your heart, a sense or image of the person you want to use as the benefactor. Again, see if you can have a memory or an image, a felt sense of this person. Take a moment to consciously focus on their wholesome, their lovable or inspiring qualities—the qualities that allow your heart to open easily when you think of this person, someone you don't know well or someone you do know well.

And as you get a sense of them—appreciation or gratitude or love or happiness or friendliness—when you're ready, then offering each phrase one at a time. Not to change this person, not to make what you're wishing be so. The phrases are an expression of our open-hearted affection. They're not an attempt to change things. We're not looking for results. We're simply offering.

May you be safe from inner and outer harm.
May you be happy and peaceful.
May you have physical happiness.
May you live with ease of well-being.

And again, when you realize you've been lost, take a moment to bring up again the sense or image, the beautiful qualities, and then connect with each phrase. There's no hurry. Give it some time. If you don't feel the connection is happening, give it a little time before you decide it's not the right person. If other more difficult aspects of this person start to surface, see if you can just leave that in the background, consciously refocus on the qualities that open your heart, and again offer the loving-kindness.

For the last few minutes of this sitting, you can either stay with your benefactor or come back to yourself—whatever intuitively you feel you'd like to do. And just for a moment, send this loving-kindness to someone sitting next to you, or behind, or in front of you.

May the beneficial energies of our practice be shared with all beings for their well-being and awakening.

CHAPTER 306

Wise Attention 2 of 3

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this second talk of a three-part series on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), Carol Wilson continues her exploration of the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), examining how appropriate attention can starve the deeply rooted tendencies (āsavas) of craving, becoming, and delusion. She offers specific guidance on working with each of the five hindrances through wise attention—turning to the stillness of awareness when restlessness arises, or withdrawing energy from stories when caught in sloth and torpor.
> The talk moves into the second and third methods the Buddha taught for abandoning the āsavas: restraint at the sense doors and wise use of requisites. Carol clarifies that restraint doesn't mean avoiding sense contact through fear, but rather bringing satipaññā (mindfulness-wisdom) to the moment of contact—knowing 'seeing, pleasant' without proliferating into craving and papañca. She shares a vivid personal story about encountering blooming irises on retreat and watching her mind spin into attachment and planning.
> The teaching on 'using' requisites wisely—food, clothing, shelter, medicine—proves equally practical. Carol examines how our relationship to everyday necessities can either feed or starve craving and becoming. Through humorous examples of retreat food hoarding and attachment to favorite clothing, she illustrates how this investigation extends far beyond monastery life into our daily choices. Throughout, she emphasizes that the practice isn't about rigid rules but about noticing what's being fed in the mind moment to moment.

So there are times when it can just be coming in, and I can really just turn to, "Oh, torpor, sloth, dullness." By doing that, the wise attention has actually moved into the awareness. And moment after moment of really turning to the awareness within which one is aware of, "Ah, this is just too hard right now," or "My eyes are just too sleepy," or "My body's just too heavy. This is useless. There's too much sloth and torpor. I can't keep paying attention." Just turn to the awareness and keep noticing it. I'm not saying it magically disappears, but it really shifts from unwise to wise attention. It stops feeding it and begins to starve it.

With restlessness and worry, the Buddha says you can actually pay attention to the stillness of awareness. In other words, it doesn't mean all the phenomena stop coming and going. It doesn't mean you're sitting there so worried about whatever obsessive thought is there and think, "Oh, let me just notice stillness of awareness," and the whole thing falls away. But stillness of awareness is actually accessible. Stillness of awareness means the mind's jumping all around—"I'm worried about this, I'm worried about that"—and awareness notices it all. It's similar to the sloth and torpor one. Just withdraw the energy from getting caught in the stories and the obsessive thoughts. Turn it back to the moment of knowing itself. Knowing obsessive thought. Knowing obsessive thought. That awareness isn't jumping around. It's not going anywhere. It's just in that moment. Everything's happening in the stillness of awareness. Just play with it.

And of course, with uncertainty, it's like quit paying attention to all those thoughts. The Buddha says, at times, really look clearly and see what's what, instead of just speculating about things. Come out of the speculation and just bring your bare attention to know what's arising in this moment. It's really sustained attention, rather than thinking you're going to think your way out of this one, which just keeps feeding the doubt.

Those are some of the examples I wanted to give under the first category, which is how wise attention actually starves these tendencies, with some very specific examples of that.

And this leads into the second, which is how the āsavas, or these habits of mind, are abandoned by what the Buddha calls restraining—in other words, restraint at the sense doors. Now, we think of restraining sometimes as putting someone in a straitjacket—that's our violent image of restraining, or holding somebody back. In a way, it could be that. But restraining is really what Ajahn Buddhadasa calls bringing sati-paññā, mindfulness-wisdom, in at the moment of sense door contact.

So in the moment of seeing, if we're right present with mindfulness-wisdom, we know seeing. We know, "Oh, that's beautiful. It's pleasant." It doesn't expand. It doesn't turn into craving or becoming or some whole papañca about what it means in the future. It just becomes, "Oh yeah, seeing, pleasant." Mindfulness-wisdom at the point of sense contact—that's really what restraint at the sense doors means.

Without that restraint, as you know, there's a moment you might notice that you're seeing something pleasant, but not quite with the wisdom factor, not quite with strong enough mindfulness. And then it goes off, like I said, with a hindrance to the gratification of the pleasant, the sense of me, and to thoughts about it and what it means. And those thoughts lead to action. This is what we call papañca, proliferation—stories of the past, stories of the future, actions it can lead to—all because just in that moment of sense contact, there wasn't restraint.

Now, sometimes we can think of restraint as being so afraid that the desire or the ill will or the sense of self is going to proliferate that we're almost afraid to look around. I have a friend who some years ago on retreat at the retreat center was working with restraint in this way, which was that he walked around blindfolded all day for several days. He knew the place, you know, up and down the stairs.

That way, you know, he was restraining sense contact at the eye door, which is true. And we can go a little far that way because, of course, there are still the other five senses, right? Sense contact at the ear door, touching sensation, taste, smell, and the mind—we can't really just put a blindfold on that.

Wise attention means both seeing how restraint at the sense door allows the whole proliferation to fall away, and seeing how far down the road we go when there is unwise attention, when we get caught up in lack of restraint.

I'll give you a simple example from my practice. I was practicing one time for about a month in this really beautiful retreat center in South Africa, up in KwaZulu-Natal. It's more lovely than here as far as the environment. One day I came out—the grounds are very beautifully landscaped with a kind of oval drive—right around dawn. All around the whole drive were huge iris bushes, and on this particular dawn, they had all bloomed at once. They hadn't bloomed before, and I still remember it. This was almost ten years ago. So beautiful and subtle—this white with a tiny violet color in the middle. I was just overwhelmed with the beauty.

I did not have wise attention at the sense door. "This is so beautiful." For a moment, it was just appreciating beauty. Then it was, "Ah, so pleasant." I didn't say "so pleasant"—if I had, that would have been wise attention. Instead it was, "How can I hold onto this?" "Oh, my mother would love to see this. She's such a gardener. If only I could take photos."

Of course, I didn't have a camera. But that didn't stop me. I went back in for photos. My friend Gavin—he's over there, he's on retreat, but never mind—I bet he has a camera. So I'm running around the place, looking for my friend who is staying in another part, trying to borrow a camera, all really in service of continuing the sense of pleasant in that moment. Total non-restraint at the sense door.

We're not talking about evil or something. We're talking about what was feeding craving in that moment. This is what we look at: What's increasing in the mind and what's decreasing? What was increasing? Craving. I finally took the pictures. I brought them home. I showed them to my mother. "Oh yeah, that's nice." Nothing to do with the original experience. It doesn't translate. It was just, "How can I hold on to this? It's so beautiful." Nothing wrong with beauty, but it's that attachment.

So keeping it simple here. Shankara, who was an Advaita master in India centuries ago, points out that we nourish craving. Craving is intensified when we let our thoughts dwell on sense objects and seek temporary satisfaction in those sense objects. That is what increases the habit of craving in our hearts, in our minds.

Practicing with restraint, satipañña, at all the sense doors really just cuts that tendency. It's starving the tendency for craving or for aversion, if you focus in the same way on all the unpleasant things. Some of us are cursed with that particular habit—at least you don't kid yourself that you're enjoying it and that it's nice. You know it's suffering.

This one, you may not quite notice the suffering aspect, but really pay attention and notice. Even when you talk, you can tell yourself, "Oh, this is really good. This is really wholesome. It's a little papañca, a little proliferation, but I'm noticing it. And it's really for the good of all beings, or at least it's for my own well-being right now. I need a little beauty. It's so dreary. There's so much dukkha."

The skillful means isn't about what it looks like. It's about what's being fed in your heart, in your mind. Sometimes, if you're in a real dukkha, in a space of lots of suffering, you go and sit outside, look at the beauty, and it just brings more stillness of awareness, more peace. That's not feeding. That's not lack of restraint. That's skillful means. But if you watch and what's being fed is more, more, more—less peaceful, less peaceful, "I need this object, I don't want that object"—then it's unwise attention. Really notice. We can see the moment-to-moment effect. It's really very useful. You can see how it works.

There's a quotation from Sogyal Rinpoche that I think describes this very well. He's saying that at the present moment, in our unawakened, not very mindful state, our mind faces away from itself. Mind—or you could say attention, or mana, as in manasikāra—the mind bends towards whatever we experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, texture. The mind leans towards it. The attention then is also caught up by thoughts about the past, about the future, and about the present in association with that object. That's the habit of our mind.

Yet restraint of the senses doesn't mean that we then get afraid to have sense contact. Like my friend, you know: "God, if I see anything, I'll get lost in craving, so better to be blind. Better to be deaf. Better to be dead." Rather, it means to see that there can be exquisite presence. It's not the sense contact; it's the clinging.

Sogyal again: "Yet we are not dragged into hell just by experiencing something. Neither are we elevated to a heavenly state by experiencing something." As Tilopa said to Naropa, "Son, you are not bound by perceiving, but by clinging. So cut your clinging, Naropa."

Satipañña, wise attention at the sense door, is really what we mean by restraint of the senses. See the contact, and by wise attention, cut the clinging, or the aversion, or the endless proliferation. And again, as Shankara says, when we cease dwelling upon sense objects, peace will arise in your heart. We call this liberation while living. Liberation while living. Peace will arise in your heart, even if for a moment. Then restraint becomes a beautiful, supportive, happy state.

The third way that the Buddha spoke in this sutta about abandoning all these tendencies, really letting them wither—and this is something useful not only in retreat, but all of these are useful in life, though this one very much in our daily life—is called āsavas that can be abandoned by using. By paying attention to our relationship to how we use things, to how we use the requisites of our life.

He, of course, is talking to monks. And here's an example: "Here, a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, paying careful attention, uses a robe only for protection from the cold or from heat, for protection from insects and burning, for the purpose of concealing what disturbs conscience." In other words, you're not using it for beautification. You're not dressing for amusement. It's just the way you use your clothes. And he goes on to talk about how we use alms food, how we use resting place, how we use medicines. Those are the four things that a bhikkhu can have. We, of course, can have many more things.

But I have found this so useful and very widespread—on retreat but also in life—to pay attention to the way I use clothes, requisites, you know, where I live, what keeps me warm, things that I think I need. All the things that really expand in a lay life: how we use food, how we relate to food. In other words, do we use these things simply for protection, to keep us comfortable? That's okay—to be healthy, to not be suffering. Or do we get caught in using clothes, food, requisites, supplies, home, for further pleasure? Does the way we relate to our clothes, for example, increase wanting in our mind?

Does it increase a sense of becoming, of who we are? Does it increase our tendency to perceive inaccurately?

So I'll use some simple retreat examples, but really look in your life. It's a fascinating thing. Food. And this isn't—remember, all this is looking carefully. This isn't some judgment: "Oh, I should only eat X amount of food, and if I eat more, then I'm using it for pleasure, I'm using it to increase craving." It could be different at every meal. It's to look and see.

I saw for myself at some point—I think it was on a retreat where I wasn't on eight precepts, which means not eating after noon, but it was just too much trouble to come to tea. It was a three-month course, and it's like a zoo in the dining room when there's a hundred people at mealtime, and it was simply too much trouble. But I would start to worry: what if? And this is really where I see this, looking at how I'm using food or clothes or blankets with this "what if" mind. What if I get hungry later? So maybe I better save some extra from lunch. Maybe I better take two or three pieces of fruit at breakfast. Maybe before I go to the retreat, I have to go buy a bunch of jars of almond butter to have in my room. All of this.

And at some point, as I started to notice how much extra trouble and dukkha and desire saving that food meant. Take the banana—but where can you save it? Here, thank God, we don't have what they have over at IMS, which is this back dining room with shelves. Most of you have sat there, and when you come in the second month of a three-month retreat, it's a crack-up if you're teaching or on staff. These shelves are packed—packed with food and old rotting oranges, and people with seventeen thousand jars of vitamins, and little saved rice with mold growing on it. People are back there cooking, and I'm not talking about people with health needs, I'm talking about all of us. Here you don't have that. God knows what's going on in your rooms, and I don't want to know.

But taking the banana back to the room, and it's up there, and then you're really hungry later—but where can I eat it? It's nine at night. I have to go all the way back to my room. I shouldn't eat in the room. I have to go all the way back down here and eat, but then they'll see me eating, and what will they think? They'll think I went in the kitchen and stole it, and I don't want them thinking that. Or maybe they're hungry, and I'll have to share it with them. Otherwise, I'll feel selfish or whatever. It's like, oh my God, who needs this? Who needs this?

So I'm a little hungry later. It's so much easier. That serves to starve desire, ill will, and sense of self. It just doesn't matter, you know? How are you using it? So it's not the outer appearance. What's increasing? Desire and becoming. "I'm going to become a hungry person. Oh my gosh, I'm becoming a very..."

Or you could not eat. You could eat one tiny little bit of food, and what that's serving in your mind is: "I hope they notice how really abstemious I am. I hope they're noticing what a really ace yogi I am." Well, then I'd say pile your plate with food and eat like a pig, because what you're feeding with being so delicate is a sense of becoming, very strongly. Break it.

When you take three blankets when there are only two apiece because "I might get cold later"—I see myself doing that all the time. And we don't really like it when our comfort level, or what we think we need, is being threatened.

I was listening to a tape of a talk by Ajahn Sumedho at Spirit Rock. He was talking about restraint and renunciation. And he's funny. So I was just listening to this tape, and the audience was really laughing pretty solidly at all the stuff he was saying.

And he was saying it in a humorous way. Now at his retreats, everyone is expected to be on eight precepts. That's just part of the retreat. So partway into this talk, he started talking about how at Spirit Rock everyone's on eight precepts, but he noticed there's a refrigerator especially for yogis with special needs. He said, "I noticed how really very full that refrigerator is. And supposedly here we're all on eight precepts. That means not taking anything extra." And he's laughing, saying this in a light way. Then he said, "I had the idea we should just empty out that fridge and give it all to the homeless." There was not one chuckle in that crowd. It was the most dead kind of silence after he said that. It was, to me, really funny.

So we're looking at this not with a sense of right or wrong, but examining how we're using things. Another example, because there's no way I'm getting through the other four tonight anyway. I noticed on one retreat, in relationship to clothes—this just popped into my mind tonight when I was writing. It can really be very subtle, what we see.

I was on a retreat in Australia with Sayadaw U Pandita, and I had this one dress. It wasn't even a nice dress, but something about the colors I really liked. It just flashed in my mind tonight as I was writing this. I remembered one day I had that dress on, and the room I was in had a big mirror. I didn't particularly look in it, but as I was walking past, I caught a glimpse of myself in that dress, and there was immediate "Oh, that's such pretty colors," and it went into this whole craving.

In a relatively subtle way—it wasn't that I thought I looked so beautiful or that anyone else was noticing me, because nobody was—but just in my own mind, by liking and wearing that particular dress, every time I saw it, craving would come up in my mind. It doesn't mean never wear a nice dress, but if the mindfulness wasn't quite acute enough to notice it, then I could suddenly wake up in a fantasy, some really pleasant craving fantasy that actually got triggered by simply noticing the sight of that dress, liking it, going into "Wow, this is really pretty," and boom—craving really strengthened and off into some fantasy that has nothing whatsoever to do with the dress or clothes or anything. You wouldn't even notice how it got started. This is the subtlety of these habits of mind and the wonderfulness of having this time and this space to explore it. Not with judgment at all, but like, "Wow, that's really interesting."

Perfume is another one. Aside from all the aversion that people get going on retreat—that's just feeding aversion. But again, I like perfume. I like the smell of perfume, on me or on somebody else. I just like the smell. I love pleasant smells. And I can notice when I smell perfume—I really can see, like in the world of fashion, the function of it—because what it does is elicit craving, elicit clinging, whether that moves into sexuality or not. Just the pure clinging. That's the function of the whole fashion world.

I know personally from being a nun, you can bring that same thing into being in robes. The whole purpose of robes is that it cuts that, and it's wonderful. When I just had three robes and it was simply wear the clean one, soak the dirty one, and the other one's drying out—that was great. It was so freeing.

But I've seen nuns and monks who can really get into—I've known monks, nobody present—who have really gotten into the colors of their robe. This is in Thailand, where some robes are too much on the neon orange color, which is kind of the schlock city monk color. And they really want to have that dull forest monk color, being really upset when the robes they were given were way too much on the neon side and not enough on the worn out "I'm a real renunciate forest bhikkhu" side. I don't see any difference between that and wearing perfume and a flower dress. It's just the same qualities of mind.

Granted, living a simpler lifestyle makes it easier because there are fewer things to get lost in, fewer things to have to relate to. But you can see how really valuable this examination is in our life as well. How am I relating to food? Is it increasing desire and clinging and becoming? Or is it bringing me freedom? Just peace in this moment in the mind. How do I relate to clothes? How do I relate to where I live? How do I relate to medicine? Never mind entertainment and all the rest. You see how really, really helpful this is.

Well, that's it for tonight. We only got through four. I thought we'd get all the way through six and then just talk about the seven factors of enlightenment, which is the seventh one, next week, but I don't think we're going to get there. So I'll just say what the next ones are that we'll talk about next week. Those are the hindrances that are abandoned by patience, or by enduring. And then, because the Buddha doesn't say just endure everything, those that are abandoned by avoiding—avoiding what is harmful or potentially unskillful. The next one is those that are abandoned by removing, and this is really how to not tolerate, which is very different from patience, persistent unskillful thoughts. And the seventh one is through feeding the seven factors of enlightenment, which is also in itself a very helpful balancing and development tool for the meditation practice.

I just want to end by telling you how the Buddha ends this sutta.

After he's gone through it all, he says, "Once one has abandoned the taints that can be removed by these seven ways, then he is called, or she is called, a bhikkhu who dwells restrained with the restraint of all the asavas, one who has severed craving, who has flung off the fetters and has made an end of suffering with the complete understanding and removal of conceit."

Conceit is the comparing and the subtle sense of self. So we're talking about many different ways of working with tendencies that are sometimes gross, sometimes extremely subtle. But this is not an idle or intellectual exercise. As he says over and over, this leads to complete freedom of heart and mind in this very life. And as he says, if it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so.

So may we all come to complete restraint of the asavas in this very life. Or as they say in Burma, may you attain nirvana in the shortest possible time. People just say that to you casually when they pass you in a monastery. Isn't that nice? "May you attain nirvana in the shortest possible time."

And may our practice, may our listening to and speaking the Dhamma, may our sincere efforts in this day and in these last days, may the beneficial energy of this be joined with the beneficial energies of all the three times—past, present, and future—of all beings. And may all these merits, this beneficial energy, be shared with all beings everywhere, in all realms, in all states of existence. May all beings be freed from suffering. May all beings be freed from confusion. May our practice be the cause for the liberation of all beings.

Yoniso Manasikara is turning into the endless topic. I have to tell you, I'm really enjoying researching it, because it starts with this sutta that I told you about last week—these seven different ways of applying appropriate attention in our life, in our practice, and by doing so, eventually completely uproot, wither away, even the subtle tendencies, the subtle habits of our mind toward greed, toward wanting to become, toward delusion.

This is like a manual of skillful means that the Buddha is giving us here in this sutta. What I get excited about is it's not just limited to this one sutta. As I start reading it and then going to other suttas, other discourses, just sticking to what the Buddha said in the discourses, there's so much relevant, really practical material—so much that I'm indulging myself a little by bringing in more quotations from suttas than I normally would, since I would otherwise telescope this whole talk into one. So I hope you can take it. It is the Buddha's words.

Just to remind you very briefly, this first sutta—we're talking about Majjhima Nikaya number two, which is called "All the Asavas." All the asavas, translated as taints—I don't like that—but we could say the deeply underlying habit of the mind to respond or erupt into craving for sensuality, craving for becoming, really personality view, and just basic ignorance, misunderstanding what's what. These subtle underlying tendencies are what the Buddha is saying wise attention or appropriate attention is the tool that can really help us, not to violently remove, but it's as if a seed in our stream of consciousness doesn't get watered, doesn't get watered, doesn't get watered, until finally it so withers that even given the perfect conditions for greed to arise, it doesn't. So that's a possibility. As the Buddha said, if it was not possible, I would not tell you to do so.

We began in talking about the sutta, where he speaks of seven specific ways, seven specific areas of working with this. The first one being asavas or habits, subtle habits abandoned by seeing. And he says, "Bhikkhus, I say that there is an exhaustion of asavas in one who knows and sees, not in one who does not know and see." Who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention. In other words, we know and understand both wise or appropriate attention and unwise or inappropriate attention. Understanding what both of these can lead to is a huge tool in our practice.

In ones abandoned by seeing, seeing really means how we pay attention. The Buddha defines wise or appropriate attention, yoniso manasikara, as basically knowing what it's appropriate to pay attention to. In other words, in paying attention to this, it leads to a decrease in greed, a decrease in hatred, in wanting to become, a decrease in delusion. Unwise attention leads to an increase in these things.

And how do we discover or know whether these things are increasing or decreasing in ourselves? Simply by mindfulness, right? Not from somebody else telling us. It's often not even by our actions. We can control our actions through sila, and that's essential.

But our mind, as you may know—you may have once or twice had the experience of looking good, so to speak, and the mind is just riddled with whatever your particular favorites are.

So the Buddha is saying, still, it's not that only good things are worth attention, only bad things are not worth attention. It's not in the thing at all—it's in how we pay attention, the quality of attention. This is what makes it wise or unwise, appropriate or inappropriate.

So remember, just in closing last week I was talking about the way we pay attention, which is of course the first aspect of this first way of abandoning the āsavas by seeing—which is of course our basic mindfulness.

I don't need to go through that all again. You all really have it down: basic mindfulness. In other words, full and total attention to just what is in this moment, without adding anything extra.

Someone asked me to repeat this, so I will. One way of paying attention in that way, from the Buddha: "Dry up the remains of your past and have nothing for your future. If you do not cling to the present, then you go from place to place in peace." Just in one moment—that's mindfulness. That totality of attention that's not dragging the whole past after us, not projecting into the future, and not analyzing or clinging to or explaining the present. It's not saying, "Yes, this is happening, therefore blah, blah, blah about me." Just pure presence.

And Thanissaro Bhikkhu had a lovely way—he's pointing to something the Buddha said—a lovely way, I thought, of expressing this: noticing just what is present and what is absent in the mind. The mind at the moment is filled with ill will. At the moment there is no mettā. That's just an example. That would be appropriate attention, seeing what's what.

And as Thanissaro points out, that is beginning to enter into emptiness. He's using a phrase from the Buddha in a particular sutta where the Buddha is talking about very gross ways of entering into emptiness, all the way to the ultimate sublime freedom of mind. By emptiness, he simply means the perception that knows this is present, but this moment is empty of that. If ill will is present, the moment is empty of mettā, for example. Just that basic, that simple.

The sutta actually starts by saying if the monk leaves the city and goes into the forest, then he realizes his perception is basically empty of city, empty of people—but it's not empty of trees and forest. That basic.

So when we're simply attending with this quality of non-judging, full attention—your whole being, but not one bit extra—that's this entering into emptiness. Knowing this is here, just this much, nothing extra. This is, again, from Thanissaro, pointing out that this is another way of saying the paragraph that comes in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness Sutta right at the end of each section. After the person has gone through all the different aspects of mindfulness on that foundation—whether mindfulness of body, or feeling, or mind, or mental qualities—this is Thanissaro's translation: "There is mindfulness just to the extent that there is body, or there is feeling, or there is citta, consciousness, or there are dhammas, mental qualities. Mindfulness just that there is body is maintained simply to the extent of knowing and seeing this, and thus he rests independent, not sustained by, not clinging to anything in this world."

Just one moment of pure seeing is entering into that emptiness for a moment. This is really, perhaps, the most subtle but also very accessible to us—perfection of appropriate attention. And in that moment, not only gross or vivid manifestations of the suffering habits of mind aren't being acted out, but even these subtle tendencies are not being fed.

So you all know that. That's kind of the peak, the height of our practice—that which we aspire to every waking moment of the day, right?

But the Buddha, being the practical being it appears that he was, doesn't just say that and then walk away and say, "Okay, it's up to you." He goes on, even just in this one sutta, even in this first section of this one sutta, giving lots of different ways to work at it—all based in wise attention.

So I want to go into some other ways, just in this first part, of how the āsavas are abandoned by seeing—by seeing both wise or appropriate attention and unwise or inappropriate attention.

There's a whole way of describing how both the āsavas and the hindrances are fed by inappropriate or unwise attention that's really quite specific. Attending in the wrong way causes these very subtle tendencies, these habits of our mind, to strengthen. And we're not talking about strengthening anger on the level of going around screaming in the woods and hitting trees. That's one level that's relatively obvious. We're talking on much more subtle levels here, but these levels are very accessible to us when we're in a long, silent retreat like this, just paying attention. You start to notice it without judging.

So it's said that what causes the first of these āsavas, sense desire or desire for sensuality, to arise and increase is unwise attention to gratification in sense pleasure. Not just sense pleasure—that's one thing—but the gratification in the sense. "This really tastes good." For who, you know? Me. "This is so beautiful." And behind it is, "It really makes me feel good." Unwise attention to the gratification in sense pleasure causes the āsava of sense desire to arise and increase.

Unwise attention to gratification in exalted states—meaning high states, meditative states—is what causes the āsava of becoming, of being, to arise and strengthen. Now you might think, "I can't even have—you know, I work all this time and I can't even have a high meditative state." But the teaching didn't say the state itself.

It is unwise attention to the gratification, the clinging, the grasping quality in it. This is really quite profound, because we can actually see this happening.

The third cause is much broader, because it addresses what causes ignorance to arise and increase: unwise attention to any mundane thing in the wrong way. What does this mean? Any mundane thing—mundane means everyday, it means basically everything. Unwise attention to any mundane thing in the wrong way causes ignorance to arise and increase.

The wrong way is, of course, very specific. It is what the Buddha calls perversions, or the turning upside down of perceptions, which we are doing constantly. The four perversions or turning upside down of perceptions are: when we perceive the impermanent as permanent (which, I don't know about you, but that's happening constantly over here); when we perceive the painful as pleasurable; when we perceive what is not-self as self; and when we perceive what is unbeautiful as beautiful.

The first three of these are the three characteristics. We perceive the impermanent as permanent—not seeing anicca, not seeing impermanence. When we perceive the painful as pleasurable, it's not really understanding dukkha. Perceiving not-self as self is not getting anatta. The fourth one, perceiving what is unbeautiful as beautiful, isn't a characteristic that covers all experience. It tends to be more relative to the body—this idea that when we're perceiving our body as this really beautiful thing, this bag of skin over the bones and the blood and the guts and the pus, we don't see all of that. We think, "Wow, isn't this beautiful?"

But I think what's really interesting is this: unwise attention is the proximate or immediate cause for ignorance to arise in a moment. Knowing this is so vital, so helpful. By knowing it, I mean just noticing in a moment how we're attending inaccurately. These upside-down perceptions, these perversions of perception—for example, seeing the impermanent as permanent—lead to a perversion of citta, of thought, of mind. Because then that's how we think about that object or ourselves. And then that leads to perversion of view. That becomes our view: "This is me" or "This is permanent." That leads to our actions in the world.

So it really starts on this most subtle level of perceiving inaccurately and not recognizing it. This is considered āyoniso manasikāra, unwise or inappropriate attention. And just by noticing how this is happening, it can change right back to wise attention. It's not like we're hapless victims, stuck with this with nothing we can do about it.

Let me turn to the five hindrances, because the Buddha speaks about them in the same way—seeing how we pay attention in an unwise or inappropriate way in the moment feeds these hindrances in our mind stream. When we see that, when we pay attention to the appropriate thing in the appropriate way, the hindrances decrease, or if they haven't arisen, they don't arise.

I think this is very useful, not just at the beginning of a retreat. We always talk about hindrances at the beginning of a retreat, and those of you who just came and we've been going on and on might have thought, "Good, now I don't have to hear about the hindrances because the retreat already began." But it's not true that the hindrances just come at the beginning of a retreat. Is that so? Those of you who've been here three months, am I lying?

What is often true is that they come in with a knockout blow at the beginning of a retreat. It's not just subtle sloth and torpor—we can't lift our head off the pillow for three days. They appear in their gross form. But the five hindrances do arise from moment to moment later in retreat as well. This is when it can surprise us, and when learning how to work with wise attention can be both fascinating (you can see I get fascinated with all this) and really liberating.

Instead of just thinking, "Oh my God, my practice was going so well and now ill will and craving are coming and all I can do is wait it out"—doesn't it feel like that sometimes? "I try to know it. It doesn't happen. I just have to wait it out, one foot in front of the other, until it finally goes away and I can keep practicing." Instead of that, we can really learn what's feeding the arising of this hindrance in this moment, or should we have missed that particular subtle moment of its arising, what's feeding its continuing? What can take away the food? What starves the hindrance, as the Buddha talks about it in another way? It doesn't mean you starve it for one second and it's gone forever, but it begins to lose its strength and gets less.

Oh bhikkhus, I will teach you the feeding and the starving of the five hindrances.

The Buddha does the same for the seven factors of awakening, but we're not going to make it there tonight.

So, feeding the hindrances. What is the food for the arising of unarisen sensual desire and for the growth and increase of sense desire once it's already here? What feeds that in the moment? Again, it's the theme of beauty—to give inappropriate attention to the sign of the beautiful, to the beautiful in something, as well as the gratification in it. This fosters the growth and increase of sense desire.

It doesn't mean we don't see anything beautiful. But just notice—someone said, "Oh, it's so beautiful here. It's so beautiful, it's hard to practice." What's happening in that moment? Notice when you walk outside: "Oh, that's beautiful." There's a way of appreciating beauty that's just pure presence, that's inspiring, that's onward leading. And there's a way of "This is so beautiful, I want more, I want more." That's fostering, increasing the habit of wanting, of craving. And we can watch that. We can watch it in a moment.

What's the food for the arising of unarisen ill will or the growth and increase of it? There is the theme of irritation—to foster inappropriate attention to it. See, he's not saying irritation should or will never arise until you're past third stage. But the inappropriate attention to it—I remember Sayadaw U Pandita saying once, it's like a cow chewing its cud. You know, it calls it up from the stomach where it's storing it and chews it over. Even the word we use in English is similar: it ruminates. And that's what we do. There's some irritation, whether it's something from the so-called past or something that happens right now. It happens, it's gone. Maybe there's unpleasant irritation, it's gone. But then we call it up. We ruminate: "I can't believe that person did that. I just can't believe that would happen in a place like this." Or "I can't believe I did that." Or "I can't believe they think the windows shouldn't be open." Whatever it is. We just chew it over and over like a cow chewing its cud. It doesn't take a genius to figure out that's unwise attention. But sometimes we don't think to look in that way—that that's fostering not just ill will in the moment, but the underlying habit for ill will to arise. And this is really what we're learning to starve: this habit.

What's the food for the arising of unarisen sloth and drowsiness and the continuance of it? There is boredom, weariness, yawning, drowsiness after a meal, and sluggishness of awareness—to give inappropriate attention to these things. To really focus, to really let your attention get sucked down into the drowsiness.

The food for the arising of unarisen restlessness and anxiety or remorse—he just says here there is non-stillness of awareness, to foster inappropriate attention to that. But I have another example from another sutta that I really like, one that is much more of a specific example of how we give inappropriate attention to an experience that leads into this restlessness and worry of mind. The Buddha says an ordinary person who regards body as the self, or the self as being in the body—any of those views—when change occurs to this person's body, it becomes different. You're sitting, you're paying attention, some change occurs to your body. Maybe a subtle change, maybe gross. You look in the mirror after a month and it's like, "Oh my god, I can't believe how I look." Whatever it is. Because of this change and alteration in the body, the bhikkhu's consciousness becomes preoccupied with bodily change. Due to this preoccupation with bodily change, worried thoughts arise and persist, laying a firm hold on his mind.

"Oh, that tingle in my knee wasn't there yesterday. Hmm, that tingle, that twitch, it's a little stronger today. Hmm, at the end of the sitting, this tingle is actually stronger and it's spread a little more." When you get up and walk, is it there?

Is it not there? What makes it come? What makes it go? Is it something I should do about it? Can I leave it alone? Do I have to sit differently? Do I need to see a surgeon? On and on it goes—the mind lays a firm hold through this mental obsession. Through this obsession, we become fearful and distressed, and being full of desire and attachment, we become worried.

Can you relate to any of this? Unwise attention to various thoughts leading to a lack of stillness of mind, based of course on the perversion of perception regarding body as self, not expecting it to change. That's an example of unwise attention.

And then there's doubt and uncertainty, which we talked about the other night. Remember, it's in the first sutta where he says—he phrases it differently here—that there are different phenomena that act as a foothold for uncertainty, and to give inappropriate attention to them is the problem. But remember the example I read last week, where he gives examples of things that are not fit for attention, thoughts that lead to doubt: "What was I in past time? Was I in past time? Was I not? Did I exist before? What was I in the past, and what am I going to be in the future? Will I be in the future? What am I now? Having been such in the past, how will it come in the future?"

You could see this in terms of past lives and future lives. You could see it in terms of your last sitting and your next sitting. You could see it in terms of how good your concentration was yesterday and how good it's going to be tomorrow if you keep going like this. You can think, "Well, last retreat I practiced in this way and that happened. What would happen in this retreat if I practice in this way? But now I'm practicing in that way, and this is happening, but maybe this isn't as good as how it was when I practiced that way in the last retreat." This is unwise attention to various phenomena that foster uncertainty.

It's not that these thoughts arise—sure they arise. But giving unwise attention to them is giving them all the power and getting really lost in them.

And of course, what starves the hindrances is just the opposite of these things. The first, of course, is always simple mindfulness. Rather than being lost in how beautiful this is, in the gratification, in "Can I have more?"—just knowing "beautiful, pleasant." That's enough. For all the hindrances, you know that.

But you also know that at times, that just doesn't cut it. It's gone too far down the road. And at that time, the Buddha gives specific things that starve the hindrances. I'll just mention them very briefly.

Lack of food for sense desire is the theme of unattractiveness. In other words, when we're really caught up—say, let's take a vipassanā romance, and the mind invests that person with everything beautiful, with everything wonderful. So, just to be really classical Theravāda about it, try imagining that person, the thirty-two parts of their body. Just imagine their organs, their liver, their intestines. Imagine the blood, the lymph. You don't have to go too far down the road. It's not that you hate them, but the desire just falls away. It doesn't really hold any juice.

You don't have to even be that classical—just look at the basic unattractiveness, the suffering nature of the desire itself. Just don't feed that sense of gratification in the beauty, in the pleasantness. That's all.

It's the same with ill will, although of course there's also the positive turning of the mind towards mettā. When we're really lost in ill will, turning the mind towards mettā can really function as an antidote.

With sloth and torpor, drowsiness, yawning, the Buddha says to arouse energy, to give appropriate attention to energy. I've also found that simply withdrawing the unwise attention to the tiredness, the fogginess, the sloth and torpor—that actually makes a difference.

It stops feeding it.

An example. Again, we're talking about something somewhat subtle here. We're not talking about when you're so exhausted you can't get out of bed, or you're sitting in here and your head's hitting the floor and you open your mouth and it's all sloth and torpor. Then you need a little grosser intervention.

But when you're more quiet in the mind and you can sometimes either just feel it coming in like a wave, or you can notice that things are getting really fuzzy, or there's just that sense of "it's too hard"—that's actually sloth and torpor. "It's just too hard to be with this right now. I think I need a tea." That's actually, in that tone of voice when it comes in my mind, that's not compassionate, skillful means. That's giving unwise, inappropriate attention to the torpor, to the sluggishness. It's kind of letting that mind state be the veil through which the show's being run.

And I found—and believe me, I have inordinate experience with this particular hindrance; it's my old friend, in and out of retreat.

CHAPTER 307

Meeting Aversion With Kindness

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this intimate talk, Carol Wilson examines dosa—the Pāli term encompassing the full spectrum of aversive mental states from mild irritation to rage, from anxiety to self-hatred. She illuminates how these experiences arise not as personal failures but as conditioned responses rooted in our misunderstanding of the First Noble Truth and our mistaken sense of separation.
>
> Drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the two darts (from SN 36.6), Wilson explains how our suffering multiplies not from the initial unpleasant experience itself, but from our reactive resistance to it—the second arrow we shoot at ourselves through self-judgment and denial. She shares personal examples, including a moment of conflict just before the talk, demonstrating how awareness of bodily sensations and the willingness to "dive into the wave" of difficulty can interrupt the cycle of escalating reactivity.
> Wilson offers practical approaches for working with aversion: direct mindfulness of the triggering sense experience, attention to the physical residue of anger and fear, "stomping meditation" for overwhelming emotions, mettā practice as a means of reconnecting rather than overriding difficult feelings, and the cultivation of patience. Through the moving words of Etty Hillesum from the concentration camps and her own healing journey, she points toward the possibility of open-hearted presence even in the midst of suffering—revealing that our willingness to meet unpleasant experience directly, rather than flee from it, is itself the doorway to liberation.

Tonight I want to pick up where Sylvia left off last night, which you may or may not remember. She was beginning to talk about the state of aversion or anger—being with that difficult state. Tonight I want to talk specifically about, in some detail, investigating together these various states of heart and mind that get lumped together under the big title of aversion.

The word in Pali—I like the Pali word just because it's broader and doesn't have all the same limiting connotations we have on aversion in English—the Pali word is dosa, and it covers a wide range of mental states which have in common what we would call aversion, pulling back from the experience. So I'll just read you a few of them: hatred, aversion, ill will, irritation, boredom, resistance, denial, impatience, annoyance, anger, rage, guilt, dislike, depression, sorrow, regret, violence, aggression, cruelty, fear, anxiety, terror, self-judging, self-hatred. That's not the whole list, I'm sure. But it's amazing, isn't it? What a range. And you can imagine, you can feel the underlying similarity.

What's very important in exploring this aspect of our experience is that we hold it in the larger context of the non-deluded heart and mind, that we explore these states from the understanding of truth rather than from the perspective of identification and self-referencing. One of the great difficulties many of us have in really understanding these states of heart and mind and seeing for ourselves how they continue our suffering is that we get so easily identified with them. By even acknowledging their presence, we already feel ten times worse about ourselves just because they're there. And so, of course, we don't even want to look at them. And we just get further and further from the truth.

I think it's really important as we begin looking carefully, exploring, to have a willingness to explore these experiences when they arise for you, to see that it's not personal. It's not who I am. It's not who you are. Aversion and any of these states arise due to habitual conditioning. If we can see that and not identify so strongly, then we can begin to discover how aversion functions to obstruct our connectedness to inner peace, our connectedness to wholeness, to integrity of being, how it obstructs joy and connectedness.

Aversion arises due to lawful conditionings, the root conditioning being ignorance. Aversion arises because we do not know things, we do not know ourselves in their true nature in the moment that aversion arises. We're not understanding or seeing clearly. Because of that not seeing clearly, aversion comes.

The first thing that I think we don't understand fully in a moment when we get lost in any of these states of aversion is actually the First Noble Truth—that all of our struggle with these states of anger, fear, ill will, self-judgment basically stem from not fully opening to and integrating what the Buddha stated: there is unsatisfactoriness in this life, in this mind and body. It's not all unsatisfactory, luckily. But we think it shouldn't be any unsatisfactory. And it's not just individually one or two of us who have that impression while everybody else is clued in to how things are. Really broadly—personally, in our families, in our society—our learned response to sickness, old age, disease, being separated from those we love or from what we want, not getting what we want, having to hang out with what we don't want.

I must say putting 150 people together in a room all day is a great way to begin exploring what it's like to be together with what you don't want and to be separated from what you want. You're sitting here, and you can either be exploring the truth of the First Noble Truth, or we can be going with our normal habits: "This isn't happening; if I don't pay attention, it won't keep happening." Or "It's a mistake that it's happening, and if I get angry enough or figure out the right thing, I can fix it." Or "It's my fault that it's happening because I'm a loser or I'm not spiritual enough." When suffering comes up—and it's not just sitting here, but when you're sick, when something really hard happens in your life—it's really easy to either deny or to turn it inward into some kind of self-blame or self-judgment. In big things and little things.

Society seems to hold, underlying our relationship to the First Noble Truth, the unspoken assumption that if we get it right, suffering's going to stop. Isn't that really it, if you're honest with yourself? Don't you think if you practice right, nothing unpleasant's going to happen anymore? I catch myself in that all the time. And so the unpleasant experience itself—now not the extra suffering of hating and judging, but the unpleasant experience itself—becomes a sign that there's something wrong with us or something wrong with the world.

When we're not deeply understanding the First Noble Truth, we miss that no matter how well we understand the nature of things, no matter how good we are, sometimes bad things happen. That's just the way it is. Aversion arises in the first place because in that moment we're confronted with something unpleasant and there's that underlying tendency: if I can get away from it, everything will be okay; if I can deny it, everything will be okay. Of course, deeply somewhere, we know that's not true. It's just that we don't really know how to meet unpleasant experience wholeheartedly, openheartedly, with kind awareness, so that in that moment, that unpleasant experience can be our access to freedom.

It doesn't have to only be pleasant. But we really don't know how to do it.

And yet somewhere in us, I feel—both personally and culturally—that ability to be open-hearted and courageous in the face of suffering inspires us enormously. Doesn't it? For me, all through history, the writers I'm drawn to, the historical figures I'm drawn to, are most often people who have in some way or other been able to be in the midst of suffering I couldn't even begin to comprehend from my life, and still had the greatness of heart to be present, to be a courageous witness for society in the midst of the suffering, to be open to it without—in fact, not only without losing the beauty, but to see that the suffering, the opening to suffering itself, is our access to truth.

I think it was Jack who was quoting Martin Luther King the other night, just as an example. Incredibly inspiring. Or this woman I've read before, Etty Hillesum, who was in the concentration camps in World War II—a Dutch woman who just naturally had this ability. She wrote diaries; she died in the concentration camps. And I think it touches us so deeply because it awakens that potential in ourselves.

She says: "It is possible to suffer with dignity and without. Most of us in the West don't understand the art of suffering and experience a thousand fears instead. We cease to be alive, being full of fear, bitterness, hatred, and despair. God knows it's only too easy to understand why. I'm in Poland every day on the battlefields, if that's what one can call them. I often see visions of poisonous green smoke. I am with the hungry, with the ill-treated, and the dying every day. But I am also with the jasmine and with that piece of sky beyond my window. There's room for everything in a single life. I sometimes bow my head under the great burden that weighs down on me. But even as I bow my head, I also feel the need, almost mechanically, to fold my hands. And so I can sit for hours and know everything and bear everything and grow stronger in the bearing of it. And at the same time, feel sure that life is beautiful and worth living and meaningful."

Somewhere, I just really trust that even if we don't know it consciously, we know that potential for such open-hearted presence in the face of seemingly unbearable suffering and conflict is the point of real liberation of heart, the point of real freedom. None of you would be sitting here hours on end if somewhere there wasn't that understanding.

But I think it's really easy for us to forget. And in the forgetting, we come back into our old habits, which is that if I can get away from this unpleasant thing, then I'll really be happy. And then we get caught in the cycle of judging when the natural habit of aversion comes up.

So we have to begin by understanding: our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate. Certainly it looks as though I am separate from other people and all other phenomena. As long as we think we're separate, we're going to suffer. We feel we have to defend ourselves. We have to find something in the world that will make us happy.

The response of aversion to what is unpleasant arises exactly from this misconception that I'm separate, that somehow I can hold myself apart from this difficult experience. We don't think it out so clearly, but that's what's going on. And in fact, what happens is that in trying to hold ourselves separate, in trying to achieve happiness that way, we're actually creating the sense of separation—that needing to defend, that fear that I might have to be united with what is difficult. So it's a cycle. From the misconception of thinking we are separate, we act in a way that continues the experience of separation and loneliness and alienation.

The Buddha said that lust—meaning just that thirst, that driven desire—hate, and delusion are each a matter of measurement. What does he mean by that? Lust or hate or delusion, in the moment it's arising in the mind or heart, imposes a sense of limitation, a sense of restriction to the heart and mind, when in actuality the heart, the mind, is limitless, boundless.

Explore this in your time here. The desert is a great way to approach that sense of the limitless heart and mind, the boundless, infinitely spacious heart and mind. If you're just walking in the desert, simply present—nothing special—lifting the foot, seeing the cholla, feeling the breath, smelling whatever, just a step, notice that in that there isn't a sense of limitation or restriction. You're not necessarily thinking, "Oh, incredible, the heart and mind is limitless, boundless." But if you were to bring in your attention, that would be the experience. And the moment that wanting something comes up, or not liking something comes up, there's a sense of limits, of walls, of restrictions coming in.

So our work is learning to understand, not to hate aversion or fear or anger—which is, I think, what we often fall into—but to really be willing to meet it wholeheartedly so that we can understand the truth of who we are. And this requires, I think, first an acceptance of the fact of any of these forms of aversion when they arise in our experience. I don't know if I can overemphasize this, because we say this all the time, but it's really rather hard to do.

I know for myself, in the last few years there was a period when something in my patterning shifted, and I really started to accept the fact that aversion frequently arises in my mind—that it's a very strongly ingrained habit and not who I was. It got to be actually very amusing. I amuse myself a lot with the way aversive thoughts come up.

I don't know if I amuse anyone else with it—that's another thing entirely—but to be able to actually be okay with these states when they come up in your experience... and that doesn't mean acting on them. I'm talking about just really seeing and being okay with these states when they arise. It's amazingly freeing because we're no longer locked in this endless cycle of fighting.

To do this, we need the tools of mindfulness, the tools of acceptance, the willingness to do just the opposite of what everything in us is screaming we need to do. Instead of turning away from the unpleasantness, instead of turning away from our fear and anger, instead of trying to pretend we don't feel it or act it out, we just turn fully into it, knowing that there is the place of peace and rest.

It's counterintuitive and it's a little hard to do. A good friend of mine was telling me how—she's kind of a big lady—her two grown sons, when they go somewhere with big waves at a beach, are always trying to tell her that when a huge wave is coming, you need to turn around and just dive right into it. You just go right under it, no problem. And intellectually, she said, "I know this, but I've only ever been able to do it once. Every other time, as soon as I see it coming, I just turn and run and it clobbers me—just rolls me all over. And they're screaming, 'Dive into it! Dive into it!' I just can't do it."

It's sort of like that. We turn and run and we're clobbered. Or we just say, "No, this isn't happening. It's not coming. I'll just sit here and it'll go away"—and wham. The next thing we know, what started as a minor irritation turns into some kind of murderous rage and we don't know how it happened.

So it begins by really accepting that in our normal state—as the Buddha said, we uneducated worldlings, we normal not-completely-awakened beings—for us, aversion, fear, aggression, irritation, that response to the unpleasant, it's part of life. It's part of our conditioning, it's part of the conditioning of every culture. And by denying it or hating ourselves for it, we're just adding more fear and aversion on top of it.

Sometimes in spiritual practice, I find it's easy to use the ideals against ourselves. You know that, for instance, freedom means the complete uprooting of greed, hatred, and delusion. And then subtly, every time greed or hatred arises, there's this subtle thing in the background: "I'm blowing it. If I were really spiritual, I wouldn't be having this reaction now." And it's really hard then to let it in.

Just as an experiment, I want to share something from Pema Chödrön, something I often read because I find it very inspiring. Just listen a minute. She talks about how every day we could think about the aggression all over the world. All over the world, everybody always strikes out at the enemy and the pain escalates forever. Every day we could reflect on this and ask ourselves, "Am I going to add to the aggression in the world?" Every day, at the moment when things get edgy, we can just ask ourselves, "Am I going to practice peace, or am I going to war?"

Now in one way I find that a wonderful and really helpful idea—when I have enough awareness that I notice I'm edgy, I notice aggression is about to come up, and I have a choice. It's a wonderful reflection: do I want to add to the aggression in the world?

But I don't know—did any of you have a feeling of, "Gee, so here today I was so furious at that person sitting nearby doing that, and all I was doing was adding to the aggression in the world. That isn't why I came here. It's another proof that by being here and allowing these thoughts to come up, I'm adding to the aggression in the world. I'm creating bad karma. I'm a bad person."

It's not so easy to just sit there and feel the shoot of aversion and say, "Oh yeah, that's aversion. That's anger. That's fear." So we have to begin by deeply accepting that it's a part of life. Although every culture deals with it differently, most of the ways we deal with it are coping mechanisms—keeping the aggression kind of under the rug, ways to contain it within the culture. I think that's a good idea; it's better that we should cope with it than just all run amok. But there's also the potential for understanding it. And the understanding is what liberates us, what frees our heart from the grip of fear and aversion.

So we have to start first by really looking at it. I just read this in the newspaper, from Tokyo:

"My intention, honest, was not to scar these Japanese kids for life. I just wanted to give them a fun game to play. It was the fifth birthday party last year for my son Gregory, and he had invited all his Japanese friends over from the Tokyo kindergarten that he attended. My wife and I explained the rules of musical chairs, and we started the music. It was not so awful for the Japanese boys. They managed to fight for seats, albeit a bit lamely, but the girls were at sea. The first time I stopped the music, Gregory's five-year-old girlfriend, Chitose-chan, was next to him right in front of a chair, but she stood politely and waited for him to be seated first. So Gregory scrambled into her seat, and Chitose-chan beamed proudly at her own good manners. Then I walked over and told her she had just lost the game. She gazed up at me, her eyes full of shocked disbelief, looking like Bambi might after a discussion of venison burgers."

"You mean I lose because I'm polite?" Cheetos-chan's eyes asked. "You mean the point of the game is to be rude?"

It's true. I guess that is the point. And he just goes on to reflect about the difference between the values of American and Japanese culture. In Japan, he asks, how else could a country the size of California with 125 million people packed into it—that's half of the U.S. in California—how else could they maintain it?

So he says, maybe that's one reason that Japan has few armed robbers, but also so few entrepreneurs. The American emphasis on winning may help explain why the United States consistently racks up Olympic gold medals, but also why its hockey players trashed their rooms in Nagano when they lost.

But every culture—it comes out in here at the end. Little Cheetos-chan, while she may be polite, shortly after the game of musical chairs, she and her friend Naoko-chan got into an argument over a party favor. Cheetos-chan slugged Naoko-chan in the mouth and grabbed the toy.

It's there, you know. It's there. It comes out one way or the other, however our culture tries to contain it. So we need the culture, but the point of resting at ease is that we really understand and can be there in the middle of losing the toy, or losing the game, or losing our best friend. And we can be there in that uncertainty and not lose our peace.

So let's begin by actually exploring the experience of any of these forms of aversion when they arise. Whenever you notice a moment of aversion, irritation, or fear, in the moment of its arising, it's always arising as a response to one of the six sense experiences that's happening here and now. We might not recognize it, but there's an unpleasant sound and a moment of irritation, or maybe there's an unpleasant memory and a stab of fear, or an unpleasant physical sensation and a moment of irritation or anger or terror. Even when we're furious at something that happened ten years ago, it was still triggered by a sense experience arising in this moment. The memory of ten years ago is a thought arising in this moment.

We of course won't always be able to see that, but one of the great things about these retreats is you can take the little things and explore how it works, because it works just the same in the big things.

So in that moment of an unpleasant sound arising and we don't like it, there's aversion or irritation or anger—what's your actual experience? Tune into the reactive experience. How does it function? It's as if internally what I feel—but look for yourself—it's almost physical, as all the attention, the mind, the heart, almost physically shrinks back away from that experience. It really makes a gap. We don't want to touch it. We don't want to recognize it. We don't want to know it. Really trying to hold ourselves separate.

And into that gap, because wherever there's a gap the attention isn't connected, it's as if somehow that leaves room for all kinds of really fascinating stuff to come up. And since you're seeing it through the filter of aversion at that moment, what will come up is all the stories about it, the interpretations, more reaction, maybe self-judgment, and a whole cycle. What's actually happening is that we don't really know what the particular experience is that's triggering it, because we're not connected with our attention.

I mean, we give this instruction all the time: something simple and repetitive like a sound in the hall that you can keep going back to. When you find your enormous reaction, there's thoughts and feelings and emotions and they're spinning and they just seem to cycle more and more until pretty soon that person who's making that noise is somewhere equivalent to the great tyrants of the world as far as their insensitivity and the amount of suffering that they're creating. We just project everything into them, followed by a deep sense of unworthiness for having had such a horrible thought. And then we turn the whole mess back on ourselves. And we never actually meet the sound, which is just a poor little sound arising, an experience not really doing anything—and we're gone.

This can go on for hours, days, weeks. What's really interesting to observe about the quality of both anger and fear—those are sort of the two sides of aversion—is how in one moment of its arising, the physiological effects are really quite strong. Dan Goleman talks about this in his book Emotional Intelligence. If you have a moment of not liking something, of anger, you really feel it in your body. In fact, if you watch over time, it leaves a real residue. Even when your mind doesn't feel angry anymore, the body is still holding on to it, still buzzing.

And it leaves this real residue. What happens is the residue itself is unpleasant. And so before it's quite gone away, even though the mind might be calm again, the next unpleasant thing that arises, just the slightest aversion triggers that residue that didn't really go away. And so the physical reaction is even stronger. It can be that what starts as a very mild irritation, but we don't really bring awareness to it, ends up so furious—where just some little thing triggers you to such an extent that you explode and you're really surprised. Why did that happen?

Because we didn't really notice the residue, the physical residue building. So without our mindfulness, it's really important to see how this becomes a self-perpetuating cycle.

The first line of understanding how aversion works is this: if it's something relatively mild, see if you can notice what sense experience is triggering the aversion or fear right now. And then you dive into the wave. You bring your attention right into that experience instead of trying to get away from it. This is our place of clear seeing and peace. Everything in you will say, "No, no, no." But if you really dive in, it's like, "Oh, hearing." You can do it with this buzz in the room. When it starts to bug you, instead of moving away and pretending it doesn't happen, go into it. It's just a buzz. We can do this all the time.

Sometimes what happens is this—when Sylvia talked about a kind of grumpy mind, you know, and you're just going on all day grumbling about everything. Every little thing that comes into experience, every sight, every person, you just have some really negative reaction. And you can't really figure out why psychologically. You don't know what's going on.

This happens to me often. I've noticed on retreat, one time I was doing walking meditation and I felt really present. I was noticing all the mental experience which was moving from mildly unpleasant to extreme self-judging to running through a litany of everything wrong I ever did to anybody back to the third grade. And suddenly I kind of pulled back and said, "What's going on here?" And I noticed I wasn't paying any attention to my physical experience. When I tuned in physically, there was a really mild pain in my toe—really mild—but not noticing it. Every time I took a step, I was just pushing it slightly out of the range of awareness. And so there was a slight aversion, a pulling away. Denial is a form of aversion. And through that veil of aversion, all the thoughts that were arising were taking that color and turning into self-judgment.

I notice this a lot when I'm tired. I used to get really annoyed and cranky and irritable at everything when tired. It took me years to figure out that if I turn my attention to my body, it's really uncomfortable when I'm tired. It doesn't feel good. All I have to do is notice that. "Oh yes, unpleasant." And that's all that's happening. But because it's something going on sort of subliminally all day, whenever we move away from it and get a little off balance, a little spaced out, the aversion comes in. We don't notice it and we get involved in our reactions to something else.

A friend of mine told me once after I was talking about this, "Yeah, I tuned in. I'd been really in a nasty mood and I saw that my sweatshirt was a little too tight." And that's all that was going on. He had worked up all these stories all day and his sweatshirt was a little tight.

So sometimes when you find yourself getting into a state and you don't notice anything obvious, just open up a little bit. What's happening now? Just tune in. It can be so minor. And without our awareness of it, it can turn into a really big thing.

And then, of course, there are plenty of times when either the anger, the aversion, or the fear is not minor. It doesn't just get triggered from some little sound—or whatever triggers it, forget it, you're never going to know—because it comes rushing up in a huge wave of emotion. Sometimes that's the hardest for us to really accept, to be willing to be with. There's this sense of, "I've been going along really well, quite mindful, quite aware, cultivating metta, and suddenly from nowhere there's this wave of anger or self-loathing or aggression." Sometimes it's really hard to just accept that as another impersonal cloud.

So when it's strong like that, it's helpful just to move into the energy itself. The acceptance is so key because without it, we get back into that cycle of "this shouldn't be happening, I shouldn't be doing this," and pretty soon we're way down the road.

I'll give you a personal example from about forty-five minutes ago. Thanks to Franz, who I think deliberately planned this to give me something to talk about. He didn't do anything wrong. I was out walking in the desert just before this—really spacious, happy, open, peaceful. When we're no longer suppressing things, I think this is really key, because a lot of the way we deal with fear and strong anger is to pretend we don't feel it. So it will come up in these rushes when we're really open and spacious and not in our normal mode of suppression.

I came back in this really open, happy space. We started having a discussion about making travel plans for the future—that's really a great discussion to get into just before giving a talk. Within two minutes—"I want to do it this way," "I want to do it this way"—well, not even two minutes, ten seconds, I went from being really open and spacious to this huge uprush. We could call it aversion, or anger, or "I'm not getting what I want," or "I might not get what I want in the future." And whoosh.

And it's really amazing to just watch that come up. Okay, so I didn't, the first second it came up, say, "Wow, isn't this amazing?" I have to acknowledge it took a couple of minutes. And in that couple of minutes, you could really see how—I mean, we both started like this, and then we both said, "Okay, cool it." Because you could really see: you don't need to do this now. Cool it.

But there's that residual burning, that ash going on in the body. So we say "cool it," but then, you know, we start off again. Okay, cool it. Then the other one: "Yeah, but in fact..." Okay, really cool it. And then the recognition of it.

I know years ago I would have piled on top of that a whole layer of, "I can't believe you're still so infantile to get so upset about something like that. And just before talking you were so open, and now it's ruined, and you're never going to feel open again." And that ensures the fact that you don't feel open again. Believe me. Take it from me. You don't have to do that.

And instead, I could see that starting. We could both see the tendency to want to keep going until one of us battered the other into submission. And we just said, "Okay, you know, cool it." And he went out for a walk and I just stared at the wall for a while. And I just started doing what I'm suggesting you do. I'm here to tell you that it works.

Pay attention. And I saw that actually quite quickly it went away from my mind. I didn't really stay in this tight space. But it doesn't go away from the body nearly so quickly. So I could just feel the reverberations in my body and the tightness and the burning. So I just paid attention to that. And that's all it is, you know—just sensations in the body, tightness and burning.

And as soon as I would start spacing out—this is why the awareness, the willingness to come and be with it with kind awareness, is so important. Not figuring out who's right or wrong or anything, but just being with the sensations, it's fine. As soon as I'd stop that and kind of space out or drift back into the conversation, or "maybe this or that," whoosh—the whole thing was really ready to get triggered again, basically from the uncomfortable physical sensations. That's really what the aversion was too. Fascinating to watch.

If you don't take it personally, it doesn't have to go down that road. We're not talking about being saints here, but you can really see: ah, this is what it is. It arises not in my control, and often at the most unexpected times. Can I still bring in my awareness? And the power of our willingness to just be present and see what's what is really quite liberating.

Sometimes—I mentioned this in the last retreat—the strength of the anger or fear is way beyond any ability to just sit and notice the sensations. So then you need to move. Like I mentioned, stomping meditation, and quite a few people told me that was really helpful. You go out, you just let the energy of anger and fear move in your body. Stomping, stomping, anger, anger. Really, just let it be. Acknowledge it. We don't need to suppress it in denial, and we don't need to stomp on somebody's face. We just need to acknowledge the energy's there and let it move. We don't have to build a "me story" around it.

It's not the being with the unpleasantness that's the suffering. It's not even the anger that's the suffering. It's that sense of coagulation of "this is me and there's something wrong with me." That's really what creates the alienation and separation. Anger or fear are just clouds that move through when we notice them. They're just another aspect of unsatisfactory experience, of the First Noble Truth. When we make it me—my anger, my suffering, my self-judgment—then it's solid. Then we're in alienation and separation.

So like Joko Beck says, can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and the uncertainty? So in that example, could I find in myself a willingness to rest in "we didn't figure out what we're going to do, and maybe I won't get what I want"—and just rest there?

It's like, yes, it's fine for the moment. It doesn't mean it won't come back, but can we rest there? It's really hard. We don't really like to rest in pain and unpleasant experience. We're really afraid of it. We're afraid of even the thought of it.

I've noticed in myself the incredible lengths I will go to in order to avoid what I think will be an unpleasant experience in the future. You might recognize this tendency in yourselves occasionally.

I think it was last year—well, this happens all the time, but this was a particular example. A really good friend whom I hadn't seen for years wanted me to come and teach a weekend with him somewhere in Canada. The only available date would have been incredibly squeezed in my schedule. It was really clear from an impersonal point of view that it was crazy to even think about it. I would have just made myself sick and exhausted.

But it took me weeks to actually call and tell him I couldn't do it. Every time I thought about it, the unpleasant thought arose—oh, he's going to be mad at me, he's not going to like me, it's going to make him feel bad. That unpleasant thought would come, and I'd pull back from it. I couldn't just be with it.

I got so afraid of the imagined unpleasantness of the experience—telling him and having to experience him getting mad at me—that I seriously considered going to teach the retreat, never mind what it would do to me, just so I wouldn't have to call him up and hear him say he was disappointed.

Finally, when I saw that clearly, I thought, this is nuts. This is really nuts. I called him up. Of course, he was fine. He didn't really mind at all. But I was willing to make myself ill to avoid future unpleasantness that I had just made up anyway—really springing from the unpleasant thought in this moment of, oh, he might not like me anymore.

Do you ever notice yourself doing something like that? Actually creating so much more difficulty in the process than if we just said, oh yeah, right, this is how it is.

With both fear and aversion, when we are lost in them—not just their presence, but when their presence is guiding our judgments—they're not such good guides. We don't make such good judgments because we're not connecting with what's actually happening. That's the way these states function, and so our judgments are distorted, our perceptions are distorted.

Last year I read a sutta from the Buddha where he talks about the two darts—some of you may remember that, the two arrows. He's asking what's the difference between an untaught ordinary worldling, which is us, and a fully awakened being. Both experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. Do you remember that? Awakened beings also experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. It's the same.

So he asks, what's the difference? He says when an unawakened person experiences an unpleasant bodily feeling, he worries and grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he weeps and is distraught. He thus experiences two kinds of feelings—a bodily feeling and a mental feeling. It's as if a man were pierced by a dart, and following the first piercing, he is hit by a second dart. In fact, we ourselves shoot the second dart at ourselves. So he experiences feelings caused by two darts.

We have an unpleasant sensation or an unpleasant emotion, and then we shoot at ourselves the dart of "we're bad, this shouldn't be happening, I hate it, I want to get rid of it, I'm afraid of it"—and we're completely lost.

And then he says that for one who experiences the second dart, you get in the habit of resisting and resenting that painful feeling. So it's not just the one dart; we really get in the habit of shooting darts at ourselves whenever there's an unpleasant feeling.

But he doesn't stop here. He says that since the only escape an unawakened person knows from painful feelings is to go out and look for pleasant sense experience, we get caught in this cycle forever—resenting the unpleasant, going out to look for the pleasant—until we stop and just look at that first painful feeling. Which is what an awakened person does.

He is, if a man is pierced by a dart but was not hit by a second dart following the first one—so an awakened person, when touched by a painful feeling, experiences one single feeling. That's all. It's like when Jack was quoting Suzuki Roshi: you absolutely believe your eyes and ears. It's just what it is—a painful feeling, an unpleasant sound, a scary memory.

This tendency to judge ourselves for experiencing dukkha, for experiencing suffering, can really escalate. We get lost in the judgment, the second dart, rather than being able to come back to the actual experience.

I want to give another example from my life of how it can be more complicated than just an unpleasant sound. Ten years ago, I started experiencing a lot of physical symptoms of a particular condition—though I didn't know I had it then. The symptoms included a lot of physical pain and a kind of stiffening of the joints and the skin. By the time it was diagnosed, it turned out to be one of these conditions they know nothing about—the kind that could either kill you or stay as it is or get better. And who knows why you get it, and who knows what makes it better? The whole field is open for projection.

It took me a long time to realize what went on during that period of about a year or so when I first began experiencing all these escalating conditions. The normal things—pain, limitations, fear of the future, a sense of self-judging—I could pretty well watch my mind around the fear of the future and say, "Okay, I don't know what's happening, come back to here." I was so grateful for my practice for that. But the underlying self-judgment that it was happening at all slipped by. I really didn't notice that for a long time.

And that sense of feeling betrayed somehow by my body—so rather than feeling connected and compassion for the body, it was really this sense of, "You betrayed me." On an even subtler level, I felt betrayed by my mind, because of this new age belief that if you're truly spiritual and all your thoughts are correct, you can cure any illness. You know how that kind of thing sometimes seeps into the culture? It's true that a lot of our emotions and our physical experience are connected—I'm not saying they're not. But if you follow that belief to its logical conclusion, then any great spiritual master would never die, right? Because they were completely spiritual, and your body would never break down or get diseased. I didn't notice this operating in me for a while.

When I finally saw what was happening, I realized the physical sensations themselves were unpleasant but not unbearable. I wasn't in agony. But in meeting those sensations unconsciously, they would serve as a reminder or actually reinforce this sense of worthlessness, of being a spiritual failure, that my body had betrayed me, that I was no good. The first dart—the physical sensations—was unpleasant but quite workable. The second dart was so much more unpleasant that you don't even want to feel it.

After a while I realized I was completely out of touch with my body. It was like I was walking around about ten feet away from my body, because if I felt the sensations, then I would have to feel, along with them, all the sense of worthlessness and failure. So I just checked out altogether. The aversion and the fear just grew and grew until they became my worldview.

What actually changed was a combination of practice—two aspects of practice that I think are very helpful with fear and aversion: the direct connection with the sensations themselves, and metta and compassion toward them. I was actually doing a Tibetan healing practice. This old Tibetan lama, he must have been in his eighties, just showed up at IMS one day. I came back from the store or wherever, and some friend had brought him along. He was one of those great beings who just beamed, seemed filled with light. He didn't speak English. I think it was Sharon who went over and told him, "Oh, Carol's going through all this stuff. Could you do some blessing?" So, who knows what he did? He mumbled some things, bonked me on the head, and said, "Okay, say this Tibetan mantra. It's a healing mantra in Tibetan." I have no idea what it means—just two short lines—and he said to do a healing visualization.

So I was teaching a three-month course, and I'd sit there. We'd give the Vipassana instructions, and I'd be sitting there going "Bekanze, bekanze," doing my healing mantra. At first I was thinking, "This is going to cure me. This is going to make everything okay. This is going to get rid of it all." That's usually our idea of going into the difficulty, right? But that's not going into the difficulty—that's more aversion. Still, you start out that way.

What the effect of doing this practice actually was, was that it brought my attention fully into meeting the physical experience. So I was present with the unpleasant sensations, actually, for the first time in a long time. I met them with kind attention.

Kind attention just cuts through all that second dart judgment business. It's simply what it is. And then I saw—instead of taking it so personally—oh, this poor body, it's hurting. This is hard for it. And so I've been hating it when actually it's suffering.

There arose a sense of compassion, fairly impersonal, that again led into a deeper connection. And in that connection with the source of the difficulty, the other stuff really went away—maybe not completely, but almost completely. None of that self-judging, or "I did something wrong," or "my body's betrayed me"—I can really say that since then I've hardly ever had a thought like that. And I'm also, I mean, who knows why things reverse, but I'm not in that state anymore. Physically I feel fine, so I'm not in pain or anything like that. You never know why, but I saw that once I was in touch with what was happening, the extra darts fell away. I could also make much wiser decisions about how to respond. Because as you know, there are a hundred million possibilities—everybody you know will come forward with suggestions: try this, eat this, do that, try that. It's overwhelming. But you can actually make intelligent, wise discrimination when you're not lost in fear and aversion.

So seeing this cycle of the first dart and the second dart, recognizing the second dart and understanding "I don't have to do this"—but the only way not to do it is to come fully into that first painful feeling.

This deep connectedness, diving into the wave—this is the point of liberating understanding. You don't do it once. I know this is what we'd like. We do it once, we have liberating understanding, and it's done forever. Sorry. I used to think that for years. But that's actually not a helpful thing to think, because—assuming nobody in this room has had that moment of totally liberating understanding after which you haven't experienced any moment of greed, hatred, or delusion—that assumption makes liberation into something always somewhere out there. It's a very self-defeating way to hold the idea.

The fact is, there can be hundreds, thousands, millions of moments of touching this self-liberating understanding, where you dive into the wave and meet it just as it is. In that, we can discover the sure heart's release, the place of peace, the vastness of who we really are. And your knee still hurts. And that disgusting noise is still going on. And your back is still paining you. And the heater still makes a heck of a racket. It doesn't matter.

The thing is, that moment is just that moment. In the next moment, we have to be just as awake, just as present. And when we're not, it's okay. Because then there's the next moment, where there's again this opportunity—no matter what's arising—to practice diving into the wave instead of getting lost in fear and denial and hating our aversions.

Mark Epstein says, "It's our fear of experiencing ourselves directly that creates suffering." It's not the painful thing itself. Our practice is to learn how to experience ourselves directly, and often that includes aversion.

I want to quickly list some of the things I've mentioned that really help you be present within fear and aversion when they're happening, rather than just falling into habits of reaction.

The first is what I've mostly talked about: mindfulness—meeting it directly, feeling the aversion, feeling the fear, noticing if you can come right to the sense impression that's eliciting the aversive reaction. Or if it's really big, just doing stomping meditation, but feeling the aversion, the anger, the fear, rather than keeping it going by feeding into thoughts. The thoughts about it, the story—they're there, they're part of it. But let your attention be with the experience itself. Or when flashes of negativity and fear arise and you can't figure out why, open up and see if there's some subtle background unpleasant experience happening—being tired, your sweatshirt's too tight, something you don't notice but that's coloring your whole day.

A sense of humor also helps a lot.

Sometimes anger, rage, or fear can come up so strongly, way beyond even stomping meditation, where you feel truly overwhelmed. You can't quite bring mindfulness to it because it hits that kind of residue and cycles more and more. Even coming back to feeling your body shoots you back into the cycle of anxiety, pain, fear, and aversion. Then it's very helpful to bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy—consciously balance your perception. It's wonderful here with the desert because you can go out and just look at the space. That really helps me not take whatever's happening so seriously. It's just so vast. What difference does my little concern make?

Or Thich Nhat Hanh talks about the overwhelming suffering during the Vietnamese war and how he would tell the workers to consciously do something as minor as going to smell the herbs at night, to go out in the field and just be with nature. That doesn't deny the suffering and the pain, but it broadens our perception. It takes our mind from just being in this loop of aversion and fear and turns it elsewhere. This really helps to balance the awareness. Then you can come back and see what's what.

Or moving the body—walking faster, running. Sometimes aversion and fear, we have a big story about it, but you can experience it as simply energy. Once I woke up in this wave of fear, and I spent the day psychologizing this and that. I didn't find any good reason for it. I was visiting my sister, and she dragged me to the gym, which is not something I normally do. I was just sitting on the exercise bike, bored—exercise, exercise, exercise, watching fear, fear, exercise, exercise. And I suddenly noticed that without any story or any big psychological understanding, the energy I was calling fear just broke up and moved out.

I thought, that's really interesting. I could just go ride an exercise bike instead of years of therapy, once in a while. Not always. Sometimes it's really helpful to know why. But sometimes it really doesn't matter. It can just move out. We don't have to build so much "me" around it.

Metta practice, compassion practice. Not as we often think—"Oh, I don't want to feel anger, so let me do metta. I hate this person, may they be happy." And then we wonder why it doesn't work. When you do metta for a long period, you find yourself saying things like that. I would find myself saying, "May you be filled with suffering." Time to back off and see what's going on here.

What metta actually does is help us connect, believe it or not. It doesn't override the fear and aversion. What it does is bring us back into connection with the fearful or aversive thing. And that's where we're back in the place of wholeness, back in the place of integrity. Our separation, our dream of separation, is broken. We're back in connectedness. That's really what metta practice does—it lets us see the unity that we already are. It's not just some kind of thought control, although it seems like it.

And the last thing is patience, which is actually an aspect of metta. The willingness to just keep coming back over and over to meet what's happening as best we can, seeing there's still aversion, just being patient with meeting that. This is a huge aspect of practice. I don't think we're very good with it in this culture. I don't really think patience is a virtue that has a lot of support. If you make a long-distance call here, it rings three times and the mechanical voice comes on and says, "Well, they're not answering." I think, give them a chance! It's just so embedded in the culture. Patience is an aspect of metta. It's what helps us connect.

To close, I'll share a story of a man I met at a retreat who told me that for ten years he'd been in therapy because he was so filled with rage and anger. He held on to every slight. He had so much judgment, so much anger, so much negativity. And he said the ten years of therapy—and I don't mean to be saying therapy isn't helpful, it can be very helpful, I just realized it could sound like that—he said it didn't really quite touch the roots of it.

And then he got stomach cancer. He was telling me this while he still had the stomach cancer. And in that difficult situation, when we're finally faced with what we can't deny anymore, can't suppress, can't fix—when we're up against the wall and we have to open into it. I don't know why we wait until we're up against the wall, our heads hitting the bricks, but we do before we let go, a lot of the time.

So when he was faced with his stomach cancer, he said, "Oh my gosh, this is where I hold all that rage, all that anger, all these years. Anytime anything unpleasant happens, that's where I hold a grudge."

And then he said something so interesting—now that he couldn't hold it, he didn't. It just didn't stick. Difficult things would come and he was right there, and there was just no residue. It didn't stick because he wasn't afraid of it anymore.

So I wish for all of us that we don't have to wait till that point in our lives. We don't have to be up against the wall. We can understand the reactions of aversion and fear and anger. We don't have to be afraid of them. And when we can understand them, then we really understand the way that being caught in them obstructs our freedom. It's not the unpleasant experience itself.

This understanding is really available to us in maybe fifty percent of our moments—when we have an unpleasant experience. The other times, when it's pleasant or neutral, we have other opportunities to see through the craving. But really, any unpleasant experience that arises the rest of the night and tomorrow—think of it as a place to practice freedom. We can be really happy that these things arise.

I'm only kidding a little bit.

CHAPTER 308

Wise Attention

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this luminous talk, Carol Wilson examines the profound teaching of yoniso manasikāra —wise attention—as the gateway to what Tibetan teachers call "resting in natural great peace." She explores how moments of pure presence, characterized by an exquisite balance of vivid wakefulness and non-clinging, reveal our true nature and are accessible to everyone, whether watching leaves fall or experiencing deep concentration states.

Wilson offers a beautiful translation of the Pāli term yoniso manasikāra: "an active quality of mind that is nurturing"—from yoni (womb) suggesting protection and nurturance, combined with manasikāra (mental action). She distinguishes wise attention from unwise attention by examining how we pay attention and what we pay attention to. Unwise attention increases the torments of mind (greed, hatred, delusion), while wise attention allows them to diminish and wholesome states to arise. She explores how we get subtly seduced by pleasant experiences (mistaking pleasant for "good") and repelled by unpleasant ones (equating unpleasant with "bad"), even when we think we're being mindful.

The talk offers practical guidance for working skillfully when caught in mental torments: first returning to bare present-moment experience, then if needed directing attention elsewhere (hearing, seeing), contemplating inspiring thoughts, or simply resting. Wilson emphasizes that the motivation behind our skillful means matters greatly—whether we act from genuine wish for balanced awareness or from aversion and self-judgment. She invites practitioners to trust their capacity to rest at ease as their true home, more fulfilling than any seduction of saṃsāra.

If you remember how Steve ended his talk last night—all of 24 hours ago, or perhaps a lifetime ago—he was speaking of wisdom and the luminous nature of heart, of mind, and how wisdom really means to rest in that, just to rest. Which, at about this time in the retreat, might sound good. Just rest instead of trying so hard all the time. I want to talk a bit about that tonight. About resting.

This is from Nyoshul Khenpo:

Rest in natural great peace, this exhausted mind, beaten helpless by karma and neurotic thought, like the relentless fury of the pounding waves in the infinite ocean of samsara.

Now remember the first line: rest in natural great peace. We get lost in the other part.

This resting in natural great peace, in the luminous nature of heart or mind, is possible through an exquisite balance of innate wakefulness, of vivid wakefulness, and the heart, the mind of non-clinging. These two together. And what I want to talk about tonight—in many ways we talk about it all the time—is this balance of our practice, just one way of talking about this balance through wise attention, that can allow us again and again to rest in natural great peace, in vivid wakefulness and letting go.

Now this balance, this exquisite balance, is something that I'm sure we all experience in many moments—if you're not looking for it to last through the whole day or the whole retreat or the rest of your life. If you're content to notice a moment, they manifest really just as one of those moments of pure presence. Nothing specific, good, bad, pleasant, unpleasant need be happening.

An example from the poet Denise Levertov, just these moments—she calls the poem "Living":

The fire in leaf and grass, so green it seems each summer the last summer. The wind blowing, the leaves shivering in the sun. Each day, the last day. A red salamander, so cold and so easy to catch, dreamily moves his delicate feet and long tail. I hold my hand open for him to go. Each minute, the last minute.

Just how that exquisite sense of presence reveals the universe to us, the whole truth. And it doesn't have to be anything special. And it's nothing special we do. That's the catch, isn't it? We can't make it happen. And we spend so much time trying. But we do experience it.

Just the other day, two different people were expressing experiences like this in different ways. One describing sitting in the dining room and just being so present with hearing. And if you think of what you're hearing—you're hearing spoons crash and dishes rattle and scooping and scraping and chairs pushing. But that exquisite presence with hearing, just so here, so present, resting in the moment. And someone else describing walking down by Gaston Pond, and it was more an experience of seeing, just noticing the leaves and the water and the animals, and it just became such a moment of presence with the infinite movement of the universe. Different aspects reveal themselves.

In a moment like that, whatever it is that's happening, there's a sense—at least for me, how I would describe it—of pure presence, of real fulfillment. It's so clear there's nothing lacking and nothing to want. In those moments you don't sit there thinking, "How can I balance my concentration and energy? How can I get my awareness to be more choiceless?" These things are important. But the point of all the skillful means is to re-recognize our natural home, the luminous nature of awareness, of pure presence. In a moment like that, skillful means are not necessary.

And we can't hold onto it. We can't make it happen. And I think—this is my opinion—that all of the skillful means and the instructions we give and the ways that we work in our practice are not to make progress toward some state like this. This isn't a state that we can hold on to. It's resting at ease in whatever arises. Our skillful means are to help us come back into this balance of vivid wakefulness and letting go on all the different, various levels of perception—from the very refined states that come from deep concentrated practice to a moment of watching movement on the lake. One isn't better than another.

This resting in natural great peace is our birthright. It's what's true for us. It's more about learning how to recognize and trust this rather than taking our refuge in all the seductions of papañca—our mind and our interpretations.

I've talked about the vivid wakefulness, the pure presence. Now I want to read an example from Dudjom Rinpoche about the letting go aspect.

"In quietly sitting, body still, speech silent, mind at peace, let thoughts and emotions, whatever rises, come and go without clinging to anything."

What does this state feel like? Dudjom Rinpoche used to say: imagine a person who comes home after a long, hard day's work in the fields and sinks into her favorite chair in front of the fire. She's been working all day and knows that she's achieved what she needed to achieve. There is nothing more to worry about, nothing left unaccomplished. She can let go completely of all her cares and concerns, content simply to be.

Just relax into your armchair in front of the fire—but don't turn on the TV, which is where we usually go with that. We think if we relax, we can't just be wakeful; we've got to dull out. And that's where we go adrift on the relaxing side of things.

So just imagine: Could you practice like that? Nothing to worry about? Nothing more to achieve? Content simply to be? Is that a possibility in mindfulness practice? It is.

When you meditate, it is essential to create the right inner environment of the mind, of the heart. Effort and struggle come from not being spacious—spaciousness meaning the non-reacting heart and mind.

These moments of equipoise, a heart and mind of non-clinging but vividly present and awake—how do we get there? How do we make it stay? We're going to try, and of course, that's what makes it go.

Most of our skillful means, as we discuss them, are ways of bringing our inner environment of mind and heart into this balance of wakefulness and letting go. That's why we talk from so many different angles—because conditions are always changing. Whether we talk about balancing the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom; whether we talk about balancing the seven factors of enlightenment—mindfulness, and then the three active ones of investigation, rapture, and energy, and the three calming ones of calm, concentration, and equanimity—we talk about balancing them. We might talk about wise effort. Tonight, what I'm going to talk about is wise attention.

It's easy to turn any of these into a project, into something to do perfectly, into something to get. And it's just the same old thing—we get sidetracked into the arising appearances, which in this case might be energy and concentration, instead of recognizing that the skillful means is in service of this balance of being purely present. And then we let go of skillful means.

Notice how we get caught in the idea of progress. We can turn anything into getting caught in the idea of progress, as if there's some stable place to get to. It's so easy to forget that liberation of heart and mind isn't about getting anything or getting rid of anything, but about seeing the shift in the heart and mind's relationship to experience, to ourselves. It's really about recognizing what is true—what we really are, what experience truly is—in a different way. We don't actually have to change any experience, and we can't anyway. Only our recognition of things is affected. We recognize natural great peace more readily, with more trust, with more faith, and hopefully we get less seduced by all the diversions.

Let me talk about that a bit. I'm sure you've noticed in all the various instructions that are given, both in the morning instructions and the answers to questions in the hall, how you can pick any one and within a day or two, someone will say the opposite. Be precise. Be spacious. Really note every single moment. And then you come into an interview and we say, "Would you go for a walk and stop paying attention for a while?" It's very confusing. And if you try to do all of it, you'll just explode.

How do I be precise and spacious at the same time? How do I be non-clinging but never let one arising moment of experience come without being right there noting it? How do I connect and sustain and at the same time be really receptive and non-manipulative? You try to do it all at once and you feel like you're going crazy.

Tonight I want to add another one to your arsenal.

I want to talk about something translated as "wise attention"—a reference point I'll describe in a moment. The short definition is: how we pay attention, and what we pay attention to.

Imagine a moment like I was describing before. Just a simple simplicity of presence. Nothing special, but there's really that equipoise, that balance of heart and mind that allows the resting in awareness to be so noticeable, so tangible. Whatever's arising is fine. How fulfilling that is, without our even realizing it.

And then, in the next moment, a smell can arise, or a sound, or a thought—say, an unpleasant sound. From this moment of pure presence, that sound lands: "I can't believe it. That person's opening the window again." In a moment, we're completely entranced by the particular experience, its pleasantness or unpleasantness, our reactions to it. We're entranced and seduced, and even if we know what's happening, there's a way we've completely lost sight or recognition of even the possibility of resting at ease in natural awareness—where we might be aware of the unpleasant sound, the not-liking, how it reminds us of our father, all of this—but we're really entranced by it.

How do we get so seduced? How do we get so distracted? Because what really happens isn't that somehow the luminous nature of mind and heart is gone and there's only this being lost and clinging and aversion. It's just that we've gotten distracted. We've stopped paying attention to resting at ease, and we're back into me and mine, you and yours, how things should be, and so on.

When we talk about the mind and heart that's undistracted, it's really the mind and heart that can recognize the potential of resting at ease, even when all this other mishigas is going on. Because it's going to go on. Resting at ease doesn't mean this other stuff stops. It means it goes on and we recognize just what's happening. Natural great peace doesn't care, really, what's happening.

So we lose recognition. The truth doesn't vanish, but we're taking refuge in the wrong place. This would be an example of unwise attention.

Wise attention, as the Buddha describes it, involves how we pay attention—which is largely mindfulness—and what we pay attention to: what is fit for attention and what is not.

Now, all you self-judgers, I want you to be really aware of this, because I can just sense how self-judgment immediately leads to: "That's right, all these negative things arising in my mind are bad, they're unfit for attention, and because I'm noticing them, I'm caught in unwise attention." That's not true. That's not what the Buddha was saying.

He talks about wise attention as knowing what things are fit for attention and what are not. What is not fit for attention, in this translation, is anything we pay attention to in a way that increases the torments of mind already present, or allows torments of mind that have not arisen to arise.

For example, that unpleasant sound—you notice it, but you really go into it: "Yeah, it's really unpleasant. I really can't believe it. I'm so angry." The more you pay attention in that way, the more you get lost in anger. Or it can be desire. You're sort of aware of it—you can describe later what happened—but there's a way that paying attention, just subtly paying attention in the wrong way to the wrong piece of the experience, really revs it up.

Whereas wise attention is that attention where the way we pay attention and what we attend to allows arisen torments of mind—and we all know what the torments are: greed, hatred, delusion, and all their manifestations—allows them to diminish, and allows wholesome states of mind and heart—wisdom, equanimity, calm, energy, compassion—to arise.

Now, this is the place where it's important not to hear this through the veil of self-judgment and the judging mind. If you're aware that self-judging is the strong backdrop, just know that you can't really trust your evaluations and perceptions of anything. It's true, because they're all filtered through that veil of "everything you do is wrong and not good enough." So notice that. And if that's strong right now, take in what I'm saying and don't try to evaluate it.

Things that are not fit for attention, or how we pay attention in ways that increase suffering—this is not really a value judgment on what's arising. It doesn't mean that if aversion or greed is arising and you pay attention to it, that's unwise attention. The idea that unwholesome things arising makes for more bad karma, and the more I pay attention to them the worse it gets—sometimes it's not that they're getting worse, it's that we're just seeing them more clearly and it feels worse. That's not the same thing as really getting lost and spinning.

So, how we pay attention and what we pay attention to. Starting with the how, which is mostly, as I've said, mindfulness: non-judging, kind, total attention to whatever's arising. I want to describe it in two ways.

The Pali words translated into English as "wise attention" are yoniso manasikara. Andy Olenski, the head of the study center and our Pali scholar, gave me his translation of it, which I really liked.

Yoniso comes from the Pali word for womb. So he translates it as "womb-like" or nurturing, held in protection—which I appreciate because mindfulness is often spoken of as our protection. Mana means mind, and kara comes from the word for action, the same root that kamma derives from. Putting it all together, he translates yoniso manasikara as "an active quality of mind that is nurturing."

To me, this really describes mindfulness. It's active, truly awake and connecting with what's happening, but in a nurturing way—not with judgment, not with liking or disliking, clinging or pushing away. Just holding experience in the arms of attention. I like that.

So that's one way to think about how we pay attention with wise attention. It gives us the ability to simply recognize what's present. We can just say, "Oh yes, this is what it is."

The second aspect is a way of describing the freshness, the beginner's mind that comes with wise attention—with meeting what's happening in this nurturing, active way. There's a sense of wonder, which is how I like to think of it.

Let me describe an example. This summer I saw a documentary on television about the well-known classical cellist Yo-Yo Ma. I had never seen him before, and he was just lovely. In this special, he was flying into Africa to meet some of the musicians of the Kalahari Bush people. He flew into the Kalahari Desert and was basically jamming with the Bushman who was the main musician.

It was really fantastic. He gets out of the helicopter with this beautiful cello—God knows how much it must have cost—and when he played it, the sounds were so resonant. The Bush musician's instrument, I remember, was literally an old oil can with a stick and a string. He's playing on this, and it's easy to feel some kind of cultural superiority. Compared to the resonance of the cello, it's just a string and a stick and an oil can. You can get some sounds out of it.

But Yo-Yo Ma was so filled with appreciation and wonder. There was no trace of "my thing is better." It was like, "Wow, listen to the sounds he gets from this instrument!" He was totally appreciating it, trading instruments, having the musicians show him how to play. He said, "Well, I can't make it sound nearly as beautiful as you can," which was true. Just that sense of absolute freshness and delight and wonder that he could bring to something one could easily write off as a stick in an old oil can.

That kind of freshness, brought in a nurturing way—can we bring that to whatever happens to be arising? When we bring that quality of attention, that's the how of wise attention.

When it's like that, it doesn't really matter so much what we're attending to, because almost anything is fit for attention when we bring that quality. There's no judging, no sense of referring back to me, no liking or disliking, no building a story. It's just what is. We could be as aware of the beauty of falling leaves as of aversion, greed, self-making, or some subtlety of rapture. It really doesn't matter, because that wonder, that nurturing active quality, brings us naturally into balanced awareness.

So remember this when you feel you're not in balanced awareness. Before you say, "Well, this thing that's happening is not fit for attention," watch out for that, please. Try shifting the how first. Bring back the freshness, the wonder, if you can.

Now, there are other times when we might look at what we're paying attention to without quite recognizing clearly how we're paying attention in a way that leads to an increase of the torments. One good place to examine this is with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral—those experiences of feeling tone.

It's easy to believe, to really think, that there's pure mindfulness present. We feel we're really here without clinging to what's happening. And it's not that what's happening gets more intense—that's fine. It's more that we feel we're spinning deeper and deeper into some kind of wallowing sense of self, and we don't really know what's going on or how the way we're paying attention is increasing it.

I'm not about to give you a magic cure—forget that. But I want to point to a couple of ways this happens very subtly.

One way this happens is with the experience of vedana, of feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. We've talked about this a lot. It's not always the obvious aspect of experience, but more and more people are really tuning into it. You might be tuning into a sound and know it's unpleasant, or the taste of food and recognize it as pleasant, but still it feels like there's some entrancement, some seduction going on. We're somehow getting pulled in and not quite seeing why.

I'd like to point out something that has become clearer and clearer to me in my practice, more and more subtle—the subtle aspects of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, and our conditioning around them. My conditioning anyway, though I don't think I'm alone. Even when I'm aware of vedana, there can be, very subtly, almost unnoticed or actually unnoticed, a value judgment or interpretation. Even though I know something is pleasant and I'm trying not to get attached, there's this subtle belief way back there that pleasant actually means good. If it's pleasant, things are going right. And of course, unpleasant means bad—it's going wrong, or I'm going wrong. Even as we sit here noticing unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant, we're not quite seeing what's really happening: unpleasant, it's wrong. Unpleasant, it's bad. Unpleasant, how can I change it? Very, very subtle. We don't even notice, and that's where the unwise quality of attention comes in.

Neutral, which I forgot to even mention—because that's how we relate to it—it doesn't count. If we even notice it, it doesn't count. That's why a lot of people are really uncomfortable with calm. We struggle and struggle, we finally get calm, and then it's like, "Hey, nothing's happened. Let's whip up some suffering—at least then I feel like I'm working."

I read in one of the suttas where the Buddha talks about the hindrances and how they get increased or whipped up through unwise attention to certain aspects. I really see it as this pleasant-unpleasant subtle conditioning. He's saying that sense desire arises due to unwise attention to the attractive aspect of an experience—not just noticing pleasant, but the attractive aspect, the subtle sense of gratification that comes from a pleasant experience.

I'll give you an example. One time I was on retreat, and I was eating pretty mindfully—eating, noticing pleasant, unpleasant, chewing. There was some homemade bread, and I would bite, chew. "This is really pleasant. This is really good. Liking." And then that subtle "Yeah, this is really nice." Although I thought I was mindful, the unwise attention was getting sucked into really how nice this made me feel. Can you get the slight shift? It's not just noting pleasant, pleasant. It's "Pleasant... yeah, it's really pleasant. Opening a bakery, getting the recipe..." Then the bite would be gone and I'd be right back—okay, chewing, pleasant, unpleasant, whatever, really mindful again. The next bite, the same thing would happen as soon as the taste hit the taste buds. After about a piece, I really started to notice that.

So you get a sense of the unwise attention—a little seduced by the gratification of it, the attractiveness of it, rather than just noticing pleasant. And often it's so subtle that we don't want to give it up. We know that if we just say "pleasant," if we're just aware of the pleasant, we don't feel that gratification quite so much. So we kind of don't want to look at it too closely sometimes. But it's hard to notice.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, the great Thai meditation master and forest monk, says: look at your life, look at the decisions you make. Almost everything you do, when you come down to it, is for the sake of pleasant sensation. Look at the decisions you make and the things you do. But if you really look at pleasant sensation, how long does it last? It's gone.

I find this in my practice over and over, more and more subtle. I'll think I'm just going along, being open, wise attention, meeting whatever's happening with freshness. And at some point I see this subtlety of being seduced by the attractiveness, the gratification of the pleasant. The pleasant might just be the thought, "Oh, now it's going how it's supposed to go." You could even be suffering, and the thought is, "But this is what's supposed to happen"—and that's pleasant, and we're seduced by it.

There's a nice story from the Buddha's time about Ananda, his main attendant for twenty-five years, who was a very kind man, always taking care of the disciples and the people who came to the Buddha. It's a story about getting seduced, paying attention subtly to the wrong thing on the aspect of pleasant.

Ananda was on a mission for the Buddha, and he passed by a well in a village. One of the things monks could ask for was water, but you couldn't just go take it. There was a young woman there, a young outcast. You know, there's the caste system that existed at that time in India, and then below all the castes, there were the outcasts—people that anyone of any caste was supposed to have nothing to do with.

Ananda asked her for water, and the woman, Pataki was her name, said, "I'm too humbly born. I'm an outcast. I can't give you water. You would defile yourself."

And he said, "I'm not asking about your caste, I'm just asking for water."

That touch to her heart—she felt so touched, so joyful at that acceptance of her—that she gave Ananda the water. He thanked her and went away, and she followed him. She followed him all the way back to the Buddha.

When she got there, she went up to the Blessed One and said, "Oh, Lord, help me. Let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells so that I may see him and take care of him, because I love Ananda."

The Blessed One understood the emotions of her heart, and he said, "Pataki, your heart is full of love, but you don't understand, really, your own emotions. It's not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice towards you and practice it towards others."

I think that's very sweet. And how often we get entranced by the pleasantness, and in that entrancement we don't really see clearly what's happened. We're blinded by being pulled into the pleasantness. We can, as we know, end up doing all kinds of things in our life where we look back and think, "How did I get here?" And a lot of it was, step by step, very reasonable—this feels good so I'll do it. Down the road it doesn't feel so good.

The Buddha spoke in the same way about ill will as a hindrance. It's the same dynamic—it's the unwise attention to the repugnant aspect of things. And again, you can see this. It's good on retreat because often the thing that arouses our repugnance is so small that we somehow can't totally buy into the idea that that sound is really the cause of all our suffering. But there's a way we get so worked up—"I can't believe that person would do something like that. I can't believe how loud that sound is. I can't believe this pain in my back is still here after all the stretching I did." There's some way we might be noting unpleasant, unpleasant, but just that little bit of reactivity is in there working until we're whipping up the hindrance of ill will. Again, unwise attention—seduced by the repugnance and not seeing it. And it takes us out of knowing what's happening.

Just to quickly say, not so much for sloth and torpor, but for restlessness and worry or remorse, the Buddha says it's unwise reflection on disturbing thoughts. Which you can relate to, right? "I can't believe that. Why did I do this? What if that happened?" Over and over, unwisely reflecting on it.

And this is actually my favorite. Doubt can come about through unwisely reflecting on dubious matters. The Buddha gives us an example of dubious matters—this is an example of unwise attention from the Buddha himself, describing how one attends unwisely. We think these are dharma thoughts, but it's really unwise attention: "Was I in past time or was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what shall I be in the future? Shall I be in the future or shall I not? And what shall I be? Considering what I was in the past, how will that affect what I am in the future?" Or else one is perplexed about the present: "Am I? Am I not? What am I?"

How am I? And if I am just thoughts and emotions arising, then what are you? As some people have been saying, and it just goes on and on and on. And it feels like dharma thoughts, but it's actually unwise reflection on dubious matters leading to the hindrance of doubt.

Those are some examples from the Buddha of how unwise attention works, and you can see it can be quite subtle.

The first choice, once we recognize that somehow we've gotten sucked away and we don't quite know what's what, the first choice of wise attention is recognizing even that we have a choice. That's the beginning of skillful means—to recognize that there are moments in the practice when we really do have a choice where to let the mind dwell. There are moments when we absolutely don't have a choice too, and there are moments again of that exquisite balance when the question of choice doesn't even arise. But when we realize we're starting to spin in the torments, to recognize that we do have a choice is where we can use wise attention.

It's mindfulness that gives us that moment of choice. And the first choice, of course, is always mindfulness—wise attention to the bare experience that's happening now.

So, for example, in that seduction into the pleasant when I was eating the bread, the choice is not to start reflecting on what's going on and how come I'm getting seduced. It's simply to ask, "Okay, what's happening right now?" And feel the graininess of the bread in my mouth. Or notice the sweetness of the taste. Just come back into the present moment experience. Often, that's quite enough. Because a lot of the time, as we're getting really seduced, taking refuge in the wrong place so to speak, it's not always huge storms. We can really notice how it works in these subtle little experiences that are happening off and on all day long. So something like that—oh yeah, tasting, sweetness, liking—and you're right back.

Even with something a little stronger, the first choice of wise attention is to just bring that freshness of kind awareness to what's happening.

Another example, a kind of bigger torment: One time I was staying in a friend's house on an island in Washington State, and I was there alone at night. I remember I was washing up, and I heard some sound—you know, just how you'll hear a sound in a house when you're alone and immediately the mind goes, "Oh my God, somebody's breaking in. I'm out here in the middle of nowhere. I don't know the area." And the mind starts going into fear.

I really noticed, because I experimented with it, that there was a choice—wise attention or unwise attention. When I kept paying attention to the thoughts, I was paying attention to them, but really with them: "What if it is? No, that's probably not someone, you're just being foolish, you're just caught in fear. What could that sound have been? I don't hear it again." The more I stayed with the thoughts, the more the fear just kept amping up.

So I said, "Okay, just be with the sensations." Now, that's not denying the fear. I would feel the pounding of the heart. I was still washing my face, so then I'd just feel the sensations of the water on my face, the tension of the fear. And within really seconds, the whole thing would just calm back down again. I was at ease with what was happening, which included still some agitation, but the fear wasn't getting amped up.

And then I would see how the mind just isn't content to stay with the bare experience. It would go, "Yeah, but what if? And this could be this, and this could be that, and what was that sound? I'd better go look, and I wonder what the emergency numbers are"—the whole thing. And then I could have the choice to just feel the agitation, feel the water in my hands, and really within ten seconds, this is just what's happening.

To play with that, to see the difference—that's really where unwise attention to thoughts led to spinning in them and the increasing of an arisen torment. Or wise attention to just what's happening. The thoughts were happening too, but because of the pull of them, the attention to them wasn't really quite balanced. Whereas being with the sensations could bring me into more balanced awareness.

I find this a really fascinating moment that happens over and over—that moment of coming back into balanced awareness and seeing the mind that goes, "Yeah, but what if," and zooms back into the whole story, just whipping it up again. Knowing that peace is available, knowing I don't need to do that, knowing I have a choice.

I borrow one of Buddhadasa's phrases here. He uses it in another context, but for me, I really see this like my mind is volunteering for suffering. I have a choice, and I'm going to go towards suffering. Over and over and over.

Now see, if you're in a self-judging mode, you'll add that on top of it, but you don't need to. It's just a moment of pure fascination. Why do we do that? It's really amazing. And then to just come back again and again and again. That's not suppression.

There are also times when—take an example of fear—where the fear or the rage or the greed or whatever the particular torment is, is really strong. Either you can't even find the bare experience to come back to, or when you do come back, the thoughts of fear... sometimes when you return to feeling the body, the sensations are so intense, or the fear or greed or aversion is actually grounded in the sensations, that bringing attention to them just feeds the whole thing.

A lot of times when some suppressed memories, some previous trauma, begins to surface, it might come up physically first. You think, "Well, let me just be aware of sensations," and you touch it and you're blown away. And then wise attention can be, again, knowing we have a choice—and this is sometimes where we actively direct the attention to something else.

So you know times when we'll say, "Why don't you stop paying attention to the physical sensations and be really aware of hearing and seeing?" It's a choice, not that hearing is better than sensations, but what helps bring ourselves back into the balanced quality of awareness that can rest at ease in what's arising. When it's so strong, there is no resting at ease, and it gets to be so there's no awareness either. We're just lost in it.

So the next step is to try diverting the attention, but you're still really present. Hearing, hearing. Seeing, seeing. Hearing, hearing. Staying mindful that the motivation is to come back to that balance of awareness that lets us know what's true. It's not avoidance. It's not suppression. Those are very different. And it's still a commitment to mindful awareness. You might find that sometimes this again just opens up the window of possibility of recognizing innate wakefulness, even though there's the fear and trauma. It just opens up a little more space, another window.

Now sometimes hearing and seeing isn't going to cut it. Everything's just too strong. The Buddha, in another place, advises as a kind of wise attention to bring up some inspiring thought. This is a place where we can use wise thought, deliberately think with judiciousness. He's describing a monk, a yogi, doing the four foundations of mindfulness, basically contemplating the body, ardent, clearly aware, and mindful—these are the phrases used in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the foundations of mindfulness. "And as he thus dwells meditating, some bodily object arises, or a physical discomfort, or a mental drowsiness causes his mind to wander away to external things"—if that sounds familiar. "Then, Ānanda," he's talking to Ānanda, "attention, when you're really lost in something else, should be directed to some inspiring object of thought. And as he thus directs his mind to some inspiring object of thought, gradually delight springs up in him. And when he is delighted, then rapture comes. When he experiences rapture, his body calms down. When his body calms down, he can experience joy. Being joyful, his mind is concentrated."

Now, have you noticed that before? The conditioning factor for concentration is joy or happiness. It is not dukkha, striving, heaviness, self-judgment, or clinging. The conditioning factor for concentration is really happiness.

So it's using wise reflection on something that inspires you, inspires faith or energy. And then, when he sees that he's again calm and present, he thinks, "The aim on which I set my mind has been achieved, so let me withdraw my mind." In other words, it's time to stop thinking about this inspiring thing now and just be present with balanced attention. That's another use of wise attention—judiciously, when being mindful of anything naturally occurring just keeps spinning into more torment, bring up inspiration.

And sometimes nothing works. Those are the times we'll tell you in an interview, "It's time to take a walk and be with the lake. It's time to stop trying so hard. It's time to just go sit in that armchair by the fire and imagine everything's done and quit trying to do anything." And the mind can come back into its natural balance.

With all of these choices, these skillful means, I find the most helpful thing in working with them—whether it's with wise attention or any of the other balances—is the quality of motivation that leads to the skillful means. The examples I just gave come from the motivation of what brings me back to recognize the purity of presence, resting at ease, balance of heart and mind. The same choice could be made from aversion: "Yeah, this is kind of tormenting now. I don't really like it, so let me think of something more inspiring." Or "Fear is coming, and maybe it would be better if I just went for a walk down to the lake." But really, we could be present with it. We just don't like it.

Or the self-judgment of, "Oh no, more anger is coming up, and if I pay attention to it, that's really unskillful. It's bad karma. So I better try to do metta."

Anything can be a skillful means when it arises from the motivation of coming back to the balance that lets us rest in whatever's arising. But when the motivation shifts into project mentality—trying to fix what's arising, or even more, trying to fix yourself so you're better and these ugly things don't come up—it moves from skillful means to the same old, same old. Unpleasant is bad and pleasant is good and neutral doesn't count.

One more aspect of wise attention comes up frequently when we're working with the energy factor. When difficult things are arising, have you noticed how often there's this sense of, "This is really hard—fear, aversion, greed—so I have to push harder. I can't let up for a moment. Note, note, note, note, note." But of course it's unwise because the noting is either not quite seeing the place we're caught, or it's as if we believe that if we note this enough, it's going to go away. Or the noting is with, "I'm so bad, but I've got to note this." Push, push, push, push. You start to notice all the hindrances, and you never notice a moment when a hindrance isn't present. You think, "They talk about seven factors of enlightenment, but I haven't seen one for a single second." You're aware of greed, and if I say, "Maybe there are some moments of renunciation," you respond, "Renunciation? I don't think so."

It's really important sometimes then, with wise attention, to deliberately—similar to bringing up an inspiring thought—deliberately notice the beautiful qualities. This isn't the same as ego, as in "I'm so great." But really, when you're noticing greed, greed, greed, greed, greed, just notice a little renunciation. People have come in and said, "I did this and I gave up that. Is that renunciation?"—as if it can't count. It is. Renunciation can be so small. You walk out of here, you pass the notice board, and you say, "No, I'll just keep going." That's a moment of renunciation. You don't have to give up everything. It's just little. You're still here—that's a lot of moments of renunciation. Notice that.

Or even the thought of generosity. You didn't even give anything, but you had the thought. That's generosity. It begins with the thought. A moment of compassion toward yourself—that's compassion. Thich Nhat Hanh often talks about deliberately bringing up seeds of joy. When you're really in a dukkha phase where that's all you see, the practice isn't to pretend that's not happening, not to say, "Oh yes, I had this one generous thought, so there's no greed arising." It's to balance, to again say, "Yeah, there's some generosity, and okay, I can notice this next moment of greed without all the holding around it, the self-referencing around it."

Nature is also a wonderful way to connect back again with that simplicity of presence in the moment. We don't tend to fight so much with nature, insisting that it should be different. That's why we often say, go outside and be with seeing and hearing. We might not like the wind, but we don't really get too obstreperously upset with it. It's just wind, just air element, literally. And it can bring us back into that balance again.

Resting at ease in whatever arises, recognizing what Chögyam Trungpa liked to call our basic goodness—it doesn't matter what's happening. It's not about fixing ourselves. It's not about having our practice go in a certain way. And it's just as accessible to us whether we're in some very subtle state of rapture or we're just walking around normally, eating our muffins at tea time. It's not so important what's happening; it's more that we begin to recognize and trust the balance of being, the balance of presence that opens us. We let go of clinging, we let go of self-referencing, we're not trying to do anything, but we're really here. There's the energy. We let go of fixing ourselves and can really recognize this luminous quality, this peaceful abiding here and now—even in the midst of the chaos in the dining room, for example.

And hopefully, what begins to happen is that we don't have to create this—it's always accessible to us. We begin to trust it more. I know for me, a moment of pure presence like that, that wakefulness, becomes so much more fulfilling than any of the seeming goodies that samsara might try to pull my mind into. You know, that piece of "Oh, what if I don't get the last chocolate chip cookie?" Who cares? This is just what it is. Maybe I'll get it and maybe I won't.

We can trust that capacity to rest at ease. That's true. That's our true potential, and it's accessible no matter what's happening—so that it becomes more our true home than all the seductions of liking and disliking and judging and getting "good practice" and everything else.

Another way of describing this moment of pure presence, from the Dalai Lama: "Why do we endeavor to discover the present moment? Because it is the only place where you will know love."

I want to end with a short poem that describes this—the power of presence in a moment with simple things. It's called "In Memoriam" by Seamus Heaney, and it's really a memoriam to his mother:

When all the others were away at mass,
I was all hers as we peeled potatoes.
They broke the silence, let fall one by one,
like solder weeping off the soldering iron.
Cold comforts set between us.
Things to share gleaming in a bucket of clean water.
And again let fall little pleasant splashes from each other's work would bring us to our senses.

So while the parish priest at her bedside went hammer and tongs at the prayers for the dying, and some were responding and some crying,
I remembered her head bent towards my head,
her breath in mine, our fluent dipping knives, never closer the whole rest of our lives.

Let's just sit a moment.

CHAPTER 309

Coming Home: Renunciation

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson reframes renunciation—often misunderstood as deprivation or penance—as an expression of wisdom and self-compassion that leads to genuine freedom and joy. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on right intention (sammā saṅkappa) as part of the Noble Eightfold Path, she explains how renunciation represents the transformation of thoughts rooted in greed into thoughts of letting go and open-heartedness.

Wilson illuminates how our constant seeking outside ourselves for completion—whether through sense pleasures, possessions, or self-identifications—is precisely what obscures our natural great peace. She shares the Buddha's vivid simile of six animals tied together, each pulling toward its own domain, to illustrate how our unrestrained senses create struggle and suffering. True restraint, she explains, is not shutting out the world but meeting sense experience with mindfulness-wisdom (satipaññā) at the point of contact, remaining neither drawn toward the pleasant nor repelled by the unpleasant.

Through personal anecdotes and teachings from masters including Huang Po, Sogyal Rinpoche, and Thich Nhat Hanh, Wilson demonstrates how the simplicity of retreat life creates space to recognize what has always been present. The greatest renunciation, she suggests, happens moment by moment when we put down our stories, self-identifications, and the habit of looking elsewhere, discovering that we are already home in the natural state of awareness.

Today, in an interview, somebody said from a very deep place in his practice, "I feel like I've come home," with a sense of real peace, of ease, of letting down. And the saying, "I feel like I've come home," had nothing to do with being here at IMS or with any particular place or location. He was really talking about the experience in his practice at that time of having let go of trying to manipulate, control experience or practice or whatever was arising—letting go of self-referencing and just being completely present with experience as it comes and goes. Just that ease of total presence that lets us come home to what is really true.

The purpose of meditation is to introduce us to that which we really are, that which underlies the whole of life and death. In the stillness and silence of meditation, we glimpse and return to that deep inner nature that we have so long ago lost sight of amidst the busyness and distraction of our minds. Meditation is bringing the mind home.

That's what I want to talk about tonight: bringing our mind, our hearts home so that we can recognize our true nature. And the way I want to talk about it is through the aspect of mind, of heart, of renunciation.

I think this is a concept that we often don't really quite understand. Renunciation is the key component. We renounce the distractedness, the clinging, the busyness, the fantasies, the attachments that keep us from resting at home in our true nature. But the word renunciation, even though we've talked about it quite a bit before—the concept doesn't play well in our culture, in our training. And you don't have to have come from a Catholic background to have that; it's pretty pervasive, I think.

Renunciation can be equated with some kind of harsh penance, with deprivation, with giving up things for our own good but in a way that's going to make us miserable, with self-mortification, rigid adherence to some outer ascetic form. But nowhere much do we hear of renunciation as actually being a source of joy, a source of freedom, an actual delight and relief to come out of this distractedness that keeps us looking elsewhere for the truth.

Renunciation also happens to be part of the second stage of the Eightfold Path: right thought or wise thought that is motivated by wisdom, the first stage. The three aspects of right thought the Buddha speaks about are these: thoughts or intentions of greed transform to thoughts or intentions of renunciation, letting go, open-handedness, open-heartedness, which then moves to generosity. The second aspect of wise thought is metta—thoughts of ill will transform to thoughts of friendliness. And the third is that thoughts of cruelty transform to intentions of compassion, of kindness. Those are the three right intentions. Tonight I want to talk about renunciation in that way.

If you remember, the Eightfold Path is the path of happiness, not the path of suffering. And so the thought or intention, the movement of heart and mind of renunciation, is an expression of wisdom. It's an expression of the pure heart and mind, as Sogyal said—that deep nature that we've so long ago lost sight of amidst the busyness and distraction.

Renunciation is actually an expression of realizing our intrinsic wholeness, of accessing inner contentment instead of this ceaseless, restless looking outside of ourselves for wholeness and contentment, which is where it can never be found. And the only way we can learn that is if we would stop looking. You know how Krishnamurti said, "To seek the truth is to deny it." And that's just what we're doing. So renunciation is a conscious choice for our own happiness and well-being.

This is from Huang Po: "This pure mind shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection. This one mind is the Buddha and there is no distinction between Buddhas and ordinary beings except that ordinary beings are attached to forms and thus seek for Buddhahood outside of themselves. By this very seeking, they lose it."

That's the crux of our confusion, our problem, if you would put it that way. Through our attachment to forms—not just material visual forms, but also all the mental realm, thought forms, emotion forms, visual forms internally, so the five senses and the mental sense, the sixth sense—being attached to those, thinking that somewhere by holding onto or acquiring new forms we're going to make ourselves truly happy, actually complete ourselves in some way. And by continuing to look in this way, by this very seeking, we lose it.

By thinking that anything outside of absolute attention and presence, wholehearted being here and now in this moment—just the slightest movement of thinking something else outside of here can open me to inner completion—that's the exact movement of mind and heart that hides the potential for peace. And it's so hard for us to get that. So that's why renunciation as a practice comes in.

Renunciation, restraint of the senses, in its truest form, its deepest form, is a giving up of this fruitless quest for peace and completion by adding something extra to what's already here.

Now, do we really, really believe this? I mean, it would be nice if we did.

It sounds good, you know? But our conditioning is so deep, so subtly pervasive. It assaults us everywhere we go in this culture. I don't need to give you many examples. But really, how much of our sense of who we are is based on what we have, what we do, what clothes we wear? Even here in yogi land. Isn't there a certain image we present of ourselves that we're aware of—by what we're wearing, how we're eating, how we're walking? In some way, so much of what matters in the world is seeming externals, and it's just so deeply ingrained.

But in a way, when we move towards something outside of ourselves to complete us, that's the real self-abandonment. We think, "If I get the love I need, if I get the approval I need, if I get the new car I need—I don't know, whatever it is—then I'll be okay." That's the movement of moving away from completion, of abandoning your true nature. But it's so subtle, this pull towards "if I just get this, if I just do that, if I just have this comfortable feeling."

And we can end up so easily at the end of our life—or the end of a sitting—lost in some fantasy land of either make-believe happiness or real suffering because we didn't get the make-believe happiness. We can end up our whole life this way.

I read an interview with Marlon Brando in a magazine about three years ago. Actually, I didn't read it—it was in German, so my friend Franz translated it for me. Brando was saying, "I was never a good father or a good husband. I was always busy with my own life. Now I'm a guilty old man who feels ashamed of his life. Besides food, there is nothing else in the world for me. That's the only thing in my life. I know this eating will kill me, but I just can't stop." It's intense, isn't it? Hopefully he's moved on from there.

I use that example from someone like Marlon Brando on purpose, because that's someone we would think has had enormous opportunity—through having and being in so many different realms in this culture—who should really have had a good shot at happiness. It's so hard to believe that this wanting outside of ourselves is so much the way that keeps us miserable.

So renunciation is not a penance for our sins. It's a gift to ourselves of love and compassion. From Geshe Raptan: "Having great compassion for oneself is the same as renunciation, because we're renouncing the delusion, the attachment that keeps one bound to samsara. The point of renunciation is the development of love and compassion for oneself. Only then is compassion for others possible."

The point of renunciation is love and compassion for oneself—not self-punishment, not self-hatred.

So what is renunciation then? What does it look like? Really, at the heart of it, it's intention. The intention of the heart and mind that lets go in a moment of craving or clinging. It's that simple. It doesn't have a particular outer form that our behavior must match, although there can be. But so often we get caught in thinking, "If I give up this, if I give up that, if I come up to some particular standard of asceticism, or I give up the most important thing in my life—that's renunciation."

But really, renunciation is not about outer form. It's about the inner motivation of our heart. We could meet an outer form of very stringent asceticism and be completely attached to that form. I've seen it often enough in monks in Asia—more Western monks who I could talk to. "Well, you know how it is. We come here and we're really very sincere. But boy, on the good days, we're really clinging to being a good, ascetic, slow-moving yogi." That's okay. We see that. It's suffering. That's the next thing to renounce.

But it's not about form. Slow isn't necessarily more enlightened. You can't tell from the outside. It's all in the intention.

Now, at some level, of course, this form of renunciation is part of all of our lives, where we want something, but when we can expand our vision to the bigger picture, we're able to give up a particular thing in the service of something greater. If you have children, you do that all the time. You give up your sleep or you give up what you want to do in order to be with your child, to help your child grow—or with old people, or with friends, or just going to work every day when you'd much rather go to the beach in Maui, but you like to eat and have a place to live. So in service of that, we'll do something we might not particularly like.

It's simply being able to expand the big picture. When we're talking about the renunciation that opens us to freedom on our spiritual journey, we just expand to the biggest picture we can possibly imagine. And so it's really in service of being willing to recognize our natural completion, our natural purity. To be willing to recognize that, we make the commitment of the greatest renunciation of all, which is the renunciation of all seeking outside of ourselves, no matter what that seeking may be.

From the outside, that might look like you're some kind of huge ascetic. But as Anandamayi Ma, the great Indian woman saint, said one time—she lived a very simple life, and some businessmen, wealthy men, came and were praising her in awe at her asceticism. She just kept laughing and laughing. Finally they said, "What's so funny?" And she said, "I'm not the renunciate. It is you who are the renunciates, because you are giving up the great delight, the great happiness, the great joy of the divine presence."

We just need a bigger picture. That's why we like to have a few saints and masters around in the world—because they remind us there is a bigger picture than the next sitting.

So what helps us? What allows us to even let in the possibility of this great renunciation, the renunciation of all seeking outside of ourselves? Often, as I said, we can turn to very strong, harsh asceticism—it's a very common spiritual practice. I'm not saying that's a negative practice; it can be helpful. But remember, it comes from intention, and it's easy to miss that.

When we read about the Buddha's life, when he first renounced all the great indulgence of pleasure—compared to how so many people in the world live, life in this Western world can be like a big pleasure garden, even with all our sufferings—it's easy to say, "Okay, throw all of that over and get really tough. Renounce everything. Give up everything. That's the way. That's what's going to do it." But that can just as easily be an aversion trip, or an ego trip. The intention can come from fear: "God forbid I should get near anything pleasant because I'm going to be lost." Now that might be true, but we don't have to live in fear of that.

True renunciation isn't a shutting out of the world, shutting away all sense experience out of fear or aversion. That's just trading greed for fear. And it's not necessarily true that the more externals you give up, the more awake you're going to be. It might help, but it isn't a given, because it's all in the intention.

I think that's what the Buddha discovered. Luckily for us, he bequeathed us what he called the middle path—not wallowing in sense pleasures and not living a life of such mortification. As you know, he almost starved himself to death before he realized that he didn't have enough energy to really look. So he bequeathed us the middle path, which to us in this life might seem like a path of strict austerity, but it's really the middle path between what's possible.

The middle path is not of harsh mortification, but of restraint of the senses. One way of defining restraint that I like, from Buddhadasa, is that with real mindful awareness, we pay attention at the point of sense contact—at that point where I meet sense object and there's knowing. We don't try to shut out all sense contact, although we might try to restrict how much we let in. But the real restraint is paying attention at the moment of sense contact. Then it doesn't have to expand into looking elsewhere for happiness.

When we pay attention—and that's our whole practice here, is it not?—we begin to discover how much of our sense of presence, how much of our energy, as it were, just flies out the sense doors. We've talked about this a lot, and it continues to be amazing, doesn't it? It just flies out the eye door, the ear door, the mind door. And in a second, we're miles away, somehow thinking this is really where it's at, this is what's going to make things whole, complete, okay.

When we pay attention, we see that. And rather than a punishment, rather than some sense of restrictedness—"Oh my God, now I have to pay attention every time sense contact comes"—when we really do that, it doesn't lead to restriction. It leads to real presence, openness, ease in the moment of what's arising.

It opens our hearts and minds into the present and allows us to begin to touch that truth that's always here, that deepest part of ourselves, of our life.

As I said, renunciation can't be forced, because then it comes from an outer obligation and the intention isn't really one of renunciation—it's of meeting some ideal. But the inner intention, just the simple letting go of heart and mind, arises naturally from wisdom. It arises from a moment of clear seeing.

Two particular aspects are said to naturally bring about a moment of renunciation: the wise seeing of the painful nature of grasping, and the recognition of impermanence. We've hammered on that first one, and we will continue to do so, because seeing the painful nature of grasping is so ultimately freeing. And of course what helps with that is recognizing impermanence.

I won't say a whole lot about these two, just offer a couple of examples of how they really allow the heart to open.

In noticing the painful nature of grasping in little things, you've seen how that moment of craving and grasping, when it arises, is actually the grasping itself that shatters our natural great peace. You've noticed that, have you not? Really look and see. It's just the littlest things—that's what's so great about a silent retreat. You have time to explore.

I remember one time I was flying an overnight flight to Europe. I don't sleep well on planes—I don't sleep at all unless I can lie down, which pretty much never happens these days. So I was sitting on the plane as it was loading up, and about five minutes before the doors were going to close, I suddenly noticed that none of the seats in my row were filled.

In that moment, I had been perfectly peaceful just sitting there. But with the thought, "Maybe I could lie down," it was as if some kind of vice snapped shut in my heart. What had been perfectly spacious and peaceful became a source of tremendous suffering and ill will. Everyone who came through the door became my enemy after that—until they either sat down or walked past. Then I went, "Oh, okay, may you be happy." But only after they walked past.

I really watched how much the sense of separation—me and other—was created just by clinging to that thought: maybe I could lie down. It was stunning.

So just explore. In those moments, how much pain is created? Notice the futility of grasping anyway, because the grasping wasn't going to help. Either the seats were going to be empty or not. My sitting there hating everybody and urging them past really wasn't going to have much to do with it. It only made me miserable.

We miss our essential completeness, that wholeness in the situation, our own essential completeness. As soon as I saw, "I need those seats," I had distracted myself from my essential peace and wholeness. As soon as the plane took off—and as it happened, nobody sat down, so I had the seats—the essential wholeness was back. But it could have been even if someone sat next to me, because it was the grasping that was the problem.

There's something about clinging that, if we sort of look at it but don't really examine it deeply, we almost find a kind of poignancy in the clinging itself. It seems almost sweet, as if the clinging somehow makes us feel more alive or more present. It makes us feel more me, that's for sure, but that's not necessarily more alive.

There's a way, I think, when we don't really explore the experience of clinging, that we get a little caught in the almost sweetness of it itself. You know that haiku of Bashō? It's pretty well known: "Although I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto."

Just longing. That kind of poignancy, bittersweetness. We're entranced by it, by the pleasant feeling, by the seeming promise of happiness the clinging brings. And we forget to notice.

It's not necessarily the clinging that's bringing that happiness. It's the absence of clinging that reintroduces us to that peace that's always been here—and was here before we got so caught in the clinging in the first place.

There's a line I love from Galway Kinnell. I won't read you the whole poem, but he's talking to his little daughter, and he says: "When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us." In some way, we think clinging will save us.

I read in a newspaper in Seattle a report about something called compulsive hoarding condition. It's something that happens with elderly people—I don't know if it's just elderly people, but they're the ones who get found out. Elderly people who can't throw anything away. This is a real condition. The newspaper article was about one particular woman. The neighbors had finally called the health department because her house was smelling so bad. They went and found sixteen tons of garbage in her house—debris, newspapers, bags, cans, pieces of string. Everything that had come in, nothing could go out. The house was completely packed. All the rooms, just a little alleyway in one room that she would use, a little corner where she could sit, and everything else completely full. The health department said it was the fourth house that week they had to come and clean out. The fourth house that week.

The article quotes a woman who is a geriatric psychiatrist saying, "I see it as a response to grief over the passing of time. It's a kind of abnormal response to getting older. You can't say goodbye to it." Can't say goodbye to anything.

Sometimes when you go back to that little back dining room and look at the food stashes—I think we all have a little bit of that in us. I know when I'm sitting, I'll keep saving the banana. I never eat it. But I just keep saving it. We all do that.

So just noticing in yourself that pain of grasping, and our somehow denial of that, our involvement in that sweetness of clinging. It isn't really sweet when you look at it. It's really painful. So look at it, please.

And the fact of impermanence—just in a moment when these come together, you don't have to say, "Oh, I think I'll renounce. It would be for my well-being." The heart just lets go. It's really, "Oh, yeah, right." Let's put the banana back. I don't need the aggravation.

Bhikkhu Bodhi says, "Real renunciation is not a matter of compelling ourselves to give up things that we inwardly cherish. It's rather a matter of changing our perspective on the things we cherish so that they no longer bind us." So we think we cherish something, but if it's binding us, is that what we mean by cherish? We're not cherishing ourselves in that moment. When we recognize this, our heart and mind naturally turns towards renunciation.

The word renunciation is most commonly used in association with the renouncing of sense pleasures. And of course, this is a big area where we look outside of ourselves. Renunciation isn't just, as I said, the flat-out giving up of all sense pleasures. We do need to cut it back a little bit. We do need to give ourselves some slack from running after so much sense pleasure—not from fear of judgment, but so that the mind and heart has some space to recognize natural great peace.

Huang Po: "Blinded by their own sight, hearing, feeling, and knowing, most people don't perceive the radiance of the source." There's just too much sense desire, sense pleasures going on. We get blinded by them if we're not really aware with mindfulness wisdom, sati-paññā, right at the point of contact.

Just coming here on retreat is a huge renunciation, isn't it? It's not something to belittle. It's a huge amount of letting go of sense pleasures. Also letting go of sense of self and identity. And you see already how much space it allows in awareness, in the heart and mind—not space just to see the kilesas, but to see how we suffer from them, and then the heart naturally lets go. There can be a re-recognition of natural great peace.

So we have a huge giving up just to come here. But we do find, don't we, how sneaky this tendency to fill ourselves up by sense pleasures is.

So for each of us, we just need to pay attention as the retreat goes on—not with judgment, but with interest, with delight—to see how we've transformed going out to the movies every night into looking at the bulletin board five times a day. It might not seem like a fair trade, but look at the intention. What are the ways we're still filling up the awareness, the space of presence, from outside in some way to help ourselves feel whole?

That yearning to look—a lot of people have been talking about that. It's so amazing how you feel like you'll just die if you don't look up at the person walking by. Why? So that we can have some kind of judgment about them or us and then feel bad about ourselves. But that yearning is so strong. Or wanting different sensations in your sitting or your walking, wanting the breath to be more subtle, wanting a new sensation in the lifting or the moving, wanting some new emotion or some new subtlety of emotion, or something different to happen, or for the noting to change, or to have less change—or that subtle love of thinking.

That subtle love of analyzing all the dharmic aspects of what's going on—it's another way of filling up the space, of looking for something else to make ourselves feel whole.

I remember one time I went to Sayadaw U Pandita in an interview, sort of whining as much as one dares whine to him. Basically, "It just keeps on going, the same old thing, the same old thing, noting, noting." And he just looked at me and said, "So what do you want, different objects to note?"

You get it? Like, really—does it matter if I'm noting lifting, moving, or thinking, sensation? Does it matter if I get to note pressure instead of tingling, or if I get to note sadness instead of happiness? Does it really matter?

So conscious restraint of our senses—what we do when we come on retreat here—and then the willingness to look in an even more refined way, to bring that mindfulness wisdom at the point of contact, and also to consciously, when we can, limit how much we're going out looking. Limit the input a little bit.

When we talk about this, the sense is it feels constricting. But as someone said today in an interview—it was really great—she was talking about this looking around, this compulsive need we have to look, and how really unpleasant and distracting it is. And she finally said, "Okay, I'm just going to be looking down at the ground." And I said, "That's great. That's restraint." And she looked up and said with a sense of such innocent surprise and joy, "Yeah, restraint—but it was a relief. It was really great."

We think of restraint as like putting someone under restraint because they're out of control—a kind of holding back. But this restraint of just limiting how much we look around, it's a relief. It's a joy. It makes space to really meet ourselves and meet life more fully with joy and appreciation. It's immensely freeing.

I want to read you something from the Buddha talking about restraint of the senses. First he gives a simile—you know, he talks a lot in similes. I used to skip the similes, but then I realized I really like them.

He says, "Suppose a man catches six animals of different domains"—like they live in different areas of the world—"a snake, a crocodile, a bird, a dog, a jackal, and a monkey. And he ties them each with a strong rope and then takes those six ropes tied to those six animals and ties them together in the middle, so they're all tied to each other. Then all those animals would just be swinging around and struggling together, each trying to get back to its natural habitat. So the snake would struggle thinking, 'I want to get to the anthill,' and the crocodile thinks, 'I want to get to the water,' and the bird wants to fly up into the air, and so forth. So they're all struggling. And then when those six hungry animals grew weak and weary, then the one who was strongest would carry the day and they'd all just be dragged after the one who was strongest to wherever that was going."

"So in the same way, O bhikkhus"—now, whenever he uses six, you can pretty much guess he's talking about the six fields of sense experience: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body, and the mind—"So in the same way, whenever a person fails to practice and develop mindfulness as to the body or the mind," and then he starts with the eye: "The eye struggles to draw him towards attractive objects while unattractive objects are repellent to him," and he runs through all the senses.

So it's as if the eye is struggling to pull us towards pleasant objects, and the ear is struggling to pull us towards pleasant sounds, and the body is struggling to pull us towards pleasant food or a nice soft sitting place or whatever—just this struggle when we're not mindful. This is lack of restraint.

And what is restraint? "Restraint is when, seeing objects with the eye, the person is not drawn towards the attractive ones and is not repelled by unattractive ones. Simply remains firmly established in mindfulness."

Just that awareness at the point of contact, not pushed and pulled to and fro by whether it's attractive or unattractive. So she remains firmly established in mindfulness and her mind is boundless. The heart is boundless, meeting sense experience with mindfulness. She knows in truth the liberation of the heart, the liberation by wisdom.

See, he's not here saying restraint means you hide away from all sense experience. Simply meeting it firmly established in mindfulness, not pulled towards the pleasant, repelled by the unpleasant, and the heart and mind is unbounded, boundless. That is really the beauty of restraint, of natural renunciation.

So the next time you feel like one of those animals is pulling you towards—I don't know what—reading all the kinds of tea there are, or listening to what that new particular sound could be, or what the person in the next room could possibly be doing with the noise they're making—the next time you feel like you're being pulled that way by clinging, stop a moment. And instead of letting the awareness go out through the eye door or the ear door or the mind door, turn it back on the clinging itself. Just make the simple experiment of landing firmly with mindfulness in the experience of the grasping, in the experience of the clinging. Stay there with it, with kindness but clear comprehension, and watch the clinging fade. It will, eventually.

If you're somewhere where you keep getting re-stimulated by seeing—say you're in the dining room and it's that third cookie you really want—it might be helpful to leave the dining room so you don't keep seeing it, because it's getting re-stimulated every moment. It's harder that way. But go somewhere and just stay with the clinging, with spaciousness and clear comprehension, until it fades, and then notice. What do you have? What's there? If you're lucky enough that a new clinging doesn't arise so quickly, there's no space—what we can notice is peace. That actually what we wanted was this peace of non-clinging. So often the third cookie doesn't actually give us that, does it? If we just hang out with the grasping and watch it vanish, we find out that that completion, that peace, that natural perfection is already here. It's the looking away that blinds us to that.

So this restraint at the sense doors is not about cultivating fear or aversion to pleasant experience. It is a fine balance to walk. I have a friend who spent some time here on retreat going around blindfolded, experimenting. I mean, that's an experiment. I don't know that I advocate it. But at some point, it's learning to meet sense experience with sati-pañña, with mindfulness-wisdom, because we don't have to shut out the world. We learn the difference between attachment to sense pleasures and the enjoyment of a peaceful heart and mind.

Thich Nhat Hanh says this in a way I really like: When we are obsessed by sense pleasures, we lose our freedom. But we have to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. Attachment to sense pleasures brings about suffering and entanglement both in the present moment and the future, for ourselves and others. But the joy and happiness of a peaceful mind and heart brings neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others.

It's very important that we realize that renunciation, restraint of the sense doors, is not to shut ourselves off from the world, but to open up the space that allows us to live with great joy and appreciation of ourselves and all that the world offers us. And still, the simplicity of outer life is immensely supportive of opening our hearts to this greater appreciation.

And you know, it doesn't have to be that we're really deep in the spiritual path. Simply cultivating simplicity, even for a short time, opens the space to recognize the truth, even if we don't think we're looking for it. Today, just pure chance, I was looking for distraction and I picked up a magazine lying around our house called Men's Health —not a new age health magazine, but a really mainstream magazine for young men about looking good, feeling good, how to get the most out of life. I opened it and it just happened to open to an article about a guy who writes for the magazine, some young editor, who went to the Trappist Abbey of Gethsemane in Kentucky for four days, where the monks live very simple lives of silence.

It was amazing. This guy, you could tell, was a fun-loving, bar-hanging-out kind of a guy. He said in the beginning, "I'm about as spiritual as a hot dog bun." That's how they write in this magazine. "The thought of disconnecting from the outside world, left alone with my tortured thoughts, seemed pretty unnerving." Within half an hour of getting there, he thought, "I've got to get the hell out of here."

But the article was actually fascinating. He stayed there four days and, almost against his intentions, it really profoundly moved him. Within two days he was saying these monks—and it could be nuns, but anyone really on the renunciate path—are actually the most revolutionary people in our whole society. And he meant it. He said, "Forget James Dean, these guys are the most revolutionary." He talked about different aspects that really touched him and said he ended up seeing a lot that would really help him in his life.

He was in awe that someone could be so radical as to choose celibacy. Just thinking of how much suffering sexuality had caused in his life, he said, "These guys are radical. It's amazing." He was truly amazed. The silence, the simplicity of life, the simplicity of their routines, not holding grudges, the metta—all of it. Just in the silence, no one was preaching at him. In fact, they would talk to him a little bit, but no one was indoctrinating him. He said they get up at three in the morning, they have a lot of quiet contemplation and short services. Four days, and it just really seeped in.

The last night, he said, on the way there he had carefully noted where all the bars were in the nearby area, because he figured he was going to need to escape at some point. And he didn't until the last night. It almost sounded like he just thought he should want to escape. So he said on the last night he went to a bar, was hanging out, there was all this music, and he had a Weiss beer. As it got louder and louder, he sat there thinking, "What am I doing here?" And he went back to the monastery. Went to bed, got up at three the next morning to go to the services, and then he left.

He said, "Well, I'm not ready to sign up." But it touched him, because it allows us to reconnect with the truth—whether we have a name for it or we know it or we recognize it or we have some big context for it or not. It really doesn't matter. And allowing ourselves some outer simplicity, some outer renunciation, gives us the space to begin to re-recognize this.

So just look at the ways—here, more and more subtly—we're getting caught in sense desire. And without judgment, notice the pain of it and see if we can put it down, to give ourselves more space to open to what we really are.

And it's not only sense desire we renounce. It's a lot of our self-identifications: the way we present ourselves, the stories we hold about ourselves, the ways we act—keeping busy, taking care of people, being the good yogi, being the bad yogi, being the angry yogi, whatever it is. The greatest renunciation, I think, is simply in the moment when any of these strong self-stories begin to arise and we notice it. "Oh yeah, that's me. Okay." Just feel the lifting. Just feel the sensation of this next breath. That simplicity—that's the great renunciation.

We just put down all the stories and interpretations and papañca and sense of self we're creating, and relax into the presence of whatever's arising in this next moment. That's all. In one moment, over and over—that's where we can begin to recognize that we're already home. We don't have to go anywhere. We don't need to create any better story about ourselves or others, or present ourselves in any light. Just let go and rest at ease in whatever's arising in this moment.

And we discover that we're already home.

It's the looking outside that reinforces our belief in being incomplete, that we're suffering beings, that something better needs to happen. It's the looking that reinforces it. That moment of renunciation, just letting go of the looking—we're back at home. No matter what may be arising, it really doesn't matter. If we can just rest here, we'll discover our potential to be at home.

From Jetsun Milarepa, Padampa Sangye said: "Everything is found within the natural state, so do not seek elsewhere." Buddhahood is the wisdom within us all. It is not elsewhere. It is actually our fundamental nature.

I'll end with a poem by Lalla, a fourteenth-century Kashmiri woman:

I was passionate, filled with longing.
I searched far and wide.
But the day that the truthful one found me,
I was at home.

May we each come home to our true nature.

CHAPTER 310

Compassion

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson reflects on the nature of karuṇā (compassion) as one of the brahmavihāras—the boundless, beautiful states of heart. Inspired by a gathering of Nobel Peace Prize laureates including the Dalai Lama and Bishop Desmond Tutu, she examines how those who have witnessed immense suffering can still embody lightness and joy, demonstrating that compassion is not a heavy burden but an uplifting quality.
>
> Wilson explores how compassion naturally arises from wisdom, as described in the Buddha's Eightfold Path, where karuṇā and mettā (loving-kindness) emerge as wise intentions alongside renunciation. She addresses the common fear that opening to suffering will cause us to drown in pain, showing instead how our attempts to protect ourselves by shutting down actually create isolation and separation. Through personal stories—including her experience with her father's Parkinson's disease and walking meditation at IMS—she illustrates how resistance to our own pain becomes resistance to connection with others.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for practitioners: by meeting our own suffering with kind, non-judging awareness, we naturally open to the suffering of all beings. Wilson shares the story of Milarepa meeting his demons with compassion, suggesting that our 'last fallback'—the heart of compassion—is actually our strongest and most freeing response. She emphasizes that we need not start with grand gestures; even opening to small discomforts like hunger can reveal our interconnectedness with all who suffer. Through steady, compassionate awareness of our moment-to-moment experience, transformation happens naturally, and in changing ourselves, we truly change the world.

What inspired me to talk about this tonight was a short article in the Sunday paper. It was about a program at the University of Virginia on Saturday where they brought together seven Nobel Peace Prize laureates to talk with the students. The article says the university hoped to inspire its politically apathetic student body and others into turning their attention away from material concerns for more than a moment to the world's victims of war, genocide, ethnic conflict, and starvation. It's actually beautiful that they did this.

In a rare joint appearance, they had seven Nobel Peace Prize winners: the Dalai Lama, Bishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, and Jody Williams, an American who won it together with Bobby Mueller for their campaign to end world landmines. Also there were President Oscar Arias Sanchez of Costa Rica, Jose Ramos Horta of East Timor, Rigoberta Menchú Tum of Guatemala, and Betty Williams of Northern Ireland. Aung San Suu Kyi sent a delegate since she couldn't come herself.

Just that this even happened is so remarkable. That was the first thing—that it even happened, that there's a recognition of how apathetic and materialistic we can be. Now we know it's not just the students at the University of Virginia. I certainly can see in myself how easy it is to get caught up in my own affairs and just not quite pay attention, not quite remember that we are the world.

There are many aspects to this article. One is how just touching into the possibility of such openness and caring can really affect people. It's like we just need a touch of the truth and it really can affect us. One student said, "I feel so changed by this. You get so caught up with your life and then you see these people who are making so much of a difference."

And then what drew me in in the first place: there's a photo of the Dalai Lama standing behind Bishop Tutu, who's sitting in a chair, and he's cracking up because he's trying to pull Bishop Tutu's hat off. These two men, who together have probably seen more suffering than any of us can imagine, are clowning around. Not coming in heavy with the weight of the world. To be able to have one's heart opened in South Africa, Tibet, wherever—and they meet the world by clowning around as well as holding all this suffering. It's so beautiful.

That's what inspired me, both of those aspects of compassion. But that's really, in my mind, what we're doing here in our practice. We talk about how wisdom naturally manifests in compassion, but I still think it's easy to forget, to get even here so caught up in how's my practice going, am I advancing to the next stage, whatever you think the next stage is. We forget that it's really about understanding that we are the world and who we are affects and changes the world, and that we don't have to be so afraid of opening our hearts to our own and others' suffering. It doesn't necessarily make for a dreary person. No one would call these men dreary. More lightness than I could imagine.

Opening to the experience of compassion, really incorporating that in our practice, in our understanding—first, just recognizing that it is the natural expression of wisdom, of clear seeing. Through our practice, the natural expression of oneness or emptiness or non-self or interconnectedness, whatever way your mind wants to talk about it, the natural manifestation of that is mettā and karuṇā, love and compassion. Whether that's a manifestation just on the level of thought, later moving to speech and action.

The Buddha described this in his Eightfold Path, how natural this progression is. Last week I talked about renunciation as being one of the three wise intentions, the second step of the Eightfold Path, the first stage being understanding, wisdom. Karuṇā and mettā are the other two wise thoughts or wise intentions. As we begin to understand ourselves and the world as it truly is, quite naturally our thoughts and intentions transform to renunciation or generosity, mettā and compassion. So in some ways, all we have to do is keep looking honestly. And whenever we see, be willing to connect with that in an open-hearted way. Compassion naturally becomes stronger and stronger in our way of relating.

The koan I find in a lot of my practice, of this whole practice, as we look at the world, is: how can we continue to open, to awaken, and to remain awake and open in a world that is so painful, that does have so much suffering in it, that is so confusing? No one's saying it's easy. As you know from being here, from looking at your own lives, it requires enormous courage and persistence and kindness to ourselves, enormous patience.

But the wonderful fact of our practice is that as we're willing to continue to open to ourselves through our own experience, we necessarily open to the world. You really can't separate the two, though we certainly try.

The definition of karuṇā, compassion, is often given as that quivering of the heart in response to pain or suffering. I really like that because to me it feels like a description of the physical, emotional state of compassion when I experience it. Quivering not of fear or of suppression, but of just being so touched. And then the response of the connected heart and mind to act, if there's a way to act, to relieve or alleviate that suffering. But if there's not a way to act—so often there's nothing one can do—that quivering of the heart in connection with compassion, with pain, we stay connected even when there's nothing one can do.

That's really the trick.

When we talk about the near enemy of compassion—the thing that compassion can often slide into or be confused with—it's sometimes described as pity, or sometimes as sorrow. There's a feeling that we're caring about the pain, and it might even come with a genuine motivation to do something about it. But there's that little bit of a quality of distancing, such as, "I want to do something about this so I don't have to see it anymore." There's that little bit of "I can't take it." Whereas with true compassion, when you can't do something, you can still hang out there with it, whether it's yourself or somebody else.

It's such an interesting phenomenon, really, which we've talked about endlessly—how dukkha, or unsatisfactoriness, or just plain old pain, is a fact of life for all beings, certainly all human beings here on this planet. And yet, when we're in pain—if I'm in emotional pain or suffering, or some kind of really deep chronic physical pain—isn't it easy to feel sort of alienated or isolated instead of thinking, "Oh great, now this is a link to all beings"? Do you feel that when you hit into some of your pain? "Oh good, now I'm connecting with the world." Not too much, right?

It's more almost a shameful thing. "Oh, here I am caught in grief again." We're ashamed of it. "Here I am suffering from this chronic disease again. Here I am in lust again"—whatever it is. It's almost as if we have to hide it. And even if we don't think that, it certainly can get reinforced in the world.

We go out, especially here in America—I teach a lot in Europe and my partner's German, so I get reflected back certain aspects of culture that others see as perhaps particularly American. Franz is always telling me I'm so American it's unbearable; I could never pass for anything else. But our greeting of "Oh, how are you?"—we all know you're not supposed to really say. You're supposed to say, "Oh, fine, thank you," and then you move on. If you meet someone on the street—"Hi, how are you doing?"—well, gosh, to tell you the truth... No, they're gone. Two-thirds of the people are gone. It's not really reinforced that other people want to know if we're suffering. If you're going on vacation with friends and you're depressed, you've got to sort of hide it. You don't want to bring them down. It's in our culture to some extent.

And we're so conditioned, it's so ingrained really here, to either hide or feel ashamed of our suffering, or to try and protect ourselves from it first and others secondarily, that the thought of compassion can get linked with the thought of suffering—not in the way that compassion comes out of suffering, but that to be compassionate means we're going to drown in suffering. Compassion can be thought of as a suffering mental state. We forget it's one of the beautiful emotions. It's one of the four boundless, limitless, unfathomable openings of heart, these connections of heart. It's uplifting. It's tender. It's beautiful.

Why are we so scared of it? It's not really that we're scared of the compassion, but the only way we get there is through the pain. And that is something we have to really bring our courage to bear on—to be able to even remember and notice how much we're shutting down.

The first time I went to India, of course it was an assault on all the senses for quite some time, especially for one who has a tendency toward aversive reactions to unpleasant experience. It can take some time to settle into just being with the way things are in a culture like India. But actually it liberated something in me, being there, and it continues to do so when I go back—because there's no pretense that everything's fine. You can't walk down the street in India and think everything's fine. It's just all out there: birth and death, disease, craziness, happiness, joy, spiritual ecstasy. It's all there. Just walking down the street is fantastic.

And I'm not trying to sentimentalize it. It's painful as hell. What's really interesting for me, always, is to see how long I can actually stay open and connected, and when does the heart shut. Two seconds sometimes, all day other times. How long can I look a beggar in the face and really connect—whether I give or not, almost immaterial.

When I shut down, it took me some time to see that it's not their pain I'm shutting to—it's my pain. And that's really the key to our whole practice here. To see how in shutting down to pain, mine or others', I'm shutting down to the world. I'm shutting down to connectedness. I'm shutting down to the richest and most beautiful part of myself, of life.

Let me give an example on a more personal level of how, by thinking we're protecting ourselves from pain, we're actually alienating ourselves from connectedness and love.

My father, in the last few years, has developed Parkinson's disease. Not real severe, but it's progressive, it's having an effect. In the first couple of years that he had it, it wasn't diagnosed, and he hadn't gone to a neurologist. And he who had always been a very bright, very sharp, very athletic person—really on the mark—started getting a little clumsy. It seemed like he was just going vacant. He would just kind of stand around, wondering what did I come here for? Now, I'm like that half the time, so I don't know why that should have bothered me. But you could just see something was going, and it was really painful for him, having always been so present.

And it was really painful for me when I'd go home to visit. But I didn't really notice that because I didn't tune into the fact that I was going through the loss of the person I'd always known as my father—the one I could rely on to be a certain way. To see that disappearing before my eyes, to see him beginning to get less sure of himself, to have his pain coming so much out into the forefront, to see his fear—basically, I hated it.

And instead of opening, instead of really even allowing myself to feel my own suffering, I found myself getting really impatient with him. And of course I beat myself up mercilessly for that. But then the next time something would happen—he'd ask me the same question for the third time, or I'd be in the middle of a book and he'd come up and say, "What are you doing?"—what do you think I'm doing?

It took me some time to see. Instead of, you know how we do this, "Okay, I will not be impatient again"—we make these resolves, right? I will be a better person. But we're just doing it out of self-hatred. We're not really looking at what's going on.

And when I really allowed myself to feel the sense of sorrow and loss that I was feeling, to kind of grieve that—that connection with my pain was the key. The sense of impatience and almost pushing him away vanished. Because it wasn't his pain I was pushing away; it was mine. And after a while, we can't really separate the two very well, if at all.

What lets us connect again to this place of oneness, this potential for compassion, for caring, for kindness, both to myself and to my father? It's just the simple willingness to open to what our experience is without judgment. It's not like I took a hammer to my heart and said, "You better open up so you can be kind to your father." It was more like, "Hey, let's look and see what's happening. Let's feel it. Let's meet experience directly and let awareness take care of the rest."

I heard a little snippet of news, I think it was last year, but it really spoke to me about how simple connection is what opens us to compassion. President Clinton was traveling in Africa, and all I heard—I didn't hear the whole story—was that he was in Rwanda and had been talking with some of the people who had survived that horrific period of massacres when millions of people were killed, people who had been wounded but survived. And you know how Clinton can be. He can sound and seem to genuinely be really touched face to face with somebody. And he was saying afterward, making a statement that regarding all those massacres in Rwanda, we—meaning we Americans, the Western world, whoever—were all part of that, that we are all responsible, that we didn't do enough.

And I reflected on that. I thought later, you know, that wasn't really new information. What made him say that two, three, four years later? And I really think it's the fact of coming face to face with a person, a living being rather than a sound bite or a talking head on television.

I remember Sister Chan Khong, who works with Thich Nhat Hanh, saying back during the time of the Vietnam War—they had been so active in Vietnam with both sides—that when she was out of the country and seeing, remember how much of that war was on TV, seeing horrific things, people holding wounded and dead children, she said she'd been in the situations that she was seeing on television. And she said seeing it on TV isn't the same as really being face to face, as really opening to what's happening.

And I think it was the same thing with Clinton. It's the same thing with us. It is really scary sometimes. It can be really difficult. Just to think about letting it all in—if I open to all this, I'm going to drown.

And we can't open all at once. You can try, but we can't. We open little by little. But we can begin to explore some of the ways that we stay closed. Some of the maybe unconscious habits that we get caught in that help us block or deny the suffering in the world, the suffering in ourselves.

I'll just mention a couple of these patterns, and you can keep exploring on your own.

The first is simple ignoring, denying—just your basic, flat-out getting so involved in our own scenario that we can't see beyond what we think are our borders. Sort of like those students at the University of Virginia. We all do it, and it's good just to be aware of it. But I can also see it on retreat. It's a good place to explore how, with all sincere good intentions—and we're really all here with good intentions—we can still get so caught in our own little scenario, or big scenario. The particular stories, the routine. And somebody or something intrudes on our scenario. They sit in our space in the dining room, or they cross our walking spot too close, or whatever. There's that moment when we can't see beyond our boundaries, and that person... we can't see their suffering. We just see how it impacts us.

As soon as we see beyond our own story, the whole story restructures. It stops being me and them and becomes we.

I'll give an example from my own practice. I was walking on a retreat here, downstairs in the gym, real early in the morning. I like to get up early and practice when it's quiet. So this one morning—I just loved that time—I was walking, really concentrated. It was so still, so peaceful, for however long.

And then the wake-up bell rang. It was always—not always fun, but interesting—to watch the transition from this pristine, concentrated stillness to the doors opening and alarms going off and the toilets flushing and the showers going and people stomping up and down, back and forth to their rooms and the bathroom. I was just watching my concentration crumble, thinking, "Ah, these people are ruining my concentration."

That went on for a few minutes, and then it just let go, and the whole story restructured. It wasn't my concentration that these people were ruining. It was simply that conditions had changed. There were conditions before, and there was concentration, and now they've changed. It isn't me or them—it's just we, all doing our dance in the big picture. And then it was fine.

This leads to the second pattern I want to talk about: how we can care, or open, to so much in ourselves or in people close to us, but then everyone else somehow becomes the other—because it's too much to let it all in. When I was walking there and people started coming out and going to the bathroom, everybody was the other. Everybody in the whole of IMS was the other, because they were in the way of my concentration.

Just to watch how we do that and how powerful it can be. Like the Clinton and Rwanda thing. Even though we think we care, it's easy just to read or hear and, without meaning to, everybody in Rwanda or Bosnia or Northern Ireland or Central LA becomes the other. The people in the house next door become the other. Aspects of ourselves become the other. And it's too hard, we think, to open to that.

I was having a great conversation with someone in an interview just about this. She was talking about visiting a hospital to see a certain person and really seeing the care that brought her to the hospital for that person. Then realizing, after some visits, how she was only there to connect with that one person. Everyone else was sort of beyond the realm of what we even notice. I've done that myself, of course—both being in the hospital and visiting. It's almost as if I can handle being with this one person and their pain, but if I really look and see how many people are in this hospital, how many hospitals there are just in this little area, and on and on and on... it's like, I can't bear it. I'll drown.

Of course, it doesn't work that way. But seeing how the other is like a repository of our fears, our sense of separation.

I read a great article in some newspaper—USA Today, I think—about aggressive driving. You know how "road rage" is suddenly a tag word that's all over the place. It was a whole article about aggressive driving and how it's getting to be a real epidemic, what constitutes it, and they were talking to therapists who work with aggressive drivers, helping them calm down. Here's what one of the therapists said about how aggressive driving arises so easily: "Especially if we're in a car, if someone on the road upsets you, that individual's whole identity is encapsulated in this bad thing he did. He's not seen as a whole person. There's an urge to express your aggression on this anonymous other, to think, 'I can't let him get away with this.' The thin veneer of civilization is removed." They said it's like a car offers you anonymity, but if you were walking down the street and meeting face to face, there wouldn't be such a sense of otherness. You look each other in the eye.

It's a very common experience. Notice, as we go through our days here, how unconsciously or subconsciously, without realizing it, who here or who in the world has suddenly moved beyond the circle of kindness and become the other—either as a repository for our aggression or just because it feels like too much pain to open to.

Because when we look, even though it might feel like we're protecting ourselves by holding all that otherness at bay, it's our own potential to rest in our truest goodness that we're blocking. It's our own potential to really experience the deepest happiness and peace that we're holding away from ourselves by holding away someone else's pain.

Or by holding parts of our own experience. And that's something I think we might not always see clearly. What part of your own emotional landscape or physical experience or processes of thought somehow becomes the other that isn't okay to surface? What is the awareness afraid to open to, or doesn't even recognize as being openable to—something that we have to get rid of?

I find it helpful when I'm feeling locked, when I'm feeling like I can't, it's too much, I can't open—whether it's to the suffering in the world, one more newspaper article, or simply one more throb of the knee, one more twinge of head pressure. Thinking, I just can't do it. It's too heavy. The burden's too much. It's going to make me bent and heavy and withered. Forget it. Nobody could bear it.

And then I look again. This is a reflection, but it helps me to consider people like those seven I mentioned at the University of Virginia—to look at who really inspires me in the history of the world, or in literature, or people who are alive now. And it's the people who really have that greatness of heart to open to and bear witness to the immense pain of a particular culture or of the world. It doesn't mean they're perfect human beings. I'm sure the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu are not perfect human beings. I'm sure Aung San Suu Kyi is not a perfect human being. But the thing I see when I look at these people is a sense of at-homedness with not being perfect. And that greatness of heart that allows them to be the loving witness to so much suffering—it's remarkably inspiring.

The more one opens to, the more love and compassion, and yes, lightness, is how we begin to hold the world, our own suffering and others. It's not that the more we open to, the heavier we become until we can't pick our heads up off the floor. There's more space, there's more lightness, there's more love.

And where does such greatness of heart come from? We don't have to start out being Mother Teresa. We don't have to start out or even aspire to being Gandhi or Bishop Tutu or anybody. This summer I was teaching in Switzerland, and one of the staff people asked what was really a heartfelt question. After reading the newspaper—which is like every day, you know how the newspapers are, so much suffering in the world—bombings, wars, famines, just the usual really, which is pathetic—she said, "It's so overwhelming. It feels like it's too late. There's so much to do, and what can I do? And of what earthly use can it be to sit here and follow my breath? To sit here and bring open attention to my knee pain and my hunger and my shame and hearing the tractors out there and my aversion?" It seems sometimes so insignificant, or even self-serving, or ostrich-like—sticking our heads in the sand.

And that's where, for me, the power and the wonder, really the miracle of awareness, of the light of steady, kind awareness, pure non-judging attention to just these little things that we're each experiencing through the day—that it really reveals the truth of ourselves. And that truth is the truth of all beings, the truth of the world: our interconnectedness, how we suffer, how we hide by trying to keep ourselves from suffering and create more suffering, how by doing that we create this false sense of separation.

And as we see this little by little, without even trying, the heart, the mind, naturally transforms and responds from love and compassion. It just can't help it. That's what's so nice. You might feel like you're the most selfish, uncompassionate person who ever lived. And it doesn't matter. If you just keep paying attention to what's coming up—that feeling of how unkind you are—the truth reveals itself.

John Muir, the great naturalist, once said, "I find that if I touch anything, it is connected to everything else in the universe." If I touch anything—that little niggling pain in your back, that's anything. Your self-hatred, that's anything. It's connected to everything else in the universe. And just the power of non-judging connection can reveal the universe in anything, even a painful experience.

I want to read this poem from Mary Oliver. It's a little long, but you're not going anywhere. It's called "Singapore."

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl. Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket. A poem should always have birds in it—kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.

Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem. When the woman turned, I could not answer her face.

Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win. She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem, but first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She's washing the tops of airport ashtrays as big as hubcaps with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life, and I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen. But maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

The light that can shine out of a life. We just have to be present with kind awareness to see that. Our life, your life, anybody's life.

Where does such greatness of heart come from? It starts right here, right now, with whatever is going on in your own experience. When we open to ourselves, to our own pain, we open to the pain of the world. You don't have to get fancy or romantic about it. You don't have to have a really big, gut-wrenching pain either. It can even start with the petty, the small petty pains. As someone said, we understand the universal through the specific.

Just a little example—it might sound petty, but it was really quite profound for this person. She told me a few years ago that she was here sitting and hungry one day. Clearly not starving to death, just hungry one day before lunch. And for the first time, she really opened to the experience of being hungry. Just that. I guess it had been a fearful experience for her. In opening to that finally, really feeling it and the pain of it—not a big pain, right?—she said she had spent months of her life in India over many years, never really connecting with how hungry so many of the people she met were. She just hadn't been able to. But by sitting here, feeling her hunger, she really felt her way into an appreciation and a connection with the people she'd met in India, the hungry people in the world.

That might sound facile, easy to say. We're sitting here, we know we get three meals a day. You could say that, but please don't just talk yourself out of honoring the path to our connectedness with the world by opening to our own sufferings, however petty they are. It's where we have to start, and it's good enough as a place to start. Just in one moment of opening like that, it's like reclaiming our wholeness, reclaiming the truth of what we really are.

I was reminded today in an interview of what a teacher of mine used to say. He'd say, "One spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies." So we can stay cut off, separated, in denial, fighting, keeping something or other at bay for eons. And one moment of whole-hearted connection and all of that other is gone, because the truth is so strong. It's stronger than our denial. And we reclaim our wholeness not in spite of the pain and confusion, but through it. It becomes our avenue.

So as you go through the days and the nights and the moments, the endless sittings and the walkings and another hell realm in the dining room, really look with kindness at how you are meeting all of your demons. All of our demons come up on retreat—the petty ones and the really, really scary ones. It's actually amazing, isn't it, how it seems that we each have had the retreat personally orchestrated? Some kind of interaction with a yogi or the staff or something happens that really triggers our deepest patterns. I don't know how this works, but it does seem to happen for us. You just can't imagine it would.

So, looking at how you're meeting your demons. I've read this before, but it's my favorite story about it, from Milarepa. Milarepa was Tibet's great yogi who lived for years and years in a cave, just eating pine needles.

In Tibetan iconography, Milarepa is often depicted as green because he was simply the most fantastic yogi. So this story goes: he's been meditating for who knows how long, and his mind became blissful. He carried some wood back up to his cave, and when he arrived there, he found seven metal demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some were grinding tsampa—barley flour—and some sat performing various magical tricks.

Isn't it just like this? You go out walking, feeling so blissful, you come and sit down, and the demons are there. They've made themselves at home, and you don't know how it happened.

As soon as Milarepa saw them, he became frightened. He meditated on his deity, uttered a subjugating mantra, a controlling mantra, performed a gaze, aroused the deity's presence. You get the drift—he was trying everything to get rid of them. Then, after all that, he meditated on compassion and friendliness. It's usually the last resort. But he was unable to pacify them.

So then he thought, "You know, they may be local deities, and I've been here a long time, but I haven't praised them." Milarepa sings many poems, and I won't read the whole thing, but he sings a long poem of praise to the place, ending it with: "You non-human demons assembled here are obstacles. Drink this cup of friendliness and compassion and be gone." Sound familiar? And three of the demons who were performing magic went away. But he was unable to make the other four leave.

Realizing that they were magical obstacles, he then sang another song, this time a song of confidence in his understanding. So we keep falling back on our practice. This long song of confidence ends with: "It's wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time, we should converse." It's a little more of a "catch you later." And three of them vanished like a rainbow.

The remaining demon, though, performed an imposing dance. And Milarepa thought, "This one is vicious and very powerful." So he sang a song of the pinnacle of his realization, the absolute peak of his understanding. This one ends with: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. Demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk out our differences."

And then he says, "I feel compassion for this spirit." He prays to Lord Vajradhara: "Grant your blessings so that this lowly one himself may have complete compassion." And then, with friendliness and compassion, without concern for his body, Milarepa placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and so vanished like a rainbow.

Internal, external—it's our last fallback, the heart of compassion. But it's actually the strongest and most freeing way of meeting all the aspects of ourselves that we try to demonize. Ask them in for tea.

And then what starts to happen is that the sense of my suffering, your suffering, my boundaries, the world's boundaries, really starts to get mushy, starts to dissolve a little bit. It's just the pain.

Pema Chödrön quotes Bernie Glassman in a wonderful way. Bernie Glassman was a Zen teacher who ran a project for the homeless in Yonkers, New York. She said she heard him say something that struck her. He said he doesn't really do this work to help others. He does it because he feels that moving into the areas of society that he had rejected is the same as working with the parts of himself that he has rejected.

It goes both ways—the parts of ourselves, the parts of society that we reject. Working with one is working with both. And the intention of compassion that allows us to meet our sufferings here with kindness, the intention of open-hearted awareness, strengthens into the natural, deeper intentions of speech and action, so that there becomes a natural purification of how we act and who we are in the world.

To the point where it might not even be viewed as compassion. I heard this great phrase once: "just doing the obvious." What's the obvious thing to do in this situation?

An example that quite moved me when I heard it on the radio was a couple of years ago. A basketball player, a rookie in his first year in the NBA—you know how it is, for someone to finally make the NBA, it's the pinnacle of someone's dream. You couldn't go any further. They were interviewing him on the radio. His sister lived in LA, I think, and she needed a kidney transplant or she was going to die. He was saying that if he was a compatible donor, of course he would give her one of his kidneys. He didn't even mention this part, but the announcer was saying, "But doesn't that mean you'd have to give up your career?" Which I guess it did—I'm not sure why, but I suppose it's too dangerous, you could damage the second kidney. The announcer was going, "Oh, that's so amazing," and the guy was like, "It's an obvious choice." He didn't say "doing the obvious," but he might as well have. "There's nothing to think about. It's my sister. If she needs a kidney, I give it to her. What's playing basketball compared to that?"

It was so beautiful because it was so unselfconscious. It wasn't, "Aren't I a great being?" He was just doing the obvious. To me that was the perfect example of a life of compassion. Not holding ourselves as special, but just the natural transformation from—as Joko Beck phrases it—a self-centered view of life and practice to a life-centered view. We're part of life, but each of us is not the central core. We can look at the whole picture. And it happens naturally.

I know each of you has seen that transformation happening naturally here. In the times when your neighbor or somebody does something that's just aggravating you—anger, anger, anger at them, anger at yourself, self-judging. And suddenly there's this openness to the whole picture and the movement of connectedness, compassion. You see the pain that caused that behavior. You feel the pain that caused your own reaction. And there's just a putting down of the story. It's a little thing, but it's the natural purification from awareness to the heart of compassion.

And besides it happening naturally, awareness gives us a choice. The times that we see—and it's painful, isn't it, to see how much of our actions, our thoughts, come from greed, come from aversion. But again, the willingness to open to that pain gives us that moment of choice. And we begin to see that much more often than we might have thought, we do have a choice where to let the heart and mind dwell. Quite often we do have a choice which response to choose. And if we're willing to face the pain of the times we can't make the response we'd like to make, then it becomes actually easier and easier to make that response we would like to make.

From Victor Frankl: "We who lived in the concentration camps can remember the men who walked through the huts comforting others, giving away their last piece of bread. They may have been few in number, but they offer sufficient proof that everything can be taken from a man but one thing—the last of his freedoms—to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's way."

It's not easy. We won't always make the wisest choice. But if we continue having the courage to look, we can really begin to choose our way. And in transforming ourselves, we really do transform the world.

Thich Nhat Hanh—someone asks him, "There are so many urgent problems, what should I do?" And he says, "Take one thing and do it very deeply and carefully, and you will be doing everything at the same time."

So let's do our practice very deeply and carefully. Let's meet ourselves open-heartedly, deeply, and carefully. And in changing ourselves, we're changing the world.

CHAPTER 311

Views & Opinions

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines one of the Buddha's four fields of grasping: attachment to views and opinions (diṭṭhupādāna). She observes how practitioners often shift from seeking peak experiences to seeking knowledge and understanding, wanting to grasp ultimate truth in a formula they can hold onto. Yet as Thích Nhất Hạnh reminds us, "Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking."
>
> Wilson draws on the Bāhiya Sutta to illustrate the radical simplicity of direct experience: "In the seeing, just the seeing. In the hearing, just the hearing." She explores how perception (saññā), one of the five khandhas, is colored by mental states and conditioning, leading to misperception that becomes the foundation for elaborate self-stories. Through vivid examples—from Swiss food beliefs to neurological case studies—she demonstrates how our sense of a solid, continuous self is constructed moment by moment through selective perception and habitual thinking.
> The practical implications for meditation are significant. Wilson encourages practitioners to release all views about what "good practice" should look like, noting how doubt masquerades as analytical thinking when we compare our experience against fixed standards. She invites us to discover the freedom of having no resting place, no unchanging reference point—what Nisargadatta Maharaj calls abandoning all flavorings to taste pure water. Rather than living in the prison of our known world, we can open with vitality into each moment, like mountain monkeys who launch themselves into space with complete trust.

I'd like to talk about letting go of knowledge, or attachment to views and opinions.

I notice, talking to people and in myself, how easily this happens. Perhaps at this point in the retreat it starts to become more noticeable. We begin to think of practice differently—maybe we're beginning to get it that practice isn't about a quest for experience. We sort of get it. We keep trying, but we hear it enough.

What I find it turns to, for me after that, is a quest for knowledge, a quest for understanding. We want to get it and have it and hold on to it and have somewhere really solid to stand with this knowledge. And guess what? We suffer. We suffer.

Maybe it's wanting to understand the teachings. I know for me, for years I was practicing thinking I would attain some specific set of knowledge that somehow I could think it or have it. It would explain everything. And that would be the endpoint. Finished. Got it. Now I don't have to keep doing this anymore. It would explain impermanence. It would explain non-self. It would explain the whole show. Ultimate truth in two sentences. I don't know what I thought.

But sometimes if it's not that, then we want knowledge about the technique, or how to be a perfect mindfulness machine, or what exactly one should do in every particular moment of practice in every particular situation. Have the list, pull it out: "Okay, when the breath is like this and the noting's like this, then I should do that." And we forget—we really forget, or we don't like to remember—that practice takes us in just the opposite direction from thinking we're going to attain some knowledge. It's actually taking us into the ability to live in the mystery, in the fact that we don't have a clue. And that's okay.

When it's not okay that we don't have a clue what's going to happen in the next moment, then there's a lot of suffering. We try to limit and control that through our knowledge, and practice can become another quest for it.

Thich Nhat Hanh wrote: "Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking." If you could just take that in, it would really save a lot of grief. Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking. Understanding is the result of a long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding. But we keep trying.

I want to talk about one of the ways we easily get trapped in rigid and limiting thoughts, and that's when the thoughts form a description, a view, an opinion of anything—and we get attached to it. Rigid and limiting. That attachment really limits what we know, limits what we think we know, limits what we look for. We can only experience what's within the realm of what we might be looking for based on what we know. Anything else is either outside the realm of what should be happening, or we don't even let it in. Our lives become so constricted. Our minds and hearts are so constricted.

We go on and on about beginner's mind—that whole phrase: "In the beginner's mind there are many possibilities; in the expert's mind there are few." But somehow we all want to be experts.

When we can really just look at what's presenting itself without our preconceptions—which is the whole of mindfulness practice—then what we discover over and over is the wonder of ourselves, of life, the mystery. And it's not fearsome. It's invigorating. It's amazing.

Someone was showing me a PBS science special. I think it was about something modest, like the creation of the universe. But it was very serious science. The only thing I remember from it is that they were saying, based on the theory of the Big Bang—that the universe as we know it all began as one massive explosion—that all the molecules in each of our bodies at one time came from the stars, because that's how everything started.

To think that all my molecules were once in a star kind of takes away any sense of ownership, doesn't it? It's all a mystery.

I have to read this. I've read it many times before, but it's just my perfect description of how the closer we look, the more we see we don't know. This is also a science article from The New York Times a few years ago, so maybe it's outdated—again about astronomy. They were announcing that astronomers had discovered the largest galaxy ever. It includes 100 trillion stars. 100 trillion. And it's more than 6 million light years in diameter—more than 60 times bigger than our galaxy, the Milky Way. You didn't know we owned a galaxy, did you? Sixty times bigger than our galaxy.

Now, this new galaxy, the biggest one ever discovered, is in the middle of an even larger clump—a clump of 1,000 galaxies called Abel 2029. But then comes the interesting part; that's only the buildup. The interesting part is that they hope that by studying what lets all this clumping happen in the universe, all these galaxies clumping together, why the universe is bunchy, they'll discover the role played by a mysterious substance called dark matter.

This means that there doesn't appear to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the huge gravitational forces that would seem necessary to cause all this clumping. So scientists propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that eludes detection because it emits no radiation. According to the prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe consists of this invisible missing mass. This is serious science. This is not a joke. Ninety-nine percent consists of some invisible missing mass. And we think we know what's going on.

But so often in our practice, in our explorations, when we look, it's not so comfortable—this hanging out and absolutely not knowing, not having a place to rest. Our practice is a moment-to-moment opening into this unknown, as Kamala talked about a bit last night. It takes an enormous trust and confidence.

But one of the things our mind does as a way of countering this "who knows what's going on" is to contract and congeal around explanations, thoughts, views, and opinions, somehow thinking that's giving us security. We think we know, but that idea we are attached to without realizing it actually forms a veil over our perceptions, over the way we relate to our experience. And far from providing safety or security, it's like living in a prison.

I was thinking recently that it feels to me like living, trying to live within the realm of my views and opinions, my understandings of who I am in the world, is like living in two dimensions when three are available. You know Krishnamurti's famous saying: freedom from the known. It's really that. The known keeps us in a prison of our own devising. The possibilities are so vast, but if we limit them to what we can already think of, that's pretty puny. What about the other 99%?

So, grasping attachment to views and opinions. The Buddha considered this an extremely important area of investigation. When he speaks about the pain of grasping attachment, craving is that leaning towards, and grasping is when it hardens into "Aha, gotcha." He talked about four fields of grasping. One is sense pleasures. The second is views and opinions—and he talked about it a lot, how it limits possibilities, how it keeps us in bondage. I'm not going to talk about the others because somebody else is going to talk about them. Don't worry, you'll hear.

When we're attached to a view, it's really just a thought. The way they describe it in the commentaries is as a thought with the tendency of mind to think "this alone is true, everything else is false." Now, I wish my mind would think that when I'm attached to an opinion, because then at least I would know what was going on. But I think it's much more insidious when we don't even recognize it's an opinion—when we really do think, "Yeah, this is how it is."

I want to talk about some different ways we do that. It's obvious in the world, if we look at other people, how they get really attached to ideas, and how much suffering exists in this world through really clinging to views and opinions. Massive suffering. When you think of the famine in North Korea, which apparently is as bad or worse than ever, and how much of that could have been avoided, could continue to be avoided, if the government didn't have particular Opinions of how they looked at themselves, how they wanted to present themselves to the world, how they think about the rest of the world—not allowing aid in, not allowing other people, not even admitting there's a famine going on. Unbelievable. But it happens all the time. Or politics—need we even mention?

What attachment to a view does, and this is what's really interesting, is that we see the world ourselves often through that veil, to the extent that we don't even consciously let in information or perceptions that challenge that particular opinion or view. We just completely dismiss them out of hand. We can see that in politics all the time. It's more interesting to see it in ourselves.

I can watch myself with particular American politicians who I just can't even stand to listen to. There's no chance they could say anything worthwhile. And if they do, they're obviously insincere. There's no way my mind wants to let it in that certain people—who will remain unnamed—could have anything useful to be adding to the way this country is being run. And I see that—I don't let anything else in.

I read somewhere that in 1988, the Soviet Union—well, it wasn't the Soviet Union anymore—but the authorities canceled history exams because they said that the national heritage had become lost among the lies and official secrets of the past. Nobody had learned the real history, I guess, so they couldn't give exams on it. At least they admitted it. It's not like that doesn't go on here.

So in those ways, it's obvious pretty much when we look out there how really insidious and dangerous attachment to views can be. But look in our own behavior and in smaller areas. What do we think? We don't think it's a view—we think it's true. It's not really open to challenge. And how much anger and fearfulness really comes up when our view is challenged.

Work meditation, if you work with a team, that's a really good place. How things should be done. Or living with somebody. How the house should be kept. How cooking should be done. How the dishes should be done. How the chores should be divided up. Little things. Or food—what is healthy and appropriate food? Now that's a huge area of dissension.

And even looking in ourselves, can we find the place where we can acknowledge, okay, some of it's preference, but this is the line where I know this is true, and everyone else is sadly confused? It's also relative, but if we can even let that in, we're making a first step. Can we even think, maybe this is an opinion? Maybe this isn't true? It's hard.

And so often—just the other day, I said something to someone about a particular situation. I was absolutely convinced I was correct. There was no question in my mind. It was something that was checkable, you know, like a fact. So I went and checked it. I was totally wrong. Totally. There was no crossing of what I said and what was true. I was totally convinced. How often do we do that?

This is from Pema Chödrön: "Opinions are opinions, nothing more or less. We can begin to notice them and label them as opinions just as we label thoughts as thoughts." Opinions are also thoughts, by the way. "Just by this simple exercise, we are introduced to the notion of egolessness. All ego really is, is our opinions, which we take to be solid, real, and the absolute truth about how things are. To have even a few seconds of doubt about the solidity and absolute truth of our own opinions, just to begin to see that we do have opinions, introduces us to the possibility of egolessness." We don't have to make the opinions go away. That's important. We don't have to make them go away, and we don't have to criticize ourselves for having them.

We could just notice what we say to ourselves and see how so much of it is just our particular take on reality—which may or may not be shared by other people. Just to let in that possibility cracks the solidity of what we perceive and think our world is.

And that's the point. We don't like it to crack, really, and so we hold on tight. But it's also relative—seeing how much of our opinions, our views, how we really look at ourselves and the world comes from our conditioning: our family, our culture, our heritage, the particular education we had, the environment we grew up in. All of that forms our take, how we actually perceive the world. And yet we still take our opinions as so solid.

Just a funny example I experienced this summer—a little one about how strong the belief in "how things are" can be, and how it can be cultural. Again, it's about food. I was in Switzerland teaching a retreat. I go there a lot. And for some reason, my two friends Fred and Ursula, whom I was teaching with, got into this joke of singing this little Swiss ditty to me. I apologize to my Swiss friends—I know that my translation won't do justice to this—but it's something from their childhood, something about, "We're so happy living in the mountains," and it would end with—and this is what would crack us up—"We have butter and cheese, and that gives us good blood."

So this is serious, you know, and they're hiking till they're ninety. Well, if you're from this culture, or this segment of this culture, somewhat cholesterol-obsessed I would say, I cannot hear that. "We have butter and cheese and that gives us good blood"—I get cross-sections of arteries clogged with cholesterol. I think, "Yeah, really good blood." Could I even say, okay, it works for them? I can't be hiking up and down the mountain like they are. Something's working. But just to see the difference—it's views, it's opinions.

So it's fine when we can recognize we're holding an opinion, a description. What about when we can't? What about when someone tells us something, or some piece of information comes in that's so outside of our realm? Can we just hold open the possibility, or do we just forget it? "Forget it, that can't be true"—even if it's your own experience.

Again, my friend Fred was telling me about a Tibetan teacher of his who was teaching a whole group of Western students some time ago. He was going on and on about this really intricate description of the Pure Land, where Amitabha Buddha hangs out in one of the Deva realms. He was going on and on—the color of the walls, what it looked like. Finally he stops and looks at the Westerners, who were becoming more and more like, "Yeah, right, buddy." And he says, "If you think I'm making it up, I've been there." What do you do with that?

So it's really to look at: what are you holding as absolute truth? What's not open to discussion? It probably won't even come to mind right away because we take it so much for granted. But when it's challenged, when perceptions arise that don't fit—we're on shaky ground, and we don't like it. It's fearful. Often we get angry. Dispute comes up, or frustration.

This is one of my favorite quotations from the Buddha: "For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions, they wander about in the world annoying people." You can relate, huh? But which side are you relating from?

Okay, now I'm getting serious. I want to talk a minute about where a thought and a view, a description of reality, arises from in the beginning of a moment. Because remember, everything's moment to moment. And it really begins with perception. Perception, as Steve talked about, is one of the five skandhas. Perception is that quality when there's sense contact—it's that quality of recognition based in memory. So when seeing, I know that's a human being, I know that's a rug, I know it's red—that's perception.

The Dalai Lama once said that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there is so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. Mistaken perception.

This is a very fascinating area of exploration, especially when you're sitting as you are now, when you're quiet, because there's a little more space to explore this. This recognition faculty, one of the five skandhas, arises with every sense contact. And it's not always accurate. It's not always correct. The memory, the recognition, occurs through the veil of whatever mental states happen to be present at the moment, whatever mental factors are there. If we're not aware of that coloring, the perception can be a little bit off—or completely wrong.

And we don't know that. From that recognition, we build an association and a memory and a liking and a disliking and a sense of self, and on and on and on—we're way down the road. When we talk about papañca, this proliferation of thoughts and ideas and associations, that's where it starts, right at that point of perception.

Let me give you a couple of examples of how perception can be inaccurate. You know how this happens—many people have reported this—they're just in a grumpy mood, and you don't recognize it at first. Then after a while you notice that everything happening and every person who crosses your view, there's something wrong with them. And suddenly you get it: "Oh, I see. There's aversion coloring my perception of everything."

There's a way that we can literally, literally think we see something that isn't there. I remember one time I was in the hospital and quite, you know, you get kind of out of it. This nurse would always wake me up around five in the morning to weigh me. She came in the first day when I was in a kind of altered state—not drugged exactly, but just a little out of it—and I literally perceived her as somewhat demonic, kind of evil. That's really how she looked to me, not quite like a normal human being. And of course I responded in an appropriate fashion, which I felt terrible about the next day when this same lady—a nice, kind of timid-looking lady—came to wake me up to weigh me, and it was just a regular nice-looking nurse. The mental state really colors the perception.

Now, one that we often don't recognize is delusion. A lot of people have been saying, "I don't ever see delusion." Well, that's its nature—you don't recognize what's going on. I've noticed in myself that there can be a perception, a sound or a sight, and basically you don't know what it is. You don't have all the information. But the mind doesn't like that, so it makes something up. Something similar, something close. And until we can come back and really recognize—"Oh, that sound wasn't really a bomb going off, it was the radiator"—until we recognize that, we can go a long way down the road on this inaccurate perception.

One woman told me this summer—she had a lot of self-hatred and a lot of aversion, and she was really working with it in her practice and in her daily life. She said she noticed that when she'd come to work, one of her co-workers, a man, would come in frowning. Immediately she'd think he was frowning at her because he didn't like her. She'd get angry back, and she'd start going through her mind, kind of clicking through: "What have I done? What's he reacting to now?" This whole thing would get built up.

Through her continued practice, she really started to recognize: "Oh, he's frowning. I actually have no idea why. Maybe he had a fight with his wife. Maybe his shoes are too tight. I don't know." But she had been seeing his frown through the perception of her own worthlessness, her self-hatred—not just thinking maybe he didn't like her, but totally convinced that the frown was because he really disliked her. Totally convinced. And if you tried to talk her out of it, forget it.

How often do we do that? And we don't know it. That's holding a particular view, a construction of thought based on perception.

Can we just hold open the possibility? Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe I don't actually know this.

It's not easy. It's not easy to do that. Because when we're not recognizing that the perception is inaccurate—which generally we don't—and the whole train of papañca, the stories, the views, the descriptions that are built on it, follows naturally, it's hard to hold open the possibility of doubt. We're saying, "No, no, this is just how it is." We don't even question.

Attachment to views really freezes our experience.

As the Buddha said, attachment to views brings us into conflict with others, but it also brings us into conflict within ourselves. When we're caught in an opinion, a construction like that, we tend to deny perceptions that don't fit our description. And because the experience is happening anyway, we find ourselves in this state of internal conflict.

A wonderful place to explore this is in how you're relating to your meditation practice. See if you notice, should it happen, that you form any views or opinions about what good practice is. Should you notice that arising in your mind, assume, please, that it's a view—no matter what you think good practice is. But really start to look and see.

We're lucky as teachers because we get to talk to so many different people. We really hear it all. Somebody will walk in and say the exact opposite of the person before, and both are really invested in their view. "This is what good practice is. My samādhi is no good because things are coming and going so quickly." The next person comes in and says, "My practice is no good because I'm not seeing beginnings and endings of things." Someone else comes in and says, "My practice is no good because I'm having so many emotions." And the next person goes, "What's the matter with me? I'm so shallow. I'm stuffing everything. I'm not having a lot of emotions."

And it just goes on and on. A really common one involves whatever "good mindfulness" means to someone—choiceless awareness, being in the flow. "Now I've finally hit deep practice. And this thing that starts to happen, this is in the way of my deep practice. Somehow I've got to fix it, get rid of it, be mindful, because if I'm really mindful, it'll go away. Then I can go back to my deep practice." Whatever that means.

The question periods in the morning are a rich field for this. Or anything we say in instructions. You notice how you'll hear the particular instruction or question that fits into your view. "I knew I wasn't doing it right. I knew I don't know what the heck I'm doing here all this time." Or if it's a person you've formed some view about based on the fact that they walk faster than you, you say, "Oh well, they don't know what they're talking about anyway, so it doesn't matter what they say."

Just watch this stuff. We suffer from it so much, and we don't let in that things are changing all the time.

Here's an example of how much we cannot let it in. Once in a retreat—I was teaching a short retreat with a lot of beginners who'd never sat before—about the fifth day, a woman in an interview, maybe in her fifties or sixties, on her first retreat ever, came to me and said kind of sheepishly that she had been basically killing herself, sitting cross-legged in the proper lotus position every sitting, in excruciating pain. It was just awful. That was her whole retreat—the resistance and reaction to this self-torture. Because that's how you have to meditate.

It was the fifth day when she looked around and said, "Wait a minute, Carol's in a chair." It's really amazing. Maybe—and she was still sort of checking it out with me—maybe you could meditate in a chair.

We build some whole construction around a view, cling to it, and then suffer enormously. We compare everything that happens in our practice to this view of what it's supposed to be. It's unbearable, isn't it? But we keep on doing it.

And that's how doubt gets going. "Wait a minute. Good practice is like XYZ, but mine is like this. How can this fit into that? Or how can I change this to make that? Or maybe that's not really good practice. Maybe I have to change my view." That's doubt masquerading as analytical thinking. It does masquerade as analytical thinking.

Try to imagine having no view whatsoever of good practice. Know nothing. Not "this is good practice" and "this is bad practice." Can you imagine just starting the walking or starting the sitting with no opinion whatsoever of what should happen? Just let it rip. It doesn't matter what comes and goes. It doesn't matter how you pay attention. It doesn't matter what it looks like.

It's just all happening. It's such a relief. But it's so hard to do. It's so hard to do.

When I say attachment to views freezes experience, at first it doesn't recognize impermanence. Because how can any one thing or two things be good practice? Conditions are changing constantly. How can we hold on to any idea as "this is always good practice"? It doesn't recognize impermanence. It doesn't recognize conditionality. It binds us in a box instead of letting us just open with vitality into whatever arises.

But it's still so kind of basic scary. We still would prefer, often, the security of some explanation or some idea or some knowledge than just, "Oh yeah, I have no idea what good practice is and I'm just practicing 100% and who cares what happens?" It's hard. We're more comfortable wanting an unchanging reference point. Even if it means we're constantly comparing ourselves detrimentally against that unchanging reference point, we'd rather have it than not.

The Buddha said once, "The desire for resting is burning. Not to need it, not to need a resting point, is cool and peaceful. Let one, calm and independent, not desire any resting place." Just not desire any resting place. It's lovely.

Now, the sense of inaccurate perception or misperception, and the descriptions, the views, the whole story that comes out of it—the basic core of our suffering, the basic misperception that comes and goes all the time, that's at the core of our wrong view, of our confusion—is the misperception that leads to the idea that we are a separate, unchanging, self-contained being.

It's not like it's some stupid, wrong idea. It's not like there's some ego we have to dig out and blast apart and break into little pieces. All we need to do is keep bringing our attention to what's actually happening. With that clear seeing of mindfulness, we begin to see through the misperception. But again, we need to have just that willingness to say, "Maybe the way I know it is isn't really that way." Just allowing that possibility.

You know the anthropologist Oliver Sacks, who does a lot of work with different people with different neurological conditions? He has this one article about a man who, I think at the time he was four or five, went blind. And in his forties they did an operation that could bring him back partial sight. And the thinking was, "Wow, he's going to be so happy. He can finally see."

And the experience was so other than that. Because when they finally took off the bandages, everyone's standing around, "Oh, great! What do you see?" Well, he saw, but nothing made any sense. Just blur. And he said something—he heard a voice and he turned his head and said, "Well, that must be a face," because he knew voices came out of faces. But it didn't look like a face that made any sense to him the way it would to those of us born with sight.

And in fact, his whole world, which he was actually doing fine in as a blind person—his main sense of getting around was through touch, and the world made sense to him that way—it really never got so it made good sense to him through sight. In fact, it was anxiety-producing and stressful. And in times when it got really hard, he would just close his eyes so he didn't have to see. He could go back to shaving or eating or everything through touch, which was more relaxed.

But it just goes to show how we think about how we see things. We don't question that it's just a perception that may or may not have much to do with what's really there. What about the other 99% we can't see?

My father recently, in the last year, has been having a lot of eye operations. And about a year ago, in order to save the retina, they rotated one of his retinas 40 degrees—and not the other one, which he couldn't see too well out of anyway. So what that meant was that he went around from this eye seeing everything as if it was at a 40-degree slant, while from this eye it was more straight up.

So as you can see, it's just the mechanism of how our eyes are that helps us see, and then memory. It's not like, "Oh yes, everything is really the way we see it." But you can imagine how unsettling that would be, to see everything at a 40-degree slant. The idea being that the brain would gradually overcome the way the eye was and see everything straight, even though that wasn't how the information was coming in. That was the theory. He's still waiting. It's getting closer, but it's been a year, and it still isn't quite there. It's very, very unsettling.

So that's just an example of something that just seems so given, so obvious, and it's not necessarily the way we perceive it.

It's the same with us, with our body, with our feelings, with our emotions. When Steve was talking about identification with the body, we might begin by exploring what we are even calling "the body." It feels solid. This feels like the same body I had three years ago—doesn't look the same though, does it? Feels like the same body we had when we were five. Sure doesn't look the same.

And if we really begin just noticing what happens in our meditation without always referencing it to this idea—"this is my solid body"—a lot of people report times when there are perceptual distortions of the body, or there's no sense of body at all, or the body is just sensations coming and going in space. Sometimes we like it, sometimes we don't like it. Then it goes back to being solid.

Do you think, as you were sitting there, your body really completely dissolved and no one could see you and there were just little dancing molecules in space, and then you came back together again? The perceptions are just changing. It's scary when we want our world solid again. But when we can just let go into that—oh great, fine, dancing sensations. Oh great, fine, solid concrete. Oh great, fine, body of light. Oh great, fine, heavy pressure in the head. Just whatever it is, without always referencing it to some solid idea.

Technically it's said, and it really seems true, that our sense of continuity—of the body being solid—is because things are coming and going so quickly that we don't see the gaps. As the mind gets more concentrated and refined in awareness, there are times where that solidity of perception begins to break down. And then it goes away again. But just to open to the possibility that things aren't the way we assume they are in us, as us.

And just as with the body, so too with the sense of ourselves as thought, as emotion. Watch your thoughts. I know when I look at mine, even going through a retreat, how often we're telling our self-story through experience as it's going on. And unquestioned, uninvestigated, it feels like the same self-story. The story is different, but it's the same self. But if you really look, it's just as discontinuous as the physical. In fact, you can even notice it more in a way.

What I notice happening is that from any particular sense experience—hearing, seeing, thinking—there's a perception, and from that an association, a memory, a liking, another feeling, and like this, a whole self-story. And like any construction of thought, any opinion, we use selective perception to tell that particular self-story, not really getting it that the next story five minutes later could be totally the opposite. And it can start from any little sense experience.

I'll give you some examples. They're just so obvious. Hearing the rain. Hearing, hearing. Now, it could stop right there. And in fact, there's a wonderful sutta of the Buddha called the Bāhiya Sutta—talking to Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth, who is begging him for a quick five-minute explanation of everything that will awaken him. And as so often happens, it did.

The Buddha says—it's classically translated as "in the seen, there is just the seen." Let me give you this translation. It's from Buddhadāsa, but translated into English by Santikaro Bhikkhu, a friend of ours. This is basically the Bāhiya Sutta put in a little more accessible language:

"O Bāhiya, whenever you see a form, let there be just the seeing. Whenever you hear a sound, let there be just the hearing. When you smell an odor, let there be just the smelling. When you taste a flavor, let there be just the tasting. When a thought arises, let it be just a natural phenomenon arising in the mind. When you practice like this, there will be no self, no 'I.' When there is no self, there will be no running that way and no coming this way and no stopping anywhere"—the stopping, you know, when we try to stop everything to get secure. "That is the end of dukkha."

So any sense experience—hearing the rain—and in the hearing, let there be just the hearing. It's so simple.

It's radical, and we can't stand it. We can't stand to let it be just hearing. It has to be hearing—oh yes, the rain, it's so cozy to stay in bed on a rainy day. My childhood and poignancy and how I felt as a child and me, I'm so solid—and a whole mood of nostalgia arises, all of this in a tenth of a second of hearing.

But where would we be without our stories?

So there's a kind of hearing, and the nostalgia goes into sadness, goes into loneliness. Here I am on a gray November day looking out at those dreary pine trees, and everyone in my family is off doing what they're doing, and I'm so alone here—and on and on it goes. Only sad, lonely memories and perceptions make it through the veil. Well, maybe I better go walk. We go walk. I'm so sad. I'm so lonely. I've always been like this. I always will be.

Then something happens—someone drops a cup, you get distracted—and you go back to lifting, moving, placing. Lifting, moving, placing. Oh yes, really present, really here, really clear. This is really just all there is. Lifting, moving, placing. It's so freeing.

And then we go off somewhere else. Even if you don't go off, there's just the sense of me lifting, moving, placing. Then we start thinking about what a good yogi we are, how much we love this, and we're going to sign up for the next three-month course. And then—oh God, I'm thinking again. I'm hopeless. I can't do this. Then we remember all the times we failed at things, and we think all of that is some kind of continuous self going on.

But it's nothing but isolating a particular sense contact, perception—whether it's the hearing, whether it's a particular feeling in your body, whether it's a particular thought of sadness or a feeling of pleasantness as you're lifting your foot, whether it's a self-judgment when you notice you're thinking again. That could just be noted as "thinking, thinking." It doesn't have to go into "I can't do this." Whichever particular idea we grasp at, it becomes who we are. Unexamined, that feels solid and continuous. And it's all nothing but opinions and thoughts and associations arising from some sense contact.

There was a line from Lily Tomlin that I really like. She said, "I always wanted to be somebody, but I should have been more specific."

So inquire into this—the perception and the sense contact. Notice how when we're in a particular description of who we are, there's selective perception going on. We don't want to let in the perceptions, the memories, the experiences that don't fit that description. Just to notice this begins to break up the sense of solidity of who we are. But it also breaks up our illusion of security. And so sometimes that can be a little scary, a little shaky. It's sort of like if you've ever been in an earthquake—it's so unsettling, especially when the aftershocks keep coming, because somewhere we think the earth should be dependable. It's not supposed to move like that.

Coming back to Bahiya: in the hearing is just the hearing, in the thinking is just the thinking, in the feeling is just the feeling. As Nyoshō Kempō says, get out of the construction business. Just stay simple and easy with what's arising. We don't need to add to it.

The Buddha was so radical, because he goes on to include even views of his teaching, views of practice. Any description of the truth, at some point, has to be let go. You know the famous simile of the raft, where the teachings are the raft you build to get to the other shore, but when you get there, you don't carry the raft on your shoulder. Any of the opinions, the descriptions, the interpretations that we're holding to—they might be helpful for a while. Ideas about practice, senses of who we are. Sometimes when we get a new psychological insight into our past and why we have been doing things, that can be really helpful. And then at some point, holding on to it becomes a burden. It gets in the way, and we really have to let it go. Even the Buddhist teachings—and definitely any view or opinion about ourselves or who we are.

Any view or opinion. There's not some view you can kind of keep in reserve. The Buddha says there is no view of self we can take refuge in that will not cause anxiety, exhaustion, sorrow, and suffering. Those are powerful words. We try to take refuge in some solid sense of self, to have some sense of resting there. But remember, it's that desire for resting that's burning. Let one, cool and independent, not desire any resting place. It's our holding on to explanations and opinions that keeps us locked in a limited life, a limited potential of reality, of who we are. It keeps us living on the surface, as it were. It's like a cage.

And it's scary to let go of it because we want something better to grab onto. This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj, talking about the mental habits of longing for the known past and fearing the unknown future. You know, we want to know what the future holds, if it's better than the past. He says, "But when you know these are habits of the mind only, they're just habits, you can go beyond them. As long as you have all sorts of ideas about yourself, you know yourself through the mist of these ideas. To know yourself as you truly are, give up all ideas. You cannot imagine the taste of pure water. You can only discover it by abandoning all flavorings."

So it feels scary to abandon all flavorings, to abandon all ideas, because we want to know what it's going to be. But we can't. And as scary as it might seem, when we actually put down that burden of trying to control the uncontrollable, it's such a relief. Instead of living in fear and contraction, we can just open with all our vitality to be fully alive in the present. Because it's true—we never know what's going to happen in the next moment. It could be boring. It could be incredible. It could be horrific. But trying to control that doesn't work anyway.

We really never know. It was brought home to me this summer, again in Switzerland. The first full day of the retreat, one of our friends got a phone call that her mother, who was young and quite vigorous, had had a terrible accident. She'd fallen down some stairs, broken vertebrae in her neck, completely paralyzed. And it didn't look like they could do anything. Just from one moment to the next. Of course we all know this, but it takes really coming up against it to feel it fully. We don't know.

Now hearing that, it's easy to contract in fear. Oh my God, I'm afraid to put down my foot in the next moment. What will happen? But it's been this way anyway. That's not some new piece of information. And when we just realize, "Yeah, I don't know," then we can live with a vitality that releases us from this prison of our minds.

We can be like the mountain monkeys some friends told me about at Mount Arunachala—the sacred mountain of Ramana Maharshi in southern India. I was there last winter, and some friends of mine would climb up to the top real early in the morning, like three a.m. Just as the mist would clear and you could see, there were monkeys. There are monkeys that live down below, but the ones up on the top are a little different. These mountain monkeys, on this very stony terrain with lots of rocks and some little bushes, would be holding on somewhere and then completely let go and catapult themselves out into the air—as if they could fly. Either complete reckless abandon or total trust. My friend said they always did land again, on a rock or on a bush somewhere. They never just launched out and crashed all the way down three thousand feet. They always landed somewhere. But they didn't sit there thinking, "I'll aim over there." They just threw themselves out.

That kind of perfect trust, opening into the moment—that's what we're practicing. That's what mindfulness practice really is. And if we think we know where we're going, then we can't see where we are. We'll never know the truth. But as we begin to just open in that way, life becomes so much richer, so much deeper, and we can actually be open to the possibility of living in a whole different way from how we've been living, relating to who we think we are in a whole different way. We never have existed in the way we may have believed.

Nothing changes except the way we perceive ourselves. It's like coming home.

Let's close with this poem by Rilke:

I live my life in widening circles that reach out across the world.
I may not complete this last one,
but I give myself to it.
I circle around God, around the primordial tower.
I've been circling for thousands of years,
and I still don't know.
Am I a falcon, a storm, or a great song?

CHAPTER 312

Embodying Freedom

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this closing retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the common anxiety practitioners feel about maintaining their practice after retreat ends. She challenges the misconception that deep mindfulness requires the precise, microscopic awareness cultivated in intensive practice, introducing the broader concept of sampajañña (clear comprehension) as an essential complement to sati (mindfulness).
>
> Wilson explores two key aspects of clear comprehension: purpose and suitability. She encourages practitioners to identify their overarching life purpose—not as another ideal to fail at, but as a beacon for decision-making. Drawing on Aung San Suu Kyi's example of simply purifying the mind moment-to-moment without grand plans, Wilson shows how following deep intention can lead to unexpected manifestations of service. The second aspect, suitability, involves recognizing our interconnectedness and responding appropriately to each unique situation rather than acting from fixed ideas.
> Through vivid stories—a practitioner facing possible death after heart surgery, a friend with Alzheimer's, Buddhist monks walking through a Vietnam War firefight—Wilson illustrates that what remains when memories and insights fade are the deeply ingrained habits of how we meet each moment. Using Bodh Gaya's chaotic pilgrimage scene as metaphor, she suggests that awakening isn't about transcending life's messiness but fully embodying freedom within it. Every action, however mundane, can serve the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion.

It's pretty natural at this time of the retreat for various ones of you to be in a somewhat assessing mode. People come into interviews and they're thinking, has anything happened this whole retreat? What have I gained? What have I learned? How can I hold on to it? How can I possibly keep this insight for the rest of my life and apply it? How can I hold on to this precision of mindfulness?

And we know—I mean, we know those are thoughts and wantings—but it's natural that we get into them. And when you say, which is really the theme of my talk, that it does come down to the simplicity of how we meet this moment, it's not really satisfying, is it? We want something a little more to hold on to.

So when we point out, or when you tell us about just a moment of really profound peace, or ease, or happiness, and learning to trust that that's true—yeah, but what about later? What about when I'm dizzy? And when you've had moments of being in a really difficult state, you're sick or you're lost and caught in a really powerful and familiar suffering mental state, and there's a moment where one just brings full attention to it, recognizes it—oh yes, this is grief and self-hatred. Just that. Just that. And there's a moment of freedom in that. But we think, well, that was a moment. How can I replicate that always?

Or you notice yourself coming back up through the layers, sort of as the retreat gets closer to an end. And it's normal. Maybe in the beginning there were a lot of hindrances or certain personality patterns, and it seemed they receded. We hardly dared hope that they were really gone forever. And if not now, in a week or two, we'll find out they may not be. Maybe they're not gone forever. But they don't have to be the enemy. We can see that moment of meeting that mental state with mindfulness, without judgment, and without identification—that's what's possible for us. And the way we cultivate that is by how we meet this moment.

So I want to talk tonight about ways of broadening our understanding or our idea of what mindfulness is. Remembering that the word sati that is translated as mindfulness is more closely allied to the word for remembering. And being mindful here or not here in a bigger situation isn't difficult. It's the remembering that's the trick. And what we're cultivating here is how to remember to come home to our true nature, no matter what may be arising experientially.

So what have we been practicing? The two wings of the Buddhist practice: wisdom and compassion. And what can we take with us? What's really important? What can we take with us into the next moment?

I'll tell you a story. This spring, in the middle of a retreat I was teaching with two friends, we went to visit a friend, a teacher of mine, whose husband is in the middle stages of having Alzheimer's disease. And she's, among everything else she's doing, taking care of him. And it was really interesting in terms of this question: what can we take with us? Because this is a man who's had a really fascinating life, devoted to spiritual practice. He's hobnobbed with all kinds of important spiritual teachers and famous psychologists. He hung out with the whole Alan Watts crowd. He's a monk in a Hindu order, done all kinds of fascinating things. I don't know personally what his practice was like, but I'm sure he had lots of insights, understandings. What could he hold onto?

When we visited, he was very gentlemanly, and as long as we were just staying in the immediate present, what he said was quite appropriate. Apparently he knows his wife and all, but as far as other memories, I don't know what he has. And it really was striking: what can we hold on to? Even all our profound spiritual experiences—what's the point of trying to remember them when our whole memory goes? What about, and this could be a relief actually, when we don't even remember our story anymore? We're just relating to how the dogs are acting in the moment. What do we have left?

And I was reflecting, because I don't really know this gentleman well, but what remains is how we have cultivated the way we meet and open into ourselves and experience in the moment. The habits of our heart and mind.

It seems to me that's what's left on the most basic level. What we dedicate our life to in the inner sense—with no views and no memories and no fantastic insights to hold on to. To me it seems like it comes down to: how do I meet this next moment? And it will come from my deeply ingrained habits, not from thinking about how I ought to meet the next moment because that's the right dharmic way. It's going to come down to how I've lived my life, moment to moment. And that's what we're doing here—how we're living our life, moment to moment. That's what's left. That's what karma is.

At the moment of death, what's going to be there?

Another friend of mine told me this story a couple of years ago. I think I mentioned him before. He's an older man who's been practicing for a long time and lives in the middle of the country. He's a farmer. I said he does contemplations riding his tractor because he works thirteen hours a day. But he's one of these people—maybe you can relate—who feels like his practice has never gone anywhere, that he has no concentration and no big experiences to show.

A couple of years ago, he told us he'd had really serious heart problems and had a heart operation where they put an artificial valve into his heart, which is apparently a serious operation. He came through the operation okay, but afterward, when he was in intensive care right after the operation—tubes coming out of every orifice, if you've seen intensive care you know that state, everything hooked to a monitor—something went askew. He was lying there and the bells started ringing, the monitors started flashing, the nurses started running around, and he thought, "Oh, this could really be it. I could really be dying right now."

And in that moment of fear—"Oh my God, what should I do? This might be my last breath"—from somewhere came the thought: "Well, if it's my last breath, I guess I better be here for it." And he just took all his attention into being with his breath.

Who knows? You think your practice is going nowhere, but when it counts, that's what we need. That intention, that deeply ingrained habit to just be here in this moment. And clearly it wasn't his last breath. Now he tells all these jokes because it's a pig's valve they use, so he tells all these jokes about corn and pigs that I won't go into. I just talked to him a couple of weeks ago. He's fine.

So I thought, when we come down to it, our practice is about remembering—not ideology, not our wishes, but remembering: How can I meet myself in this moment? How can I awaken in this moment? And how can I meet myself and whatever's arising with kindness? To me, those two questions—how can I awaken in this moment, and how can I greet this moment with kindness, or whatever's arising in this moment, or whoever's arising—embody in a really simple, moment-to-moment way the two great wings of wisdom and compassion. Or in the language of that sutta: form is emptiness, emptiness is form.

In our practice here, we're exploring that on very subtle levels of experience. Due to the silence, the concentration, the period of time of exploration, the simplicity of our lives, we can explore in moments of experience the subtleties that aren't so accessible to us in our daily life. That's true. We're seeing really that form is emptiness. Over and over we experience that as we sit and notice every thought, every emotion, every sensation, every sound. Everything that arises as you sit just passes. And we've said over and over: awareness doesn't care. Just notice what's happening. And we can do that sometimes.

But we can do that when we're just sitting here. Of course we think, well, in our life—going to work, dealing with the children, driving the car, whatever we're doing—you can't just sit there and say, "Oh, form is emptiness, it doesn't matter, emotions come, emotions go." I mean, we can have that attitude of knowing it's not us, which helps. But we get involved in needing to make choices, needing to make decisions. How are we going to live our life? What direction do we want to take?

And here also we see that the flip side of emptiness is form. We live our lives in this form, in this reality. As long as we're on this plane, in this human life, we're in this form—at least as far as I've discovered so far. I shouldn't claim for everyone, but for me, until you get to the level of Dipa Ma, you can have two forms or three forms or different forms. But we're living in this form. We have to take care of the body.

We have to make decisions about how we relate to other forms. But you can see from the subtlety here that when we really understand from the level of "form is emptiness"—it's all coming and going, and none of it's me—the natural response isn't to say, "Okay, who cares about anything?" On some level, we really care about everything. Not caring so specifically about me as the most central aspect of every experience allows the space for us to truly relate with compassion and metta. And I know you've all experienced that over and over. Talking to the people I talk to, I know you all have experienced that.

So care and respect for form, for each other, for relationships, for taking care of the environment—this arises out of our deep experience that form is emptiness. We see that at a subtle level over and over here on retreat.

And it's true, as many of you have said: "I can't be that precisely mindful in daily life." It's true. We can't. The mistake that's often made, or what leads to this sense of frustration or disappointment, this feeling of "what's the point of all this because then we just have to go back to being so busy"—the mistake sometimes made is to equate mindfulness with this precision, or with this subtlety, to believe that depth of mindfulness is only possible when we can be this precise, when we have this much concentration. It's not true.

What we need to do is remember that mindfulness, awareness, awakeness in a moment can have a much wider lens. While we've really worked a lot with the narrow lens, the microscopic lens here on retreat—and that's extremely valuable—it's not the only way or the only valid way.

The aspect that we haven't talked a whole lot about here, which probably we should have from day one, is the corollary to the microscopic precision of mindfulness: the bigger lens called clear comprehension, sampajañña in Pali. Often you'll hear mindfulness talked about as sati-sampajañña—mindfulness and clear comprehension. That clarity of knowing what's what, that's mindfulness. But knowing what's what in the bigger picture, really broadening it out. Don't confuse the starriness, that real precise subtlety that comes a lot from concentration, as being necessary for mindfulness. It isn't.

I want to talk about a couple of ways we can remember to include in our understanding of mindfulness—both here and in more complex situations—ways that we widen the focus, widen the lens. Broadening our awareness of the moment, specifically when we're involved in choices, in relations, in actions or decisions.

The two main aspects I want to talk about are bringing awareness to purpose and intention, which we've talked about somewhat but I want to broaden, and to what's called suitability or appropriateness of actions. That's remembering that we're not acting in isolation, that any particular moment includes the whole picture. What's suitable and appropriate in a particular moment?

When we talk about bringing attention to purpose, widening the lens: How can I awaken in this moment? How can I meet this moment with compassion, with kindness? That's basically the intention we've talked about. How can I awaken wise understanding? How can I meet the moment with kindness, with compassion, with generosity? That's the second step of the Eightfold Path—wise intention. We've talked about that very much on this precise moment-to-moment level, seeing our intentions, how to be mindful of intention.

That's extremely helpful in the bigger picture, in making decisions in our daily life—knowing why we're choosing to do something, or even remembering that we could pay attention to why we're choosing to do something.

The bigger picture with intention or purpose that I want to bring in is to acknowledge to ourselves that we can hold in our hearts, in our minds, a sense of that question I asked before: What's really important in my life? To look at the decisions, the choices we make, the way we're living our life, very much moment to moment, but to hold as a frame of reference the larger, overarching sense of what's really most important to you, to me, in our lives. It's called clear comprehension of purpose, or of aspiration.

You may or may not have thought of this. Some people have a real clear sense throughout their lives, or as they're practicing, of the overarching motivation. It might be seen as a direction you're heading in or a goal, or it might just be an overarching sense of what's important that informs your decisions in the moment. But some people don't really think about it too much. Or if you do begin to think about it, I've had a lot of people say to me that they're—even quietly to themselves—almost embarrassed, or in some way their personality patterns of unworthiness come in.

Say, if you sit down and really ask yourself, "What is most important in my life?" and what comes up, for example—what came up for me the first time I did this was "to love and serve the Dharma." That just kind of came. It's not like you sit and make up a list and say, "What sounds good?" It's waiting to see what's really true for you. And then seeing how, without a breath, the worthless voice comes in with, "Who do you think you are?"

So whatever your patterns are, don't listen to them if they're on the negative frame. Allow yourself to hold a space in your consciousness, in your heart, over time, to see what really comes up for you.

as the most important thing in your life—the beacon, sort of, for when you have a decision to make, when you have a choice to make—to use this as a reference point. It can be enormously empowering. It can really focus our energy and our sense of purpose, even in seemingly mundane choices and decisions. And there's a way that can bring a kind of resolution to our energy and to the way that we live our life that might allow us to open, in the way that we live and in the things that we do, to live in a whole different way from anything we might have imagined.

It's not that we see the endpoint from where we are. When I first had that thought—not even "I want to," but just what was most important: somehow to serve the Dharma—I didn't have a clue what that meant or what that would look like. And I think actually that's good, because as soon as you think, "Well, that means I should start teaching," for example, that would have been some whole kind of ego idea of what to do and how to get there that would have put, as I see it now, a constraint on the decisions I made, trying to veer them in a certain direction.

But when I took the intention, the purpose of serving the Dharma, as something to hold as a reference point, then over the years—and it's been quite some years, maybe eighteen years ago or something—it served me enormously in making decisions. Already I think I was manager here when I had that thought. I guess I wasn't thinking of that as serving the Dharma. I don't know what I was thinking. I mean, I'd been working here, I'd been practicing—that's all I'd been doing. But just to have that as a clear purpose without an idea of how it should look has served me enormously.

Because what it does is, rather than thinking, "Oh, I should be a teacher"—which is really the last thing I wanted to do; the thought of getting up and talking to people like this or talking with people all day, I never thought I could do that—so it really often has nothing to do with what we think we can or want to do. That's another thing. It's not about what we think would be fun; it's about what opens into serving the Dharma. For me, I'm not saying that's what it should be for you.

So having that as a beacon, often when I've had a decision to make and I'm really not clear, and I try to look at what's my motivation for going this way or going that way—as soon as I remember, "Oh, serving the Dharma," it's almost always clear which decision I should make. I mean, I'm not talking about whether I have a chocolate ice cream cone or whether I have a piece of cake, okay? I am talking about slightly bigger decisions.

And you can make yourself crazy—which I did. I did for a while. Everything I should do should be serving the Dharma. So I would turn on the TV and get out the whip because I was not serving the Dharma; I was watching television. There's a point where you have to give yourself some slack. But in big decisions, as soon as I would look, I got this question, this thing that comes up in my mind: "Do I want to be comfortable, or do I want to be free?" And as soon as that comes up, I go, "Oh. Well, I do want to be comfortable, but I guess that's not the way we're going right now." It's been enormously helpful. Enormously helpful.

I read somewhere that a teacher said in every moment of activity we are committing to something. It's a question of what. Are we willing to look?

So this tuning into what your overarching purpose is, then holding that—not as a way to be more wrong or bad, not another ideal that we're not living up to. I don't mean it in that way. But to have that sense of "I want to serve the Dharma," or "I want to live a compassionate life," or "I want to be kind"—the Dalai Lama's statement that "my religion is kindness," that's pretty great. "How can I be kind?" isn't a way to hate yourself every moment you're not kind. But it gives one the resolution, the vastness of determination, that we're really willing to look. What am I committing to in this moment?

And for me, if it is to comfort rather than freedom, I'm happy to see that. It's not another reason to beat myself up. It helps me look and see why. Is that really what I want? And of course it isn't, and the decision makes itself when I'm willing to really look.

And this is mindfulness—looking at the larger intention, being willing to look and see the intention of why I'm doing what I'm doing. And remember, mindfulness is nonjudgmental. So when I would say, "I really want to serve the Dharma," and instead I'm watching some stupid, totally stupid, half-hour situation comedy on television—how can I meet that without hating myself and without trying to force, "I will turn it off and read the Majjhima Nikaya"? Really? I experimented with myself. Of course I wouldn't turn it off, or if I did and I opened the Majjhima Nikaya, it would just blur, you know.

It's really to see, over time, that sometimes I just need to relax and this isn't harmful. Sometimes it's to see that amidst the vast multiplicity of choices and situations we have in this life, we're not always, every moment, every single moment, going to choose our overarching purpose.

There's a lovely poem from a Japanese woman from the year 1000 that speaks to this.

Although I try to hold the single thought of Buddha's teaching in my heart, I cannot help but hear the many crickets' voices calling as well.

I love that poem. My crickets' voices are all so beautiful. But having your deep purpose as a beacon, we come back to it, and it strengthens. And we really don't know where it's going to go, and that's wonderful. We find ourselves heading in directions we never might have thought.

I've been reading recently Alan Clements' book of interviews with Aung San Suu Kyi, The Voice of Hope. It's really lovely—just wide-ranging discussions he had with her over several months. The thing that I find quite inspiring in relation to what I'm talking about now is that she never had any sense she was going to return to Burma and become the leader of the democracy movement and a Nobel Peace Laureate. No sense of that at all. She was just quietly living her life.

She says she's really surprised that people think of her as an important person. "I suppose people think I'm extraordinary because I'm so simple they can't believe it." Her beliefs, the way she meets situations—these are profound and inspiring. But the sense I got from reading these conversations was just that: very simple. No sense of her destiny being to remain in Burma all these years. It just happened that she was there taking care of her dying mother in 1988 when the peace demonstrations broke out and so many people were killed. She wasn't even part of that—she was in the hospital taking care of her mother. It wasn't until afterward that she got involved. And she said all along, never any sense of where it was going.

But at one point she said—and this is a paraphrase, I couldn't find the exact quotation—that in some way, her real purpose is to purify her mind in this life. That she's just always working to purify her heart and mind. She says, "I have very ordinary attitudes toward life. If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I do it. The motivation is its own reward."

I really got the sense from reading that book that just by following her deep purpose in that way, the way it's ending up manifesting right now is what she's doing—still in Burma after all these years, never knowing when she'll be arrested again, separated from her family. And she doesn't see it as anything extraordinary, or even as an endpoint. Her life is about purifying her heart and mind with deeper mettā, deeper compassion. She said at one point she sees herself, when she gets older, doing more practice.

So we never know where it's going to go. But it's having that moment-to-moment relationship to what's happening now, inspired and viewed through what's really important to us in our lives. It's not simple or easy, but it gives us enormous strength—courage, really, resolution to keep going, to meet this next moment with kindness, with awakeness, or whatever your deepest purpose is.

A big support in this—this second aspect of broadening out from the microscopic view of mindfulness—is having a sense of clear comprehension of the suitability or appropriateness of our actions and speech in the particular situation in which we find ourselves. This is very much what we've been pointing to, perhaps not quite so explicitly, when we try to talk about skillful means in meditation and having to make decisions—for example, whether to go to the breath or whether to open up. We keep saying, "Well, sometimes it's this and sometimes it's that." That's because it depends on what's appropriate to the situation.

This brings in the understanding that we're never isolated in any situation. Whatever situation we find ourselves in, we're connected to all others, affected by circumstances. We can't act in isolation.

I don't know if any of you have felt this at any time during your retreat here. Often people at different points in their practice will express this—they feel they're actually practicing very sincerely, mindfulness and concentration are good, whatever the heck that means. But there's some way they begin to feel really self-centered in their practice. I've experienced that myself. Or sort of myopic, where you really feel you're concentrated and mindful, but it's like it stops here. And you find yourself going through the food line doing something totally thoughtless.

This is embarrassing. I wasn't going to say it, but it came into my mind. One year, many years ago, I was one of those people who think they're so incredibly mindful. I'm really just walking through this room so mindfully. I was walking through the coat room with my zafu—that's how long ago it was, when people still sat on zafus. I got to the top of the stairs, put down my zafu, noting every moment, took off my shoes, so aware, picked up my zafu, and just walked off the top step. I totally forgot where I was. Lifting, moving, placing—wham. Fell into the upper walking room. Luckily, only a few people were walking.

Very embarrassing. A certain lack of broader perspective. That would seem useful in bringing mindfulness into the bigger picture—bringing awareness, broadening the awareness to the whole situation, or to quote Joko Beck, moving our practice from a self-centered view of practice to a life-centered view of practice. We're part of life, but we're not the center of it. We're only part of it.

So this is clear comprehension of situation appropriateness. Let me give you a retreat example of how we can work with this and notice the difference.

One year I was on an Upandita retreat here, and several of us friends signed up together to be veggie choppers in the morning. We figured it was a control thing—if six of us all signed up together, we could control that we wouldn't talk and that we were all in the same rhythm. And it was fun. It was really fun. And it was a great practice experience for me in this clear comprehension, bringing clear comprehension to the precision of mindfulness and concentration.

This was a very strict retreat, very much noting every moment from the moment you wake up until the moment you go to bed. And we could see how when we have that myopic view, you could be cutting a carrot incredibly mindfully, but you take fifteen minutes to cut a carrot, and there are giant tubs of carrots. You just can't do that.

So it's really about how to be mindful in the bigger perspective. You still feel your body. It's not like, "Oh my God, I've got to hurry, I'm going to cut the carrots," and you're completely disconnected. Very much in the body, but bigger. Knowing standing, knowing movement, but also seeing the whole flow. If someone finishes their task and someone else needs help, you help them. Or if someone else finishes, they see what you're doing and they help you. Very much a sense that it doesn't work if I don't see that it's not me—it's the whole situation.

Every time I would go in thinking, "Well, today, this is what I want to do"—having a preference or having decided before I walked in—it always was an obstacle. It always got in the way. If I tried to get this cutting board or get that vegetable, it would never work, and it would just be going against the flow. Even in the short space of picking up my cutting board at the end, thinking, "Now I'm going to go wash it at the sink"—something would happen before I could get to the sink, and it's only three steps. Someone else would get to the sink first, or something else would need to be done. Just seeing: give up any sense of me-me, any sense of limiting my awareness, of trying to build my concentration, or being afraid I'm going to lose it if I'm not noting precisely every moment. Just open into the entirety of the situation. I can't decide ahead of time what's appropriate, because I don't know the situation until I get there.

It was a great learning. Really wonderful. And it's not like that's lesser mindfulness. It's not like, "Okay, that was the best way to get through it, so then I could go back and practice." That was some of the deepest periods of practice, really letting go of that neater self of practice.

This aspect of suitability of mindfulness—of seeing that we're not separate, of seeing that things are always changing, that what's appropriate one day is totally not appropriate the next day—that is a really powerful aspect of mindfulness and clear comprehension that's very useful, need I say, in our daily lives. It comes in so often. Really seeing how the situation is always changing.

You've seen that here, right? When you see what really works in one sitting doesn't work in the next sitting. Or how nice the open awareness was, and you just can't get there for love or money the next day and you have to go back to the breath. You have to go down a step and go back to the breath. All these crazy ideas we get. Or seeing that when your energy is low, you relate to physical pain very differently from when the energy is strong and balanced, and one isn't right or wrong. Seeing how we're absolutely interconnected with each other, that how we are affects how the others are.

There's a great story about this that Daniel Goleman has in his book Emotional Intelligence, about how much our energy, our mental state, our mere presence affects one another—part of the whole situation.

The story takes place during the Vietnam War. An American platoon was hunkered down in rice paddies in the heat of a firefight with Viet Cong. Suddenly, a line of six Buddhist monks started walking along the elevated berms that separate rice paddies from each other. Perfectly calm and poised, the monks walked directly toward the line of fire. They didn't look right. They didn't look left. They walked straight through, recalls David Bush, one of the American soldiers.

It was really strange because nobody shot at them. And after they walked over the berm, suddenly all the fight was out of me. It just didn't feel like I wanted to do this anymore. At least not that day. It must have been that way for everybody because everybody quit. We just stopped fighting.

Now, in a small way, we all have that effect on each other. I was just talking to someone today who's visiting for a few days. He sat a three-month course a few years ago. He said he just walked in here, walked to his old walking space and walked along it once, and he immediately felt like he'd been sitting for two months. It's not just the walking space, you know. It's the energy of all of you here. You catch it from each other. We catch it from you. And as you see toward the end of the retreat, if there starts to be a little anxiety, you catch that from each other too. It's not bad or good. It's just how it is. We're all part of the same situation, and we can't act in isolation. We don't act in isolation.

So when we're bringing in this aspect of broader mindfulness, it's to look at the whole situation. What's appropriate, given my mental state, given your mental state, given what's going on in this situation right here? We all affect each other. This is a really big piece of broadening mindfulness—seeing interrelatedness, impermanence, no separate self, and cause and effect. You don't outline it like that, of course, in every situation, but you're really seeing that the wisdom factor, non-delusion, is present. As soon as you really look at what's going on and expand your mindfulness, you get an intuitive sense of what's appropriate. And it takes us out of feeling so self-sufficient, but also out of taking so much unnecessary responsibility for everything that happens.

I don't mean we're not responsible for our actions. Of course we are, in terms of our intentions. But for example, I love seeing on a retreat—especially when I see a lot of people—how much the weather actually affects our mental states. And we often don't realize it. So we teach in Yucca Valley in the desert every year, and there's usually a period of at least two or three days when this wind starts to blow. It's strong and gusty. At first it's okay, but by the second or third day, all the yogis are cranky and irritable, not to mention the teachers and staff. But people are taking it on themselves: "What's the matter with my practice? How come this hindrance of impatience and irritability and restlessness is here?" And I say, well, look around. The whole world is restless right now, and we're just part of it. I really like that. It takes the personal out of it, but it allows us to respond more appropriately.

So seeing the whole situation allows us the flexibility and adaptability—not always doing the same thing at the same time in the same way, but really responding intuitively and flexibly to what's appropriate. And then with the clear comprehension of broader purpose, that gives us the resolution, the sense of remaining flexible in relationship to what's really important.

In these two ways, as we move out of just being able to explore our lives and our moment-to-moment experience in such a subtle way, we can begin to get the sense that we won't always have the samādhi, we won't always have the subtlety, but every act of our life can become a vehicle for waking up, can become a vehicle for learning how to respond with kindness and mettā. Every moment, every activity—it doesn't matter how mundane. We don't have to be Aung San Suu Kyi; it can just be washing the dishes. But every activity can really become the vehicle, the doorway to awakening.

This happens when we really embody, really inhabit life—this body, this mind, exactly what's happening—being fully present within it, without defining ourselves by it. I don't know if that makes sense. We're really here, but we're not saying, "This is who I am, and this is where I'm at right now in my practice."

I say that because for years, I think, I really somewhere thought that freedom was going to somehow be about lifting me out of all the grit and the hullabaloo and the mundanity, and somehow everything was going to be light-filled and special and glistening. You know how it is at the end of a retreat.

So I always thought I'd lost it when the retreat was over and it was back to the grit and the mundane life. And really, something that has served as a metaphor for me—because I see now it's not like that, it's really about getting more and more ordinary, fully embodying freedom in the midst of what's happening—has been the village of Bodh Gaya in India.

As I'm sure you know, that's the village where the Buddha supposedly sat under the Bodhi tree and came to his full awakening. It's really the peak pilgrimage spot for Buddhists. And it's actually the place where I did my first Vipassana retreat, in 1971. So in some ways it's been a very special place for me. I didn't go back there again until 1989.

How it served as a metaphor for me is this: when I went back in '89, I had much more of a sense of what Buddhism is, of the practice and freedom and how important it is to me. I'm not really a devotional type, in case you hadn't noticed—that's not really my nature. But going there and sitting... you can't actually sit under the Bodhi tree anymore, the descendant of the Bodhi tree, because there's a gate around it. But you can sit near it, on the wall, inside this park. There's a big temple and a park around it.

So I was sitting there and, really unexpectedly, I was filled with such joy, such inspiration, such devotion. Because sitting there in that real place, near that real tree, it brought home to me the fact that the Buddha was really a person—sort of just like us. A person, not a god, not someone from outside our realm. He really sat in this dusty little village and came to awakening. It's really true. And when he said that he wouldn't tell us to do it if it wasn't possible—it really is possible. It just brought home to me the human reality of the potential, for me and for all of us. It really brought tears to my eyes.

And then, looking around... if you've been to Bodh Gaya recently, you know what I mean. If you haven't—it's India. It's gotten very busy. It's still a dusty village. But sitting there, even within the park, never mind outside, there are pilgrims from all the different Buddhist countries coming in buses. Japanese people walking around in groups, someone talking through a megaphone to guide them. Tibetans sitting on the side, blowing their horns and chanting for three days straight. Hindus walking around talking at the top of their voices. Dogs wandering around starving. Cows wandering around. A mad woman kind of wandering about, talking to everybody. It's a zoo. And that's just inside the park.

Just outside the park, there are buses going by blaring and all the life of India. And as you walk down the road to get inside the gates of the park, it's lined with beggars, of course. Some of them come in rickshaws from the nearby town because that's their work for the day, and they line up there. And before you get to the line of beggars, there are little tables where guys are selling ten-paisa coins. Now, a hundred paisa make up a rupee. Currently there are about thirty rupees to the dollar. So you can imagine how much ten paisa is worth—nothing. You buy nine ten-paisa pieces for a rupee. And these guys are making ten paisa for each rupee you spend. Then you take these little nothing coins and give them out to the beggars. It's all a business. It's great.

And the thing I liked best was this: there were guys selling little plastic bags filled with water, filled with fish. You buy these because it's really good karma to take the fish and set them loose in the little pond inside the temple. So you do that. Of course, where do you think these guys got those fish to begin with? It's like a recycling operation. It's India. It's great.

You can't get upset about it. It's just how it is. It's crazy. And it's one thing to look around and think, "Oh, this is awful. All this is happening in the midst of this sacred shrine." But that's not really the feeling. The feeling is, "Oh, this really is it. This is spirituality." It's in the middle of all of it. You don't get out of it—you get into it much more fully.

And so to me, I really think more and more that awakening is about embodying our freedom in the midst of it all. How do we meet this moment? And the moment can be pretty crazy. Or sometimes it's really beautiful. But it's the habits we're cultivating of awakening—no matter how we're suffering or how joyful it is, here and now—that's what we can take with us. No memories, no experiences, but how can I meet this moment? How can I be in the middle of the grit and the craziness and still awaken with joy, with compassion, with connectedness?

It gets more and more ordinary and more and more wonderful.

Geshe Rapton says something that I really love. He says that for himself, all actions, even the most simple, are for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings. I love that. All actions, even the most simple, are for the purpose of developing the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion and for the service of all beings.

To bring that attitude to washing the dishes, to changing the diapers, to working on the stock market if that's what you do—to whatever we do. Nothing doesn't count. Nothing in our life is too ordinary or too complicated or too painful or too joyful to be excluded from the awakening mind of wisdom and compassion. Anything we do, we can meet it that way. We won't always be successful, but we can bring that intention. And every moment here that you've been present, that's what's being cultivated. It's really powerful. It's tendencies. Remember last time we talked about these underlying tendencies? Well, we've been cultivating wholesome underlying tendencies this whole three months, and in your lives previous to these three months, and we continue cultivating those when we're not in deep retreat, when we don't have deep samādhi. And that's what's really important. It doesn't, I think, matter so much how it manifests, as long as it's wholesome.

You know that poem by Rumi? I'm sure you've heard it: "Let the beauty you love be what you do. There are hundreds of ways to kneel and kiss the ground." I love that. Whatever you do, let it be the way that you kneel and kiss the ground. Let it be the way that you manifest your awakening mind and heart of wisdom and compassion—vacuuming the floor.

This is the last talk I'll give, and I just want to express my deep gratitude to all of you. It's been a profound honor to share this time with all of you, to be with so many people—no matter what you think of yourself—to be with so many people who are so deeply committed to awakening and compassion. It's really extraordinary for all of us, all of us teachers and staff, just to know there are people dedicated to this on this planet, and that we can all spend this time together. It's an enormous blessing. I thank you all.

And I just want to close with this from Nyoshul Khenpo: "Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who overlook or ignore it are deluded. This recognition, the stability of it, is the borderline between Buddhas and other beings, and this recognition is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives."

Every moment. So if you missed this last moment, here's this moment. We're always at the great crossroads.

CHAPTER 313

Suffering, Impermanence and Freedom

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's Four Noble Truths, with particular emphasis on the First Noble Truth of dukkha—the inherent unreliability and unsatisfactory nature of all conditioned experience. Drawing from the Buddha's own life after awakening, she illustrates that enlightenment doesn't mean the cessation of difficulty: the Buddha experienced physical ailments, witnessed violence among his relatives, faced division within the Saṅgha, and mourned the deaths of his chief disciples Sāriputta and Moggallāna.

Wilson explores how our suffering arises not from change itself, but from our misunderstanding of impermanence and our habitual reactions to pleasant and unpleasant experience. She points to our deep conditioning to evaluate all experience in terms of pleasure and pain, and how this keeps us perpetually restless—like six different animals tied together, each pulling toward its own habitat. Through mindfulness practice, we can recognize these patterns without judgment and discover the peace that comes from non-clinging.

The talk offers practical guidance for meditation retreats and daily life alike: learning to meet each moment fresh, without the burden of expecting permanence or taking difficulty personally. Wilson shares moving stories—including a friend's near-death experience during heart surgery and the Buddha's teaching to the outcast woman Pakati—to illustrate how resting at ease in whatever arises opens us to genuine intimacy, compassion, and freedom. This liberation, she emphasizes, is always accessible in any moment, requiring only our wholehearted presence.

A few weeks ago I was asked to give a public talk and given the title "The Possibility of Inner Contentment," which I thought is a nice title. If you think about that for yourself—the possibility of inner contentment—it sounds good, and I would imagine in some way it could cover most of the reasons most of us would come on retreat.

I'd ask you to reflect for a moment: when you personally think about what inner contentment would be, or freedom, or enlightenment, or peace, do you have some clear sense of what it is you're looking for? Or perhaps some not-so-clear, subversive notions that can actually be driving us in the wrong direction? Just begin to have a sense for yourself. What is the mind actually thinking of in terms of contentment?

There's a passage from Thich Nhat Hanh: "Meditation is to be aware of what is going on in our bodies, our feelings, our mind, and the world. Each day, 40,000 children die of hunger. The former superpowers still have more than 50,000 nuclear warheads, enough to destroy the Earth many times. Yet the sunrise is beautiful, and the rose that bloomed this morning along the wall is a miracle. Life is both dreadful and wonderful. To practice meditation is to be in touch with both these aspects."

To live an awakened life is to be awake to both these aspects—here on the cushion and in our life. As a friend of mine said when we were talking about this talk, "Well, when things are going smoothly in life, anyone can experience inner contentment." So it's worth looking and seeing how much of our unspoken idea is that things are going to get better, and that this somehow is going to be a manifestation of our awakening.

Look at the Buddha's life after he was awakened. The supremely enlightened one, free of all suffering—his life wasn't that nothing happened. As Guy mentioned, he had plenty of physical problems. His back ached, he had headaches. Sometimes he'd say to Ananda, "You give a talk, I have to go rest my back." His clan, from both his mother and father's side, included people who were often at war with each other. Many people would be killed. He'd go and try to mediate. There was a lot of quarreling from time to time within the Sangha—I know, hard to believe, but even then.

Actually, if you read a lot of the Vinaya, the rules governing how the monks and nuns' rules came to be, much of it arose from monks going to the Buddha and saying, "So-and-so did such and such. What should we do about that?" It would be conduct that really wasn't so great. He'd say, "Okay, we need to make a rule." But there was this real sense of sniping. In fact, one of his cousins, Devadatta, was so jealous of him that he tried to divide the Sangha and get people to follow himself. He actually tried to kill the Buddha. The Buddha's two main disciples, Sariputta and Moggallana—Moggallana supposedly being the strongest in psychic power—was actually murdered in old age. Sariputta also died before the Buddha, and the Buddha experienced their loss. And in the end, they all died. They've all been dead for a long time, including the Buddha. All through his life, stuff happened.

Clearly the freedom and inner contentment the Buddha is talking about is something else. It's of another order altogether. And it begins by our being willing, learning how to stay awake, connected, and intimately present in the midst of the beautiful and the horrific. Both of which are difficult, actually. But the horrible stuff, the painful stuff, is generally more difficult for us to be open and present with.

This is why, when the Buddha was formulating his succinct way of describing how to awaken, what it is that keeps us caught in suffering, when he delineated his Four Noble Truths—which is what I'm talking about tonight—the first one is the truth that basically stuff happens. And it doesn't stop happening just because our hearts and minds are awakened.

I find it really interesting that of all the things the Buddha knew he could talk about, all the things he thought would free our hearts from confusion and suffering, the first thing he chooses to discuss, of only four things, is that there's a lot of anguish in this world. That our experience—our body, our mind, our feelings, other people, all experience—is basically inherently unreliable if you're looking to it for any security, any lasting happiness, any resting place whatsoever. No aspect of our experience can give us that. None. This is the first thing he chooses to tell us to free our hearts.

It's one of the reasons Buddhism sometimes superficially gets the reputation of being about suffering. But it's not—it's acknowledging the reality of things. And I think it's fascinating to look at this truth, this fact that the Buddha lays out, not conceptually or intellectually, but as a living question: how am I relating to this as a fact in my life? Never mind your whole life.

How about today? How about all those moments of sitting and walking and eating and everything that's going on today? Has anyone noticed any moments that were less than satisfying? A couple, one or two moments here and there that didn't quite meet the grade of what's expected, of the direction your practice should be going if you were making progress, of what would be possible, what is allowed within the field of experience of contentment and happiness.

If you have taken anything and put it outside of what's acceptable in the field of experience of contentment and happiness, that's the place you're lost in confusion and suffering. That's the place we're not opening to the truth. And I imagine most of us have one or two little places like that. Starting from sleepiness. We're not even talking about the big things. Starting from your knee hurting a little bit five minutes into the sitting, or a little pain in your back, or feeling kind of fearful. Not even a big thing.

So it's looking at this: even though we all know that there's disease, old age, sickness, that we die, we all know that we're going to be separated from those that we love, that we're going to be united with those that we do not love, or with experiences that we do not love—intellectually we know it. But really, just look over the days and yourself: how do you relate when that happens?

Let's just stick to the simplicity of the retreat format, because it's the same way we relate here as how we relate in our life. But the experiences are generally easier. They're a bit smaller or a bit simpler, although just as intense. I'm not saying they're not intense, but they don't tend to have the complexity of having to decide whether to keep your job or take another one. It's more, should I move or not in the sitting? Should I go to the walking or should I have a cup of tea? The amount of energy that goes into relating to those is just the same. So it's a little easier to notice: oh, maybe it's not the situation. Maybe it's how I'm relating. That could have something to do with the discomfort here, just possibly.

So look at when something difficult, even a little difficult, happens. How strong our tendency can be in many ways to deny it or to feel that it's a mistake, a sign of failure. I mean, do you usually say when you're really suffering in a sitting, "This is a good sitting because I'm paying attention to it"? If you've been practicing for years, you might. But rarely do people come out of a sitting where they're restless and sleepy and their back hurts and they can't stay present and say, "Well, that was a really good sitting." Now, if it's pleasant, it's probably a good sitting, you know, because something nice is happening.

And we tend to internalize our suffering or deny it. We had a conversation in one of the interviews today about the many different ways we try to pretend we're being mindful of suffering—whether it's pain or grief or fear—but really we're saying, "Okay, I'll be with you as long as you go away." A kind of bargaining, a kind of basic denial, a kind of superficial mindfulness, or "I look at you but not really completely open to you." All these different things.

And I think a lot of it is because we haven't quite accepted that the difficult and the beautiful are both just constantly changing parts of life. It's not a personal failure when we get sick, or when the breath gets choppy, or when we have a fantasy. It's just what's happening in that moment. The tendency to deny, to deny by trying to shut out suffering—our own or another's—is so deep that it's actually quite amazing.

I'll tell you a little story that happened to me. Some years ago, I was in the hospital, had been for a few days, and I was on IVs. You know how over time your veins kind of collapse, and so they were trying to put in a new IV and couldn't quite get it. So it's painful. You're not going to die from it, but it's not so pleasant. The nurses couldn't do it—two, three, four times they couldn't do it. So this nurse was dripping sweat, and she ran out in the hall and grabbed the doctor and brought him in to do it. And I was sort of out of it, but enough to think, "Now I'm really in trouble." Because who does the IVs? The nurses. Doctors don't do IVs. So if they're bringing in the doctor, I'm really in trouble.

So this guy was jabbing around, trying to do it. It wasn't a good scene. And I was a bit afraid. And I didn't say anything, but little tears just kind of rolled down. And he looked at me—it was so amazing—and he said, "What's the matter with you? It doesn't hurt."

I remember that because it's classic. If he let in—now let's say this is my projection, right? Maybe he thought it didn't hurt. But if he let in that in his good intention, trying to help me, he was clearly not doing a good job of it, knowing that, seeing my pain—if he let that in, it's so painful to feel that. So really his own pain couldn't do it. It's not okay. We're afraid of it, and that fear can bring down such a barrier that we become completely out of touch with ourselves, with another.

You see how, if we want to talk about living an awake life, we can't shut down to the pain, just like we don't shut down to the joy either. But we somehow aren't allowed to shut down selectively. We shut down to one, we shut down to all.

A lot of people have mentioned that wanting really to open their heart is part of the sense of this retreat. And the corollary, which people have also mentioned—opening your heart, you're much more vulnerable. That's right. There is no way around that one. There is no way around that one. And freedom isn't a way around it either. Freedom gives us the courage and the understanding that we don't need to fear or deny or even react so much to the difficult, because we don't take it so personally and we don't take it so tragically because we know it's part of life and it isn't going to last. Nothing lasts.

That's sort of the other aspect of this First Noble Truth. Not only that there's physical pain, disease, death—there's also beauty, happiness, joy, and love. But another aspect of the dukkha, the unreliability, the unsatisfactory quality, is that nothing really lasts very long.

When I first heard the Four Noble Truths many years ago, when I first started practicing, so that I could understand what was being said—I know I didn't really get it the first time I heard it. I started practicing at about nineteen. And I had had a life that was basically kind of average, middle-class, suburban, no great suffering or trauma in my personal life. But there was that fifties culture, you know, the Donna Reed show and such, where everything was sort of nicey-nicey and you just didn't really talk about other things. The mother of my friend down the street who committed suicide—we sort of knew that happened, but it wasn't really brought out in the open.

So when I first started practicing, it was out of this deep sense of, really it was understanding on some cellular level, dukkha—that things were unreliable, that just going after some kind of sense of pleasure or status or whatever didn't quite make sense because it all just vanished. And that I was truly not happy. But I couldn't look at anything in my life to complain about. You know what I mean?

So when I first heard this truth, it wasn't depressing. It was like, ah, what a relief. I'm not crazy. It's not that one has to be miserable, but that there's an inherent unreliability in experience. As long as I'm depending on my physical health, on the health or presence of my friends and family, on other people doing what I want them to do, behaving the way I think they should behave in order to keep things copacetic, in order for there to be happiness—somehow they always fail to do that. There was this sense of things falling through, and I didn't know why.

So hearing this first truth took a real burden off my heart. It's like, oh, let's just look at things the way they really are instead of pretending that if you just live your life right, everything will be good. It's that book, Why Do Bad Things Happen to Good People? As if underlying that is the assumption that if I do everything right, nothing bad's going to happen. I don't think so. And it doesn't mean you're bad or you did something wrong. Things are going to happen. How we meet it is the point of freedom.

So there's this sense of noticing when we're in denial, seeing how that shuts down our heart to presence with ourself, to compassion for others, to connectedness, to appreciation of life. Just noticing it, not judging it. Noticing when it's too much and we can't open to it.

The second aspect of the First Noble Truth I want to talk about is impermanence, which in itself is neither good nor bad, just how things are. And I think it's a really interesting truth because, again, conceptually it's a pretty easy one to get—that everything's changing, that nothing really stays the same. You don't find too many people who argue with that on a conceptual level. And I know for me, I know it's true on a conceptual level. But is that how we really relate to things in our life that we like when they change? When something that's really lovely, a relationship, somehow changes and falls apart—do we say, "Well, the conditions that led to the coming together of this relationship have changed. All meetings end in partings"?

Probably not. Maybe somewhere down the road we might arrive at that understanding. But in the moment, it's much easier to see what went wrong, who's to blame, what did I do wrong. And I'm not saying there aren't things to work on. But this sense that nothing should ever change, and when it does, I blew it somehow—that sense of self-judgment, or the fear of the sadness.

I find it even poignant, the fact that beautiful things end. Also, really unbeautiful things end too. But there's a kind of poignancy, a feeling of loss, and even the Buddha spoke to that. After his two main disciples died in his old age—Moggallāna and Sāriputta—he said something to the effect that it's as if the moon and the stars have gone out of the sky. A sense of loss. It's just how it is. He didn't then go away and berate himself and beat his breast and throw the second arrow at himself and wail, "What did I do wrong? Why did they have to die?" Yes, they're here, now they're gone. It's a fact of life.

And learning to really open into this flowing, changing nature, instead of holding ourselves away from it, is actually an opening into real intimacy, joy, deep appreciation of what's happening right now. Because we're not saying, "Oh no, this is happening, I have to hold on. This is good, but how can I keep it?"—in which case, we're already away from appreciating it. But rather a sense of: yes, right now, this moment, this is what there is.

There's a good friend of ours who comes to retreats often, though I haven't seen him for a couple of years. He tells a wonderful story from his life about having had open heart surgery. He must be in his sixties. They replaced a valve in his heart, and he came out of it and was in intensive care. A day or two after the surgery, something went wrong. And I don't know if you know how it is in intensive care, where all the bells and whistles are going off, you've got a tube in every opening. It seemed really serious, and he was about to lose consciousness, and he thought, "This really might be it. I might be about to die." Fear and panic arose. "This could be it. I might be about to die."

Now, this is a man who didn't consider himself an ace yogi, not someone who would come out of retreats saying, "Wow, I had this incredible, blissful, fantastic experience"—which you can then make yourself miserable for the next ten years trying to repeat. But who would come out of retreat saying, "You know, I'm just plodding along, just doing my work."

So he said to himself, "I'm about to die right now." Fear came pouring up. "Oh my God, what do I do?" And he said, "Well, if this is your last breath, why not be here for it?" And he just dropped into that breath. The fear went, and he was just fully present for that breath. And then he went unconscious. And he woke up.

I love that story. Ultimately, what else can we do? All experience—wonderful, awful—it's going to be gone. But the habits of mind, the tendency that we've learned, that all there really can be is fullness of presence, wholehearted intimacy in this moment, and the next moment will arise in its own time. You can take care of being present with that then.

That's really what we're practicing here. This is a laboratory for that. And I think the awareness of impermanence, rather than leading us to panic, depression, and despair, can actually free us to open into our life, into each moment of our life, with this attitude of wholehearted presence.

I've noticed in myself that one of the automatic or habitual responses of our heart and mind—we're not even aware of it—to the unreliability, to the fact that anywhere I try to put down my claim is a little bit shaky, isn't going to last, is at times almost like a panic. A kind of looking in different places for something that will be reliable, that will be trustworthy, that isn't going to change, in a maybe subtle, not quite conscious way. And I, and certainly many people I've talked to—look in yourself and see if it's true for you—also bring this mindset unconsciously to our meditation practice.

For years—and it's probably still lurking there unconsciously at times—but for years I was really conscious of this: I thought that if I practiced hard enough and long enough, what freedom meant was really some place where all the hoo-ha stopped. It was either a place of constant pleasant experience, because really, when I thought about living an enlightened life, I didn't think about having backaches and arthritic joints and having wars and such. You just kind of imagine living in a cloud of compassion and love. I didn't think about struggle. There was always some kind of ending point, I thought, where I'd finally understand everything and it would all be over.

Notice as you go through the day here, when something happens, how the mind responds—usually in a very subtle way. The mind doesn't say, "Aha, this is it! Now I've got it, and it's going to be this way forever." That would be too easy. You'd notice if the mind said that. But in a slightly more subtle way, it's: "Oh, now I get what mindfulness is supposed to feel like." Or: "Now I know what concentration is." Or: "I'm finally making progress. I've finally settled in, and now it's going along the way it should." Or even more subtle than that. Watch out. Just be aware of that, because the heart and mind are trying to land somewhere. This sense of being on shaky ground because everything's dissolving—the thinking mind doesn't like that too much.

We like to analyze, have you noticed? We like to analyze and figure out why, and if this happens then that'll happen, and that happened last time so I can assume it's going to happen this time. And then it's all nice and neat and tidy—finished with that one. We don't like it when we hear: "You've had the same pain in your back for five days? Every time it arises, it's new. Meet it fresh."

No, we don't want to meet it fresh. "I've been looking at this for four years. I don't want to meet it fresh. I know it. I know everything about it."

We know nothing. We need to meet it as it's arising in that moment, for the first time ever. And it's passing. And another experience is arising for the first and last time ever. And it's passing. Can we bring that quality of freshness? Then we're really alive. Then there's not that clinging, not that trying to find a resting place.

There's a lovely statement by the Buddha: "He or she abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." And in another place he says it's the search for abiding that's burning and restless. Giving up of that search is cool and freeing. To search for somewhere to take a stand, for something to hold on to—that's our lack of understanding of the First Noble Truth. And that's where the suffering, the anguish, the confusion that the Buddha is speaking to comes in.

Change is just how it is. It's not good or bad. It's just how things are. Our lack of understanding, of really living from that place—that is where we truly suffer. That second dart, that second arrow. Something happens, and then we shoot another arrow at ourselves and say, "No."

Pema Chödrön, the wonderful Tibetan teacher with quite a sense of humor, once said: "Remember, whether or not you go with the flow, the flow always goes with you." We really can't step out of it.

So while the fact of change and loss, of things going away, can be truly poignant, opening to it opens us to love, to presence. This is part of a favorite poem of mine by Galway Kinnell that speaks to that. It's called "Little Sleep's-Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.

I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you. I've heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down." I've stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old. Don't die." Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry. This the nightmare you wake crying from—being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. You cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.

And that to me is what's poignant about our understanding of impermanence. It's what's poignant to me about our whole human condition of confusion and delusion, of ignorance. It's said that what prompted the Buddha to teach after his awakening was compassion, because he could look around—and with his great psychic powers could see what was going on in everybody in the world. And seeing that the deepest wish of each human being is to truly be happy. But in our efforts to be happy, and our lack of understanding of things as they are, of just seeing things how they are, our lack of ability to do that—the things we do to try and be happy are the very things that keep us from seeing the truth, that keep us from relaxing into things as they are.

It's so poignant because things as they are—you can't change it. It's right here. There's nowhere to go. It's always accessible. And we're so busy clinging. As if clinging could save us. And it's clinging that keeps us from noticing that we could live in peace in any moment. That to me is what's so poignant. That to me is the whole point of our practice, in all the different ways we talk about it—to really recognize cellularly the facts of life. And when we recognize it, clinging doesn't make sense anymore. We don't have to uproot every moment of clinging. When you see, "Oh yeah, this is going to go. In fact, it's already going. Before I can even enunciate what it is, it's gone"—you just open up and appreciate. Clinging stops making sense.

But we cling because we think it will make us happy. Look in your experience over the days when you find yourself suffering, frustrated, somehow unhappy. Look and see—sometimes it's clinging, sometimes it's the flip side, pushing something away, wanting it to be different. But look and see then: Do I really believe in this moment what the Buddha is teaching? That if something is impermanent, it can never give me lasting happiness? It can only give transitory pleasure, the pleasure of being with something pleasant. No, it makes sense, but when I look and see, do I really believe that? When I'm clinging, no, I don't believe it. I think if I can have this—anything from another rice cake up to something really important and beautiful, my idea of an enlightenment experience, whatever it is, a child, a grandchild, a beautiful relationship, it doesn't matter what. That claim is somewhere that arises then. Nothing else did it. But this thing will really bring me happiness.

So we need to look and see what our mind is doing, how we're getting caught in investing somewhere, in landing in this experience.

And this brings us to the second piece, which is, again, that the cause of this anguish, this confusion, is clinging—or really, our deeply ingrained habits of mind. Both clinging and pushing away, and confusion, basically not even noticing what's happening.

But as someone said to me on the last retreat, "So let's face it, I've noticed that I'm never clinging to an unpleasant experience when it leaves." When your knee pain goes away, you probably don't experience massive clinging and suffering about that. So it's a clue that part of our lack of understanding is rooted not just in not seeing imperman-ence, but also in the first aspect of the First Noble Truth—that pleasant experience is basically good, and unpleasant experience is wrong or bad or a mistake, and neutral experience, well, it doesn't even exist.

In our not noticing that, and the way the Buddha describes experience—experience just meaning our sense experiences: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling sensations of the body, and the whole mental realm, thoughts, emotions. The mind is considered the sixth sense. And that's all that's happening. Those sense experiences, over and over and over. And they're just changing really rapidly, and they're moving back and forth between pleasant and unpleasant and neutral. When you break it down like that, things stop seeming quite so exciting.

Like Sayadaw U Pandita said to me, "What do you want? Something else to note?" Because I was complaining about what was happening. "You can note this, or you can note that. What's the difference?" When I heard that, I thought, sharing things, it really doesn't matter what's happening. That's what you need. If it's not this, it's that. And this is going to change anyway.

And it'll turn to that. And if it's pleasant now, it's going to change to unpleasant. And then it'll change to pleasant. And then it'll be neutral. And then it'll be pleasant. And then it'll be neutral. And then it'll be unpleasant. Really pay attention moment to moment—that's all that's going on.

You really stop getting quite so reactive to things when you begin to notice how fast they're changing, that how much I prefer pleasant really doesn't matter, because you're going to get pleasant, you're going to get unpleasant. I can fight it or not. Those are our basic choices.

It's interesting to begin to look and see how deeply ingrained the habit of our mind is to evaluate experience in terms of how pleasant or unpleasant it is. So again, just noticing. When something's pleasant, we usually don't think there's a mistake, or that we've stopped, or started going backwards in our practice or in our life.

In a subtle way—and I see this going on more and more subtly in my practice, in my life—this whole process where I think I'm just noticing things, letting it be, it comes, it goes, I like it, I don't like it, letting it be. But then I'll notice something very, very subtle: I've started trying to aim my experience towards having some pleasant meditation experience arise. It's so subtle, this habit, to think somehow that's better.

And really, freedom is about just being aware—without identifying, without getting lost in this reactivity to whatever's happening. But if you look at it, we aim so much of our life... how many of our decisions have we made on the basis of pleasant experience, or of hoping to have more pleasant experience? It's a little shocking sometimes if you look at it.

I'll read you this story about the Buddha's attendant, Ananda. You've probably heard of Ananda. He was the Buddha's cousin, and for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life, he was his main attendant. He's a great character in all the Buddhist texts because he comes across as being very human. He's partially awakened, but not completely awakened. He's a totally generous, loving, compassionate man, and he's always the one interceding for people who come, trying to get them in to see the Buddha, trying to help people. And he's always the one who says, "I don't quite get it." There are many suttas where Ananda will say something and the Buddha will say, "Not so, Ananda," and then correct it a little bit. So one warms to Ananda.

Anyway, this is just a nice story about him. He was sent by the Buddha on a mission, and he passed by a well near a village and saw Pakati, a young outcast woman, and asked her for water to drink. Now, some background: in India at that time the caste system was very strong, and there were very strict rules about outcasts. They weren't supposed to touch people of higher castes. You couldn't even give water to someone of a higher caste. And a monk isn't allowed to ask for anything except water—that's the only thing he could ask for.

Pakati said, "O monk, I am too humbly born to give you water. Do not ask any service of me lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of low caste"—meaning contaminated just because she handed him water.

And Ananda replied, "I ask not for caste but for water."

And the woman's heart leapt joyfully, and she gave Ananda water. She thanked him, and he went away, but she followed him at a distance. Having heard that Ananda was a disciple of the Buddha, the woman went to the Buddha and said, "O Lord, help me and let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells, so that I may see him and minister unto him, for I love Ananda."

So you see how easily some pleasant experience could completely guide a person's life. He was nice to me for one minute—I love him. I want to devote the rest of my life to him.

And the Buddha, being wise, understood the emotions of her heart, and he said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you don't understand your own sentiments. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice towards you, and practice it towards others."

That's a nice story. But the message I get out of it is how easily we misplace our pleasure and pleasant feeling and build a whole life story around it. We think, "Oh, that's really nice."

He's kind. That feels really good. And then go and act like that to someone else. But no—I'll follow him for the rest of my life.

So noticing pleasant feeling is wonderful. Appreciate it. But it's going to go. It's nothing to build a life around. It's nothing to build a meditation around. It's just as much a part of life as unpleasant or neutral.

See if you notice anything neutral. It's getting really hard in this culture to find anything neutral. The breath once in a while, your steps—they're much more neutral than the beauty of the environment. Just see if you can notice it occasionally. That's all.

So our awareness practice is to begin noticing these habits of our mind, not with judgment. It's just how we've been conditioned. But in the noticing of them, we don't have to be like robots, driven by craving for the pleasant, driven by moving away from the unpleasant, judging our experience and our life in those terms, spacing out and looking for intensity when something neutral happens.

It's been an interesting phenomenon for me to notice over the years of teaching retreats and talking with people in the middle of them. Often on long retreats—I teach a three-month retreat every year—the same dynamics unfold, only stretched across three months. On the second day, people feel exactly how you do: "Oh my God, three months." But it changes.

There come places where the mind gets more quiet, more neutral. It's not always huge highs and lows. People come in saying, "My God, nothing's happening. I'm so bored," or "I'm afraid." Then they return the next week saying, "Oh, I get it—it's calm. I get it—it's peace." But we almost can't recognize or appreciate it when we're so hyperstimulated. That's part of the dullness of the first couple of days of retreat. The mind is either stimulated or it's bedtime. After a while, the energy returns and we can engage with more subtlety, actually coming to love the calmness and peace. But at first we don't even recognize it, because we're oriented toward pleasure. That's how we've been trained. That's what our culture constantly tells us—though not just our culture. The Buddha was teaching about this same tendency thousands of years ago.

When we don't examine our habits, we tend to think it's the change that causes our anger. Something pleasant goes away and we're stuck with something we don't like. We believe it's the pain causing our anger. But actually, when we begin to pay attention, we see that it's our misunderstanding of the way things are that creates the anger. It's our reactions to what's happening. What's happening isn't really that important.

In terms of freedom, of course, how we act and respond in our lives matters. I'm not suggesting we fall into some emptiness where nothing we do has significance. But in terms of freedom, getting what we want and getting rid of what we don't want is not the path. Being able to be really present without getting lost in reactivity—that is the place of real, intimate connection with ourselves and with life. That is the real opening into peace. A peace that's always available, but which we ignore because we're so entranced by our reactions to experience.

Really look at the stuff that goes on throughout the day—the sensations and the thoughts about them, the emotions, the future projections, the past memories. Sometimes, when I'm in a humorous mood with myself, I notice: no matter what happens, within two seconds it's turned into "How does this affect me?" Me, the center of every single thing. How everybody walks by, whether someone flushes the toilet, how everyone eats in the dining room—everything that happens all day is assessed and reacted to in terms of how it affects me. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. I like it, I don't like it.

It's really quite something when you look at it closely. But you can't take it personally.

It's just our habit.

There's an image I really like about how we're so involved in our reactions that it keeps us from recognizing the peace that's here when we stop getting so involved and just land in openness. It's as if we're in prison, and we're trying to make ourselves as comfortable as possible. You might find some relations to how it's been the last couple of days here. You're in this room and you're doing everything you can to get comfortable—fixing the furniture, turning up the heat, working out your little routines, straightening the pictures on the wall, writing notes to Lynn, finding the right time to go up to the lunch table, early, late, middle, how to avoid the lines. Believe me, I've spent a lot of time in retreats and really have seen all the angles.

We spend so much time with that, that we fail to notice that the door is wide open and we could walk out any time. We just don't even notice because the picture's a little askew and maybe there's some way I could get a more comfortable blanket and maybe

I could just adjust the heat a little bit. And this big empty space—there isn't anything really gripping to notice about it. I mean, there's nothing really there, is there? It's just space. We're more pulled to things we can react to.

So what goes on as we begin to see that everything changes? Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral are going to come and go. We don't have to fight the unpleasant. We don't have to hold on to the pleasant. Just let go. The space becomes more and more inviting—whether we experience it as space or silence, or ease, or quietness, or love, or connectedness, or unity.

There's a lovely phrase from the Buddha: "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by me, namely liberation of the heart from clinging." Just letting go of being so involved in all our assessments and reactions and interpretations and analyses and likes and dislikes. Letting go and then learning how to really be intimately present, wholly present. Not letting go and spacing out somewhere, but really being here.

It doesn't matter then if there's a headache, if your back hurts, that there's deep suffering in this world. Sometimes it's me, sometimes it's others, sometimes it's all the different kinds. It doesn't change any of that. But this peace, this heart of non-clinging, is always accessible. And it's not like we have to have some amazing meditation state. It's just those moments when we're really present and awake and the heart and mind are strong for a minute. Just stop trying to fix everything, to manipulate everything, to control everything—which doesn't work anyway, but somehow we don't get it.

A Tibetan text speaks about this peace. It's not really a state, even. If you look for a state, it's so hard to talk about, because then you look for some state and we're back on the wheel again.

"Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that this state—the Buddha mind, Buddha heart—is never impaired or improved in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease in whatever happens."

That's a mindfulness practice: liberated by resting at ease in whatever happens. We're practicing how to do that. And that's the Fourth Noble Truth, the path—really, the Eightfold Path. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, the core of it is mindfulness, the ability to be fully present, connected, resting at ease in whatever happens, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

Without mindfulness, we're just drawn by the habits of mind. With mindfulness, there's the potential to let go and really appreciate the beauty, appreciate the unity we have with others in our suffering. Just appreciate the beauty of this fleeting moment, and then be just as present for this next moment.

Without mindfulness, we're like this: There's a great sutta from the Buddha where he describes what we're like with and without mindfulness. He says, imagine six different types of animals all tied together—a snake, a crocodile, a bird like an eagle, a dog, a hyena, and a monkey. They're each tied on a rope, and then it's all tied in one big knot in the middle. You can imagine—they're all just pulling in every direction. Each tries to pull toward their own habitat. The snake pulls to the ground, the crocodile pulls to the water, the monkey pulls to the tree, and they're just being pulled in this mass back and forth. The strongest one at the moment will win.

Probably the crocodile drags them all into the water.

The Buddha is saying that for a person whose mindfulness of the body, mindfulness of the mind, mindfulness of the six senses is undeveloped and unpracticed, life is just like that. Our six senses are like those six animals. The eye struggles to reach pleasing forms, and unpleasing forms are considered repulsive. The nose struggles to reach pleasing odors, and unpleasing odors are considered repulsive. The tongue struggles for pleasing flavors, the body struggles for pleasing sensations, the mind struggles for pleasing mental states—and the unpleasant ones are considered repulsive.

Without mindfulness, that's how we're living our lives. The six senses just running after pleasant and away from unpleasant, one after the other after the other. It's exhausting.

But the Buddha says that one who has established mindfulness of the body dwells with a mind and heart unlimited. Such a one understands as it really is the liberation of the heart, the liberation of mind, the liberation by wisdom. You dwell with a heart and mind unlimited.

Mindfulness is like a stake that you put in the ground. The animals can't go anywhere—they just quiet down, lie down, and come to rest. I like that image.

So that's a practice. And it is a practice—to learn how to be that presence, just for a moment, without getting so entranced by our reactions, by our fears, by being pulled hither and thither by pleasant and unpleasant. To find that place of ease and freedom, resting at ease in whatever arises.

We have some more days ahead, with many, many moments each day. And no matter what's happening—no matter what's happening—it doesn't matter. It's an opportunity to find that place of resting at ease. Really, no matter what's happening at any moment of the day. And if you miss it in this moment, that's okay. Because now there's this moment. It's always available to you.

CHAPTER 314

What Is Mettā

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this opening talk from a mettā retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a question many practitioners face during their first days of loving-kindness practice: how does this seemingly formal, repetitive technique actually cultivate genuine warmth and care? She explains that mettā—one of the four brahmavihāras (divine abodes)—is not something we create but rather an expression of our fundamental interconnected nature that we learn to recognize and trust.
>
> Wilson carefully distinguishes authentic mettā from common misconceptions. It is neither the romantic yearning portrayed in popular culture ("I need you to complete me") nor a passive, weak acceptance that lacks discernment. Drawing on teachings about the "near enemy" (attachment disguised as love) and "far enemy" (aversion and ill-will), she guides practitioners to notice when simple well-wishing slides into wanting or when judgment arises. The Buddha described mettā as "the deliverance of the heart"—liberation from our self-constructed prison of fear, separation, and reactivity.
> The practical heart of this teaching lies in understanding that each repetition of the mettā phrases plants a seed of intention, gradually shifting where the mind naturally dwells. As the Buddha taught, "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." Wilson emphasizes that we need not force feelings or achieve particular states; by simply connecting with our mettā subject with open attention, we allow the truth of interconnection to reveal itself. She concludes with the insight that love, far from being blind, is "the only thing on this earth that lets us see each other with the remotest accuracy."

The first day of a mettā retreat, especially if it's your first ever mettā retreat, can sometimes leave you wondering: Is this really being kind to myself? What's the link, again, between this practice and loving-kindness? I'm sure there were moments when that question didn't arise, but the first couple of days can really be a bit difficult—tiring, wearing, hard work.

Someone asked me at dinner what I was going to talk about tonight. I said mettā, of course. That's what we're going to talk about every night. But I would like, in broad terms, to talk about what mettā is and how I think this practice of loving-kindness, as formal as it might seem, almost rigid perhaps in the beginning, is actually one of the greatest kindnesses that we can do for ourselves and for the world.

Mettā—this state of heart or mind of loving-kindness, of boundaryless, undiscriminating connectedness and acceptance—is one of several divine abodes, states of heart and mind that are expressions of the deepest truth of who we are. These are expressions of the truth that under our obvious differences, underneath and underlying all the seeming things that separate us from one another and from life, the things that seem to create our suffering—underlying these seeming differences, we are really essentially whole, complete, connected.

Mettā is an expression coming out in our mind stream, in our heart stream, in our thoughts, speech, and actions. It's an expression of this unitive nature. And the habits of mind that we so often respond or react to life from—toward ourselves, toward others, toward situations—the habits of wanting, of fear, of aversion, of hatred, of needing to protect—those habits arise from what is really our dream of alienation, of separation. It's a dream. It's an illusion. Unfortunately, we really believe it. It's a misperception.

Listen to Joko Beck: "Our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate. It certainly looks as though I am separate from other people and other phenomena. And as long as we think we are separate, we're going to suffer. We feel like we have to defend ourselves, that we have to find something in the world that will make us happy."

So that misperception that we are separate leads us to look for something in the world that will make us happy. It leads us to create, to construct, moment by moment, a kind of self-prison, a fear of needing to control and manipulate our world, whether internally or externally, to make us happy, to keep us happy, to keep unpleasant things away. These actions, these habits of mind are what continue to create and extend this experience we tend to have of feeling lonely, alienated, separate, needing to protect. We are actually misperceiving and then recreating the conditions that make us feel like we need something out there to make us happy. These are being recreated over and over.

Mettā, loving-kindness, is a wise response to life, whether it's our internal experience or our external experience. It's a wise response because it arises from a deeper understanding. And it's not just an intellectual understanding. Intellectual understanding is helpful; it's part of it. But it's not enough, as I'm sure we all know.

Mettā, even in just a moment—that moment of simple acceptance of yourself, of another, of simple well-wishing—in that moment, the boundaries aren't being created. The fear isn't there. The sense of needing to keep apart or wanting something else for happiness isn't there, just in that simple moment of mettā.

It may seem like a lot of work, like we're trying to create some really nice mind state and then hold on to it so that by the end of the retreat you have unremitting moments of bliss, never to change again. I'm glad you're laughing because that means maybe your expectations are realistic. Even mettā itself isn't unremitting moments of bliss. As either Steve or Michelle said last night, it has many flavors. I'm going to talk about some of those tonight.

What is really important as we begin to explore the range of this heart-mind state of loving-kindness is to realize we are here very much creating conditions that let us recognize and come to rest in and trust the heart-mind experience of mettā. We're creating conditions that are conducive to recognizing and becoming familiar with it. But it's really not that we are creating that mental state so much as uncovering it.

A lot of the practice—you think we're trying to make mettā happen—but what really goes on is that the psychological habits of mind that are obstacles to this free-flowing, open-hearted connectedness begin to be discovered. That's what you may not have known when you signed up for this retreat, if it's your first mettā retreat.

The mettā gets stronger along the way. What allows us to rest with more trust in the loving-kindness is becoming more familiar with the psychological obstacles, the habits of mind that prevent us from recognizing our unitive nature. So there are really two aspects to the practice: recognizing this boundless state, this connectedness, this friendliness—and understanding what obscures it.

Becoming more familiar with metta until we trust, really trust, that this is an expression of our true goodness. More so that it's stronger than fear and hatred and wanting and delusion.

At first we'll have a moment or two of metta and we'll think, "Oh, that must have been a mistake. It slipped in there, but it won't last." We don't trust it. But as the course continues, as we become more and more familiar, it's much easier to not be so entranced by the obstacles and to trust—to fall back into the expression of unity.

So we recognize metta, and as I say, the practice highlights what's obstructing. And that's great. That's part of the practice. It's not a mistake.

I want to talk a little bit about both of these aspects. Trying to describe metta, as with all of this, there are many different ways. I just want to give you some sense of the flavors.

First, why do I tend to use the word metta rather than loving-kindness? Perhaps it's just because I'm so used to English—the word love, as I experience it in English, is wildly overused. I love pizza. I love your new haircut. I love it when the lilacs come out. I love it when it gets hot and the black flies go away. I don't think love really covers all of those. So when we use "loving-kindness," I don't know—that word doesn't quite have the juice for me. Metta, since I've gotten used to it, has more depth, more breadth. So that's why I'll probably keep using metta.

In the classical Buddhist tradition, let me start by saying what metta is not. First, it's not the mistaken idea about love that one can absorb from the culture. I mean, if you really listen to all the songs and the movies, the ideas of really deep love get a little—this is just my view—a little sickening at times. "I'll die for love." "I'm yearning for you." "I need you to complete me." "I am nothing without you." Is that an expression of love? "I'm nothing without you"?

Often love can be seen as—and I've experienced it internally—this sense of looking for something or someone to complete me, to make me whole, to make me happy. Now, I'm not saying a relationship can't make us happy. Of course it can. But if I'm actually saying, "I need you to be happy," the chances of that being a happy relationship are getting slimmer. The more I need that person to be a certain way to make me happy, the more trouble we're in.

But none of that is what we mean by metta. It's really quite poignant because this looking elsewhere for completion is the very thing that hides the fact that we're already whole and complete. And if we stop looking out there, we might recognize it. So it's something that is very easy to slip into in our culture—thinking love is this loneliness, this grand passion, that love always has yearning in it. "I'll miss you so much if you're not here."

And then we think that when we really feel this grand passion of love, it's a kind of unitive bliss. In the meditation, we might look for that—a total unitive bliss, tears streaming down, a total sense of oneness—and that becomes our guideline. "This is metta, and everything else is something lesser." Again, we're in trouble.

I didn't see this, but I read a newspaper article about a particular Oprah Winfrey show a few years ago. It was based on the movie Sleepless in Seattle. She had on her show five men—I think they were all widowers whose wives had died—and all five of them had young children. And they were all highly rated professionals, doctors, lawyers, plumbers, something like that. She did this kind of Sleepless in Seattle thing: "Who's looking for a mate out there who would be interested in meeting these guys?"

Then the article said that two weeks later she came on the show with a bulldozer full of letters, because the show had received 60,000 letters from women in those two weeks—women who wanted to meet these men, or even proposals of marriage. It made me kind of sad, you know.

Marriage is a great thing, but needing someone so much—that's not the way of love, of metta.

Another misconception that often comes up, particularly in retreats when we begin to talk about teaching metta, is that metta is a kind of weak, passive, deluded state. I was talking to a man a couple of years ago in Germany who was extremely resistant to even beginning to try the metta meditation. He said he felt it was passive, weak, that there was no wisdom in it, no wise discrimination.

A couple of years ago, Sharon Salzberg and I were teaching a retreat billed as being for burned-out environmentalists. Some of them had done meditation practice before, some not. Some were kind of dragged in by the man who organizes the retreats. Sharon was talking in our first group discussion—it was a Vipassana retreat, a mindfulness retreat, but we do a fair bit of loving-kindness as well. She came back after the discussion a little shaken. She said some of the people got really reactive. They were saying, "Don't give us this metta-shmetta mushy stuff. I need my anger. That's what helps me do what I do. I can't lose my edge. I don't want to lose my edge."

I don't think that's a totally uncommon reaction—the idea that if we feel loving-kindness, if we feel friendliness toward everything, it means we just accept anything anyone does. We can't tell the difference. Everything's hunky-dory. It's like those movies of lovers wandering through fields of daisies, everything in soft focus. They never get old, they never have an argument. The movie ends before you see any of that, and that's what we go out with: "Oh yes, that's love. Everything's wonderful. You don't see anything unpleasant."

Both of these views are untrue. Metta is both more simple and direct and familiar than really grand, overwhelming passion. And it's also much more courageous and profound. It is an expression of wisdom, of clear seeing—not of delusion, not of avoidance. It includes all, seeing clearly.

The Buddha described metta as the deliverance of the heart. Deliverance from what? Deliverance from just what I was speaking of before: from our prison of fear, separation, worrying, anger, anguish, loneliness. It's the deliverance of heart into happiness, into connectedness. Not the happiness that everything's always the way we want it to be—that's not happiness, that's based on fear. The happiness that allows us to be open and connected, seeing things as they are, but not getting so separate and tight and restricted around it.

Metta does not depend on conditions, but it does not exclude any particular conditions that may arise. It spreads out and includes whatever's going on.

So what are some ways we might experience metta? First, you could say it's just a simple good wish—a feeling of happiness and well-wishing. It's completely normal if you see a little puppy running around, or a small child. If you went out and saw a small child running across the yard playing with a ball, most of us would naturally feel a sense of happiness, wanting that child to be happy. Think about it. It's not unfamiliar. It's not such a big deal. It's a generosity of the heart. You don't say, "Oh, I want that child to be happy and he should grow up and do good for the world," or "He should come over and tell me how nice I am." It's just: may you be happy. It feels great.

It's not always high ecstasy. But just in that simple moment of heart's generosity, it feels great because it's an expression of truth.

We can learn to trust that. It's not a mistake. Difficulties don't vanish. But there's still the generosity of heart toward ourself, toward another. The heart softens and becomes less reactive around difficulties or unpleasant experience. It doesn't dwell on them.

Another quality of metta is that sometimes it's simply experienced as spaciousness, inclusiveness. I get a sense of that when I go outside, even if it's not particularly directed at people—when I just go outside and look at nature. There's a sense of my whole being opening up. I don't say, "That tree's nice, but that one over there is spoiling the landscape a little bit." Or when I hear the birds in the morning—and I know some of you might have heard the birds and it was aggravating you; it's different for everybody—but when I heard the birds, I wasn't thinking, "That one's really nice, but that crow could take a hike." It's just openness, spaciousness, inclusiveness.

In fact, during walking meditation, if you walk outside and you're feeling kind of tight and pulled in, walking outside can really help. Unless, of course, there are swarms of black flies, and then there's a whole other element there. But if you walk outside and you're feeling too tight, just stop for a minute and send the four phrases to that bird flying by, or to one of the chipmunks, or a person who just happens to walk past. Begin to open to that inclusive quality, and then bring that same inclusive quality back to yourself.

So metta is not affected by conditions. And it's very simple and natural. Let me give you an example of how familiar it is to us. We don't need to make it so esoteric.

I spent some time in Hawaii this winter, on Maui, and with two friends we went to a local happening. It took place in a high school gym, and it was called "Honoring Our Kupunas"—Honoring Our Elders. People of all ages were there in the audience, from little kids to old people, families, church groups. The event featured groups of elder women—I'd say from late sixties up into their nineties—coming from different community groups or different churches. They'd all organized on their own. Each group came up and did the hula for everybody.

And I tell you, it was so fantastic. A ninety-year-old woman up there doing the hula, doing what she called the "naughty, naughty"—doing a little naughty hula. Women of all kinds—some could hardly move, some must have weighed four hundred pounds—of all ages, all makes. And there was no sense anywhere of making discrimination, of saying, "Well, she did it better than she did," or "What's she doing? She's too old, or she's too big, or she's not graceful enough"—either on the part of the women or on the part of the audience. Just complete naturalness and acceptance.

I would say it was metta—not gushy love, but total friendliness. I left there feeling so happy, just seeing that this potential exists: people, some who know each other and some who don't, just being so open-hearted and accepting. I tried to imagine my mother—never mind my mother—me, going up to a bunch of strangers and dancing a hula in the middle of a gym. I couldn't get there. It was great. I thought, that's the perfect example of metta in a way that we can all experience it. You don't have to do an eight-day intensive retreat.

I say this because once we know how metta can be experienced, we'll recognize it more in our practice. Don't look for something so high and esoteric. Notice those simple moments of openness, connectedness, friendliness.

And as simple and friendly and familiar and natural as metta is, to really come to trust in it as one of the natural expressions of truth is actually extremely radical in terms of how we're brought up in our society, in our culture. Because it comes from the radical understanding that our deepest happiness, our true happiness—in fact, our true nature, who we really are—does not depend at all on how other people treat us. It does not depend on having other people love us. It does not depend on getting what we want. Rather, love is an expression of who we really are.

For each of us, we begin to discover that the more we can trust in love rather than trusting our fear, our wanting, our craving, our anger—the more we can trust to open and connect rather than needing to keep away—the more we discover that this generosity of the heart is what truly takes us into happiness. And that we each have a boundless supply of love and connectedness.

We don't know it yet. We touch moments of this understanding and then we forget. That's okay—that's what the practice is about. But to really begin to know, radically, that no one else can prevent us from loving. No one can prevent us from being happy. No one else has that key for us. We each have it for ourselves. It's just learning how to recognize it and to trust it.

Have you ever had the simple experience where someone does something that you really feel is wrong—it makes you angry, or it hurts you? And you're quite clear that you are right and they are wrong. You're kind of closed down in anger, resentment, or hurt, unhappy, waiting for them to come and apologize. Waiting for them to realize what a stupid jerk they've been, and if they would just come and grovel a little bit and acknowledge that, then you'd be happy.

I've had that experience many times. And I know now that it would be nice if they did that, but I can't count on it. How many of you have had the experience where, at some point, you could really say, "Okay, forget them—it's up to me"? And you connect again with something about that person that reminds you they're not all just this negative thing. The heart opens again. "Oh yeah, right. Just as you are, you're not perfect. I do care. May you be happy." And the anger and the pain and the suffering is gone.

Just a little example—don't pick the most difficult one in your whole life. An example like that is where you begin to really see: the key, the secret is with me. Holding out anger against that person isn't so much hurting them as it is keeping me feeling separate. We start small. I'm not saying we should all just drop our deepest pains right away, but simply begin to explore this as a possibility.

So the metta practice is about recognizing and familiarizing ourselves with metta—not about holding on to a state of mind, staying there and never moving. Second, it's about uncovering and recognizing the obstacles that arise in our hearts and minds as we cultivate the intention of metta. You may perhaps have noticed one or two today.

I'll mention only two. There are two big ones, and we'll talk about others as we go, but these are the main ones. They're called the near enemy and the far enemy in the classical terminology of metta. They arise whether we're doing metta or not, but they come up frequently in loving-kindness practice. We tend to think of them as mistakes, rather than thinking, "Oh great, I get to see these now! How is this blocking connectedness?"

I'm serious—I'm not being Pollyanna-ish. It really can be a moment of recognition: "Oh yeah, it's good to see this." Not "I wish this would go away so I could feel metta."

The near enemy is called that because it's a state of heart or mind that we often confuse with loving-kindness, with open-hearted connectedness. And this near enemy is—guess what—attachment. Love with attachment. Just plain attachment, desire.

Did you notice that coming up at any point today?

I've actually discovered in my own practice of loving-kindness that because attachment is sort of close to metta but different, when we start to pay attention, they're wildly different when you really look. But it's as if when I'm cultivating metta—just wishing well to myself, to the benefactor—and my attention flags a little or I space out, it just slides over into wanting.

"May I be free from danger. May I be happy. I would be happy if only I didn't have this particular pattern of mind. I'd be a lot happier now if, in fact, I'd gone to Aruba this week instead of coming here."

Or when you're sending metta to the benefactor: "May you be happy." And then, "You know, if you just made these changes that I think of, you'd be a lot happier. You would be happier if you only listened to me."

Or just plain desire—to be more comfortable, for something different to happen. Desire for the pleasant feeling of metta itself.

That's the tricky one. I slip into that a lot—sending metta really wholeheartedly, very honestly, and then subtly: "Well, do I feel it? Am I doing it right? I must not be doing it right. I'm not feeling it." May you be happy... Where's the feeling? It's switched then. It's not metta anymore. It's attachment. It's desire. So it's great to see.

Play with feeling the difference—not hating it, just feeling the difference. Take your benefactor, or when we move to a dear friend, or of course people in your life pop into your mind here. We know that. Feel the difference when you can really, out of a generosity of heart, wish them happiness. And when there suddenly comes some slight condition—it can be ever so slight—a little hook comes out.

When I was doing metta for a good friend, a dear friend, and just feeling it, suddenly I noticed: "She's so great, I wish we saw each other more." Just some little condition comes in. Towards ourselves, it can be a big one. Don't judge it, but feel the difference. Attachment is called by the Buddha a "maker of limitations." Whereas a moment of generosity is just out there, as soon as some attachment comes in, some desire, there's limitations, there's conditions. This much, so far, but no further.

Sometimes "so far" just feels like that's all we're able to do. We can't suddenly really honestly send loving-kindness to all beings in the world. That's huge. That's vast. So we start really simply, kind of build up the supply of metta, the trust in the metta, and then it overflows into the next being and the next being.

That's why we ostensibly start with ourselves. And for some people, that's best. For some people, ourselves is really hard and you run into the second obstacle, the far enemy—which, guess what that is? Aversion, hatred, fear, judgment. And if the self is a hard person in that way, then maybe the benefactor is an easy person, someone that more easily evokes this generosity without the conditions.

So just play with this. When you feel the generous, open-hearted connectedness, notice—probably after it's happened a little bit—that there's suddenly some condition there. Rather than immediately going, "Oh, bad conditions," open up to that too with metta. Metta is an open-hearted connectedness. Feel what the wanting feels like. You begin to see it's very different from metta. It's not actually as similar as we think when we're not looking.

This will be highlighted. The purification Michelle mentioned last night—the way it works is by bringing up into awareness these deep-set habits and patterns of mind. So there's attachment, and there's the far enemy, the opposite, so to speak: ill will, aversion, fear, not liking. And again, I'm sure there was one or two moments when that arose today. Sometimes it arises towards ourselves or towards the metta subject, but it's not always so clear. It can just be kind of generalized aversion or generalized desire, just squirting out at anything that's going on here. And the first couple days of a retreat, that can happen anyway, as the hindrances of mind—whether you're doing vipassana, mindfulness, or metta—can get strong: attachment and aversion.

So beginning to recognize the presence of aversion or fear, rather than just letting it color our vision and thinking everything is wrong, something's bad, I'm not doing it right because I'm feeling lousy about myself—beginning to recognize it is how metta begins to surround and see what's happening without reacting to it.

Back to my friends at the environmental retreat, where I could really understand, in a way, what they were saying: "Oh, we need our edge." And anger, that real kind of passionate anger, is energizing sometimes, isn't it? I could really understand where they were coming from, feeling, "I need that energy to do the work I'm doing."

What we need to learn to see is that the energy which comes with our deep understanding and connectedness—to ourselves, to things as they are, to all life—is much more deep and profound and long-lasting than the energy of anger. Metta sees through the concept of "the other." Instead of having to be angry, holding something at a distance, it can open up and include. Clear-eyed, it sees what's wrong, but it doesn't fall into this habit of making things "the other."

And they're talking to a psychologist who's discussing how road rage happens, what we do in our mind. He says, "It used to be there was a rule of courtesy for the road, just as for writing thank you notes. Now everything is a personal insult, especially if we're in a car. If someone on the road upsets you, that individual's whole identity is encapsulated in this bad thing he did. He's not seen as a whole person." And then there's an urge to express our aggression on this anonymous other, this bad being—to think, "I can't let him get away with this." The thin veneer of civilization is removed.

What I appreciate about this is that tendency to encapsulate one being's whole identity in this bad thing they did. That's what aversion, fear, and anger do. What metta does that's different is it sees this bad thing he did—sure, it's really clear seeing, open-eyed connectedness—and it sees the rest. So it's inclusive. It's not driven by reacting to the bad thing, and it's not blindly hurt or letting someone act on us in an inappropriate way, but it's all-inclusive.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, a wonderful American monk in the Thai tradition. He's talking about metta not in terms of this vast unity of heart, but very simply when faced with the unpleasant: "Metta does not necessarily mean liking something, or that you like everything at all. It means an attitude of not dwelling on the unpleasantness or the faults of any situation, inside or outside of oneself. Now with metta, one isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, in a person, or in oneself, without creating anything around it."

I personally love that. Witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a person, or in ourself—with space. That's all. Not creating any reaction around it, just the spaciousness. That's an expression of metta.

He goes on to say that you simply stop the mind from thinking, "I hate it, I hate it, I don't want it." That's a huge advance in itself, isn't it? Just repeating the phrases instead of "I hate it, I hate it" is really a huge difference. Over time, I think you'll see that. Or "I want it, I want it." Some of us lean toward "hate it, hate it." Others lean toward "want it, want it." Either one—metta cuts through them both.

So witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it. And where we start on this retreat, as we've been doing today, is very directly and simply with ourselves. Noticing, without creating anything around it, how your heart and mind might have responded to some of the difficult things that came up today. Whether you're sending metta to yourself or sending metta to the benefactor, as Stephen said, it's all coming out of us. And metta really lets us see a lot of gunk sometimes. That's great. That's what the practice is. Not just the gunk, but beginning to see what are the habits of our heart and mind. How do we respond to our sleepiness, our anger, our aversion, our pain, our sadness, our jealousy, our judgment of ourself? How are we responding to all of that? Is it with more resistance? Is it, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, do we meet our anger with more anger, trying to root it out and uproot it and tear ourselves into a battlefield? That's not compassion. That's not loving-kindness.

So we begin by seeing how we are meeting the unpleasant things, the things we don't like about ourselves. As C.G. Jung said once, those parts of yourself you do not accept will become hostile to you. But I actually think that we start by being hostile to them. So begin to notice: when that particular negative tendency comes up, when that loneliness comes up, when you remember me talking about metta not being wanting or loneliness and you find yourself lost in yearning—how do you meet that? Where do we start?

When you wake up in the morning and out of nowhere comes the heartache of alienation and loneliness, could you use that as a golden opportunity? Rather than persecuting yourself or feeling that something terribly wrong is happening, right there, in the moment of sadness and longing, could you relax and touch the limitless space of the human heart? The next time you get a chance, experiment with this.

That's a perfect description of metta to ourselves. The next time, just relax. Let that pain be there. And you might touch the limitless space of our human hearts—not by getting rid of it, simply by being present, connected with spaciousness. We don't have to approve of everything. As Samaya said, we don't have to like everything, but we don't get lost in reactivity and we don't pretend it's not happening.

There's a line from the Buddha I love because I think it has very profound implications, especially in this practice. He said, "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." So with no mental training, when we come in and we sit—if this is the first time you've ever sat, or even if it's not—we all know, we come in from a busy life, and our mind doesn't really go where we tell it to very well, does it? Have you been zoomed in on the phrases and the method of feeling all day? I wouldn't believe you if you had. The mind's all over. And what we get to see is what the mind dwells upon frequently, because that's what it's naturally inclining towards.

For a long time, before I really did an intensive practice, I was a little resistant. Saying these phrases—you don't feel it a lot of the time. It feels either like wishful thinking or affirmations or some kind of rote repetition. The words all get mixed up. Maybe happy, maybe peaceful—no, no, no. I have a friend who ends up saying, "May I live with peas." It just gets all mixed up.

But when you think about what we're actually doing, we're cultivating the seed of intention. Each time we connect with our metta subject—ourselves or another—just that moment of open connectedness, that's planting the seed of connected loving-kindness. Each time in your heart you repeat the phrase, knowing what it means—feeling it or not is out of your control—just saying it and knowing what it means, that's shifting where the mind dwells.

And the amazing thing is that as we shift, we have more choice than we realize about where to let the mind dwell. It's a lot of work to begin to activate this choice, but it does get easier because the mind then begins to incline more naturally towards metta. Amazing! It really happens. I was amazed. It really happens.

And we begin to have much more choice. The Dalai Lama—I know this might seem like a big leap from where we are, but it works. He says, "Each day when we wake up, we could say to ourselves, 'Altruistic attitude.'" I get the feeling he really does wake up saying "altruistic attitude." He continues: "If we have an altruistic attitude, many favorable things will come. I practice these things and I know they are helpful. I try to be sincere to everyone, even the Chinese. If I develop some kind of ill will, anger, or hatred, who will lose? I will lose my happiness, my sleep, my appetite, but my ill feelings won't hurt the Chinese at all. If I am agitated, my physical condition will become weak, and some people I could make happy will not become happy. Some people may criticize me, and some do, but I try to remain joyful. If we want to work effectively for freedom and justice, it is best to do so without anger or ill will. If we feel calm and have a sincere motivation, we can work hard for thirty or forty years. I believe that because of my firm commitment to nonviolence, based on a genuine sense of brotherhood and sisterhood, some positive results have been produced."

One gets the sense that he really practices this. And it might come up: okay, so he's the reincarnated bodhisattva of compassion. He had a head start on some of us. But we're not aspiring to be the Dalai Lama. We can, however, make that choice from time to time—where to let the mind dwell. Even when we're caught in irritation with ourselves, how we meet that irritation is where we're choosing to let the mind dwell. That's how we begin to cultivate metta, the intention of metta.

And what is another amazing aspect of how naturally the mind and heart begin to trust and dwell in metta is, again, we don't have to work so hard to create it.

The simple openness of connected attention is really enough. Because since metta is an expression of how things really are—the interconnectedness, the oneness—if we can just open and pay attention without creating the limitations, the judgments, the wanting, the aversion, the truth reveals itself. And metta is a natural expression.

John Muir, the naturalist, once said that if he touched anything, he found it connected to everything else in the universe. Even your irritation. If you touch anything, really, with an open heart and mind, you find this to be true.

I want to read you this poem. It's a little long, but I love it because it expresses precisely this—the power of simple connectedness to open us to love and to everything in the universe. It's called "Singapore":

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it—kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings. Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face. Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win. She smiled, and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem. But first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She's washing the tops of airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly, nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life. And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen. But maybe it will.

If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

We can't force a happy, all-inclusive metta feeling. So just give up trying right now. And what we find is that by letting go of results, by not trying to force the feeling, by not needing to fix the person we're sending wishes to, letting each phrase, each connection with the metta subject simply plant the seed of intention—just being content with that as a gift, handing the phrase to yourself as a gift, opening your heart to the benefactor as a gift—each time we do that, each moment is breaking the cycle of reactivity, the habit of limitation, the habit of separation.

Each moment that we connect with the phrase is a moment of choice about where to let the heart dwell, where to let the mind dwell. And you'll see that the metta emerges all by itself, because what we're really doing is uncovering it. It's an expression of our truest self. We actually work really hard in our lives not to see it. It takes a huge amount of energy to keep constructing this illusion of separation. And so it takes a certain amount of energy to begin countering that habit. But then it takes less and less, and the metta begins to emerge.

You can't tell what's happening, really—never mind on the first day, even in a long retreat. This is a true testimonial. I was just teaching in California, and there were two women on that retreat who had sat the three-month retreat this fall, doing loving-kindness practice just like you're doing, for the entire three months. I know—you don't want to think about that right now. But it gets easier.

One of them came up to me and said that even at the end, she had enjoyed it, it was nice, but she kept saying to herself, "I'm not really concentrated. Nothing's really happening." Then she told me what occurred afterward: "I never would have believed it. I went back home. I was in a difficult situation—didn't have a place to live, was staying with friends in their living room, and they were getting divorced. It was a horrible situation. And I was just so present, so kind, so open—"

So loving. I kept going, I'm waiting for it to pop. I'm waiting for this to stop. I'm waiting for something else to come up." Not that there weren't other thoughts. And I've had the same experience. I come out of a mettā retreat thinking, "Well, that was nice... so what?" Because you feel like your normal self. But when you don't expect it, the heart and mind dwells in inclusive connectedness. We turn away from the woman in the painting and look back at the world, and we see beauty—in ourselves and in others.

So it's trusting that potential enough to let go of all need for result and just offer yourself this moment of pure intention as a gift. It's not sentimental. It's not passive or weak. In some ways, I think it's the strongest response we could have in this world.

I want to close with something I read just last night. It's a book review of a book by a woman named Martha Beck. She and her husband were both academics at Harvard, both teachers there. They had one young daughter and found out she was pregnant with another child—and that this child would be born with Down syndrome. Everyone, all their doctors, all their friends, everyone at Harvard, told them they should have an abortion. And she said, to both of their surprise, they didn't do it. And it's been absolutely wonderful in their lives, this little boy named Adam.

To give you the context, she's describing how she once spoke to an entering class at Harvard Medical School about her pregnancy and her decision. Adam, her little boy with Down syndrome, was asleep in her lap at the time, wearing a bow tie and a dreamy expression. After the speech, she was approached by an elderly professor who had just become the grandfather of a little girl with Down syndrome. As he talked to her, he stroked Adam's soft blonde hair and wept. He loved his granddaughter with inexplicable openness, and the experience had changed his whole life.

"Whoever said that love is blind was dead wrong. Love is the only thing on this earth that lets us see each other with the remotest accuracy."

CHAPTER 315

Compassion

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this heartfelt talk from a mettā retreat, Carol Wilson addresses what happens when loving-kindness practice meets difficulty and pain. She explains that compassion (karuṇā) naturally arises when mettā encounters suffering—it is the "quivering of the heart in response to pain," a vibrating together rather than a pulling away. Wilson illuminates how our conditioned response to push away suffering actually creates separation and fear, while the courage to let our hearts break opens us to our fundamental connectedness with all beings.
>
> Drawing on the First Noble Truth (dukkha), Wilson examines our cultural conditioning to hide suffering and treat difficulty as failure. Through personal stories—including her father's Parkinson's diagnosis and her own chronic illness—she demonstrates how meeting pain with compassion rather than aversion transforms our relationship to life itself. She shares the inspiring example of the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu, noting how those who are most present to suffering also radiate the greatest joy.
> The talk offers practical insight into how mettā practice shifts our moment-to-moment relationship with unpleasant experience. Rather than the attention shrinking back from difficulty, loving-kindness flows into whatever arises without discrimination. Wilson emphasizes that this isn't passive acceptance but wise, fearless engagement—distinguishing true compassion from codependence. She encourages practitioners to trust that even when practice feels unproductive, the intention of well-wishing is strengthening our capacity to meet both beauty and suffering with an open heart.

A metta retreat, a loving-kindness retreat, the way we're doing it here together for these eight days, is a kind of complex amalgam of different experiences that you all can go through. When there's a hundred of you, you can be going through different experiences, different ones at different times.

There's the strain of the loving-kindness that's being cultivated—the feeling of loving-kindness, the stuff that comes up around it, how you relate to the different metta subjects. There's the concentration strain, which may or may not come together with the loving-kindness. Sometimes you just feel really concentrated, no loving-kindness. Sometimes just loving-kindness, no concentration. And I know you're thinking you're in the third category, which is neither loving-kindness nor concentration, and sometimes it feels like that.

In deciding which strain to speak to tonight, after we spoke with only about half of you today, I thought maybe I'd speak to what happens in the times when there's a lot of difficulty coming up. Because what occurs when loving-kindness is turned towards difficulty, pain, suffering of any form, what arises is compassion. It's subtly different from loving-kindness, but it's really the face of loving-kindness in connection with our suffering.

In a couple of days we'll teach the specifics of compassion as another divine abode, brahmavihara, but in the meantime, we're all working with and experiencing compassion. And it's a wonderful way to begin to see that we can relate to the things we don't like, the things we're afraid of, including the fear itself, in a different way.

Compassion, just as metta is, as is empathetic joy and equanimity, is a so-called divine abode—vast, boundless, undiscriminating. In other words, compassion is another expression of our unitive nature. It's actually one of the beautiful states of heart and mind. It's a happy state, believe it or not. The heart of metta, in connection with suffering as compassion, is a beautiful expression of the truth of who we are. Not the way most of us think about our resistance, is it? Or the fear, or the pain. But it's really about unlearning our mistaken response to what is difficult in our life.

Compassion, karuna in Pali, has one definition which I really like because I'm sort of kinesthetic and that's how it feels to me: the quivering of the heart in response to suffering, in connection with pain. The quivering of the heart, sort of vibrating together—not the quivering of "get me out of here," but the quivering of vibrating together.

Instead of our conditioned response to ours or another person's strong difficulty—of "what can I do to fix it," but fix it meaning so I shouldn't have to know about it or feel it anymore, or of judgment or self-judgment or blame—it can really become a way of opening more deeply into truth and connectedness. The quivering of the heart, connectedness.

At the end of April, I was leading a retreat in Colorado and it started just a couple of days after that massacre in the high school in Littleton. Though we were a few hours away from that, there were people at the retreat from Denver. And there was also the sense that the bombing in Yugoslavia was very strong. And there were people in the retreat, of course, going through their own deep sadness and fears and pain and suffering, just as people are here.

In talking with one woman who came from the Denver area and so felt very affected by the massacre in the high school—just knowing people who went to that school—she said she'd been really questioning not only the pain in the world, but also her own pain. What's the good of sitting here and just being with my sadness and my grief? She was in a lot of grief, but it felt personal at first.

But she said—and I thought it was really a beautiful thing—that little by little she came to be able to be with her own grief, and saw that it opened into really the grief of the world. When you really resonate with your suffering, it stops being just "me" and it moves into that boundless quality that connects us with all beings. We really see through compassion that we're not separate.

What she said was, "Okay, I was really struggling with: am I just being selfish? What's the point of just being with this difficult stuff? Is it worth it? Is it useful?" And then when we were talking, she said she had really come to see that by being able to be with what she was going through then, however big or little it might seem—she said, "I really get it. That will be that much less violence, that much less anger that I'll have to put out into the world." That by simply being able to be with whatever's arising in my experience, it really translates into more compassion, more kindness in the way I am in the world.

That might seem like a little thing. I think it's really huge. It's the beginning of true compassion. Where else can it begin? Where else can it deepen but here within our own experience?

I remember when I first started in practice, I was nineteen and, of course, quite idealistic. I would practice for a while and then I'd think, "Well, okay, now I'm feeling pretty good, I have to go save the world now." You know how long that lasts. I'd go out for a little while, go back to college, get all caught up again—never mind saving the world, I just want to function again in a happy way—and go back into practice.

It doesn't have to be quite such a dichotomy, but I really see that until I can be with my own pain and suffering—the pain that's elicited in me when I'm with someone else who's in pain—I can't really be there for somebody else.

So in our practice here, in the metta, when all these difficult things come up, it's not a mistake. It's not a sign of failure. It's not a sign that you're hopeless at this practice, or that the practice is going backwards. Have you had thoughts like that, just flickering through? You know, if you're doing it right, it should be all bliss.

It's interesting—a couple of people in our group today have had retreats where it was mostly bliss. And it ain't happening now. That really can lead into the feeling of "I had it right, and now I don't anymore. Now I've got it wrong."

So I think where we have to start in beginning to see where we get so astray in our response to our suffering is really to come to a deeper understanding of the First Noble Truth of the Buddha. You remember that, most of you, right? The unsatisfactory quality of life—that there's pain, that there's old age, sickness, disease and death, that we have to spend time with what we don't like, that we get separated from what we like, that things change. That's just a fact of life. Not good, not bad. It's just a fact of life.

And what's so interesting is the way we don't quite take that in, which I think is why the Buddha made it the first noble truth. We say, "Well, you know, big deal, we know that." But do we? When we get sick, somehow it can feel like a sign of failure. If I really had it together spiritually, this wouldn't be happening. When your practice goes bad, when good practice goes bad, it's always something that you're doing wrong. And if you could just figure it out, only good things would happen from now on.

Or just in our culture—how much, when something difficult happens physically, emotionally, or you lose your job or anything, it's so easy to get into a feeling of self-blame or shame or figuring out what you did wrong or needing to hide it. It's a way we're not quite getting it—that difficulty, pain, sadness, sorrow, losing people we love, getting sick, the whole show, it's an inescapable part of our journey of awakening. Nobody gets away with it only being bliss, I'm sorry to tell you. Nobody does, because we're humans in this body. At the very least, somewhere along the way, we will die. So far, that's what seems to always happen, and it's not a sign of failure.

We're so ingrained to close down around suffering or push it away or hold back from it that to think of compassion—the quivering of the heart in response to pain—as one of several avenues into the boundlessness of our true nature, into the boundlessness of freedom, it's amazing. It's beautiful. Sure, if we had the choice between compassion and sympathetic joy, maybe we'd go for sympathetic joy, but we all have all of it.

So the suffering aspect is one of the things that we all have in common as humans. And it seems so sad to me that that's something we tend to feel like we need to hide or gloss over or move away from. That only keeps us spinning in more confusion and suffering.

Our society perpetuates this a little. Franz tells me, coming from Germany, it's a slightly different culture. Not hugely different, but some difference. And one thing he notices—okay, this is him, but there's some truth to it, right, about Americans?—is our tendency to, first of all, "How are you?" "I'm fine." That's just what we say. And mostly you're not supposed to—if you're not fine, and someone you meet on the street says, "How are you?" do you launch into a whole thing about what's wrong with your back and your spleen? Probably not. "Oh yeah, I'm fine." Smile, smile, good, go on their way. That's what we're supposed to do. He says, "Yes, you're always smiling. How are you? Fine. I know you're feeling miserable. Why are you smiling and saying fine?"

Or, you know, if we're going on vacation and we're suffering, we'll say, "Well, don't tell anybody. You don't want to bring them down." We've got to hide it. And it's just another way of saying suffering is part of life, but we don't quite accept it.

The lengths we'll go to—this is true. Maybe you've heard of it. This kind of blew me away. Have you heard of Botox shots? This is a beauty treatment made from botulism toxin. I heard this on National Public Radio. They give you these shots in your face because what it does is temporarily paralyze—for a few months—certain facial muscles, the ones that let you frown. So if you're getting a lot of wrinkles from frowning, you simply can't frown for a few months, and you don't get those wrinkles. You can be happy, happy all the time.

And another twist that's being taken—this is true, I swear—is that because you can't frown, certain high-powered professionals like lawyers and bankers and stockbrokers have started getting shots before they go into important meetings, so their faces can't give them away when they're doing certain kinds of deals. It's scary but true.

So we come from a deep conditioning that suffering is wrong, and if we're suffering, it's shameful, or we're failing. Of course, we'd rather not be suffering. I'm not saying we're going to say, "Great! I'm so happy to be suffering—another chance to open into unity." Actually, there are times when, once you are suffering, you can say, "Okay, it's happening. At least I can use it to open into truth." But we don't have to have this shameful, fearful, keep-it-away attitude. That's what keeps us locked in separateness. That's what keeps us in this illusion of looking elsewhere for happiness.

And mettā, as we try to hold the suffering at bay, keep it away—mettā doesn't really let us do that. Because mettā is this outflowing, undiscriminating quality of heart. It doesn't say, "Yes, all of you except that piece." I mean, we try to say that, and that piece just gets bigger and bigger. And we see that by trying to hold the difficulty at bay, we're not holding the difficulty at bay—we're holding life at bay. We're denying ourselves the recognition of our wholeness, of our completeness. We're keeping ourselves artificially separate from life, from all sentient beings.

We think that by protecting ourselves from suffering, we're being kind to ourselves. The truth is, we only become more fearful, more hardened, more alienated. We experience ourselves as being separate from the whole. And this separation becomes like a prison for us that restricts us to our personal hopes and fears and to caring only for the people nearest to us. Curiously enough, if we primarily try to shield ourselves from discomfort, we suffer. Yet when we don't close off and we let our hearts break, we discover our kinship with all beings.

It's really true. When we don't close off, when we're not afraid of letting our hearts break, of that sorrow—whatever it is we're afraid of—in that we find again our connectedness. In little ways and in big ways. You don't have to think in terms of the Dalai Lama. In little ways.

Just a personal example. My father, in the last four years or so, has developed Parkinson's disease. When it was first coming on for a year or two, it hadn't been diagnosed. We didn't really know what it was. I'd go home to visit for a few days, and we have a pretty good relationship. He's always been very smart, very quick, very funny, very athletic. And I'd go home to visit and he was kind of moving very carefully. There's a mental aspect of Parkinson's where it just kind of dulls you out, and he'd have this kind of vacant stare. He'd go to turn on a light switch or something and just be staring vacantly for a while.

It was so painful. But what I found myself doing was getting impatient with him. I mean, we didn't have a name to call it—Parkinson's disease—didn't know what it was. But I found myself getting impatient, saying, "Come on, what are you doing? Turn on the light," or whatever. And then, of course, when I'd go be alone, I'd feel awful about it. As I just sat and explored my impatience and what was going on, I saw—and it took some time, because it's always like, "Why can't he fix it?"

What can we do to make it better? All of that dance.

And then I really saw the place in me where it was so painful to see him going through that, to feel his pain, and also my own—losing the father I had known, which is going to happen—but it was so painful. I could see that my impatience was actually my way of not feeling my own pain.

And it's so doubly painful to see that my father, who had always been kind of quick to anger, has turned into Mr. Mellow these last few years. He's much more open and affectionate. And here I was being impatient and kind of pushing him away. Miss Vipassana, right? Miss Metta, pushing my poor loving father away because I didn't want to be with the pain. That's what we do.

Seeing it, seeing it, is often enough. Let my heart break. Let myself feel it. Over and over—once doesn't do it. But not to be afraid of that sadness. And that's really all that has to happen, because once I wasn't afraid of it, then I could be there with him. I didn't have to make some big statement. I could just be there with him. It's a wordless thing. And I have to keep relearning that as the disease develops, as he gets scared. Can I be with my scaredness enough so I can be there for him when he gets scared?

It all starts with us. I can have great ideas about how compassionate I should be, but until I can be with my own pain about it, I can't really do it.

So it's a small example. We all have lots of them. But it's a hint, I think, of the vast possibilities—the strength, the unitive nature, and the real power of compassion—once we learn that we can trust enough to let our hearts break. And it just takes doing it over and over. And it's fine to start with little things. That's what happens here on retreat. They may not feel little. They're huge. Sometimes you'll think, "Well, this is really trite. What am I so upset about this for? I know in the big picture this is small." But here, the big picture has gotten a lot smaller, and the energy that comes up around things is really deep. It's really profound. So honor it as a chance to see if you can move into this, let your heart break, just in this little instance. And we learn to trust that more.

I know one of the big fears—well, it comes up for me, and I know I'm not the only one—is saying, "Okay, my suffering is more than I can be with. If I step back and just look around the world, it's too much. We're going to drown. It's overwhelming." And from that stance, it is. And we all have moments where it's more than overwhelming. But what gives me real faith is first my own personal experience, just like that little incident with my father. And then looking out in the world, past and present, at the people—famous people, I guess, mostly—who really inspire me with their courage, with their compassion. People who have been witness to such a huge amount of suffering I can't even imagine. The Dalai Lama is a good classical example.

And looking at how some of these people are in the world, there's a lightness, there's a kind of joy. That really shows it's not a sense of being so burdened and disconnected that they're dying from it. The other flip side of compassion is the ability to really be present for joy. You're so present to life. Because we can't just hold off the pain—we hold off everything if we're shutting it out. When we're present with the pain, with that quivering heart, there are so many little moments of joy, of connectedness, because the underlying quality of our being really is love and connectedness.

I'm sure you can't really see this, but... Actually, you still probably can't see it. It's a picture of the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu from South Africa. They both won the Nobel Peace Prize. There was a big conference at the University of Virginia last year where they called together all the winners of the Nobel Peace Prize from the last ten years or so who could come. They had about seven or eight of these people there, to try and inspire what they talked of as the apathetic, self-involved student body to think about something other than material things for more than a moment. Really, that's what it says. And these people really did inspire them. But anyway, what I loved about this is...

The Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu—these two men who together have been witness to and present for the suffering of all the Tibetan refugees and the people in Tibet, and all the apartheid in South Africa. As you know, Archbishop Tutu has been heading the Truth and Reconciliation Council that's been going on for the last year or two in South Africa, which just sounds heart-rending. People from both sides confessing the horrible things they've done and asking for amnesty—whether it's forgiveness they're asking for, I'm not sure.

But these two are clowning around. They get together, and in the picture, the Dalai Lama is trying to pull off Archbishop Tutu's cap, and Tutu is kind of holding it on, and the Dalai Lama is just cracking up, and the person behind them is laughing. It's this childlike joy. It's not this heaviness of "oh, the suffering of the world." When you're so present with the suffering, you're so present with the joy.

Looking at people like that is one of the things that really gives me the faith and the trust to dive in again. The next time I'm going along happily doing my loving-kindness practice or my vipassana practice, feeling really concentrated, and a big wave of—take your pick—aversion, loneliness, resistance, fear, self-hatred, judgment, sorrow, grief, sleepiness, pain in my big toe, whatever it might be, comes along. The next time it comes, after I fight with it for a while, it's like, "Oh yeah, right." Diving in is the way to freedom, to unity, to connectedness. It's not what we're used to, it's not how we're trained, but it's the way to real peace.

And what's so wonderful, what I truly believe, is that the greatness of heart of Archbishop Tutu, of the Dalai Lama, of any of the people through the years—Martin Luther King, whoever, people that inspire me—you see they're not perfect human beings. We don't have to think, "Well, you have to be somebody special to have that greatness of heart." It really starts right here, in how we're meeting the difficulties, the painful things that arise moment to moment, whatever comes up.

What's so fascinating to me about meditation practice, both metta practice and vipassana practice, is that you can really see, moment to moment, how the heart and mind relate to experience. As the days go on and our world shrinks, you can get very specific in little moments—noticing when a fear comes up, when a painful sensation comes up, when that memory arises that last time led you into sorrow. We really can begin to see how the mind and heart relate. And guess what? Our whole life is only moment to moment. So the fact that it's all sort of exaggerated here gives us really useful, fascinating information to see how we can begin to shift, how the metta shifts the way our heart and mind habitually relates to difficult experience.

Let me give you an example. When in a moment of experience something unpleasant arises—say it's a physical sensation that's unpleasant, or a sound, or a thought, a smell, a taste, anything unpleasant, an emotion—it's happening right now, correct? Your knee hurts; that's an unpleasant sensation happening right now. Even if a mental memory comes up of something really sad and painful in your life two weeks ago, or fear comes up about something that's going to happen next week, that emotion, that thought is actually arising right now.

Notice what happens when we respond from aversion or fear. The aversion is that "get this away from me"—don't want to feel it, don't want to know about it, don't want to think about it, it's bad, my practice is failing, whatever—push away. And fear is kind of like imagining it into the future. "Oh my God, if I feel like this now and there's five more days to go, it's going to be absolutely unbearable." And it's not even going to be unbearable—it is unbearable, because we take the whole five days and put them on this moment. Or if it's just a pain, and you know at the end of the sitting when you get up that pain goes away, we might try to be doing metta, but really we're saying, "Oh no, oh no, forty more minutes, this is impossible, I can't stand to be with it." That's fear, taking it into the future.

But both aversion and fear, if you see the difference between them and metta—the aversion and the fear are as if the attention shrinks back from connecting with whatever it is, a sensation, an emotion, the sensation of fear itself. It shrinks back, it shrinks away. It's as if the mind is thinking, "Somehow I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant or painful experience. I'll live a little ways away from it and hope that it goes away." And of course, that reinforces the experience of separation and disconnection, because that is the experience: disconnect. And because the attention isn't really connecting with what's happening, you can't see it clearly. We can't really respond with wise discrimination because we're not connected, so we're seeing it through a veil of aversion and fear, which tends to build on itself. We get more and more disconnected. It might manifest as stronger resistance, or as stronger aversion, or the fear goes into some other fear, and pretty soon we're in this whole huge web of all the fears of our life—and it might have started from something really little that the attention just disconnected from, flinched away from.

Look at how metta works in a moment of just friendliness. Don't think about even these vast, wonderful, unitive kinds of metta—but the friendliness, the spaciousness. It just flows as if the energy, the attention, the heart flows into whatever's arising without discrimination, without saying "yes this, no that." It just flows into, covers, includes. Compassion is the same. Although compassion would begin with the suffering aspect, it also flows out and includes everything. So there's this strong connection.

There's no flinching back, no pulling away. So every time there's a simple moment of friendly metta toward whatever is happening, that begins to shift this moment-to-moment habit of disconnecting from the difficult. And of course, when we disconnect, we feel separate. That's what the mind is doing in that moment. It's not the difficult experience itself that creates the separation, that keeps us out of peace, out of completion. It's that reaction of mind that seems to keep us separate. It makes us seem separate because we're pulling back.

The simplicity of meeting what's happening — it's the same in mindfulness, just meeting it. Metta is this flowing into. In the meeting of it, the fear can fall away. It's the holding ourselves separate that promotes the fear.

I want to read you one of my favorite stories about how simple connectedness breaks through fear. It's from Michael Crichton, a true story he tells. He was on a camping safari in Africa with his wife, tenting at night with guides. He was nervous and kept asking about lions and elephants, and the guides were kind of dismissing his concerns, saying there hadn't been any elephants or lions around — just go to sleep.

In the middle of the night, he and his wife both woke to huge crashing sounds outside. They lay there absolutely terrified, completely petrified. "It's an elephant, it's an elephant!" They were both in total panic. Finally, he said he just couldn't stand it anymore. Without thinking, he grabbed his flashlight, unzipped the tent, shone the light out — right into a huge brown eye. It was an elephant, immediately outside his little tent.

But here's what was interesting. He said, "Oh, it's an elephant." Zipped his tent up, got back in bed, and went right to sleep.

This is his musing about it, which I find fascinating. He slept well once he stopped worrying. He wrote, "I was quite impressed with the instantaneous flip in my own emotional state — from barely controlled hysteria to detached calm — once I saw the giant eye. How did that happen?"

After considering various explanations, he arrived at this insight: "We're all like that. We can all work ourselves into hysterical panic over possibilities we're afraid to look at, to really connect with. What if I have cancer? What if my job's at risk? What if my kids are on drugs? What if I'm getting bald? What if an elephant is outside my tent? What if I'm faced with some terrible thing I don't know how to deal with?"

That hysteria goes away the instant we are willing to hear the answer, even if the answer is what we feared all along. Yes, you have cancer. Yes, you're going bald. Yes, there's an elephant outside your tent. The question then becomes: what are you going to do about it? This is discriminating wisdom. Subsequent emotions may not be pleasant, but the hysteria stops.

Hysteria accompanies an unwillingness to look at what is really going on. It promotes an unwillingness to look. We feel we are afraid to look, when actually it is not looking that keeps us afraid.

And it's really like that in our metta practice.

It's not that everything becomes perfect, but with the outflowing, accepting, clear connection of metta or compassion, we can recognize: ah, this is what's happening. Again we're connected to the world, to ourselves, and there's wise discrimination. We can act appropriately without getting lost in the fear.

What's really interesting is that no matter how long we might spend lost in fear, no matter how long we might have spent conditioning ourselves to push away the difficult and unpleasant—it only takes a moment of real, open connectedness to cut through all of that.

We can have days of awfulness, and then we have this one moment of recognition: oh yes, it's really true, we're all connected. And that keeps us going for days more. Because the truth is so much stronger. One of my teachers used to say, "A spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies." And it's true. Truth is so strong. In that one moment we're whole, we're connected to life, and we know it's true. It keeps us going.

I'll give you a personal example of how this shift of attitude, this connectedness to suffering, changes everything—changes our life.

About ten or eleven years ago, I was developing some condition that no one could identify. Even after they diagnosed it, they still don't really know what it is—one of those situations where they can give it a name, and that's about it. At that time, I was developing symptoms that severely restricted my activity and were quite painful. Once the condition was diagnosed, it was one of those where nothing might happen, or you could die, or anywhere in between.

It was scary, of course. It was painful. I went through all of it—resistance, and more interesting, the levels of shame and blame, the whole sense of spiritual failure. A little bit of that New Age affirmation thinking: if I could just think the right thoughts, this would go away. And all my years of meditation, I'm still not thinking the right thoughts. So somehow, subterraneanly, I felt like a spiritual failure.

Although I could watch my mind spinning into future fear—"Oh my God, I'll never take a walk again, I'll never..."—I could see that and bring myself right back. But there was still a level of really feeling that my body had let me down. It had abandoned me, failed me. There was a sense of betrayal and real difficulty with it.

At some point, I was living here, and I came home one day to find an old Tibetan lama in his eighties who happened to be visiting for the afternoon—which happens here sometimes. One of my friends grabbed me and said, "He's got to give you a blessing!" She dragged me over. He said something, bonked me on the head with his staff, and said, "Okay, say these words," some words in Tibetan that didn't mean anything to me, "and do this healing mantra."

So I said, sure, why not? What do I have to lose?

I would sit over there—that's when I started having to sit in a chair during the three-month retreat. Luckily the yogis didn't know I was sitting there saying my Tibetan mantra and doing my healing meditation. Really, I was just surrendering to it. I wasn't trying to get better. I wasn't doing anything. I was just doing it because what did I have to lose?

And I think it was actually that attitude of just being with it that allowed something to shift. What slowly began to happen was a real attitude of compassion toward my body—almost as if I were holding my body as a separate being, like a baby, instead of identifying with it so much. Instead of being annoyed with it, instead of being afraid. I realized I had been holding myself a little bit away from my body, because if I really sank into the sensations, it would trigger this whole level of fear and betrayal. So I stayed a little bit away.

It was simply the compassion of connecting. That's all. In my mind it became clear: wow, I've been so angry at you, poor body, and you're really hurting. It really isn't helping you for me to be angry. I just began to hold it with compassion, letting go. None of this was conscious—"I should do this." But in meeting it just as it was, with kindness, just that flowing in of attention without the pulling away, a whole different level of acceptance arose.

Again I felt whole, connected to life, not separate. And the whole sense of what healing means changed. It moved from doing a healing mantra to get better—some idea of "better"—to just really letting go into the unknown. Because healing can mean anything, really.

And if I died, I died. Now, I'm not saying I still feel like that—the capacity for denial remains huge. So now that I'm feeling better, you know, that was then and this is now, and everything is hunky-dory. Watch that in your mind too.

But really, in that moment, the sense of all the shoulds fell away. There was complete connection, and through that I was reintroduced to the sense of wholeness, the sense of peace, the sense of connectedness to all of life. And so that particular time, that illness became the doorway into my kinship with all beings—not something to fear anymore.

From that place, I actually began to have better discrimination about what to do. I didn't respond or make decisions out of fear. I was telling someone today, everyone kept saying—because the cold isn't good for me now—"Oh, you should move to Arizona. You should take care of yourself. You should stop teaching. You should do this and that." And I realized that for me to have done any of that at that time would have been entirely fear-based. It wasn't necessary.

Instead, some good friends of mine were going to India for a few weeks, and I said, "Yeah, I think I'll go to India with you." They're probably the only friends who would have said, "Yeah, great!" Everyone else would have said, "Are you out of your mind, going to India?" I'd been trying to eat a really pure diet—no wheat, no dairy, no sugar. So I went to India, where you live on grease, chai, sugar, and wheat. I felt better. What can I say? So who knows? Again, we never really know. It's opening into the unknown.

But that simple meeting of whatever's happening with kindness—it's our avenue into unity. And it doesn't really matter what level the suffering is at.

Pema Chödrön writes: "Learning how to be kind to ourselves, learning how to respect ourselves, is important. The reason it's important is that fundamentally, when we look into our own hearts and begin to discover what is confused and what is brilliant, what is bitter and what is sweet, it isn't just ourselves that we're discovering—we're discovering the universe. There's an interesting transition that occurs naturally and spontaneously. We begin to find that to the degree that there is bravery in ourselves—the willingness to look, to point directly at our own hearts—and to the degree that there is kindness towards ourselves, there's confidence that we can actually forget ourselves and open to the world. The reason that we don't open our hearts and minds to other people is that they trigger confusion in us, and we don't maybe at the moment feel brave enough to deal with it. But to the degree that we look clearly and compassionately at ourselves, we begin to feel confident and fearless about looking into someone else's eyes."

And so really, all this hard practice we're doing—there's no way it can only be for yourself. And don't worry if it seems like what's going on is kind of small. I've found, and I really believe it, that the specifics of our own experience that we can open to, of our own suffering, lead us into the vastness of the suffering and the unity of the world.

I imagine many of you have had the experience of sorrow, of grief, and when you really let yourself courageously open into it, the specific sorrow seems to move beyond itself. It seems as if we're crying for the pain of the world. It seems to be much more than whatever our specific story is, our specific grief. When you touch the heart of grief, you become all mothers, all fathers, all children. All people are united in that. And there's a poignant beauty to it when we're not afraid to feel that grief, to feel that sorrow.

So we start small. We start with ourselves. And I know how much time in this metta practice it can really feel like absolutely nothing is going on. You're saying the phrases, you're not feeling metta, you feel like you're suffering and just lost and spinning in it, you throw out a phrase now and again, and you think, "This is really a joke."

I just want to tell you from my own experience—and remember the woman I mentioned last time who did it for three months and found her life really different—there are changes taking place on a level we really don't know. Sharon Salzberg likes to say, and I've led retreats with her so I've heard her say it over and over: "It really doesn't matter if you don't feel anything. It really doesn't matter. The changes are happening on another level that's often beneath our consciousness." Just that willingness to make that commitment of well-wishing—that's an intention that is strengthening the ability to move into the beauty and the suffering without holding back. It's reclaiming our wholeness, starting where we are. It's being willing and courageous and kind to ourselves, feeling whatever suffering we're going through, huge or small.

It's not about being passive. It's not about so-called deluded compassion. Compassion doesn't always mean we should feel good—I hope you're getting the drift of that by now. Deluded compassion sometimes sounds like, "Well, this is really hard. I'd better leave before it even gets difficult."

There are times when absolutely the pain we're going through—the fear, the grief, the sadness, the terror—is way too strong. We can't bring metta to it. We can't bring mindfulness to it. It's overwhelming us. Absolutely, at those times, the compassionate and wise action is to back off. There's no question. When you're working with a difficult person and you get lost in anger, we say, please go to where it's easy. That's wisdom. That's compassion.

But when beginning to move into practice with a difficult person, if you think, "Oh, there's that thing I don't like. It might get really unpleasant. I better not try"—that's different. That's acting out of fear before anything happens. That's deluded compassion.

And I think what happens even more commonly is confusing compassion with codependence. This is such a small example, but it popped into my mind today for obvious reasons. Some of us are really allergic to black fly bites. Yesterday, this little incident happened to me twice. I was outside talking to two different friends, and as we talked, the swarms started to gather. First you think they're not there, then they start swarming. When I get bitten by black flies, it doesn't bother me at first, but for days afterward I swell up and itch and get kind of feverish.

I noticed in both cases that the other person wasn't so bothered—some people aren't—and there was this tendency to think, "Oh well, it's an important conversation, and I need to stay here with them and talk. That's the compassionate, friendly thing to do." And I realized that's not compassion at all. It was just codependence—not wanting to say, "You know what, I can't stand here anymore. Let's go inside." In one case, inside was literally five feet away. He was saying, "Oh no, stay here, it's so nice, we can have our tea out here on the porch." And I thought, "Oh yeah, he really needs me to be here." That's not compassion. That's codependence.

Compassion takes in the whole situation and says, "You know what, let's go inside." And if the person doesn't want to, fine—that's their choice too. Getting all bitten up to no purpose is not the same as compassion. There might be another time when that same situation would genuinely require staying. So compassion connects us and allows for wise choices—actually fearless choices. Codependence is largely based on fear. Compassion can be quite fearless.

I know this is such a small example, but I thought you could relate. I certainly did.

What compassion leads us to is the fearlessness that comes from knowing we're living in truth. We're living in our connectedness. We don't need to be afraid of fear itself. We don't need to be afraid of sorrow. Sure, we'll still tend to hold back. But as a friend of mine describes it, her grown sons are always trying to tell her how to be safe from waves when they go to Hawaii or somewhere with big surf. When a huge wave is coming, you have to turn around and dive into it. She says, "I know it's true, but I just can't do it. Every time, I turn around and run, and the wave clobbers me."

With the fearlessness of compassion, we really learn that we can trust diving in. You come to that smooth place of peace where the wave merges into the ocean and there's no separation anymore—and we're also part of that ocean. It's a whole different way to meet the difficulties.

I don't know if this sounds a little too nice to you, but it happens to be true. So play with it. Experiment with it.

Really learn to see that even the resistance, even your loneliness, even that backache—it doesn't matter what—when met with metta, which turns to compassion in the face of suffering, is again our avenue into the boundlessness of a heart that's free and connected.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

May our sincere practice be for the benefit and happiness of all beings.

CHAPTER 316

The Facts of Life

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines how the Buddha's teachings on the facts of life offer a path to genuine freedom—not by escaping difficult experiences, but by transforming our relationship to them. Drawing from the Buddha's own life after awakening, she illustrates that even the supremely enlightened one faced physical ailments, conflict, loss, and death, demonstrating that inner peace has nothing to do with having a perfect life.
>
> Wilson explores the First Noble Truth (dukkha) not as a philosophical concept but as a personal invitation to examine how we actually meet unpleasant experiences. She reveals our deep denial mechanisms and how mindfulness both increases our awareness of suffering and opens us to greater joy in ordinary moments. The Second Noble Truth becomes central to her teaching as she describes how our habitual reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings—craving, aversion, and delusion—create the very suffering we seek to escape. Using the Buddha's vivid simile of six animals tied together, each pulling toward its preferred habitat, she illustrates how our untrained senses constantly drag us away from presence.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for meditation practice, emphasizing that freedom comes through non-clinging rather than through achieving particular states. Wilson encourages practitioners to meet each moment with childlike wonder and curiosity, using the touching example of cellist Yo-Yo Ma's genuine openness when encountering unfamiliar music. This teaching reminds us that liberation is available right here, in this very moment of mindful attention.

It came up in some of the discussions today, and I think it's by no means an unusual discovery—being a little bemused upon realizing that we come to retreat, especially if it's your first retreat, thinking we're going to get away from the hustle and bustle and pain of our lives. And as you've discovered, guess what comes with us? That's not a mistake.

What I want to talk about tonight is really the way the Buddha described the facts of life and the potential for our freedom. I think a lot of our confusion and struggle comes from our ideas—perhaps unformed even in our own minds—of what we're actually expecting freedom or happiness, inner contentment, peace, whatever word you use, to feel like, to look like, to be like. Because if you're looking for a different reality from this one, a nice, happy, safe, secure place, you're not going to find it.

When we look at the Buddha's life after he was awakened—the supremely awakened one, free from anguish, free from confusion and suffering—he spent forty-five years teaching. But if you look at his life, stuff happened. He wasn't just drifting on a cloud for forty-five years. He was walking barefoot all around northern India, begging for food.

In terms of things that happened, he had physical problems. He had headaches. He had backaches. There are suttas where he says, "Ananda, you give the talk. I have to go lie down and rest my back." He didn't give him a day's warning either.

There were wars going on between clansmen—his own clansmen from his father's and his mother's clans—and they would be killing each other over water rights. How would you like it if all your in-laws were killing each other and you had to go and try to stop it? Everything wasn't groovy.

There was quarreling within the Sangha. There are many suttas, and a lot of the monks' and nuns' rules come about from times when one of the monastics would see another one doing something and run to the Buddha and tell on them, basically. "So-and-so is doing thus and so. It doesn't seem good." Often it was appropriate, but there's definitely this little element of envy and all of that.

His two main disciples, Mahamoggalana and Mahasariputta—next to him, I guess, the most awakened, the wisest—Mahamoggalana, in his old age, was murdered. And both Sariputta and Moggallana died before the Buddha did. There's a lovely sutta where he's saying it was as if the sun and the moon had fallen out of the sky when they died. So he noticed that they were gone.

And his cousin Devadatta, who was very jealous of him, continually tried to sow seeds of discord in the Sangha and divide it, and actually tried to kill the Buddha. The Buddha's life was attempted to be taken. So it's not as if everything pleasant was in his life. And in the end, he died. They all died. Everybody died. That's what happens.

Looking to the Buddha's life—the supremely awakened, peaceful one, which he was—we have to see that inner contentment, true liberation of heart, must be about something else than having the perfect life, than having everything be the way we want it to be.

So what could that be?

The way the Buddha introduces what it could be is by having us let our hearts and minds, our vision, open to be able to live face to face with things as they are, rather than as we might wish them to be or think they ought to be if we did things right.

When he lays out his Four Noble Truths, the basic facts of life, the first one, as most of you are very familiar with, is that there is unsatisfactoriness in this world, in our bodies, in our minds. There's birth, which is suffering if you think about it. There's decay. Old age, sickness, death. There's separation from those we love and from things we like. There's having to be brought together with those we don't love and things we don't like. This is what happens.

It's not the only thing that happens. Luckily, there's beauty and joy and love and happiness within this realm of form.

But there is not a way of not having unpleasant experience arise. And if you stop and think about it—which obviously I have, a lot—you need to consider: okay, we all nod, sure, there's birth and death, we get sick, we have to be with things we don't like. But is that the way we really meet these experiences when they arise?

You don't have to think far. Just cast your mind back over today. That's as far as most of us need to go. If you're one of those for whom today was a good day, you can look at yesterday. We really don't have to go far to see that we're going to come face to face with difficult, painful, unliked experiences. And how did we relate to them?

I think the Buddha's not saying this in order to bring us down, not in order to say life is miserable, suffer. It's really to wake us up to see: how do we relate to this? The fact that things are unreliable, that they're in constant change, that there is difficulty—we think we accept it, but do we?

The denial is so amazing. Just the denial of the fact of pain, of suffering, that things happen that we don't like. How much of the unpleasantness that has come up in your body or mind or in the surroundings today has your mind greeted as a mistake, or your fault because you're not mindful enough? If you were more mindful, this unpleasant thing wouldn't be happening. Well, I've got news for you. As we get more mindful, we actually begin to notice not only more joy, but also more of the unpleasant things that we've been in total denial about. Our denial mechanism is huge. Witness Michelle's story with her ice cake the other night. It's amazing.

I'll tell you another one. I really like this story because it's just so flat-out denial. Quite some years ago, maybe twelve years ago, I was in the hospital for some days and I was on an IV. I had some big infection. And you know how after a few days, the veins sort of collapse and it gets harder and harder to keep putting in the IV. So this one time, the nurse was trying repeatedly and failing, and she's sweating. It hurts. It's not a pleasant experience—you wouldn't call it that. And I could tell she started, in a little way, to panic. It's hard to know you're hurting someone, especially when your intention—her intention—is to help.

She finally kind of gave up and ran out in the hall and grabbed the nearest doctor who was passing by. And I wasn't completely cogent, but I was cogent enough to know that now I was really in trouble. Because who practices and puts in the IVs, huh? Have you ever had the doctor, the surgeon, come in and put in your IV? Not too often. So I was like, okay, right, just be cool, be calm.

And the doctor had the same problem. I wasn't my most equanimous. I didn't say anything, but just little tears trickled down. And he looked at me with such an expression and goes, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

It's just so amazing. And I could understand how hard it is to let in—if you really let in that it was hurting me—the pain of knowing that with really kind intentions, you're hurting somebody. That's so hard. It's hard for us to be connected and open-hearted in the face of painful experience, physical or emotional. It is hard for us. And so a lot of the time, we don't even know that we're blocking it out.

And that's just flat-out obvious pain. I mean, that's the most obvious, and we can deny it. So not to get down on ourselves about it, but I really think that this first truth of the Buddha's that he enunciated—certainly how it works for me—is as an invitation into my own experience. Not a philosophical point of debate. I mean, we can debate that, but for me, the point is that it brings our awareness in to look and see.

And when I first heard this years and years ago, when I first began to sort of understand—oh, like stuff happens, it's not my fault—

When I was first introduced to the Dharma, I was about nineteen, and up until that time I had lived what you might call the 1950s storybook picture of America—the middle-class, suburban, happy life. My family stayed together. My parents weren't abusive. You just didn't talk about certain things: our friend's mother who committed suicide down the road, or the divorce up the street, or my friend whose father had left when she was a kid and she never met him, or the fact that my mother never even met her own father. You didn't talk about it. Everything was happy, happy.

I actually couldn't point to anything that was really bad in my own life. And I had imbibed the idea that you grow up, do whatever you do, get a career, and then you have this happily-ever-after life—like the Donna Reed show on television, or the way all the movies end, going off into this happy cloud where nothing bad ever happens again.

I don't know if this will resonate—I'm really showing my age here—but when I was young, there was this sense that everything's good, nothing's bad. We don't talk about unhappiness. And my mother took me to see this Walt Disney movie called Old Yeller. I don't know if you remember it. It traumatized me for years.

It's this loving family with their golden lab, this wonderful, perfect dog. Everybody loves everybody. And in the end, the dog saves the little boy from getting attacked by a rabid squirrel. Then the father has to shoot the dog because he has rabies. Walt Disney traumatized me! Because I thought everything ends happy all the time if people are nice. And it just didn't fit with my worldview.

So when I heard about the First Noble Truth—oh yes, this is part of the facts of life: there's unhappiness, there's death, things you love go away, sometimes you have to be with things you don't like, and everything is changing all the time—I felt this huge sense of relief. Oh, I'm not crazy. It's okay that I'm not happy every minute, and I don't have to keep pretending. For me, being an aversive-type personality, this was an enormous relief.

So that really, I think, is the beginning of freedom—just to see, to come face to face with the truth that things aren't always the way we want them. Then it becomes a question of how do we relate, rather than what's wrong with me? What's wrong with things? Am I crazy? We begin to stop our lifelong habit of running and hiding from pain, or from the unpleasant, or hating ourselves when something happens that we think we should have been able to avoid.

On one retreat, a man was telling me in an interview how he'd been seeing aversion in his mind all day—aversion to experiences he was having, to feelings in his body, to thoughts. Just aversion to so many things. And he was labeling everything he was aversive to as "bad." This is bad, this is good. Suddenly he stopped and said, "Wow. So much of my experience has been bad today. So what I'm saying is that much of my life is bad." And then he said, "No, that just isn't true. It's just part of how it is. Sometimes unpleasant, sometimes pleasant." That realization took a huge burden of judgment and negativity off the way he was relating to his life. It's just part of life.

Someone told me—this is apocryphal, I don't know if it's true, but she said it was—that Robin Williams, the comedian, has already had his tombstone engraved, and on it it says, "I knew this was going to happen." He's a step ahead of us. When we know it, we can stop being afraid. We can start to actually live each moment as it presents itself, instead of holding on, planning for the next moment.

So there's this dimension of being together with what we don't like, and there's also the quality of unreliability, the changing nature, the fact of impermanence—which is also included in this First Noble Truth. Again, we all know everything changes. But if we really knew that, how would we live? I think we would live very differently.

On a retreat we were doing together, focused on this subject of impermanence for a week, someone said on reflection—when I asked her, "How would you live if you really understood and accepted impermanence?"—she said, "You know, I would stop being afraid." Because when we know it's going to change, while we don't fear it, we can relax into here and now. Sure, there's a poignancy to change. That's okay. But we don't have to grip so blindly.

I think one of the reasons for the denial of change on a deep level is this very poignancy, this sadness—which maybe doesn't feel quite okay to feel. But it's fine. Let the poignancy in.

This is my favorite part of a poem I love, because it touches for me that place of love and knowing things change, and the poignancy of clinging. It's by Galway Kinnell. I'm just going to read part of it. The poem is called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight."

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up, and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us. I think you think
I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down."
I've stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old, don't die."
Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

We are forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. It's poignant. It doesn't have to be awful.

When we can relax into that moment just as it is, without needing to cling or change or look back at the last moment—there's a kind of peace there. But I think, at least I certainly notice in myself, one response to this constant change, this unreliability, these shifting sands, is to look quietly but frantically, moment after moment, for some steady, unchanging place to abide. Whether it's a physical experience, an emotional experience—how much do we try to manage and control our lives so we get everything just so? Ah, finally!

In a small way, it's like when you finally get the house all clean. How long does it last? This used to drive me crazy. It lasts two seconds, and then it starts getting dirty again. That's a small example, but I think we're doing that all the time—always looking for some place to abide, to rest and say, "Here." And it's that very looking for an abiding place that keeps us suffering, off balance, and fearful.

The Buddha said once, "He abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." It might not be what we had in mind, because our minds only know what they already know. You know Krishnamurti's famous book, Freedom from the Known. We can only imagine what we already know in some way. So to rest in peace—"he abides in peace who does not abide anywhere"—it really is the peace of letting go of that frantic searching.

But we won't, and we can't, let go. We can't even have a concept of it until our heart begins to understand through experience how much the searching itself is creating the suffering, the anguish, that feeling of being off balance. Because it's not the fact that things change. It's our resistance to that fact that's actually so poignant and scary and awkward.

Nyoshul Khenpo, a wonderful Tibetan teacher, said once, "Remember, whether or not you go with the flow, the flow always goes with you." We can't actually step outside of that. But we can start to just look and see, "Oh yes, that's what's happening." We can feel the poignancy. We don't have to fear it. As someone said, "Let's face it, I don't fear it when unpleasant experience is going away. It's only the pleasant ones that I'm holding on to." There's something important to notice about that.

So you might be thinking, who wants to look this closely? Maybe denial is ignorance, but it was working okay in a lot of situations. And often, on our journey, on our spiritual path, we hit moments where we say, "Oh God, I wish I could go back to not seeing quite so clearly." Because I meant it—even though you laughed and I sort of said it in a joking way—as mindfulness strengthens, as our ability to be present for whatever is strengthens, we will be so much more at ease and happy, but we will also be much more aware of the unpleasant and the changing nature. That actually brings us to freedom, believe it or not.

Knowing things the way they are is what releases our heart and mind from this fruitless clinging, this fruitless searching for steady state in a world that is totally unsteady state. But the way out is in, and we go in kicking and screaming most of the time.

So looking at this first truth, it's a wake-up call—really a wake-up call—not just something to be demoralized about. As Ajahn Chah said, "There's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering." The difference is in the way we relate to the difficult, the painful, the poignant experience.

And that's the second truth, the second fact that the Buddha describes. What is it that's the cause of the suffering? The anguish? Not the fact that there's unpleasant experience, but how our hearts and minds relate to experience—this is the place of bondage or freedom. It's the place where understanding can really begin to flower.

So how is the Buddha different from us?

He went through experiences after his awakening, and if you believe that he was a human being, then his awakening holds the same potential for us to awaken. He wasn't some kind of divine being with different factors making up his mind and body.

So in his awakening, in going through these difficult experiences, what would be a way of describing how he was different from us? Or different from me—I don't want to project onto all of you.

One simple way I want to talk about it is in how he related his understanding: that it's the clinging, the aversions, the longing for things to be different, the denial—all these reactions to the bare facts of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience—and then our total entrancement with those reactions. Look at it: we're completely entranced with how much we don't like something, or how much we like something, how involved we get. We go from an unpleasant sound to the history of our life in two seconds. Completely involved. So entranced that we don't even know it's happening—which I'll go into in detail.

So it's our reactions, our identification with them, and the total entrancement that sends us off and running with them—this is what hides the way things are from us and obscures the potential for really living in contentment, in peace, with things as they are. It obscures the potential for rediscovering, resting in, and trusting the radiant mind, our basic goodness, as Chögyam Trungpa calls it.

This is not a state that you can get and hold on to and rest in. There is no steady state of heart and mind. Rather, it's an attitude that can arise no matter what state is coming in our body or in our mind.

The peace, the freedom, the happiness of the Buddha has nothing to do with what's arising in your experience right now. Freedom has nothing to do with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. It really doesn't matter. And it's the hardest thing for us to really believe. When you come in and you've had one of these crummy sittings, and all this stuff is coming up, and yesterday it was so clear—we say, "Oh yeah, fine. Yesterday was clear. Now it's really painful. Those are both good. Just pay attention." And you think, "Yeah, right." We don't really believe that very well. But the fact is, it's true. Freedom has nothing to do with the particular experience that's happening. It's everything to do with the relationship to it.

Someone came in and said—I think it was this retreat—she was really getting at the understanding that pleasure, the experiencing of pleasant feeling, is not the same as happiness. Pleasure is pleasure. Sure, it's nice. If we had a choice, we'd probably take pleasure over displeasure. We can tell the difference. The Buddha could tell the difference too, I think. We're not heading toward some dull neutrality. But we're also not getting into all those reactions.

And that allows us to turn away from our entrancement with our reactions and ourselves and our stories—everything—and actually come to live in this moment with total intimacy, wakefulness, a loving, awake presence that can allow us again and again to glimpse, with more or less depth, the true radiant nature of our mind, our heart. Big mind-heart, not this little heart. The radiant nature of what we truly are.

In the process of this shift from our habitual reactive mind to opening into whatever is happening this moment with totality of presence and intimacy—yes, we are more aware of the unpleasant and more aware of the beautiful, the joyful. As someone was saying today, it was really beautiful: in the midst of a very difficult day, one little experience that we normally would completely overlook—in the middle of all the difficulty she said, "You know, this doesn't seem like much of an experience," but it was giving her so much joy.

Like the flowers. Franz and I planted a couple of peony bushes last year, little new ones. Two days ago, Monday, one of them bloomed for the first time. Now, for some reason, that day hadn't been a particularly joyful day. It was really hot, I forget what was going on. But I wasn't dancing in joy through the day. And just seeing that flower open over the course of a couple of hours brought so much happiness and joy.

When we're more present, it doesn't take winning the lottery to feel joy. We can be really present for suffering and then something just lovely happens and we're really present for that. There's this immediacy, this vitality of presence—all of life becomes so much richer in the little things. In the little things.

When we're not afraid of impermanence, we're really here.

This is called "Living" by Denise Levertov:

The fire in leaf and grass, so green it seems each summer the last summer. The wind blowing, the leaves shivering in the sun, each day the last day. A red salamander, so cold and so easy to catch, dreamily moves his delicate feet and long tail. I hold my hand open for him to go, each minute the last minute.

You get a feeling of the presence in that poem. She's not saying, "Oh my God, each minute the last minute!" with panic. It's more like: if this is the last minute, let me really be here for it.

I have a story about a friend of mine, a man who's been coming to retreats on the West Coast for some years. He told us this a couple of years ago. He must be in his mid to late sixties, very hardworking. He said he'd had open heart surgery—he had to have a valve replaced. And he's one of these people, which I'm sure many of you can relate to, who felt that his practice was never going anywhere. No incredible bliss experiences, no wonderful jhanic concentrations, just kind of slogging through the days and the nights, year after year of meditation, trying to be mindful and getting nowhere. You can relate.

So he woke up in intensive care after the operation, which apparently had gone fine. His family was there telling him everything was okay. And then something went wrong. He said he was hooked up to machines from every orifice, and all of a sudden they all started blinking, sirens going off—which must be quite scary—nurses running. He didn't know what was wrong, but something serious was happening.

He said he noticed his mind start to go into total panic. "Oh my God, I'm going to die. This is really it"—which it very well could have been. And he saw his mind going into panic, his breathing got tight, and he said he doesn't know where it came from, but the thought arose: "Well, if this is going to be my last breath, I might as well be present for it." And he just came totally into that breath. The panic went away. He said he must have gone unconscious after that, and then he woke up and things were fine.

But you never know. We can't evaluate what's going on in our practice, but that's the quality of real presence. And each moment as the last moment isn't a scary thing—it's an invitation into being alive in this moment, because this moment is really all we have. We can plan a lot about all the next moments, but who knows what's going to happen? We really don't know what's going to arise in this next instant. Like that other night when the low water alarm went off in the middle of the sitting—no one knew that a moment before. We never know.

This moving out of our reactivity into open-hearted presence does not hide life situations. It allows us to live them more fully.

How do we get so sidetracked? Why is it that we get so caught in this clinging, which is so poignant? One way—we've touched on it, and Stephen and Susan spoke about it—is a habitual pattern so deep we mostly don't notice it: the habit of how our heart-mind relates when confronted with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience.

The way the Buddha described our experience is that there are six senses: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and mind. So we can have any of those six sense experiences—thoughts and emotions, any of the five physical senses. And that's really all that's happening. Keep looking in your experience. As Jack Kornfield likes to say, just these six things are happening over and over. And if one of you experiences something else, please let us know.

First of all, just by beginning to reduce it to that, it takes a lot of the hoo-ha out, doesn't it? Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, thinking, emotion, thinking, emotion, seeing, hearing, smelling, touching. Oh, what's the big deal?

And then each of those arising one after the other, really quickly, we experience—like a sound, for example—as being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Same with touch, emotions, thoughts.

And we don't all experience things the same way, given our past conditioning and our karma. So say the sound of a crow—someone could hear it and it's pleasant for them, while it's unpleasant for me, or neutral to somebody else. And that could even be different for the same person at different times.

Now this is a relatively subtle thing, this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, and it's very fast. The habit of our mind—and in the dependent origination, the place where we can explore how suffering arises, how confusion arises—is that there's the sense contact, so there's the hearing, it's pleasant, and without awareness, immediately there's that movement: "Oh yeah, I like that, that's good," or "I want more," or "Let's keep it going." If it's unpleasant: "Oh, bad. Get away. Not good. How can we fix this?"

If it's neutral—well, have you noticed many neutral experiences? That's what happens. Neutral? Huh? I'm bored. Nothing's happening. Let's think about a really unpleasant fantasy because that's better than being neutral. God forbid. It's actually quite interesting to see how often our mind does that. I'll suffer rather than be calm and neutral.

So it happens so quickly that often we don't even know there's a difference between unpleasant and aversion. But those are two different experiences—between pleasant and clinging, between neutral and spacing out. The second is a reaction to just the bare fact of an unpleasant experience or a pleasant experience. But it's so deeply habitual in most of our minds, without mindfulness, that we not only often don't recognize it, but we can easily evaluate our whole experience, the whole tenor of our life, on the basis of how pleasant or unpleasant or neutral it is. And this is where we really get off into being entranced.

So for example, when you're evaluating your meditation so much, the good ones are the pleasant ones, the bad ones are the unpleasant ones. And when you're having pleasant ones, not too many people come in and say, "I'm useless, I'm worthless, I can't do this." But when it's unpleasant, it jumps from unpleasant to "I'm the worst yogi, I can't do this, I'm filled with doubt, this is stupid"—and self-hatred, and all this really painful stuff, just in a moment from an unpleasant experience. Neutral, we don't even notice.

We get so entranced, and we can actually act on and base our whole life on wanting pleasant and going away from unpleasant, without seeing what we're doing. Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful Thai teacher, talks a lot about pleasant feelings. He says it's so fast, it just comes and goes so quick. And he says almost everything you do in your life, the choices you make—if you really look at it, the choices you make without awareness—we do for the sake of pleasant sensation. And how long does it really last? It's a little scary when we look at how long it really lasts.

There's a story I love from the Buddha, really about Ananda, his attendant. Ananda is a really very personable character. He's the one who's very compassionate, he's the one who's always saying things, and the Buddha's kind of going, "Not so, Ananda. It's really like this." You can really empathize with him. And he was very kind.

So in this story, he was off on a mission for the Buddha, and he passed a village well, and he was very thirsty. At the well was Pakati, a young outcast woman, and he asked her for water to drink—one of the few things a monk was allowed to ask for was water. You must remember that in India at that time, the caste system was really strong. An outcast couldn't even touch something and hand it to someone of higher caste. It was that strong.

So Pakati said, "Oh monk, I am too humbly born to give you water to drink. Do not ask any service of me lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of low caste." She had so thoroughly bought into this system. And Ananda replied, "I ask not for your caste, but for water." And the woman's heart leapt joyfully and she gave Ananda water. He thanked her and went away, but she followed him at a distance.

She found out he was the Buddha's attendant, and she went to the Buddha and said, "Oh Lord, help me. Let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells so that I may see him and minister unto him for my life, because I love Ananda." And the Buddha—he could understand her emotions and her heart—said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you don't understand your own emotions. It's not Ananda that you love, but his kindness."

Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice toward you and practice it towards others.

Sweet, isn't it? But mistaking that pleasant feeling she associated with Ananda, she was ready to follow him and take care of him for her whole life for the sake of that pleasant feeling, without being able to understand exactly what was going on. We do that from time to time, and in ways sometimes far more confusing and destructive than that.

Or with unpleasant. Again, sometimes in the whole field of experience the mind can get so fixated on the unpleasant, and so lost in aversion to it, that we build up a whole world based on reactivity rather than clear seeing.

Have you ever had a time when part of your tooth breaks off inside? It happened to me last year while I was traveling, and I had to go for a few weeks with it just broken. You notice how the tongue cannot stay away from that place. You're sitting perfectly happy, and the tongue just has to go over there, feel how rough it is, feel how unpleasant it is, get upset. What am I going to do? My teeth are falling apart. I'm getting old. A million times a day.

Now, all the rest of my teeth didn't hurt. That's neutral. Did I notice that? No. We have one thing that's wrong and a million things that are neutral, and we don't notice those at all when we get completely fixated on the negativity. Frustration, self-doubt, judgment. And neutral? We just don't notice.

So often, actually, the entrée into calm—a kind of radiant, connected peace—begins by seeming neutral. And we so much don't know what to do with that, we bounce away, fall asleep, or create a diversion.

This is from the Buddha, really describing what we do with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Someone asks him what's the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened person—an untaught worldling, as he says. And he's very straightforward. He says, okay, here's the difference: An unawakened person, when touched by a painful feeling, worries and grieves, laments, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught. He thus experiences two kinds of unpleasant feelings—a physical unpleasant feeling and a mental unpleasant feeling. It's as if, being shot with an arrow, he shoots himself with a second arrow.

Sound familiar? That's what an untaught, unawakened person does. You experience pain from two arrows whenever you have an unpleasant feeling.

Now, it actually goes deeper than that, into how it becomes habitual. He says that when touched by painful feeling, we develop an underlying tendency to resist that—push it away, don't feel it, resist. A lot of people have talked about seeming to come up against a wall of resistance, subtle or not so subtle, in the practice. And you're right. We've cultivated an underlying tendency to resistance to the unpleasant for most of our life. And we've got to begin to see it. That's why it's coming up. It's great that it's coming up.

So what do we do? Unpleasant? No, this is bad. We shoot ourselves with another arrow again. And the Buddha goes on to say that unawakened people do not know of any other escape from painful feelings than to go after a pleasant sense experience. Isn't that right? And so they also inculcate the underlying tendency to crave the pleasant.

So we've cultivated these two habits—this ongoing resistance to unpleasant, and as soon as there's something unpleasant, leaping after something pleasant, lusting, wanting the pleasant, because that's the only way we know to bring us happiness. The only trouble is it doesn't work for more than the lasting time of the pleasant feeling.

The difference with an awakened person? When an awakened person experiences an unpleasant feeling, that's it. They don't create anything around it, to paraphrase Ajahn Sumedho. They don't get into resistance, and they don't go lusting after something pleasant to hide from it. Same with pleasant. Experience a pleasant feeling, that's it. Experience a pleasant feeling. The mind is calm, creating nothing around it. It's not that you don't know the difference. We just don't get into these reactions, being so entranced by them, with this ongoing tendency to move away from the present moment.

And that's what's so poignant. Our underlying tendency of resisting the unpleasant and moving towards the pleasant, totally ignoring the neutral—we're doing it without knowing we're doing it. But it's all in the service of our own real happiness and peace. None of us would do that if we really, really knew it was keeping us confused and suffering. But we don't. And I'm saying it, but I find myself doing this in subtle ways all the time. It's so ingrained when we're not paying attention to go after what's pleasant.

And the poignancy of it is that it's just this clinging and craving. It's just this pushing away, this checking out that hides from us our true potential. It's just this looking in the other direction that keeps us obscured from recognizing that freedom is right here. In fact, it's so right here that we're not usually right here enough to recognize it. We're always just a little bit leaning away.

The Buddha said, "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata"—meaning himself—"namely, liberation through non-clinging."

Now see, that doesn't sound so exciting, does it? Liberation through non-clinging. I want bells and whistles. I want some fireworks going off. Liberation through non-clinging? But that's the way into recognizing our potential for awakening. Non-clinging allows totality, intimacy of total presence.

Otherwise, the way we live our life is as this description from the Buddha of someone who does not have mindfulness established—because mindfulness is our way in to see what's really happening. In a moment of mindfulness, pure non-judging presence, there's no clinging, there's no aversion, there's no delusion, because it's connected. Just a quick moment. Sayadaw U Pandita used to call it "a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom." Not total absolute liberation where confusion never arises, but it's a moment of clarity. And that moment is what allows any experience to become a gateway into really recognizing our true potential.

Without that, a person without mindfulness established lives their life in this simile the Buddha offers. As if a person catches six creatures from different parts of life. Get it? Six. The six senses. Everything always matches. Eye, ear, nose, touch, taste, and mind. So as if you took a snake, a crocodile, a bird, a dog, a hyena, and a monkey. And you tied a rope around each of them, and then you tied a knot of all those ropes together. So these six animals are all tied together with a rope in the middle. And then what do they do? They all start struggling to go to where they want to go. The crocodile wants to go to the water. The bird tries to fly up. The dog tries to go to the village. The snake tries to go into the garden. And they're just all pulling any which way. And the strongest one pulls all the rest along after. So probably the crocodile takes them all down to the water.

You get the simile? He spells it out, don't worry about it. He says that is just like a person whose mindfulness is undeveloped and unpracticed. Each of those animals is like one of the six senses—the eye, the ear, the nose, the mind, the body, the taste—and they're all struggling to go after pleasant experience and all struggling to run away from unpleasant experience. And whichever one's the strongest wins. Moment after moment after moment. So eyes are often really strong. That's why when you're out doing walking meditation and that chipmunk runs across the path, seeing pleasant, boom—everything else is gone. It's like the crocodile running to the water.

Okay, so that's kind of an exhausting way to live, I would say.

But for one who has cultivated mindfulness and presence, when seeing a form with the eye, that mind is not attached to pleasing forms and is not repelled by unpleasing forms.

And the same with all the other senses. It knows pleasant from unpleasant, but it's just not attached to the pleasant, not repelled by the unpleasant. And so she is one who has established mindfulness of the body and dwells with an unlimited mind and heart. Unlimited mind and heart.

So mindfulness is really our tool. It's like a rattle, one of my teachers says. We're like two-year-olds just going after "I want this, I want that, take me over here, I want to do this." And he says, "I just shake the rattle and say, turn around, look back here. It's right here. Come home."

And that's all we're doing with our mindfulness. What's happening? Knee pain? Fine. Come home. What's happening? Sadness? Great. Come home. What's happening? Bliss? Fine. Come home.

Mindfulness doesn't say this is good, this is bad. It doesn't think this is more important to pay attention to than that. It doesn't say, "I've seen this before, therefore I don't need to pay attention to it again—I'd rather pay attention to that." Just noticing what's arising with a quality, as we talked about, of non-judging, total, kind attention. Coming back to the bare experience, not the reaction and the story and the hoo-ha we create around it. Not all the story about why that sound is so unpleasant, but coming back to the sound itself.

Ajahn Chah says the sound doesn't disturb us—it's we who go out and disturb the sound. Just stay with the pure hearing. And bringing to it this quality of no preconceptions, a kind of wonder, such curiosity, such willingness to discover something new instead of thinking we already know. Not "I already know what the breath is like, but I'll go to it," or "I've experienced these cramps before, I know all about them, but alright, cramping, cramping." Not that. This newness, open to discovery each moment.

I'll leave you with an image that really helps me get the feeling of this quality of open-hearted attention. In Germany, I saw a documentary about Yo-Yo Ma, the famous world cellist. He has such a lovely attitude of openness. In this documentary, he was flying to Africa with his really fancy cello—I don't know how much it would cost—going to visit a tribe of Bushmen, to share music with them.

So here he is with these Bush people, and they bring out the old man who's kind of like the village shaman musician. He brings out his instrument, and Yo-Yo Ma brings out his incredible cello, and they start trading music. Now, this man's instrument was literally a round oil can with a stick coming out of it and one string or line of some kind. And he's playing along, and Yo-Yo Ma is saying, "Wow, this is so incredible. It's so beautiful, the sounds he gets, the music he gets out of this." And he was totally sincere.

Then he says, "Let's trade instruments." So he gives this old musician his million-dollar cello or whatever it is, and he, Yo-Yo Ma, tries to play on the old man's instrument. He's going, "I can't play this nearly as beautifully as he can."

And he had such a childlike, open-hearted sense of discovery and wonder and appreciation and newness. Meanwhile, we watching were sitting there thinking, "Oh yeah, an oil can with a string coming out of it." And he's saying, "Wow, what an instrument! What sounds he can get out of it! What beautiful music!"

It's really a different way to live with the same facts, with the same circumstances. It's just a difference in how we relate to them.

So that's really what we're practicing here. And it's okay that we blow it a lot of times, because every moment we have another opportunity to meet what's happening with the simplicity of open-hearted attention and wonder.

CHAPTER 317

Nature of Insight

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this talk, Carol Wilson examines the nature of insight (vipassanā) and the conditions that support its arising. She distinguishes true insight from conceptual understanding, describing it as a spontaneous, wordless shift in perception that cannot be controlled or held onto, yet fundamentally changes how we relate to experience. Using the metaphor of 'magic eye' images where hidden pictures suddenly emerge, she illustrates how insight reveals what has always been present but remained unseen.
>
> Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Wilson discusses how mindfulness of body, feelings, mind states, and mental contents—practiced with open awareness free from judgment—creates the conditions for insight to arise. She emphasizes that dharmic insight specifically addresses dukkha and its cessation, showing how a practitioner's moment of recognizing restlessness as 'just physical unpleasant sensation' exemplifies the ending of suffering through non-clinging.
> Wilson explores how the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa)—impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and non-self (anattā)—reveal themselves through sustained, continuous mindfulness rather than through conceptual grasping. She quotes Nisargadatta Maharaj on abandoning familiar ideas to discover pure truth, and closes with Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche's teaching that Buddha nature is present in everyone, with recognition being the only difference between awakening and delusion. The talk offers practical guidance for bringing fresh, wonder-filled presence to each moment of practice.

For those who don't know me, my name is Carol Wilson. I'm the fifth of these five second string teachers, the second half. Tonight I want to talk about the process of insight and supports for that process to arise.

So this insight, this Vipassana, is usually translated as insight meditation. What is insight, actually, anyway? We come looking for insight, obviously, or we wouldn't put ourselves through this. We eagerly, impatiently await its arising. What is it? It's easy to have some idea or to think of insight as a certain state of mind, something we can produce or hang on to. But the nearest I could come in my experience to describing true insight is a shift of perception—spontaneous, out of our control. We just suddenly have that "aha," and we see something in a different way. The situation itself doesn't actually change, but the effect of that momentary shift of perception can have quite a radical effect on the way that we relate, a whole range from very little to really huge.

A good metaphor—not complete, of course, as metaphors are not, but a good one—for the way insight works in our Dharma understanding is those magic eye photos. They have some kind of geometric designs and colors, and when you look at it, it's nothing in particular. But if you look at it long enough and unfocus your eyes in just the right way, some magic 3D picture of dinosaurs, for example, springs out from the background. And once you see it, in that moment of seeing it, it's like, "Wow, dinosaurs! How could that be there in just these orange and blue triangles?" And then it's gone. Your eyes focus again and you start thinking about it, or you look away, and it's just the triangles again.

But the seeing of that has an effect, right? Even though it's momentary, it's shifted something radically. You know there's another way of perceiving that same geometric picture. You know something else is possible, even though you can't hold on to it. And if someone were to come to you and say, "No, you're out of your mind, there are no dinosaurs in that picture"—or you know how sometimes you meet someone who cannot see it? My mother is like that. She cannot see it, and it drives her crazy. Everyone's going, "Wow, dinosaurs! Spaceships!" And she's saying, "I want to see it." The tighter you get, the more you look for it—and of course, that sounds familiar, doesn't it? Forget about it. You're not going to see anything.

The seeing of it makes the next seeing a little easier. That momentary shift of perception doesn't stay with us, but it exerts an influence on the way that we meet the next similar experience. So you get the drift, right? You get the metaphor, how that works for insights in our life, as well as in our meditation practices, as well as in our Dharma understanding.

The insight isn't of thought. We can't hold onto it. Yet the fact of our perception having shifted exerts an influence on our mind stream, on our memory, on our readiness to hold a more open sense of possibility in the next moment, in the next experience. We're never quite so fixed on thinking we know this is how it is. We're never quite so fixed. We could be pretty fixed—but there's a little teensy weensy nubbin of change that might slip in there. And that's only about seeing dinosaurs. When it comes to our life, actually, it's much more radical.

Obviously insight doesn't have to be dharmic—seeing dinosaurs or suddenly approaching a mathematical problem in a different way, seeing a different aspect of our personality, or having problems with somebody and suddenly realizing, "Oh, maybe that's what they meant." It's the same process. It changes everything.

What makes it dharmic? The type of insight we are looking for—although we'll tell you not to look for it—but the type of insight we find ourselves looking for here is the type that deals with the nature of suffering and the ending of suffering. It's the kind of shift in perception that takes us out of our lifelong habit of creating and perpetuating suffering by the way we relate to experience. Because we're perceiving ourselves, each other, the nature of life, in a way that isn't completely accurate. And often we don't even know. We not only don't know it's not accurate, half the time we don't actually know how we're perceiving or the kind of box that we're putting our experience in. The insights that arise in our practice are the kind that let us really move outside of that box, relate to ourselves and one another and life in a different way.

The Buddha said that he teaches suffering and the end of suffering. All of our practice, all of the teachings, the meditation, any so-called meditation experience, whatever goes on here—all of it is in the service of understanding suffering and experiencing moment by moment for ourselves the possibility of the ending of suffering. Or as the Buddha described it, the supreme state of sublime peace that has been discovered by the Tathagata, namely liberation through non-clinging.

Non-clinging and basic awareness, totality of open connected presence—these to me are really the two sides of the same thing, really at the heart of what allows any moment of pure insight to arise.

So the insights that we talk about, the momentary experiences that allow us to open and trust that we and life are not as we thought—these are at the heart of our practice. And it's from this that we really begin to experience, to trust the fact that the freedom, the peace, the happiness that the Buddha spoke of, that we can at moments experience, isn't about fixing ourselves or achieving a certain mind state or changing our inner or outer experience. It's really about that shift of perception that changes our attitude on deeper and more lasting levels.

I'll give you what I think is a good example. A woman at a retreat this summer shared with me that she was having a lot of very restless, physically uncomfortable sittings. I had told her that one thing you can do when it's that kind of restlessness, when you want to just run screaming out of the hall, is before you do that, to stand up. Just as we say stand up for sleepiness, stand up with restlessness.

So she was standing up and thinking, "This is horrible, this is so unpleasant, this is a waste of time, I can't stand it, I'm going to run out of the hall screaming." And this went on for some time. Then suddenly, just standing there feeling restless, restless, restless, for whatever reason, there was a moment of letting go of that story, and the shift came. "Oh, so this is just physically uncomfortable. Restlessness. So what? What's the problem? It's just physical, unpleasant, restless sensations."

And that—you can get the difference between having that thought, which does absolutely nothing useful, and the real insight, the perception of, "Oh yeah, this is just physical dukkha, so what?" In that moment, there was no problem. She was still physically restless and uncomfortable, but the sense of this being a problem was gone. That's a moment of the ending of suffering. As we know, it only lasts a moment. But that is, to me, a really good example of the power of insight and how it comes about.

From that moment that she described of seeing, "Oh, it's just physical unpleasant experience, so what?"—suffering falls away. We can extrapolate from that any number of the profound teachings of the Buddha. We could say that really points to the Four Noble Truths, and I could give a whole talk about the suffering, the craving, the ending of suffering, the path to the ending of suffering. We can see how it points to the three characteristics of impermanence, of suffering, of no-self. We can see how you can get the whole dependent origination—the relationship to pleasant and unpleasant feeling giving rise to clinging, giving rise to a sense of grasping, giving rise to a sense of being, of suffering—from a little experience like that.

All of that can be very useful, very helpful. It might be the way one thinks about that experience afterwards. But none of that is the insight itself. The insight itself is that wordless "ah." And I'm not putting down using the concepts, the constructs of the Buddha's teaching or other concepts or constructs that are useful to us to help us understand in a conceptual way, because that's one of our tools. But it's not the insight. The insight is that wordless, non-conceptual shift of the way we see and understand and experience. And it can change everything.

Now, the problem, which I'm sure you've run into, is that we can't control this process arising when we would like it to arise. I don't know if you've ever sat down or walked and said, "I really want to have an insight into impermanence now." Or, "This week I'm going to work on anatta. I really want to see anatta." Or, "This whole retreat, in fact, will be my anatta retreat." Usually that's a sign that anything else but that is going to be what comes up.

It's totally out of our control. The insight arises spontaneously, and it, of course, passes spontaneously. So, for example, that woman standing with her restlessness—probably, luckily for her, the bell rang and ended the sitting, because I would really have been surprised if she said that sense of freedom in relationship to the unpleasantness persisted for forty-five complete minutes. The insight's there. It's real. It exerts an influence in our mind stream. We know things can also be otherwise than they seem. But we can't hold on to it.

The concepts help us remember. If we could stop there it would be fine, but then they help us try to make it happen again, and then we're back in suffering because we're not in open awareness at all. We're in striving.

The factors I want to drill in—and they're not new—about the arising of insight are these qualities: what we've been talking about as sati, mindfulness, the open totality of presence without assumptions, without expectations, without judgments. And this pure presence in the moment is only possible when there is non-clinging of heart, of mind. Obviously, the two go together.

Now, you can have non-clinging and not have totality of presence. We can have non-clinging and be completely zoned out. That's also possible. So non-clinging also has to have non-delusion, some sense of wakefulness, totality of presence along with it. It's these two, minimally, that are helpful.

When there is a moment where there's the clear totality of connected awareness and non-clinging—sometimes the non-clinging is obvious, you know, not clinging to wanting the restlessness to go away, not clinging to wanting the weather to be different. But sometimes the clinging that's happening in that moment is much more subtle—to an idea, a description we have of ourselves or reality that might not even be a conscious thought. For us in that moment to be able to recognize in a different way, just as in the magic eye when we can suddenly recognize the dinosaurs behind there, there has to be that moment of non-clinging to the tight focus. But in that moment, you also can't be looking for the dinosaurs or looking for impermanence. There has to be that total steadiness of purpose and connectedness and the letting go of any particular.

When the clinging that has to be let go of in a moment is to an object, to a thought, it's easier to know what I'm talking about, so I'll give that as a first example.

Take the weather. I've been here most of the first six weeks. Those of you who just arrived today, this isn't going to help you to know, but it's been really lovely. Warm, one of the warmest Octobers I can remember. And suddenly, what was it, yesterday or the day before, literally between the morning and the afternoon, the temperature dropped twenty-five degrees. It was quite amazing.

If that doesn't bother you, you're lucky. You have something else to let go of. But if you find, as I do—I'm very sensitive to cold—doing walking or being outside, and not even obsessively, but just a little bit, that pulling back, that aversion to the coldness, that little subtle feeling: "Oh, so nice when it was warm. My practice was so much better. I could walk outside in this open, relaxed space without this contraction." This contraction of body leads to contraction of mind and contraction of heart. How are you supposed to do really open, spacious practice inside in the dark when you're all contracted and all these people are stomping around all over? It's impossible.

And it is possible to really attribute the suffering to the fact that the weather changed. It's possible to be lost in that for quite some time—or to the fact that different people are doing different things than the other people were doing four days ago. We finally got used to the other people's stuff, and now we have to start over again. And it works both ways, I want you to know. The people that just arrived have to get used to your stuff too. It goes both ways.

Anyway, I got a little sidetracked. I haven't been sitting for six weeks. You'll have to excuse me. Soon I'll get to the concentration part. Maybe that'll bring it in.

One could really be thinking one is working quite mindfully, but there's just this little clinging to it: it would be better if it was warm again. And the moment when there's simply the willingness to bring the open attention without pre-assumption to the sensations of contraction, to the coldness, to whatever it is—in that moment of mindfulness, there isn't clinging. There's just letting go into what is, and suddenly, "Oh yeah, right, unpleasant sensation again." And that shifts the whole sense of the problem. A new problem will arise, no doubt, but that particular one is seen through.

It might not be the big "aha" you're waiting for to end all sense of self, but it is an insight. It is a shift of perception that in that moment is the end of that suffering. There was really a letting go and a clear connection to just what was happening, free of extra interpretation.

And of course, this kind of shift of perception is not dependent on being in a meditation retreat. It's not dependent on continuity of mindfulness and concentration. But what is so helpful about the meditation process, and about doing it with the commitment and steadiness and intensity with which we do it here—is that it allows us to begin to see through some of the inaccurate—and some downright wrong and confused—perceptions that overlay our moment-to-moment experience. These perceptions are either so fast or so subtle or so continuous, and we're so used to them, that we really don't notice them without a steadiness and continuity of mindful awareness and letting go.

The clarity, the stillness of the concentration, the moment-to-moment nature of the mindfulness, and the power of the moment-to-moment doingness allow us at times to begin to see through certain ideas—they might be personal ideas that you've held about yourself. You don't even put it in words: "This is my personality. I could never do XYZ. I could never really experience pure loving-kindness. Maybe anattā is true for everybody else, but for me it's not, and I'll never be able to know that." Whatever it might be—certain views of who I am, how things are, that we don't even know we're holding.

Without the steadiness and subtlety of the meditation, it's very difficult to begin to notice that, to experience that momentary shift of perception. We're so fixed on how we think things are that it doesn't even allow perceptions in sometimes that are outside of the framework, outside of the box. We don't even know there's a box—we think this is all there is.

Fred actually told me a great story in this vein this summer. I'm not completely sure it's true, but it's a great story and it illustrates the point. He was talking about Captain Cook—when Captain Cook's ships, the tall-masted ships, first sailed into harbor. He wasn't clear on which harbor it was, whether it was Australia or one of the Polynesian islands. But he said when the ships first sailed into the bay, there were many native peoples on the beach. And so the assumption of what they saw is based on the native people's behavior: that these weird, tall things sailed into the harbor, and there was absolutely no acknowledgment whatsoever that anything was there, that anything had happened. The people just kept going on completely about their everyday business.

You might have thought, well, they're just not very curious, they just don't care. But the assumption was that really it was because that was such a bizarre thing, outside of any range of experience that could be imagined, that they didn't even notice. Because as soon as the tall ships lowered their little rowboats and people got in and started rowing towards the shore—that fit into their experience, because the native peoples had boats and rowing. And so as soon as that started, they went nuts. They started running around and going wild and dropped what they were doing and ran down to the beach and started bringing gifts and rowing out to see the people rowing in.

It's really the sense that something we already know, we recognize, we know how to respond to—that fits into our world. But something so completely outside of what we've known or ever imagined, we can at times effectively not even perceive it. It's just not even happening. And we don't even know we're doing it. If someone told you, you'd think they were the nut.

That's really what's so fascinating to me in the whole process of perception—coming to discover through the meditation process that there are many, many different ways of perceiving the reality that we call mind and body, that we call this world. And who's to say this is the right one, that is the wrong one? After a while you realize you can't really grasp at any of them. "I think this is right"—I'm just shutting out other possibilities, and that's where we suffer.

When the Buddha spoke about wrong view, diṭṭhi, to me it's literal: wrong view. We're really perceiving in an inaccurate, incomplete way and completely grasping and constructing ourselves from that inaccurate understanding.

We can't decide from what we know what we should be looking for. If we could just extrapolate that into our meditation practice, think how much suffering we'd be saved. If you could just imagine not having an idea of what really good concentration is that you have to try and live up to, and just feel the breath—my God, what a relief that is when we can do that. Or if you have some idea or an experience—"Oh, this is open, flowing awareness. Now I know what it's supposed to be like"—it all slams shut again in that moment. Any idea of what emptiness is, of what enlightenment is, of what I'm looking for, immediately slams the box shut.

Krishnamurti's famous expression, "freedom from the known"—that's really what insight is. For that moment we're completely freed from any clinging to known thoughts, perceptions, ideas, and we're present with openness to discover, present with appreciation for the mystery. Really not even thinking, just with that openness that has no clue what's going to arise in the next moment, or what we're going to think about it, or what it means about me as a human being. Just that presence and openness to discover. It's really quite a wonderful way to live, to practice.

In many ways I find the function of our meditation to stay quite classical with the three aspects of mindfulness, wise effort, and samādhi—collectedness, focus, steadiness of mind. The cultivation of these qualities of our presence is in the service of allowing this total presence without expectation, without any clinging to views, to opinions, to constructs. This makes possible the opening into another way of being, another way of living, another way of perceiving ourselves altogether—a way that is ultimately much more joyful and freeing than the little boxes of suffering that we seem to write and think ourselves into.

And I know that's what goes on in a meditation retreat. Someone was saying today—and I've often had this thought myself—how amazing it is that just coming back to feeling your breath, just coming back to feeling your footsteps, just coming back to sensations in your body, it seems quite a lot of the time rather mundane, not very esoteric, not very profound. And then there'll be a period where we're just seeing all these different things about what's going on, on different levels, and it's so amazing. And you think, how can that come about? Just from following my breath? Just from feeling pressure, pressure, pressure, and suddenly I'm seeing these subtle chains of cause and effect in my behavior that I never saw before.

Like someone was saying—just walking and suddenly realizing, feeling a little sensation of coldness, the unpleasantness of that, and seeing how immediately the mind was saying, "Oh, it's cold, it's unpleasant, I'm going to quit walking and go have some tea." And how before, we would have done that with no clue why we stopped walking. The memory of the last moment before that was really happy, really present, and suddenly we can't stand it and we're in the dining room having tea.

How did I get there? And you know, this isn't the first time in our life that that particular string of events has happened. And suddenly we see it. Oh! It's just a momentary reaction to unpleasant sensation. Wow, that's fascinating. And that comes about from the cultivation of the moment-to-moment mindfulness that develops into concentration, steadiness, collectedness of mind.

The classical description, of course, of the insights that tend to arise over and over again—the insights that cut through our unthinking, normal way of experiencing our life—are the three characteristics, which I'm sure you know: that of impermanence, the ceaseless changing nature of all experience; the characteristic of dukkha, or the unsatisfactory, unreliable nature of all phenomenal experience, including ourselves; which brings us to the third characteristic, that there is no permanent, reliable experience whatsoever that I can point to, hold on to, or think of as me or mine. Nothing whatsoever.

I want to use impermanence as I go on as an example, because I think it's a good illustration of the difference between conceptual understanding and insight. Impermanence, I think, is worth exploring in that way because conceptually, of those three characteristics, impermanence is rather accessible on a conceptual level, no? It makes sense. You usually don't have to explain much to people about impermanence, whereas when we talk about anatta, that just opens the floodgates. But impermanence—most of us can conceptually say, "Yeah, I can see that. That's true."

And then we go about our lives, as we know, as if nothing that we like is ever going to change, including ourselves, including our moods—just completely overlooking the constant impermanence, which if someone came and asked us about, we'd completely agree with. Yes, everything's impermanent. But there will be times here, of course, more and more, when the fact of constant change isn't a concept but a real experience.

It's a real sense of insight. And in those moments of insight, you're not fighting it. It isn't really scary. There's that sense of, "Right, what's the problem? Everything's changing." We let go of the struggle, and there's a real sense of harmony, of ease, of being with things as they are—an ending of the struggle in that moment. I'm sure you all know that experience.

What's interesting is how often—not always, but often—immediately afterward, or very soon afterward, when the insight has again changed, we have the memory of it, but it's not our living experience anymore. And in fact, it can have a feeling of dissonance. You know what I mean? Where you've been so in the flow, and suddenly everything's frozen solid again. Either you're clinging to something, or something unpleasant is happening, and instead of just letting it flow, you're really struggling against it. The fact that you knew a minute ago everything was changing just adds to the sense of suffering. And there's a whole struggle, a whole sense of dissonance, the friction between our actual experience and the clung-to, perceived idea of how the world is.

A great deal of the time, we might find ourselves in more or less subtle forms of this dissonance. And it can manifest in different ways. Sometimes the dissonance is that things are changing and we're clinging—we don't want it to go, and we're suffering. Other times it's that we remember that everything was changing, and we can't get there again. Then there's dissonance: "I know it's really wonderful that everything's changing, but actually I'm suffering like heck because I can't let go into it." The sense of dissonance arises because we know in one way, but we don't really quite get the strength and subtleties of the views that are keeping us bound, the views we are actually holding to.

So just using impermanence as an example—and this is all without judgment, this is just the nature of our life in these bodies on this planet—we keep getting tripped up on clinging to these ways of experiencing that don't quite match how things are. Because, for example, if impermanence is a characteristic, a fact of life, doesn't that mean it's always true? Not just when we perceive it, but always. And it doesn't mean that when we suddenly have an insight into impermanence, now things have changed—that before they weren't impermanent, but now they are. Or anatta, which is more likely to confuse us. It's not that once you have an insight into anatta there's no "I," but before there was. It's just seeing how things are in another way. But things have always been that way. We're just seeing it—like the dinosaurs. They're not only there or not there; it's just how we perceive.

So go, just taking impermanence as you go through tonight, as you go through the next couple of days, really without judging—or if you judge, just notice it, note it. Not as a way to make yourself wrong, but really out of interest. Notice all the times that the mind and the heart clench when something changes, as if it shouldn't change. All the times that we really are coming from the place of, "No, things aren't impermanent."

In practice, you know, forget about it. As soon as it gets nice—and what is nice? That's different depending on your mood anyway. But this change over days, it's really interesting. Not for everybody, but for a lot of us, one way or another, it's just settling in, just getting in the groove, just getting to this peaceful place, and now there's all this aversion, there's all this thinking, there's all this emotion, there's all this whatever. Or I had my little walking path and now that person's on it, and I know it shouldn't matter, but boy does it. And on and on and on.

Underneath that, in some way, is this sense: "I lost it. I had it, and now I lost it." I did something wrong—or more like, IMS did something wrong by even allowing this to happen. It's their fault that my meditation is now ruined. "I lost it." Underneath that, we're somewhere thinking, "I hit the right place at which I'm going to cruise from now on," even though it doesn't last for more than a second. If you really look at some experience you're having in meditation that you think is really far out and great and "now this is it"—really look. How long does it stay the same, really stay the same? I'm willing to bet not much more than a second. Maybe it gets better, but it doesn't stay the same.

So every time you find yourself thinking it should have been like that, or trying to get back to how it was, or trying to move ahead to something you've heard or something you think is about to happen—every time you find yourself starting to feel disgruntled because it's nighttime and your energy dropped, because the weather changed and your mind got fuzzy along with the day, every time you find yourself thinking you know what's going to happen in the next moment—we're clinging to the idea of permanence.

It's more amazing that this stuff happens the way we think. That I'll talk for another ten minutes or so, and then I'll ring the bell, and then you'll get up and go walking, and then the bell will ring—maybe, if someone signed up. And then you'll come back in here and sit again. The fact that sometimes that stuff does happen lulls us into complacency. But really, we have no clue that there'll even be a next moment, never mind that we know what's going to happen in it.

And every time we notice that somehow we're taking for granted, somehow we're resisting change—in that moment, we're denying the truth of impermanence. In that moment, we're coming to look for rest in an unspoken, unclear idea of permanence.

That's the function, that's the role of mindfulness and concentration. We don't have to think, "I will now see through the idea of permanence." You know, forget about that. But the steadiness and the open-heartedness of mindfulness, and the concentration, the collectedness of mind that develops through continuity of mindfulness—this allows the truth to reveal itself, if we stop looking but remain willing to really be present.

From Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Discovery cannot come as long as you cling to the familiar. As long as you have all sorts of ideas about yourself, you know yourself only through the mist of these ideas. To know yourself as you are, give up all ideas. You cannot imagine the taste of pure water. You can only discover it by abandoning all flavorings."

So we can't even sit down and say, "I need to abandon the cherry flavoring," because we don't even know it's there. We don't know what flavorings are there. And we won't know, "Oh, now I've gotten to pure water, I can stop paying attention." We won't know that either. But it's that willingness to bring that open-hearted totality of presence that allows the truth to reveal itself on more refined and more subtle levels, moment to moment to moment.

So that's the quality of mindfulness, as you know, all of you—and I know the ones who've been here the first six weeks have heard a lot about it. This connected presence that's completely free in that moment of clinging or aversion, of judgments, of assumptions, of preconceptions—that allows us to just recognize what is as it is. "Oh, okay," without a lot of hullabaloo about it.

As an example, reading from the Buddha in the Satipatthana Sutta, as you know, he speaks about areas—just a way of dividing up experience so we can talk about it—areas to bring awareness to: the body, the feeling tone (that pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality), the mind (the colorings, the flavorings of mind, the mental states), and then all the contents of mind.

Just to read from a moment from the third foundation, citta, the mind, the mental states—an example of how just knowing what is, without anything extra:

"When one's mind is desiring, one is aware the mind is desiring. When one's mind is not desiring, one is aware my mind is not desiring. When one's mind is hating something, one is aware my mind is hating. When there is not hatred in the mind, one is aware there is not hatred in the mind."

Now, do you hear anything in there about saying, "My mind is hating, which is proof of what a worthless, useless meditator I am"?

I don't read that either. "My mind is not hating—I finally surmounted all aversion and I'm about to move into the deva realm of compassionate loving-kindness." No, I don't hear that.

Simply moment to moment: hating is present, hating is not present. The mind is contracted, the mind is expansive. Finished. Just notice it, let it be, and notice when it changes. Why is that so impossible for us? That's the quality of mindfulness. And that's what allows us to notice, "Oh wow, I'm putting this cherry flavoring on, and it really doesn't need it."

Dudjom Rinpoche, describing mindfulness to a room full of Westerners, said it's that state you're in when you wake up in the morning in a strange motel in a strange city, and for a moment you don't know where you are. Just no clue. Your mind is empty of information and chit-chat, and you just sit there—alert, at ease, and full of wonder. This sounds nice, doesn't it? Next time you come in and sit down, just sit down with your mind empty of chit-chat, alert, at ease, and full of wonder. No matter what comes up: alert, at ease, and full of wonder. That moment-to-moment mindfulness brings a kind of freshness, this openness to discovery that really does bring a sense of wonder.

My favorite story that conveys to me this sense of openness and wonder, this willingness to meet a situation freshly, comes from when I was in Germany. There was a documentary on television about Yo-Yo Ma, the famous classical cellist. Just the other day I heard a piece on NPR about how he had forgotten his cello in a cab on the way to a concert at Carnegie Hall or something—it's a two million dollar cello. Luckily he got it back. But this is just to let you know: he took this cello of his, and it's not nothing, and got on a little bush plane and went to visit a tribe in the Kalahari desert in Africa. He's really into comparing music across cultures.

In the documentary, he gets out with his cello and he's with this tribe of the bush people, and he asks through a translator for the main musicians. An old man comes and brings his instrument. Yo-Yo Ma seems like a really nice guy, and he's all excited. He sits down with this old bush musician to swap songs and play their instruments.

Now this man's instrument was literally a round empty oil can with a wooden stake that made a handle, and a couple of strings that went up off a little stand on it. That was it. He would pluck it or play it with a stick, but mostly he just plucked it and sang. We could hear that, and I couldn't approach it with anything like the openness that Yo-Yo Ma brought to it. I saw it, the guy was plucking it, and it sounded to me, with my tin ear, like an oil can with a couple of strings coming out of it. Plong, plong, plong. But Yo-Yo Ma—he was so happy. He goes, "Wow, that's incredible!"

After listening to the man sing and play, Yo-Yo Ma would play something, and then he says, "Let's trade instruments." He trades instruments with the guy, totally open, and the man is sawing away on this two million dollar cello. Yo-Yo Ma's plunking on the thing, saying, "I can't play this nearly as well as he can. He really makes beautiful sounds come out of it." Gives it back to him and has him play and sing some more. Totally heartfelt. It was really beautiful.

I think of that a lot in my life. It's easy to bring a kind of cynicism or "I know what this is about" to life, to experience, certainly to another sitting, to the breath, to lifting the foot, to that crunching pain in the lower abdomen that God knows I've experienced more than enough. Can we bring that quality of newness, openness to discovery? It's the first time. What a different way to live. That's the quality of mindfulness. Sure, we'll lose it. But I just think of Yo-Yo Ma, and for a moment it opens up my heart, my mind again. You're there fresh. And moment by moment is all we've got anyway. So meet this moment fresh.

That's the mindfulness piece—the continuity of mindfulness. I do assume that's been mentioned once or twice in the first six weeks. Once, years ago, a friend of mine who must have sat four three-month retreats came to me after about the fourth one and said, "Wow, you guys were really stressing continuity."

I never remembered hearing that before. So I just thought I'd check. It's another example of selective perception, and we don't know when we're doing it. That's what's so interesting.

Anyway, the continuity of mindfulness is extremely important, both because it's what allows the steadiness, the concentration, the unification of mind and attention to develop, and also because the steadiness of mindfulness is what reveals impermanence. Lack of continuity hides impermanence. Have you noticed that?

I'll give examples, but the steadiness, the continuity—mindfulness moment after moment, not just when we like it, not just when we think something's worth paying attention to—that's the biggest trap. Because the things that aren't worth paying attention to are the things that are going to reveal a lot about life and ourselves.

The continuity matters because one moment informs the next. One moment of rage makes it a lot easier to be angry the next moment. One moment of metta makes the next moment of metta a lot easier. Same with mindfulness. One moment of open, wondrous presence makes us much more likely to be in the same space in the next moment.

This leads to a stability of attention. The kind of concentration we're cultivating here—khanika samadhi, momentary concentration—the objects may always be changing. We start with the breath or with hearing or with body, but at times there's sensation, sensation, the breath, hearing, sensation, thought—things changing, but there's a steadiness of meeting each experience where the mind isn't fluttering, it's not distracted by the pleasant or unpleasant, it's just there with what is. That's a real depth of unification, non-distractedness of mind and heart.

That in itself—have you noticed how satisfying it is? Nothing special may be going on, but just that undistracted quality of presence is really quite lovely, peaceful. It is just this rest from running all over the place in the mind. So that steadiness, the moment after moment after moment, allows the concentration of samadhi to develop. And this is what allows for the recognition, that shift of perception that's insight—to see our experience in a different way.

Using impermanence again as an example: lack of continuity hides impermanence. When we pay attention only to what we think is interesting, when it's strong enough to call us or we're simply caught in it, we tend to notice both the mind states we really like and are attached to—concentration, joy, feeling so high, so peaceful—and also the ones we don't like: the heaviness, the self-judging, the sadness. And there's a real tendency to think, when you're in a grief space or a self-judging space, "I've just been so self-judging all day" or "I've been grief-stricken all day" or "I've been dull and sleepy for the last three and a half weeks." That's selective perception again. There isn't just moment after moment of one thing.

I've noticed, even in the depths of really intense grief—the kind that feels like you're completely sucked into a pit of grief—if I stay really present, somewhere in there my mind is going, "Is that pizza? I wonder if we're having pizza for lunch. I wonder if there's dessert." And then, "Oh my God, this grief is just too much to bear." Without the continuity, the undiscriminating quality of mindfulness, we just cut out that little piece. And then we think, "I am so filled with grief. It's steady, it's solid."

If you keep working with continuity, there is no way you can go on thinking that everything is permanent. There is no way. All we see is more and more how fast things are changing, whether we like it or not.

Another way the qualities we cultivate in meditation help us is not only through the steadiness, but through the depth of concentration that lets us begin to perceive experience on subtler levels than when we're really busy, when our mind is distracted. Again, to use the example someone gave in an interview: just walking, feeling really great about it, noticing a couple of moments of unpleasant cold sensation, and the mind saying, "Okay, I'm going to go have some tea." That's very fast. It's quite subtle. Without the concentration that can notice the rapidity of mind and body sensations coming and going, we wouldn't catch that cause and effect. We'd just be having the tea and not quite sure how we got there.

Or the times in practice when you're feeling quite present and focused, and the sensations in the body start to seem to come faster and faster, and there are moments when there is no real perception of a solid body at all. And it's as real as feeling solid right now. In that way, you really see for that moment: it's true. There's nothing solid. There is no body. There is no me. There are only sensations arising and passing in space, like points of light. And then we go into a whole thing and we're solid again.

But in that moment, that's absolutely the truth. It's a truth that's usually not accessible to us as a perception without the steadiness of mindfulness and concentration.

And if that's not your experience, let me also hasten to say, that doesn't last either. It's one of those perceptions that lets us know, "Oh, things aren't the way I always thought." And it changes something. We're not so fixed. But that perception also doesn't last. And the next moment, or the next week, or the next year, everything is really solid and you can't get back to that other perception.

But it doesn't really matter. You never really perceive so solidly again. Just opening that space of don't-know in the heart, in the mind, allows us to bring that freshness—like Yo-Yo Ma—allows the possibility to really, deeply perceive in another way altogether. And the more often we recognize a moment—"Ah, it really isn't what I thought. I'm really not the way I thought I am"—those are the moments that can change everything. You don't have to hold on to them. It's just that totality of presence, complete nonclinging in a moment, that allows the truth to present itself.

That, to me, is the whole point of our practice. And then, of course, we can't hold on to that either. Just this moment.

I want to close with this quotation from the late Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche:

Buddha nature, the essence of awakened enlightenment itself, is present in everyone. It cannot be improved upon. It cannot be changed or degenerated. Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore or overlook it are deluded. This recognition is the borderline between Buddhas and ordinary beings, and this is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives.

CHAPTER 318

Devotion To The Truth

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson shares a pivotal insight from her time at Ramana Maharshi's ashram in southern India—the profound difference between practicing from devotion to truth versus wanting truth. Observing the humble president of the ashram simply walking around the samādhi before serving dinner, she recognized a quality of surrendered love that contrasted sharply with her own mindful but subtly grasping approach.
>
> Wilson explores how wholehearted surrender differs from passive resignation—it's a vital, exhilarating presence that requires releasing our safety nets and preconceived notions moment by moment. Drawing on teachings from Ramana Maharshi, Pema Chödrön, and Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, she illuminates how "in the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly." The talk examines our habitual resistance to letting go, using vivid imagery of mountain monkeys launching fearlessly through space and the story of a man clinging to a branch while God tells him to let go.
> Practical guidance emerges for reconnecting with devotion: taking refuge, opening to nature, cultivating gratitude, and reflecting on bodhicitta—the awakened heart that arises when we can no longer shield ourselves from life's vulnerability. Wilson emphasizes that this love includes ourselves, our relationships, and all beings, transforming even difficult moments into opportunities for presence and freedom.

Tonight I'd like to talk about an attitude of bringing to practice that I've been finding very helpful lately, sort of a shift at times. And that's the attitude of devotion and surrender.

This fall in August and September, I spent a few weeks in southern India in an ashram where Ramana Maharshi used to live. He died in 1950, so he's been gone a while, but he's widely considered one of the more realized beings to live in this century. I mean, who knows, but he's widely considered to be that. And still many, many people go to the ashram today, of course, with various motives, as we all come to our practice. But the ashram is really there not so much as a kind of honoring him as a person. They really try to set it up in a way that informs one with the willingness to practice, which is basically self-inquiry—to realize and rest in the truth for oneself rather than to just go out of devotion to this man who used to live there. But of course all kinds of people and all kinds of behaviors are there. It's a lovely place.

What inspired me to want to talk about this tonight was a little experience I had one night. They have, as is a very Indian custom, a big hall where every evening there's about an hour of chanting in the Tamil language. At one end of this hall is a big marble tomb. The word they use for a tomb like that in India is samadhi—his final samadhi, they call it. And it's a common practice to circumambulate it.

So we were sitting, listening to the chanting. While they're chanting, some people sit along the walls, and anyone can come and go. It's very informal. People will come in, maybe bow to the samadhi, walk around it, and sit down. Many times people come in and do full prostrations, or a little bow, or they're lying on the floor for five minutes, or just casually walking around—the whole range.

I was just sitting there practicing awareness, being with the chanting. At the end, one of the male chanters was an older man who's actually the president of the ashram. He's a very kind man. He got up, and I just happened to see him. I hadn't even noticed in all those days that he was one of the chanters. He just got up—the dinner bell rings—and he got up to go help serve the dinner, which he does for the hundred or so people who are there. They come around and serve you on banana leaves. You sit on the floor with a banana leaf, and they come and slop the food on the leaf, and you eat it. He would be one of the people who would come around serving, just very simply.

He got up and I happened to see him. There was just such an air of humbleness, of simplicity. He just walked around the samadhi. No bowing, no prostration, nothing. Just this simple walking around and then out to do his duty of serving the dinner. Somehow there was something in the way that he walked—I realize it could be total projection, but I'm aware of that, and it doesn't matter. There was something in the way that he walked that felt so humble, so simple, and so filled with devotion. Just simple devotion. Now I don't know whether it was to Ramana, to his memory, or to the truth, but the whole air of the ashram is devotion to truth rather than to Ramana as a person. There was that quality of humble, simple devotion. No big airs, no big prostrations. Just walking around and going to serve his meal.

That just went right in somehow. Because I felt the difference between myself earlier, having walked around that samadhi. It's one of the things you do mindfully, you know, doing my mindful walking the way we'd walk back and forth here. But the difference between his devotion and love, the simplicity of his love for the truth, really contrasted with my devotion to wanting the truth. And it's a vast difference. You might have once in a while noticed a subtle wanting the truth creep into our dedication to practice.

That's really all I had to say in this talk, but five minutes is a little short, so I will elaborate on this theme for some time.

It really had a profound effect on me, actually, that moment. It stayed with me for the last two months. It comes and goes, but it stayed with me. And all I need to do is remember that sense that seeing him brought up in my own heart—of practicing simply out of love for the truth. Without any "in order to's" or "so that's" or "because I want X, Y, and Z to happen" or "because what's here now isn't good enough"—or fill in your own blanks.

That wholehearted loving of the truth is a transforming approach to bring into the simplicity of our day-to-day mindfulness, our moment-to-moment mindfulness. And in order to practice even for a moment in this way requires—yes—surrender. I hate to say it. It requires, just in a moment, wholehearted, total surrender.

It doesn't have to look like anything.

For example, at the ashram, people would come in from all over and really throw themselves on the floor in front of the tomb or in the meditation hall. You could feel a sense of devotion in them. They would sit there for a little while, get up, and go on with their lives. Meanwhile, the president was just doing his chanting, walking around the tomb, going in to serve dinner, being kind to whoever came, running the place day after day after day—without any big sense of making himself somebody special. And it's so easy to do that when you're the head of something, when people come from all over the world and say, "Wow, you're the president." Yet he was one of the most simple, humble people there.

So how do we approach our practice day to day, moment to moment—our walking, our sitting? When we feel the breath, when we notice that peace and calm has suddenly changed to contraction and tightness, when we notice that quietness has suddenly given way to random scattered thoughts—or maybe not so random, maybe obsessive—what then? When the nice, calm energy that we were so aware of not getting attached to has changed, and we realize that somehow we weren't attached to the energy, but obviously it meant something really profound in our practice. And its being gone also means something missing that's really profound.

Are we able to surrender into meeting whatever's happening with our fullness of attention? Not so that we can get back to something. Not in order to finally rest in truth. But simply out of love for awareness itself, simply out of devotion to the truth in whatever way it's manifesting in this moment. Whether we like it or not really doesn't make any difference. Whether we understand it, whether we have a frame of reference, doesn't make any difference.

That level of surrender—not of giving up, but of surrendering into presence out of real devotion for the truth. Obviously, what we have to give up is all our ideas, all our desires, all our preconceptions. Only in a moment, not now forever. Just in a moment, because if we think all that way ahead, it's impossible. Then there's me having to give up all my desires. But just in the moment—can we surrender into a situation that's difficult, not difficult, confusing, or beautiful without even the slightest exception? So that there's no "I'll surrender this far, but this last piece can't go."

It's tough, isn't it?

And when we actually approach it out of love, rather than out of wanting—which is even kind of gross, but let's face it, it is wanting, it's grasping, some subtle clinging for what we're going to get—the devotion, the love, really makes the surrender already happen. But it's so easy to hold on to one last "what if."

A friend sent me this story about a man who went for a hike. While he was walking along a steep path, he slipped and started to tumble down the mountainside. At the last moment, he grabbed a branch growing from the side of the mountain, but he could not get a foothold to climb back up. He became frightened and pleaded, "Lord, please help me. If you get me out of this predicament, I'll do anything you say. Please help me."

Just then the clouds parted, and a voice said, "Did you say you will do anything?"

The man answered, "Yes, Lord, I'll do anything."

And the voice said, "Okay. Let go."

And the man said, "What? Are you crazy? I'll be killed!"

Now that's our place of surrender. Real surrender. And if we could let go out of love for the truth, rather than out of getting what we want—that's a moment of devotion. Yes, it's scary. It's unnerving. It gives us nothing to hold on to. It gives us no set path that we can absolutely trust.

Of course, we know that certain things tend to happen, that other people have walked this path. And one of the reasons we're here as teachers is so that when something weird starts happening, you come in and tell us, and we almost always say, "Oh yeah, that's normal"—almost no matter what. I don't know whether you believe us or not, but we say that, and you go, "Okay." Maybe they don't believe us. But we mean it. We wouldn't lie.

Almost everything's normal at some point or other. So there's a path, but it's so vast that you can't absolutely count on anything. And that's why total surrender is necessary. It's scary, but also in that moment of opening the heart and mind and letting go into devotion and love, it's exhilarating. It's freeing. It brings in such a vitality of life, of really being present, that holding to our plans and preconceived notions just can't allow.

The image that comes to my mind is something a friend told me, again from this place in India. The ashram is at the base of a mountain, a sacred mountain. This friend climbed up to the top—a lot of people do—and they climbed in the middle of the night so they would be at the top just as dawn was breaking. There are lots of monkeys in this area, and the monkeys apparently up at the top are a little more wild. The ones at the bottom are basically craving personified—you hear a rustle, you see food, they're on you. They know. But up at the top, a little more wild.

The image this friend described really comes to me with this sense of surrendering, abandoning our toeholds in the moment and just surrendering into what's happening now. He said these monkeys, these wild mountain monkeys, they're up at the top on these rocks, on these trees, and they just launch out from whatever they're holding onto—a rock or a tree—just as if they could fly, completely trusting that they'll land on a branch or a rock. And they do. But they're not sitting there checking it out. Where's the next toehold? If I go this way, can I go that far? They just launch out and land.

To me, there's that sense of complete trust, vibrancy, total aliveness in the moment. And that's really the surrender I'm talking about. It's not the surrender of, "Okay, fine, I'll lie down and whatever happens, happens, because I can't do anything about it anyway." It's the surrender of totally vital, wholehearted presence. There's nothing like it. And it could be called love. It could be called devotion. It brings in a unity of being that allows us to transcend our identification with the personal, whatever aspect that's taking at the moment. It allows us to open into a radical acceptance of this moment right now as manifestation of truth—the only one that's available right now. And only when we can really open into it, launch into it like those monkeys, can we perceive, in a way, ultimate reality.

I think in the first talk I ever gave, I used this quotation, and I still love it, so I'm going to use it again. Talking about really taking refuge in whatever's arising right now as the truth: "Radical acceptance is the radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, as all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways."

This, in a way, is our practice. The "all"—in all forms, at all times, in all ways—is accentuated because that's the only way through, this total devotion. It's another angle of non-grasping; I'm sure you've got that by now. It's only in the totality of it that truth can reveal itself. Just that slightest holding on—"I can't let go because I'll be killed"—that slightest holding on is what blocks in that moment the perception of ultimate truth. The wholehearted surrender into it is what allows the unitive nature to reveal itself.

Obviously this isn't easy or simple; we all know that. It's such a habit, such a deeply ingrained fear, that we need some kind of safety net. We can't just launch out like those monkeys without some little sense that there's some way we're going to be able to keep ourselves safe, or familiar, or hanging on to the known in some way. But that safety net is what imprisons us. It's what keeps us roaming back and forth in the little box of the known, the little box of "me," the little box of my ideas about who I am, about what is possible, about what truth could even be. We think it's a safety net, but it's a prison. Yet it feels so safe and comfortable, and at times it's so subtle, that it's really hard to have the trust to let go of it for a moment, to venture outside of it.

For me, that's why the sense of love, of devotion, is so helpful—even more than trust in a way—because devotion or love, in my own personal experience, has an energetic power that is stronger than fear, stronger than the need for a safety net.

And the safety net here on retreat can be as simple as what's comfortable. How much sleep I need. How we're relating to food. What would happen if I ate less? What would happen if I skipped the chocolate cake? What would happen if I didn't take a nap after lunch?

Things that somehow don't enter the realm of what's possible for me.

I remember the first three-month retreat I ever sat. At that time, all the work meditations were assigned—you didn't have a choice, you didn't sign up. And about every month they rotated the assignments. So just when you settled in and had your schedule all going, suddenly you'd go in and discover you were the lunchtime dishwasher for the next month.

My safety net, my sense of comfort at that time, was that I could get through the day and do the schedule if I had my little half-hour nap after lunch. And that seemed quite acceptable—until they rotated the jobs and I had to do lunchtime cleanup. Another safety net I didn't even recognize at the time was that I had to look like a good yogi, so I wouldn't dare go in and say I couldn't do that job, that I wanted another one. I didn't even recognize that was a personality safety net. People had to like me.

So I said, "Oh no, what's going to happen? I have to do this cleaning and there's no way I can get through the day without my nap after lunch. It's just going to be hell."

And of course, you can imagine—it was amazing to find out that it didn't make any difference at all whether I had my nap after lunch. From the first day it just didn't matter. It was completely something in my mind. But I think I would have gone through that whole retreat without even thinking to question that it was necessary, that it was possible for something to be different.

It can be more subtle than that, of course, but we get a familiarity with our habits, a familiarity with aspects of our personality, things that can't change—even sometimes very suffering aspects of our personality. Who would I be if I didn't feel worthless? That's not a possibility. Losing my sense of self. We hang on.

So something that can jar that is really helpful. A friend of ours this summer told a Zen story that kind of jars that sense of seeing how we look at things. It was about a Zen master and a very wrathful samurai who came to visit him. One wonders why the samurai came to visit, because he started abusing the Zen master from the moment he arrived, calling him, "Oh, you're just a pig, you look like a pig, this zendo looks like a pig"—just abusing him.

The Zen master let him go on, and finally the Zen master said, "Well, but you are a Buddha."

This brought the samurai up short. He thought of himself many ways, but a Buddha wasn't one of them. He said, "Me, a Buddha? Why do you say that?"

And the Zen master said, "Well, a pig only sees pig. A Buddha only sees Buddha."

So it jars our preconceived notions, what we want to hang on to, what we're comfortable with. If we want to just see pig, okay, we're welcome to do that if that's more comfortable. But the willingness to let go of that, whatever our preconceived notions are, and just surrender into this moment from love, without hoping for result—to wholeheartedly meet what's happening just because it's the truth in this moment, not as some kind of self-confirmation: "Yes, my practice is getting better." And that's so tricky. "Now I am experiencing this deep, open-hearted devotion"—just to notice when we are.

An illustration of this point, again from Ramana Maharshi: One of his devotees remarked to him that a certain fellow devotee must be very well advanced on his spiritual path because he meditated for eight to ten hours every day. So this guy would have been very impressed with all of us.

And Ramana replied, "Oh, he meditates, he eats, he sleeps. But who is meditating, eating, sleeping? What advantage is there in meditating for ten hours a day if in the end that only has the result of establishing you a little more deeply in the conviction that it is you who are meditating?"

Now, before you fall back into "I am worthless because I think I'm meditating, and that's just the proof of it"—of course there are times when we are very firmly established in the sense that I am meditating, I am developing concentration, I am feeling such open-hearted devotion, I am surrendering fully into the moment. Of course that's going to happen. That's our human condition. And there are times when we are meditating in order to develop concentration, in order to open the heart, so that I can finally rest in the pure nature of awareness and forget this whole show.

Whatever our "in order to" is, whenever there's an "in order to," I am very firmly placed behind it, so it seems.

But luckily for us, the whole gestalt of mindfulness practice is that all we have to do is have the willingness to keep looking. Look at that I who's meditating so faithfully. Look at that I who feels worthless. All we have to do is keep practicing surrender, keep practicing simply the devotion that lets us meet a moment fully. And when we practice with love, we naturally begin to see through this solid sense of I.

So please don't think, "Well, I'm meditating ten hours a day, but I still feel like I'm me, so the more I meditate, the worse that's going to be." That's not the point I was trying to make with that quotation. Just to notice when we're meditating from I, from wanting—even wanting enlightenment—and when it's just love of being present. Even when we hate what we're being present with, we can still—it's weird, but it is possible—love just awareness itself, even when what's happening we could really do without.

Seeing through this sense of me, the personality patterns, whatever our safety net is—it changes from time to time, the comfort level. Of course it's not always comfortable. Of course at times it's unsettling, confusing, takes us onto unfamiliar, uncomfortable ground. For myself, I'd say in the years of practice, it continues to be in many ways like a series of small deaths, really. And sometimes with the accompanying sense of loss, of grief that goes along with death for us humans.

And if I would try to place a rational explanation on what it is that feels like it's dying—you know, this piece of my personality feels like it's dying—it doesn't really make sense. I mean, it didn't even make sense to me. I won't even try to make it make sense to you. But it's really been over the years, over and over, that opening into a sense of real dying, of real death. And coming out the other side of it to a space of greater ease and freedom and greater ability to love—just to love the truth, to love things as they are, not so wrapped up in some idea of who Carol is or what practice should look like or what I think is possible.

It's interesting when we run into these places in our practice, and I think we all do, though they can be different. A place just before that sense of death, that sense of real letting go of some idea we've had about ourselves, or of something that we see we're going to have to let go of to keep practicing—and this huge resistance comes up. "No. If freedom means this goes, I don't want freedom." Do you know that space?

And sometimes the "this" is something so mundane. I remember one time my teacher told me I had to start noting "pleasant." I was having some kind of rapture, some kind of pleasant experience, and I went back and went into a total temper tantrum resistance. Because I knew, really, that I liked that pleasant thing, and noting "pleasant" was really going to cut the attachment. I mean, all I had to do was note it once to know that. It was going to cut the attachment, which gave me some sense of—wow, it wasn't even that strong, but just a sense of being. And I had a total conniption, a temper tantrum, a three-year-old fit.

Before I finally said, "All right, I'll just note pleasant." Pleasant, pleasant. The whole thing falls away. And lo and behold, it's not like, "Oh, life is so gray and miserable." It's like, "Oh, yeah, right. Equanimity. It's really lovely." Peace, spaciousness, presence. It's something so small, really. And we can just go to the wall resisting. "No, if that has to go, forget about it. I want to stay in suffering."

Sometimes it's not mundane. Sometimes it's something really profound—an understanding we have of life, or we think we have. Often for me it will come up around a sense of how I feel attachment in relationship, or to family, or to friends. And it's more an idea than a reality, but the idea that if I really open into choiceless awareness or into love, then the specialness of that attachment is going to go away. And I don't want life without that.

It's a common question that comes up, more often when we're teaching at a class—not so much when we've been on a long retreat, but when people are just beginning to come to the Dharma and the idea of non-attachment. You say there's no attachment, so that means we can't have relationships? And what about love for our children? Is it some kind of cold practice that says we can't be attached to our children? All these what-ifs. And of course that's not the reality when we really open into devotion or love for all beings.

It happens to include our children, our partners, our families, ourselves.

But I'm not making light of this—it's a profound kind of wall we can come up against. No. If this goes, if freedom means I don't have this anymore, I don't want freedom. Of course, that's just another thought. Here we can notice that we keep practicing and we see it's different from what we thought. But these places of resistance, of "no, this can't go, this is who I am," or "this is what makes life worth living"—this is a very important place in practice. And this is where that true surrender, that devotion to the truth without an "in order to," comes in.

From Pema Chödrön—I think she has a great way of putting things: "To live fully is to be always in no man's land, to experience each moment as completely new and fresh. To live is to be willing to die over and over again. From the awakened point of view, that's life. Death is wanting to hold on to what you have and to have every experience confirm you and congratulate you and make you feel completely together."

So that's not happening, is it? You're not finding every experience here is making you feel completely together. So that's good, see? Even though we say the yama mara is fear of death, actually the mara is fear of life—life meaning that holding on, having every experience congratulate and confirm us. You can feel the difference when we're practicing so that the practice can confirm us. You can feel that sense of solidity, that sense of clinging. And in the moments when we're just giving our heart to it, without holding back, you can feel the vitality, the aliveness, the spaciousness, the lack of sense of self.

Now, interestingly enough, the attitude of devotion—wholeheartedly giving one's being to, of love, which is non-clinging—it's another way of coming at non-grasping. In the heart of this attitude, it allows the true nature to shine through.

I want to read this from Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, who was a wonderful Tibetan teacher, describing this. He says, "A method for becoming quickly accustomed to the unfabricated state of awareness—unfabricated, unconditioned, uncreated state of awareness—is to have devotion for enlightened beings and compassion for unenlightened sentient beings. Devotion and compassion are both love. And in the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly."

In the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly.

He goes on to say, "If in this moment"—the moment of love, devotion, compassion, metta, whatever different words you want to put—"if in this moment one can look inwardly, it is like the sun unobscured by clouds. The nature of emptiness is nakedly manifest in the moment of devotion, in the moment of love." In fact, it's the same: devotion, love, naked empty nature manifest.

And he goes on to say, "Yet in the beginning you need developed or fabricated devotion because natural, unfabricated devotion or uncontrived compassion doesn't necessarily occur immediately"—if that happens to be your experience, that it doesn't always occur immediately.

And of course, as with devotion, as with anything, there are ways we can remind ourselves of devotion as an attitude. As with the compassion practice, as with the metta practice, sometimes people will say it does seem so contrived to cultivate the boundless quality of heart, of loving-kindness, of compassion through such a formulaic practice. It's quite common that people feel a dissonance between the method and the so-desired-for result. But it's just looking at the fact that sometimes total, unfabricated devotion and compassion don't just arise spontaneously every moment, but we can incline the mind, incline the heart. And so a lot of that is our practice here.

I'm not going to talk about—I mean, there's a whole practice of the bhakti path, of guru devotion, and I'm not talking about that at all because it's both not what we're doing here and it's also not my personal experience. So I'm really talking about aspects of love and devotion within our mindfulness practice here, including the compassion and the metta practice. I'm not discussing them specifically because Marcia talked about karuna last night and we've talked about metta, but know that those are aspects of love, of devotion.

To think of devotion in the beginning, in terms of cultivating this open-hearted love, there are ways that it can seem quite dualistic, but we can use skillful means. The whole sense of devotion or love or inspiration inspired by a teacher—as for example the Buddha—is using what starts as a sense of duality and separation as a skillful means. The Buddha or the teacher or the being, whatever being inspires us, becomes a catalyst for the open-hearted surrendering of our sense of wanting, of separation, of "what if"—a catalyst, an inspiration to really fully open into this moment.

It's commonly used in the Theravada tradition at times when people's motivation is low or they're really discouraged or dragging through practice. Often our teachers would encourage us to reflect on the qualities of the Buddha or the qualities of an awakened being who inspired one. And I found that this can be a skillful means if it's used not to create a sense of distance or separation—"Oh, the Buddha or whoever was such an amazing enlightened being and that's impossible for a poor dumb cluck like me." That's not the point.

Not to hold on to the separation, but rather, by reflecting on and tuning into the awakened aspect of the Buddha or a being we know, it ignites the awakened aspect of our own heart and mind. Instead of increasing a sense of distance, it brings us back into the unity that comes about through devotion.

A little poem from Lalla, a woman who was a mystic in the fourteenth century in northern India:

When the mirror of my consciousness became clear,
I saw that my family and others I love are the same as me.
The "you and I" thought does not occur.
The entire world is God.

The entire world is God. The "you and I" thought does not occur. That's the skillful use of devotion—to come into the sense of vastness, of unity. The love, that totality of devotion that allows for naked awareness to manifest like the brilliance of the sun. We move from the personal to completely beyond any sense of personal.

The Buddha used devotion in this way, but he was very clear that we not get stuck having our devotion fixated on a person, on a being, because that continues and creates the sense of separation, of something to gain. There's a story where one monk was quite enamored of the Buddha. He would just sit in the discourses and stare at him like he was in love with him, basically. And finally the Buddha had to snap him out of it and said, "It's not me. Stop staring at me. If you see the Dharma, you see the Buddha. It's about the Dharma, it's about the truth, it's about your own awakening. It's not about me."

So it's very clear that we can use devotion and inspiration, but if we get stuck there on the personal, then the clinging comes back in. And you can tell, because there will be more of a sense of separation, more of a sense of wanting. Love and devotion is not wanting. They're very different—vastly different.

There's a story conveying the same thing from present-day times. In India today, the whole tradition of guru devotion and guru worship is really, really strong. It's quite a kick to be in the country, actually, because that's definitely not the culture I came out of. And being in Tiruvannamalai, where Ramana Maharshi's ashram is—that's really the center of that town. As I was describing, there's a lot of devotion to him as a person. But it's also sort of a great mecca for all kinds of gurus and babas to come. They're all different. There's always conversation in town about this baba who came or that guru who arrived. It's fascinating to see this sense of guru devotion. But a lot of times, it's really in service of that sense of separation—this person is going to give it to me.

There's a story I really like that I read about Ramana himself, who very much drew devotion from people. If you read about him, he taught a lot in silence. Just his presence and his emanation of the truth would often wake that up in people's hearts and minds. But of course, people also related to him in all different ways, and there was a strong element of personal devotion.

One story I read was in a book written by one of his longtime disciples, a man who lived in the ashram from the early twenties and thirties, was one of Ramana's attendants, did a lot of the construction work, and was just very close to him, living there for years and years. Finally, at one point, Ramana just knew the moment when this man's heart and mind was beginning to open up, to awaken, to not be so fixated on him. And he basically said to him, "This being, this body—this is not the truth. This is not Bhagavan," as he would call himself. "It's not me. But it's with you always. So now it's time for you to leave and go do your practice."

And so this man, Annamalai Swami was his name, left and went about five minutes' walk away. Now there's an ashram there, Annamalai Swami's ashram—it's really just five minutes from Ramana's ashram. But he went there, stayed for the rest of his life, practiced intensively, and never saw Ramana again. Never saw him again, though he was living five minutes away. Ramana basically banished him and said, "Forget about this body, this being. The truth is always with you. Now go discover it for yourself."

And another example of when we don't quite make that transition, when we do get fixated—this summer I was in Italy for a week or two, and we went to Assisi, where St. Francis of Assisi lived and practiced. If you know anything about him at all, he's from the twelfth century, I believe, and he was renowned for his love and simplicity, his sense of brotherhood with all life, with all nature. He lived a profoundly simple, loving life—the birds landing on his finger and all of that. But really, to have this sense of sisterhood, brotherhood—he would talk about sister bird, sister death even. No sense of anything separate or shut out. That impressed me.

So we went to Assisi. And over all these centuries, his manifestation of truth is what so deeply inspires people—it still, over these centuries, deeply inspires people. But somewhere, somehow, something seems to have gone a little askew. Rather than recognizing that what he touches in people is that truth in us, some people seem to have gotten sidetracked onto a sense of veneration of the man himself. Because you go there and so many elegant, elaborate structures have been built to honor and be devoted to this man whose life was a statement of simplicity. It was really amazing to me.

We went in, and there are at least two humongous—I don't know if they're cathedrals, I don't know the exact term—but really huge structures with all kinds of artwork and many floors. The top floor with the most beautiful parts we couldn't go in because they were quite damaged in the earthquake a couple of years ago. But the one that really struck me: just on the bottom floor of this place, which was so huge you'd keep getting lost, right in the middle there's this tiny stone chapel. That is the actual chapel that St. Francis used to pray in. It's this teensy little rough stone thing from the twelfth century, lost in the middle of this gigantic cathedral built to honor St. Francis. And the place was packed, and of course there were rows and rows of souvenir stalls outside—St. Francis T-shirts and little... I didn't really get this, but it looked like little gray nun's habits for children, for girls. It was really bizarre.

And you get the sense—we often think of that as devotion, but that's not really the quality I'm speaking of as devotion. I don't mean that cynically, really. There's a love and respect that has led to all these elaborate structures being built, that draws people there. The legend, or what one has read or felt about St. Francis, is touching that spark of truth in people. But then it goes askew and gets onto him, venerating the person long gone—twelfth century, he's been gone a while. It's the simplicity.

So in our practice here as well, giving ourselves to it with devotion and knowing, it will go askew. Some wanting will come in. Some sense of looking for results, some sense of comparing—all the pitfalls, you know them all by now—will come in. That's okay. That's okay. Just remember: in the moment of love, in the moment of surrender, in the moment of devotion, the empty nature dawns nakedly.

We can become more attuned—I'm sure you have already—to really feel in our experience the difference between the moment of love and the moment of clinging. Sometimes it's subtle. But if you're feeling a little stuck, a little wanting, a little frustrated, or something's askew and you don't know what, sometimes I just try to get big with my awareness and check in attitudinally. Is my practicing from love? I don't even say the words, but really—is my practicing from love, or from wanting, or from self-aggrandizement in some way, needing to feel better about myself? Just check in and see.

And just a couple of things that are more conscious doings that sometimes can help me to reconnect with the surrender, the devotion, the love of truth rather than the wanting of truth. These are just various things. If they help you, great. If not, let them go.

Taking the refuges—taking refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma, in the Sangha—is so powerful for me. Saying it and really meaning it in the beginning of the day, the beginning of a sitting, in the middle of a hard time in walking. Taking the refuges as a reminder: all right, I take refuge in the Buddha, in awakened enlightenment. I take refuge in the truth. I take refuge in the Sangha. I'm not taking refuge in this thing that I want or in having a certain result. It just opens me into surrender again. Sometimes.

Sometimes it gives enough faith, enough willingness to act, that I can jump off the mountain in that moment like the monkey and land in the middle of whatever's happening—without needing to flinch away or hold back or have an escape route or a safety net. This willingness to act comes not from forcing, but from appreciation, from love.

Carlos Castaneda wrote that for sorcerers, this willingness could be called discipline—but discipline to meet the moment. He says that for sorcerers, discipline is the art of facing infinity without flinching. Not because sorcerers are strong and tough, but because they are filled with awe.

This is the courage to fly off the mountain and land in whatever is happening now—out of awe for the mystery of the truth of the Dharma, knowing that we'll never understand all of it. We can give up trying, and that release lets us really surrender into the middle of it.

Nature can have the same effect on me. Just going outside into the woods, no matter what the day is like, and opening up the senses to nature. Letting it come in. That sense of awe and mystery, of love and devotion, often returns from that simple act.

Conscious reflections on gratitude work similarly—which to me feels very close to the awe and beauty I find in nature. Gratitude to the Dharma itself. Gratitude to the whole lineage of people over the last 2,500 years who have suffered and practiced with discipline and commitment to keep the Dharma alive in this world, so that we can all be here now. Gratitude for the circumstances in my life that have allowed me to practice the Dharma, that have even allowed me to appreciate it.

The last thing I want to mention that really helps to open me to a sense of devotion, of love and surrender, is reflection on bodhicitta. Pema Chödrön describes this very simply as the noble or awakened heart—a tenderness for life. If you think of it that way, it's not quite so grandiose. A tenderness for life that awakens when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. In fact, when things are difficult, that's precisely when bodhicitta can be awakened.

I want to share what she says about it:

"It manifests as tenderness, basic compassionate warmth. When we walk around like we're expecting to be attacked, we block it. When we release the tension between this and that, the struggle between us and them, that's when bodhicitta will emerge. Bodhicitta is available in moments of caring for things, when we clean our glasses or brush our hair. It's available in moments of appreciation when we notice the blue sky or pause and listen to the rain. It's available in moments of gratitude when we recall a kindness or recognize another person's courage. It is available in music and dance, in art and in poetry. Whenever we let go of holding onto ourselves and look at the world around us, whenever we connect with sorrow, whenever we connect with joy, whenever we drop our resentment and complaint—in those moments bodhicitta is here."

I find that just the willingness to start a sitting or a walking with one moment of reflection on bodhicitta, one moment of willingness to say, "May my practice be for the benefit of all beings"—you don't have to believe it. Just have the willingness to incline the heart and mind in that direction. It's a lot like metta practice. It has an effect, a profound effect. It brings in the vastness of what we're doing beyond any mere sense of benefit for ourselves, because it takes the self out of it.

It gives us a stamina, a resoluteness, and a connectedness to life—an appreciation of life that could be called love, that could be called devotion. No matter what's happening in your experience, it makes it all worthwhile. And it gives us the courage and the willingness to open up our hearts and be here again for the next moment.

Anattā

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson demystifies one of Buddhism's most challenging teachings: anattā, the characteristic of not-self. Rather than approaching this as abstract philosophy, she offers a practical invitation to investigate our moment-to-moment experience of 'I-ing and my-ing' (ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra). Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Buddhadāsa and Ajahn Sumedho, Wilson explains that the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there is grasping or clinging in the mind—nothing more.
>
> Through vivid personal examples, including her memorable attachment to a meditation retreat mug, Wilson illustrates how the birth and death of self happens countless times each day. She guides practitioners to notice when clinging arises around the body, feeling tones (vedanā), emotions, thoughts, intentions, and even consciousness itself. The key practice is turning attention directly toward the experience of contraction and grasping rather than fighting or analyzing it.
> Wilson emphasizes cultivating contentment with emptiness (suññatā)—those 'nothing special' moments when no sense of self is present. Using the metaphor of space, she encourages practitioners to recognize that liberation doesn't require destroying something that exists, but rather seeing through the misperception that was never accurate to begin with. When this is understood, compassion naturally arises alongside the recognition of emptiness.

Tonight I want to talk about a specific aspect of the teachings, something that Steve spoke of a bit last night, and that is anattā, or the fact that there's no one here doing all of this. I really want to look at it from the perspective of deconstructing in our experience this sense of self that seems so solid.

Someone asked the Buddha once, "What is the one thing that liberated ones know that we don't, that makes them different?" And he said, "Knowing that nothing whatsoever should be clung to." Nothing. If we really knew that, we would be liberated. This whole dilemma we seem to find ourselves in—struggling with this sense of me and mine, self and no self—can be experienced very simply as the result of clinging or grasping in the moment, or not.

I know that often when we begin to talk about anattā, which is usually translated as "no self," there's a kind of inward groan, or the mind thinks, "Okay, that's not for me," and checks out. "I can never know that." Or else the mind really starts working: "Okay, let's hear this. How can there be no me? If there's no me, who decided to come here? If there's no me, who's eating dinner?"

So what I want to do tonight is hopefully not talk about this as a philosophical point, but as an invitation into investigating our own moment-to-moment experience. A lot of times we get the sense, or people talk about, how "I have to destroy the ego, I have to get rid of my ego"—as if to understand anattā means we somehow change. But it's just as with impermanence. It's not that everything's been permanent and then when you understand impermanence suddenly everything's changing. That's how it already is. Things are changing. It's the same with anattā. Nothing changes except our perception, our point of view. It's already true. I hate to tell you this, but it's not like you have to destroy something that exists in order to discover anattā. It's already true. It's the way things are.

Realizing anattā doesn't mean you cease functioning. We're all functioning more or less fine. Actually, we probably function a little better once we stop referring everything back to this concoction of experience that we cling to and call self.

That said—and I'm sure the mind's still whirring away—I want to use the model that Ajahn Buddhadasa, this Thai forest master that I think we've referred to on this retreat, uses. Rather than getting into a big deconstruction model or trying to think our way out of it, just begin to tune in to when there's a sense of me and when there's not. He calls the moments when there's no big sense of me by the Pali word suññatā, usually translated as "emptiness," or in his translator's rendering, "voidness"—moments that are, as Steve said last night, empty of any separate self.

It's interesting because when Buddhadasa was writing about becoming content with voidness, he said that when he first started teaching back in the thirties and forties in Thailand, although anattā is really one of the three characteristics, one of the core teachings of the Buddha—liberation teachings, not teachings just for the heck of it, but teachings to liberate us from suffering—even so, in Thailand, which is a Buddhist country, anattā wasn't taught very much to lay people. When he started teaching it, the monks would say, "No, no, don't teach that to lay people. They can't understand it very well." That was the held belief. And he said, "Forget it. Of course people can understand it. This is one of the liberating teachings. What are we talking about, not teaching it?"

It's really much more simple. It can be approached experientially in a way that makes it much more simple than when we get so caught in thinking about it.

As Buddhadasa talks about it, the moment when there's no particular strong sense of me or mine, a moment of emptiness so to speak, is very normal and natural. It happens many, many times in one day. We look sometimes for bells and whistles, some ecstatic explosion into unitive experience that never goes away. And until we get that, we don't really notice little nothing-special moments that are empty of grasping or clinging to me or mine. Another reason we often don't notice these moments is simply because they are nothing special. Going along, taking a step—nothing. We don't think, "Wow, a moment of no self."

We just think... Nothing's happening now. When's lunch? When's the next interesting sensation going to arise? This is just pressure. Felt this one before. We don't really notice it so much.

And what we do notice, just as Steve was talking about last night, is all the concoctions and elaborations and memories and stories that come up around any particular sense experience. We're really entranced by that. As he said, we're really just making up a dream and living in it and reacting to it, because what's happening is just this. Just this. And the mind that's living in all the concoctions thinks it wants a little more. So it keeps on spinning out the concoctions and forgets to notice. Ah. Just this.

That's, I think, why Buddhadasa talks about really cultivating a contentment with emptiness, a contentment with voidness. That's a lot of what our mindfulness practice is taking us into. Experientially, what we can begin to do, rather than thinking about, analyzing, or philosophically trying to understand anatta, what we can begin to do, moment to moment, here in practice and also in our daily life, is to examine with mindfulness, with the wisdom of mindfulness, with truth-discerning awareness, at the point of contact, when we feel the presence of a sense of I or mine. In other words, rather than just standing on the side and waiting for it to go away, we begin to explore what we're taking for granted as an ongoing sense of me, I, always in the background.

Buddhadasa uses the Pali words, which I really like: ahankara and mamankara, which means I-ing and my-ing. These are experiences that come and go, unexamined. Of course it feels like I'm always here. Doesn't it? If you don't really look closely, doesn't it feel like you're always there, here in the background—seeing, thinking, talking, eating? It feels like me. Without really exploring it, I'd say it was the same me that's always been here. And the more we think about it, the more solid it gets. How can I ever experience a sense of no self? I feel so solid. I'm never going to understand this. The more we think, that sense of I is getting stronger and stronger and stronger.

I used to feel like I was beating my head against a brick wall, and I would get into these internal torture sessions with myself about this. How can the sense of I not exist? It's clearly so strong. And of course, the more I was getting fixated on those thoughts, the stronger it got. What we need to do is turn around with our attention and explore the I-ing and my-ing itself, rather than assuming anything about that experience.

So when we turn around in a moment of I and my, what do we see? Now I'm going to tell you, of course, what I see, but I want you to look and see what you see, because my telling you won't do any good if you don't take that and turn around and look for yourself. So I really want this whole talk just to be an invitation for all of us to keep doing that, over and over and over, because it takes seeing it often.

This is Buddhadasa: "It's so simple. The sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind." That's it. That's it. Merely a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. We have a friend who puts it, "I want, I need, therefore I am." That's all.

This thing that feels so problematic and troublesome is a condition that arises and passes, not a steady state permanent experience. But it takes our truth-discerning awareness, our mindfulness right at the point of the sense of self arising, to see that it's a condition that comes and goes. The birth of self—it's born and dies many, many, many times in one day. Seeing that takes it out of the realm of some big steady state thing and it becomes just, oh yeah, another thing that comes and goes, just like that knee pain. Really, you don't have to get so reactive to it—or the knee pain either.

So this is a simple example, but it works. I was on a long retreat here at IMS. You know how the mugs are just all in that case there when you walk in. So I was on a retreat for a long time. I'd walk in, take a mug, get my tea, eat my meal—nothing. And after, I don't know, weeks, for some reason one morning the mug I took I'd never had before. And it just happened to be the perfect mug. I still can sort of remember this certain color green, and the grip was just right, and it just fit right on my mouth. And as I was drinking, I was appreciating what a perfect mug it was, and craving was born.

So first it's just craving. That's the beginning. There's contact, sense contact. It's pleasant. Craving arises. Sounds familiar?

Out of that craving, not really noticed, it strengthens into grasping. Yes, this is a good mug. I want this mug other times. And from being really quite present, just moment to moment, there was clearly the birth of me—me and my mug.

It was a very different experience from how things had been a few moments before. That was really a birth of self: me and my mug. And from what had been quite relaxed, just going along, there was suddenly a sense of complication. What do I do about this now? We have a situation that needs to be dealt with—me and my mug. Things aren't just free-flowing anymore.

Well, I managed to notice all that and, with quite some pride, put the mug back on the dish cart and left it alone.

So that's an example of birth of self. But putting it back on the dish cart wasn't death of self, because there was still pride. Aren't I doing a good job letting go of my mug? The clinging had simply moved from the mug to the emotion of pride. That's all. But that's actually two different births of self, you see, and we don't notice that. It feels like one steady state.

So that's really birth of self. That's the whole dependent origination happening right there. Sense contact, pleasant, craving turning to grasping—which is what Buddhadasa calls the I-ing and my-ing. Both came up: I and mine. And then it moves into having and being. It strengthens into: I'm a person who has this mug, and I want to continue to be a person who has this mug. What am I going to do about it?

Seeing that the birth of self is simply that clinging and all the concoctions that come around it.

So I did. I put it back. I went away. But the next meal, things weren't quite so simple. You see the constriction that comes into the mind and heart with the sense of self, with the craving. I was aware that in a subtle, background kind of way, I wanted that mug. And I looked for it, and it was there, and I got it. It was all a little mellower than the day before, but I was really aware of thinking, Okay, this time I'm going to hide it. I know everybody hides mugs. I know all the tricks—I've been here a long time. You know how a mug disappears and you don't see it for the rest of the three-month course? Somebody's nabbed it. I knew I could do that. And there were plenty of mugs.

I was just watching it all. You know how you kid yourself—you're being mindful. I'm watching all of this. But I really was going to do it, until I truly saw the constriction, the suffering. It's mild—this is really small suffering. But this is the suffering of the contraction of "I," the clinging. And I really saw it. I said, Ah. I get it. I don't need this.

And that time I really put it down. And that was it. Birth, and then a moment of death of that particular self.

So that's what I mean by really beginning to notice—not with hatred. It helps to laugh at it.

It's just another arising experience. But when there's clinging and grasping in the mind, the sense of self arises. And notice—rather than fighting it, turn the attention back onto the experience I'm calling "me," or the experience of clinging itself. That's how I could notice the restricted quality of mind and heart. Where everything had been spacious and flowing, the world had suddenly shrunk to me, the mug, and everyone else who was the enemy who might get my mug. It's a very different experience from seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting. Spaciousness. So put it down, sense of "I" disappears—death of the self in that moment.

We all experience this birth and death of self many, many times in one day, don't we? But do we notice? We might notice the birth because there's that more or less subtle sense of clinging. Sometimes we just focus on the thing clung to and we don't notice the sense of "me" so much. Turn around and notice that. But we often may not notice that moment of the death of the sense of "me." Because again, it's just—ah, that's nice. Often it's quite neutral. Those moments where that sense of self has died, nothing particular going on—that's often that neutral moment that we don't notice. So instead of generating a recognition and contentment with emptiness of self in that moment, we're kind of sitting back and going, "Well, nothing much happened," and now we wait for the next arising experience. In other words, the next something that gives us a sense of self again.

So we don't often notice the death of the self, the sense of self, and those moments of just what is without the extra. If you're waiting for something to happen very subtly, notice that, and begin to notice when the clinging opens up and there's just pure presence again.

What we can explore in our practice—not thinking about it, but whenever there's a moment like I just described with that mug, or you don't even know what it's about but you suddenly become aware that "I" and "mine" is feeling very present... or as someone mentioned today, they're just noticing the sense of self more in their practice. Rather than making a big thing about it, turn the attention around. With the investigative light of mindfulness, explore whatever the experience is in that moment that I'm calling "me" or "mine," without preconceptions. Not like, "Oh my God, me again. I've got to get rid of this. I've got to figure out who I am." That's already—you're not there anymore. We're lost in thought. It's like, "Oh, self." Turn around and see what that note is labeling.

I mentioned in the group today, I was doing that a lot one time when I was practicing with Sayadaw U Pandita. It would be about every third note, there'd be sense of self, you know, and I'd just note it. And seeing that each time, it was actually a different experience. It's not the same. There is not a self sitting back there that we're turning around and noting. It's just some experience of grasping. And that's what I want to talk about—the different experiences we grasp at and often don't notice. That's where the sense of self comes from.

But anyway, I was sitting with Sayadaw, and in the interview you're just supposed to describe very specifically what's happening in your sitting, what you're noting. So I tried to describe this, how I'm noting sense of self. Well, it didn't really make it through the translation and through the way they look at things in any kind of clear way. They got hysterical, the translator and Sayadaw. "She thinks there's a self! She's noting the self! Every third note she's noting the self! Haven't you been practicing for years? Don't you know better than that?" That wasn't my most memorable interview.

Anyway, clinging and grasping, "I-ing" and "my-ing," is simply a habit. And we can begin to explore what's actually going on with that habit just by bringing mindfulness there when we recognize it.

So, talking about a few of the experiences—which we all know—and how the clinging to that experience gives rise to the sense of "I" and "mine." The first one, obviously, is the body, our body. And what I have found most helpful—not thinking about it, but taking the attention and when we are having an experience of feeling we're clinging to our body—is to look with awareness and see: what's the actual experience that's happening right now that I'm calling "my body"? Because what I find, if you're just with the bare experience, say your knee's hurting, you know—"my knee, it's falling off, I need surgery, I'm going to the hospital." Okay, we know that's thoughts already.

You can come back to "my knee." But what's the actual experience? You're sitting there with your eyes closed, feeling sharpness. What are you actually calling "my knee" that you're so attached to? What's really happening in awareness at that particular moment?

I've noticed so often that I'll be sitting, there's sensation—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, doesn't really matter—and there's almost like a visual, very subtle visual background. I don't know, I might be seeing my whole body. I might be imagining seeing my knee from the outside or from the inside, or not even that clear, but a subtle reference back to some almost pre-verbal, almost pre-image idea of my body. And it's not actually the sensation itself that I'm clinging to, but it's this overlay of subtle image that I'm calling "my body." So it's actually more attachment or clinging to an image or a sense or an idea.

Come back and look, in any moment, when you think, "Oh, my body, what am I going to do if I get sick? What if something happens to my kidney?" And you go down the whole thing. What's actually in that moment? Am I even connecting with my body? In that moment, for me, it's actually almost completely thought and emotion. "My body"—well, when I connect, there's nothing wrong with my kidney. I don't feel anything. That's just some idea going on. Or there's a simple unpleasant sensation.

And if you move just into the sensation, simply feeling it—twinging, burning, itching, whatever it is—how can we even think of that, if you're just with it? How can I think of that as Carol? I mean, it's not even female or male. Just sensation. Does it have an age, that sensation? Is it American? Has it gone through all the experiences I think Carol has gone through in my life? It's just an arising and passing sensation.

So it gets really interesting to come in. I might be clinging or having aversion to that sensation, but "my body"? It's a whole idea. Again, don't think about this. It won't help. Bring your attention into your actual physical experience and notice the difference.

For example, those really hot days, or today if you were hot, you notice the difference between, "Ah, I'm so hot. It's so hot. I'm just a rag. I'm all washed up. I can't function. I can't meditate. Ah, it's so hot." And just sensations you might call heat, or it might just be vibrating, or it might just be moisture. There's a huge difference. The sensations didn't really change in those two. The clinging and what we're clinging to is vastly different.

So next time you find yourself in some mode of "I am my body" or "I have this body" or "I'm saddled with this body"—I'm dragging this body through samsara—whatever way you're relating to your body, stop and bring your attention to the actual experience, the material experience itself. This is where the mindfulness and the concentration are really helpful. Then see what thoughts, emotions, and storyline around those sensations you were confusing with the physical experience itself. Just notice that without preconceptions.

The concentration can be helpful because there are times when you can really experience your body, when you're sitting or walking, as sensations arising in space. There are times that people report in practice where the sense of body shape and form falls away. It's just the perception anyway, and the perception shifts. Sometimes that's scary for people because it's unfamiliar.

Sometimes it's pleasant for people. Sometimes it's nothing special. It's just a shift in perception. But experiencing that shift in perception from time to time is very helpful because it helps us see that this sense of solid form in space, unchanging, is just that—a different perception. It's not necessarily the true perception.

So one of the things that happens with our mindfulness, when we come to the bare experience free of all the papañca, is that we can begin to experience how things are underneath. Because the sense of lasting self is really just a misperception. That's all it is. When we begin to perceive in a different way, that sense of me doesn't have such a grip. That's really what's going on in this practice a lot of the time.

Many people report having experiences that are unfamiliar, accompanied by a little bit of fear. They'll look back and say, "I don't know why—the experience wasn't actually unpleasant, but somehow there was this fear." Just the fear of the unfamiliar, of a different perception.

So of course there's the clinging to body. Look and see what you're really clinging to, what you're calling body.

The second aspect of experience where clinging arises quite easily is this feeling tone —vedanā—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. We've talked about this quite a bit. As we've said, we often don't notice the pleasant or unpleasant quality and get lost in our reaction to the experience. But with this clinging and the sense of self, I've found for myself that often in an experience there can be this clinging and the sense of me arising with the clinging, the contraction around the pleasant or unpleasant feeling tone. And you don't really notice it because we're more focused on what it is that's pleasant or unpleasant.

A simple example: when you have a good sitting. You know, the breath is just so nice and smooth, and you're so present with it, and the mindfulness is how you like it. And you're aware of it. So often it happens that we think, "Well, I know this is going to change." We're telling ourselves the whole time, "I know this is going to change. I'm not getting attached." Rising, falling, noting, noting. And often, of course, it changes. And of course, we find out that somehow we were attached because we're disappointed. It isn't quite so free-flowing.

Often the thing—not always, but sometimes—the thing we don't see is that we were noticing the experience but not quite noticing the pleasant feeling and the attachment to it. So the sense of "I" becomes: I am not getting attached to this really nice, mindful sitting. And there's the clinging, the grasping, the "I" arising in response to my pleasant feeling.

So that's another one. And as I mentioned the other night, Buddhadasa says a lot about exploring the nature of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling because they're so ephemeral, so wave-like. If we really tune in and say, "Oh, this is such a great experience, my pleasant feeling"—well, when we look at it that way, the oomph goes out of it. "Oh yeah, my pleasant feeling. Now that one's gone. Oh yeah, my next pleasant feeling. Now that one's gone." We quit identifying with it so much, the identification just being that clinging.

Now, the next area—the whole area of the mind, thoughts, emotions, concoctions, the me-story—is obviously extremely complex. It's obviously an area where a great deal of the birth and death of the self is happening. And because it's so quick and complex, it's often unnoticed.

In fact, the Buddha once said—and I'm paraphrasing—he said that if you must identify with something, if you must think the self is something, better to identify with the body because at least that's changing more slowly than the mental stuff. The mind is going so quickly. The thoughts and emotions and the whole conglomeration of thoughts and emotions happening together—the formations, the stories—it's so easy for the sense of me to come in, and so easy not to notice the impermanent nature of that birth and death of self because they're just flowing one into the other and it can seem very continuous. The continuity is an illusion, but we often don't notice that.

So I'll just give some examples. Starting with emotions, just because it's easier to talk about an emotion—though I know they often come with thoughts and with our whole life story. But just to start with emotions, I've noticed for myself: first of all, we see in the sitting here how emotions just come and go and come and go. How many emotions have you been through on this retreat?

And still, there are certain emotions that when they come—we've seen them come and go a million times in our life—but certain emotions, when they come: this is it. This is really me. This is who I am. "I've felt like this all day. I've been so sad all day." Or the worthlessness went away for a little while, but really, that's the core of my being, and it's under there all the time, whether I'm aware of it or not. And now it's surfaced again.

So there's an assumption that we don't look at. Yes, it's always here.

I just don't always notice it, but it's always here.

So to begin with, you might notice which emotions can come and go quite fine. Anicca, yes, emotions are just clouds passing through the sky. And which ones are really grasped? Which ones really give birth to a sense of me and mine? My worthlessness, my sadness, my joy, my loving-kindness—whatever it is, we can grasp at it.

Notice when there's a sense, unexamined, that "I've felt like this all day" or "This has been going on the whole retreat." And even when it's really intense—I've noticed I could be in really intense grief coming up a lot during a day—there will be moments when it's just not there and I'm suddenly bored. Moments when, in the midst of the most ecstatic sitting, you're suddenly thinking, "Well, that's nice, but when's lunch going to be? I wonder what's happening for lunch today." Oh yes, I'm about to get enlightened, right? I forgot.

Just notice those moments when the continuity of this "me-emotion" isn't there. Noticing the gaps, noticing the coming and going, really helps to let go of the grasping that gives the sense of self. Or pushing away—it's the same, you know. Grasping for it to be gone creates the same sense of me and mine as grasping for it to stay.

And then you might notice that with certain emotions, there are times when the emotion is just there. Say sadness. It's not a problem. Then we might assume it's the presence of the emotion that interferes with peace, the presence of the emotion that makes me feel so solid. But there are plenty of times when sadness has been really just coming and going, and there's no particular grasping or reaction—it's no problem. But then suddenly it turns into my sadness. And there's a whole birth of self in that moment that feels very different—much more solid, much more problematic, much more sense of me and my sadness, my whole life history, what to do about it. Really no different from picking up that mug and getting attached.

And then there might be another moment where it's simply, "Oh, right, there's sadness." And that moment of pure mindfulness, when it's with an emotion, very clearly feeling it but nothing extra—that's also a moment of emptiness. There's no "I" manufactured around that emotion. So explore this stuff.

Now, the whole complex of emotions and thoughts and memories and projections—this happens so quickly, so quickly that from nothing to our whole life history can happen in a tenth of a second. It's really fascinating to watch it, to look.

I can remember one time I was doing walking meditation down in the gym. Just present, no sense of self particularly, just walking, really focused. And I just ran my finger under my turtleneck. That's all. Very mindfully ran my finger under my turtleneck. And because I was so present, I could notice this whole stream happening just like that. This is nothing special, right? There was no big pain, no big desire going on. I ran my finger under my turtleneck, had the physical sensation, an image flashed in my mind—a made-up image of what I looked like walking with my turtleneck and my finger under it. The thought came, some thought about slumpy yogi attire, how it gets about two months into the three-month course and we're all just slumping around in our sweatpants. A sense of self-image projected out, wondering what other people thought of me, and in that came a solid sense of me, around really that whole quick conglomerate of mental images, thoughts, and then memories. A feeling of contraction, feeling of clinging—ah, solidity of Carol.

It's fascinating to watch that happen. And admittedly, that's really subtle. We don't have to wait for it to be so subtle, but we can explore how the mind does that.

One of the ways that the sense of self seems so strong and continuous is that, just in that moment I described, the story of Carol starts up—slumping along in the three-month course, and what do I look like, and how I looked in the past, and how I'm going to look in the future, and how the other yogis look. We're telling ourselves our self-story all day long. We forget to notice that the self-story is constantly changing in response to clinging to different experiences.

So one moment you're the slump yogi who's just wasting their time and not doing very well and not getting anywhere. And the next moment somebody goes running by looking really distracted, and you've suddenly become ace yogi, headed for Dharamsala to consult with the Dalai Lama. It's a whole different series of thoughts and emotions and sensations that are clung to. There's nothing the same about the two series except that sense of clinging and the calling it "I."

If you turn around and look, it's just clinging arising and falling, arising and falling, thoughts and emotions arising and falling. But we don't stop and say, "Well, there's the schlump me, and then there's the ace yogi me, and then there's the wise me, and then there's the..." And if we do do that, we start to think we're really going crazy. "Oh my God, there are so many me's in there!"

None of them are. They're just arising, clinging to specific conglomerations of thoughts and emotions. And if you can just notice that.

I have commentary, self-story going on in my mind a great part of the day. You might notice that too. I don't know if everyone has it, but it goes something like: "Now she's doing the dishes. Now she's scraping the dishes so mindfully. Now she clunked them down and made a loud noise. Now she's walking, lifting, moving." I mean, it's ridiculous. But if you see it, it's just a thought. It's just a thought. It does not have to be clung to. The biggest self-story going is just more thoughts and emotions coming and going. It doesn't have to be clung to. And then it's not self. It's just thoughts.

I'll give you an example. I think this was from the same retreat, I'm not sure, but I was sitting in my room. I'd been sitting for some weeks, just sitting and noticing what was happening. I coughed a little, and I was just noticing sensations—tickling, tickling, burning, burning, coughing, coughing. This went on for some time, nothing dramatic, just sensations coming and going.

And then this thought arose: "Oh, this feels like bronchitis," which I'd had a couple of times already that winter, quite seriously. That's the thought coming and going. Then the thought: "Oh my god, this feels like bronchitis." Really strong birth of self in that moment, attachment to that thought. And from that thought, immediately panic—total panic. "Oh my god, what am I going to do? I got so sick before. I can't... I have to leave in a week. I have to teach here. I have to go there. I have no time to have bronchitis. I cannot deal with this."

Total panic. And then I thought, okay, what's happening here? Tickle, tickle. Cough, cough. Thinking, thinking. That's really all that was happening. And that whole panic completely went away. The whole sense of me—the death of the self again. Just sensations coming and going. Thoughts coming and going.

And I really saw that we have a choice where to let the mind dwell. What's so interesting is how often we choose to dwell on suffering. Because I saw that I could really just stay with the sensations and there was absolutely no problem. But my mind said, "Yeah, but bronchitis." And it would want to jump back there.

There's a line Ajahn Buddhadasa uses. He calls it "volunteering for suffering." And I thought, yes, my mind's volunteering for suffering here. I could stay with this, but no, what if it's bronchitis? Oh my god. And back into the panic.

I went back and forth, back and forth. It actually got fun because you could see it—birth of self, death of self, birth of self, death of self. And this, back to the barbershop question this morning, does not mean that if I'm not caught and clinging to "Oh my god, bronchitis"—just tickle, tickle, cough, cough—it doesn't mean I couldn't still tell if it was bronchitis.

Because actually it was. I could tell that and I could take appropriate action. All of that could happen without panic. Not the "oh my God, bronchitis, me, my past history, my future history, my whole life, what's going to happen?" Just staying with what is. The functioning just arises, doing what's obvious. It doesn't have to have all this clinging and self-story in it.

So that's an example of how quick and fast all the conglomerations of thought and feeling and memory and history and emotion can become so solid. But instead of trying to think your way out of it, you simply take your attention back to the feeling of panic, the feeling of clinging, that simple contraction itself. Don't try to think about "what am I calling self?" Turn attention to the contraction and just notice—oh yeah, grasping. It goes. Let it go. Nothing to hold on to there. It's really quite interesting.

A couple of other very subtle things we cling to that really feel like self, because they're so subtle. I just want to mention them, drop them in as something to explore in your practice. Again, please, if you notice your mind getting into a lot of thinking about it, just notice that we cling to that thinking. The sense of self gets strong and we think, "Well, of course this can't be true, because the more I think about it, the more solid I am, so that's baloney." Just notice that and come back to experience.

One is what we've talked about the last couple of days—the experience of intention. That intending to move, intending to eat a bite of food, intending to stand up. It's a subtle thing, often not noticed at all. And of course, unnoticed, if you say, "Who's standing up?" Well, I am. What kind of a stupid question is that? Who decided to come here? Who's eating?

When we can begin to have the mind quiet enough that we notice just that movement, that intention before scratching an itch, say, we can begin to see that the intention itself is a mental event that arises and passes. So you can really see the cause and effect nature of it, which takes it out of the realm of being "me."

To take a very simple example: itching when you're sitting. Unpleasant sensation gives rise to aversion. Aversion gives rise to the desire to move, to scratch the itch. It's all cause and effect. There's not some "me" in there, you know, all-seeing, having that intention. The intention arises as a result of causes. There might then be, also in that moment, mindfulness and wisdom that sees that intention and sort of has the intention not to act on it, so you don't. Another moment there's not mindfulness or wisdom, and you know how you've watched the intention ten times and suddenly you're scratching and you don't know how that happened? Or you're walking very thoroughly, very committedly, and suddenly you find yourself in the dining room having a cup of tea and you don't know how that happened. You were really committed to the walking meditation, but somehow here I am.

Intention arising unnoticed—and it feels like me. When we notice it, there's not necessarily any clinging. You can act or not, but there's not that identification, that clinging, that contraction around the intention.

Another, and this is even more subtle, is the mindfulness itself—the moments of consciousness themselves. That moment of knowing. We say the sound arises, and it's quite spontaneously known; the hearing happens. But if we think about it—well, who knows? Who? I know, obviously.

It's very easy, because the consciousness, the knowing, is so subtle. To notice that it arises and falls takes the mind to be quite quiet—even to notice consciousness at all, the mind needs to be a little quiet. So please don't try to puzzle this out. But in times when you're really aware of both the sensation and the knowing of it—if you're unconscious, the sensation can happen and we don't know it, right? If you're unconscious or asleep and there's a loud sound, you don't hear it.

So the knowing is that consciousness, that presence, that wakefulness. Prior to thought or verbalization, consciousness is simply the knowing of sound. It's not, "Oh, that's a robin calling."

That's more than consciousness. Consciousness is just that knowing quality.

When our mind is quiet, we can play with turning attention to that and begin to see also that it's not a steady state, and it's not me. But when we feel like we're noticing everything coming and going, coming and going, we're not clinging, we really feel like that—but still there's this subtle feeling of I-ing and my-ing somewhere in the background. Turn around and notice that sometimes what the contraction of self is around, what the clinging is around, is just that subtlety of knowing.

So whenever you notice the feeling of self, turn around with awareness, land on the feeling itself, the experience itself. It may be a physical kind of contraction—I feel it that way. It may be more subtle than that. But turn around and notice what it actually is in that moment, not thinking about it. And this is going to happen, this birth and death of I-ing and my-ing, many, many times in one day. There will also be many, many moments when there's not a sense of self.

So it's not so much that we have to take some dynamite and blast away this thing, self. It's more just beginning to see its impermanent, illusory nature—that a rapidly changing experience, actually many, many different rapidly changing experiences, because of our lack of investigation and our misperception, we're taking for granted a continuity that is not there.

And so then when I feel now, and I feel like really solid Carol, it's just another experience coming and going. It's not, "Oh my God, I am so strong again! It's so humiliating, what am I going to do about it?" Okay, sense of self. Just another arising experience, just like anger, just like pain, just like hearing. And when you take away that kind of explosive reactive quality we can have around it, then we can actually explore it in a much more balanced and spacious way.

So the sense of self is merely an appearance that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. And what follows on that, as the Buddha said, as Buddhadasa elaborates on, means that nothing is worth clinging to. I mean, we'll still cling, mind you, but nothing's worth it. That means nothing. That means not any of the things I've mentioned. It means not our mindfulness. It means not clinging to wisdom. It means not clinging to views of practice. It means not clinging to any idea whatsoever of who we think we are. It's the clinging itself that creates the separation, the sense of isolation, the misperception that keeps us in this wheel of suffering over and over.

What's also true is that in many moments, we all have that potential to recognize and generate that contentment with emptiness, that contentment with no sense of self. And it's important that we also begin not to overlook these times, to realize that, again, you don't have to wait until you're in some incredibly deep state of concentration. There are sometimes very strong experiences of emptiness that really can blast away a lot of our conditioning. That's true. But you don't have to wait for that, because the fact that there's no ongoing self is true now, every moment, no matter what your experience is. And we can begin to notice those moments when that's more evident.

As I said before, I think one of the reasons it's a little difficult to notice those moments is because there's so nothing special. We get more interested in things, and it's harder in a way to be open to the spaciousness of nothing special.

In fact, I've found the metaphor of space as a way to generate contentment with emptiness can be very helpful at times. This is from Ajahn Sumedho. He's talking about space. He's saying, is knowing the unconditioned, which is a word for nibbāna—is that very interesting or fascinating? You might think, "I'd like to know God or Dhamma. It's going to be an incredibly fascinating thing to know, something blissful and ecstatic." So you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think that getting high is getting close.

But he says the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. Look at the space in this room. Is it very interesting to look at? It's not to me. The space in this room is like the space in the other room. The things in this room, the people in this room, may be good, bad, beautiful, ugly, interesting, uninteresting—but the space, what is it? There's nothing you can really say about it except that it's spacious.

And as there's nothing one can grasp in space, the only way one recognizes it is by not clinging to the objects in the room. That's what allows us to recognize the space. So when you let go, when you stop your absorptions, your judgments, your criticisms and evaluations of the people and the things in the room, you can begin to experience the space of it. But that takes a lot of patience and humility.

And I've noticed in my own practice at times almost a discomfort with spaciousness—spaciousness which simply means non-clinging.

I noticed one time I was doing a self-retreat somewhere in California, sitting outside with a very vast, spacious view. This is actually a nice way of inviting in that sense of spaciousness, just as we do with hearing meditation, where sounds are simply coming and going in space. There's not such a tendency to glom on.

So there was this spacious view. I was sitting with my eyes open, just being aware of space. And then I noticed there were four horses—teensy-tiny. I mean, I guess they were normal size, but they were in the distance. They looked teensy-tiny, way down in the back, moving around. You could hardly see them in proportion to the vastness of the view. But I would notice that my mind, my attention, would continually be drawn to those horses. What are they doing? Are they moving? Just fixated on the horses. And when I'd notice that, it was really a kind of grasping. Oh, right. And the next moment, the mindfulness would fall away and zoom—glommed back onto those little teensy horses.

I've often noticed a kind of uncomfortableness without this sense of relating, without this sense of fixating on something. Just as Ajahn Sumedho says, my conceptions and our points of view and all the things we think and say and do about each arising thing—just to let it be there in the space without attaching special significance to something was a little bit unsettling, a little bit uncomfortable. That's simply a habit of mind.

So playing with this sense of spaciousness, whether it's actually noticing space or being with hearing—spaciousness doesn't mean spaced out. It doesn't mean indifferent or disconnected. It's simply the quality of non-grasping. And you can be spacious and also be very precise. That's why space is only a metaphor. It's not an exact description.

If there's total, precise attention with anything—inside a sensation of breath, inside an emotion, inside what's happening—in that moment, isn't it true there's no reference back to anything else? There's just only the purity of that moment. There's no past, no future. There's no sense of anything else. That's also a quality of pure presence, non-clinging, very, very present, and nothing else. So in a way, it's total space as well, if you get a sense of what I mean. Just to let you know, it doesn't mean you have to only look at the sky and you can't notice what's happening. It's that quality of grasping, discomfort with nothingness, with emptiness. Just begin to notice that, play with the spaciousness.

So from Ajahn Sumedho, just to end: In your meditation now, as you incline towards the emptiness of the mind, towards the spaciousness of the mind, just incline to stillness and not taking something up and making something of it. Just letting things be as they are. As you incline towards spaciousness, towards stillness, your habitual grasping, fascination, revulsions, fears, doubts, and worries—all of that stuff that we get so fascinated by about the conditions—lessens. You begin to recognize they're just things that come and go. They're not self, nothing to get excited about or depressed about. They are as they are. We can allow conditions to be just as they are because they come and go. Their nature is to go away, so we don't have to make them go away. We're free and patient enough to allow things to take their natural course. In this way, we liberate ourselves from struggle, strife, and the confusion of an ignorant mind that has to spend all its time evaluating and discriminating, trying to hold onto something, trying to get rid of something. Things are as they are. The experience of I-ing and my-ing is simply another condition that is as it is. Turn our attention to it rather than fighting with it, struggling with it, or avoiding it, and see that this too is simply a condition that arises and passes, nothing to take up and make something of.

And this leads us not into some kind of nihilistic life where nothing matters, but just the reverse. It allows for the depth of compassion and connectedness. Because really, all the suffering, all our wanting and fearing comes from this sense of an ongoing, unchanging self that I have to protect all the time.

So there's a lovely quote from Padampa Sangye: "Once you really understand emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything harmful. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously."

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

Thank you for your attention. Thank you for listening.

This concludes the talk.

CHAPTER 320

Wise Intention

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses the challenge of transitioning from retreat practice to everyday life, emphasizing that the most demanding aspect of practice is bringing moment-to-moment awareness into our daily existence. She explores sammā saṅkappa (wise intention or right thought), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, as a powerful tool for navigating complex life situations with mindfulness.

Wilson examines how intention serves as the crucial link between wisdom (paññā) and our actions in the world through speech, conduct, and livelihood. She explains the Buddha's specific teaching that wise intention counteracts unwholesome mental states: intention of renunciation (nekkhamma) counteracts greed, intention of non-ill will (abyāpāda) counteracts hatred, and intention of compassion (avihiṃsā) counteracts cruelty. Drawing from the suttas, she illuminates how right view naturally leads to right intention, and how these factors work together with right effort and right mindfulness.

Through vivid examples—from walking meditation to Sister Chan Khong's mindful activism to the challenges of environmentalists—Wilson demonstrates how paying attention to intention creates moments of genuine choice and transformation. She reframes renunciation as the joyful release of attachment rather than punishment, and emphasizes that difficult retreat experiences, met with kindness and satipaññā (mindfulness-wisdom), are often the most transformative for developing compassion and equanimity. The talk concludes with Pema Chödrön's insight that learning kindness toward ourselves opens us to the entire universe.

So in a few days, we'll be entering into the most challenging part of this retreat, which is the rest of your life. And I'm serious. That is the most challenging—it really is the rest of our lives.

A lot of the anxiety and expectation that starts to come up has to do with however you're feeling now, which is somehow different from how you were before you came to the retreat. Either we're projecting how it's going to stay like this in our life, or maybe we're going to get out of this and get back to something more pleasant. But really, when I say it's the most challenging part, what I mean is this: bringing the same quality, the same commitment to awakening moment to moment that we bring in a retreat is what we need to bring to our life.

While I do believe it's true that we don't need to leave our life behind to walk a path of awakening—that we don't need to go live in a nunnery or a monastery—I also think it's really important that we remember we don't need to leave the path of awakening behind in order to live our life.

In our Western dharma culture, we say, and we mean it, but it's almost become too easy to say, "My life is my practice." And we mean it, sort of. But you see how hard practice is. What makes us think it's going to be any easier when everything gets faster and more complicated?

We need to bring a quality of deep, openhearted commitment to the aspects of our life, because what seems so obvious now—it came up in some of the groups today, and I always experience it on retreat—won't stay obvious. Right now it's clear just how painful clinging is. It's obvious how everything changes. How can I ever forget that thoughts are ephemeral and have no intrinsic meaning? It's just so clear that we can't imagine it all getting so solid again. Of course it does, and then it loosens up again.

What I want to talk about tonight is one of many tools of mindfulness, a specific focus of mindfulness that has been quite helpful for me in bringing awareness to the more complex situations of everyday life. That's mindfulness of intention—right intention or wise intention or wise thought or wise aspiration, different translations of the second step of the Eightfold Path.

I want to talk about it because it's bringing the microscope into something that's such a subtle experience, as we've noticed here. But the subtleness can lead us into not respecting the fact that it's intention that gets us into both the beautiful things we do and also all the trouble that we get ourselves into. It all starts with intention. Incredibly important.

So consciously bringing mindfulness to intention, to why we're doing what we're doing in our life, in moments of choice big and small, is a key link in living a life of awareness. It's the way the Buddha placed it in delineating the Eightfold Path, which begins with wise or right understanding. Right view, remember, is the view of how things are, which leads naturally to the second step: wise thought, how we think about the world, or wise intention, the intentions that lead to the next three steps—wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood.

Intention is the link between understanding or wisdom and how we manifest with ourselves, with other beings, with this planet. A very direct, immediate link.

As with all aspects we talk about on this path, it works in two ways. On one hand, intentions naturally transform in the light of wisdom. In one way, there's nothing we have to do but pay attention. On the other hand, of course, there's the commitment to cultivate and develop and pay attention. So in one way we don't have to do anything, and on the other side we have to pay attention every minute of our lives. Somehow those two come together.

I know for myself, probably for some of you, if I just don't really take care with paying attention to why I'm doing what I'm doing, even with having a good heart—and I'd say basically all of us here have good hearts relative to some of the stuff that goes on on this planet—we see what happens when left to its own devices without any commitment to awareness. The greed, hatred, and delusion just spring up, get in their old grooves, and run the show. All we have to do is pay attention for that to begin to transform.

Intention, sometimes called right thought or wise thought, is an interesting place because it's a place where we can explore how the completely empty, ephemeral nature of a thought can suddenly become so solid that we're doing and saying something that, given a little more attention, we really wouldn't have wanted to do or say. Or vice versa—a really kind, loving thought or intention can also strengthen into intention that leads to action. Sometimes you'll find yourself surprised doing a really kind or generous thing, thinking, "Oh, is that me? I'm not used to doing something like that."

So intention is the place where emptiness comes to meet the relative nature of life as it manifests in speech and action.

You know that quotation from Padmasambhava that Joseph read the other night? "Although my view is as spacious as the sky"—the emptiness, the ephemeral nature of all experience—"my respect for karma, for action, and my respect for cause and effect is as fine as grains of barley flour." How do we hold both? They come together in right thought, right intention.

We talked about in the instructions, and many of you were looking at in your practice, that very subtle expression of intention that's almost prior to thought. Just that subtle "about to," that direction, that inclination of the mind that leads to speech and action. Sometimes it's a little stronger, a little more clear, and it actually manifests as a thought: "I'm getting out of here."

And at the broader level, sometimes wise aspiration—you could think of intention really in the macro, like the aspiration for a lifetime. Remember when Marcia talked about back in the time of the Dipankara Buddha, when the being who became Gautama

Buddha, who was a mendicant then, had the great aspiration to spend all those eons and eons of lifetimes to become a Buddha? That was one mind moment that had a lot of power. It fed into succeeding mind moments, but that's the really broadest aspect of intention.

What's interesting about intention, as with everything, is that it's simply arising as an effect of previous causes and as a cause for the next effects. In other words, it's enmeshed in a whole series of cause and effects; it doesn't arise alone. For example, there's the intention to scratch your knee. That would be arising due to previous physical sensations that are unpleasant, maybe aversion—maybe it's noticed, maybe it's not—leading to the intention to move the hand and scratch. So intentions don't arise in isolation, and they arise as a result of and together with the whole variety of mental states.

And that's what determines, in the aspect of karma, in the aspect of the psychology as the Buddha talked about it, whether an action is wholesome or unwholesome, skillful or unskillful. Karmically, it has nothing to do with the effect, with the result of the action, because that's out of our control. Which is interesting, because mostly that's what we focus on. If we get the desired result, then good—it was a good action. If it doesn't turn out, it was bad. The Buddha is saying that's out of our control. The place of karma, of wholesomeness or unwholesomeness, is in the intention. It's in what states of heart and mind are causing this intention to arise, or what it's coming together with.

So this is one reason why judging other people is so completely useless. You can't tell from the outside why someone's really doing something. And we're lucky if we can tell why we're really doing something. That's really where we could put our energy in paying attention.

Just an example: if you take the same action of saying something to somebody that's a bit difficult to say, or that's hard for them to hear, that can come from such a wide range of intentions—both wholesome and unwholesome. It could be really scary for you to say, but out of really deep compassion, because you really think it will help that person to know, you say it. That would be a really compassionate, courageous action. You could say the same thing out of knowing that it's going to be hard for them to hear and kind of being glad that it's going to be hard for them to hear. You could say it out of revenge. You could say it out of real anger—it's going to be hard for them to hear, but at least maybe they'll stop doing this thing and leave me alone. You could say it out of a kind of pride, that you're able to point out to that person their faults. You could say it out of just complete delusion, complete obliviousness to how it's going to affect that person—it just comes in your mind and you say it. Or you could say it with good intentions, really trying to help, but with an obliviousness, a neglect of whether it's a useful and helpful time to say that to that person. So you come in, they've had a horrible day at work, they're really busy, they're cooking dinner, the kids are screaming, and you say, "I have something really important. I think you need to hear about your behavior last week." Not so helpful.

So you get the sense of what I mean. We can't evaluate even our own actions by how they look—forget about somebody else's. And so intention is the key.

The Buddha specifically described what he means by wise or right thought, right intention in several suttas. He's quite specific. Right intention counteracts the unwise intentions or thoughts of greed, of ill will, and of cruelty. So he says, "What, friends, is right intention? Intention of renunciation"—which counteracts the intention of greed.

Intention of non-ill will—you could read that as metta—counteracts intentions of ill will. And intentions of compassion, of non-cruelty, counterbalance intentions of cruelty.

You notice there's not an intention of non-delusion, because the Buddha also says that delusion, moha, isn't counterbalanced by an intention, but by wise seeing, by wisdom. So we can't really say, "I will now have an intention of wise seeing." Rather, simply in the connection, in the doing, in the moment of mindfulness, clear seeing is there.

So that's right intention—very specific.

And first comes right view. The Buddha again: "Right view comes first. And how does right view come first? One understands that wrong intention is wrong intention and that right intention is right intention." That sounds simplistic, but it actually isn't. That is one's right view.

I think a huge amount of what goes on in our practice here is allowing us to come to understand wrong intention or unskillful intention as wrong or unskillful. And if those words catch the mind—if it kind of echoes of "I'm bad because it's wrong, right intention means I'm good"—think of wrong or unskillful intention as meaning intention that brings suffering to oneself or to another. Take away the blame and just think: it's wrong in that it causes suffering to myself or another when I think, speak, or act with intentions of greed, ill will, or cruelty. It's that simple.

And wise intention—intention of renunciation, of metta, of compassion—doesn't bring suffering. It brings joy and peace to ourselves or another. So it's basically back in the realm of the really practical. What brings happiness in our life? What brings happiness to others, and what doesn't?

And really, that's what we've been seeing like a hundred million times every day, isn't it? Sometimes. We don't quite notice it, but if we pay attention enough, we do. When we're acting out of greed, we suffer. Sooner or later, we notice that. When we act or speak or even spin in thoughts of ill will or cruelty, we suffer. And the opposite leads to no suffering.

That's really what the Buddha means by "right view comes first"—that we get this on some level. Not totally and completely, but we get it enough to motivate us to be willing to continue to pay attention, to be willing to cultivate wise intention.

So as I said, we need to cultivate. But our intentions, our attitude to life, our attitude to moment-to-moment experience—which is all life is—also transforms naturally through right view, through understanding. When, for example, we notice that we're really suffering from the greediness of our mind, when we really see that, in that moment the heart naturally lets go. Because greediness comes from thinking it's going to make us happy. When we really notice it's making us miserable, at least for that moment, something lets go. That's wise intention of renunciation.

And at the same time it requires effort. Again, the Buddha: "One makes an effort to abandon wrong intention." He doesn't say one makes an effort to hate wrong intention. One simply makes the effort to abandon it, just let it alone, and to enter upon right intention. "This is one's right effort. Mindfully, one abandons wrong intention. Mindfully, one enters upon and abides in right intention. This is one's right mindfulness. Thus, these three states run and circle around right intention"—that is, right view, right effort, and right mindfulness.

So you see right there, he's brought in the whole Eightfold Path circling around right intention: right view, right effort, right mindfulness. And of course speech and actions are the direct result of right intention. He doesn't mention samadhi, but you need that to even pay attention, to notice the intention in the first place.

What's so powerful about noticing a moment of intention—whether it's the subtle moment you might see in a sitting here or a larger intention as we're making a choice or about to act in our life—is that that moment of mindfulness can be a powerful moment of transformation. Transformation of how we're living, how we're relating, how we're going to speak and act. Because in that moment of recognizing what's leading to what I'm going to say, what I'm going to do, there's a moment there, as if a moment of choice. And that's where wise intention can either arise naturally, or we can cultivate it a little bit.

An example in the walking meditation. I think I've used this before. You're walking, and suddenly—or not so suddenly—there's an unpleasant sensation in the feet, in the back, or you're tired. And without quite noticing it, there's the thought: "I've had enough, I'm out of here." Out of here might mean a cup of tea. Out of here might mean into Barry. Out of here might be on the Greyhound bus to New York City.

It really depends how unpleasant the sensation is and how strong the thought becomes. Unnoticed, well, at least you're having the cup of tea. But noticed, there's really a moment of recognition: "Oh, I see—that's aversion. I hate this. I'm going to go have a cup of tea."

And in seeing that, without blaming or judging, one can tune in: "Oh, aversion. I don't really want to be driven by that." There's just that stepping back. Mindfulness is again present. In noticing the aversion, we're meeting that intention with satipañña—with mindfulness and wisdom. The mindfulness allows us to connect: "Oh, that's aversion"—without judgment, with honesty, with clear seeing. And the pañña, the wisdom, the right understanding, recognizes: "I really don't want to be driven by aversion. I really don't want to act out of aversion. I'll just take another step."

Two seconds later, we've completely forgotten that whole scenario and things are fine again. It's a little moment. I know it's simpler—I'm not saying it's simple, but it's simpler here in a moment like that to see how, with mindfulness of intention, we have a moment of choice.

Of course, in bigger actions, in more complex interactions in our daily life, it's a lot more complicated. But still, our whole life is nothing but this moment, this moment. Even when it seems really complicated, it can always be reduced to this moment, because really that's all there is. The rest is thoughts—past and future.

So no matter how complicated things are, what we've been practicing here—that willingness, that ability to bring satipañña to the moment of "about to" and honestly look at why—that is possible in our lives at times when we can remember. It really takes a commitment, and it takes the ability to remember to be present. And being present isn't as hard as remembering to be present. You know? That's what we've been practicing here. That comes easier. But in moments of presence, we see that we do have a choice.

It doesn't mean that the natural, wise, loving, kind, renunciate intention is always going to spontaneously arise the second we turn our attention on something. "Oh, I'm aversive. Oh yes, may I be happy"—immediately. Sometimes it does happen, and that's really amazing. But we can have the wisdom to know: "This is tough right now, but I don't want to act from this place."

One of my favorite stories about this kind of commitment comes from Sister Chan Khong, who works with Thich Nhat Hanh—the nun who's been working with him since she was sixteen in Vietnam. Quite an activist person, with a deep, total commitment to mindfulness and compassionate action.

In her autobiography, she was talking about how she was in a letter-writing campaign. She and Thich Nhat Hanh both haven't been able to go back to Vietnam since the middle of the Vietnamese War. But she was on a campaign where she would write to the government whenever she heard about an arrest—this was during a period when monks and nuns and artists were all being arrested.

But she wouldn't do it from a place of anger. And that took a huge commitment to cultivate wise intention, as she says: "Every time I receive news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew that I had to do walking meditation."

Now, is that what we do when we feel angry? "Yes, I know I need to do walking meditation." It's not a bad idea.

"Sometimes I would walk several hours to regain my calm." And she's not in a three-month meditation retreat either. "Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities had acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

There are lots of examples like that. And this is after having spent thirty years at least of her life in deep commitment to peaceful activism and mindfulness. It doesn't just become totally unthinking second nature. Our commitment is to the cultivation. Our commitment is to really knowing deep in our heart what leads to happiness for ourselves and for others—and having the commitment to do the best we can to speak and act from that place.

And to know that a lot of the time we won't speak and act from that place. And be willing to pay attention then too, because each moment's a new moment.

So she's really angry, and I'm sure—although she doesn't say so—that she learned by writing from an angry place that it doesn't work, either for her or for the people listening. So it takes commitment, but we can do it.

And alternatively, if we're not willing to respect our intentions, respect the power of renunciation, of mettā, of karuṇā—if we don't want to pay attention—we can't get away with it. Because if we're not cultivating wise intention, guess what? We are cultivating. That's what's kind of scary to me. If I just let my mind run loose, we're cultivating greed, hatred, and delusion.

Says the Buddha, "O bhikkhus, whatever a bhikkhu frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of his or her mind." Obvious, isn't it? We talk about the grooves. Well, that's what he's saying. If he frequently thinks and ponders upon thoughts of sensual desire, he has abandoned the thought of renunciation to cultivate the thought of sensual desire. If his mind inclines to thoughts of ill-will, thoughts of cruelty, he's abandoned the thought of non-cruelty to cultivate the thought of cruelty, and then his mind inclines to thoughts of cruelty.

And of course, just the reverse. If he frequently thinks and ponders upon thoughts of renunciation, in that moment he's abandoned the thought of sensual desire to cultivate the thought—or the intention—of renunciation. And he's just talking on the level of thought here. It's really powerful.

So we know we can't control every thought. We do know that now, right? But to even get upset for a minute about a previous thought, for a minute to start berating yourself or hating yourself or blaming yourself because a previous thought wasn't good—again, you're falling into cultivating cruelty, thoughts of cruelty, thoughts of ill-will. So no matter where we can start paying attention, that's the place we start.

Can I cultivate even a thought? It doesn't even have to quite move into speech and action. There's one place where the Buddha says that. He says, "I say that even the inclination of mind towards wholesome states is of great benefit." He's not even saying you're in the wholesome state. He's just saying the inclination of mind towards wholesome states is of great benefit. So then what should be said of bodily and verbal acts that come from such states of mind?

So just the willingness to incline our minds to renunciation, to mettā, to compassion, is really transformative. Because the seed of intention in our hearts, in our minds, eventually flowers.

You know Ruth Denison's succinct description of karma. You must have heard it: "Karma means you don't get away with nothing, darling." The seed of intention will ultimately flower. Basically, it means we can't hide from ourselves. We can't pretend we're feeling loving when we really hate our guts. We have to see honestly what's happening.

I've taught several retreats in New Mexico that were specifically for, quote, "burned out environmentalists." And it was really quite interesting to see—not always, but often—how some of the people who would come to these retreats for ten days, really being in the forefront of the environmental movement, working really hard for years with extreme dedication... and seeing how, in whatever way they began—being lawyers or advocates or whatever—basically from quite good intentions of caring for the planet, of really sensing, feeling, living our interconnectedness with all life, really wanting to make this a better world to live in. But meeting with what seems like a very intense life, meeting with enormous greed and anger and frustration day after day after day.

For many of these people, even though what they were doing still seemed like a very wholesome thing to do, they could even express it: they were loving life on the planet but living from a place of real anger and frustration. Loving the planet, but their heart was so closed that anger was spewing out all over their family, all over their life, all over themselves.

And it just shows that even trying to do something that seems really wholesome, we can't sidestep the moment-to-moment intentionality, the attitude with which we relate. And it's tough. Nobody's saying it's easy. It's hard. But we can just step back and notice on the moment-to-moment level. That's what I think is such a great gift of an intensive retreat time like this.

I imagine most of you have seen the intensity of ill will and cruelty and greed that can come up in our minds here—about what, when you stand back and look at it, seem like pretty insignificant things in the big picture. In the little picture, though, they're not insignificant at all. As one yogi said to me, "This is how world wars start"—over whether the windows are open or closed, or whether we step on the cracks and squeaks in the upper walking room when the rest of us are sitting.

Over the little things, so much hatred and anger and greed can be engendered. Somebody's sitting in your seat in the dining room—the seat you've sat in every day for the last five weeks—and they know it. They have to be doing it on purpose. They couldn't possibly not know that's your seat. And to watch what comes up!

I wouldn't denigrate it or say it's because we're all regressed, we're all so childish, our life has shrunk to this little place. It has shrunk, but that's okay. I think that's actually a good thing. That's what lets us see. When you're really working in the environmental movement, for example, it's easier to miss the suffering and the intensity of the anger, the really destructive aspect of it, because the issue is so big and complex and powerful. It's easy to skip over the intention part and focus on the result. But here, when it's about whether you beat that person ahead of you to get the last orange, there's some way that when you step back, you can't really convince yourself about how important the issue is. And we have to turn around. It might take a couple of days, but somewhere you have to say, "Maybe I need to look at how I'm relating to the situation. Maybe that has something to do with the suffering here." In three months, we're bound to get that message. That's why long retreats are so good.

I'm serious—when this yogi said to me, "This is how world wars start," I actually don't think that's an exaggeration. When we see how strong the grooves of greed or cruelty or ill will are over little things, imagine if somebody destroyed our home, took our land, killed our relatives. I mean, imagine. I can't even imagine. So this is good. We start with little things. It's hard enough. But it's not insignificant. It's not unimportant. It's exactly the same mechanism for the difficult, complex situations that are going to come up in our life. It's where we start.

And luckily, hopefully, besides having that commitment to cultivate—as with Sister Chan Khong—hopefully we also begin to notice that as our understanding, our clear seeing, our wisdom develops, and it is developing. You can't measure it, you don't know, you're in the middle of it. We tend sometimes to see the so-called kilesas much more strongly than you can notice the wisdom. But believe me, a lot of wisdom and understanding and clear seeing is shining in all of you.

And you notice it in little things. Like someone described to me—they were having a kind of unpleasant, unhealthy experience. They didn't like it. And they noticed the mind's habit to go do something to dull out, not to feel it. And without getting into a big deal, as soon as they noticed that, another thought came and they said, "Oh, but I don't need to do that now. I can just be with this. So what if it's boring?" That's little, but it's huge, if you know what I mean. That's really a moment of the natural transformation of attitude, of intention. And it's happening here a lot.

It's really beautiful for us sitting on this side, getting to talk with everybody through all this time. Each of us when we're on retreat, we're right in the middle of it, and everything that's happening today is huge. You really can't have a very good overview, and you don't need one. Forget looking for an overview. But for us, just in the groups today, it was so inspiring to me—and probably the people in the groups wouldn't think what we talked about was inspiring—but to me it was inspiring to see these subtle shifts in attitude.

In one group, somehow we got talking about the hell realm of the dining room at mealtimes, and how really seeing... somebody was saying how they really liked it, how with the meals that this person really liked—the really good ones, the pizza or the ice cream or whatever—that seemed to hold the promise of so much pleasure and happiness. But then paying attention while eating, and noticing how much greed and how much grasping was going on even at the time of having the pizza or the ice cream, that actually by paying attention, it's like, "Wow, this isn't even pleasant." It really isn't worth it.

Now, if you don't add on top of it, "I'm a stupid jerk because I'm caught in craving"—that's extra. And that didn't happen in this discussion. It's just, "Wow, look at this. It isn't even pleasant." That's a moment of natural renunciation. That's the moment where the habit of greed simply lets go.

And notice, you could still be eating the pizza in that moment. Renunciation is about intention. It's not really so much about the outward appearance. You could look like the biggest renunciate in the world and be totally attached to what people think of you or how you look. You might think, "I'm not going to break the eighth precept even if I'm falling on my face from low blood sugar and my medical condition clearly says I have to eat at night. It's bad for my health, but I still won't do it because then I wouldn't be a good yogi." I don't know if that's renunciation. I'd question if that's actually renunciation or a kind of conceit.

So renunciation is really the natural, joyful releasing of attachment. As Geshe Rapton used to say, renunciation is really the expression of love and compassion for ourselves, because we're renouncing the craving and attachment that keeps us in suffering. In that moment of letting go of the clinging to that pizza, you might keep eating it or you might not. It's really irrelevant. Renunciation is a relief, not a punishment.

I'm sure you've all noticed moments like this, even if you haven't thought of them as renunciation. Wise intention of renunciation is that moment of renouncing the craving, renouncing the clinging, renouncing the greed that keeps us bound to suffering. And keep it moment to moment. It's not that wise intention of renunciation means you now have to figure out how you're going to renounce pizza for the rest of your life, or how you're going to go back and live this really simple life because you've learned that craving leads to suffering—so you're going to set up a life that doesn't feed into craving. That whole approach becomes its own suffering scenario.

It's moment to moment. Wise intention of renunciation arises when you feel that clutching of wanting and the satipaññā is there. You tune into the wanting and recognize, "Oh, I really don't need this." It's the wanting we don't need. Whether you get the thing you want or not, who cares anymore? Just the wanting itself—I don't need that. And there's peace. There's ease. And incidentally, we're a lot nicer to be around, so it's good for other people too.

My favorite story about renunciation—the joy of it—is about Ananda Mayi Ma, who was regarded as a great saint in India in this century. Some businessmen were coming to her and, as is the tendency, were praising her effusively: "Oh, you're so wonderful, you live such a simple renunciate life," and on and on. She started laughing, and the more they praised her, the more she laughed. Finally they asked, "What are you laughing at?" She said, "Me the renunciate? It's you who are the renunciates. By living the way you are, you're renouncing the great joy of divine presence. I'm not renouncing anything."

That's really the spirit of wise renunciation, wise intention.

Similarly, with the wise intentions of mettā and karuṇā, counteracting ill will and cruelty—sure, there's enormous suffering in the world. And sometimes it can be easy, or one can fall into feeling, that there's been a lot of suffering here on retreat. A great deal of the retreat is coming face to face with our own demons in whatever way those manifest—physical, emotional, mental. It can just be sleepiness, whatever it is.

It's easy also, same as with greed, to fall into thinking that we're being a bit self-indulgent, so wrapped up in our own suffering. After all, there's nothing we've gone through here that can compare to the amount of cruelty, the enormous suffering going on in the world. And in a way, that's true.

But again, please don't denigrate the powerful possibilities that come from meeting whatever difficult experience you've gone through here, or are going through at this moment. Meeting it with mindfulness, with satipaññā, with wisdom—this is the place where our habitual tendencies of ill will, anger, hostility, and cruelty, whether directed at ourselves or just in our minds toward someone else, are truly transformed. Through mindfulness, through how you meet your own suffering with compassion, with mettā as friendliness and acceptance. I'm not saying you meet every moment of suffering with this beaming, suffusing sense of "I love every moment of what's happening."

And I know we can get into that—a kind of exaggeration of metta. But acceptance, simple open-hearted friendliness and patience are equally expressions of metta. And the expression of compassion is simply not exercising cruelty towards ourselves or others in the face of suffering.

It might be that the suffering seems small. Again, you didn't get that orange, or whatever. You ate too much ice cream. You can't really get behind the story. But the suffering is still the same emotions that are engendered in our life, that are engendered in other people. How we meet it here is where wisdom and understanding and our intentions begin to transform.

Sometimes I feel this really deeply, seeing it in my own experience and from talking to a lot of people. Some retreats—if you do a lot of retreats, they're all a little different, or a lot different from each other. And some retreats, when I look back, I would really dub in my mind as "that was a real dukkha retreat." That was a real struggling retreat, a real suffering retreat. And there are all different kinds of dukkha retreats. The dukkha could be that you never got into it, never got concentrated. That can be a huge dukkha retreat. That's one of the big ways we are really cruel to ourselves—because our experience didn't come up to some idea we made up of what it should come up to, and we hate ourselves for three months. Or it can be really old traumatic pain. It can be physical pain. It can be sleepiness. Whatever the range of a so-called dukkha retreat.

There are retreats that were kind of smooth sailing, really interesting, had really nice states. Of course, given the choice at the beginning of a retreat, probably most of us would go for the nice states. But when I look back at my whole history of practice—well, you can't ever really pinpoint "I learned this from that moment"—but I have a deep conviction that the retreats that were really a struggle, where a lot of hard stuff went on, those are the ones where my understanding really deepened, where the sense of equanimity and patience really got strong, and where compassion and metta were really, really developed.

It's easy to feel compassion and metta when everything's groovy, when you're shining in white light. Who wouldn't feel compassion and metta? That poor schlump over there—obviously they're not as happy as I am. But when you're having a really lousy retreat, whatever that means to you, and you can feel, really feel kindness and compassion and metta for yourself, that's real compassion and metta. That's where it's really going to come through in the crunch. That's when our intentions, our understanding, are really transforming.

And it's only the attitude, the understanding, that's going to inform our life. All the groovy experiences are gone. As Jack Kornfield says, they're all back with Cleopatra. Even the ones that happened a minute ago—gone. But the inclination of our mind and heart, the strengthening of that understanding and propensity, that's what's going to inform how we meet the next moment, how we meet this moment, how we meet a difficult situation.

So you can be really happy if you're sitting there thinking, "This is the crappiest retreat I ever did." You can be really happy because you're going to come out of it a lot deeper and stronger. You think I'm kidding. You might not notice it right away, but it'll last longer.

And really, this transformation comes from the willingness to simply meet this moment of our experience directly. It's back to mindfulness again—kindness, just as it is. I really feel deeply that in the power of the direct meeting, the satipañña in the moment, the wisdom really does transform how we relate to things.

You've all seen it—see it on the news. A couple of years ago, I think, they were talking about how Clinton had gone to Africa, gone to Rwanda. This was a couple of years after the seeming end of all those horrible massacres there. He'd gone and was saying on the news how he'd talked with a lot of people. He'd met and talked with some people who had been attacked in the massacre but had lived, though they were quite wounded. He was publicly making a speech saying he really kind of got it—that we're all responsible. You can't just say it's about Rwanda; it's about all of us in the world. Which is obvious. But still I thought, what made him say that now and not two years ago, when it was actually happening? Not to get into what he should or shouldn't have done, but what made the change that he said it then?

In reflecting, what made sense to me is that really it was coming face to face with the actual suffering—seeing and talking with someone who was really directly involved. I remember Sister Chan Khong talking about during the Vietnam War and seeing how it's like a war on television. In Rwanda, we read about it. It's not the same as being there. Sister Chan Khong was saying you'd see this stuff happening in villages—a mother holding her wounded baby or something—on TV, and it's really powerful.

It really moves us. But she says, it's nothing like being there. It just isn't the same. We don't get the immediacy of the experience.

And so when we're really face to face—and now I'm coming back to here, and again, talking about huge suffering, and then we're talking about our self-hatred about back pain. But if you don't get into comparing, if you can bring that same immediacy of kind attention to the back pain and the self-hatred, that's the moment of potential transformation. From ill will, from cruelty, to compassion, to kindness, to the ability to be present without flinching away.

I really believe that this is the capability that allows one to go out and keep finding the inner resources to do whatever we need to do—whether it's the environmental work I was talking about, whether it's just meeting your kids day to day when they're cranky, whether it's whatever it is we do. To keep finding the resources to meet the suffering, whether it's so-called mine or so-called yours, and meet it with kindness, meet it with compassion, with friendliness, rather than ill will and cruelty. It's huge.

Pema Chödrön writes: "Learning how to be kind to ourselves, learning how to respect ourselves, is important. The reason it's important is that fundamentally, when we look into our own hearts and begin to discover what is confused and what is brilliant, what is bitter and what is sweet, it isn't just ourselves that we're discovering. We're discovering the universe. When we discover the Buddha that we are, we realize that everything and everyone is a Buddha. When we regard thoughts and emotions with humor and openness, that's how we perceive the universe."

We're not just talking about our individual liberation, but how to help the community we live in, how to help our families, our country, the whole continent—not to mention the world and the galaxy and as far as we want to go.

"There's an interesting transition that occurs naturally and spontaneously. We begin to find that, to the degree that there is bravery in ourselves—the willingness to look, to point directly at our own hearts—and to the degree that there is kindness towards ourselves, then there is confidence that we can actually forget ourselves and open to the world."

So let's sit quietly for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 321

Introducing Mettā

Carol Wilson · 1h43

> In this foundational talk on loving-kindness meditation, Carol Wilson addresses a profound paradox: if mettā (loving-kindness) is truly our natural state, why must we work so hard to experience it? She explains that mettā is not something we create but rather uncover—it is the spontaneous response of an open heart when we are truly present, like the natural warmth we feel seeing a child at play.
>
> Wilson clarifies common misconceptions about mettā, distinguishing it from romantic love characterized by yearning or passion, and from a 'mushy' state that ignores reality. Drawing on the Brahmavihāra teachings, she describes mettā as non-hatred, inclusiveness, and expansiveness—qualities that arise from wisdom rather than delusion. She shares the powerful story of civil rights leader Jim Lawson, who demonstrated the courage and strength of genuine mettā by connecting with someone who had just attacked his colleagues.
> The talk explores how desire (the 'near enemy') and aversion (the 'far enemy') obstruct our natural connectedness, creating the illusion of separation. Wilson emphasizes that every moment of distraction or difficulty in practice is an opportunity to cultivate mettā through patient, non-reactive awareness. Rather than seeking dramatic states, practitioners learn to trust their 'basic goodness' through countless small moments of recognition, gradually seeing through the habits that perpetuate feelings of isolation and unworthiness.

Depending on what your day was like today, some of you may be wondering how what you're doing here has much to do with loving-kindness and friendliness for yourself. Sometimes that escapes the experience on the first day, especially if you're new to it.

Another common question comes up in my mind every time I begin a mettā retreat for myself: if it's true—which it is true—that loving-kindness, this friendliness, is a natural expression of who we really are, of our truest nature; if it's more true than our experience of separation, why do we have to work so hard to try and have a fleeting moment of experiencing it? Why do we have to work so hard to learn to recognize and trust it?

I want to talk about those two things tonight.

It's true, as Sharon said, that friendliness, mettā—I will probably mostly use the word mettā just because it's easier—is a natural, spontaneous expression of the truth of the deepest nature of all of us. And it's also natural in the sense that it's not some esoteric, incredibly blissed-out experience that you can only know if you're deep in absorption. Because that wouldn't make it quite universal, would it? It would make it much more conditional than it really is.

The experience of mettā, connectedness, friendliness, is the natural response of our heart to a situation when we're really open and present. For example, if you're outside today and you see a small child running and playing and bouncing with a ball, and you're present, the natural response arises without thinking about it. You don't wonder what that kid is doing here, who his parents are, what his background is, what he's thinking about. There's just a natural sense of friendliness, non-judging happiness. We simply feel our empathetic connection to that child.

Or if kids don't do it for you, puppies or kittens or whatever particular species of being opens your heart when you're present—you don't have to try to make that happen. It happens naturally.

But not always, right? And that certainly isn't the natural spontaneous response in most situations. So why not?

Same situation: you're out walking today and there's a small child laughing, playing, having a good time, but you're in a different state, in some way self-absorbed. You're hurrying to get to lunch. You're just starting to feel maybe the tendrils of a nice concentrated state. Or you're worrying about something at home, or you're thinking about how you could have brought a better raincoat or whatever. And you either don't even notice the kid, or if you're in an aversive mood, you think, "What's he doing screaming and yelling? He's wrecking my possible concentration." Or if you're in a worrying mode, "Where the heck are his parents? What's he doing here anyway? Is he abandoned? Is he an orphan?"

We go into whatever our stories are. And those stories, that reaction stemming from our self-involved state of mind and heart at the moment, actually block the sense of connectedness. There's definitely more of a sense of separateness, of fragmentation in that case. We get locked in our mental world. And these mental worlds seem so real—never mind that you get locked in seventeen thousand different mental worlds in one day. Each of them seems so real, much more real than the underlying unity beneath all of our differences.

This sense of connectedness, this unity, is much more real and true. But we don't tend to notice that as readily. We get more involved in the seeming differences, in our habits, in our tendencies of reaction that increase the sense of separation and fragmentation.

What's interesting—and we discover this both in Vipassana or insight meditation as well as in the loving-kindness meditation we're doing here, and in any of the other three Brahmavihāras that Sharon mentioned this morning—we begin to discover that this experience we have, seemingly ongoing, however you experience it personally, whether it's fragmentation, separation, isolation, loneliness, neediness, fear, whatever, is actually due to a misperception of who we are and how things really are.

This is from Joko Beck: "Our misery stems from the misconception that we are separate. Certainly it looks as though I am separate from other people and other phenomena. And as long as we think we are separate, we're going to suffer. We're going to feel that we have to defend ourselves, that we have to find something in the world that will make us happy."

And by the very acts of doing this—having to defend ourselves, having to find something to make us happy—the continual making of separation in our mind strengthens and continues this illusion, this suffering state that we can so often find ourselves in.

For many of us, the illusion of separation, of the need to find something somewhere to finally make me happy, to protect and defend myself from all the bad things out there that could happen—that certainly has been more familiar.

It's more reinforced by the culture. It's the experience when I don't pay attention. It's what the mind most easily and naturally falls into. And since it's familiar, one tends to take it as real.

So the whole point of our practice, our metta practice here, is to consciously help us to not keep falling into this habit of delusion, of illusion, of separation. Each moment that we experience some metta, some connectedness, just basic friendliness—don't go out there looking for bliss, just that friendliness of all the kids playing, natural connectedness. Each moment that we experience that with awareness, that we recognize it, that's the moment where we're seeing through the idea of the fragmentation, the illusion of the separation.

It doesn't mean that I can't tell the difference between me and the child playing. We can have ideas about what unity or connectedness means that don't make sense to our rational mind and get caught in trying to think our way into it or out of it. It doesn't quite work. What our practice does is help us recognize over and over and over the visceral experience of connectedness, of unity, of simple, open-hearted friendliness, so that we begin to trust it more. And maybe we trust the illusion of our fragmentation, our isolation, maybe we begin to trust that a little less.

Maybe we won't think of ourselves as trusting fragmentation. But look at where your mind goes and look at how we make decisions and look at the conclusions we jump to just automatically. We do trust it. So we need to learn to actually trust the connectedness, to trust what Chögyam Trungpa used to call our basic goodness, a much deeper truth of who we are than all the superficial differences that we perceive with our normal seeing and hearing, smelling and tasting.

And we practice because hearing about it, believing that things are really different from how we perceive them, isn't enough. Certainly hasn't been for me. The difference between "oh yeah, that really is true, I think that makes a lot of sense," the difference between believing the idea, liking it, accepting it—the difference between that and knowing for yourself from your own experience that things are different from the seeming superficial differences—that difference between thinking it's a good idea and really knowing it is awesome. It makes all the difference in how we live our lives and how we respond to ourselves and others in any situation.

And so our metta practice is not about trying to create an artificial state of friendliness, a kind of static state, and then hold on to it for as long as we can. Probably a lot of us have done that from time to time, tried to do that. And let me tell you, it leads to enormous frustration because you cannot create a static state of heart and mind and hold on to it. You can't do it, not for long. So if you could just give that up right now, you'd save yourself a lot of grief.

What the practice is about is uncovering more the beauty of what we already are and learning to trust that a little bit more. Have a little more faith in it. Verified faith. Faith from your own experience.

For me, I've seen two basic ways that this deeper trust in my basic goodness, deeper trust that friendliness, metta, is a natural expression of who we really are—this has come about in a couple of ways in metta practice.

One way is what I was just describing: recognizing a simple moment of metta, connectedness, recognizing it when it's arising more and more so that we don't overlook it, so that we're not waiting for the big bang and overlooking the little moments of friendliness and connectedness. When you're just sitting here, it's like, ah, it's just so nice being here with everybody. An openness, a spaciousness. It's not that you should go,

"Oh, a moment of metta! Let me write it down. That's three today." I don't mean that. But it is nice just to know, oh, yes, we're all here together. Not so much me and them. Just notice it. It's important. It strengthens our trust, our familiarity with it.

And then the second way—and sometimes it seems some days, some hours, like the second way is more prevalent than the first—is that in the deliberate cultivation, as we incline our mind and heart towards loving-kindness, whether it's to ourselves or toward the benefactor, through the repetition of the phrases, this practice by its nature highlights the states of heart and mind that we're quite familiar with that actually obstruct the connectedness, the states that obstruct our recognizing friendliness, metta. I'll talk a little about them, but we basically know all too well what those states are—all the difficult states: desire, aversion, boredom, everything you can name.

But that's part of the practice. As we continue inclining towards the metta, the so-called obstructions, the states of mind that we tend to believe in when we're not paying attention, that actually keep the connectedness hidden, they just get really big sometimes. But because we're paying attention—this is really where the learning comes in. When Sharon was talking last night or this morning about how what's really important on a retreat like this isn't having some nice state you can go home and talk about, it's the learning that happens.

Well, I hate to tell you, but it does seem to work that way—that a great deal of the learning that happens is about really seeing how we get hooked in these unpleasant or difficult states of heart and mind, and really seeing, "Oh, that's how it creates separation." The wisdom that comes from that takes so much juice out of our continuing to fall back into our habitual responses that it allows the open heart to shine much more strongly, allows us to trust it more.

So let me try again to talk about some ways of understanding what metta is and is not, and then I'll speak a little about the obstructions.

Some of the nouns we might use to describe metta include loving-kindness, friendliness, and the classic one: non-hatred. In the Theravada tradition, they do tend to put things in the negative a lot, but non-hatred—that's pretty good. Non-hatred, open-hearted connection, patience, acceptance, inclusiveness, expansiveness.

That last one—inclusiveness, expansiveness—has actually been very helpful and important to me, because you can get hooked into looking for some idea of what love should feel like. And a lot of times, metta is actually this inclusiveness. When I said earlier, "Here we are, all in the room together," it doesn't feel like what you might think of when you use the word love. But if you think of inclusiveness, expansiveness, connectedness—oh, yes, that's metta too. You can appreciate it.

The word love in this culture, anyway, in the culture I grew up in, in the popular entertainment culture—it has so many connotations that just don't have anything to do with metta. Love in the form of passion, for instance. You know, passion comes from the root word that means to suffer. Metta doesn't mean to suffer. But that kind of love—the idea that it's not real love if you're not tormented, if you're not in agony when the person you love isn't nearby—that has nothing to do with metta. Yet that is sometimes what we mean by love.

Or this sense of yearning. When I read about chivalrous love in medieval times, the whole idea was based on a knight cultivating this chivalrous love for a woman who was usually married to someone else, which meant they could never really be together. So the love was characterized, in its supposed purity, by this sense of unsatisfied yearning.

Metta is not unsatisfied yearning. It's not yearning in any sense of the word at all. Yearning signifies that there's something lacking, that we're looking somewhere for completion. And I do think a lot of the use of the word love in popular culture has that connotation in it somewhere, even in a slight way—that the presence of the other, even somewhere in the world, makes me more of a complete person. This certainly feeds into our Western propensity for feeling rather less than worthy of much of anything.

Really, of all the people we talk with on retreats, I would say over ninety percent have in some way a deep-seated sense of worthlessness, of not being good enough, of self-hatred. And it's so sad, because it's so not true, and because it's so deeply painful. Love in the form of yearning, in the form of needing someone to make me whole, really plays into that. The whole advertising industry—my God, you know, it's making billions and trillions of dollars off of that assumption: that if we buy the right thing, wear the right clothes, go to the right place, or take the right course, we'll be more lovable and somehow happier.

Metta is so much the opposite of that, because metta arises from the understanding—whether intellectual or just from the heart—that we are already complete. Metta is a springing forth from the internal knowing that everything is already here.

This is from Mark Epstein, the psychiatrist. I think it's from his book Going to Pieces Without Falling Apart. He says: "When plagued with a sense of unworthiness, it is easy to feel deficient and to see the love of another person as the only possible solution to this plight. Meditation tends to work against this assumption of deficiency by restoring the capacity for connection from the inside. In doing this, meditation challenges the common assumption of our culture about where connection comes from. In the Buddhist view, connection is already present. We are not separate and distinct as we think we are. Connection is our natural state. We just have to learn to permit it, to allow it."

That's a great description of metta practice. We're not trying to create connection. We're learning how to permit it, to allow it, to trust it. And I'm not saying that's easy, but it's really, ultimately, the source of our living from a much deeper ease and happiness with ourselves, with one another, with the world.

I want to give another example of the spacious, inclusive aspect of metta—how it doesn't have to be directed at someone we know, but can simply be an attitude of acceptance that is itself metta. Last year I was on Maui with two friends, actually with Kamala and another friend.

One afternoon we went to a local event in a high school auditorium or civic center. It was called "Honoring Our Kupunas," which means honoring our elders. I didn't really know what it was—we just went to see.

And it was so... I really felt like the whole afternoon was permeated with the spirit of metta.

What it was: all ages were there, from small children to whole families. It centered around several groups of elderly people—some from local retirement homes, some from their local churches. Many of them knew each other, and many of the people present were their families spanning all generations. But then there were people like us who didn't know anyone there. And everyone was equally welcome.

What would happen is we would sit on the bleachers, and group by group, mostly women, would get up—some by themselves, some in groups—and do hulas. These were women ranging from early sixties to mid-nineties. They would get up, all ranges of skill level and physical type and ability, and really with such goodwill, so unselfconsciously, just getting up in front of everybody and dancing very sensuously and laughing—and everyone just loving it.

There was no sense whatsoever of judgment, no thinking, "How can she get up in front of everybody at her age?" I tried to imagine my mother getting up—of course my mother would never do the hula—but to imagine her just getting up and being able to be so at ease. Or me, never mind my mother.

To see the sense of warmth and acceptance that just flowed through this room, and the love. I thought, that's really a metta experience: the non-judging, the acceptance, the inclusiveness. And it wasn't hard. It wasn't something one had to manufacture.

So metta, whether it's toward beings or toward ourselves, has this connected, inclusive aspect.

And that leads into another misconception of metta—not so much the passion and yearning side, but the other extreme: that it's mushy, clouds and angels, a perpetual Valentine's Day, as Sharon put it. Everything's always nicey-nice. It accepts everything and you really don't look at what else is going on. If there's anything ugly or negative, you just pretend it doesn't happen. A kind of false, blind, stupid way to be in the world, basically.

Also not true.

Metta is an expression of wisdom. Wisdom really sees things as they are. The mind of metta sees things quite clearly. It's not mush-minded at all. But again, we have to experience this for ourselves.

I was teaching a retreat a few years ago specifically for environmental activists—I think it was with Sharon, this one. It was a Vipassana, an insight meditation retreat, but we would spend a session each day going through the formal metta practice, the same practice we're doing here, only condensed.

In the beginning—I did several retreats like this—many of the people, the environmental activists, had never done any meditation at all. We announced we were going to do loving-kindness meditation, and you could see the flinches or the groans. Someone actually said to Sharon, "I don't want to do that mushy practice. I don't want to lose my edge." You know, out there working every day for the environment—really tough, hot-shot lawyers and activists—"I can't afford to do this loving-kindness mush stuff and lose my edge."

I don't think that's an uncommon response. As Sharon mentioned, many people come to retreat and say, "I don't want to do this metta-shmetta stuff."

And again, it's a misconception. Invariably, on these environmental retreats, by the end of it—because the people are tough, they stick it out, grit their teeth and do it—the truth starts to shine through. Even if you hate it, it doesn't matter. Just the willingness to incline your mind, and it happens by itself.

Invariably they really appreciated the metta practices. Sometimes that was the best thing for them about the retreat.

So we begin to discover that the ability to love, for each of us, is boundless.

And that our happiness does not depend on having people love us, or even on our external conditions, but it really depends on our ability to love. And as we begin to contact that ability, as we begin to trust it, as we begin to see that you don't lose your edge —when we begin to trust the strength of boundless connectedness, it's actually far more strong and more courageous than acting from anger, acting from fear. But again, we need to begin to experience this for ourselves.

I'll tell you one story about someone I've been reading about recently who's deeply inspirational to me. I haven't met him or heard him personally, but he's a man, still alive, named Jim Lawson. He's an African-American man who in the late 1950s, early 1960s, was teaching nonviolent workshops. He's a minister, a Christian minister. He was teaching nonviolent workshops in Nashville to some young college students who began, actually, the sit-ins in Nashville and then the Freedom Rides. Together with some other students in North Carolina, they were really the beginning of the whole sit-ins and Freedom Rides, the civil rights movement, based off of the Montgomery bus boycott.

Jim Lawson was a deep believer in nonviolence based on love, on unity as human beings. He had been a conscientious objector during the Korean War and had spent time in prison for that. And he spent three years working in India because he was a very devoted disciple of Gandhi. That was really a lot of his inspiration for nonviolent activism.

I also love the threads of how you can't pin down metta or universal love to any particular path. Gandhi, of course, is a devout Hindu. And here we are, Buddhists, and Jim Lawson, a devoted disciple of Gandhi, was a devoted Christian. And it all just strings together.

This particular story takes place at the beginning of some of the marches for these sit-ins, and they hadn't turned violent yet. This is through the eyes of a young man at that time, one of the students named Bernard Lafayette. They were marching from the church to a lunch counter in downtown Nashville just to sit in and demand to be served. This is the early 1960s, so forty years ago.

Bernard was recalling it some years later. He said he hadn't really felt he'd been tested yet, and so even though he had the deep belief in the power of love and nonviolence, he really didn't know how he would respond when actually faced with violence—which is really honest. We don't know, do we? Do I really believe this? And that's our test as humans, isn't it?

Bernard was at the very end of the line when some young white toughs—like what they would have called greasers when I was a kid, with leather jackets and jeans and slicked back hair—attacked him and started beating this one man. Then the other young men, without even thinking about it, Bernard turned around and did what they'd been taught, which was to throw his own body over the body of the man who was down and being kicked, so that it diverted the attention to him. He did that without even thinking. Then they started beating on him.

At this point—and this is from Bernard—Jim Lawson comes walking up. He said Jim just walked up, not in a hurry, not upset, not as if he was going to fix something, just like he was coming to a day of work at the office. And he was so nonchalant that it really enraged one of the white guys. The white guy spat on Jim Lawson.

And this is the power then. This is the method and the connection. Jim looks at him and says, "Do you have a handkerchief?" The man was so shocked that he reached in his pocket, took out a handkerchief, and gave it to Jim, who calmly wiped his face. Then he looked at the man, saw what he was wearing, and said, "So do you have a motorcycle or do you have a souped-up car?" The guy says, "Well, a motorcycle." And they fall into this conversation about what he's done to soup up his motorcycle and what kind of motorcycle he rides, on and on.

Meanwhile, Bernard and the other man get up. They get back on the line. They all start walking. At that point, the line has moved on. So then Jim joins the line and he waves goodbye to this man. The man didn't wave back. But he also didn't do anything else.

As Bernard said, that was such a wonderful example of Christian love. To me, that's been very inspiring, because it's an example of the real courage—not thinking that nonviolence and human love is a good idea, but knowing the power of connectedness. Because that's what Jim did. He found a way to connect with that young tough, found a way they could both see each other's humanness. And that's because he so knows that we're all human, that we're all connected. It wouldn't work in every situation, but it's the power of the knowing. That's real metta.

That's the power of metta. Stronger than fear, stronger than anger, because it's really coming from truth.

So if it's so strong, how do we get so lost in the separation, in the fragmentation, in these habits of mind?

There are two main habits. Kamala's going to talk more about them tomorrow night. But what we're doing here, moment to moment—we don't have to be at the end of a line being attacked by some racist thug. All you have to do is sit here and look at your mind and heart when your knee starts to hurt, when you wish the bell would ring and you look at your watch and there's twenty-two more minutes. When you go out and it's raining again, you think, "Oh my God"—maybe you don't. You're from California, it's all good, it's raining. "We need the rain"—that's what everybody says. "Oh, I love it, we need the rain."

All you have to do is look at your mind and we see the two biggest habits. They're actually labeled in the tradition of loving-kindness practice as the near and far enemy. Enemy of metta. I know I just finished saying metta has no enemies and now we've got the near and far enemy. They're just words.

But they are desire or attachment—the near enemy in that we can confuse desire for metta, just as I was saying with that kind of yearning. We confuse it for loving-kindness. Not just sexual desire or desire for a person—I was going to say that's obvious, but actually in your practice it often isn't so obvious. It feels sort of good if you don't really look and see that it makes you feel incomplete. It feels sort of good, we really get into it, but it's not metta.

Desire is a maker of limitation, attachment. It doesn't have to be that kind of sexual yearning desire. It can simply be desire to see more of the person. Desire for a more pleasant experience of metta. Desire for the bell to ring. Or you might notice when you're thinking of yourself, you start just subtly wishing you could be a little bit different. "If only I didn't get so distracted, I'd be more filled with metta. If only a really nice state happened, if only this would keep going, then the metta would really flow."

Desire makes limitations, whereas metta is boundless. Even when we have to begin where we are—which is metta for ourselves, for benefactors, for people we know.

But a friend of mine was describing how she noticed even that real open-hearted metta for people she knew, how she could see it made limitations when you limit it. She was visiting her ex-husband who was dying in a VA hospital. They had long ago reconciled and she had a good relationship with him; she was his main support. He was fairly old and he was going through a long sickness and death. She would go to visit him really filled with metta, with caring, with friendliness, happy to be there, just radiating peace and being with him.

And after—I don't know how long she said, whether it was weeks of going—it suddenly dawned on her that she was walking past rooms and beds filled with other men that she just didn't even notice. She was focusing all her sense of friendliness and love and compassion on her ex-husband. Which was fine, but as soon as she noticed that, she noticed that sense of limitation. Like, "I only have enough metta for this guy, and maybe the one on either side of him, but it can't go any wider than that." The sense we have of its being too hard, too limited.

So, just notice that. Notice when you're wanting something, how it shrinks our world. Notice if there's a sense of separation at that time. Do you feel really connected? Do you feel more isolated? I can tell you what to find—I mean, get the drift—but really look, because we have to get it for ourselves. "Oh, wanting keeps the illusion of separation and neediness going." Just begin to notice the difference between wanting and metta. They're not the same.

And the so-called far enemy, which is more obvious: ill-will, aversion towards people that are difficult, towards that which is unpleasant in our experience. It's more obvious how this creates separation. I mean, no one's going to say—I doubt anyway—that yes, really holding on to ill-will and anger against this person brings us closer together.

But the kind of hook in ill-will and aversion is that it's generally directed toward the things we actually don't want to be brought closer together with. Like our environmental friends who say, "I need my edge. I don't want to feel buddy-buddy with this jerk of a lawyer who's trying to cut down all the trees I've been working to save for nine years. He's a jerk, and I don't want him in my heart."

So this is where we have to really begin to experience for ourselves even the willingness to find a way to connect to that person—or to ourselves, to the things we're having difficulty with in ourselves—to connect with them. We don't have to love them in the common sense, but just not hate them. Just not push them away.

On this environmental retreat, one of the men who was most vociferous against wanting to do the metta practice was someone very dedicated who had been spending years on a particular project, working with a group of trees in northern New Mexico. A very dedicated guy, really not into metta. By the end of the retreat, it was one of the more moving experiences I've had of meeting people at the end of a retreat, seeing what's arisen for them. It's always beautiful, actually, at the end of a retreat. You go through so much, and the truth just shines out in a different manifestation for everyone.

This man was actually filled with anger. And at the end of the retreat he was weeping, saying, "You know, I really see how the anger doesn't serve. Because I couldn't just keep the anger and direct it towards the work I was doing. It's turning into bitterness, it's leaking out on my family, on my kids, it's eating me up inside." And the metta just—it's not like everything is hunky-dory forever, but it's beginning to see there's another way. And in the connectedness we can actually act with more courage, like that story of Jim Lawson.

I saw this for myself when I was doing a loving-kindness retreat, a long retreat, and I got to the so-called difficult person. They'll tell you to start with an easy difficult person, not the worst, most horrible person in your life—just someone who gets on your nerves a little bit. That's hard enough.

So this was a person who got on my nerves a little bit. I could say the phrases easily and mean it. But then I saw what was going on. It was only if he was over there. There was a moment where I could really feel as if experientially my heart would open and the person would come in, and I saw myself say, "No, I don't want him in there. No, thank you. It's okay if he stays over there."

That was really so instructive. I said, "Oh, I'm really creating the separation. The problem's not him. The problem is me wanting to keep that out." And that's really all you can do—notice that, and boom, the separation's gone in that minute. And I really saw how a lot of the stuff about him that bothered me was just who he is. It was just him being him. He wasn't doing any horrible thing. It was my reactivity, my aversion that was creating the separation and the difficulty. It's really quite powerful to just begin to experience it to where you can trust it.

So these habits of aversion and desire are very, very strong. We'll talk more about them as we go on. But they're really some of the roots of what keeps us in this dream of separation, of illusion—creating the sense of the other, whether it's the other that we want and need, or the other that we want to go away. Whether it's another being, or whether it's the pain in your knee, whether it's the sleepiness that hits at 2:30, whether it's the boredom, whether it's "My God, if I have to say this phrase one more time, I'm going to run out of this room screaming."

It may seem like a huge leap to walk up to someone who's beating our friend and try to connect on a human level. Conceptually, it may seem beyond anything we could do or would even want to do. But we don't have to start there. We really can start not looking for perfection, but moment to moment, with what comes up when you're sitting and walking here.

The moments that you don't feel friendliness, connectedness—when you feel or notice something other, any of the difficult things: aversion, boredom, restlessness, self-hatred. You're off in worlds of desire, planning your fifteenth vacation to Bali, planning what you wish you had done on New Year's Eve. You can spend endless time in totally meaningless stuff and get completely wrapped up in it. When you notice that, how you meet that moment—that can be the cultivation of metta as well. If you meet that moment with "Yes, let's continue this, let's really get lost in Bali, the hour will go faster"—okay, we're back in separation.

If you meet the unpleasant experience with "this really does stink, I hate it, and I hate myself for hating it, and I'm never going to be able to cultivate metta, I'm a no-good, worthless jerk" — okay, what are we cultivating in that moment?

One of my favorite quotations from the Buddha is when he said that what the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that the heart will naturally incline. It's so simple, it's so obvious. Well, left to its own devices, what does the mind dwell upon frequently? It's a little scary as we start to notice.

So don't treat the moments when you get distracted or when the metta isn't happening as lost moments. Those are the places when you wake up and notice where you are and notice how you connect to that moment. Is it with spacious acceptance? Is it with desire? Is it with hatred? Notice. Those moments are really the cultivation of metta also.

There's huge potential for cultivating metta in saying, "Oh, off in Bali again, yep. May I be free from suffering. May I be happy. May I live at ease." Right back, without reaction, into the metta. That's a tremendous opportunity. Each moment that we do that — never mind if you don't feel a thing — each moment that we can offer a phrase wholeheartedly, we're inclining the heart towards metta. And we're cutting through that habit we've cultivated for so long of either desire or distractedness or aversion.

So if we can really be patient, not looking for the big results, not looking for the big states — that's desire again — but simply having that willingness, that acceptance, that spaciousness to meet this moment with kind acceptance, that's metta. Then the willingness to begin again with the next phrase — that's the concentration part. The two strands come together really in every moment. You don't have to be doing something spectacular. Just have this willingness to meet each moment with friendliness, with clarity of seeing, and to begin again.

It's a choice, you know. And in more moments than we realize, we do have a choice where to let the mind dwell. Now there are plenty of times you don't have a choice. The mind's going to go off. You're not going to usually say, "Oh, I'm about to have a fantasy now about what's for lunch tomorrow." Usually you don't see that until you've already gone over the recipe for the dinner party fifteen times. But in that moment you wake up and notice, "Oh, right, I'm sitting in the meditation hall. I'm not really in the supermarket" — in that moment, you do have a choice. Do I want to stay in the supermarket? Do I want to get into self-recrimination? Or do I just want to say, "Okay, wanting. May I be safe"? Just that simple, that non-reactive.

We can't force results. We can't force some feeling of expansive loving-kindness. But we can be patient. We can be simple and humble and learn to trust that if we have the commitment and the willingness to simply be present, to try and be kind, to not turn against ourselves, then the truth of our connectedness with ourselves and with others will naturally begin to shine forth. And we begin to see that metta really isn't a deluded or a blind state at all. It's really the truest expression of our humanity, our common humanity.

I just want to end with one quotation I read that was really quite beautiful. This is from a review of a book by a woman — she and her husband were Harvard academics on the big career track. They wanted children, they got pregnant, and they found out before the baby was born that it was going to have Down syndrome, a form of mental retardation. All their friends were saying, "Have a therapeutic abortion." But they just didn't want to do that, so they didn't. And all their friends thought they were crazy. They had this baby.

And she said it turns out that this baby was the most wonderful thing that ever happened in their lives. They left Harvard, moved to New Mexico, so that they could step back—I mean, they still had careers, but the career wasn't the most important thing anymore.

This is the woman speaking. She's talking about how she once spoke to an entering class of Harvard Medical School students about her pregnancy and her decision to keep the baby. Adam, the baby, was asleep on her lap at the time. After the speech, she was approached by an elderly professor. He had just become the grandfather of a little girl with Down syndrome. As he talked to her, he stroked Adam's soft blonde hair and wept. He loved his granddaughter with inexplicable openness, and the experience had changed his whole life.

Whoever said that love is blind was dead wrong. Love is the only thing on this earth that lets us see each other with the remotest accuracy.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

This afternoon we're going to get into a topic that's been on people's minds since the last time we've been together, and that is where we go from here.

I want to say hello to everyone. As most of you know, Bhante has been on retreat and has just come out to be here with us. So we're honored and really delighted to have your presence. Do you remember how to talk?

"Sure. You'd be really surprised if I didn't know."

How's it been going?

"Good. There's still a bit of construction going on around the place, so until the contractors are finished, we're just having an open routine during the day. A lot of solitary time. It's agreeable."

And Mary, you came in towards the end of the morning. Want to say hello?

"I don't think there's anything to say except hello. I'm really happy to be here and spend this last day and a half with you."

I know there's been a planning committee that's met a few times, which we'll hear from in a little while. But I thought I would share with you some thoughts I've had and maybe update you on things that have been going on regarding where we go from here.

It's been interesting hearing from the different teachers. I've been asking each of the teachers who've come and stayed with us, as they end their time, if there are any words of offering or advice for the group. A number of teachers have emphasized the importance of staying in touch—colleagues, sangha. So we have to figure out a good way to do that, one that works for the group and really supports you.

Here's been my thinking. One possibility is for the group to get together once a year. At the same time, there's another group that I'll be starting—it's not clear yet whether that will be at the end of this year or the beginning of next year. Actually, I've been more focused as far as dates and planning on this group.

What I'd like to do, and I think I put this out in an email to you, is get the larger teaching community more involved besides just the Spirit Rock teachers. One, I think it's healthy for you to have input from people outside the radical left of the Dharma teaching world. I really respect all the different Dharma perspectives, honestly. And also, I'd like this not to be so Spirit Rock-focused, which means including all the different teachers in the community. I would love to see this be something that can support Dharma communities that other teachers are involved in as well.

So what I did, I wanted to see about having a meeting for this group on the East Coast. And I think I mentioned that Tara Brach said that she would be interested in being involved and supporting in some ongoing way.

I also, ideally, had in my mind that I'd love to see you have more contact with Joseph, and him have more connection with you. Sharon, if she's open to it and interested. Carol Wilson, who perhaps many of you know is a very dear friend of mine and somebody who I respect tremendously, and who is a kind of bridge between East Coast and West Coast. She comes out here and teaches with us and is also starting to be encouraged to do some teacher training on the East Coast.

So I wanted to have something happen there, and ideally the one time that it could happen where Carol and Joseph and Sharon, if she's into it, could be involved would be before the three-month course. It could also be after the three-month course, although actually in January there's usually the staff retreat, but it starts getting cold after that. And besides, after the three-month course, the teachers are kind of burned out.

So I called and just put out some feelers to see if, one, the study center is a possibility and also if teachers would be open to it. The study center couldn't hold everyone on an accommodating basis, but they have retreats or workshops where people come and meet at the study center but stay in town at various motels and inns. I spoke with Joseph about it and Carol, and they are both open to that happening.

I want to share with you some delicacies about this as well. There are some Dharma politics to be worked out. And there are some valuable things for you to keep in mind as I explain a little bit of the Dharma politics.

By the way, I spoke with the study center and Andy Olendzki, and I had a really nice conversation. You probably all know Andy Olendzki, who's the head of the study center and a scholar of the Pali Canon and the suttas. He's quite open to us being there and would even be willing to rearrange some dates that had been planned for us to be there. So it's possible. And I invited him to participate as well.

So here's the thing, just to be straight about it. We all know this is an incredible program, right? Not just because of any one person, but because the group has manifested so beautifully and has supported each other, and because of all the great Dharma work that you've been doing around the country.

But not everybody knows what has been happening here. And different people have different concerns. Here are two main concerns from outside of our teaching community.

One: who are these guys? Who are these community Dharma leaders? Remember, that was the first question—what is a community Dharma leader? Well, now it's more, who are the community Dharma leaders? People don't know you like I know you and the teaching community knows you. Are you really qualified to be sharing the Dharma? Gina's shaking her head no. But as Hillel said, "If not me, who? If not now, when?" And for some reason, you've been invited and have been doing a beautiful job. But there is that concern: who are these people, are they qualified, and what are they doing?

And it's not just what are you doing now with your communities, but what are you doing with your practices? A number of people—Joseph and a few others—have said, and Eugene in his closing words was saying, make sure that your practice is at the forefront of your Dharma work.

I spoke with Sharon, who said just one thing that she would really hope is that you consider yourself Dharma students, even before Dharma leaders. Because as Joseph and Jack were saying today, it's so seductive, isn't it? And that identification with role, which we've been talking about since the beginning, will be an ongoing issue. Even for people who've been leading retreats for fifteen years, it's an issue. So it's really something for you to keep in mind, and also something for you to know that other teachers outside of our community are also keeping in mind and watching.

Another concern is the parameters that we have an understanding or agreement upon. When we started, it was spelled out that this was to authorize, encourage, and support people to be teaching classes, beginning classes, ongoing sitting groups, daylongs, and weekend retreats.

And obviously, there is a tremendous need and demand. Your communities might say, "Hey, let's do a two-week retreat. Let's do a month-long retreat. Let's really go for it." And there's a need there. We might, out of really caring, want to respond to that need, but that raises flags for people. It really does.

I know some people in this group, even before the group started—I can think of one who's actually no longer in the group—had been doing some teaching before coming to the program. We didn't want to exclude them or say, "No, you can't do what you were doing before." And a couple of people here were invited by teachers to teach retreats with them. But it is a very delicate and tricky subject that people are watching.

I think you should be aware of this, not just for your own sense of playing within your game—knowing what your healthy limits are—but for the whole program, this current group, and future programs as well. It's something to take quite seriously. The temptation will be there, coming from the best possible intention. But it does cast some question for some people on the program and what we're doing.

So those were some questions and concerns that have had to be addressed before the study center can just slot us in. I've done what I can to start addressing those concerns, and I'll share with you what I've done.

I wrote a letter, emailed it to everybody in the larger community whose email addresses I had, explaining what the program has been, what's happened, and talking about the next program, the next group. What I did was ask for people to give names of candidates for the next group. First, because I wanted to get as many good, qualified people as possible. And second, I wanted to have them buy into the program and realize that this is not just a Spirit Rock enterprise. This is our Vipassana community. It can be a program for all.

What I said was: please give me names for the next program, if you're interested, by the end of January. Then at the end of that time, I will post all the names that have been submitted and send them out to everybody again. If anybody has any reservations, let me know. So at least everybody will see that in the next program, people seem to be qualified.

I also said in that letter that I heard there might be some concerns people have about the program, about this program. And when I say this, I don't want to get you really paranoid. Mostly, people feel great about this program, but all the little niggling things have to be cleared up before there are no doubts.

So I said, please, if you've had any concerns, I'd like you to tell them to me, because I want to really do the best job I can in creating this program. I want to learn and have your input and your guidance, rather than having you carry some question in your mind, where we don't have the benefit of it, and it might color your whole perception of what I think is quite a good program. It's going quite well, and there's a lot of good Dharma work happening. So I've welcomed that, invited it.

One person who had some concerns sent a very nice email and also asked if I could hold seven slots for the next group. So that's the kind of thing that happens as they start feeling more connected.

This is something, again, that we've talked about in your own communities. If there are any kind of grumblings out there, although it might not be an easy thing to do, invite the feedback. Because in the long run, it's going to serve you a whole lot better anyway. The talk will be going on. You might as well hear it straight on, and then you can deal with it.

So I'm kind of figuring—and I said please contact me by the end of January—if people don't have concerns other than the ones who've shared them with me, or if they do have concerns and haven't talked about them, then they've had the opportunity to, and they just haven't moved on it. And actually, that's felt pretty good to people like Joseph and Carol, that at least we've given that space for that to happen.

So that kind of gives you a sense of the delicacies of learning a little bit about Dharma politics. I guess the essence of it is just have a smile on your face, welcome feedback, and say thank you, I really appreciate it.

By the larger community, do you basically mean the IMS, Spirit Rock community?

IMS, Gaia House, Spirit Rock. I've emailed people in Europe, in South Africa. There was a big teacher's conference in the summer and I got a lot of email addresses. So just everybody in the Vipassana community worldwide that I know.

So there's a possibility of us getting together in September if we're to be done on the East Coast. The dates that I think tentatively we were looking at were September, after a two-day sit here with the teachers, like September 12th, which is a Tuesday, and then on through maybe from Tuesday to Sunday or something like that.

So that's kind of where we're at on that end. The thing is, if that happens, then probably I will start the next program, the next CDL program in January here. And I told Marianne to save some dates for us to do that. If it doesn't happen at the Study Center, or for whatever reason that doesn't happen, then I would be more inclined to start the next program in the fall here. And one other possibility would be that we come back here in January instead of going to the East Coast. Again, I said to Marianne, hold some dates. I don't know whether it'll be for the next group here in January or for this group in January, and we'll do something with the other group in the fall.

I would love to see ongoing contact be part of the process. I'd love to see this group having ongoing contact with each other, whether it's the listserv or website that's being discussed, and also a connection with the new group. I could see, at some point, having retreats with just CDL people, annual retreats or something like that.

Actually, I should say just on a personal level, the thought of coming and leading or being part of leading a week-long retreat here, for me, is great. I schedule a few retreats a year and this would be a wonderful retreat. It's a bit different when it involves co-ordinating teacher involvement and presentations. So I just want to put that out to you. Whether it's here or even traveling, even if it's going to the middle of the country or on the East Coast, doing a retreat, a silent retreat, I'd love to sit in silence with you, do a talk in the evening or whatever we decided to do.

So I think I'll stop here. The only other thing before the planning group goes is at some point, whether it's this afternoon or later on, I want to look at the whole issue of mentoring and what that will look like for the continuation of this group. I mentioned in that letter to the larger teacher community that when they nominate somebody as a candidate for the program, it's not just "oh yeah, this person asked me, good luck with them." It's that you feel good enough about them that you would consider being a mentor for them or take some role of active support.

Hopefully that will make it so that the people who are mentors for the current group, if there's been a good mentor relationship, don't have to take on five more people. And also, again, more involvement from the teachers outside the Spirit Rock community.

Question from participant: I certainly see the political reason for doing that, and I think it's extremely wise, but then it seems like it kind of puts the teachers in the position of recommending people that they know really well. In other words, people that are in their group.

Well, yeah, but the thing is that when a teacher recommends somebody, it's not necessarily somebody that they're in the same community with. It's people that have been on retreats whose practice they really value. That was mostly what I've been encouraging—people whose practice warrants and whose natural paramis warrant them being Dharma leaders. But as a little extra incentive, I said think about, besides that, if there are people who could be of real support for your local community who can fill all the requests that you can't do. So there are two ways that teachers would recommend people.

And even the question of the whole mentoring here has come up. Sometimes it's worked really well and sometimes less well. We can take a look at that when we explore that issue.

So anything else that you want to ask me before the planning group goes ahead? They've asked for about an hour to explore and present.

Question from participant about getting teacher support, noting it feels like karma that people end up in places without much teacher support, and that it seems like unless you move...

What would that look like, or what are you asking? I bet if you look at who teachers nominate, the greatest number will be in the local area.

I mean, I may be wrong, but take a look. I'm not talking about this group. I'm talking about the group coming. And if you see that happening, then I would really look at what Rosemary said and see if there's some other way to stay connected to the communities that don't have a lot of people involved.

And actually, another thing is there have been a few places like Washington or New York or Colorado where there's been a benefit in having a few people work together and kind of having a critical mass. So I could see how it would be really helpful if you're kind of a lone orphan out there in the wilderness and there's somebody else in your community who's got really strong practice—you know, to consider them for the next program. Ideally, and so I'm open to those suggestions, ideally if they were people who knew, had some relationship with some teacher so that the teacher could sponsor them. But I'm still open to other possibilities. We'll continue what's going on one way or another. It's more about the East Coast branching out. There just needs to be an opportunity for anyone's concerns to be heard.

I see that now you're going to be communicating with a much larger body of people looking at you.

Well, they're looking anyway. I'd rather have them look from the inside than the outside. I mean, why not?

For this group, I sent out a letter to everyone—IMS, Gaia House, and Spirit Rock. And there were a few people that were nominated through IMS and Gaia House. There were a handful. There were a number of people who were nominated or whose names were given, and I sent applications to them and never heard from them. They just kind of put it in the waste paper basket or whatever. So that was a little statement right there. But there were some people—Claire was nominated from a few people on the East Coast. And Tamara and Sandra also. So there's been some involvement, and people have appreciated it from the outset, but I just wanted to open it up and include them on the inside.

Someone asked about my concern about the nominations for the next round of people coming via teachers—is that so that they're kind of taking care of the politics of it, so that everyone's coming through an approved channel? It's twofold. One, because I respect teachers' estimations of people's practice. And also to include them and give them a chance to have input into the program.

One person offered this perspective: there's actually quite a lot of groups here where people would recognize within their own community very worthwhile individuals who might not have been spotted by various teachers. Because if you're coming in and you're teaching a retreat for a hundred people or eighty people, when you've got a ten-minute interview every couple of days, you've got to be pretty sharp to say, "Oh, this is a good one." So I would tend to encourage more weight coming from the input from these folks to the people they're actually working with and functioning alongside, rather than having that as the primary criterion. Personally, I feel that's worth more weight.

That's good to hear. And like I said a moment ago, I'd be open to that. In so far, I've been more concerned about teacher buy-in. Can I keep getting other teachers on board? But that makes sense.

We talked about this a little bit last week. Someone in our community came up to me after I'd given a talk one night and said, "I really want to be a teacher. I want to become a teacher. How did you become a teacher?"

And I said I'd like to hear a little bit about that. My impression of the traditional way that one becomes a teacher is that a teacher says, "Go out there and teach." Not "Gee, boss or guru, I want to go and teach now." That's not really the way it goes, right? It comes from the top down.

So it seems like you're trying to use that model in a more structured way by saying, you know, make these formal recommendations and send them applications and all that. And yet I do hear this thing that there are communities where maybe even the community should nominate someone—a group out there somewhere.

I don't know how you know about that. This is a puzzling piece, because it might be that there'd be somebody in your community that you would know better than we would know. But let's assume this person has done a fair number of retreats and a lot of practice. If you brought them to the attention of a teacher—perhaps it's someplace that James has traveled to a lot—then both could make the nomination. It seems highly unlikely that there's going to be somebody whose practice is fabulous, who's done gazillions of retreats, and there's not a teacher anywhere who knows them. That just doesn't seem possible. And I would really want whoever would be doing the program to be steeped in intensive practice. So I'd say at least five years of experience and five retreats, at a minimum.

And you raise a point that actually a lot of teachers have to deal with all the time: "I want to apply for the job. Where do I sign up?" If you knew how many people asked, "I hear Jack Kornfield has a teacher training program. How do I find out more information about it? Where do I apply?" I wouldn't need Donna if I had a nickel for every time that came up.

One of the things the teachers actually asked for, because it's been awkward for them—even teachers outside of the Spirit Rock community have been saying, "I've had a number of people tell me they want to join the Dharma Leaders program." And it's a little awkward saying no. So I actually said in the letter that there's officially a limit of two slots per teacher. And if you have more than that, I'd consider it. But that'll be a simple way to say no—my slots are filled.

I may be missing something, but I don't see what the problem is with either approach, or both. It would be like inviting people here to also be submitting names, with no assurance that there are people whose names they submit who can make the final cut. And January 31st was just something I wanted to start sending out applications for new people, but it's not a hard and fast deadline.

Anyway, that's mostly about the next group, and I want to bring it back to this group as well.

My understanding of the original purpose of the group was to be able to have places all over the country where dharma would be held in their communities. I did that last time, actually. I asked specifically teachers who I knew went to certain areas to consider somebody from this area or that area. And these are the names that came through.

But yeah, I definitely have in mind—like with New York, Tamara and Sandra were just, I think, the last two people to come into the program. I really wanted to have somebody from New York, because that's my hometown. And they need it there. Then I didn't know that Gina would create that critical mass there, but that's one of the really great delights—everything that's happened in New York. That just kind of happened at the last moment, really. I certainly want to look for areas that need some support. And Soren, who started out as local, ended up in New York.

CHAPTER 322

The Possibility of Inner Contentment

Carol Wilson · 49 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's promise of inner contentment—a peace that transcends circumstances and remains available regardless of what life presents. Drawing on St. Augustine's insight that humans suffer because they are "not living in their true home," she explores how we can reconnect with what Chögyam Trungpa called our "basic goodness" through simple, moment-to-moment presence.

Wilson guides practitioners through the Four Noble Truths as "four facts of how things are," explaining how our suffering stems not from life's inherent unreliability and constant change, but from our reactive relationship to experience. She illuminates how we habitually deny difficulty, obsessively self-reference, and mistake our interpretations for actual experience—mistaking the story about neck pain for the bare sensation of tightness itself.

Through poetry by Mary Oliver and reflections on figures like the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Wilson demonstrates that authentic peace doesn't require withdrawal from the world's suffering. Rather, it emerges from the courage to be fully intimate with both the dreadful and wonderful aspects of life. She offers practical guidance on cultivating bare attention—the capacity to distinguish direct experience from our layers of interpretation—revealing how this simple practice in meditation becomes the foundation for responding to all of life with wisdom and compassion.

Tonight I wanted to offer a general overview of the possibility of inner contentment, of living in peace—the potential that was promised to us by the Buddha from his own experience, actualized by many people over the centuries, and which we can discover for ourselves over and over in a moment-to-moment way.

This contentment is a way of living in this world as it is. The Buddha once said there is no higher happiness than peace. It's not a kind of constant ecstasy or always being filled with joy, not the bubbly happiness we might think of. That happens, and it's great—it comes and goes like everything comes and goes. But the peace, the deep contentment, is a way of living as we are right now in this world as it is, highly imperfect as it is.

What the Buddha holds out to us, and what we can explore through the simplicity of this practice, is the possibility of waking up to living our lives in a different way—relating to ourselves, our experience, and the world from a different place. Living from a contentment, an ease, a harmony with ourselves and with what's arising actually allows us to act more effectively, to be more present and more responsive. This is not at all the peace of dissociation, of needing to shut oneself away forever.

I read a quotation recently from St. Augustine: "The reason why humans behave as they do is because they are not living in their true home." I love that. We are not living in our true home. And what this practice is about is helping us to rediscover it. We're not creating something new. It's not that our true home or inner peace—or what Chögyam Trungpa used to call our basic goodness, a phrase I like very much—is something non-present, something we must irrevocably alter ourselves to create, or that we must somehow leave this world in order to get elsewhere. It's not so.

Rather, through shifting the way we relate, the way we understand our experience, ourselves, and the world, we live and move and trust in a different way. We come from a different place—from our basic goodness, our true home.

This is not discoverable by going elsewhere. Somewhat paradoxically, given that this world can be so troubling and painful and unsatisfying at times—our inner world, our outer world, what's going on in the world—paradoxically, we can only rediscover and reconnect with our true home by sinking totally into whatever's presenting itself here and now, but with an open, non-judging quality of heart, of attention. By really coming alive in life, in this moment, the natural radiance of who we really are is again recognizable.

It's hard to talk about, actually, true home. It's not something tangible. It's other than thoughts. It's not our emotions. It's not our sensations, although all of that can bring us into recognition. It's indescribable, yet when you are aware of, conscious of your basic goodness—all of our basic goodness, not just mine or yours separate—it's so familiar, so simple, so obvious. Like, "Oh yeah, right." You know those moments when you think, "What's the problem? Why can't it always be like this? What was I so upset about before?" And then, of course, the next moment it's gone again.

It's so familiar that I think sometimes, especially in a meditation retreat, we're looking for something a little more far out, a little more altered, a little more fantastic, a little more definable—something you can talk about and take home and say, "This really happened and I'm advancing on my spiritual path." Rather than just this: yesterday I was walking quickly through the desert, hurrying to get to the phone to answer emails—very important stuff—and suddenly I realized I was missing the whole desert. Just a sense of presence. So simple. But in that moment there's no sense of dividedness, no me or desert, no "I should do this" or "I was being a jerk before." Just this. Not even "this moment"—just being this.

We all experience that a lot. And then it's gone. If you try to say, "Wow, this is a moment of living in my true home, of beingness," it's gone. There's nothing to make a big deal out of. But it's helpful to know it, to recognize it, and to know that it's totally trustworthy.

So a lot of our practice here is a microcosm—how many moments are there in a day? Each moment is an opportunity to again connect with fullness of presence with whatever's happening. And it doesn't matter what's happening. It doesn't matter. We don't have to like it or dislike it.

Whatever's arising can be, in that moment, the avenue to again be fully present, to recognize what another friend of mine calls "a place of no problem." Where you're just—oh, my knee is killing me, and my breath is no good, and I'm falling asleep—and there's just a moment where you stop fighting, but you're still awake. Oh, place of no problem. Then it's gone again.

So, living from our basic goodness in this world as it is. And it's hard, isn't it? I mean, this world is really painful. There's so much in our own particular lives. I talk with many, many people, and even those whose lives you could say are very fortunate—everyone has their own suffering, a lot of difficulty. And in this country, in every place I've ever been, in everything I've ever read, we don't have to say it: the injustice, the poverty, the economic imbalance, the greed, the confusion, the violence, the hatred. How can we really live with contentment and still stay open to this?

Again, it's not easy. And it comes from beginning to understand that we're defining peace and contentment in a slightly different way from our cultural norms.

A friend of mine, when I told her I was talking about inner contentment, said, "Well, anyone can have inner contentment when conditions are calm and peaceful." Think about it. That's not even true. Have you ever had a time when you went on vacation, or you finally were doing something you'd really been looking forward to, and you weren't happy? Something happened, or you had a fight with your partner, or you get there and it's too hot, or you come here and it's too cold. All the conditions seem good, but you're still miserable. So even that you can't rely on.

But our tendency, the way one generally tends to think about contentment, is to first relate it to outer conditions. We're contented if we can somehow control our environment. That's what's great about retreats—it's a microcosm of your whole life. Often people find themselves in the first day or two, if that's your particular tendency, trying to control the environment. If that's not your tendency, believe me, you have other ones. We all do. But some people find themselves really trying to control the room, control the hall, control what they're going to wear, find their little schedule so they can walk in this way at this time to this place, and then it'll really be okay.

Controlling the environment is also a way of trying to block out the difficulty, the suffering. Some people, in living their lives and looking for happiness or contentment, are always going after pleasure and somehow avoiding—just saying, "It's too painful what's going on in this world. I don't want to know about it." Every now and then I'll talk to someone who says, "I just never read the newspapers because it's too painful." That's not what we're talking about either.

And then one can take the flip side of that, where we really are very involved in the suffering in the world, in whatever arena particularly calls us, working actively to help effect a change, but getting so involved, so over-identified, that we really start to drown in despair, in anger, in frustration—because no one can fix it all. From that place, it's really a challenge to imagine how one could live with real peace and contentment while people are still going hungry, while children are still not being educated, whatever the particular issue is that's closest to your heart.

But we're talking about something completely different. That's one of the reasons I think Buddhism has sometimes gotten the reputation of being very quiescent, very pulled back. That we go off into caves, we go off into meditation retreats, completely removed from our lives in nice places, meditate on our own for ten days, but that the peace acquired by setting up those conditions doesn't have very much to do with the rest of life. That we're just the lucky few who can do that. That Buddhism requires a removal from day-to-day suffering and is really about that removal.

It's not that either. It's true that the conditions of a retreat give us the opportunity to investigate in a much clearer way than is possible when our minds are so busy, so cluttered as they are in our daily lives. Well, I'll speak for myself. Maybe the rest of you have very quiet lives where you just do one thing at a time with a lot of space. Maybe that's possible. It's not true in mine, or anyone I know. I just read an advertisement from HBO—I didn't quite get the technicalities of it, but the drift was that they had some new thing you could get that would enable you to watch two different movies at once on two different TVs. As if this was something we should want. God forbid we should miss anything.

The Buddha's understanding of the inner contentment we're talking about here—it's very different from escapism, from avoidance. It's much more radical than what we would normally think, because this inner contentment is always available.

It's who we are. It's our birthright, and it has nothing to do with conditions—either outer or inner. Ultimately, contentment isn't dependent on our body feeling good, or on being in a good mood, or on having people love us, or on being able to effect wholesome change where we work, in our families, in our communities. All of that is important to do, but that's not the basis for the peace of the Buddha.

The shift that allows us to recognize our true home and live from peace is exactly a shift of attitude, not a shift of conditions. And oddly enough, the attitude shift isn't one of pulling away from conditions, but of opening into, sinking deeply into what's happening. It's the shift of attitude that allows us to see things as they are rather than how we think they are. And this actually is huge. It's an immediacy of presence, a wakeful intimacy that actually allows this shift of perception, this shift of attitude that opens us into a different way of being.

Let me read you this poem because I love it. It's a little long, but to me it really speaks to our tendency to pull away from the painful, the unpleasant, our wanting to change things—and how the simple immediacy of presence, loving acceptance of what is without any dialogue about it, just as it is, opens us to a whole new way of being in that moment.

It's by Mary Oliver:

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl. Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it. Kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings. Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place, in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face. Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win. She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem. But first, we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She is washing the tops of airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life, and I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen, but maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. And neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

So our human potential for connectedness, for harmony, for happiness, for being able to meet ourselves and the world as it is with love and compassion—it's so close. And it can seem so far in a moment when we're having difficulty with what's happening. But the shift is just one of attitude, of how we meet what's happening in that moment.

And so in this retreat, what we're doing is having many moments where we can simply practice that wholehearted meeting—and explore as well the times when we just can't do that, when we're suffering, when we're caught, when we're reactive, when we're frustrated, whether it's with ourselves, with others, with situations. When we're longing for something. When we want things to be different.

We start out with ourselves, but it isn't a self-involved, separating practice. Because as we explore our own reactivity, our own ability to open to truth, to love, to peace, that automatically takes us out into the whole world. We see that we are the world.

This is how Thich Nhat Hanh describes the four foundations of mindfulness:

Meditation is to be aware of what is going on in our bodies, our feelings, our minds, and the world. Each day, 40,000 children die of hunger. The former superpowers still have more than 50,000 nuclear warheads. Yet the sunrise is beautiful. And the rose that bloomed this morning along the wall is a miracle. Life is both dreadful and wonderful. To practice meditation is to be in touch with both of these aspects.

And it's often quite challenging. It can take a lot of courage to keep being in touch with both of these aspects. You might find you have a tendency more for one than the other. No one really likes to be with difficult stuff—but some people really notice the difficult a lot and just don't quite see that there's also a lot that's pleasant, a lot of beauty. For others, it's more the reverse. They notice their happy states, they notice the beauty in the desert, and they try to shut off the difficult. Somehow it can seem hard for us to recognize that both can be true in alternation.

If we're lucky, it's in alternation.

So we begin to cultivate a recognition of this place of no problem, of our basic goodness, this sense of ease in the moment. I've tried to describe a few such moments. Again, it's nothing special. Right now, just right now, quit trying to do anything and simply feel your body sitting there. Just notice it. Without any judgment, without any story—you're just sitting there.

Now, is that so hard? Does it take a lot of time? Does it require any great skill? No, I hope the answer is no. It's not a big deal. All we're doing is remembering to do that, to appreciate the simplicity of being present.

Yet to do that moment to moment is really hard.

I want to talk a little about the way the Buddha tried to lay out the facts to help us understand why it's so hard. What I tend to notice is that if I just sit—okay, I'm sitting here, fine—pretty soon the mind goes off. Either it hits something painful or unpleasant: right now my back's hurting a little bit, it's so cold, I didn't like that noise, I don't like my breath, I'm feeling sleepy—and we're off in reactivity. Or we have a memory of something difficult, or we start to feel sad, and we have a difficult emotion. Or we go off just distracted. The mind simply doesn't quite know how to settle into a steady focus.

Again, it's what I was saying about how busy our lives are, this thirty-second attention span that seems to be cultivated by the media. Like it or not, it's so prevalent that it's easy to fall into it. Even with the best intentions, when things are relatively pleasant and there's no big problem, the mind is hopping off here and there. How many of your thoughts today have seemed totally useless? You know—why am I thinking this? It's not even interesting. It's not going anywhere. And then when that same thought comes up again for the fiftieth time: what is going on? Nothing. It's just the mind looking for distraction. It's not used to focusing.

So the Buddha talked a lot about this, and he gave us the Four Noble Truths. I'm going to speak about them briefly as the four facts of how things are. Not recognizing them, not accepting things as they are, keeps us in this mode of reactivity to what's arising rather than being able to land with full presence in the moment. When we meet a moment without reactivity, we can respond appropriately. We can respond from connectedness, from compassion.

The first truth is that life experience—everything that comes into our life, our body, our mind, other people—is basically unreliable. Unreliable in terms of being in constant change, in constant flux. We never really know what's going to happen in the next moment. Even with all of our plans, as carefully laid as they are, we never really know. Jack had been planning to come here for a year, and the night before he got really sick.

We never know. Is he going to get better tomorrow? Is he going to get sicker? Who knows? All of us sitting here—who knows how we're going to feel tomorrow? One time here, quite some years ago, in the middle of a talk, we had a big earthquake. You never really know what's going to happen in the next moment.

That level of unreliability—we really mostly don't like to live with that too much. That's not something that makes us perk up our ears and say, "Yeah, great, that really brings me a sense of peace, a sense of rest." It's much more like, "Why is she talking about that? Okay, unreliable, sure, I know. We get sick, we die, yeah, yeah, yeah. Bad things are going to happen, yeah, yeah, yeah."

That's sort of what the Buddha's saying in this first truth. He's saying: this is how things are. It's not good or bad.

It's not your fault. It's not someone else's fault. We're not talking about blame. We're simply saying, this is how things are. Everything is constantly changing. There's no state of mind you can hold onto, no state of body. We're all going to have to deal with loss, with things not being the way we want them to be, with having to be with things we'd rather not be with—situations and people both.

Watching my parents getting old and getting sick, I notice how my mind thinks, No, not them. And then I think, Hey, my dad's eighty-two. What do you expect? It's going to happen. But still, there's the resistance.

And what's our relationship to this? Without really paying attention, our knee-jerk habitual relationship is just what keeps us suffering. The first, most obvious pattern—but one we can get caught in—is just outright denial. I'm not sick. You're not suffering. Just pull yourself together and get over it.

You know how it is when you're really grief-stricken, or you've been sick a long time, or something really hard is happening in your family. After a while, your friends seem to only want to hear so much. And you kind of get the feeling, Okay, better talk about something else. I'm going to spoil the luncheon. You don't want to talk about it on vacation because it'll bring people down—as if we could somehow hold ourselves separate.

I read this article from the Associated Press. To my mind, this is the ultimate example of trying to control and deny. The mayor of a small southern city in Spain banned death. He felt the local cemetery was too crowded for a soul to get decent eternal rest. So the four thousand residents of this village in the Granada province should "remain alive" while municipal officials shop for land to build a new graveyard. Mayor

Jose Rubio, age fifty-eight, issued an edict last week ordering people—and I quote—"to take utmost care of their health so they do not die until Town Hall takes the necessary steps to acquire land suitable for our deceased to rest in glory."

Now, maybe we don't go that far. But there's something in it I could really relate to. When I have something I really want to do, I'll think, Okay, I'll get sick later, but I can't get sick this month. Or if I'm worried about my parents: Okay, in November it's fine if something happens because then I can go home, but not in August because I have to be in Europe. There's an element of denial.

Once I was in the hospital quite some years ago. I'd been there a while, and if you've ever been in the hospital getting intravenous fluids, you know that sometimes after a while the veins collapse and it gets harder to put the IV in. The nurse that particular morning was having problems. She tried it a few times, and by that point we were both stressed. She was actually more stressed than me because she hated to cause pain.

So she ran out into the corridor and collared the first doctor walking by. I thought, Man, I'm really in trouble now, because the nurses are the ones who put in the IVs, not the doctors. So he came in and was jabbing away. I wasn't at my most balanced, and little tears were coming down. I didn't say much, but there were tears. He looks at me and says, "What's the matter? This doesn't hurt."

And really, I could understand that. It was too painful for him to let it in—that he was hurting me, even though his intention was wholesome. He wasn't trying to hurt me; he was trying to help me. But it's so hard for us to be present and open, fully intimate with the experience of the unpleasant.

That holding ourselves away—whether through denial, through trying to change things, or through completely going after pleasure—is what keeps us confused and suffering.

So what the Buddha's saying is not that we have to live with passive resignation: Okay, whatever bad happens, I'm a doormat. There's nothing I can do to change things. Not at all. But simply, in the moment, if something difficult, painful, or lost is happening—that it's happening. That's all. To be able to acknowledge with an open heart: Yes, this is happening. From that, we might be able to respond with a lot more wisdom, with a lot more appropriateness.

So seeing the constant change, the flux—it's actually a seeing of wisdom that brings not the kind of despair that cries, Oh my God, there's nowhere to rest, everything's changing. What it really brings is peace.

Because if I know this beautiful thing is going to change, I actually can appreciate it more fully rather than worrying about whether it will change. I know it will change, so I can be present. When something difficult is happening, rather than blaming myself, rather than blaming others, rather than taking it really personally, it's just: okay, this is what's happening. It's a fact of life. Can I be with the bare experience rather than all my reactions?

And notice—this is one of the ways we don't quite see change clearly—that we tend sometimes to take it personally. In myself, I feel like it's an obsessive self-referencing about everything.

For example, the weather here in the desert. I love doing retreats here because the desert is such a teacher in this regard. You never know. I've been here fifteen or sixteen springs now, and you never know how the weather's going to be. But every time—sixteen years—I never pack enough warm clothes. I always remember the first year I came when it was really warm and we were sunning ourselves. Sixteen years, and I don't get it. Franz keeps saying to me, "What's the matter with you? Pack more warm clothes." Two years ago I had to go buy a down coat at a thrift store here because it was freezing.

But it's constantly changing. You can't come here and really settle into "this is how the weather is going to be." Two days ago—we got here Tuesday night—it was really pristine. It was warm. It was beautiful. The wind wasn't blowing. And even though we could say, "Oh, we know the wind's going to start blowing sometime," we didn't really mean it. When the wind started blowing, I could see my mind going, "Oh, wouldn't you know it. Just when I come to the desert, the wind starts to blow."

That's what I mean about this obsessive self-referencing. Constant change—and how does it affect me? That's all I care about. How does it affect me? That's the source of the suffering. Take the me out of it, and it's just what it is. There's no real problem. I can walk outside, and instead of pretending it's warm because I want it to be, I can notice it's cold and put on the appropriate clothes. It took me until this afternoon to put on this jacket. So yes, it really is cold and it's staying cold—put on the jacket. Just to be really present. It's out of our control.

So how much of our suffering is about trying to control what's uncontrollable? I came here to sit with Jack and he's sick. That's just a fact. What does the mind do with that? That's the suffering—if the mind does something with it.

And so the second fact that the Buddha talked about: the cause, really the cause of our discontent, of our dissatisfaction, of our dis-ease in this world, is not that difficult stuff happens—because it's going to—but it's the reactivity of our heart and mind to both the difficult and the beautiful. We hold on to what we like. We want it to stay, knowing it can't. We push away, we hate, we react, we blame ourselves, we blame each other, we try to control. All the permutations. And you have ten days to explore those permutations. That's an important part of the practice.

It really is. How do we react to the simple fact of what's arising? How do our reactions cause us suffering in this moment?

So often we're entranced by our reactions, by the cycling stories that we tell from our reactions, and we aren't even aware of what actually started off that reaction in the first place. We're long gone into reaction on top of reaction on top of reaction.

For example, this is a very simple thing, but pleasant. You could be sitting in the hall, getting a little bored with what's going on, and some pleasant smell comes by. You don't even really consciously recognize it. From that pleasant smell, you kind of get a nice feeling. There's a thought: "Ah, I wonder what's for lunch." And then you go back to that wonderful meal you had two weeks ago with so-and-so, and maybe you can do it again. And what are you doing sitting here? Because you could be having that wonderful meal with so-and-so, and actually it's freezing here. And you're completely gone—wanting and aversion and spacing out. You never even noticed just a simple nice smell coming through. And you're in worlds of discontent. Because wanting the pleasant that isn't here is also discontent. It keeps us from landing in our true home.

Just to connect with what is, recognizing it, the simplicity of a moment's experience for what it is—that's the place where our peace can begin.

This is from the great Buddhist teacher Phil Jackson. His book is actually quite good. I don't know if you've read it—Sacred Hoops, about his time training the Bulls. It's really quite good. He said: "In Zen it's said that the gap between accepting things the way they are and wishing them to be otherwise is the tenth of an inch of difference between heaven and hell. If we can accept whatever hand we've been dealt, no matter how unwelcome, the way to proceed eventually becomes clear. This is what is meant by right action: the capacity to observe what's happening and act appropriately without being distracted by our self-centered thoughts. If we rage and resist, our angry, fearful minds have trouble quieting down sufficiently to allow us to act in the most beneficial way for ourselves and for others."

That's really it in a nutshell: learning how to connect with the simplicity of our experience, using just the sensations of breath for the beginning. How much more simple could we get? And we'll move to sensations in the body and include our emotions and our thoughts and sounds and senses and everything that's happening in our experience—everything. Learning how to quiet the mind enough to connect with the simplicity of experience and learn how to tell the difference between what's actually happening and all our interpretations and reactions. And from that place, true compassion and peace and right action become really possible.

The end of suffering that the Buddha speaks of—we can experience it in moments. It's not by separating ourselves from life. It's not by achieving some very high state of concentration or an altered state. I mean, those are nice. Those are momentary, you could call them worldly pleasure. But it's not the end of suffering the Buddha's talking about. The end of suffering is really when we have a moment where we can experience what's happening—internal, external, whatever it is—fully, openly, without resistance, without clinging, without this self-referencing of "what does it mean to me?" Simple, total presence. Here, now, this moment. That's all. Just this moment. Free of clinging and self-referencing.

And in that moment, we see how much energy in our lives goes into resistance. How much energy is caught up in wanting things to be different, in holding on to or chasing after the pleasant, in trying to arrange things so we don't experience what we don't like. It's huge. And we recognize that when there's a moment when none of that is present. There's this vivid, wakeful totality of presence—just what is—that lets us begin to trust that maybe we really are other than this mass of emotions and reactions and thoughts and body sensations. I mean, if I'm really my emotions and my thoughts, that's a really depressing thought. If we pay attention, how many emotions and thoughts have gone through today? How can we really think we're any of them? It always amazes me that I keep thinking this emotion is me when I know it wasn't here five minutes ago and it's going to be gone in another half hour.

But this sense of presence, of not being so self-absorbed, is not like a grim, disconnected kind of life. That's another misconception of a mind and heart that's free from clinging, of the peace of the Buddha, so to speak—that it's somehow ethereal, floating along, disconnected, dispassionate, meaning indifferent, "who cares."

But the people that I've read about or the people I meet—I can't say someone's completely awakened, I don't know that—but you know when you're with someone who seems more free, more alive, less self-obsessed. Someone who is compassionate, who is really able to roll with what's happening in life without getting so thrown by it. The people like that that I know or that I read about, they're actually some of the most joyful, alive people I've ever met.

I saw this one photograph—I don't know if I have it somewhere here. Oh yes, you probably can't see it, but it's the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. They were at a conference in Virginia, University of Virginia I think, a couple of years ago, for Nobel Peace laureates. Seven or eight of the Nobel Peace laureates had been invited to this conference to try and jolt the students at this college into some sense of caring about the world outside of themselves, basically. That was the point of the conference.

But what I love is this: I think of the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu as two men who have probably come face to face with more suffering in their respective lives than almost anyone. All the people that they work with or listen to in South Africa or among the Tibetan refugees—I can hear just one or two stories and it's unbearable suffering. And for these men, it's their whole lives. Yet in this photo, they're just clowning around, completely laughing and joking. The Dalai Lama is behind Archbishop Tutu, and he's trying to pull off his cap, like little kids. Archbishop Tutu is holding it on, and they're both just cracking up. This is obviously in front of everybody, a photo opportunity, and that's how they're acting—innocent and joyful, not weighed down with the troubles of the world.

So when we begin to explore opening here and now, meeting what's happening rather than avoiding it, it might seem counterintuitive. We think, "I don't want to dive into this. This is what's causing me problems. I want to get away from it." But the actual meeting face to face with bare attention—that's what brings us into real trust, into our true home, into the ability to meet ourselves and life with much greater compassion and kindness and connectedness. To really trust that that's who we are. And that it's possible in this confused and painful world to live from a truer, more connected place that lets us actually be more present for one another. More present for ourselves.

Our practice here may not seem like it's connecting to that, especially in the beginning. Feeling your knee pain, feeling your shoulder tension, watching your breath, falling asleep, hating it. "Don't give me that. What's that got to do with living in your true home and compassion? It's just torture." But the way our mind responds to the neck pain is the way we're going to respond to something bigger in the world.

The only other concept I want to mention is that of bare attention. In other words, use that neck pain, use the coldness of the wind to begin to see how to bring our attention into the actual experience and learn to tell the difference between that and our ideas and interpretations. Sometimes we don't even know that we're mistaking our interpretation for the actual experience.

Pain in the body is a good example. Your knee starts to hurt. Do you just notice dullness or throbbing or sharpness? Do you even have a moment of that, or is it immediately, "Oh my God, here it goes. This is bad. I'm going to have to have arthroscopic surgery. These people are nuts. They're all sitting in chairs. What happened to them? I bet they really damaged themselves somewhere down the line." You don't even get to, "Oh, it's throbbing. It's actually not even that bad." When you look at it, it isn't even hurting yet, but you're already out of here.

Or the tension in the neck—is it just tightness? Or is it a sign of your high-stress, type-A personality? A sign that you're out of control in your life? That you're driven? That you've never been able to express love to anybody?

That you're doing way too much. That you yelled at your kids before you came. That everything's wrong in life. That this whole society, this whole culture is completely messed up. And in fact, you've got that guy you met who moved to Ireland and has finally found peace—that's what you need to do.

It goes pretty far pretty quickly, doesn't it?

Can you even get out of that back to simple throbbing without it meaning anything about who you are as a person? Sometimes we can, but sometimes we really can't. And in fact, we get angry at someone who tells us that it's just throbbing. Don't tell me that. I know.

So this is our practice. Just feel the bare sensation of breath without it meaning anything. It's just a sensation. It's our avenue in that moment to awareness. Whether the sensation is beautiful or ugly or tight or loose or you can't feel it or whatever—it doesn't matter. In that sensation, in the feeling of it, we're in awareness. The sensation comes and goes, but awareness is here no matter what's happening. And sensation—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, the coldness of the wind, whatever's happening—is simply our key to open into awareness again.

And in that simplicity of awareness is where we re-recognize and learn to trust what St. Augustine called our true home.

I urge you to try to be non-judgmental about whatever's going on. Just recognize that every moment is an opportunity to dwell in peace, in contentment, in really participatory intimacy with life. This moment is all the life we've got. Let's be really here with it.

CHAPTER 323

Attachment to Views

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines one of the Buddha's key teachings on suffering: our attachment to views and opinions (diṭṭhi). Drawing from both classical Buddhist teachings and contemporary examples—from political debates to dietary beliefs to the civil rights movement—she illuminates how our tendency to think "this alone is true, everything else is false" creates conflict within ourselves and with others.

Wilson traces how suffering begins at the level of perception itself, explaining the Buddhist understanding of how contact leads to feeling, perception, and then the proliferation of thought (papañca) that can "assail and overwhelm" us. She shares the story of a woman whose entire day was ruined by misperceiving a colleague's expression, illustrating how our interpretations—colored by memory, mood, and conditioning—can spiral far from what is actually happening.

At the deepest level, Wilson points to our most fundamental misperception: the belief in a continuous, unchanging self. Through direct investigation in meditation, we can discover that what seems solid—body, emotions, thoughts, and the sense of "I"—is actually arising and passing moment to moment. Rather than finding this destabilizing, she suggests it offers profound relief: we can put down the burden of thinking we're in charge of everything. The talk concludes with an invitation to meet each moment with openness and trust, free from the preconceptions that keep us imprisoned.

When I said earlier that I really liked asking opinions from fifty people, that's actually what I want to talk about tonight—the not-so-subtle tendency of mind.

Tonight is Passover, and in the staff dining room, we had a little mini, very reduced Seder, reduced from four hours to ten minutes. But that's okay. And me not being Jewish, it's really nice to hear the metaphorical explanation that it's really a celebration of coming out of bondage into liberation, and thinking of that not in the past, but as our heritage, as what we are doing right now in this moment—coming out of bondage into freedom, to liberation.

So tonight I'd like to talk about one way that without wisdom, without understanding what's happening in the moment, we relate to experience in a way that keeps us suffering, that keeps us in bondage—and how by a simple shift of perception, the whole relationship changes. What I want to talk about is basically centered around this experience we call thinking. I don't know if you've noticed how much power that experience can have, but that's what I want to talk about tonight.

At this point in the retreat, a little over halfway through, it's pretty common for a yogi, a meditator, to find yourself at times in a sort of self-assessment. How am I doing? Has this been a complete waste of time? Am I getting anywhere? Am I making progress? What have I learned? And most of this assessment comes in the form of thinking, doesn't it? Comparing how our experience meets some ideal we've read about or heard about or just made up ourselves. And you'd be surprised how much we're just making it up ourselves.

In the realm of thought, a lot of our practice, a lot of our spiritual journey can become about acquiring knowledge. If we get some particular set of knowledge—whether it's philosophical, whether it's understanding how to do the meditation so that you know the correct response in every situation—then we'll know. We'll be free.

For years—I hate to say how many years—my practice was really, I held in the back of my mind some idea that finally on one retreat (and I always thought it would be this retreat), I would suddenly acquire the particular piece of knowledge that explained everything. And then I would understand it all. Everything would make sense, all the paradox, all the mystery, and then I would be able to rest. Forget all this hard work and this confusion that gets going in the mind and trying to put it all together. Now I know. I understand. I have the knowledge.

I guess you know what I'm leading up to: the fact that it doesn't work this way. Actually, the more we bring our attention into experience, the less hard and fast knowledge there is to hold onto. It's really about a willingness to open into the total mystery, the vastness of not knowing.

So I'll read my favorite scientific article, which I think serves as a perfect metaphor for what we really begin to discover as we inquire into our mind and body moment-to-moment experience. This is from the New York Times a few years ago about cosmology. It says, "One of the great unanswered questions of cosmology is why the universe is lumpy instead of smooth." I know you've been worrying about that in these days. Lumpy meaning why things cluster together instead of being evenly spaced out in the universe.

So these scientists discovered, in pursuit of understanding this, the largest galaxy ever detected. That galaxy has 100 trillion stars in it and is more than 6 million light years in diameter. That's big. It's sixty times bigger than the Milky Way, which they call the Earth's own galaxy. You didn't know that we, as Earthlings, own a galaxy, but we do—the Milky Way.

But this new galaxy, this huge one, is located in the center of an even larger clump of 1,000 galaxies. And this giant clump of galaxies is called by the poetic name of Abel 2029.

But that's just leading up to all this investigation to try and understand what all this matter is doing. The scientists still can't understand what holds all these galaxies together. There doesn't appear to be enough ordinary matter in the universe to account for the gravitational forces that cause all these galaxies to clump together like this. So scientists propose the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that eludes detection because it emits no radiation. According to prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe is made up of this missing, invisible matter. What's generally thought of as astronomy actually concerns only a tiny subset of particles that happen to be detectable by human nervous systems.

Now I think that's a very good metaphor for our practice. The willingness to simply bring our attention to what we can observe, to meet it as clearly as possible. Sure, we'll have ideas about it, things we want to understand, interpretations—but can we put that aside and simply open into the mystery and let this experience in this moment reveal itself? All too often the answer to that question is no. But what we're learning is that it's possible.

When we talk about beginner's mind—Suzuki Roshi's fantastic phrase that we've all been using—it's really this: to bring to each moment of experience a quality of attention that is free from preconception. When we meet just a moment of life in this way, rather than saying, "Oh, I know what this is. This is the desert. This is a bell. That's Anna. What do I know about Anna? I think I know Anna because I've known her for years"—can we bring a freshness instead? We don't really know anything, absolutely. And when we can open with this wonder, life is so mysterious. Everything is so... it just brings such an aliveness, such a presence, such a connectedness.

If I look out over the desert there, just walking up here, I think, how can I think I know anything? It's so mysterious. And then when we think we know, the mind snaps shut. But this isn't normally the way we live.

One of the things I've noticed in thirty years I've spent really observing this mind and body closely is that our mind tends often not to be so comfortable with meeting every moment with this openness of "who knows?" We like to know, don't we? Do you really like thinking you're here, really working hard for ten days, and you're going to get absolutely no confirmation whatsoever whether it was worthwhile or not? Does that sit well with the mind? We like to have some sense of stability, some sense of security, of knowing where we are in comparison to yesterday and tomorrow. And I want to know where I am in comparison to Anna and Philip—we're constantly comparing. Am I better? Am I worse? Am I equal? Always wanting to have this sense of security.

The Buddha said one time, this desire for a resting place is burning in the heart and mind. Not to need a resting place is cool and peaceful. But to us, the sense of no resting place can be very unrestful, disturbing. We want some firm ground to stand on.

And one way—the way I want to talk about tonight—that this tendency of wanting to control and have security manifests is through the way we can relate to thought. As I think Jack said, and I thought it was a great line, thought is a wonderful tool and a terrible master.

Thought is great. It communicates. We use it to communicate, to describe, to explain, to encompass very complex things. We really can appreciate the power and the quality and the subtlety of thought. One way that it becomes a terrible master, that it brings us into conflict, confusion, and suffering with ourselves, with how things are, with one another, is when the descriptions or interpretations that we're putting on a moment of experience or ourselves or another harden and solidify, and that description or interpretation becomes a view or an opinion.

Even that's okay if we know it's a view and an opinion. But so often we get caught in really believing—to use the Buddhist terminology—grasping, clinging, attaching ourselves to that view, to that opinion, to that description of how things are or should be. And in that attachment, in that grasping, enormous suffering can arise in ourselves, and then we can inflict that on others and on the world.

This aspect of grasping at views the Buddha actually spoke about quite a bit, as one of the great sources of our confusion, of our not seeing things the way they are, of our not recognizing our potential for liberation.

The classical description of grasping at views is the tendency of mind to think, "This alone is true, everything else is false." Now, I always think if my mind would really say that, it would be a big help, because then I would know at least that a view is arising and I was grasping at it. Unfortunately, it's usually much more insidious. We really do think this is true, to the exclusion of being able to admit—often even the possibility—that maybe, perhaps, things could be another way.

So attachment to views really limits our world, our heart, our mind, our experience, our ability to be open and connected with one another. When we're caught in an opinion, in a view, what's really interesting is how our perception, our mind, snaps closed. We don't even let in, or want to let in, any information that might run counter to our view, because we're so sure this is how it is.

Let me give a few obvious examples. Politics, of course, is a great one, because at least we usually know we have a view. We believe it, of course. There's nothing wrong with that. We're going to have opinions, and we're going to act on them. Hopefully we'll vote. We'll have opinions on different issues. Nothing wrong with that. But you know how on television, when election campaigns are coming up and the candidates have so-called political debates? I find those debates a joke. I've never heard one where I felt like they were really interested in listening to each other and maybe hearing, "Oh, you have something different to say about that issue. Maybe there's something useful in what you say." You know, forget about it. They're just not even talking to each other.

I've noticed—back in '92, I won't go into specifics—but during the presidential election that year, there were a couple of politicians running for various things that I literally could not stand to listen to on television, or even see. This was my real attachment to my view. I knew that they were completely—what would I say—selfish, uncaring, had no one's interest in mind but themselves and rich people, that there was nothing good whatsoever about either of these two human beings. And if anyone told me something good, I didn't want to hear it, because then I would have to loosen my view.

I read in a newspaper—maybe it was in Thailand—about the recent presidential election in Taiwan. It was describing how completely, intensely the Taiwanese people were caught up in their opinions about who they wanted elected president. To the extent that before the election, the hospitals were, on a daily basis, having people brought into the emergency room. Usually it was men, brought in by their families. They developed a name for it: a kind of pre-election mania. This is true—I read it in the newspaper. So obsessed. I know, that really means it's true, right? That's another scary thing. But these men would come in so obsessed that they were in a kind of manic state, and this kept happening over and over, every day, different people. Such a manic state that all they could talk about was their candidate and how you should vote for him, and they couldn't stop talking about it. They weren't able to work. They wouldn't even let the doctors or nurses talk to them until they found out who they were going to vote for. It's very serious. And then after the election—I don't know if you recall—there were a lot of riots by the people whose candidate didn't win, because they were so upset.

So taking an opinion, a view of what we think is right, and attaching to it—we really want that—can lead to enormous suffering. These are minor examples. Minor examples.

A couple of others that are more personal: the views people can have about what is healthy to eat. Now, I'm from the East Coast. I don't want to cast aspersions on California, but I do notice the views are a little more strongly held here than in some parts of the world where I've been. But I'll tell a story from IMS in Massachusetts. Every summer we have a retreat for young adults, for people between the ages of thirteen and eighteen. Every year it's grown until now there are about sixty people. Stephen Smith and Michelle McDonald-Smith have been doing this for years. It's a wonderful retreat.

In the beginning, it was just parents—you know, people who had been sitting and made their kids come. But the kids got into it, and now there are plenty of kids who come whose parents have nothing to do with it. They love it, and they tell their friends. One year, there were three or four fifteen- and sixteen-year-olds from New York City who lived a very different life from a meditation center out in the country in Massachusetts, and whose diet was very different. They didn't really eat vegetarian. Tofu wasn't big on their agenda. Mostly fast food and sweets and potato chips and like that. So the cooks would—

The cooks would try to make things the kids would like, but within vegetarian limits. At this particular time, we had a group of cooks who were not into sugar—very strong views about how bad sugar is. And some of these kids, the ones from the city, really had physical difficulty with the diet. If you go off eating a lot of sweets and a lot of fat very quickly, the digestive system doesn't adjust so well. These kids were really having trouble, and Michelle told me she wanted to at least get some sweets, some sugar. But the cooks didn't want them to have it. Finally, after quite some negotiation, the cooks agreed to let these kids have sugar—but they had to hide it. My God, I thought. These kids must think we're really nuts, making them hide sugar, coming from the city.

We can get so attached.

On the other end, I was teaching a retreat in Switzerland a couple of years ago with two very good Swiss friends. Just kidding around, they kept singing to me—every day they would sing me this little Swiss German song from their childhood. Don't worry, I cannot replicate a song in Swiss German. But the upshot of this song was: "We are so happy living in the mountains. We eat plenty of butter and cheese, and that gives us good blood." Well, that's different from what I hear over here.

We had another couple of friends from Germany who came to California for the first time, and they were reporting about their first experience in a supermarket. They just wanted to go in and buy some milk and some yogurt. And they said, "My God, what is with this country? You can't just find milk. There's 1%, 2%, no percent. There's lactaid 70%, lactaid 100%, 1% lactaid 70%, 2% lactaid 70%, skim milk lactaid." Finally they found regular milk. Then they would go to some inexpensive taco place in Palm Springs, and they said, "We're really hungry, let's order the jumbo." Franz said, "You better not." So they ordered the regular, which was, of course, gigantic—more than two people could eat. They said, "Why don't people here just eat half as much, and then they wouldn't need seventy-five different kinds of milk?"

So—views about what we eat. We can get very, very fixated on it. I've been in millions of conversations that got quite heated about what is really good to eat. Can we just let in the possibility that what we think is an opinion? It's not God's truth on this planet. It's an opinion.

And then it gets actually very painful and very scary. When we're holding an opinion and we don't know it's an opinion, really deeply—when we think it's the truth of how things are—in our personal life this causes suffering, and even more so it wreaks havoc on the social, economic, political, person-to-person, and nation-to-nation relationships on this planet.

Just look in your own relationships—in your intimate relationship or with your family. Aren't there ways that... maybe I should speak for myself. I see that my mind thinks certain people should behave in certain ways. For example, there's a certain way a house is supposed to be kept. And that's just the truth of the world. Now, the person I'm living with might think there's a different way the house is supposed to be kept. But I really notice in my mind that my way is the right way, and the other unnamed person's way is due to a woeful ignorance and lack of proper upbringing.

And it's not always funny either, right? It isn't always funny. It leads to real misunderstandings, to anger. If I come in and I'm really tired, and the house isn't the way I like it, I get really angry. But if I catch myself—all right, this is an opinion, it's an opinion—sure, I prefer it this way, and that's okay, as long as I know it's an opinion. And if it's not the way I want it, open up.

What about in the way we think the socioeconomic system should be dealt with? If you're into the environment, if you're working on any particular environmental issue, when you look at the injustices in our educational system, in the economic system, all the bigotry that goes on in this country and in other countries, the way different people, different neighbors can really hate each other just based on their cultural or family background...

A few years ago in Thailand, you meet a lot of young people traveling. We met a young guy who seemed like a lot of the young guys traveling, and he was from Croatia. This was right at the time of the big Croatian-Serbian war. He seemed like a normal guy —until he was reading the newspaper one day, and there was some article about how some Serbians had been blown up and killed on a bridge.

He started cheering, as if his football team had won. And he just said, "You know, I just hate all Serbs. Finished." And you could see there was nothing that would allow him to let in a perception of a Serbian person that would get through that barrier.

Now that's what's really scary about how, when we hold to an opinion or view and we don't know it, we shut our minds, we shut our hearts. We don't let in alternative information that might break that down. When our view is threatened, it feels frightening. Often it's scary. And so the tendency is much more to hold to it rather than to move back onto that shaky ground.

This is from the Buddha: "For one who is freed from holding to views, there is no entanglement. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no more conflicts. But those who grasp after views and opinions, they wander about in the world, annoying people." But we also suffer.

Pema Chödrön says, "Opinions are opinions, nothing more and nothing less. We can begin to notice them. We can begin to simply label them as opinions, just as we label thoughts as thoughts. By this simple exercise, we are introduced to the notion of egolessness."

And this is interesting, because it's not just that it saves us from conflict in the moment—it begins to take us right into the heart of the Buddha's teaching, into egolessness. All ego really is, is our opinions, which we take to be solid, real, and the absolute truth about how things are. To have even a few seconds of doubt about the solidity and absolute truth of our own opinions, just to begin to see that we do have opinions, introduces us to the possibility of egolessness.

We don't have to make the opinions go away, and we don't criticize ourselves for having them. We just notice what we say to ourselves and see how so much of it is just our particular take on reality, which may or may not be shared by other people. Doesn't that just open up a whole different possibility of relating? Which we may or may not like. It doesn't really matter if we like it.

So mindfulness is just cultivating this ability to see what's what—to meet an experience and tell the difference between that experience and our interpretation and our opinions about it. And this comes down to the basic level of perception. Perception is the recognition faculty in any moment of what's happening.

For example: you hear that, I'm assuming. The perception is when the mind goes, "Oh, bell." That's perception—very simple. It's based on memory, on prior experience. And from perception, we begin to think, we begin to cogitate, we begin to draw associations and interpretations and memory very, very quickly. From that, we very quickly can solidify into a view and an opinion. It's only through the willingness to see that there's a view and opinion, and to be willing to come back and have a direct perception, that we can reach out of the mental cage, the solidity, the disconnection from life and from others that getting caught in a view of someone or something creates.

The Dalai Lama said, "All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception." That's quite a statement. All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge.

I want to share a life experience I read about that inspired me deeply—someone having the courage and the vision to reach outside of what could easily have been a closed view of someone else, and how that can really affect a shift. Then I want to talk about it in terms of our meditation practice here. This direct connection, this willingness to reach out of what could easily be a closed view, and how that direct experience shatters preconceptions and prejudice.

It's from a book by David Halberstam called The Children. He's talking about a man who really inspires me greatly. His name is Jim Lawson. This is about the sit-ins and the civil rights movement at the beginning of the 1960s. I don't know if you remember—I was quite young then—but in the 1960s in Nashville, there was a group of college students, and that's what The Children follows, about ten of these students who, under the tutelage of Jim Lawson, were taking a series of nonviolent workshops.

Jim Lawson was a little older, an African American man who had been a deep disciple of nonviolence for many years. He was a conscientious objector in the Korean War and went to prison for that. He was a disciple of Gandhi. He was a Christian minister, but deeply inspired by Gandhi. After the Korean War, he spent three years in India on a mission, also studying Gandhian nonviolent philosophy. And so he was in Nashville teaching these nonviolent workshops.

In early 1960, they were beginning the demonstrations. This story is about one particular demonstration where the students were marching peaceably to sit in at lunch counters. At that time, African American people were not allowed to eat at the downtown lunch counters, although they were allowed to shop in the stores, of course—just not eat there.

It was a peaceful demonstration, just marching down the street, and some young white toughs, like motorcycle hooligans, at the end of the line attacked and knocked down two young men at the end of the peaceful demonstration line and were kicking them and beating on them—Bernard Lafayette and Solomon Gort.

Jim Lawson, who was there, just walked over. This is Bernard Lafayette describing it—he was one of the ones being beaten, but this is how he observed it: "Jim Lawson just walked over very calmly, as if every day he walked over to young white toughs who were beating up his friends." And so that brought the hooligans' attention to Jim Lawson.

And they were so enraged by his confidence and his calmness and his non-aggression—it just enraged them—that one of them spit on him. And so Jim Lawson just looked at this guy and said, "Could you give me a handkerchief?" And the guy was so stunned that he reached in his pocket, gave him a handkerchief. At which point Bernard Lafayette and Solomon Gort had gotten up, and they started getting back in line.

And then Jim Lawson—and I could see in my mind how my mind immediately tends to make divisions, tends to say, "Oh, these guys are just bad, they're stupid, they're ignorant," completely shutting them out of my heart. But Jim Lawson looked at the guy, he looked at what he was wearing, which was the prevailing uniform of the day for white toughs: black pants, black leather motorcycle jacket, that kind of greased-back haircut. And he looked at him and said, "Do you drive a motorcycle or a hot rod car?" And the guy said, "Oh, well, I drive a motorcycle."

And then they plunged into this conversation. Lawson asked him, "Well, how do you have it souped up?" He asked him a couple of technical questions. They got into this whole conversation about the levels of horsepower in motorcycles. Meanwhile, the other two guys who had been attacked had gotten up, and the march had gone on. Jim Lawson just sat there talking for a while.

As Bernard Lafayette said, in that brief, frightening moment, Jim had managed to find a subject which they both shared and had used it in a way that made each of them seem more human in the eyes of the other. As they walked away, Jim waved to the man. The man remained still. He didn't wave back. He couldn't accept the friendship, but on the other hand, neither did he reject it.

Of course, that takes enormous courage, enormous vision in a situation like that—to be able to reach beyond the fear and the limitation that stereotypical views impose, and find that there's got to be some thread of humanness in there. And it's only by reaching beyond our views that we're able to do that.

So that's a huge life experience. And it takes a really exceptional person who can do that, I think. So I want to bring it back to here, to our meditation retreat. And the examples now may seem mundane. But remember, the way our mind latches onto experience, solidifies it, forms views here in this situation is just the same way our mind does it in more complex and confusing situations. This is where we can learn about it. This is where we can begin to see that perception can be different.

Just think a minute: have you noticed any views arising about what good practice means during this time? About what good practice would look like if you—God forbid—should ever experience a moment of it?

For us, talking to all of you, it's wonderful because we get to see, one after the other, the views. We get to see that there are views because one person will come in and say, "You know, my practice stinks. I try to stay with the breath, but all this other stuff keeps happening." The next person will come in and say, "I can't see impermanence. I'm just staying with the breath. And I really want to see impermanence, because that's what good practice is about." And one person thinks if you have a lot of emotions, that's good practice. And the next person says, "I don't have emotions, I'm just shallow and superficial." Another person says, "I just can't even feel the breath—I have no practice at all." Views about how you sit, how you walk, what good samadhi is.

When someone comes in to me and says, "My concentration is no good," that is one of the most uninformative remarks as far as having any idea what the person means. By samadhi, by good concentration, by bad concentration—we have so many views. And do you notice that as soon as you maybe have achieved what you think is good practice, then another view forms? Or we say something up here and you hear part of it and make a view about it. And we get stuck there, and we suffer, and we beat ourselves up because that's not what's happening. We don't let in other perceptions.

This is true. At one retreat some years ago, it was about the fifth day. A woman came in for an interview, and she said, "I have just been in agony trying to sit cross-legged here these five days. It's been so painful, but that's what you have to do. That's what good practice is." And it had just dawned on her that morning. She looked at me—I was sitting there the whole time in a chair. She looked at me and said, "Oh, Carol's sitting in a chair. Maybe that's okay." I mean, we had said it, of course, a million times.

Did we ever say you have to sit cross-legged or it's not good practice? Believe me, we never said that. And it took five days to let in that visual perception that, "Oh, maybe that's not true." We all do this, and it's so painful. I'll watch myself finally letting go—for example, just to take it that far is enough. "Oh, I don't have to sit cross-legged, I can sit in a chair. But I can't move the whole sitting." Immediately we drop one view and make another one. This is how it has to be.

Can you imagine having no view, no opinion of what good practice is? Just like I said, having no confirmation at the end and just being willing to be with what arises. Have you heard us say that before? The thing is, we really meant it. Just be with what arises. That's where it's at.

Or the views I certainly have of what an enlightened being should be like, of what a spiritual life would look like. Philip reminded me of this story. I haven't told it in years, so I get to tell it again tonight. It's always nice to remember old stories—views of what it really means to live in a spiritual way.

Quite some years ago, almost twenty years ago now, I went to Thailand to ordain as a Buddhist nun, and I spent a year in that way. When I first got there and found the temple and an abbot who would agree to ordain me—that's the whole process—it was in a temple in northern Bangkok. The abbot was very, very well-known in Thailand, very famous, an older abbot, a good friend of Ajahn Buddhadasa's, so very respected.

He had me stay there first. You can't just walk off the street and have him say, "Sure, I'll ordain you." They need to check you out a little bit. So he had me stay there for some weeks as a layperson. My first night there, in a little hut they gave me, I had very long hair at that time. You just sleep on the floor on a thin straw mat. In the middle of the night, I found out that an army of ants had suddenly altered its path. You know how they walk in a path. And the path now went through where I was sleeping, and especially through my hair.

In the middle of the night I woke up with all these little ants in my hair. We take the precepts not to kill, of course. So I sweep them away, sweep them away, they come back. I really didn't know what to do. And that was just the introduction—I mean, you spend some time in the tropics, you develop many intimate relationships with all types of insects. But I really didn't know what to do.

So the next morning I went to the abbot and thought, well, they must deal with this all the time. He'll have the answer, how you deal with this in a spiritual way. I explained my dilemma—they're in my hair, and yada yada. So he had his assistant, Maha Chachai, another monk, and said, "Oh, okay, don't worry." Maha Chachai went off and came back and handed me a big can of Raid.

I said, "Huh." Okay. I personally didn't feel good about that, but I said, "Okay, I'm on my own." That's really what it comes down to.

You want to know the truth? I can't remember. That's really the truth. I can't remember if I squirted the Raid or not. My guess would be I probably did, because I was like, "Oh, these ants." I was really freaking out. But a year later, I was in another monastery, and it was part of my morning routine. I'd get up, I'd have my shower, I'd go to have my meal, I'd come back and spend half an hour trying to sweep out the ants. That just became part of the daily routine. But I was fresh. I hadn't adjusted to that yet.

But ultimately, it comes down—no one can tell you, really. We're on our own there. What's really true for me?

So, how the whole line of thought and opinion and view begins and gets so solidified.

It starts with this process of perception I mentioned, that recognition factor. The Buddha says that at the moment of contact with any of the sense doors—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking—something arises. We feel it as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We perceive it: "Oh, that's a bell, that's a rug, that's an owl baby." And then we proceed to think about it. The thinking is colored by all our memories and associations, and if we're not aware, those turn into the associations and notions that assail and overwhelm a person.

The word for this is papañca, which we love—it's called proliferation. The mind just proliferates and goes crazy, assails and overwhelms us.

Now what's interesting is that beginning with perception, what we perceive is often not even accurate. From that inaccurate perception, we proceed to build up all these memories and associations, and then we're really gone into opinions and views, relating to something that isn't even happening. We wonder why we feel confused and disconnected.

A simple example of misperception: when I walk around my house without my glasses on, I'll think, "Oh, everything looks really clean." And I'll feel happy. Then I put on my glasses and I go, "Oh my God, I didn't see all this." And I feel bothered. Difference in perception, colored by my desires and emotions.

Let me give you another example. A friend of mine told me about this at a retreat, and I think it's a very clear illustration. She goes to her office and she sees a co-worker come in. He looked in her direction and frowned. She thought, "Oh, he's frowning at me." Immediately she asked herself, "Why is he angry at me? We haven't even spoken today. What did I do wrong?" She spent the whole day alternating between fear, aversion, and anger. It brought up her feelings of worthlessness. She was running over everything that was going on between them—why was he angry at her? On and on. It put her in a rotten mood for the day.

The next day, she finally realized he wasn't even looking at her or frowning at her. He was having family problems and was just feeling down.

So her original perception, the original contact, was seeing somebody and an expression on his face. Her misperception was that he was frowning at her. Then that misperception was colored by her mood, by her tendency to feel worthless, and a little bit of fear. The day was spent with these notions proliferating—past, future, everything she could remember about him, all her feelings of worthlessness, the whole story—all based on something that wasn't even really happening in the first place.

Does that sound familiar to anybody? Have you ever noticed that? If you haven't, please pay attention the next few days.

There's a phenomenon we call "yogi mind," which is basically what she's describing: a particular perception happens—a desire, something we don't like, or we perceive something inaccurately—and our mind just goes to town. It really runs riot, as they say in the commentaries. We find ourselves running all over the campus, looking for something, trying to tell somebody something, trying to fix whatever. All the energy that we expend in our lives in distractedness, in all the stuff we do—because life is so simple here at retreat—when we lose mindfulness and get caught up in this proliferation, all that energy becomes available for craziness, basically. And our mind just takes it and runs.

So that's perception, which may be inaccurate. We rarely stop to let in the fact that perhaps what we perceived isn't actually what happened, that it could be different. Then all the proliferation comes on top of that. That's where most of our views form and solidify.

It's so valuable to know: "This is what I think, this is what I believe is true. Could it be another way?"

And this is where we get to selflessness, egolessness. The actual basic misperception that we're misperceiving in many different ways, over and over—one that often, without some form of self-inquiry, goes unquestioned—is the perception that there's a continuous, unchanging "I" or "me" somewhere in here running the show.

You may not think you're your body, or you may think you're your body, but somewhere back there, doesn't it feel like you're the same you you've always been, running the show? Maybe not doing such a great job of running the show, but really trying.

It's the most subtle and unrecognized view, interpretation, opinion of ourselves and the world. And it's the one from which all the rest of our confusion and trouble can spring. We don't question our perceptions—we assume how we perceive is true.

For instance, if you can see—I think everyone here can see, so I'll use sight—we all maybe know intellectually that somehow the way sight comes in, it's turned upside down and the brain turns it around or something. But really, the way we see things, when I open my eyes and look, I really unquestioningly, if I'm not paying attention, think that's how it is. But that's just how we're trained to see.

My father recently had an eye operation because he has macular degeneration, where they rotated one of his retinas forty or fifty degrees. And they said, "Oh, don't worry, it'll compensate." But it didn't. So he was walking around and one of his eyes saw everything leaning over this way, and one saw things straight but nothing in the middle. We're so used to depending on how we see as being how it is, that he really didn't feel comfortable walking on the sidewalk. He'd kind of be leaning over and keep walking off the edge because everything was tilting. It was a good reminder to me that I take visual perception as really how it is. But like that other ninety-nine percent of the universe that's undetectable—somehow we don't see it. Something's out there, or so they think.

It's like that with our physical experience, with our emotions, with our thoughts. What this practice is helping us do is to keep meeting, moment by moment, our physical experience, emotions, thoughts, perceptions—each time fresh, rather than assuming continuity.

In the physical realm, sometimes as the mind gets quiet in meditation, the sense of solidity kind of falls away. Sometimes that's very scary. Sometimes it's very pleasant. Sometimes it's nothing special—just points of sensation arising. It's like the example they give in Asia: from a long distance you see a line of ants. From a distance it looks like one solid unbroken line. Then you come up closer and you see it's millions and millions of ants moving. But from a distance it looks solid. Our body feels solid, but as the attention gets finer, it's just sensation after sensation after sensation, arising and passing, arising and passing. Knowing that or hearing that doesn't make any difference. Experiencing it—it doesn't change everything, but it opens something: oh, maybe things are a different way. Some little clinging to "I think that's how it is" lets go.

The same with emotions, the same with thoughts. Have you noticed how thoughts tell you your self-story all day long? Now she's getting up, now she's turning around, I'm really not doing this very well, I'm not doing the walking well, other people are doing it better. And how the particular self-story is based on a perception—you might have the perception as you're walking that someone walks by looking so pure and mindful and present, and you're wobbling all over the place, looking at little bunnies and thinking about what's for lunch. And you think, "I just can't do this. I am no good."

So the perception was somebody walking slowly, colored by self-negativity, a sense of worthlessness, and comparing. And you start remembering everything you ever failed at in your life. I go back to remedial gym class in fifth grade. And now here I am, I can't even walk mindfully. Anything pleasant isn't noticed. Any other memory isn't accessed—only everything bad, until you've worked yourself into a total knot of disgust and failure. And that's me.

Then we don't notice that suddenly it changes. In the next sitting you walk in, having sort of forgotten that whole little knot. You're just walking in thinking about lunch. You sit down and—wow, the breath's right here. It's cool. It's present. I can really note every time the mind goes off. I am really something. I really am getting this. I think I have a deep, deep spiritual inclination. In fact, maybe I'm a tulku.

You know, I'm a reincarnation. I just haven't been discovered yet in some Tibetan tradition.

And then you remember everything positive, everything beautiful that ever happened. And you forget the other.

But the thing is, at the end of the day, you feel like that was one "I." It wasn't one "I." There was some positive, pleasant perception. There was all that papañca. That was the birth of "I." Then that "I" died. There was an unpleasant thing. There was all this papañca. Then that "I" died. Birth and death of self, constantly. And without examination, we think it's me.

You know Lily Tomlin's line? "I always wanted to be somebody, but I should have been more specific." That's what we're doing.

Notice. Any sense experience—the sound of rain, boom, pleasant, rain in my childhood, the smell in the desert, isn't this beautiful, I'm one with nature, yada yada, all this "me," my whole life—from one hearing experience that's pleasant, from one smelling. Just notice that in the next moment. There's no judgment. But watch it come and go. And notice that it goes. It is not solid and continuous. Same with emotions. Same with sensations. Same with all experience.

And please don't believe me. Look and see.

We posit continuity through lack of inquiry, through lack of attention. Really look and see—there isn't something solid. There isn't an unchanging "me" here.

And that—it's the ultimate scary thought for that mind that's looking for security, that's looking for a resting place. But it is such a relief to put down that burden of thinking we're in charge of it all. Because frankly, if we're in charge of it all, we're not doing a very good job. We don't have to keep taking responsibility. Put it down. It's so freeing to be willing to simply meet the next moment with an air of "who knows? Let's just be here for it." I don't know if this is going to be my last breath. We really don't know that. Can I just be present?

And if that moment is a moment of interpretation, a moment of thought, fine. Thought is just thought. It doesn't have to drive us. It doesn't have to imprison us when we recognize it for what it is.

So that sense of—this is the last image I'll use—the sense of opening, throwing ourselves into the next moment, into the unknown, not with fear but with trust and faith. Because whatever happens, we can take refuge in this: that the truth is present in this moment if we can meet it free from all the baggage of what we think it is. Then the truth can reveal itself.

The image is one that Franz told me about—climbing up to the top of this mountain in India, Mount Arunachala, which is a sacred mountain for Ramana Maharshi. He climbed up to the top; it's not huge. And up at the top, there's a whole bunch of mountain monkeys that live there. It's very rocky, scraggly, with a few branches and bushes. He said these monkeys were so great to watch because they would be standing on the edge of a rock and they would just lean themselves out into space as if they thought they could fly. With total trust and total abandon, giving themselves into the moment. And they always landed on a rock, landed on a branch. But they didn't stand there first and look and go, "Okay, that one, I'm going for it," and "I don't go until I'm sure where I'm going to put my foot down." It's just—the universe will catch us.

That quality of full-hearted, open attention. Willingness to meet this moment. And you don't have to think about anything I said tonight, because it reveals itself to us when we can meet the moment free of preconceptions.

So let's just sit quietly.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 324

Freedom From Conflict

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's observation that human beings are like fish writhing in shallow water, trapped in competition and conflict due to a 'dart' buried in their hearts—the dart of craving, confusion, and clinging to preferences. Drawing from various suttas, including Sakka's question about why beings continue living in hostility despite sincere wishes for peace, Wilson illuminates how our attachment to preferences and our reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences perpetuate suffering.

Wilson offers a realistic portrait of awakening by examining the Buddha's own life after enlightenment—which included illness, loss, conflict mediation, and the death of beloved disciples—demonstrating that freedom doesn't mean escape from life's difficulties but rather a profound harmony with things as they are. She explores the Buddha's teaching on the 'second arrow': how we compound unavoidable pain with layers of reactive suffering through grief, lamentation, and endless self-referencing.

The practical heart of this teaching lies in recognizing that our true home is found not in any particular experience but in awareness itself. Through the practice of sati (mindfulness), we learn to discriminate between raw sensory events and our habitual reactions to them, gradually discovering an inner stillness that remains stable regardless of changing circumstances. Wilson emphasizes that this practice doesn't distance us from life but brings us into deeper intimacy with reality, where we can rest in the grace of the world and find genuine freedom from conflict.

Last night James talked about the power and the possibility of cultivating our sincere intention to live in a contented, happy way. And we come really to practice, I would imagine most of us, with the intention to cultivate the wholesome, really delighting in the wholesome. Why else would we do this? And yet, with our sincerest intentions, wholeheartedly, it's so common, isn't it, that we still find ourselves living in confusion, dissatisfaction, with anger, discontented. So what's going on?

This is a sutta from the Buddha that I've recently been reading and really liking. He's describing here, somewhat poetically, his own experience of dismay at seeing how humans are living. He says: "Just look at how people quarrel and fight. Let me tell you now of the kind of dismay and terror that I have felt. Seeing people struggling like fish, writhing in shallow water, in competition against one another, I became afraid. At one time, I had wanted to find some place where I could take shelter, but I never saw any such place. There is nothing in this world that is solid at base, and not a part of this world that is changeless. I have seen people trapped in mutual competition, and that is why I had felt so discontent. But then I noticed something buried deep in their hearts. I could just make it out. It's a dart. It is a dart, an arrow, that makes its victims run all over the place." He's referring to the running after sensual pleasure, the running after happiness. "But once that dart has been pulled out, all that running is finished. And so is the exhaustion that comes with it."

I really like that, first because I get a sense somehow of him as a person just really feeling this dismay at looking at all of us. I say us—we weren't around 2,500, 2,600 years ago. But it doesn't sound too different, does it? And I just like that feeling of seeing the dismay at the competition, the running around, the exhaustion that comes from that running around. And what he points to is pulling out that dart, understanding that dart.

What he's talking about here, of course, with the dart, is our old friends of confusion—of not understanding ourselves and the world as it is, as we are, of misperceiving and misconstruing what we do perceive. And that misperceiving and misconstruing is strengthened by greed and hatred, anger, wanting.

The Buddha was part of the warrior caste, brought up as a warrior and a king, and so a lot of his images are warlike images. But also, if you read the suttas, the Buddha's time had a lot of war, a lot of violence in the world. As today, there's a lot of war, a lot of violence in the world. Not only that, of course—there's also great beauty and love and compassion. But what he's pointing to is that the place to look to free ourselves from conflict, the way that we can bring freedom from conflict into the world, is by looking inside, looking into this arrow, this dart in our own hearts.

Maha Ghosananda, a Cambodian monk and peace activist who is sort of the spiritual leader of the Cambodian people, once spoke at a rally in Washington, D.C., for banning landmines. A friend told me what he said—I didn't hear it directly. He got up and said, "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts." So if we want to eradicate the landmines in the world, we must first understand, change, remove the landmines in our hearts. It's exactly the same thing that the Buddha was talking about when he's talking about these darts, these arrows.

Another sutta I like addresses this very question: if we're so seriously wanting to live in freedom, why do we keep doing stupid things, basically? It's put a little more elegantly than that, but that's what it boils down to. This is Sakka, who often appears in the suttas. He's the ruler of one of the heaven realms. In the Buddhist cosmology, there are many different realms of being—humans are only one of thirty-one or thirty-two, I forget the number. We're six from the bottom, by the way. So Sakka is the ruler of the gods, but even he's often coming down to the Buddha for teachings. And he says to the Buddha, basically: "Dear sir, what are we chained with? Even though we—humans, gods, devas—even though we think really wholeheartedly, 'May we live free from hostility, free from violence, free from rivalry, free from ill will, free from those who are hostile,' yet still, why do we continue to live in hostility, with violence, with rivalry, with ill will?"

"What are we fettered by? What is chaining our hearts?"

And the Buddha answers, and there are many different ways that he arrives at the same answer in different suttas. He says that basically we're fettered by envy and stinginess—that's his way into it here. But that's just the surface. That envy and stinginess is caused by, and this is interesting, holding to preferences. And that holding to preferences is basically caused by craving, wanting, thirsting. This is one of these darts: I want what I want. That's holding to preferences—the cause of our continuing to act in ways that bring us into conflict with ourselves and with others, into suffering.

Now I think that's a very powerful statement, and for many of us at times an unsettling one—that holding to preferences can ultimately bring us into acting from ill will and hostility, into continuing in competition and rivalry, into continuing our inner suffering. Because most people—I don't know about you, but when I was starting my practice, if someone had said, "It's about coming to let go of all your preferences," I wouldn't have been lining up at the door. "Oh yeah, let me really get rid of all my preferences!"

But remember: he's not saying we don't have preferences, that we can't tell the difference between anything. It's that holding to it—"I have to have this or else everything's not okay. I'm bad, you're bad, the world is bad, whatever"—that's the cause of our suffering. That's the cause of our not perceiving ourselves and the world clearly on a very deep level.

Here on retreat, what we can practice, what we can begin to see and learn, is in small ways how we get attached to preferences. Mostly we don't even recognize that they're preferences. We think it's true, that's how it should be. We get attached to it, and then we notice the suffering inherent in that in many different ways. Because how we relate to our experience here in retreat is a microcosm of exactly how our hearts and minds relate in bigger circumstances in our life. There is absolutely no difference. You're not experiencing different conditioning, a different mind and heart here than the one you have when you're going through your daily life. Fortunately or unfortunately, I don't know, but that's the way it is.

What I really love about the retreat format is that things that in the picture of our big life are pretty minor can bring up an intensity of reaction and emotion and grief and desire—the whole show. We stand back and say, "Wait, because I didn't get an orange at breakfast, I'm a complete wreck?" But it's true. It's not about the orange. But we can explore what this holding to preferences is.

Something that I think is important to understand, so we don't fall into judging right away—"Oh, I'm so stupid"—is that even our misunderstandings, the desire, the hatred, the holding to preferences, whatever, are really arising from our deep yearning for freedom, for peace, for real happiness. In some way. And the Buddha in another place spoke about how all the foolish things we do come, in some way, out of a perhaps unconscious or misguided sense that "this is going to make me happy."

What we learn through mindfulness—mindfulness in itself is the way to begin to perceive in a different way—is not how to change the world, but how to re-understand what the possibility of living in freedom from conflict and in peace and happiness is, what peace is really about. It's really to come home to ourselves, to our truest selves. When I look at my practice, all my life, I feel that everything I've been doing has been in a way a yearning to live at home with myself, with what is really true. And not knowing what that is, we keep looking in the wrong direction—to passing experiences, to things, to objects, to moods, to people, to whatever. What our practice does is turn us back to look in another direction.

One very common misconception that I've certainly held for years and years about what happiness or freedom or awakening or enlightenment is or will be, is that in some way—it seems naive, but if I look closely I see I keep falling into this trap—full enlightenment would be about everything being basically nice all the time. No more unpleasantness. Without getting down on yourself, just examine what images or ideas or conceptions your mind is holding about what practice or freedom is going to be like. Few of us include sickness, old age, loss, dismay, unpleasant things happening. Mostly it's that our whole personality just gets better and better and nicer and nicer, and we love everybody and everybody loves us, and we're able to really effect great change in the world, and basically there's this peace that somehow is still looking outward more than inward. Everything gets better.

But if you look, even very briefly—this has been instructive to me, and it took me years to notice—look at the Buddha's life after he became the Buddha, the peaceful one, the all-awakened one, no more suffering. He said over and over, "I teach suffering and the end of suffering. That's all I teach." Yet his life had plenty of difficult things going on.

He was sick at times. He had headaches and backaches. Sometimes he'd tell Ananda, his attendant, "You give the talk. I have to go lie down. I have a headache." They didn't have Excedrin then—that's our wonderful new discovery.

He actually died from eating poisoned meat. It wasn't deliberately poisoned, but he knew it was tainted and wouldn't let anyone else eat it. He lived in a very warlike time, and there are different suttas where his clansmen on his father's side and his mother's side were at war with one another over water rights. Many, many people in his clan on both sides would be killed, and he would be called in to mediate.

He also had to mediate a lot within his own nun and monk sangha. It's kind of funny if you read all the suttas, or the Vinaya, where a lot of the rules for the monks and nuns come out of, because there's a lot of monks running to the Buddha and saying, "Well, he did this and he did that, and I don't think that's really such a good thing to do," or "He's talking to the nuns too much," or "He's hanging out and socializing too much." A lot was going on between the monks. There was a lot of competition. There was actually his cousin, Devadatta, who was extremely jealous of the Buddha. He was a monk, and he was often trying to split the Sangha, to turn them against the Buddha. He even tried to kill the Buddha at one point by throwing a huge boulder down on him, and it just grazed his heel. But there was a lot going on. It wasn't all peaches and cream. It wasn't just floating on a cloud.

The Buddha's two chief disciples, Sariputta and Moggallana, both died before the Buddha died. And while he said he was the peaceful one—he didn't experience grief, he didn't wail and beat his breast, that's a common way they describe it—he did experience loss. There's somewhere in the suttas, and don't ask me where because I can't find it, but it's there somewhere. There's a lovely phrase where the Buddha describes, after the death of his two disciples, that it's as if the sun and the moon had fallen out of the heavens. He noticed they were gone. And Moggallana, who was considered the most spiritually adept of all the Buddha's disciples, was actually murdered by a gang of bandits in his old age.

So awakening doesn't mean freedom from pain, or freedom from loss, or freedom from all the dukkha that goes on with living in a group, working with a group, working with people. But how was the Buddha different from us? In that he didn't cling to preferences. He really was able to live and move in deep harmony with things as they are. Because he understood so clearly how things are, he wouldn't get caught in this holding, in this wanting things to be different.

It's not that he didn't have preferences. It's often said that if he didn't have anything else he had to do, he didn't just kind of wander around. His preference was to go off in the forest and abide in the bliss of Nibbana. He could do that at will. Clearly that was his preference. But if anybody needed anything, if anyone came calling, he would come out and be there for them. Not like, "Oh God, another wandering disciple wanting to plague me with questions." He would just come out and be there. Not clinging to preferences, not out of a "should," but as the natural response from deep understanding of oneself and of life as it is.

So how does he describe what he understood, briefly? How do we remove that dart, so to speak, of confusion, of clinging, of hatred? It's really removed by clear seeing. And Vipassana really means seeing clearly, seeing into. Just being with things as they are. It's so simple we can't stand it. We always want to figure it out and add something on top of it. That's why we have this practice, practice, practice. Practice just to be with things as they are.

What do we begin to notice? I'm not going to go through everything the Buddha said, but just a couple of things. When he came out of his awakening and began to teach, the first thing he talked to the five friends he had been practicing with about—as he sat down, out of all the things that he understood, the first thing he chooses to say is: there is change; dissatisfaction, unreliability, is a fact of life. That's the first thing he chooses to say. I think that's really interesting. It's not the only thing he chooses to say. When Buddhism gets the rap that it's really negative because it just says life is suffering—that's if you just hear this First Noble Truth and stop. "Oh yeah, things change. It hurts us. Everything's unreliable."

Difficult things happen. That's life. If you stop there, okay, it's a pretty downer of a message. But he's not saying it to take us down. He's saying it to free us.

Because what frees us is living open-hearted, fully present in life, with reality as it is. This is what frees us. Our meditation isn't going to change who we are, change the facts of life, change this whole world. What it does is free us from misconceptions and allow us to rest at ease in whatever's arising—to live wholeheartedly, open-heartedly, fully present, at peace with things as they are, and from that place be able to affect change.

So to really be willing to learn to open, just to stop resisting that difficult things happen, that there's an inherent unreliability to experience, to things, to people, if we're looking to them for permanent happiness. And the anguish or dissatisfaction or real suffering isn't because things change, or because difficult things happen and pleasant things go away. The suffering is because of our not understanding that, and so getting caught in reaction—in wanting and in pushing away, getting caught in our reactions to what's happening. But that's the glitch, the little glitch, the place that we can learn to see through.

So I want to talk just a little bit about that.

This aspect of things changing, of unreliability—it doesn't mean that there's no pleasure in life. Of course there is. It doesn't mean that if we say "having no preferences," we don't love our families. We can probably have a slightly different feeling about our own child and someone we've never met, that we read about. Of course we do.

But it's knowing that you can't rely on anybody to do what you want—although God knows we try—to do what you want, to make you happy, or what you think will make them happy and then that'll make you happy, or to always be there for you. You can't rely on anything, you can't rely on any experience to do it for us. Although in the moment, it might be quite pleasant.

Now what's so interesting to me when I look at my own experience, my own mind and heart? Intellectually, I don't have a big argument with that, that things change. I mean, it's not really a secret, is it? But look at when we're struggling. Just look back on your experience today or yesterday or in the next hour. How do we actually relate to our experiences?

Just to come into this little mini world of the retreat: How do we tend to evaluate ourselves, to assess whether things are going well? How the meditation is going? I'm sure there are lots of different ways, but quite often I find in myself it's in terms of how much pleasantness there is and how long it lasts. And when something pleasant goes away and something difficult arises—it might be an unpleasant sensation, or it just might be that it doesn't meet our expectations. And that's very unpleasant. We like our expectations to be met.

When that's not happening, how often the assessment becomes: "Well, everything's gone wrong now. Meditation's gone to hell. I better try and get it back." How often people come and say, "Well, thank God the sloth and torpor is over. Now I can begin to meditate." Or, "Okay, the mind's not wandering so much. The breath has finally gotten nice and smooth and relaxed. Now I can really meditate."

We get so fixated on what's happening as the way to evaluate, and when it changes, something's wrong. Or something's right—finally I got it right. If the unpleasant goes away, that's okay. That change we don't mind; we finally got it right. When the pleasant goes away, something we haven't gotten right.

Now to me, this gives a slight hint that there's something that doesn't quite totally get it—that everything changes, and that it's not all about being pleasant. The pleasant is going to change and the unpleasant is going to come, and there is nothing we can do about it. What our choice is: do I want to suffer from this or not? But mostly we don't notice that that's our choice, that that's the place of awareness.

So mindfulness practice, sati—the word that we translate as mindfulness—it really is closer to "remembering" in literal translation. It's not about taking us away from this world, stopping this constant flow of experience, finding some experience that'll last, somehow managing to manipulate things so that the balance is more on the pleasant and less on the unpleasant.

Sati is about allowing us to recognize and experience ourselves and the world as it is in this moment. No exceptions, no pulling away, no clinging—to live in the world more wholeheartedly, more completely than we are now.

It's somewhat paradoxical, because sati is really the practice of meeting each moment of experience with clear-eyed, open-hearted recognition of things as they are right now. Living in fullness of presence in the world, with ourselves as we are. And it's a little paradoxical because retreat really looks like—and people often think a retreat is about—escaping from the world. But the truth is, with mindfulness we're diving more deeply into the reality of ourselves and the reality of the world than we ever do. Unless we're truly committed and have a lot of practice out in our daily life, there are countless ways to distract ourselves when we don't really like what's happening. Here, there aren't many. And we set it up deliberately. Even today, now you're not allowed to distract yourself at mealtime, because now we're doing mindful eating, mindful working, mindful showering, mindful going to the toilet. It's about really waking up in our life.

And that's not to suffer more. That's not the point. It's interesting, because paradoxically, what I'm saying is that really opening to the fact that unreliability and change is a fact of life—to open to that, to not let ourselves deny it so much—that's not to suffer more. Paradoxically, that opening is what allows us to let go. To really, like the Buddha, live so in harmony with how things are that we're not in this constant conflict with our experience, with what we want to happen, with not getting our preferences. So that we can really live clear-eyed, kind-hearted, and engaged with ourselves and with life.

So this truth, this fact—the word dukkha is usually translated as suffering, but it's more unsatisfactory, unreliable—this fact, rather than being something alienating or depressing, is actually one of many things that unifies us as human beings. It's one of the threads of our common experience. So also is love. So also is compassion. Dukkha isn't the only thread; I don't want to give that impression.

But when we really look at it—I heard a talk by Ajahn Sumedho that was quite lovely. He was describing how many of the abbots in Thailand would come in and begin a talk not by saying, "Dear yogis," but rather, "Dear brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death." Not as a downer, but doesn't it kind of level things? It's really true, isn't it? Nobody gets away from old age, disease, and death. Well, the only way you get away from old age, of course, is if disease and death come earlier. I'm not trying to be funny. It's a leveler.

When we look through that lens, it unifies us as human beings. Instead of getting caught in seeing our differences—whether cultural or economic or societal or whatever—where we can get so caught up in seeing how we're different from each other, and difference often breeds fear and protection, this view unifies us. When we're seeing one another through this lens of being brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death, if you really think about it, it just naturally elicits the heart of compassion. Compassion being that openness to each other, that connectedness to one another in our suffering. Any suffering—the suffering of disease, the suffering of rage and anger, the suffering of loss.

And when I look around the world, I can see how a sudden natural disaster will often spontaneously bring about this sense of connectedness, this natural response of compassion. Just last week we were in Durango, Colorado, which is close to New Mexico, and those huge fires were raging in Los Alamos. Durango, which has a similar climate and topography—they were saying in the papers that it was quite possible the same conditions could easily ignite a fire there too. There was a natural, really spontaneous outpouring of compassion and support for Los Alamos. There were stations all around Durango where people could bring food and money and blankets and whatever was needed. People were just spontaneously setting this up, collecting it, and bringing it down to Los Alamos. You often read about this with earthquakes and floods, whether in Venezuela or Turkey or wherever. Our connectedness as human beings—for a while, it often brings out the best in us. We forget, of course; we go back to our lives. But that's really what I mean by this opening to our common thread of loss, of old age, of suffering. It brings out our natural humanity, the heart of compassion.

And so, paradoxically, rather than fearing or being afraid to really open to this when we notice it—to open to change, to open to pain—the recognition of it is what matters. You don't have to rip your heart open and go around drowning in suffering, but just here, notice when you're in conflict. Is there some way you're fighting with something unpleasant? Is there some way you're fighting with change? Rather than simply acknowledging, "Oh yes, that's what's happening. Things are changing."

Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche said once, "Whether or not you go with the flow, remember: the flow always goes with you."

We don't really get a choice.

And again, on a personal level, bringing it down to the personal, it's really very deeply ingrained in many of us, I think, to keep looking for the thing that doesn't change—the circumstance, the situation, the person that's going to give us this sense of security, this place of rest. Whether it's a relationship, or how we grew up, or our job, or our house. The way you finally found the right way to sit in the hall so pain doesn't come. Whatever it is. Deeply ingrained. And I think that's quite natural, again—a natural effect of our yearning for happiness. And again, just not quite totally getting it: that we can't keep trying to look to something for reliability. That's going to change. And then not to get down on ourselves when we find ourselves doing it.

So, for example, my father the last three or four years has been developing Parkinson's disease. I mean, he's eighty-three. You know, something's going to happen. I say that, right? But when it's happening, do I go home and say, "Well, the conditions that allowed for a healthy and young body to be here have changed, and now disease is coming. That's just the way it is"? Maybe I can get there, but first I have to go through denial and impatience and this kind of edge of panic, seeing what's going on with someone who's always been so athletic and so bright and so strong—to see how the whole mind and body can start to break down, and it's so out of control.

I mean, we all know it, right? But just to see how—no, this can't be happening. There must be something we can do to keep this from happening. And if we don't, we've somehow failed. It's just so interesting to me. And when I can really see that and stop beating myself up, and just open to—oh, yeah, things are changing. There's a sense of loss and sadness. Totally normal. Both the change and the loss. It's fine to feel it all.

And then what had been actually a distancing from my father as I got into my franticness and trying to change everything—again, there's connection. Connection, because one can only connect with a person as they are in the moment. Not as I wish he was ten years ago, or I wish he would be tomorrow. Only as he is right now. And only by accepting this is the fact of how things are is that connection, that openheartedness, that flowing with life as it is, really possible. And in that, just for a moment, there's living in peace. There's living in contentment.

The happiness, the contentment of the Buddha isn't about having things the way we want them or the way we think they should be. It's being able to really be present and open wholeheartedly, not fighting with things as they are. That doesn't mean we can't act appropriately—of course we can. And we can act much more appropriately when we're not fighting the facts, when we're really present. We can act from love instead of fear.

So when we notice our response to unreliability is this frantic searching for something, you might appreciate that that comes from our deep yearning for peace, but recognize we're looking in the wrong direction. The Buddha said once that the search for a resting place is burning. Not to need a resting place is cool and peaceful. He also said, "He abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." In other words, who does not grasp to any "this is where I am, this is where I'm staying, this is how it is." That's what he means by abiding. Abides in peace—just present in the moment, it changes, that's fine. Present in this moment.

But the really interesting piece of this, again, is not the difficult, the unpleasant, the change that's the point of confusion, the point where we misperceive. Where we get caught is in our reactions to difficult experience or to change. It's our reactions that blind us to peace, to the potential for peace, to our truest nature. Because it really, ultimately, doesn't matter what's happening. We're not here to have a certain experience. We're here to become friends with, to trust in, awareness itself.

And awareness doesn't care how the breath is, or whether the breath is, or how much you're thinking, or whether you like what's happening, or how much your knee hurts, or how good your sitting was. Awareness can be with anything. But we tend to look past awareness and get completely involved in assessing and reacting to whatever it is that's arising.

Because we're so entranced—really entranced—by what this knee pain means, and is it going to continue into the future, and how was it yesterday, and what can I do about it, and how do I feel about it, and what's going to happen, and what is the other person experiencing, and what's the best way to be mindful... We're so entranced with our reactions that half the time—frankly, I think it's more than half the time—we don't even have a clue what's really going on. We're just completely caught up in assessing and judgment and liking and disliking.

And it all has to do ultimately with me, me, me. How does this affect me? What does this mean about me? Is this mine? Is this other person having the same experience as me? It's this continual self-referencing. Look at it. If you're caught in reaction, if you're really assessing, just see if it happens much without this little core of me, me, me. It's so fascinating to us, but I tell you, it is so exhausting. When the Buddha talks about being free from the running around and the exhaustion of it—that's the exhaustion.

We can't just experience sensation in the knee. No, it's my knee, my sensation, my yesterdays, my tomorrows, my trip to the hospital, my mother, my father, my dog. It's on and on and on. And what's really happening? Oh, some twinging or some throbbing. Maybe there's a little tick in the shoulder, a little twitch. Maybe we're having a really difficult memory. Unpleasant things do happen. But just what's happening now—that's what's happening. Everything else is our reactions, and we're so entranced by that. That's where we go off into worlds and worlds of thinking. That's where we don't recognize that peace, our true home, is right here, right now, no matter what's happening. It doesn't matter—if we can learn to look through the reactions and just land and rest with ease in whatever's arising.

Saint Augustine said once, "The reason why humans behave as they do is because they are not living in their true home." Our true home. There aren't many words to say about it. But on a deep level, we know when we're recognizing, when we're touching our true home. And it doesn't have anything to do with what phenomenal experience is coming and going.

The Buddha taught that one must look for peace within oneself and not in any other place. When a person is inwardly quiet, then there is no self to be found. Inwardly quiet doesn't necessarily mean no thoughts, which is what we often think. Inwardly quiet means we're not entranced by these reactions to experience and whipping up a whole story. Just what is, coming and going. What is can be thoughts, as well as sensations, as well as sounds. Inwardly quiet means calm, present, non-reactive. That's our practice.

Now, one place where this habit—and it really is a habit—shows itself... It's not like we're deliberately trying to be foolish. It's not like we're deliberately setting out to suffer. Everyone in the world, the Buddha said this often, deeply wants to be happy. But I've come to have a very healthy respect for the strength of habits of reaction of heart and mind. You know how hard a really strong habit is to break. I think our habits of reaction to experience when we're not paying attention are perhaps the most deeply rooted habits we have, because we're not even aware we're doing it much of the time.

So just to mention briefly: one of the very simple but not always easy to notice dynamics, cause and effect relationships that the Buddha pointed out, where we get so easily caught in reaction, where we get so easily distracted from the bare experience—whatever it is—is in our habit of how the mind and heart relate to pleasant experience, unpleasant experience, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant, or neutral experience.

We don't usually think in those terms so much. We know we like something or we don't like it, or it hurts, or it feels good. Well, that's basically pleasant and unpleasant, but within a whole range. Physical sensation is pleasant or unpleasant or sort of neutral —we don't even notice it. Emotions, sounds, smells, tastes, even thoughts become pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. And the deep, deep habit—not only of reaction, but of assessing our whole life—is to move towards the pleasant.

Moving towards the pleasant seems not only a habit but logical, doesn't it? You think, well, who wouldn't move towards the pleasant? Who wouldn't move away from the unpleasant? That's just common sense.

And neutral? A lot of people say, "Neutral? I don't have any neutral experience." That's our relationship to neutral. "What? I've never seen a neutral thought." We're just gone. In this culture especially—everything is so intense, so fast. God forbid you should go to a movie and have one neutral second. It's just got to be pounding, pounding, pounding.

This is one of the reasons a retreat can seem so uncomfortable—because we're not just letting ourselves flow with this habit of whenever it's pleasant, hold on to it; whenever it's unpleasant, get up and leave; when it's neutral, bring in something else. Here, you have to sit there. If it's unpleasant, you just have to sit there with it. The most you can do is shift your knee a little bit or something. If it's pleasant, you sit there, but then it goes away and you can't go get something else pleasant. You have to notice that it went away. You can't go to the refrigerator or turn on the radio, make a phone call. If it's neutral, we tell you to keep paying attention until you finally notice something's happening.

Calm, you know, is very neutral. Sometimes it takes ages to recognize that calm is present. "Oh, calm!" And then you realize, this isn't neutral—it's actually really nice. You just had to notice it first.

This is a very deeply ingrained habit of mind. And we assess, we evaluate our whole life, often, in terms of: it's good if it's pleasant, it's bad if it's unpleasant.

There's a nice story in the suttas about the Buddha's attendant Ānanda, who was a very kind man. Many stories that are kind of very human are about Ānanda. He was walking past a well where there was a woman from the untouchable caste at that time in India—someone from whom a person of different caste wasn't allowed to take anything, any food or anything. And Ānanda asked her to give him some water from the well. Monks were allowed to ask for water.

She said, "Oh no, sir, I'm untouchable. I can't give you water."

And being very kind, he said, "I'm not really interested in your caste. I'm just asking for some water."

So she gave him the water, and she was so touched by his kindness that she secretly followed him back to where the Buddha was. She waited until Ānanda wasn't around, went up to the Buddha, and said, "Oh please, I know he's your follower. Tell me where he is because I love Ānanda and I want to follow him and serve him."

And the Buddha, who could tell what was going on with people, luckily said, "It's not Ānanda you love. It's his kindness. You don't need to follow him around. Just go back into your life and do likewise. Spread the kindness."

So that's lovely in itself. But what I like is the fact that somebody does one pleasant thing and we're ready to follow them around for the rest of our life. There's a certain lack of discrimination about what's really going on, right? And we do that. Just look and see.

With the unpleasant, we can get really fixated on what's unpleasant when everything else is fine. The mind can—have you ever had, you know, like a little chipped tooth? All your other teeth are fine.

You're sitting there feeling good, but the tongue just can't stay away from that little chipped tooth. And then the mind doesn't simply note, "Oh yes, chipped tooth"—it gets tight. "Oh no, I have to go to the dentist. Oh no, I can't afford it. This is ridiculous. I just went last week." And pretty soon you're into everything that's wrong with your whole life, just from rubbing the tongue on this little unpleasant sensation. We can get completely fixated on the unpleasant. That's being caught in reactions.

With the neutral, as I said, we zone out, space out, try to make something else happen. It's really interesting. Very often, especially in long retreats—I teach a three-month retreat every year—people will come in after a few weeks and say, "You know, I've noticed that things have been pretty calm and neutral, and my mind doesn't like it." The mind sits there and makes up really difficult suffering scenarios and gets caught in them rather than resting in calmness. It's really amazing to see.

The Buddha described this way we react to experience. The going after pleasant—that's craving, desire. The reaction to the unpleasant—that's the second root of hatred, fear, aversion. The totally missing the neutral—that's what leads to confusion, delusion, misperception.

He talked about it in terms of an arrow—again, a warlike image, but it's very to the point, and I like it. He asks, what's the difference between a completely awakened, free person and us ordinary worldlings? And he said, this is the difference: An ordinary worldling experiences a painful, unpleasant sensation—say a physical sensation, it hurts. And when he experiences that sensation, he grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he gets caught in judgment, he carries on a whole hoo-ha. So it's as if being shot with an arrow, he then shoots himself with another arrow as a way of relating to that first arrow. An awakened being experiences a really difficult, unpleasant sensation or emotion or whatever, and that's just what they experience. They don't add anything extra on top of it.

So just noticing through the day: how much of our real conflict and suffering comes from the first arrow—just an arising unpleasant experience—and how much is because we're blaming ourselves, or wanting it different, or blaming someone else, or trying to manipulate, or wanting to know what it means, or trying to understand it, or all the different ways that we shoot ourselves with that second dart?

Nisargadatta Maharaj said once, "We miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination." I love that. Just take a look: How much are we missing the real by lack of attention, and creating the unreal by excess of imagination? If you can remember that, explore over the next days.

And of all the darts we shoot ourselves with—the second dart—the biggest one, the strongest confusion, the one that's really at the root of all of it, is this dart of me, me, me. I, I, I. The Buddha again: "With what manner of insight does a person become calm, cool, and no longer grasping at experience?" He accomplishes this, replied the Buddha, by seeing through the root obstacle, the root delusion—the thought of "I am." Just seeing through it. By being mindful all the time, he trains himself to let go of, to not get caught in attachment to all the preferences, all the desires. They can still come. But not getting so entranced by this constant self-referencing of me, me, me. The thoughts can still be there—"How does this affect me?"—just let them be there. We don't have to build a whole world around it.

And that's what our mindfulness practice is really a practice in doing. One of my teachers said mindfulness is like a rattle. It's as if we're two-year-olds—and really, if you look at our minds, two-year-old is sort of like a compliment, actually, half the time. It's as if a two-year-old is running along: "I want this, I don't want that, no, no, no, no, no!" And mindfulness is like the rattle. You shake it and go, "Okay, pay attention over here for a minute. Just feel the sensation, just notice the thought, just notice the emotion. What's actually happening here?"

That's what mindfulness is about. That by landing in the present moment with kindness, with honesty, we can re-recognize, remember our innate composure, our natural ease, our really natural peace. It's not about changing experience, but finding that even in the midst of what we like and don't like, when we're not so entranced by reactions, we can rest in the peace of things as they are—looking through the reaction to what is true.

An experiential example from that famous dharma teacher, Phil Jackson: "Little by little, with regular practice, you start to discriminate raw sensory events from your reactions to them. Eventually you can begin to experience a point of stillness within. As the stillness becomes more stable, you tend to identify less with fleeting thoughts and feelings such as fear, anger, pain, wanting, and you experience more inner harmony regardless of changing circumstances. For me, meditation is a tool that allows me to stay calm and centered—well, most of the time—during the stressful highs and lows of basketball and life outside the arena."

Learning to discriminate raw sensory events from our reactions to them. And even the reactions are simply raw sensory events—they're just different events from what elicits them. They're nothing to hate, just the next thing to notice.

This practice brings us not into another place, another way away from life, but into intimacy, a closeness, meeting our life with clear-eyed, kind-hearted honesty. Not with harshness. Respecting whatever arises. Because in this moment, whatever arises is our avenue to recognize truth.

The Dalai Lama said: Why do we endeavor to discover the present moment? Because it is the only place that we can know love.

Whatever is happening in the present moment, as soon as we want it different, we've missed the whole possibility of natural peace, of our natural great mind and heart.

I'd like to close with a poem that expresses this sense. You might be quite familiar with it, from Wendell Berry:

When despair for the world grows in me and I awake in the night at the least sound in fear of what my life and my children's lives may be,
I go and lie down where the wood drake rests in his beauty on the water, and the great heron feeds.
I come into the peace of wild things who do not tax their lives with forethought of grief.
I come into the presence of still water.

And I feel above me the day-blind stars waiting with their light.
For a time I rest in the grace of the world, and am free.

That is actually always available to us—to rest in the grace of the world and be free.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 325

Closing Talk - Motivating Our Practice In Daily Life

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this closing retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the perennial challenge of maintaining practice in daily life. She reframes the common concern about "losing the juice" for sitting practice, pointing out that this already misses the deeper purpose. Drawing on the Pāli understanding of sati as remembering—not remembering past experiences, but remembering our ineffable pure nature—she invites practitioners to recognize that awakening happens only in this present moment, regardless of circumstances.
>
> Wilson offers practical guidance through two approaches: first, consciously connecting with our deepest purpose and motivation, allowing it to become a cellular knowing rather than mere intellectual concept; and second, the traditional Tibetan contemplations of the Four Mind-Turnings—reflecting on our precious human birth, the ever-presence of impermanence and death, the nature of suffering in saṃsāra, and the workings of kamma (action and intention). She illustrates these teachings with stories including her visit to Ruth Denison caring for her husband with Alzheimer's, which prompted reflection on what remains when memories fade—our habits of heart and mind.
>
> The talk emphasizes that spiritual awakening isn't about escaping life but fully inhabiting each moment with wholehearted presence. Wilson quotes Shantideva and Pema Chödrön to illuminate how compassionate action naturally arises from wisdom, and how our individual practice opens us to the entire universe. The underlying message is one of realistic encouragement: changing deep mental habits requires sustained commitment over a lifetime, but each moment offers a fresh doorway to awakening with clarity and compassion.

Well, here we are with the perennial question for long-time practitioners, the so-called practice in daily life question.

It's actually interesting to me that quite a few people, starting at the beginning of this retreat, came and the first thing they were saying was about their daily life practice—either "I'm not sitting every day" or "I'm losing my juice for it." Already it's implying that daily life practice is about sitting every day. That's the focus, which is already where we start to go astray. But really worrying about it, feeling the losing the juice, how to keep it fresh, how not to have it get stale, as if there's some magic answer.

So I want to talk a little tonight, not about tricks to keep our sitting interesting. Forget about that. But just how we can approach our commitment to awakening. Just maybe a couple of things that might help us to care enough to keep paying attention in our daily life. Because I think that's what it really comes down to. We have to care enough. No little trick's going to do it for us.

If this is your first retreat, maybe not, but those of you who've been on retreats before, doing mindfulness practice in this form for some time—it's no big secret that we can easily begin to think of practice in terms of our experiences on retreat. Either when we think of practice we think of the sittings on a retreat, or the particular states of mind that we might have experienced: some kind of concentration or peace or ease or silence, not so many thoughts, or some deep understanding you had. Whatever. And without even quite realizing it, that kind of search to either hold on to or repeat experience, or using experience as a reference point to evaluate whether our so-called practice in daily life is going somewhere—which is already, right, where has it got to go?—we so easily transfer this to the way we meet our daily life, to the way we "practice." I'm even not so crazy about that word as far as daily life is concerned.

So we end up relating to our spiritual life, our spiritual path, in our daily life easily as simply transferring our gaining mode from one thing to another. You know, we go from wanting to earn a lot of money or having a nice house or the best relationship to having a better practice or being more compassionate or something. A lot of what Howie was talking about, the time-bound thing.

But really, the word sati in Pali, which we usually translate as mindfulness, is much closer in meaning to remembering. Now, it doesn't mean to remember the great state that you had on retreat and try to repeat it. That's not the kind of remember that it means. Really what it means to remember is our ineffable pure nature. Not to remember it conceptually, because you can't remember something you don't know, can you? So mindfulness isn't about—remember doesn't mean create. It means remember that which we already know, that which we have experienced, that which we actually are.

And what the formal meditation practice of sitting and walking and formal mindfulness on retreat or in daily life—what we do in retreat—the thing that it most deeply serves is to deepen in us our trust, our faith, our recognition of what that ineffable nature is, that remembering, what it is that we're remembering, so that we can learn to trust that. It's not a state, really. It's not even an experience. It's just that which we are.

So in those moments—which many people have reported, they don't have to be anything special, and sometimes they feel special—but those times, take a pretty mundane one: suddenly getting it, so to speak, that the knee pain is killing. It's been there for the last seven days. And suddenly there's a pristine presence. There's no more sense of aversion, no more sense of me and that, something to fix, something to manipulate, something to even do anything about. And whether the person describes it as spaciousness or peace or coming home or ease or whatever—there are all different words, the way we describe it. But realizing that that is present and accessible, even in the middle of the ache, the pain, the striving mind, or in just a little normal moment. You're walking out and you see a bird fly by, or nothing special, drinking your tea.

But what the practice does is just kind of strip away for a moment—it might only be for a moment—strip away all the gaining, all the comparing, all the aversion, all the clinging, and it's just: home. Coming home. That's the whole point.

And because it's not a state of mind that you can create and hold on to—sometimes we don't like that—but really, that's what opens us to freedom. It's nothing we can create and hold on to, and therefore it doesn't matter what situation we happen to be in; it can't get in the way.

So to me, our life practice is about remembering this ineffable essence that we are, much more truly than our aches and pains, like Ajahn Chah was talking about. He was so clear he wasn't his chicken pox. That's great. That's the perfect example.

You know, there's this emptiness and compassion—"I'm not the chicken pox. The heart isn't itching." That's such a classic, perfect example of what I'm talking about. It doesn't matter what's happening.

So if we want to talk about daily life practice, it's about—and this is all my opinions—it's about learning, having the commitment to relate to our experience moment by moment. To relate to it as: this is the moment in which I can really open, can come home again. Only this moment. Exactly this moment. Nowhere else.

And that is not easy, is it? When it happens, it's so obvious. You think, "Well, sure." And it's so easy to leave a retreat and think, "That was so clear." Either sitting was so easy—"I'm going to sit four times a day, that's no problem"—or there's just ease. "What was the problem? I just sit and whatever comes up, that's the meditation. There's no sense of struggle, there's no sense of strife. I got it." And we walk out and we go into Walmart, and that's the end of it, right there. Where did it go? I thought it was so obvious.

So the trick is knowing we don't have to leave life behind to walk on the path of awakening. We don't have to retreat for the rest of our life to a cave—although that's a viable option for some people. But it's not the only option. We don't have to leave life behind. On the other hand, we also don't have to leave our commitment to awakening behind in order to live an active, normal life.

I've said before that in my opinion, retreat is just a microcosm of our life. It's the same mind, the same reactions. You recognize that by now. And it's fascinating. The way we relate to a sense of trying to control the breathing just reverberates into seeing how we relate to everything in our life.

In the same way, if we look at our life, as complex as any activity might be, or as many things as we're doing in a day, it's still only moments. A day is made up of moment and moment and moment. Moments don't go away and suddenly there's a solid hour. As he was talking about last night, there's no past and future—there's only this moment. That's true when you walk out of here, just the same as it's true here. The laws of nature didn't change when you came through that gate and into the silent retreat.

So the trick isn't to figure out how to get really good practice from now on. It's much more: How can I awaken in this moment? This moment? How can I awaken with compassion? How can I awaken with clarity into this moment? How can I meet this moment with kindness? And if we blow it in this moment, that's okay, because now there's this moment. And it's endless, as long as we're alive. There's nothing but moments in which we can practice to awaken with clarity, with compassion.

I think it's almost a mantra sometimes, at least in the Vipassana scene: "My life is my practice." And ultimately, I think that can be true. But I actually think it's—personally speaking—extremely necessary and extremely difficult. As much energy and motivation and commitment as you put out to come and be on this retreat, to be with whatever experience is coming up, all the stuff you've gone through—I know that an intensive retreat can at times be one of the most difficult and challenging experiences in our life.

What makes us think, as I did for years, that that's all the time I had to put in? That if I then go out, it's just going to carry me on a cloud of bodhisattva-hood and love and compassion, and I don't have to keep up that same quality of willingness to awaken in the moment?

I mean, really, it's a little embarrassing, but I would say it took me close to twenty years to really understand—I probably still don't really understand—but to begin to think that maybe I could understand someday how much depth of motivation and commitment is required.

Because as I was talking some nights ago, what we're really dealing with here and in our daily life is the deeply ingrained habits of our mind. There's that famous quotation of the Buddha: "What the mind thinks upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." Now this is not to inspire fear, but to inspire a healthy respect. What does my mind think about frequently? Then why am I surprised if in a moment of inattention that's the way the mind moves?

I think seven days of a retreat, or seven years of a retreat, will counteract it, will have an effect—but completely end it? No. It's moment to moment to moment. I'm not saying this to be discouraging; I'm saying it to be realistic. Because I actually feel that one of the things that really brings discouragement to people's keeping a committed practice going in their daily life is an unrealistic expectation. "More should have happened," we think. "Here I really saw through this stuff"—yet the habits of greed, the habits of self-judgment, the habits of aversion or fear still keep coming up. So what's the point? Forget about it.

We're an impatient culture. We're an instant culture. I don't know if you caught it when listening to Ajahn Jumnian talking about how for the last six years he's really just been in emptiness. I thought, wow. This guy, how old is he? Close to sixty or more? He's been practicing really intensively—more than probably most of us could imagine—since he was seven years old, maybe five. And it's not to be discouraging; it's to be realistic. We're talking about a lifetime here, not a couple of years.

Habits are just really hard to break. Recently someone told me that she'd quit smoking twelve years ago and just recently picked it up again. It was right back, just no problem—like she'd never stopped. Well, craving in the mind, aversion and fear in the mind, spacing out when we don't like what's going on—these are really deep habits that, before we pay attention, we're unaware of.

So I want to talk about a couple of things that I think are helpful, because we need to have the interest and the energy to keep paying attention. If we're paying attention in a moment, it's really often quite easy not to get caught up in those habits. It's not always that hard. Sometimes it is, but not always. It's not always that hard to awaken into what's happening in the moment with some clarity, to meet it with some kindness. Remembering is the tricky part.

And what helps us remember, what helps us want to sit every day, what helps us want to really investigate in our life, is to consciously—this might sound obvious, but I think it's important—consciously have the motivation, the intention to do so. It has to be really important to us. Not just intellectually, but cellularly. The kind of important that if you have children, your children are important. You don't have to stop and think, "What's more important—my kids, or this movie I want to see, or maybe I want to go out for brunch? Which is more important? I don't know." You know it. It's there. It's in your cells.

That's the kind of commitment of knowing that our spiritual awakening, understanding and freeing ourselves from suffering, living a life of compassion, of understanding how things are—whichever phraseology resonates with your motivation—we have to really know that and get it. That's what's going to keep us, for example, sitting in the morning when we're tired. That's what's going to give us the confidence and the energy to bring our attention into our experience when we're feeling really scared, or blamed, or afraid, or angry, or embarrassed, or self-conscious—any of the things that we're not comfortable feeling. Underneath, there has to be the intention to care enough to want to be present, to want to come home to our true self.

So I want to talk about two ways that can be helpful for keeping in touch, for strengthening, refreshing, reawakening, enlivening your motivation, your commitment. You'll find other ones for yourself, but really to look from this level—the underlying motivation—so that it comes back up rather than from above.

The first way is getting in touch with what you might call the overarching purpose or motivation in your life. There may be more than one, but what really matters—in your heart of hearts, in your guts, in your cells—what is truly important to you? I'm not here to say what that should be. There's no should. But to really take some time to reflect on it.

Wise reflection means using the thought process to see what's important. For me, it's often been a process of just sitting quietly with vipassana, feeling into it over some days or weeks. I hold that question in the back of my mind, let it go, and just be with myself. Sometimes things will come up. And when whatever is really important to you arises, don't denigrate it or say it's not good enough or that it should be more spiritual. Just let it be what it is. Let it resonate around in you for a while and see if it's really true.

I'm talking here about what's really spiritually important—what we have in common in this room. But you might look and find that actually that's not so important to you, that what's really important is being as comfortable as possible. I'm not trying to be dismissive—that's pretty high on my list of things that are important too. But when I really look, it's not the most important. What's interesting is that if I don't really look, something like being as comfortable as possible actually assumes primary importance. Without a sense of reference to what truly matters—not just what you intellectually think you want your life to be about, but what it really is about—comfort can quietly take over.

When I first ever did this reflection, something came up sort of out of nowhere: I want to serve the Dharma. And then the mind came in: "Oh, you stupid, what do you think you could ever do? That's so egocentric." Don't listen to all that, because that's just the habits again. It's not about knowing how you're going to achieve this purpose. It's not even about achieving. It's more about resonating with what's really alive and powerful for you.

Then it becomes useful to make it conscious, to really honor it, whatever it is, to value it in yourself. Don't get into those denigrating thoughts—"it's impossible, I could never do that." You don't know what it means. You don't know where it's going to go. You don't need to. But in times of choice, either big choices in our life or smaller ones, this can be a reference point, a kind of beacon. A sense of, "Oh yes, what's really important here?"

To use my example of wanting to be comfortable: if I'm not paying attention, if I don't sometimes consciously bring up the question of whether that's really the deepest thing in my life, a lot of my decisions—even more than already are—would incline toward what makes me comfortable. That would become almost the most important thing. It's easy to fall into patterns like that.

But when I'm faced with a difficult choice and I can't make up my mind, and I'm in my head weighing pros and cons, writing out all the considerations—that's helpful in a small way, but really, I'm disconnected when I'm doing that. Then I sit and I go, "Wait a minute, what's really going on?" And I realize, "Oh, I think if I pick the right thing, I'll be really happy and comfortable and at ease. I'm looking for the one way that's going to give me that." And then I know: forget about it. That's the wrong way to make the decision. And then the obvious thing can arise.

It's a different process for each of us. But perhaps you get a sense of what I mean—to begin to connect with this motivation, this purpose, and then do it consciously from time to time. Really feel it and honor it. It will help you make decisions. It doesn't make anything magic or easy. It's just another help. It'll keep you from mindlessly falling back into old habits. And it'll support your motivation to keep doing whatever particular activities help you stay awake in daily life—whether it's sitting every day, going to sitting groups, listening to talks, whatever works for you.

Getting in touch with your deepest purpose again and again gives us the juice to make those small choices about what's really useful. It's about looking at what our life is really about. I had an experience recently—it's funny, but it inspired me. Funny strange, not funny amusing. It wasn't what you'd call an inspiring experience, but it really touched me on this level and made me look at this question yet again.

Because your purpose can keep changing, keep renewing itself, keep shifting. A couple of years ago, we went to visit Ruth Dennison in Yucca Valley—every year I teach in Southern California, and I usually go to visit Ruth, who probably a lot of you know. She's an old teacher of mine, and she has a center about a half an hour away.

I think it was two or three years ago. I went with Jack and Guy Armstrong, and we went to visit her. She was taking care of her husband, Henry, who has Alzheimer's—very severe at that time. He's pretty sick right now. She had sold her house in Hollywood and fixed up a house out in her desert enclave and was taking care of him, along with running the retreat center, traveling around the world, teaching retreats, taking care of six little dogs and various other responsibilities. She's an amazing bundle of energy.

So we went to visit her, and she had us come in and have tea with her and Henry. What was interesting to me, in terms of this sense of really looking more carefully at what I think I'm doing with my life, what I'm trying to hold on to—here was a man who I didn't really know well, but who had apparently lived a fascinating life. Long years of practice. He and Ruth were in Burma practicing, I think in the late 50s, early 60s, then in Japan practicing, hanging out with Alan Watts and that whole group. He was in the Ramakrishna order for a while. A really intellectually fascinating life, a deeply spiritual life, all kinds of experiences, all kinds of practice, all kinds of stories.

And what's left? What are we left with at the end of our life? We can't even try to have experiences, store up experiences—for what? What good are they when we can't even remember them? We can't even remember our own stories. What's left?

And then it's like, is there any point in my trying to achieve or hang on to anything for achievement's sake? There's plenty of point in doing things when you do it out of compassion, out of love, when it's just the obvious thing to do. You do it for the moment, for the motivation. But doing something to have or achieve or be known or think better of myself—it's like, leveled, gone. What if I don't even remember who I am? What's left?

And you can see, to some extent, if there's not really a lot of physical brain damage, what's left is our habits—how we respond in the moment. We came in, and he didn't have a clue. He had a vague sense that Jack was somebody he knew. Me and Guy—not a clue. But very courtly, very gentlemanly, very polite. "Sit down." You could tell it was just a habit. And then the mind would wander off and it wasn't there anymore. And I know there are other habits too, not always such wholesome ones.

But it really gave me pause to think: all that I feel I can cultivate most deeply is how I meet this moment. That's the habits of mine that are being formed. How can I awaken in this moment with compassion, with kindness, with clear seeing? This is just personal. I'm not saying this is what anyone else should draw from this. I'm saying this is the effect it had on me. And it was very much: what is life about except cultivating awakening, cultivating compassion, and only in this moment? First, because there is only this moment—it's the only place to do it. But that's what we're left with: our habits.

"What the mind inclines toward, what the mind dwells upon frequently, toward that it will naturally incline."

In fact, even karma—the whole round of cause and effect, birth and death—karma just means action. And action, the seed of action in Buddhist psychology, is all in the intention. The motivation with which we think, speak, and act—and that's only here, only now. So it really comes down to that's what we're left with.

You know the saying from Chögyam Trungpa, when someone was asking about rebirth and karma, and he says, "If there's no person, what's reborn?" And he said, "Your bad habits."

So the fewer bad habits we have left when we go out, the better off we are—in that frame of looking at things.

So sati is about remembering—just remembering. Not all our stories, but remembering: Can I bring presence? Can I bring acceptance and awakeness into this moment?

And holding lightly to this larger sense of purpose—to me, even though it's just momentary, it's actually a larger sense of purpose because it permeates everything for me. That's very helpful, to give us the courage to keep going, because sometimes it's really hard. And you never know where it's going to take us.

I was reading a book of interviews with Aung San Suu Kyi, the leader of the democracy movement in Burma. Under house arrest for all those years. And she was saying at one point that it was never her intention or her idea to go be the leader of the democracy movement in Burma and to be such a famous person. She said it just all kind of happened. And she said, "I'm just a very simple person. I'm so simple, people probably can't believe it because I'm so simple." This is, to me, like an enunciation of her simplicity of purpose.

And you never know where it's going to take you. She said, "I have very ordinary attitudes towards life. If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I'll do it. The motivation is its own reward." I just love that. She didn't say, "In the name of justice, I'm going to go to Burma, I'm going to take over." Decision after decision, out of justice or love, out of simplicity, she finds herself in this whole scene she's in.

We don't know. That's not in our control. I mean, I do have friends—it amazes me—they decide what they're going to do for the next five years, and by and large, they do it. That amazes me. I think that's actually a good quality of mind. I don't have it. But in the long run, we really don't know. We take our purpose, we try to live from as deep to what is true as we can. But if we have it too much set on where it should be going, we're out of touch with how we meet the moment.

So for me, one thing that's sort of changed—I've noticed over the years—in maybe the subtext of purpose or my understanding of daily practice, is that somehow there was some sense that spiritual awakening is really about getting myself a bit out of the grit and the hullabaloo and the craziness of everyday life. Almost physically removing myself, as if I wanted to live about a foot away from everything that was happening because it's just too intense. Never go into Walmart again, or whatever. Which, I mean, there might be a little aversion in that. I wouldn't say no. But really, the idea that spiritual awakening is some kind of Shangri-La somewhere else.

And for me personally—and this is how my trips had to go, yours might be different—it's becoming more and more about recognizing it's all right here. Awakening in the middle of everything that's going on. It's got nothing to do with the outer circumstances. This is really what Ajahn was saying today. The outer circumstances have nothing to do with the space of emptiness and the expression of compassion. I actually loved it when he said it's been six years he's been in this emptiness and it really doesn't make any difference to him if he's in the city or he's here talking to yogis or he's back in the monastery or whatever. And I really understand that not as an indifference, not as a shutting off—I don't care because I'm so in my own little world—but as an awakening in the midst of everything. So that things aren't in our way, but we don't have to get rid of them. We can be really awake and in touch with the truth, no matter what's going on.

Okay, we're not there yet, but we can have moments of it. And for me, that's really shifted from floating up somewhere and then I'd be awakened, to awakening in this life, to fully inhabiting each moment of life. Or never mind each moment—just this moment. To live this moment with wholehearted presence of heart, of mind, and freedom in the middle of it all, in the midst of life.

Each moment, any moment offers us the doorway. Some moments are a lot easier than others, you know, to go through the doorway. No blame. Of course they are.

That's why we come on retreat. It makes the moments a lot easier. It's a lot easier to do this here, isn't it, than in the middle of a traffic jam on the Bay Bridge? It's a lot easier than when you're in the middle of a major fight with your partner. So that's okay. We use the easier moments so that we can then begin to access presence in the more difficult moments.

And it is difficult. Our lives are so complex, we get so busy. As Howie was reading about last night, we go so quickly from one thing to the next to the next and fill up our attention and fill up our energy so that actually, you see, remembering just to be present is often the most difficult thing. If you remember, well, how long does it take to feel your breath? How long does it take, even in the middle of a really tense board meeting, to feel your body? It doesn't take any time. It takes almost minimal effort. It just takes that moment of, "Oh yeah, presence." That's what's tricky. And it takes real courage, because so often the presence is unpleasant or scary or difficult. And it takes great motivation to keep trying to do it.

So one other group of things that can be very helpful as a way to keep helping us remember, to re-motivate, are some traditional contemplations from the Tibetan tradition called the Four Mind-Turnings. Now by contemplation I mean really using wise reflection. This is a place where we appreciate and use the process of thinking. We never said to hate thinking. Thinking can be really useful.

The Four Mind-Turnings are just four conscious reflections that you begin by thinking about and then move more deeply into. They're nothing you haven't heard before. But they are ways to remember, when you're really feeling like, "What do I want to do this for? Why did I go to that retreat? Why do I want to pay attention?" They help when you really need to remember why it matters to pay attention. Have you ever had moments like that? It happens on retreat a lot. "Why am I lifting this foot? Remind me again, what's the point of this? The breath? Okay, already." We really lose it—never mind in life when there's so much else. "Why should I sit down when I'm so busy?"

So the four traditional contemplations, the mind-turnings, help us turn our heart towards the Dharma. Very stuff you know, but to consciously think about it.

The first one is our fortunate birth, the preciousness of our human life. To put it in very common terms, not into the Buddhist background: to appreciate all the factors that we have in our life—and everyone here has to some extent—that allow us to meet the Dharma in this life. There are so many people on this planet who don't have the physical time, who don't have the health to even pay attention at all, who don't have the opportunity or availability to hear some spiritual practice. There are those who have to work so hard all their life just to support their family, just to get enough food to eat, who are in the middle of wars, who are in places where they're not allowed freedom to do such things. There are so many places on this planet, in this country, where life is just about barely surviving, never mind really having what seems like a luxury to sit down and explore the nature of the mind and heart.

Technically, sure. Technically it's possible no matter what you're doing. But if you don't have the teaching or some way to really access it, and you're so overwhelmed in your life, it's pretty impossible.

It's so easy for me to forget how fortunate I am, how fortunate the people I meet are. Because we all have our stories of difficulty and suffering and poor health—I mean, really serious suffering. I'm not saying this means our life is easy. But the suffering is actually part of what is considered the preciousness of our human birth, seriously. Because it's said in the God realms, in the deva realms, there is so much sensual pleasure that there's not much motivation for investigation. It's just too nice. So aren't you lucky that it's not so nice? And actually we are.

And even that we're interested—because there are many people who have plenty of opportunity and luxury and leisure and just really aren't that interested. Think of your families if you've been trying to bring them along, you know? "Yeah, thanks a lot. That's really nice."

Even when I was in Thailand as a nun, people were wonderful to me. As Mark, the translator, was explaining today, a lot of the practice of basic everyday Buddhism in Thailand is of dana, of generosity. And it's beautiful—incredibly generous, supporting the monasteries, the monks, the nuns. But when I went there to meditate for a year, people would come up to me and say, really so happy, "Oh, it's so great you're here. You meditate for me. I can't do it." It wasn't that they didn't have time or anything, but they just thought they couldn't do it, weren't interested in doing it, and were quite happy being generous and making merit. "But I can't do that. You go do it." Just really not that same interest in investigation.

So take some time to reflect when you're really getting lost in a negative whinge about how bad life is and it's impossible to practice because of X, Y, and Z. Just stop a minute and reflect on your own particular fortunate circumstances that allow investigation, that allow development of compassion and love and clear seeing, and that you care enough to even try to do it.

And then, of course, there's the suffering aspect, which is never left out for very long of any Buddhist list of contemplations. But it does start with appreciation. I want to point that out.

The next two, which I'll mix together just for purposes of time, are reflection on the ever-presence of impermanence and death, which Howie talked about a little. If you really reflect on it—not as a panic attack but as a motivator—it works. It's not like, "Well, okay, next year," which is so easy. "Next year I'm really going to put in some good practice time. I can't really deal with being awake in this particular situation because right now it's just too intense. I'll wait until it cools off a little bit and then I'll pay attention." That kind of thing. We never know. We never know. Our ability for denial is great.

I thought of this little article last night when Howie was reading one of his, the one about human growth hormone. This is from a newspaper about a small town in Spain. The mayor of this city has banned death. He feels the local cemetery is too crowded for a soul to get decent rest. So the four thousand residents of this village in Granada province have to remain alive while municipal officials shop for land for a new graveyard. The mayor, Jose Rubio, issued an edict that said people should take utmost care of their health so they do not die until Town Hall takes the necessary steps to acquire land suitable for our deceased to rest in glory.

Now there's a certain level of disconnect going on, I would say.

The ever-presence of impermanence and death. And the third contemplation is to really use the suffering, the frustration that comes with basically our day-to-day life in samsara—the unreliability of experience, the unholdability, the fact of change. The difficulties that come in this human birth are not seen as impediments. Rather, reflection on the ever-presence of impermanence and death, and being willing to meet our difficult circumstances as avenues for understanding, as motivators to pay attention—these are actually very deep contemplations.

And they work. I talked to a couple of people where it came out as we were talking that they weren't practicing so much daily anymore, and when I asked about it they said, "Well, actually things have been going pretty good, you know?" One person even said to me, "I'll probably have to start really suffering before I get back into a daily practice." And we do this, don't we? It's easier if you just contemplate on impermanence and suffering and let that motivate you, rather than waiting until it gets really bad. But waiting is pretty common.

I'm sure you've heard of the work that Jon Kabat-Zinn and the people in Worcester are doing with mindfulness-based stress reduction. Basically it's a program where people are referred by doctors because the medical community can't really do anything else for them. It might be that they have terminal diagnoses, are really sick, or it might be just a lot of pain or migraines—situations where they're in a lot of pain and suffering presently and may have a terminal diagnosis. Of course, mostly they come to this program thinking they're going to find some cure. It takes a few weeks, because all they're teaching them is just straight mindfulness meditation.

I can tell you, it's really quite amazing. Some years ago, when I was managing the meditation center in Barre at IMS, several of us went to become interns in this program. They allow a few people in each class who aren't referred by doctors to sit in, participate, and really learn and see how teaching mindfulness works with strong pain and disease. So I went with two good friends. We were all working at the meditation center, and it was an extremely busy time—we were majorly stressed out. You'd think it would be a good time for us to go to stress reduction, but we'd hop in the car in the morning, drive like an hour really fast, get to this program, stuffing down some breakfast in the cafeteria as we ran in. Then they'd start teaching mindfulness by having us lie down on the floor and do a body scan. One or another of us would invariably fall asleep.

We never really made it through the body scan. But after two or three weeks, other people in the class were saying, "I've had four migraines a week and I'm not having them anymore."

Meanwhile, the three of us would have to leave at two in the afternoon whenever the session ended, driving like mad through terrible lunch-hour traffic because we had our weekly staff meeting—which was never the most enjoyable experience. We'd arrive at our staff meeting completely fried, our heads splitting. "I can't take this meeting. I'm so stressed out from my day."

Somehow, we were supposed to be the meditators. But because we already knew how to do it, we didn't really have the motivation. We went to learn something, but we weren't at our wit's end. We weren't facing a terminal diagnosis. When I think back on it now, it was kind of pathetic.

And yet to see the effect on people in that class—not everybody clicked, of course, and that's fine—but there were really some huge transformations. It wasn't that mindfulness was some magic cure. It was just shifting the relationship, being able to actually be with the actual experience instead of hating it and fearing it and blaming whatever happened and reliving all the past. Learning how to be with pain just as it is, without adding the extra. The results were really amazing. And we just got stressed out.

But thinking about it later, I realized it was a perfect example of how the imminence of death, the constancy of impermanence, the suffering we face in our lives can really serve as a motivator to wake up. And why should we think we can wait until we really do have a terminal diagnosis? That's even a luxury—to know you have time. We don't know. We all have suffering. Instead of just kvetching about it, we could really say, "Okay, this is the moment to wake up. How am I meeting this difficult circumstance? Can I, just for a fraction of a second, awaken with clarity, meet it with compassion?"

No, it isn't easy. It takes enormous motivation. A little reflection can sometimes help to re-inspire that motivation.

The last reflection, which I'll just touch on briefly, is on karma. Karma means basically action—cause and effect, the whole chain of cause and effect, the inevitability of karma. Action, in the way the Buddha looked at it, really has its seed in the intention, the motivation behind why we do a particular action. Speech, thought, action—but really we can look at our actions in our life. Even if something comes out looking like a great action, if what motivated us is total pettiness, that's the seed of karma. That's the effect that will at some point bloom.

Now, where karma gets very complicated—and I don't want to go into it tonight—is that it's not so linear. That's why it's very confusing. You see people having all these good things happen, and you know they're really rotten to the core, and you think, "I don't get this karma." But if we don't worry about other people and we pay attention to ourselves—which is really where the healing is and the freedom is—we have our work cut out for us. None of us are going to get too free by analyzing other people's intentions and what's happening to them.

To bring attention back and pay attention to why we're doing what we're doing, what happens—and this is where I'm skipping all the details—what you begin to notice is that when we can meet and awaken in the moment with clarity, just meet what's happening, notice why we're doing what we're doing, and pay attention to what happens after we do something out of anger, or after we do something out of love, or after we do something out of total obliviousness, or after we do something out of compassion—when we keep paying attention, the feedback we get, our own internal feedback, our experience, is that really we're so much happier when we act from our interconnectedness, when we act from compassion or friendliness, when we act from seeing clearly rather than from all our preconceptions.

Thinking about this is useful. Paying attention is where we really learn it.

So what begins to happen—it's already happening for all of us, and you see it often on retreat—is that our habits of mind, right here in intention, start to shift. This is where you can notice habits beginning to change. Not overnight, but we do notice it. Acting from greed isn't so satisfying anymore. In little things you start to notice: "Oh, I got that fifth chocolate chip cookie. It didn't really do it. And first of all, I guess I need a sixth."

Maybe it's because it's never going to do it. You can put it down. I'm making it small, but it really begins to shift.

And if you caught what Ajahn Jimnean was talking about—how his emptiness is even bigger this year—and how even when he had chicken pox, he kept just doing for people, doing for people, that actually that compassionate action is what made the emptiness seem to get bigger, is what actually gave him strength. In his way of talking, I loved it, because what I got was the sense of the emptiness, the wisdom, and the compassion as natural interplays together—the two wings of our practice of wisdom and compassion. They can't be separated.

When we're seeing clearly, our natural response in a situation is going to be more from our interrelatedness and less from our sense of small separate me that has to be totally protected, with everything else kept at bay and manipulated so that somehow I can be happy if I can control everything. It's just not even, as he was saying, this idea of being so compassionate—not that we have to be the Dalai Lama or Mother Teresa—but it becomes what one teacher called "doing the obvious." You don't even think about it. But in a situation, rather than always self-referencing, we just respond by doing what's obvious. And often what's obvious is going to be the response of caring, of friendliness, of compassion.

And we start, as I said, not by some grandiose idea or service project, but by starting where we are. How do I meet this moment? Starting with ourselves, from Pema Chödrön: "When you wake up in the morning and out of nowhere comes the heartache of alienation and loneliness, could you use that as a golden opportunity? Rather than persecuting yourself or feeling that something terribly wrong is happening, right there in the moment of sadness and longing, could you relax and touch the limitless space of the human heart?" Next time you get a chance, experiment with this.

Start where we are. You don't have to have some big thing going on. You just wake up feeling crappy. We all get to do that. That's a great place to cultivate compassion and clarity. No one can say they don't have an opportunity.

And so the moments of our lives—that's plenty to start with. When you're caught in traffic, when the baby's crying and you're changing the diaper, when you're having a horrible time with your landlord, when you've been working in real estate for six months and never made any money—no matter what it is that's happening, right here. It can be mundane. Mundane's fine. Mundane's great. It's easy with mundane. Practice with the mundane so that for the really big difficult ones, we have a sense that we can trust. That if I'm really willing to meet it wholeheartedly, doing the obvious, meeting it with compassion, responding appropriately will be more natural. We don't have to figure it out all the time.

And so it's not just self-serving either—just meeting our own circumstances and somehow it doesn't affect how we meet everyone else. How we meet ourselves, how we meet each experience, it really seeps out into our relationships with everybody. And really what happens is, over time, what makes us happy really changes. Generosity makes us happy. We don't have to think about it. Kindness, friendliness, open-heartedness makes us happy. And when I get snippy, when I get impatient, when I get aversive, it's more noticeable because it's really so obviously suffering.

And the suffering is really in the sense of separation. I think in some ways the deepest suffering is our sense of separation—separation from others, and really, deeply, our sense of separation from our true home. We're not really separated, but because we're so caught in reactivity, we don't notice that we're not separated. So just the expression of kindness becomes our real, deepest happiness.

I want to read this article because I've liked it and I never have a chance to read it. So I'm reading it. It fits in.

It's an article about a man named Matt Dawson who's worked for Ford Company for fifty-nine years in Detroit. He could have retired a long time ago. He's seventy-eight years old. But he's still at it, driving a forklift, working as much overtime as possible, making about $100,000 a year. And he keeps doing it just so he can give most of it away. He first gave $50,000 to the United Negro College Fund in 1994. Since then, he's given them $180,000 more. He gave $200,000 to Louisiana State University, $112,000 to churches in Detroit and Louisiana, $20,000 to the NAACP, and $10,000 to community colleges. And he just gave $200,000 to Wayne State University.

He says, "I get joy and happiness out of this. I can go home and sleep good." And he just lives in a little apartment, drives a 1985 Ford Escort, and works constantly, doesn't take vacations, because it makes him really happy to give this money away.

Isn't that nice? Real happiness. That's real happiness. Not just saving it all so you can maybe make a hundred dollars on the stock market if the NASDAQ goes up and you sell at the right time. That's not happiness. I've been watching my friends—I cannot say that's happiness. But this is. And that comes to be happy for us.

Shantideva, the great Indian teacher, said, "When I've done something for others, no amazement or conceit arises. It's like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return." It's like having fed myself. That sense of separation, that sense of isolation isn't there. We're really happy.

And to come back to this practice, which can seem so isolating—sitting here, being with what's happening, being in silence, removing ourselves from the world to do a retreat. But really, as I know you know, it's about opening to the whole world.

I want to close with this from Pema Chödrön:

"Fundamentally, when we look into our own hearts and begin to discover what is confused and what is brilliant, what is bitter and what is sweet, it is not just ourselves that we're discovering—we're discovering the universe. When we discover the Buddha that we are, we realize that everything and everyone is Buddha. When we regard thoughts and emotions with humor and openness, that's how we perceive the universe. We're not just talking about our individual liberation, but how to help the community we live in, how to help our families, our country, the whole continent, not to mention the world and the galaxy and as far as we want to go. There is an interesting transition that occurs naturally and spontaneously. We begin to find that, to the degree that there is bravery in ourselves—the willingness to look, to point directly at our own hearts—and to the degree that there is kindness towards ourselves, there is confidence that we can actually forget ourselves and open to the world."

So that's our practice. Here, in daily life—no difference.

CHAPTER 326

Acceptance of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson examines the paradox of impermanence (anicca): while conceptually easy to grasp, truly accepting it in our bones remains profoundly challenging. Using the poignant example of her father's declining health from Parkinson's disease, she illustrates how our first reactions to change are often fear, denial, and resistance rather than the equanimity we might expect from our intellectual understanding.
>
> Wilson explores the Buddha's teaching on vedanā (feeling tone)—how every moment of experience carries a quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral sensation. She explains how our unconscious reactions to these feeling tones create the chains of craving and aversion that bind us to suffering. Drawing on the Buddha's analogy of being shot with two arrows—the first being the actual experience, the second our reactive suffering—she shows how an awakened being experiences the same changing phenomena without adding layers of resistance or grasping.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for meditation, encouraging practitioners to notice where they assume permanence, evaluate experience based on pleasantness, or get entranced by reactions rather than meeting bare experience. Wilson emphasizes that freedom isn't about eliminating unpleasant experience but about non-clinging—allowing the heart to let go naturally when we truly see things as they are. This letting go, she suggests, reveals a peace that was always present, waiting to be discovered in each moment of genuine presence.

Tonight I want to talk a bit about impermanence, the acceptance of impermanence as a doorway to liberation.

Impermanence is kind of an interesting fact to me, one of those paradoxes of our spiritual life, which is filled with paradoxes, of course. It's one of the facts of existence that conceptually is really fairly easy to comprehend. It doesn't really take a rocket scientist to say, yeah, things are changing. Impermanence, that makes sense.

But really, deep down, when I look at my life, when I really want to invite myself into an understanding of impermanence, I ask a couple of questions. One is, aside from the fact that it's so obvious, do I, do we truly believe that all phenomena are arising and passing? And not only believe, but really know. The second question is, if it were true, if I really do know that, if I do believe that, how would that look in my life? How would I live my life as a result of that knowledge?

That takes us into a lot of areas where we see, as is so often the case, our intellectual understanding, which is useful, but it can be miles ahead of our cellular understanding, so to speak. What would it mean to know in my cells that everything is arising and passing?

The way we act is that if things were really impermanent, it would be horrible. It's not like we say, oh yes, great. No, too much suffering. But the truth is that were we to live from that knowledge, we'd be living in freedom. Deep knowing is one of the gateways to liberation, to freeing our hearts and minds from clinging, from wrong view, from suffering, basically.

When I look in my own life at an example—it's both a very painful example because it's in my immediate family, but it's also one of the more obvious examples in which one would think if one had even a modicum of acceptance of impermanence, it would be active here. The example is my father, who is 83 and has been a very virile, healthy man all his life. In the last few years, he's developed Parkinson's disease. And at the same time, due to something else, he's losing his sight. The two together, it's a suffering experience, no question about that. To watch someone who's been so athletic and strong and clear in his mind be shuffling around and not able to do so much. The mind is still strong, but seeing how it gets harder and harder, and he's suffering from it.

What was my first reaction, and what is often my reaction when I think of him or go back again? Was the first reaction, well, the body decays, what is born suffers old age, sickness, and death, that's really how it is? Not in a callous way, but really that's how it is. Of course not. It took me ages to really be able to feel with some equanimity that this is how it is.

The first reaction was actually not compassion. It was a kind of fear on the edge of panic. No, this can't be happening—slight denial of how things are. This can't be happening, and then at times almost an anger at him. You're not allowed to get old. You're not allowed to be different from the person I've been used to for the last 45 years. You're not allowed to suffer. Why? Because then I have to suffer.

When I saw I could open to my own suffering around it, the natural compassion comes. And the sadness, the sense of loss, the compassion—that's fine. It's not that those won't happen when we understand impermanence. That's natural. It's that denial on the edge of panic that I was feeling, the negativity and the underlying sense that there has to be something we can do to stop this from happening. You know that feeling.

It's very interesting to me to see that I've really been able to come into much more harmony, which means greater compassion, greater connectedness with my father, more ability to be there with him as he is, rather than colluding with him in his aversion and denial. That feels a lot better. But I still have to consciously keep bringing myself back here. When I'm not really aware, it's so easy for my mind to go into, no, can't be like this.

I find that fascinating in dharmic terms. Because at 83 years old, something has to happen. It's how it is. I'm 49 years old, something has to happen. And it could be tomorrow. I don't know.

As I say, that's a poignant, strong example, but also an obvious one. How often, in even the little things, when something that we like or are comfortable with or think that's the way it ought to be changes—how often are we really able to meet that with acceptance?

equanimous? Do we truly respond with "Well, of course, whatever arises is bound to pass"?

Let's just look at our meditation experience today. We really don't usually have to go much further than that—unless you're having a day of equanimity, and may you be happy. It happens. But just to look at the little things: how did you relate to something difficult or unpleasant that arose? Was there a sense that of course unpleasant arises, and that's fine, it will change? Or was it more like, "Yes, it'll change, and it better change fast"? Or perhaps fear that it will never change?

And when something pleasant happens, that's okay. We don't worry about impermanence when something pleasant is happening—only when it's about to leave. And then we say, "Well, of course it left." Intellectually, yes, we do tell ourselves that, like I did with my father. Sure, it left. It's changing. That's natural. But what's the real response so often, not always, but so often, underneath? "What did I do wrong? How can I get it back? How can I subtly shift my practice in order for that to happen more often?" Because that's better and this is worse. It's just so ingrained.

How would it be to really be awake, connected, and at peace with coming and going, coming and going, coming and going? It's so peaceful, so connected, so much less struggle. But why are we often so afraid of it?

Of course, intellectually we know—and from experience too. That's what's even more mystifying. This isn't all intellectual. We do know this from our experience. Why do we forget it again so quickly? That's another mystery to me.

When we suffer from change, from loss, from not getting what we want—big ones or little ones—we know really that the anguish isn't in the fact of the change itself, the changing nature. That's just how it is. The anguish is in our clinging, in our fear, in our wanting things to be different, in our aversion.

Why do we cling so much? Why is it so hard for us to simply be with things as they are? Well, that's the question, isn't it, of our spiritual practice, which we approach in so many different ways. So I'll just talk about some of my takes, some of the ways I look at this.

In some ways, I feel—in looking at my own experience—that the clinging to pleasant, the fear and wanting unpleasant things to go away, this trying to stop the constant change, really is our deepest heart's response about wanting to be happy. As we know, as it's often been quoted, the Buddha said that everyone wants to be happy. We as human beings share this common bond: our deepest wish is to be happy, but we don't really know how to go about it. And I think one of the ways we keep creating suffering out of really wanting to be happy is through this clinging, trying to stop the flow of experience, trying to control.

As we continue in our practice, and as many of you are quite aware of experientially, aside from the obvious—of course everything is changing, we can see the seasons, we can see the days, we can see our bodies over time—but even on a microscopic level, there is no moment, really, that is not in constant flux. There are times when we experience this consciously, whether through concentrated meditation or just the way the mind is set. Some people on some days simply see the ending of things, the ending of things, the ending of things.

And often, not only when we first experience this but at other times too—and even when we don't experience it consciously—I think this sense can be underlying our reactions in a subconscious way. This constant flux is sensed as a deep unreliability to all phenomena. We want, at least I see that I want, my mind wants, somewhere to rest. Somewhere not subject to this constant arising and passing, arising and passing, arising and passing.

And in looking for someplace to rest, the habituated response of the mind and heart is to try to hold on to some particular moment of experience, whatever it may be, looking for that place of peace, that place of rest—because we tend to focus on experience. We lose sight of the fact that when we cling to this thing and it goes away and we really suffer, we forget in our daily life to look at the process and think, "Well, that thing didn't do it, but this next thing will." That particular job didn't do it, but this next one will be perfect. That particular rice gruel at breakfast didn't completely—bring unending happiness, but maybe tomorrow's cornmeal will—you know, whatever it happens to be.

And to open with awareness to that "no place to rest" can at times be experienced—not always, but it can be experienced—as fearful, or at least wildly unsettling, to say the least.

It's like being in an earthquake. Eight years ago I was teaching a retreat in Yucca Valley in California, and we had an earthquake. Actually, it was in the middle of a talk I was giving. And that was just kind of cool—I'd never been in an earthquake before, and it wasn't a really bad one. Then later that night, a couple hours later, there was a stronger one. And even that, because I was outside just watching the ground ripple, was a little unsettling on a cellular level, but it was also kind of cool.

What wasn't so cool was the fact that for three days and nights, every five to ten minutes following that, there were aftershocks. One or two we can handle—that's cool. But every five or ten minutes, it was so profoundly unsettling, both mentally and physically. I mean, the body of the earth is supposed to support me. There's really nowhere to go.

So that experience has stayed with me very strongly as a metaphor for anicca, for impermanence—that there really is nowhere to go in this phenomenal world of appearances that isn't going to change.

And the shift that comes through our insight mind, through our wisdom mind, through our mindfulness practice that just allows us to see things as they are—the freedom, the ease—isn't about changing the fact of impermanence. It's about letting go of looking for some place, some thing that we can rest in that isn't going to change.

The Buddha said once that the search for a resting place is burning, burning. Not to need a resting place is cool and peaceful.

And so our whole practice with impermanence—opening to it, feeling it, seeing it, allowing it in more deeply—allows us to give up this search for some place to rest. And paradoxically, in that giving up, there's the peace. It was always here. We couldn't find it because we were looking for something somewhere that was going to give it to us. We just don't quite look in the right way.

Still, I say that. On some level, I know that. And still, the clinging is like second nature. It's really second nature. It isn't our first, most basic nature, although it may really feel like that a lot of the time. It isn't. But we're so used to it, and we cling because we think it'll make us happy.

It's so poignant to me. The very thing that keeps us spinning in confusion and suffering—we do it because we think it'll make us happy.

Another thing the Buddha says over and over when he's talking to monks or laypeople and bringing them into their experience—no matter what aspect of experience—he'll often say, "So you see that the body, for example, is impermanent?" And they'll always say yes, we can see it's impermanent. And then he'll say, "So what is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying." And they'll always say yes. And then: it cannot be self.

So this is another question I pose to myself and to you, to see: Do we actually believe that? Do we actually buy that, deeply, deeply in our understanding—that if something's impermanent, it cannot be inherently satisfying? Again, if we really bought that, we'd let go. The clinging would stop, because we'd know that orange, that relationship, that meditation experience, that really peaceful breath isn't going to make me lastingly happy. It can be nice for the moment—nothing wrong with that. But I think as our response to the complete unreliability, we do tend to cling to a moment of ease, a temporary moment of pleasure, a moment of respite. And there's nothing wrong with that, except that clinging doesn't work.

It's just so poignant to me. There's a fragment of a poem by Galway Kinnell that I love because to me it expresses the beauty, really, and the poignancy as well of clinging—without judgment. It's called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You cry, waking from a nightmare,
when I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight.
You cling to me hard,
as if clinging could save us.

I think you think I will never die. I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you. I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down. I have stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die. And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake crying from, being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

And the only thing different about that is it's scary when we think we're the house, or when we think we're some steady state that needs that house to support us. But when we realize we're not the house, and there's nothing steady here that's experiencing change coming at it, but we let go into the change, there's just no problem. There's just no problem. When we stop trying to block the flow and things just are as they are, we wonder what all the problem ever was.

So I want to talk a little bit about this deep habit of our tendency to cling. And again, don't be discouraged by this. I think it's really important to recognize in your practice here, in our whole spiritual life, that we will have deep insight in many different ways into various forms of these truths—whether it's impermanence, no self, the unreliability, emptiness, whatever. And really, the insight is true. We are in that moment touching the truth. We're recognizing it. We're trusting it. And we'll forget again.

The conditioned habits of our mind are really strong. And just because we forget again doesn't mean it's gone, it's lost, we've failed. I think most of us—at least most of the people I talk to, and I'm including myself, especially here in the West with the speed of life these days—we have quite an incredible impatience. A sense that I've seen this already five times, so it should be over.

But if we just look at our life, and if we just stick with this lifetime—never mind the whole idea of countless lifetimes, just stick with this lifetime—how many mind moments has craving been conditioned, or aversion been conditioned, or delusion been conditioned? I'm not saying this to be discouraging, but no, really, you've got to look at things as they are. But I didn't finish. I'm not saying it to be discouraging because it's a lot, right? That's why you're laughing, I'm assuming. It's a lot.

How many moments has non-greed, non-craving, non-aversion, metta, friendliness, non-delusion been cultivated? Well, as you're practicing and as you've been practicing over your life, also quite a lot—although it's true, probably not nearly as many moments as the other. Yet it doesn't take as many moments. I think it was in an interview today with somebody, but just the power of a moment of truth. You can be suffering in something, wallowing in some knot of personality or frustration or whatever for days. And you have one moment when you just see through the whole thing and it's really gone. Really gone. And that moment sustains us, doesn't it? For really quite a long time. Hopefully it won't have to sustain us for too long before there's another moment like that.

But it does sustain us because the power of resting in the truth is so much stronger than the conditioning of greed or aversion or delusion. It's just that there are a lot more moments of those, and our mind falls into the habit. So that's why I'm saying it isn't really discouraging, but we tend to be a tad impatient. Five, six times—that should do it.

And it just isn't like that. So if we can let go of that expectation, we just keep seeing the same things more and more deeply, more and more fully. And that's how the practice seems to work.

So this tendency to cling or to push away—it basically arises because of our not seeing and understanding experience accurately. In some ways, when the Buddha talks about wrong view and right view, that translation "view"—I like it because it really is that we're viewing experience incorrectly. That's why we respond in a way that doesn't fit.

Two of the ways we view it incorrectly: we don't really let in impermanence, anicca, so we continue to respond as if something could be held. And the deep habit that feeds from this is evaluating—often unconsciously—the value or the worth of our experience moment to moment in terms of its pleasantness or its unpleasantness or its neutrality. As you know, I'm sure, this is how the Buddha described our moment-to-moment experience. And as you look in your meditation here, as things are slowed down a little bit, all that's ever happening is the arising and passing of one of our sixth sense experiences: seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, hearing, thinking.

One after the other after the other. All the mental is also one sense experience—thinking, emotions, and everything. And in each moment of consciousness of one of those, there's awareness. With that consciousness of hearing, we experience it, each of us, as being either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. And that's just, as it were, a fact of the experience, how we experience it. It's just a passing thing. Even pleasant or unpleasant, they're neutral in themselves. It doesn't have to have any emotional reaction around it. So that's just kind of how we experience things. And don't believe me—look and see, because this is really a very fruitful and freeing area of exploration.

What's so fascinating about this is that when we don't have any awareness of the pleasant or unpleasant or neutral aspect of a moment of experience, this is where our deeply conditioned habits come in. So if it's pleasant, without thinking, we just lean towards it, want more, try to keep it going. Unpleasant? Well, that's bad. That clearly isn't what's supposed to be happening. Move away. Neutral? Have you ever noticed anything neutral? And if we do, quite often it equates to boring, or something's wrong, or let me fix it, or fall asleep.

These correlate with greed, hatred, and delusion, these three. They're not any kind of judgment. They're just habits of mind, and really fascinating to begin to pay attention to, because it's in really paying attention that we can begin to experience a different way of relating on a moment-to-moment level.

This is a little statement from Lama Yeshe, who was a Tibetan Lama who died quite some time ago. And this is from a little booklet I ran into the other day called Becoming Your Own Therapist. He was talking about vedana. Vedana is the Pali word for this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral sensation. It's sometimes translated as "feeling." I like "feeling tone" better, because we use, in English, "feeling" often to mean emotions.

So he says, "Many of our negative actions are reactions to feeling." Look and see for yourself. Feelings can come to see—if you really look at feelings—reactions to feelings are responsible for all the conflict in the world, whether it's two small children fighting, up to nations at war. "Without understanding the characteristic nature of your own feelings of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutrality, you will never discover the nature of your mental attitudes. And without discovering that, you'll never put an end to your emotional problems." This is Lama Yeshe.

And never mind emotional problems—without understanding the nature of these feelings in our experience, these feeling tones, and our reaction to them when we're not awake, we'll never understand the nature of clinging and aversion and delusion. But it's a wonderful place to explore, because just by looking at this, you can come right in on where experience changes from just being what it is to clinging, to aversion, and to the whole following field of suffering.

So I'll talk a little bit about just these three feeling tones. What's really interesting to me is, as I said before, how much unthinkingly, if we're not paying attention, we tend to evaluate really our whole life in terms of how much pleasant feeling there is.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who is a great Thai forest monk and meditation teacher, once said, really look in your life and the decisions you make and the things you do. He says, almost everything you do is for the sake of pleasant sensation. And how long does a pleasant sensation last? This is what's really interesting in terms of anicca. These feeling tones, they last about that long. Really. About a second. And so much of what we do is to act out of not quite understanding that what we really want is more of that quick, flying-by pleasant feeling tone. And we do all kinds of things—some are lovely and some are really stupid—in order to get more of this pleasant feeling tone.

There's a story from the Buddha's time I like a lot, and one way you can look at the story is through this lens. It's about Ananda. He was the Buddha's attendant, his cousin. For twenty-five years he was the Buddha's attendant. He was an extremely kind-hearted, compassionate person. And in many of the suttas, the discourses and stories from the time of the Buddha, Ananda is very human. He shows a lot of human qualities. It's easy to identify with Ananda when the Buddha is expounding on something. He'll often ask the questions or intercede in a way that's very kind.

So once Ananda was out walking and he passed a well, and at this well was a woman of the untouchable caste. At that time there was a very strict caste system, and someone of the untouchable caste couldn't hand or give anything to someone of a higher caste. So he went by the well, and one of the few things a monk was allowed to ask for was water.

So he just said, "Oh woman, would you give me some water?" And she said, "Oh no, oh no, reverend sir, I'm from the lower caste, you don't want water from me." And he just said in his kind way, "I'm not really asking about your caste, I just really would like some water."

So she gave him some water, but she was so touched by his kindness that she secretly followed him back and saw that he was one of the Buddha's disciples. And then she went up to the Buddha and said, "Oh, Ananda is so wonderful. I want to follow him and serve him for the rest of my life. I love Ananda because he is so wonderful."

Part of me finds this story amusing, because somebody's nice to you and you're ready to give them your whole life, simply because it feels good. The Buddha, luckily, was very wise, and he could see what was really going on. He said, "You know, it's not Ananda that you love, but his kindness." It was really the pleasantness, the happiness she felt—and he didn't say this, but this is what I'm putting into it—it was simply how pleasant it felt to be treated that way.

So he said, "You don't need to follow Ananda. Just take the lesson of his kindness and go out and treat other people in the same kind way." I think that's a lovely story, but it also shows how we can misinterpret our experience and really, for the sake of pleasant feeling, get ourselves into all kinds of situations.

There's nothing wrong with pleasant feeling. It's nice, as long as we know what it is. We see that it's coming, we see that it's going. And probably an unpleasant feeling will come next, and it's out of our control. That's the big piece—it's out of our control.

With unpleasant feeling, it's just the reverse. How often do we evaluate our experience as wrong, or a mistake, or think we've got to do something to get rid of it when it's unpleasant? It's really easy to see both of these in our meditation practice. It's rare to be having a really painful, confused sitting and think, "Fine, this is good practice." Then you come and tell us and describe it clearly, and we say, "Oh good, that was good practice"—and you think these guys are a little off.

But it's also rare for someone to come in and report a very pleasant sitting and say, "But I can see I was really spaced out. That was bad practice." Rare. But the quality of practice has got nothing to do with pleasant or unpleasant.

Just as we can get fixated on the pleasant, we can also get fixated on the unpleasant. Instead of bringing a balance of attention, sometimes we only notice the pleasant, sometimes we only notice the unpleasant. If you're eating lentils and there's a little rock in them—which, God forbid, will never happen here—but should that happen and your tooth cracks and you have a chip in your tooth, it doesn't even hurt, right? But there's that rough spot. Have you ever noticed how you can't keep your tongue away from that rough spot? All your other teeth are fine. The whole rest of your body is fine. But you go through the day just worrying that rough spot in the tooth.

This is what we do. And it can build up so that it's not just some relatively minor—or even major but singular—aspect of experience that's unpleasant. We get into reactivity, we get into comparing, we get into self-judgment, we get into thinking it should be different, and pretty soon we can be really lost in a morass of suffering and negativity, self-doubt, giving up—the whole thing. And it can all be starting from an unpleasant feeling tone that's arising that we don't quite notice.

And neutrality, as I said, we often really don't notice at all. A lot of times when things are relatively neutral, people will come in and say nothing's happening. The more we talk, it becomes clear that calm is happening, maybe even ease is happening, maybe peace is happening. But it's amazing how often, at first, we're really not comfortable with calm. We want a little more juice. Neutrality gets a little too close to not being alive somehow.

We've got to learn how to bring awareness into neutrality. Without that, we often either fall asleep or find ourselves bored, and then we get aversive to the boredom. So we manage to move from neutrality to aversion.

Other times—and people have reported this to me, not this retreat so far—they found themselves realizing they were experiencing calm. The breath, yes, they could feel the breath. It was there, kind of quiet, a little bit shallow. They were really with it.

But so what? You know, I want something else to happen here. And pretty soon the mind is off, creating even negative suffering fantasies. But we'd rather suffer than be in neutrality land. It's really an interesting phenomenon, just to notice if that happens to you.

So these three feeling tones—they're just what they are. In themselves, no problem. Pleasant arises, unpleasant arises, neutral arises. They're just constantly coming and going, coming and going. Where do they become a problem? Neutral is never a problem, but where we get lost is when we don't see the feeling tone for what it is. The reactions, the responses of conditioning, come really quickly if we're not aware. They just come quickly.

Once we see the reaction, again, no problem. So there's clinging—you just notice it. That's no problem. It's when we don't notice it, and we follow Ananda all the way home and are ready to devote our lives, that there's a problem.

When we get caught up in the reactions to experience—and this is really very common—at times you might find that you're spending most of your energy involved in your reactions. Actually, we can get entranced by our reactions to what's happening, sometimes to the point where we don't even really know what's actually happening. We're completely lost in our reactions to it—like that woman following Ananda home.

Or a friend of mine: we were sitting in a little house, and the refrigerator kept going on and off, as refrigerators will do. This friend is from Europe, and he claims that in Europe refrigerators aren't as loud as refrigerators in the States, which might be true. The refrigerator would come on in the middle of the sitting, go off, come on again, go off. He said by the end of the sitting, he just wanted to get up and kick that refrigerator. He said it was like a modern torture chamber. Just a noise—that's all it is. That's an example of getting really entranced by our reactions. We don't know what's happening.

This is one of the ways the Buddha described the difference between an awakened being and an ordinary worldling—such as ourselves. I would assume it's ourselves; I don't want to put anything on you. Such as myself.

He talks about how someone asked him the question: basically, what's the difference between an awakened person and an ordinary worldling? He says an ordinary person, if they experience an unpleasant bodily feeling, feels that feeling and then worries about it, laments, grieves, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught.

Does that strike a chord anywhere? That pain in the knee, that feeling in the chest, that arrow in the back? Weeps and is distraught. Thus, he says, it is as if being shot with an arrow, he shoots himself with another arrow. So instead of experiencing one unpleasant feeling, he experiences two—or it sounds like more than two. Once you worry and lament and beat your breast, it's escalating a bit.

What's very interesting is how the Buddha speaks to what follows from this over time, how the conditioning gets so entrenched. He says that having experienced that painful feeling and gotten involved in that lamenting, beating of the breast, and worrying, there comes to underlie in that person a tendency to resist the unpleasant. In other words, each time we get lost in that lamenting aversion, it strengthens a little bit the tendency to do it again with the next unpleasant experience.

And, he says, because ordinary people do not know of any other escape from painful feelings except to experience sense pleasure—because that's all we ordinarily know, we think that's the only way out of unpleasant. So then, out of our resistance to the unpleasant feeling, we go after some sense pleasure. And then we're creating an underlying tendency to crave for sense pleasure.

It's really quite interesting. So just watch it in ourselves, not judgmentally. The cycle becomes: unpleasant, the tendency to resist, then going after the pleasant, thinking that will make us happy. The difference, the Buddha says, is that when we feel it like that, that's how we're fettered by pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. We're chained by it because we're caught in that cycle.

And an awakened person, when touched by a painful feeling, does not resist it or resent it. He's touched, shot with one arrow, and nothing happens. It's just unpleasant. And the same with pleasant. Fine, it's pleasant. There's no need to create anything else around it. It's just what it is.

In a way, this is the essence of our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice—to learn to bring our attention into the simplicity of what's arising, rather than getting lost in our reactions and interpretations of what's arising. On a simple level, to just feel the burning in the hip as opposed to all those visions of hip replacement and permanent trauma. We all do it. That's an easy, obvious example, but there are many much more subtle and complex examples. We just come back to the bare experience.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said that we miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination. That's one of my favorite quotations.

So when you notice you're all caught up in some kind of tangled reaction, the first thing is just to pull back a little and notice: what's happening? Tangle, reaction—that's fine. Just to notice that. And then see. Sometimes the triggering sense impression may actually still be going on. If that's the case, you can go right to it with awareness and see the whole chain. That's really the chain of dependent origination. Sometimes not, and then you just come in on the craving or the aversion or the boredom and simply be with that.

I'll give you an example of that chain of dependent origination. Today in the morning sitting they were scraping and painting outside. Now, that's hearing—sounds arising. And this also reveals the nature of feeling tone: it can be different for different people.

It's not that that's an intrinsically unpleasant sound. Some people told me today that it really bugged them. Other people said they actually kind of liked it because there was something to hear and it brought them back to awareness. For other people it might have been quite neutral. For the same person, different moments of that sound might have been pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

But if there was any reaction, positive or negative, if the mind was going off—"I can't believe during the three-month course they have guys come here and scrape the windows! They have the whole year, don't they? And they're doing it today, for God's sake!"—that's the moment where, if it goes too far, when you notice it, and luckily the sound's still happening, that's so fortunate, because then you can go right back to the sound. In that moment you might notice if there's a pleasant or unpleasant quality. You might not—sometimes it's subtle—but you might notice the flinching back of aversion right away. Great. You can notice that. And notice how it can change.

Thich Nhat Hanh says sometimes that even when we experience the feeling tone as unpleasant, if we know more about the bigger picture, it actually changes our relationship and we don't experience it as so unpleasant anymore. Joseph told me this—I didn't know it. He checked with the maintenance department: Why are they doing this today? And they said, you know how wood that's in the sun really rots if you don't paint it every couple of years. The contractors have been so busy this year that this is the only time they could come, and we were lucky to get them now. Otherwise, that wall would just be falling down around our ears. We should be blessing them for painting.

But anyway, you can think of mindfulness as what brings us out of our entrancement, all our stories, out of the reactivity, back to the bare experience. That's our mindfulness practice—to meet this moment, whatever's arising, in a non-preferential, non-judgmental way. The light of awareness doesn't say to only pay attention to what's pleasant or minimally neutral and try to ignore the unpleasant until it's so strong that you can't ignore it anymore.

We don't say that. We also don't say, if it's pleasant or neutral, that's okay, but it's not worth paying attention to. It only matters if it's really suffering, so go right to the suffering and stay there the whole complete sitting. There's nothing else happening but that. We don't say that either.

In other words, it's out of our control. You just sit here, or walk, or eat, and notice what's arising, and notice that it passes. And as much as we can do that—and really, you're doing it a lot in each day of practice—it's not like big fireworks going off. It's just a moment of feeling your foot lift. You might think, "So what? Big deal. What am I getting out of that?" You're being present, for a change, for what's actually happening.

We do that a lot in the day. What happens is the mindfulness gets clearer and brighter, but also more undiscriminating, in that our subtle, unconscious preferences stop running the show. So you begin to notice: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. What do you know? It keeps changing. What do you know? I'm not in control of it. What do you know? Everything keeps changing.

We start to really experience this more and more and more, on many levels. Sometimes it's intellectual. Sometimes it's so cellular it almost bypasses our conscious, mental, verbal understanding. But it's being learned in another way. And sometimes it all comes together at the same time.

As we begin to get it cellularly, impermanence becomes much more obvious. There are times in that obviousness that we see we really do have to open to that sadness, that sense of loss, that poignancy—like in that poem, "as if clinging could save us, being in the pre-trembling of a house that falls." There will be times when we experience that as solid me losing everything, and it's sad. There's loss. There's some aversion in that—we're not quite free in it—but it's okay to feel that. That's part of it.

And I actually think one of our problems with letting ourselves open into impermanence is that this unreliability, this sense of earth tremoring all the time, is generally an unpleasant experience. We don't like to be in this unsettledness. And so we're back in our habit: Unpleasant? Let's just avoid it. Let's go find something that doesn't look like it's changing.

But it's okay to hang out in unpleasant experience. We really learn that freedom, peace, real happiness—the happiness and peace of the Buddha—has nothing to do with pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. It's got nothing to do with things only being pleasant. And really look in yourself. I know when I look in me, when I'm thinking about what freedom would be like, what the unconditioned would be like, what enlightenment would be like—does it include much unpleasant experience? It's got nothing to do with pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. That all just keeps on coming, keeps on going.

If we can just begin to open into that, whether it's poignant or sad or freeing—but when you notice it, rather than hiding, let it be a wake-up call. Oh yeah, touching the edge of change. Great. This is where the letting go of clinging, the heart of non-clinging, can begin to be touched, can begin to become more familiar.

Acceptance of impermanence—it's not gloomy, or like, "Who cares about anything?" That kind of dispassion is a wrong understanding. "Well, everything's changing, so who cares anyway? It's all going to go, why get involved?"

It's not that at all.

When you're not trying to make something stay, it allows us to be so vividly present, to really appreciate this moment. The poignancy lets us really be here because we know it's not going to be the same the next moment. So instead of fighting that or grieving that or shedding tears, it's like, "Oh, this is so beautiful, just as it is now" — and now it's different.

Even the difficulties, because we're so alive in them, so present in them, can take on another context. With my father, when I'm really present in that sadness, in the poignancy of watching someone losing their faculties, when I'm present in it, there's compassion, love, a sense of aliveness. Paradoxically, it's so much sweeter than when I'm trying to make it be different.

And we never know, do we? We never really know what's going to happen next.

It's interesting to notice in your practice ways that you might find yourself assuming permanence. Because we do, don't we? I certainly find myself assuming permanence, and it's interesting to see. Usually when we're assuming permanence, we'll end up in some kind of discomfort or struggle because we're out of harmony with the way things are.

Assuming permanence might be when you find yourself getting frustrated or self-judging or filled with doubt because your practice keeps going up and down. Because you finally had some really good energy and the next day it went away. When you find yourself thinking, "How can I get it back? What did I do wrong? How can I stabilize in this?" When you have a mood filled with gratitude and the next day you wake up just as cranky as ever, and you think, "What happened? I lost it." Pleasant, unpleasant, coming, going — but we posit permanence.

Whenever you assume that what's happening now is going to continue into the next moment, we're assuming permanence. Whenever we look at this retreat and think it should be like the last one, whenever we're comparing to something we've read or experienced or to someone else we see, we're assuming some kind of permanence. Whenever you find yourself looking for perfection — like there's some perfect mindfulness, some perfect way to walk, something that once you get there, that's how it's going to be — forget about it. We're assuming permanence.

Whenever we think we know what's going to happen in the next moment... it's really quite amazing to me, actually, how much does happen as we think it's going to. That's more what's amazing than how much things change. But once we're really getting it, even for a moment, the fact of impermanence — even if the moment is a pretty awful moment — there's a kind of letting go that really wakes us up to the truth. It's just so different from trying to hold on. And we appreciate just the simple things about not knowing what's going to happen.

Maybe some of you have read the book called The Diving Bell and the Butterfly by a French man who was the editor of Elle fashion magazine, a very high-flying guy. When he was about forty-one or forty-two, he got up one day feeling fine, living his life, and had a massive stroke — a cerebral hemorrhage or something. He went into a coma, and when he woke up, he was completely paralyzed except for one eyelid, and his mind was completely clear. It's called locked-in syndrome, where your mind is completely clear and you can't move at all.

He lived like this for about a year and a half before he died. During that time, with the help of a speech therapist, he wrote this book. She would point to the different letters of the French alphabet, and when it would get to the letter he wanted, he would blink the eyelid he could blink, and she'd write it down. He wrote the entire book that way.

It's really a lovely book. I just picked it up last night to look at one quote, and I found myself skimming through the whole thing. He wasn't a spiritual guy, and he didn't have some kind of spiritual transformation. But he's writing from the perspective of someone who got so hit in the face with impermanence that you can't deny it anymore. It's just a series of vignettes of his life — some horrible, some lovely — but reading it is so poignant and so filled with a love of life. I come away from it deeply touched.

The passage I wanted to read is about how being present to simple things really wakes us up. He's talking about letters he receives — people write to him and someone reads them aloud. He says: "Some letters relate the small events that punctuate the passage of time. Roses picked at dusk, the laziness of a rainy Sunday, a child crying himself to sleep. Capturing the moment, these small slices of life, these small gusts of happiness, move me more deeply than anything else."

It just hits me, that sense of total presence. Just this moment. It doesn't matter really what it is — sitting and feeling your bum hurt, drinking a cup of tea, watching my father die. Whatever is happening, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, deeply sorrowful, joyously happy — it's all just part of the show.

begin to open to that, the peace that the Buddha spoke about emerges. When he says he has discovered the true liberation of heart, the peace of non-clinging—the heart, the mind, can let go.

And in that letting go, just of clinging to little things, just in a moment—think of it in a moment, not some whole vastness of life, just in a moment—when the heart lets go of that needing to change or hold on to or manipulate or control things, peace is here. It's always here. It's so simple.

You'll lose it again. That's okay. But just to trust enough to look, to meet this moment and allow the heart to let go. You can't even make it let go. Just by connecting, seeing things the way they are, really getting impermanence, it lets go by itself.

And this, really, in a moment, is the peace the Buddha talked about. Not the peace of some lasting state of mind or heart. Not the peace of some ongoing pleasant experience. But that relationship of non-clinging that allows us to be so fully here without being caught up in being here at all.

CHAPTER 327

Self-Judgment and the First Noble Truth

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines self-judgment as a form of aversion rooted in our fundamental difficulty accepting the First Noble Truth—that dukkha is an inherent part of existence. She distinguishes between dukkha dukkha (the pain of pain), anicca dukkha (the suffering of impermanence), and saṅkhāra dukkha (the dissatisfaction of conditioned existence), focusing particularly on our habitual reactions to life's inevitable difficulties.
>
> Wilson illuminates how our protection systems—whether blame, denial, fear, or self-hatred—actually prevent direct connection with our experience. Drawing from her own struggles with physical illness, she demonstrates how self-judgment creates a veil that keeps us spinning away from the present moment. She shares Sharon Salzberg's insight from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita that awakening happens in stages precisely because we can only open to so much suffering at a time.
>
> The talk offers mettā (loving-kindness) not as a superficial overlay but as a practice that expands perception and gives the heart courage to face what is difficult. Wilson explores how the comparing mind (māna, or conceit) perpetuates separation and exhaustion, suggesting that truly present moments—free from comparison—reveal our fundamental connectedness. Through examples ranging from Oklahoma City bombing survivors meeting Kenyan embassy bombing survivors to Jim Lawson's nonviolent courage during the civil rights movement, she shows how meeting suffering directly can become an avenue into profound human connection rather than isolation.

Tonight I want to talk mostly about the habit of mind some of us share of judging, of self-judging. There may be some of you this doesn't quite apply to, so another talk will apply for you.

Really, self-judging is an aspect of aversion. And to talk about any form of aversion, I feel like the first place we need to start is to explore, to see that—at least as far as I can see so far—at root, our basic problem with aversion is our problem with really deeply understanding the First Noble Truth.

Just a refresher, I'm sure you know: the First Noble Truth is that there is difficulty, suffering. There's the dukkha dukkha, which is the pain of pain—basically what I'll be talking about tonight—that difficult, painful, unpleasant things happen. And there's no judgment of that; that's just the way it is. There's anicca dukkha, the suffering of imper-manence, which I talked a bit about last week. And there's the sankhara dukkha, the dukkha of just the tedious, ongoing nature of day-to-day existence. We're not talking about that tonight.

But I feel the more that I practice, the more that I explore my experience, I start to appreciate the genius in the mind of the Buddha. When he had to succinctly begin his teachings, and he laid them out in this form of the Four Noble Truths, of all the ways he could have expressed it, he starts out by saying: the first fact of life is things are tough sometimes. That's just a fact we need to deeply integrate, understand, and accept.

It's interesting to see how really deeply difficult that is. On the intellectual level, of course, the degree of suffering, of real pain, of cruelty in this world, in this time, in any country you want to choose, including this country, in any past historical time that I've ever read about—the degree and the kinds of suffering, especially the cruelty that people use against other people, is almost unbearable sometimes to even read about, never mind to witness or to experience. And so on that level, it's certainly understandable to me why we have to at some point shut it out, shut down, divert our attention, because we drown.

We get lost in the habitual reactions to suffering—and we can really get lost in them. The habitual ones of fear, of anger, rage, blame directed outwards. Of total denial, disconnection. And directed inwards, the same things: either denial, acute self-blame, acute self-hatred, depression, despair.

Of course, the Buddha wasn't talking about the fact of difficulty in order to drive us into despair. That's why I think sometimes Buddhism from outside gets the impression of being a real downer of a spiritual path. People hear: the first thing, life is suffering. You can't want anything. Wanting things is suffering. You can't have beauty. There's no self. And people say, thank you very much, I think I'll go somewhere else.

I remember Sharon telling me once that in one of her interviews with Sayadaw U Pandita, Sharon was having a maha dukkha retreat, you could say. We all have those periods, and some retreats are more that way than others. Some periods are more that way than others. If you're in one now, it doesn't mean it'll stay that way. But anyway, she went in to him and said—you know how in the Theravada way of talking about awakening, there are four stages, four classical stages, and at each stage we awaken a bit more and let go of a few more of our confusions, our kilesas, see through them—she said to Sayadaw, "Is it true that the reason there are these different stages is because we can only open to so much suffering at a time? You can't just do it all at once." And he said yes, he really thought that was true, that this was an aspect of it: to open, to integrate.

That's what's so beautiful—it's a weird word but it's true—that when we begin to be able to meet the pain, the suffering, and it can be huge ones in the world, but let's start with the little ones we go through here. When we can meet them head on, we see that dukkha—and I'll use that word because "suffering" is a little too gross somehow—we often experience dukkha as a separation, either something to get away from, something there's too much to bear. Or if it's our own suffering, often we can feel a bit alienated, almost embarrassed. Or else another kind of aversion, which is poor me, poor me, but it's still a separating kind of experience.

What's actually true, when we're with it rather than pushing it away, is that dukkha is actually one of our unifying experiences as human beings together on this planet. Instead of experiencing it as something negative—I mean, we're never going to say, great, I love it, I'm not saying that—but instead of experiencing it as something that shouldn't be happening, that if we could get it right we could get rid of, we can see that when we actually open in a moment to things as they are, and that moment's difficult, we touch in a very profound way our unity with all other human beings. It is quite ennobling. It really opens us to a much deeper, richer connection with life.

I heard a talk by Ajahn Sumedho on tape recently where he was talking about this, how dukkha is really what unifies us rather than something we should hate and push away. He said in Thailand, where he was a monk for many years, often when Thai abbots would begin a dhamma talk to the lay people who would come to the monasteries to hear talks, instead of saying "Good evening, ladies and gentlemen," they would start by saying, "Dear brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death."

Kind of levels it, doesn't it? We are brothers and sisters, and it cuts through our differences.

I read an article in a newspaper, just as a human example of this. I remember the bombing in Oklahoma City—I don't know, five years ago or something. And then maybe two or three years later, there was a bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kenya. In both of those bombings a lot of people were killed and a lot of people were wounded, and also wounded maybe not physically but because people they loved were killed. Sometime in the last year, some of the people who had suffered from the bombing in Oklahoma City—I don't know who organized this—but some of these people from Oklahoma were flown to Kenya to meet with some of the people who had suffered in the bombing in Kenya. This article was just talking to two or three people from Oklahoma.

They struck me as very Oklahoman—this is from an East Coast person who actually hardly knows where Oklahoma is. But the people were saying that at first their expectations were that this meeting would be kind of strange and weird. They were thinking, you know, our cultures are so different. What do we have in common with people from Kenya? It's going to be really awkward. It's going to be really strange.

But when they got together and began to talk, and they started to share their experience, it became so quickly apparent that they were going through just the same thing. The sense of difference was almost obliterated. The underlying sharing of experience through the pain led to a great sense of connectedness, appreciation of each other, openness to one another. The Oklahoma people could say, "Oh yeah, what you're going through now, that's just what we went through two years after the bombing. And now it's five years later, and now it's sort of like this." And the people from Kenya could listen and understand, because there was really this connectedness of common experience.

When we are able—and of course we're not always able—to actually touch the truth of our own experience when it's difficult, so often it brings us into a wider view of ourselves, of life, of humanity. It brings out the heart of compassion, the heart of connectedness. Really, connectedness in our pain, our difficulty, rather than highlighting the differences. We experience the underlying connectedness, and it changes our relationship to ourselves and to life.

I know in my heart that I'm fearful of pain, of loss, of suffering—the big ones, but also the little ones. How often it's new treat! I do all kinds of things not to feel the anticipated pain of my knee hurting, or what if, God forbid, I get a little hungry later in the day—I better have three helpings now. The pain can be huge or it can be small, but I see how much of my life can be built around trying to keep that away.

It's interesting that this can be so much our habit, because I know for myself—and I do feel this is true—that somewhere in us, as much as we have the habit or tendency to regard difficulty as always bad or wrong, and somehow our fault if it's anything personal, when I look over my life, over my readings, at the people who have most deeply inspired me and continue to inspire me, they don't have to be people I know personally—they can be, or people I've read about—it's almost always people who have somehow had the ability to hold their hearts open in the midst of great suffering. Whether it's their personal suffering, or they happen to be historical figures who are somehow caught up in the suffering of a particular time or age.

This ability to bear witness with a greatness of heart doesn't mean always open. We don't go right away to thinking we all have to be Gandhi or something. But to be able to somehow bear witness, and the greatness of heart is that you don't completely drown in it, but can still see—in fact, even more so—the basic goodness of our human heart, of our human spirit.

I remember there was a couple of years where I voraciously read everything Alexander Solzhenitsyn wrote about his time in the Gulag, or life in the Gulag. As I look back, I can see—well, even then I could see—it was horrific. I mean, horrific stuff. But somehow within what he wrote, in his experiences, there would emerge a sense of love and appreciation of humanity, an ability to recognize individual acts of goodness within just horror.

When I've read about Aung San Suu Kyi, when I've read a lot about Reverend Martin Luther King—who seems to me like one of the spiritual heroes of the age—the ability to make the choice to meet really unbearable suffering, violence, hatred, and make the choice, as I already said, that we can never let hatred become our motive. "I refuse to become bitter." It's a choice, you know. That choice is so powerful.

And not to let our hearts fall into the habit of saying, "Well, okay, he was really special. He could do that. I can't do that. Forget about it. I'm hopeless." We're all sharing the same human tendencies, and a lot of what I feel our practice can do is open up to us an understanding of the ways we get lost in our fear of suffering, or our reaction to suffering, or our going after desire—and using the small examples to see that there's really another possibility. That wanting to be present, to be alive in the midst of life, becomes more compelling than our habit or our need to deny.

I know for myself, I see this over and over, and then I forget. Well, we've talked about that before, but it keeps happening. Whenever I start to notice—it's probably been going on for a while before I notice it—that I'm feeling really disconnected, ill at ease, shut off from my heart, shut off from the world, or people will tell me beautiful things or suffering things and I can say the right words but in my heart I don't feel connected—that state. Almost always, every time I can remember, when I stop and look at my experience, there's some unpleasant thing that I'm trying to avoid. It could be something really difficult, like last year my sister was suffering a lot and it was really hard to be there and feel it. Or it could be something mundane, like I said, like a pain in the knee. But the dynamic's the same, in that trying to avoid it, the heart's closed. I'm shut off to life. I'm shut off to connection. It's like I'm living on the surface.

And when I feel, "Oh, that's what's going on—enormous sadness"—it's weird, but it's more connected again. It's more alive. The world feels whole once more.

In our practice here, what we are meeting day after day—we're meeting joys too. Because I'm talking about the First Noble Truth and our habit of judging, I just don't want to forget that that's only part of our experience. There's also plenty of experience that's pleasant, that's beautiful, that's peaceful, and that's also important to recognize.

Just as we don't want to completely avoid the way it is, which is sometimes painful and difficult, we don't want to get so fixated on "everything's painful" that if you happen to be having some calm days or some peaceful sittings or things are going well, you think something's wrong. That also arises in experience. Really, more often than you think, people will come in and say, "Well, you know, I'm not really suffering enough. I guess I'm not really getting anything from this. I'm not really learning anything." So this is just one side of the picture.

In practice here, in a thousand small ways and sometimes in big ways, we're discovering—we're being brought face to face with the whole range of this First Noble Truth. Unpleasant sensations, perhaps. Deep pain from our childhood. Really strong patterns of how we relate. Maybe physical illness or limitations. The whole range. I don't have to enumerate them all. We each have our own.

And what we discover is that in little ways, we can see how just opening to what is becomes an avenue into connection with humanity. I'll give a small example. It may sound a bit trite or too easy, but please don't discount it for that reason, because I think it truly is an avenue in.

One woman was telling me once—a woman who had spent lots and lots of time in India. She said she was on retreat here, taking the eight precepts, and in the evenings was experiencing some hunger. She said, "I'm not starving to death here. In fact, it's not even hunger with fear around it. I know I'm going to get food the next day. But just the willingness to actually feel it—I guess it was the first time in her life she really let herself feel it." She said, "In just a little way, it kind of opened me up to think: Wow, all that time I was in India, I might have been with people who were really hungry, who couldn't know for sure they'd have another meal. And I couldn't really be there with that. I couldn't even really let it in."

So just in a small way, being with how things are can be a gift to connection.

Now, on the other side—because we are again, a thousand times a day, having this wonderful opportunity to open into difficulty and connection with all beings—there's the odd, you know, once or twice when we don't jump at that opportunity. And in fact, what we encounter is the whole range of our—I would say more or less unconscious—protection system, our denial system. All the ways that the mind has habituated itself, sometimes for survival, not to really let in the pain of what's happening.

I do want to say again: sometimes there's too much pain happening to ourselves or in another, and we really can't let it in. We would just drown. I actually think our protection systems have sometimes served us. That's their purpose—we don't need to hate our protection systems. But we need to recognize them. We need to get to know them.

All the habits of mind that come up—sometimes, as many of you have said, even before the knee starts to hurt, the mind has already gone into full gear, strategizing how to avoid it. Even before the food runs out. In fact, it's only eleven o'clock. Lunch hasn't even been served yet, and the mind has already gone into all its ways to make sure I get enough. You know what I mean?

On the aversive side, of course, there's blame, anger, rage, fear, the two-year-old tantrum mind—which gets to be funny after a while, which helps. And ill will, and turned inward: judgment, self-judgment, a sense of worthlessness or self-hatred.

Desire, of course, is also a protection system of choice. We talk about that a lot as well. I'm just not focusing on it tonight, but it's an equally effective way to avoid being with how things are.

As our protection systems become more visible—and probably we're all getting quite familiar with our particular patterns as the retreat goes on, as our practice deepens—mindfulness becomes undiscriminating. That's really one of the beauties of choiceless awareness. It simply allows awareness to notice whatever's happening. And since we stop unconsciously directing it so much, the things we haven't really seen clearly begin to pop up more and more, and we get to meet them. We get to make friends with them. First we get to meet them.

One of these is the protection system—what the mind does in reaction to pain. Sometimes, of course, that's a little wearing. We get really tired of seeing our mind in judgment. We get really sick of watching the mind run off in desire.

We start to think, "I'm much more neurotic than when I started. I'm just getting more hateful, more desiring." But really it's because we're more mindful and we're seeing what often hasn't been quite noticed before.

And if you can look at it that way—I don't know if Joseph has said this yet, he says it a lot—that when he actually sees a kilesa in his mind, it makes him happy because he'd rather see it than not see it. That's really true, you know, because when we see it, we're not being driven by it so much anymore.

Self-judging is one of the strong habits we have when we begin to encounter experiences in ourselves that are in some way unacceptable, that are really painful. This is why I was talking about the first noble truth. If just the fact of suffering in the world is unacceptable—I don't mean unacceptable in terms of thinking we should never do anything about it, or we should never act for compassion. Of course, whenever we can, we will. But I mean unacceptable in terms of pretending it's not even happening, or believing that if we could figure it all out and have the perfect world then it would never happen anymore.

And I see how for me the mind can get into this perfection ideal. Then when in my own experience something imperfect arises that I can't control, that I can't change, it somehow becomes my fault. And what turns inward is a kind of self-hatred, a kind of self-judgment.

It's interesting to me, anyway, just to look at that tendency of my mind to like to have everything kind of neatly delineated in little boxes. It is sort of a perfection ideal. Somebody's a saint—they're all good, the perfect person, all open to suffering, noble heart. And then if you hear anything bad about them, you don't know what to do with that. It doesn't work. Or else someone becomes all bad. How can they be good and how can they be bad? The mind just wants these nice little boxes.

This popped in my head this morning in the sitting. I hadn't thought about this for years, but when I was a kid, like eleven or twelve, I used to read about people that would go into really suffering environments and try to help. Somehow I stumbled on these books by an American physician—his name was Dr. Tom Dooley, I think. He had gone to Vietnam in the fifties, and Laos, and started all these clinics. His books were a little self-congratulatory as I remember, but about all the things he was doing to help people, and I was quite inspired when I was young.

Then in the late sixties, early seventies, I found out that he was actually a CIA agent. So that's why he was in those places. And I thought back, yeah, Vietnam in the fifties, Laos—that makes sense. And of course at that time, CIA agent in my mind meant everything that was unwholesome. I couldn't put those two together. So from being this hero, he went into—you know, totally wiped out, forget him.

When it popped in my mind today, I thought, that's so perfect. Because he still did do all that stuff. He still did go and start those clinics and do a lot of good for people. And he was a CIA agent. What can my mind do with that? It's just so perfect because I see how we do that to ourselves.

When we're having a good sitting or whatever, we're great, we're wonderful. Then we see the selfishness come out, or we get really greedy, or everything goes to heck and you can't be mindful for two minutes. All the other wholesome stuff is just blotted out, and we become this one painful, useless piece of experience. That's who we are, right?

More than one person has told me, when we say at the beginning of metta, "Think of something wholesome about yourself"—it's painful. They know it's not true, but they can't think of one thing. It's painful, isn't it? But that's our mental states—it's all good or it's all bad.

When we don't have a balanced perception, when we're experiencing the difficulty in our own experience that we somehow think we ought to be able to fix, or it's my fault—whether it's our personality patterns, whether it's behavior that we feel like we can't control, whether it's the body getting sick or being tired or being sleepy, whether it's memories of past actions that we really feel regret and remorse about, or you can fill in the blanks in your own experience—that response to that in the moment of aversion is like pushing it away, flinching away. It's so quick.

The function of aversion in the mind stream is that in a moment of something unpleasant, aversion pulls back from it and disconnects. Whether it's fear, whether it's anger, whatever it is, it disconnects. And so in that disconnection, there can't be a clear seeing, a clear experiencing of whatever's happening.

And instead, what takes over is either desire for something else, or in this case, a kind of turning back on oneself—self-judgment.

And oddly enough, you know how when you're spinning in hating yourself or self-judgment, you can't think of one good thing or one good thought you ever had in your life. Oddly enough, the self-judgment, which is generally so much more suffering than just feeling the darn thing in the first place, acts as a protection system. It keeps us spinning in it, but it actually keeps the mind away from just connecting directly with what's happening—which is, of course, where the sense of peace, the understanding of truth lies.

But when we can't connect, when we believe the self-judgment, identify with it, keep spinning in it, then the whole cycle just keeps going and going and going, doesn't it? And it becomes a veil through which every experience, for the rest of the time it's going, gets seen through.

There's a line from Carl Jung that the parts of ourselves that we do not accept will become hostile to us. It's a way we're becoming hostile to ourselves. And really, the simplicity of direct connection is the first line, I would say, in our mindfulness practice of moving out of believing the self-judgment and into the reality of how it is—the facts of life—which leads us into peace, into connectedness.

It's not always easy. I'll give an example.

Some years ago, when I was going through the onset of a particular physical condition, the body was getting more painful, symptoms were increasing, and there was also the sense of not knowing what it was or where it might go. So of course the mind gets caught up in wanting to know and getting fearful. But what was more interesting was seeing how the mind went into a whole kind of self-blame about it.

Part of it was the new age spiritual thing that if you really are spiritual and think the right thoughts, you won't get sick. I thought I was above that, but I guess I wasn't. So that was another way to judge myself because my body wasn't in good shape. And also a sense of judgment that the body was betraying me. And the mind was betraying me as well, because the mind should have kept the thing together, and in fact it didn't. It was much more weak-minded than I thought it should be.

It was an interesting cycle—now it's interesting; it wasn't so interesting then—a kind of downward spiral. And what I saw later, I'm telling you from hindsight to make my point, is that what kept the spiral of self-judgment and aversion, anger towards my body, going was the lack of direct awareness, direct connection to the actual physical experience itself.

What I saw after I softened into it was why that was. As soon as my awareness would touch, say, the stiffness in my hips or the pain somewhere in my body, it wasn't that the pain was so strong I couldn't be with it. It wasn't that kind of pain. It was that the unpleasantness of it would immediately serve as proof of the self-judgment, of the sense of failure. I failed. My body's sick. I failed as a spiritual person. And that sense of failure, actually, was harder to be with than the physical sensation. But from the physical sensation, the mind would bounce off—like when you throw water on a hot skillet, just jumping off—and then the whole spiral of self-judgment would start going.

What helped me see through it was, of course, mindfulness practice, where eventually you notice—duh—that's what's going on. But also mettā. And I'll talk a little bit in a moment about how mettā can really help our awareness open into what's happening when it's a little too strong, when the whole experience is a little too strong for simple direct connection.

I realized at that time it was like I was walking around a few inches away from my body all the time, until I finally connected with it. And of course, lo and behold, when there was just a simple sinking into—with mettā I actually turned a kind awareness onto the body itself, stopped identifying with it as a betrayer, as me, and just turned mettā and compassion onto the sensations of the body itself. It really was like that. It was like holding a little baby and saying, "Oh, oh, you're really suffering. Why am I so mad at you? You poor thing, you're really in pain here."

And that allowed a deeper direct connection of awareness. Out of that, what actually happened was—it's not the surrender of "oh well, I'll lie down and give up, whatever happens happens." Out of that comes a clear seeing that allows us to respond in a much more appropriate manner. Whereas before the clear seeing, the direct connection, my response was out of either fear or denial. For instance, people would say, "Go live in Arizona because the cold makes it worse." I'd think, "Yeah, I'll go live in Arizona. It's 120 in the summer, and I'll never have to feel any of this anymore." Totally out of fear and denial.

And once I could just be with what was happening, it's like, okay, I can be with what's happening—and what's really important to do? And one can make choices from the bigger picture. The perception gets balanced again, instead of just being on "let me do anything not to feel this, not to know this is happening."

So I'll talk about how mettā can help with that in a moment.

But to bring this sense of judging, of self-judging as a way of denying, into our practice here: over time, ask yourself as you go through the days—what particular aspect of my experience, today, yesterday, tomorrow, when you notice the sense of struggle—what particular aspect of my experience is not okay? Can I not accept? Do I find myself in real judging, discrimination, saying this particular piece has to go? The first noble truth applies, I understand it, but in this case, no.

This isn't the first noble truth, this is me blowing it big time, and I've got to get back to where it's always pleasant. Just noticing that pattern is really helpful, because once we notice it, we can often make the counterintuitive move. Instead of moving away and saying, "Yes, this does have to change, how can I fix it?" we can make the counterintuitive move of asking, "Well, actually, what is this experience? What's happening?"

A friend of mine generously gave me this image from her life, and I've used it a lot because it's so apt. She describes being in Hawaii with her sons in the surf, where the waves can be really, really big. She said she knows, and her sons would always tell her, that when a wave is getting really big and you know you can't ride it, the thing to do is turn around and dive right into it. Then you just harmlessly go under it. She said that as much as she knew that, she could hardly ever do it. She'd know it intellectually, but then she'd turn around and run like heck, and the wave would just clobber her.

What our practice leads us to do is this: when you notice that impulse—"Let me out of here, this is wrong"—turn around and dive in, just to see what is actually happening right now. Whether it's a painful sensation, whether it's the self-judgment itself, whether it's a feeling of anger, whether it's a feeling of loneliness, whatever it might be. Dive in, not to fix it, just to meet the truth in this moment. And often, under that wave, there's a lot of peace. Sometimes it's a little bumpy. Sometimes we don't quite make it under. Sometimes it really jostles us up a little bit. But it's almost always better than turning our back to it and running. It almost always clobbers us unless we're really fast.

Mark Epstein says, "It is our fear of experiencing ourselves directly that creates our suffering." It keeps us suffering. When we do experience ourselves directly, well, it's just how it is. Things are just how they are. We don't have to fight it, we don't have to fix it, but we can see clearly how to respond in a more helpful, compassionate manner.

So, metta. As we know, there are times when that wave is so big and we turn around and look at it, and there is just no way we can dive underneath it. Maybe it's too close, maybe it's too high, maybe we forgot how to dive in that moment. Whatever it is, there's just no way. So I don't want you to take what I've said and then increase self-judgment by thinking, "Oh, here's self-judgment. That means there's something going on I'm not accepting. I can't be with it. So that's a further reason for self-judgment." Believe me, I'm one of the many experts in this room on self-judgment, and it can just go into an endless spiral—judging the judging the judging the judging—instead of simply seeing it as a filter.

There are times when it's too much, when we're too tired, when direct connection just isn't possible. For a while when I was sick, I just couldn't even really see what was going on. I didn't even know what to directly connect with sometimes. It's just a big morass and you can't quite tell. I found that at those times, the practice of metta, or compassion—I'll speak of metta, though compassion is very similar since we've been practicing it here—can be enormously helpful.

Sometimes we think of metta in a kind of superficial way. Say, for example, we're hating ourselves or we're really angry at someone else. We think, "Oh, I'll do metta for them." And as we know, that's not what I'm talking about. "Metta, metta, I hate your guts, may you be happy." We're just trying to pretend we feel something other than we do. It's a genuine attempt, but it doesn't really work when we do that. I don't mean metta as an avoidance or an end run. Rather, it's a willingness to be present with suffering. Generally, when we're in self-doubt or anger or really suffering, the best place to practice metta is towards ourselves, because who's suffering? There's one person here who's really suffering for sure that we know about, and that's a good place to start.

It's really interesting. As I said, for aversion, metta is often given as the antidote. But it's not as straightforward as it might seem. I have this mind that likes everything in nice little boxes. So, you're feeling down on yourself, you're judging yourself, so do some metta and then everything's fine, you feel loving. It's not like that. It didn't work like that at all for me. But what happened was much more profound in a more simple kind of way. What metta can do over time—the practice of just bringing kind, loving wishes to ourselves—is begin to balance out the perception.

So again, a kind of superficial sense one might have – I know I had from a distance – is, well, with metta you're deliberately tuning in to the beautiful aspects of someone. And we say, do it in the easy way. So you tune into what's good, you ignore the person's faults, and you just wish them well, and it's a kind of goody-goody, blind kind of practice. Which of course it's not.

And what happens with loving-kindness – I'm sure many or all of you have seen this for yourself – is that in the moment of the metta, just the simple friendliness, I'm not talking about gushing senses of unitive love every minute. I'm just talking about metta as connection, as simple friendliness, as simple openness. It's not always so intense. In a moment of metta, it's actually not one-sided or blind in the perception at all. It expands and includes the whole picture in a way that aversion or self-judging never can.

So, for example, back with my body and my mind spinning about it, when I began to just meet it with metta, the whole picture became much more clear. That's when I saw the pain of the body and the pain of the mind, because in the metta there's no judging. It's a softening of vastness that holds the whole thing in a field of kindness, in a field of undiscriminating connection. So I would see the whole picture – my body, my mind reacting, the pain in the mind – and just a sense of basic goodness and clear intention beyond that, that makes it much easier. It actually gives our heart the courage to directly face what is difficult, because what is difficult is not the whole picture anymore. It's embedded more in the vastness of the human mind and heart. It's held in really our basic goodness, which in my experience is ultimately what is true and what is vast.

The self-judging, the aversion – it comes out of delusion. The delusion that we are separate beings. The delusion that somehow we can keep ourselves separate from this unpleasant experience. And that aversion, that pushing away, that self-judging, perpetuates the delusion. Metta just dissolves it. Because in metta, the sense of separation – whether I'm separating this part of me from that part of me, or me from you, or someone who's being really awful in their behavior from me who doesn't try to be so awful – metta just dissolves those separations and gives the heart and mind the courage to directly connect in the midst of it.

And we don't have to look for such grandness when we're doing metta either. That's also what's nice. We just simply wish ourselves or the other each phrase without reaching for some kind of grand courage. And it comes. It comes. The strength of metta is the strength of truth, of the vastness of our connectedness, of non-separation.

Well, this story really inspires me. It's a little long, but it really inspires me. It's about a person's courage acting from the strength of love in the face of real hatred and violence, and the power of that love and courage.

This is from a book called The Children by David Halberstam, and he's talking about a man who, everything I've read about him, sounds like really another spiritual hero. His name is Jim Lawson. The story is about Nashville in 1960 – and if you remember, some of us were just little kids then, and maybe some of us weren't born then – but in Nashville in 1960, when the sit-ins at the lunch counters were starting, right in the early days of the civil rights movement in this country. Jim Lawson was teaching the nonviolent workshops to all the college students who were actually the ones marching in the sit-ins, which became violent after some time.

A little synopsis of Jim Lawson: he was a Christian and very deeply committed to nonviolence his whole life, to the point that during the Korean War he went to jail as a conscientious objector because he was so strongly committed to nonviolence. He was also very inspired by Gandhi and at one point had gone to India for three years with his church, partly so that he could study Gandhi's ways. So he brought that with him and was teaching these nonviolent workshops. That is what was really fortifying the love and the courage of these young kids, really, who were marching in these demonstrations.

So this was one of the first demonstrations. I'll just read this description by Bernard Lafayette, who was one of the young students in the demonstration. They were marching in one of the early days, and at the end of the line Bernard Lafayette was marching with another man, Solomon Gort, right at the end of the line. A couple of young white toughs came and knocked Solomon down and started kicking them. Bernard saw this as his first chance to really try his nonviolent commitment, so he threw himself on top of his friend to distract the toughs, which he did, so the toughs started beating on him.

At this point, Jim Lawson walked over. He did not rush over like going to an accident. Instead, he walked over very calmly, as if to a long-standing appointment. Lawson's arrival shifted the attention of the toughs from Gort and Lafayette to Lawson. "The thing about Jim," Bernard remembered, "was that he was so utterly self-assured, so confident, as if he were accustomed to dealing with toughs beating up fallen demonstrators every day of his life."

The leader of the toughs was wearing what was the prevailing uniform of the day – black leather jacket, black pants, and the haircut they called a duck's ass. When he saw Lawson, he was enraged by Lawson's coolness, and he spat at him. Lawson looked at him and asked him for a handkerchief.

The man, stunned, reached into his pocket and handed Lawson a handkerchief. Lawson wiped the spit off himself as calmly as he could. Then he looked at the man's jacket and started talking to him. Did he have a motorcycle or a hot rod car? A motorcycle was the answer. Jim asked a technical question or two, and the young man started explaining what he had done to customize his bike.

Amazingly, Bernard thought, these two men were now talking about the levels of horsepower in motorcycles. A few seconds earlier, they had seemed to be sworn enemies, ready to maul each other. By this time, both Solomon and Bernard were back up on their feet, the line was moving, and Jim and the young man were still talking about the man's motorcycle. In that brief, frightening moment, Jim had managed to find a subject they both shared and had used it in a way that made each of them more human in the eyes of the other.

As they walked away, Jim waved to the man, and the man remained still—neither accepting the friendship nor, for that matter, rejecting it. It had been a marvelous example of Christian love for Bernard.

That's a powerful example. But we can bring that same quality of courage into our own lives. We don't have to compare ourselves and think, "Well, I'm not that good," as I said before. We can bring that quality of willingness to humanize our own self when we're judging, when we think we're useless, when we think we're worthless, when we can't abide what's happening.

There's one other point I want to address, and I mentioned this earlier: comparing. One thing we see in judging, as in all aversion, is that it stems from ignorance—because we're trying to pretend that what's happening really isn't happening. We don't want to know the truth of it, and this perpetuates that ignorance. The underlying source of all our ignorance is that sense of separate self, of separation—the feeling that somehow I am a being isolated from everything else.

What really keeps that going, and it's a very subtle, deeply ingrained habit of mind, is the habit of comparing. I don't know if any of you have noticed the mind comparing from time to time. The word in Pali is mana, often translated as conceit—which is nothing to get down on ourselves about, because it's one of the most deeply ingrained and subtle patterns of mind. This comparing with anything: they're better than me, they're worse than me, they're the same as me. Even "they're the same as me." It's endless. Have you noticed how totally exhausting it is?

What's really interesting about it is how completely self-referencing it is. Everything that happens, everything anybody does, in comparing mode is experienced as how it affects me. What does it say about me? It's me, me, me—the center of the universe. In fact, we see that judging and self-referencing, even when we're down on ourselves, is a huge ego trip, because we become the center of the world.

This is a little uncouth, but it's so perfect that I have to use it. Yvonne Rand once made the statement that when we're in this mode, each of us thinks we're the little piece of shit that the whole world revolves around. That's really it, in the comparing and judging mind, right? It captures both sides so perfectly.

Just notice how we compare to everybody walking by. We compare to our past experience. We compare to something we've read. We compare to some idea we completely made up, but we think that's what's supposed to be happening. We compare to the imagined experiences of others. How often do you see someone sitting there, make up what's happening for them, compare yourself, and start feeling horrible? It's really quite endless—and so painful.

So you might just begin to notice this comparing. Just notice it. I didn't say judge it. Just notice it. Notice the state of mind it comes out of. Notice the effect of it, the experience it engenders—that kind of me-centered exhaustion, the self-referencing.

Often it arises with seeing. Not always, but a really good place to explore is to bring your awareness to seeing. For example, it's good dining room practice. When you're walking into the dining room—which is, you know, judgment city, maybe not for everybody, but it can just open the floodgates sometimes. Or walking practice can do it too, if you're walking in a room with many other people. If you simply bring your awareness to seeing, you notice how all that's happening is form and color going by.

"Wow, they really look focused. What the heck have I been doing all this time?" And then the next person walks by with hardly any food on their plate. "Oh my God, they are such a renunciate and I'm such a slob." And then the next person comes by and clatters their plates down and makes a heck of a racket, and you think, "Well, forget them. What have they been doing for five weeks? I've really got it together here."

Instead of going with all of that—it helps to laugh at it, though. I mean, a lot of times in my practice, I'm going around in my mind, letting it really say that, and just laugh. You know, just don't take it personally. Just laugh. It helps.

But come to seeing, and notice the difference between going out through the eye door all the time and just being there—seeing, seeing, seeing, seeing. You know, just back and forth, back and forth. It can be quite instructive and entertaining. Try it at your next meal.

And notice how when we're caught in comparing, it's as if—at least this is how it is for me—as if I think somehow I could compare myself into happiness. You know? That I can finally compare myself to the top of the pile, be the best around, and then everything's going to be okay. I guess I'm not totally alone in that. Until, you know, a new yogi comes who's better. Or you think you're doing good and then you go out and read about Milarepa, and you go, "Well, forget about it. I can't even start."

Instead of seeing that it doesn't make any difference. That comparing is completely deluded, senseless, and it doesn't have any bearing on reality. It just doesn't make any difference.

So just to end now, I'll simply say: remember, or notice when it happens again, a time when you're really present and there's no comparing whatsoever. It's kind of a timeless moment because there's no past or future. You're not thinking about how it was in the past or how it should be in the future. You're not reaching out to what's going on with somebody else. There's no looking outward for self-verification, for self-justification, for a sense of being anything. In fact, there's not much sense of self at all. There's just things as they are, whatever it is.

That moment—really these timeless, pristine moments—that's the direction of the peace of heart. That's really the direction of our connectedness. Not sitting there thinking, "I feel so connected to all beings." Just that timeless moment of no separation being created. Then the vastness of the truth of things, the awareness of our connectedness, can reveal itself.

I want to end with this poem, more because it gives me the feeling of what I'm saying than the actual words, by Wendell Berry:

When despair for the world grows in me and I awake in the night at the least sound in fear of what my life and my children's lives may be, I go and lie down where the wood drake rests in his beauty on the water and the great heron feeds. I come into the peace of wild things who do not tax their lives with forethought of grief. I come into the presence of still water, and I feel above me the day-blind stars waiting with their light. For a time, I rest in the grace of the world and am free.

Let's just sit quietly for a minute.

CHAPTER 328

Wise Attention (Yoniso Manasikāra)

Carol Wilson · 1h07

> In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the Buddha's teaching on yoniso manasikāra (wise attention), which the Buddha described as the single most important internal factor for spiritual development. She explains that wise attention means understanding what is fit for attention—that which reduces craving, becoming, and ignorance—versus what increases these tendencies when we dwell upon it.
>
> Wilson presents a practical framework of the three vattas (rounds of saṃsāra): transgression (unskillful speech and action), obsession (repetitive thoughts), and the latent level (dormant tendencies). She explores how sīla protects us at the first level, samādhi at the second, and paññā at the most subtle level. The talk examines how the five hindrances strengthen through unwise attention—sense desire through focusing on gratification, aversion through dwelling on repugnance, and doubt through speculation on dubious matters.
> The teaching unfolds through six methods the Buddha taught for abandoning unwholesome tendencies: seeing (basic mindfulness practice), restraining (guarding the sense doors), wise use of requisites (relating skillfully to necessities), patient endurance (cultivating the vast mind of equanimity), avoiding (renouncing what doesn't support awakening), and removing (redirecting attention when overwhelmed). Wilson emphasizes that yoniso manasikāra—literally 'womb-like nurturing action of mind'—involves directing awareness in ways that protect us from suffering, always with the quality of mettā rather than aversion.

Sometimes I know when I'm deep in practice and getting very involved in how the practice is going—the different techniques and the subtleties of the meditation—it can be easy to forget that even the intensive depth of meditation itself is only a tool, one of many tools, to enable our heart and mind to open to the liberation of heart and mind through non-clinging. In other words, the meditation isn't an end in itself. Hopefully we're not here only to become ace meditators, which may or may not happen. It's not in the Olympics yet as an event. We're here to bring all the conditions together to allow our hearts and minds to open to truth.

Of course the meditation is our most powerful and useful tool, but even here the work is happening on many levels in all of the things that we do throughout the day. Our journey of awakening is not a linear process on a scale, going up, up, up until it reaches some point of peak experience and that's it. It's really a constant balancing act—expansion, contraction, falling out of balance, coming back into balance. But the balance is balancing the awareness, balancing the state of our attention, of our mind and heart, so that it's exquisitely, delicately balanced, vividly awake, present, no holding back, yet at the same time not involved in any to-ing and fro-ing, any pushing and pulling, any manipulating. This delicate balance.

What I want to talk about tonight is a particular factor—it's a mental factor, a particular aspect of our experience. It's a factor that the Buddha spoke about a lot that's extremely useful, I find, and interesting to be aware of. It helps us look at all different aspects of our experience with an eye of awakening, with how to pay attention in order to awaken, how to use the experience. This aspect is called wise attention. That's the usual translation. Sometimes I've seen it translated as appropriate attention.

To give an example of one conceptual framework showing the different levels and how the way we pay attention in different areas of our experience can serve to awaken us, there's one called the three vattas, or the three rounds of saṃsāra. You thought there was only one round of saṃsāra, but in this framework there are three. I find it interesting.

The first round is that of deeds or speech. When we are not mindful—and in all of these, of course, mindfulness is always our protection—but in this first round, it's called the round of transgression. When we're unmindful and some of the torments of mind spring up—greed, hatred, confusion—in this round it's called transgression because we actually speak or act out of that unmindfulness in an unwholesome or harmful way.

To give a simple example: you go to your walking meditation spot, and everyone knows it's your walking meditation spot, but somebody got there before you. They had the nerve—after three weeks they took it. In the round of transgression, without mindfulness, we'd actually say or do something. We're protected from this by sīla. Have there been times when you can just thank the Lord for having taken the precept of noble silence? That's the thing that keeps our mouth shut. That's nothing to sneer at. That's really useful. So that's on the level of transgression.

The second, more subtle level is called the obsessive level, which we're probably also quite familiar with from time to time. This is on the level of thoughts. You go to the walking place, the person's there. It doesn't even occur to you that you're going to say or do something, but the mind just picks at that and worries at that and gets lost in thoughts of revenge and what you're going to do, how you have to write a note. When you find yourself writing a note to the staff about twenty-five times in your mind, there's a good chance you're hanging out at this level in that moment.

That's actually how I check myself for yogi mind when I'm on retreat. I find myself thinking, "Well, the cooks just really need to know this. It's for the benefit of all beings. It's not for me. I only care about the other yogis—for myself, it doesn't matter." And I just watch. If that comes up for three days running, I go, "Uh-huh." Never write the note right away. That's my advice. Because they can read your handwriting, even if you don't sign it. They know who it's from.

On this level of obsession—the repetitive, compulsive thought—it's said that samādhi, concentration, protects us. And you can see that. As the mind gets more focused, we're not as liable to get so sucked in to these obsessive thoughts. They may come up, but it's easier to come back to the breath or to the changing objects, and the obsession doesn't take hold. That's our protection.

And then the most subtle level is called the latent level.

And this is the one that I think can give rise at times to a sense of discouragement if we're not quite paying attention.

Now this is the level where the mind can be really quite focused. The greed or the hatred, the confusion isn't really coming up, but there just needs to be a little space where the conditions come together that would allow that to arise. And if there's that tendency, sort of like a seed resting in the mind stream, well then given the conditions, it could sprout.

So again, taking the example of the walking: you're going to your walking place, you're really quite mindful, you're not in obsessive thoughts. And if you stayed really present, you'd notice the person there, you'd just say okay and walk away. You may have done that and really seen that it was no effort, that was just how it happened. And another day you go, just as mindful, but just when you get there you get a little bit distracted by something, and whoosh—in rushes desire or aversion or confusion.

Quite a few people have been reporting something like this in interviews. As I say, it can seem discouraging because you think, "I'm so present and I just have one little pleasant thought that I don't pay much attention to, and the next thing I know I'm in some incredible fantasy—making up dinner parties and building houses and constructing retreat centers, or whatever your fantasy is. How did I get there? My practice was really good."

And it is. It's just that it doesn't take much space for these underlying tendencies to shoot up. Don't be discouraged by this. It's just kind of interesting to see it. It doesn't mean you're doing something wrong. It means the practice is quite subtle. There's that sense of being really present, and all of a sudden, boom—out from the depths comes greed or aversion.

What really helps us move out of this is wise seeing, paññā, wisdom. In other words, understanding. The understanding that arrives at that place of non-clinging where the mind and heart naturally let go.

So in all three of these levels, in the way we're working in our practice, wise attention is a very useful and important tool. It's a concept, but we can turn to it as a tool.

"This was said by the Blessed One, so I have heard: With regard to internal factors, I don't see any other factor like wise attention that can do so much for a bhikkhu"—or a person in training. That's us. "A person who attends wisely abandons what is unskillful and develops what is skillful."

This is what the Buddha says: no other single internal factor can be so helpful to us. There's one sutta where the Buddha talks about several different ways—all using wise attention in one form or another—that can help us, if we pay attention, to abandon, to see wisely in such a way that these underlying tendencies, these latent seeds, begin to be abandoned, begin to lose their power. And all of these are based in wise attention.

So let me actually define what wise attention is, according to the Buddha. It's very pragmatic, as the Buddha so often was. He says that wise attention is understanding what is fit for attention and what is not fit for attention. That's how to pay attention wisely.

Now to us that can sound like a value judgment, the kind of value judgment we often put in our practice: "This particular pain is not fit for attention. This bliss state is fit for attention." Guess what? He's not talking about that. It's got nothing to do with pleasant and unpleasant. It's very practical.

Unfit for attention means that when we pay attention in a steady way to this particular experience, whatever it is, the underlying tendencies of craving, of becoming, and of ignorance arise if they're not already arisen, and get stronger if they are arisen. It's just really basic. You keep paying attention in this particular way, and craving gets stronger, becoming gets stronger, delusion and confusion get stronger.

And what is fit for attention is, of course, just the opposite: when you're paying attention, meeting with awareness, with kind awareness, this particular thing, whatever's arising, then maybe not in the first second but over some time, these three—craving, becoming (which is like grasping), and ignorance—either get less if they're already present in the mind stream, or they don't arise.

Now, our mindfulness practice is, of course, the perfect pure example of this. Do you understand that? How we've been going on and on about how a moment of mindfulness, of pure connection to the bare experience, whatever it is—how in a moment of that connected mindfulness there's no wanting it to change, there's no aversion, there's no delusion making up some story. Just meeting what is, in that moment of mindfulness—that's wise attention. The torments of mind are not increasing and they're not even arising in that moment.

So that's the basic description of wise attention. And it's at the root, the Buddha says, of wise view, of seeing things clearly, of liberation.

And so then he goes through these different areas and how we can use wise attention. I'm going to talk about some of those tonight.

The first one is really our basic mindfulness practice, never to be neglected. Sati, mindfulness, is always our protection, always our ally. So he talks about ways to abandon these tendencies, these torments of mind, the craving. And you've got to realize that within craving is also included the flip side, aversion. Because when we're wanting something, we're also wanting something to be different. So it's in a way a shorthand for both.

The first way is to abandon by seeing. That's really our mindfulness practice, seeing things as they are. And again, remembering that the fitness of what's appropriate to pay attention to is not inherent in the object and whether the object itself seems skillful or unskillful, but in how we pay attention to it.

So a simple example, the kind we always give, about where to place attention can make the difference. This is a story someone really told me a couple of years ago here. She was sitting in this hall day after day, close to the front, and some very subtle, repetitive noise began to bother her. She told me this after having gone through the whole process over a few days. But this repetitive noise—which I'm thinking might have been the ticking of the clock up here, something really soft you don't hear until your mind gets pretty quiet—she said she started to go through all kinds of aversion and anger and resentment, just really trying to focus. "This sound is ruining my samādhi. This sound is ruining my concentration."

You might be able to relate to how we do that. It seems we're paying attention to what's happening, but we're really paying attention to how annoying and inappropriate this particular sound is. And it just kept spiraling and spiraling until she was really, you know, in a state.

And then one day it struck her: "Oh, let me pay attention to the sound itself. I think I've heard that somewhere." Which she did—just went right to hearing, hearing, unpleasant—and was like, "Oh, I see. The sound wasn't bothering my concentration. My mind was bothering my concentration."

So that's a very obvious example, isn't it, of unwise attention and wise attention. Would that it were always so obvious and so easy, and even then it takes us sometimes days to get it because we get so caught up.

But sometimes we're attending to the wrong object, so to speak. Sometimes we're attending to the right object, the sound, but in a really harsh way. You're listening to the sound, but in it is thinking, "May it stop, may it go away, if I pay attention to this correctly." We do that with pain. We know sound won't stop, but "May it go away."

Another aspect of wise attention is the quality of the attention, which is what we always say with mindfulness—that quality of mettā in the mindfulness.

The Pāli term for wise attention, two words, is yoniso manasikāra. Andy gave me his own idiosyncratic translation of what this means, but I really like it, so I'm going to use it because I think it gives the sense of the quality of wise attention. Yoniso, which is usually translated as wise or appropriate, actually comes from the word for womb, yoni. So he translates that as womb-like nurturing or held in protection, which I very much like if you remember that mindfulness is our strong protection. And then manasikāra—mana is the word usually for mind, kāra comes from the verb from which kamma also comes, which means action. So it's a nurturing, protecting action of mind, the directing of the mind in a way that protects. You could put it that way.

So wise attention is directing the awareness to what's arising in a way that protects us from increasing the torments of mind, from suffering. And so obviously we can't do that by hating what we're paying attention to. We can try, but it won't work.

So this one, again, about wise seeing—something that I found very interesting is how with four of the five hindrances, the hindrances can strengthen and increase if we have slightly unwise attention. We don't quite pay attention to the right aspect.

So I'll give you these examples. With sense desire, the first hindrance, the way that the sense desire increases is if we pay attention to the experience of the sense desire—not just on the bare experience, but our emphasis is really on the gratification that we're experiencing in that particular sense pleasure. So for example, if I'm eating a piece of very tasty bread, and I'm just noting tasty, pleasant, nice, that's fine. But if there's that little bit of "Mmm, this is really tasty"—and you're noticing tasty, but the real emphasis is on the gratification, it's sort of how tasty it is for me—I get in there, definitely. And as we're paying attention to that gratification more than the bare experience, the sense desire increases, gets stronger and stronger. This might be a little subtle, but play with it.

With aversion, it's the same thing.

How we pay attention matters deeply. Like that woman with the clock, you might be sort of being with the sound, practicing what seems like wise attention, but really the attention is a little more with the repugnant nature of that unpleasant experience. "This is really so unpleasant. This really shouldn't be allowed to happen in a retreat center like this. I really shouldn't have to deal with such an unpleasant physical experience." You know, just that little tinge of "this is really disgusting." That's the place where, even though we can fool ourselves that we're being mindful, the unpleasantness feeds the aversion because we're not quite present with wise attention.

Sloth and torpor, I hate to tell you, isn't quite like that. It's more that we get overwhelmed and the energy can't match the heaviness. Or we get into boredom.

But with the other two hindrances—with restlessness and remorse, particularly the mental part—it's that we give unwise attention to spinning reflections, to painful or difficult or sorrowful reflections, and the attention really goes into thinking about them. And with doubt, that's more obvious: the attention goes to getting lost in thinking about speculative matters.

In the beginning of a retreat, doubt is a little more obvious because it can just be like, "This is stupid, I can't do it, worst practice I ever heard of," or "I'm hopeless." That you can kind of recognize. But as practice goes on, and your attention is getting more subtle, and you've also heard already so many dharma talks—you know, that one didn't match this one, and what about that other practice I did—and we're all getting so much more refined, doubt can take quite another turn. We actually think we're having profound Dhamma thoughts. And maybe we are, but with unwise attention, we're just going from this to that. "How was it? How did it used to be? What would this practice lead to? How can I really understand not-self? What did she say about wise attention? Where am I paying attention now? Should I pay attention to this? Should I..." You know, that's doubt. Unwise attention to speculative matters, as the Buddha put it: reflecting unwisely on dubious matters. Just drop it.

Now, the way the Buddha describes the second tendency—of becoming or being—that's a little different from sense desire, and how that gets fueled is interesting. This is more when we're in exalted, or just say nice, meditative states—it doesn't have to be exalted. And we really pay attention to how nice they are, how exalted they are, how I am having an exalted meditative state. Now let's face it, we all do that, don't we? Especially the first few times. It's really rare to go, "Oh yes, comes and goes, nothing to do with me." Pretty hard to really believe that, though we may try. But all we need to do is see that arising—"Ah, my exalted meditative state, isn't this nice?"—just notice that, otherwise we get lost into unwise attention.

And ignorance, of course, increases through unwise attention. As the Buddha described it, ignorance arises whenever we pay attention to any aspect of experience, any mundane thing—meaning not particularly meditative states—in the wrong way, meaning through any of the inverted or incorrect perceptions. This is a whole other talk, so I could just mention them. But whenever we perceive what is impermanent as permanent, in that moment, ignorance is arising, and the more we do it, the more it increases. How often do we do that?

Or whenever we see what is painful, or what is dukkha, as pleasurable. You may think we don't do that so much, but I've observed that often when I'm not paying attention, I experience craving and even clinging as pleasurable. If I really look, of course, it's clearly dukkha. But that's wise attention—you really look. When we're kind of half looking or not quite looking, we may see what's impermanent as permanent, what's dukkha or unreliable as pleasurable, and what's not-self, which is everything, as self.

So again, not to get discouraged, just to notice that when we do that, we can redirect the attention to the bare perception. And that's really what the mindfulness practice, moment to moment, is helping us see.

I don't know if this example is helpful. I'm trying to illustrate the subtlety of how this can be—not in a discouraging way. It's actually quite interesting, I think, because it helps answer the question of why, when we've really had insights on quite deep levels into impermanence, or insights into not-self, or the suffering and futility of clinging, how does it keep happening? And it's a lot on these subtle levels of tendency that we don't quite recognize when it's happening.

So this example is just one time I was on retreat. Pretty mindful, you know, the times when you're really noticing pretty much what's going on. You're not getting caught in big stories, big reactions or anything. And I was sitting eating one day. Present, present, present—and then I would notice I'd get into a little short thought train. Like an image and a thought and an image and a thought, maybe four or five or six little quick images and thoughts. Then I'd see it and I'd come back. Eating, eating.

After a few times, I noticed there was nothing compelling or even interesting about the images and thoughts. They weren't particularly pleasant or unpleasant. And I was thinking, well, what's the hook here? What is it that kind of sucks the attention away and gets it going? Because I knew it was one of these tendencies. So I started looking really closely when the first image would arise and it would go into the next thought. And what I noticed—this is just particular for me—was that even though the image and the thoughts themselves were nothing special, something about it in the seeing, when not quite being mindful... there was a sense of me. Big surprise. Just a little subtle sense of me. And it's so familiar, you know. It has kind of the comfort of familiarity.

And I experienced that as pleasant in a very quick kind of way. Because that was pleasant and I didn't notice either the image or the pleasantness, then it would go into another thought, another thought. Each one building a little stronger sense of me, a little stronger sense of me. And then we get to the point where the sense of me is far from pleasant anymore—but we wonder how we got there. It's just all these little familiarities, building one upon another.

Okay, that's for seeing, and that's a lot of our practice that we've talked of often. I want to move to the other areas.

The second one the Buddha speaks about is abandoning these tendencies to suffering through restraining—restraint at the sense doors, restraint of our awareness at the sense doors. Now that's really... if you were in the hall this morning, this is exactly what we were speaking of. Someone asked the question or just pointed out how we talk about noticing seeing, but how quickly from seeing the mind has completely gone off into seeing and wanting and comparing and judging and me and a whole story. It happens so fast. And it's hard to just go around noting "seeing, seeing, seeing." How does it happen so quickly?

This is exactly what this area of restraint at the sense doors is talking about. It doesn't mean that we have to stop up our ears, wear a blindfold, and never let anything in through the sense doors. That doesn't exactly do it. Real restraint at the sense doors, when the mindfulness is strong enough, balanced enough, is exactly what we're talking about when we talk about being with seeing at the point of seeing. We bring in what Ajahn Buddhadasa would call sati-pañña—mindfulness-wisdom—right at that moment of seeing, or of hearing, or of smelling.

So for example, there's a really pleasant smell. You recognize that the perception is, "Oh, that's pizza, maybe we're having pizza for lunch"—and you're gone, right? Sati-pañña would be at the moment of smelling, of recognizing pizza even, noticing: okay, smelling, pleasant, pizza. Smelling, pleasant, pizza. And that's all. Just keeping mindfulness-wisdom right there at the sense contact. As Ajahn Chah would say sometimes, when you smell an odor with the nose, let it be—just leave it at the nose.

So that's what we do. We leave our mindfulness-wisdom here at the nose, at the eye, at the ear, at the touch, at the mind. Otherwise, we're off in whirls of papañca, that proliferation that Steve talked about last night. And papañca is pretty much fed by—guess what? Clinging, sense of self, confusion, becoming. So come back to the nose, come back to the ear, come back to the eye. This doesn't have to be a struggle or a judgment, just seeing what's what.

But the other aspect of restraint, and this leads a little into the next ones as well, is that papañca is so quick. That was what the question was pointing to. Who has time to notice seeing? I'm already off in Bali and I don't even know I saw anything. It's so fast that restraint at the sense door actually requires a sense of not leaving all the windows and doors open, to paraphrase Thich Nhat Hanh. Give it a chance.

That's one of the reasons we come on retreat, and this gets into one of the later ones anyway—we set up certain conditions to make it a little bit easier to see what goes on, to see how fast the greed goes out through the eye door, the aversion goes out through the ear door, so to speak. I mean, it's not really—you know that, right? It's not really that there's greed and aversion inside of you shooting out your eyes or shooting out your ears. They feel like that sometimes, I know. But just so you know, it's a figure of speech. That's not who we are.

But it happens so quickly that we can give ourselves a break once in a while by, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, not sitting in the living room with all the windows open to the traffic and the neighbors yelling outside, the TV on one side and the stereo behind you, and then saying, "How come there's no quiet?" We can give ourselves a chance by restraining how much we, for example, look around.

A lot of people have been telling me—and this they've discovered on their own, I think; I don't know, maybe someone said it in a talk, but it really felt like they were discovering it on their own—that as much as they love being outside, sometimes they're finding it very helpful to walk inside, just because there was less pull to get lost through the eyes, lost through the ears, lost through smelling.

But it's important to recognize this is not from aversion. If you walk inside thinking, "I have to fear smelling the wind or seeing the leaves," and you get into some kind of aversive, fearful state—this is not wise attention. It's not sense restraint. It's just feeding aversion.

So remember in all of these that we look at what is helping to reduce in the mind stream clinging and aversion, confusion and becoming. What's helping reduce it? If you're walking inside to keep your senses restrained and over the days you turn into one tight knot of suffering, please go outside. But if you're outside or walking around the dining room and your eyes are just wide open, just greed looking for something to land on, then do yourself a favor and look down a little bit. Don't look around so much.

You can tell. We all take turns being sort of walking mental states. And we can see it in each other. It's too bad we have trouble seeing it in ourselves. But we can see when someone's the walking craving state. You just can't walk by the bulletin board. You can't walk by the toilet cleaner in the bathroom. You can't walk by anything. You just need some stimulation.

So I find it really helpful just not to look around. Feet are bad enough. You can tell a lot about everybody just from their feet, but at least it limits it a little bit. So keep it simple, but not out of tightness, not out of a should—out of what decreases suffering, what helps you be present with an open mind, with an open heart.

The third protection is called wise attention to the attitude with which we use things. And this really, as in all of these, it's not just about being on retreat. It's an attitude of wise attention that we can bring to our life. It expands the idea that cultivating freedom from clinging, freedom from confusion, freedom from sense of self doesn't have to be dependent only on deep meditation. We can pay attention.

Just like with the sense doors I was just talking about, this doesn't just have to be on retreat. Look in your life. Look when you're home. What increases your sense of desire, your sense of wanting, your sense of discontent? If I start going to movies a lot and I find I'm wanting more and feeling disconnected, guess what? I don't need to do that. We can just pay attention. So it's really a very useful thing.

Wise attention to the attitude with which we use things means paying attention to how we're relating to the basic necessities of our life—how we use our food, how we use our clothing, how we use the requisites that we have here: our room, our seat in the hall, the necessities. We all need things to be healthy. We need to eat. We need to be protected from the elements. We need to have a modicum of comfort and ease so that we can practice. But look at how we're relating to each of these things. Are we relating in a way that increases our fear and anxiety, that increases our craving and clinging? Or are we relating in a way that brings a kind of ease, a peace in the world?

I notice for myself, both on retreat and off—but we can stick to retreat since it's a microcosm for the rest of our life—I have a sense of ease, a sense of trust, a sense of peace in the environment when I know I'm using just what I need. I take what I need within a sense of how much there is for everyone else and just leave it there. But when I'm operating from a sense of fear or that scarcity model—what if there's not more later?—how does that feel? What does that engender in the heart and the mind? What is one's relationship to oneself, to the other people?

I know when I'm in scarcity model, everyone else is my competitor for whatever it is that's scarce. And what it breeds in my mind is a quality of fear and clinging that is quite a lot of suffering. It's burdensome.

Just a very simple example. When I get into saving food on a retreat—for instance, I'll be at breakfast and I'll think, "Oh, I really would like to have a banana for tea instead of an apple." And they usually don't serve bananas, so I'll take two bananas, if there's one left at the end—at least I do that—and then save it for tea. So already I'm in this clinging mode. I'm anxious. I have to kind of hang around and wait and see: when do I think everyone's done? When is it too soon to take the banana? If you take it too soon, then you feel really bad for the rest of the day. Who saw me? Can I get away with it?

You sneak back at noon and put it out on that table and write "Donna" on it, because you can't stand yourself anymore. It's so much suffering. And even if you save it and it was extra and all, then when you get it, what do you do with it? You put it back there on the shelves where there's no room, or you take it to your room, and then at tea time—do I go to my room first and get the banana, or do I take the tea and then go to the room? It's just torment. Just take the apple and forget about it. It's so much more peaceful, so much more at ease.

So you get the drift—it's really a drag. Watch what increases in the mind. If, as sometimes happens, there really is a need, a physical need, you know whether it's a physical need or you're rationalizing. If you're rationalizing for half an hour about why you really need it, forget about it. If it's a real need, you don't have to rationalize. You know you need it. And so then it's just something you do, and you might see how this is a drag, but then you let go of it. You do it because you need to do it. It's also wise attention. You're not engendering that wanting, that anxiety, that fear. You're just doing what needs to be done.

So you notice if you're hoarding blankets, if you need two or three seats in the hall just in case. That just-in-case mind is always a sign. But don't do it out of judgment. Look and see what leads to an ease of being, what leads to freedom of heart and mind, what leads to non-clinging, and what leads to suffering. That's what's at the root of it—not what anyone else thinks about you, not who saw you take the fifth orange—just what leads to more ease, what leads to freedom.

I know a lot of you listened to that tape of Ajahn Sumedho, which I listened to before we played it, and this really quite amused me. I know it amused you. Toward the end—that was a talk given at Spirit Rock last year—do you remember toward the end when he was talking about being on eight precepts? Up until then, everyone was laughing along with him. And then he said, "All the food in the yogi fridge should be donated to the homeless." Did you notice that kind of dead silence? There was a little panicky titter and then dead silence. I thought it was a riot—like, "Oh my God, could he really do that?" So that's really noticing our attitude with which we use things for our own freedom.

Often, this is a translation of a chant that monks and nuns do before they eat, a kind of reflection. It's from some things the Buddha said, but it's a way of reminding oneself of this attitude: "May I eat this meal with mindfulness, not for pleasure nor for beautification, only for the nourishment and continuation of this body, to keep it from harm, to avoid hunger and overeating. Thus I will be free from bodily suffering and living at ease." So we're allowed to live at ease and be comfortable, free from hunger, free from overeating—just what we need to live at peace.

The next aspect is abandoning these tendencies by what is usually translated as enduring—enduring what is difficult. I like patience better, because at least for me, when I hear "enduring"—and again, I know Ajahn Sumedho used that word a lot—but for me, enduring has the connotation of a passive aversion. When I'm enduring something, I'm thinking, "Okay, I'm here, I'm enduring, knowing it'll go away." I'm sure in the way Ajahn Sumedho is using it, and also in this translation, it doesn't have that connotation. It has the connotation of patience, which is actually an aspect of mettā—that ability to simply be with what is difficult, with a mind and heart that is non-reactive, that is present, neither pushing away nor trying to control, but really at ease. Reflecting wisely to be with difficult experience without getting caught.

This is really the heart of equanimity—the peace of equanimity leading directly into the mind of non-clinging. That we can be with what is without reacting, without needing to change it.

I don't think I need to say a whole lot about this, because we have talked about it a lot before, and it's obviously a big aspect of practice here. But it's important. It's one of the reasons there is this emphasis, when you're sitting, of not moving the first second that the sensations get unpleasant or difficult. And I know it's a delicate balance—not to get into a kind of masochistic sitting with it, or locked in aversion sitting with it, or the idea of "I have to be kind to myself" so you move immediately. But to really learn to cultivate this, the aspect of developing a mind that's like the earth, as vast as the earth and as unmoving. No matter what we put on it—something beautiful, something ugly—if we spit on the earth, if we plant a flower, the earth doesn't say, "No, I won't take this, send it away." It doesn't say, "Yes, this is nice." It accepts us all. It doesn't say, "You can stay here, you have to go." It just accepts us all.

Developing a mind with that vastness and spacious acceptance is really what this long-enduring mind, as Suzuki Roshi used to say, is about. Both to external situations—such as the noisy neighbor, the weather when you're feeling too cold and you don't have the right clothes, the bell ringing for sitting when you really could use another half hour of sleep, whatever it might be externally—and also the internal: the unpleasant mental state, the meditation that isn't going the way you like it, the unpleasant sensation in the body. Just the mind and heart that's vast enough to be with it all.

Practicing in Asia gives everybody great stories about the long-enduring mind. Like sweating through three robes while going out for alms round. You can just feel how completely grimy and wet and uncomfortable it is, and you have to do it day after day after day. A friend of mine who was a monk would wash his robes every day, but after a while he said, "I don't need to wash the robes, I'll just wear them." And one other monk finally said to him, "Are you deliberately trying to make your robes stink?" It just builds up.

But you don't have to go to Asia. I'm going to spare you Asian stories because you can start to think one has to go to a really extremely difficult situation in order to develop the heart of patience, the long-enduring mind. And you don't. Sometimes what's helpful about going to a really difficult situation is it's so difficult, you're just so up against it that you have to find a way. There's nowhere else to go. You went to all the trouble to go to this place, and so you have this motivation to somehow find a way to be there in it. That's a lot of what practicing in Burma or Thailand or India can really do.

But guess what, folks? The same mind is going on here. Even if externally it may seem like a silly difficulty, in your experience it's really hard, isn't it? Even if it's sleepiness, or some noise, or construction workers scraping outside for days. And what is really useful—why we tell these stories, always after you've come out the other end—is discovering that after we go through the aversion and all the "how can I fix it," when we finally give up and say, "Okay, I'm really here, let me be here," you discover that you can be tremendously at peace and happy, even blissful, so happy, and the circumstances haven't changed. Really haven't changed.

When that happens and you let yourself see it, something in you just can't believe anymore that you can't bear it. It just can't believe it anymore.

When I was a nun in Thailand, from the beginning to the end was like a world of difference. I hated everything for two months. And at the end of the year, I was so happy. What changed? Well, I don't think the climate changed. I don't think any of the circumstances changed. Just the mind and heart's ability to be there and really see how superficial our preferences and our likings and dislikings are on so many levels.

So when you find yourself in a real struggle with something that you just think you cannot endure—and it's not that sometimes it isn't too much to endure, because sometimes it is, and that's the next thing. That's what's so tricky. But don't let yourself go there too soon.

When your mind is first thinking, "I can't bear this another second," two things. One, see if you can expand into the bigger picture and see: Oh really, somebody's snoring in the next room. Do I really think that this is something unendurable in this life? That I can't practice anymore because of this? Even though in the moment it feels so overwhelming, you can get bigger and go, "Okay, maybe there's a way. Maybe I can come back and try again."

And the other is to remember, when the mind's going, "Okay, that's it, I'm out of here"—as you hit that place of "if this happens one more time, I'm leaving at six weeks, I'm leaving at four weeks, I'm never coming back again"—see how much of the unbearableness is actually arising from being present with this moment's experience, and how much of it is the mind imagining into the interminable future: moment after moment after moment of this unbearable grating experience, and how it's going to be forever this way.

Is it really what's happening that you can't bear, or is it that thought you can't bear?

And a lot of times—I wouldn't say always, but a lot of times—it's that thought. Which means... oh, that's a thought. Maybe if I just come back to here... ah.

So what is it that's really causing the effect of increased clinging and aversion and confusion in that moment? Is it the presence of that difficult thing? Or is it the unwise attention to the aversion, to that thought: "If only this would stop, I would be an arahat by now"? Just notice: where's the attention? What's increasing the suffering?

And then, what I was going to say is this: when you actually come through one of these difficult things—even if it's a little thing—but you come through and you see that the thing's still happening, and you're really okay with it, really at peace, don't just go, "Oh, I was so stupid, what was that all about?" Notice the difference. Notice the peace and the spaciousness that comes from that cultivation of acceptance, from that cultivation of mindful presence, that real equanimity. That's the real power of mind and heart. Don't belittle it and think, "Oh, I was just in yogi mind." Let yourself draw confidence from that.

The next factor is avoiding. And this is what's really interesting: the Buddha actually said that through wise attention, through wise reflection, there are some things we need to avoid. Which doesn't sound like—you know, acceptance is the one we always hammer on. So it's very tricky. I see why avoidance was listed second, after acceptance, after patience.

The things the Buddha describes avoiding are what is dangerous—like a savage elephant, or a poisonous snake, or a cesspit, or a sewer. Okay, that's like a no-brainer. We would avoid those things. That's sensible. But also, we can learn to avoid what's internally dangerous—what will internally bring us to confusion and suffering.

Now, this is where we look at the motivation really carefully. That doesn't mean we avoid whatever we don't like. Not: "Oh, if I hear this unpleasant thing again I might get angry, so I better just avoid it and take a walk." Not that. Not: "If I stay on eight precepts I might experience some hunger and that would be unpleasant for me, so I better avoid that." Not that. But really looking with wise attention at what truly prevents or does not support our developing awareness, our developing mindfulness.

This is one aspect of renunciation. In fact, look at the setup of this whole retreat. We've structured it so that quite a lot of things you're having to avoid—we're avoiding them for you. And that's really as a way to support the developing awareness, as a way to increase wise attention. So we don't have TVs in the lobby with CNN on every half hour. There's a reason for that. It's not just by chance. We're here in the middle of the country and not in Times Square. It makes it a little bit easier. We ask you not to get your mail. Those of you who are getting your mail know why we ask you not to get it—because it makes it more difficult to really just notice what's going on.

So we can avoid not only what's dangerous, but what really does not support our developing practice, our developing awareness. And I just want to point that out because sometimes we can get quite idealistic. This ties into the next factor, which is actually removing—redirecting the attention when you're really caught in something. I'll talk about these together.

We can get quite idealistic about not avoiding anything or not removing. "I should be able to be with anything, right? I should be able to be mindful in the middle of any activity in my daily life. Therefore, avoidance is the baby way out. Or avoidance is not going to support me. It's just—okay, I can be mindful if I avoid these things, but what good is that if I can't be mindful in Times Square?"

This is idealistic. What's so interesting about the Buddha is he was so practical. Look at what's true. If you can be totally mindful with CNN on every half hour in the middle of Times Square, that's great. If you can't, let's get real and do what helps us to cultivate a stronger mindfulness—to see what really increases our craving and our sense of self and our confusion, and what helps it to go away.

So the Buddha talked about, for instance, in life, avoiding unwise or unskillful companions. Now that's interesting.

It's not saying they're bad people, but just knowing that you can hang out with certain people and you end up doing things that you really don't feel good about. And if you stay alone or hang out with other people, you don't do those things. Just the power of suggestion, the power of just doing what people are doing. The Buddha saw this as a very strong influence and said, okay, avoid those unwise people for your own well-being. So that kind of avoidance—not out of aversion, but out of skillfulness.

The actual avoidance, the renunciation itself, may in the beginning be unpleasant. And actually some aversion may come up. So it's not that the first second there's aversion, that means we should avoid it because the torments are coming up. That's a trick. Just like talking about patient endurance—if you stay with something and there's a lot of aversion in that renunciation, but after a while you see that really craving is getting less, serenity is getting stronger, the heart is opening—if you can see that, then that's a sign of wise attention. But if you're paying attention, being with something, and the longer you're with it the stronger the greed gets or the fear gets or the terror gets or the sense of self gets, then that's a sign it may be something to avoid.

The last way I'll quickly mention, which goes with avoiding, is what the Buddha described as removing. This means that in reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu sees that there's an arisen thought affected by sense desire, or by ill will, or by cruelty—you see that there's any kind of arisen unwholesome, unskillful state—and you don't endure it. In other words, you don't say, "Oh, well, so what? They come, they go. I'll just let it take me until it's over." You say, "No, okay, I'm not putting up with it."

On the most obvious level, when attention is strong and balanced and the energy is balanced, that's really a point of resolution—what Joseph likes to call the sword of wisdom. When you start off in that fantasy for the tenth time and you go, "No, I don't need to do this. Not now." And you just come back. Resolution, not aversion. That's pretty clear cut. I'm just not enduring this anymore. I'm not feeding it.

But there are times, both with this removal and avoidance that kind of go together, when the arisen unskillful dhamma—whether it's a strong emotion like fear or terror or rage—is so strong you can't just go to the sense door and notice it and have it go away. You can't just say, "Okay, terror, not now," and come back to the breath. It's not possible.

So with wise attention, this is the example for removal the Buddha gives. We can actually redirect our awareness, not out of fear or running away, but in order to bring a balance, a spaciousness, a brightness back to the mind.

This is an example from the Buddha. He says, "In this, Ananda, a monk dwells contemplating"—now monk means nun, it means all of us—"dwells contemplating the body, ardent, clearly aware, and mindful, putting aside worldly desire and dejection." That is the classic way he describes the foundations of mindfulness, being aware of the body. So he's doing basically mindfulness practice on the body. "And as he dwells contemplating the body, some bodily object arises, or a physical discomfort, or a mental drowsiness, causes his mind to wander to external things." In other words, he gets completely distracted.

"Then, Ananda, that bhikkhu's attention could be directed to some inspiring object of thought." What is usually meant by an inspiring object of thought is one of the reflections on the qualities of a Buddha, on the qualities of Dhamma or Sangha. But it could also be your own virtues, whatever inspires your faith. It's the deliberate redirection of attention.

"As he thus directs his mind to an inspiring object of thought, delight springs up in him." Now these are translations of specific Pali mental states. That's pamoja—delight springs up in him. "When he is delighted, rapture arises"—that's pīti. "When he experiences rapture, his body is calmed down"—tranquility. "With his body calmed, he experiences joy"—or sukha. "Being joyful, his mind is concentrated."

And that's a classic delineation of some of the order of how this unfolds—going from a kind of joy in the mind, the mind gets calm, piti arises, then the mind gets calmer still, then there's sukha, then there's concentration.

At that point, the Buddha says, one reflects: "My mind is concentrated. The reason I was reflecting on this has been achieved." And then one withdraws the mind from that conscious reflection and returns to mindfulness of body.

So that's a very deliberate—you could say it's removal or avoidance—but it's a very deliberate cultivation of wise attention. Just staying lost in the thing is only increasing confusion. So you consciously reflect on some inspiring theme, just until the mind is spacious, bright, gladdened, calm, concentrated a bit, and then come back to the meditation.

Another example—not from the Buddha, this is just as we see in our practice—when you're overcome by a very strong mental state, rage or fear or anxiety, you know it, you're trying to be aware, but the energy of the mental state is just stronger than the energy of the mindfulness. They're simply out of balance at that time. You try to come to the body, but even touching with awareness the sensations of the body only highlights the anxiety. It only feeds back into the fear.

And you see, it's not so much an aversion of "I don't like this," but a recognition that this is just increasing the suffering. It's increasing the confusion. So with wise attention, we place the awareness elsewhere. You may first try going to hearing or seeing, completely out of the body. If that's not strong enough, you may then reflect on an inspiring theme. If that's not strong enough, then at that point we tell you to actually break the meditation—go outside and take your mind off it completely, go for a walk or go into the woods.

It's not out of running away. It's out of wise attention to rebalance and focus the mind and heart.

I talked last time about that idea of diving into the wave when it's difficult. But sometimes the waves are so big that all we can really do is put our toe in the water. We have no business being out there in the waves in the first place. And it's wise attention to simply recognize that and redirect rather than just get lost and overwhelmed. That's an important part of the practice.

I'll just end with a very short poem. This is from Lala, a Kashmiri mystic, a woman poet:

Some people abandon their homes.
Others abandon hermitages.
All this renunciation does nothing if you're not deeply conscious.
Day and night, be aware with each breath and live there.

CHAPTER 329

Hindrances in Mettā Practice

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a common question that arises when practitioners encounter unexpected difficulties during loving-kindness practice. She explains how the intensive cultivation of mettā naturally brings up challenging mind states—not as obstacles to practice, but as essential aspects of the path toward recognizing our "true home" of connectedness.

Wilson offers detailed guidance on working with the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) in the context of mettā practice. She gives particular attention to desire (kāmacchanda) as the "near enemy" of mettā—a state that can masquerade as loving-kindness through subtle wanting of pleasant feelings, concentration, or results. The "far enemy" of ill will (byāpāda) is explored through its tendency to create disconnection and self-judgment. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, she clarifies that mettā is not about liking everything or suppressing difficulties, but rather "witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it."

The talk provides practical instruction for recognizing when concentration practice leads to sleepiness, how restlessness manifests as endless tinkering with phrases, and how doubt can disguise itself as intellectual analysis comparing mettā to vipassanā. Wilson emphasizes that each phrase offered is a moment of breaking down the illusion of separation, quoting the Buddha: "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." This understanding transforms even dry periods of practice into powerful acts of kindness and wisdom.

So sometimes about the end of the second day on a mettā retreat, people will ask us, "Remind me again how this is being kind to myself?" Because certainly you're a rare person if you haven't discovered by this time that many, many things arise in our mind and body, and many of them are not mettā. Even if you've done loving-kindness retreats before, we tend to forget. But if you haven't, it would really be normal not to be expecting such a variation. And I know how much of the stuff that comes up is difficult—pain in the body, really deep emotional pain sometimes, some that's not so deep but quite painful nevertheless, just basic aversion or sleepiness or restlessness.

So I just want to reiterate that actually, we don't recognize it in the middle of the retreat, but it really is an act of deepest kindness, of ultimate kindness to ourselves, to be willing to practice in this way. Because with each phrase that you plant that seed, that you drop the phrase into your heart, that you repeat it—each phrase is a moment of breaking down our dream, our illusion that we live in of separation, of isolation, of neediness, of loneliness. And each time that we make that intention to cultivate loving-kindness by saying the phrase, we are counteracting the habits of our mind, the habits of our heart that are keeping us confused and in delusion, that are keeping us away from our true home.

St. Augustine said once that the reason why humans behave as they do is because they are not living in their true home. The context of the heart of connectedness that manifests as mettā, as compassion—that's not some weird altered state we have to create. That is our true home. And that we're not living there is sort of what Sharon was alluding to the other night. We think greed and aversion and restlessness are really who lives here. And we don't recognize that that's not our true home. The heart of kindness, the heart of non-judging, the heart of compassion really is our true home. So what we're doing really is an ultimate kindness.

However, we don't get the instant results that—I don't know what it is—I think it's so deeply inbred in us in this Western culture that even when we think we're being patient and taking the long view, we're not even close. The long view is three months, that's the long view. You read the Buddha, and he's talking about eons and eons and eons. I'm not saying that's encouraging; I'm just trying to give a comparison for what could be the long view. Three months isn't it. Seven days isn't it. That's not to be discouraging; that's so that we don't have completely unrealistic expectations and think that because anger is coming up in my mind on the third day, I'm wasting my time here, I might as well go home. These difficult states of mind and pain in the body coming up—that's normal. It's part of the practice. It's not a mistake.

One of the ways you could look at the formal practice of mettā as we're doing it here is that part of what we discover is a moment-to-moment training in seeing how we create, with our mind, the dream, the illusion of separation, of alienation, of suffering. It's not that this sense of being separate, this sense of loneliness, this sense of neediness, is some big thing in us, hanging there, that we have to chip away at. There's only this moment. And the sense of separation, the sense of distance, our sense of suffering, of fear, of neediness, is created in the moment by how the mind and heart responds or reacts to whatever particular experience is arising.

Thinking of my experience or looking at it in this moment-to-moment level is enormously freeing, because it takes a huge load off—that I somehow have to undo the whole last forty-nine years of my life and make sure I never in the future, for however long, make a mistake again, both of which is obviously impossible. I can at least pay attention to this moment sometimes. Sometimes. But that at least seems within the range of the doable—to pay attention to how the mind and heart is reacting in this moment to whatever's arising.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, one of my favorite quotations, said, "The obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain." Sound familiar? Desire for pleasure and fear of pain—that's desire and ill will, right? Greed and aversion, the first two of the five hindrances. It's not that they're evil. But when we don't recognize those habits, when those habits basically run the show, run our life—even though we think that desiring pleasure and fearing pain is what's bringing us happiness—those tendencies are actually what's perpetuating moment to moment our sense of isolation, of neediness.

And so one of the reasons that at times the mettā practice, and vipassanā practice too, because they're working from different angles on the same thing—but one of the reasons that the mettā practice is sometimes quite uncomfortable is because we're counteracting very deep habits. And as you know, breaking a habit doesn't feel good a lot of the time, even though we know once the habit's gone or it's a lot less, we're a lot happier.

But in the meantime, the habit is what's comfortable. The habit is where our mind naturally goes.

So it's natural that as we deepen in this practice here—and I know you might not feel like you've deepened at all, but don't go there. That's a completely irrelevant judgment that the mind makes based on some made-up idea. You are deepening. You're still here. You're still doing it. It's deepening.

You say, "I'm not deepening because more aversion, more greed is coming up"? No, that's proof that it's deepening. Because as we continue strengthening the intention of loving kindness, each time we say the phrase, it's as if the obstacles get highlighted. I know I rather naively thought they would just vanish into the background, but instead they get highlighted. One of my teachers used to say that as the light of awareness shines, all the snakes come up out of their pits. And there are moments when it really feels like that.

There are plenty of moments when it's not, too—moments of goodness, connectedness, a sense of non-judging. It's important to notice those moments as well. For neither of them do you need to take credit, which makes it a whole lot easier. You only have to notice them.

It's natural that the difficult states get highlighted. One model for understanding what comes up is the five hindrances, which I know if you've done any meditation in this style before, you're quite familiar with. In metta practice, sometimes we forget to notice them. They come up in just the same way, with just as much strength as they do in vipassana practice. They might manifest in a slightly different way, and I'll talk about that at times. And because the practice is a little different, we don't always notice them as soon—if "soon" is the appropriate word—as we might in vipassana.

The challenge of our hearts, really, is how to meet these difficult emotional and physical states. In metta practice, the task is not to think, "Well, I can't do metta because they're here," or to see them as obstacles. The key is simply the recognition—of desire, for example, the first hindrance—the recognition of it rather than being driven by it, and then how we meet it with our attention. That's how the metta continues: in the recognition, and in meeting what's arising with clear, non-judging attention. That really is metta. I think Sharon said something like that last night—that connected, non-judging attention is an aspect of metta.

So when you're feeling really sleepy, or really aversive toward yourself or something that's happening, or filled with doubt, recognizing it is essential. And then notice: what's the habit of how your awareness greets that? One way is what Sharon described last night—how we think, "Oh great, come in, you live here, settle down." Suzuki Roshi once said, "In zazen, leave your front door and your back door open. Let the thoughts come and go. Just don't serve them tea."

So that's one way we greet them—"Oh sure, it's your house, it's your home."

Another way is the opposite, which in my mind is personified by an old blind swami I met in India a few years ago. I was staying in a small ashram, which was just rooms built around a kind of concrete courtyard. There was this really old swami—a renunciate dressed in orange, a little crazy—whom they had taken in off the street and were letting sleep on a bed in that courtyard. When we arrived in the afternoon, he was just lying there, seeming out of it.

In the middle of the night, around two in the morning, the whole place started reverberating with these huge banging sounds that rattled everything. It would go on for ten or fifteen minutes. You'd bounce awake, and then it would stop, and you'd fall back asleep. In another couple of hours, it would start again.

The next day, at some point, I came walking back and the swami was actually up. I saw that he was the one making those sounds. He had this huge piece of rope—like a big rope he'd made himself out of old little pieces of cloth, woven together so it was very thick and frayed at the end. He would just be lying there, seemingly out of it, and suddenly he'd leap up and grab this rope and start whacking the floor with all his strength. He'd go at it for five or ten minutes, and then lie back down again.

After a couple of days, I asked one of the young guys who lived there, "What's he doing?" And he said, "Well, you know, he's a little..." He said, "He says when he's meditating, evil spirits come and disturb his meditation."

So he's getting rid of them.

That's the second option, which I also don't recommend.

But look and see. We often engage in either whacking the unpleasant visitor or whacking ourselves for having the unpleasant visitor. Not mettā. Definitely not mettā.

Let me speak a bit about these five hindrances in the context of a mettā retreat. Recognition is very important. The first two hindrances—desire or sense desire, and aversion or ill will—are, of course, much larger than just hindrances. They're really the key to how we keep ourselves suffering and in delusion. But in mettā practice, these two states of mind, states of heart, have a very specific relationship to the mental state of mettā.

Desire and clinging is called the near enemy of mettā. And ill will, aversion, fear, is called the far enemy. What does that mean?

Near enemy means it's a state of mind or heart that can fool us. It can look like mettā, and we can actually think that we are cultivating mettā or feeling mettā, when we're actually in wanting. Just logically hearing that, we think, "But they're not the same at all." It's really quite interesting how that happens. If you look at the two states, they're almost opposites of each other.

Because if you look at desire—look at it in your experience when you start wanting something, whether it's just some little thing like wanting the bell to ring, wanting something special for tea, or it's a huge thing like wanting a particular relationship, wanting something major to happen in your life—but looking with your attention at the state of wanting itself, the essence of desire is separation. The sense of desire is that I am somehow separate from whatever it is. And there's a sense of neediness for completion, for wholeness, for collectedness. Something is lacking and needs to be acquired or held on to. It's actually the energy of the craving or the desire itself that creates and sustains this sense of inadequacy, insufficiency, neediness. But we often don't recognize that and just think, "If I had this thing, then I'm whole again." So the whole essence of desire is separation, insufficiency.

While mettā is just the opposite. Mettā is the clear connection without judgment, without creating limitation, without creating separation. Mettā recognizes things as they are—a sense of friendliness, a sense of connectedness, a sense of no problem, really.

Here's a simple example of how desire really disturbs our essential completion, our essential peace, but we get sidetracked by it. I'm on airplanes a lot. If you've ever been on an overnight flight—I remember one flight where I was in the middle row, and about five minutes before the doors closed, I suddenly noticed no one was sitting in the rest of the row. I had just been sitting there quite peacefully, no problem, no wanting, no aversion, just at ease. Until I noticed that, and the pleasant thought of maybe I could lie down arose and was clung to.

In that moment, what had been quite peaceful became really antsy, anxious, nervous. Everybody who walked onto the plane—I was really focused on them, and I wasn't with mettā, I can tell you that—until they walked past my aisle, and then, "Ah, may you be happy." What had essentially been a very peaceful situation became one where each person was evaluated, judged as my enemy, as a threat, until they passed and they were okay.

I was really—at least I was noticing this as it happened. That's about all I can take credit for. But it was a really uncomfortable state. Contrast that to the state before, where I'm just sitting there and when people come in, it's just me, just them, no problem. Me as I am, they as they are. Nothing needs to change, nothing needs to happen. We're just right here. There's quite a sense of peace and connectedness.

That's the difference between mettā and clinging. So when we look at it that way, you think, "How could we confuse them?"

Mettā is a divine abode. When we talk about the four brahmavihāras—mettā, compassion or karuṇā, sympathetic or empathetic joy, appreciative joy, and equanimity—these are divine abodes. Limitless, boundless.

Well, I'll tell you, the state of desire is no divine abode. And I think that's one thing we can really discover for ourselves.

So how do we get confused? Because we do. It really is fascinating, if you can take the personal out of it, to explore in your mettā practice that shifting sand between the sense of friendliness and connectedness into subtle wanting, into blatant wanting.

Craving, clinging, wanting as a habit arises as a result of connection with pleasant experience. When we're not paying attention and it's really pleasant, the habit of our mind is to want more, to hold on to it, to keep it going. And in the practice of metta, to begin with, we're saying deliberately focus on the good, on the beautiful in someone. So even if you're not feeling anything you would remotely describe as metta—you're not feeling some huge upwash of beautiful, pleasant energy—but you're still focusing on the good in someone, it's very easy for that pleasantness, when we don't quite notice it in a moment, for clinging and craving to start arising.

A simple example. I noticed on one retreat, when I was with the friend category, I'd be sending metta to her. And this is a pretty happy person, so I'd be feeling happy. I'd be feeling, "Yeah, she's really nice. Gee, she's so great. Why don't we see each other more? That would be really nice, to see her more." Before I knew it, there was a whole story about when we could get together and how we could see each other, and maybe I'd go call her. And then—oh. That's not metta. That's wanting.

And that was relatively easy to notice. Sometimes it would move from one pleasant thought into another pleasant thought, into another pleasant fantasy. We don't really pick it up. And suddenly we're into a full-blown attack of wanting, where it's really the hindrance of sense desire. Nothing to do with a dear friend. Nothing to do with anything you could remotely call the metta practice. We're just gripped. How did I get here? I was so diligently sending loving-kindness to the benefactor, and here I am off in Bali, skin diving. How did that happen?

Of course, there's nothing to judge or get upset about. It's interesting. When you notice—say, when I noticed I was off in "How am I going to get to see her?"—rather than going, "Oh no, get back to the metta," just for a moment, notice the wanting. That leaning forward, the tightness, the sense of neediness, however you're experiencing it, so that we really recognize that it's not metta. We really learn to recognize it. And then, not with any harshness, put it down, gently come back and refocus. In that case, I refocused on the friend and simply offered the next phrase as a gift. So it's starting over, over and over, but noticing the difference. And then you start to notice sooner. You'll think you're in the metta and you've just a little bit slid into wanting, but you'll pick it up sooner because it really is a different experience.

When there's wanting as the hindrance, when it's just full-blown, eventually you'll notice that. You're wanting a different seat, you're wanting different food, you're wanting different weather, you're wanting different people sitting next to you. That's the classic hindrance we talk about in the first days of a retreat. With that, just notice it, really notice it, name it, recognize it without judging. You can take what I call a few minutes of a vipassana break, a mindfulness break. If it's really strong, just bring your mindfulness to your body and your breath and be with that feeling of wanting, so that you're not pretending this elephant in the closet isn't there while in some tiny little voice saying, "May I be happy, may I be peaceful," and really you're filled with lust or something. It's like, this is what's happening—let's just feel it for a moment. And then, from within that, you can reconnect with the next phrase, with the intention of loving-kindness.

There are a couple of specific ways, particularly in the metta practice, that are a bit more subtle than this, more like what happened with my friend, where the metta gets a little co-opted by the wanting, where the wanting really is masquerading as metta. This came up in both the groups today, but we were talking about it particularly in one of them.

One way is that we are doing our practice very diligently, repeating the phrases, but subtly or not so subtly, our motivating force is really wanting the metta feeling. This is pretty hard not to fall into sometimes. We really want some kind of good feeling. I mean, why the heck would we be here if we didn't? I didn't come here to feel nothing and say this for seven days. Of course we want some metta feeling. We just need to recognize it and realize that's not the metta practice—to be sitting there going, "May I be happy... Do I feel it yet?" So if you notice that happening...

Recognize it. Come back.

Or we get into wanting concentration. And there's a way with both of these—it's almost as if after every phrase or after every set of phrases, we're subtly checking back. Am I more concentrated than before? Do I feel it a little more than before? Do I feel a little more connected than before? And if you start to feel that you're leaning forward, that's often a sign. If there is a nice feeling, which sometimes comes, you'll know that you got into wanting rather than just being with the metta feeling, because when it goes and you're really frustrated—that's always a sign that we were caught in the wanting.

None of this is with judging. This is simply to see what's what, to see where we suffer. And metta, just that simple connectedness—no particular feeling, it doesn't matter—metta is not about suffering. It can connect with suffering. It's not about hiding suffering. But when we're really in that connected, present moment of metta, it's not going to cause us suffering. Wanting, expectation, ambition, holding on—these are going to cause us suffering. And all we have to do is keep noticing to see the difference.

One other way that is subtle, and at some point pretty much most of us get into this in the metta, is in saying the phrases. Whether it's to ourselves or to the other, there's a subtle quality where we're not just saying the phrase as an offering of the heart—we're wanting something to change. I really want that person to be happy. It often comes up with phrases like "may you have physical happiness" or "may you be healthy." And if the person isn't so healthy, you often notice that dichotomy more easily. But it's quite easy to slip in. In one sitting, you can go back and forth between just the simple intention and suddenly leaning. "But if you just did this, you would be happy." Or for ourselves, of course: "may I be happy, may I be happy, may I be happy." So it's just to notice when it's moved from the simple intention of well-wishing, the simple intention of friendliness, to wanting some result.

It's also common if you've spent a few days on the benefactor, your friend—people often want to go home and see if they noticed anything, if they're feeling better, if they're feeling more happy. Just notice. Of course we're interested, but don't be doing it for that, because it gets into the wanting.

So these are some of the ways, especially in the metta, that the near enemy can masquerade. But as soon as you notice it, it's no big deal. It's so obvious once you notice it that we wonder how it ever masqueraded. Until the next time.

The far enemy—well, that's more obvious, because it's the more obvious opposite. Aversion, ill will, all the gradations of that, including fear. But again, and this is sometimes not what people expect when they begin a metta practice, because ill will and fear really are obstacles to the perception of our true being, and they are the opposite of metta, it's quite common that they begin to come up rather strongly at various periods in our loving-kindness practice.

And often, of course, the person experiencing it interprets that as they're blowing it in some way. You're not. It's an almost inevitable part of an intensive loving-kindness practice. If there are habits in our psyche of fear or ill will or irritation—and I suppose it's a rare being who doesn't have some habits of those—they're going to arise. And so again, our challenge, our practice, is not to get caught in hating them or blaming ourselves or going into a real downward spiral of self-judgment.

This is really common on all retreats. But metta sometimes seems to highlight it—sending loving-kindness to oneself and encountering the endless list of what's wrong with us. The inability to really feel loving just proves what we had always suspected. I don't need to say more. And from that, every unpleasant experience becomes further proof.

So I think it's helpful to take a moment, as we did with clinging, to see how this is experienced. In the moment, to have a sense of what ill will or aversion or fear actually is, how it really functions. In the moment. We're not talking about our big psychic patterns, but just how it arises in the moment to begin with.

And again, just as clinging or craving arises when we come in contact with something pleasant and we're not particularly paying attention, when some unpleasant thing—a sight or a sound or a thought, or a physical sensation in our body like sleepiness, which is physically unpleasant—when that unpleasant experience meets us and we're not particularly noticing, it gives rise to aversion or fear.

And what is that? It's a pulling away. So in that moment, it's a disconnect from the reality, the simplicity, of that moment's experience. Ill will or anger is sort of like "no," lashing out, "get away." Fear is more like pulling back, retreating. But it's a disconnect.

If you tune into this carefully—say you have a pain in your knee and you notice aversion to it—you can almost feel as if your attention pulls back, retreating from the experience. Sometimes our whole body pulls back like that. And of course, because of that disconnect, we're not going to see clearly what's actually happening in that moment. We're not connected.

And this is precisely the moment when sleepiness, for example, becomes something more than just sleepiness. It's unpleasant, we pull back, and that moment of disconnection, that space, is all that our patterns of mind need to run in and take over. "Yeah, you are sleepy. You are really hopeless. You know, you really slept for a week before you came here so you wouldn't be sleepy. And here you are, sleepy anyway. And that just proves..." and there you are, back on the downward spiral.

If we don't recognize that this is just aversion arising, or fear, we project it into the future. "I'm sleepy now. I've been sleepy the last sitting. It follows that for every sitting from now on, I'm going to be sleepy. And it's unbearable. There's no way I can do it." And then again, the spiral starts.

The more this happens, it's as if we're wearing colored glasses somehow. Every experience that arises, once we start to fall into whatever pattern of negativity is our common one—whether it's judging ourselves, hating ourselves, fearing the future, getting angry at everyone else, whatever our particular story is—once we start believing it and not recognizing it as aversion, we get farther and farther afield from the reality of what's going on in this moment. And each moment of fear, aversion, negativity just feeds the next.

I've learned to recognize when a worthlessness pattern is running in my mind. Any perception that comes up—a sight, a sound—when that worthlessness pattern is really strong, is interpreted in such a way that it confirms I'm worthless. It could be anything. And it gets to be funny when I notice it.

For a small example, I could come down the stairs outside and look at that row of clips where you put notes. Usually I look and think, "Oh, good, no notes. That means everyone's fine." That's a normal response, right? But when worthlessness is operating, I'll come down, see there are no notes, and look at that empty row thinking, "Oh my God, nobody likes me because I'm useless." That level. And when I see what's happening, I can just laugh. It's simply what this pattern does.

But when we don't see it, that's another unpleasant experience that we didn't recognize. We pull back, and we're completely disconnected from reality in not much time. And we wonder, looking at ourselves, "I'm not that bad of a person. How come I feel like this about myself?"

This is where metta becomes essential. With any unpleasant experience—it doesn't have to be turned inward on ourselves, though that's a significant way the hindrance of ill will arises in a metta retreat—the same dynamic applies. It could be the lashing out where you're just hating everybody who comes into your field of vision or hearing, or hating the weather. Maybe you've just picked one pet peeve, but it's really taking over.

I notice when I'm on retreat and I suddenly feel I have to write a note to the cooks "for the good of all beings." They need to hear it. They really need to know. I start paying attention to the quality of energy that's convincing me I need to write that note. And now I know enough to say, "Okay, that means you don't write that note for three days." Because by that time, of course, the urgency is gone—it was just the hindrance of ill will.

This is something you could pay attention to. If you urgently have to write a note to the maintenance people, or the snow shovelers, or you have a brilliant idea for how the place could run better, why don't you wait till the end of the retreat and see if it still feels so brilliant? Maybe it is brilliant—but then it'll still be brilliant at the end of the retreat.

Metta really is the antidote for fear and ill will. Now, the mind of ill will—and I can say this from experience—doesn't want to hear that, or doesn't believe it.

negative way of looking at things, or it's just a strong habit of mind, it will come up when you do metta. So metta becomes difficult at that time. And that's when you'll hear yourself—I've heard myself, I've heard many people say, "I hate metta. I hate practicing metta. I'm not going to do it." And that's because it's going against this strong pattern.

We often have—and again, it's this kind of habit of ill will speaking—a mistaken concept about how metta is the antidote to ill will. This is often what the resistance, the intellectual resistance, is about. We think, as Sharon alluded to the other night, of metta as being stupid. "Oh, I see these really difficult, painful, horrible things in myself, but I'll just say, 'May I be happy, may I be peaceful'"—as if just covering it over or suppressing it or pretending it's not there. Or with somebody else, it's even more problematic. They have this really harmful thing that they do, and I'm just going to say, "May you be happy, may you live with ease," and completely ignore that. That's stupid. That's naive.

But that's not metta. That's what we often think it is—just a covering over. Or the other thing we can quite fall into is almost the opposite: thinking that I have to really love that person. I have to love their stupidity. I have to love my pettiness. "Really, you're wonderful, and so is your pettiness." And that doesn't seem realistic either. So we're kind of in a quandary.

That's not metta. Metta is simply, clear-eyed and clear-heartedly, with the attention connecting with what's happening, without judgment, without expectation. Just connecting. You don't have to love it. You don't have to think anything about it. In fact, don't think anything about it. Just connect.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho. You know who Ajahn Sumedho is? He's an American man who ordained as a Buddhist monk in Thailand with Ajahn Chah, who was quite a well-known, famous forest monk and meditation teacher. Ajahn Sumedho has been a monk about thirty years, and he lives in England now. He's the head of the whole Western order of Buddhist monks and nuns in this tradition.

He's talking about metta. He's very down to earth and simple in the way he describes things. He says, "Metta does not necessarily mean liking anything at all. It means an attitude of not dwelling on the unpleasantness or faults of any situation, inside or outside of oneself. Now with metta, one isn't blinding oneself with an ideal. Instead, one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, a person, or oneself. You're witnessing the unpleasantness without creating anything around it."

I love that. This witnessing, connecting with the unpleasantness, and you don't create anything around it. Just let it be in the light of awareness. You simply don't get into thinking, "I hate it, I hate it, I don't want it." This is metta.

Honestly, doesn't that seem a lot more doable than loving everything that's really hard? It's the power of non-judging, unlimited, kind attention. That's really what metta is. It's so much more simple and so much more powerful than our ideals about it might have us believe.

So really, whether it's a pleasant experience or an unpleasant experience, neutral—it doesn't matter. This is where metta leads into wisdom. The attitude, the connectedness of heart, of attention, of mind, of metta, automatically opens into wisdom. And this is something I didn't really believe until I practiced it quite intensively, but it seems to.

When we allow, as Sumedho was saying, just that connecting with the unpleasantness or the pleasantness—don't create anything around the pleasantness either, such as "Isn't this wonderful, isn't this great, how can I have more?"—just what it is.

When we really allow that, the inclusiveness, which we would call metta, that sense of acceptance, that sense of all-inclusiveness, that sense of limitlessness, naturally arises. It's not that we have to try to feel inclusive about that person, this aspect of myself, that experience, but simply by steady, connected, non-judging attention in various ways, the connectedness, the inclusiveness, the lack of limits becomes apparent.

Let me read you this poem that I really like. To me, it really expresses this—the willingness to come back and meet with unflinching kind eyes something that's a little difficult or unpleasant, and how it opens into connectedness. By Mary Oliver, it's called "Singapore."

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there washing something in the white bowl. Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it.

Like, let me out of here, right?

Kingfishers say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings, rivers are pleasant and, of course, trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face. Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win. She smiled and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem, but first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She's washing the tops of airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life, and I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen, but maybe it will. If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't, and neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life.

I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth, the way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

So much more simple and so much more vast and powerful than anything our complicated minds could make up. And we just really need the willingness, the faith really, to trust enough to just keep practicing and not be discouraged when we're caught in wanting, when we're caught in aversion, when we're caught in complete boredom because nothing is happening. We don't know. It's so much vaster than we can know. So just really an urge to keep going.

I need to mention the other three hindrances. But first I wanted to say that sometimes people feel a strong urge to stay with themselves as they're practicing metta, to stay more with themselves than going through all the categories as quickly as we are, which is fine. But it's common to feel that it's somehow wrong or selfish or greedy. We should be sending it out to all beings, and here I am just sending it to myself. Don't believe it. Because again, just like in that poem, if you can really touch your own experience with loving-kindness, it expands outward, past the limits. It doesn't stop at some made-up idea of this edge of my body with everything out there being separate.

So please trust to keep going if you feel moved to send it to yourself. And you'll see that ultimately the illusion of separation begins to break away. Even against all your best efforts, you'll find metta leaking out to other people, even when you didn't intend it.

In one of the groups, I mentioned that sometimes we use the phrase—if you're having trouble connecting with phrases to yourself, or it feels like too much wanting—something along the lines of, "I love and accept myself just as I am," rather than trying to make yourself feel something different.

The other three hindrances, just to mention: sloth and torpor or sleepiness; restlessness and agitation, that physical restlessness where you just can't sit still, and obsessive worrying spinning in the mind; and doubt. Just as in a vipassana retreat, they arise sometimes very strongly in a metta retreat.

One thing I noticed, because of the nature of metta as a concentration practice where we're not investigating so much other things that arise—you notice you're thinking, you go, "oh," and you come back to the phrases. You don't necessarily name what's happening at first if you can just come back. Sometimes that's fine. There's a little anger, a little restlessness. You notice it, you come back to the phrase, and it's gone.

But sometimes, because we didn't notice, all of a sudden it wallops us over the side of the head. And you'll just be in a frenzy of doubt, for example, and not know how you got there.

So that's just to say, if that happens to you, you're not doing something wrong. And as soon as you can recognize it, recognize it. That's the main thing.

With sleepiness, again, because this is a concentration practice—in other words, we're just coming back over and over to the object or focus of the metta phrases and the person we're sending it to—that concentration is one of the calming factors of mind. Investigation, which we're not doing as much of here, is more energizing. And so in the early days of a concentration practice, you can be really right there with your phrases, feeling quite connected, and the next thing you know, you're nodding off. You don't quite know how that happened. It's just because the calm and the concentration got stronger than the energy. That's all. No big thing.

So when you notice that, do the usual things. One is to really aim more clearly at each word in the phrase. That action of aiming, called vitakka in Pali, is actually the mental antidote to sloth and torpor. It's not hitting it with a sledgehammer. It's just gently aiming. "May I... be free from danger." Just that little extra energy can sometimes wake us up, balance the concentration, and you're back in business.

Sometimes, of course, it's too far gone. So the usual things: open your eyes, look at the light, stand up. Sometimes changing the speed of the phrases can help you refocus. If they've gotten into a lullaby modality and you're singing yourself to sleep, you might want to just vary the speed in how you're saying the phrases. But it's really important not to get into judging about this. It's just a natural effect of the practice at times for everyone.

The opposite, restlessness and worry, is again recognizable. Too much energy, not enough calming, not enough concentration or focus to balance it. And sometimes you feel like you need to walk more, just walk off the energy. One way we sometimes don't recognize restlessness—and I think I said something about this in the hall regarding metta—is that we find ourselves ceaselessly tinkering with the phrases or with which person to send it to. So if you find you have seventeen phrases, or your phrases have become paragraphs, or you're changing them all the time ("Well, that doesn't feel right anymore, let's try this"), or you've been through thirty-five different friends, I would at least suspect there could be some restlessness. If you can name it as restlessness rather than thinking, "Oh, the metta hasn't clicked yet," that can be really helpful. "Oh, restlessness. Okay."

Simplify. When you feel restless, don't complicate. Simplify. Go back to only four phrases, or cut down to two phrases. Go back to only one friend and just stay very steady, very simple on the phrases.

And doubt, of course, is very interesting. We know how to recognize it: "I can't do this. This is stupid." I mean, we're used to that, I assume, if you've done meditation practice before. One interesting way doubt can manifest, if you're new to metta but you're used to practicing vipassana, is that it takes the form of criticizing and analyzing the metta practice and comparing it to vipassana. "Well, what about mindfulness? What about wisdom? What's the point of this 'I' and 'you'? I thought there was no self, and here we're going, 'May I be happy, may you be happy.' All we're doing is reinforcing..." And you're thinking about all the precepts, all the things you learned from mindfulness retreats, and how metta is just the opposite, and you're completely lost in thought, analyzing the practice. This is major doubt.

It's very, very helpful to notice it and name it. You'll never think your way into deciding which is better, mindfulness or metta, or whether you're doing it right, or whether metta is really emphasizing a sense of separation by the use of these words. Thinking will never get you there. So as with any doubt, recognize the hindrance of doubt as just this spinning in the mind. The recognition of it is, "Oh, okay, that's doubt." You put it down and you simply connect your attention. That's the antidote: connected attention. You come back to the phrase, and it's sort of like, "Okay, just do it."

We're not giving up our discriminating wisdom here. It's not that we just blindly believe anything that's said for the rest of our lives.

But there's that famous sutta where the Buddha said, "Don't believe it just because I tell you—try it and see for yourself." That second line is really important: try it and see for yourself. And as long as we're spinning in doubt, we can't try anything, because we'll never do it.

So you have to recognize: "Oh, doubt." Okay, just do it. And at the end of the retreat, definitely evaluate. See what your experience is—of course you'll evaluate. See if it's useful. See if it's true for you. No question about that. But it's impossible to evaluate in the middle of it. You're just in doubt. So noticing it, not judging it, but having the commitment to try the practice: "Oh, that's doubt." Recognize it, center in your body again, and then just start by focusing on the next phrase.

And you might notice—I've noticed—that doubt rarely comes up when you like what's happening. It often comes up when what's happening isn't meeting your expectations. So that's just a little piece that might help you not completely believe the doubt next time it arises.

One of my favorite lines from the Buddha is: "What the mind dwells upon frequently, towards that it will naturally incline." That's actually, I think, a very deep statement. So what we're doing here—each moment that we are planting that seed of intention, of friendliness, of connectedness, of loving-kindness, each moment that we actually say the phrase—in that moment, that's what we're dwelling upon.

And if you think about what our mind dwells upon left to its own devices, what it naturally inclines towards left to its own devices—I don't know about your minds, but I can tell you, in my mind it's not a pretty picture. To really have the sense that we are effecting a change as to where the heart, where the mind, will naturally incline through this practice—we really are. And that helps me enormously in those dry times when it seems like nothing's going on.

So if I can just summon up the willingness to offer the next phrase, it's a very powerful act of kindness, of wisdom, and of really coming out of our dream of separation, of fear and neediness.

Let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 330

Cultivating Seeds of Joy

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common challenge in both meditation practice and daily life: becoming so focused on suffering and impermanence that we lose sight of the joy that supports awakening. She emphasizes that while understanding dukkha is essential, getting stuck in bleakness is not onward leading toward freedom.
>
> Wilson explores multiple avenues for cultivating wholesome happiness, beginning with sense pleasure and its limitations, then moving to the deeper joys of renunciation and simplicity. She draws on her experience as a nun in Thailand to illustrate the profound happiness that arises from dāna (generosity) and sīla (ethical conduct), describing how the "bliss of blamelessness" serves as a foundation for meditative joy. She traces the Buddha's teaching from the Two Darts Sutta and other discourses, showing how each level of happiness—from sense pleasure through jhānic rapture (pīti), happiness (sukha), and vipassanā joy—leads naturally to the next when we release clinging.
>
> The talk concludes with practical guidance on muditā (appreciative joy), one of the four brahmavihāras, as a particularly accessible way to open the heart when we're drowning in difficulty. Wilson reminds us that awakened beings like the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu demonstrate profound joy not in spite of witnessing great suffering, but because of their capacity to hold both suffering and joy with an open heart.

I want to talk about cultivating seeds of joy, which is a phrase Thich Nhat Hanh uses, in our practice, in our life, in the service of awakening—and that's really important.

The whole path is much vaster than our meditation practice, which we can sometimes lose sight of in the middle of a retreat. The meditation practice itself is so rich and so deep and so vast that it can seem to be everything. But the breadth of the Buddha's teaching, if you read in the different suttas and discourses, covers a whole range of our experiences in life. Meditation practice is only a part of it.

Among the many different aspects of the path of our life, I want to talk about a few that we can specifically draw on as ways to cultivate a sense of happiness or joy—what is often called gladdening the heart. We sometimes lose sight of this in the depths of a meditation retreat, or in the depths of our life at times.

It's not that every moment should be a joyful, happy moment. It won't be. But there are times, as I think many of you know all too well, on retreat or in life, where the difficult, the suffering aspect is so visible, so strong, that it seems to be all we can perceive. It becomes like a veil, and the only thing we can see in our practice or in the world is suffering.

Now, of course, a very important aspect of our understanding, of coming to freedom of heart and mind, is the understanding of suffering and how we get caught—how we suffer by our really incorrect perception of experience, our inaccurate idea of what happiness really is, and the confused ways we go about, in our ordinary mind, trying to be happy. We've talked about that a lot.

What happens often, and I think it needs to happen, is that we do get sometimes, and sometimes for seemingly long periods of time, quite focused on the transitory, the unsatisfactory aspect of all experience. We need to be really kind of hit over the head with this over and over, simply because we are so conditioned and ingrained to view life as otherwise.

But there are times when we get stuck there, where all we can see, all we can project is difficulty, is endings, is falling apart—and in a way that isn't freeing, that is not onward leading. Because the whole purpose of our spiritual life is about freeing the heart, freeing the mind. As the Buddha said, there is no higher happiness than peace. That's the whole point of our practice.

But on the way to this highest happiness, there are various other kinds of happiness. And there are practical ways, even in our practice here, for those times when we're seeming to drown in the suffering—when it's not just suffering but bleakness, drabness, total negativity.

I'll give an example. I call these periods dukkha periods, whether on retreat or in life. In life, maybe there's just been a whole series of times when people you know are dying, people you know are sick. You don't see relationships coming together; you see relationships coming apart. And it just seems like the accent is on the impermanence, the transitory, the unsatisfactory. Then that starts to be the glasses we see through.

I was giving this example the other day. Years ago, when I was on staff here, a couple—two people who were on staff—got together in a relationship. They were walking down the driveway holding hands. I see it in my mind's eye. They were so happy. And I was in a dukkha period. I turned to whoever I was with next to me and said, "I give them six months."

That's the veil. That's not helpful. That wasn't coming from the freedom of a heart at ease. That's unbalanced perception. I'm happy to say they're married. They have a kid. As far as I know, they're happy—not always happy, but happy. So that was wrong. That wasn't clear seeing.

Tonight I want to talk about, hopefully not too theoretically, some practical ways we can consciously access seeds of joy. Not to pretend that difficulty doesn't happen, not to get lost in pleasant feeling, but to gladden the heart, to open the mind. It actually leads us onward to deeper understanding, to greater peace, to the real happiness—the heart of non-clinging that is not dependent on any particular mental state.

So the first thing to talk about is really what we mean by happiness. This is a word—or joy—that each of us might be interpreting very differently. It has many connotations. Even within the very precise language of Buddhist terminology, there are different words for happiness. Remember when I put up that transcendental dependent arising and there was a word for joy? There was a word for rapture, which is pīti. There's a word for happiness, which is sukha. Joy is pāmojja.

Those are referring to very specific mental states, all of which we could lump under happiness, and there are also other forms of happiness. So I'm not speaking so much tonight from the precise Abhidhamma perspective, but I think it is important for each of us, when we find ourselves reflecting or mulling over or looking for happiness, that we don't just take that word or that concept at face value. Look a little deeper and see what it is you're really wanting. And of course, as long as you're wanting it, forget about happiness—that's the other trip.

These seeds of joy are really just reflections, ways to access the happiness that's onward leading, something that can support us when we're in those really difficult phases. Rather than just passively waiting and hoping that piti arises sometime in the distant future, that some kind of sukha will come and brighten our life—and then we want it, and then we crave it, and then we compare ourselves to others who sound like they have it, although we don't even know what it is. That just leads onward to more suffering. So that's not what I'm talking about.

The guiding principle, I would say, when we're thinking or speaking about gladdening the heart—states of heart or mind that are onward leading to peace, to freedom, to giving up clinging, the heart and mind of non-clinging—the guiding principle is really this: a wholesome state of joy or happiness, which can be triggered by many things, is non-clinging in the experience of it. In other words, it's not self-referencing back to me, me, me.

A lot of these different things I'll talk about can at times be experienced just this way, in a very non-self-referential, non-clinging, onward leading way. And the same experience can also be seen as starting to refer back to me, me, me. It might be experienced as pleasant, but it isn't the same type of happiness or joy that's going to gladden the heart, bring faith, bring brightness and lightness and energy to our system. I think you get a sense of the difference, and I'll keep giving examples of it as we go along.

So let's talk about really many different kinds of pleasure, joy, and happiness that we experience, starting with—believe it or not—sense pleasure. Sense pleasure is a form of pleasure. The Buddha never said it wasn't. And he didn't actually say that pleasant sense experience in itself is bad.

But if you look at most of our common sense pleasure experiences when we're not really paying attention, the danger isn't that sense pleasure is bad and we shouldn't have it, or that it can't for a moment bring us a kind of happiness. It's that for most of us, the movement from the experience of the moment of pleasure to clinging—to trying to get it, to trying to hold on to it, referring back to me, me, me—is so quick and fast that we almost can't tell the difference. We get completely and very quickly caught up in that cycle of wanting and clinging and longing and separation and neediness, all the experiences that actually hide us from the state of deepest happiness, of peace, of non-clinging.

When we're not seeing clearly, sense pleasure can strengthen our confusion, our sense of imprisonment. I don't know if you remember earlier in the retreat when I read from a sutta called "The Two Darts," where at one point the Buddha said that for ordinary people, the only escape we know from unpleasant sensation is to crave after, to lust after some pleasant sense experience. So on the first level of pleasure, of happiness, that's what we've learned, that's what we know: go towards some pleasant sense experience. And the drawback is simply that we get caught there. Unless we have another way to look, another avenue into our experience, we just keep spinning in that cycle of going for more pleasant experience. The more subtle happiness that isn't so self-referential, that isn't dependent on sense pleasure—we actually can't even quite imagine what else could give us happiness, as long as we're in the thrall of this cycle.

I read an interesting sutta where a householder went to the Buddha and was basically saying—I'll try to shorten it—"We're householders, and we indulge in sensuality, we delight in sensuality." Now that just means sense pleasures. "We really enjoy it, we rejoice in sensuality." He's really appreciating it. And he's saying, "So for us, when we hear about renunciation, it just seems like a sheer drop-off." That's the translation—like, ugh. "Even though we see and hear about young monks and nuns whose hearts leap at the idea of renunciation, who get really joyful, who grow confident and really see renunciation as peace—we've seen that this happens to these young monks and nuns. But for us, when we think about renunciation, it's like a sheer drop-off. Forget about it."

Which is true, isn't it? When we're first immersed in sense pleasures, even a little renunciation sounds awful, so bleak.

And I love the Buddha's response. He said, "Yeah, it's true. Even for myself, before I became awakened, when I was still an unawakened Bodhisattva, I thought renunciation is good, seclusion is good—but my heart didn't leap at the thought of it. I thought it should be good, but it wasn't really making me happy. I wasn't seeing it as peace. It wasn't bringing confidence up in me." And then he said the thought occurred to him: Why? If I think it's good, but my heart isn't leaping—why not?

And he looked at himself and he saw, oh, it's because I haven't really understood the drawbacks of sensual pleasure. So as long as I don't understand the drawbacks, I'm caught there. Once I understand the drawbacks, I'm able to—it doesn't mean you give up sense pleasure completely, but to renounce that clinging to it and then open to the joy of renunciation.

And this sutta, I won't read it, but it goes on and on. He takes that through all the different jhānic levels, through all the different kinds of deep happiness, pīti, rapture, sukha, through all the different understandings. Each one, he sees it, he appreciates it, and then something in him lets go and he moves to the next. It's not denigrating anything previous. It's just seeing it's not all there is, releasing the attachment to it.

I really like that, because to me first it made the Buddha human. I could relate. That was only the first one out of that whole list, but I could relate to that one. And I think it's why the dangers of sense pleasures get hammered on so much in the suttas, because we are so overwhelmed with the possibility of sense pleasure. It's so easy to miss the clinging in it.

But I want to point out, because it's something people have asked and I've gotten notes about it, that understanding the drawback of sense pleasures doesn't mean we turn off and don't appreciate anymore. Doesn't mean you can't appreciate how good the ice cream tasted the other day. If, on the other hand, as someone told me last year at the end of retreat in the group discussions—on one of those days, I think he had eaten either one or two whole pints of Ben and Jerry's. He said, "Don't worry, there's enough for everybody." I asked, "Did you really enjoy it?" And he said, "Not really, after a while, but you just get going."

You can get the difference. One can enjoy the taste, but you don't need to eat two pints. Or with nature, which is, I think, almost the fear—that if we see the clinging in sense pleasures, we're going to stop appreciating. It's not so at all. Part of the joy of renunciation is that when we're renouncing the clinging, we're so much more able to appreciate just what is.

There's a saying I love from the Buddha: what is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it. So looking at that sunset tonight—I looked out my window, it was pink, the whole sky, it was beautiful. Our job really is to learn to tell in ourselves the difference between that appreciation that's not referring back to me, not asking how good does it make me feel or how can I hold on to it, but that appreciation that really opens us up, takes us out of ourselves. It's onward leading. It brings in a brightness, a lightness in the mind, in the heart. It energizes.

And so it's often very skillful when you're feeling tight and drab and bleak and striving here in practice to go outside—not to try and grab some sense of happiness, but just to appreciate.

Someone else asked me, in the Buddha's time, did they ever appreciate nature or such? Or is it all this anti-body, anti-beauty? It's not at all. If you remember, the monks and nuns were living outside all the time, living under trees, living in forests, living in beautiful deer parks.

And so I looked up this one poem. This is from the monk Mahākassapa, a disciple of the Buddha. Now, he was the one most renowned for his asceticism. Even before he ever came to be a disciple of the Buddha, he was an amazing ascetic. And after the Buddha died, he was the most senior monk, the one that everyone looked to to hold the Saṅgha together. So, Mahākassapa—more ascetic than any of us, I think, could even begin to imagine.

There's a long poem, and I'll just read a few stanzas. He was asked over and over, why did he keep living in the forest and the mountains? Why didn't he come and live in the bamboo grove or somewhere a little more comfortable? And it's because he loved the nature. He said:

Spread over with kariri garlands, these regions are delightful to my heart. Resounding with elephants, so lovely—those rocky mountains give me delight.

Their lovely surfaces lashed by rain, the mountains are resorted to by seers. Echoing with the cries of peacocks, those rocky mountains give me delight.

Wild gorges are there where clear water flows, haunted by monkeys and by deer, covered by wet carpets of moss—those rocky mountains give me delight.

The music of a five-piece ensemble can never give me so much delight as I derive when with one-pointed mind I gain insight into the Dhamma.

He had to put that on the end. But that's the point.

The delight he's gaining, that he's experiencing, is onward leading—leading to really seeing into the truth. It's supportive. It's a supportive condition for awakening.

So I think it's just part of our practice to explore in yourself the difference between the joy in sense pleasures—these pleasures that keep us on the cycle of wanting and needing and self-referencing—and the joy that helps us open to appreciation and peace. And then this peace we take back into our mindfulness to simply explore whatever's arising next.

So as long as I've talked about Mahakassapa, I'll go on to appreciating the joys of renunciation. Not on that level, although you could if you want, but simply on the level of the renunciation each of us experiences being on a retreat like this. Sometimes it might take a conscious reflection, because we might lose sight of the joys of renunciation. But if you look, you can see an incredible sense of spaciousness, simplicity, and ease that can come even from a small moment of renunciation.

For instance, the times when you're drinking tea or walking outside, whatever you're doing, and there's a simple moment of pure presence where you just really appreciate the beingness of the tea or the walk or the nature or the gurgle of the water fountain. That moment is accessible to our consciousness because in that moment, even though we don't think of it as renouncing, we're not caught up in looking for sense pleasures. There's a kind of seclusion, a quietness of the mind that isn't battered by the hindrances, that isn't wanting something—and this allows the simple peace of presence to be there.

On a little more active level, consider the kind of simple renunciation when you're in line for breakfast and it's egg day, and you're a few people back, and there are three eggs left. You really want an egg. You're dying for an egg. You've been waiting six days for an egg. But in that moment of going by, you can say, "You know what? There's more people behind me. I can let it go." And it's not some self-congratulatory "Aren't I so great?" It's a real letting go. There's a sense of real joy and ease that can come with that kind of renunciation. And we see in this that the things we want or need in our mind are the things that bind us. The renunciation, even when small, can bring quite a spacious joy, a lightness, an uplifting of heart, an uplifting of energy.

People give me little examples all the time in interviews, so I want to point this out so that you can appreciate those moments for yourself. It's not that you should knock them away and say they're nothing.

I think a common misconception we can get into in our practice is that we look so hard for the kilesas, but we forget that when the Buddha described right effort, he gave four elements to it. The first two deal with not allowing unwholesome mental states to arise if they haven't, and if they have arisen, to abandon them, not get lost in them. But the other two are having a zeal for the arising of un-arisen wholesome factors, and for the ones that have already arisen that are wholesome, to appreciate them and allow them to continue.

That's different from ego. So in a moment of renunciation and that joy, that appreciation, let it fill your mind and body. Believe me, when it turns to "I'm so great," it'll stop being so uplifting. It'll stop filling your mind and body with joy, and you'll feel that heaviness again. So just recognize, okay, now we're back to the first two wise efforts. But I think we often tend to overlook or give short shrift to moments of wholesomeness. They don't have to be big. You don't have to renounce the whole world. But you can notice the moments here, and they're quite helpful.

In Thailand as a nun—I think I mentioned before—in the beginning of course it was quite difficult for many reasons. But a big reason was simply the level of giving up comfort, giving up the way of life I was used to: the food, the weather, sleeping on the floor, all of that. And for an aversive personality, that's what comes up when you don't get what you want—aversion. That's how it works. If it was a greedy personality, then greed would come up. Not that one's really better than the other. But anyway, there was suffering for a while.

The joy that came after some months was the simplicity of the lifestyle. I didn't really think of it as renunciation anymore, but it really was. The simplicity of the lifestyle and not having so many choices of things to do or things to go towards—sort of like here. What do you want for lunch? It doesn't matter. You get what there is. That's actually, if you can be content with it, a huge relief.

And some people have told me when they stopped eating after tea, if that's a choice they make, something that surprised them was actually this sense of ease, of lightness, of joy—just not having to deal with that whole mishigas in the cafeteria one more time. It's just this sense of spaciousness, ease, a joy that can come from simplicity.

We would never have the chance to appreciate this, really, if we didn't somehow, for some moments, if we weren't able to not be caught up in wanting sense pleasures.

So it's not that sense pleasures are bad, but as long as we think they represent the highest happiness, we don't know how to explore and experience and let in more subtle, more pervading, and more supportive types of happiness. That's all. The joy of simplicity, of renunciation.

Another very strong avenue that gives rise to various kinds of joy, of peace, and strong experience of our connectedness and lack of separation, is the whole area of dana, or generosity. As I'm sure you know, whenever the Buddha taught, he would always start with dana. He had a set order in which he would teach. Starting with lay people, he'd talk about dana, then he'd talk about sila, which I'll discuss next. Then he'd talk about bhavana, the whole field of mental cultivation and development through meditation.

If you look at it, generosity is really an expression of non-clinging. It's an active expression of a sense of connectedness, a sense of letting go rather than holding on, rather than self-referencing. It's a practice of letting go of self-cherishing. It's really an active opening of mind and heart to non-clinging. And because there are many forms of dana or generosity, and in the world when we're not in meditation, it's a very active thing one can do. It's a very good source of practice—both of freedom, of cultivating non-clinging, of cultivating a sense of our oneness, and also of bringing happiness to our heart, of gladdening the heart.

Have you ever noticed when you really are generous, whether it's with your time, whether it's with giving something, whether it's just with letting someone else have something you want and they don't even know it, how really happy that makes one feel when we really do it? I know sometimes it's a little grudging, and it makes us feel sort of good, but we can't quite stay happy. But it's a start.

When I was a nun, I think that's when I really began to understand—I can't say I understand it completely, of course—the depth of real joy that I could see in people from their incredible generosity. It's one of the most humbling and really profound lessons for me of living as a renunciate, as a Sangha member, because one lives completely on the generosity of others, and without even asking. You don't ask.

Even though, I must say, for nuns in Thailand it's a vastly different scene than it is for monks—they aren't supported in the same way or with the same enthusiasm by the whole group of people, the whole country—my experience in the short time I was there, only a year, was such total, loving, joyful support that it really blew me away. There was no sense of "we should do this" or "now this foreigner has come, she has more than we do, and here she comes to our country living off of us." I could imagine myself thinking something like that. There was nothing like that. It was much more like, "Oh, we're so happy that you're here! Let us give you your robes. Let us give you your food. Please stay in the best kuti. Let me take you here. Let me take you there."

At one point my back got really bad, and I was staying in a place way out in the country, like two or three hours by a really bumpy bus. A woman who was a nurse, who would come out sometimes to sit there, took me to her house in town for a month and insisted on cooking for me every day. You can imagine, I was incredibly uncomfortable with this—which is a good lesson, because that actually blocks the kindness. She was so happy to get up at five in the morning and cook me this giant breakfast, and then come home from her job as a nurse at like ten thirty so she could cook me lunch.

To see the stuff I went through from my Western conditioning—we take care of ourselves, I'm beholden to nobody—it's so isolating, that attitude. It's so separating. It so blocks the real connection that we all share. And when I began to let in the generosity and just tune into the people as they were offering, there was a transcendent kind of joy that came about. I have to say, that was my unvarying experience in the whole year that I was there. It's really profoundly etched on my heart, the beauty and the happiness that real open-hearted generosity can bring.

I have lots of examples of this. Another example, not from Thailand but from Tibet. I was watching a video a few years ago called Home to Tibet. I don't know if any of you saw it. It was about a Tibetan man named Sonam who actually—I don't know if he still does—used to live in western Massachusetts and built stone walls. In this video, he managed to go back home to Tibet to visit his family, his sister, people that were still there. He hadn't been to Tibet for many years. He was saying that when he first went, he was a bit shocked by how old his sister looked, how really hard the life was, how really poor they were. So he brought all kinds of gifts and money, and he was so happy to give it. And they were so happy, the old sister—when she got the gifts and the money, you could see on the video, she just lit up with transcendent joy.

And why?

Because now they could give more to the monastery. It was so beautiful.

I share this not to enter into any kind of value judgment, but simply because the happiness, the joy of that transcendent generosity is really deeply touching to me.

So why does it make us so happy? I mean, it's kind of obvious. If we look deeply, of course, as with all actions—even actions of mind—the seed is in the intention more than in what we give. But in that intention of real giving, whether it's money or time or service—and metta is a form of generosity of the heart—in that intention of giving, it brings us into a sense of unity, doesn't it? It's not "I'm so great, I'm giving to you." That won't bring the same kind of happiness. It might bring a little; at least we're letting go. But that real generosity of "Oh, you need this—here"—there's no self-referencing. It's coming from a sense of the big picture, the heart of non-clinging, our basic unity. And as we're acting from non-clinging, we experience the joy and the peace of non-clinging.

On retreat here, I know there's not so much you can really do. And actually—this might seem strange—I want to beg you not to go around trying to do generous things for each other. Because in some ways, the most generous thing we can each do is just let each other continue their practice. Sometimes when we talk about generosity, it does feel good. You want to ask the office to buy little things so you can go around and give them to everybody. But that's a lot of doing. You don't need to. You can just offer some metta in your heart. Or you can do little things. When you see the place you always sit in the dining room and somebody's hovering, you think, "Maybe I could let them sit there next time." There are intangible ways we can offer the heart of generosity. And it's also generous to just let people be in their own space. I know I need to say that as a proviso just for here on retreat. But you'll see there are little ways of generosity. Notice it. Notice when it's possible.

And also—and I'm going to say this about morality too—you can reflect consciously when you're in a kind of pit and you think, "What's going to get me out of here? There's not one good, wholesome, joyful thing I can imagine." Reflecting on acts of generosity, thoughts of generosity in your past—the karmic fruit ripening can actually bring joy. It's the same with reflecting on our wholesome actions, on our sila, which is again something we don't do all that much because we think it's sort of egocentric. It is egocentric if we're doing it to say, "I'm so generous, I'm so great, I'm more generous than that person." Well, that won't make us too happy. But to just hold in our heart those moments of generosity—it can bring us back into that unitive intention, into the joy. Or when we've been the recipients of generosity.

When I was talking just now about being in Thailand, the sense of happiness just washes through me. Deep gratefulness, which also opens us to happiness. Deep appreciation of generosity and being able to be the recipient—that I could finally let go of all my self-image of "No, I shouldn't take that, let me take care of myself" and just receive it. It made me tremendously happy as well.

So dana. Now sila, or our non-harming conduct. This is the second thing the Buddha would always teach. It's often talked about as the bliss of blamelessness. I like that phrase—the bliss of blamelessness—or freedom from remorse.

Now I know some of you, and maybe all of you, have at times had actions you've done in the past, or wish you'd done and didn't do, or unkind things, or just little things come up, and you experience tremendous remorse or sorrow or regret over it. And some of these things—when people would tell me about them, they're so little. Just such a small thing that you wouldn't even notice it in your daily life, really. And it's happened to me too—sitting, thinking of all the people whose letters I didn't answer, all the phone calls I didn't return, all the little things I haven't done when reaching out might have made someone happy. And you can really sink into a swamp of remorse.

Remorse is useful in seeing—not with judgment, not with self-hatred, not with guilt, but in understanding the suffering that comes from our unwholesome speech and actions. But sometimes it can also go quite too far, just little things we're really beating ourselves about.

our internal commitment, even though of course we're not perfect in it, to speak and act from that non-harming is again an actualization of our oneness with all beings. And this bliss of blamelessness, this freedom from remorse, is actually a very profound and supportive form of happiness.

At least many of the people I talk to, it's not something we consciously turn our minds to all that often. You know how in the beginning of the metta, the formal metta meditation, sometimes we'll say, consciously reflect on something wholesome you've done or some good attitude of yours. And sometimes people really can't think of anything, or you think of some little thing and you think, well, that's too stupid, that's not good enough.

But it's important. It's really important because it can bring a brightness, a confidence, a sense of gladness to our mind and heart. If nothing else—and this isn't nothing, this is big—reflect on the power and the sincerity of your intentions in pursuing a spiritual path at all. In all the moments here and in your life that you have cultivated kindness, honesty, awareness, metta, freedom, non-harming. It's vast. It's really important to see and acknowledge this in ourselves, and it can be a major source of support in difficult times.

You could consciously bring up a specific incident or a specific time where you were aware of appreciating something wholesome or non-harming that you did. And again, for us, it's difficult to know how to do this without falling into "Aren't I great?" But experiment with it.

I really got a sense of how powerful this could be, sort of by mistake, a few years ago when one day, just out of nowhere, came a memory—the kind that comes up on retreat as if you're reliving it. Just a day many years ago when I worked in a sheltered workshop in North Carolina with moderately to severely mentally handicapped adults. It was pretty intense work.

But anyway, this one day came up. We were in this windowless garage with no air conditioning in North Carolina in the summer, 105 degrees outside. It was a charming environment. But I remember this one day in particular where, for some reason—I mean, I really came to love the people in the workshop that I worked with. I can still remember a lot of them and their names. And this one day, for some reason, there were just several different little incidents of interactions where basically I was just being kind, being loving. And I was also receiving—for some reason, people were expressing in their way that sense of love and appreciation back. It was just a very beautiful half a day or whatever.

And when that memory came up, it brought with it that gladdening of the heart of wholesomeness. That's all. It wasn't like, "I'm so great." Just the wholesomeness of being kind, of doing the best I could, certainly non-harming, and of being able to receive that sense of connection with the people we were all working together. Again, it's the karmic fruits coming up in this life, in this moment. That can really just bring up some brightness and energy and confidence. It's kind of like you take a deep breath and go, "Okay. One more five minutes of lifting, moving, placing." Okay, I can come back and feel this tightness in the abdomen just as it is. It just brings in a spaciousness.

It's a great balance for self-blame and self-judgment when you're getting lost in that. And again, if no incident comes to mind, reflect on your intentions.

This freedom from remorse, which is what attention to our conduct is, this bliss of blamelessness—also called freedom from remorse—I found an interesting sutta where the Buddha is talking about how skillful virtues have freedom from remorse as their purpose, Ananda, freedom from remorse as their reward. And then it goes through this whole list again. What's the purpose of freedom from remorse? What is its reward? And he says joy is the purpose and the reward of freedom from remorse. And then from joy, he goes to rapture, to serenity, to sukha. He goes through the whole transcendent dependent arising. Exactly as I talked about the other day. Only instead of starting from faith, he's starting from skillful virtues and freedom from remorse.

So don't overlook the power of our non-harming speech and action. It is the foundation, the grounding of our whole opening into freedom. It's the grounding of the joy and rapture, serenity, sukha, concentration—which are all happinesses that come specifically in the meditative path. Onward leading to the last one: dispassion has knowledge and vision of release as its purpose, knowledge and vision of release as its reward.

So in this way, Ananda, skillful virtues lead step by step to the consummation of Arhatship.

Just in case you missed that. It's not a little thing.

This brings me to the point of how, simply by our step-by-step willingness to pay attention to each of these areas, coupled with our mindfulness practice, this whole field arises—not so much sense pleasures, but what you could call meditative joys and meditative happinesses. Those ones I specifically mentioned: the joys of the secluded mind and heart, the rapture, the sukha, the concentration, the tranquility of mind. These are specific states of happiness, of joy in the mind pervading the body, that are onward leading. They arise quite naturally in their own time through our continued attention to dāna, sīla, and our meditation practice.

As well, there is the great joy called vipassanā happiness. When a sudden insight arises, it brings a kind of happiness with it. Sometimes it's like a big release of energy, or there's more energy, or you feel happy, excited—but there's a real joy that comes with that.

These aren't so much the kind of happiness that you can decide to access when you're in a pit of despair. So I'm mentioning these, but I'm not recommending this as a practical means. Like when I saw those people walking down the driveway and all I could see was "Give them six months"—I couldn't then say, "Well, I'll go inside and access sukha." The mind wasn't in a state of seclusion at that time. It's only possible to really open to and experience these more subtle states of joy and happiness when we're not entranced by sense pleasures, when the mind is more quiet, more secluded, more at peace. And they'll come in their own time. We can trust that. But if you get caught in wanting, as you know, forget about it. It just gets in the way.

So only by the abandoning of sense pleasures can we even begin to taste these more subtle yet at the same time much more satisfying kinds of meditation pleasures, and the happiness of vipassanā.

I remember one retreat I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, and I was in one of these states of vipassanā happiness. Things were just coming and going, coming and going very quickly. It's one of those classic stages where great rapture arises, joy arises, just from seeing everything coming and going. And I remember thinking at the time about different sense pleasures—anything you could think of. The thought of them would come up in my mind, and it was really funny because my mind would go, "That's not even appealing. That's gross." There was no sense pleasure that could even touch the happiness of this vipassanā happiness.

And even now, I don't experience that in the moment, that vipassanā happiness. But again, even in talking about it, some knowing of that peace, that happiness comes back. It doesn't mean I don't want sense pleasures again, but somewhere I know they don't really cut it in the same way—not like seeing things clearly, the joy that comes from that, the heart and mind that doesn't need to hide from suffering and doesn't need to hold on to pleasure. There's a happiness so much greater in that.

And it's onward leading, as long as we keep paying attention. Even this happiness of deep meditation, of concentration—if we stop paying attention, of course we get caught there. As I know Steve was talking about: getting caught within. "Wow, this is so great. There's no happiness greater than this. Aren't I happy? This is really making me..." It starts to refer back to me again, back to me again, and how to prolong it.

I think a little of this is inevitable, and don't worry about it as long as you keep being mindful. Mindful of the happiness. Mindful of the liking of it. Mindful of how great it is. Just notice that. And I have ultimate faith that the awareness takes care of it. You'll move through that. You don't have to say, "Oh, vipassanā happiness—better back away. I might get attached. Let me go distract myself." Don't do that. So you get caught a little bit. Keep paying attention, and the mindfulness will just take us through that place.

Now, without paying attention, we do get caught. Caught in the cycle of me and self-referencing, caught in the cycle of clinging. Or another place we might not notice is that happiness turns into—it's actually the near enemy of empathetic joy—exuberance. And it happens a lot in interviews. People will come in with some insight, and they're so happy and filled with rapture or whatever, and the energy is going up, and then suddenly you can see they just want to run all over the building being happy. All of a sudden there are all these things to do and all these expressions of it—and that's exuberance.

It's without mindfulness. The energy builds, and we're not quite paying attention to it. It stops being so connected. We run around, do all kinds of stuff. "Oh, I feel so great. I just need to run around the loop feeling this joy." And we come back with a thud sooner or later with that kind of exuberance, because the mindfulness has gone out the window. So you're happy, then you're really high, then you're really excited, then all of a sudden you're like, "Ugh. What happened?"

After you do that a couple of times, you'll learn. Maybe you can notice when the energy is really high. "This is happiness. Just keep being mindful. Don't try to hold on to it."

Now I have five minutes for my favorite topic, which will make me happy anyway. One other specific way that we can access non-clinging, non-self-referencing joy in our practice—both here and in the world—is through the conscious cultivation of one of the four Brahma Viharas, the one called mudita, appreciative joy.

All the Brahma Viharas bring us a kind of happiness, but appreciative joy is, I have found, so practical and so useful as a way to consciously open the energy field, the heart, the mind to happiness and joy when you're not particularly experiencing it yourself.

Mudita is defined as metta turned toward someone's happiness—turning toward the joy or success of another. It's said to be one of the four Brahma Viharas that's in some ways the most difficult or most unfamiliar. Perhaps it's the one we're not in such a habit of, but I've found that when I consciously turn my mind that way, it's pretty accessible, and it's really fun. That's what's so nice about it. It's light, it's bright, it's energizing—and yes, its near enemy is exuberance.

Ajahn Sumedho also talks about appreciative joy as being able to appreciate the beauty and the goodness in nature and in the things around us. It's sort of back to what I was talking about in the beginning, about appreciating beauty. If you find that you can't quite yet connect to mudita with another person, you can begin by just consciously appreciating the beauty around you, or something that makes you happy in nature, or a beautiful work of art—just something you see around here that brings you joy.

But mudita is really about turning our attention to the perceived happiness or success of another person and saying in our heart, "May your happiness continue. May your success continue." In doing that, their joy becomes something we get happy from. It stops being their joy or my joy—it just becomes joy that's accessible in the world. Instead of having to rely on our own paltry resources for joy, we suddenly have the resources of the whole world.

You know how when you read something in the newspaper about someone who's done something really generous or really good, it can bring shivers and make us really happy? That's mudita. I read about this man who works for Ford in Detroit. He's seventy-eight years old. He's been working for Ford for fifty-nine years. He makes a hundred thousand dollars a year because he works overtime all the time, and mostly he gives all his money away. He's given over two hundred thousand dollars to the United Negro College Fund, two hundred thousand to Louisiana State University, a hundred twelve thousand to different churches, twenty thousand to the NAACP, four hundred thirty-one thousand to Wayne State University. And he says, "I get joy, happiness out of this. I can go home and sleep good." He lives in some little apartment, drives an old car. Doesn't it make you happy to hear about him? He's just this big smiling face.

That's mudita. We can consciously look for that. It's such a wonderful way, because it's not just his goodness—how does it make us happy? It's because just as we all share suffering, we all share happiness, we all share goodness. It touches that place of unity in us. It's a really important thing to tune into.

Of course, the far enemy is envy—that constant comparing mind, that sense of there being a finite amount of joy to go around. When you're in a down space and you see a yogi walking by looking really happy, do we say, "May your happiness continue"?

Or do we think, "Oh, how come they're so happy? I'm really doing even worse than I thought." We kind of take it as a way to reflect back on what a loser we are.

Notice your mind do that. You can change the channel. You can consciously try and say, "Oh, may your happiness continue." Remember, it's intention. You don't have to feel it right away. But try it. It really opens so that other people's happiness stops being a threat and becomes a source of joy, a source of connection.

You can start in very small ways. For instance, if you're really having a hard time sitting still in the hall and you're beating yourself up about it, and the person next to you comes in and sits like a rock for two and a half hours, you might not be able, quite in that moment, to feel muditā for that person. But you see someone else sitting outside smiling at the sunset—you can feel muditā for that. Or I'll think of friends who get happy when their particular tennis star wins. Now, I don't really care what tennis person wins what tennis match. But my friend gets so happy, so I can think of him and I can feel muditā for that.

The proviso is, of course, wholesome things. Not muditā for somebody who's doing something that's harmful to themselves or others. That's not really what we're talking about in wholesome joy. But just look around here and try it. It can really bring a balance to the mind and heart that's only seeing suffering. Even in compassion, where we're connecting with suffering, sometimes that's all we see. We can consciously bring in the fact of joy.

This is important because we often tend to see all one way or all another. When there's a lot of suffering in the world, to consciously look at someone who's smiling and think of joy—it almost sometimes feels like cheating, or it's shallow, or inconsequential. Sometimes when I'm listening to news on the radio about any of the difficult places around the world—so much suffering, so much torment—I think about here we are in this little deva realm, getting upset at the things we're all getting upset about. But we're safe. We have so much to eat. We have the opportunity to practice.

My mind can go to, "How can that be possible? How can I appreciate that when there's so much suffering?" But it's very important not to denigrate the joy, but to open the heart and mind to hold both. Because that's how it is in the world. It isn't all joy, and it isn't all suffering, and all of us experience both. Muditā is a conscious way to access joy when we're drowning in suffering, but it's not a way that denies the suffering.

And that's really what takes us into the highest happiness of peace—one that isn't dependent on only positive things or pleasant experience, one that isn't overwhelmed by difficulty, by suffering. Nor does the mind at peace identify with or blame oneself for the suffering either.

If you look at some of the people who seem most awakened—who can tell from outside—but people who have really exhibited great love and care for this world, they seem really joyful at the same time that they've perhaps seen and been close to more suffering than I could ever imagine.

This is my favorite little photo. It's a picture from a conference of Nobel Peace laureates. I'm sure some of you have seen it—the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. These two men together—Archbishop Desmond Tutu and the Dalai Lama—the amount of suffering, of cruelty that they've talked to people about, that they've experienced in their two different countries of Tibet and South Africa, is mind boggling. And here they are together, yucking it up. The Dalai Lama is standing behind Archbishop Tutu trying to pull off his hat. The Archbishop is holding it on. They're both just filled with this kind of simplicity of joy that I would say isn't in spite of, but maybe because of, their ability to be with suffering—balanced with these other aspects of joy.

So thanks for listening. Let's sit quietly for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 331

Opening Talk of Vipassanā Retreat

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> This opening talk marks the beginning of a vipassanā retreat, with Carol Wilson and Sharon Salzberg welcoming practitioners to what Wilson describes as a deliberate, conscious withdrawal from daily entanglements—a modern expression of the hermit tradition found across cultures throughout history. Drawing on the example of St. Antony of Egypt and Thomas Merton's reflections on solitude, Wilson frames retreat as an act of love rather than escape, offering space to meet ourselves with kindness and courage rather than running from what we fear.
>
> Sharon Salzberg then formally opens the retreat by introducing the Three Refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the Five Precepts (sīla). She explains taking refuge in the Buddha as recognizing our own capacity for awakening, the Dhamma as aligning with the truth of things as they are, and the Saṅgha as joining a stream of beings committed to liberation. The precepts—refraining from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and intoxicants—establish a foundation of care and compassion for the community.
> The teachers emphasize that retreat practice mirrors real life with its inevitable ups and downs, yet offers a unique opportunity to transform our relationship to experience. Through the simple practice of mindfulness—paying kind, loving attention to each moment—practitioners can discover what Salzberg calls the 'inexhaustible treasure' of our original pure nature, a happiness that doesn't break when conditions change. The talk concludes with basic meditation instructions on breath awareness and the essential teaching of beginning again with compassion whenever attention wanders.

We'd like to join our welcome to that of John and the staff, to those of you who've come tonight. I'll just introduce us each. My name is Carol Wilson. Sitting next to me is Sharon Salzberg, Kamala Masters, and Ryoshin Kelly. Together we'll be sharing these next nine days, this journey we're taking together.

It really is for us a privilege to be sitting here at the beginning of this period of retreat together—for most of you, at the beginning; for some of you, the continuation. I was thinking today about what an amazing thing it is that so many of you are willing to take this time to leave your daily life, to leave your families, your friends, your loved ones, your jobs, your televisions, your pizzas, whatever it is that you think makes you happy, and come here. In this culture, such inner journeying is not always completely respected and supported. And so to think that there are so many of us willing to spend this time together is really very inspiring to me, and humbling also.

Hopefully, you're coming here from a powerful commitment not to run away from everything you hate, because you'll find out soon enough that all of that came with you. But coming here really to take a journey of discovery and rediscovery, to come back home again to your truest self, your deepest self.

It never ceases to amaze me how this relatively simple practice of giving kind, loving attention to our experience—just our moment-to-moment experience, our thoughts, our emotions, our breath, our body, just being present for whatever arises—what a profound effect this has on how we understand ourselves and how we understand life. It can really change how we live with ourselves, and thus when we return from a retreat back into our daily life, can really have a profound effect on how we live with others. By taking this conscious time to step out of the daily routine, we're committing a conscious act that will allow us to live with ourselves and with society in much greater harmony.

Because we are living a little more closely aligned with what is really true about ourselves, what is really true about the world. Instead of existing in this state where I always feel like I'm trying to fit a square peg into a round hole somehow in daily life and wondering why it doesn't work—it's because we're not really seeing ourselves as we are, we're not really meeting the world as it is. We're always wishing it was a little bit different or thinking that we're a little bit different.

This practice opens us to just being who we are, as we are, without a lot of elaboration or embellishment. To let ourselves be with ourselves as we are—not with resignation and disgust, but with real kindness, acceptance, and compassion, with a real love for the truth of who we are.

Today when I was thinking about speaking tonight, I remembered a book that I had read a couple of years ago about hermits in different cultures, in different historical traditions. I really enjoyed reading it because of being so deeply enmeshed in the retreat culture, and seeing how through all cultures where there is recorded history, there is some strain of a hermit culture embedded within it, more or less respected.

What we're doing here in our way—whether you're here for a little over two weeks, whether you're here for nine days, whether you're here for a year, whatever it is—we are, in this culture, partaking of that life of the hermit. A deliberate, conscious withdrawal from all the entanglements and enjoyments of society, a deliberate withdrawal into solitude. I know this isn't total solitude, but a silence, an internal solitude, a simplicity of lifestyle, a real giving up of your own control of your meals, your schedule, your sleeping quarters—not just to avoid things, but to really set the conditions for deep inner discovery.

Using the conditions of the solitude, the silence, the simplicity, not just for a breather—it's not like a vacation in Bali. You might wish in a couple of days you were on vacation in Bali, but that'll pass. This is a way to really strengthen our understanding so that we can then re-emerge back into society from a deeper, more whole place.

One of the modern Western cultural examples of a hermit type, who's quite well known, is Thomas Merton, the Trappist monk. In reading about him, he really wanted to be much more of a hermit than he was mostly allowed to be by his order. He was writing and very famous and always having to live with others and travel around. But he really studied in himself the power and effects of solitude and the deep reasons for it.

One of the things he says about it is: "Withdrawal from other people can be a special form of love for them. It should never be a rejection of humans or society, but this withdrawal may well be a quiet and humble refusal to accept the myths and fictions with which our social life cannot help but be full, especially today. To despair of the illusions and facades which humans build around themselves is certainly not to despair of humanity. On the contrary, it's a sign of love for humanity. For when we love someone, we refuse to tolerate what destroys and maims their personality."

I really resonate with that. Our society—we all know it's crazy. All societies in their own way are crazy. And our deliberate choice to withdraw is really in order to love ourselves and to love other humans more deeply and more fully, by seeing what's really true rather than just being in the thrall of our habitual attitudes, of the habitual intensity of this society that we live in, of the cultivation of greed, of the cultivation of fear, of the need to protect.

To withdraw to a safe place, which Sharon will talk about more, allows us to open much more deeply to what is true. And then to emerge really in a different space.

So often people who don't understand why you're coming on retreat never really understand why one is coming on retreat. And it's pretty impossible to explain it in a way that they get it. Even a lot of people who come on retreats have a little place where they're wondering if they're just being self-indulgent and denying our common humanity. Although deep in us, we know it's not the case, because we come out different.

One of my favorite stories from this whole book is about one of the desert fathers in Egypt in the days of the early Christians. These men were really serious hermits out there in the desert, really serious. One of the most famous of them was called St. Antony of Egypt, and he was born into a very wealthy Christian family.

But at some point in his young adulthood, hearing the teachings of Jesus where he said, "Sell all you have and give to the poor," Antony took this literally, much to his parents' dismay, and sold everything he had and took off for the desert.

And he lived alone way out in some cave way down the Nile somewhere for twenty years without seeing a human face. Every six months, friends of his would come and bring food and the supplies that he needed, but he wouldn't see them. And sometimes they would hear these heart-rending horrible screams and yelling and all kinds of commotion going on behind the barrier in his cave.

Finally, after twenty years, they couldn't stand it anymore. His friends broke down the door. And it says here they expected to release a wasted and emaciated maniac. That's what they were expecting. Instead, Antony emerged healthy, sane, balanced, and full of kindness and ability to help people. And for the rest of his life, he alternated between periods of solitude and really going and giving support and advice and help to people who were in trouble.

I love that. And somewhere in the middle of this retreat, you might remember that period of the shrieks and groans. That's part of it too. As you know, having done retreats before, it's a real rollercoaster ride.

We need the seclusion. We need the support. We need the solitude and inner silence to give ourselves the space to let whatever we haven't been really comfortable with come up into the light. And the power of the mindfulness or the metta gives us the calmness of mind and the courage of heart to let it be—to really see it with a calm heart, with clear eyes, and to recognize that whatever it is we've been holding away or driven by, we don't have to be so driven by. We don't have to be so scared of. We can actually meet it with courage and kindness. And this gives us a real strength of heart and compassion for humanity that will inform the way we are with people once we leave our hermit's cave here.

Thich Nhat Hanh often says that we think we're leaving society when we come on retreat, but we find out that really society comes with us because we are society. There's no way that we are really isolating ourselves. What we find in our exploration of our own heart and mind and thoughts is our commonality with all humans. And once we realize that and meet our own stuff with compassion rather than disgust, with kindness rather than hating ourselves for not being perfect, then we find that we don't have to only be in retreat to feel this commonality, this courage and kindness in the face of our own stuff, in the face of other people's.

I want to close with something from Pema Chödrön. People often say, "Meditation is all very well, but what does it have to do with my life?" What it has to do with your life is that perhaps through the simple practice of paying attention, giving loving kindness to your speech and your actions and the movements of your mind, you begin to realize that you're always standing in the middle of a sacred circle. And that's your whole life. It's not this room that's the sacred circle. IMS is not the sacred circle. Wherever you go for the rest of your life, you're always in the middle of the universe. And the sacred circle is always around you. Everyone who walks up to you has entered the sacred space. And it's not an accident.

So thank you for coming here into your sacred space.

Between the pizza and the television and the trip to Bali and the shrieks in the grounds, I wondered when I opened my eyes how many of you would still be here. That was great. It's great to leave it all behind.

So I'd also like to welcome you. And we'll formally begin the retreat, as is traditional, by undertaking what are known as the Three Refuges and the Five Precepts.

First, this is a quotation from a Tibetan text which says: "Beneath the pauper's house there are inexhaustible treasures, but the pauper never realizes this, and the treasures never say, 'I am here.' Likewise, the treasure of our original nature, which is naturally pure, is trapped in ordinary mind, and beings suffer in poverty."

This is something Carol just alluded to—this sense of our having an original nature that is pure. And so, as she said, we come together to an experience like this as an act of discovery and reconnection to something that is already there. Though it may be hidden from us, it is something that once we connect to, can support us tremendously through all the different kinds of experiences we have.

The wonderful thing about a retreat, also as Carol was saying, is its mirror-like reflection of real life with the ups and the downs and the changes and so many different kinds of experiences. It's not really a vacation from stuff, but it's a tremendous opportunity to radically transform our relationship to what arises in our experience—our bodies, our minds—and to connect to the world in a very different way.

So this inner treasure, this original nature, is reflected in what is called in Buddhism the Three Jewels.

That is the object of our taking refuge. We take refuge as an act of aligning our vision to what is possible, expanding our sense of what is possible, and linking our own potential to these external expressions of awakening, of freedom, of compassion.

The first of the refuges is that of the Buddha himself. The Buddha, in this tradition of teaching, has always been described as being a human being—a human being who had some very profound questions about the nature of life. He more or less asked: What does it mean to be a human being? To be born into this human body, to be helpless as an infant, so vulnerable, subject to conditions? To grow up, to grow old whether we like that or not, to die whether we like that or not?

And what does it mean to have a human mind which can careen from one feeling to another, one view to another, so that we might wake up in the morning full of doubt and then by mid-afternoon be full of faith? We're happy and sad and angry and joyful—constant movement, fluctuation. Without it being subject to our whim or wish or dictum. How successful is it to wake up and say, "Okay, I've suffered enough. I will never be afraid again. I will never fall asleep in meditation again." Things don't seem to work that way.

And yet the Buddha asked: Is there a quality of happiness that we can experience as human beings that will not break, that will not shatter as the conditions of the body and the mind change outside of our control? What is that peace or that happiness that isn't so fragile, that isn't so dependent? And how do we experience it? This was his driving quest.

What the Buddha discovered in terms of an answer or a resolution to those questions, he discovered through the power of his own awareness. And so can we. This is the capacity of the human mind—to learn, to understand, to grow, to be free.

When we take refuge in the Buddha, it's really not just an act of paying respect to a historical figure of 2,500 years ago. It's very much a reflection of what we ourselves are capable of as human beings. It's like a reminder. And taking refuge in the Buddha doesn't really have anything to do with adopting a set of beliefs or a dogma or calling oneself a Buddhist.

One of my early teachers, a man named Munindra, was quite wonderful with one-liners. One of his great comments to me, which changed a lot of things for me, was when he said, "The Buddha's enlightenment solved the Buddha's problem. Now you solve yours." It was this fantastic moment because it actually felt like maybe it was the first time in my life somebody was looking at me with that kind of conviction: You can solve your problem. You can solve the problems that led you to want to come to India to begin with, to learn how to meditate.

So we take refuge in the Buddha really as a reminder of that fact. We can solve our problem. Our question may not be exactly the same as the Buddha's, but it's something like that. And through the power of our own awareness, we too can come to some resolution, some answer.

The second of the three jewels is the Dharma. Dharma is sometimes translated as the Buddhist teaching, the path. In more depth it means the nature of things, the laws of nature, the truth of things, things as they are. Another meaning it has is that which supports us, that which sustains us.

To take refuge in the Dharma is to align ourselves with the truth of things so that we can come close to what our actual experience is, face to face. It's the extraordinary opportunity of this kind of supportive environment—that's all we need to do. We don't have to pretend anything to ourselves or to somebody else. We use the truth of each moment's experience, whatever it is, to come closer to more fundamental underlying truths, because that's where it's found.

There's a saying in the Chinese tradition: If you want to understand the nature of water, look at the waves. So we look at the waves of all our different kinds of experiences, and there will be many different kinds, because each one of them speaks a certain truth. This is taking refuge in the Dharma—being willing just to be with the truth of change, things as they are, and see what we might discover.

It also means that it's an unfolding process. We don't have to force it. We don't have to make it happen faster. We can bring ourselves close to the truth of each moment's experience and let the rest unfold. Let the laws of nature take care of the rest.

The third of the refuges is the Sangha, which means the community. A very classical meaning of that word is the community of monks and nuns who, in the Buddhist tradition, have preserved the teaching of the Buddha through all of these centuries so that what we get to practice here now in Barre, Massachusetts, bears a direct resemblance to what the Buddha actually taught. It contains the essential teaching of his discovery of a path. And so it's a way of paying respect to that sense of tradition.

Sangha also means those beings who have made a commitment to discovery, to understanding, to finding a different quality altogether of happiness in their lives than the ordinary, conventional, and breakable happiness that we normally depend on—those beings who have taken a risk, who've had the courage to try to see more deeply, and who have discovered the truth.

And so we take refuge in the Sangha because again it means something about ourselves and what we're capable of. I know that I've always found that very inspiring when I take refuge in the Sangha, in this sense of Sangha. I feel almost like I'm joining into a stream of beings, of men and women who since the beginning of time have been daring enough to want to find a greater degree of happiness and have put forth the effort and have made that kind of discovery. So I feel encouraged and inspired by their example because I feel like I've become a part of that in my own efforts.

And Sangha also has a meaning of community very much in the sense of we who have gathered here together have created a community, we've created a world together. And we support one another. It's like an act of solidarity. Sometimes it's easier to do together. This kind of practice, even though we are very much practicing solitude and aloneness, it's in the midst of a great amount of group support.

So these are the three refuges that mark the formal beginning of the retreat. It's aligning ourselves with this vision and expanding our sense of what is possible.

And then we take what are known as the five precepts, which are the guidelines that lay the foundation for the community so that it can be a community based on kindness and self-respect, respect for others, real care, and simplicity. We undertake these precepts for the time that we are here together to define the fabric of our togetherness, the nature of being here in a way that is based on compassion.

The first of the precepts is the precept we undertake not to kill any living being, which includes small beings like bugs and insects, to see if we can use this time as a time where we are not creating that kind of sense of self and other, but are rather developing a reverence for all of life.

We undertake a precept to refrain from stealing, which means not to take that which has not been offered, that which has not been given. In a deeper meaning, it means having a certain spirit of contentment or ease with what we are offered.

We undertake a precept to refrain from sexual activity, which in normal life, outside of retreat life, is to refrain from sexual misconduct—meaning not to use our sexual energy in a way that creates harm or suffering for ourselves or for others. Here that's extended to mean no sexual activity but rather to use all of our energy in this kind of exploration.

We undertake a precept to refrain from lying, which here again is extended to a precept of maintaining silence. There are times when you'll be meeting in groups with us or individually with us where we are speaking, or there might be times when you need to speak to the staff for some reason. But in terms of conversation amongst yourselves, and that includes excessive notes and things like that, we really ask you to try to use this time to make a friend of silence.

I was saying at the beginning of the last retreat, because I had a friend sit that retreat—the metta retreat that we just finished today—and she had never done anything remotely like this before. This was very strange for her. She came the night before because she came from California and that was how her flights went, so I saw her the night before the retreat started. Every time the word silence came up, her eyes got really, really big. It was clear that it was very alarming, the thought. It also became clear that people in her life, like people at work, were astonished at the thought that she wouldn't speak for a week and somewhat contemptuous of the possibility.

I just saw her today when the retreat ended, and she said how much she was going to miss the silence, how much she was going to miss the quiet. The very thing she was most apprehensive about turned out, as is so common, to be just about the most beautiful part of the retreat.

In so many ways it's such a relief not to be so concerned with presenting ourselves to other people, making a certain kind of impression, being somebody in the eyes of others, but really to let go of that, to come back to our own experience, to turn our attention back to ourselves in a way that honors our own experience, that learns to trust it—not in reference to what someone else thinks of it. It's a beautiful thing to really come back to ourselves and to make a friend of silence.

And then we take the last of the precepts: to refrain from taking intoxicants that cloud the mind or cause heedlessness. That means no recreational drugs, no alcohol, but using the power of the mind in its natural state to be able to make this kind of exploration, this kind of journey.

So it's a stepping away from the force of habit, coming into a community that is based on care. Both the refuges and the precepts are about becoming more aware and more compassionate, understanding our minds, our intentions, our limitations in a clearer and kinder light, all of the time.

It's so unusual to be able to come into this kind of situation. It's really pretty amazing when you think about it. Many of you know that this Valentine's Day will mark our 25th anniversary of when we first moved into this building. I got up here tonight and I thought, how many people have come through here in 25 years? And how many people have served here on staff? What an amazing thing that so many people will have wanted to join in this incredible adventure. And so here we are.

I want to read this quotation from the Taoist philosopher Chuang Tzu. He told this story:

"There was a person so displeased by the sight of their own shadow and so displeased with their own footsteps that they determined to get rid of both. The method they hit upon was to run away from them. So they got up and ran. But every time they put their foot down, there was another step, while the shadow kept up with them without the slightest difficulty. They attributed their failure to the fact that they were not running fast enough, so they ran faster and faster without stopping, till they finally dropped dead. They failed to realize that if they merely stepped into the shade, the shadow would vanish. If they sat down and stayed still, there would be no more footsteps."

So we come together here in that kind of courageous choice to be still rather than running away. We have the opportunity to establish a relationship with what is rather than living with some kind of distortion.

It's really an incredible thing. It's also a process that we undertake hopefully with a good sense of humor and a fair ease of heart—not to be heavy-hearted about it, but very much in that sense of discovery, of seeing what will unfold without a lot of expectations, without a lot of impatience.

I'm going to repeat the refuges and precepts in English, and you can repeat them silently to yourself. The refuges are traditionally done three times, and the precepts once. You can repeat them to yourself in a way that is meaningful for you, recognizing the spirit with which we undertake these.

I take refuge in the Buddha.
I take refuge in the Dharma.
I take refuge in the Sangha.

I take refuge in the Buddha.
I take refuge in the Dharma.
I take refuge in the Sangha.

I take refuge in the Buddha.
I take refuge in the Dharma.
I take refuge in the Sangha.

I undertake the precept to refrain from killing any living being.
I undertake the precept to refrain from taking that which has not been offered.
I undertake the precept to refrain from sexual activity.
I undertake the precept to refrain from lying.
I undertake the precept to refrain from taking intoxicants.

We'll meditate together now for just a little while. You can sit comfortably with your back erect without being strained or overarched. You can close your eyes, unless you're accustomed to meditating with your eyes open, or unless you're very sleepy—in which case it's a good idea to open your eyes.

You can begin just by listening to sound. You can listen to the sound of my voice, other sounds in the room, internal sounds. This helps create a sense of the relaxed, natural aspect of mindfulness, of awareness. You don't have to try to seize control of the sound, trying to make it last longer or cut it off or judge it. Just meet it in the moment with your awareness in a very relaxed and natural way.

Feel your body sitting with that same relaxed and natural awareness, whatever sensations you experience. And feel your breath, wherever you experience it most distinctly—the in and out movement of air at the nostrils, or the rising and falling movement of the chest or the abdomen. Let your attention rest in the sensations that you experience without trying to control them or change them. One breath at a time. That same relaxed and open awareness. Letting the breath be however it is. Letting it change.

If you find that your attention has wandered, don't worry about it. As soon as you realize you've gone to the past, you've gone to the future, you've gone to judgment, you've gone to wherever—see if in that moment of recognition you can gently let go, shepherd your attention back, come back in touch with the feeling of the breath. If you have to do that again and again and again, that's fine. Wherever the attention wanders to or however long it's been, you can always let go and begin again.

It's really like the essence of the practice. In that moment, with compassion for yourself, with forgiveness, without judgment, without rancor, see if you can let go and shepherd your attention back to feel the breath.

If by any chance you're not sleeping, this hall is always open for your practice. If you are tired, please take some rest.

The wake-up bell tomorrow morning is at 6:15, with breakfast at 6:45. We'll meet here together at 8:30 in the morning again, and I'll go much more deeply into the instructions.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 332

Acceptance

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines our deep-seated confusion about happiness and liberation. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that liberation comes through non-clinging, she reveals how our unconscious worship of comfort and pleasantness keeps us trapped on a hamster wheel of suffering. Wilson explores how we misinterpret pleasant feelings as "right" and unpleasant feelings as "wrong," bringing this same confused mind into our meditation practice where we chase after blissful states while avoiding difficulty.
>
> Wilson illuminates the role of vedanā (feeling tone) in perpetuating suffering, explaining how our reactions to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences strengthen the sense of separate self. She offers the radical alternative: meeting each moment with full-hearted presence rather than manipulation or avoidance. Through personal stories—including a vivid account of transforming her relationship to a pounding headache through direct mindful attention—she demonstrates how bare experience differs from interpretation, and how true acceptance means intimate connection rather than distant tolerance.
>
> Quoting Joko Beck and Tibetan texts, Wilson emphasizes that meditation practice is meant to disturb our self-centered view of life, not simply to make us feel good. The talk concludes with the story of Kishan Singh, who mapped Tibet through 5.5 million patient footsteps, as a metaphor for practice: one step at a time, with infinite patience that arises from wisdom and compassion rather than resignation.

Since it's really the first full day of suffering, I'd like to talk about acceptance.

We've said a few times, different ones of us in different circumstances, that we are really engaged here in a practice of liberation, whatever form or particular activity might take in a moment.

I'd like to ask you just for a moment to reflect right now on what liberation—that word, or freedom, or whatever word you use—just for a moment, please reflect on what that actually means to you. Either what your deepest motivation is, and also what concepts, what connections come up in your mind around this word of liberation.

I ask you to do that for two reasons. One, of course, as we get in touch with our deepest motivation, this is a wellspring of commitment, a wellspring of energy that we need to touch in with over and over again throughout this retreat, throughout our life, to keep us practicing, to keep us on the path. Because things do get difficult, and we need to really honor our deepest motivation.

But I also ask for another reason: to see in yourself, and to continue to explore over the time here, what concepts come up, what ideas do we hold of what liberation might feel like or look like, what that experience is or will be. It really comes down to what our expectation or idea is that we're holding, perhaps not so consciously, of happiness, of peace.

I think our ideas of liberation, happiness, and peace bear continual examination, because I've found that mostly our unexamined ideas tend to spring from not looking clearly and tend to get in our way.

I'm sure many of you have heard this famous teaching about what the Buddha saw when he was first awakened, how he could look with his all-seeing mind through the world. What aroused his compassion for beings like us was seeing that while everyone's deepest desire is to be truly happy, in our confusion—because we haven't changed much since he was around, it doesn't sound like anyway—in our confusion, in trying to be happy, we keep doing just the things that continue us in this cycle of suffering. And we bring the same confusion as to what happiness is or liberation is into our practice. Of course, it's the same mind.

I'll tell you a little story about this that to me really illustrates how we bring more suffering on ourselves by trying to be happy when we don't really pay attention.

Two friends of mine who live around here told me this. They live in a house, and in this area, as in most country areas, in the winter or summer, mice can easily get into houses. They get into the cupboards, they eat the flour and so forth. So my friends had a mouse, and being good caring beings, they got one of these have-a-heart traps that catches the mouse without hurting it, because they didn't want to hurt it.

So my friend, the woman, was telling me this story. They got up one morning, of course very rushed to go to work, and heard that there was a mouse in the trap but said, "Well, okay, it'll be okay until the evening, and then we'll take care of it," because they were rushed.

She came home in the evening, very tired, and could hear from the other room the mouse just going bonkers, going nuts in this trap—which has a lot of room, but I guess it was just sort of bouncing off the walls and sounding really frantic. Somehow the sound disturbed her so much that she didn't want to deal with it. So she thought, "Well, my husband will take care of it when he comes home," and went to bed.

He came home very late, wasn't of course thinking about the mouse, didn't hear anything, went to bed. And in the morning when they got up, the mouse had died. She felt awful, just awful—like a hundred times worse than she would have felt had she just gone and dealt with the mouse when it was kind of upset.

That's what we do. Without really paying attention, on some level, for most of us, our concept of happiness is linked to pleasant feeling. And our idea of suffering, unhappiness, things being wrong, is connected to unpleasant feeling. This is so basic, but it is so easy for us to bring this interpretation of experience into our practice, so that our commitment to liberation—which is deep, which is genuine, which is why we're here doing this peculiar thing together for three months—it becomes so limited. It becomes so conditional on having the correct circumstances, whether they're the correct external circumstances.

How many of you have already found yourself in deep manipulation, trying to organize your sitting cushion or your room or your food or something about being here so that everything is going to be just right so you can have a good retreat?

How many of you, when you think about a good retreat, does that include a lot of physical pain? Does that include your mind wandering all over? "Yeah, I really hope my mind wanders like crazy this next sitting. I hope my knees hurt like hell." Probably not.

Mostly when we think of a good retreat, we think of—we each have our own story—but some transcendent state of samādhi, some deep state of bliss, no more thoughts from tomorrow noontime until November 15th. Or if we suffer, then we really suffer in a way that is clearly purifying, getting to the bottom of our deepest wellspring of grief. How many of you are thinking, "Okay, I'll battle with sleepiness for a month, and that'll really be an enlightening experience"? Probably not.

This is from Joko Beck. I really like the way she puts this:

"What do we actually honor and pay attention to moment by moment? We might call it the god of comfort and pleasantness and security. Until we honestly see that this is what our lives are about, we will be unable to discover who we really are."

And then she gives a whole list of examples about how we do this in our lives:

"We have many ways to cope with life, many ways we worship comfort and pleasantness. All are based on the same thing: the fear of encountering any kind of unpleasantness. If we must have absolute order and control, it's because we're trying to avoid any unpleasantness. If we have to have things our way and get angry if they're not, then we think we can survive and shut out our anxiety about death. If we pursue life madly, going after any pleasant sensation, any excitement, any entertainment, perhaps we won't have to feel any pain. If we can bliss out, if we can be a mindless Buddha, we don't have to assume any responsibility for the world's unpleasantness. We can just be happy. All of these are versions of the God we actually worship: the God of no discomfort and no unpleasantness."

As we pursue it, we lose touch with what really is, and the very unpleasantness that we sought to avoid can overwhelm us.

I find it fascinating to keep exploring in my practice how, in more and more subtle ways, I find my mind inclining in the same direction. Oh, a little more pleasantness. Unpleasant—I must be doing it wrong. Let's change things around and get back to that pleasant state.

This chase after pleasantness in our life here in retreat brings up an image for me. You know when you have a pet hamster, those wheels in the cage where it just runs and runs and runs endlessly? It's like that. We get on this wheel of running after pleasantness or away from unpleasantness, and the faster we go, the faster the wheel spins, and it just seems more and more oppressive. Until we really stop and look, we don't see that all we have to do is stop. Just stop running. Get off the wheel. And that whole sense of oppressiveness vanishes.

So just to pay attention: do we bring that same mind, the same expectations—subtle expectations of a world heading towards more and more pleasant experience, less and less unpleasant experience—until we finally hit the pinnacle where pleasantness never stops and unpleasantness never raises its head in any of our sixth sense experiences? Which sounds ridiculous. But when I really look, I find that somewhere back there, there's this little unspoken belief that that's really what's going to happen. That's what liberation is.

Well, we can forget it. If we could forget it, it would save us a lot of trouble. The real happiness, the real peace is far more radical and so simple, so immediate, so continuously accessible to us that we just totally overlook it and jump back on that wheel with gay abandon, running after some pleasant experience rather than stopping and looking.

The potential for real peace—happiness that is not dependent on internal or external experience—is our natural state. It is our inherent potential to rest in this peace, in this ease with whatever is arising.

The real secret—I'll tell you this now and then maybe it'll last for the whole retreat—the secret of this whole practice is it doesn't make any difference what's happening in your experience. It makes absolutely no difference. When you come in and tell us in interviews this is going on and that's going on, and we say good, or try this or try that, we're all playing a little game in a way. We keep getting caught in thinking that it really matters what's happening in your experience. Actually, the only thing that contributes to our recognizing peace or our spinning on that wheel is how we're relating to our experience, not what the experience is.

When we really know this—and we might know it just for an instant and then forget it again; that's mostly what we do—but when we really are touching that deep knowing that it doesn't matter what's happening now, we stop all the fighting, the manipulating, the trying to hold on, the interpreting, the reactivity of mind. We let go and just totally accept this moment as it is, with wakefulness, with open-hearted connection. In that moment of resting at ease, of full presence, there is no problem. There is no further something to look for to make ourselves happy. It's possible to just stop running and open to peace and happiness.

The Buddha said that the supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata—which means himself—which is namely liberation through non-clinging. Liberation through non-clinging. Our natural state: the mind, the heart that is fully connected with whatever is arising without clinging or pushing away or reacting. Whether your knee hurts, whether you're sleepy, whether you have a headache, whether you're deeply connected to the breath, whether there's a lot of rapture, whether you're lost in discursive thought—none of these are what freedom is about. Rather, it is the liberation of the heart and mind through non-clinging. And this is accessible in any moment, no matter what our experience is. That's really the way we practice.

So in that case, it really doesn't matter what's arising. No matter what it is, we have the opportunity to meet this moment fully with a heart and mind of non-clinging. And in that is the possibility to recognize, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, our capacity to wake up, to understand, and to love. In other words, our Buddha nature is always here. Our only problem is that for some reason we don't know how to recognize this.

It's to me the great mystery of our life, of why we practice—that this, whatever you want to call Buddha nature, just the capacity to recognize peace, is always here, always accessible. And we touch it from moment to moment. In the moments we touch it, it's so obvious, so simple. So how come the next moment it's completely gone?

I remember I was sitting this winter for a few weeks—I wish it was a few months—and I had one moment like that, just sitting and looking out my window at the snow, the endless snow.

It just snowed, it seemed like, every day for weeks. And a little bird landed on a branch of the tree, which is really all I could see out of this window. And in that moment, my heart and mind was just very awake and connected—not lost in all my ruminations about how much I hate the cold and the snow and when would it end, or how gray it was, or anything. Just present.

And in that moment of seeing the bird, there was such a sense of joy, of peace, of simplicity. And it was so obvious that nothing special was happening. I wasn't in some deep jhanic state of absorption. I was just very clear and present and awake. How simple, how accessible that is. It doesn't take some fantastic experience. This is our potential to rest at ease in whatever's arising.

The great paradox and mystery to me is the next moment. The next moment some stupid thought comes up in the mind and there's immediate grasping. "Wow, I wonder what's for tea." I know what's for tea—rice cakes, crackers, and peanut butter. That's been tea every tea time for the last ten years. It probably didn't change. But that thought comes up. What's for tea? Yeah, what's for tea? And grasping—gone, gone. And it could be, you know, another lifetime before that moment of peace and simplicity returns. That's what's so amazing. Not that it's so accessible, yet we go to such lengths to keep ourselves spinning on that hamster wheel.

This is from a Tibetan text: "Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest, like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that this Buddha nature is never impaired or improved on in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very beginning. How amazing that it is liberated by simply resting at ease in whatever happens."

That's my favorite line. How amazing that it is liberated by simply resting at ease in whatever happens. How rare it is that we simply rest at ease in whatever happens—and how immediate, how close that possibility is.

In fact, this liberation of resting at ease in whatever happens requires such an immediacy of connection to experience. There's no room for the slightest moving away out of craving or aversion. Immediate deep intimacy with whatever's arising—that's all that's required. Like when I was so present noticing that bird. Just seeing. And the immediacy with all of life that can bring.

So please notice. Bring it into your conscious awareness whenever you experience this, because we all do, and I really believe we experience this many, many times in a day—this immediacy, this simplicity of wakeful resting at ease in whatever's arising. But when we don't notice the power of that, it's because we're looking for something a little more spectacular than just seeing a bird land on a branch, or just smelling the scent of fall when you walk outside, or tasting the warmth of tea, or just feeling the pressure on your foot when you take a step, or the sound of a bell, or the chill of coldness, or whatever it happens to be.

And often when we even do recognize that purity, that sense of completeness in a moment like that—we think, "Nothing more could possibly be needed. There's nothing to push away." Sometimes we'll recognize that's happening, but even so, we'll misinterpret. We're so conditioned to look outside for completion or to attribute that sense of completion to something outside. So, for example, we'll say, "Ah, the crispness of fall—it's such a perfect day." Because of this crispness, I'm experiencing this sense of presence and deep happiness. Or because I'm at the meditation center. Or because this is a very special moment with Oolong Kuan Yin tea that I brought with me, and when it runs out I'm really going to have a hard time the rest of the retreat—or whatever our story is.

Notice. Just notice that exquisiteness of presence, and then something else arises, and that's fine. But just begin to tune in when we have these moments.

And the question that keeps arising, of course, is: why? Why do we keep getting lost?

Why do we not recognize what is happening? Why, even knowing this—and I really know this on some level—why then, a minute later, am I so engrossed in the pleasantness of a thought about what's for tea? If we pull back and look, the mind says, give me a break. I don't even care about this. How do we get so seduced?

One way—the way I began with tonight—is by not seeing clearly the actuality of these experiences of pleasantness, unpleasantness, and neutrality. As most of you know, the way the Buddha describes our experience is that moment to moment there are simply six sense experiences arising over and over: seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, sensing with the body, and then mental experience—thoughts, emotions, images—just happening rapidly over and over. That's it. There's nothing else.

First, if we could just see that, things lose a lot of their glamour. It's much easier to rest at ease when it's simply a sight, instead of "Wow, what incredible thing might we have for tea?" Oh, it's just a thought.

Secondly, whenever we experience any of these sense experiences, it comes together with what we call a feeling tone—the Pali word vedana—of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Very basic, just what it is. But what's so intriguing is that when we don't notice this pleasantness, unpleasantness, or neutrality—which very often we don't, because it's quick, subtle—we interpret pleasant as being good, right, the way things should be. Why? Because of course it's pleasant; we like it. The mind immediately moves into clinging, holding on. Unpleasant, of course, the mind immediately moves into pushing away, aversion, fear. And the interpretation we put on unpleasant experience is generally that this is a mistake—something to be fixed, something to be gotten rid of, or that I'm doing something wrong in meditation if this is arising.

And neutral? Well, basically we don't even notice that neutral is happening. And if we do notice, we get bored. In fact, I've often noticed in meditation that when there's a period of calm—which actually happens to be one of the seven factors of enlightenment—very often the mind will actually whip up a huge suffering scenario rather than just sit and be calm. Just watch and see: getting completely into something that never even happened but that might happen if certain conditions came together, and if it did happen, I would be really angry. We spend an hour on that rather than be with the calmness of the breath.

Just notice in your meditation today, in your meditation tomorrow: do these interpretations of pleasant as right, unpleasant as wrong, neutral as basically not existing or boring—do these become how we evaluate our practice, how we evaluate our life? We get so involved in these evaluations, these reactions. This is how we're running on the wheel, instead of just noticing the bare sense experience itself.

It's hard to see through this habit. One reason is that it's so deeply conditioned we often don't even notice it. This is what I meant by seeing for myself more and more subtly how I get caught in trying to manipulate my practice to get back to some quietly pleasant state I was experiencing. And the more you know about practice, the more you can find a really good interpretation of why that's the appropriate thing to do.

I know that when mindfulness is strong, the sense of choiceless awareness is really open and flowing—there's no constriction, everything's expanded—which of course feels a lot better than when there's contraction, when we're caught in some kind of fear. So we try to subtly push back to that open space of choiceless awareness. And besides, that fits the instructions better, so that must be what's supposed to happen. This constriction, this tightness, is clearly wrong, and I've got to get back to the other. In some form or other. Just keep watching how we do that. It's really tricky.

The pleasant-unpleasant-neutral happens quickly. We're so used to believing the interpretation that we often don't notice we're even doing it. And another thing that makes it hard to see through is that this habit of running after pleasant and fearing unpleasant very strongly conditions and strengthens the sense of self. Because what does it all refer back to? Who is experiencing pleasant or unpleasant? Who cares? Only one person cares. Me. And when we look at our life or our practice, when I look at myself trying to manipulate in some subtle way, this sense of Carol who wants to have good practice, or Carol needs to be liberated, or whatever it is—

Carol is really a strong, separate, solid concept at that moment. We take it all so personally when we're running on this hamster wheel. My sitting, my unpleasant experience, my bliss, my enlightenment—whatever it is.

And because the sense of separate self is really our baseline, solid delusion, it's the hardest one to see through. So you put these two together—our interpretation of pleasant and unpleasant, not seeing that clearly, and the fact that this strengthens our sense of separate self—well, you see how they feed each other. Just pay attention and watch that.

It's hard from this state to touch that place where we can really trust that the way to open our hearts, to rest at ease, to touch peace, is not to get rid of what we don't like in ourselves or in our surroundings. It's much more radical, because the path of freedom is to meet whatever's arising full-heartedly. Full openness of attention, total connection, just as it is. To be with things just as they are is the path of freedom. And that's what we practice moment to moment.

This is from the Buddha. He says, "When someone sees objects with the eye and is attracted, is drawn into the things that are pleasing and is repelled, pushed away from the things that are not pleasing, that are unpleasant, that person dwells without mindfulness and her mind, her heart, is restricted. She does not experience the emancipation of heart through wisdom. But in the case when a person sees objects with the eye and is not attracted, is not pulled to things that are pleasing and is not repelled by things that are not pleasing, she dwells with mindfulness present and her mind is unbounded. Thus she experiences the emancipation of heart through wisdom." And he goes, of course, through all the six senses.

It sounds so simple, but it also doesn't sound that exciting. And if you think about it, there's not much sense of "me" in it. It's not so juicy. Just seeing a sight, and the mind and heart are not attracted to the pleasant and not repelled by the unpleasant. And thus we dwell with mind unbounded, and the heart experiences emancipation through wisdom. Simply through being able to see through this attraction to the pleasant and fear of the unpleasant.

It's an extremely powerful place to investigate. There's a reason why the Buddha, when he described the four foundations of mindfulness, only picking four, made this aspect of vedana, of feeling tone, the second one. Because by exploring our confusion around happiness, we can really experience the mind and heart that is unbounded—unbounded, connected, a life that is at peace, that's joyful.

Joko Beck puts it in a lovely way: it's the movement from a self-centered view of life to a life-centered view of life. When we're caught in going for comfort, everything refers back to me, me, me. I'm the center of everything. When we can let go of that, when the mind is unbounded, our view of life becomes life-centered, which includes us. We're part of life. But our decisions, our choices, come from what is most nurturing to life, to all beings, to whatever surrounds us as a whole—not just what can bring me pleasantness. It's quite radical.

When we describe this, perhaps you can see why meditation practice, why a three-month retreat, can at times be so difficult. Because these habits—just the habit of preferring the pleasant, our fear of what's difficult—this habit is so strong. And the way we set up our meditation is specifically to keep us from being able to indulge this habit on a moment-to-moment basis.

Just the fact that we all sit in a room together and we tell you that you can't leave until the bell rings. And there's eighty other people who'll notice if you do. I mean, we don't say that, but you all know it. How many of us would get up and leave when we get sleepy, or our foot falls asleep, or we just get really restless? But no, because of the setup, we sit here. Just that is a really strong way that we begin to break this habit of avoiding the unpleasant and to see that we can come to a deep peace even though my foot hurts or I'm restless.

So meditation can be quite difficult because we are confronting these habits of mind over and over and over—not only the habit itself, but the interpretation that something's wrong because we're not feeling blissful and pleasant all the time.

This is Joko Beck again. She's talking about teaching in her center. She says, "The function of teaching in a center like this is to help us see the alternative and to disturb us in our selfishness. So long as we are caught in the self-centered viewpoint of life, governed by wanting to feel good or blissful or enlightened, we need to be disturbed. We need to be upset. A good center and a good teacher assist that." You thought we were here to make you feel good.

"Enlightenment is, after all, simply an absence of any concern for self. Don't come to this center to feel better. That's not what this place is about. What I want," Joko Beck says, "are lives that get bigger so that they can take care of more things and more people."

I love it.

She's so direct. It's like, let's not fool around.

So we're not here specifically to make you feel miserable either. That's not what I'm trying to say. We need to open to the difficult as well as opening and being fully present for the beautiful, for the pleasant, without clinging or pushing away either one.

But the practice is about shaking us up—shaking us up in our self-centered view of the world, shaking up any remnant you may have. Maybe you're all beyond this, but if you find anywhere in a corner of your mind any remnant of going after pleasant as the way to freedom, we're here to shake you up. The practice itself, that's what it does. It shakes us up. And the shake-up is the gift of the Dharma. It's the gift of our practice.

If we could manipulate life in a way that we could make it all comfortable and secure and happy, well, none of us would be here, that's for sure. Clearly it doesn't work. What we can also do is begin to appreciate the shaking up process.

And my friend with the mouse—the last little part of that story is that as she was telling me how badly she felt when she realized that mouse had died because she didn't want to deal with some unpleasantness, the additional anguish of that actually shook her up to the point where she became really connected again. Whereas before it was just, "This is unpleasant, push it away"—not even another living being. She really thought, "God, this mouse was a living being. It was hungry, it was thirsty, it was scared."

And although she was opening much more deeply to her own pain, again she was connected through herself and her pain and that mouse to all of life. She was, in telling me this story, very deeply awake again and connected and flowing.

Sometimes our shaking up, at least here mostly, will only affect ourselves. Sometimes in life, when we shut ourselves off out of fear of unpleasantness, it does affect other beings as well.

So our practice here is giving us the tools to meet this challenge, because it's not easy. We will be shaken up over and over, or we will be seduced by the beautiful and the lovely over and over—but then we'll get shaken up when it changes, because it will.

And the tools that our practice gives us, as we've mentioned and as we will continue to mention, are the tools of mindfulness and concentration. Not to change experience, because no amount of meditation will take away the potential for unpleasant experience. No amount of meditation saves us from loss or sickness or death. There's no way we can get out of that.

But mindfulness and concentration and our practice—our continual meeting of experience as it is—can completely transform our attitude to these experiences, and that changes everything.

So mindfulness, as Michelle mentioned very briefly last night, and of course we'll talk about this over and over, is a quality of very awake, connected attention meeting whatever's arising in a moment—a sound, a sight, a physical feeling, a thought—very directly, without reactivity, without judgment, without interpretation.

And this is the trick that I want to talk about at the moment: to be able to be with the bare experience, what we call bare attention, without confusing the bare experience with our interpretation of experience. And in this the concentration is very helpful because it helps us have a steady enough mind to go right to the sense experience.

So for example, if I ring the bell, the bare experience is just hearing. The interpretation is even "bell," what you think about the bell, how loud it is, whether you like it or not, comparing it with other bells, does it mean the end of a sitting, how many times you ring the bell, thinking about when you're going to have to ring the bell when you're a practice leader, and on and on and on. The bare experience, mindfulness, is just hearing.

And we need to practice this over and over because so easily we confuse the bare experience with our interpretation. And it's in the interpretation that we get lost in reactivity and jump back on that wheel.

An example: in a retreat this summer here, a woman told us after it was over that she'd been spending days here in the hall—she was sitting in the front row—and she said there was a sound in the hall that was completely ruining her concentration. She didn't say what this sound was, but it was very continuous. I don't know if it was another yogi or maybe this clock that you can hear ticking if you're close when it gets very quiet.

But she said this sound was ruining her concentration, really ruining her sitting, and she was getting really aggravated, really angry. Apparently she went through this for some days, until it occurred to her—or she heard one of us say, I mean we say it every day about ten times, but we hear it when we're ready—something about, "Oh, why don't you just be with the bare experience of hearing?"

And so she did that. And she said, "You know what? It was just hearing. It was just a sound. It wasn't disturbing my concentration. My mind, my reactivity—that was disturbing my concentration. The sound is just what it is." Hearing—maybe pleasant, maybe unpleasant, maybe neutral.

This is really radical, because when we can meet experience with this connected quality, this is mindfulness—connected and open, free of interpretation. It opens us to a whole different relationship with the moment, and thus the potential for resting at ease in whatever it is that's arising. We need to practice it because we're so easily confused.

We often don't even know what's an interpretation. This is one of the reasons we cultivate some samādhi, some steadiness of mind during the retreat, especially in the first days. Because without that steadiness, when there's a sound that's really bothering you, it's hard to even realize that all the thoughts and anger and "it's ruining my concentration"—that those are thoughts. It just seems like a whole gestalt. And it's hard to have the steadiness to get through to the bare experience.

So the concentration really gives us this steadiness. The mindfulness gives us the power of seeing things as they are, to then rest at ease. We can do this with sounds. We can do it with physical sensations. We can do it with emotions. And sometimes it seems counterintuitive, especially when we're in a situation of suffering, because the mindfulness says go right into the experience that seems to be the cause of the suffering rather than move away from it. That going into the experience is where peace is found. So we need to practice, so that we believe it because we know it from our own experience—not because I'm telling you, but because you really experienced it yourself.

An example: sometimes when I sleep a little bit wrong, or my pillow's a little too high, my vertebrae get thrown off, and I can have a really pounding headache that lasts a few days. Once, during a retreat I was doing this summer, I'd had that headache all day. On one level, I was sort of working at acceptance—what I call the appearance of acceptance: "Okay, here's the headache. I can live with the headache. It's okay." But that's appearances, because I'm saying the right things, trying to pretend it isn't bothering me. My attention is really not going anywhere close to the headache. It's as far out of my body as I could possibly get. And the way I was feeling was, not surprisingly, very disconnected, very cut off, not at all at ease with what was happening. Some aversion, some negativity.

Finally—and this is what's so amazing, why does it take us so long?—finally it dawned on me: why don't you try bringing attention fully into the actual physical experience itself, what I'm calling "headache"? Just move right into it. Which I did. And it's immediate, just like that. The headache—no, the headache didn't go away. The headache stayed there. It was still unpleasant. It wasn't like, "Oh, I'm so glad, I can't tell if it's pleasant or unpleasant." It was unpleasant. But the whole sense of separation, this whole sense of constriction and suffering, vanished. And in fact, you can experience that sense of the heart and the mind as unbounded. Because the boundedness is the constriction of fear, of separation, of trying to control. As soon as I was fully present with the unpleasant physical sensation, the mind and heart were unbounded. There was again a sense of appreciation. I was in a very beautiful place. The weather was beautiful. The people in the retreat were wonderful. And a great sense of happiness began to come in. I still had a headache. And I didn't like it any better. But that sense of separation and boundedness was gone.

This is the power of mindfulness. The power of acceptance, of clear seeing, of being fully present. Mindfulness is participatory. Often we get the sense that to be mindful, because it's non-reactive, it's sort of objective—that it means we're looking at something from a distance, as it were. Looking at the headache from over here—that was what I was calling a kind of false acceptance. It seemed like acceptance because I wasn't in a big reaction, but it wasn't true acceptance because there was no connecting with the experience. True mindfulness, true acceptance is a deep connection. Seeing something, being with something just as it is, right in the middle of it. And the mind, the heart, is non-reactive. The mind and the heart are unbounded. This is really the function of our practice.

This mindfulness, samadhi, and all of our practice gives us the tools to recognize this potential over and over. The only other attitude that we need is infinite patience. Infinite patience. One step at a time, over and over and over.

Because as much as we will experience the potential of liberation, when we can rest at ease, just as often again we'll lose that sense and get caught up in some reaction, some interpretation, some wanting things to be different, some trying to move away from our knee pain, some thinking, "I've been doing this long enough already—three months, three weeks, twenty-five years, isn't it enough? Don't we ever see it and just rest there?"

So we come back to this infinite patience, one step at a time.

Here is an example of infinite patience. In the middle of the 1800s, the English, who at that time were in India, felt they needed, for security reasons, to have a map of Tibet. But they weren't allowed into Tibet. No Westerners were allowed into Tibet to map it. So they devised a plan where they hired some Indian civil servants that they called pundits. They paid these men something like twenty rupees a month. They trained them for months so that no matter how they walked—uphill, downhill, any direction—the length of their stride would always be exactly the same.

Then they sent these men into Tibet to measure and map the country by counting their footsteps. They had rosaries like the Tibetan monks used, but with one hundred beads instead of one hundred and eight because they had to be in disguise. They were risking their lives to do this for twenty rupees a month. They would count on this rosary—every little bead was one hundred steps, so one round of the rosary was 5.2 miles.

One man whose name I think we should know—his name was Kishan Singh—did this for four and a half years. He walked 5.5 million steps to map out the perimeter of East Tibet. So when we say one step at a time, just think of that. And since he didn't know where he was going—there was no map, there was no way to know when he reached some goal—it was just this step, this step, this step. That's our practice here.

And to know that patience is not a form of weakness or a form of subtle aversion, of denial, of "the best I can do is grit my teeth, take one step at a time, because basically I'm a failure as a yogi, so I'll just take this next breath." Patience actually is an aspect of metta, of loving-kindness, of open-hearted connectedness, and it arises from seeing things as they truly are—knowing that life is in constant flux, that as soon as something pleasant arises it will pass and something unpleasant will come, and as soon as something unpleasant is here it will last a while and go away and something pleasant will come. All of our attempts at manipulation and controlling and self-referenced activity arise from our confusion, from not seeing things as they really are.

This deep patience, open-hearted acceptance, is not weakness. It's the incredible strength of the heart of wisdom, the heart of compassion, that sees that life is made up of the incredibly beautiful and of suffering and horror that we can hardly imagine sometimes. Our challenge is not to deny the horror and hold on to the pleasant, or to be afraid of the pleasant and think we need to dive into horror, but to find that we can hold both in our heart, hold both in our experience.

With this clear seeing comes a strength of heart and mind that allows us to know—acceptance doesn't mean you never change anything, it doesn't mean being victims. But with the strength of heart, of clear seeing, we can see which things can be changed and change them out of compassion, not out of reactivity. We can see which things cannot be changed and meet that with the great-hearted courage of mindfulness, of clear seeing, of resting at ease in whatever happens, opening to all aspects. This is really what our practice is about.

And out of this, it's really not dismal. An incredible connectedness and joy and aliveness comes from this, which I know you all know or you wouldn't be here.

I want to close with a poem. It's strong, but I love it because to me it expresses how out of the depth of suffering, when we meet it with full-heartedness, the beauty and joy and mystery of life is present. This is from Anna Akhmatova, the Russian poet, and she wrote this in 1921, in the middle of the Russian Revolution and Civil War, when there was immense death, starvation, poverty, fear:

Everything is plundered, betrayed, sold.
Death's great black wing scrapes the air.
Misery gnaws to the bone.
Why then do we not despair?

By day, from the surrounding woods, cherries blow summer into town.
At night, the deep transparent skies glitter with new galaxies.

And the miraculous comes so close to the ruined dirty houses—something not known to anyone at all, but wild in our breast for centuries.

The miraculous comes so close to the ruined dirty houses.

Let's just sit for a moment.

This article is based on a dharma talk given by the teacher.

CHAPTER 333

Opening To It All

Carol Wilson · 1h56

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the great paradoxes of practice and life: that in opening, we open not only to great beauty but also to great suffering. Drawing from observations of baby birds in the harsh desert and her transformative visit to Bodh Gaya, she explores how we can hold both the exquisite and the painful aspects of experience.
>
> Wilson examines the pure qualities of mind—non-greed (generosity), non-hatred (mettā, compassion, patience), and non-delusion (clarity, insight)—and why we often fail to recognize them when present. She addresses the tendency to discount positive experiences while identifying strongly with difficulties, and how this creates unnecessary suffering. The talk draws on psychological research about self-deception and selective perception to illuminate how deeply conditioned our minds are to avoid the unpleasant and grasp the pleasant.
> The teaching emphasizes that mindfulness is non-discriminating awareness that can illuminate these habitual filters of greed, hatred, and delusion. When we see these patterns clearly, they lose their power over us. Wilson concludes with a reading from Alexander Solzhenitsyn about finding spiritual growth even in the Gulag, demonstrating that incredible suffering can open to equally incredible beauty. The talk includes James Baraz's reflections on Earth Day and how our inner practice connects to global healing.

One of the great paradoxes to me in practice and just in living life on this earth is that in opening, we open not only to great beauty but also to great suffering. Somehow there's this incredibly sublime part of experience and a real unbearable part of experience, and we often experience both of them—often together, almost at the same time.

I thought of giving a whole talk that was just examples of this because as I considered it I could come up with one after the other, but I'll give just two.

Today, two different people in interviews told me about a little nest of baby birds. James and I went out and saw it in one of those really vicious looking cholla bushes. Buried deep down inside this forbidding plant is a tiny little nest with four tiny birds. Baby birds, so vulnerable and so tender—the miracle of birth, the real beauty of that—in the harshness, the forbidding climate of this desert. And knowing that the chances they'll survive are maybe fifty-fifty.

Another example, again from the desert: back to those baby bunnies. When they first came out, just barely alive, not really knowing—is this the life that's coming out of birth really going to be new life? Or are they barely alive because they're on the point of going back into death? It was such a unique space to be in, kind of witnessing this very tender borderline between birth and death and the beauty and the pain of that. Knowing that this is something that happens all the time, everywhere in life. It turned out to be death because the mother wasn't around for whatever reason, because the climate's too harsh, because the world is the way it is.

Nature has this incredible beauty and this incredible harshness—the sublimely beautiful and the exquisitely painful. Our life encompasses both. And what our practice is about is opening very deeply to both.

Because the suffering aspect, the difficult, painful aspect of life is so unbearable, and we have been so conditioned unconsciously to avoid this, to move away from this because it's so hard to open to—that's the reason it's the first noble truth that the Buddha felt necessary to proclaim: yes, life is unsatisfactory. For that reason, it can seem a great deal of emphasis in our practice is on seeing, accepting, really being fully present for that which is difficult, that which is painful.

There's no question but that everyone here has had ample opportunity to do that, even just today—probably even just in the extension of the schedule today. It might have brought up a lot more physical pain than you had before, maybe more emotional difficulty. Maybe things got so quiet that that was really scary. There's endless variations.

It is necessary for us in our practice as in our life to really get in contact with the painful when it's what is happening in the moment. It's necessary because freedom from the suffering—not freedom from painful experience, but freedom from suffering—comes about through our directly facing, through our seeing it and understanding it for what it is.

But at times, it seems in practice, as also in life, we can get so focused on seeing these difficulties, on working with opening to the difficulties, really becoming aware of the manifestations of greed, of aversion or anger, of confusion, delusion, identification in the mind. We start to see them and we can become so aware of them that it can be really depressing, almost overwhelming, discouraging. We can lose sight of what we're doing here, lose sight of our inspiration, just seeing this seemingly endless array of painful, difficult experience.

So what I want to talk about tonight is the importance, yes, of seeing the difficult experience, but the importance of balancing it with appreciation of the pleasant, of the beautiful, of the sublime when that's what happens to be present in the moment. To be able to open to appreciation as well as open to suffering, and to see ways that we can sometimes get lost in the suffering—that our relationship to it can distort our perception of what's actually going on, even in the practice, even with our full best intentions to be present for just what is.

I think it's important to remember, it's something I reflect on, remind myself of from time to time, that these qualities of greed, of hatred, of confusion, of delusion—they are not our intrinsic nature. It's not the true inseparable nature of our mind and heart to be filled with greed and hatred and delusion. It's not an inseparable part of our experience.

The pure nature of our mind is clear and radiant, and often we lose sight of that. It's like these difficulties, these discouragements of the heart, these distortions of seeing are like clouds that come and cover the sun of the purity of our mind and heart. We get so involved in seeing the clouds, we become identified with the clouds, and we think that's all there is. In our experience sometimes that's all we're aware of, that's all we see. And so it's important not to lose track of the pure shining nature of the sun.

Our practice is about opening to both the sublimely difficult and the sublimely beautiful, and everything in between.

I want to mention some aspects of this pure nature of mind, simply so that we can recognize them when they're present, which sounds simple, but it's something we often forget to do.

In Buddhist terminology, these aspects of mind are classified as non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. It sounds kind of negative, kind of passive, but really they're much more active, experiential qualities of mind, very positive.

Non-greed encompasses the qualities of generosity, of outflowing energy of the heart, qualities of sharing, of sacrifice, even of renunciation, of non-attachment.

Non-hatred, again, is the active qualities of mettā, of non-discriminating loving-kindness, the active qualities of compassion, of forgiveness, of patience, of acceptance. All of that's non-hatred. It doesn't just mean we stop hating and go numb.

And non-delusion is when confusion is not present in the mind—there's a real brightness, a real clarity of mind, a clarity of perception. This leads to insight, to real equanimity, to real evenness with our experience, to understanding.

Now, all of these different aspects—at various times, we experience all of them. They're not highly esoteric, unobtainable qualities of mind. They're accessible to all of us. And at various moments when confusion or hatred or greed isn't present in the mind, we can experience and do experience these qualities. It's really important to recognize them when they're present. That's all. Not trying to make them happen and not looking for something, but just recognizing when—oh, clarity is present right now. Patience is present right now. Really important.

Sometimes even talking about these possibilities of clarity, of metta, of compassion, these possibilities of existing in these states—even that can sound discouraging to people. Because they think, well, yeah, that sounds really nice to have a mind of boundless metta, but I know what my mind looks like, and it's filled with boundless greed and selfishness. Forget it. It's way out of my league. And it's so easy to get into comparing—well, I could never... Now that person who is moving so slowly and mindfully, I bet they really have a lot of clarity, and I can just hang it up right now.

It can get really discouraging. It's important to remember when we're seeing a lot of clinging or anger or whatever it is that we think we're seeing in our mind, and we can't imagine the mind ever changing, ever being in a different state—that the mind can't know. The thoughts at that moment can only know what's already been experienced. They can't know what hasn't been experienced. And so those kinds of thoughts are totally unreliable, and there's nothing to base anything on. The heart can trust that it is possible and that we do have access to these qualities of mind.

I wanted to share an experience that has helped me in working in this way, because for me too, hearing about the possibility of freedom, of enlightenment, of living with a heart and mind really free from delusion and confusion seemed just too far away. Sometimes it was inspiring, but often there was a real sense of, you know, that's just so far from where I am.

Last year, I went with some friends to Bodh Gaya, which is a small village in India where the Buddha sat under the Bodhi tree on the night of his complete enlightenment. I hadn't been there for about eighteen years. There's a shrine there, a tall stupa inside a little park, and a descendant, supposedly, of the original Bodhi tree with a little fence around it. We went and sat under the tree. I'm not usually a person who is very moved by shrines, but somehow the place moved me to tears.

As I sat there, I felt the reality of the Buddha as a human being and of the understanding that he had come to. It moved out of the realm of myth for me, of some distant unachievable thing, to—oh, this is real. This is a real human being who sat under this tree and came to very deep understanding and freedom. And so it is a real path and a real possibility, and I'm also a human being. It just demythologized it and made it seem possible. Rather than feeling discouraged, I felt a great deal of energy and inspiration—not to get somewhere, actually, but just to stay on the path and really put my energy into investigating, into practice. It was very energizing and inspiring.

Being at this temple also served as a metaphor for me in another way. The thought that often comes after thinking, well, okay, so the Buddha was a human being, he could do it, fine—he was an ascetic, he spent his life as a monk. And monks and nuns can go off and really come to understanding. But what about me in the middle of the marketplace, with a family and a job, and I'm so busy?

As I say, being in Bodh Gaya was a metaphor. This shrine in the middle of this little dirty, noisy Indian village is not some sublimely peaceful place. Again, it's the sublime and the ridiculous and the excruciatingly painful all at once. The power and inspiration of this place was beautiful. It touched me very deeply. It was also somewhat ridiculous. There were hordes of tourists coming, different nationalities, shouting on loudspeakers, coming up and staring at you, just chattering and touring around the stupa. There was a group of Tibetan monks—this wasn't ridiculous, it was just noisy—sitting on the side of the hill for three days, chanting and blowing their long pipes. Actually, that was quite inspiring, but really noisy. There was a crazy Tibetan woman who would run around just ranting and raving at anyone who was sitting there. And all the noise of the village, and all the people in the village who weren't the least bit interested except to try and earn some money off the visitors who were coming.

There were, again, the sublime and the painful and the ridiculous. As you walk in, some young men would run up with plastic bags full of little fish that they'd try and sell to you.

I found out later what was happening: there's a lotus pond in the back, and because the Tibetans have such reverence for life, these young Hindu men would go and catch the fish, then sell them to the Tibetans, who would buy them back and put them back into the lotus pond because they didn't want them to die. It's so sweet. And it's so human. We're like those fish—just going back and forth. That's their life.

This place has become a metaphor in my mind for all aspects of life. The practice, the journey toward understanding, is not necessarily about removing oneself or separating from the various aspects of life. Even the Buddha, after his enlightenment, spent forty-five years until his death extremely engaged, teaching anyone who wanted to be taught, very busy. Far from withdrawing, this metaphor enables me to come back and be in life more fully engaged.

Because one knows that it's impermanent, one comes back with more wisdom, more understanding, able to see the whole play of impermanence and recognize that there's nothing solid. But that's no reason to withdraw. In fact, one can engage even more fully. You're not so fooled as to take some aspect of the show as the thing that's going to make you really happy for the rest of your life. You just know that isn't true. But in this moment, this aspect is beautiful and worth your full and total effort and energy.

In that way, going to Bodh Gaya helped me not to feel that the sense of talking about the possibility of freedom, talking about these clear, clarifying qualities of mind—rather than having that be a far distant goal and something discouraging—is actually accessible in this moment. And that's all there is: this moment.

Something I've noticed in myself and in talking to people is another thing that sometimes happens in speaking of these powerful, uplifting qualities of mind. After practicing for some time, it's almost as if we sometimes discover we're more afraid to open to qualities of deep mettā or compassion, appreciation, a deep love of the Dharma. Sometimes it's as if we'll be experiencing that, and it's harder to fully open to and trust these experiences than it is to open to pain.

Just a few things I've noticed about why that could be. In myself, sometimes there's an almost instinctive distrust that the experience is real. "This couldn't really be compassion. It must be masquerading as compassion. I can't really trust it. I can't really trust that this is joy, that this is real rapture, love of the Dharma. I'm just kidding myself." And so there's a subtle pulling away.

Watch the tendency to discount the validity of clarity of mind when it's present, thinking it's some incredible esoteric state. "This couldn't be it." We always think it's going to be something more extreme than it actually is.

Another thing I experience in holding back from opening to these qualities—maybe even stronger—is that there can be such a deep poignancy to it. In really opening, there's that part of the mind that says, "Yeah, but I'm going to get attached, and it's going to go away, and then I'm really going to suffer. So I'll just hold back altogether." It's the poignancy of life. It's the poignancy of those little birds—incredibly beautiful. But should I never go see them because I know they're just going to die there in that cholla bush? What's the point? Forget it.

We do the same thing to ourselves. "I'll just stay with the knee pain. What's the point of acknowledging this joy? It's just going to go away and I'm back with the knee pain." So we hang out with the knee pain.

Just watch that. Can we learn to trust in the experience of the moment, in our ability to deal with that experience? Yes, grasping might come in, and it definitely will go away. And if grasping is there, you might suffer. But can we trust enough to open and experiment and explore? Allow yourself. Notice the holding back. Allow yourself to experience these uplifting qualities of the mind and heart. Consciously acknowledge their presence. If attachment starts to come in, if grasping comes in, okay—notice that.

The experience has now changed, as you knew it was going to, from rapture to attachment. That's fine. Be mindful of that. And if you don't notice the attachment, at some point you'll notice the quality of the experience has changed significantly. Okay, it's gone. Be with what's happening now.

But we don't have to be afraid of fully opening to these experiences. What we can find actually in the doing of this—in the fully opening and seeing it pass—is that I have actually learned to open and appreciate much more fully something because I know that it will pass. Because I know that it will pass, and if there isn't that clinging, that fear, then all the energy, all the attention is just there very fully with the experience, just as it is. Nothing extra, nothing else to want, nowhere else to go with it, and okay when it goes away. It allows the appreciation to be experienced in a much deeper way. It's very sweet.

Now I'm moving from talking about the sublime back to the painful. It's always shifting back and forth.

How is it that even when we've had experiences of these strong positive qualities of mind, or deep understandings of impermanence—knowing that we really do know how we want to live, that there is another way to live, that we can have real moments where we know we're not separated from each other or from the earth—or when we really understand the pain that comes from clinging and grasping, we really know that, not just intellectually... how come then we continue to be caught in confusion? We'll see clinging really clearly, get up, walk out, and get lost in a frenzy of wanting a certain thing for lunch. How can that happen?

And this can be very discouraging. We walk out, the clouds come back again, and we immediately think that's all there is. The sun is long forgotten.

Partly, we tend to think sometimes that because we've seen something a couple of times, we ought to be able to just drop it, and then we feel very defeated when it's not quite that easy. I want to talk a little bit about the power of our conditioning, because it's enormously strong. I think we need to understand this in order to respect it—not to feel discouraged or defeated, but rather just to understand the nature of what we're working with. And not to feel that we're doing something wrong, or there's something wrong with us, because we keep falling back into old patterns even when we think we've understood them and are ready, more than ready, to move out of them.

The conditioning I'm talking about here is really the tendency to avoid, to deny what is difficult—in other words, aversion or hatred. The tendency to cling to, grasp after, get attached to what is pleasant—that's what we call greed. Or the tendency to space out, be bored when something neutral is happening, or to get identified—that's what we call delusion or confusion.

These tendencies are so deep that a great deal of the time they're not even conscious. We're not sitting here consciously thinking, "Oh, that's nice, maybe I'll get attached." It's very deep and unconscious. That's why the Buddha said that one of his main impulses to teach, when he first came out of his deep enlightenment—he looked around and at first said, "Ah, I'm not really so inclined to teach. These people are too far gone. It would be too troublesome for me." Various beings came and begged him to teach. But one of the things that really aroused compassion in his heart was that with his eyes of wisdom he could see all around the world, and he saw that everyone—not just many people, but everyone—wants to be happy in this world. And we're so confused that we're doing just the things that will bring us more unhappiness in our efforts to be happy. This is because of the power of the conditioning of these tendencies.

I read a book a couple of years ago called Vital Lies, Simple Truths: The Psychology of Self-Deception by Daniel Goleman, a psychologist and also a practitioner and meditator. In it he reports some scientific experiments that I found fascinating because they show the depth of this unconscious conditioning in our minds.

The psychology of self-deception is about ways that our mind can block the conscious knowing of certain stimuli in our environment—not only the conscious knowing of the stimuli, but even the conscious perceiving of certain stimuli that might be anxiety-provoking. Or also, if we have a kind of preset to see a certain thing, a kind of tunnel vision, somewhere in the recesses of the mind stimuli are blocked out and we don't even perceive them consciously.

Let me explain some of the experiments he used to demonstrate this. This is both a physical process and a mental process. He began by talking about how, on just the physical level, in situations of extraordinary danger and stress, the receptors that feel physical pain can somehow just stop working—physical pain actually goes unperceived consciously. The example he gave was of a man who was being mauled by a lion, was conscious during it, and survived. In describing it, he recounted the experience quite fully, saying he just wasn't feeling pain at that time, though obviously his body was being ripped apart. It seemed to be some kind of survival mechanism, because he was able to stay conscious enough to somehow get away.

This same process of selectively deciding, on an unconscious level, what we're going to perceive in our environment and what we're not going to perceive operates often in ways that are supposedly meant to protect us from anxiety, or to help us move in a desired direction—tunnel vision.

One experiment involved a group of subjects who were told to watch a short video of a very fast basketball game. Their task was to count how many times the ball was passed—a very specific task requiring real focus. At some point during these few minutes, a woman in white with a white parasol went strolling through the basketball court, entering one side of the film and exiting the other, very nonchalantly.

What's so interesting is that nobody commented on it. At the end, they just reported how many times the ball was passed. When they were asked about the woman, they all said, "What do you mean? What are you talking about? That never happened." When they went back and were shown the video, of course they were astounded. How could they have possibly not seen that? It's so incongruous, so obvious. That's tunnel vision. What our expectations are can really determine what our reality is in that moment.

The other experiment demonstrated aversion—things that provoke anxiety. They had a series of tests where people looked at different drawings and later had to remember what was in each drawing and describe it. But they also had some fancy machine that could register for each person exactly where their eyeball looked in the picture. The pictures would have, say, one part that was just normal—a man reading a newspaper—and another part that was quite incongruous with that, perhaps sexually suggestive.

If the person later only described the man reading the newspaper, if he didn't remember the sexually suggestive part consciously—somehow that was an anxiety-provoking thing for him—they could also register that his eyeball had never even looked at the half of the picture that was sexually suggestive. I thought, now that's really weird. Not only did he not consciously take in the stimuli, but somehow there was some previous information so the eyeball knew not to even look there. It's really interesting to me.

Sometimes this tendency has served us in a functional way—as in blocking out pain so we can function, or as a child blocking out memories of abuse because you couldn't keep living with the same people if you remembered that. But a lot of the time it's not serving a life-supporting function. We're actually prisoners of this unconscious tendency of mind, these habits of mind.

Prisoners because what we are perceiving in a certain moment as reality, what we're taking to be what is—our experience—is often actually inaccurate, because it's seen through these distortions of mind: the distortions of wanting, the distortions of pulling away, of resisting, of denying, the distortions of confusion. We have these big blind spots sometimes in our understanding of our experience. Selective memory, selective perception, this unconscious selecting of what not to notice.

This book fascinated me because it's showing in a very data-oriented way how much our experience of what's going on can be skewed by these deep-rooted tendencies of mind—the tendency to avoid, to deny, to block any stimuli that's threatening. We can even deny the actual sight of something that we're looking at, actually deny that that's what's happening.

Once I was in the hospital and I'd been there a few days. The doctor came in and was doing a somewhat painful procedure, and I was over the edge. It was really hurting and I was crying. He looks at me and goes, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt." Just flat denial. And we do that a lot.

The filter of denial, of aversion. The filter of greed, of tunnel vision—seeing just what our mind is set on and everything else is in the way. You know when you're walking down the street and you're hungry, suddenly all you see is restaurants, whereas before you never noticed them. Or here, when you're walking in the desert and it's really beautiful, but suddenly the bell rings and you're really hungry and you want to get to lunch. What was filled with appreciation is now just ground to get over till you get somewhere else. And the people who were your brothers and sisters are now in the way. Tunnel vision—it skews our perception.

The third factor is identification: taking any facet out of our experience as being permanent and really identifying with it, making it solid. For example, the thought goes by, "I'm really stupid." We take that thought out, really identify with it, give it power, and then take in, perceive only what corroborates that experience—that I am stupid. Anything else, that I'm not stupid, that I did something really bright—it just kind of doesn't make it in through the perceptors. But anything that corroborates "I am stupid"—yeah, right, that's true, I'm really stupid. Identification.

All of this filtered, skewed perception is delusion. It's how we stay out of touch with reality. It's why we don't know what's going on sometimes. It's why we can feel so confused. As long as these filters are operating and we don't know it, as long as they're operating and we can't see them, can't know that they're there, we'll continue to live in confusion. We'll continue to suffer.

So that's why we can so easily fall back into the same old patterns. Not that we're doomed to be stuck forever, but the habits of viewing life through these filters are so strong.

They've been conditioned so deeply, they're even unconscious, so that when we're unaware, when we space out for a while, that's what springs back up again.

Here's a simple example. We can know very deeply that we're not separated from the environment, that our actions impact on the environment, that we're part of the earth, and that we really want to act in accordance with this understanding. We know it deeply. And so, for example, thinking, "Okay, there's a water crisis. I won't take long, hot showers. That's just really inappropriate and disconnected." And that can be true, and we know it.

But in a moment of inattention, when we're unaware, all of the old habits spring back up and we can find any reason—it skews our vision. So suddenly what was a long shower, well, that's not so long. That's not hurting anybody. It doesn't matter what I do. That's not going to affect anybody else. Or we just space out completely and after twenty minutes think, "Oh yeah, right, I wasn't going to take long hot showers anymore."

It's not bad. It's just how these tendencies spring up when the mindfulness isn't present and skew our perception of things.

This is where mindfulness is so powerful in working with these filters, because it's the tool that counteracts the unconscious self-deception by shining the light of awareness on whatever arises in our experience. And that's just what we're doing here. Whatever arises—not discriminating, not just going to the pleasant or just going to the unpleasant, not choosing—but shining the light of mindfulness on whatever presents itself in a strong way in our experience. We're developing the ability to be with our experience whatever it is, just as it is. And because we're not trying to change it, we're not trying to avoid it, we're not trying to turn it into something different—because we're allowing it—we begin to see in our experience how these filters themselves are working.

We begin to not only see the world through, say, a veil of confusion or anger, we start to actually be able to see the anger or the confusion or the greed itself. When we're seeing these filters, not fighting or denying them but seeing them, they're no longer so much coloring our world. We're not so much looking through them as if we're blind to them. We know them for what they are. Our perception is no longer so skewed. We know they're clouds, and we know they're clouds, and that's okay.

When these habits of mind become conscious, it cuts their power enormously. And that's just the power that mindfulness has. In a moment, it's bringing consciousness, awareness, to a veil like this, if that's what's present in that moment. It's a very powerful purifying force, mindfulness.

And it needs patience, because these tendencies of mind are strong and a couple of viewings isn't going to uproot them completely—at least for most of us. So it needs a lot of patience. But it's really helpful to know, to reflect on, that each moment of seeing is a moment when that habit isn't operating. It is a moment of weakening the tendency for it to arise in the next moment. In a way, a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom, because we're free of these patterns of mind of greed and hatred and confusion. And that moment might not seem ecstatic or really special, but it's really important.

And it's important to notice, again, these moments. Not just noticing the moments we're caught in the tendencies, the habits of mind—notice the moments when we're not caught in those, when there's mindfulness, when there's calmness. It's really important.

One other thing that sometimes happens—actually, most of the time happens with all of us—as the mindfulness gets stronger and we actually do begin to come out of our blind conditioning and we start to see these habits of mind, these filters, is they start to seem so prevalent sometimes. People often say, "Since I started meditating, I'm just so much worse. I think I'm much more neurotic than I ever was before. So much greed. I'm so aware of grasping. I'm so aware of aversion. I didn't used to be this way."

It's important to notice this. It's another way of kind of drowning in the suffering aspect, of getting lost in the clouds, seeing only the disturbances. Seeing in this way—thinking that I'm worse, that it's getting worse, that I have more greed than I ever used to have, that I'm more neurotic than I ever used to be—it's another veil, another skewing of perception, like a real identifying with the negative. It's happening because what was unseen before is now becoming conscious. Before, we didn't feel like we were filled with greed because we never saw it.

Now we're seeing it right, left, and center. And we think that if we see it, it should go away. But as I said, it's really strong, so it doesn't just disappear like that. We're seeing it, and the awareness is really lighting up the causes of suffering. This is an important, vital step in our becoming free of it. And it can seem overwhelming. It can become a veil to our experience because, again, we're identifying with it. We're identifying with "I'm such a greedy person" or "I'm more neurotic than I used to be"—identifying with seeing all the negative tendencies and not noticing when they're not present.

Thich Nhat Hanh has a great way of talking about this. He says that yes, to see and understand suffering is absolutely necessary. But we don't need to use it to create unnecessary suffering out of that. And this is what we're doing when we're going, "Oh my God, look how much greed there is in my mind." We're creating unnecessary suffering in that moment.

His example—I love his examples, they're just so simple and down to earth. If you have a really bad toothache, you're very aware of suffering in that moment. There's no denying it. You can't get away from it. And when it finally stops, it's so pleasant. It's really almost blissful. And there's a real awareness: there's no suffering, this is a happy moment. How much of our life do we not have a toothache? And how often do we appreciate that?

It's like that with these other aspects of our mind too. We focus in on the difficulty. We forget to notice when it isn't present. We think, "Well, that's just kind of blah." But actually, not having a toothache is really a nice experience. If I pay attention to it, it's not boring. It's not neutral. It's really nice.

So this is a way in life, as in practice, that we isolate the negative, the glaring, the difficult, and discount or ignore what is pleasant or positive or enjoyable.

I often notice this in myself. If I do something that people observe and ten people come up and say, "Oh, that was really good, Carol," and one person comes up and gives me some negative feedback—who do I believe? There's no question. All those first ten people are completely discounted, and the eleventh one? Well, that's an accurate description of what happened.

We do this all the time. Out of the flow of our experience—of thoughts, of emotions, of sensations—we isolate one, we identify with it, we kind of pull that one out, give it a lot of energy, and that's the one that fits our filter at the moment. That's the one we believe.

So if you're in a space today of "I'm so lazy," or "I'm really greedy," or "I can't concentrate," or "I'm just stupid"—which thoughts are drawn out and identified with? The ones that match the filter. And if we're not aware that that filter is just another thought, another feeling, we stay caught.

So today, how many thoughts and emotions have come and gone in your experience? How many? You couldn't even begin to count how many thoughts have come and gone. Which ones did you hook onto? Which thoughts and feelings are defining, right now, your perception of today's reality?

We all do this. But just to be aware that we're doing this.

So today—are you rebellious? Are you spaced out? Are you a basket-case yogi? Are you doing really terrific?

Are you scared? Which perceptions has the mind hooked onto and made a solid reality out of?

Of course, you can do this just as well with the pleasant as with the unpleasant. And once we've done it with the pleasant, we're not so aware that we're suffering from it. We're not so discouraged about practice. We think it's great when we're doing that with the pleasant. It's when things are unpleasant that we want to pack it in. So that gives us the motivation to really investigate.

When you become aware that you're holding such a self-definition—"Boy, I just can't concentrate," or "I've just been so angry today"—when you become aware of that, it's a clue to begin to look very carefully at your moment-by-moment experience. And what one usually finds is that experience really isn't nearly as solid as you think it is.

"I'm so angry. I woke up really grumpy today." Yeah, and I was grumpy for a while. And then I went out and saw that the morning was really beautiful and appreciated that for a while. And then I got kind of spacey and wondered if I should walk or sit. Went to breakfast, enjoyed that. But then the person ahead of me was really rude in the way they served themselves. "Boy, I'm really angry today."

And it goes like that. You'll see that there were various moments, maybe a lot of them, where a lot of anger came up. But also a lot of other moments where the whole range of other experiences arose—from bliss to boredom to mindfulness to concentration to sleepiness. And somehow the definition has been anger, because we isolate, identify with, kind of cling to this negative experience. We make a bridge with our thoughts between separate moments and create one solid umbrella to cover the whole day or the whole last three hours.

So just to begin to notice this. As we see that moment by moment it's changing, that what we're calling "I'm so neurotic, I'm so much worse, I'm so filled with greed" isn't so solid as we think. It's coming about because we're seeing more clearly. But as Thich Nhat Hanh says, yes, we can feel and be with the anger, but also begin to see more clearly the moments of calm, the moments of contentment, the moments of peace, the moments of just neutrality. Really, really important.

Realizing that pleasant and neutral objects are equally valid objects of attention as difficult and painful ones. Not more valid—I mean, we've spent a lot of our lives chasing the pleasant. There's a reason we're kind of afraid to fall back into that again. It is important to open to the difficult. But when the difficult isn't present, it's also important to open to what is present—if it happens to be pleasant, if it happens to be neutral.

Mindfulness is non-discriminating awareness. Totally non-discriminating. The same as the quality of mettā. In a way, that quality of soft, connected openness and acceptance that we bring to whatever object is arising in our attention in a moment—in a way, that is the quality of mettā. Nothing is shut out of it. Nothing is more important than anything else. All equally valid, because in this moment what's presenting itself is the truth of this moment. It can't be otherwise.

So that's our life experience, moment to moment. Anytime we look, it brings the excruciating, it brings the sublime. It's our experience on this earth, our experience of nature, our experience of mind and body when we just sit here for an hour. It's peace, real peace, freedom. It's being able to be with all aspects of life—the sublime, the incredibly painful, and everything in between. Appreciate the beauty, open to the suffering through our own experience. And from this can arise great compassion—great compassion for ourselves, for each other, for the earth.

Practice is not about attaining or coming to some perfect, unchanging state of bliss, some perfect place that is free from pain. That isn't here on this earth, in these bodies. It's about a process of relating to life, to all of life, to this moment of life, however it presents itself—the painful and the beautiful—with a fresh, open, and loving mind. Even incredible suffering can open to equally incredible beauty.

I just want to close by reading a quotation from Alexander Solzhenitsyn, which to me demonstrates this. He speaks a lot in his books about the Gulag archipelago, the labor camps under Stalin. It's three volumes. It goes on and on. Things that are unbearable to think about, the way people were treated and the torments and hardships that people went through in these camps. And through it, over and over and over, he recounts cases of people growing incredibly spiritually, of incredible beauty emerging in the human heart through being in and opening to these experiences that would seem from the outside to be completely unbearable.

I couldn't think of something that's more unbearably painful and more exquisitely beautiful than this power of love and spiritual opening and compassion that comes in a human heart that's been through immense suffering. And to me, that's what our practice is about—opening to both.

He says, and he himself spent ten years in these prison camps, so he's talking from what he knows:

"Gradually it was disclosed to me that the line separating good and evil passes not through states, nor between classes, nor between political parties, but right through every human heart and through all human hearts. This line shifts. Inside us, it oscillates with the years. And even within hearts overwhelmed by evil, one small bridgehead of good is retained. And even in the best of all hearts, there remains an unuprooted small corner of evil. Since then, I have come to understand the truth of all the religions of the world. They struggle with the evil inside a human being, inside every human being. It might be impossible to expel evil from the world in its entirety, but it is possible to transcend it within each person."

So that's what we're doing here by opening to the beauty and the pain. We can learn to transcend it in our own heart, and in some ways I think that's one of the strongest gifts we can bring to the world and to each other, because from that space we can then manifest in as many different ways as there are people.

So tonight is the third day of practice for many of you and the thirteenth day for quite a few others. As is customary at this time in a retreat, at the end of this initial settling-in period, there's often a talk about difficulties—working with all the sufferings and difficult energies that come in practice.

For those who've been here for a longer time, you'll probably find that even though you went through a talk on the hindrances early in the last retreat, it will still be relevant—unless you've gotten rid of all of them. You're just perhaps dealing on a subtler level, but it's the same movements of the mind towards or away from, or getting disturbed and confused by certain emotions and moods that take you over and prevent clear seeing.

So I want to talk about that tonight and also include in this talk honoring the fact that tomorrow is Earth Day. And that's quite a thing to reflect on. The planet for one day will jointly and directly acknowledge the fact that it's suffering, and that if we can bring some compassion and wisdom, perhaps we can come to an end of that suffering, or at least move in the direction of lessening it.

The hindrances, these difficult energies which you've probably heard of before many times, show us the first noble truth of the teachings that the meditation is based on—that there is suffering. It's true, isn't it?

Someone asked Ramakrishna why there's so much suffering and confusion and evil in the world. He said, "To thicken the plot." Who knows why there is all of this suffering? It does make things interesting. It's not just boring meditation when your shoulder is screaming out or you've got confusion and heaviness. Something else is there to be dealt with.

The first time I led a retreat, a weekend retreat, I had been teaching for a while and was encouraged to lead a weekend. One of my good friends was taking part in this weekend, and I really wanted her to have a positive experience. Well, around Saturday midday, as often happens after the initial glow of excitement of coming into the practice, she was having a terrible time and came to me saying, "This is awful. Why are we doing this?"

I tried to think of how I could help her have a pleasant experience with the meditation. I suggested she might take a walk or do a few other things. But it was weighing on my mind: "Gee, I'm really putting her through some real terrible stuff, and is this right?"

After about an hour or so of this, I remembered that the first truth of this teaching is there's suffering in life. I said, "Oh yeah, there's no getting around it." You really have to see that if you're going to understand what this is about.

What we do with the suffering by our reactions, our response to the problems that come up, will either create more suffering or can lead to wisdom and growth and an opening of the heart. The more we understand these forces, the less we're run by them.

The more we understand suffering, the less we're afraid to touch it. So the meditation is taking a direct look at our difficulties, being willing to wake up to them and see them clearly, name them clearly, so that they don't get us from behind, ambushing us. Or we don't spend our time trying to run away from them, hoping that sooner or later they'll pass.

This is from The Power of Mindfulness. Nyanaponika says, "There is an element of truth in the word magic of primitive man. Things that could be named had lost their secret power over us—the horror of the unknown. That ancient belief in the magical power of knowing the name appears also in many fairy tales and myths where the power of a demon is broken just by facing him courageously and pronouncing his name. To know the name of a force, a being, or an object was to primitive man identical with mastery over it."

And in a way, that's what we're doing here when we bring to light these various problems that arise. We name them so that they lose their magical power over us. We see them clearly.

There's such a strong conditioning to turn away in the face of our difficulties, to find some way to make ourselves feel better. This is contrary to most of what we've been taught our whole lives: get out of the unpleasant stuff and go towards something that's a bit more fun or entertaining. But if we can open to our suffering, it deepens our compassion and our wisdom.

How do we react in our lives out in the world when we see something that's quite unsettling—an accident or a severely disabled person? You notice that clenching up of, "Ooh, I can't let that in. It's just too painful." Not that that's wrong. It's just important to see that this reaction closes us off from our connection to life, to others, and to ourselves—to the suffering in ourselves.

Yesterday, I met somebody, quite a remarkable woman. Carol and I both met her. This is the continuing saga of the bunnies. The other night, Jack mentioned that there were these baby bunnies being born. Well, it seems that the mother wasn't around, and there was a litter of four. One of them died, and then we saw a second one die. Adrienne and her partner Elliot found an animal rescue unit nearby in Morongo Valley and took one of the other bunnies over. We hadn't discovered the fourth yet. And they met this woman who they talked a bit about and said, "She's a pretty interesting person." Sounded really remarkable. I said, "Boy, I wish I would have gone." Then it turns out there was a fourth bunny. So we had our chance.

Carol and I went over and met this woman, Judith Lindley, who runs the animal rescue unit in Morongo Valley. What this is, is some space that they got which is kind of like a junkyard, filled with old beat-up trucks and machines that aren't working—really an out-of-the-way space, not a place that you'd pick for setting up your dream home. Along with all the machines and the broken-down vehicles were forty-two cats, forty-two bunnies plus the babies, twelve dogs, six chickens, two donkeys, and a pony with one eye missing.

These animals, most of which were disabled, were taken in because other people didn't want them. Some had lost legs, some were blind. They were, as Mother Teresa would say, the poorest of the poor. She took them in.

She lives there with her seventy-five-year-old husband—she's in her forties, I'd say. He wasn't there, but he's this linebacker of a guy, she says, who goes out and finds work and odd jobs and fixes beat-up cars and trucks and is really strong. He looks about fifty-five. They have three kids: an eleven-year-old, a five-year-old, and a four-year-old. She has another child, twenty-one, who's living nearby with a family of his own, plus people who are passing through whom she takes in. There were about three or four elderly people there who didn't have a home.

She hauls in fifty gallons of water each day. There's no water on the property, but it takes about fifty gallons to meet all the animals' needs. She's supported just through donations plus the odd jobs that her husband finds.

She's a very happy person. Incredible. She said, "Oh, come look at the cats."

And here's Jasper. Come on out, Jasper. And here's Justin. And here's... She named every single one of them. She's been doing this for quite a few years, living out in the desert like a bodhisattva. How she responds to the suffering around her was very inspiring to me—responding with joy. That possibility is perhaps in each of us.

Getting back to our practice today: What sufferings have you been working with? What difficulties have you been encountering? And how have you been meeting them? How have you been relating to them? Wishing they'd change? Or with somewhat of an opening, a willingness to learn from them?

In practice, there are five classical hindrances—difficult energies that color our experience and keep us from seeing clearly when we don't recognize them. That's why they're called hindrances: they hinder clear seeing. But if we can start to wake up to them with understanding and wisdom and kindness, they don't have to be difficulties or hindrances. They become the richness of our practice. They're what one teacher called manure for enlightenment.

So I'll go through them briefly as they relate to our practice, and then talk a bit more on a global scale about these hindrances at work and how we can work with them.

The first is the difficult energy of attachment—wanting in the mind. Wanting things to be more fun or different than the way they are, wanting the next bit of entertainment. It runs the gamut from a mild fantasy to a deep obsession. Whether it's lust or greed or whatever it is, your mind can find anything to latch onto when there's this feeling of incompleteness.

The problem with this wanting mind is that it keeps us looking outside of ourselves for completion. Somehow this moment isn't enough, and so if I had something out there, then that would satisfy me. But whatever it is that you can find or that you think will satisfy you, it won't do it. Has anything done it so far? Has any gourmet meal or great sexual experience or new car or new house—has anything done it to the point where you say, "I don't need anything else"? Probably not. Because when you get it, it starts to grow old and doesn't have that same attraction and novelty. The energy of wanting keeps us looking for things, and it can be any kind of strange thing.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho. I've been reading a bit from him this retreat. He says, "You'd be surprised at some of the forms that greed takes for monks. As a layman, you can spend time trying to seek out suitable objects. You can form material possessions. But because monks live a celibate life and have very few possessions, we find our greed accumulates over things like robes or alms bowls. I became obsessed with robes for the first few months—the color of the robe, believe it or not. At the monastery where I lived before, they wore robes of a bright knock-your-eyes-out kind of orange, and it just wasn't my color. When I went to Wat Pa Pong, they wore a kind of ochre yellow or brownish colored robe, and so I developed a great desire for this kind. First, they wouldn't give me one. I had to wear one of those knock-your-eyes-out orange robes, and I became very greedy to get new robes, big robes. The robes in Thailand never fitted me properly, and at Wat Pa Pong they made them to your size. You'd have tailor-made robes. Finally, after a month or so, Ajahn Chah suggested that a monk make me these robes, but then I became obsessed by the color. I did not want it too brown, and I did not want it very much red. I went through a lot of sorrow and despair trying to get the right color for the robe."

A new robe, a new piece of clothes, a sweet meditation—then everything will be okay. You think you'll get one that'll last? No way.

The second hindrance is the opposite of grasping, of wanting: aversion. Not liking. Annoyance, irritation, aggression, rage.

The whole gamut—the mind that pushes away from things. Again, it keeps us from seeing clearly because we're contracted in that state, and there's a great turbulence in our beings. Have you noticed it? What have you gotten annoyed at or irritated by today? Notice how it keeps us from being here in the moment.

In some ways, aversion is not quite as seductive as desire, as wanting, because it's painful after a while. But it is so painful that sometimes we don't even want to let go of it, just because we don't know there's another way. We're so familiar with that reaction of "this is not fair." The Buddha talked of it as holding on to a hot burning coal and not realizing that you can let it go.

The third energy—or I should say lack of energy, difficult energy—is that of sluggishness, laziness, dullness of mind, sloth and torpor as it's called classically. It's very hard these first few days especially, because we don't operate on our own energy when we first get here. It takes time. Coming from a very busy life, you start to nod out when you don't get that extra stimulation. Or when what you're looking at is pain in the mind or pain in the body, it's not so much fun, and so we can have a tendency to check out. "I don't think I want to see that." Not necessarily consciously, but the mind has a way of blanking out when things aren't so delightful.

As you have noticed, this can be very frustrating and also keep you from putting any commitment into your practice. "Well, maybe I'll just take a nap." Sometimes that can be appropriate if you feel quite depleted or exhausted. But often, if you just reinforce leaving when you're getting sluggish or you're not so clear, you won't be willing to stay with things when they're not bright and alert. So that sluggishness, that laziness or dullness of mind—it's difficult to work with.

The fourth energy is restlessness, which includes agitation, nervousness, worry, anxiety, guilt. If you're replaying old memories again and again, it creates a kind of skittishness that keeps us from being here with presence in the moment. It can be very superficial, that scatteredness of one thought to the next, jumping around, often about the future or about the past. Sometimes the energy when we first come to a retreat is still jiggling around from the busyness of our lives. We sit down and our outsides can look very still, but inside we're still just jumping around. It takes a little while for it to settle.

Then the fifth energy, which is the doubting mind. "I can't do this. This is too hard. I don't know if this practice really works. I don't know if the teachings are the real way." Again, it's very heavy. It keeps us from having the confidence to put forth the effort.

The way that we can work with these energies is to open up and experience them fully, as we will start to do formally in the instructions tomorrow. We can incorporate the qualities of wanting, of aversion, of worry and restlessness, of the doubting mind, even of dullness of mind, as objects of meditation. And the key is being willing to acknowledge that they're here, not trying to set some comfortable place up so that we don't have to touch them. Each time we can touch them that way, we're not quite as afraid of them, and we see other possibilities of working. This is a learning process. One moment at a time. One encounter at a time.

A passage that I often read about this learning process—"Autobiography in Five Short Chapters" by Portia Nelson.

Chapter one: I walk down the street. There's a deep hole in the sidewalk. I fall in. I'm lost. I'm helpless. It isn't my fault. It takes forever to find a way out.

Chapter two: I walk down the same street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I pretend I don't see it. I fall in again.

I can't believe I'm in the same place, but it isn't my fault. It still takes a long time to get out.

Chapter three. I walk down the same street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I see it is there. I still fall in. It's a habit. My eyes are open. I know where I am. It is my fault. I get out immediately.

Chapter four. I walk down the same street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I walk around it.

Chapter five. I walk down another street.

It takes time. And what we're doing here is, little by little, living more in chapter three—where we fall in from old habits and we wake up and say, "Oh, I do have a choice." Not that I need to blame myself for falling in, but I have some options whether or not to stay in here and feel that life is unfair or feel totally overwhelmed, or to wake up and say, "Oh, this is just the confused mind. This is just the doubting mind. This is just the angry mind." Wake up to it, understand it with care, with compassion. And then, as soon as that understanding comes, not be caught by it.

There are ways you can work with each of these energies besides the basic mindfulness, but mindfulness is the key. Feeling it inside fully. How does wanting feel? Is there a tightness? Is there a clenching? Is there a disturbance that contracts? How does hatred and anger or annoyance feel? Get to know it well. It's an old companion. And it's not just in your mind. You've got a lot of company. That's why these are classical hindrances. It's part of being human.

When we can go from the level of "my problem" to the commonality that we share in working with these difficulties, then we don't have to take it so personally. It's okay. It's just the mood coming to test us, teach us.

We practice not just for easing our own pain, because we're not separate from the rest of life. You know how easily you're influenced by someone around you. Well, we all influence all aspects—the people around us, the beings around us—by our actions. Our responses have effects on the whole of life. And the meditation starts to awaken us to the fact that we are not separate. We can't divorce ourselves from life. We can't come to a retreat and say, "Okay, well, I hope the rest of the world gets together, but I've got my own problems." You can do that for a little time, and this is a training period. But if we go with that attitude, then we cut ourselves off from opening in a much deeper way to what love is about. The love that has the barriers lifted between us and all beings.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh, from Being Peace. He says, "How do you expect to leave everything behind when you enter a meditation center? The kind of suffering that you carry in your heart—that is society itself. You bring that with you. You bring society with you. You bring all of us with you. When you meditate, it is not just for yourself."

You do it for the whole society. You seek solutions to your problems, not only for yourself, but for all of us. It's a wonderful way to practice. And when you see that, then you see that the suffering inside of you is not so different than the problems and the suffering that we're all dealing with.

If you're a mountain climber or someone who enjoys the countryside or the green forest, you know that the forests are our lungs outside of our bodies. Yet we have been acting in a way that has allowed two million square miles of forest land to be destroyed by acid rain. We're imprisoned in our small selves, thinking only of the comfortable conditions for this small self, while we destroy our large self.

One day I suddenly saw that the sun is my heart, my heart outside of this body. If my body's heart ceases to function, I cannot survive. But if the sun, my other heart, ceases to function, I also immediately die. We should be able to be our true self. That means we should be able to be the rivers. We should be able to be the forest. We should be able to be a Soviet citizen. We must do this to understand and to have hope for the future. That is the non-dualistic way of seeing.

We're one organism, this planet—the Gaia principle. Actually, there's a beautiful book that's just come out called Dharma Gaia: Buddhist Perspectives on Ecology. If we think of the planet as one organism, then humanity is the consciousness of that organism, the thinking mind. We are the way that the planet knows itself. As Brian Swimme says, it is self-reflexive awareness that allows the planet to know itself, and through that self-reflexive awareness, we can understand that we are alive.

That's something quite special when we think of all the different kinds of beings on the planet. Perhaps a few of them have that capacity; it seems like many of them don't. And just as within us there can be forces of destruction or the possibility of awakening, that larger mind of humanity as a whole can be involved in forces of destruction, or we can awaken.

Like our own predicament, where we often need suffering to wake us up, this is what the planet is going through. It's unfortunate, it seems, that it has to be that way. But often it's the suffering that brings the sense of urgency, that sees we'd better wake up or else we're all going to be in a lot of trouble. The Buddha said suffering, the first noble truth, is what wakes most people up to look for an end to it—if we can process it wisely.

So again, as with our own hindrances, the way to wake up is to see how our global hindrances are causing suffering. Those same forces—desire, aversion, laziness, restlessness, doubt—they have their roots in our minds.

This is from Staying Alive: The Psychology of Human Survival, a book written by one of the meditators here on this retreat, a very powerful exploration:

It's no secret that we've reached a critical time in our history, a time that may decide the fate of both our species and our planet. It is a time of paradox. The evidence of human genius and inspiration is all around us, but so too is the evidence of ignorance and idiocy. On the one hand, we possess scientific, medical, and psychological resources undreamed of only decades ago. We've gone to the moon, fathomed the intricacies of the brain, and sent probes to the farthest reaches of our solar system. On the other hand, millions of people starve, our ecosystem is endangered, and nuclear arms threaten global suicide. In short, we possess unprecedented opportunities yet also face unprecedented threats.

Moreover, for the first time in millions of years of evolution, all the major threats to our survival are human-caused. Problems such as nuclear weapons, pollution, and ecological imbalance stem directly from our own behavior and can therefore be traced to psychological origins. That means the current threats to human survival and well-being are actually symptoms—symptoms of our own individual and shared mindset. The state of the world is therefore a creation and expression of our own minds, and it is to our minds that we must look for solutions.

Looking at how these forces, these hindrances work: greed—it's not hard to see that greed is probably the main problem, because it leads to a lack of respect, a cutting off of sensitivity to the larger well-being. Whether it's the rainforest being cut down, or fuel consumption, or using up fuel that produces wastes we don't want to look at—"Oh, no problem, we'll just find a place to ship them off to"—that's a lack of acknowledgment of the fact that we're all sharing this house together.

Aversion, which also takes the form of aggression: in our relationship to the planet, we've often had a "man versus nature" stance. We will conquer nature. That's rather silly when you think about it. We're part of nature. Why would we want to conquer it? And that same aggression leads to the development of all the weapons that deplete our resources and threaten us.

Sloth and torpor, the lazy mind. We know the answers and may even have a sense of urgency, but we often don't act accordingly. Well, someone else will do it. Or we pretend that it's not really a problem. We can probably all get in touch with the ways we're lazy about waking up to the problem and doing our share.

Restlessness, worry, and fear that immobilize us—or guilt over our past actions, or blame. It's their fault. No, it's their fault. Not my fault. That worry or fear can really keep us from acting because we simply give up. Oh, forget it. We can be paralyzed by it. This is also closely connected with the doubting mind, doubting that anything can be done. Forget it, it's too late. We're just on a downward roll.

And just as within ourselves, the awareness practice needs to be turned toward these difficult energies from a more global perspective. The Tibetans talk about transmuting the energies—our neurotic energies into sane or enlightened energies—taking the basic energy that's present and, by applying awareness, wisdom, compassion, and a real intention to change, allowing transformation to occur. We can contribute in a very meaningful way.

When we look at each of these energies—attachment, the wanting, and so forth—we can see that when we bring understanding, the understanding of the suffering it causes, there can be that same energy transmuted into generosity. With the wanting mind, we begin seeing that as we take more for ourselves, there's nothing left for anybody, including ourselves. We start to wake up and see: we'd better share this wisely, or there won't be any for me either.

The aversion, the anger, the hatred, the sense of separation—little by little, we can actually see it over the last few years, miraculously starting to give way to a new way of relating. Perhaps with a bit more concern and sensitivity for others. Perhaps with a bit more compassion and loving-kindness, seeing that we'd better do something quickly, otherwise we might not have another chance.

Laziness, when we really look carefully at the choices and we're willing to touch the suffering that laziness causes, can give rise to commitment and perseverance. The restless mind that's immobilized by fear—the antidote to restlessness is focus, concentrating that energy, channeling it into meaningful, purposeful activities. The doubting mind—the antidote is faith. And it seems simple to see that if we keep on giving up hope, there is no hope. If we throw in the towel before we try, then no possibilities remain.

That's why it seems so important to find whatever way we can to be inspired and let our faith grow. Because that enables not only us to hold the vision, but to share it with others, so that it can awaken faith in them. And it can in turn affect all others. It's contagious, that kind of faith.

Earth Day tomorrow is a bit like a one-day retreat where we hold the vision—a kind of world retreat that lets us all stop and take stock, acknowledge really what our situation is, and commit, focus, align our purpose.

It's interesting looking at Time magazine this week. They've got quite a big spread on it, all these activities going on. They say that in one recent poll, some eighty percent of Americans said they would support more strenuous environmental efforts regardless of the cost.

Just to get a sense of some of the activities: A Bangkok bash, where Thailand's top rock band headlines the "We Love the Forest" concert. A Tokyo happening, where visitors to the Earth Day Festival at Yume no Shima—Dream Island, a park built on what was once a trash dump—can take in a concert or play, watch milk cartons being turned into postcards and cooking oil into soap, or tour two nearby garbage processing centers. The Kenya countdown, where the Evangelical Fellowship of Kenya will launch its campaign to plant one and a half million trees with the help of churches and schools. Peak performance: to demonstrate that the environment is a common cause, fifteen American, Soviet, and Chinese climbers hope to reach the top of Mount Everest on Earth Day. Those who get there will place satellite calls to heads of state, then pick up garbage and gear dumped by previous expeditions. In Rome, pollution protests—Rome's nature lovers plan to put their bodies on the line when they stage a sit-down, maybe even a lie-down, along one of the Italian capital's traffic-choked central thoroughfares. Survivors can attend a concert in a nearby piazza. And just lots of television shows. It's quite far out.

Now, of course, as many of these global events sometimes can bring up this sense of skepticism: a one-day retreat is not enough, as you've probably seen in your own practice. It's just the start. Here's a commentary on Earth Day: "Instead of making hard choices, it's easier to blow off steam. April 22nd will offer people an opportunity to purge accumulated anxiety over wounds to Earth's life support systems."

Worn out by weeks of buildup and an accompanying media blitz, many people will return to business as usual on Monday, hoping not to hear the "E word" again for weeks.

And so that's the challenge to the globe and the challenge to us. Not just one encounter—"oh yeah, I saw it, okay, enough"—but each time you see it, being willing to open up to it. Just like seeing here on the retreat, each encounter is a new opportunity that we can have to wake up.

So as we practice, we can practice with the understanding that we affect and we're affected by all of life around us. We're not separate. We can see the impact that each of us has on the global community. We can acknowledge how deeply the roots of confusion are, both within us and within the collective humanity. And we can see, as we practice here, just doing our sitting and walking, our moments of mindfulness, each little moment of mindfulness as we deal with these challenges in practice—our efforts that we bring here to bring wisdom and compassion and purify ourselves for our own peace, our own inner peace—they're a contribution, they're a gift that we give to the planet.

And so let's not underestimate each moment of mindfulness. Let's be willing to open up to all the pain and the suffering. Because that is what leads us to the end of suffering.

A retreatant shares that she felt shocked about extending the sitting, that it took her over, and she felt angry.

This retreat was set up for people who've done ten-day retreats before, and that's what we want to honor. Part of deepening practice is extending sittings at times. But you can go at your own rhythm. You don't have to stay in the hall or feel that you've got to be in a prison. When you feel that you've had enough and you're losing your perspective and balance, then you can leave.

Another retreatant asks about the balance between needing to do things about the unacceptable state of the world and accepting it.

Well, it's kind of the same in our own process. When there are things inside of you that need to be changed or that are important to bring another way to, the first piece is to accept that that's there with some understanding, with some openness and compassion. But that doesn't mean sitting back and just letting them go on. It means bringing a commitment to wake up to those things.

It seems the same way with global problems, to me anyway. First there needs to be acknowledgment. Where are the roots of these problems? Can I open up to see the fear and the greed and those things? And not so much blame the perpetrators of those things, including myself, but do what I can in my way without polarizing, without making somebody evil—just seeing that the real villain is ignorance. The real villain is not seeing clearly. And so you do what you do with commitment and without attachment for fixing it up fast. You just do your part. Just like each time, each encounter with the angry mind is that one drop in the bucket. As the Buddha says, drop by drop, we do our part.

If we get too attached with fixing it up and rescuing it out of a sense of fear, then it's a very exhausting and frightening kind of task. If we can bring a sense of caring and compassion and steadfastness, then there's a possibility of a bit more effective action that can inspire others.

So, no paper napkins tomorrow.

When you're walking in the desert, if you see things that were contributed by human container disposal and so forth, you might pick them up. I joined a co-op recently, and the latest little brochure has a line of recycled paper napkins, recycled toilet paper. So you can actually get paper napkins that are made out of recycled paper. I suppose the napkins here are supplied not by us, but we could say we're bringing our own if you don't get recycled napkins.

Can you recycle them again?

I've been sticking them in my pocket and using them instead of toilet tissue.

Let's sit for a few moments.

One announcement before we do the walking, and that is just a reminder about the precepts that we all took as we started the retreat: non-harming, non-stealing, being in our own process, not communicating with others sexually—physically or verbally—honoring the silence, and refraining from intoxicants.

Please, let's make this a retreat where we bring our commitment to the practice and give it as a gift to everyone practicing together.

So there's about thirty minutes for walking. We'll ring the bell just about five minutes before, and we'll have another sitting at nine o'clock. Then there'll be a late night sitting tonight as well, with a reading.

Thank you.

Tomorrow morning the schedule is the same as usual up till nine. We'll post the new schedule and re-announce it at the sitting between eight and nine tomorrow morning.

CHAPTER 334

Aspiration and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the inseparable relationship between wisdom and compassion, describing them as two wings of a bird that cannot fly with only one. She explains how the natural expression of emptiness and non-clinging is spontaneous compassion—what Tibetan teachers call awareness being "ceaselessly responsive." Drawing on the teaching of Nyoshul Khenpo, she shows how realizing the empty nature of phenomena naturally gives rise to tenderness for all beings who continue to suffer through delusion.
>
> Wilson explores sammā-saṅkappa (wise intention), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, as the crucial intersection where understanding manifests as compassionate action. She emphasizes that the Buddha defined wise intention as non-greed, friendliness (mettā), and compassion—qualities that develop naturally through steady mindfulness practice. The talk distinguishes between moment-to-moment intentions and overarching aspiration, offering inspiring examples including Aung San Suu Kyi and the Cambodian monk Mahā Ghosānanda, whose radiant presence at a teachers' conference demonstrated the fruit of a life devoted to purifying heart and mind.
> Practically, Wilson encourages practitioners to trust that each moment of meeting difficulty with non-judgmental awareness is itself shifting habitual patterns from greed, hatred, and delusion toward clarity and compassion. She reminds us that transformation happens in small, seemingly insignificant moments—"doing the obvious"—and that compassion must begin with tenderness toward our own experience before extending outward to all beings.

The mind of non-clinging, the liberation of non-clinging, reveals to us the nature of mind. But it always has been, as it is now, the nature of pure awareness—empty, awake, and knowing.

There's a third aspect, you could say, in trying to talk about what is basically indescribable. As soon as we start talking, it limits. But that's our mode of communication, so we talk. This third aspect describes the nature of mind, the nature of awareness: the natural, spontaneous expression of the wisdom of emptiness, of naked awareness, is compassion—a tenderness for all life.

Joseph and I were talking earlier, and he reminded me of a Tibetan phrase that expresses this, describing awareness as being ceaselessly responsive.

So that's what I want to talk about tonight: this quality of compassion, of friendliness, of tenderness for life, which includes ourselves, as an aspect of our practice. I want to talk about some ways that the simplicity of our mindfulness practice cultivates, strengthens, and reveals to us the depths of compassion and connectedness that are possible in our hearts in this life—and that aren't really so far away from our own experience as that little judging mind in there might be saying. Just let that one roll on, but don't give it any attention for now.

Rationally, to me it makes a lot of sense that emptiness—this openness of non-clinging, of not fixating on any experience as being me or mine—would have compassion as its flip side. I know it doesn't always make sense to people. Sometimes hearing about no-self, emptiness, seems a little unsettling. But remember, that's the idea we have about it, not the actual experience.

Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a Tibetan teacher, said that someone who realizes that all phenomena are empty and who realizes the non-existence of self or ego will naturally experience spontaneous compassion for all sentient beings who do not realize this truth of emptiness and so who continue to suffer through delusion and clinging.

We don't have to wait until we are completely enlightened to experience this. Remember, our whole practice, our whole life experience is only this moment. It's only moment to moment. Anything that we talk about—any qualities we speak about developing, the seven factors of enlightenment, the qualities we speak about understanding, the five hindrances, compassion, non-clinging—it's all experienced only here and now in this moment. There's nowhere else to go.

This has been a very empowering and also comforting understanding for me. Because if I think I have to understand the complete essence of emptiness before I can experience compassion, it's a little daunting. But if I can recognize in a moment that possibility through my own experience, just in a moment, then it really opens up the sense of possibility.

You can see it at times throughout our practice. Joseph spoke again about impermanence and how really opening to the ephemeral nature of our experience—whether it's thoughts or emotions or sensations, whether it's the ephemeral nature of our outer situations—when we open to that, we really have an access into recognizing emptiness because we stop clinging. But also you can recognize how in those moments, even if they're quite brief, where we really get that sense of impermanence, when you just really feel open to it—and opening to it means we're not in that moment resisting it or hating it or trying to hold on, we really just let go and see it as it is—we both appreciate in a very deep way the fragility of life.

Not in a kind of beating-the-breast way, but with tenderness, with appreciation. Because if life is so fragile as it is, the natural response is one of presence, of openness, of connectedness, of appreciation, just for this moment of life as it is. And that naturally extends to a sense of compassion, of tenderness for the suffering of ourselves and other beings that we come into contact with. Because we're so present, we're naturally open to that.

So we experience both compassion for immediate suffering—just the pains we all go through—but also the wider level of compassion that Nyoshul Khenpo was speaking of, what's really referred to as bodhicitta: that sense of poignancy, of compassion for looking at all of us beings here, keeping running in these cycles of samsara, trying to find happiness in places that cannot offer it, looking for ease in constantly changing situations.

Out of that rises a sense of connectedness, a sharing of our mutual situation, so to speak, but with a real tenderness of heart. Not a kind of "we're just such stupid jerks" attitude. More like, "Oh, look at this situation—we're together." And that tenderness then again opens us into further letting go. It's sort of a mutually supportive thing: the emptiness leads to compassion, the compassion leads to more letting go.

Another way you might notice, just keep a little eye out in your practice, how the wisdom of letting go can open us to compassion. Just notice in those moments when you're not really clinging to anything as me or mine—my experience, my pain, my great meditation, whatever. Those moments when there's none of this me-ing or mining, none of this clinging. Notice the corollary: it's as if the movement from tight, obsessive self-referencing opens into spaciousness, connectedness with life, with beings.

Have you noticed this relentless, obsessive self-referencing? Have any of you noticed that over these days? Those times when no matter what happens, the first thought in our mind is, "What does that mean about me?" Somebody slams the door—they did it to me. They woke me up from my nap. Whatever happens, it's all about me. It's exhausting. It's relentless. It's wearing. This, to me, is really what we're talking about when we speak of sankhara dukkha, the dukkha of just the ongoing wearing nature of life—this me, me, me all the time.

Sometimes I sit here and think I would be so happy not to be absorbed in this meness anymore. What a relief.

So notice, because we all have plenty of moments when we're not absorbed in this me, me, me. Sometimes we don't notice them. Sometimes there's nothing special happening except spaciousness, except peace.

It also allows the space, again, for connectedness and caring.

Nyoshul Ken puts it in a way I really like. He says the difference between the deluded mind and the enlightened mind is mainly a difference of narrowness and openness. In our present deluded state, our mind is extremely narrow—the more constricted and narrow the mind, the more it thinks only of itself, completely disregarding the well-being, happiness, and suffering of others. Conversely, the enlightened Buddha mind is one who considers the infinity of sentient beings rather than being concerned only with its own ego and individuality. Thus the entire path from an ordinary being to Buddhahood is the gradual opening of the mind. The concept of growth is used here for the passing from a completely narrow attitude focused principally on oneself to an open loving heart whose scope instinctively encompasses the infinity of beings.

I really like that—the concept of growth in practice is from this narrow, constricted sense of mind and heart that only focuses on oneself to a natural openness that spontaneously considers the well-being of beings. And that's important to really trust: that this compassion, this tenderness for beings, really is a spontaneous expression of our wisdom mind, a spontaneous expression of awareness of emptiness.

It's not that we can't consciously cultivate compassion. Of course we can, and we do, and the Buddha talks about that—wise intention, which is really important. But we must also really trust that if awareness is our true nature, our pure mind, then compassion, tenderness, metta, is also our true nature. And there are no exceptions to that. It's not "everybody but you." I know people say that—"Me, compassion? I don't think so." No, no. If it's how it is, it's how it is, for all of us.

So that's why often the practice, the Buddhist path, is spoken of as a bird with two wings—the wings of wisdom and compassion. You really don't have one without the other. At times in our life, in our practice, one or the other might be more obvious. One hint of awareness, so to speak, is more apparent to us, and at another time, another one. But ultimately it all comes together.

I want to talk now about really practical ways that we can begin to notice and work with and also help us trust the cultivation, the development of compassion in our life, in our actions, in our minds.

One way the Buddha spoke about this—the place where our understanding and our actions come together, the intersection—is in the second step of the Eightfold Path. I won't go into the entire Eightfold Path tonight because that's a whole talk. But it begins with wise or right understanding: how we understand ourselves, how we understand the world. That's the first step, not the last step. And that gives rise to the second step, which is what I'm talking about: sama sankappa, the word in Pali, variously translated as wise intention, wise thought, or wise aspiration—those three different qualities.

Our intention or thought or aspiration is what gives rise to the next steps of the path, which are how we speak and act in the world—our speech, our action, our livelihood. So right here, in this step of sama sankappa, right intention, right aspiration, is the place where our wisdom manifests as compassion, as friendliness, as generosity. In fact, the Buddha's definition of wise intention is actually that: non-greed, friendliness or metta, and compassion. That's his definition of right intention.

The point I want to make is that this is what naturally develops and strengthens simply through the power of mindfulness, through the simplicity but steadiness, the committedness of our mindfulness practice.

This intention—that sense of motivation that leads to speech and action, that moment, that inclination of mind that gives rise to speech, that gives rise to action—is a really key concept, a really key experience in the whole understanding of karma. Karma, or kamma in the Pali, means action. And what's interesting for us practice-wise, in a way I find really helpful in my life: when we think about our actions, when we tend to evaluate whether that was a good or bad action—or to use more Buddhist terms, skillful or unskillful, wholesome or unwholesome—our tendency is often to evaluate by the result. How it looks. Whether whatever we wanted to happen happens. Whether everybody feels good about it. Whether we got what we wanted.

But as far as skillfulness or unskillfulness, as the seed of karma goes, all of the power of the action is actually in the intention. Because the result of the action is actually out of our control a lot of the time, isn't it? But why we do and say what we do and say, what states of mind and heart are motivating that—this is really where the power is.

This is the place where greed, hatred, and confusion manifest, leading us to speech and action that gets us in trouble one way or another. And it's also the place where metta, compassion, and generosity manifest—just here, in this movement of intention.

We can begin to notice this. Not always—God knows you'll make yourself crazy if you try to notice every intention before every word you speak, before every action you do. So please don't try. But we can begin to notice, in retreat and off retreat, before big things that we do, before big decisions.

The whole power behind skillful means—when we talk about skillful means in retreat, learning to do what helps keep your awareness balanced—the whole seed of that is in the intention. Because you can do the same action on succeeding days. Have you noticed that? Like, "I'm really tired now. I think I need not to sit and go take a walk." Now that could be motivated by a lot of different intentions, couldn't it? And one day it might be a real clear, balanced sense.

It's not wanting, it's not aversion, it's just seeing clearly—yes, I really am tired. Taking a walk refreshes the mind, brings some energy. You take the walk, that's the experience. That was a skillful action, a skillful intention.

The next day, the same sitting, and you have the thought: yesterday it was so helpful to take a walk, and I really just don't feel like sitting, but probably taking a walk would be really good right now. But the motivation and the whole surrounding circumstances are completely different. The motivation now might be aversion, it might be avoidance, it might be desire. And so the seemingly same action really is quite a different action from the point of intention. You see what I mean? This is a very simple example, but it has many ramifications.

So it gets really interesting—and I mean really interesting, not from a point of judging. You can't be looking at your intentions with judgment. Well, you can, and you probably will, but it isn't helpful. Because we're all going to have plenty of intentions that are less than sterling—that's why we're here, to learn, to see. If we were all completely free from greed, hatred, and delusion, we wouldn't be needing to sit here like this day after day, would we?

This is a fascinating and very powerful area of exploration in our life and in our practice. What I'm describing is on the micro level—a small action, like watching scratching an itch, or when you go back for seconds at lunch, or when you write a note or don't write a note, or think about writing a note and decide not to, asking yourself why you wanted to and why you didn't. Just watching all that stuff, seeing the play of intentions.

I'll come back to the micro level a little later in the talk, when we can begin to see how the power of mindfulness really begins to naturally shift the habit of our mind, the habit of our intentions.

But I want to move for a moment to the third aspect of sammā saṅkappa I mentioned, which is often translated as wise or right aspiration. I want to talk about aspiration and bring this into compassion. I was going to do so anyway, and then I was interested that it came up in a couple of questions this morning.

For the purposes of how I'm talking about it, right aspiration can be understood not so much as that micro, about-to movement just before we do something—brush our teeth or make some small movement—but rather as an overarching intention. You could say goal, if you will—we know that's not always a good word—but a sense of purpose, a greater sense of purpose or aspiration in our life. It's not just an automatic response to this moment, but having a clear sense of direction.

This is something I think is very helpful and supportive to take time to consciously reflect on in our lives. If you haven't already done so, if it's not something you do regularly, really tune in: What is my deepest purpose? What is my aspiration? It could be the goal or overarching intention, the conscious awareness of which we can use as a guidepost, as a reference point in the decisions we make and in how we live our life.

Now, if this overarching intention is unskillful, it might be that we become so focused on the goal that we don't use the overarching intention to come back and be present. For example, if your purpose in this life is to die with as much money as it's possible to accumulate—I don't suppose one would say it that way, but that's what could happen—if one's goal is to earn as much money as one could possibly accumulate and that's all that matters, the way that would reflect in our moment-to-moment decisions is that each decision would be about which choice earns more money. The overarching purpose would affect our moment-to-moment intentions. Hopefully we will choose something more enlightening, more supportive, more inspiring as our purpose—but that's each of our own business, isn't it?

The way this can function in our life—and it doesn't have to be particularly dharmic—is that when we have a very clear sense of commitment to what our purpose is, to what's really important to us, tuning into that in moments of difficulty or choice, in moments when we're making decisions, has the function of collecting all our random, dispersed energy. It allows us to act sometimes from a strength or a commitment or an intention of depth that we didn't really know we had. It gives us courage, a strength we might not know we possessed.

Perhaps if you have children, you can imagine how you will do things for your kids that, if it was just for you, you would never have the energy or the courage or the gumption to do. But when it's something for the well-being of your children, that hesitation doesn't even arise. You just do it.

I read a book a few years ago called Life and Death in Shanghai by Nien Cheng. She was a Chinese woman who lived in Shanghai, a middle-class woman who had a pretty comfortable life. During the Cultural Revolution in the 1970s, she, like so many others, was denounced for her bourgeois lifestyle and thrown into jail. She was pressured in many ways to sign confessions of things she hadn't done, which would have included accusing other people. She was physically abused, placed in a very uncomfortable situation.

But she had this strength of purpose around honesty—honesty was simply what was most important to her. She refused for six years to sign anything they gave her because it wasn't true. She wouldn't accuse other people of things they hadn't done because it wasn't true. She went through amazing ordeals—a woman who had never been under any kind of physical stress, someone who hadn't had any preparation for this kind of thing. Finally, after six years, she became very sick, cancer I think, and they decided to release her because she was causing trouble. She would stand up to the guards and simply refused to cooperate.

So they were finally releasing her, leading her to the door.

And just before they take her to the door, they take her into another room and say, "Just before you leave, would you sign this?" And she refused. She said, "No way. It's not true. I won't sign it." And they let her go anyway—just get her out of here. She was living in the States when she wrote this.

It was very inspiring to me, both her personal story and courage, but even more the strength of a purity, a clarity of purpose that really is bigger than the moment-to-moment experiences. It allows us to let go of needing fulfillment just in this moment. It allows us to have a much broader vision of our life, of what's important to us, of what is possible. And by using this aspiration or our purpose as a reference point, we can really make more intelligent, more courageous decisions in our life.

I see for myself, when I don't have a sense of purpose, or I'm not aware of it, I tend to respond to situations with knee-jerk reactivity—oh, that'll be nice, or no, I don't want to do that, or that'll feel good, or that'll be comfortable, or I'm in a bad mood so I say no. It's very robotic, very automatic. But when I tune into what's really important to me—which changes from time to time, so I think it's good to keep checking in with ourselves—to me, some aspect of loving and serving the Dharma, or of living an awakened life, keeps coming up as what's important. And then that really informs how and what I decide to do.

Not every minute, of course. Again, some compassion, some kindness. It's not like every time I'm going to get an ice cream I have to go into deep dharma reflection—is this going to serve the Dharma, whether I have chocolate chip or strawberry, or maybe I should have non-fat? Not like that. We can be normal human beings. But this sense of purpose can really strengthen us, support us, give us courage that we might not otherwise access. We can surprise ourselves.

Another aspect of tuning into this higher aspiration is that it's not always that we have a sense of "I want to be X, Y, Z" or "this is what I want my life to look like." Very much as with Nien Cheng, it was the sense of the importance of honesty. We often don't know where it's going to take us. When I realized quite some years ago that really I loved the Dharma as the most important thing in my life, I had no clue what that was going to mean. I never had the slightest interest in doing this teaching gig, but that's just how it manifested. It's not what I would have thought of.

Someone who also very much touches me in that way—I haven't met her personally, but whose life has been one of following what's really important to her without knowing where it would lead—is Aung San Suu Kyi. I'm sure you know who she is: the leader of the democracy movement in Burma, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1991. Her father was the Burmese leader of democracy in the late 1940s, and he was assassinated. Aung San Suu Kyi had been living in England, married to an Englishman, with two teenage children, and came back to Burma in 1988 because her mother was really sick. She came back to take care of her dying mother.

It just happened to be at the time when there were these big student uprisings against an incredibly repressive, violent government—still in charge in Burma today, really quite cruel to the people of Burma. She happened to be there when these incredible student uprisings and demonstrations were being put down by mass shootings. And she became the focal point of the democratic movement, to the point that when this repressive government allowed a free election, Aung San Suu Kyi and her party won in a landslide. Then of course the government wouldn't let them take office and put her under house arrest. She's been there, on and off, ever since—her movements completely constricted for over ten years. They've always said she could leave, but she knows she could never come back. And she's so important to the democracy movement that she really feels she has to stay, even though her husband has since died of cancer. She sees her two sons not very often at all. Years can pass.

But what's interesting is that she really seems, from what one can tell from reading and hearing, quite an amazing woman. This is what she's said: "I never set out to be the leader of the democracy movement in Burma. I have very ordinary attitudes towards life. If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I'll do it. The motivation is its own reward." And somewhere else she said that her purpose is to purify her mind and heart.

So having a deeply felt but ultimately simple purpose, simple aspiration—we don't know where it's going to go. We never know anyway. But the power of aligning ourselves, when we can, when we can remember it, to what is really so deeply true for us, has the power to change how we live our life. And that's really what it's about: how we live our life.

The habits of mind with which we meet each moment of our life—this is where freedom manifests. This is where compassion manifests. Never mind how it looks to anybody else. Never mind achieving some goal that people can recognize.

And the good news, as I said before, the really good news, is that simply through the power of mindful presence—this awareness that is open, clear, connected, with no agenda, just what we're practicing here, moment after moment after moment—the natural fruit of this is the development of compassion, of friendliness, loving-kindness, of generosity, of letting go. If you really look in yourselves, in your practice, in your daily life, in little ways, I truly know that you'll see how our intentions, our habits of mind, do begin to purify. By purify I mean they begin to transform.

Our deep habits, the kilesas, as I know have been referred to—of greed, of hatred, aversion, fear, of confusion—that's not inevitable, although it may seem so sometimes. It's not inevitable, but they are like deeply conditioned habits in our mind. But that's all they are: habits. And as we practice, these habits really do begin to transform.

The Buddha said frequently, and I love this quotation: whatever one thinks about frequently, whatever we're in the habit of pondering on, wherever we let the mind dwell, that will become the inclination of our mind. It's simple but obvious, right? Wherever we let our mind hang out over and over and over, that becomes its natural inclination.

In one way that's a little scary. In another way it shows us how mindfulness works, as well as loving-kindness practice. I won't get into that because it's a whole other topic, but just repeating the loving-kindness phrases when you think nothing's happening—just consider what your mind might be doing otherwise. It's totally worth it. That's just a little aside, a little plug.

But through the power of mind—I was talking to someone today who was saying that over the last ten years or so of her practice, even though there are areas she doesn't feel so good about, areas where it's not good enough and all, which we can all find—she could absolutely see areas of transformation, of spaciousness, of change in how she lives her life and how she relates. This is just what I'm talking about. The habits change.

In a place where you would naturally have said, "Oh, going through the food line, there's ten people behind you and there's one muffin left—great, I'm glad I got here for that muffin"—sometimes now, just naturally, without even thinking about it, you might say, "Oh, there's only one left, well, I'll leave it for someone else." And it's not like a big "Oh, aren't I great?" moment. It's just a natural expression.

Look for it in little things, because that will really increase your trust and confidence. If you're waiting to be Gandhi before you notice it, it's going to be a lot harder. Our habits change, and at the end of our life, what are we going to have left but how we've lived our life? The habits of our heart and mind.

Last year there was a big Buddhist teachers' conference here at Spirit Rock. Buddhist teachers from all the different traditions, about 220 or so teachers, and the Dalai Lama was here. The thing that was most inspiring to me in this whole conference was a Cambodian monk named Maha Ghosananda. He's sort of the Cambodian Thich Nhat Hanh, if you know Thich Nhat Hanh. He's been a leader of the peace movement in Cambodia. He's an old man now. He spent many years really working in the refugee camps with Cambodian refugees after all the horrors of the Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot regime—truly unthinkable suffering.

And now, last summer, he's a little bit senile. He's not really quite knowing what's going on. Someone would be delegated to stay with him through the day to make sure he didn't wander off. He would come and sit here in the room and not really say much.

So what was inspiring about this? He was just radiating love and happiness and compassion. You just wanted to go up to him and hug him. Of course you don't—he's a monk. But anyone who would come up to him, he would bow to you with this huge grin, like you were the happiest, most important person he'd ever met, that he was so happy to see you again. You felt like he recognized you, although I'd never met him really where he would remember me. Just this sense of all-embracing love. It was so beautiful, and I never saw that break.

At the end, as a closing, he was asked to come up and give the refuges and precepts.

So first he started off in French doing metta. It's sort of like something that was in there just kind of came out. But then he caught himself—okay, English—and he went and did the refuges and precepts in English.

I just felt so much... I don't know, just sort of who he was. That's how he'd lived his life, and at the end, that's what came out—so pure and beautiful. It was by far, for me, the most touching and inspiring moment of the whole four days.

To me, that's a sense of how our habits can transform. It doesn't matter so much what we achieve or what our life looks like. We can really begin to trust this. And again, it's not like you sit down and say, "I will now become like Maha Ghosananda." I think to myself—because I have that same kind of judging mind—fat chance. But we'll each become our own person, manifesting through our own personality. Yes, I hate to tell you, it's going to be through your own personality. The sooner you get used to it, the better!

But again, as I was saying, we don't have to sit and decide, "I will now be compassionate." We learn to trust that out of the simple act of this connected attention, this letting go of our judgments, letting go of our preconceptions, overcoming our fear and holding ourselves separate—to simply connect with presence—the natural expression of that is a sense of our unity, a sense of mettā, a sense of compassion.

I want to read this poem because it really expresses this for me. It's a bit long, but it's by Mary Oliver, called "Singapore":

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes. In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open. A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach, and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it—kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings. Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees. A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling. A person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem.

When the woman turned, I could not answer her face. Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win. She smiled, and I smiled. What kind of nonsense is this? Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place in a poem. But first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough. She's washing the tops of airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag. Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing. She does not work slowly, nor quickly, but like a river. Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life. And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river. This probably won't happen. But maybe it will.

If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't. Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth. The way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

So we don't have to go somewhere else or look for some special kind of situation in order to touch, to recognize, to come home to this sense of vastness, of tenderness, of compassion for others, for life, for ourselves. Really, the best place we have to start is right here, right now, with exactly whatever your own personal experience is.

We often think of compassion as so outer-directed that we forget it has to start—the only place it can start—right here in our own hearts, in our own immediate experience.

From Pema Chödrön: "When you wake up in the morning and out of nowhere comes the heartache of alienation and loneliness, could you use that as a golden opportunity? Rather than persecuting yourself or feeling that something terribly wrong is happening, right there in the moment of sadness and longing, could you relax and touch the limitless space of the human heart?"

"Next time you get a chance," she says, "experiment with this."

That's what's so great about retreats—you get lots of chances. And you might notice them more than when, in our regular life, we just kind of think, okay, what to do about it. But here there's not much to do. So that's a real blessing, because it gives us a chance to relax, to really touch with awareness our own experience of whatever's going on. And in that, we can discover over and over again the limitless space of the human heart, of our own heart.

The difficulties in retreat are extremely important. I know you think we always say this, and we say it to keep you going, but really it's not just fine until you get to the pīti and the sukha and all the good stuff. Where do you think we're going to really open to tenderness and compassion? Just by having everything nicey-nice all the time? No. The difficulties that come up in retreat, and each time that we meet them face to face—this is really the place where we are touching the tenderness of our hearts, the vastness of compassion.

So really looking at it, as you go through whatever your demons are: How do you meet the pain in your body, the fear, your feelings of disappointment or discouragement, sleepiness, anger, envy, that judging mind, our irritations with others—whatever it is? We don't have to have some incredible, worthy kind of suffering. Sleepiness really will do very well if you're hating it. The pain about it, the resistance. How do we meet these experiences? This is really the place where our deep insights into the nature of suffering, our connectedness with all beings in this field of suffering, and the deep tenderness or compassion for ourselves and all beings arise—right here in the middle of these difficulties, when we can meet them with kindness, with openness, without judging.

And one way this is really important: first, of course, by not judging, by meeting it in the moment, we're at least allowing ourselves to see what's actually happening. So we learn compassion for suffering because we see how much of our suffering is extra. For example, there's that twinge in the knee, and then there's all the fear and aversion and future projection we create around it. That part's extra—extra suffering. What Joseph said his yogi friend called "the rope burn" of holding on when we could just let go.

But another way that meeting each arising difficult experience, whenever we can, with that clarity, that complete connection, that openness—it goes back to what I quoted the Buddha as saying before: where we frequently let the mind dwell, that will become the inclination of mind.

So you're sitting here, and these judging thoughts—you know how it is, it's just so common that we're just completely one after the other after the other with these judging thoughts, and then we hate them, and then we hate ourselves for having them, and then we hate ourselves for not being kind to them, and on and on and on, infinite regression. Now the judging thoughts themselves, that they arise in a moment, is really the effect, the result of our past habits of mind. That it's arising now, you don't have a choice about it, because obviously if we had a choice, we would choose not to think that. But it's out of our control. So it's really the effect of past karma, the effect of past intentions, of past dwelling: "You're a stupid jerk, you can't do anything right, I can't believe you did that again." It's just what it is.

Now, in the moment that we meet it with "Ah, that's judging"—that's all, just "Ah, that's judging," noticing it—in that moment, what quality, what intention is being cultivated, is being developed? It's not judging. It's clear seeing and compassion. And so each moment that we meet a difficult experience, just fully and openly—you don't have to say, "Oh, may I be compassionate to this"—just meeting it with that kind, non-judging attention is in itself a moment of mindfulness. There's no greed, there's no hatred, there's no confusion. So simply each moment of mindfulness is shifting our habit, shifting the tendency of mind. Our mind is not dwelling anymore in the kilesas; it's dwelling in clarity, it's dwelling in compassion.

And so those times that you've gone through a long, drawn-out, difficult time, and you think you weren't perfectly mindful, you sometimes got caught, you think nothing's happening—mostly we can't recognize in looking back how much mindfulness, how many moments there actually were when there was just this pure meeting of it. Because we expect something to happen from that, other than just being with it. But something is happening on a level we don't notice right away. We're changing the habits, we're changing the way we relate to life. And compassion and wisdom are strengthening. It's like learning to trust that more, even if it's subconscious. So it's extremely powerful and important practice.

Once I was practicing in a long retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, and I was in a phase where I could report—he does use the word "report," very clearly. It is like a report. You go in and report: this is what's happening. And so I would just say what I was noting. I didn't give any content, but what was happening was really heavy judging thoughts. I didn't even mention that. But he has this way—I know Steve told a story the other night—he has this way of knowing what's going on, even when you don't give the content.

And so he said to me, "You know, some yogis talk to themselves on retreat. Have you ever noticed that?" He can actually be quite funny. I said, "Yeah, yeah, I've noticed that." He goes, "Well, you know, it's supposed to be a silent retreat." Yeah, I laugh too. It was just his way of saying, you know, you don't have to do that. Silence really being the nonreactive mind. It was a kind moment. He was being kind.

So on the level of our moment-to-moment awareness, clear awareness is cultivating both our trust and understanding—the essential wisdom of emptiness—as well as our familiarity and trust in the heart of compassion. And the two really can't be separated.

Pema Chödrön again: "At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness or open space." And they're both true—kinship with all beings, groundlessness or open space.

So we start where we are. Our highest aspiration, our deepest purpose, can inform our commitment, how we respond, the intentions we bring to our life, to our choices, in present moment situations. And our ordinary circumstances of life are enough.

Gandhi once said that almost everything you do will seem insignificant, but it is very important that you do it. And it's not like we're suddenly going to become Shantideva, who was the ultimate expression of the bodhisattva, author of the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life—very moving. We just start where we are.

One teacher I heard once referred to compassionate action as "doing the obvious." There's a situation, and given the whole of it, you do what's obvious to be done. There's no sense of amazement or major compassion—you just respond in an appropriate way.

I heard an interview on NPR a few years ago with a young pro basketball player in his rookie year. I forget what team he was on. You can imagine how for a young guy to make it to the pros, that's got to be the biggest thing in his life, maybe the biggest chance he'd ever have. They were interviewing him because his sister needed a kidney transplant, and he was going to give her his kidney if their types matched—which meant that would effectively end his pro basketball career. I'm not sure why it would, actually, but that's what the interviewer was saying. And the interviewer was so amazed, really trying to build him up: "What an amazing thing you're doing! You're so incredible!"

And this guy just sounded so grounded. He said, "What are you talking about? It's my sister's life versus playing basketball. I mean, what's to think about?"

Just doing the obvious. At this point we don't even think about it as being a compassionate person. It's just the natural expression of clear seeing.

And it can start with these small, insignificant actions and strengthen as we have more and more trust—in the power of awareness, in the power of connectedness, in the power of clear seeing. We don't need to fall back as much into our self-referential protections of fear and desire. We can trust that we can open to the world.

And then it's as Shantideva says: "Even when I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises. It is just like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return."

CHAPTER 335

Mettā and Meditation

Carol Wilson · 13 min

> In this guided meditation session, Carol Wilson leads practitioners through a comprehensive mettā (loving-kindness) practice that extends outward to encompass all beings in every direction. The session follows the traditional progression of the brahmavihāra practice, beginning with oneself, moving to a benefactor or friend, and then expanding to radiate loving-kindness directionally—north, east, south, west, above, and below.
>
> Carol offers practical guidance for maintaining authentic connection throughout the practice, emphasizing flexibility when attention becomes scattered or overextended. She suggests returning to easier categories—self or benefactor—whenever the energy feels lost, then reopening to all beings once recollected. The practice incorporates multiple ways of connecting: visualizing specific beings, feeling the kinesthetic sense of sending well-wishes, or simply extending energy geographically across the earth and beyond.
> The meditation highlights mettā's essential quality of total inclusion—embracing humans, animals, beings in other realms, those we like, those we find difficult, and the vast majority we will never know. Carol emphasizes not leaning forward or forcing results, but rather letting phrases arise naturally from the heart as gifts offered freely. This practice cultivates the boundless quality of loving-kindness that makes no separation, extending warmth and well-wishing to all beings in all realms and conditions.

Tonight, in the loving-kindness practice, we'll open to sending loving-kindness to all beings. There are various ways to do this, and we'll only do it one way tonight, which will be directionally.

But still, we start in the usual way. Start with yourself. After some moments, I'll suggest going to either a benefactor or friend—whatever category has been the easiest for you to connect with. And then from that, I'll guide us into all beings in the various directions.

Just a word as we get to all beings: as you're radiating directions, sending these wishes to all beings in a particular direction, moving out—if at any time you find, not just that you lose connection a little bit (of course that's normal), but that in moving into all beings, after some time you really start to feel a bit lost, almost as if the energy's overextended—then that's a sign to just come back again to the easiest: self, benefactor, friend. Recollect the attention, the sense of well-wishing, the focus, and then again you can open up to all beings. So continuing to use this flexible approach.

As always, beginning with ourself, connecting with the sense of your body. Presence in this body, in this moment, in this space. Take a moment to recollect, to connect, turn your attention to some wholesome, some skillful or beautiful aspect of yourself—thought, word, or deed.

For some people, the forgiveness practice is a good way to start: forgiving oneself for any harm, offering forgiveness to those who have harmed us, asking forgiveness from those we have harmed.

And then in your own time, beginning the loving-kindness to yourself, using your own phrases, making sure you connect with either a felt physical sense, a feeling quality, or a mental image. Connect with yourself and then begin the loving-kindness.

Now moving to whichever has been easiest for you—either benefactor, mentor, or friend. Take a moment to connect with their wholesome, their beautiful qualities. And when you feel that sense of openness, of inclusion, begin offering one phrase at a time. Gently, steadily, not leaning forward or trying to make something happen. Just settle back. Let the phrase arise from within the heart area. And just offer it as a gift.

Now to begin radiating loving-kindness to all beings. Begin by imagining sending these waves of loving energy in the whole quadrant to the north, which is behind you, in front of me. You might find different ways your mind connects, your heart connects. For example, just imagine sending this energy widening and widening and widening behind you. Sometimes I'll imagine different beings I know to the north—animals or people. Sometimes just kinesthetically feeling the sense of sending this well-wishing in that direction. Sometimes categories of beings might pop up: all females in the north, all males. But we use the same phrases, just really kinesthetically sending the energy to the north, one phrase at a time.

May all beings in the north be safe and protected from inner and outer harm. May all beings in the north be happy and peaceful. May all beings to the north be healthy and well. May all beings to the north live with ease of well-being.

You might just start small—just the people behind you—and let it widen out. Just experiment, see how it feels, what helps you connect.

Now sending loving-kindness to all beings to the east, to your left towards the forest. All beings includes humans, animals, unknown beings in other realms, those we like, those we find difficult, mostly those we don't know. You can either imagine geographically all areas to the east covering the whole earth and beyond, or various specific beings, using the phrases to anchor, connect your attention, your energy in the present moment.

Now all beings in the south, towards the altar. Beings most immediately to your south, extending infinitely through this whole earth and beyond, the whole universe. All beings in all realms, in all conditions, towards the south.

And all beings to the west, towards Pleasant Street. People in the cities to the west, in the country. People driving on roads, traveling, healthy, in hospitals. All the animals, in various stages of being born and dying. The west, here in Barre, throughout the state, and on infinitely. When you lose the thread, come back to yourself or benefactor or friend, recollect the energy, and again open up to all beings to the west.

And then all beings above. Of course that's obviously birds and insects, humans going over in airplanes, but also the infinity of unknown beings above us through the atmosphere and beyond. There's no being left out. Mettā being total inclusion, not making separation. Simple connection.

And then all beings below.

Just imagining immediately below us, through the earth, the animals that live and burrow in the earth, in the seas, all the way through the earth to the other side and beyond. May all beings below be safe and protected.

And just for the last moments, sending this radiating, this loving energy outward in all directions. Imagine it spreading out from your heart center, radiating in all directions—this warmth, this inclusion that wishes safety, happiness, health and well-being to all beings in all realms, in all conditions.

May all beings everywhere be happy.

CHAPTER 336

First Saṅgha of Nuns

Carol Wilson · 1h05

In this deeply inspiring talk, Carol Wilson explores the rich legacy of the first Buddhist nuns (bhikkhunīs), drawing from the Therīgāthā—the collection of enlightenment poems by the Buddha's female disciples. She begins with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's aunt who persistently petitioned for women's ordination despite initial refusal, ultimately establishing the bhikkhunī saṅgha. Wilson then shares stories of remarkable women teachers: Khemā, renowned for deepest insight, who awakened instantly upon witnessing impermanence; Paṭācārā, who transformed unimaginable grief into boundless compassion; and Dhammadinnā, whose Dhamma explanations the Buddha declared equal to his own.

The talk illuminates how awakening transcends all social boundaries—from slave women like Puṇṇikā who boldly spoke truth to Brahmin priests, to the courtesan Ambapālī who used her aging body as the ground for liberation. Wilson shares poems from nuns who struggled for years with restless minds and longing for pleasure, offering reassurance that the path is rarely quick or easy. She also highlights women who found freedom late in life, including those escaping oppressive marriages and elderly practitioners renowned for courageous effort.

These 2,500-year-old voices feel strikingly contemporary—women navigating grief, difficult relationships, physical decline, and spiritual doubt. Their poems consistently point to one truth: suffering itself becomes the avenue for awakening when met with presence and clear seeing. The talk invites practitioners to feel solidarity with this ancient lineage and trust that the path remains available to all.

The longer I'm involved in this practice, both sitting and teaching all the different aspects, the more appreciative I am of the sense of lineage—that we're not just hanging out here doing something that somebody made up fifty years ago and hoping that it works. There's this long, 2,500-year documented history of people going through more or less what we're going through here, believe it or not.

Of course, we think of the Buddha, perhaps, as the beginning of the lineage. But tonight I want to share some of the stories and poems of some of the first women who became nuns during the time of the Buddha. We hear about the Buddha a lot, and we hear about his chief male disciples. There are some books in the suttas that contain poems of some of the main monks and some of the main nuns from the time of the Buddha.

Reading these poems and then reading the stories of the women to whom they are attributed is really incredibly inspiring to me, because it's not at all a sense of some dry women who lived somewhere and have nothing in common with me.

Even though it's true that all the poems are written by women or men who became fully enlightened—it seems that was the criterion to get your poem published through posterity, so there are really no poems of miserable, dejected failures—some of the poems are written by women who felt like miserable, dejected failures for long periods of time during their practice.

I want to tell some of these stories and share some of their poems, because to me they seem just as real now, reading their poems, as we are. They come from all different backgrounds within the tradition of the Indian subcontinent 2,500 years ago—all economic levels and all life backgrounds. Their stories were incredibly difficult, incredibly easy, just like us.

To begin, of course, one has to begin with the woman who is credited for bringing the nun or bhikkhunī saṅgha into existence in the first place. Her name was Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. That's a long name. We'll just call her Pajāpatī. She was the aunt of the Buddha, the younger sister of his mother.

She's credited with bringing the bhikkhunī saṅgha into existence because for some years after the Buddha left home, when he came back, met his family, and began the teachings, there was a whole monk saṅgha around him. But while he had many women lay followers, there wasn't an ordained women's saṅgha for some time. So she started it.

As I said, she was the younger sister of the Buddha's mother, and both sisters were married to the same man, the Buddha's father, King Suddhodana. This is all I'll say about it, but you'll hear through all these stories a really different culture from this one. All the kings and wealthy men had numerous wives and consorts and women in their harem. There's a whole different ideal of wifely devotion—sort of forced devotion, you could say—in a marriage. It's just a very different context.

The Buddha's mother, Māyā, died when he was a week old. Pajāpatī, his aunt, brought him up. She also had two children of her own. When the Buddha, before he was the Buddha, left his kingdom, his aunt who was like his mother, his wife, and his newborn son—when he went off to do his practice and become the Buddha, leaving the whole family behind—and when he came back, his welcome was maybe a little tentative at first. But the family did welcome and listen to him. His father King Suddhodana, Pajāpatī, and also her son, who was close to the Buddha's age, all became great followers of the Buddha, though they remained lay followers.

Over the years, not really so very long, both the Buddha's son and Pajāpatī's son left home to become monks, followers of the Buddha. Soon after that, the king died. Now this left Pajāpatī—even though she was from a wealthy family and there was a whole court—in a difficult position. In that time, women's place in society was usually very much determined by the men in their lives: either their husband or their father or their son. In Pajāpatī's case, her husband had died, her father was dead, and her sons had left to become monks.

She was a very powerful woman, and many other women looked to her for guidance. At this time, as many men were joining the bhikkhu saṅgha, many other women were left alone. They came to Pajāpatī for guidance and to see what to do. Remember, Pajāpatī was very devoted to the teachings, not only to the Buddha himself.

At this time, with all these women on their own, there came another event: a small war between the kingdom of the Buddha's family and the neighboring kingdom. The Sakyans and the Koliyans had a fight over water rights, which seems like the way we're going again. In this fight, more men were killed, so more women were left alone.

They all went to the Buddha and asked him to help with this dispute. He came, being related to both sides, and gave such a rousing and inspiring Dhamma talk that many more men went and became monks. So now you have what's called "five hundred women"—five hundred is the number used in the texts to mean "many"—five hundred women, together with Pajāpatī Gotamī, sitting around saying, "Now what do we do?" But they were really very devoted. They got together and said, "Why can't we also join the homeless life? We really want to come to freedom."

This is where who Pajāpatī was really comes into play. It's her qualities of real courageous devotion, persistence, steadfastness, and humility that got the bhikkhunī saṅgha going.

Because when they first went to ask the Buddha if they could be ordained, with Pajapati at their head, the Buddha said no. She asked three times, which is the classical technique. The first time you get a no, the second time you get a no, and you're supposed to get a yes the third time. But she didn't get a yes the third time. The Buddha still said no. He said, "Enough. Don't set your heart on women being allowed to do this." No explanation. Just don't.

It's hard to look at something not through our cultural bias. But at that time, even though within the Buddha's Sangha—both nuns when they came to be and also monks—he was quite radical in that there was no sense of caste division, no sense that if a king came to become a monk he was considered better than a beggar who became a monk. Nothing of that. He wiped it away. But still, there's a way that the Buddha didn't really go around trying to completely uproot the outer society. A lot of his important lay followers were kings and wealthy people. And while he preached the precepts and generosity, he really wasn't, at least from what we read, preaching radical politics or economics. So anyway, he wouldn't do it.

Now, another person—a woman less devoted, a woman less awakened and clear in the fact that the ordained life would be worthwhile for her—might have given up. I mean, really, it's the Buddha who said no, not his second in command. But she didn't give up.

The Buddha left with his retinue, as was his wont, and wandered some hundred and fifty miles or so away. And she, with the women, followed him. She shaved her head, put on orange robes, and barefoot they followed him all that way, and came to the hall where he was staying and just stood outside crying.

At this point, Ananda—remember Ananda, the Buddha's very devoted, kindhearted, compassionate attendant—stepped in. He saw her there, asked why she was there and what was the problem, and she said the Buddha would not permit them, the women, to enter the homeless life.

So Ananda went to the Buddha, and he said, "Pajapati is standing outside with swollen feet covered with dust. It would be good if you would allow women to enter the homeless life." And the Buddha said the same thing to Ananda three times: "Don't set your heart on allowing women to do this. Enough."

But Ananda also didn't give up. He's very persistent in the service of compassion. So it's said that he thought about it and thought, okay, let me try asking another way. And he says, "Are women able, Lord, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of awakening, the four stages of enlightenment?"

The Buddha says, "Of course, no question. It's nothing to do with that."

And Ananda says, "Well then, if women are able to realize perfection, and since Pajapati did so much for you—she was your aunt, your nurse, your foster mother, and when your mother died she even suckled you at her own breast—it would be good if you allowed women to enter into the homeless life."

So then the Buddha said, "All right. You can enter." He did make eight special rules for women. And all through the history of the bhikkhuni order, the rules of both orders were made up as they went along. He didn't sit down and think, "Two hundred and twenty-seven rules for monks have arisen in my mind, and here they are." Rather, each time something would go wrong, they'd make a new rule. And so the women ended up with more rules, sort of out of protection in that society. He started by making special rules for women that they had to agree to, which she did. She agreed to them, and so the Bhikkhuni Sangha was born.

And what's wonderful is that out of this Bhikkhuni Sangha—sure, they all looked to the Buddha as their teacher and listened to the Buddha's teachings—but within the bhikkhuni sangha, just as many really inspiring and courageous and great women teachers arose as within the men's sangha. In these poems, there are many verses just referring to how another nun helped to inspire awakening in the heart of the nun who's writing the poem. And so in a way, within the ordained sangha, the women really were inspirations and sisters and supports for one another. A really very rich and alive sangha.

It's very inspiring to me to get in touch with that by reading about these women. And they were all different.

You know, Pajapati was a great leader and teacher. There were several other women very well known as great teachers, each with different qualities. Other women preferred the quiet life of a recluse, just living in nature in the forest, as did many of the monks. Some had enormous struggle through years and years of practice. Some awakened right away and cruised. It's different for everyone, but the Sangha of women was very rich and very deep in understanding.

So I want to read you Pajapati's poem. This particular translation is by Andrew Olendzki, who is the director of the study center down the road.

She says:

Buddha, hero, praise be to you,
you foremost among all beings.
You who have released me from pain and so many other folk too.

All suffering has been understood.
The source of craving has withered.
Cessation has been touched by me on the noble eightfold path.

I've been mother and son before, and father, brother, grandmother, too.
Not understanding what was real,
I flowed on without finding peace.

But now I've seen the Blessed One.
This is my last compounded birth.
The onflowing of birth has expired.
There's no more re-becoming now.

See the gathering of followers, putting forth effort, self-controlled, always with strong resolution.
This is how to honor the Buddhas.

There's that sense of how courageous practice is how we honor the Buddhas. That's really what it's about.

It's said that Mahapajapati died when she was 120 years old. And just as there's a lot of mythology around the birth and death of the Buddha, so also around Mahapajapati. It's said that at her death, and again at her cremation, all kinds of miracles occurred in the earth and in the heavens. I like that because it shows that in the mythology, there's a real honoring of her as a very important woman in the beginning and the carrying out of the teachings.

Now I want to talk about some of the other women who became very important teachers to the other nuns and also to laypeople. And then just some of the range—because it's so wonderful—the range of lives that led these women to come into the homeless life, and then the range of experience they went through after. It's just like here on retreat: it wasn't a picnic.

Women from all classes came: sisters of kings, consorts to kings, really poor beggar women, poor prostitutes, very well-to-do prostitutes, slaves, women who were actually insane at the time they met the Buddha. Just the whole range.

The first one I'll speak about, her name is Khema. She came to be known as the nun with the deepest insight. Her story is fun—it's one of the more delightful stories.

She was incredibly beautiful. And because of her great beauty, she was the chief consort of King Bimbisara. Now a consort isn't a wife. He also had a couple of wives and many other consorts, but she was the chief consort. In that time, this gave her a lot of status. She lived a life of great ease and comfort. She was very conceited about how beautiful she was. And she really liked her life of pleasure.

So it's not that she was going around looking for some teaching of renunciation. She didn't really want to know about it. But King Bimbisara was a follower of the Buddha. The Buddha often came to his palace grounds to preach. But Khema would never go hear him, because she had heard that he spoke about the dangers of sense pleasures and the need for renunciation. She thought, "I don't want to hear that."

I like that, because I can relate. The very thing that's going to free us—we think it's going to take away our pleasure. We don't want to know about it. So she was like that.

But the king tricked her. Because he knew how much she liked beauty, and the Veluvana Hermitage where the Buddha would come and teach was very beautiful, he had court poets compose poems about the great natural beauty of this hermitage. Finally Khema said, "Well, I have to go and see this."

So she did. And of course it was beautiful, and of course, she couldn't avoid seeing the Buddha. When she came within his presence, he performed what might be called one of his magical displays—a technique that appears in several other stories as well. As she came close to him, with his magical powers he created an image of a goddess, one so much more beautiful than Kema that she was utterly fascinated. She thought, "Wow, she's incredibly beautiful." And then he had this image slowly grow old and decay, moving from beauty to aged and wrinkled skin and rotting teeth, gradually falling apart completely.

And she got it. It really went in. "Oh, yes—it's the same for me."

At that moment she was so open, so deeply struck, that as is so often the case, the Buddha only had to say a few things. He spoke more about how people devoted to physical beauty are bound, how they suffer in this world, and how those who can let go of that attachment are free. It is said that this penetrated so deeply that Kema became a rare example of a lay person who was fully enlightened at that moment—all four stages at once, just from hearing those words.

So of course she went to King Bimbisara and said, "I want out. I want to become a nun." And he gave permission. She came to be considered, as I mentioned, the nun with the deepest insight. It is extremely rare that someone is completely awakened as a lay person in just one moment.

Her story, her poem—I'm sure you've heard about, if you haven't actually read, how many of the poems of the monks or teachings about sense pleasures use as a way of counteracting lust a great deal of talk about the repulsiveness of the body, or what are often framed as the dangers of women, who might get in the way of the monk's chastity and purity of purpose. Many times in reading this, I know women who feel rather offended. And I think it's important to realize that this wasn't simply something male directed toward female. Many of the nuns' poems contain the same imagery, the same sense of examining the almost repulsive nature of sense pleasures and the decaying aspects of the body. It's not that the men alone see it this way while women are all out there being dangerous. Although being in some monastic places in Thailand, it might seem like they think that.

There's one thing I perhaps shouldn't mention. At Suan Mokkh, which is actually very eclectic for a Theravadan monastery in Thailand, they have one big building called a spiritual theater with all kinds of poems and pictures—including the Zen ox herding pictures, which if you're familiar with Theravada Buddhism in Thailand, to find in a monastery is really quite amazing. But what I really remember was this one very large drawing of a woman with chains coming out of her, hooks on the ends, as if ready to snare the monks. I mention this only because the same imagery appears from the women's side as well. And I think that's genuinely interesting.

So—Kema's poem:

Pleasures of the senses are swords and stakes.
The elements of mind and body are a chopping block for them.
What you call delight is not delight for me.
Everywhere, the love of pleasure is destroyed.
The great dark is torn apart.
And death, you too are destroyed.
For myself, I honor the Enlightened One.
And best of all, in practicing his teaching, I'm completely freed from suffering.

They use this phrase often—"the great dark is torn apart"—as a kind of expression for the experience of awakening. But I love it because it's so vivid. The great dark is torn apart.

There's a lovely story that follows the account of Kema the Nun. One of the other great kings, King Pasenadi—who was actually a much more devout follower of the Buddha than Bimbisara—came to a town looking for a senior monk to instruct him. None could be found, but they said, "Here is the Bhikkhuni Kema." At that time, for a king to go and sit at the feet of a woman and take teachings would have seemed quite outside the structure of society. But he didn't even think about it. He went straight there, bowed to her, and received teachings from her, with which he was very pleased and happy. Just a sign that the process of awakening has nothing to do with gender or age or class or anything else. And that's the radical aspect, I think, of the Buddha's teaching and of the lives of the women and men who lived with him.

Now, this next story is very different. Patachara was also one of the greatest teachers among the nuns. In fact, in all the poems of the nuns, she is referred to more than any other woman as helping to awaken the hearts of the different nuns. She came to be a nun through enormous, enormous suffering. The last time I was telling this story on a retreat, some friends told me later that it was one of those stories that goes on and on to the point where they said they were almost ready to start laughing—you simply can't believe one more thing is going to happen. But I'll try to shorten it while still giving you the full story.

Born to a wealthy banker's family in the town of Savatthi, at a time when all marriages were arranged, she fell in love with a servant—someone her parents would never allow her to marry. So they ran away to a distant village, got married, and were happy.

When she began to have her first child, the custom at the time was to return to your family to give birth. But understandably, her husband didn't really want to go. He procrastinated. They started out so late that she had the baby while they were still on the road, so then they went back to their distant village.

When she was about to have her second child, the same thing happened. The husband didn't want to go, and she finally started out without him. He caught up with her on the road, and she began to go into labor—again, not all the way home. He was with her, but just as she began to go into labor, a huge violent storm started. Thunder, pouring rain. So the husband went off to collect some branches and brush to build a shelter for her while she was having this baby.

While he's off, he's bitten by a poisonous snake and he dies. She doesn't know where he is. She thinks he's deserted her. She has the baby in this terrible storm, and then as the storm passes the next day, she has no idea where he is. But what can she do? She gathers up her first child, a couple of years old, and the baby, and says, "Well, I might as well keep going towards my parents' house." She stumbles across her husband—her dead husband. Understandably, she's crazed. But what can she do? She keeps going.

She comes to a river that's hugely swollen from the rain. This is where it really gets bad. It's so swollen she can't cross it holding on to both children. So she leaves the older child on one bank, crosses over and puts the baby on the other bank, starts crossing back—and a big hawk swoops down and takes the baby while she's in the middle of the river. She starts screaming. The other child thinks she's calling him. He starts into the river, but she can't get to him, and he's swept away and dies.

So she keeps on going towards Savatthi. She gets to the edge of town and says to the first person she sees—and she's pretty crazed by this time—asks about her family. And the man says, "Ask me anything else, but don't ask me that." And she said, "But that's all I want to know." The storm had brought down their house and it caught on fire, and both her parents and her brother were dead.

At that moment, she went insane—just literally crazed with grief. She tore off all her clothes, began walking in circles and babbling. People didn't want her around. They threw things at her, drove her out of town. And she was, for some time, like that—just walking around crazed.

At some point, and it's not clear how long—if it's days or weeks or years—she comes to the Jeta Grove, one of the places the Buddha stayed often. But as she began to come close to him while he was teaching, because she looked insane, because she didn't make sense, because she didn't have clothes on, his disciples tried to protect him, tried to drive her away. But he, of course, sensed what was happening. He made them stop and said, "Sister, recover your presence of mind."

And immediately she did. She came and sat in front of him, and a kind man gave her a cloak to wear. She told him her story and said, "Please, Lord, help me."

What the Buddha said is so powerful. It's really the power of speaking truth to suffering—how he was just so straight. Not like, "Oh, it's okay." He said, "Don't think you've come to someone who can help you with that. In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than all the water in the four oceans."

It's powerful. When someone comes to me with a story, to just be able to be that clear, that direct. And you think this is bad—all your other lives, this is how it is. And that, of course, really went in for her.

He kept talking about how when we die, no one else can help us, just as we can't help our relatives who die, and everyone is going to die. And that really opened her up to begin to just accept the truth. She became a nun.

It's not one of those stories where immediately she was awakened, but it opened her to be able to use her immense, unbelievable suffering to first awaken herself—which she did, and there's a lovely poem of her awakening. But then you can imagine how she would become such a vast reservoir of compassion and support and inspiration for the many, many other women who joined the Sangha. There were many women who joined out of grief—their husband or their children or their families had died. And just having been through that, she became, as I said, really the greatest teacher of the women nuns and the one most often referred to by the others.

What's nice about her story—I mean her poem—is that it describes the moment when her heart awakened. And it's clear it's not just at the beginning of the time that she became a nun, because it begins with a sort of lament about what am I doing wrong, one that maybe you can relate to. She says:

I've done everything right. I followed the rule of my teacher. I'm not lazy or proud. Why haven't I found peace?

Then she says:

Bathing my feet, I watched the bath water spill down the slope. I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse. Then I took a lamp and went into my cell. I checked the bed and sat down on it. I took a needle and pushed the wick of the lamp down. When the lamp went out, my mind was freed.

Just that simple moment. And if you notice, it's also the sense of discouragement, picking yourself up and concentrating your mind again. You just do it. And then after a period of concentration, real awareness, but also that relaxation of just being in the moment—the simple moment of patting your bed and putting down the wick of your lamp—the mind was freed. Now we're always telling you it's not just about the sitting and the walking. It's really just about that presence.

So that's Patachara.

And I'll just read you one poem by one of the women who mentions her. Chanda was one of the women in deep grief whose whole family—husband, children, parents—all died at once of an epidemic. And she, having no other family to take care of her, she didn't go crazy, but she had to become a beggar to survive. It was such a family-oriented culture. And so she was a beggar for years. This is her poem:

I was in a bad way, a widow, no children, no friends, no relations to give me food and clothes. I was a beggar with a bowl and stick and wandered house to house in the heat and cold for seven years. I met a nun who had food and drink, and I went up to her and said, take me into the homeless life. She was Patachara. Out of pity, she guided me in leaving home, encouraged me, and urged me to the highest goal. I took her advice. It wasn't wasted. There are no obsessions in my mind.

But you notice, the first thing is: I met a nun who had food and drink. It's not like she was starving and Patachara said, "Sit down, let me teach you the high dharma." She fed her. We need to be taken care of. And then she urged her to the highest goal.

The last of the really great teachers I want to mention has, again, a different story. Her name was Dhamma Dina, and she was supposed to be—everyone seems to have a label. I don't know if that's just the way they could remember to write down later who was who. But she was considered the foremost in preaching, the best in answering questions in oratory.
