In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the elegant simplicity at the heart of Buddhist practice: the recognition of yathābhūta ñāṇadassana—knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be. She emphasizes that this Pāli phrase captures the dynamic, conditioned nature of each moment, revealing how everything arises through innumerable causes and conditions in constant flux.

Wilson explores how the Buddha's path begins and ends with right view (sammā diṭṭhi)—the capacity to recognize accurately what is happening in this very moment. She explains that freedom doesn't require creating different experiences or adopting new beliefs, but rather seeing clearly how greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha) distort our perception and create suffering. Through vivid examples—from searching for tortoise holes in the desert to her visit to Dachau—she demonstrates how these mental distortions narrow our world and drive reactive behavior.

The talk offers practical guidance on trusting the simplicity of mindfulness (sati). Wilson reassures practitioners that awareness of any object—whether breath, fear, wanting, or boredom—cultivates the same purifying quality of presence. She encourages recognizing moments of natural peace that arise throughout daily activities, noting that mindfulness cannot be damaged and is always immediately accessible the moment we remember to be present. This understanding, she suggests, is not merely an esoteric pursuit but essential for responding to life's challenges with wisdom and compassion.

The best way I could introduce what I want to talk about tonight—which is simply mindfulness—is to share in a simple way what to me is at the very heart of our practice, and why I spend my life trying to share and teach this.

There's something about the Buddhist teachings that, despite the tons of teachings and all the lists and suttas and the Vinaya, when you get to the very heart of it, what the Buddha is teaching is so simple and elegant. He's teaching about understanding how our mind works.

You may have noticed that meditation is essentially the work of the mind. Our body comes along, it's useful, it helps us. But the seed of suffering and confusion arises in the mind stream, in the mind or the heart, here, now, in this moment. And the understanding that leads to peace—to recognizing the natural peace and ease of the mind and body as it is, to freedom from suffering and confusion—also arises here. The seed and the experience of it arises in this mind, in this heart stream, in this particular moment. They're not both happening at the same time, mind you. But it's always now, in this moment, in this mind, in this heart.

The heart of our practice, the heart of this work of the mind, the key catalyst you could say, is this attitude of mindfulness that we have been talking about and will continue to talk about. Mindfulness or awareness: simply, with full presence, knowing what's happening just as it's happening. That's all it is. It doesn't seem like much. We actually try to add too much extra to it. It doesn't seem like much, yet it's the seed of transforming our suffering to wisdom, to freedom. In itself, it's the catalyst for transformation.

The question may arise: what exactly is transformed? And this, again, is where we come to what I find so elegant about the way the Buddha taught.

The deliverance from suffering, from confusion, the experience of freedom—what we're trying to share in our understanding of that here is not about taking on another set of beliefs or another faith. For sure, there's wisdom, there's knowledge, there's information that we're sharing that you take in that's helpful. But freedom isn't about buying into the information and having another set of stuff that you believe and can say and can write.

Everything we say is trying to be helpful—not that you have to believe us, but to support your gathering interest to turn your attention around and look at what's going on in your mind, in your heart, right now. To really begin to get a sense of how interesting that is, how exciting that is. When you're not trying to make a certain thing happen, but you just want to see how it works, the whole world is our playground for exploration. Anything that comes up in your mind can be the object of mindfulness. No exceptions.

So the freedom of the Buddha isn't about adopting a set of beliefs. And it's also—and this sometimes is harder to get in meditation, because meditation is a weird activity—we come here, we sit down, we say watch your breath, and it feels different from our life. So we think something different should happen. When you sit and your mind does its same old, same old stuff, you think there must be something wrong, that you're doing it wrong.

But actually, we've set up this very elaborate support so you can sit and walk and, as Jack said, spend two more hours with your own tedious thoughts. We've got nine days not to end them, but to really start to recognize how they work. Because they were there before, they're here now, and they'll come up again later.

The meditation looks like we're trying to create a new experience, a different world, that freedom has got to be something other than this. This can't be it, right? This mind, this body sitting here sweating all day—is this freedom?

Guess what, folks? Freedom isn't about changing the externals. And it's also not that we're going to get to and create a really wonderful mind state that's going to last. Wonderful mind states will come and they'll go. Horrible ones will come. And you may not believe it, but they'll go.

Really boring, calm ones will come. You may notice them, you may not, and they'll go.

And the freedom the Buddha's talking about is not about awakening into some other world. And this is the part that I love, that's so elegant. In the way he describes it, the beginning of the path, what gets us going, is some kind of right view. It's called right understanding, but I like the translation of right view. It gives the sense of recognizing accurately. And the end of the path is right view.

What is it that allows for the wisdom that arises in our mind that frees us from suffering? It's not being somewhere else. It's recognizing accurately the way things have come to be in this moment and this moment. The Buddha's not saying we have to change things. He's saying we don't have a clue what's really going on. And that's our problem. And we don't know that we don't have a clue. That's our bigger problem.

The fact that you're all here, that's the beginning or well into the middle of the path. Right view is the first beginning of "wait, there's something else going on." Because how I respond doesn't really seem to meet the situation. Everything I do is for my own happiness, and somehow I didn't get there yet for very long.

There are lots of different names for different kinds of insights that come and go in different models. You don't need to know them right now. But one of them, the Pali word is yathābhūta ñāṇadassana, which is usually translated as knowledge and vision of things as they are. This is a very profound level of understanding, just on the edge of freedom.

I've been told on good authority from a couple of different friends who are much more Pali scholars than I, that the word yathābhūta, often translated as "things as they are," has a more accurate translation in terms of the grammar: "things as they have come to be."

It's great, isn't it? Because what it gives is that sense of movement, the sense of cause and effect and conditionality, and there is no steady state. Things as they have come to be in this moment—and the accurate recognition of that is what opens our hearts and minds to peace, to freedom. That's what's so cool. We don't have to create something else, and you don't have to change your personality. Good luck anyway. But it's about learning: how come we don't see things the way they are? Yathābhūta—how come we don't, and how can we? Guess what? Mindfulness.

But "things as they have come to be" is such a living phrase. It really takes one into the experience that we don't recognize. Because one of the ways of understanding things as they have come to be is recognizing that each of our experiences in this moment is the effect of innumerable causes and conditions, isn't it?

In fact, if you start thinking—okay, you can think for ten seconds while I talk, I know you're doing that anyway—but if you start to think about what are some of the causes and conditions that allowed you to be here? You might think: you could get time off work, you had enough money, you're healthy enough, your spouse let you go. But if you keep going, where can you stop? Where can you stop? Everything runs into everything. You go back to the food and the farmers who grow the food and the trucks that transport it and the people who drill the oil and back to the dinosaurs, because otherwise there wouldn't be oil. And it goes, and everything is completely connected. You can't pull anything out and say it's separate.

Things as they have come to be in this moment cannot be otherwise. And this next moment they will be otherwise, because things as they have come to be, the conditions are always changing. Even as we're talking, the words I'm saying are different, the sensations in your body may have changed, a different thought is there, a different mood is there. You hear me, you don't, you're somewhere else. The energy in the room—every moment it's changing. Things as they have come to be now and now and now.

And so the ability, the willingness to be so present for that without trying to fix it, even just to recognize that's what's happening—because do we really recognize that most of the time? Recognizing it in terms of right view is different from thinking, "Oh yeah, that's how it is." I mean, I can say that.

We can say it. We can think it. That may not be how I'm perceiving in the moment.

But that's the elegance of the Buddha's teaching. We awaken into this world more fully, into how things are. And what makes that possible? It's this quality. It's not the only thing, but it's our big avenue in, our big key in—this quality of mindful awareness. This quality of seeing, just being present with fullness of attention for whatever's arising.

And this, of course, is what makes it wise mindfulness, what makes it mindfulness at all. In that moment, there's not a clinging to make it stay. There's not an aversion trying to push it away, or fear. And there's not the sense that whatever's going on is only happening because it's all about me. Or at least we know when that's happening. Or we don't know it's happening—that's delusion.

There's a statement from the Buddha. He said, "This Dhamma is visible here and now." He's talking about the truth, the way things are. But to what extent is it visible here and now? To the extent that greed, hatred or aversion or fear, and delusion or confusion are not present in the citta. Citta is a word that encompasses mind and heart.

So to the extent that these are absent—and in a moment, not that you have to somehow experience a mind and heart that never again feels greed, never again feels aversion, never again feels delusion. That's said to be the mind and heart of a completely awakened being. But as has been said before, it's moments. So any moment that there's real presence with this clarity of mind that isn't colored or distorted—and I'll talk more about how that works, the distortions of greed, of hatred, of delusion—in that moment, there's the potential to just recognize accurately what's happening. Whatever it is that's happening, no big whoop.

And the steadiness of this mindfulness—this is really the key—is the continuity. Not that every single moment you're aware, of course not. But the sense of willingness to just come back, be here, be here, be here. At first, you have to consciously remember all the time, right? But those of you who've done retreats before and have incorporated this in your life know, I hope, that the mindfulness begins to get its own inertia. Inertia meaning a body in motion keeps going in motion.

Just like anger, for example, has its own inertia. Have you noticed? If you're really angry and not aware of it, you keep thinking about the person you're angry at and what they did. What happens to the anger? The more you think about that stupid jerk and what they did to me. Or you just look at them. Someone here bugs the heck out of you. You don't even know them, and they're sitting way on the other side of the room. You know nothing about them, but you just look at them when you're angry. In fact, you're calm, and you're scared of calm, so you look at them so you can get angry. Something could happen, right? It gets its own inertia. Then whatever next poor sucker walks into your line of vision—then you go to the group interview, then you think about that unfinished business you had with your partner, and you know, "I'm going to write that letter right now. I'm going to clean this up." It just gets its own momentum.

Well, luckily, the wisdom factors also get their own momentum, and that's what we're cultivating here. The mindfulness, just the sense of willingness to be present, starts to remember itself. And that's why there's sitting, and that's why there's walking, and that's why there's noticing what you're doing when you're eating and when you're taking a shower and when you're doing your work meditation. Because it begins to get its own momentum. And when the mindfulness is there, if we notice greed or hatred or delusion, fine. That's the next arising object of mindfulness.

When seen clearly, it's no problem. It might not be pleasant, but as the Buddha said, we're not awakening into a different world. So perhaps you've noticed that not everything is pleasant in your world. Does anyone have a life where every moment is pleasant? No one would be here if they had that.

Is there somewhere in the back of your mind—and I've had this for years, it keeps slipping back in—the unacknowledged, unspoken idea that actually freedom means everything unpleasant goes away? That no more unpleasant thoughts will arise? That your family is going to start acting right? That you're not going to get fired from your job? That the weather will cooperate? That people will start behaving the way we think they ought to? I can tell you the answer to that. It's a big no way.

If you look at the Buddha, who we often look to for inspiration, for looking at how it is—when he awoke, his awakening is often described as this sense of interconnectedness, the dependence, the cause and effect. What I was saying: things as they have come to be, this constant movement and interconnection, really getting that that's all there is. But then how did he spend his life? He still had a body with headaches and backaches and got sick. He spent his life walking barefoot around India in the heat, begging for food, living in the woods. There were definitely some unpleasant physical sensations going on with that, one meal a day. His clan's people got into wars over water rights and killed each other. His different monks would get into battles—not physical, but verbal. "No, this is what the Buddha said." "No, that's the right way." There's one sutta where he comes and tries to mediate, and they basically say, "Go away. It's okay, we can take care of it." This is the Buddha. They say, "No, no, no. We don't need your help. We can take care of it." He goes away and says, "Foolish, misguided men." He had to deal with organizational problems, people not getting along. There were tons of people who came to challenge him, basically trying to show him up. It's not my idea of a pleasant life, if I was thinking of one. But a peaceful one? So clear.

The world he awoke into—he was more present, moving out of compassion for the welfare of all beings. The freedom is all about this: when we understand through accurate recognition, our whole relationship changes. We respond, don't we? We don't react—we respond from how we perceive a situation to be.

Have you ever had a time when someone has done something that either really hurt you or made you angry, or you think they're so insensitive, so selfish? You get all worked up in whatever way. And then later, either you really tune into them or you find out another piece of information, and you discover that the story you made up about why they did what they did was completely and totally wrong. Totally wrong. And I want to point out, this happens a lot more often than we might know. When you know the reason, you go, "Oh, they were in so much pain at that time. They couldn't help it. They couldn't even see past themselves. They didn't even know they hurt me. There was so much pain." And that whole anger just shifts to compassion, which is the natural expression of wisdom, of clear seeing. Yes, you were still hurt. But when we understand, it just becomes part of the bigger picture, and there's a natural compassion. It's a simple example, but you get a sense of what I mean.

How we respond is based on how we understand. How we understand is based on how we're really present, what we can perceive. So this is really, really powerful. Yathābhūta—things as they have come to be.

The heart of our mindfulness practice isn't about trying to get to a certain place. What are all the instructions, all the techniques—not only the ones we've given here, but all the different instructions and techniques just within the so-called Vipassana tradition, which isn't really an accurate label, but within the Theravada Buddhist tradition? Many forms of meditation coming from different angles. But the heart of all of it is to give us the interest, the willingness, the courage, and the capacity to be fully present with this moment however it's manifesting—not to make a different moment.

As soon as we're going for a different moment, there's no way to recognize yathābhūta in this moment, because we've already jumped over it, dismissed it, disliked it. "No, I want something different. Something different's better." Well, what's actually here? "I don't know, but something different's better."

Just to say a bit about the instructions we've been giving here: when talking about feeling the sensations of breath to help collect and steady the mind, there are forms of meditation that would completely focus on one experience—say, for example, sensations of breath. Whenever there's thinking or hearing or whatever, you might notice what it is, you might not even notice what it is, but you come right back and very gently just keep surrendering moment after moment only into that experience. This is called either samatha meditation or absorption, one-pointedness, and it can develop a very strong power of mind. Other things happen along the way, not so pleasant. And that concentrated mind can then be used to investigate what's happening. But that's a long road.

Vipassana meditation—so-called insight meditation—is more accented on the wisdom side. What we're doing here is Vipassana. So when we're talking about feeling the sensations of breath, being with the breath as something arises—really, that's only the beginning. The breath is a tool. And it doesn't even have to be sensations of breath. It could be sensations in the body. It could be hearing. It really doesn't matter.

In terms of mindfulness—and if you really can believe this, it saves so much suffering—mindfulness awareness can be aware of anything. In terms of cultivating the steadiness, the purity of mindfulness, it absolutely does not matter what the object of mindfulness is. Mindfulness doesn't care.

Being mindful of breath when the mind is filled with greed—that actually isn't mindfulness. That's cultivating greed. "I want to feel the breath. I want to feel the breath." If we turn around and notice, "Oh, that's wanting"—that's mindfulness. Wanting is like this. And the mindfulness of it is just seeing how it is.

If you're coming to be with the breath and you feel clutching, clutching, and then you notice the clutching—it stays or it goes. That's not our job. Mindfulness's job is not to change it. It's just to see: what's the nature of wanting in this moment, and this moment? In that steadiness of seeing clearly, that's what allows wisdom to arise.

Wisdom comes. We don't have to make wisdom. This is a huge relief, because actually we can't. All we can make up is what we already know. Mostly we sit here and make up something we think should be happening, and it doesn't happen, and then we think it's wrong because that's what should be happening. We get all twisted in a knot.

All you have to do is notice, "Oh, this is fear in the mind." That's all. Doesn't feel like enough, does it? "I didn't come here just to get all twisted up and notice, 'Fear in the mind.'" Fear is like this. This is how fear behaves. This is the nature of fear.

But what we're doing is cultivating awareness—awareness of fear. That awareness is just as good as awareness of bliss, or awareness of the sensation of breath, or awareness of a step, or awareness of calm, or awareness of joy, or awareness of mettā. Awareness doesn't care. And so we can learn to bring awareness and interest to anything. And when there's interest, there's usually not fear or aversion or clinging.

How does that work? That's interesting.

But it's hard to trust this. Hard to trust this.

So we're cultivating. We've been using the sensations of breath in the instructions just as a tool to help the mind get a little bit steady, so we even have a clue what's going on at the other sense doors. If we were to say, "Come in, notice whatever's arising—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, emotions—just notice without distortion of greed or hatred or confusion. Just notice it. Stay steady. Go." Five hours later: Am I thinking? Am I aware? Is there a difference between thinking and what's happening?

So we get a little bit steady. But then we open up. If you're sitting with the breath and hearing comes and you note "hearing," then really be with the hearing. That's what's happening now. Notice the hearing. Notice how effortless the awareness of hearing is. Did you notice that? Hearing comes. You don't have to plan: "In a minute that bird's going to make a sound, I better be ready." No.

You're sitting and a burning pain arises in your knee. Now, if it happened yesterday, you might be thinking, "That burning pain is going to arise and I better be ready." But that's not the burning pain, is it? That's fear, which you didn't plan on. Oh, this is fear. That's what's happening now.

Same with the breath. The sensations of breath arise in their own time, and mindfulness can be with it. So whatever's happening—sensation, emotion, thought—it arises, mindfulness meets it, notices.

But when we're really lost, kind of lost, don't know what's happening, everything's just too shaky or confused, then we have our friend: the sensations of breath or body or hearing, to help recollect that quality of receptive clarity, clear undistorted mindfulness. Because that's really our friend. That's really what we're learning to recognize and trust and really get.

It's so simple and so accessible that we're looking for something too big.

So right now, however you're sitting, can you feel your hands? Yes? No? Yes? Yeah. Wasn't very difficult, was it? Did it take much effort? As soon as I said "feel your hands," you could feel it, right? Just feel some sensations. That's mindfulness. That is mindfulness.

It doesn't have to always be incredibly focused and precise. Sometimes it is. But sometimes, when you're really trying to feel the breath, to feel the sensations, to feel the foot, to hold on—that's not mindfulness. That's a certain kind of extraness, I would say, in the mind. Wanting, striving, pushing.

Notice it. Ah, pushing feels like this. That's mindfulness again.

It's hard to trust. We want a little more oomph. But this is really where we begin to see that steadiness is more accessible when you don't feel like everything has to be so incredibly focused and precise and clear. We can't keep that up. You can do it for a while, and then you're exhausted, or you get a headache, or you just say, "Well, to heck with this. I'm taking a couple hours off." And then I'm coming back.

Notice your mind going, "To heck with this. I'm taking a couple hours off." That's mindfulness. You notice that. "I've had it with this." It feels like this. It's not so hard. It gets really interesting.

So it's not unattainable or esoteric—recognizing things as they have come to be, learning how our mind works, really beginning to trust. In a moment, we can see, when we're learning how our mind works, how the source of suffering comes up, how it fades, how the sense of peace comes up with wisdom, how it fades. They're just like the back and forth of the hand, this close. Suffering, suffering. "I don't want this. I don't like it like this." Oh, not liking is like that. It still doesn't feel good—it doesn't start feeling good. But it's a shift from being caught in the distortion to the awareness of it. And that awareness is what we're cultivating.

So even awareness of, say, aversion—if we recognize, "Oh, aversion feels like this"—in that moment what's being cultivated is a pure consciousness, pure mind that's not filled with aversion. You see? So it's always just that close.

I think it was this fall during our three-month retreat, Joseph was welcoming people, and he said something that kind of stuck with me. I hope it's useful. First he was saying, you know, this is a great privilege that we all have, to be together, to have this time and space to actually explore how our minds work. And sometimes it can seem—you know, I'm talking about these little subtle movements of mind—it can seem rather esoteric. I know a lot of people, some people even today said, people outside don't really understand what we're doing. The classical dismissal of meditation is staring at your navel, that it's a waste of time, that you should get out and do something.

So let me say: yes, whatever our situations in life are—and I'm not saying everyone's in a great situation—but compared to the vastness of the world, that we have this time and this space and enough health to be here, and most of all, the interest, the courage to really look at, to keep meeting what's happening in the mind—we are really privileged.

But I'm not saying this to invoke guilt. Someone went right to guilt when they heard that. We're privileged, but I'm not saying it for that reason. I'm saying it in a much more positive way. We can really feel a sense of appreciation, of gratitude for the opportunity and for your interest and your courage, because this is an uplifting quality. Yes, it is an incredible privilege. That's a wholesome state to appreciate. It can uplift the mind and heart, give us a little energy, a little willingness. It is a privilege. Don't take that to beat yourself up. But when you're thinking, "Oh, my mind—I came to look at this junk"—yes, actually, yes. And it's a privilege. And here I am.

We don't have to deal with what so many others face. I've spent a fair amount of time in Burma in the last few years, and that's a beautiful and very messed up, incredibly suffering country. And the sense of privilege—I think in some ways there's so many people who are so poor that they can barely get enough to eat, or not even, plus the horrific oppressiveness of the government.

And even within that, Burma is a country filled with meditation centers and meditation teachers. It's ingrained in the culture. To stay in a meditation center is completely on generous donations—there's no charge. So technically, anyone could go.

I was there with a group of friends, and at one point some people had sent us money to offer to villagers to help rebuild the most decrepit houses. When I say decrepit, we're talking beyond decrepit. I can't even explain—bamboo mat walls. Four ladies were living in a house with only two walls, completely open in a compound with many other families, so they had absolutely no privacy. The floor was just bamboo rods with about this much space between them. That's it. That's their house. Incredibly neat and tidy. That was one of the ones we rebuilt.

In doing this, one of our friends speaks fluent Burmese, so we'd get a sense of the people's life situations, which of course weren't good. In one family, the father had died—he'd been an alcoholic. The sixteen-year-old had to quit school in her last year, which is really hard to even get to. It gets more expensive as you go. She quit to work in a sewing factory. The mother was frying little foods to help support the other three kids.

Then there was another family with an old granny sitting smoking her stogie cigar, and four little kids, none of whom went to school even though there was a free school within walking distance—which we told them about. The mother was out working heavy labor.

I bring them up because similar circumstances produced such different responses. In the first family, there was so much light, so much mettā, so much generosity. The older girl who had to quit school was dying to go back, but with total love was supporting her family. As soon as we could offer some money to fix their house, they insisted we come over for breakfast so the lady could cook her things for us. And they sit and watch you eat—that's the way it works—with the monk who was helping us.

This monk was so happy to help. He said, "I usually can't give things to people—as a monk you receive. But I can go." And he organized the work. He ordered all the supplies and had them bill us. He spent the whole day there making sure it was all built right. And he was so happy. That was great.

So we were with the monk, and this family was so filled with light, so beautiful, coming to the meditation center. The other family with the old granny—just completely beaten down by life. Even when we mentioned the school, you could see... Some people have the conditions that allow them to really use what's available. We all do, at some level. Some people don't. Similar circumstances, such different responses.

So really, I mean it—appreciate your courage. Or maybe it's naïveté if you've never done a retreat before. But if you stay to the end, it will turn into courage. Appreciate your interest. Not every moment will feel inspired. You'll feel beaten down at times.

But you're here. You're looking. It's a whole other way of being. Really, call on that uplift. Sometimes we need it.

And in speaking to the sense that we're looking at these subtle movements while there's so much difficulty in the world—it can seem rather esoteric. But I had another experience this summer that somehow re-deepened my commitment to what I see as the absolute necessity of understanding that when we recognize things as they are, it's the only way we have a chance to act with greater and greater compassion and wisdom—for ourselves, for the world. It just really deepened in me: yes, this is the way to live. This is worth spending my life doing.

I was in Munich for a month, and one day I had time to take the little suburban train out to Dachau—one of the concentration camp museums. I'd never been to one before. I went by myself, which was great. And of course I've read a lot. But this is not just about Germany and World War II. This is about our human nature—that's the point I'm trying to make.

I thought it was really well set up. It's in a nice country area. Two or three of the buildings are still standing, and they've made museums in them with very well-explained placards throughout. In the back, there are just the foundations where all the other buildings and dormitories were. To me it seemed huge. I don't know—somehow I was amazed at how vast it was. When I went back to the German friends I was staying with, they said, "Oh no, that's one of the little ones."

But this experience actually inspired in me a greater depth of appreciation for this practice, this understanding of what we're doing. The way it was set up, many of the rooms had big placards, each one describing a different aspect of life in the camp—how people were transported there, some of the things that happened, all the different groups of people who were interned. The Roma, Jewish people, gay people, people from Hungary, people from Italy. It just went on and on, all kinds of ethnic groups, things I didn't know about. Other placards described scientific experiments, or the people who lived in the village, or prisoners in the camp—some acted really nobly, some not so nobly.

But each placard, in my memory, would present something general—all the Roma, for instance—but there would also be a picture of at least one real person with their name and a little story. It made it all human. Instead of just this vastness, each thing was human.

I couldn't come out of it thinking, "Well, that's just some monsters under Hitler." There were too many people on all the different sides. These were normal human beings. Some really disturbed individuals, okay, but mostly normal human beings—individuals caught in vast, huge forces of politics and circumstance, each person having to make their own decisions based on their own particular story, to the best of their ability. And decisions catapult.

Whether decisions based on denial, or fear, or trying to protect your family, or greed, or delusion, or hatred—whatever the motivation—that was so strong in me as I walked through.

And as I came out, I could really see: pick any place on the planet in just the last fifty years. It doesn't only happen then. How many people are involved in hatred and genocide, in trying to get rid of "the other"? Whether the other is immigrants or another ethnicity, another culture, another political persuasion, another social class. What about the way people were treated at Guantanamo? What about the Congo? What about the Balkans? What about Soviet Russia under Stalin? The Burmese government is doing atrocious things to its own people right now. Human beings.

I came out of it thinking: I could have an idea in my mind—"Oh, I would never do something like that." But if I don't know intimately, if I'm not able to be with my heart and mind in any situation and know how it works, know how it's responding, recognize when I'm acting from greed, know when there's fear and what fear actually feels like instead of getting lost in it—I don't know how I would behave in a situation I've never been in. I could have all kinds of nice ideas: "I would never do that. I would be compassionate." But I don't know.

I really don't know.

But I do know there's nothing more worth doing with my time than learning to know how the mind works and where freedom is. And if I'm afraid of being with the unpleasant, if I'm afraid of fear, if I'm afraid of pain—then if I don't recognize that, I'm going to act out of it. And that action could have... well, we never know what the consequences will be. But if I know how to get in touch with, "Oh, this is fear," then I can look at the bigger picture and make a wiser decision.

This doesn't come from wishing or hoping or waiting. It comes from sitting here and walking here and going home and learning how to really be interested—with wisdom, with love, with mindfulness—to just see what kind of tricks the mind is getting up to now. Over and over and over. How does greed work? How does delusion work? How does wisdom arise? Are the distortions in the mind of greed and aversion and confusion actually suffering? Well, you have to see if it's true for you. Don't believe us.

Mostly, we don't think wanting is suffering. We think not getting what we want is suffering. But watching closely, you see that wanting is kind of leading us on to happiness, you know.

So I say half of this practice is learning to recognize these distortions. And I'll give a couple of simple examples of how they distort. The other half is recognizing when there's the wisdom mind, when there's peace in the mind, when there's love, when there's brightness, when there's faith. It's not just about focusing on the negative, but it's also not about running away from it. It's not about thinking that anything uplifting that happens is a freak of nature and nothing to do with you. It is nothing to do with you—but then again, the other is nothing to do with you either, because it's all just things as they have come to be in this moment, how they act.

A couple of simple examples. When the Buddha said that the Dhamma is visible here and now, in those moments—and this is my paraphrasing—in those moments when there's no greed, not hatred or confusion arising in the mind. It's not personal that those happen; that's just habits of mind and how they cloud. Recognizing accurately means seeing that they distort our perception. They narrow our vision, and we don't recognize accurately when we don't see that these qualities are distorting our understanding of things. We see inaccurately, we understand inaccurately, and then the whole ball gets rolling.

Simple examples—because that's what's great about a retreat. It's a laboratory. Everything, little things that happen, get really blown up in your mind. Have you noticed that yet? It's only the second day, you know. You're like, "I'm so upset about this!"

And your rational mind comes in and goes, "It's not a big deal." Okay, so they ran out of oranges. I think you'll live. "No, I've got to have an orange now. I'm going to die without my vitamin C in the desert!" I think this is exaggerated. Maybe.

You're mindful if you think it's exaggerated. You don't always catch it. But in a way, it's good that it gets exaggerated, because sooner or later we notice, "Oh, this might be wanting. Ah, maybe this is wanting. Could I notice how wanting feels?"

When there's wanting, it runs us. My brother had a hunting hound. Well, it didn't hunt, but it was that kind of breed—really a lovely, sweet dog. He just lived in suburban Atlanta. The poor dog didn't get a chance to hunt. But that's what he was bred for. He's led by his nose.

Really, the nose was so sensitive that when he'd come in the house, he was simply enthralled to it. His nose would take him to every new thing in the house. If I had come to visit, he'd be in the room, in the suitcase—anything that any human had touched, he'd pull it out, rip it open. The garbage, the suitcase, anything. He'd go out in the backyard and just run with his nose along the ground the whole time.

It looks like suffering, doesn't it? But to me, that's craving, wanting. It's just pulling us. "Yes, this next thing will do it. This next thing will do it. This next thing will do it." But do we notice that?

The Buddha said craving and hatred are makers of measurement. In our mind, they narrow the whole world.

Let me give an example. I used this one a few years ago—it happens here. It happened here the other day. It happens here all the time. You go out walking in the desert. I love this desert. It's one of the reasons I like to come here. The space and the kind of smell in the air—it just feels like it purifies my mind. I love it.

So when you're walking out and you're just with whatever's arising, you see a little chipmunk, you see some birds. You see, you hear, you smell, and there's just this sense of isness of things. Notice that—not just in the desert, but it's a good place for it. That sense of isness, I call it—just being. In that moment, there isn't greed. There isn't aversion or wishing things would change. You're not thinking, "I am having such a great moment of smelling the smell in the desert." You're just there. No biggie.

This is a moment that inclines toward freedom. Totally present with things as they have come to be, not needing to describe or explain or reference or anything. Just this. It's so simple. Someone else said the other night—no, we all have moments like this all the time. We don't notice, or we're looking for something more.

But in that moment, just notice how many moments there are here. And many of them will not be in the formal sitting or walking. They'll be when you're drinking tea or standing in line or going to the toilet. It doesn't matter what. When the mind at that moment is pure, notice it.

So we want to understand the distortions, but we also want to recognize and trust—really trust—those moments of wakeful purity when the mindfulness is present.

So you're walking like that. I was walking like that in the desert the other day. And suddenly I remembered how last year and the year before, I knew exactly where three tortoise holes were. So right away, I said, "The tortoise holes! Can I find the tortoise holes?" And everything collapsed. What had been really pleasant—I got tightness in my chest, which I recognize as wanting from watching it for thirty-five years. I started pressuring. I'm looking for the tortoise hole, which, by the way, I couldn't find. So don't ask me. I can't remember this year. I'm wondering, "Was it that tree? Was it that tree?" I know there was one tree out there.

There's three trees together. Try to find three trees together. Everywhere there's three trees together! And it was under that tree. And the search was completely unenjoyable. I noticed that.

So I thought, okay, stop. Just walk. La, la, la—pretending to be relaxed. But really I'm scanning: that's not it, that's not it, that's not it, that's not it. Pretending.

Then I acknowledged, okay, this really isn't pleasant. I did have a moment where I said, okay, forget it. And guess what? Just then I saw a tortoise.

Now that's bad news, because what do you think that did? Right? Oh, I just have to relax and I'll see a tortoise! Everything happens the way we want it. That's what we were joking around about with the managers—that's a sign the divine is taking charge. As soon as I relax, there's the tortoise. It's all about me. That's the third hindrance, you know.

But anyway, this is how we make measurement. Everything else is not what we want, and that becomes what we want. And if we don't notice that, we think we're having a good time. Yeah, I'm looking for a tortoise—far out.

So notice that feeling of wanting, how it distorts. We can't see what's accurate. What was accurately happening? Smelling, tasting, hearing, and tightness. And wanting feels like this. As soon as I recognize wanting feels like this, it's still there. But what's being fed in that moment is mindfulness, is purity—not feeding the wanting.

Explore that. That's what we get a chance to explore here. Don't believe me. See.

Aversion is more obviously suffering. But we can still easily jump over the aversion itself. We think the suffering is that thing that shouldn't be happening. When that's gone, it'll all be okay—as if we're going to somehow manipulate the whole world. But somehow we keep thinking we're going to manipulate the whole world. Rearrange the deck chairs on the Titanic. We're missing something.

Have you noticed—Thich Nhat Hanh talks about this—if you have a toothache, it takes over your world, doesn't it? That's all we notice. But how many teeth don't hurt? How often do you notice when you don't have a toothache? Or even not a toothache, just a little rough spot that doesn't even hurt. Can you keep your tongue away from that little rough spot? Is your tongue running over all your other teeth? No.

Is there a sound you don't like? Have you noticed how when you're lost in aversion and don't notice it, that sound takes over your entire world?

Once I was on a retreat at our center, IMS. I'd been living there for years, way up in the attic. And I got into what we call "yogi mind"—this really exaggerated wanting or aversion. There was this sound, like a low humming. I started going nuts. I was running down into the furnace room, running all over the building. It was the heat. The heat had been running all winter for several years just like that. There was nothing wrong with the heat. I was losing it. "I can't stand it. There's no way I can practice if this sound continues. It's absolutely making me crazy. There's no way." I mean, I was really out there.

If you start to notice that kind of thing happening in your mind about anything, you might want to check in. What's happening in the mind right now? Don't keep focusing on the object. "Oh, that's aversion." And as my teacher in Burma says, aversion is just doing its job. But mindfulness is doing its job too—noticing aversion.

And the third mark of measurement—well, delusion is when we just don't have a clue what's happening. That's when you wake up and think, "Oh, thinking. Maybe I'll feel the breath." But the other aspect of delusion is what I was describing earlier: that every sight, not every one, but many sights, sounds, thoughts, smells somehow get referred back to "What does that mean to me?" It's all about me.

I'll give you a good example from Joseph. He told us this a few years ago. Joseph Goldstein, one of our colleagues, was on a retreat somewhere, sitting in line waiting for lunch—second in line. You know how it is, everyone lined up in the cafeteria. I call it the hell realm of retreat, actually, because there's so much going on. You notice everybody's minds and thoughts flying around that room.

Anyway, he was standing there, and the person in front took the lid off a giant pot, and it dropped and made a heck of a racket—clang, clang, clang, clang! And Joseph said his first thought was, "It wasn't me. You can all see it wasn't me." First thought, right? That's the sense of self. So inundated with comparing everything to me, me, me, me—we don't even notice it.

So just for fun, for the rest of the night, the rest of the retreat, notice if that ever happens. Not that you drop the thing or the person in front of you does. But notice. And this is with interest: How does the mind work? Somebody's walking along—"Hmm, not as good as me." Somebody else is sitting—"Oh, they're doing better than me." Is this pleasant? Is this uplifting? Is this onward leading? Is this what you'd call freedom—comparing ourselves to every other person here?

Better, worse, equal? It's exhausting. It's really boring. And you'll do it over and over and over again.

Don't take it personally, though. Because every mind is doing that. I know yours is doing it the most of everyone's mind. Everybody's mind is doing it. That's the nature of identification.

But mindfulness doesn't care. Mindfulness can also be with identification. Nothing can stain or harm or damage the quality of awareness and mindfulness. We can forget about it, but it's just right there. As soon as you remember, "Oh, I wasn't mindful," you are already mindful. As soon as you think, "Oh, I was lost in thought," you're not anymore.

Recognize that moment of awareness, that moment of mindfulness. Being mindful, remembering—that moment isn't hard to do. Trusting it, really trusting the power of mindfulness rather than "I have to fix it, these things are wrong, I want to get here"—trusting that mindfulness and the steadiness of it is enough—that is hard to do. Because we think we are in charge, despite all evidence to the contrary.

So that's just my encouragement to you: to recognize that awareness of anything is like this. To appreciate and trust awareness. And don't despair, because however long you haven't been noticing what's happening, as soon as you notice you're not noticing, you're here again. It's always accessible, and nothing can damage it.

And the steadiness of mindfulness is the cause and condition for wisdom—wisdom of how things have come to be in this moment—to arise naturally. You don't have to make that happen.

Huge relief.

CHAPTER 93

The Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines anicca (impermanence) not as an abstract concept but as a doorway to liberation through accurate perception. Drawing on the Buddha's teachings about vipalāsa (distortions of perception, thought, and view), she explores how we habitually perceive permanence where none exists—and how this misperception underlies our suffering.
> Wilson unpacks the Buddha's powerful statement that when the perception of impermanence is fully developed, it eliminates sensual lust, craving for existence, ignorance, and the conceit 'I am'—equivalent to complete liberation. She discusses saññā (perception/recognition) and how our failure to recognize the momentary, changing nature of experience leads to clinging and suffering. The talk addresses three manifestations of delusion: inattention, denial, and misperception itself.
> With characteristic warmth, Wilson acknowledges the poignancy of impermanence—sharing the story of Ānanda weeping at the Buddha's approaching death, and Steve Jobs' reflection on mortality as a tool for clarity. She emphasizes that opening to impermanence doesn't mean suppressing sadness or loss, but meeting these experiences with tender awareness. Drawing on Ajahn Chah's teaching to simply recognize 'it is uncertain,' she invites practitioners to sustain moment-to-moment awareness of the way things are, discovering that accurate perception leads not to despair but to wonder, freshness, and freedom.

So tonight, I wanted to talk about anicca, impermanence. I was thinking with the weather lately, I hardly need to talk about it—it's really quite obvious. But I want to talk about it from the point of view of how the Buddha speaks about accurate perception being the doorway to liberation, to understanding.

When he talks about the nature of insight, freeing insight, the nature of insight is not about creating some new reality—that if we meditate hard enough or study hard enough, somehow we create a different world that's better and impermanent and not-self and all. It's not like we're moving from permanence to impermanence. We just don't recognize accurately. And the nature of perception, when the Buddha talks about right view, the translation into English—right view—I like that translation because it's almost literal. We're viewing accurately the way things are. We're recognizing the way things already are.

In terms of the three characteristics, as you know: anicca, impermanence; dukkha, or unsatisfactoriness, unreliability; anatta, not-self. All three of them—and I think I'm going to give a talk on each of them this month—but all three of them, the way we're caught and why we suffer is that we resist them, we don't understand them. But on the deepest level, we don't understand them because we don't recognize accurately.

And what gets in the way of recognizing accurately? Our old friends, the kilesas, you know: greed, wanting, hatred, aversion, and delusion—both not having a clue what's going on, not paying any attention, or making it all about me.

So I want to start by talking about the perception of impermanence. These distortions of perception, the Buddha talked about them. He calls them vipallasa, distortions of the mind. There are four. I'm only going to talk about three this month.

"These four, O monks, are distortions of perception, distortions of thought, and distortions of view: sensing no change in the changing, sensing pleasure in what is unsatisfying, assuming self where there is no self, sensing the unlovely as lovely. Gone astray with wrong views, beings misperceive with distorted minds. Bound in the bondage of Mara, these people are far from safety. They're beings that go on flowing, going again from death to birth."

This is Andrew Olendzki's translation, "Distortions of Mind." I'll go into it a little more specifically in a moment.

But I find it fascinating—in particular about impermanence of the three characteristics. To me, it seems like on an intellectual understanding level, impermanence is the most obvious. People here wouldn't really argue that our bodies and minds are permanent. In an intellectual discussion, I'm assuming we could agree: yeah, stuff's changing all the time. That's right. And I may or may not be comfortable with it, but it's something that intellectually we can get.

But do we really? What would it mean if we were actually living from the cellular knowing of the way things are in terms of impermanence—the fact that no experience of mind or body lasts for more than a split second? That's the level at which impermanence is how things are. What would it mean to live from that?

And our mind that isn't quite there isn't really thrilled about that idea. Even when I think, "Yes, I understand impermanence," if I then think, "What would it be to live from it?"—the Buddha often said that whatever is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying. If we really recognize the changing, impermanent nature of something, we so deeply see it that we can't cling to it to satisfy our hearts and minds, because it just doesn't make any sense. He says that often. Do I really believe that? He doesn't say you hate everything because it's impermanent, just that we know it's inherently unsatisfying.

And he also says over and over: can whatever is impermanent, can that be self? He says this in many suttas, and the monks and nuns always respond, "No, Revered Sir, it cannot be self." And that's always presented as proof that there's no self. But I think, do we actually live from that? Do we believe that? Just because the Buddha said it, do we believe it?

So I think part of our practice, our exploration, is not to try and make ourselves believe another view. That's not freeing or helpful. But instead, to look and see what we do believe, how we do act, and then start to explore and cultivate what the Buddha calls the perception of impermanence. We do cultivate the perception of permanence all the time.

Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all lust for existence—all wanting for becoming. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit, 'I am.'

That's a really powerful statement. Those four things are equivalent to arhatship, complete liberation in the Buddha's teaching. The perception of impermanence, when developed and cultivated, eliminates sensual lust, lust for becoming, ignorance, and uproots all conceit of "I am." That's incredibly powerful.

And what I love about it—I love exploring perception anyway. I think it's a fascinating place of study. What we mean by perception is simply this: with any sense contact—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, moods in the mind—the perception, saññā in Pali, is what the Buddha described as the recognition faculty. On a gross level, perception would be "paper." I see this as paper. Knowing I'm seeing is a kind of perception. Seeing people is a perception. A name is a perception. Those are obvious perceptions.

But he's talking on a subtle level—that we don't perceive, we don't recognize, the constant subtle changing nature of experience. We literally perceive things to be solid and permanent. I could do a whole other talk on perception itself, but I'm not going to tonight. Instead, let's explore the power of this perception of permanence and perception of impermanence, and start to bring mindfulness to this area—not to make ourselves right or wrong, but to recognize: what are we perceiving?

The Buddha talks about distortions of perception, of thought, and of view. This is another thing I love about exploring perception. How we perceive—like perceiving paper, or perceiving a certain person—that's saññā. And the distortion of perception, say, perceiving permanence, leads to how we think about something. That's what he calls a distortion of thought. We don't recognize that we're thinking about something as permanent, but that's how we perceive it.

See if this happens to you at all, ever in the day: "Oh no, this terrible mood. How am I going to get through the rest of the day with this mood like this? How am I going to get through the rest of the retreat if it keeps on raining like this?" Or: "Finally, finally I've hit that place of smooth samādhi, and now it's going to be smooth sailing for the rest of the time." Or we try to recreate an experience. All these thoughts become distortions of thinking.

And that then leads to distortions of view, of diṭṭhi, which would be wrong view rather than right view, where we don't even recognize that we're assuming the permanence of anything. Perception is quick and subtle, but it's extremely powerful when we don't recognize it. It's a fascinating place to explore. That's why he's saying: cultivate the perception.

Again, the Buddha: "There is no form, no feeling tone, no vedanā, no perception, no volitional formation—meaning intention or any of the actions of our mind—and no consciousness that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, and that will remain the same just like eternity itself. None."

Then he took up a little bit of dirt in his fingernail, and he said to the bhikkhus, "There's not even this much form"—the amount of dirt in his fingernail—"not even this much form that is stable, that is permanent, that will not change." He said, "If there was even this much form that was permanent, that was stable, that was eternal, then this living of the holy life for the destruction of suffering could not be discerned."

So there can't be even a little bit. Not that there can't be—there isn't. There simply isn't. Or we couldn't see through. Because what frees our heart and mind is seeing how things really are. And then clinging, for example, doesn't make any sense.

The stuff that we really know—like this sunset—pretty much all of us have seen quite a few sunsets in our life, right? Pretty much, we let it go. You may cry because it's so beautiful, but you're not like, "Oh no, come back, come back, come back, sunset."

No, don't go, don't go.

We were talking today about this changing of season and how hard it might be for some of you who are from warmer, sunnier climes to come here in the fall when the days are getting shorter and shorter and shorter. And we started thinking, what must it be like in northern Sweden? You know, or Finland or something like that. So now I was just thinking, based on that conversation, maybe on the last day that the sun's going to show up for four months, maybe you do go, "No, no, no, no, don't go away." But you know it's hopeless.

So I want to talk a little bit—just various thoughts I have—about how the delusion that gets in the way of perceiving accurately in terms of impermanence, some of the ways it shows up, some of the ways it manifests. And I'm sure you can come up with other examples and other ways it manifests in your own experience. I'm by no means thinking this is exhaustive.

But I saw an interesting list somewhere. I can't remember where—I've looked—but I like it. It seems true wherever I found it. Three ways that moha, or delusion, can manifest in our experience, particularly in terms of impermanence.

The first is just plain inattention. Delusion—we're just not even noticing what's going on. La, la, la, la. This is what mindfulness is really here to help us with. I've noticed personally, I have an aversive type temperament, which really notices everything. What's wrong, what's right, how it should be. And that's been getting less. And guess what? Delusion's coming up. I walk into a room: "Oh, has that picture been here? Is that a new picture?" I say to people. And they look at me and say, "No, Carol, it's been here ten years." I mean, I'm not making this up. It's embarrassing, you know? But that kind of just inattention—and I gather you might be familiar with that sometimes happening. We just don't really notice what's happening, accurately or inaccurately.

The second is denial, the quality in our mind. Sometimes we can even see ourselves doing it and pretend it's not happening. But the mind is basically going, "No, that's not true. It's not like that." That's on the most gross level. In terms of what I notice with impermanence, especially in the bigger aspects—of things we love going away—is both the denial in terms of "This shouldn't be this way, it's not supposed to happen," and the resistance that can come with that. The resistance to the change itself, or the resistance to the sadness or the loss or whatever way that comes up for us. I'll talk about that in a minute.

And the third, on that level of vipalasas that I was talking about, the distortions of perception—the third way that delusion, that moha, manifests in our experience is by misperceiving, by just recognizing wrongly. Someone was telling me today about his experience, giving me funny little examples of how he saw somebody and his mind completely made it up: "I know this person. This person's sick. This is all going on with this person." And then recognizing later that he was completely and totally wrong. His mind had just made it up. Well, I love it when we can at least see that, to see how that process works. Because until we're really awakened, when we're suffering, that process of really just recognizing wrongly is going on a lot of the time.

So I want to talk about these ways for a moment, how they might show up in our experience with impermanence. The not recognizing impermanence, or even more the resistance, the denial, the sadness—I don't think this is news to anybody. The kind of strategy that seems to be the habit of our mind, and is certainly what the Buddha was pointing to in the Four Noble Truths: our strategy in the face of the fact that there actually is no stability anywhere, that there is no steadfast reliability of anything. And when we hear this and we're still looking for reliability, mostly we don't like that too much.

This is actually an interesting thing to me about all three of the characteristics—that when we're not quite seeing through them... and we all have moments of seeing through them. It's not like you see through them once and it's over. We see through them.

Everyone here has seen through them all. You wouldn't be here. And then we get back in the misperception again.

But what's interesting to me is that all three of them—impermanence or unreliability or not-self—the times we're not seeing through them, the thought of them, it's not pleasant. It's not uplifting. It's not, "Oh yeah, great, there's no reliability or stability anywhere. Let's hear more about that. That's great. Nothing in this world gives satisfaction. Wonderful. That's why I came to practice."

But when we understand them, they're the source of freedom and joy and a much deeper way of being—like living in three dimensions instead of living in two. That's how I think of it. That's how it seems to me. The seeing through them, the accurate perception, is the source of a much more beautiful, sensitive, connected, free life. But we resist it with every cell in our body half the time.

The main way we resist—this isn't news to anybody—with impermanence is through fear, denial, and clinging. It seems to be, as the Buddha pointed out in the Second Noble Truth, that our strategy to find some stability, to try and hide from impermanence, or deny it, or at least somehow find a place of safety within it, is to cling. The mind that tries to hold on to anything—to sense pleasures. We all know that; that's the obvious one. To views, to ideas, to experiences, to relationships, to family, to situations, to comfort in our body, to whatever, to our ideas about who we are, to our personality. We may hate our personality, but we'll cling to it come hell or high water. Don't give me someone else's personality; I just want to hate my own.

But it's so poignant to me, really touching, because the clinging—in a way, the deepest clinging, I feel, is this clinging to really be free, this yearning for wholeness, for connectedness. And what we experience with impermanence is the constancy of loss, as long as there's a sense of me trying to hold myself separate from all the changing experience. It gets like that sometimes with impermanence—everything else around me is changing. But then it's just constant loss. We forget to turn it around and say, "Oh, this part's changing too."

But it's so poignant because it can really be a response of deepest yearning—for understanding, for freedom, at least for peace. And that's the misperception: that the peace will come if I can just hold on to this, whatever. And you all know whatever it is in your life. It could be something really simple. It can be something really complex.

Again, I know you know this, but I just need to say it. Seeing that clinging brings suffering because it's based on recognizing wrongly does not mean that we hate the things that we cling to. It's the clinging that's the source of suffering because it keeps us from recognizing accurately. But it doesn't mean, "Oh, I shouldn't cling to relationships, so forget about relationship. What do you mean not cling to family? Are you saying I shouldn't love my family? What do you mean?" That's not what I'm saying at all. It's not the object. It's the process of trying to hold on to what's already gone by the time we notice it and think, "Oh yeah, this is going to make me happy."

And of course—duh—this is the same pattern that we bring into our meditation, don't we? You've probably noticed that, all the ups and downs. By the time the thought comes, "Now I've figured out how to have a good sitting," it's over. By the time you've had that thought, you're into wanting. You may not notice it for a while because you want to pretend you're still back in that really peaceful sitting. But as soon as it's, "How can I make this happen again?" it's gone.

That's why we're saying: What's here now? What's here now? What's here now? And clinging, when we don't recognize it, is what freezes our perception, freezes our experience, is what keeps us from recognizing what's here now. It's so poignant because really the clinging is in the service of bringing us peace and happiness.

I read somewhere in the suttas that the search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful. But we cling, thinking it will bring us happiness.

This is a fragment of a poem from Galway Kinnell called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You scream, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.
I think, you think, I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I have stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake screaming from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

I love that because I get the poignancy and the love and that subtle undercurrent. We're all in the pre-trembling of a house that falls—whether it's about sense experience, whether it's about our external situation, whether it's about our body, our life itself. And this denial, this clinging, is a kind of pretense: just hold on, hold on, hold on.

So when we can't resist or avoid acknowledging change, we're just overwhelmed by the sadness, by the suffering. The mind doesn't like uncertainty. I heard on the radio today something that really made me laugh. They were talking about the European debt crisis—ongoing, not fixed somehow yet—and the news person was discussing the effect of this on politics and governments. This is a quotation of what they were saying: "Politics now in Europe is being driven by the stock markets. And the stock markets hate uncertainty."

Like, what world do they live in?

So they pressure this or that government, this or that political figure to stay in office or resign or to do this or that. And I just was cracking up thinking, what do they expect? They hate uncertainty, so they think if this happens, there'll be no more uncertainty? If this political figure resigns, if this bank does this, if this government decides that, then there will be no more uncertainty? It's nuts. And it was said so straight-faced: "Oh, they hate uncertainty, so they try to do this to stop it from being uncertain."

It's just so poignant, this clinging. And then there's the other aspect: opening to change when we can no longer hide from it, in whatever form it's taking. Usually when it's a problem—we don't mind change when something we really hate is going away, do we? Then we all go, "Yeah, impermanence, that's great." So I'm talking about the denial that arises when change comes in ways that are really hard for us—the loss, the sadness, the fear.

Again, why does the stock market—not that the stock market is a thing—why do people on the stock market hate uncertainty? Okay, because of greed; they want money, that's true. But on a deeper level, we don't want to face the truth that every step is into the unknown, that every moment we don't know what's going to happen next. And that is just so unsettling to us.

But when we start to really get it cellularly, it doesn't mean—as far as I can tell, until we're completely awakened—it doesn't mean we don't feel the poignancy, the sadness, the sense of loss. This is only my own personal feeling about it, but I actually think part of our practice, part of opening to the truth of things, is to also open into the sense of loss. When someone dear to us becomes ill and dies, it's not like we can simply say, "Okay, they will not be seen by me again." Maybe the Buddha could say that, but we're most likely going to really feel a lot of things—sadness, loss, anger, whatever.

That's okay. What we've been saying in this whole practice of mindfulness is simply to bring kind, non-judging attention to whatever is happening. So when there's loss and there's sadness, we can be with the sadness. It's part of our humanness.

But we tend to be so resistant to the unpleasant, right? Unpleasant means something's wrong. So this shouldn't have happened. This illness shouldn't have happened. This loss shouldn't have happened. This death shouldn't have happened. Something's wrong. Instead of saying, no, this is life. There's beauty. There's love.

There's beautiful things coming. And there's loss. There's beautiful things going. And there's sadness. And all of this—opening to all of this—is what opening into impermanence is about.

Even in the suttas, I'm sure most of you know this story about Ananda, who was the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. I haven't read all the suttas, but in many of them, different monks and nuns appear, and you start to get a little sense of their personalities. They pop up. Some of the main ones pop up a lot. And Ananda, being the Buddha's attendant for twenty-five years, and also having been present for and remembering every discourse the Buddha gave, is very present in the suttas.

He's partly awakened, but he's not a complete arhat for all those twenty-five years. And with Ananda, one often gets a sense of just his humanness. You can almost feel like he's a stand-in for us in some way. Maybe he's a better stand-in. But anyway, you can relate to him often. He'll make mistakes, and the Buddha will go, "No, Ananda, that's not so." One time he was saying, "Oh, I understand dependent origination. It's so obvious. It's so simple." The Buddha goes, "No, Ananda, it is not simple. Do not say that."

So when the Buddha was announcing that he was going to die in a certain amount of time—this was when he was eighty years old, and I couldn't find the sutta, but I can paraphrase it, I remember it—he's sitting there talking to people, and suddenly he realized Ananda had disappeared. He says, "Friend, go find Ananda and ask him to come here." So the other monks go and find Ananda.

There's this image, which Andy Olendzki tells me appears in Buddhist art often, although I haven't actually seen it myself. But it's described in the sutta very specifically: Ananda is standing in the doorway of his hut, leaning up against the door frame, just weeping in such deep sorrow, saying, "The teacher who has done so much for me is leaving. What will I do? And I still have so much work to do." He was just weeping from sadness that the Buddha was going to pass away. This is after twenty-five years of listening to all the Buddha's teachings—so we can cut ourselves a little slack that we're not perfect yet.

The Buddha, of course, calls him—and you can imagine—says, "Ananda, Ananda, what's going on?" Of course, he knew what was going on. And he just says, very kindly but very directly, "Enough, Ananda. Have I not told you? Everything that is subject to arising, everything that comes together by conditions, is going to pass away when the conditions change. Enough of your grief. That's just how it is. Not good, not bad. That's just how it is."

I love that about Ananda, because it's just—yes, that's our human reaction. We don't need to be ashamed of it, and we don't need to push it away. Because when we try, "Oh no, no, I don't want to feel sadness, so let's not acknowledge that change is happening, let's not even go there"—but no, we can actually, I find, use the sadness, use the resistance when you become aware of it, as a wake-up call. Oh, something's not quite... what's actually happening now?

It is said that when the Buddha's two chief disciples, Sariputta and Moggallana, died within a week of one another, and when they were gone, he looked out—he could tell the difference. It wasn't like he didn't know the difference. He looked out over the assembly and said, "This assembly feels empty to me now, empty of Sariputta and Moggallana."

So loss is part of life, and we can use it as a wake-up call. You all know Steve Jobs died recently, right? Oh, right, you've been on retreat for three months. He did. Anyway, he had cancer for several years.

And she was kind of shocked, you know. And she was saying, "Why did this happen?" And I said, "This is called life." And she said, "I know, I know." But you can feel the shock of it.

So we can use all of that just as another opportunity to see more clearly, to open. We don't have to be afraid of those experiences. The sadness, the compassion, the tenderness of heart—these are beautiful qualities. They're part of being fully alive.

And when we stop running from impermanence, when we stop trying to freeze reality into something permanent and controllable, something wonderful happens. We start to taste life directly. Not through the filter of our fears and preferences, not through that constant comparing and grasping, but just—this moment, as it is.

Every moment is new. Every moment is fresh. That's really how it is.

When we cling, we actually can't see clearly. The clinging creates a kind of fog, a distortion. We're so busy trying to hold on to what we want or push away what we don't want that we miss what's actually here. But when we relax that clinging, even a little bit, the world becomes vivid again. Colors are brighter. Sounds are clearer. People's faces are more alive.

This is what Deepa Ma was pointing to. It's not that awakened beings live in some special realm. They're seeing the same world we're seeing. But they're seeing it without the distortion of greed, hatred, and delusion. They're seeing it fresh, moment by moment, without the film of habitual reactivity.

So use whatever is arising in your life—the changes in your body, the losses, the uncertainties—not as problems to be solved, but as doorways. Doorways into this direct perception of how things actually are. That's the practice. That's what we're doing here.

And she said, now it's getting to where every week, people in the group are putting up on the blog, "Oh, add to your metta prayers my cousin, or my partner, or my mother who's in the hospital, or my niece who has this disease," or whatever. And she's starting to see—she's like, every week there's something new.

I was just thinking about it and thinking how most of us, there's periods in our life when we see it, but most of us have a smaller circle of intimates. So we can go for a fair amount of time without it being so immediate. We hear about it on the news all the time—and for sure, sometimes it's too much—but it's not like every week another intimate person got cancer or got sick, or their child had some accident, and on and on. And that's what my friend's experiencing right now.

So when we have the strength of mindfulness—not to get overwhelmed by it, not to get lost in negativity, but the strength to see, "Oh yes, that's how this life is"—we really, really never know. It can take us in the direction that Dipa Ma was talking about. Or as Steve Jobs said, that we can make the decisions that are important to us, or that we realize this moment now is the only thing I really know and can really count on. And as Dogen said, "If you can't see the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?"

So that's one aspect of our resistance and denial, of not recognizing our perception of permanence as a perception of impermanence—because it's just painful, scary, unsettling, and we're not comfortable with that. The other side, of course, is the beauty and the mystery. I'll talk about that again in a minute.

The third aspect of misperceiving is the level where we don't even know. Not even denial or resistance, but we don't even know that we're perceiving permanence. I just want to talk about that a little bit in terms of our practice here. This is one of the gifts of having the interest and the time to come on an intensive retreat. We can also bring this into our life, but this gets kind of subtle sometimes, and that's why intensive retreat can be helpful.

One way we assume permanence—I heard this from a talk that the Dalai Lama was giving once—we tend to think, "I know things are impermanent. Like, I'm impermanent. I was born, I lived for a while, and even though I can see changes, I feel like it's still been me all this time, and then I'll die." So things come together, they exist for a while, and then they go apart. And we think that's impermanence.

But the Dalai Lama was saying, no, no, no. What we don't recognize is what I've alluded to—the momentariness of change. There's no "exists for a while, the same, and then goes away." Change is happening every moment, every moment.

One place you can see that is in the experience of seeing. If you were really just paying attention to the eye door, to seeing, it's different every single instant, just slightly different. But it's useful conceptually, in order to function, for our mind to put it together in a way that looks steady, that looks solid. Actually, everything's changing every single instant, and we don't notice it.

Just today—and I don't know brain science, so I'm sure this is extremely superficial, and if any of you know it, please don't be offended by my superficiality—but someone told me this yesterday. We were talking about change, we were talking about death. It was somebody's birthday party, so what else do we talk about? Change and death. Then we started apologizing, and she, the person whose birthday it was, said, "No, no, I love to talk about death. What else is there?"

But anyway, in this conversation, one of the guys who's done a lot of study about brain science and the way the brain perceives things—not from the Buddhist perspective, but from a scientist's perspective—said specifically about sight and about thoughts that from various experiments, these scientists have come to believe that the way consciousness or the brain can perceive, can actually see, is only because of the change. That if there was absolutely no change, if there was no movement whatsoever, the eye could see, but the brain couldn't interpret it as seeing. And they've done some experiments—I don't know what, I don't want to know what. And the same thing with thoughts: if it's just a thought that never moves, that never changes, we don't even recognize it.

I, as I said, don't know how they figured that out.

Because we'll never know a thought that doesn't change, will we? And the sight that doesn't change—it's changing every second. That's the only way that we can perceive.

But because the change is so rapid, our mind puts it together in some way that makes it look like a steady state. That's useful. It's not that this perception is so wrong that we want to throw it out. It's not that when we open to impermanence, we can't tell anything apart anymore.

You know what I mean? Sometimes people get afraid of that. "Well, if I see there's no solidity to this body..." And there are times in meditation when that's your actual perceptual, physical experience—there's no solid anything. There's just sensations arising in space. And then you think, "How can I function? How can I stand up? How can I eat? If there's just sensation and there's no solidity, where's the food going to go?" We can go into all kinds of stuff about that.

So in one way, conventional reality is useful. It works. That doesn't have to go away. But we can recognize, when we perceive the actual changing nature, that this is a conventional way that works, but it's not the way things always are. So you can kind of see both—like those images where if you look at it one way, you see a profile, and if you look at it another way, you see two vases. Both ways of seeing are in that same picture. It's like that.

And so really, the impermanence that the Dalai Lama is talking about, and the impermanence that it's so hard for us to see in our speedy lives, is the fact that there is no stasis ever.

Someone mentioned this at a retreat a couple of years ago. I thought it was a great image. She was seeing it herself. She said it's like time-lapse photography. If you see a time-lapse of a plant growing—there's just the dirt, and then you see the little leaf begin to push up from the soil, and the whole plant grows, and then the flower blooms, and then it goes away, and then the flower drops, and the fruit, all of this. They're making that fast, so you see the whole thing. But in that you also see there is no place where it's just the flower or just the leaf or just that. There is no place where it stops and says, "Now we're just going to be flower for a while." It's always the conditions coming together, and they make the condition for this moment. And then this moment is the condition for the next moment.

A phrase I use a lot—it's one of the insights in the Vipassana—is yatha bhuta ñana dassana. It's in the suttas a lot, usually translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are," which gives a kind of solid feeling to things. But friends who know Pali better than I have said that a much better translation is "things as they have come to be just in this moment." Knowledge and vision means recognizing accurately things as they have come to be in this moment. They've come to be, and only for an instant is it like this. And then it's changing, and then it's changing, and then it's changing. There's no—as they say—there's no there there.

And that to me isn't scary. That opens into the mystery. What else is there to do but really appreciate, as best we can, the mystery and the wonder of right now? And the fact that everything that's happening right now is part of the condition for things having come to be as they are right now. Nothing can be left out.

You start to think about what conditions came together for things as they have come to be right now—that we're all sitting here together in this room. If we start enumerating conditions, you can never stop, can you? Just the conditions that kept each one of us alive, and the food that we've eaten, and the people that supported us, and the farmers that grew the food, and the drivers that drove the trucks, and the people who owned the farm, and their parents who gave birth to them. It can't ever come to an end. There's no separation anywhere.

I hope this makes sense. It does to me, but sometimes the language is a little complicated.

Ajahn Pasanno is talking about the experience of stream entry, sotāpanna, and one of the lines that's often given in the suttas when somebody recognizes the Dhamma. The phrase is, "The eye of Dhamma is open," and the line often continues, "I see all that is subject to arising is subject to ceasing."

Ajahn Pasanno goes into a more accurate translation. He says what would be more accurate from the Pali to the English, instead of "all that is subject to arising is subject to ceasing," would be "whatever arising dhamma, cessation dhamma"—dhamma meaning thing.

He goes on to say it's not good English, but it's great Dhamma, because English grammar requires a subject and a verb. So we say "all that is subject to arising is subject to cessation"—something arises and ceases in English. So dhamma comes across as a thing that arises and ceases. "I've seen the Dhamma, this thing that arises, and then this thing goes away."

Do you get it? If there's a thing, there's that moment in there where there's that thingness that the Dalai Lama is saying no, that's not so. A thing has existence in time. So whatever thing arises or is subject to arising then subsequently ceases. But if we consider stream entry as something profound, it would be useful to consider the experience to be one in which the very process that brings things into awareness is seen into. In other words, the mind is experiencing an event stream, a dynamic of arising and ceasing that rules out substantiality.

Really, in talking about emptiness, it's this emptiness of thingness, this emptiness of unchanging existence in time. And that is what impermanence opens us into.

So, cultivating the perception of impermanence. A very simple but profound teaching from Ajahn Chah:

"With everything, just recognize to yourself: it is uncertain. This is uncertain. Sustain this reflection on impermanence as you meditate. Every single sense object and mental state you experience is impermanent, without exception. In the course of meditation, reflect that the distracted mind is uncertain. When the mind does become calm with samādhi, it's uncertain just the same. The reflection on impermanence is the thing you can really hold on to. You don't need to give too much importance to anything else. Don't get involved with the things that arise in the mind. Let go. Even if you are peaceful, you don't need to think too much about it. Don't take it too seriously. Don't take it too seriously if you're not peaceful either."

Viññāṇaṃ aniccaṃ—have you ever read that anywhere? It means sense consciousness is impermanent. Have you ever heard that before? How can you train yourself in relation to this truth? How can you contemplate when you find that both peaceful and agitated mind states are transient? The important thing is to sustain awareness of the way things are.

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? Just sustaining awareness moment to moment on the way things are. Reality is how it is. It reveals itself. We don't have to think, "Now I'm going to go out and really see impermanence." Just sustain awareness on the way things are, and you'll notice when we're assuming permanence—when we're assuming now it's going to be like this for the next hour, for the next day, for the next moment. When we're trying to repeat an experience, thinking, "Let's get all the conditions exactly the same as they were yesterday at this time"—knowing that's impossible. Every moment is just its own perfect moment, and it's gone. Can't recreate it. Conditions are always changing.

Notice when we can just rest at ease in whatever arises. So just explore this: it's uncertain.

When the mind's in reaction, don't take it too seriously, but meet it with awareness. When we're seeing that things are always changing, a sense of that willingness to open into the mystery. Don't take that too seriously either, but just notice it.

I want to end with a poem by Hafiz, the fourteenth-century Persian poet, about this. This translation is called "Deepening the Wonder."

Death is a favor to us,
but our scales have lost their balance.
The impermanence of the body should give us great clarity, deepening the wonder in our senses and eyes of this mysterious existence we share and are surely just traveling through.

If I were in the tavern tonight,
Hafez would call for drinks,
and as the master poured,
I would be reminded that all I know of life and myself is that we are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

If I were in the tavern tonight,
I would buy freely for everyone in this world, because our marriage with the cruel beauty of time and space cannot endure very long.

Death is a favor to us,
but our minds have lost their balance.
The miraculous existence and impermanence of form always makes the illumined ones laugh and sing.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute. Or you can laugh and sing internally.

CHAPTER 94

Understanding Dukkha

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of dukkha—the second of the three characteristics and the First Noble Truth. Moving beyond the common translation of "suffering," she presents dukkha through its Pāli etymology: an axle that doesn't quite fit in the wheel's hole, creating constant friction. This understanding reveals dukkha not as something to resist but as a fundamental unsatisfactoriness woven through all conditioned experience.

Wilson examines the three types of dukkha found in the suttas: dukkha-dukkha (obvious suffering like illness and loss), viparināma-dukkha (the suffering inherent in change, which includes even pleasant feelings), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (the subtle oppression of constant arising and passing). She emphasizes that the Buddha's instruction regarding the First Noble Truth is that it "is to be understood"—not resisted or denied. Drawing from the Sutta of the Two Darts, she illustrates how we compound unavoidable pain with mental resistance, creating additional suffering through our untrained reactions.

The talk illuminates how denial and aversion—the primary ways delusion manifests—prevent us from seeing clearly. When we stop being "in contention" with experience, meeting even difficult moments with open-hearted presence rather than resistance, something remarkable happens: our particular suffering opens into universal compassion. Wilson shares the wisdom of Congressman John Lewis and the Freedom Riders to demonstrate how this understanding of dukkha, met with "a graceful heart," becomes the foundation for transformative love and genuine freedom.

Tonight I want to share some thoughts about the second of the three characteristics. Last week I talked about anicca, so tonight I want to talk about dukkha—not exhaustively, but just sharing some things about it.

Dukkha, as a second characteristic, is also of course the first noble truth. It was really given a very central place in the Buddha's teachings, among the things he thought essential to address. And so, just to understand it, really.

I know many of us have been in this scene for a while and tend to use the word dukkha, even though we know "suffering" may not be the best translation. I certainly do, and I notice many other people tend to use the word dukkha as a shorthand for unpleasant things we wish weren't happening. Like if someone comes in and says, "Oh, I'm having a real dukkha day." Well, according to the first noble truth, every day is a dukkha day. But we take it to mean everything's going in a bad direction—I'm suffering, I'm unhappy, and things are bad.

When I say I want to talk about dukkha, just notice for yourself if some subtle or not-so-subtle quality of aversion pops up. "I really don't want to hear about this." Realizing the first noble truth or understanding dukkha as a characteristic has nothing to do with cultivating aversion. It's not about aversion. As soon as we think, "Oh, life is suffering, everything's suffering," as soon as we translate it as "suffering" in English, it is so easy to move into that connotation of all the bad stuff.

Remember, the first noble truth as dukkha—the Buddha said the first noble truth is to be understood. To be understood. And why? Why does it seem that he shared anything? Why do we practice? Do we understand it so that somehow we can be right, or it would be better for us, or we have to take our medicine? No. To understand it is to free our hearts and minds from the actual suffering of recognizing wrongly. Same with impermanence—not recognizing accurately, not understanding this truth of dukkha. And it's profound. I have no idea that I'm explaining it all tonight. I'm just dropping in some different ways of looking at it.

But just notice, even as we start, if the habit of your mind tends toward subtle aversion, or a little shutting down, or "Okay, I'll listen." Notice that. Notice that veil, notice that little bit of bias, because that is a good example of how we mostly meet a lot of the aspects the Buddha talks about in the first noble truth in our life. It's not about aversion.

The definition I currently like best—two ways of describing this word dukkha—comes from Bhikkhu Bodhi, where he breaks down the actual word in the Pali. He gives a couple of examples. One is that the "du" part can mean difficulty, not quite working right. And the "kha" part means an axle hole, like the big ox carts at the time of the Buddha, with a big round wooden wheel and a hole in the middle that the axle would go through. So dukkha actually means the axle just not fitting properly in the hole. Every time the wheel turns, there's a kind of disharmony, a kind of friction—it's just not quite working right.

Another explanation he gives, a different way of parsing the word, is that "du" can mean difficulty, and "tha" is standing, so it's kind of standing badly—uneasy, uncomfortable. Or as Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it, the basic unsatisfactoriness, the basic "just not quite"—a little bit of friction running through our lives.

If you're sitting there thinking, "There's no friction running through my life," may you be happy. My mother used to say—she didn't really understand this, but once she came to visit the retreat center, and it says "Metta" up above. Somehow she knew: "Metta, that's like the opposite of dukkha, isn't it?" I don't know where she got that, but I thought it was very nice. I was trying to explain dukkha as this friction running through our lives, and she said, "Well, I don't have any dukkha." That's one of the ways delusion works, if you remember from last week—just flat-out denial.

Let me tell you a story just to cheer you up about dukkha and axle carts. This last year when I was in Burma, we were in a little village up in upcountry Burma, a couple hours out of Sagaing, visiting with our Sayadaw. We were setting up a little fund for the fifty-some-odd kids in that village who couldn't afford to go to school. The village basically made sure what we were doing every moment of the day. You can't just say, "I'll take the afternoon off and go for a walk"—forget about it. So they decided that this morning we all had to go for a ride in an ox cart—there were six of us—out through these deeply rutted pathways into a giant watermelon field.

So it was just like this ox cart, big wooden wheels, a little axle thing going through the hole. It was definitely friction, disharmony. I cannot tell you how uncomfortable it was riding in that ox cart through those ruts and bouncing, and the dust was coming up. I'm not exaggerating any of this—higher than the cart, and it's tilting down. Never mind springs. Every time it would hit a rut, we'd fly up and wham back down.

And then we got out at this watermelon field, like, so what? We don't want to see this watermelon field. It took us 45 minutes, and we had two nuns with us, Western nuns. We got there at about 20 minutes to 12, which meant that they were serving us lunch in like five minutes. And if they didn't make it back for lunch, they didn't get any food for the rest of the day. And it had taken us 45 minutes to get there in this dukkha cart. That surely was a dukkha cart.

And then they unhook the oxen, and they're off there showing us the watermelon fields. And we kind of said, okay, something isn't going to work about this. This is sankhara dukkha. It doesn't work. And we started walking really fast back, which of course freaked the guys out who were driving us, because it was their job to take care of us and we had just abandoned them. They hooked up the ox and came running after us. But meanwhile, we figured out this is on the edge of a river, and the river was flowing, and here was the village, and we'd come this really long, complicated way. So we thought, we'll just walk back along the river.

And they got the ox and came running for us and said, "No, you must get in. You must get in. We must take care of you." We said, "No, we only have 10 minutes to lunch." So we walked back along the river. It was less than a 10-minute walk along the river. It was like one of those experiences.

So that whole experience is dukkha, but I just want to say the sense of the friction of the axle not fitting in the hole of the wheel of the ox cart is a very apt description of this—just this sense of friction running through our lives.

In the suttas, the Buddha mentions three kinds of dukkha. I'm sure you're familiar with this. I just want to mention them and then talk about how we can misunderstand.

The first one, you all know: dukkha dukkha, which is your basic unpleasant, difficult experience. This is the one that we all just kind of label everything dukkha. We think of this. And this is the classic definition I'm sure you've heard: birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair are suffering. I'm using "suffering" on purpose now because I would say these things are suffering. Separation from what is pleasing, union with what is displeasing, and not to get what one wants is suffering. In brief, clinging to the five aggregates is suffering. The five aggregates is nama-rupa—mind of consciousness, perception, vedana or feeling, and sankhara or mental formations, and form. You really could say, in other words, clinging.

So that basic dukkha dukkha—the problem with that, as I'll talk about it a bit more later—that's just the first one, dukkha dukkha.

The second one is called viparinama dukkha, and it's basically the fact of change, which I talked about a lot last week. It's also included under the sense of unsatisfactoriness, of things just not quite working right, basically that there's nothing we can rely on, as I said last week. And it's under this one, viparinama, that in the commentaries, this is where pleasant feeling is included. So we tend to think of dukkha as a characteristic of all phenomena, being that we can't rely on it, and our mind, as I said in the beginning, tends to go to the unpleasant, thinking of unsatisfactory as bad. But here the Buddha is saying pleasant feeling also is included within dukkha. We'll talk more about that in a minute as well.

And the third one, sankhara dukkha. Sankhara, you know, is the word that's sometimes translated as mental formations, but it's really any formation. Sankhara is anything that is formed or fashioned by conditions. Whatever comes together goes apart.

That's sankhara. In terms of the five aggregates, sankhara is used as intention, as really all of our mental formations. In terms of this sankhara as dukkha of the first noble truth, it's often talked about as the fact that whatever comes together is going to come apart. And this is constantly going on.

The way it's described in the commentaries is that when we're experiencing sankhara dukkha, it's recognizing that there's a sometimes very subtle, sometimes not, quality of being oppressed by the constant rise and fall of everything. Just this fact that there's nowhere to rest and that it often doesn't quite work. This sense of subtle disconnect, this unsatisfactoriness running through life that Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about.

And our struggle with that—there's a Tibetan phrase I've heard Guy use, so I asked him about it. I thought it was Trungpa, but he said no, he doesn't know who it's from. But I really like it. I think it describes our unawake response to sankhara dukkha: the essence of samsara—rounds of birth and death and wanting and suffering—the essence of samsara is trying to correct, trying to just make it a little bit better, this moment, this moment, this moment. To me, that's the best feeling I get of sankhara dukkha—just not quite totally settled in this moment.

So I'll talk a little bit about each of these. And you get it: this is including dukkha as the first noble truth to be understood, as a mark, an aspect, a characteristic of all phenomena. It's really a radical understanding. That's why to stop with the sense of dukkha as unpleasant, or things we don't like, or actual physical suffering—it's so limiting. We really need to open ourselves to explore, to try to understand. It's quite radical that when he's talking about all aspects of phenomenal existence being dukkha, having this thread of unsatisfactoriness in it—that's not to make us suicidal. It's to free us. But it has to be that radical to free us. Otherwise, the mind is always trying to find some kind of happiness and ease where it can't, not recognizing accurately, and that little bit is what keeps us spinning.

And so, as with everything he taught that I can understand, the understanding of dukkha, even when we have moments of understanding—it frees us. And personally, I find it really inspiring and energizing. Not at all depressing, but sort of like, "Oh, right." Instead of everyone going around with the emperor's new clothes, someone saying, "Yes, the emperor has no clothes on." That's an old moral tale.

Anyway, when I first began to hear about this, sometime after I started practicing, I didn't hear much. You just hear what we're ready to hear, right? So I'm sure it was talked about, but I didn't hear it for a while. But when I first heard this sense of this thread of unsatisfactoriness, and nothing, even the beautiful, can be relied on—I felt such a sense of relief, of wholeness, of things coming back into balance. Like, "Oh, I'm not crazy."

And I don't know, just taking very simple examples: you go somewhere with people to the movies, or you go out to dinner, and "Oh, this is going to be so great, we're going to have such a nice night." Then when it's over, people say, "Oh, that was so wonderful." You hear people the next day saying, "That was such a nice night." And my experience would have been, well, some of it was nice. The car ride there was kind of long, a little bit cold, a little bit cramped. But it was okay, we didn't have a crash. We had some nice conversation, but then the radio was too loud. And it wasn't like I was so thrilled when I got out of the car.

And you go in the restaurant. You're looking, and you're talking, and you wait, and you're sitting there, and it's a little bit noisy. And you order some food, but it's not really what I had in mind—I was kind of more in the mood for seafood. But okay, this really tastes good. And I'm not being negative, but everyone's saying, "This is so great, this is so great." But then, well, okay, the peas are a little mushy. But this is really great, this is so good. And you have a conversation. And part of the time you're bored. And part of the time you're thinking about what if you were back home in time to see that movie on TV. Or this is good.

But oh, it's an hour's drive home. And it's so cold tonight. And I wish I would have just stayed home in the first place. Oh, no, no. This is great. You get home. And the next day, everyone goes, "It was wonderful." And I'll think, well. You know, it wasn't like it was bad, but it wasn't really wonderful either. It had moments of everything. You know what I mean?

And when I saw, oh, I don't have to—there's not something wrong with me that I'm not getting completely thrilled with all these things that everybody's saying is great. There's not something really twisted about my mind that I keep waiting for everything to be perfect, like I read about in the books, and it doesn't happen. I kept thinking something was wrong with me. But no.

That's not the same as saying everything stinks, and life is all suffering. It's not saying that. It's saying, let's look at what's really going on. What's really going on. It's not depressing at all. It's like just saying, oh yeah, that axle hole is rubbing. And if I don't need it to be different, if I'm not expecting to be driving in a Peugeot, if I know I'm driving and it's a friction axle hole, okay, that's fine. I don't get different expectations. I'm not looking for it to make my day. It's fine just as it is. We can really appreciate life.

So those same qualities, the way delusion shows up that I talked about with impermanence, are also true for understanding—or maybe not understanding—dukkha, unsatisfactoriness, this friction that's just not quite right. Or as Ruth Dennison used to say, it's just the little hole in the canoe. You know, you're paddling, everything's fine, but there's just this little hole in the canoe. It's always just leaking a little bit, or sometimes more than a little bit.

So the main one's denial, just flat-out denial, and we're all very familiar with this. And the other is the misperception, the not perceiving accurately due to the holding back and the aversion in the mind. I love exploring denial. I was talking to somebody about this, I think, because it's such an amazing quality in the mind. You can almost see the mind going, "That's not happening, and I don't see it." Or, "I'm just not going to look at that, and I'm just going to pretend everything's fine."

So denial of, first, just flat out dukkha dukkha. And this is what's amazing. The fact that old age, sickness, disease, and death happens to everybody. It's the same with impermanence. We go, yes, sure, but not me, not yet. And when something like that does happen, it's because there's not that complete understanding and acceptance that this is just the nature of whatever's compounded—is going to change, is changing right now.

It's not quite deeply seen that when something really difficult, just in the dukkha-dukkha level, happens to us—separation from what is loved, having to be together with what is unloved. Well, how often does that happen? A lot. It's easy to turn it into either pretending that's not happening or thinking it's a mistake. It shouldn't happen. And if I would have figured things out right or done stuff differently or taken vitamin C or whatever it is, this wouldn't be happening. There's something wrong with me, or there's something wrong with you, or there's something wrong with something somewhere, because this shouldn't be happening.

Instead of just bringing this clear, calm, uncluttered attention to just notice how things are, like I described going to dinner. Without judgment, just noticing this is a pleasant moment, this is a not pleasant moment. This is pleasant, but my mind's wanting it to do more. Oh, that's the suffering, just noticing it. No problem. When we don't notice it, we don't know how to respond appropriately because we don't even know what's happening. And we get more and more confused and more suffering.

I read a book a few years ago called Unquiet Ghost, where the man who wrote it had gone to Russia in the 1990s after the end of the Soviet Union. And he talked to a lot of people who had been there during the era of Stalin, those years when something like twenty million people Russian citizens were put into prison camps, into the gulags. Perhaps it was twenty million who died, and more than that who passed through them. But there were periods in the thirties and forties when so many people were arrested, often for doing nothing at all. It was immense. Those years were called the years of terror.

So this writer went to Russia after the end of the Soviet Union, when people could begin to talk about it a little—though it still wasn't talked about much. He was interviewing people he could find who had either been in the gulag and lived through it, or family members, or neighbors. It was fascinating, but there's one quotation from it that particularly struck me. It almost felt as if the book was a meditation on the power of denial in our minds and in society.

What he discovered from talking to many people was that during the periods of terror, people who tried to avoid arrest by lying low and moving from place to place—basically running—actually had a good chance of success. The KGB at that time was good at arresting people but wasn't so good at searching and finding them. However, people rarely tried this. Despite mass arrests, almost everybody believed, "It won't happen to me." Because people deny bad news since it implies worse news. If I'm about to be arrested, that would mean the whole system has gone mad. I know I've done nothing. Therefore, it can't be true that I'll be arrested. Anyone else who was arrested must have done something bad—until they come for you.

George Orwell talked about the courage of perception, the power of facing unpleasant facts. I would call understanding dukkha not only the power of facing unpleasant facts, but simply facing facts in general—which is, as you might recognize, mindfulness. It's not that we need to become negative and look for the unsatisfactory aspect of everything. It's the same as with impermanence. If we simply rest with steady moment-to-moment awareness, noticing what's presenting itself in this moment without bias, without preference, the fact of change and the fact of unreliability—this thread of nothing really being stable, nothing really doing it for us—will be obvious. The thread that unpleasant, difficult things do happen, not only to others but to me, not only to me but to others, becomes clear.

And we start to see that the real suffering our understanding can free us from is the suffering of a mind and heart that doesn't understand and stays lost in denial, in aversion, in blame, in judgment. It's rooted in a misunderstanding. I remember reading somewhere—I forget if it was Joko Beck who said this—but the feeling is as if I can somehow hold myself separate from this unwanted experience. And in fact, if you think of it as an unwanted experience rather than just an unpleasant experience, that brings it closer to what's really the problem in the moment.

My knee's hurting. It's unpleasant, but really, it's unwanted. And the subtle, unseen—maybe not so subtle—habit of our mind, both flat-out denial and basic aversion to the unpleasant, this pulling away, is rooted in the belief that I can somehow stay separate from it. It's happening over there. If I can't stay separate from it, then there's a way I can stop it and make everything okay again.

When you can't stop it, and you can't stay separate from it, but you're still lost in aversion to it, that so often turns to even stronger aversion, whole levels of self-judgment, even despair, depression. I've seen this often for myself and with others—some kind of chronic illness or chronic pain, a knee, a back, or some chronic condition. We might in moments be with the unpleasant, but overall there's this sense that I should be able to be separate from it, or if I could figure out what I did wrong and how to fix it, I could get rid of it. And when we can't, this subtle or not-so-subtle turning of aversion back on ourselves—because of not understanding the truth of dukkha—becomes "What am I doing wrong?"

This shows up in the whole New Age thing: if I had the right thoughts, I wouldn't be ill. Do you remember years ago, there was this writer named Louise Hay who wrote all those books about proper thoughts? Certain thoughts lead to certain sicknesses. I remember that certain thoughts would give you warts on your feet. It went on and on like that. When I first developed my chronic disease, I got a little sucked into that thinking—if you have the right thoughts, you won't get sick.

And I started thinking: Ramana Maharshi died of cancer. What about Ajahn Chah, all those years, eight or nine years, where he needed complete care? What about the Karmapa who died? Wait a minute—they all died. All the most amazing people died. Even the Buddha died. There might be something that isn't quite in alignment with reality about that way of thinking.

This came up in an interview, I think today, again from the Buddha's teachings, but these are the habits of our mind when we don't understand the truth that unpleasant, difficult things happen. They simply happen. And pleasant experience isn't the source of all our happiness.

So the Buddha is talking about this in what's called the Sutta of the Two Darts. You experience something unpleasant—say a pain in the knee—and you shoot yourself with a second dart. The unpleasant sensation is the first dart. The second dart is: What's the matter with me? I don't like this. This should go away. And so it's like you have an unpleasant physical feeling and an unpleasant mental feeling.

But in this paragraph, he's describing how our minds get into habits without seeing clearly: "Having been touched by that painful feeling, he resists and resents it." Does that sound habitual? Normal? What we do?

"Then, in one who resists and resents that painful feeling, an underlying tendency of resistance against painful feeling comes to underlie his mind." In other words, it gets to be a habit. And so it just seems normal, doesn't it? With an unpleasant, painful feeling, of course we have aversion to it. Of course we resist it. That's normal. I'm not saying it's bad—I'm just saying look and see. That's normal.

"Then, under the impact of that painful feeling, he proceeds to look for and enjoy sensual happiness. Why does he do so? Because an untaught worldling, oh monks, does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness."

That makes me—I just find that so poignant. And so true. Because when we have something painful going on, someone was saying today, "I saw it in myself—I go off into fantasy, some pleasant fantasy." Here on retreat you can't do much else, so the mind goes to find some pleasant feeling as seemingly the sensible way out of unpleasant feeling.

"And then, in him who enjoys sensual happiness, the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie his mind." So now there's the habit of resistance to unpleasant, the habit of lusting for pleasant. "He does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings, nor the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings."

And then he goes on to say that the tendency for ignorance in regards to neutral becomes the next habit.

That is what I really want to talk about—the gratification, the danger, and the escape. To look and see what's really going on. Because when we don't look, when we're what he calls an untaught worldling, that's some sorrow. We spend our life just ping-ponging back and forth: unpleasant feeling, need to find a pleasant feeling, that one goes away, need to find another one. Needing another one and not finding it is unpleasant, so then we get another pleasant. Then it's neutral, and we really have no clue what to do with neutral. We either fall asleep or we make... People here have even made unpleasant fantasies. God forbid—it's better than neutral! At least I feel like me, having a suffering, unpleasant fantasy. It's better than calm. It's better than nobody home. So we're ping-ponging back and forth.

There's another phrase somewhere in the suttas: that dukkha either ripens as confusion, ripens as bewilderment, or it ripens as search, ripens as investigation. So here, with the untaught worldling he's talking about, there's unpleasant, you just run to the pleasant. And we spend our whole life doing that. That's dukkha ripening as bewilderment. Or we get really lost—we get really lost in the aversion. That's ripening as bewilderment.

But ripening as search—that, I know, is what we're all doing here at moments. You can tell the difference. Like, Wow, what's really going on here? Not assuming that my sense of suffering, of dissatisfaction, of something not just working—the square peg in the round hole—is because of this unpleasant feeling. We stop. We look. We explore, just with this moment-to-moment mindfulness. And it reveals itself.

So this is where we start to see that even pleasant feeling is included within dukkha. And this is the point where people say, "Why do I need to know this? Give me, please, somewhere to go to have a moment of pleasure!" But that's when you're thinking of dukkha as suffering, only suffering—when you're thinking of it with aversion.

We're thinking, even pleasant is dukkha, means even pleasant is unreliable, is unsatisfactory. Look and see, as he was saying, it just doesn't last long.

There's one sutta where Sariputta is saying this. This is actually a sutta like Sariputta's lion's roar of his attaining arhatship, of his complete enlightenment—which didn't happen after only two weeks; maybe it took him a couple of days. But he's talking about, to the Buddha, different ways he would express his understanding, his freedom. And this is one way:

"If they were to ask me this, venerable sir, I would answer thus: Friends, there are these three feelings. What three? Pleasant feeling, painful feeling, neither painful nor pleasant feeling. These three feelings, friends, are impermanent. Whatever is impermanent is dukkha. When this was understood, delight in feelings no longer remained present in me."

Then the Buddha says, "Good, Sariputta, good. This is another method of explaining in brief that same point. Whatever is felt is included within dukkha."

Whatever is felt is included within dukkha, included within unreliability, included within the sankhara—the sense of formations that come together, go apart.

And that doesn't mean that we start to hate unpleasant, I mean hate pleasant, or fear pleasant. It doesn't mean—and this is where sometimes people go with this when they start to look at it or start to hear this—they start to think... And I did this for a while myself. I thought it was very clever. "Oh, everything's dukkha. Everything's suffering. So there's no point in feeling pleasure or appreciation for anything." Just, "Oh, so it's a beautiful plant. Never mind, it's going to die." "It's a pretty day today, but so what? Tomorrow's going to freeze. It's Massachusetts in November. Don't get all excited about it." Go out to dinner and say, "Okay, it's a nice dinner, but so what? It's just going to turn into junk in my stomach, so why don't I just bolt it down and stay home and eat zwieback? What's the difference?"

And I went through a phase like this. We used to call it, years ago, the dukkha club. We'd kid around about dukkha, which we thought was very clever. I mean, for me, it's my sense of humor with the other friends too. And it would help us laugh rather than be aversive. But I can see now where it put that lens of "nothing's worth appreciating, it's all dukkha, it's all..." And you hear it goes into aversion. And that's not wisdom. That's not paññā. That's not clear seeing.

I remember, this was on staff years ago, this couple got together, a man and a woman. They got together as a couple, and they were a very cute couple. They were walking down—I was watching them walk down the driveway hand in hand. And I forget who, but another one of our dukkha club, we turned to each other and said, "They're so happy. Give them six months. It'll break up. All meetings end in parting." And all that stuff's true. But it doesn't have to have that tinge.

Well, twenty years later—I haven't heard from them for a while—but twenty years later, they were still together, very happy. So it took longer. That is not understanding.

That's not understanding the truth of dukkha. That's moving into a kind of fear of the unpleasant, a kind of despair. It's not understanding.

The way the Buddha talked about understanding is to bring in investigation. What he said about gratification, danger, and escape is a really wonderful model to bring into all kinds of aspects of your experience when you're investigating. Because he's not saying pleasant is bad and horrible and not good. He's saying there's gratification. Of course there's gratification.

He said, "Before I was a Buddha, when I was still a bodhisatta, before my enlightenment, it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? What is the escape from the world? And I saw whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world—this is the gratification of the world." And he says later, "I set out seeking the gratification in the world, and whatever gratification there is, that I have found."

So it's very sensible. It's very in touch with our experience. There is gratification. There is joy. There is appreciation, even just of sensual pleasure. There's gratification in that. But don't stop there. Keep steady with our awareness, and then we'll see what is the danger: that the world is impermanent, bound up with unsatisfactoriness, bound up with unreliability, and subject to change. This is the danger in the world. So if we're putting all our eggs in the basket of any particular moment experienced for gratification, that's the danger, and we're going to suffer.

And the removal, the abandoning of desire and lust for the world—this is the escape from the world. He's not saying the removal of the world, but the abandoning of the lust, stopping that running back and forth toward pleasant feeling every time something isn't quite pleasant arises. This is the escape from the world.

To quote Eckhart Tolle, because I like the way he says it: it doesn't mean that we no longer appreciate pleasant or beautiful things or conditions. Understanding dukkha does not mean we stop appreciating beauty, love, joy, or even the nice taste of a mango lassi—why did that come to mind? But to seek something through them that they cannot give—an identity, a sense of permanency and fulfillment—to seek that is the recipe for frustration and suffering.

So it's really just seeing the facts as they are. It may seem like everything gets all flat, like we're losing something. But we're not. That's when we're putting all our eggs in some pleasure thing, and like the emperor's new clothes, telling ourselves, "This is making me so happy," and fighting like crazy to deny all the moments when it's not like that, and wondering why we might be a little bit confused.

The other aspect of delusion is not recognizing accurately this incorrect perception. Same as with impermanence—we perceive permanence. Similarly with dukkha, with the unreliable aspect of all experience, we don't recognize it and we see it as reliable. Another way of misperception: when our perception, our consciousness, our mind is colored with aversion, colored with denial, with resistance.

This is one of the tricky places in terms of understanding this truth, this quality of dukkha in experience. Because of this deeply ingrained habit the Buddha spoke of—of pulling back, of aversion, of disconnecting from unpleasant experience, either from fear or by just pretending we're not there, or by lashing out with anger and blame—when that aversion is coloring the mind, the citta kilesa, we can't recognize accurately. It's sort of like a catch-22, a cycle that keeps going until we stop and recognize the aversion.

This is from the Buddha: "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good or the good of others or the good of both."

We just can't see straight when aversion, when dosa, when ill will is coloring our mind. And so the deep habit of our mind to meet unpleasant, unwanted experience with some form of resistance or ill will makes it just that much more tricky to recognize without that reaction—to simply acknowledge, "Oh yeah, difficult things happen. It's not my fault. It's not something wrong. It's just how it is. This is difficult."

But when there's a moment—or more than a moment—of that mindful, clear awareness, just simply meeting the difficult experience: the pain in the knee, the cramping in the joints, the fear of getting old, the sense of loss, the feeling of loneliness, the feeling of grief. Just meeting it as it is in that moment without ill will. It's still a feeling of grief or loss or cramping in the joints or growing old, but it doesn't have to lead to this sense of isolation, the sense of something wrong.

It doesn't have to spin us into this whole sense of being at odds with life as it is, believing that something bad is happening to us. Instead, we can simply meet it: "Oh yes, here it is."

Bankei, the Japanese Zen master, said at one point, "Don't set yourself into confrontation with things. Then your primary being reveals itself in its true form." Don't set yourself into confrontation with things, and then your primary being reveals itself in its true form.

So in those moments when we're not in contention with our experience—not in contention with sorrow or loss or illness or unpleasantness or anger—when the mind is fully present and willing to simply meet this as it is, then our natural being does reveal itself in its true form. That's when there are those moments of what I call "just is-ness," the times when we can recognize an intimation of the natural purity, the natural luminosity of mind, of consciousness.

We all have those moments. There's nothing special happening—there's just this, and the mind is not in contention. You can be drinking tea. You can be walking. You could be feeling comfortable or cold or hot. You could be feeling sad. You could be feeling anxiety. You could be feeling contentment. Your body could hurt. You could be hungry. It doesn't matter what's happening. But when there's fullness of awareness and presence, and we're not in contention with experience, then there's a sense of seeing through. We're not looking to experience for reliability, for happiness, for ease. The sense of fighting with what's happening is gone. There's actually a sense of understanding the truth of dukkha in that moment.

Denial of dukkha—denial of even dukkha dukkha, of the unpleasant stuff that's happening, all the things I've mentioned: illness, loss, fear—thinking that there's something wrong, that it shouldn't arise. Have you noticed that when difficulty happens to us and we believe something is wrong, we either blame ourselves, as I did with that illness, or we try to hide it? We feel that other people don't want to know about it, or we're embarrassed, or we just feel really isolated. Have you ever had a time when you were in deep depression, or grief, or illness, or loss, and you felt really alone with your experience? In a way that's aversive, that's depressive, that is truly isolating? The sense of suffering makes us feel more and more alone, as if there's something wrong with us.

This is really not understanding the truth of dukkha. Because the reverse of it, the jewel that arises when dukkha is understood, is this: when we're not in contention with experience, that sense of wisdom, of clarity, the purity of heart and mind arises. And the other jewel is that it manifests in our heart and in our relationships as compassion.

When we're not in contention with difficulty, with unpleasantness, when we're not running to the pleasant to escape, when we're not meeting dukkha with aversion, the experience of life is not one of isolation but of recognizing our non-separation. Suffering—and now I'm really using suffering as suffering—rather than being a modality that enhances our feeling of weirdness, of isolation, of shame, of self-judgment, is actually one of many ways through which we can experience our commonality with all beings.

This is really the jewel in opening into the understanding of this characteristic of dukkha: the natural response of compassion. The Dalai Lama has said that compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering is. And this comes from being with our own experience, really being with it—not with aversion, but with lack of contention, with open-hearted presence—just to see what reveals itself.

I've seen it many times in myself and of course in other people: how our own particular experience, whether of physical pain, of not getting what we want, of being separate from what we love, of frustration, loss, illness, trauma arising—whatever it is—has the particular form of our story, our particular physical and mental memories and experience. Of course it does.

And at first, when we're still in denial, when we're wrestling with it, when we're trying to keep it away, we're personalizing it. There's so much extra suffering in that, isn't there? First the resistance, the denial, and then so often the sense of self-blame.

What am I doing wrong? I shouldn't be suffering from this so much. It's shameful. Everyone else on this retreat seems like such great yogis, and here I am, stumbling through, filled with grief over something that happened twenty years ago. What's my problem?

We become isolated and alienated. But it's this personalizing and this resistance that's actually creating the sense of separation where it doesn't exist.

It's creating the sense of alienation—"This is all my story"—where it doesn't need to exist.

And in that moment, and many moments, when we suddenly stop resisting... Of course, we can't do this with willpower. We all know this, but we still try. When suddenly we just stop resisting, we stop being in contention—"Oh, grief is like this. Just like this"—totally open to it. And maybe not in that second, but it does happen, over and over, that it moves from the particular to the universal. It still can be our own particular story, but it becomes so clear that my grief is the same, in a way, as the grief of all beings in the world. Every being goes through grief. Every being goes through loss. Everyone experiences illness.

And when we stop fighting it, when we stop trying to fix and just open into it with this clarity, this wisdom, this non-contention—"Ah, it's just what it is"—and we really see it... It doesn't mean it's not grief. Grief is still grief. Grief is like this. But you couldn't—and I mean this is my experience with grief or with illness, with pain—in those moments of pure presence and non-contention, it could be enormous grief, but I couldn't say it was difficult. I couldn't even say it was particularly suffering. It's just what it is. Times I've been really sick, and there's presence and non-contention, I could say, "Yeah, I'm sick, and this and this and that." I couldn't really say it was difficult. It's just what it is.

And then there is contention, right? Experience is not difficult. Then suddenly the personalization comes in again. No judgment—it just does. There's some resistance to it: "Okay, that was great, but now it's enough already. It should be over." And that's like such a world of difference in my mind. It's going to be so subtle, but okay, but that's enough now. That's enough. Get over it. And then it's personal. It's alienating. It's suffering. There's resistance. Like they say, "The smallest amount of judgment, heaven and earth are set infinitely apart."

Exploring that, exploring that jewel of compassion in the heart of all suffering, in the heart of all dukkha.

So I just want to end with one example of that which quite inspires me. Again, remember the saying of dukkha that leads to bewilderment and dukkha that ripens as search. This is from John Lewis, who was a U.S. congressman. He was one of the original Freedom Riders in 1959, 1960, out of Nashville. A group of students from the university there, African-American students, began sit-ins and Freedom Rides. They formed the beginning of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. And he and many others—I mean, it's amazing. These were kids, nineteen-, twenty-year-old kids. The marches they experienced, lots of violence and beatings in the Freedom Rides—unbelievable, the violence they put themselves in. And they kept going back and going back from a deep, deep commitment to nonviolent action. Everything they did was rooted in nonviolence, not as some external idea, but as a deep manifestation of transformative love, of Christian love. It's a really very profound way of self-transformation as well as social action.

I just want to read what he wrote. This is from his autobiography of a few years ago, just a little snippet where he's talking about that. He said:

"Suffering puts us and those around us in touch with our consciences. It opens and touches our hearts. It makes us feel compassion where we need to. Suffering, though, can be nothing more than a sad and sorry thing without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart."

This is different language, but to me it says the same thing.

"Without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart—an accepting and open heart, a heart that holds no malice towards the inflictors of his or her suffering."

This is a difficult concept to understand, and it is even more difficult to internalize, but it has everything to do with the way of nonviolence. We are talking about love here—not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is a broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us, even in those who would raise their hand against us, those we might call our enemy.

This sense of love realizes that emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, turning a person toward anger and hate. It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into himself, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence.

I think of that as really non-contention with presence and acceptance—something that takes us past the personal, past the needing life to serve us in a certain way, and into truly, just for a moment, touching the truth of non-separation. It opens us to the luminous, non-suffering aspect that is available to us in any moment, whether pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, whether wanted or unwanted. It is always accessible, just now.

Anattā: Investigating the Misperception of Self

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this intimate fireside-style talk, Carol Wilson explores anattā, the third of the three characteristics of existence, alongside anicca (impermanence) and dukkha (unsatisfactoriness). Rather than presenting not-self as a philosophical concept to debate or memorize, she emphasizes that anattā describes how things actually are—our confusion arises from misperception, from not recognizing accurately.

Wilson draws on the sutta where the Buddha remains silent when the wanderer Vacchagotta asks whether there is or is not a self, illustrating how this teaching transcends both eternalism and annihilationism. She explains Ajahn Buddhadāsa's insight that the sense of self is "merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind," tracing how the dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda) unfolds rapidly from contact through feeling, craving, and grasping to the birth of self-sense—thousands of times daily.

The practical heart of this teaching lies in generating what Buddhadāsa calls "contentment with voidness" (suññatā)—noticing the many moments each day when no sense of self is present, rather than constantly recreating identity through habitual clinging. Wilson shares teachings from Ajahn Sumedho on how our strong belief in personality becomes our reference point, and offers Ramana Maharshi's observation that the idea of self "is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows—look closely and the ghost vanishes." The talk concludes with the understanding that realizing emptiness naturally gives rise to compassion and total responsibility for the world.

So tonight I want to talk about the third of the three characteristics. If you thought I was going to talk about thanksgiving and gratitude, forget it. I'm talking about anattā—really more about investigating this idea of self, this sense of self. Think about this as a little fireside chat, not some big philosophical disquisition.

As I said with the other two characteristics of existence, anicca (impermanence) and dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), the same is true with anattā. It's not that it's some different reality that we need to achieve. It's just a description of how things actually are. Our confusion comes about through recognizing wrongly, recognizing inaccurately. Those of you who were here may remember when I talked about the inverted perceptions—that we see things opposite from how they are.

With anattā, in my personal experience (and mostly I'm just talking from personal experience, not declaring this is how it is, but hopefully just getting you a little interested to keep exploring), with this sense of not-self, it's not so much that it's a philosophical concept that we need to understand and discuss and remember and debate. Basically, that doesn't really get us very far.

It's a sense of seeing—I think with anattā more than the other two—that the sense we have, and we do have a very real sense of "me here now," is worthy of investigation. It's not like we don't feel that. We feel it. It seems really true. And because it's not investigated, we just assume it's true. It's a basic misperception that's so frequent and familiar and cozy, kind of comfortable in a twisted way, that we just keep on believing it.

In this way, the whole sense of recognizing not-self, whenever we first start talking about it—as I mentioned—the Buddha didn't seem to teach for us to memorize more philosophical concepts. At the time he was teaching in India, there were clearly lots of wanderers and ascetics with all different points of view and different spiritual backgrounds. They really went around debating each other quite a bit, very philosophically. The Buddha was really not teaching to add another line to the debate.

There were even times when people would come to him—I mean, he taught about not-self, "this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself." But if we just take that up as a philosophical view, as one of my teachers said, people go around saying, "This is not me. This is not myself." But it's they saying, "This is not myself." They're just throwing it in as another line. "Oh, I know this thought is not me. I know this thought is not me." And they don't really look carefully.

The Buddha really wasn't teaching to try and get us to have another philosophical concept. There are even suttas where some of these wanderers would come and ask him questions. Even though he taught very clearly over and over about not-self—that none of the sense experiences, no aspect of nāma-rūpa can be thought of as me or mine—there are suttas where wanderers come. There's one in particular who shows up a lot named Vacchagotta. He always shows up and walks away shaking his head and looking confused. Just so you know, not everyone who met the Buddha got it. Plenty of people would walk away going, "Okay, if you say so," then they'd go off.

One time this Vacchagotta came and said to the Buddha, "Is there a self?" And the Buddha remained silent. Then he asked, "Is there not a self?" And the Buddha remained silent. So Vacchagotta went away dissatisfied and confused.

Ānanda said, "Why didn't you answer him?"

The Buddha said, "Well, if I said that there was a self, I would be siding with all the people who are eternalists, because that's the background he comes from, and that wouldn't be helpful. But if I said there's no self, then I would be taking the side of what he would think of as the annihilationists—'this self of mine is going to be destroyed'—and that would also not be true."

Then he said, just on the personal level, "If I said to him there is a self," he asked Ānanda, "would that be commensurate with what I've always taught and what I've known, that no aspect of nāma-rūpa can be considered a self?"

And Ānanda said, "No, that wouldn't be true."

And the Buddha said, but if I said to him there is no self, then he wouldn't understand it. He'd go away thinking, "Oh, so it seems this self of mine must come to an end." And he would be even more confused. So I just didn't tell him anything.

This story shows just how confusing this topic can be. And in talking about it, I find that the more one tends to think about it, for most people, it's just not helpful. We can't think our way into this because it's a misperception. So what helps clarify the perception? Just what we've talked about all the time—the steadiness of mindfulness when the mind, the citta, the consciousness in a moment isn't clouded by wanting, isn't clouded by aversion, isn't clouded by confusion.

Of course, the catch-22 is that the sense of self is itself a manifestation of confusion and clinging. But still, we can begin to observe that itself, rather than just stopping looking. When there's a sense of self, how do I get rid of it?

When we begin talking about this again, often besides trying to think your way through it, some people go into, "Okay, I'm waiting for the big blowout experience of anatta, of no self." Finally, like that last way he said, Vacchagotta would think, "Finally this self of mine will be completely destroyed, and I won't have to deal with all this craziness anymore. And I'm waiting for that." So now there's self. But when anatta really comes, or I get there, or whatever way the mind says it, then there won't be self. You get that sense of positing something that we're waiting for to go away. And we're waiting for the big bang for it to happen, too.

So I want to say, for most people, forget about it. Quit waiting for the big bang. Quit waiting for what's here now to go away, and turn around and see what's actually true. That's, again, what I said before, what I love about the Buddha's teaching. Liberation comes not from getting rid of something, but from seeing how things are arising in this moment accurately. Accurately.

If we're afraid of our sense of self, if we hate it when ego arises, well, then we're not going to be able to recognize it accurately, are we? We're already in contention with it. But we can just begin to explore it the same as any other arising experience, because that's all it is—another arising experience.

So it's neither annihilation, getting rid of something, where everything just becomes a dull grayness. "If there's no me, who decides what to eat for lunch?" All those questions come up when we take questions the next morning after an anatta talk. "Well, if there's no me, who decided to come to this retreat?" And all that kind of stuff. "If there's no me, how am I going to function in the world?" And see, all of that comes from the thought that there is a me that has to go away.

But this is the thing. There is no solid self now, before, tomorrow, or ever. There's nothing to lose but confusion. There's nothing to be afraid of. Not that we're in control of whether we're afraid, because we're not in control of anything.

Sayadaw U Pandita said once to me in an interview—I forget what was happening, obviously something was going on I didn't like, or I was afraid—he said, "Well, are you making that happen?"

I said, "Well, no, I can't make it happen."

He said, "That's right. It's out of control. That's anatta, out of control."

I thought, oh, that's a nice definition. I like that quite a bit, because the sense of control is always about some "me," you know, the little person in the head. Like, did you ever see Men in Black? I don't know what was coming into my mind, but there's this little being, this little alien inside somebody's head that's running the body. And I thought, yeah, that's really so much what it feels like—just in here pulling all the levers, "I'm the one."

Well, there's no one in there doing that.

So really, it's this sense of misperception, of not recognizing accurately. There's a sutta somewhere where the Buddha compares the way consciousness works to a magic show. When we don't see how the magic is done—like someone on the side of the road performing magic or working puppets—when we don't see how it's done, it's fascinating, amazing. And then when you see behind the scenes how the magic is done, it loses its power. It isn't magic anymore. It loses the mystery.

The way that our thoughts and emotions and associations and clinging all come together around any particular moment of consciousness—the sense door contact and awareness—the way that all comes together and creates this seemingly real, palpable, and somehow to us unchanging sense of self is just like that. It's like a magic show. And it seems so solid only because we don't really look. We don't let that arise into a space of awareness like anything else.

Ramana Maharshi said the idea of self—or he used the word ego; I'm not using ego just because that brings us into psychological terminology where the sense of an ego structure as a way to navigate conventional reality is very useful, so I don't want to confuse things—but he said the sense of self, the idea of self, is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. Look closely and the ghost vanishes. The ghost was never there. So also with this sense of solid self: so long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it is found not to exist.

So it should be so simple, shouldn't it? Why it's so complicated, I don't really know. But that is really the key. It seems to exist because it's not investigated. Investigated really with mindfulness, with dhamma vicaya—one of the seven factors of enlightenment—investigation, interest. Not investigated with fear or greed or trying to make experience match some philosophical concept. But really, when the sense of self is there, turn around and notice. Just bring your awareness to it the same way you would a sound or a sight.

Because for sure—I mean, I do, and I don't think I'm the only one—the sense of me, self, is a palpable experience that arises, oh, say ten million times a day, right? We know there's a sense of me, or of me watching, or me hearing, or me thinking. Or else it's my pain or my thought. But often that felt sense of me—we're sort of aware of it, we have sort of mindfulness with it, we're really aware of it—but we tend not to turn around and actually notice: sense of me is like this. Feel or notice in this moment what am I calling "sense of me"? Don't bring in the thoughts, but bring in this quality of interest, of attention.

And for me, it could be just a little physical feeling at that moment. Another time, it might be an image. Another time, it might be like a sense of an image, like of looking out through eyes—that's just another image. It could be all kinds of things. And the thing to notice is this sense of self, however you're experiencing it—we assume, without looking, we just assume, "Oh, here it is. How am I going to get rid of it? Here's the ego again causing trouble." We just assume it's some solid thing, instead of turning around and noticing as it arises, noticing as it passes.

But often right here is where our awareness snaps shut, where our perception is inaccurate. So here our practice is first to just become aware: sense of self is here right now, in whatever way—there can be different ways. And then just to keep on being aware, being mindful of that, just the same as you would of anything else. Anything else. Keep on looking. Because what keeps the magic show going is lack of attention. And lack of attention leads to inaccurate misperception.

So again, it's not that something that's here has to go away, but rather we recognize it a different way. Conventional and ultimate reality are both still here. It's not like we stopped existing.

The example I often use—I've used something similar in another talk—is about perception, accurate perception. I don't know if it's so popular anymore, but a few years ago there were all these posters and books of something I think they called Magic Eye. Each page would just be symbols of different colors, maybe red and yellow. If you looked at it, it didn't have any picture of anything—just geometrical shapes all blended together. They'd have a whole book of these different ones. If you just looked at it flat out like that, without looking very carefully, without a lot of attention, that's all you saw.

But what was magic, so-called magic, about them is that if you looked in the right way—which was sort of steady but not focusing, not looking for something, but relaxed and present and steady—your perception would kind of shift. And suddenly in that field of just symbols, just shapes, would suddenly jump out what looked like a three-dimensional picture of something. Maybe of a spaceship, or maybe of an elephant, or maybe of two hockey players, or whatever. What it was was usually pretty mundane, not that interesting. But it was always fascinating for people to see how this flat bunch of colors suddenly had within it what really looked so real—a three-dimensional representation of people or animals. And then if you kind of looked away or stopped that steady, relaxed focus, that would go away again and it would just be the flat image.

So you couldn't say that that representation of the hockey players wasn't there. As far as we can tell, it's there all the time, right? But you don't perceive it all the time. Some people could never perceive it. They just never got the knack of how to look right. You'd tell them, "Well, there's these hockey players in there." And they'd say, "Well, I can't see it. I can't see it. I can't see it." The harder they tried, the less likely they were to see it—looking for the hockey players, everything just getting tight. But even when you know how, sometimes you're looking in a certain way and you see it, other times not. It's just the flatness. So both ways of perceiving are available in that particular experience.

To me, it's a little bit analogous to what it's been like in my experience with this sense of self, with identification or non-identification. I'll say in a later minute what I mean by identification, because that's a word we throw around. "I'm identified with that." Well, what the heck do you really mean when you say that? It's something that's really easy to say, but what's the actual moment-to-moment experience? What are you really experiencing when you say "I'm identified with that"?

So both pieces are there. That's been my experience—that the sense of experience is coming and going, including the sense of self. And it's just what it is, coming and going. And then other times, it's the same experience, but the perception has shifted. And somewhere there's that sense of ownership or beingship. And everything's a lot stickier, isn't it? It really does start to be a problem. Or you think it's really fantastic—it's not a problem. And then that goes away. And then it's a problem.

But in one way, it's just so simple. Stuff's just happening. And the same things are happening. And you function just as well as ever—frankly, better. And then it just switches. And it's me. It's mine. It's rough. It's ugh. You're back with that dukkha axle hole grinding against the cart.

It's not that there was no self and now there is a self. It's just not recognizing accurately.

And then how do we respond? Back to that moment of perception—how an experience is perceived, how it's named, how it's labeled. That colors how we think about it, how we view it, and then that becomes our description, our view that describes and defines our world, without even recognizing that's what's happening.

This is really what happens in terms of a whole sense of personality view, which is one aspect of sense of self. It's not the only sense of self; there's a more subtle sense of self too. But this sense of perception and then how we label it leads to how we think about things, leads to our emotions, leads to our actions, leads to a deeper and deeper story about ourselves. Have you ever noticed that?

And it can be just in regard to anything, anything. You can walk outside and it feels cold. It can just be coldness—just unpleasant or pleasant or whatever you think about cold. But you can also walk outside: "Oh, it's cold. Oh, it's November. Why is it so cold? I didn't bring the right clothes. I never bring the right clothes. And I have this particular physical condition that really can't be good for me to be here." And then all the memories and all of that. "And look at those other people—they have the right clothes. How come I never do bring the right thing? What's the matter with me anyway?"

This is mundane. But how many times a day might we do that? It goes just from "it's cold and not so pleasant" to the whole story of our life, seemingly the whole story of our life. Five minutes later, it could be a completely different story of your life. Walking by —"Wow, look at that nice lunch."

And here it is Thanksgiving. God knows what you all went through about Thanksgiving, being such a big family holiday. It's a day that can often just trigger a lot of thinking about stuff. And now you're sitting there thinking, "I didn't think anything. What's the matter with me? I'm not a good family person." It's hopeless if you're going to take all this seriously.

But this is the sense of concocting a whole story—not just the sense of self, that little clinging, but the whole personality view, the whole story of self. This is a whole personality view, which is a sense of self, but also more elaborated than the more subtle senses of self that arise all the time.

Ajahn Sumedho said: "So then the self arises." The cold, the food, the whatever. "I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears, my desires. And the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit—my views, my feelings, and my opinions. I can get caught into that world, that view of me that arises in consciousness."

And that's a view based on perception, based on thoughts. It turns into a view that arises in consciousness. "But if I know that, then my refuge is no longer in being a person. I'm not taking refuge in being a personality or my views and opinions. Then when I let go, the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends."

So just notice how many times in a day the world of whoever we are arises, based on anything. And rather than hating it, explore it just like that. See how it arises. See what makes it. See what that sense of self is. And notice how it ends when we take refuge in awareness.

He says: "It doesn't mean Ajahn Sumedho dies and the world ends, or that I'm unconscious. In Buddhadharma, the world is the world that we create in consciousness." That's why we can be living in different worlds. Have you ever noticed that? It's like we're all living in our own little world. The world of Ajahn Sumedho is not going to be the same as the world you create. But that world arises and ceases. And that which is aware of the world arising and ceasing transcends the world.

"Our refuge then is in this awareness, rather than in trying to sustain refined experiences in consciousness as our refuge—because you can't do it. So trusting, resting in this conscious awareness is what I refer to as coming home, or our real home."

So just in simple terms, when we notice this whole psychiatry, personality view, identity view arising in a moment, or we wake up and it's well arisen, instead of getting into "Oh my God, and me, and this and that, and I've got to change my personality and then I'll be better"—that's the same thing. Just that Tai Chi move of recognizing: as soon as you see all that personality stuff, just the recognition of it is mindfulness. It's awareness.

So he's saying you don't have to get rid of it even. Just let your refuge shift to the mindfulness, to the awareness. And if that sounds too highfalutin, just appreciate the mindfulness in that moment. Mindfulness of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, fine. Mindfulness of the whole story of Carol and her whole life arising out of coldness—fine. It's a story just like any other story. We don't have to hate them. We don't have to take that one so seriously as "me," especially when you notice it changes ten thousand times a day.

Quite some years ago, I was doing a couple months retreat. I was doing the practice, and you know how the story of you just keeps going and going, even when it doesn't spring up with something cold—just that commenting: "Now I'm doing this, now I'm doing that, now I'm walking, well now I'm walking badly, now I'm going to do this," and on and on, until it comes up stronger and then your whole past and future appears.

I happened to see a movie just before I came on the retreat. I don't know if you've ever had the experience, but whatever movie or song or whatever you might have had the misfortune to listen to or watch before a retreat—let's hope you liked it, because you're going to see it and hear it again for quite a while. So I had watched The Fugitive with Harrison Ford, this kind of thriller.

After some weeks on the retreat, this Fugitive story would come, and I'd notice it, and then get going on Carol's story. And after a while, I realized they were exactly the same. I mean, the stories were different, but the quality—the Fugitive story would start, it'd come in image, there'd be Harrison Ford, there'd be the emotions, the music, and that would go on for a while. The reactions in my mind would go on, and that would stop. Then practice, practice. Then Carol would come up—"Oh my God, and why is this..."—and that would go on for a while with the emotions and the thoughts, then that would stop.

After a while, I realized they were exactly the same process. Exactly. This isn't a metaphor—exactly the same process. And it was really quite funny.

And the Carol story, really, it's pretty boring, isn't it? I mean, you know my Carol story's boring. But your own stories—this isn't anything you say to me in interviews, I'm not commenting on my discussions with you—but really, isn't most of your own story pretty boring? Over and over and over. So The Fugitive was actually a little bit better, a little bit more exciting. But it's really on that level. This is what we call, and this is the whole sense of, personality view.

I'll say something else interesting about this, and then talk about the step underneath it that starts the sense of self in a moment. Ajahn Sumedho talked about one time when some teachers were meeting with him, and he was discussing teaching. He had taught for twenty or thirty years in Thailand to Thai people—he speaks Thai—and then he was living in England and taught a lot to Westerners.

So he said at this point—and maybe he would have changed his mind later—he felt that the biggest hindrance for Western practitioners and meditators is a kind of self-doubt regarding their own insight into awareness, a self-doubt regarding the liberating experiences that Westerners had with awareness. And not like the big bang, everything's over—quit looking for that. But just moments, like the example I just gave of "Oh, that's the same process!" And awareness of that is really quite liberating. You don't have to stop it. You just shift the refuge.

And he says Westerners have so much doubt, self-doubt, about their own insights into awareness. This is his opinion—he believes that's partially because our personalities are so strong and our belief in and reliance on our personalities is so strong. The personality, he says, is so often a reference point.

Think about it. When you're having doubt, how often does it become, "I couldn't really do this, because of past history or whatever." But there was a moment where it really seemed like you got it—that there's nobody here doing it, that it's just so simple. There was a taste of freedom. And then the next day or the next year, "Well, that couldn't have really happened. It must have been something I read, because clearly, here I am with my personality, and it's still so steady. There's no way I could step outside of it." We just so believe it. We use it as our reference point.

So he says we keep getting caught back into our personality. If it's a choice, basically he's saying, between really having confidence in awareness and having confidence in our limited personality, nine times out of ten we go for the personality. It's just what we really believe. I just think that's interesting. I'm throwing that out as something to chew on. I'm not saying I'm sure if it's true or not, but I think it's very interesting.

In some ways, this is the easier part of the sense of self to notice—when it's arising and how it's created. Easy just because it's a bit more obvious. But again, if we want to really explore for each of us the sense of self, just to get interested in exploring it, we can go back to something that Ajahn Buddhadasa says. Over and over he said that the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind. That's it. Merely a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. I have a friend who said that translates to, "I want, I need, therefore I am."

The sense of clinging can be really strong, but the much more subtle clinging that can arise around any sense experience—just the little contraction of clinging, of wanting—that can be quite subtle. And from that, it becomes like, "This is my experience. This is my unpleasant feeling, the cold weather. This is my thought. I am this thought. I am this feeling." It's not telegraphed so clearly as that, just kind of a little contraction around it.

If I go outside and there's a contraction of cold and it's unpleasant, it's not so clear. I can say it in retrospect—it's unpleasant, I don't like that unpleasant. Right there, there's the contraction, the clinging to the unpleasant as mine, as me. And then from that, the aversion and the whole sakkāya-diṭṭhi starts.

But there are other times I can go outside—you get it that I don't like the cold, right?—I can go outside and it's cold. You see it and it's just cold. It's just cold. There's nothing else about it. There's not a sense of me-ing or my-ing about it. There's not a sense of liking or not liking. It's just what it is. It's just not a problem. It's nothing, because there's nothing to compare it to. There's not this little sense of clinging that creates a sense of self. So merely a condition that arises and passes.

This is, of course, the whole of dependent origination, which I'm not about to try and explain right now. But to say it very briefly and succinctly, the chain of twelve links that the Buddha described over and over: when there's not wisdom in the mind, when there's ignorance and there's not clear seeing—I won't go through the whole thing, but the ones we can see most easily are how mind and matter leads to contact, that moment of sense experience, feeling. Say it's coolness, staying with the cold—the body that can feel, and consciousness that's aware.

When those three come together—the body that can feel, and consciousness that's aware—that's called contact. Any sense experience we have: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. Every second, some sense contact is arising, and consciousness is recognizing that. Mindfulness is recognizing that recognition.

But with contact, right away there's a feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. The mind feels that contact. When it's not recognized, that often leads into taṇhā, this kind of thirst. It's either leaning into the pleasant or pushing away the unpleasant. And this is all really fast.

Then it goes on. That leaning into creates a kind of grasping—grasping to hold onto something, grasping to push it away. This is still really fast. And that grasping leads to, in terms of the dependent origination, bhava, which is having and being, into birth, into sickness, old age, and death.

That can be thought of as lifetimes. But the way I want to talk about it—and I'm coming from Buddhadasa again here—he's talking very specifically about exploring how the sense of self is merely a condition arising when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. It takes all the personal out of it. It takes all the problem out of it. It's a conditioned arising like everything. We can just explore it.

So he describes contact, feeling tone—say it's pleasant—then the taṇhā, the leaning into. And then the grasping—Buddhadasa calls it the feeling of I and mine. And the feeling of I and mine leads to bhava, which he calls having and being. You see, we're getting more and more real. And then comes birth, jāti—birth of the sense of self.

And then sickness, old age, and death—the death of that sense of self. Thousands of times a day.

I'll give you a very simple example from a long time ago. I was on a retreat at IMS—this retreat center. We used to have, where you go to take the mugs, back in the good old days, all different kinds of mugs. Any kind of mug people had bought and left here—we loved all those old mugs. Now they're all exactly the same and green, but anyway, there were all these different mugs in different sizes. I would come in, get a mug, just have my tea and go. I was, I think, a little bit proud that I wasn't getting caught in it at all.

Then one day I came in, grabbed a mug, and as I was getting my tea, I thought, "Wow, this mug just really feels perfect in my hand. I love this mug." And it's like, "I want to use this mug."

Right then—that was the contact. It was pleasant. The feeling moved to grasping. And right away, the sense of having and being. I have this mug, and I'm becoming someone who wants this mug. It was birth of the sense of self right then—me and my mug.

Just a little thing. It's not like something we hate, but to really feel it—the difference between coming in, getting a mug, having my tea, and going, versus coming in thinking, "Ah, this mug! How can I keep it? Should I get—no, okay, never mind, put it back. I'm not going to keep it." Put it down. Then I walked away and it was all gone. Death of that sense of self.

It's just a little thing. Next time I came in though, I sort of looked for that mug. And it was there. The whole thing started already. The whole thing was there—the sense of self. You see, it's not a horrible thing, but it complicates everything. There was the birth of self as soon as I saw that mug. I picked it up and sat down.

And then I really started planning: how can I save it? I'll take it back to my room. I mean, there are plenty of mugs. I know other people save things, and on and on. And then I started thinking about it. Well, what does that mean? That means every time I want tea, I have to go all the way to my room, clear on the other side. And I'm walking really slow, so that's like an extra hour every time I want tea. Okay, put it back. Put it down.

And that time, it really died. Stayed dead, because it was just too complicated. But that's a simple example. That's the whole dependent origination right there. And it's fast.

As Ajahn Chah described it once—I love this—he said the dependent origination is like falling out of a tree. You're at the top of a tree, and you fall down. All the twelve links of dependent origination are like twelve branches on that tree. You fall down past them really fast and just hit the ground. You don't get to stop and go, "Oh, that's contact. That's feeling. That's tanha. That's upadana." But sometimes it does slow down in retreat. That's one of the interesting things. But mostly it's like, "Oh, how can I save this mug?" You didn't quite see the whole thing going. Whap—you just hit the bottom. You're in dukkha.

But then the sense of self dies and it's gone. So the magic trick is seen through at that point. And if you can just get interested in exploring it rather than hating or fearing it, it really gets quite interesting. It starts to lose its magical power. "Oh my god, the sense of self again with this mug, and I'm suffering, what can I do?" Instead of putting it down and walking away and noticing—wait, that self just died. It's gone now.

And again, this is from Ajahn Buddhadasa. He talks about shunyata, emptiness. In the translation from Santikaro, he translates shunyata as "voidness," which sounds—I don't know, it just sounds strange to us. But to me, okay, it sounds strange to me. But he's talking about one way he's using shunyata, or voidness: that all phenomena—not just me and you—all phenomena are empty of intrinsic, lasting sense of self. They're all void, empty in that way. That's how it is, not somewhere we have to get to.

And so he talks a lot about not only noticing this birth and death of self—what conditions cause it to arise, what conditions changing cause it to die—which is fascinating to see. But also to notice, as he says, there are many, many moments in a day when there is no sense of self at that moment. There are voids. He talks about many moments that are empty in that way—empty of a sense of self. And he talks about how important it is to notice these many moments of emptiness and to generate—this is his language—generate a contentment with voidness. Generate a contentment when there's not this birth and death of self, when there's not this strong sense of personality view.

And I think that's very interesting advice, because often—there was a time a couple of weeks ago, it's not happening here so much now—where it was a kind of phase where a lot of you were coming in, you who were here then, just saying, "Nothing's happening." It's either boring or too dull or calm. Or some people even reported they noticed their minds kind of bringing up angry memories so they'd have something to work on. Or bringing up some kind of unpleasant, difficult past—sort of like bringing up the fugitives so you'd have something to chew over. Instead of generating a contentment with those moments when there's no big sense of me, I've seen it in myself how often the mind jumps to a suffering scenario because the sense of self is there.

And you look around—what is that sense of self? It's just this little contraction, just this little moment of clinging around a sense experience, around a thought, around a feeling tone: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Just like this. It seems gross, but often when we look, it's very quick and very subtle. But I keep seeing this over and over in my practice, in my life: the more subtle ones are the ones that are harder to see, and they're really driving the bus.

The big ones cause suffering, certainly. This big personality view where we're all caught in it, and I'm no good—yes, we're caught in it, but it's not really unobserved. We do notice it's there. Even if we believe it, it's easier to observe. But I've noticed this sense of generating contentment with voidness—at times when that sense of self dies and no other sense of self arises. Sometimes that's lovely. And I know you all know that. We're just present with the is-ness of things, that place of no problem, as one of my friends says. You're quite awake. Things are just so simple. What's the problem with that? Nothing.

But there are other times when the mind is just not quite so awake, and there's not a sense of self. It's a little bit like it's calm, the mind maybe a little dull or a little bit like, "What now?" Sometimes that sense of emptiness opens into fear. I think Stephen Batchelor—I don't have the quotation here—says the sense of emptiness isn't just this beautiful oceanic bliss. Emptiness in the big picture is a falling apart of all our strategies for self-congratulation and self-protection, all our ways of getting through the world. All those strategies fall apart. Sometimes that brings up a little fear.

But sometimes this contentment with voidness is just nothing special. And I've seen—that's what I was saying—so often just the subtle clinging, the sense of that contraction of me, even around some stupid, unpleasant, or difficult story. It's almost as if it's just cozier to have this sense of me. And "sense of me" is even too strong a phrase. It's just a little—that's the best I can describe it. But it's almost like putting on an old, cozy, fuzzy bathrobe that you just feel comfortable in. And without it, what? There's nothing here. "Oh, yeah, that's right. I'm not really doing it right. I feel so much better now. I'm familiar. I know where to go from that." But this—what? "Well, if there's no one here, who's doing it? Okay, I'm afraid. Okay, that's better. I can put back on my cozy bathrobe."

It's really interesting. To me, at least—you might think I'm loony, so look and see for yourself. But as Ajahn Buddhadasa says, many, many, many times a day there's also this experience of voidness, this kind of emptiness that's empty of sense of self. So start to notice it. Not me looking for it—that's wanting. Just moments of neutral, moments of space. Don't make a space, but just notice moments of space between activities. Or notice how if you're sitting and the thought ends, the mind says, "Get back on the breath quick before something else happens." God forbid there should be a space. Or you finish an activity and immediately we have to do another activity.

And it's like I have to jump up and do something else right away. I'm not a particularly energetic person, but I can't just sit down and be for a moment. I've got to do this, do this, do this, do this. That sense of compulsion—just notice the space. Notice if there's space between thoughts. Notice if there's space between breaths. Finish eating, and before you jump up from your eating and go do your walking, just be with the stillness.

Just start to notice when there's nothing special going on. You don't have to dull out. You don't have to space out. You don't have to create something to feel like you're doing it. Just start to incline towards the voidness. And then when the sense of self arises around the next thing to do, or the mug, or whatever it is, instead of recoiling, just notice—that's the next arising condition. Fine. It might be a sound, or it might be the sense of self, or it might be a smell. What's the difference? Just notice it arising.

Buddhadasa again: normally we don't notice these moments of shunyata, of voidness, because we're so involved with experience and concocting conceptual thoughts. And we do—that's part of what Sayadaw said. We get pulled back into the personality, the experience, the conceptual thoughts. But here, don't hate the thoughts. Just shift to awareness of the concocting. "Oh yeah, look at that—making up a whole story. Oh yeah, it's like that. Personality views like this, the stories like that." We don't have to make anything be different. Just bring in interest, that quality of "what's happening now?" That confidence, entrusting the mindfulness, entrusting the awareness. And the truth of things will unravel by itself.

You're not here to create no-self—that's impossible. You're not here to discover some other world. It will reveal itself. The misperception is seen through with the steadiness of awareness, with the steadiness of mindfulness.

Reality doesn't change. And even our personality—it may change a little bit, but mostly it doesn't seem like our personalities change a whole lot. And that's not what it's about. It's about just honing the mindfulness, the awareness, and trusting it to the point where we see through the whole show. The sense of self, that subtle little clinging around any experience, a little craving, or the whole full-blown story—we just see it as appearances arising and passing, just like any other experience that arises and passes.

And in those moments where it's void of self, as Buddhadasa said, but also quite awake—it's like someone was saying in an interview today: it's just so simple. Things just arising and passing. It's so simple, I like to say, that we can't stand it. The mind that wants to think about stuff says, "How can you function like this?"

But this is from the Buddha. I really like this, and I hope it makes sense. He's talking about how things are in his mind. He says: "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight." In other words, there's just sight. He doesn't conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight. He does not conceive of something that's unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer.

You get that? So apart from sight, there's not a thought, there's not a concept about "that object is being seen" or "this seer is seeing that object" or "there are other things that aren't being seen." He's not conceiving about anything—just seeing. There's just seeing. Not he seeing. There's just seeing. Similar for hearing, for cognition: "It is not conceived about one who cognizes." Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata, being such-like in regard to all phenomena seen, heard, sensed, and cognized, is just thus. Just thus. Nothing else. Like that Bahiya Sutta: in the seen, there's only the seen.

Let me read you something similar, I think it's from Adyashanti: "Self-referencing is the mind's tendency to locate itself. So when it is realized that there is no self apart from the perceiving, then the tendency to try to find oneself in any experience, insight, or concept ceases."

We don't make it cease. It's just like when we see clearly—the concept about someone seeing, that ceases.

What I'm talking about is the condition where the mind has no compulsive need to understand in terms of ideas, concepts, and beliefs. A condition where you are no longer referencing the mind, feelings, or emotions for security in any way. No compulsive need to understand. Things are just as they are. And it's so simple. And there are moments we all know that. And that's the sense of emptiness.

Buddhadasa talked about emptiness in another way too. He talked about two kinds of shunyata. The second meaning of shunyata points to the quality of the mind when it isn't grasping and clinging at anything. The character of the mind, when it isn't attaching to anything, is called voidness also.

So the first meaning of shunyata points out that all things are void, all phenomena are void of intrinsic self-existence—that voidness is the inherent characteristic of all things. The second meaning points to the mind that isn't grasping or clinging at anything.

In a way, the closest we can get, an easy way to access this, is through that sense of simple, pure mindfulness, simple, pure awareness. In that moment when it moves from "Oh, and me, and this" to "Oh, it's like that"—that is a movement into the intimation of that quality of mind or heart that isn't clinging to anything. Rather than trusting the story, just start to recognize that. That's another kind of contentment with voidness that we can generate, that we can pay attention to.

And it doesn't lead to annihilation. It doesn't lead to non-functionality. It doesn't lead to a disconnect where who cares about anything. I think you all know that.

So I'll just close with a couple of short readings you've probably heard. One is a description of a Japanese nun named Togetsu. Togetsu saw that arising arose, abided, and fell away. She saw that knowing this arose, abided, and fell away. Then she knew that there was nothing more than this—no ground, nothing to lean on stronger than the cane she held. Nothing to lean upon at all, and no one leaning. And she opened the clenched fist in her mind and let go and fell into the midst of everything.

And falling into the midst of everything doesn't mean you don't care.

This is from Padampa Sangye: "Once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything harmful. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously."

And let's end with this from Nisargadatta: "Once you say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself'—falling into the midst of everything—you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

So let's just sit for a moment and generate a contentment with voidness, or recognize non-voidness with contentment, as the case may be.

CHAPTER 96

Awareness and Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the profound relationship between awareness and wisdom, drawing on teachings from Sayādaw U Tejaniya and the Buddha's description of Nibbāna as directly visible. She explains that right view (sammā diṭṭhi) is not about adopting new beliefs but about accurate perception—seeing things as they have come to be (yathābhūta ñāṇadassana). This recognition, when unclouded by the kilesas (greed, hatred, and delusion), naturally gives rise to wisdom without our having to create or force it.
> Carol addresses the common misconception that practice requires fixing ourselves or eliminating defilements through willpower. Instead, she points to the radical simplicity of turning attention toward the quality of mind that is observing, rather than fixating on objects of experience. When awareness is pure—free from wanting, aversion, and self-reference—accurate recognition arises spontaneously, and the sources of suffering simply don't manifest.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing moments of pure awareness, which often feel unremarkable yet represent genuine freedom. Carol emphasizes trusting this capacity rather than measuring progress by experiences or states achieved. She concludes with readings from Ajahn Mahā Bua and Dīpa Mā that point to the gentleness and freshness that characterize an awakened mind, reminding us that this potential is available in every moment.

Sally was talking about mindfulness and wisdom, Satipaññā, the other night, and then last night James was speaking about the steadiness of awareness that's imbued with relaxation, interest, and—what was the third one? Very good. That awareness imbued with those three things. I think he said something right at the end of his talk about how just with the steadiness of that, there's nothing else you have to do. Everything happens by itself. So I wanted to pick up from that.

Coming out of something Sayadaw U Tejaniya, one of my teachers, has been emphasizing recently: he talks a lot about reminding us that the beginning as well as the ending of the whole circle of the path is right view, right understanding. When we understand correctly, that leads to how we think, our intentions, our attitude of mind. Those are the first and second steps of the Eightfold Path.

The way he talks about beginning our practice with right intention is basically giving some information about why we're doing what we're doing, or the way I say it, how it works. What I hope to do now is just talk a little bit about why the steadiness of awareness that's not colored by confusion, by distortions, why that is the key to everything happening by itself—and what do we mean by everything happening by itself, anyway. In other words, some background on why we're doing what we're doing, what the point is. When we understand a little bit, whatever technique we're doing, we can meet it with right attitude, with appropriate attitude.

Our tendency can be to focus on: I'm doing this technique, I'm doing that technique, I'm looking for this experience, I'm looking for that experience. We can do any technique very sincerely, with enormous effort or willpower, commitment, with a lot of good qualities, but also colored with our confusions, the distortions, because we haven't really seen behind what's the purpose, how to practice.

Of course, when we say everything happens by itself, or ask what's the point of practice, I'm sure you would all know that the Buddha talked about what he taught as suffering and the end of suffering. That's really the point: to deliver our minds, our hearts, from the confusion that generates what we experience as suffering, as disharmony, as pain in our hearts, in our minds.

What I personally love is the elegance and the simplicity of the way the Buddha described his awakening, his understanding, the simplicity of the essence of his teaching. I realize the teachings are very complicated, so I'm probably doing a disservice, but there's a certain elegance of simplicity that has been serving me enormously in the last few years in my own practice. That's what I said in the beginning: the beginning and the ending and the whole of our path is contained in the sense of right view.

What I love about right view in terms of that translation is that I think of it as a literal translation. Right view is not about buying into a different set of beliefs from the set of beliefs we have now, although it can sound like that when you read the suttas at times. You know, you should understand, you should know that there's impermanence. But that's not a belief system. It's a perception, an accurate view of things as they are, which is very different from a belief.

The elegance of right view is this: what frees us from the confusion, from the conflict, from the disharmony, the whole thrust of our practice, is simply to recognize in any moment—and in more and more moments—things as they actually are right now. The thrust of our practice is not about fixing samsara.

There's a quotation from the Tibetan tradition: the essence of samsara is trying to correct. How much of your time today, in even little things, was the quality in the mind trying to correct? Trying to correct your practice, your breath, your attention, other people, the food, the sounds, our memories, our future plans—trying to correct. When we don't get it that that is actually just a movement of wanting, that that's the source of our suffering in the moment—it's not the answer to it, it's the cause of it.

When we think of samsara as trying to correct, we see that right view is recognizing accurately things as they are. There's a phrase in Pali, yathā bhūta. It appears in one of the kinds of insights you can have, called yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, which is usually translated as knowledge and vision of things as they are. But as I've often said, friends have told me a better, more accurate translation of yathā bhūta, in terms of the grammar, is "things as they have come to be" in this moment.

I love that because it has that sense of movement and no separate thing-ness. Things as they have come to be in this moment. What I get from that is like recognizing accurately all the conditions that have come together to create things as they have come to be in this moment. There's no separation there, is there?

If you pick any experience you had today and start trying to draw in, remember, all the conditions that made that experience possible, there's nowhere to stop, is there? You know, like Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching about holding up a sheet of paper and how on the sheet of paper you see the world. Because there's the trees, and there's the sun, and there's the rain, and there's the soil, and there's the people who cut down the trees, and the people who fed, who grew the food that was shipped to the people who cut down the trees, and the people who shipped it and built the trucks, and the stars in the sky and the Big Bang. You just can't keep anything out.

Things as they have come to be in this moment cannot be any different, and in the next moment won't be the same. That quality of all-inclusive everything, but no separate lasting entity-thingness—you get a sense of that. And we all have moments where we recognize that the perception of that is accurate. In that moment of accurate perception, any thought of "it's all about me," or clinging to the moment, or hating them, just doesn't arise. It's not in that moment, "Oh, this isn't good enough, this as they've come to be, how am I going to fix it?" Because we see there's no way it can be different, and whatever we do is just part of the next moment, part of the whole big picture.

So when there's this right view, in any moment—and in many moments we all have it—the sources of our confusion, of our suffering, that trying to correct just doesn't arise. And we get a tiny little window into the potential, into the possibility for a greater life, a sense of the peace and ease that's possible. The peace and ease that's a natural condition, really, of mind and body, when we're not caught up, when the mind is not caught up in trying to correct or trying to make what we perceive as reality fit what we're holding as how it should be.

Because we don't know we're doing that. That's our problem. If we knew we were doing that, that would be one thing. But we don't know, and that's where we get caught. And that's where awareness comes in.

The Buddha's teaching, as is often said, goes against the stream—against the stream of the mores and beliefs of the culture, against the stream of our own habits of mind that we don't even recognize as habits of mind. They're so familiar. Or we recognize them, but not quite without identification.

But it's not about taking up another view, another explanation. Views can be useful. Explanations help us. Everything I'm saying tonight, all these words and concepts, hopefully one line of it will be helpful if in a moment it helps us drop a holding and just see more clearly. But then if we take that and say, "Yes, this is how it always is," and try to graft it onto the next moment, it's all frozen solid again. No explanation is final.

Where the teachings go against the stream, where it gets tricky, where our practice and where the teachings of freedom, of non-suffering, are so radical, is that it's a stepping outside of the system of beliefs and views altogether. And that can be a scary place—just not holding to any view. Not "I'm right and you're wrong," "you're right and I'm wrong," "can we find a middle ground?" All that is useful in our relative world. But to have that quality, that pure awareness—and I'll describe what I mean by pure in a moment—that's just present for what's arising without any distortion, that gets us confused again, that gets us in conflict with how things are. That's rare. It feels wonderful when it happens, but it's rare and not quite easy to talk about.

Mostly, on the deepest level, the most subtle level—and the subtle levels are the ones that really get us—are the views or the explanations of reality, the way we think we perceive things, which leads to how we think about things, which leads to our actions and our choices. We don't get it, that it's a view. We just think that's how it is.

To me, that's one of the interesting things about traveling, being in different cultures. It's also one of the things about all the different cultures within our own country here. When you don't realize that different cultures look at things in different ways and have different belief systems, and when we first go into another culture without realizing that, there's often this kind of friction. It can also be really interesting. But we start to see, "Oh, I thought that's just the way people should behave. No, that's just this particular cultural group."

I've used this example before, but since I just got back from Burma, I thought of it again. Burma is an essentially Buddhist country, and I've been spending a lot of time talking to nuns and monks and people who are particularly Buddhist, which is tons and tons of people in that country. They have a very strong faith, not only in Buddhist practice, but in the Buddhist teaching and in the whole cosmological description that's in the suttas. It's all taken very literally. One time, a few years ago, I was with some friends and we were visiting nuns and doing a lot of different things, taking a lot of photographs.

And in one of the photographs—we were in a room down in a monastery in the Delta, distributing a lot of food at this place, with many people present—in one of the sets of pictures, there were these kind of round, exactly round, strange light-shaped images on several of the people and in between them. They were scattered all over the picture, just in certain pictures.

What was interesting was to see the interpretation that different ones of us came up with out of our culture, out of our conditioning. When we first saw them, one of my friends—a Swiss woman who's been a nun there for about nineteen years and is kind of half Burmese—she looked and said, "Wow, look at that. That's devas"—celestial beings—"all over the room, all over the picture."

Then my other friend looked at it. She's also a nun, but she's been a scientist. She had a PhD in biology, a real scientist. She said, "Devas? Don't give me devas. It's clearly just a little bit of moisture in the lens and refraction of the light"—and then the whole scientific explanation.

Then I got home and looked in my camera, which was different. And in that same grouping of people taken at the same time, there were also those little light things. Who knows? Who knows? And that's the place of seeing—well, who knows what's true? Not holding to a view. But we didn't even know there was a view.

This time when I was just back there, the scientist friend had been to Tiruvannamalai a couple of years later, which is where Ramana Maharshi's ashram was. One night, one of the full moon nights, people from all over India come to do pradakshina, to walk around the mountain. It's considered very sacred. She said literally two million people show up on buses to walk around this mountain that night. It was unbelievable. She took a million pictures, and she sent me one. And there were these—I'm thinking of them as devas now too, I don't know what—all over the place. It was nighttime, and they were all over that picture.

So this year, I was just there again, and we were taking some other photographs. And this time, she's just going, "Oh yeah, look at the devas in that picture. Oh yeah, there's devas between you, Carol, and that other guy."

And the views change. We know they're views. That's fine. That's just to give an example.

The space of the purity of awareness is like, "Well, who knows?" It can be interesting to take up this perspective, interesting to take up that. They're both fine, but we don't have to land somewhere. We don't have to land in a knowing, in a certainty, because once we do, that leads to our thoughts and how we define the world and ourselves. Useful when we know that's what we're doing, but when we don't—that's exactly the process that hides yathābhūta.

In a moment when the citta, the mind, the moment of consciousness, awareness, knowing what's happening—that simple knowing, you could call it the mind. When there's a sound and there's an ear that works, and there's that consciousness, that simple knowing of sound, you don't have to think about that. It's not particularly mindful. It's just that if you're conscious, there's a knowing of sound. That's a moment you could call mind.

And that comes together with all different qualities, mental states, emotions that might be present in that moment as well, that color that knowing. So if you're feeling, for example, really irritated right now, or super sensitive, and I clap my hands—there might be an unpleasant sound. You could just notice it's unpleasant, or you could go off into a world of story. But just how you perceive it is colored by the qualities in the mind.

You might have quite an equanimous mind. You might be in one of these states just filled with love, and everything you hear is beautiful, and all the people here are glowing, and the night outside is incredible. And that seems like our accurate perception.

The perception is colored by what's happening in our mind. We can be aware of that, and that's fine. That's just part of how the mind works, how being human works. It's not a problem.

Where it becomes a problem, where it contributes to and keeps us caught in confusion, is when we don't recognize that this is happening—and when the qualities that are present and coloring the mind are our old friends: greed, hatred, confusion, the so-called defilements, the kilesas. I actually prefer that word. "Defilements" has such a pur-itanical, Victorian quality to it. It gets quite negative, and as soon as something becomes negative, we're in aversion. Aversion is aversion, but it isn't the right response. It's not helpful.

So how do we recognize accurately and thus respond appropriately? In any moment when the attention is really present and collected and not distorted by greed or hatred or confusion. And the Buddha spoke about this. He described that as freedom.

Someone was asking the Buddha, "It is said, Master Gautama, that Nibbana is directly visible. In what way is Nibbana directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see?" In other words, immediate—right here and now.

And he says, "When, Brahman, a person is impassioned with greed, depraved through hatred, bewildered through delusion, overwhelmed and infatuated, then he may plan for his own harm, for the harm of others, or the harm of both. He experiences in his mind suffering and grief. But when lust, hatred, and delusion are not present, he does not experience in his mind suffering and grief. In this way, Brahman, is Nibbana directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, to be personally experienced by the wise."

The common definition or explanation of an arhat, a completely awakened person, is one in whom greed, hatred, and delusion are not arising in the mind. But we don't have to jump to that. I mean, don't put it out of your mind entirely, but any moment that greed, confusion, aversion, and bewilderment are not present, are not coloring our awareness, and we're awake—not just zoned out but really awake—that's a moment of what we could call pure awareness, pure mindfulness if you're paying attention. And in that moment, accurate recognition can arise.

What is the power of the steadiness of mindfulness? We can just pay attention in this moment, and that's wonderful. But where's the insight? Where's the wisdom?

The steadiness of mindfulness with those qualities James spoke about—which are ways of pointing to non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion—means that through that steadiness, the mindfulness, the awareness, the pure awareness begins to get its own momentum.

Have you noticed that in the couple of days you've been here? Not that you're mindful every moment, of course not, but does it get a little easier? Are there times when you're walking and you're zoned out, off somewhere in your thoughts, and then suddenly you're really feeling your feet? Or you're eating and feeling the taste, and then you're gone somewhere, and then suddenly you're back? And you didn't have to beat yourself up. You didn't have to go through a whole thing. Attention is just back again. Awareness is back again. Does that ever happen?

Notice that. And don't think, "Oh wow, that's amazing! I didn't do it. I should try harder." No, you shouldn't try harder. You should trust that. Because it starts to happen more and more by itself. And the steadiness of this so-called pure awareness is actually the condition that allows wisdom to arise.

This is something I love. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it a lot, and I've come to understand it more than I used to. It's not my job to figure out what wisdom should arise and try to see it and try to make it happen. That's like reading, and that's another view. Even the Buddha Dharma is a view if you're holding onto it as an idea. "Now I need to see impermanence. Let the wisdom of impermanence arise now." Have you ever tried that? Does it work? "I see things are changing."

The bell rang. Okay, it's changing, it's changing. But we're still looking out. We're still looking at the object. We're still looking at what's happening. And what's happening is changing in every moment.

The radical nature of this practice is that, in a way, as someone was saying, we turn around—and that's just a figure of speech. There's not really a here and there. It just seems like that. We notice the quality of the mind that's observing. Over and over and over. And in the big picture, that's all that matters.

So it's not about getting impermanence stuck into the mind. It's not about achieving some experience of no-self. It's turning around and simply seeing: what's the quality of the mind that's observing? Is there wanting? Is there steadiness? Is there boredom? Just seeing without judging, without taking it personally, just looking and seeing and trusting.

And it really happens. There's a growing momentum where the—well, I'm going to use the word purity just because I can't think of a better word. I hope it doesn't trigger you too much—where the purity becomes more and more natural. And in that, the wisdom will come by itself. We don't have to create it. And in fact, we can't. It's like a huge load off. You don't have to try so hard. You don't have to chalk up some kind of chart of how much wisdom you have relative to your last retreat, or relative to the person who asked that question. They sound like they've got a lot of wisdom and I don't have that much, and I used to know this and now I've forgotten it. That's all just ideas, concepts, stuff.

And you think, well, my experience is so mundane. Lifting, moving, placing. Where's the lights? Where's the explosions of unity? Where's the rapid arising and passing away? It's just lifting, moving, placing. Tightness, burning, itching. For God's sake, could something happen? The breath—okay, there's a new sensation in the breath. Big deal. I want something big, because then wisdom will come.

And the amazing thing is, wisdom's not about the object. It doesn't matter. Because everything, every phenomenal experience, is part of impermanence, is part of unreliability. Experience is not me, not self, has no intrinsic separate reality. Everything—including the experience of aversion in the mind, or greed in the heart, or bewilderment, or delusion. Those can be recognized with awareness just like anything else. And they're just as good an object to clarify the pure awareness as an incredibly stoned, blissed-out experience. Maybe better, because you can get lost in the incredibly stoned, blissed-out experience. "I'm not identifying. Oh no, I know it's going to change. I know. I know." And you don't come back because now you've really got it. It's just a little more subtle.

James doesn't agree. That's the difference between a greed type and an aversive type. We see things clearly and they just get a little... I'm going to pay for that, don't worry. But you might as well know what goes on behind the scenes.

So this sense of wisdom arising—we never know how or where, but it's possible at any time, anywhere, with any experience, because it arises from the quality of the pure mind-heart in any moment. And so when we say this practice is about moment-to-moment presence and acceptance of whatever's happening, that's right. It's not that what's happening is good or bad or whatever. The acceptance is that purity of citta, purity of mind, purity of heart that will allow accurate recognition, right view, to arise.

I'll say it again: I just love the elegance of this—that freedom comes from simply recognizing accurately, not from making yourself different.

When that accurate recognition, that moment of wisdom is present, these deep habits—the deeply ingrained habits of clinging, of greed, of aversion, of fear, of trying to correct, the delusion that it's all about me—incredibly deep habits, yes. But they are only our habits. It's not like we have to get rid of them one by one. Because in the light of recognizing accurately, in that moment they don't arise. They don't make any sense in terms of how things really are.

We cling to them—we don't even know we're clinging to aversion, to wanting, to bewilderment—because in our twisted way, that's our refuge. We think that's the source of happiness. We think that trying to correct is going to make things better. And in a relative way, sometimes we do make things better, and sometimes we don't, because so much is out of our control. But they're deeply ingrained habits that in a way we take refuge in without recognizing.

Before I talk about those habits more, I want to say something important. Even as we talk about getting caught in habits of wanting, habits of aversion or self-judgment, habits of "it's all about me"—we must recognize that it isn't personal. You see how deep the habit is? "Oh, look how much greed there is in my mind. It's my fault." Right there, it's met with aversion and selfing. It's all about me. And that just feels right.

You think, "Yes, the Buddha—the freedom he talks about is freedom from clinging. Look how much clinging I have. Therefore, I need to get rid of this clinging to become free." Very sincere, very dedicated, a lot of faith, and not recognizing, not turning around and looking at how even clinging is just another habit that doesn't have to be a problem when it's seen with the pure mind.

I'll read this from Ajahn Sumedho. You know this book, The Island? It's a great book that Ajahn Pasanno and Ajahn Amaro put together—a compilation of references in the suttas to enlightenment, to awakening. It's wonderful.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho's introduction. He's talking about how the island is used as a metaphor for awakening:

"The only way to go beyond thinking and emotional habit is through awareness of them, through awareness of thought, through awareness of emotion. The island that you cannot go beyond is the metaphor for this state of being awake and aware, as opposed to the concept of becoming awake and aware."

That's what we're practicing—just being awake and aware. Aware of what? It doesn't matter. Being awake and aware.

He goes on: "In meditation classes, people often start with a basic delusion that they never challenge: the idea that 'I'm someone who grasps and has a lot of desires, and I have to practice in order to get rid of these desires and to stop grasping and clinging to things. I shouldn't cling to anything.' That's often the position people start from. So we practice from this basis, and sometimes the result—actually, he says many times—the result is disillusionment and disappointment, because our practice is based on the grasping of an idea. Eventually, we realize that no matter how much we try to get rid of desire and not grasp anything, no matter what we do, we end up feeling disappointed because the basic delusion has never been recognized. The delusion that I'm someone who grasps and I have to change it."

"This is why the metaphor of the island that you cannot go beyond is so very powerful. Because it points to the principle of an awareness that you can't get beyond. It's very simple, very direct, and you cannot conceive it. You have to trust it."

I'll say that again: you cannot conceive it. You can't conceptualize about it, describe it and hold it. You have to trust it. You have to trust the simple ability that we all have to be fully present and fully awake, and begin to recognize that the grasping and the ideas we have taken on about ourselves, about the world around us, about our thoughts and perceptions and feelings—these are just habits.

My thinking mind doesn't like that. "You can't conceive it, you just have to trust." But what strengthens our trust, our confidence—and Sumedho uses that language a lot, confidence in this pure awareness—is simply manifesting it, recognizing it over and over and over again.

So you have—I'm not a mathematician, some people would be able to figure out how many seconds you've got from now until the end of the month. I don't know, but it's a lot. That many potential moments. A ton of moments go by when you're lost in some fantasy or filled with greed and you don't see it. But in the moment when you recognize, "Oh, greed is like this"—

It doesn't matter how many other moments there were. In that moment of recognizing what's happening, that's the moment of pure awareness. It's always available. It's always possible.

It's not, "Oh, I can recognize accurately when this greed is gone, so I just have to get rid of the greed, and then maybe I can see clearly—but it's so hopeless." No. "Oh, self-judgment is like this."

As we're learning to trust, I often talk about it like a Tai Chi move. All our interest and focus is on the self-judgment, or on the idea. Maybe we don't even notice the self-judgment, and our interest is on the thing we're doing wrong. We don't even recognize the self-judgment. It's all in the object, in the experience. So you go, "Ah, self-judgment is like this." You still know it's self-judgment, but without trying, without making it a big thing, in a subtle way the interest, the energy, is really about the awareness—the quality of mind that's aware in that moment.

Notice that. Notice, without getting into a lot of thinking—I mean, I have to use words to talk—but when you're really caught up in something and suddenly you see it, it just feels like such a relief, even though the thing's still going on sometimes. Don't think about it, but let yourself really feel, with awareness, the quality of that mind-heart that's in relief. Feel what that's like.

We need to learn to recognize the moments when awareness is present and pure. It's not big lights going off. It's just, "Ah." Recognize what it feels like when there's not wanting, when there's not aversion, when there's not bewilderment in the mind, when it's not all about me.

Bewilderment is one aspect of delusion—you're just like, "Duh, I don't know what's going on." That one's even a little easier to recognize. Another kind of confusion is when our perception is completely wrong or partially wrong due to the confusion in our mind. That's a little harder to recognize, but we can. But the hardest to recognize... I forgot. I had it there, but then I sidetracked. That's a sign of the first kind—duh, I don't know what's going on.

Well, I know it has something to do with "it's all about me." That kind of delusion is really harder to see because it's so subtle—the delusion of just having a little sense of self-referencing.

In the moment when it's just the pure mind, there can be attention, awareness, there might be love, there might be concentration—there can be any wholesome qualities—but there's not the self-referencing, there's not aversion, and there's not greed. It's not always big lights going off, and mostly it's not. It's just—as one of my friends said—squeaky clean. Like windows that are squeaky clean. It's just what it is.

There are many, many moments like that, which we often don't notice because our attention tends to turn toward what's happening. It's such a habit to evaluate our practice, our life, ourselves, each other, by what's happening or how we look. This is the radical nature of the freedom the Buddha is talking about: it's just not about what's happening.

It's so hard to trust. I sit up here and talk about it, but it's hard for me to trust it too—when I really don't like what's happening, when it's really uncomfortable or scary. But then that moment: "Oh, scary feels like this." It doesn't have to change. The movement is from the identification, the me-ing, the making of that scariness into a thing in itself. Instead of that, we see yathā bhūta—in this moment, things as they have come to be. The habit of this mind, this particular configuration—it all comes to be. Scariness is like this, and then the next thing arises.

It's a constant, endless coming together and changing and going apart. Coming together and changing and going apart. I'm not somehow separate, outside of that, watching it. We are that.

When the shift isn't about making what happens better, but into the "Ah, like this. It's like this. It's like this"—to have confidence in that ability to be aware, as Ajahn Sumedho talks about it. And to see when we start wanting: "Oh, but I want it. Maybe I'm not doing it quite good enough." "Oh, wanting is like this."

It's radical. There are no exceptions. No exceptions. And that's really hard.

Last year when I was practicing for some weeks, I could often see it like that. But then there'd be a moment where I was just spacing out all over the place, walking up and down, thinking about this and that. I was noticing wanting and aversion. I could see the sense of self. I was just spacing out.

I really ought to be putting in a little more effort, you know, just a little. I mean, I want to do something, for God's sake. I can't just walk up and down and wait for wisdom to come.

And it's true, there are skillful means. It's true. So to trust so completely—and then see that thought arise, "I should put in a little more effort"—oh, that's the delusion of me. I put in effort and I will get a better result. That's not actually so subtle, but it felt subtle in the moment. But trusting this understanding is hard. Trying to be—not trying—being that radical.

But there needs to be, for that level of radical trust, some momentum with the mindfulness. To just walk up and down and actually not know what the heck's going on—I mean, to really not know—there's not mindfulness. You're just lost in greed and hatred. "Oh, it's okay. Wisdom will come when it comes. La, la, la." I mean, there is a reason we have techniques and practice, and why we're talking about this.

The difficult part is for us to know, "Okay, there's enough momentum to trust," and then to see when we're really lost, "Okay, let me bring in a little bit of technique." But understanding that the technique is simply to help us re-recognize the quality of pure awareness—not to get to some state that makes us feel more fulfilled, that justifies our sense of self. "Now my practice is okay, and now I can relax."

Have you ever noticed that? I noticed with myself years ago when I was practicing in a certain very concentrated way. I'd get to a certain point—I had the idea that I can't concentrate, so that's the belief I'd operate from. I'd get to a certain point where pīti, or rapture, can have certain physical effects. Sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't. But it would get to this one where the floor seems to be rolling. So I'd get there, where the floor is rolling, and then my mind would relax. "Okay, I'm doing it good." And then the mind would relax. And the relaxed mind was actually what let wisdom come. The reason it relaxed wasn't so skillful, but anyway, it relaxed and quit wanting and quit doubting. And then the awareness just gets stronger and stronger. So we can learn to trust without having to do it in an unskillful way.

So again, knowing that the habit of these kilesas arising is, as Tejaniya always says, it's just nature. It's not personal. He says things like, "Aversion is doing its job. Wanting is doing its job. Mettā is doing its job. Mindfulness is doing its job." They're all just different factors of nature doing their job. So if we can begin to meet it that way, then we can explore how these qualities, when they're in our mind, color our mind, how they color our perception and our decisions, how they cause suffering—just with awareness, as a scientific kind of exploration to see: Is it true?

I mean, I totally believe this, but is it true that we can't really trust any perception or thought or views that are guided by, that are led by, greed, hatred, or delusion?

For me, I know as much as I know that that's true. And so when I'm believing something or thinking—even in my daily life, "This is what I need to do" and "How do I need to relate to this person?" and there's some kind of problem—I look back at the mind and go, "Ah, there's a lot of fear." What I know then is I just can't trust the perceptions and the thoughts and the conclusions I'm drawing. I don't have to take that personally. It isn't personal. That's how fear works in the mind. It colors perception, it colors conclusions. You can't trust it.

And that's the moment of awareness. Okay, that's awareness. It's not like you have to figure it all out. We just learn to keep moving. That Tai Chi move from lost in the subject, lost in the experience, to just noticing what's happening.

I'll give you an example.

I wrote this down from last time I was practicing, just to see, for example, how aversion can color perception without our recognizing it. It's the same with greed, and the same with "it's all about me."

There's some resistance in the mind to something or other, unrecognized, and you'll notice that can lead to thoughts—either "I'm not doing this right," or "this place stinks," or "if only I had different food," or "my experience isn't good." It can go to "I'm no good, I'm worthless," or "you're no good," or "nothing's any good." It can change to anger or disappointment, whatever the habits of your mind. At some point you recognize, "Oh, okay, that's self-judgment." But you don't quite recognize the dosa, the aversion—that mental factor of negativity called hatred. You don't quite see it.

I was noticing this while sitting in some beautiful place in Switzerland. There was this little subtle aversion still arising moment to moment in the mind, and it would color my perceptions. I'd look out over the scenery, which that morning had been so peaceful and sunlit, and this time it was like, "Oh, it's so melancholy. It looks so sad." The scenery went from peaceful to sad. Scenery isn't sad—it just is what it is.

Or you look out at animals, and when there's love in the mind, you say, "Oh, the deer are so filled with love, they're such beautiful beings." And then there's aversion in the mind, and you go, "Oh, the poor deer, that coyote's going to eat him. Life is suffering in the animal realm." You look at the turkeys and they're regal, or they look really stupid, or they're just... whatever. And that's our perception at the time.

I'm making simple examples, but from this, we can go into really all kinds of decisions about our life. It's scary, actually, if you want to look at it. And this is the way the world functions.

Do you remember, was it last year when there was that big oil leak in the Gulf of Mexico off Louisiana? It went on for so long when that thing blew up. I remember in the news at the time feeling, "Oh gosh, what a weird world." One of the criticisms of Obama was that he wasn't angry enough. People wanted him to be really angry—come on the news and... I don't know what they wanted. I thought, "Wow, is that what we want? Someone making decisions that affect the country and the world to be blinded by anger and hatred? Is that really our idea of what a good leader should do?" That scared me.

But that's what people want. We think that's strength. Because the kilesas are so common, we're so used to them. In one way, as I said, they're our refuge. We think they're going to make us happy—anger, wanting, fixing, "it's all about me." It just feels that way. So somehow we've got to arrange the whole world to make it okay for me, which doesn't work for more than a fraction of a second, if that.

And the kilesas, in my experience, they're louder. They're more obvious than, say, a moment of pure awareness, of pure mind, a moment of pure mindfulness. There may be lights, but often it's just that squeaky clean quality—there's no wanting, there's no aversion, it's just the is-ness of things. It's not making a big noise. Easy not to notice. Easy not to trust.

The kilesas come and they're screaming in your mind—wanting, aversion, "that's wrong!" Whether we believe them or whether we fight against them—which is just fighting fire with fire—it's easy to keep looking in that direction.

So really my whole point tonight is just keep remembering to look back and notice the moments of pure awareness. Many, many moments without greed, hatred, or delusion. Then notice when there is wanting, when you are trying to push something away, when you are thinking it's all about me or taking experience personally. And notice not that there's something wrong with you, not that that's personal, but explore it. See if it's true that that leads to more suffering and confusion. Don't believe me—look and see if it's true.

See if it's true that when you're caught in it, and you can say, "Oh, wanting is like this," you can get a little flavor of the freedom that comes when we are not glued to experience, to wanting, aversion, and delusion by identification. "Ah, wanting's like this."

The freedom to be fully awake, fully present without fearing any experience whatsoever is an amazing place to be—because it's so normal. It's really the potential for all of us.

So let's see, there was something I wanted to read.

This is from Maha Bua, who just died recently. He was a really powerful Thai meditation master, a forest monk, kind of like a brother lineage with Ajahn Chah. I remember years ago when I was in Thailand, a lot of the foreign monks were afraid of him because even though he was way out in the forest, they were afraid that he could read their minds, even when they were in Bangkok. And you know what? He probably could. He was a pretty powerful guy.

If you've read some of his books, he talks about sitting every night through the night without moving, to the point that if there was any pain worse than death, death could not bring any more pain than this. He sounded like the toughest guy. I'm giving you that background because then to me it's surprising what he writes.

He's writing about yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana—things as they have come to be. He says:

"Then the mind knows and sees things as they are, within and without, through and through, and then it stays put with purity. If you were to say that it stays put, it stays put with purity. Whatever it thinks, it simply thinks. The body is simply a body. Feelings, labels, thought formations, cognizance are each simply passing conditions that we use until their time is up. When they no longer have the strength to keep going, then we let them go in line with their reality. But as for the utterly true nature of our purity, there is no problem at all."

Then this is the surprising part: "Those who have reached full release from conventional realities of every sort don't assume themselves to be more special or worse than anyone else. For this reason they don't demean even the tiniest of creatures. They regard them all as friends in suffering, birth, aging, illness and death, because the Dhamma is something tender and gentle. Any mind in which Dhamma is found is completely gentle and can sympathize with every grain of sand, with living beings of every sort. There is nothing rigid or unyielding about it. Only the defilements are rigid and unyielding, haughty and vain. Once there's Dhamma, there are none of these things. There's only the unvarying gentleness and tenderness of mercy and benevolence for the world at all times."

And then I'll read you one different description from Dipa Ma, who was a very realized little tiny Indian lady. She said:

"There's so much sameness in ordinary life. We are always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. Once greed, hatred, and delusion are gone, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest."

We only have to start with this moment. It's like this, always available.

So let's just sit quietly with taste and zest.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 97

Compassion and Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a seeming paradox at the heart of Buddhist practice: how can mindfulness that 'doesn't care' lead to genuine compassion? Drawing on T.S. Eliot's line 'Teach us to care and not to care,' she illuminates how non-clinging awareness and heartfelt compassion are two sides of the awakened mind. When we're not caught in relentless self-referencing, the natural response to suffering—whether our own or others'—is karuṇā, the quivering of the heart in the presence of pain.
> Wilson emphasizes that compassion develops through deep insight into the First Noble Truth (dukkha)—not as something to resist, but as the basic unsatisfactoriness to be understood. She challenges practitioners to recognize that difficult times in retreat are not 'marking time' but precious opportunities for cultivating compassion. Each moment we find willingness to rest in confusion or pain without aversion, we are actively developing both wisdom and compassion. Citing the Dalai Lama, she explains that compassion strengthens through genuine connection with our own suffering, which naturally expands into empathy with all beings.
> Through a moving personal story from Burma about encountering a monk serving impoverished children, Wilson demonstrates how openness to suffering creates connection that ripples outward in unexpected ways. She concludes with Nisargadatta Maharaj's teaching that direct experience of non-separation transforms the 'senseless sorrow of humankind' into our sole concern—not as burden, but as the natural expression of an awakened heart.

Tonight the topic I want to share about is compassion—just sharing some thoughts, really reminding us all about compassion. Generally, it's a good thing.

I've been saying a lot that mindfulness doesn't care. It's really very freeing when we realize that whatever's arising, mindfulness can be with it without being damaged or stained, without preference, without making a big story of "me" around anything. That's incredibly liberating when we not just intellectually know it, but when we experience it.

And yet, to our intellectual minds, that understanding can seem troubling—this sense that in some ways nothing matters. Everything matters, but nothing matters. Mindfulness doesn't care. We think, "Hmm, I'm not sure that's really the wisdom I signed up for." The heart-mind of no clinging, which is really one of the Buddha's descriptions of freedom, isn't particularly juicy when we think about it. Which is good—juicy isn't particularly helpful. But the idea that mindfulness doesn't care can lead our associations into a sense of disconnect, a kind of not-caring that has a tinge of distance, a tinge of passivity, or of nihilism.

Of course, the freedom of the heart and mind that's not clinging, the mindfulness that doesn't care, isn't about taking us out of the world of connection or out of caring for other beings. But it's a different kind of caring.

The phrase that's been going through my mind for the last three days is just that one line from the poem by T.S. Eliot, from "Ash Wednesday," where he says, "Teach us to care and not to care. Teach us to sit still." To me, that's a great pithy description. The not-caring is really the essence of understanding selfless emptiness—that no experience can be held to be existing separately as about me or mine. Mindfulness doesn't care, and so it can be present. We can be present with all things equally, but not equally disconnected—equally connected.

Out of that lack of obsessive, exhausting, relentless self-referencing for every sense contact that arises—have you noticed that? It's exhausting. Totally exhausting. Everything that happens has to refer back to me. It's sort of like six degrees of Kevin Bacon, only it's more like two degrees: how many thoughts before it refers back to you? Not many. It's fun if you can laugh at it. But mostly we're believing it, we're hating it or loving it or buying into it. It's exhausting. Don't believe me—check it out.

When our heart, our mind, when the energy of consciousness is not bound up in this relentless self-referencing, when awareness is equally present with whatever's arising, resting at ease in whatever arises, then the natural response of the awakened heart and mind, the appropriate response in the face of suffering, is compassion. Because when we're not so concerned about me, me, me in that sense of separation, then when there is suffering or pain in ourselves or another, rather than the flinching back of "Oh no, I can't handle this" or "This is wrong"—there's presence. The natural response of the awakened mind and heart is to be present with whatever's happening. And if there's suffering, compassion is the natural response.

So it's two sides of the awakened heart and mind: the non-clinging, the non-constructing about "me," and that allows for the clear seeing of things as they are. Teach me to care and not to care. The not-caring is the emptiness, and the caring isn't a caring about me and you as what you mean to me, but the spontaneous, impersonal, yet very tender caring for life as it presents itself.

Because there's wisdom, and we're not blinded by our self-referencing, if there's something one can do to alleviate suffering, one tries to do it. Many times there's not something one can do, and one doesn't have to turn away or flinch back or say it's too unbearable, that I can't fix this.

One of the ways compassion gets confused in our daily life—the near enemy of compassion, you could say—is grief or pity or being overwhelmed. And before we get to that stage, often I find in myself, and someone was telling me they saw it in themselves the other day with really a lot of insight, that someone will be suffering and the impulse comes to do something about it. It might still be a good thing to do; it might be a way you can help that person. But if you really look inside yourself, the impulse is one of aversion. It's too unpleasant to feel this discomfort seeing you suffer. So let's, for God's sake, fix it. There might be something useful to do.

It isn't compassion. It isn't compassion.

That's why the real depth, the natural, spontaneous depth of true compassion comes together with this wisdom of emptiness, this wisdom of awareness that doesn't care.

So sometimes when people say, "How can I hold all the suffering in the world?" We can't even imagine all the suffering in the world. "How can I hold all my suffering? How can I hold the suffering of my friends?" And exactly—that wording is exactly why we can't. We don't hold anything.

When we're in our unseen or familiar concept of me and my heart, and this is just too much to be with—yes, sometimes that's our experience, of course. But when it's about me somehow holding, of course not. It's the I, that limitation of separation, that is actually in that moment the cause of the inability to be present. This isn't to judge or anything. It's just to explore and see how it works.

Because when we're holding to me, that limit of me creates immediately the sense of other. And then right away we have that duality and we can hold this much but not more. But we don't have to hold anything. Just as someone said to me, just let it pass through. Let it go through. The question: through what? Nothing. Nothing. Just passing through emptiness.

But when we can't see with that vastness, even though we may act with as much caring as we can—and we still should act. Let's not wait until we're all arhats before we do anything wholesome or helpful for somebody. I'm not saying that. But just to realize that when we're still caught in the delusion of self or the resistance to pain, we'll do the best we can. And please, we do do the best we can. But we can't see clearly the whole situation because of being blinded by clinging to sense of self, by self-cherishing. Those are kind of catchwords—don't make them too heavy.

Like this example I've used a few times, something I heard on the radio a couple of years ago about a new footbridge that had been built over the Thames in London. When it opened, people were walking over and it was some big deal. According to what I wrote down, a few hundred people were walking over the bridge and it started to shake. It started to sway to one side, which is very embarrassing for a newly built fancy bridge. So it was swaying, and each person acted in the most sensible way to stop the swaying, which was to move to the other side. Of course, all four hundred of them moved to the same other side, which just made it sway even more the other way.

It's that kind of sense—we're doing the best we can, but we can't quite see past this self-created boundary. And that's not a judgment, it's just to look and see the moments when that's not there.

The spontaneous action—like when you see a statue of Green Tara, a Tibetan statue. She's one of the embodiments of compassion. In the statue, she's sitting in meditation. The statue I have, her eyes are open, so there's this sense of connectedness, which to me is the essence of compassion: wisdom and connectedness. And one foot is always kind of up on a lotus petal, so she's sitting at ease in meditation, but always about to get up and do what needs to be done. Not planning it out, just the spontaneous expression of wisdom and connectedness. That's how compassion shows up.

So tonight I just want to talk a little bit about how we can explore this in our practice here, more than about action in the world, which is a whole other topic. But since we're in the middle of retreat, this is the way I want to talk about it tonight.

Sometimes thinking of compassion as the natural result in a moment of the awakened heart and mind can be really inspirational. Sometimes not. Sometimes it can just feel like it's so far away. And I also know there are times we can turn anything against ourselves, right, if there's enough negativity and self-loathing in the mind. We can turn the whole concept of compassion against ourselves.

Have any of you ever done that?

There's no way I could be compassionate. I want to be compassionate, but I'm just so selfish.

Say you take what I said earlier about looking at how many thoughts it takes before it gets back to me, whatever happens. And instead of laughing at it, you're having a bad day. So you look at that. In two thoughts, it's back to me. I am the most selfish, uncompassionate, self-centered person in this room, on the retreat, on the planet. There's no way I could ever cultivate compassion. I came here to cultivate compassion, and instead these angry thoughts are coming up. I'm hopeless. It's horrible. And in fact, the longer I'm here, the more angry thoughts I'm noticing.

And if you come and tell us that, we'll say, "Oh, that's great. That means mindfulness is getting stronger, right?" And you walk out and think, What a crock. These guys will say anything to keep us going.

Okay, sometimes. But I don't think we outright lie. We do want to keep you going past the hardest patches. But I think pretty much what we say, we think it's true.

Sometimes also—and these are all different things our minds can do; we're not all doing all of it—but sometimes when we're cultivating vipassana here, most of what we talk about is mindfulness and insight. We've been doing loving-kindness practice once in the afternoon, and we'll be starting with karuna, compassion practice, tomorrow.

I know for me, just by the nature of how the mind works, it easily can set up duality. Doing wisdom practice, insight practice—what about compassion? I can't do them both at once. So I do a little karuna, I do a little metta—may you be happy, may you be peaceful—but I really came here for insight. And then Carol just said if I really understand emptiness, then I'll have compassion. So let's get back to the insight. Push, push. That's really where it's at.

Or you could do it the other way around too. It's all about metta and compassion, and this other stuff—forget about it. If I open my heart completely, then wisdom will come. And we make it like we're doing one or the other. That can get confusing. It's a completely unnecessary dualism.

Sure, in terms of a specific practice, you're doing vipassana or you're doing the form of metta or karuna practice. But in the days here, in what you've been going through with the mindfulness practice—not "just," I mean, this is really quite profound—there are times when paññā, wisdom, really feels like that's where the energy is. That's where the juice is. Not that you're having insights popping off every two seconds—I know you wish—but the mind is more noticing how things change, or more noticing cause and effect, or the first and second noble truth, or just investigating the five aggregates, or perception, or vedanā. Just in that modality of interest in what's happening.

And when that's happening, everything's cool, right? That's when it's going good, when there's interest.

What about those other times? Sometimes you have other times when it's not quite so interesting. When the suffering personality patterns emerge. Once in a while that happens, right? They show up. You notice them with mindfulness. They get stronger. You notice them with mindfulness. You get really caught. And then we start to just spiral.

Come in, I was caught in this thing for three days. I couldn't be mindful." We get frustrated. We get lost—whether it's fear or aversion or self-judgment. We get taken up by loneliness, or we're fighting sleepiness. You know all the different things. Fill in the blanks.

And isn't it easy at that time, somewhere in the back of the mind, to think, "Okay, they say I'm cultivating mindfulness through this. I'll say fine." But really, we feel like we're marking time until the practice really starts clicking in again. "So I'm being with self-loathing for three days. Yeah, that's... right. Okay. Yeah, I'm mindful of it. Yeah, I really see how that's cultivating mindfulness and wisdom. I have a lot of faith in that. Thank God Aaron talked about faith because I really forgot why I was here at all."

This happens over and over and over. And if we're just focused on insight in that way, if we've somehow put all our marbles into the idea of it's all about wisdom, we really do feel like we're just marking time until the practice gets good again, until it reemerges. We think, "Well, I only have two more weeks and these are three lost days. What am I going to do? Three lost days."

Well, this is not marking time. Marking time would be if you get in your car, go out, have a pizza, and go to the movies. That is a lost day in terms of practice, that is marking time. So a lost day is possible. I remember years ago, at a three-month retreat, somebody was so caught up in the World Series that they went to a motel so they could watch it. I call that marking time.

But when you're hanging out with this other stuff, when it's painful and you're suffering from it, but you're hanging with it—this is actually how compassion is being developed and cultivated in the moment. Compassion—I don't necessarily mean it as a huge, heart-opening emotion. It can be, but it doesn't need to be. Compassion really, one of the definitions, is the quivering of the heart in connection with pain, in connection with suffering. It's really just that sensitivity of awareness, of presence, of heart that doesn't have to run away and doesn't meet the difficulty with aversion, with clinging to me.

So just a moment: "Okay, self-loathing feels like this." We keep saying that over and over. "Give me a break. Self-loathing feels like this." But I'll try it because there's nothing else to do. And there's one moment—and I don't mean the lights go off and you have a huge insight and you're overwhelmed with love for the world. Just a moment where there's no greed, no aversion, no referencing back to self. Yeah, self-loathing feels like this. Just that sensitive presence for a moment—that's compassion. That's just the beginning of cultivating compassion. It's happening in the midst of our mindfulness practice. It's happening all the time. It's the furthest thing from marking time to really notice this.

The Dalai Lama, in talking about compassion—and of course he's the reincarnation of the bodhisattva of compassion, over and over—speaks about it as tender heart, noble awakened heart.

And of course, the Tibetan tradition talks about compassion taken all the way to the bodhisattva intention of wanting to awaken, not only for our own sake, but in order to awaken others.

But the Dalai Lama talks about the cultivation of compassion. We don't just sit back and wait. And he says two things really happen with this. The first is, how does it develop? Through deep insight into what suffering really is, the experience of suffering. And guess where we get that? That arises through stillness and wholeness by focusing on our own experience. As Ajahn Sumedho often says, your own experience of suffering is enough to get enlightened with. We don't have to go looking for any extreme suffering. It finds you. It finds us. Our own suffering is enough for compassion to develop with.

And then the Dalai Lama goes on: as we learn to open into our own experience of suffering, the compassion strengthens into a sense of empathy and connectedness with the world, with all beings. In my language, I would say what's happening is that as mindfulness doesn't care, as awareness doesn't care, it's just present in that purity with suffering—then that self-referencing, that prison of self-referencing, isn't being created in that moment. The sense of separate artificial boundaries isn't being created in that moment. And so our own experience of suffering does broaden into a quite natural sense of empathy and connectedness with the world.

So really, we start here. We start where we are. We don't have to go work in some NGO or live in a favela in Brazil in order to really prove that we're compassionate. And it can feel, when we talk about compassionate action in the world—which, as I said, I'm not focusing on tonight—when we talk about compassion and our mind goes there, our intellectual mind, to the suffering in the world, the immensity of it... how much am I doing? And then it can easily come back to: here I am, sitting on my butt, thinking about my knee hurting, and "Oh, I'm cultivating compassion thinking about my knee?" We can turn it into real negativity. What am I doing? It's completely self-centered, blah, blah, blah. Notice that that's aversion.

Really starting to explore and see if it's true, what the Dalai Lama says—that compassion does begin to develop through learning to be with our own suffering, with wisdom, without pushing it away. That's why the difficult times in retreat are so important. As I said, our tendency is to just wait the difficult times out, to not realize that these are actually the jewels. We think the jewels are the big insights we have, because they make us feel great, we like them—but they last two seconds and they're gone. The difficult times, when we're willing to really meet them with presence, these are where the jewel of understanding can arise and deepen.

So just that willingness to bring the same quality of attention. The Dalai Lama again, when he was asked one time about what looks like such a lack of compassion in human society and what he thinks about that—because he always talks about our basic goodness—he said perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we tend to really embrace hostility and anger as emotional states. We get really involved in them, fueling and reinforcing them. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger.

So part of our practice here in the difficult times is that by bringing this quality of pure, tender awareness, mindfulness, to the difficulty—your difficulty—we are reinforcing compassion, presence, acceptance.

So why don't we do that more? Why do we have to talk about it so much? If it really is a natural result of wisdom, the natural expression of understanding, why is it so difficult for us at times to be present with our suffering? I mean, when we go, "Yeah, well, it hurts. Who wants to be here where it hurts?" Right, exactly. That's deep, deep, deep conditioning.

I can't talk about compassion without talking about the First Noble Truth that the Buddha spoke of. I want to mention that briefly because I feel the deep-seated tendency we have—which has been talked about, I think, by Pascal in the first talk—to move away from the unpleasant. We've talked about that a lot. You've all seen it. The body hurts, you can't get away from it, so we go into fantasy. Deep, deep conditioning. And we're sort of getting that it doesn't bring us happiness. But we're not really getting how being with suffering brings us happiness either, are we? It's kind of like, okay, there's just not really another option.

But Pema Chödrön, in a talk I was listening to, made a distinction I like. We tend to talk, when we're talking about compassion, about life in retreat, about being with the difficult. She said, what if we think about it not as learning to be with the unpleasant, or learning to be with suffering, but rather that at some point, we all come up against having to be together with that which we really don't want?

And it's more that I don't want this to be happening. Rather than saying it's bad or even unpleasant, the more accurate way of talking about it, as Pema is trying to say, is that we're with something we don't want. And that's not to blame, but to help us look back and see what's happening in the mind right now around this difficult experience that's creating the suffering.

So this is where I need to talk about the first noble truth. As you know, we will give a talk later on all four noble truths, but you're aware of the first noble truth, right? You've all heard that—the first noble truth being dukkha.

Now, often that's translated as suffering. And one of the reasons I don't personally think that's such a good translation, especially into English anyway, is the connotations that it brings. The first noble truth, when the Buddha talked about it, he said it's to be understood. And as soon as we say "suffering," unless you're in a really clear space, isn't it easy for just a little tinge of aversion to come in around that? Oh, the first noble truth of suffering. Great. Yeah. Right. Already we're not understanding it, because that's not what he's saying. The first noble truth is to be understood.

I could give a whole talk on this, but the way Bhikkhu Bodhi puts it—like one line to describe what the Buddha is saying in the first noble truth—is "the basic unsatisfactoriness running through our lives." That's Bhikkhu Bodhi's definition. It doesn't mean everything is horrible. There's plenty of beauty. There's plenty of pleasant feeling, and it changes, right? It's that it's basically unreliable, basically unsatisfactory.

And why is that a problem? Then you get to the second noble truth. It's a problem only if we're clinging to it and trying to make it be satisfactory—if we're thinking, "this shouldn't be happening."

So that's where I want to go in terms of seeing how compassion develops and what gets in the way of compassion, what gets in the way of our being present with difficulty—whether it's physical pain, whether it's emotional unpleasantness, whether it's loss, whether it's having to be together with what we don't like, whether it's having the pleasant go away. All these things happen, and that's just the way it is in this world. Again, it's not rocket science if we look around, just like when I talked about impermanence. It's obvious, except somehow it isn't.

So in this realm of the first noble truth, on some very deeply conditioned level—not a place in the mind, but a habit of mind—there is the sense that some pains we can be with, some difficulties we can be with. But the ones we all hit in practice and in life, particularly here on retreat because it's magnified when you're looking at it, is that thing of "this is wrong." This is bad. What did I do wrong for this to happen? It shouldn't be happening.

We do that in life too, but particularly here. Often when you like your meditation and it changes—what did I do wrong? When the difficult stuff I was just talking about comes up, when you have to be with loneliness, when you have to be with despair, when you see old conditioning that's really painful, you think, "Well, I should be past this by now. Why is this coming up? What did I do wrong? I was so concentrated, and now this stuff is coming." It's all, as one yogi used to come and say to me, "going to hell in a handbasket." I have no clue what that means or what a handbasket is, but it gives you a sense.

And so the first noble truth—why did the Buddha say, of the four true things, if you understand these, you'll be awakened? He says there's a basic unsatisfactoriness running through life. He's not saying, "Okay, let's stop being happy. Let's get really depressed." No, the understanding of it frees our hearts and minds. The understanding of the first noble truth takes us out of delusion, takes us out of a relationship to this basic unsatisfactoriness—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, change, difficult—takes us out of a relationship to that experience that's based in delusion and denial and confusion. That's where our suffering comes from.

And I think the reason that compassion develops from being with suffering—the reason we have to develop it, let me put it that way—is because our knee-jerk reaction is "let's get out of here," or "something's wrong." And also, don't we often, in times of suffering, feel even more isolated than before? Kind of alienated or shamed, like something to hide? You know how people often say, "I look around and everyone else is sitting like a Buddha"—and they even know it's not true, but everyone else is doing so well, and only they are lost. And that's kind of how we feel.

So the difficulty, the suffering—in this case I'm using suffering as unpleasant, difficult experience, which is what compassion arises in connection with—the suffering has the effect of increasing our sense of self-cherishing in a strange way, of limitation, of isolation, of aloneness. And it also strengthens the sense that something is badly wrong.

And in some subtle way—do you ever find this? I find it all the time in my meditation practice. Even though I totally know better, I somehow keep equating pleasant with right. And that's just the Buddhist teaching saying, no, we don't understand. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. The mind keeps changing every second.

So the First Noble Truth is to be understood—not to engender aversion, not to engender fear, not to serve as further proof of our strange separateness, of something wrong with us. But rather, it's something that is a commonality of all beings. So when we open to a moment of real difficulty and the mind is totally present, the heart is really present, that's why it can open into a sense of connection with all beings—because all beings suffer.

Ajahn Sumedho says he used to start talks in Thailand with, "Welcome, brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death." And we are all brothers and sisters. Sometimes we experience wonderful stuff. Sometimes we experience suffering. It takes turns. But it's really a way of opening into tenderness for all of us.

But the delusion that comes when we don't really understand the First Noble Truth—and it's a profound understanding, not simple, I'm not meaning to say it's simple—the delusion is rooted in the misunderstanding, as Joko Beck says, that somehow I can hold myself separate from this painful and unwanted experience. Do you get a sense of that ever? Have you felt like that? If I could just get it right, I could watch it, but it's over there and I'm over here. I don't have to really feel it. And if we do it right, we'll stop it.

Even though you all know this—we've said it a million times and you even know it yourself—don't we often say, "Well, I was mindful of it, but it kept on happening"? Somehow mindfulness means it should go away. The pleasant stuff we're mindful of should keep happening, right? You don't say, "Oh, I was mindful and it went away." With the unpleasant stuff, we think mindfulness means it should go away. But no, it's just being here with it.

And it's such a deep habit that it leads into... we can't see clearly. We can get into real denial. But just this subtle aversion—I want to hold myself separate—means that in that moment the mind, the consciousness, the awareness isn't just connecting completely with the experience. It's a little bit pulled away. And that delusion and that aversion or ill will, as I said before, colors the perception. And then there's no way we can accurately perceive what's going on.

This is the Buddha: "Again Brahman, when one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will and does not understand as it really is the escape from ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

We just can't see accurately—not even our own good. And so we can really get lost in thinking that the further I get away from this unpleasant thing, the better it is for me. Not seeing that that's just strengthening the tendency of aversion and denial and separation and alienation and suffering. And it can lead into total denial.

I think I mentioned the other night that I love denial. I just love it because it's such a powerful force. I read a book a few years ago called Unquiet Ghost about the author who went to Russia in the 1990s and was interviewing people still alive who had been part of the gulags under Stalin—which was twenty to forty million people in the gulags. I think twenty million people died there. So many people were arrested. Family members were arrested for no reason. It was really like a reign of terror. And it was never talked about, of course, at the time, because all you had to do was say one bad thing about Stalin and someone would report you. That was it—you'd be in the gulag for ten years.

So Adam Hochschild went in 1990 and was just talking to different people who were still alive, and they could talk about it at that point, after the Soviet Union had come apart.

Anyway, it was a really interesting book, and in some ways it almost seemed like a meditation on the power of denial in the mind.

One thing he quoted—Adam Hochschild quoted George Orwell on what he called the courage of perception, what Orwell calls "the power of facing unpleasant facts." It takes a lot of courage for us to face unpleasant facts on a moment-to-moment basis, just here in our practice.

One example of how that played out in the period of Stalin—this is from the book, from talking to a lot of people. He said the people who tried to avoid arrest by lying low, by moving from place to place, by kind of hiding out, they actually had a pretty good chance of success. The arresting mechanism was really strong, but the searching and finding mechanism wasn't that strong. But people rarely tried to do that. Because despite mass arrests, almost everybody believed, "It won't happen to me."

He said people believed it because people deny bad news because it implies worse news. If I'm about to be arrested knowing I did nothing, it means the whole system has gone mad. And so people just thought, "It won't happen to me. It won't happen to me."

That sense of fear, or sometimes our absolute inability to face unpleasant facts, really leads into this deep habit of just not recognizing accurately what's happening. And that's so poignant and sad because accurate recognition, as we've been saying, is what frees our heart and mind from suffering.

So can we find in ourselves a willingness—and I think this is from Joko Beck too, I love this sentence—can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? Again, just for a moment. Don't project it into the whole day, into your whole life, but just for a moment. If you're feeling sorrow or confusion or fear or pain and your mind is going, "No, what's wrong?"—just, can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? Just now.

In that moment, that attitude is the practice of compassion. We're cultivating compassion by how we meet each moment of experience. What arises in a moment in our practice is the result of all the previous conditions—you could say the vipāka, the karmic result of all the previous conditions. In a way, it's just arising. The present moment habit that's being created is how that particular experience is met in the mind.

This is not to scare you; it's meant to be encouraging. Sure, sometimes we can see the habit of our mind, as I'm saying here with denial, is to meet unpleasant experience with "I'm out of here." And that's feeding the habit of fear and aversion and denial. But every time we go, "Can I rest? Can I just find the willingness to rest?" Or in the language we've been using, "Can I just meet this moment with kind awareness?" That seems like nothing much, but it is changing the whole habit of your mind. That is an actual manifestation and cultivation and development of the attitude of wisdom and compassion. That's why these moments are so important. It doesn't feel like much, but it's huge. It's huge.

And true compassion, karuṇā, really can only arise with connection. It's not an idea. I mean, we can have the idea, and that can help us have the willingness to rest in this painful and confusing situation. The idea can guide us. But the actual spontaneous compassion that arises—it only really comes with connectedness. We're just willing to be fully present with this without having any other reference point or assumption, just for an instant, just for a moment.

I want to give an example. This has kept going through my mind because it seems like a good example of how connection with a difficult, painful moment led to compassion. But I'm not 100% clear—I'm not sure it actually conveys it. So I'm sorry if it doesn't. But to me, it just happened recently and it really did.

When I was in Burma last month, several of us were visiting different places, offering some dāna, some support that many friends had given to offer. We had heard about a new school. Many kids can't afford to go to the government schools—I mean, there are so many, it's unbelievable. And many nuns and some monks have begun starting their own schools that local kids—both little nuns and monks, but also regular children—can attend for free.

It's amazing. We know some nuns who started a school three years ago just for the local kids, and they thought maybe a hundred would come. Now, three years later, there are over five hundred children. I could name you five schools in a ten-minute drive area that are like this. And they start with nothing. They do it on dāna.

They hire good teachers and pay them, just relying on receiving dana every month to cover the salaries. They don't even have decent buildings—just lean-tos. But anyway, there's a lot happening like that.

So we were seeking out some of these schools. We can't give a lot of money, but some—a couple thousand dollars at each place—and also perhaps tell some other friends who have greater resources. We heard about this one school that was way out in some remote area, and we went. The taxi driver we often traveled with knew us; he knew the monastery where we stayed.

We'd heard about this monk who'd started a school like this. We drove a long way, and it was really hard to find. The route took us through the poorest area any of us had seen so far—really crowded, way on the outskirts of Yangon. There were all these shaggy bamboo houses built over this really fetid, swampy water, just on stilts. The floors were bamboo slats with big holes in them. Even the taxi driver kept saying in English, "Oh, they're so poor. They're so poor." It was just intense.

We got to the monastery and met the monk who was doing it. He was a youngish guy, early thirties, and he was one of these beings who just radiated goodness, you could say. He seemed like a bodhisattva. He had come from another area of the country because, he told us—one of us could speak Burmese, so we could talk with him—he just wanted to help the poor children. He was educated, with a Dhammacariya degree, which is what monks and nuns receive after studying the Pali scriptures for many years. To have one of those at thirty-three means he was really quite intelligent and quite assiduous in his studies. He'd come there and built this little school with a hundred kids.

We were really open to listening to him and talking with him because he was radiating so much sincerity and goodness and sweetness. But he lacked managerial skills, I must say, based on the state of his little monastery and school. It was right in this really poor area, and the place was so... I mean, we're used to poor, but this was just shabby. He told us how because of all this fetid swamp right around, in the rainy season—which is like three or four months a year—the water would rise this high.

He took us into the little shack where the young monks lived, the samaneras. They were like seven, eight, nine, ten years old. He would have these young boys become monks so they could stay there with him and he could take care of them because they didn't have anywhere else to stay. A lot of the other kids stayed at home. He said in the rainy season, the water rose up to the level of the beds they were sleeping on. It wasn't the rainy season, but it was just such a mess. And the latrine was nearby, and he said, "Oh yeah, in the rainy season, the water from the latrine flows..." You get the drift. It was just a mess.

Then he took us to the school, which was right there. The school was actually nicely built, and the kids were there, and he'd hired teachers. That was really where he'd put his first energy. But the whole place was just so pitiful. We all were—like I said, even the taxi driver was going, "Whoa, this is so much suffering."

But we were really somehow not shutting down to it. I think because we were so open to him, to his beauty, to his sincerity. And he was saying, "I'm out here and nobody knows I'm here. Please tell people about me." Because he, like all of these monks' and nuns' schools, subsists on dana. And he wasn't getting any. It was really at the end of nowhere. No one was going to happen on it by accident.

When we left, seeing again the state of the village, it really made an impression. We visited a lot of different schools and nunneries and monasteries, and we'd seen a lot of poverty. But this just really hit us all—both the goodness and the poverty and the lack of skill. Because some of it was just lack of skill. We've been to nunneries that were poor but neat and tidy. We've been to other nunneries that were poor and just a mess—like my friend said, "Some overwhelm is going on here."

So we left. And leaving, I could just feel it reverberating in me for a few days.

So that's just the openness to suffering. I'm not saying that's particularly compassion or wanting to help, but just the openness. And I can see how that openness came from tuning into his goodness.

The next day or so, this is just a little thing, but I really noticed it. I don't think I would have normally been so open. I was in the monastery where we stay, and I needed help filling a big bottle of water—I can't carry it by myself. The guy who usually does it in the office wasn't there, so the nun called one of the workers. There's always construction work going on in these meditation centers. You might as well know that up front. If you ever want to go sit in Burma, there's going to be construction work going on, or loudspeakers, or both. That's just how it is.

So he was one of the construction workers. She called him over, and he came to help with the water filter—you have to do a certain thing, run the special filter and wait and do all this stuff. He was a young guy, probably early twenties. And I was just standing behind him, looking at him. I could see he was taking such care, because most of the time the locals there don't pay any attention to how the water filter works. They don't need it—they drink the water. But he was so meticulous and careful.

I was just standing there behind him, you know, because it's awkward. We can't talk and he's kind of shy with me. And I saw later that I was still really open from the experience the day before. Instead of just waiting or being lost in thought, I was tuning into him. That's the connection that allows compassion. And tuning in, I just saw how very simply he was really intelligent and really caring and really knew what to do. Then we had a little nice connection. He was a lovely guy.

And immediately, in a sense, I felt it—so many of the young people in Burma have nowhere to go. He's really smart. He clearly doesn't have any chance to go to university. He's working this crummy construction job, earning about two dollars and fifty cents a day. And he clearly has so much potential. Just that sense of connectedness, which on another day I wouldn't have really noticed. It would be like, yeah, another young guy who isn't really having much chance. It's a shame. But there wouldn't be that open-hearted connectedness. And I really credit that to really being there in the pain, in the sorrow the day before.

From that, we got the idea—I asked the nun about him, and she knew his whole story, of course. "Oh yeah, he's really smart. He's really good. He comes from this other state. He wants to learn how to drive." And then we thought maybe we could help him learn how to drive. Then they told us about another young guy who is only nineteen and really smart. He passed tenth standard. He should be able to go to university, but he has no money. He has to support his family. We had money that friends gave us. We could maybe support him to go to college. And it just kind of moved from thing to thing, just from the simplicity of being opened to suffering. We never know where it's going to show up.

I don't know if that communicates, but that to me was such a simple little act of connection. And it can actually have far-reaching effects, because then we just started looking around and seeing more young people. Some of them don't want the support. Some of them it's not feasible. Some of them it is. That one young guy—not the one I'm talking about, the one who was only nineteen—when we met with him and talked to him about whether we could support him to go to college, the smile on his face was so wonderful. We all just were five feet off the ground, just from muditā, from sympathetic joy, that maybe some of our friends' money could help support him through college. Who knows what will really happen?

You never know. We never know. Compassion comes from very simple little moments of connection. It can come from very simple moments of connection with your own suffering, right here. That's really the point I want to make—because it doesn't stop with you.

When we're not, as Bankei, the Zen master from the 1600s in Japan, said, "Don't set yourself into confrontation with things, and then your primary being reveals itself in its true form." So just notice when you're feeling in confrontation with what's happening now. Instead see: can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusion, just for a moment? Just for a moment. And don't go looking for it, but you may find it happen. Looking for it—that gets in the way.

Notice how in that moment of real connection it opens up past your own particular story of suffering and begins to see that this is the particular experience of the universal experience of pain, or sorrow, or confusion, or loss. And that doesn't have to be overwhelming. That actually is the other side of seeing that we're not separate beings at all. We're not separate at all.

Vincent Van Gogh said once, "I wish that people could understand that the boundaries for compassion don't lie where the world draws them." And the boundaries for us don't lie where the world draws them. But it arises quite naturally, the sense of non-separation, just from touching our own suffering.

Tara Brach quotes Stephen Levine, who writes of a woman who was dying in terrible pain and feeling overwhelming bitterness. At the point at which she felt she could not bear the suffering and resentment any longer, she unexpectedly began to experience the pain of others—a starving mother in Ethiopia, a runaway teenager dying of an overdose in a dirty flat, a man crushed by a landslide and dying alone by the banks of a river. She said she understood that it wasn't her pain, it was the pain of all beings. It wasn't just her life, it was life itself.

And this is Pema Chödrön saying, "We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence." In the words of the 16th Karmapa, "You take it all in. You let the pain of the world touch your heart, and it turns into compassion."

Again, we don't have to try and hold all the pain of all the world. Our own pain is a representative of the pain of the world. And when we touch that, it turns into compassion. It naturally begins to move into the pain of the world.

I'll end with this one short quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj—second only to the Buddha, and I don't disagree with that: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

Then the senseless sorrow of humankind—which includes you—becomes our sole concern.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 98

Generosity: A Foundational Practice for Awakening

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson invites us to reconsider generosity (dāna) not as a preliminary practice or moral obligation, but as a direct path to liberation. Drawing from her extensive experiences in Burmese and Thai monasteries, she shares moving stories that illuminate how genuine generosity—whether giving or receiving—purifies the mind of greed, aversion, and delusion in the very moment it arises.
> Wilson explains the Buddha's graduated teaching approach, where discourse on dāna and sīla (virtuous conduct) naturally opens the heart and makes it pliable, uplifted, and serene—conditions ideal for understanding the Four Noble Truths. She references how the Buddha established the monastic saṅgha with generosity at its core, creating mutual support between lay practitioners and monastics. Through vivid accounts of rice dānas in cyclone-affected villages, spontaneous offerings from unexpected sources, and nuns transformed by their commitment to helping children, Wilson demonstrates how wholesome states feed wholesome states.
> The talk offers practical guidance for purifying motivation in acts of giving: clarifying intention before giving, abandoning clinging to what is offered, being fully present in the exchange, and honoring the complete circle of giving and receiving. Wilson concludes with the Buddha's instruction on recollecting one's own generosity as a meditation practice, citing how such recollection naturally leads to joy, calm, ease, and concentration—making generosity a complete practice for awakening.

Last night when Sally was talking about the Four Noble Truths, she mentioned that the fourth truth, the Eightfold Path, is so brilliant because it's really about our whole life, not just about meditation. I'm not talking about the Eightfold Path tonight—we're saving that for Pascal, unless he changes his mind. But I do want to take a little turn and not talk specifically about meditation tonight.

I want to remind us that as far as I can tell, everything the Buddha taught was in the service of transforming our consciousness, transforming the habits of our mind from unwholesome to wholesome. Basically everything he taught was part of our path of awakening. Of course, we're in a meditation retreat, and that's mostly what we're looking at. But I want to remind us that other aspects of his teaching, such as dana or generosity and sila or non-harming virtuous conduct, aren't just nice things to do to get yourself ready for meditation, or a byproduct, or a should.

Tonight I want to talk about generosity, but in the way of really seeing, really opening in our own experience to learn to see and deeply trust that the practice of generosity in all its different forms is actually a deep practice of liberation—not just the preparatory work, not just the waiting room.

In some Buddhist countries, because the Buddha always did start by talking about generosity, then virtuous conduct, then mental cultivation in that order, the practice of dana—supporting nunneries and monasteries, supporting each other (it's not only about nuns and monks)—sometimes remains just in the field of merit: "I'm doing this because I can't meditate, and if I'm generous, I'll have a better life next time around." There's an element of that in the teachings.

But when I talk about generosity as a practice tonight, I want us to really see how in a moment where we experience a generous heart-mind, that's a moment of real purity of consciousness. It liberates us from greed, from possessiveness. It frees the heart and mind from ill will in a moment of generosity. And of course, it moves past the false sense of separation of self—that kind of holding, of possessiveness, of clinging, of trying to protect.

The generous action, which can be of thought, of word, of deed—it's not just about giving things or money, it's about any kind of generous sharing. And also receiving, because there's no giving without receiving. Open-hearted receiving completes the circle. The open-hearted act of generosity, even just in thought—that's an act. It highlights the connectedness, the non-separation. So instead of coming from fear and protectiveness and possessiveness and I-ness, it's a movement in contradiction to that, when we're really present with it, when it's really being practiced as an awakening practice.

This probably isn't news to anybody. We all know that in all of our different cultures, generosity is a very appreciated and deeply taught practice in whatever religious tradition, and just in general life too. It doesn't even have to be a spiritual tradition.

What I've really been learning in the last few years, mostly from my time in Thailand and Burma—maybe being in a different culture from this one (and I have to say, people are really generous in this culture, I'm not saying we're not)—somehow being in an essentially Buddhist culture, in both Thailand and Burma, spending most of my time in nunneries or monasteries or meditation centers, but also traveling a lot... I've experienced both that very deep generosity and, in the same way, the more superficial kind that's just for merit, which is everywhere. But also, over and over, so often, a quality of spontaneous, heartfelt, natural generosity that is so joyous it has a quality of contagion.

This was a quality I never really learned from how I grew up, or even from all the generosity I experienced here and in my life. But the quality of real joy that comes from this open-hearted generosity—I found it has a quality of really seeing, really feeling how contagious it is. The actual practice of generosity becomes not just second nature but truly natural to us, where one wants to be generous because it's such a source of immediate happiness.

That was kind of like a secret teaching that I hadn't really learned. Yes, generosity is good. We feel better when we're generous, and we should be generous, especially to those less fortunate. But there's room for other moods to come in there.

In Burma, where I've been going for the last ten years, every time I go there are so many big and small spontaneous movements of generosity that it blows me away. At first, when you receive generosity, you think, "Oh no, I can't accept that. I'm so much better off than you." And then you feel how churlish that is—how that completely stops the circle of interconnectedness. That response is all about me: "Oh no, I can't take your generosity."

But when one really opens to it—for example, in the last few years I've been going with a few friends, and many of you here know that people offer us dana, money that we take, and as the vehicle for all the dharma friends here, we share with different nunneries. We've made funds for children to go to school who can't afford it, or rebuilt some houses, or whatever comes up. We've been to one meditation center where I've been staying, and there are many poor nunneries all around, and every year more. We go back—we can't give to all of them, but there are certain ones we've connected with that we give to, and other people may offer dana. We return the next year and see how it's been used, and it's usually been used wonderfully, and we can offer more.

But any time we even just show up—we're not even offering anything, we just come to say hello—immediately there's a lunch invitation. There are four, five, six of us depending. My friend Aryanyani and her friend Mimi—Mimi is Burmese, Arya speaks Burmese, so there's a lot more communication. There's always a lunch invitation. And the first years, we were like...

No, you know, they'll make a lunch for us that's ten times better than any meal they ever have. And it's embarrassing because you go and sit and eat and they watch you eat. They're not eating. That's how it always is.

In meditation centers, you know, every meal you see the meal dana. That's the thing coming from Asia. In every meditation center all over the country, the meals are offered every day by different people. So it might be if I'm staying in a meditation center, one day I'll offer the meals. And if it's a big one like Shwe Oo Min, last year it was four or five hundred people a day—it's not nothing. And you see so many Burmese people come. They signed up months ahead to offer the meal dana, and they'll come on their day with their families, all dressed up, and they watch you eat and take photos. So that takes some getting used to for us.

But you're just a yogi, so you just eat, you don't interact or anything. So we know it's like that. So when the nuns invite us, we'll go to their nunneries, which are really poor, and sit at the table on the floor, and they'll have a table groaning with twenty-five—I'm not exaggerating—different kinds of curries. Then they'll have another table that's groaning with fruits and little desserts. And they don't eat like that ever, ever. And when we're done eating, they'll take what's left and they may take a few days—the six of us, twenty-five of them—they may take a few days to eat off of the leftovers of what we didn't eat.

So there's that disparity. And if we say no, it just cuts the cycle. Or if we go and feel embarrassed—you know, they're so happy, they're so thrilled, they love to be able to offer. So can we go and be so happy to receive? And when both sides are like that, it's a beautiful teaching. It's a beautiful opening of the heart and mind. It makes one want to be more generous, not as it "should"—first it's like that, well, they were good to us, so we should give them more money. But it really isn't like that at all. What happens is you just go, "Wow." It's so beautiful and you just want to give. It may not be to them. It may be you walk out and someone else comes across your path and the heart and mind is in this open, receptive space. And if there's something to be offered, you just offer it. It's really contagious, and it starts to be not a practice but a way of being.

It is particularly highlighted in the monastic tradition within Buddhism, for sure. The Buddha set up the monastic sangha during his time so that generosity was at the center of it, at the core of it. The whole thing depends on generosity.

This is from the Buddha. He says, "Monks"—he's talking to his monks—"Brahmins and householders are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicines in times of sickness." And just if you don't know, those are the only four things a monk is allowed to accept, what they're offered: robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicine. And they can't keep food overnight, so it's just the food for that one day.

So still, in Buddhist countries, the monks go out every morning at dawn on this barefoot alms round with their bowls—not that big—with their bowls and get food. Now, in many places, all they get is a little bit of rice because the places are really poor. And so then often the monastery or the meditation center will actually cook for the monks and nuns. They'll use the rice that's donated. But then that food that's cooked is also offered by other people. But they keep the alms round up because—and I'll tell a story about it in a minute—it's an opportunity for generosity for the people that come out and offer rice. And to stop doing that is actually an act of selfishness, of taking away that opportunity for dana.

It's not so much the way we think, but that's a common phrase: "Oh, this is an opportunity for generosity." Sometimes loudspeakers will be going through a village: "An opportunity for generosity!" You know, in my Western mind I hear, "Yeah, right, someone's out there trolling for money." But it's really felt as an opportunity for generosity.

Buddha again: "And you monks are very helpful to Brahmins and householders as you teach them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end with the correct meaning and wording. And you proclaim the spiritual life in its fulfillment and purity. Thus, monks and nuns, the spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

And so the Buddha really set it up that way—that monks and nuns couldn't just withdraw and be separate from lay people, that they're linked together through generosity, through support of one another. Lay men and women and ordained women and men.

Those are the four types of people that are important in the Sangha, and their link is generosity. Generosity with things, generosity with time, generosity with the Dhamma. This is at the heart of sangha, so of course it shows up prominently in Burma, in Thailand, in the nunneries and monasteries. But it really seems to have become quite intrinsic in the culture.

Every year when I go, I know this now—it's not like magic. People have their stuff. It's not some kind of magical, wonderful culture, as you well know from reading the news. Things are just kind of normal for a while, but after a few days or a few weeks, each time we keep running into some little unexpected gesture of such deep quality of generosity and metta that it blows us away. One of my friends, Mario, calls it a "piti opportunity"—where something will be so touching at the depths of someone's generosity that we just come to tears.

And that is touching us, and that's the point I want to make. It's not about thinking, "Oh, these people over there are so wonderful. I couldn't be like that." Rather, it's about what happens with the wholesomeness in our heart and mind when it's generated. Have you noticed how wholesome feeds wholesome in your own self? Unwholesome can also feed unwholesome. Both are lawful. Wholesome feeds wholesome. And we catch it from each other because it wakes up the natural goodness, the natural wholesomeness in the mind that isn't colored by confusion.

Let me share a couple of stories to give you this sense of the spirit of joy in the giving and receiving of generosity.

A few years ago there was a big cyclone in the lower delta region southwest of Yangon, and really thousands upon thousands of people died. The farms were destroyed. It was a huge devastation, and the government, of course, did nothing. Many Burmese people naturally went to try to help. Any Burmese person who had anything tried to load up their car or their boat and go down there, even though the government was stopping them.

A couple of years later, some of us were with Sayadaw Indica at the meditation center where I've been staying. He organized a dana of food—from the money people had donated, he bought a lot of rice and oil and onions and beans and staples. He's an organizer. He arranged these big boats, and we took all this food down the river to a few little villages in the delta, then very formally offered the food. The villages were quite poor and really happy to receive. It's all done very formally, with a kind of ceremony, a kind of honoring of both the giving and the receiving. It's not like, "Well, here you are." "Oh, we'll take it, we're ashamed." It's a real honoring.

Then the villagers all came in a row with whatever beautiful plants they had, because it was a very rich area for growing things. They offered all these potted plants for us to bring back in the boat to plant at the monastery. Of course, you know, you think about how you're going to get all these plants in the boat and schlep them up there, and the Western mind wants to say, "That's too much trouble. Thanks a lot, you keep them." But you don't do that. You accept it with great joy, and then you go back and figure out what you're going to do with all these plants. You put them in the boat even though there's no room for you, and you schlep them up there and you plant them. There's a sense of really honoring the whole cycle. Something truly beautiful in that brings much more depth to the generosity and the receiving on both sides.

That same year, right at this meditation center on the edge of Yangon, the villages around it were also affected by the cyclone and didn't have much food that year. So we decided to organize what's called a rice dana, where every household in every village is registered. People can't live somewhere without being registered, so they know every house, they know how many people are in every house. Everyone would come and we'd all fill these big bags of rice—huge bags.

So they'd get a little chit and come and stand in line. And it would take two of us to heave this giant bag of rice up. These little ladies would go, "Okay," plop it on their head, and walk off—maybe carrying a couple of babies. I mean, I'm not kidding. I have pictures of ladies with two babies and this giant bag of rice on their head.

So they all took their rice and went off. It was a nice day, kind of like a picnic day. And then a friend, a guy from Mexico who was a temporary monk there, told us the next day about the alms round. Every morning when they go out, they walk the same route, because then people know when the monks are coming.

The way the alms round works, there's a little novice monk who goes ahead of them ringing a bell. Then the people who want to offer know they're coming, and they come out and stand by the side of the road. The monks come silently and walk up to them, and then the monk will take the lid off the bowl and they put in the food. The monks don't say thank you, and it's not meant to be personal. It's not me giving to you personally. It's supporting the sangha, supporting the sasana, supporting the Buddha's teachings. So the people come out when they hear the bell.

This monk said basically every day it's more or less the same people. You know which families are going to come out. But this day after the rice dana, when every family had rice, he said so many more people came out to offer because now they had a little rice that they could give. They didn't have it before. Sure, they kept some to eat, of course, but that was the first thing they wanted to do—and they were so happy to be able to do it. It's just so touching to see that over and over again.

And the sense of joy in dana isn't just with monks and nuns. Another example from this year: the whole money-changing scene there is a little weird. It's kind of half legal, half not legal, and it's not really through banks. You have to get money changers to come out to where you are, especially if you're changing a lot of money.

So we were changing a lot—maybe twenty-five thousand, thirty thousand dollars—and it was organized through a friend. These young guys kind of come up, not really sleazy, but businesslike, you know, on an edge. A step up from drug dealers, but sometimes there's a little bit of that sense. They look at every single bill, and if there's the tiniest dot, they won't take it. So you're there a while. It's a whole process. And then they give you all these piles of money, because Burmese money is big. You hand over two thousand dollars and you get a pile like this of things that crumble to dust when you touch them.

So we were there for a long time, changing the money, and it was all just straightforward. The guys were not unfriendly, but not chatty or anything. And I don't even know how—I think somehow just at the end, the woman who owns the B&B, the Burmese woman who was kind of the intermediary for us, just said something like, "Oh great, now you can build a lot of toilets for the nuns," which was part of what we were doing. That's all. No one was asking what we were doing with our money.

There was about six hundred dollars still kept back for some fee. And the lady from the B&B called us a couple days later to say, "Okay, now I have that. It's been released. And someone here donated another three hundred fifty dollars to bring it up to a thousand."

We thought it must be a yogi who stays at that B&B—a lot of Western meditators come through there that we know. We got there, and she said, "No, it was the money changer."

We were all completely blown away. When he heard how we were spending that money, he just wanted to donate. Three hundred fifty dollars for a Burmese person—that's a lot of money. And it was done in a very anonymous, not wanting any kind of recognition way. He just added three hundred fifty dollars to that.

That was a real pīti moment. You just never know. You think, "Oh, some sleazy money changer." Not the case. That seed of goodness and generosity is really blooming in that person's mind. The first chance they act on it—who knows what other good things he's doing.

So it's very, very institutionalized in the culture. I could tell you ten million more stories, but I'm running out of time, so I won't.

But one point that I want to make in terms of the contagion of generosity—not only how it spreads to others, but how it functions as deepening us into liberation. It's not just about feeling good about it, the joy of it, though that's certainly the case. But it opens the heart and mind to more wholesomeness, to see more clearly.

The Buddha often talked in this way. There are many suttas where he begins with what he calls a graduated teaching, where he sees someone and thinks, "This person could hear the Dhamma," but first he'll give them a talk on generosity, a talk on sila, to open the heart and mind, to make the heart and mind more pliable.

So I just want to give a couple of examples again from this year of how you can see it happening in people—first in terms of how the generosity comes in the culture at this place we're staying.

The monks, of course, have nothing to give other than teaching Dhamma. But the few monks who live at this meditation center, aside from the Sayadaw—I've been back there a few years now, and my two nun friends live there half the year, so they know all the monks. And the monks are so wanting to support helping people.

In the past, I've had the impression—not with these particular monks—that monks tend to want to help each other, that they look down on nuns or don't really think about them so much. But that's just not true here.

There are quite a few schools that have been started by nuns because they see there are so many poor kids that can't afford to go to the government school. One started just nearby where we're living, by a nun that we had known for a few years. We thought she seemed a little bit depressive, actually. And her nunnery was nothing special—fine, and we'd support them some, but they weren't particularly bringing up a lot of orphan girls, which a lot of nunneries do. They were just doing their thing, studying.

But she came, I think it was last year, to Ari and Yanni and said, "I really want to start a school." There was another nun school started about a ten-minute drive away, which that nun began three years ago. She just said, "I have to do something. There are all these poor kids that can't go to school."

So they just decided to do it. They build a lean-to, a roof building, and start a school. Somehow they get enough dana to hire a few teachers. And that's it—they start a school. She said, "Okay, well, maybe I can have a hundred kids." We went back the next year: 350 kids. We went back this year: 570 kids.

And so this other nun came last year and said, "In the rainy season, all the little nuns and all the little kids around this area go to that school, but it's so far to walk—it's a forty-five-minute walk. In the rainy season, which is pouring monsoon, it's too hard, so the little ones don't go."

She said, "I want to start a school around here for the little ones."

She asked for about $3,600, which is for us a lot to give all at once. We didn't really think she could pull it off. But we said, "Okay, great, do it."

Well, we came back this year. She did it. They had two little buildings, not a lot of land. They demolished the main building the nuns all lived in. They all moved, cramped up into this other little building. They eat there. They sleep there. They do everything there. And with the money we'd given, she built one of these long lean-tos, hired some teachers. It has 150 kids who are going there—all the little kids.

And then another company, some chemical company—a Burmese company—came and saw what she was doing, so they built another school. And then some other friends of ours came and they built some toilets. And it's like it attracts more and more.

So this year, we saw how she had done that. And then she was talking to Ari and Yanni, and it's really wonderful to be able sometimes to just sit down and have a conversation, because this is where these little gems come out that you don't get even from seeing what she did, which is amazing. But she came and was just chatting...

First of all, as I mentioned, she had always been somewhat depressive. But as she was sitting there talking with us in the little kuti, her face was just radiant—so bright. She was saying that last year, when she came with the idea for the school, the idea had been growing so strongly in her mind. "I just want to help these children," she said. And it got so strong that she could hardly eat, could hardly sleep. It was just such an overwhelming feeling—she had to do something to help these children.

And now, she said, the school is built, and it's so much work. It's so hard, because everything falls on Dana. To hire teachers—regular, government-approved teachers—means every month they have to somehow find the funds. Dana has to come up with whatever donations happen to come in from people who visit, to pay the teacher salaries, to pay for the desks, to have a well that works and toilets that work, all kinds of things. She said it's so much work and they're all cramped together.

And then she said, "I'm so happy. I'm so happy. It's hard. All the energy is for the children and the school." She said her mind is calm and happy, whereas before it had been filled with worry. All the hard work notwithstanding, her mind is so happy, and she would be so happy if she could just do this for the rest of her life.

We could see—sure, it comes and goes—but the transformation through this genuine commitment to generosity of her time and energy, this really stretching to help others, has brought much stronger peace and happiness and contentment to her mind. And that's then available to see more clearly.

This onward leading doesn't just end with the generosity. I'll read this from Ajahn Pasanno—this is essentially his commentary on a sutta. He says it's just nature, it's lawful, that generosity, the foundational quality on the path of awakening, lawfully opens into deeper qualities of awakening.

This is Ajahn Pasanno: "There's a naturalness to this gradual training. The cultivation of these foundational qualities leads naturally to deeper qualities. For example, common ways of teaching emphasize dana, sila, bhavana—generosity, virtuous conduct, mental cultivation. When one is generous and delights in giving, the heart is satisfied and joyous. This supports the development of virtue because a heart that is satisfied and contented easily inclines to restraint and composure. With this composure, together with the lack of remorse that virtue affords, the heart is easily settled and focused. Then meditation progresses more smoothly because the mind naturally brightens, making it suitable for seeing things as they truly are."

Do you get a sense of that? Part of the reason I keep telling different stories is that even if just one of them resonates with you, you get a sense of how the mind or heart naturally brightens. And that brightness leads to a pliancy, a suppleness, an openness. We're not clouded by kilesa, and there is more potential to see things as they truly are.

Let me give you a different story. This one is not from Burma, but I heard it on YouTube—someone showed me a little clip from one of those talent shows, like American Idol. I never watched them, so it wasn't American Idol; it was some British one with that guy—you probably know him—one of the judges, the mean one. Simon something or other. He seems like really not a very nice guy, but he's always the judge, so that's all I remember.

The young man who was singing was a teenager, seventeen or eighteen, of Iraqi descent, but he'd been adopted by an Australian woman. He and his brother had both been adopted, and they had both been really severely wounded—I think by bombs or something during part of the war in Iraq when they were really young children. Wounded to where their limbs were gone. I can't remember the specifics, but he was certainly missing arms and legs; both of them were.

This Australian woman had gone to Iraq and fallen in love with them both, adopted them both, and brought them back to Australia. That's the backstory. But first, the audience didn't really know any of that. They just introduced him, and he comes on—just so bright, missing arms and legs—and starts singing.

And he was really good. But of course, everyone's heart was completely open. He was really good, so he's singing, and then at the end he turns—his mother was there and his brother was there. And this is what was really so moving. He turned to them just with so much love and appreciation to his mother, just for her love and generosity. And then you see the brother there. And she's saying, "This isn't generosity, you know, it's just love." But it was like a love fest, just so much purity.

And I tried to imagine what a generous heart that woman would have to adopt two kids so wounded, who could never really... and how beautiful they all were. Even that mean guy, Simon, had tears in his eyes.

The thing I want to bring out—it's a beautiful story—but just seeing that generosity and love, the kind of generosity where you don't think, "Oh, I'm so generous." It's just a natural sharing. Why does it touch us? Because it opens that same potential. It opens in our own hearts and minds that brightness, that movement beyond the sense of me.

I might think, "Oh, I couldn't do that. She's so great." Well, that isn't really very touching, is it? But when you don't go there, it's just, "Wow, look at that." You're not thinking, "I should be like that" or anything like that. Just "That's so amazing." That expression of generosity and love is so beautiful. We can appreciate it because it's natural to us too. And so opening to see it acted out through other people is really a great way in for us. It begins to open us to a deeper practice and deeper understanding.

In the Buddha's stories, in the scriptures, there's one man who was known as the most generous. He was a huge supporter of the Buddha—Anāthapiṇḍika. When he first met the Buddha, he was so filled with faith that he just basically fell in love with the Buddha. And he's one of those people that when the Buddha first met him, he gave him—I just want to read you this line because this is one of these ways they introduced this graduated teaching.

So the Buddha met Anāthapiṇḍika, who had never met the Buddha before, never heard the Dhamma. And step by step he saw he needed a step-by-step gradual discourse. So he spoke to him of generosity, of virtue, of the heavenly realms, of the perils and vanity and the nature of sensual pleasures, of the joy and benefits of renunciation. And when he saw that Anāthapiṇḍika was ready in heart and mind—the mind and heart was pliable, unobstructed, uplifted, and serene—then he explained to him the teaching that is unique to the enlightened ones, the Four Noble Truths.

So specifically, when I'm talking about generosity tonight, not only in how we do it, but noticing the effect it has in our hearts and mind—any wholesome state does—it brings... it makes the mind uplifted, serene, pliable. In that state, it's more able to recognize things as they really are.

I'll read another sutta towards the end of the talk, but there are times here in practice when practice is going fine, great. There are other times when whatever's coming up is so difficult and so overwhelming. Maybe you're really getting overwhelmed by fear, or physical pain, or self-judgment. And not just that it's there, but you're just lost in it, or fatigue. And you think, "I just can't do this anymore." Everyone thinks that. You more than think it—you really think it's really true. "I can't do this anymore."

And if the only option... and I know I'm always saying, I'm going to keep on saying: have total confidence in mindfulness. I'm not backing off of that. I have total confidence in awareness. That's always the first way to go. But sometimes you're like, "What mindfulness? What awareness? What confidence?" You say mindfulness doesn't care what's happening, but I care. And I can't look at this thing one more second.

That's when you can remember that there are other aspects of purifying our heart and mind. Generosity is one.

And it doesn't mean you have to run out and do something generous. You can—and I'll say more about this at the end—simply bring to mind acts of generosity from your own past. It can even be thoughts, or remembering the generosity of others. Like even this little story I was just sharing—contemplate it. Recognize gratitude. Tune into that quality of openness of heart and mind and notice what happens. It changes the channel. It can really bring some uplifting to your heart and mind.

That's not cheating. It's really not cheating. It's actually shifting out of feeding the unwholesome by just spinning in negativity, and opening into what is an authentic aspect of moving beyond greed, hatred, and confusion on the path.

I want to give you another example of how this onward leading happens naturally too. This was another powerful moment for us. One of the monks at the place we were staying likes to help people. He goes around and talks to everyone, and he would point things out—"Oh, this young guy, he's really smart. He could go to school, but he doesn't have any money." Or he'd say, "This person's house is really falling down, and they're really virtuous. Maybe you could help them." It's so sweet to see this.

So he told us about two monks he had met just over on the other side of town in this dusty little compound. He said they were two men who had become monks in their mid-thirties. They'd only been ordained a few years, and they didn't really know what to do with themselves. They were just living in this compound as monks, not really studying, not really meditating, not really doing much of anything—just kind of hanging out there.

He suggested to them, "Why don't you do something useful with your life?" I think he said it in a nice way. He went to them and said, "You're just sitting around, and you're educated." One had been a businessman and the other had been a captain in the army, so they were both somewhat educated. He said, "There are all these poor kids who can't afford school, and you could help them with tuition."

The way it works in Burma, even if you go to a government school, even in the younger grades, you somehow don't learn enough to pass the tests. Most kids have to have after-school tuition, which they need to pay the teachers for. And that's also the only way the teachers can survive, since they don't get paid enough in the schools. It's this whole system. So there are lots of kids who maybe scrape by in school but can't afford tuition. These monks decided to help with that.

So Upanyaloka, the monk, told us about them, and we went over to visit and see. It was such a trip. It also cut through our views. Because you get into views of good monks and not-so-good monks, sincere monks and just-hanging-out-doing-nothing-much monks and nuns.

We went over, and these two men were living in just this poor little compound with a couple of shacks. They didn't look like good monks. They were just kind of there, and they chewed betel nut, which is not a good look for anybody once it has become your habit. You know how it looks—it dyes your mouth red and your teeth start to rot. But it's addictive. So when you see a monk who's chewing betel nut, right away you kind of judge. Which is superficial, right? You don't know.

But they had about a hundred little kids there in the afternoon that they were teaching. Then we had a conversation about what they needed. They needed a well. They didn't have any water. They were hauling it in with buckets for all these little kids and for their own daily needs. Very poor circumstances.

We talked more, and one of them had only been a monk for three years, the other for seven. The businessman was the younger one, more talkative. He had been working in the alcohol, cigarette, and beer trade. Then he did a meditation retreat with Pa Auk Sayadaw and wanted to ordain. His parents wouldn't let him, and he had to keep working until they finally relented. He ordained maybe in his mid-thirties.

So he was telling us, just talking away, and we were kind of, ah. And then we started really listening.

He said, you know, first he told us this parable. He said that a frog is sitting on a lotus flower, but he's so close he just doesn't even notice the lovely fragrance of the flower. But then bees come from far away, and they really enjoy the scent and the nectar of the flower.

So he's saying this to us. He says, "You're foreigners. You're like the bees that come from far away." He said, "I, a Burmese person, I live here in a country where the Sasana, where the Dhamma is flowering. But for the first thirty-three years of my life, I didn't even enjoy the fragrance. Whereas you foreigners come from far away and enjoy it."

He said, "But now I've discovered—I feel like I have a new life." He feels like he's reborn from helping people. He said, "Now, to be able to help these kids, I feel like I'm completely reborn, like I have a new life. So I feel like I wasted the first thirty-three years of my life, and now all I want to do the rest of my life is—if these kids grow up, we'll move somewhere else and then start another tuition and help those kids."

It was just so beautiful. And he was also—that was deepening him into his love of the Dhamma, into his wanting to practice more. It's just like a whole circle.

And it was really good for us because we were so touched. It's like, okay, we thought they weren't good monks. Delete that one. So what if they chewed betel nut? So what if they were sitting there not knowing what to do? As soon as they got the idea to help, they were like transformed beings. It was so beautiful. We went and watched them with the kids, and they were just so tender, so kind with these hundred kids running around. We talked to families in the neighborhood whose kids were going there, and you could just see it all spreading out.

But that's just an example of how generosity, when it's really done wholeheartedly in whatever way, is the natural unfolding into deepening and deepening our understanding, our freedom of heart and mind.

So the point the Buddha makes very strongly in the suttas with Anathapindika is that the heart of generosity is—guess what, just like everything we do—in the intention. The motivation in our own mind and heart. It's not about who gives more, who gives less, or even what. It's not about giving things. It could just be a thought of generosity.

There's a saying in the sutta: even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup into a village pond thinking, "May whatever animals live here feed on this," that would be an act of generosity. And you can see how it just shifts our mind and heart from throwing the slop away to thinking, "May this be of benefit to beings." That's an act of generosity. So it's this intention at the heart that really makes the difference.

And there's a story from the Buddha with Anathapindika that illustrates this that I really like a lot.

Anathapindika, as I said, became the Buddha's most wealthy supporter. He bought the Jeta Grove, where—if you read the suttas—more suttas than anywhere else take place in that grove. The Buddha spent a lot of rains retreats there.

So after he established that monastery, Anathapindika would keep supporting the Sangha. When they were in the area where he lived, he would invite the Buddha and all the monks and nuns to his house for the noon meal—up to five hundred. Andy Olinsky says five hundred when you're reading the suttas basically means "a lot." It doesn't specifically mean five hundred. So five hundred monks would come daily, and he would give them alms, give them food, and his home was filled with robes and the ambiance of saintliness—okay, that's not in the sutta, that's from a writer.

Then the king of the area, King Pasenadi, who was also a supporter of the Buddha, heard of Anathapindika's generosity and wanted to imitate him. Basically, he was jealous of him, right? Well, if he gets five hundred monks, I can do that too. I'm the king, after all. So he started supplying alms for five hundred monks daily.

But one day, when he was on his way to talk to the Buddha, he learned from his servants that after he offered the monks their meal, they were taking the food away with them into the city, giving the food to their supporters in the city, and then the supporters would offer the food back to them. The king was mystified. He said, "I'm giving them very tasty food. It's much better than Anathapindika's. What's that about?"

And the Buddha explained to the king that in the palace, he just had his servants, his courtiers, distributing the food without any inner feeling—just following orders, as if they were cleaning out a barn.

So they lacked faith. They had no love for the monks. It wasn't an act of generosity. When anything was given in that spirit, no one could feel comfortable accepting it, even when the meal was made of the most delicious food.

In contrast, the faithful householders of the city, like Anathapindika and Visakha, a woman who was also known for her generosity, welcomed the monks and regarded them as spiritual friends, appreciating that they lived for the welfare and benefit of beings. A humble meal provided by a friend would be worth much more than the most sumptuous meal offered by someone who did not give in the right spirit.

So the purification, the joy of the generosity, the onward leadingness to free our hearts from clinging, from holding, from possessiveness—it's really all in the motivation. It's not about who gives more, but simply about keeping tuning in, tuning into your motivation.

So I can quickly share this practice of purifying motivation—a little seven-fold practice. Don't make a big deal about this. Don't even try to remember it all, but just let whatever goes in, go in. I got this from a talk by Sayadaw U Pandita. It's just practicing in the act of giving.

The first is you really tune in to your volition, to your motivation. When the thought comes up in the mind—"I want to give this" or "I should give this" or whatever—don't think "should I, shouldn't I." Tune in to the motivation and really purify it before giving. I heard a Tibetan teacher say that if you actually can't imagine giving a thing or your time or whatever, just imagine it in thought. That's enough to start with. Just imagine being generous in your thoughts. Just imagine spending time with your sick friend. Or as another Tibetan teacher said, if you can't give something, just take a rock and give it from one hand to the other, and practice letting go like that. But just play with it. Purify the motivation.

And as you're doing that, obviously you abandon the clinging to the thing that you give, whatever it is—your time, an object, clothing, a meal. In that moment, really let go of clinging to it.

The third, which isn't as workable here but is common in Burma where giving to monks or nuns is very formal—it's done face-to-face, not casually. Not "oh, here's this, okay, thanks, see you later." I remember a friend told me once that I had something I didn't really want, and he kind of wanted it. So I said, "Yeah, sure, take it." It was like that. And he said years later, "You know, that thing you gave me—some kind of pillow—I use it all the time. Your casual generosity turned out to be so useful." He didn't mean that in a critical way, but it really went in because that's exactly what it was: completely casual. I didn't give it any attention. "Yeah, sure, take it." It's not like you're building yourself up by giving it attention, but it's honoring the motivation and the connectedness of generosity itself just to do it with yourself being present and the person being present.

So when we go to nunneries and we offer, even if it's just money, it's always done formally. You get a tray—any kind of tray, there's always a tray lying around somewhere—you pile the money on the tray, or if you were giving cups or food or whatever. Then some of the people offering hold the tray, someone representing the nuns receiving holds the tray, and they chant a whole really lovely metta chant. Different lengths—sometimes it's short, sometimes it'll go on for ten minutes. And if it's a big nunnery, even the little girl nuns, like four years old, they know it. They stand there and completely do this chant. It's so beautiful. The chant's not always so melodic, okay? But it's so touching. You can go through whatever you go through, but it's a real honoring of that whole movement. It's so different from "oh, let me put this check to Amnesty in the mail." But even writing a check to put in the mail—do it really with your mind fully present on what you're doing. Abandon the clinging, clarify your motivation, and do it fully present.

Then after we're giving, again, purify the motivation. Have you ever had that experience? "Oh, why did I do that? That was too big of a check." Or "I gave that away, but I think I might wear that in two years. I want it back." Have you ever done that?

Should I give this? I haven't worn it for ten years, but I don't know. Okay, I'll give it. No, no, maybe no one took it yet—I'll go get it back. So that's not so great. Notice again.

And the other practice is really to be aware of clear comprehension of the broader context. Sometimes we don't fully know the situation, but the classic example is if someone is an alcoholic and they want to drink—is it generosity to give them a drink? Maybe not. So really tuning in, we don't know all the circumstances, but it's important to tune into the broader context as well as we can. It's not that sense of "I should be generous, and whatever anyone asks, I should give"—all these shoulds that we bring in. Notice how that shuts down the mind and the heart? That's not at all the open space of generosity, either giving or receiving. So as much as you can, be aware of the broader context. Clarify your motivation.

And then I've added what I mentioned before: to receive in as connected and open-hearted a way as possible. And if in the receiving a big sense of self comes up, just tune into that with kindness. But don't land on that. Don't let that get in the way of letting the circle of giving and receiving be complete.

As a practice here in quietness—and this comes from the Buddha—we can use thoughts and recollections of generosity, our own generosity and others', to brighten and purify our own mind and heart in difficult times, or just in sleepy times, or just because it's a lovely thing to do.

Here's an example. In past years, I was spending a lot of time with my aging parents when they were alive. And I really noticed, as many of you know, it's very demanding, lots of choices. And whatever one does never feels like enough, because you can't really make the situation the way you wish it were—like how it was twenty years ago. So I would notice how easy it was for the mind to focus on: I didn't stay long enough, I didn't do this, I forgot to do that, I got impatient about this, it's not enough, I have to leave them alone. But that's not helpful. If you can actually turn around and focus on all the many moments of pure-hearted generosity involved in that, it changes everything. So that's with parents, with your children, with your friends. There's stuff we don't do that we could do—yes, sure, I'm not saying go into denial. But it's so easy for us not to really appreciate the generous acts and thoughts and deeds, the goodness, the non-harming behavior. And to actually bring that into heart and mind is not an ego trip. An ego trip would be "I'm so great." No, no, no. You'll notice the mind doesn't get brighter with that. It doesn't get more supple. It's not onward leading. It just feels the limitations of self coming in. But when you actually use it as a practice—and this is from the Buddha—it's extremely helpful.

This is from a sutta, and the Buddha is talking about six different recollections. One is sīla, one is generosity, one is the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha. He talks about the devas and other things. It's all the same pattern, but I'll read the generosity one:

"There is the case where you recollect your own generosity like this: It is a gain, a great gain for me, that among people overcome with the stain of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests, delighting in the distribution of alms. At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed. Her mind is not overcome with aversion, is not overcome with delusion."

Did you hear that? At any time one is truly contemplating, recollecting generosity, your mind is not overcome with greed, with aversion, with delusion.

"Her mind, her heart heads straight based on generosity. And when the mind, the heart is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the meaning, a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. In one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm."

In one whose body is calm, experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated.

So, you should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children.

If we can recollect it when we're resting in our home crowded with children, perhaps we can recollect our generosity now, just for thirty seconds.

Recollect your generosity.

And thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 99

Mindfulness and Full Awareness: Sampajañña

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the often-overlooked quality of sampajañña—variously translated as clear comprehension, alertness, or full awareness—which the Buddha consistently paired with sati (mindfulness) in his teachings. Through a memorable personal story of falling down stairs while meticulously noting each moment, she illustrates how bare attention without broader awareness misses the complete picture of practice.
> Wilson explores the classical commentarial framework of four aspects of clear comprehension: awareness of purpose (motivation), suitability (context), the domain of meditation, and non-delusion. She emphasizes how examining our intentions before, during, and after actions—as the Buddha taught his son Rāhula—becomes the mirror for purifying heart and mind. Drawing from the lives of Aung San Suu Kyi, Martin Luther King Jr., and the Dalai Lama, she shows how moment-to-moment purity of motivation itself becomes the fulfillment of our deepest aspirations.
> The talk addresses how practitioners can shift from wanting awareness to loving awareness, from effortful striving to natural surrender. Wilson explores the interconnected nature of our actions, noting that "in every moment of activity, we are committing to something—the question is, to what?" She concludes with the inspiring story of Tibetan nuns who maintained their practice through decades of persecution, demonstrating how our deepest aspirations manifest uniquely through each individual while affecting all beings.

Meditators don't look very happy. But I know that's just perception, and I have no clue what's going on.

Tonight I want to talk about a word in Pali: sampajañña. Usually when you talk about mindfulness, sati, it comes together with sampajañña. Sati and sampajañña are often discussed together. I want to speak about this not as a corollary but as a support, a broader aspect of mindfulness, to help round out how we come to awakening—just looking at all different angles.

Last night Sally spoke so beautifully about the transcendent dependent arising and that very precise, subtle, and specific way that the heart and mind can open up to freedom. That's not just in retreat, of course, but that specificity, that subtlety is certainly more accessible when we're in the silence of intensive practice.

Sometimes, though, as I talked about with generosity, all different aspects of the path are each in themselves a way of awakening. Deep in retreat, we can start to confuse mindfulness with the very narrow, focused, precise, magnified kind of attention that comes with deep stillness, with concentration. And often when that's not available—if by now you ever have a moment when that's not available—it means you've failed. So what I'm saying is second best. I'm kidding. I'm kidding.

But when that quality isn't available, isn't that what you think? "Well, now I failed. I had it and now it's gone." So you do whatever, but you're kind of waiting until the goodies come back. It's easy at times, and also when we leave retreat, to think that mindfulness needs this really highlighted, specific, narrow-focused, laser-like quality. And it doesn't.

Sampajañña is often translated as "clear comprehension"—that's the classic rendering. But Thanissaro Bhikkhu translates it as "alertness." Sati and sampajañña are used together often in the suttas. Bhikkhu Bodhi translates it, and I like this even better, as "full awareness." Full awareness. As Thanissaro Bhikkhu describes it, coming together with mindfulness: be aware of what you're doing in the movements of the body and in the movements of the mind. Knowing what you're doing—not just this tiny little bare attention. Yes, that's mindfulness. But in the broader context, wise discernment, knowing what we're doing, that's clear comprehension.

I wasn't going to say this—it's an embarrassing story—but it gives a good example of the difference between laser mindfulness lacking clear comprehension and how clear comprehension, full awareness, is really necessary for understanding.

Years ago, many years ago, I was on an intensive retreat at IMS, one where I was really, really slowed down, noting every moment, very committed. I was walking extremely slowly, noting every little subtle step. At IMS, there's a coat room you walk through to get to the upper walking room, which you then walk through to get to the meditation hall. Those of you who've been there know how this is. So I was walking slowly through the coat room, and I had my zafu—that's how long ago it was, like a suññatā zafu. I put it down. I'm noting the whole thing: taking off my shoes, picking up the zafu. This is taking like five, ten minutes. Then I turn, noting incredibly carefully.

It so happens that right where the coat room meets the upper walking room, there are three steps. I lived there. This was not unfamiliar to me. I just walked right off that top step, noting every moment, and fell flat on my face. I forgot to notice the bigger context. There are steps. Hello.

This is a lack of sampajañña, a lack of full awareness. You can see how narrow attention doesn't really get the whole picture, right?

So I want to use this broad template to talk about whatever I feel like talking about tonight.

But classically in the commentaries, things are broken down quite precisely. There's a very nice grouping of four aspects of full awareness, of alertness, that we need to notice. I want to use these as a sort of outline.

The first, and I'll just name them all, is full awareness or clear comprehension of the purpose—the motivation of one's actions. The second is full awareness of the suitability, the appropriateness, the broader context. The third is full awareness of the range, the domain of meditation, which basically means not abandoning your meditation during your daily activities. And the fourth is full awareness of non-delusion in life, which is described by Bhikkhu Bodhi as simply being aware that there's no abiding self. But it's really about seeing how all aspects of life come to be shot through with non-delusion.

This is broad. Of course, they always give the highest potential. But I just want to say how if we give a little attention to each of these areas, it really deepens and broadens and stabilizes both our practice—in retreat and out of retreat—and our understanding.

So the first: full awareness, clear comprehension of the purpose, the motivation of one's actions. We've talked a lot about intention. This is basically intention, so I don't have to describe it at length because Guy did so clearly. Cetanā—that impulse that leads to speech, action, and even thought, that comes together with whatever mental qualities it comes together with in a moment—that's the seed of karma. You remember that? We've talked about noticing that "about to" intention in our practice.

But the seed of that—this is so key. Mindfulness gives us the bare attention, the simple recognition quality that gives us the tools to recognize a moment of intention. Full awareness, clear comprehension, brings in something more—really on two levels. Our willingness, our remembering to pay attention, to notice what the motivation is, why we're doing what we're doing, over and over—to really bring this into deep awareness is key to purifying our heart and mind, to freeing our heart and mind from suffering.

As Guy talked about, we can notice that the same action can come from many different qualities of intention. So we can't judge someone's intentions by the results or by their actions. And even for ourselves, we may think we have the best intentions, but that doesn't mean we can control the results of an action. Really, the results of actions are pretty much out of our control. What we can notice is the intention. And so we start to bring our awareness into the subtlety of why we're doing what we're doing. To do that, it takes interest, non-judging, and awareness.

The example I always give—it's very basic and simple—is this: if there's someone you care about and they've been doing something unskillful, something that bugs you, that brings them suffering though they don't know it, and you really want to give them that feedback. You can already see the many different ways that could play out. And much of what determines the range of outcomes comes from our intention in the moment, doesn't it?

In your mind, you can say, "I really want to tell them because I love them and it's for their own good." That's a thought. But in the moment of saying it, it might be when they've just done it again and you're really bugged, and you say, "Yeah, I'm just telling you this for your own good. Let's have a talk. I want to give you some feedback because I love you so much." The words are right, but they're not really conveying the true intention, are they? The true intention leaks out. Nobody's fooled there. Maybe you're fooled. The person you're talking to—they're not fooled. Because we forget to check.

But another time, you could really stop, see that intention, and not say it then. You wait and get in touch with mettā, compassion for that person, and actually feel it. Then you sit down, and from the mettā, you say it. You can play with this. You can really see the difference.

Another time, you may feel it, feel the mettā, but you're completely oblivious to the circumstances of the person at that moment. As if it's all about your intention. This is where it moves out into suitability—the second aspect—which I'll talk about more later. But it's not just about my intentions. Mettā is completely overlooking the fact that the person just stumbled into the house after twelve hours of a really difficult day at the office, people were on their case, they're totally exhausted, and their dog just died. And you say, "Let me give you this feedback with all the mettā in my heart." And somehow they can't hear it.

I think, "Well, it's hopeless. They can't hear it." But you see, there's again that quality of missing the big picture, like me falling down the steps.

These are just simple examples, but you get a sense of how the quality in mind that comes with the intention is really what's key. As Guy said when he talked about kamma, that's what forms the seed of kamma, of wholesomeness, of unwholesomeness. And it's powerful. Even when we're not aware of it, that doesn't make it less powerful. I don't want to say it's scary, but it's not something to be underestimated, the power of intention.

I heard this—I was kind of half listening to the news, the BBC, a couple of weeks ago, and I didn't get all the details, but I think I got the main gist. This was a little scary to me. They said in the U.K., the military was talking about the possibility of experimentation with drones—you know, those drones they have that they fly and bomb people from a distance, operated by computers or whatever. So, okay, that's bad enough. But they were thinking about somehow beginning to experiment with drones that would respond to the operator's thoughts.

Yes, exactly—whoa.

So you know, the person might think, "Well, I didn't actually push a button to make it bomb, but I just had the thought and the thing did it." It would really be easy to feel, "Well, the thought just popped in my mind. I didn't really even want to do it. Never mind." I'm really hoping I heard that wrong, because that's really scary.

It's something to look at. But that's not to make us scared. It's not to make us afraid to see unwholesome intentions arise. In fact—and this is again still part of the clear comprehension of motivation on the moment-to-moment level—this is where we want to look out of interest, out of what's really freeing. What brings us suffering? What brings us happiness? What brings people around us suffering? What brings people around us happiness? Hating ourselves and being afraid to see unwholesome intentions doesn't bring us or anybody else happiness. But the interest to look does.

There's a very well-known sutta where the Buddha is talking to his son, Rahula, who joined the order of monks as a novice when he was a young boy, about seven. In this sutta, the Buddha asks Rahula, "What is a mirror for? And why is this important?" And Rahula says, "Well, it's for reflection." The Buddha responds, "Yes, just so. And just like a mirror, what's really important is to reflect before actions of body, before actions of speech, before actions of mind."

He goes through each one individually, starting with action. Let me read just the way he phrases it to make it more precise:

"When you wish to do an action with the body, reflect upon it thus: Would this action lead to my own affliction, or to the affliction of others, or to the affliction of both? Is it an unwholesome action with painful consequences, painful results? When you reflect, if you know that it is painful, then you definitely shouldn't do it. But when you reflect, if you know this action would not lead to my own affliction or the affliction of others, it's a wholesome bodily action with pleasant consequences, with pleasant results, then you may do such an action."

And then he goes on to say—because of course we don't always reflect before we do it—"If you're in the middle of an action and you recognize you're in the middle of an action, reflect upon it in the same way: Is this action that I'm doing leading to my own affliction or the affliction of others?"

Notice it's my own affliction and or the affliction of others, not only the affliction of others. Sometimes we forget that we're also included. And sometimes we don't even notice what we're doing in the middle of it.

So then the Buddha says, "After you've done an action, reflect on: Did it lead to my affliction, the affliction of others, the affliction of both, or not? And if it did lead to affliction, then you should reveal it, lay it open to your teacher or to wise companions in the holy life." In other words, don't try to hide it away, hoping nobody saw. Lay it out, and then try to refrain from such actions in the future.

The same applies with actions of speech, the same with actions of mind.

Now the mirror part is really important because he's not saying reflect on it, see that you're doing an action that might lead to your own affliction, and then hate yourself, beat yourself up, beat your breast and tear your hair and say, "What a bad person I am." He just says, notice it. Like a mirror reflects what's put in front of it.

This is the quality of mindfulness, of sati—recognizing just what's happening without judging, without aversion, without clinging. Clear seeing. How else are we going to see what leads to our own affliction or the affliction of others? What leads not to affliction, but to pleasant circumstances for ourselves and others? Only by this willingness, this interest to explore, without any judging. That's how we learn—before, during, or after.

So it comes to be really interesting, much more natural. We just keep on noticing what's the attitude in the mind. Does that sound familiar? This is exactly what this is. When we're doing something, before we're doing something, after—we just check what's the attitude in the mind. "Oh, I'm filled with aversion. Maybe this isn't the time to tell that person that incredibly important feedback." We start to notice that. We don't have to analyze it, but you can just start to tune in more and go, "Okay, there's aversion. Not the time to do it."

As we begin to notice cause and effect, we don't look so much to what's going to happen if I do it, whether I'm going to get the result I want. Because big picture, we never know. But we look to what's this speech, this thought, this action coming out of. Is it as clear as I can be? And then we start to see, as Ajahn Pasanno says, we start to nurture the appropriate causes for the results we're seeking.

So if the result we're seeking—and this is assuming we're embracing wholesomeness, that we're coming from a place of wanting to foster our own happiness and the happiness of others, our own wholesome heart and the wholesomeness of others. If the result we're seeking, back to that simple example of giving someone feedback because they're doing something that's bringing suffering to themselves and to me too, all of us suffering. If, without tuning into intention, the result we're seeking is just to make them stop doing that thing, you might just go blat them over the head—"Stop doing that or I'm not going to be your friend"—blackmail, whatever, because you don't care about the motivation. You just want that thing to stop. But you're not tuned into the fact that that's leading to more suffering for both of you.

If we want to nurture the results we're seeking with the appropriate cause, then what we're really seeking is the happiness of that person, the well-being of both of us, out of a sense of caring, out of a sense of mettā. So the appropriate cause for that is to speak out of a sense of mettā, out of a sense of connection, out of a sense of caring. And then that person will hear it or they won't. They'll act on it or they won't. That's not in our control.

This is kind of a big leap to make from a small action, a small motivation in our mind, but my mind does make this leap, so I'll put it out there. Knowing in little actions of speech, body, and even thought—when we have the choice—how our mind works, how we get lost in suffering and greed and wanting and negativity, how we can see that and not act on it. Knowing how the mind works is the cause that's going to nurture the effect of being able to live our lives in the world of not causing harm, of cultivating wisdom, of cultivating compassion.

I'm making a leap. I'm assuming that's something that's interesting to you, to live in that way. I am making that assumption, but not everyone has that as a result they seek. But just to say, "I want to live in a compassionate way" but not pay attention to how and why I'm doing what I'm saying and doing—it doesn't work. It's sort of like the motivation of what I'm doing and saying is the result. It is destiny, really.

So the leap I'm making is—and I've told this in other talks—a couple of years ago when I was in Germany, I go every summer, I went to visit the museum at Dachau, which had been one of the concentration camps. It was very well set up, with big billboards describing all different aspects of that whole period, all different people from all different walks of life. People who worked there, people who came there, different populations that were incarcerated in Dachau—different ethnic groups and gay people and different religions and different cultures. Different people who worked there, different things that went on there, people in the community. It was very, very broad-ranging.

They would tell a story, but they would also usually then have one person, like a picture of one person. So if they were talking about Roma who had been incarcerated, they might have a photograph of one person who was Roma and their name and a little of their story. It made it personal. If they were talking about guards, they might have a photo of one guard and their story.

What that did for me was—it just shows there's so many people involved in so many ways. I couldn't walk out of there and think, "Well, just a few really rotten eggs, really evil people did this."

Vast amounts of people, vast amounts of people. And I couldn't walk out of there and think, well, if I'd been living in Germany, I wouldn't have had anything to do with it. I couldn't think that.

I really got the sense of how so many people were incarcerated, and among those who were incarcerated, some would act heroically, some would act cowardly, some would just mind their own business, some would help people, some would snitch on people—all different ways. Same with the guards. Some were awful, some tried to be kind. Same with people in the community. Some knew nothing, some just did what they did and pretended to know nothing. All these different ways.

And I thought, I don't know what I would do if my family was threatened, or if I thought my family was threatened, or if I thought my life was threatened. You really don't know. And I realized it was just normal people, and each little decision we make is a little decision we make. No one could really have imagined where that was going in 1933. I can't even imagine it now—how could no one see where that was going?

So everyone would make whatever little decision they would have to make in the schoolroom, or as teachers, or if someone was taken away. Do you say something about it? Do you pretend it didn't happen? Do you deny it? Do you talk to people? What do you do? If you feel your family is threatened, what do you do?

And I saw how each little decision that's made, we do the best we can. You never know what the results are going to be, and it could end up as something like Dachau. So it was actually one of many wake-up calls for me to recommit in a way, to deepen my faith in awakening, in the Buddha Dharma, in the power of love, of awareness, to really pay attention to what's going on in my mind.

I might say I would never do something like that. But I don't have a clue. If I don't know when my mind is reacting from fear, when I'm acting from fear, if I don't know how to be with aversion without acting from it, if I don't know how to be with a sense of wanting to blame people, wanting to put it all off on somebody else, if I don't know how to be with that without acting on it—then I can't say I'm going to do the good thing, I'm going to be the bodhisattva. I don't know.

We have to really know how our mind and hearts are working, and we only know that by loving attention, by the courage it takes. That's what you are doing here, moment after moment, day after day. Those hard times—I've said it before, we've all said it—that's not the waste of time. That's where we're really learning. Because stuff like that, that's not just Germany. Pick your country, pick anywhere in history in the last two hundred years. It just keeps going back. It seems to be that horrific things keep popping up in human society. And great, beautiful responses keep coming up in human hearts.

So all we can do is really have that commitment, that caring, that trust to keep looking in our own heart and mind. And not be afraid when we see aversion. Great! We see it. Not be afraid if we see hatred or fear or greed. I mean, have you ever, just with greed, seen yourself want to—for something stupid, like a piece of chocolate cake when there's only one left—knock everybody in front of you out of the way to get that piece of chocolate cake? It's horrific! I've seen my mind do it. Social shame is a good thing because it often keeps us from acting on it. I'm not saying it's wholesome, but it keeps us from acting.

So this sense of being willing to look, not just in the big things but in the little things—this is what the Buddha was talking to Rahula about. It's not just about looking good. This is about freeing our heart and mind.

I'll give you another simple little example. A friend of mine emailed me and said, "Oh, this is a good talk example." I said, "Oh yeah, you're right, it's a good talk example." Earlier this retreat we were down in the bookstore. We can go in the bookstore because we're not on retreat. I don't even want to know how many of you have been down in the bookstore. But anyway, we were down there, this friend and I. She helps there sometimes. I was looking for a particular statue that I remembered from last year, a small statue of a White Tara that I wanted to buy.

And as she picked up a different statue to get the one I wanted—it was Manjushri, I think, with a little sword—she just barely touched it, and the sword snapped off. And then I was putting one down, and I mean, I really just touched it like that, and the sword snapped off.

Now what?

And just for a nanosecond, just for a fraction of a nanosecond, it comes into mind: this must happen all the time, and I didn't do it on purpose. Let's just put it back and close the door. No one will know. I could see that in my mind too. We're both like, oh God, now we have to buy this.

And it was so great because just to see that—as soon as we saw it in our mind, right away there's the suffering. Not even the suffering that would come from acting on it, but the suffering of even just having the thought, you know?

So immediately, no, no—we took it out, closed the cabinet, went to Marianne's office, and started writing out a whole explanation. We took care of it. And then Marianne came in. She caught us like two little girls. "What are you guys doing?" And she said, "Oh yeah, that happens all the time. No problem. We just glue it back together and sell it half price." Oh, good. Okay, that ended well.

But just to see that little second in the mind—that is what's so great to see. Don't gloss over it. Be really happy to see it, because that's where the purification happens, that's where the choosing of wholesomeness comes in, and there's a happiness from that. We were just lucky it ended up good, that we didn't have to buy it. It doesn't always end up good. Maybe you have to buy it. That's okay.

So that's the moment-to-moment aspect of motivation, of clear comprehension, full awareness of purpose—why we're doing what we're doing.

There's also, especially as Nyanaponika Thera talks about in his commentarial work The Heart of Buddhist Meditation, motivation in a larger aspect, our broader aspiration in life. It's a little bit like on the very first day of the retreat when you went around and spoke your intention for the retreat. But I would say in an even larger way than that—a sense of your greater aspiration in life, your greater purpose. And it can be very useful to clarify for yourself what that is.

It's said that without that, we tend to just go through life—even if we check our moment-to-moment motivation and it's wholesome—but we can easily just drift from one situation to another. Well, this is okay, or maybe I'll do that, or this seems nice. And we don't really have a broader overarching focus.

The way Nyanaponika describes it, a sense of tuning into your broader purpose, your deepest aspiration, has the function in our life—not just in a moment—of collecting our dispersed energy. It's sort of like making priorities, you could put it that way. And then we can align our moment-to-moment decisions with our broader, deeper aspiration.

Now, this serves in all aspects of life. It doesn't necessarily have to do with Dhamma. It doesn't have to be wholesome. Just to give a pretty obvious example, take professional athletes—which is really far from any realm of personal experience that there could be. But I happen to really enjoy watching professional tennis. And as I've watched it over the years, and read about some of the tennis players, the amount that their whole life, from the time they're young, comes to be directed at playing professional tennis is remarkable. I was reading the biography of Andre Agassi, which is quite interesting—he's an interesting guy. Sometimes it's forced by the parent, but from very young, the decisions of how you live your life, of what you do, are based on what's going to support you to keep on playing professional tennis.

And a lot of these guys didn't even finish high school. Andre didn't finish high school, which led him now to really use all his time and money to raise money for the school that he started in Las Vegas for underprivileged kids, with the commitment that every kid that goes there goes to college. It's really a great thing he's doing.

So he didn't finish high school because he goes to a tennis academy. And just one example, even later in life—he's married, he has two kids, but he's still playing and he wants to play another couple of years, even though his body's getting old. And he says everything he does, he has to evaluate. Going to the beach with the kids: if I sit on the beach for an hour, how will that affect me? It'll affect my energy too much. I'll get too hot in the sun. I won't have the energy to play tomorrow, so I don't go to the beach with the kids. What do you eat? How do you sleep? Do you go out at night? What do you do? Everything is focused on being able to keep on playing tennis. It's a huge commitment, huge renunciation, but because of that focus and then aligning your decisions with it, you're able to do all kinds of things you never would have thought you could do when you're just kind of drifting along in response.

For example, sitting here for a month. When you first started, whenever you first started your practice, could you have imagined sitting here for a month? It was just impossible at that time. So for whatever reason, this has become enough of an aspiration that you have made many choices in your life to support your being able to be here, because it was important enough for you.

You see what I mean? Tuning into what really is your greatest aspiration, your deepest aspiration—I think to do that consciously is extremely important because it really can serve as a guideline, as a beacon, both here and in the choices we make in our daily life.

So I would advise—I was going to say do it now, but I think it takes more time. Take some time if you don't know or you're not sure. Just hold that question, let it settle. Not go write pages and pages about it. It's not so intellectual. It's like, what really bubbles up from the depths? Just set the question. It may not come for a while, or maybe you already know. And it could be something quite deep and profound, and then your judging mind may say, "Oh no, that's not possible for me," or "I'm not good enough for that," or whatever. Don't pay any attention to that, because it'll be a feeling. It won't just be, "Oh, I want to be a nice person." It's some really deep intuitive sense. It's important to let yourself really honor that, because then it can serve, and it does serve.

I know you all in some way have that, or you wouldn't still be here. It can manifest as faith. It can manifest as courage. It can manifest as confidence, or it can just manifest as how you choose what to do.

But I bet many of you, if not all of you, have had at least a couple of moments here where you very seriously thought, "I need to leave, like right now. There's no way that I can stay." And you do stay. I mean, you have so far. I've had that many times on retreat. Sometimes it's just a passing thought, just aversion. But sometimes it really has that hook—like, this is really not the right time, or I'm too hopeless, whatever story you make up.

So I'm assuming it's not that you stay because you don't have a car and it's too much trouble to rebook your flight. That's not deepest aspiration. We're not talking about that. I'm talking about when you really take a breath and you go, on some level, "Okay, this is really hard, but what's really important?" In whatever way you say that to yourself. And you take a breath and you feel the next footstep, or you feel the next moment of aversion, or you go out and be with hearing the birds for a while and your mindfulness gets a bit balanced, but you hang out with it. It's not like you have to put a veneer on it—"I'm so great, I'm living my deepest purpose"—but it informs your moment-to-moment choices.

And sometimes when we've lost sight of it, being able to call it up can help us—in little things and in big things.

So the purpose—and again, I'm making the assumption here that we're coming from really the love of peace, of freedom, of compassion, whatever way it is for you—in that case, the purpose or the result or the aspiration you have is fulfilled by the way we meet each moment. That's back to the mindfulness of the motivation, of how we're meeting each moment. And that's what's really so inspiring, because we affect one another in that way.

I'll give you a couple of examples of how the purpose really becomes the motivation—how the moment-to-moment purity of motivation is actually the acting out of the purpose.

Aung San Suu Kyi, who as you know spent at least twenty years in Burma as the symbol of hope and courage for the people—she said one time that she was really surprised that people think of her as an important person. And this is a quote: "I suppose people think I'm extraordinary because I'm so simple they cannot believe it. I have very ordinary attitudes towards life. If I think there is something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I will do it. The motivation is its own reward."

You never really know where we're going. She didn't go to Burma saying, "Now I will become the icon of democracy and hope for the Burmese people." Just moment after moment of purity of motivation.

Another example: Martin Luther King. Certainly he had an aspiration of integration and nonviolence, but in terms of the whole ethos, the whole way of living and practicing nonviolence, he said nonviolence doesn't just mean you don't hurt a person or kill a person. Nonviolence means you don't let yourself hate a person. It's really from motivation. And at some point after one of the worst bombings, where little girls were killed in that church in Birmingham, he said, "I refuse to become bitter. Hatred must never become our motivation."

Some of the most inspiring acts—and both of those people I find tremendously inspiring to read about, to see old speeches of Dr. King, to see speeches of Aung San Suu Kyi—yes, it's what they've done or what they've achieved, but really what the inspiration is, is that sincerity, that purity of motivation in action after action. It doesn't mean you don't make mistakes. It doesn't mean we don't blow it. And it doesn't mean that things turn out the way we want. But there's that depth of aspiration and then the moment-to-moment willingness to keep looking, to keep aligning. It's a lifetime of work, a lifetime of sati sampajañña—mindfulness and full awareness.

One last example: the Dalai Lama. There was an interview a few years ago where some young Tibetan activists were talking to him—basically the new generation speaking to the old generation. As you know, he stepped down as the head of the Tibetan state, the political wing. But up until recently, he had been both the spiritual head and the head of the Tibetans in exile. And he's always preached nonviolence towards China, nonviolence in all ways.

These young Tibetan activists were saying, "Look, old man, it isn't working. China is just destroying the Tibetan culture in what has been Tibet. It isn't working. There has to be another way. Your nonviolence isn't cutting it."

In this interview, he was—I was reading it, I didn't see it—but they said he was really weeping, saying, "Maybe I've been wrong, maybe it isn't working, but I cannot be otherwise. I cannot abandon the sincerity of motivation."

To me, that is so powerful. And who knows what's right or wrong? Who knows how anything's going to turn out? We don't. We can't.

But you get a sense of how, when we abandon the willingness to align ourselves with non-harming, with wisdom, with mettā, with compassion in the moment—when we say, "Okay, but it's not working, let me jump to the result"—we've lost it all.

The freedom of heart and mind is here now. It's not in some future result.

So when the question comes—how do we continue to stay awake, to wake up in the midst of our own actions, in the midst of a confusing world, just in the midst of our busyness—how do we find the motivation to continue to explore like this? To say, like the Dalai Lama, something isn't working and you have to keep looking at your motivation. How do we find the trust not to abandon?

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who's been my teacher the last few years, talks a lot about just cultivating this appreciation of mindfulness, of awareness. It doesn't have to be focused, but the appreciation of it here, in daily life. How do we continue to wake up? It comes to our motivation. He says when we appreciate awareness enough, we notice what our mind is like when it's aware, what our heart is like when we're aware, and we notice what it's like when it's not. When we start to appreciate, when it's important enough to us that we appreciate awareness enough, that's when it's going to become our priority.

The way I phrase it—this is my language, not his, he would never use this language—is this: I used to practice because I wanted to know the truth. I wanted it. It was a deep yearning, but it was a want and a sense of me needing the truth. It could bring great urgency, could bring a lot of energy, but it also brought frustration, it brought separation, it brought incomplete feeling. But the shift is when we start to love the truth, or love awareness.

When I go home thinking "I need to be aware, because I should be aware, and I wasn't aware in that last hour, and I should have been, and I lost it"—you know all of that. Even when we have a deep yearning for truth, like "I'll be aware because I want to have that better experience, I need to be aware"—tune back, don't judge it, the mirror not the judge, but tune back to what's the quality in the mind and heart. That subtle or not so subtle yearning, wanting, fuels a subtle discontent and then the judging of yourself when it's not happening.

But when we just love awareness, that opens into surrender. Surrender into what's happening in this moment. And awareness is right there. It's not about trying to make something else happen, but that faith, that trust that Aaron spoke about a couple of weeks ago. For me, when I really think of loving awareness—yeah, I see my mind that wants to say, "Oh, let me just hide that statue." And then there's awareness of it, and the love of that. It trumps everything. Because awareness can be with anything.

So the motivation and the willingness to notice the motivation comes to underlie everything. It strengthens and deepens our practice, it supports our aspiration, and keeps us going.

I read years ago in a dharma book—I forget who wrote it now, but it stayed with me. The person said, in every moment of activity, we are committing to something. The question is, to what? And again, that's not with judgment, but that mirror. Every time we're doing something, that's a commitment, that motivation. So get interested. In what?

When we first begin practice, we first begin our spiritual path, we have really beautiful—maybe you do, maybe you don't, hopefully you did—beautiful ideas about how we want to be, and we're really inspired and lit up. We also, of course, have goals and idealizations. But then our moment-to-moment way of being can seem really far from that, can't it? Just in our little things.

For years, I was always kind of berating myself. You shouldn't watch TV. You shouldn't do this. It's not dharmic. Get back over here. With this kind of negativity. But if I just look without judging—in every moment of activity you're committing to something, to what—so just look and see. It gets really interesting. In this moment, I'm committing to dulling out and watching this really stupid TV show because I'm just too tired. Okay. No judging around it. Just look and see.

That was a lot easier than all the years of judging. And the more I do that—oh, look, I'm really committing to this—after two minutes, my mind goes, "I really don't want to do this anymore." And I get up and leave.

I hardly make it through things anymore when I'm on my own, especially. And it's not at all about judgment. I'm just noticing: What am I committing to? The mind starts to get dull, and I notice it's not interesting. I get up and leave. It's no effort. It's not even renunciation. It's actually moving towards the pleasant, moving towards wholesomeness. It becomes much, much easier, not more difficult.

Now, very quickly, because this is important: the second quality is suitability, which is really looking at the larger situation. This is crucial because what it's really pointing to is the fact that we're not separate beings. We can't act in isolation. Or another way of saying it is: nothing ever happens twice. Every situation is different.

The other morning there were questions about energy—how do we affect each other with energy? The notion that this is me and that's you and we're two separate beings with our separate energy—that's just a concept. The fact is that everything that's come together to be as it is, yathā bhūta, things as they have come to be in this moment, in this room, the effect of all the past conditions is just as it is. And anything any of us does affects everything.

Right now I'm talking. If one of you got up and started screaming, it would have an effect, wouldn't it? It would pretty much affect everyone in this room. Different effects, because there would be different qualities going on in the different particular individual mind streams. But we all affect each other.

So when we talk about skillful means in practice, when people come in and ask, "What's skillful means? What's right effort? I want to know. Just give me the list of right effort," we always say, "I can't tell you because it depends." Some days it's like this, some days it's like that. Should I take a walk? When should I do mettā? When should I move away from the unpleasant and practice mettā? You want a list. We get this question all the time. But the answer is always: it depends on what's going on in the mind. It's always different. Nothing ever happens twice.

So some days the mind is really tight and contracted, and you're trying to be aware, but you're just getting more and more frustrated. The more you try to be aware, the more you get lost. You can see there's no mindfulness. You take a walk outside with seeing and hearing, and the mind balances. There's more presence. It's useful.

So the next day you think, "I might get frustrated, so I better take a walk outside." And you take a walk outside thinking, "Oh, look at the deer. Oh, when am I going to feel this calm again?" You come back all jacked up, filled with restlessness, and wonder, "Why didn't that work?" As if it was the same situation. They're two completely different situations.

This is a sense of suitability—looking at what's going on in this mind and body, what's going on in the broader situation. If you're in a relationship or interaction with someone else, you try as best you can to understand what's going on for them, but you'll never really know. Heck, we hardly know what's going on with us, do we? Never mind with the other person. But seeing, really, that we affect and are affected by each other and all the conditions.

Weather, for example. Have you noticed? It's been pretty nice weather, but when it's really rainy, pouring weather, it often affects our minds. And then we think, "Well, it shouldn't."

Why shouldn't it affect us? As if we're separate from the weather? In some essential way, we are the weather. So really starting to see this interconnection—that's clear comprehension of suitability, of interrelatedness.

The point I want to make about this in terms of our practice concerns this whole sense of spiritual friendship, of kalyānamitta—realizing that just as unwholesome qualities can be contagious, so can wholesome ones. Propaganda, for example. When it's really well done, broadcast on radio or television, putting out negative or positive messages about someone... You're all being spared for at least a month from the presidential campaign—nothing but propaganda. But the ad campaigns are rather brilliant in how they try to twist things to get people's minds to think what they want them to think. We're all very influenced by each other.

But just as much as the unwholesome influences affect us, so do the wholesome ones. When I talked about generosity the other night, the point I was trying to make was how goodness and happiness are contagious—it goes both ways. In all aspects of life it's like that. Why does hearing about Aung San Suu Kyi or Dr. King or the Dalai Lama inspire us? I think this came up in the questions the other morning. It inspires us because it opens up those same wholesome qualities in our own mind and heart, in our own mind stream.

This is why the Buddha made a big point about who you spend time with. If you have a choice, choose to be around wise people, wholesome people, because we affect each other. But also recognize that often you're going to be the person who serves as the spiritual friend, the kalyānamitta. You're the one who, simply by your willingness to be present with yourself with integrity, by your willingness to see when you do something unkind or foolish or greedy—"Oh, wow, look at that. That's greed"—brings wholesomeness into being. That brightness of your sincere intention, your generosity, your morality, your love of awareness, your wanting to cultivate compassion even when you're not one hundred percent—that affects people.

It's not about going out and proclaiming, "Now I am the Kuan Yin of the ages, let me show you." It's simply about who we are, moment to moment, in really small ways. And that looks different for each of us.

I'll end with one story. Perhaps some of you have seen a movie that was made, I think it was called Blessings, about some Western women who traveled with Sogyal Rinpoche, the Tibetan lama, back to Tibet to visit nuns in an area called Nangchen. It was about these nuns of Nangchen.

These Tibetan nuns had lived there for many years. Then, perhaps twenty years earlier, after the Cultural Revolution in China, when many nunneries and monasteries were destroyed and nuns and monks were either killed or forced to leave, these nuns—quite a few of them who had been living in caves or in this large nunnery way up in the hills of Tibet—were disbanded and had to disperse.

What they shared was their sincerity, their greater aspiration. Most of them didn't want to stop being nuns. They were deeply committed to the life of a nun and to their spiritual awakening. They couldn't live there anymore, but they didn't all respond in the same way, even though they shared this deep aspiration.

Some of them simply stopped being nuns. Some went back to live with their families but thought of themselves as secret nuns—wearing regular clothes and acting normal, but in their hearts being secret nuns living outwardly ordinary lives. A few of them went far off and hid in caves way up high, living for those twenty years lives of great privation, starvation, and difficulty.

They all responded in different ways. When Sogyal Rinpoche and these women returned a few years ago, the nuns had been allowed to start coming out again. The women who were still alive and hadn't given up their aspiration were coming back together, rebuilding the nunnery stone by stone, dragging the stones with their bare hands up incredible hills, building the nunnery again.

They had each found different ways that were suitable for their particular temperaments, their particular ways of being. There wasn't one right way. But each honored her deep aspiration, and when they had the chance to come back together in that form, they did.

I want to leave you with this sense: our aspiration—we don't know how it's going to show up. The suitability for our own particular circumstance cannot be compared to anyone else's. We really have to honor it with our own wisdom and our own integrity, and trust that. Trust your own love of freedom, of compassion, of awareness—whatever word works for you. And moment by moment, hold to that.

And you don't know what kind of effect you're going to have on others. You may be doing something where you interact with a lot of people, or you may live in a way that is really reclusive.

The movie ended with them climbing way, way up to visit the oldest nun among them. She looked about 120—I don't know how old she really was; maybe she was 40 and had just had a really hard life—but she was truly old. Way up high they climbed, and they said she was the most awakened, the most enlightened of all of them.

She couldn't really walk anymore. She just lay in her little bed in this tiny hut way up there, all day and night. And she said she spent her days and nights spinning her prayer wheel. "All I do," she told them, "is send out my love and prayers for the happiness and well-being and awakening of all beings." That's simply how she spent her days and nights.

It's amazing, isn't it? A mind like that. In some way it touches us when we hear about it—but who knows how it touches us when we don't hear about it?

So there are seven billion different ways to show up, to follow the deepest aspiration, and seven billion different ways it will manifest. But what remains constant is the deep devotion, the deep trust, the moment-to-moment willingness to meet this moment with full awareness. Knowing what we're doing in our mind. Knowing what we're doing in our body. And knowing that we all affect one another—meeting that truth with love, not with fear.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 100

Working with Wise Thought and Intention

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the profound relationship between right view (sammā diṭṭhi) and right intention (sammā saṅkappa) within the Noble Eightfold Path. She emphasizes that liberation isn't about escaping the world or forcing change through personal effort, but rather about recognizing experience accurately through the steadiness of mindful awareness. When we perceive clearly—seeing the impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) nature of experience—wise intention naturally emerges without struggle.
> Wilson explores how the three unwholesome roots of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha) distort our perception, creating elaborate stories and suffering. She offers accessible retreat examples showing how misperception leads to mental construction and emotional turmoil, while clear awareness dissolves these fabrications. Drawing from teachers including Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and Ajahn Chah, she explains how mindfulness itself—non-reactive, non-judgmental, accepting—is free from these distortions and naturally reveals things as they are.
> The talk culminates in describing how the three wise intentions (nekkhamma/renunciation, mettā/loving-kindness, and karuṇā/compassion) are not qualities we must manufacture, but natural expressions of wisdom when the mind recognizes accurately. Through touching stories of Burmese monks discovering the joy of generosity and Tibetan nuns maintaining pure intention through decades of hardship, Wilson demonstrates that wholesome action flows naturally from clear seeing, manifesting uniquely through each person's life circumstances.

I thought I'd talk a little bit about both aspects of thought and how thought manifests as intention. These are huge topics, so I can only really touch on a small part of them.

To talk about wise thought or right intention, I have to go back to the so-called first step of the Eightfold Path. It's actually a circle, though that's still the way the Buddha talked about it—as a place where you kind of enter into it. Jack spoke the first night about wise understanding, wise view, and I want to start from there.

But the first thing I want to say is how much I love the format of the Buddhist teachings as a way of supporting us to understand how our mind works and to come into harmony with reality. Even though it may seem really complicated when you look at all the books and the lists and everything, in some way I find it incredibly elegant and simple. Not easy, but simple.

To my understanding, the liberation of heart-mind that the Buddha is talking about—that we're cultivating this practice to recognize—isn't a liberation from the world. It's not a liberation to get away from life and ourselves. It's a liberation, a freedom, from our misunderstanding of the world, of ourselves, of what's really true.

This misunderstanding stems very basically from misperceiving, from not recognizing what's happening in a moment, from recognizing our experience inaccurately. And then, from the way we recognize experience, we think about it and we construct the world and we act and react and have emotions. Can you relate to that?

One of the translations of the first entry into the Eightfold Path—the Eightfold Mandala, if you want to call it that—I actually really love in this context is "right view," because I find it quite literal. The Buddha is saying that when we recognize accurately, when our view, our perception, our recognition of experience is accurate, when it's aligned with how things are, without any effort the natural result of that is wise thought, wise intention, leading into how we act in the world.

The support for that, the key to recognizing accurately, is of course mindfulness, supported by concentration, supported by energy, supported by effort.

The elegance I love is that the freedom, the liberation of our heart and mind, isn't about getting rid of, changing, digging up, hating, clinging, or figuring it all out. It's not about striving and gaining wisdom and digging out all the defilements. It's about the commitment of mindful awareness moment after moment after moment, and then learning to trust that through that steadiness of clear awareness, the way things are reveals itself.

Because of course—it's already how it is. It's not like we're permanent and if we practice hard enough we become impermanent, and then we're free. We're scared. We don't want to be impermanent. But already, that's how it is. So our not recognizing is what keeps leading us into confusion.

Buddhism isn't about learning and adapting a new set of beliefs. God knows there's plenty of information and plenty of beliefs, plenty to take on. But the question is: does this help me? Does this lead to freedom in the moment of heart and mind? Does this lead to more happiness and peace, or does this lead to more confusion and suffering?

The ultimate knowing is right here in our own hearts and minds. We're not trying to make our experience match some description. We take the descriptions as a tool, as advice, as a reference, and then try it for ourselves. I just love this because it's really so simple.

We're putting in huge effort, it's true, but there's actually much less that we need to do. Because if you think you have to personally, with your little brain, figure it all out, absolutely understand it all, get it all logical, and then put it into practice moment by moment and actualize impermanence, actualize non-self, actualize unreliability—you don't even know what the heck it means, but you've got to actualize it moment to moment—dig up greed, get rid of hatred, cut through delusion, and get going, and every time those things come up it's because you've personally failed... my god, it's exhausting. And it's also impossible.

But what's it like to start to have the trust that if we can just commit our intention to cultivating a steadiness of this loving awareness, of mindful awareness, that things as they have come to be in this moment reveal themselves naturally? We don't have a clue how they are. So quit looking. Settle in with open heart and mind, and the truth reveals itself. Just moment after moment after moment.

It's actually so much more trustworthy.

So in terms of how right view works, accurate perception leads to wise thought or wise intention, and into wise action, and into wise mindfulness. Let me just talk a little bit about thought in general.

I know we talked some in the instructions this morning in the guided meditation. It's one of those where really opening into that space of awareness where things just come and go—thoughts, sensations, moods, sounds, whatever's coming and going. The thought arises like a little star, and then it's gone. No thought matters.

And sometimes people ask, well, if no thought matters at all, how do we do anything? What thought does matter? And if no thought matters at all, how do we get into such a mess? So both: How do we get into such a mess? But also, how do we use thought? Because we do have to make decisions. We do act, as Larry talked about so beautifully last night.

So to start describing a little how thoughts work, first I want to read this great description of thought from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche:

"This mind is always being carried away by one delusion after another. Thoughts of hatred or attachment suddenly arise without warning, triggered off by circumstances, and unless seen clearly, they quickly take root and proliferate, reinforcing the habitual predominance of hatred, of ill will, or attachment in the mind. However, however strong these thoughts may seem, they are just thoughts and will eventually dissolve back into emptiness."

Have you noticed that? Did you notice that this morning?

"Once you recognize the intrinsic nature of the mind, that empty, wakeful, aware nature, these thoughts that seem to disappear and appear all the time can no longer fool you. As clouds form, last a while, and then dissolve back in the empty sky, so deluded thoughts arise, remain a while, and then vanish in the voidness, the emptiness of mind. In reality, nothing at all has happened."

Can you get a sense of that? Or if it makes you crazy, get a sense of that? In reality, nothing at all has happened. So that's from the level of this kind of ultimate level, where it just... So then what happens? That we get so carried away.

And I love how this works. The Buddha taught that it all starts with this element of perception, of recognition. So anything that happens, there's a sound. We hear it. We're aware of sound. Fine. And perception's a natural mental function that almost immediately will know: it's a bird, or that's a motorcycle, or I don't know what it is—and you know you don't know what it is. Just that recognition. It's so simple.

That happens with pretty much everything. It's useful. It's functional. It helps us kind of know where to come and sit when you come in here. It helps you actually find your way in here. It helps you know what we're doing. It helps us communicate. It's very useful.

And often, it's not accurate, the perception. Have you noticed that? What we perceive, the Buddha goes on to say, we think about. What we think about, the tendency is to complicate with views and assumptions and connections and memories. Then we start to have the feelings and the emotions that go with that complication. And then that leads into a solidification of view, of describing our world. The thoughts describe our world, both for useful and not. And then from that, it coheres into a thought that leads to an intention, a movement, an about-to, that leads to action.

So it's useful that the thoughts can describe and define our world. As I said, you hear the bell, you know "bell." You have a sense of the time of day. You're a person here on a retreat in Yucca Valley, and it's 7:20, and it's time to come into the meditation hall and listen to a talk.

That's a huge amount of thoughts describing a whole experience, isn't it? Useful. Nothing wrong with that when we know that's what's happening.

But often—and I'm going to use mostly simple retreat examples here because I deliberately want to give a sense of how what we're doing here, just paying attention to our thoughts and our movements and our sense perceptions over and over and over, really is extremely profound, very powerful in opening our minds and hearts to recognizing reality in a more accurate way.

Very often the perception may not be accurate, but we don't know that. A simple example: I remember another retreat, although similar things have happened here, a three-month retreat where the interview schedules go up, same as here. There was a person I knew who really had this thing about being overlooked for interviews, not getting interviews when she was supposed to—a whole story about being a person who was ignored.

So twice in a row, she would go on her day, look at the interview sheet, looking for her name and not see it, and get really upset. How could they overlook me? Again, even after last time I talked to her about it—really upset. Can you relate? And then, how could they do it? The thoughts and the pain and the sadness and the blame and all of this stuff. Writing notes to us: How could you do it?

And then we have a conversation. We said, "No, your name's up there."

"Don't tell me. I looked. I looked."

And if it's too late, if the paper's gone, you'll never convince the person. But sometimes you know the paper's there. You say, "Come on, let's just have a look."

"Oh my god. How could that be?"

And as soon as she sees her name, all of that story, all of that construction is gone, right? Because it was based on an inaccurate perception. Of course, a new one comes in: "I am so stupid. I am so embarrassed." A whole new story comes in.

Well, this is one of the ways thought is working a lot during the day. Have you noticed that at all? And what the Buddha goes on to say is that when it's inaccurate and we don't recognize it, that's when we get into so much trouble and confusion.

Now, the stories, the descriptions of our reality are, of course, based on our own personal experience. We all have our personal histories. And as Larry was talking about last night, we all have our different cultural histories. A group of people—a great example being your board of directors coming together—there's nothing right or wrong, but people each have a very different set of history that's going to affect their perceptions and the description they make of the world, what they think is the useful thing to do, and how that's going to affect their decisions.

Well, there's seven billion of us doing this. What's more amazing is how often we kind of get on the same page enough.

Knowing that this is what is happening is fine. There's nothing wrong with that. Knowing this—and the Buddha talks about not being attached to views—so we might think, "Well, this is really how I think it should be based on all my experience, and I'm sure of it." But knowing that my perception is colored by my past experience, my views, the things that I like, and knowing someone else's is different—coming to agreement is another thing, but at least having that awareness.

But what the Buddha is talking about on a very subtle, pervasive level—not all the time, but pervasive—is a set of misperceptions that we really don't see through. We don't recognize they're there. And so our unconscious description of ourselves in the world really isn't accurate. This is where we can fall into suffering and confusion.

I like Ajahn Chah, who's so earthy. He picks up a vase—pretend this is a vase—and he says, "You know, you look at this vase and you think it's really beautiful or it's really ugly or it's boring or whatever. It's just a vase. It doesn't care. It's you who are making yourselves crazy about everything."

There's a Zen story.

I have to share another Zen story. I don't know if it's true, but it's a typical kind of Zen master story from Japan. Some wild, aggressive samurai warrior came to this Zen master, just wild and abusive, carrying on and basically ending up saying, "You are a pig! You're a pig!" — which is a huge insult — and threatening him. The Zen master just stood there, the way they do, or supposedly do, very calm, and said, "And you, sir, are a Buddha."

Well, that stopped the samurai for a minute. "I'm a Buddha? How can that be?"

And the Zen master said, "A pig sees a pig. A Buddha sees a Buddha."

Yes.

So the basic misperceptions — and Wes mentioned this the other night, and I'm sure if you've done any practice or any reading of Buddhism at all you're familiar with them, but I feel I must mention them — begin with the impermanent, changing nature of all experience. Not that things are kind of the same for a while and then later they'll go away. Constant flux. Constant flux is the way things are.

One of the labels for a powerful, deep level of insight is the recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment — as they have come to be just now. All the causes and conditions that come together in this moment for each one of us to be sitting here, with these particular sensations and particular thoughts, the way that you feel, the moods, the clothes that you're wearing. What causes and conditions come together for that? Start trying to enumerate them and you can never stop. It includes everything in the world that came together in this moment.

And now this moment's already different, isn't it? Your sensations are subtly different. The words you're hearing are subtly different. Whatever moods are arising, whatever's happening, it's again a little bit different. Things as they have come to be in this moment are like this — and now like this.

But our habit, the misperception of not perceiving just this changing nature, leads to assuming permanence. I was going to say "all the time." See, that's how we talk! "All the time we're assuming permanence." Nothing's all the time. Nothing.

Remember the other morning when someone was talking about accepting and saying, "Well, I don't know how it feels. I accept it, but then later it's grumpy." Because we tend to think, "I've done it. It's over. Finished. Now I understand." Right? Have you had a seeing-through, an insight where it felt like something let go? And then even if we know, even if we know, somewhere back there the mind's going, "Finally. I'm done with that one." And when it comes back: "Oh, I wasn't clinging. It's okay. I know it came back. Yeah, that's fine." Now, after ten years, you say, "This is coming again? I've worked on this in therapy. I've worked on this in Rolfing. I've been through this on so many retreats."

I really love what Wes was saying about our personality. Ajahn Sumedho says it's not our personality that gets enlightened. We're going to keep on seeing this stuff. But it's coming and going, coming and going. Still, we assume permanence.

When you're having a really lovely sitting, and then that little niggling pain in the back starts — the one that was there the first two days, the one you thought was going to make you run out of here screaming, but it went away for a while — and now here it is again. Does your mind just go, "In this moment, the arising of burning"? Maybe, great, for a moment. But doesn't it start to jump ahead? "Oh my God, how much longer in this sitting? There's no way I can be with this pain for the rest of these days." The mind just does that. So noticing it.

The same with the unreliability, the sense that...

Pleasure is so fleeting that if we're putting our sense of happiness, of peace into pleasure—pleasant sensation, pleasant experience, getting—we've talked about this. And again, we know it comes and goes, do we? We know that peace isn't about only getting pleasure, do we? On some level, yes, but it keeps getting more and more subtle. That's my experience—more subtle, the ways I find it.

"Oh no, I'm really equanimous. Comes and goes—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. That's cool. I know. It comes and goes." Right? "I'm just in equanimity..." until something really doesn't work. Okay, I guess the equanimity is gone—which is fine to see.

But that unreliability, that unsatisfactoriness, arises if we try to get something out of changing experience that it simply can't offer, because it's always changing.

And the third reason we can't get satisfaction out of changing experience is because we're not here anyway. There's no "me"—anatta. There's not some solid, unchanging, internal entity called "me." Intellectually, don't even try to think about that right now, because thinking about it can make you crazy. I don't mean really crazy, but a little crazy. Has that ever happened? You start to think, "How can there not be a me?"

Now, the more you think about that, what experience gets stronger? Doubt. Yes, doubt—that's a good one. That gets stronger. For me, what gets stronger is the sense of me. "How can there not be a me? I feel me really clearly. No, there's not me. There's an 'I really want to understand why there's no sense of me.'" And this just gets... anyway, explore it.

I'm going kind of fast here, giving a huge overview, but the habits—the tendencies that we have been exploring here, that we can really see more easily moment to moment—these habits arise in our mind at times, not always. And when they're not seen, they have the function of basically distorting perception.

Again, it's Dingo Khentse: "When sense organs encounter an object"—sort of like this glass or the vase or a sound or a body sensation—"the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in the consciousness." So there's this that initiates seeing, and there's consciousness. "From then on, as your mind reacts to the object influenced by the accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective. When your mind is full of anger, the whole world can seem to be a hell realm." Have you noticed that? "When your mind is peaceful, free from clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure."

And so that's just really an interesting thing to explore simply with awareness, because awareness can see this. And if you don't take it personally, but rather approach it like, "Wow, this is an investigation into how perception and how the mind works"—what's clear recognition and what's not? What's suffering and what's not? Not out of some personal failing, but out of interest—it's just fascinating.

So of course, the main things we can notice are when there's clinging or greed in the mind, when there's ill will, hatred, some form of aversion or fear in the mind, when there's "me, me, me" at the center of it in the mind. Just to give very simple examples. Because these are arising—they're habits. They're arising for all of us much of the time. It's nothing we need to hate or be afraid of or identified with, but really see how it works. As one of my teachers says, we can just see, "That's just greed doing its job. Mindfulness doing its job. Anger doing its job."

So what's greed's job? When greed is there, wanting in the mind, it's just that sense of "this is going to make me happy," leaning towards the pleasant. We've talked about that. But the function, its job, is to kind of blind us, to bring us into a kind of tunnel vision.

My brother used to have this hound dog, a really lovely, very sweet, friendly dog. But it was bred for hunting, so its nose was so sensitive. And it was just enthralled to that nose. It had no freedom from being caught up in scents. I really felt for the dog. So when it would come in the house, if I was visiting, I had to hide anything in my suitcase and zip it—anything that had any kind of human scent on it, or any kind of garbage. Every time they went out, every wastebasket, every garbage, every food had to be locked away because that dog would come in the house and its nose would just pull it to every new scent, to every kind of food, to every kind of human thing. Dirty underwear? It's in the suitcase ripping it out. Serious. You leave it alone, it's in the wastebasket, ripping up every piece of Kleenex and toilet paper. It was like it had no choice. It had no training—forget about it. It had no choice.

I really feel like that's craving. That's craving. And the promise of it is that it's really going to make us happy. And the delusion is we don't see it. We don't see that.

I have a very good friend, a very wise friend, who is a self-admitted craving type, meaning that's where the mind tends to go when left alone. And this person loves cookies. Just a couple of cookies after lunch. Got to have those couple of cookies, but that's all. So one day we were sitting having a discussion about this, basically about samsara—which is like wanting and getting, or not getting, and either way you're not happy anymore, and wanting again and getting or not getting, and either way you're not happy again, and on and on and on. That's one description of the hound dog. That's one description of our lives. That's one description of all the rounds of rebirth, if you want to go that far. It's not really uplifting.

But we don't tend to see the big picture. We just stay in "this cookie's going to make me happy." So I say to my friend, "Yeah, but this is samsara. This is greed." He goes, "What if you don't get the cookie?" He goes, "No, I get the cookie. I eat it. It's over. There's no craving. It's fine." I said, "Well, what if you don't get the cookie?" He says, "I'll always get a cookie." I don't even know what he was saying. On one level, he meant it. And that's it, isn't it? "Can I get this one? I'll get the next one. Let's not look too closely at this thing."

So that's actually greed or wanting's job. It seduces us with its promise. And it keeps us from seeing accurately. I'll get into that again in a minute.

Aversion, dosa, resistance, fear—just the opposite, isn't it? The attention tunes into something that's unpleasant or we don't like, and then it can almost get fixated on that.

We think about what we think about. We form views and opinions, and this leads into moods. And we're really lost in that whole world of ill will, whether it's towards ourselves or towards another. Have you noticed that?

It happens a lot on retreat, just as wanting does—which, thank God, we're in silence. But with roommates, with other people in the room, we know all of this. What's great about having several days in a retreat, where you can't really get out of the situation, is that sometimes it becomes a wonderful way to learn. And I'm not just saying this pie in the sky—someone really said this to me today. I'm not making it up.

Days and days of aversion and self-blame, or thinking the roommates hate you because you're bothering them, or you're hating them because they're bothering you. They're doing it on purpose, or I'm doing it on purpose—you know, all of that. And when you feel like that, when you're really believing the story, don't we? The story's either that they're really bad, horrible people, or the story is that I'm a bad, horrible person, or the story is that it's Spirit Rock's fault for putting us together. There's some story, and we believe it.

And then ill will subtly keeps the attention focused on that unpleasant experience, which then feeds the negativity. We get lost in that. And just like Dingo Kenzie says, the whole world becomes a hell realm.

I notice times when I'm kind of grumpy, walking up somewhere, and he says, "Nice sky." Yeah, look at those ants. Ah, cold. Okay, the sun is setting. Another sunset. Come on. What are you all looking at the sunset for? Give me a break. Last night it was so beautiful, the sunset, and tonight it's just—eh. Or like Wes was saying last night, "I was sick of all those beautiful red sunsets. I'm loving this one that's just kind of gray and cloudy."

But when that ill will goes away—and this is what can happen—suddenly the perception clears. And we see, oh, first of all, the noise the roommate's making is just noise. It's not even unpleasant after a while. All the reactions in the mind fall away because the stories, the thoughts about it, fall away. We stop resisting the unpleasant, and the world becomes primordially pure.

In a sense, if you go into the dining room and instead of thinking, "Oh, these people, they've got to fight," you see that everybody's just doing the best they can, trying to eat their oatmeal, whatever it is they want. They're getting oatmeal all together. I just love everybody sharing this pot of oatmeal. The world becomes much purer. Did the situation change so much? But the space in our mind did.

And the third—the delusion aspect—part of it is just not noticing at all, when we're spaced out. Obviously, we don't know what's going on, so we're not going to recognize accurately. But the other delusion aspect, the one that's really more at the bottom, underneath, subtle but pervasive, is this tendency to perceive experience and the world—not every moment, because nothing is every moment, but frequently—through the lens of me.

You might notice that thought is a really good way to observe this, because it shows up in thought a lot. Just see how many thoughts after a perception before it's about me. Let's see how many: "That sunset's so beautiful. Here I am looking at the view."

It's not bad, but we can just notice it. Yet we don't notice it. And someone said today, "What do you mean when you talk about our self-story?"—as if there's one story. I just want you to check tonight, tomorrow. It's fun.

It's not about a good or a bad thing. It just can be fun, because even this self-story—don't take it personally. Everybody's mind is making up a story. How many different stories? About one per perception.

"Oh, here I am looking at the sunset." Maybe you go further in real thought: "I'm so peaceful." Or maybe then you go, "Oh, I'm so grumpy and I'm not appreciating this sunset. I've been so grumpy all day. In fact, my whole life is one of grumpiness because I'm such a person filled with ill will"—and all your memories and associations pile on. And you walk in here and sit down, and you've forgotten all of that within three minutes. Maybe you're still grumpy and there's a sound and you go, "Oh, that person, how can they do that? It's bothering me." But that's a new story. Or it's just calm. Or there's some wanting—there's a potential of a cookie. Or you're thinking about something else. Or often it's just quite innocuous, like "Here I am looking at the sunset. I wonder what's for lunch. What am I going to wear tomorrow? Oh, this skirt reminds me of this and that."

I've seen times when my mind's bored and I sit in a room wherever I am—I'm always in a lot of different places—and I'll kind of go through all the objects that are mine in the room and see which objects have to do with which people in my life. Like, so-and-so gave me this, and I bought this skirt when I was with so-and-so, and this is from my mother, and I remember when Gavin painted that. Sometimes it kind of warms my heart, because I really get this sense of interconnectedness. But it's also telling myself my Carol story. It's just innocuous, but just notice it.

So notice the sense of me, me, me, and see how it's impermanent. It's changing. There's nothing wrong with it. It's functional. But when we don't notice it, we assume it's steady state. We assume it's the same me. How many different stories have you been through in these six, seven, however many days it's been? Millions, probably. I mean, it's hard to imagine you've just had one story running the whole time. But if we don't look at it, it doesn't feel that way—"Well, I'm the one thinking all these stories, right? What are you talking about? I'm the one thinking all of these." But then there's plenty of times when you're not aware of "I'm the one."

Our tool here—we don't have to figure this all out. I'm bringing it up not so you figure it out, but just to help us drop in a seed of noticing. Because what's so amazing about the tool of mindfulness, of awareness—we've been calling it just kind awareness—is that awareness itself, becoming aware of that wanting mind, that hound dog mind, becoming aware of maha grumpiness, becoming aware of fear, becoming aware of me, me, me—mindfulness itself in that moment isn't grumpy. Mindfulness isn't filled with greed. Mindfulness isn't me, me, me. It's really just pure, like a mirror that reflects what's happening with kindness, with acceptance, without judging. And mindfulness can recognize anything, anything.

So often our habit is to give all our attention to trying to fix things. "Too much me here—I want to get rid of the me." "Too much wanting—I'm going to stop wanting as of now." "I've decided ill will is really suffering. I get that. So I'm giving it up. I'm giving up ill will for Lent." How long does that last?

But mindfulness can simply notice all of it. All of it.

The point I'm trying to hammer home is that through the steadiness of this mindfulness—and I hope you understand that this is what the whole retreat has been cultivating. Has that been coming through? I hope it has. The steadiness of mindfulness, this non-reactive, non-judgmental, non-adding-anything-extra attention, this fullness of attention to moment after moment of experience, physical and mental, is what creates the conditions that allow wisdom, right view, wise understanding to emerge by itself.

Things as they have come to be—the causes and conditions for wisdom arising in a moment in the mind—require the steadiness of mindfulness, the sincerity of intention. It's out of our control. But it absolutely happens. It's just natural. It's just nature. That's how wisdom works with the steadiness of attention.

Moving from thought to wise intention now: with the steadiness of mindfulness, the wisdom that arises in the face of greed, in the face of ill will or fear, or in the face of cruelty, is that these habits—which are called unwise intentions, unwise not because you're bad, but because they bring further confusion and suffering when we're identified with them, when we're caught in them, and then when those intentions lead to action. When greed leads to action, it brings further confusion and suffering.

Now, don't believe me. You have to bring in mindfulness and just look. Watch greed doing its job. Watch the thoughts in the mind. Watch what actions it leads to. And see for yourself, over and over. It's the looking that lets us see how things are. It's not deciding greed is bad and I'm a bad person. We have to really see it.

And what's so cool—this is what I love about the elegance of it—when there's that steadiness of awareness, I'm just watching: wanting, wanting, wanting, wanting, wanting. And it's easier to do this with little things on retreat. You have more space. You're not so scattered. And things do seem a little more important here than they might at home. You know, if the salad runs out, it's a lot bigger of a deal. So you can notice the wanting. Here, the job is just to bring steady, steady, steady mindfulness. And through the steadiness of mindfulness, it starts to break up because we see, oh, it's always changing. It's always changing.

When we see the changing nature, when we recognize over and over the ephemeralness, the fleetingness of pleasant experience—yes, pleasant experience is pleasant. There's lots of pleasure and gratification and happiness. Sure, that's true in life. We're not saying there's not. Appreciate it. Enjoy it. I'm talking about sensual pleasure, and even the deep gratification of wise intention, of compassion, of mettā, of generosity. But just getting that nice salad when you're hungry and eating it and appreciating the taste—nothing wrong with that. We're really present. Then you chew, and it tastes good. And how long does that taste last? If you're really present, pretty soon you're just gumming that food and swallowing it because you want the next bite. It doesn't last long, the flavor, does it? Do you ever notice that you're going for the next fork and you haven't even swallowed yet?

So we're just noticing that. As we start to see, just naturally, that ephemeral nature of pleasant, the changing nature, the clinging of thinking "this is going to do it for me" naturally eases out. Not because we think it should, but because it doesn't make sense. When we recognize things as they are, in that moment—and just in that moment, it's not forever—but in that moment, clinging lets itself go. Because it doesn't make any sense.

So for instance, I'm standing in line, and there's no more salad. You think, well, it's easy for me—I'm a teacher.

I can go get some if I want. That's true. But on retreat, too, I remember my first three-month retreat. I was very young, and we'd all go for the food at lunch. That was a big deal, you know. And there was one guy who would come strolling in twenty minutes late every day. Some stuff would always be out. Some would be there, but some would be gone. And I would think, "God, this guy must be enlightened." That's really what I thought—he must be enlightened. Just come strolling in twenty minutes late, and this is gone, and that's gone.

And sometime later, now I can see there are times I'll be in line and I see that whatever it is—the bread's about to be gone. And there are more people ahead of me than there are pieces of bread. And I can watch the wanting. I'm not saying I should or shouldn't. I'm just watching. I'm not even watching—awareness is watching. And the wanting, it's so unpleasant. It's so painful. And the mind recognizes the bread doesn't matter. The wanting doesn't matter. It doesn't say all that, but it just lets go. And there's peace. There's peace. The bread wouldn't really give you peace anyway, trust me. You eat it, you want more, or you ate too much, or it's gone. You're allergic to gluten and you ate it anyway, whatever. That peace that comes from seeing clearly is priceless. And that's available at any time of any day. We don't make it happen. But the steadiness of mindfulness allows it.

So anyway, the three wise intentions. I've got to at least get to them before the end of the talk. With this clear seeing, naturally, greed transforms through renunciation to this natural releasing of wanting, to generosity. It's a natural manifestation of wisdom. And then we can choose to cultivate, and I'm not dismissing that, but I just want you to really trust: when the mind is recognizing accurately, letting go and generosity are our natural response.

In the face of ill will—aversion to something, ill will toward something—with clarity, with wisdom, with the steadiness of awareness, that naturally transforms to friendliness, to metta. And the same with cruelty, which naturally transforms to compassion. The cruelty doesn't have to be that you really want to go out and hurt somebody. It can just be that when someone's in pain, you subtly want to get out of there. This naturally transforms to compassion—the ability to be present with an open heart and mind, present with suffering, your own or another's, with that sense of connectedness. This is the natural response of the wise mind and heart when recognizing accurately. This is really what's so beautiful, I think, about the way the Buddha figured this all out.

So as Larry spoke so beautifully last night, the intentions with which we act really transform the world. And we can bring our awareness to intentions, absolutely. I'll talk about that in a minute. But I want to keep emphasizing that even though the wanting and the ill will and the sense of me, me, me are so familiar—they seem so normal and natural—it's often where the tendency of our mind and heart may go for refuge. I'm unhappy, I want something. Things are wrong, ill will naturally comes up. It's a habit, but it's not the deepest nature of truth.

The tendency for intentions that lead to thought, speech, and action to come from generosity of heart and mind, to come from friendliness and metta, to come from compassion—this is really the much truer reflection of our nature. And when we talk about thoughts just coming and going and the emptiness of mind, you might think—

How do we function? I'm moving into intention now. When a thought coheres, when it comes together with that little movement—intention is this little movement of heart and mind that leads to speech and action. You can sometimes feel it, that little urge. There's a word in Pali, cetanā. It's talking about a particular mental state on a moment-to-moment level—just a little urge. And that can come together with love, it can come together with mettā, it can come together with wanting, it can come together with generosity.

When the Buddha talked about skillfulness or unskillfulness, wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of action, he often said, "By action, by kamma"—kamma just means action—"I mean intention." The seed of the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness, the very juice of any action of speech, mind, or body, is in the intention. Our tendency is to look at and evaluate by the results, isn't it? Because that's what we see. But that's the thing that's really out of our control. The intention—what's the motivation for doing something—is really where the alignment with the way things are or the misperception and confusion and suffering lies. That's what leads to more peace or what leads to more suffering.

So when Larry spoke last night about doing something with the overarching intention to bring more good into the world—maybe to do something for homeless people, to work with the environment—in our mind, the idea is to really do something good. But somehow we get so caught up in anger, in fear, in self-righteousness, that the actions themselves, the motivation with which we're doing them, is leading into more anger, leading into more greed, leading into more hatred. Even if the result seems to be what we want, in terms of what's really opening us to peace, to liberation from suffering, that's not a wholesome action, because the intention is increasing hatred and greed. The exact same action, from looking outside, as Larry said so well, could really be done from mettā, from compassion, from kindness. A world of difference.

So to bring it back here, because I just want to use the retreat as an experiment: do something simple like walking from here to the dining room. Wait until the lunch bell rings. If you're always first, wait five minutes. If you're always last, go first. Really see what it's like walking to the lunchroom with that wanting, with whatever it is you feel. If you hate going, go right away and hurry and see how that feels. Another time, do the same walk to the lunchroom, but just with a sense of appreciating your body for being able to walk. Just a sense, for that moment, of feeling the earth—not to be mindful, but just to appreciate that we're alive and we can walk. The action's the same. The intention's so different. Just noticing that as we move through the day can really start to have a profound effect.

When the unwise intentions of greed, of ill will, of cruelty naturally transform, that, just as with thought, naturally leads to action. And when we act from wise intention—just as when we explore these unwholesome states, if you're really looking, this is what I know, but you look for yourself, don't believe me—it leads to more suffering. When we act from generosity, from mettā, from compassion, when we're really there in it, it's onward leading. It brings so much happiness that we want to do more.

Just a little story. I was in Burma recently with a few friends, and we went to visit some monks. One of the monks where we were staying told us about two monks who had just started their own little monastery just down the road. They were interesting because these two men had become monks in their middle life, in their thirties. They had this little poor dusty plot of land. They didn't have much of anything. And the monk who was our friend said he had gone and talked to them. They'd become monks, but they didn't really know what to do with themselves. They didn't have a real teacher. One had been a businessman, and the other had been a captain in the armed forces. They weren't kind of what you think of as these spiritual guys, really.

So our friend the monk said they were just sitting around in this really dusty, poor place without much of anything, being monks and not knowing what to do with themselves. And he said he suggested to them, "Why don't you? You're both educated men. You've been to college. And there's lots of poor children in this area."

And in Burma, most children need after-school tuition just to be able to pass, even in grade school. And they have to pay for that. These poor children mostly can't even afford to go to school, never mind pay for the tuition. So our friend said, why don't you offer some free tuition to the children?

So the monks kind of said, okay, okay. And we went to visit them, and they had started doing this. They had over a hundred little children who would come every afternoon when school got out at about four, and come early in the morning. We went over, and it was so wonderful.

These two men—if you'd met them without knowing this story, they would have looked like what I used to think of as a schlock monk. They chewed betel nut, and betel nut, it's not a good look. It rots your teeth. You're dripping red juice all the time. You just look really... I mean, really. And so monks and nuns that chew betel nut, you kind of immediately—and this is a perceptual thing, right? One of my friends, she has such a thing about any monk that chews betel nut. Immediately: bad monk. Her mind just does that. So this was really good for her. Bad monk? These guys are just sitting there with a hundred children, and they were loving it, and the two men were loving it.

We were talking to them because my friend Daria speaks fluent Burmese. The younger one was more vocal. He had been a businessman selling, I think, beer and other things. And he'd had to get his parents' permission even at age thirty-nine to become a monk.

And he was saying, "Oh, now I see. To do something for others, this generosity—it's making me so happy. I feel like I wasted the first thirty-five years of my life." He was like born again, but in a really beautiful way. He said, "I never knew how wonderful it is to be able to do something for others. And so I'm so happy to help these children." The children were happy, sitting there as the monks taught them. And he said, "If there's no more I can do here, I know I'm going to spend the rest of my life finding another place, and I'll go there."

They were living in dust. They didn't have a well. Just a little lean-to shack. They had nothing. And then he came over to visit us later, because we offered money to build a well. He came with very detailed plans of how much it was going to cost. And just going on again about how his whole life felt like it had purpose, how happy being able to offer something made him. And from that, he was appreciating the Dharma more and more. He hadn't really studied Dharma much, but he was appreciating it more and more. That happiness of generosity leads to more generosity, leads to more mindfulness, leads to more wisdom. It's just a natural flow in that way. The same with mettā, the same with compassion.

I had so much more to say, but never mind. I guess all I want to leave you with is this sense of trusting the profound, amazing nature of this simple moment-to-moment awareness—that things are already as they are. You are already... your true nature is free from greed, hatred, confusion. The natural effect of wisdom is to act from generosity, from kindness, from compassion. And there's no one here or anywhere that is somehow so weird or twisted a person that that's not their nature.

When we sit this morning and it's just thoughts coming and going in the space of awareness—that's just an opening into exploring that. That's not just true for some people and not for others. But when the mind is caught in greed or stories about me, we can't notice it, that's all. But we can notice the greed. We can just be aware of the greed and notice that awareness isn't greedy.

And knowing, in terms of wise action, in terms of acting from wholesome intention—there isn't any one way it's supposed to look.

You know, it's not like the results should look a certain way, or be the same for each of us.

So just to end with this one story, from a video I saw of Sogyal Rinpoche going to visit some nuns in Tibet—maybe some of you saw it. I think it's called Blessings. He went with some Western women, and they went to visit what are called the nuns of Mangchen, in an area high in Tibet where a whole series of nunneries had existed for hundreds of years.

During the Cultural Revolution—maybe twenty years ago, thirty years ago—the nunneries were destroyed and the nuns had to leave. They were very committed nuns. And different things happened to them. Some of them were put in prison. But some of them, the way they chose to respond was to run and hide in caves way up in the hills where they were hidden, where the Chinese Communist government couldn't get to them, because it wouldn't allow them to remain nuns. They destroyed the nunneries, ripped them apart.

So some went and hid. Very tough twenty years. Some died of starvation and hardship. Some barely managed to survive. Others were in prison because they wouldn't disrobe. Others had to disrobe and maybe they went back to their families. And they said they felt that they lived as secret nuns. They were just living a normal life, disrobed, acting in normal ways. But in their hearts, in their minds, they considered themselves nuns.

And so just when Sogyal went back, things had kind of loosened, and all the nuns were now allowed to come back and start rebuilding their nunneries. They were all coming back—from being secret nuns, or hiding and starving in the hills, or being released from jail. And so they were just documenting how now they could put on their robes again, come together as a community, as a sangha, and rebuild these nunneries. I mean, they're dragging stones up these giant mountains by hand, rebuilding.

But there was no one way that they should have acted. They had this depth of pure intention, a deep aspiration of what was really important for them, and that was the guideline in their life. How they manifested and brought their actions into alignment with it was different for each one. But there's such a thread that runs through, and you get a sense of what's really important.

And then they ended it—and this was all in the talk—by saying, "Okay, we can take up the cameras and visit the most senior nun, the most enlightened of us, who lives in some little hut way up at the top." And they go up to see her.

And I know she looked about a hundred and twenty, just really—I mean seriously—just lying in a bed, spinning the prayer wheel. And her eyes, as I remember, so bright and so clear. And she said, "You know, all I can do is lie in this bed. Can't walk, can't do anything. So what I do—I'm spinning my prayer wheel, and all day, all night, all I'm doing is generating thoughts of: may all beings everywhere, may they be happy, may they be peaceful, may they be free from suffering."

What a life.

I'm not saying it should be our life. But there are as many different ways to manifest as there are people. And it comes from the intention—right thought, right intention, seeing accurately, right view—and then it will manifest through us as our personalities.

So may we all, may all beings, be well, peaceful, and free from suffering.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 101

Investigating Craving

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to investigate craving (taṇhā) directly through mindfulness, rather than trying to eliminate it through force or avoidance. Drawing on the Buddha's bold declaration that he discovered liberation through non-clinging, she emphasizes that freedom is not a static state to achieve but a moment-to-moment quality of awareness unclouded by greed, hatred, and delusion.
> Wilson introduces the Pāli term yathā bhūta—often translated as 'things as they are' but more accurately rendered as 'things as they have come to be'—highlighting the dynamic, conditioned nature of all experience. She distinguishes taṇhā (thirst, craving) from wholesome qualities like chanda (interest, willingness) and adhiṭṭhāna (determination), clarifying that the problem lies not in the object desired but in the contracted, grasping quality of mind itself. Using everyday examples from retreat life—walking meditation, the pull to look at others, anticipating meals—she shows how craving narrows awareness and obscures the peace already available.
> The talk explores the Buddha's framework of gratification, danger, and escape as tools for investigating attachment to sense pleasures, views, and the sense of self. Wilson emphasizes that the escape from craving is surprisingly simple: turning attention from the object of craving to the awareness itself. Quoting both Ajahn Buddhadāsa and Dipa Ma, she encourages practitioners to get curious about craving rather than fighting it, discovering that awareness itself—when uncolored by craving—reveals freshness, peace, and zest in every moment.

I've come to really love the Buddha's teachings and this practice because I find that what he says and where it can take us is really so profound.

One of the Buddha's more profound and bold statements, at least as far as we can tell from what we can read, is that the sublime truth has been discerned by the Tathagata—how he referred to himself. Namely, liberation of heart-mind, this word citta, through non-clinging. Liberation through non-clinging. "It's been discovered by me." Quite a bold statement.

So what I want to talk about tonight is actually an invitation to use mindfulness awareness to explore what's the problem with clinging anyway. A lot of times we may hear a statement like this—liberation through non-clinging—and where does one's mind go with that? I know some people can think of liberation as meaning we're going somehow to achieve some amazing state of mind or heart, a steady state that you get to hang out in. And I guess non-clinging is there, clinging isn't there, and we're free. But it's not about a state at all. There is nothing static. There is nothing steady state. One way you could think of liberation through non-clinging is just non-clinging as a moment-to-moment activity of mind, of heart. That's all there is anyway.

This whole exploration we're doing of mindfulness wisdom is really using this quality of mind, this quality of awareness uncolored by confusion, to explore and understand how the mind works. How does it work to create suffering? How does it work to allow freedom and wisdom to arise? And what's so far out is both of those trajectories are lawful.

One way that the freedom of heart and mind is described, or when the Buddha describes the path of awakening, is that it begins and ends with right view. Sammā diṭṭhi is the word in Pali. Right view, wise view. "Right" is actually a little bit more accurate translation than "wise." We like "wise" because we don't like right and wrong, being told what to do, black and white. Wise is nice. But as I think I said the first night, I like "right view" because "view" is actually more literal. Right view could be described as seeing or recognizing things as they actually are. Things being all the objects of our experience—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, all the activities of mind—recognizing also with mind things as they actually are.

What allows for, in a moment, the arising of the heart-mind of wisdom, which is a mind without clinging, isn't getting to some esoteric, far-out, blissful state. More likely, that'll give rise to clinging. Rather, it's when in a moment, this moment's experience is recognized really accurately without distortion. Clinging makes no sense. It's not that we have to get out a pickaxe and dig all the moments of clinging out of our mind—forget about it, that's not going to happen. We can understand how clinging works, just like we can understand how to run a recorder. It's lawful. We can get interested in it. We can discover the true nature of how clinging works in a moment, just like anything else. And in exploring that—exploring clinging with wise view, with right view, with mindfulness wisdom—that can be a moment giving rise to insight, just like anything else. Clinging is a perfectly valid object of investigation, of awareness, to wake up from.

So it may sound kind of simplistic, seeing things as they are. Another way of describing that—I mean, there's many, many ways, I'm just being very simple here—is recognizing things as they are, being that it's all lawful process of cause and effect, that everything that's happening is a process. There is no static, self-existing entity anywhere.

One of my favorite Pali expressions the last couple of years is yathā bhūta, which is often translated as "things as they are." And there's a phrase for one of the high levels of insight, yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, which is often translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are," seeing things as they are. But I've been told by good friends who are Pali scholars that a more accurate translation is "things as they have come to be" in this moment. And I love that because "things as they are"—we're back in static and things, right? Things as they are, boom, it's all solid. "Things as they have come to be" gives to me the sense of the infinite causes and conditions that have come together to be as it is in this moment. And now in this moment, new causes have come.

Things as they have come to be in this moment becomes a cause and condition for things as they have come to be in the next moment. There's no way you can pull anything out as a self-existing entity—including, guess who? Each of us.

So the causes and conditions, the process of things as they have come to be in this moment, that we are all here sitting together in this room—infinite, isn't it? Just start thinking about even the causes and conditions that you know about, never mind the ones we don't know about. The ones you know about that allowed just you to get here. And where can you ever stop? You start by getting time off from work, by having enough money, by having your health, by having read something about it somewhere, by having enough interest to come, by having family that supports you and a way to get here. And that this place is even here—how did this place even get here? Well, you heard in detail from Grove the other day. But then that's just you.

But then how did you even get here? You have to go back to all the food you've been eating and the clothes you've been wearing and all the things that happened to you in your life. That time you slipped on the ice but didn't fall through. You survived that illness. Your parents were both alive and made you—and if your parents hadn't been alive, you wouldn't be here. You can't stop anywhere. And that's just you. Then it's all of us—infinite. There's no way we can know all the causes and conditions.

But things as they have come to be in this moment, seeing with right view that it's this process, and it's a lawful process—so it's not that we have to understand or know every single cause and condition, but getting it, that causes and conditions have their lawful effect, and beginning to see accurately is what actually opens the heart and mind from the habits of clinging and aversion and confusion.

The Buddha even asked, what's the problem with clinging? When we don't recognize it, we can't see accurately. We can't recognize things as they are. The Buddha talks about this Dhamma—remember, the Dhamma means laws of nature, the way things are. This Dhamma is visible here and now. That's something monks chant: ehipassiko, come and see, visible here and now. And someone asked him, well, to what extent is this Dhamma visible here and now? And he said, to the extent that greed, hatred—which is a form of aversion—and confusion, delusion, are not present in the citta, not present in the psyche. Remember, moment to moment, not steady state.

Just to the extent that greed, hatred, and confusion are not present in the mind, to use that word simply, in a moment—that is what allows for accurate recognition. A moment of awareness that isn't distorted by looking for something specifically, wanting this to happen, that isn't distorted by saying this shouldn't be happening, get out of here, or by complete confusion, fogginess, or it's all about me. When those things are there, we can't recognize accurately.

But many, many moments—what we've been talking about as mindful awareness, awareness with mindfulness—what we mean by that is just a moment of pure mind, of pure citta, I would call it, when there's not greed, hatred, or confusion coloring it. And there are many moments of that, more than we might realize. We're not looking for that. In fact, mostly we're forgetting to notice what's going on in the mind, the awareness, at all.

This is how one of my teachers describes it. It's experiential—this isn't Abhidhamma language, but it's an experiential way of describing what we're doing here in meditation that I find personally very helpful. She says one way of describing our experience of meditation is this: in any moment of experience—whatever's happening, as I keep saying, all it can be is at the sixth sense, the physical seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body, or any mental experience—whatever's happening, any experience has two aspects, the way she talks about it.

One aspect is the object. She uses this word a lot. The object would be the sight, the sound, the smell, the thought, the mood, the emotion—whatever we're aware of, that's the object. The other aspect of the experience is the mind knowing it. These things arise together. You can't separate them. It's just a way of saying two sides of a coin. They arise together, but they have different natures, so to speak.

Whatever object is arising—the sight, the sound of my voice, seeing, a mood that comes up, a pain in your knee, whatever—the nature of that object, in terms of this way of meditating, is simply to be known. Whatever's arising that can be known, it's an object. And the awareness, the mind, has the function of knowing. It sounds simple, but it's actually quite transformative if you keep paying attention in this way.

They arise together, and when it starts to be that any object can be known, our tendency in life—because this is not just in meditation, in life, you know, whatever's happening can be known—our tendency is to get so involved with the object, whatever it is that's happening, with the experience, if you don't want to use the word object.

And often when we talk about meditation, we go, "Well, what was happening?" We ask you what's happening. That's already saying, "Tell me what experiences are arising." And we get involved in this knee pain or this back pain or this mood or this thought, and we like it, we don't like it. We get so involved in the experience that's happening that we forget often, even when we're being mindful, we forget to notice the knowing part, the aware part, the mind that's knowing. And so we can think we're being really mindful, really focusing on whatever experience is happening, but not noticing the mind that's aware or what's going on in that mind that's aware.

And so when we're aware—like, I hope God doesn't mind, I will use as an example his story from last night. He doesn't know I'm going to use this. His story from last night of when he got really angry at that guy when he was doing walking meditation. And as he said, he thought he was really mindful. He was walking down to that spot. He saw the guy. He's aware of stepping, stepping, stepping. He was aware of his thoughts. But the stepping was the object. The thoughts were the object. Seeing the guy was the object. Aware, aware, aware. Completely not noticing the other half of the equation—the mind that's knowing, and what mental qualities are arising in that mind. Aversion. Aversion.

And when he did—"Oh, this is aversion"—right? In that moment of noticing aversion, aversion itself becomes the next object, the next experience. And then it's fine. Because awareness doesn't care. It really doesn't care what the object of the experience is. When awareness is not tainted, not distorted, in just a moment. Remember, it's all moment to moment. We don't have to hold on to anything.

So a guy's walking, his awareness is filled with aversion, aversion, aversion, which we think we're clear-seeing when there's aversion. And then suddenly the awareness recognized the aversion. And in that moment, in that moment, was no longer colored by the—oh, aversion's like this. I say that I use that a lot. Aversion's like this. And in that moment of pure mind, pure citta, that's fine. That's a moment of clear seeing. That's a moment of yathā-bhūta, recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment.

And aversion is just as great an object of awareness as a state of bliss, as a subtle, subtle sense of breath, as a gross sense of confusion and nothing's clear, or a really, really subtle experience. Because we're always focusing on the object, but the objects aren't what wake up. The objects aren't where wisdom comes. It's from that clarity, that purity of mind, the steadiness of awareness that isn't colored by greed, by aversion, by confusion—that allows the clear seeing. And it's lawful.

I can't tell you how many moments in a row you have to have. It's not that. Seven million trillion moments of pure citta without any greed, and boom, you're enlightened. Sorry, you know, it's not so straightforward. But it's lawful.

So insight is not like, "Well, we put in our time, we put in our effort, and we hope to God that sometime"—well, I can't, there's no God—but somehow some magical moment will occur and we'll be free. It's lawful. It's lawful. And all we have to do is take care of our awareness, not try to figure it all out.

All we have is this moment. This moment is all there is right now. What's happening? And what's the quality of the awareness that's meeting it?

He says this regarding ill will, but it's the same for craving, the same for confusion. When one dwells with a mind oppressed by ill will—or oppressed by craving, you could say—and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will or craving, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both.

I love this teaching because he's saying we don't see clearly, but he's also pointing to what clear seeing actually is. It manifests in seeing the good for oneself and for others. You can see he's not making this into something subtle and esoteric—"I just see this for myself and then I'm separated from the world." It's seeing what's good for ourselves, what's good for others.

So this quality of knowing, whatever the object is—what I want to suggest is that we can take that quality of the knowing, and when it's not colored by greed, by aversion, by confusion, we recognize things accurately. And when we're recognizing accurately, craving doesn't make any sense. What we can also recognize accurately is craving itself.

A retreat, as Guy said last night, is where things are more simple. When it's not quite so complex, it gives us the space and the time, and the mind's a little bit quieter. Yes, it is, believe it or not. It gives us the time and the space to actually explore the nature of craving, to see if it's true or not. Don't just believe what I say. Don't believe what the Buddha says. Take the quality of clear seeing and look for yourself. Is it really true? What's the problem with craving? Is it increasing suffering? Is it keeping me lost in confusion? Start to look and see.

Now, when I first start talking about craving, I want to clarify what that means. Often—and maybe many of you already have a lot of experience, so perhaps you don't have this reaction—but often people find quite some reaction arising in their mind when you talk about craving, about the heart and mind liberation of non-clinging. They start to think of non-clinging, and again, we're focused on the object. Well, what's wrong with wanting to enjoy the beauty of nature? What's wrong with wanting to take care of my family? What's wrong with wanting enlightenment? What's wrong with wanting ice cream—or fill in the blanks for yourself.

The other extreme one can go to—and sometimes it's subtle, we don't realize we're going there—is to think, "Well, I know that when it's pleasant, the habit of mind is to lean into it, to want, to hold on to it. So if wanting is bad..." We've already gone to bad and good, which isn't what he's saying. He's saying it causes suffering, not that it's bad and good. "If it's bad, and if freedom, enlightenment means no clinging, then a good way to not cling is to never get close to anything pleasant. And if I start enjoying something pleasant, then I'm in trouble."

I'm not putting forward either of these as useful or helpful, but it's often what we do. In a beautiful place like this, it's a great spot to explore the subtleties of this. Because we're not saying craving and wanting is suffering, it's bad, therefore we should avoid all beauty, all pleasantness. That's impossible. Every experience that comes has a flavor in the way our mind experiences it—being somewhat pleasant or a little bit unpleasant or kind of neutral. That's not in our control. It arises moment to moment with the mind. It's one of the factors that arises in the mind, this perceiving of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It just keeps going like that.

Like I said, we wouldn't have any suffering if everything was pleasant. Although, I wonder—actually, I think there still would be, because it would still all be impermanent. It would just be cling, cling, cling, cling. But it's pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Awakening, freedom from clinging, doesn't change that. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. If we think we're getting to some enlightened place where it's pleasant, pleasant, pleasant—forget about it. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—and a lot faster than I'm saying it. How many thoughts have you had? How many sensations arise in your body? How many sounds? How many sights?

All of them are pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. We mostly don't notice it. When we don't notice it, that's when the mind leans into the pleasant.

So the point is, it's not about setting up an environment where there's never any pleasant—you can't do it. But it's also not about setting up an environment where every moment of pleasure can be fulfilled. Because although a lot of us in this Western culture have far more access to try and do that than in many other places, it doesn't make us happier. It makes it harder to see through the suffering of craving.

Now I want to talk about what's wrong with wanting to take care of your family, what's wrong with wanting enlightenment. I want to talk about what this word craving means. It's very specific, as with many of the words the Buddha uses. He uses this word craving as a translation of a Pali word, tanha, which is more literally translated as thirst.

In English, we tend to use the word want or the word desire, and it covers quite a wide range, doesn't it? This word tanha, thirst, is talking about not the object that's wanted. Remember, this is just what my teacher was talking about. We go to the object: "What's wrong with wanting enlightenment?" It's got nothing to do with enlightenment. It's got to do with the quality. It's a mental factor, a mental quality of tanha that we experience in the mind, in the heart, in the psyche. And that quality, when it arises in relationship to any object—thirst is a pretty good translation. It's that quality of gotta have it, right? That gotta-have-it can arise in relationship to anything.

Now, there are other words in Pali and there are other experiences that we might say in English as want. Like I said, "I want to take care of my family." "I want to eat." "I want something really good to eat." It changes. There's a word chanda in Pali, which kind of means willingness to do. It can be interest, excitement, energy to do. And there are other ways that "I want to take care of my family" might manifest. It could be a kind of compassion. It could be a sense of "this is something really important in my life, I need to do it." It's a quality that's called adhitthana, determination, which is a wholesome quality.

But tanha is very specific. It's this quality of thirst. Explore for yourself—you can kind of feel it. It's almost like it narrows your vision. It's like the sense of clinging. And very quickly, it moves from tanha to the next link, upadana, which is translated as clinging or grasping. It's like "I want this," and the mind just kind of fastens around it. And then we start making choices based on that.

So here—because it's not about the object—take an example: see how it comes up for you tomorrow, say when it's time for lunch. Now, there can be a sense that you're hungry, the body's hungry. You feel hunger. That doesn't have to be tanha. You feel hunger. There's a sense it's time to go eat. And we would say in English, "I want to go eat." But notice not the food, but the quality in the mind. The mind is aware of what you're doing. "I want to go eat." But you're present. You go eat. That's not tanha.

Now you're sitting here, and you can have the same feelings of hunger—or you don't even have feelings of hunger—but the image of pizza comes up in your mind. You think, "I really want pizza. I'm really hungry. I really need pizza." That's already into grasping, right? Can you feel the difference?

Then notice, maybe you're not going to get pizza, but you smell something at lunch. You're walking up to lunch, thinking, "When's the bell going to ring? I hear them banging around in there. I smell that garlic. It's time." You're walking to lunch. What's the quality in your mind, in your heart as you're walking?

When there's tanha, you can feel it like you're being led by the nose. My brother used to have a hunting hound dog, and to me, that dog epitomized—it's like a metaphor for how craving works in our mind. Really sweet dog, but bred so finely to smell things. It wasn't a bloodhound, but it had that kind of really fine scent. And the poor dog was in thrall to the scent, to the nose. If you let it out in the backyard, his nose was on the ground, and he would just have to run around the sides, into all the bushes, and smell everything—anywhere a possum had been, or a squirrel, or whatever. He just had to. He couldn't just go out and lie down in the sun. He had to smell everything. Every time he came new into the house, any new smell of food or a new person or dirty clothes or dirty tissue—anything with human or animal smells—he had to go smell it. It was painful to watch.

And I thought, this is what craving does. You get that idea of pizza in your mind, and we don't turn around and look at the craving. But can you see the difference?

This is one of my own particular bugaboos. Often I hear people talk about—teachers too—having good desire and unwholesome desire. I think that's very confusing, because they'll say, "Well, good desire—desire for awakening, or to care for your family, or desire to practice—is good. But desire to eat pizza and just get lost in craving is bad." That's pointing to the object. It's got nothing to do with the object. Craving as a quality of heart and mind is what brings us into confusion and gets in the way of seeing clearly. It's got nothing to do with what the object is.

So I could have the thought of freedom from clinging. What I just read—the Buddha said, "I've discovered liberation through non-clinging." I could hear that in a way that's uplifting. Yes, that's inspirational. That's possible. And it brings energy. And then I could say in English, "I want to be free," but it's not that craving.

I could also—and I certainly have, and I bet some of you have too—sit there and go, "When in God's name am I going to be free from clinging? How can I ever be enlightened?" Right? That's craving. That's grasping. It's not about the enlightenment; it's the quality in the mind.

The moment of mind is the seed of freedom. It's the seed of suffering—what's arising in the heart and mind right now. And so taking that attitude of interest, we can really begin to explore how craving acts when it's arising.

The way I was just describing it—watching how you're walking in to lunch when there's craving or when there's not—that's how we bring interest, wisdom, clear seeing, satipaññā, mindfulness-wisdom, into our practice. We don't say, "Oh, I hate this. Craving's bad." We tend to do that. "Oh no, I've seen so much clinging since I got here. It's just hopeless."

It's not personal. It's just a lawful process of nature. It's the habit of minds—not just yours, all of ours—that when there's not much awareness and when something pleasant comes up, and often it's a pleasant thought, the tendency of mind is to go into it, to lean into it, and clinging arises, wanting arises.

But in the next moment, just like Guy with the aversion, awareness can arise. And instead of hating the clinging—that's just jumping from clinging to aversion. As one of my teachers says, aversion is really thwarted craving. You don't get this, so you're aversive. That's not any better, not helpful.

But to bring that moment of mindfulness: "Ah, clinging. It's like this." And to really explore—how does it feel? How does it act? What's the effect in my mind? What's the effect in my choices? Really, just to see moment to moment to moment, and it's that steadiness of awareness that is the condition for wisdom, for insight to arise. That steadiness of awareness on any object.

Just take care of the awareness. You don't need a better object. Craving is a great object, really, to explore. And it gets fascinating when you don't take it personally. Because it's amazing, unbelievable—the power of craving itself in our minds at times. Have you ever seen that? Have you noticed that? And not just in our few little minds, at least we're looking at it, but the power of craving in the world.

So to explore it, the habit—it's so seductive. Have you ever noticed a time when... just to explore it when it comes up here in little things. That's what's so great about a retreat. Walking meditation I find a particularly good time, sometimes, to explore when wanting comes up. So you're walking along. See the difference between when you're present with just what's happening and then when wanting comes up.

Okay, it might be the example of food. One that often comes up is just the desire—someone's starting to walk past and there's this craving to look at the other person. Have you noticed that yet? I don't know if you've been here long enough. But sometimes on a retreat, especially inside when they're more like in the same room, the craving to look at the person walking by can be so strong. It's unbelievable.

And so you say to yourself, "I'm not going to look. I'm just going to be with the craving and see what gives rise to it. What's the effect of it?" And sometimes it's so strong, you can't not look. You can't. The craving is just so strong. We can't be with it. The mindfulness isn't strong enough. The craving is stronger. So we look.

Not that it matters. And then we look and go, "Well, that really did us a world of good, didn't it?" Because what comes from the looking? Some judging, right? They're better, they're worse, or all these ideas about them, or ideas about you, or why, or your ideas because you looked, or whatever. Then you just get lost in thought and you're thinking, "Oh my God." And then you come back and you're restless and bored. "Why should I bother walking anymore anyway? It's almost over." No, it's not. "But it's over now. I'm out of here," right?

Keep paying attention. Even if you can't not look, keep paying attention. It's not as if the craving has won, so give up. Never. Just take care of your awareness.

Again, my teacher Tejani was saying—he's very funny—he said, so you're watching craving, you're watching how your whole world shrinks as soon as craving comes into the mind. You're walking totally at peace and that craving for whatever the heck—craving to think about something, craving to go running, craving to have pizza, craving to stop walking, whatever—everything else is just not very enjoyable. It was beautiful before, but who cares now? You just want to go do this other thing. The whole world has shrunk. Notice that. Keep noticing. That's all.

And then you can't not do it, so you do it. You stop walking, you go in, you have the tea, you wait for the peace that comes—because the seductive message of craving is "just follow me and everything will be so nice." So you go, but you're not noticing what's going on. You're waiting for the peace to come. And there's a subtle moment of peace, but it's not about the tea or looking at the person. You don't even notice the peace because too much other stuff came too quickly. But if you come in and have tea, there might be a moment of peace—but it's not the tea. It's because the craving stopped. Oh, so briefly, but it stopped. And if you keep paying attention, you'll notice that.

That's what's so fascinating—that the peace and ease is not about getting what we want. It's about that moment of no craving. And that moment of no craving is available a whole lot more when we're willing to just stop and look at the craving.

So what my teacher says is that we tend to think, "Oh, I failed," so we stop paying attention when we're acting on it. But if you keep paying attention, he says, okay, so you did the thing, craving got its way. But you were paying attention, so you also got your way—because there was a steadiness of awareness even when acting on the craving, and so wisdom is coming from that. Just take care of your awareness.

So just noticing different ways the craving comes up. Now when I start to see it come up in my experience, I don't go, "Oh no, craving." Well, I might. But mostly it's like, "Great. It's a chance to explore it again." Because believe me, it's going to keep coming.

There's a reason when the Buddha taught his Four Noble Truths and the second truth being the cause of our confusion, our suffering, he picked taṇhā. Out of all experience, what could he pick as the cause of suffering? Taṇhā. So I'm not just picking this for the heck of it as one to look at. It's really very central to our confusion, to our disease, to our sense of unsatisfiedness. And what's so seductive about craving is it's telling us it's the thing that's going to bring us satisfaction, but it's actually the thing that increases dissatisfaction.

There's something the Buddha talks about that Bhikkhu Bodhi describes as three movements in the unfolding process of insight. It's a way to explore anything, but here we want to use craving and grasping—which is to, with our steadiness of awareness, notice the whole process with craving of gratification, danger, and escape. I like those three because, again, the Buddha is so pragmatic. Often people think he's saying, "Well, nothing is worth clinging to." He does say that. And so then, because we don't understand that, we jump to him saying that means everything's bad.

Everything's crap. Nothing's worth clinging to. The world is just dull and gray. And who wants to live like that anyway? And what about passion? And what about beauty? And what about—and then we're gone.

But he's saying there is gratification. Notice it. Be aware of it. See what it is. And when he talks about craving moving into grasping, he speaks of several areas. One, of course, is sense desire, which I spoke about last night. That's an obvious one—sense pleasures, experiencing the gratification.

Again, being here with the beauty. It's great to see. What is the gratification? Explore that for yourself. When you go outside and there are beautiful sights, experience the pleasure of it. When there's a concept of something about nature and you're having a thought about it, or a memory, or some idea, and it's a pleasant thought, there's gratification in that. When you feel a sense of just the appreciation of the beauty and it's not clinging, but a wholesome kind of joy, there's gratification and appreciation in that.

So noticing that, just with the steadiness of awareness—that's not the same as clinging. But mostly, when we're not aware, it moves so quickly into clinging. Mostly we don't notice that, but if you're paying attention, you'll see the difference. Because as soon as the wanting, the clinging comes in, as I said before, the whole thing narrows.

I don't know if you've seen this. Sometimes when I go outside and I'm just not thinking about it, but just being there, not trying to see beauty. Do you ever go out and try to see how beautiful it is? Isn't it different from when you just walk out? It just hits you. Or you're just being there, kind of quiet, and just a smell of the freshness comes through, and it's just so lovely. It's just a moment of pure loveliness. The mind isn't colored with wanting anything. It's just a moment of pure pleasure. That's the gratification.

What's the danger of that? Because there is gratification with sense desire. The danger is, of course, that we come to rely on that gratification. That gratification—not just a sense of pure beauty of the smell and then gone. That's fine. There's no danger in that. That's gone. That's gratification with wisdom. But mostly, the next step is either, "That's so nice. How can I get more?" And the relying on the gratification for our sense of self, really—for a sense of feeling okay with ourselves, or just for a sense of, "I need more pleasure, that's the only way I can bear it in this world." It comes very quickly.

If I go out and look at the beauty, then, "Oh, I want to see more." And if I walk here, maybe I'll see this tree. And if I walk here, maybe I'll smell that smell. And I saw those little goslings yesterday—maybe I can go see them again. And what about the robin? And it's different from just the appreciation. There's that taṇhā, that craving, that pulling. And the beauty isn't gratifying, actually, then. It's like, it's not enough. I need more. I need more.

I need more.

And the danger of gratification is also that none of these experiences last more than a fraction of a second. So if we're relying on the pleasure to be okay—or even on the most subtle level, the gratification feeds the sense of me, "I'm the one being gratified"—not that that's bad, it's just not accurate. Just notice that.

So the danger is the gratification and the seduction of the craving itself. Because even the Buddha, when he described the second noble truth, said it is "just this craving accompanied by delight, which seeks pleasure now here and now there." That's the way he described it. It's so seductive. The craving seems to be accompanied by delight when we're not really looking at it. And so it's saying, "Yes, this gratification is really the best it's ever going to be. This is as good as it gets. So let's have some more. This is delight. This is happiness."

But when you haven't looked—like we were talking about before—when you look at the craving itself and see that when the craving ends, the peace is there, then we know this story of seduction is not true. That's the danger of it. But mostly we forget to turn back and look at the mind, and instead we go, "Yeah, that's right. That'll make me happy." And the more often that gratification can be fulfilled, we forget how brief it is because we lean into the next one.

A little story: a very wise friend of mine who totally knows everything I'm saying—and knows it better than me—we were sitting talking, and this person really likes cookies. They have a routine they like to follow. Every day after lunch, a little bit of milk and two cookies. Good cookies. So we're in one place together, and this person is having their cookies. We got talking about craving, just this subject, and I said, "Okay, so... this is craving."

The person says, "No, it's not suffering, though. What do you mean there's craving?"

I said, "There's craving. You want the cookie, you get the cookie, the cookie's fine, the craving's gone. There's no suffering there."

They said, "Yeah, but what happens when you don't get the cookie?"

The person says, "I'll always get a cookie."

That's the seduction of craving. "I'll always get a cookie."

And if we don't get a cookie, rather than rest in that, it's "Oh no, oh no, now what?" The mind makes up something else to want. It's almost like we're afraid to turn around and look and see that peace is already here.

Huang Po, who was a Chinese Zen teacher, said, "This pure mind shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection." Just in a moment. "This one mind is the Buddha, the awakened one. And there is no distinction between Buddhas and ordinary beings, except that ordinary beings are attached to forms, attached to experience, attached to objects, and thus seek for Buddhahood outside of themselves. By this very seeking, they lose it." By this very seeking.

To me, the most poignant aspect of craving, of grasping, is that the promise it's giving us is happiness and ease and peace. And that happiness, that ease, that peace is already available in this pure mind, this pure moment of wakeful presence, of awareness that's not colored. It doesn't matter what object is coming. We turn around and look. But the craving, the grasping itself is what hides that.

And craving isn't a pleasant experience. So our deep habit of only wanting to go to the pleasant works against turning around and just sitting or walking or standing with the craving itself.

So play with it. I promise you, craving won't kill you. It won't. And pick a little one, okay? Don't pick the biggest one in your life. And sooner or later, you'll just be able to stand there with it or sit there with it and get interested in it and see what thoughts feed it and what it feels like in the body and what sensations arise and what thoughts make it stronger and what thoughts make it weaker. Notice when it's gone how it feels. Notice how it comes back again.

It will go because everything goes. It's never even steady for one moment. As Rilke said, no feeling is final. Craving comes and goes, comes and goes, comes and goes. There's no need to be afraid of it.

Sometimes it'll run us, but often it won't. Awareness is much stronger than craving. And when we start to taste that peace of the craving, we can just really play with it. No, I don't have to act on this necessarily. Just because craving's here, I don't have to act on it. Sometimes we will—okay, just keep on paying attention.

So one other aspect of grasping I want to talk about. The Buddha talks about sense pleasures, and that's an easy one to see. The next one is views. And the third one is the particular view of personality or sense of self.

Views are really fascinating to explore. A view is simply an idea, a thought, or a way of seeing the world that we may not even recognize we have. The grasping is basically what you'd call believing. "Yeah, this is true. This is how it is."

Now, at least you can see how painful it is even when we know it's a view. Take politics. I mean, we're not going to talk about politics, but just take it as an example. Even when we absolutely know—right, we know that we're right and those other guys are completely misguided morons. We know that. We know we're right. We may not even quite be able to get there to say it's a view. But maybe you could see that they believe something completely different. Both of those are views. It's not about right or wrong.

Of course we have opinions. Of course we have views. Of course we're going to vote. It's not that we don't hold these things, but it's this sense of "this is right and you're wrong" that leads to—well, the political situation you have in this country and not only this country right now, where opposing sides can hardly talk to each other. There's not an openness to explore when there's attachment to a view, when there's grasping. Just as with sense pleasure, when we're grasping, our awareness snaps shut. We see what we expect to see. We see what we're looking for.

The view in our mind—it's easy enough to see when it's politics. And you see how much suffering there is in that, right? I imagine you can see that. But in many, many ways, this view is happening.

A view will color how we perceive an object, and then how we perceive it—perception is just how we identify something—will lead to how we think about it. How we think about it will become our description of the world and our actions and reactions in our mind.

I'll give you a very simple example that I like. It's funny when you can see through the attachment to the view right away.

I was sitting in Burma, I think last year, on a retreat at a meditation center. One day I was walking up a little path toward a Bodhi tree—which is the kind of tree that the Buddha sat under when he was enlightened in India in Bodh Gaya. So there's a Bodhi tree, not too old, a young one, in a kind of cement well, and you can walk around it. I was walking up the path toward it, doing walking meditation, seeing and just being aware. And there was a Burmese nun walking around it with her hands held together.

Right away, my perception was—and you don't even think, "Oh, this is my perception," you think this is what's happening—"Oh, she's walking around it with devotion, with an air of faith and devotion to the Bodhi tree." So that was my perception. And immediately the thought that came from it was, "Oh, that's so lovely, that expression of faith." And the next thought that came was, "It's just a damn tree. I mean, what are you walking around holding your hands like that for? It's just a tree. It's not even the one the Buddha sat under."

And this was all in like two seconds.

So I'd gone from faith to judgment and aversion in an instant. And then I got up closer. She was walking around texting on her cell phone.

Quick reset of the perception.

It totally cracked me up. But then I realized that whole worldview, my first perception, was entirely built up on my assumptions about the faith of Burmese nuns. I know a lot of Burmese nuns, so I know something about their devotion, but in this case, that worldview simply wasn't true. Then I went the whole other way with my judgments.

So you get a sense of how this works. This is a time when noticing the thoughts working in the back of the mind—particularly attachment to views—can be really useful. It's something that comes up constantly in meditation, not only here but in life.

When you're starting to feel frustrated about your practice, for example, whatever that means, you might just look. It's a helpful time to notice what thoughts might be working in the background. Thoughts about what good practice should look like, or what's supposed to be happening. "After three days, I should be past this by now. This shouldn't be happening."

Well, yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be—this should be happening. Why? Because it is happening. Because it's happening, it should be happening, and it could not be otherwise. The next moment, how that moment of happening is met, is a new moment.

When we can bring mindfulness and awareness to what's occurring without getting caught in the reaction, without attachment to the view—"I think it should be like this, but it's like this"—okay. When we meet it with that freshness of awareness that isn't colored by attachment to a view, then there's the possibility to see accurately.

Do you see how when there's a view we're attached to and we don't even know it, there's not the space to see clearly? Often that view is a kind of self-judgment. Most self-judgment comes out of some view, and you can look and see how it got planted there. But it's arising in the moment: "I'm not good enough. I can't do it. This is happening and it shouldn't be happening because I'm no good."

This is a time when it's useful to just stop for a minute and ask, "What thought is going on back there?" Sometimes when I do that and I notice, I'll call up the thought, and it will be something like, "My experience should be better than this by now." And I think, "That's inane. I can't be believing that. That's a stupid thought."

But "stupid" has nothing to do with it. Knowing intellectually that it's not true has nothing to do with it. What matters is looking at it clearly and recognizing: "Oh, in this moment, I'm really believing that. I believe it should be clearer than it is." Once you see the view, the attachment can be broken.

So again, it's just another form of craving, another form of clinging. And when that clinging is there, this is the danger: it blinds us to seeing clearly.

What's the escape? This is what's so wonderful, and it's just what I've been saying. The escape isn't sitting down and figuring it all out. The escape is that Tai Chi move—from believing, from being absorbed in the object (the object at this point being the view, or not liking what's happening, or thinking this should be different, or "I love this, I need this")—moving from the object to the awareness itself.

Oh! I think I can't do this. I think I'm no good. I think it should be like this. I think all nuns have beautiful faith—whatever it is.

As soon as we move from involvement with the object—liking, disliking, getting lost in wanting—to looking at the wanting itself, that's the escape. It's not that we have to give up all pleasant objects.

It's not that we have to give up all views. It's not that we even have to give up the sense of self. The sense of self is also another view that arises based on clinging.

I can only touch on this briefly, but just look and see. Any sensation that comes in the body—aren't there times when there's just a little sensation, a little ping, it comes and goes? There's no big whoop. It's not suffering, pleasant, unpleasant. It's just what it is. There's no particular sense of self about that.

Then another sensation comes and there's a click: "Oh my God, this sensation in my knee—it means I can't... it's going to be like this forever." That is, of course, aversion and clinging, wanting it different. But notice how the sense of "me" got really strong. That's what's called personality view.

Any particular sense experience—a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste—often it's thought. The thought that "this shouldn't be happening, it's happening because I can't do it." It's just a thought. But the clinging to it, in that moment of clinging, it becomes "me." And that's the moment of the arising of the sense of self.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa said, the sense of self is simply an experience, a passing experience that arises whenever there's grasping or clinging in the mind. That's all.

The escape? Just turn around and notice the clinging. Notice the sense of self. It's just an experience that comes and goes like anything. The escape isn't to uproot it all. The escape is to take our interest out of rooting around in the experience and instead take care of the awareness. "Oh, wanting it different is like this. Attachment to this memory is like this. 'I can't possibly do this practice, it's hopeless'—thought is like this."

We get more and more interested in taking our stand in the awareness. And that lets us see how craving works, how clinging works. You don't have to figure it all out. You don't have to believe anything I said. You don't have to remember any of it. Just get interested in noticing. When craving arises, what's the object of the craving? What's the experience in the heart and mind? Stay with it. Notice how it behaves. Notice as it passes.

And keep noticing the state of calm, the state of peace, the state of ease—and the state of dis-ease because we don't like calm and peace and we want something a little more intense and we've got to get something going. Watch it. Over and over: the gratification, the danger, and the escape.

Someone today was talking about calm. Calm is the way into peace. Notice how often we don't like it. We think it's uncomfortable, it's unfamiliar. That's okay. Get used to it. Notice craving. Craving stops. It loses its seductive story, and we start to notice more and more how it blasts away the peace. You don't have to stop it. You just have to open to the awareness.

I'll close with a short quotation from Dipa Ma, since Guy mentioned her last night, with her amazing mind. She's little—

She was about four feet tall—an amazing little lady. She said, "There is so much sameness in ordinary life. We're always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. But once greed, hatred, and confusion are gone, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest."

Taste and zest. That's what craving promises, but it can't really deliver. Awareness can.

CHAPTER 102

Awareness in Daily Life: From Retreat to Continuity of Practice

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this practical talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most common challenges meditators face: maintaining awareness practice when returning to daily life. Drawing extensively from the teachings of her Burmese teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she emphasizes that awareness need not be narrow or concentrated—it can be as simple as knowing you're doing the dishes or knowing you're talking. The key insight is recognizing the difference between when awareness is present and when it's not, and discovering for yourself that you prefer how life feels with awareness.

Wilson explores the concept of sampajañña (clear comprehension), particularly the importance of understanding intention (cetanā) as the seed of wholesome or unwholesome action. She references the Buddha's teaching to his son Rāhula about reflecting on actions like a mirror—without judgment—before, during, and after performing them. Through vivid examples including her own radio-listening habits and a story about accidentally breaking statues at Spirit Rock, she illustrates how watching our motivations with genuine interest naturally leads to wisdom.

The talk culminates in a discussion of how compassion develops through the willingness to be present with suffering—our own and others'. Citing His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Wilson explains that awareness of aversion is not itself aversive, and this quality of non-aversive presence is what opens the heart to genuine compassion. She concludes with a moving story of Tibetan nuns who maintained their practice through tremendous hardship, illustrating that there are as many ways to manifest wisdom and compassion as there are people.

One of the ways I find helpful to think about or tune into what we want to call practice—awareness practice—is making the shift from intensive retreat to daily life. For those of you who've done lots of retreats and lots of daily life, hopefully what I have to say is really familiar. For some of you, maybe not so familiar. And even if it's familiar, I know I get caught in it.

Even though we're talking on retreat about how awareness doesn't care what the object is, that we can bring awareness to everything—of course, we get lost. We don't always succeed. But when we leave retreat, and even just like now, today, we forget. Things get busy. And then we will talk, in general, about how to keep practice going. Do I sit every day? What do I do?

But what often happens, consciously or unconsciously, is that some view, some idea has formed in our mind—and it's going to happen to everybody—about what we think practice should be like, or mindfulness should be like, or how mindfulness should look in our daily life. When you leave here, especially if it's your first retreat, you may find that you're actually much more sensitive and quieted down than you have any idea. You might have gotten that sense during speaking practice, where it feels like "whoa" when you come back from a little conversation.

Sometimes people find themselves thinking that if this practice is working, that means somehow we carry with us a sense of calm and it should stay. Or you'll remember what it felt like to be mindful in the times when it was really spacious and the difficult stuff wasn't bothering us. You think that's how it's supposed to be if you're practicing correctly. We forget about all the garbage stuff that happened.

In fact, many people come back to retreat because they remember what it was like at the end. And then they're sitting the first two days and it's really common for them to say, "I forgot about this stuff. I forgot what it was like in the beginning." The hindrances and the pain and the aversion—it's as if that's not part of it.

And so also the emphasis, which we have not been emphasizing, but so much there's an emphasis on concentration as a more focused quality of attention. It's often the case that we leave a retreat, and in our life when we think of mindfulness, we tend to think of it in the calm, focused kind of practice. So if we say, "I need to be mindful while I'm doing the dishes, I need to be mindful while I'm on the computer," it's impossible—because we're trying to be really specific, or really precise, really kind of narrow. And that's one way of mindfulness.

But as we've been saying, awareness can have many flavors. So I want to share a little bit about the way one of my teachers, my Burmese teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya, talks about awareness. Although he's a Burmese Sayadaw, he did most of his practice in his lay life, with a family, running a little market stall that his father owned. When he talks about cultivating awareness no matter what you're doing in your life, he knows what he's talking about because he's done it.

The thing I have to say that I've learned that's helped me so much, just in these last few years, is this sense of bringing real continuity of awareness. I don't mean every second—we don't mean that by continuity. That's a nice idea. But the willingness, the remembering that no matter what's happening, awareness can be here. We just have to remember. He's helped me so much.

First is by tuning into how simple and accessible and spacious awareness can be. You remember, I think Guy reminded you the other night, when I said the first night: Can you feel your hands? And you all said yes. How hard is that? Not too hard, right? That quality of awareness is all we're talking about to start with. That's all we're talking about. No one can really tell themselves, "I can't do it." You can't really get so caught up in "I'm not concentrated enough, too many thoughts are coming."

People will say that to him: "Too many thoughts." He says, "Oh, did you know there were thoughts?" Yeah. "Okay, that's awareness."

But if you know what's happening, that's awareness, that level of awareness. That's where we start.

For example, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, towards the end of his retreats, has periods where people practice talking—not because the retreat's going to end, but as part of the retreat itself. Then in the interview groups, he'll ask people, "How was that for you?" And mostly we get caught in trying to be too focused, because that's what we've learned. People would say—and these are people who've been practicing a long time—"I'd start talking, I'd be aware of listening, but then I'd kind of lose track because I'd be feeling the sensations and I couldn't follow. There's too much going on at once. I can't follow what they're saying and the sensations in my body—it's too much."

And he would say, "Okay, can you just know you're talking?"

"Yeah, I can do that."

"Can you know you're listening?"

"Yeah, I can do that."

Can we remember to do it—that's the trick. But when we think, "Oh, just know you're talking," that level. And recognizing the difference—this is key—for yourself, between when there's awareness and when there's not.

So when you're talking to someone, you're blabbing away—like I'll say when I'm in an interview with someone, I'm blabbing away, or you're blabbing away—and suddenly I just go, "Oh yeah, right, hearing." I don't even say that. There's just this shift. Awareness is here. Then it's gone, then it's here. Notice for yourself the difference. Is it different?

Because the most key, essential thing—and this is obvious, but it can't be emphasized too much—the thing that we have to tune into that's going to support us to continue cultivating a practice, a whole path of awakening, beginning with awareness as our key, is that it has to matter to you. Not as a good idea. Not as a should: "I should be aware, and it's a good thing to do, and then I can cultivate compassion, and maybe I'll be a better person." All of that's true, but when it's a should or a thought, it's the beginning—it doesn't hold. Because we forget. "Well, I try to do it, but I can't, and I don't feel any better, and there's as much greed as ever, so to heck with it. I'll wait till my next retreat." I mean, we've all spent many years doing that. I advise you not to do that. Don't wait.

But if it's not a high bar of awareness, if it's just noticing—you're doing the dishes and suddenly, "Oh yeah, aware of doing the dishes." You don't have to be precise. "I can't feel the precise feeling of the water on my fingers." Never mind. Knowing I'm doing the dishes. Appreciating that sense of awareness.

It's a flavor. It's a feeling. Don't look hard for it. It's not like an object you can look at. As this guy said this morning, it's not an object—but just that sense of awareness. Notice when it's there. Notice when it's not, which you'll only notice because you wake up and remember it's not. Without any judgment or goal.

And as he says, it's really true: when you start to appreciate for yourself that you, in a way, prefer how it is for you when you're aware than when you're not—and you really get clear about that with yourself—that makes all the difference. That's going to be our motivation. Then we go to retreats, we practice every day, we do whatever: we work with sīla, with conscious conduct, with non-harming behavior. We do all the different things we do, and we'll all have different paths.

But the heart of it is first knowing the simplicity of awareness. It's available to any of you, any moment you remember. And then really let yourself feel into: Do I appreciate it? Is it important to me? And pretty much, of course, I have an opinion about what you'll find.

And it takes all of our practice to help us continue to find that. But that, I really think, is the main thing. It's really the main thing.

Once we start to trust, to just touch this simple quality of awareness over and over and over—just as we've been doing here, but it won't be so refined, it'll be more general a lot of the time—something happens. Not from your willpower, but just by the frequency of remembering, the awareness starts to get a bit more momentum, just like on retreat. In daily life too.

So you can be in the middle of a meeting, all this intense stuff going on, and suddenly you just feel the clenching in your gut. Awareness. You don't have to say, "Oh, I'm aware of clenching in my gut—tightness, tightness, tightness." There's no time to do that. But you don't have to. The awareness just starts popping in. And it can be in the middle of being all caught up. It feels like this: confused, I don't know what the heck's going on. Awareness of not knowing what the heck's going on.

And that's what's so beautiful about it. It's not with any kind of judgment or preference that we'll be aware only if good stuff is happening. Many people I've talked to over the years, myself included, who have been trying to cultivate some kind of steady sitting practice in their daily life, find that one of the big things leading to abandoning a daily sitting practice is the sense that what happens in the sitting isn't good enough or clear enough. We find we're sitting for experience. We say, "All these things come to mind to do—why don't I just get up and do them? Because I'm getting nowhere in the sitting."

But the sitting isn't to get somewhere. It's just to remind ourselves what awareness is like. So that maybe when we do get up at the end of the sitting, awareness will be more easily remembered. It starts to remember itself, in a way, when we're not putting these big demands on either how precise and clear the awareness needs to be, or how clear our experience needs to be.

I can't tell you—well, I can tell you, I don't know if I can communicate it—what an amazing relief it's been not to try to be dharmic. Not to try to get rid of greed and be generous. I know I was talking about how wonderful generosity is, and that's true. But that's different from trying to get rid of greed and be generous, trying to stop having aversion and be compassionate. It's a setup. It's a total setup.

I used to spend so much energy thinking I should be the bodhisattva of the ages, and every time aversion came up—once a year aversion would come up—there would be this judgment. And then you don't want to pay attention because we have this ingrained habit of pulling away from the unpleasant. And so then the whole thing goes down the tubes. I'd say, "Well, I'll wait till the next retreat. I can't do it."

It's such a relief to cultivate this quality of interest—not to be better, because the wisdom will come by itself—but interest in how the mind is working right now. What's going on? When I'm filled with greed, rather than going into denial: "Oh, greed is like this." Like I was saying in my talk the other night, maybe I act on it, maybe I don't. Either way, we're fascinated to watch how it functions. What's the effect? How does the mind work?

That's one way of strengthening the awareness. It's making the tendency for awareness to pop in stronger. No matter what's happening, we can be aware. And two, with the steadiness of awareness, even watching greed or aversion play out, we keep being aware.

And this is what I love: the freedom of heart and mind comes from recognizing things as they are. You keep being aware. Pretty soon, it's pretty clear that acting from aversion isn't really making me or anybody else happy. And that's different from a judgment that I shouldn't be aversive. Do you get the difference? The wisdom comes by itself.

So the instruction is always saying, just take care of your awareness. Take care of your awareness, just in this moment. Just take care of your awareness.

That's the first thing I want to offer and encourage you with today, tomorrow, as you leave here. Take care of your awareness. Keep exploring it. Just see how it is for you. Can you connect with it? Is it something real to you? And give it time—time enough that you trust it, that you notice it, that it matters to you. Time enough that you see a difference in your life, in how you feel and how things are, how you function, the choices you make when you're aware and when you're not.

Because that's the only place it starts from. No one can do it for us. No one. The Buddha couldn't do it for anyone. We have to want to cultivate a life like this for ourselves. So that's the first piece.

Going along in the same direction—I might be jumping around a little bit because this is kind of two or three different talks combined into one, so I'm not going to go into the depth I would want with any of it, or else we'll be here quite late. And I know you don't want that.

One of the ways in the texts, especially in the commentaries, that this broader sense of mindfulness is spoken of—a slightly more classical way than Tejaniya talks about it—is when we discuss mindfulness and wisdom together. We've mentioned sati-paññā, awareness with wisdom, not exactly the same, but as I was just describing, with the steadiness of awareness, the wisdom naturally arises. You're like, "Oh, there's a sense of understanding. That's how that works."

In the commentaries, this wisdom is also spoken of as sampajañña. So the two are often put together: sati-sampajañña. Sati means mindfulness or awareness. Sampajañña is often translated as clear comprehension.

The two aspects I particularly want to speak about tonight go together naturally. Clear comprehension, since it comes from classical texts, is presented in a very orderly way. But it's essentially saying that mindfulness isn't just narrow—it includes the broader context in which things are happening and the motivation or purpose for which we do things. Not just a kind of blind moment-to-moment mindfulness, but seeing the appropriateness, the suitability, the whole situation rather than just our own little piece of it. It's a natural broadening of awareness.

And then there's tuning into—and I'll talk mostly about this—the factor in our mind and experience of intention, the motivation that gives rise to speech and action and even thoughts. This is such a key aspect driving our lives. Awareness and mindfulness of intention is a huge area for cultivating wisdom and a tremendous area for the natural shifting of our suffering habits of mind—of confusion, of greed.

Aversion or hatred or fear naturally transforms, in the light of clear seeing, to wisdom. Greed naturally transforms—not immediately, but moment to moment—to renunciation, which is simply a dropping away of clinging and attachment, and then to generosity.

Ill-will naturally transforms in the light of awareness and wisdom to friendliness, to mettā.

And cruelty—we may not think we're cruel, but notice some of the thoughts that come up toward yourself sometimes. Cruelty naturally transforms through awareness, through wisdom, to compassion. This is moment to moment, not forever. It's not like once you see clearly, cruelty never arises in your mind and only compassion remains. We get so black and white, so perfectionistic—forget about it. There's nothing perfect.

But tuning into intention—I want to discuss this because it's such a powerful practice of awakening in our lives.

So this sampajañña, this clear comprehension, involves noticing motivation and seeing it within the bigger context of what's appropriate, what's suitable.

Now, motivation in English has a kind of broad sense. "My motivation to come to retreat was to feel better." "My motivation in having my job is to take care of my family." Kind of broad strokes. And in that broader way, that's one use of motivation or aspiration.

But there's another way—obviously from Buddhist psychology—that's much more specific. At times we can notice a mental factor called cetanā. You won't see this mostly, but I want to describe how it works. It's a little "oomph" in the mind.

It's a mental factor that leads to speech and action. They say even thought, but for our daily life, let's stick with speech and action. The body doesn't move without an intention arising first.

And just as with mindfulness, which comes together with whatever factors are present in the citta, the psyche, at that moment, so too does intention arrive colored by the mind's current state. If you're paying attention to something and there's a huge amount of aversion in your mind that you don't recognize, you kind of see that object through an aversive screen. Someone was just saying this today in an interview. Even as beautiful as it is, they notice when the mind is averse—if they look at something and think, "Oh, another tree, look at that, yeah." And they knew they thought it was beautiful earlier. The perception gets colored. This isn't personal. This is just how it works. It's wonderful to be aware of it, to watch it without judgment, without taking it personally.

So with intention—the intention, the seed that gives rise to action, is fueled or colored by whatever particular mental states and qualities happen to be arising with it. This is so key because in terms of how the Buddha described action, what's wholesome and unwholesome, what's skillful and unskillful, whatever word you want to use, is not about the result. Which is how we pretty much judge everything, isn't it? We do things for a particular result. If the thing we wanted to happen happens, we think, "Oh, that was a good action." But that's the thing outside our control.

The Buddha says the seed of karma—and karma simply means action—the seed of wholesomeness or unwholesomeness in terms of what's helping to purify our hearts and minds, or what's feeding the demon wolf from that story last night versus what's feeding wholesomeness, isn't what happens with the action. It's the quality that is motivating the action. And so learning to explore, to pay attention to motivation, is really huge.

We can hardly tell our own motivation half the time, and it can be complex. We certainly can't tell from watching another person's action what their motivation is, although that doesn't stop us from imputing it.

Take an example—I always use this one because it just comes to mind. Say you want to tell someone you know well that they do something that's really not for their own good and it bothers other people. When you're not around them and you're not triggered, you genuinely want to tell them this out of kindness. You're thinking, "Let me give you some helpful feedback already."

And someone comes up to you and says, "Can I give you some feedback?" How many ways do we hear that? How many ways can it be meant?

The same seeming action could come from metta—a genuine feeling of "I really want to tell you this out of caring," and you're actually feeling that at the time. Or we can be telling ourselves we want to do it out of metta, but really we're annoyed as anything at them when we say, "Let me tell you this for your own good." And of course you can feel it underneath, right?

Or you come in thinking you want to say it, but you're not paying much attention and you're not even noticing the situation the person is in. You arrive all caught up in yourself, ready to give this good feedback, and you don't notice they've just staggered in the house from a horrible day at work. They're completely stressed out, the kids are screaming, they're feeling a little sick—and you say, "Let me, with all the love and kindness in my heart, give you this feedback." And you wonder why they can't hear it.

Same action, completely different intentions. Or you could consciously be wanting to hurt them. All different things.

So you can perhaps get a sense of how the seed of what's wholesome and the seed of what's unwholesome lies in our intentions, in what motivates the action for us. To begin to explore this, just to tune in, is a wonderful practice. As I was talking about with upekkha, we approach this with awareness, not with judgment. We simply want to see what's happening. If we think, "Well, I don't want to see when it's an ugly intention"—and we do that, right? We just shut it down. That doesn't work. We have to be willing to see the whole show with kind awareness. Then we really learn.

And when there's that mindfulness just noticing what's giving rise to an action—try it with little things—it can become a moment of choice. I think I mentioned this at the last retreat. I started to notice a habit of mine: sometimes when I get in the car and I'm driving—where I live in Massachusetts, it's an hour's drive to anywhere, sort of like here.

Not quite as remote as here, but I get in the car, and if my mind just gets a little restless, a little scattered, I reach out to turn on the radio. Just do it. And if I notice that—just notice it, not having the idea that I shouldn't turn on the radio, because that's putting a kind of negativity on it—but more just watching: what am I doing?

So I watch it. I'm really clear. My mind gets restless, a little bit bored. I can feel it. And so the hand goes out and turns on the radio. And then if I notice that, sometimes as I tune in, I go, "Actually, it's much more peaceful without it." And I just turn it off. That's the wisdom coming in. That's not "you shouldn't listen." Because if I say I shouldn't listen and I turn it off, two seconds later the same thing happens again, right? But when I tune in—oh yeah, it's much more peaceful without it.

Or if I go ahead and turn it on, keep watching. I notice I turn it on. Well, there's never anything I want to listen to. So I turn it on, I don't like this, and I start punching the buttons. Well, this—I go ten seconds, ten seconds. Then I put it on the one that jumps from station to station. So it's jumping from station to station, going for ten seconds. Do I want to listen? No, I don't want to listen. I'm driving off the road, meanwhile. By the end of it, I'm getting more and more restless and agitated. And I go, "Why the heck am I doing this?"

If you can just watch this stuff, we learn so much. We learn so much about the habits of the mind. It's a kind of restlessness that leads to wanting some kind of input, just some kind of input. But does the input make me happy? No. It's feeding the restlessness. It's feeding the agitation. So just to keep watching—we learn so much. And then there's that moment of choice where I go, "Ah, turn it off," and there's peace. That doesn't mean the whole thing doesn't start again in five minutes.

But when we're taking our stance in the awareness—like Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, awareness is your home, stay where you belong—when you take the stance in awareness, it's fascinating just to watch that whole process. Many, many years ago, in the first years of my practice, I would always have these ideas, as I said, of being dharmic, how I should be. And listening to crap on the radio wasn't it. So I would be listening to crap on the radio and judging myself the whole time. You're doing it without awareness and adding negativity and aversion to the mix.

Bring in awareness at that point. Because we so much don't really like being with negative states, we don't really want to bring in awareness at that point. "Oh no, this is going to go away." So this is where the structure of our practice and the wisdom of understanding—for example, the Four Noble Truths, or understanding impermanence, understanding unsatisfactoriness—comes in. Because that borrowed wisdom, that heard wisdom, gives us a sense of, "Yeah, okay, this is uncomfortable. Let's get interested in seeing what's going on. What's feeding the confusion here? What's feeding the agitation? Where's the peace?"

I wouldn't really be saying all of that internally, because I'm just kind of gently watching what's happening. But there's that quality of trust in the awareness and wanting to really see peace. Because I really trust the stuff I've read, the stuff I've heard, the stuff I've practiced—the Buddha's way of describing.

I mean, just totally. It does not make sense to doubt it. It's real in my experience, everything we've described. And so when I feel myself getting more and more agitated, I know for an absolute fact from my own experience that somewhere the mind is being strengthened by some kind of greed, or some kind of aversion or fear, or some kind of delusion. Well, delusion always goes with greed or aversion, or stands alone. I know that's there. And my interest is: let's see it. Let's see what's going on. Let's see how the mind is getting seduced. Let's understand how it's working.

Back to Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He has a mind like that. He was just fascinated by what was going on in his mind, no matter what. He said he'd go out with his friends, and they didn't know what he was doing. But he said, "I'm always watching my mind. What's going on in the mind?" He calls it his secret mission. He said, "I'm going with my friends to a bar, whatever they call a bar in Burma, or a kickboxing match or something. And I'm just watching my mind."

He was telling a story, and this is great for watching our intentions. He said he used to love going to boxing matches. And he hadn't gone for a long time, so finally he said, "I'm going to go." And his mind kind of said, "Oh no, you shouldn't." But he said, "No, I'm going to go." And he's watching his mind. So he watched how much trouble it was to take the time off from his work, close down his stall, get on a public bus in Burma—which is hot and crowded—and endure the long journey because he lived in Yangon. By the time you get there, you're totally worn out. Then he goes in and all these people are screaming and yelling at this big sports event. It's really loud and unpleasant. And then the boxers start and these guys are pounding each other. And he's right in the front row. And he goes, "What the hell am I doing here?" That's exactly what he said. And he said that was the last one he went to.

In a way, he enjoyed that whole thing because the enjoyment is the wisdom. The enjoyment is, "Wow, look at how this is working. Look at what we're doing when we're not paying attention." So beginning to get interested in watching our minds, watching as best as we can when we're about to do something.

The Buddha said to his son, Rahula, who became a monk when he was seven years old. And as I said, Rahula became completely enlightened—I think also at seven. So the Buddha did have some kind of... well, it was nice having a Buddha around. Let's put it that way.

But there's a very well-known discourse where he's talking to Rahula about noticing, about really exploring your motivation for any action. And the sutta starts by saying—and this is important—he says to Rahula, "What is a mirror for?" And Rahula says, "A mirror is to reflect, just to reflect." And the Buddha says, "Yes, just so, Rahula. So just like a mirror, you should reflect on your actions—any action before you do it, of body, speech, or mind."

The reason I want to bring that in is that the mirror reflects. It doesn't judge, does it? The mirror doesn't pop up and say, "God, you look like heck today. What are you doing?" The mirror reflects just as it is. That pure awareness is just like that. So you're reflecting not with judgment, not to say you're good or bad. He says you reflect on your action before you're doing it, if you can, to see: is this going to lead to harm or pain for me or others? If so, refrain from it.

If you don't notice before the action and you notice in the middle of the action, reflect. This is how I would put it in my own language: check what's your motivation. Because we don't know the result of the action, but we can tune in and say, "You know, there's a lot of aversion in this. Maybe I could wait and do it when the mind is clearer." In the middle, reflect. Or if you check it and go, "As far as I can tell, this seems to be coming from a clear mind." Maybe it's coming from compassion. Maybe it's coming from just simple recognition that it's time to do this—the obvious thing to do. Maybe it's coming from metta. Maybe it's coming from joy. Maybe it's coming from a sense of duty, but without negativity. And you do it.

If you don't know until after it's over, still tune in, reflect, check what was the motivation. After it's over, you actually have more of a sense of whether it brought some kind of harm to yourself or others. And if that's the case, the Buddha does not say take out the whip, tell yourself how horrible you are—guilt, guilt, guilt. Guilt actually isn't something he ever talks about. He says, in another sutta, if you see that actions you have done in the past have been unwholesome, have led to your own suffering or the suffering of others, when you see that, then you say to yourself, "Okay, now I won't do that anymore." He doesn't say, "Oh my God, I'm so horrible. Sit here and torment yourself." But you feel the remorse. "Oh, that lying, that wasn't helpful. I'm really not going to lie anymore."

So this quality of looking at what's our motivation, just like a mirror, just to see—is really incredibly powerful. And from this is where we start to see for ourselves when we talk about what's wholesome or skillful, what's unwholesome or unskillful. Sure, there are lists. There are lots of lists. There are the five training guidelines we took: not to kill, not to steal, not to lie or use harsh speech, not to harm others or ourselves with our sexual activity, not to take drugs or intoxicants that cloud the mind and cause heedlessness and lead us to do other harmful things. But those aren't meant as external rules that you just blindly follow. They're reference points.

Really, when we see what's skillful and what's unskillful, it's by tuning into our own experience as we do something, after we've done it, how we do it, how it affects others—and seeing what actually leads to the happiness and freedom from suffering of others, to happiness and less suffering for ourselves. So it becomes not borrowed knowledge and not just having to obey some rules, but we know for ourselves. We experience the goodness of non-harming.

And when a mind that's not clouded by confusion experiences that goodness, it prefers it. Even though the habit of going after the pleasant and pulling away from the unpleasant is so strong, when with conscious awareness, with a wise mind, we actually experience the wholesomeness of—I want to say goodness—of non-harming, there's such a sense of higher happiness that even our sense of self prefers it. It just feels lovely.

I'll tell you a little story. A friend of mine told this at the last retreat, but it was just an example of how you prefer it. This is Spirit Rock, which some of you have been to. They have a big store—much bigger than ours—a giant store. They sell all kinds of things. I was teaching there in February, and I wanted to go down and get a little statue, a White Tara statue that I'd seen the year before. Because you go and buy it, it's just self-service, like here. So I went in and was looking all around but couldn't see it. I happened to run into a very dear friend of mine who was just coming through that day, who from time to time has worked with the person who runs the store. She said, "Oh, I know where the statues are kept in these closets outside. And I know where the secret little magnet is kept that opens the closet doors"—because you couldn't open them otherwise.

So she did that, and the two of us were rooting happily through these closets. We finally found the one with tons of statues. We're going through all the statues, finding the little one I wanted at the back, and we get it out. Then she's putting back another little statue—it was a Manjushri statue with a little sword. She barely touched the thing, barely touched it, and the sword snapped.

And she said, "Oh, no." And then I said, "Oh." And then I was holding one. I put it back. And the same thing happened. We're both like, "Oh."

She sent me an email later, because without saying anything, we both were looking at each other, and it just flashed through. She said, for a nanosecond, both our minds went to: just put it back, no one will know. And I'm thinking, I don't want to buy this Manjushri statue. We're both thinking, I don't want to buy this Manjushri statue.

So that went through our minds, but we saw it immediately. And there was no question, right? We could have—no one would have ever known. But no, we can't. So we took them out, locked up the closet. Then we went over to Marianne, who runs this place, to her office, like two little bad girls going to confess. She wasn't there, so we're writing out a whole sheet, you know. And then she came in and goes, "What are you two doing here?"

We really felt like little bad girls. "Here, we're confessing. We have to buy these."

And she goes, "Ah, that happens all the time. We just glue it back together and sell it for half price."

That was great. But the sense of—you know, it's a funny story now, but she reminded me. I wouldn't have even thought about it. But that sense of so appreciating the quality of awareness that would just see that little moment arise. And it's so clear. It's not even a conscious choice. It just feels so off. And the appreciation for honesty is just right there. The wisdom is right there.

The more we pay attention to all the ways our mind is working, the more it moves in that direction. It's not like we're such great people or something. It's nothing personal. But wisdom prefers non-harming. It just feels better. If you just want to stay on the level of me, of personality—it feels better. Sometimes it works out nicely like that too. It doesn't always, but it doesn't matter because that's not the point.

I said before, and that was a little example, of how the steadiness of awareness transforms unwholesome qualities—the torments of mind, the habits of greed, of ill will, of cruelty—naturally transforms our motivation. And this is really true. It's really true.

I just want to talk a little bit about it. Maybe I'll talk about it in terms of compassion. Because for many of us, one aspect of cultivating mindfulness practice is to wake up, to be free. And another aspect—not for everybody, but for many people—is really wanting to act and move in the world through compassion, through a motivation of compassion rather than it's all about me, me, me, right?

This also gets to where the seed, the truest essence of an action, isn't in how it looks or its result, but in the movement in the mind, in the heart that gives rise to it. This is also very true with compassion.

Thich Nhat Hanh likes to give very simple examples where the natural effect of understanding a situation will bring the mind into compassion when we were perhaps annoyed. He gives an example of a brother and sister, or two friends, and say the sister is younger and being really fretful and whiny and bratty, and the brother's getting really annoyed and upset and going down a bad road.

And the mother explains to the brother, who's a little older and can understand, that the little girl is sick and hurting and in a lot of pain, and she can't really help herself. She explains it in a way that the brother can understand. And when he understands that, the sense of blame and aversion, even in a child, can go away.

And there's just this sense of—it doesn't have to be like the bodhisattva of the ages—but this sense of, "Oh, you're hurting. I'm really sorry." I'm sure you've all experienced that. Even to yourself. Just this sense of moving from blame, moving from ill will, moving from "Oh, how could I do that? That was so bad to say." That sense of self-forgiveness: "I couldn't have done any differently at that time." And a sense of compassion comes in, a sense of understanding. I'm giving very simple examples, but that's really how it works.

Compassion is described or defined in the Theravāda as the quivering of the heart—you could say, the quivering of the mind—in connection with, in response to pain, in response to suffering. Another way of describing it, in terms of our mettā practice: when you feel a sense of mettā, not some huge flood, but just that open connectedness with a person, or that open acceptance—"just as you are, may you be happy"—that open presence, that connectedness. When that quality of friendliness connects with the suffering aspect of yourself or another, particularly the suffering aspect, the quality of heart and mind that is elicited in this open, wise space is compassion. It just feels a little bit different. It has a slightly different shading. It's a tenderness, really, of heart that is willing and able to stay gently present with the pain, with the sadness.

It may or may not be able to fix it. If there's the movement to alleviate the suffering, that's wonderful if it's possible—coming from compassion, coming from a being-with the suffering, not from a hating the suffering. That is not compassion. Compassion is the ability to be really present with it. If there's something to do, great, we do it. If there's not, compassion has this open, tender quality of wisdom and non-judging mind that can still be with the person or be with the suffering.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who is always reborn as the manifestation, the embodiment of compassion—I was at that teaching in California where he was talking about how compassion develops. He says it develops from deep insight into what the experience of suffering actually is. And how does that insight develop, you may ask? By being present with our own experience when there's suffering, when there's physical pain, when there's emotional pain of any sort. Bringing this same interested awareness, this careful awareness, allowing the mindfulness to just gently touch—whether it's physical pain or aversion in the mind, or a whole self-judging story, or a memory that in this moment brings up a sense of shame, whatever it is. Or it's rage and despair at what's going on in the world.

Whatever it is, it's an experience arising in your mind and body right now. The thought may be about the past or the future. The thought may be about somewhere on the other side of the world. But it's a thought arising right now. It's a sensation, a feeling arising right now in your mind-body experience. And awareness can touch it. Awareness can meet it. And that quality we bring of simplicity, of kindness, of awareness—that is, in that moment, shifting the habit of mind from resistance and aversion toward the suffering to openness. That's what allows compassion. It's not that we have to think about how to cultivate it. It's just that moment, even if it's just a moment, where you can touch that burning pain and just let it be as it is—just for a moment, and then it bounces off. That was a moment of openness in the mind, of non-aversion. Non-aversion opens into mettā and compassion.

So it's not that we have to jump from being lost in reactivity to being the Dalai Lama. But this is how moment-to-moment awareness is actually cultivating compassion. Awareness of aversion is not aversion. Do you understand what I mean? The aversion is aversive. The awareness of aversion is not aversive. Awareness of suffering, when it's not colored by aversion, is actually how we open to compassion.

And as the Dalai Lama then goes on to say, as our compassion—our ability to just be with ourselves with clear awareness and suffering, even little sufferings—as that strengthens, then it begins to automatically, just moment to moment, turn into a sense of empathy and connectedness with other beings, and then too with all beings.

And I'm sure you must have seen how this works. If you've ever been really sick—I had years ago developed an autoimmune disease, and it's one of these things that everybody and their brother has something you should do for it. Try this, try that. All well-intentioned, though maybe not wisely, but well-intentioned.

But can you feel the difference? When somebody comes and says, "Do this, do this, do this," and you can feel underneath it, there's trying to help, but the motivation is actually fear or aversion or real discomfort with being with you while you're uncomfortable. If we can't be with ourselves when we're uncomfortable, it's really hard to be with someone else when they're uncomfortable. And even if we're trying to do the compassionate action, the internal seed of the action is not compassion—it's discomfort or fear or aversion. So we get interested to see that.

And have you ever been with someone who can just come and be with you? Maybe they've got nothing to offer to fix it, but they're just there with you in the difficulty. You can feel, to me, a real sense of compassion—the sense of being present without needing to blind oneself or look away. Then if something occurs to do, you do it. Sure, there's all that energy to act. If there's not, you can just be there, really open and together. It's a beautiful thing.

There are a lot of nurses here. I'm sure you know more than I exactly what I'm talking about because you're manifesting that all the time. And if you've ever been in the hospital and had a nurse who wasn't manifesting that—it's rough. I've got to tell you, it's rough. So to the nurses and doctors, I bow. I really bow.

Joko Beck, who was a Zen teacher, has a wonderful way of saying it: Can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and the unpleasantness when we're going through something? Even a little confusion and unpleasantness. This is really where awareness brings wisdom, and the wisdom naturally transforms our fear of suffering, our dislike of suffering, into compassion, into connectedness with ourselves and with all beings. It takes trust, it takes practice, it takes real courage sometimes—even to be willing to look and see and to begin to trust that we can act without trying to do so much all the time.

There's so much suffering in the world, I don't have to tell you. And being quite active in all the different realms, the results can be doing a lot of good. They can be. But if the motivation is coming largely from anger—which of course is going to happen, we're not perfect beings, and stuff is so difficult—it starts to eat us up. So this is where we want to pay attention.

I can tell this story because this is the perfect place to tell it—it happened here. The first retreat I taught here, and it was one of the first retreats at Spirit Rock, if not the first. There's a photo on the wall in the dining room of all the people who were at that retreat. I was teaching it with Joseph Goldstein. This place had just opened, and the retreat was billed for burned-out environmentalists. So most of them had no sense of meditation or dharma practice at all. It was before even stress reduction and MBSR got so big. Grove really pulled them in from environmental activism.

Yes, it was a tough bunch. A tough bunch. Really smart lawyers and activists, burned out for sure. High-powered and willing, you know—open but with a sort of "prove it" attitude, though interested. I was a little... what would you say? I was a little like, okay, let's see.

So we taught about a ten-day retreat, and we did mettā every afternoon like this. When we first introduced it, we were talking about it, and one man—I don't remember his name—but people generally were saying, "Are you kidding? Mettā? Soft? Accepting? Open to people? Do you know what it's like in the courtroom against these big corporations? They hate you, and they're attacking you, and they're doing everything they can to get you. You have to have your anger. You have to have your energy to go in and fight back. That's what you need. Don't tell me mettā—it's too mushy."

Okay, but you're here.

Just do it. I mean, they did it. To his credit, this one particular guy was very much involved in some very difficult, angry lawsuit, right in the middle of it. And at the end—I'm not exaggerating—at the end of the retreat, just talking, he was actually crying a little bit. And he said, "I had no idea how that anger wasn't just coming out against the other lawyers. It's eating me up. It's coming out in my family. It's coming out everywhere I go. It's not just at the lawyer—it's everywhere."

I never saw him again, so I don't know what effect it ultimately had. But just stopping to look, to turn around and look—it's a huge thing we're doing.

We're practicing it here, and it may feel like, well, we are really privileged to be able to be here. But we can meet that with gratitude rather than guilt, because it's not so esoteric. It's not that we're just sitting here so that we can look inside our own hearts and minds and feel better about ourselves, really getting into emptiness and compassion and subtlety. Yeah, that's fantastic—I love all that stuff. But how does it affect our speech, our actions in the world?

This awareness, this mindfulness, this understanding of how greed and confusion and hatred bring suffering to ourselves when they guide our actions and we don't know it—when we don't know it and try to blind ourselves to it, these forces run our actions. Just to have this tool of mindfulness and wisdom, the willingness to apply it over and over, the willingness to see how when these defilements are active and stronger than awareness, the suffering they cause us. To see how wisdom comes in and the mind naturally, habitually, moves toward awareness. The actions of compassion, actions of friendliness, actions of non-harming, connectedness with other beings—how we manifest in the world affects everybody we come in contact with.

There's no way we can say this is just an isolated, separate, esoteric little practice. We're learning these tools to go out and do whatever you do, whether you do some kind of environmental activism, whether you stay home and take care of your family, whether you're working in an office, whether you're being a nurse—it doesn't matter. Whatever we're doing, we come in contact with people. And how we act, and the motivations of our heart and mind, are contagious. They communicate. Just like when you're around someone really angry, it's a lot easier to get angry. When you're around someone that's angry and you can tune into the anger building in yourself and say, "Maybe I don't need to do that right now"—that is huge. I really feel like it's a huge gift to the world.

And how we show up—there is no one right way, right? How we manifest.

So I'll just end with a story from a movie, a little hour-long documentary that was made with Tsoknyi Rinpoche, who is a pretty well-known Tibetan teacher in this country now. He was going back to Tibet with some Western women to visit some nuns up in an area called Nangchen. And one of the women was filming and put together this documentary.

These nuns in Tibet had been there for many, many years. And during the Cultural Revolution, twenty or thirty years ago, they were forced—well, the Chinese came in and forced them to leave their nunneries. Some were killed. Some were put into prison camps. And the ones who weren't had to make a choice. All of them had to disrobe. Some of them went way, way up into the mountains, into the caves, and just hid, trying to stay nuns secretly and do their practice. Some of them starved to death. They had really difficult times—we can't even imagine.

Other ones went back to their families, and some of them just gave up and went back to normal life. But a lot of them, though they looked like they were having normal lives, said they were secret nuns. They were wearing their normal clothes. They had to seem to take part with their family. But in their heart, they never abandoned being nuns.

And when Tsoknyi Rinpoche and these women went back just a few years ago, things had eased a bit. The nuns that were still alive were coming back together. The ones who had almost starved but lived had come back down. The ones that had been with their families had come back.

They'd taken robes again, and they were rebuilding their nunnery, high up on a mountain. They were dragging timbers and giant stones by hand, rebuilding this sacred place.

You see, they all had this deep commitment to their awareness, to their awakening, to goodness. How they carried it through this difficult time was unique to each of them. Then when it was time, they came back together, each doing different things.

And this is where I want to end. These Western women were taken up to meet someone special. The nuns said, "This is our oldest, most senior nun. She's the most realized of all of us."

They took her up, and there she was in this tiny, tiny little shack way up high. She looked like she was 150 years old—I don't know how old she really was. She'd certainly been through a lot. She was lying in a kind of wooden bed. She couldn't get up anymore, and she just lay there all the time. Her eyes were so bright—one of these old awakened beings with incredibly bright eyes. And she was just spinning a prayer wheel.

She said, "All I do all day is send out prayers of loving-kindness for all beings. I just lie here for twenty-four hours"—except when sleeping—"just saying, 'May all beings be happy and free from suffering. May all beings be happy and free from suffering.'"

I thought, wow. What a life. What a mind. What a cultivation.

You could say, well, nobody knows. It's just some little lady up there and nobody else knows it. Like I said about that nun in Burma who chants metta—who actually I know who he meant, but I hate to tell you she died. But this other nun's still up there chanting.

So there are as many ways as there are people to manifest wisdom and compassion. Take care of your awareness. It's really the most precious gift we have.

And thank you all for being here, for your commitment, and for your caring for yourselves and the world.

CHAPTER 103

Three Jobs Of The Yogi

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> Drawing from the teachings of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Carol Wilson offers a clarifying framework for meditation practice centered on three essential tasks. The first job is cultivating sammā diṭṭhi (right view)—understanding why we practice and recognizing that freedom from suffering is possible. This includes seeing experience accurately as yathā bhūta, things as they have come to be through causes and conditions, rather than as personal or random.
>
> The second job is simple sati (mindfulness)—bare awareness of what's happening now without trying to fix or improve experience. Wilson explores how the kilesas (mental torments) of greed, aversion, and delusion color our perception and obstruct accurate recognition. Through vivid personal examples, including her own suffering while watching tennis, she illustrates how wanting and aversion distort our relationship to experience and how mindfulness reveals the natural lawfulness of cause and effect.
> The third job is steadiness—the perseverance to maintain moment-to-moment awareness. Wilson emphasizes that wisdom cannot be forced or manufactured; it arises naturally when conditions of sustained, relaxed attention are present. She offers Joseph Goldstein's practical tip of prioritizing mindfulness during daily activities over formal sitting, recognizing that the mundane moments of life are precisely where profound understanding unfolds. The invitation throughout is to trust the simplicity of awareness itself rather than constantly seeking something more interesting or meaningful.

So tonight what I want to talk about is, hopefully, a way of simplifying things, which isn't really the way my mind works. But we give so many different instructions. So I'm borrowing from one of the ways that one of my teachers, Sayadaw Utejania, talks. I find he has a very pithy and, to me, amusing way of putting things. And so what I want to talk about, borrowing from him, is the three jobs of a yogi. That's you, and me, and all of us—the three jobs—which is hopefully to simplify.

So of course, all beginning by recognizing, which hopefully we do, that meditation is the work of the mind. The three jobs are the work of the mind.

The first one, the first job, our job, is to begin not only our meditation but our whole spiritual practice with some form of right view. Now, right view in the way that the Buddha speaks about it in the suttas is a vast topic, encompassing so many different things. And just for this beginning way of our first job, I want to talk about it very simply, not complex—all the ways you have to understand what's wholesome action and what's unwholesome action. You could go on and on, and we probably will over the next few weeks because it's fascinating.

But this beginning aspect, our first job, is simply having some sense of knowing why we're doing this. That there's a possibility for less suffering, if you just want to put it that simply. To have some basic understanding that what we're doing is in a good cause, that there's something behind it. We're not just kind of sitting and walking and following the breath and being aware. You know how sometimes you're just doing it without really any sense of why. So right view is just knowing that it's possible to come to a different way of relating to our life. It's possible to have—not that we know it yet for ourselves—but this sense of a direction or the sense of a potential to live with more peace and ease. That's my language. You find your own.

That's why, for myself, I think I've always loved and why I spend my life sharing the teachings from the Buddha. I mean, there's so many different ways in this world to practice for awakening, to understand our life better. But I've always loved the way the Buddha describes things. His teachings are complex, but at the core, at the heart, I feel —this is me now—he's just taking us into the core of life, the core of experience.

What he says is that he started his own journey by just seeing how this life is. Why do we suffer? This life with all its beauty and all its marvels and so much sorrow. Why is there this suffering? Why do beings, starting with himself, suffer? Why are we unhappy? Why are we discontented? And then his whole trajectory of practice was not sitting and railing against it or trying to think about it, but setting out in an exploration of his own experience, his own mind and body, to really look into, to really explore and see. Does it have to be this way, that there's so much discontent, dis-ease, suffering? Is there another way? Is there a cause? Is there an end of it? What is it?

So you can hear the whole Buddha's teaching in that. And I'm staying simple tonight with that sense of not just going out and following the stream or going by what was taught before, but looking for himself.

And so what he offers—all the Buddha's teachings—are a path: what he discovered, what he shared, what he can offer us. But in the end, as I think someone has already said on this retreat, one of the core ways he teaches is the word in Pali, ehipassiko, which is lovely. It means "come and see for yourself." You too, come and see. He's saying, "I can see this. I know for myself that it's possible to awaken from this dream of confusion and delusion. This is how I did it. This is what I understand. Come and see for yourself." It's an invitation to explore, an invitation to really make good use of this precious life. And as he said in many different places, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so."

So that's what I've always loved, what I continue to love—this invitation. Because it's necessary that we look and see for ourselves at this very salient point of life.

And the most essential thing, again, that I really love is that when, as far as we can tell from reading, when the Buddha awakened and claimed his full awakening, he did not awaken into a different world. He awoke into the same body, the same physical conditions. People didn't start suddenly behaving better. There were still wars, there were still famines, there was still stupidity, there was still all the stuff that we experience.

And this was like a "duh" moment for me, somewhere way, way into my practice, where I thought, "Oh, the Buddha's life after he awakened still had all this stuff happening." It wasn't like floating on a cloud somewhere of everything lovely.

So what was different?

And of course, as we hopefully have some trust and faith in—or you wouldn't still be sitting here, I'm pretty sure—is the sense that the seed, the core of suffering, and the seed, the core of freedom from suffering, of peace, of ease, arises in the mind and the heart in any particular moment. And so this freedom that he is inviting us to come and explore is not in having the world change, but in our understanding of what's happening changes, so that the way our heart and mind relates to experience is completely different. And this is really the freedom he talks about.

So the first aspect of right view I want to say as our job is this: just having some sense—of course not complete, but some sense—of why we're doing it. And this gives us some energy, some motivation to get us on the path, to keep us on the path.

Let me read you this little story I just read that I enjoyed. It sort of fits in. Lama Surya Das spent a lot of time with Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, the great Tibetan Dzogchen master—Joseph mentioned him the other night. So Surya Das tells this story of being in France. Khenpo was in France, and he was an older man at this time, having lived all his life in Tibet and India. He was traveling in France, and at some point he ended up at a beach along the French coast. He'd never been at a beach—they don't have beaches in Tibet—or seen how Westerners behave on a beach.

So he came back and he was describing his trip. But then all of a sudden he started talking about the beach, how they'd gone to the edge of the ocean. At first he said, "Wow, it's so big!" Can you imagine never having seen the ocean? It's huge. And then he described what he had seen. He said, "There were these people there, and instead of sitting and meditating or doing yoga, these people were just lying there, almost naked, doing nothing. And when they were tired of lying there, instead of doing something, they just turned over. Then they lay there again for another few hours."

Khenpo was truly, genuinely perplexed. It was sort of like Third Rock from the Sun, that TV show about aliens coming to Earth. He said, "Why were they doing that?" He asked over and over. He couldn't understand it. He had so much compassion for them. How could they waste their precious human existence? This life that is so short, so tenuous, so precious, so valuable, so necessary. A life to be used impeccably and usefully for our own welfare and the benefit of all—not just to lounge around all day in the hot sun like a big sleeping lizard.

He was impassioned now. "I just wanted to go wake them up." And he had noticed a big white chair, probably the lifeguard's chair. He said, "But there were two young people sitting there, so I couldn't go up. But I wanted to badly, because I wanted to climb up there and announce to everybody that it was time to wake up."

So in our own way, that's a sense of right view—something. It's time to wake up. And the Buddha's having followed a path and saying, "Yes, it's possible" is really helpful to keep going.

The second aspect of right view—and I just want to talk a little about it because this is again vast—is another reason I love "right view" actually as a translation of sammā diṭṭhi, as a literal translation of viewing rightly, or recognizing accurately, accurate perception. What actually serves as the mode, the catalyst, of insight—of freeing insight, the insight that even just for a moment releases the habit of the mind and heart of clinging or confusion or aversion, just in a moment—it's not like some willpower: "Now I will stop this." It's a sudden shift of perception where we recognize things as they are accurately. And when we recognize accurately, the response is appropriate.

And this, again, is a vast topic. But recognizing accurately—seeing that one way you can say that everything is natural. I think Guy, or someone, said this the other night: that basically everything's a process.

Causes and conditions lead to a lawful effect. We're not going to see all of the causes and conditions and all of the effects, but there's a lawfulness. It isn't random. For example, if you plant a mango seed, we know we're not going to get an apple tree. It's not a random thing. Or the so-called law of gravity—that's what I mean. It's not like if we wish hard enough, if I throw this up, it won't fall back down again. We'd say, well, that's stupid, right?

Well, the way things work—cause and effect in our mind and body—is just the same. But until we see this, we kind of just keep wishing it would be different. "I just wish that I didn't have these unpleasant habits of mind. I wish I wasn't sixty-one years old." That will change, but not in the direction I wish. And that will also be natural cause and effect. But it's not personal.

So just in a nutshell, when we recognize accurately that everything is causes and conditions, there's a word for it: yathā bhūta—recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment. It's a phrase often used in the suttas, sometimes translated as "things as they are," but more accurate is "things as they have come to be." You get a sense of how that's process-oriented.

So in this moment, however it is for you sitting there, is how things have come to be in this moment—as this momentary result of infinite past causes and conditions that you actually couldn't separate. If you start trying to list all the causes and conditions for your being sitting here right now, well, it goes back to your birth and your parents and the universe and the food and the farmers and the weather. You can't separate anything out. Just in this moment, things are as they have come to be. Yathā bhūta. This moment couldn't be different. How could it? It is as it is. Next moment will be different—the causes and conditions change again.

Right view on this aspect of recognizing things as they are, as they have come to be in this moment—it's a huge shift. It's the seed of insight. It's not so much about having some amazing experience and living in some other realm of reality. It's like waking up to what's actually going on now.

I'm simplifying, okay? Just know I'm simplifying. But the reason the seeds of suffering and confusion—of clinging, of grasping, of resistance, of delusion—keep arising in our mind is that we don't recognize what's happening in the moment just as it is. And then our response isn't really aligned with reality.

I'll give some examples as I go along, but as you know, take clinging. Clinging to something that's already changed. Why does it not work? When we see it, it's so obvious that we don't have to groan and grunt and give up clinging to that thing. The clinging doesn't arise anymore because it so obviously doesn't make sense. We say, do you cling to the sunset as the sun's going down? "Oh please, sun, don't go down." Maybe if something really bad is going to happen when the sun goes down. But you know what I mean? We don't. It doesn't make sense.

So in this way, the sense of ease, of freedom of heart and mind, is truly natural and normal. It's not like some amazing thing we have to create through willpower. It's the natural effect of the cause of right view, of accurate recognition.

And so this shift that hopefully our formal practice helps us with is this shift from putting so much of our attention, so much of our looking to experience and objects for meaning and fulfillment, for the source of suffering and for the ending of suffering—change the object, change the experience. Our shift here, our second job, is that of simple awareness of what's happening now. And I'll talk more about that. So the second job is sati.

awareness, mindfulness, interest in how this mind is working in the moment, rather than how can I manipulate and fix what's going on so everything's a little bit better. But that's our habit.

So another aspect of this, another way of describing this right view, what helps interest in the process arise, is just starting to see, just for a moment, how maybe our strategies haven't quite been working. We know it on one level, or you wouldn't be here. Because this is, as someone said, no one's idea of a vacation—maybe some people's, but not most people's idea of a vacation. So you're here for some reason.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. He talks about three attitudes of practice, the first one being renunciation, but he means it in a different way. Renunciation, kind of the root of all the subsequent stages of the path—he's using it to imply the strong wish, the strong motivation to free oneself, not only from life's immediate sorrows, but from the seemingly unending sufferings of samsara. Samsara being that seemingly unending cycle of conditioned existence. There's this cycle of wanting and needing and getting and wanting and needing and becoming.

When we start to just see that, with that comes a heartfelt weariness, a heartfelt disillusionment, disenchantment with our endless quest for gratification, for approval, for profit, for status. It's not like we're saying, "Oh, these things are bad, and I'm bad for wanting them." It's not going from one extreme to the other, but seeing through the process itself.

And this doesn't have to be some incredibly esoteric experience. I'll give you an example that was another "duh" experience for me recently. It's a little embarrassing, but I think it's a good example. Samsara, just this endless wanting—get it a little bit better, a little bit better. There's some Tibetan teacher, I think it's Trungpa, I'm not sure who, defining samsara as "the urge to correct." I could really relate to that.

So anyway, it doesn't have to be esoteric. I noticed this: I happen to be, I don't know why, a tennis fan, a real fan of professional tennis. I don't know why because I'm so non-sports oriented, but I really love following professional tennis. I just enjoy watching the people play, I follow the tournaments, and of course, if you do that, you end up having particular players that you root for. Mine's Federer—someone who wins a lot, me and ten million other people.

But when I'm watching a tournament and he's playing, it's so much suffering for me. I'm so stressed. Sometimes when I can see he's making a lot of unforced errors, he's not getting in his first serves, I can see this is not going in a good direction—sometimes I have to stop and go take a walk. Sometimes I can't even watch and I'll get Joseph to record it on his TV. And then I check who won. I know you shouldn't do this. And then if he won, I'll go watch it. Other guys I can watch and just really appreciate, even if I have a slight preference. And it's just wanting. I mean, it's all made up. I don't know this guy from anybody. And I probably wouldn't like him. And why do I care? What's happening? They're hitting the ball back and forth, making a million dollars whether they win or lose.

But anyway, I think I'm enjoying it. That's the point—no one's making me do this. So this summer, this was the "duh" moment. This has been going on for a few years, this is not new, but this summer—

So it was Wimbledon, which if you don't follow tennis, that's one of the biggest tournaments, one of the most prestigious. Roger had been number one for many years, but he hadn't held that position for a while, and he hadn't won a major in a couple of years. He's thirty, now thirty-one, so everyone was writing the death sentence.

Anyway, he's playing Wimbledon, and again, the whole thing—so tense. And he won it, which was amazing. He won Wimbledon. He set a new record for the most tournaments ever won. He got back to being number one, which no one ever thought he could do.

So long story short, in terms of that world, in terms of my wanting it, that's the best that could possibly happen. It couldn't be any better.

How long does one stay happy from that? A day? Two days? Then you've got to start worrying about the Olympics. Well, they're over—he didn't win that. Then you've got to start worrying about the US Open, which just finished. And I'm even seeing, okay, he got to the quarters. First I'm disappointed. And then it's like, well, thank god. I don't have to worry. The next three days I can just relax and watch the tennis and not suffer.

Now, when I say it like that, it's obviously really stupid that you get so caught up. And the samsaric part is that without really looking, that passes for enjoyment, that passes for excitement, that passes for something that's really worth doing with one's time. And I'm only talking about me—I'm not talking about the tennis players or anyone else.

When I start to see how that is, it's such a perfect example of samsara. There's the lure of the next thing, the next thing. This is good; the next will be better. This isn't good enough—never mind, there's another chance. This was great, this was fantastic. Oh, now it's over. So we've got to look to the next. Always looking out, always looking next, never just really present and content with what is—not for more than a few moments. This is samsara.

It's not a matter of saying it's good or bad. What makes the shift is mindfulness. My habit kicked in a little late, but my habit of just paying attention to what's going on in my mind—I mean, it wasn't so subtle, but actually really paying attention: I'm really not enjoying this very much.

So it's not saying tennis is bad or good, or watching is bad or good, or I should stop, or anything like that. Just the simple awareness of what's actually going on. Wisdom reveals itself. Wisdom comes just from the awareness.

So I'm maybe watching a little less. Okay, not much. A little less. I'm noticing when I'm not enjoying and just turning it off or not following—not because I should or shouldn't, but because when we really see what's happening, the appropriate response that leads to ease and freedom arises.

That can be applied anywhere. So this is our second job: simple awareness of what's happening now.

Of course, we've been talking about this the whole time—simple and easy, and yet not, right? Just simple awareness of what's happening now. So why do we lose it so much?

I've been talking for about twenty minutes now. Have you been aware of hearing? I mean, you're hearing—you know you're hearing—but have you been aware of the hearing process? Probably not. But probably as soon as I said it, right? It didn't take a lot of effort, did it? "Oh yeah, right—hearing." Are you aware of seeing? You've been seeing. Most of you have your eyes open. When I said "see"—oh yeah, seeing, right? It's not rocket science, but we just forget over and over and over.

One of the really simple reasons why we forget is the ordinariness—just the ongoing repetition, which is another aspect of samsara, of our experience. You're sitting here seeing, seeing, seeing, seeing—every second that your eyes are open. I'm not saying you need to catch it every second, but it's happening over and over. Hearing is happening over and over and over. Sensations in your body. Different thoughts coming and going, or moods, when you're sitting and walking and doing walking meditation.

Why do you sometimes find walking meditation so boring? Oh, another step, another sensation. Lifting, pressure, tingling, burning. Lifting, pressure, tingling, burning. Lifting, pressure, tingling—please, God, stop. And then we just zone out.

And so it's not even in formal practice, but just in our life going through it. It isn't hard, but we just—through the mundanity, the ordinariness—we somehow stop paying attention, waiting for something worth paying attention to. Have you noticed that at all? We're looking for something that's more interesting, that's more worth our time here, that offers the potential of some insight. Not just seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—but something juicy.

But this is it, folks. What is life? What is it we experience? I mean, someone said this over and over—the six things, right? The six sense doors, the six sense objects, consciousness coming together. All that's happening: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, sensing in the body, and mental experience. We can give all kinds of different meanings and labels and interpretations, which is mental experience. But that's all that's happening, over and over. And so much of it seems so ordinary that the habit of this interest quality that comes with mindfulness, with awareness, tends to drop out.

Again, it's kind of like back to the tennis—that's how samsara works. It has to be worth paying attention to, so the interest, the worth, we place in the experience, in the object. And the shift of refuge, the real radical shift that this second job of ours of mindfulness brings up, is this shift to just the interest in that moment of awareness—the mind itself. The aliveness, the interest, the curiosity, the sense of totality of life—it's not about the experience being better.

Because just like I said, sometimes in walking you're so bored. Other times in walking, it's just amazing, right? Is your walking better then? Just we're present. Not "we," but there's that mindfulness, that interest, that aliveness, that the mind isn't fragmented. It's not waiting, trying to correct, needing something.

This sense of simplicity of awareness—that's our second yogi job. Just simple mindfulness. Not to make things better or different, but to recognize accurately what's already happening right now. And not even to recognize—that's already a doing. The only way of recognizing accurately is by this moment, just pure, simple awareness. It's like this right now. Nothing's too mundane. Nothing's too ordinary.

Dōgen, the great Japanese Zen master, said one time, "If you cannot discover the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?" The mundane, the ordinary—this is where the most profound aspects of reality are revealed, because this is it. There is nowhere else. Like I said, the Buddha awoke into this world.

There's another aspect that really helps to keep mindfulness complicated. Well, not mindfulness itself, but how we get so sidetracked, how it seems to move from the simplicity I just described. "Just be with what is." And we all go, "Yeah, right. How come we can't do it?" Besides the habit of checking out when it's not interesting enough, there's another complication we've talked about a lot and will again.

Another way of describing experience is that in every moment there's an object arising and a mind, an awareness of it. This is a simple way of describing it—again, it's the way the teachings often speak. In any moment of mindfulness, we might say: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience—some object arising. And with awareness, there's the knowing of it. These happen together, like two sides of the same experience, but with different functions. You could say anything that can be known is an object—smelling, hearing, tasting, thinking, unpleasant experience, whatever. And the mind, the consciousness, that recognition and awareness, the factor of mindfulness, knows: "Oh, that's just what's happening." It comes together.

Again, our tendency is to always be looking toward what's happening, the object, and assessing: Is it good? Is it bad? Is it this? Is it that? What does it mean about me? Endless stuff. That keeps us going in samsara forever. What we're doing with mindfulness, with our practice, is expanding—I don't want to say turning around, but expanding—the awareness to also recognize and be interested in the process in the mind.

Here's how we get confused, what obstructs accurate recognition. In a moment of what we think is mindfulness, or in a moment of knowing—say there's a sound and the knowing of sound, hearing, very simple—when in that moment of conscious knowing the awareness is colored by wanting something, by dislike, fear, aversion, dosa, or by confusion, delusion, and we don't recognize it, there's not an awareness of those, it's like that distorts our perception, our assessment. It can distort the whole way we experience things, and we don't see that's what's happening. That's what keeps us bound. It arises and passes, arises and passes. But this is such a deep habit, just habits of mind.

A sound—all day long, the six sense experiences arising—say a sound arises. Over and over and over, just with habit without awareness, as you know, it might be felt in the mind as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither one. We're not labeling it that. We're not even aware of it; it just has that kind of subtle resonance in the mind. And it doesn't have to be the same for everyone. Say some of the loud sudden sounds outside with the guys working—for one person they might not notice it much at all, it's just kind of neither pleasant nor unpleasant. For someone else it's really jarring, and the mind just has this registering of it as unpleasant. Just the habit.

And as you know how fast our minds are working—so fast—it goes into a liking or a disliking, it goes into a thought about it, an assessment about it, and what does it mean about me, about them, or what can we do about it, or whatever. I don't have to tell you how far and fast that stuff goes. If mindfulness just starts to notice those thoughts, the pleasant, the unpleasant, the aversion—fine. Those are simply the next arising objects. Then it's not a problem. We may not like it, and then we're back into not liking. When we're not recognizing it, that's what we call identified.

So the habit—all day long: I like this, I don't like this. What does this mean? How can I fix it? How can I get something different? No wonder we're exhausted. This is how our lives are lived, not just here. When we're not practicing with awareness, we don't even notice that's how our lives are lived. It's almost like that way of reacting and describing and defining things—that almost becomes our refuge. You know what I mean? When something really nice happens, the natural thing is to want more.

When there's some pain, some discomfort in the body, the natural thing is to want to get the hell out of here. And we try to say, no, why don't you stay and look at it? The response comes, why should I stay and look at it if I can move? That doesn't make any sense at all. And on that level, it doesn't. But we never really learn what's going on.

So that becomes our refuge. We cannot recognize accurately because we're overlooking. We're so focused on the object and how to fix it and what does it mean about me that we're overlooking how the mind is working. The fact that the seed of the suffering, the discontent, isn't about that sound being too rough or at the wrong time, or that I'm too sensitive, or whatever. It's the reactivity in the mind—unrecognized, identified with, and persistent. This is our habit.

And these states—greed, confusion, aversion, delusion, called the kilesas or torments of mind—I would say they're louder. They're more obnoxious, you could say, than the wholesome states of mind, such as mindfulness, such as interest, such as faith, such as calm, such as mettā. Although any of these can be strong and beautiful, and we really can recognize them as well. It's not only torments arising in the mind. But the kilesas make a big fuss. They get our attention. And our habit is to really believe the story they're telling, which is why our habit of mindfulness gets derailed. But it's also why mindfulness is so powerful.

Like with my tennis story, when I started with awareness, it was no big deal—no "now I'm going to be aware." It was just kind of sitting there watching. And instead of just being so focused on the game, I was noticing what was going on in my mind and just noticing it with no assumption of what should happen. And again, it was not subtle. It was like, whoa, this is really actually unpleasant. This is suffering. This is stress. And then just starting to observe the whole process. Not saying it should stop or it's bad, but getting interested. Okay, this is stress. What keeps it going? If the thought comes up in my mind, "Oh, I want this to happen," the stress goes up. If it doesn't matter, if whatever happens happens, the stress goes down. I mean, not just saying it and pretending, but really seeing—okay, I can be with things as they are.

Just that exploring, it's a shift of refuge. It's much more radical. And what helps us to explore is, again, the aspect of right view—realizing none of this is personal. It's just nature. Just like if I throw this up, it's going to come back down. And it'll probably make a sound. It's just nature. And wanting it to be otherwise doesn't change that. And blaming myself for it doesn't change that. Just exploring—steady, steady, steady—seeing.

So what we do and continue to do here, and I'll talk more about this or one of us will later, I can only mention it now, is to explore, to get really interested in the nature of wanting or greed when it's arising. Not hating it. Somehow we think that's better. "There's so much craving in my mind—that just shows what a bad person I am, what a bad meditator, how hopeless." As if somehow substituting hatred for greed is good. Yeah, we believe that. "Oh yeah, now I'm doing good. I'm beating myself up. I'm seeing everything I'm doing wrong, so I'm on the right track." And you see, we believe it.

Or sometimes when it's just interested. You see, sometimes you start to see a lot of wanting coming up. And people will come and say, "Oh, I just see so much wanting." And I'll say, "Great." Because it's coming up. There's some reason the Buddha picked craving as the second noble truth, as the cause of suffering. I don't think he just pulled it out of the air. And I don't think it's because it only happens once in a while in really bad people. I think it's pretty much a really subtle and ongoing, easily arising aspect of experience. So great. Mindfulness doesn't judge. Mindfulness gets interested in exploring it.

So when we see wanting come up, don't believe that it's what obstructs clear seeing. Don't believe me. Explore and see what happens.

I'm just going to give a couple of simple examples. You're walking in walking meditation, and the bell rings for lunch. You're still walking to lunch—what's the quality in the mind, especially if you're hungry? Is the quality in the mind any different? It's not going to always be, but sometimes it is. Explore and see, especially if it smelled good before. Just that kind of narrowing of our field. Before, just being present, walking, whatever's arising, arising. If there's some mindfulness, just being with what is. And suddenly, "Ah, got to get there." Or you want to get to the sitting. Or you want to get to your room. Or you want to get to bed. For me on retreat, that's a big one. Please, let me get to bed.

But noticing. It's not a good or bad about the thing wanted, but what's the quality in the mind? How it goes from just being at ease and relaxed to narrow, restricted, me and other. The Buddha said that wanting and aversion and delusion are makers of measurement in the mind. They limit. They constrict and make the sense of me and other—something needed with wanting, or something that must go away with unpleasant, a sense of problem. Without that, it's just what is. Explore and see, that's all.

And when there is wanting—again, look and see if this is true for you—and we're not recognizing it, in the beginning it may be a little bit in retrospect. But then you can kind of see it happening as it's happening. Notice how, especially if it's a strong wanting—maybe you're having a strong, pleasant fantasy about what's going to happen in the future, or your next vacation, or how great your next sitting is going to be, or whatever. It doesn't matter. You're really in it. There's a little modicum of mindfulness, awareness that at least you sort of know there's a fantasy happening. You kind of vaguely know it's pleasant. Every once in a while you can pull out, but then boom, back in.

Exploring that pleasant, explore how the story of it is, "This is going to be so wonderful, so amazing." I used to plan dinner parties, or you're planning a vacation, and very conveniently, all the kind of difficult, grunt stuff that has to go on—that isn't part of the fantasy, is it? It's going to be amazing. "I'm going to have this dinner party and have this food." You forget about the shopping and the cooking and the food burns and the people can't come and you get nervous and it's so much work and you have a headache. None of that stuff. It's just going to be fantastic, because wanting just shows us how wonderful something is. So we don't see the wanted object accurately. And anything else that's kind of in the way—that's what everything else is. It's in the way. So we're also not recognizing that accurately. It skews our perception. Things as they have come to be—accurate recognition is impossible.

Same with aversion. Same with when an unpleasant, uncomfortable experience arises.

And right away, it seems unnatural. Let's get rid of it. And as we know, it can lead to annoyance, blame—the whole story can unfold. It can go on for weeks. It can run our lives sometimes.

But here, just explore. First, it's more obvious, usually, that aversion, dislike, fear, unpleasant experience—it's more obvious that it's unpleasant. I have friends who are self-identified so-called "greed types," meaning that's kind of the first movement of mind for them, seeing the pleasant and moving toward it, and they try to pretend that's not really suffering. But on the aversive side, you can't really pretend. Occasionally, you can have some good righteous anger, and that feels good. But basically, you can feel the burning. And anyone else around is quite happy to tell you, "Yes, this is bad, and you're suffering."

But explore it for yourself and see: does it obstruct clear seeing? How is it suffering? How does aversion and dislike work? Not just saying it's bad—explore it. See the nature of it. It's fascinating.

And it is personal. We're making it personal. Then right away, it's really hard. As soon as it's there: "Oh, I'm so bad. I shouldn't be like this." And we're sucked into the story. That's just story too. Pull out and recognize, "Oh yeah, that's just aversion." Aversion is coloring the consciousness. It's coloring the perception. And at that moment, any thought that comes up is going to be seen through the filter of aversion.

This is the reason why, in terms of practice, if you're in a real doubting or self-aversive phase—have you ever experienced that?—and then you're trying to remember all the different techniques and skillful means. You're thinking, "Well, I'm too sleepy, or I'm too dull, or I'm too tight, or I'm too loose, or there's not enough breath, or there's too much breath," or whatever you're choosing. And you're trying to think, "What can I do to fix it?" But you're not quite saying that. You're saying, "Hmm, I'm a little bit off. How do I fix it?" Meanwhile, the coloring in the mind is: "I'm worthless, no good. This stinks. I stink. This is wrong. How can I fix it?"

And any fixing thought that arises at that moment, when you're not recognizing that aversion is coloring perception—any fixing thought is going to be colored by aversion. Completely unreliable. Completely. "Oh, I should take a walk. That'll be it." Then you realize, "Oh, I should just practice harder." That's usually the way it goes. "I'll just stay with the breath until..." And we somehow miss the aversion. Why doesn't that work? We don't see it. Explore, explore.

And the third aspect: delusion. Of course, both of those are delusions. One way delusion shows is just: I don't know what's happening. That's the obvious one. We don't have to take that so personally.

The other way—and this is one of the ways Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it—one of the ways delusion shows up is in making assumptions and believing those assumptions as descriptions, as accurate descriptions of what's going on. We don't even recognize we're doing this.

So he gives an example, again, a simple example of someone you've just met. And here, you can kind of notice this with people you've seen but don't really know. Our mind makes up all kinds of stuff about them, assumptions, which sometimes we know we're making up, and sometimes we don't. You think, "Oh, that poor person. They're just such a sad person. I really feel so much compassion." You have no clue. Or you pass someone on the street and go, "Wow, he's an angry person. I'm glad I don't have to have anything to do with him." Or you see someone and think, "Oh, she looks a little crazy." And we're doing this all the time. We talk about judgments. Sometimes it's obvious, and that's great, but sometimes it's not. And we just quite believe it.

Well, in our practice here, we can explore that. It's the same thing. And it can get quite subtle. It's probably happening for most of you. It happens for me a lot. I'm mindful. I think I'm mindful of what's happening. And there's kind of a subtle, sometimes it's just a subtle commentary. Or it's a kind of description: "Oh, this is what's happening. And this is why it's happening. And this is what this means," right? We kind of think it's true. It's not when it's a big thing, but just a little. We think it's true. We think it's mindfulness. And it's actually thinking, describing, assuming. The thoughts can be subtle, and we can easily mistake them for simple mindfulness. That's all. Just noticing that. That's a form of delusion. A subtle one.

And usually, this isn't so subtle—it's all about me, me, me. Just notice how long it takes for any of the sixth sense experiences that arise in known to somehow have something to do with me. What does it mean about me? Or what do they think about me? Or what is this going to look like? How do I look? It's endless. Explore it. It's not personal either.

Oh, just an example of a little thing that happened to me—a difference between assumptions, not quite seeing, and thinking it's mindfulness. Not so long ago, after some conversation I'd had with somebody, not any big deal conversation, but somehow I felt in myself later like an uncomfortable residue. And you can relate to that, right? Not some big fight or anything, but just kind of an uncomfortable residue left. And when a memory of the conversation would just pop up, I would just feel this kind of... I remember it wasn't quite shame, embarrassment, discomfort, sadness—I mean, quite what? But I'd feel stuff here, so I was feeling that. It would come, and I thought I was being quite mindful, not investigating what does it mean in my past, but just feeling it. That's what I thought. And just going about my day whenever it would come up. I'd be aware of the visual memory—that's how stuff comes up, as visual memory. And I wasn't noting.

I'm going through the day, aware of the unpleasant residue. And then there'd be a thought: "Well, I wonder, what's the hook here? Because it keeps coming, so there's a hook." I wasn't analyzing a lot, but I'd notice that thought: "What's the hook?" And you feel like you have to figure it out. It keeps coming, so I must be wanting something from that person.

I was really thinking that was mindfulness. I mean, I was aware, but it wasn't the clear awareness of mindfulness.

Then at some point I thought, "Why does this keep coming up?" This was a little thing—it wasn't some big suffering. But through the day, why does this keep coming up, this little thing?

Finally, I was just sitting there or lying there or something. Oh, unpleasant, uncomfortable feeling. Try feeling it. Just feeling it. Not all of "what does it mean?" or "I'm connected with this." Oh yeah, uncomfortable feels like this. With no "so that"—not to get rid of it, not to understand it, just because that's what's happening.

That's the simplicity of mindfulness.

So I was just feeling it. And then—this is the steadiness of awareness, our third job, the steadiness of mindfulness, the willingness to remember, to try and remember moment after moment, the perseverance—the steadiness is what allows wisdom to come.

Just feeling unpleasant, like, "Oh." The whole sense of struggle around it was gone in that moment. And then the understanding came just from being with it. Oh. It wasn't all about "what's the hook" and "I want something" and yada, yada, yada. It was just simple aversion—subtle aversion to just feeling the unpleasant, uncomfortable feeling. As simple as that.

I can't tell you how often it's as simple as that. But our "it's all about me" doesn't quite trust that it could be so simple.

Even now, if you're thinking, "But maybe it was important that she knew what it was about, right? Well, it was really important. If she wants something from that person..." You know what? If I'm working with steady awareness, if wanting something from that person arises, guess what? I'll notice it—instead of trying to go and figure it out.

This is subtle. I don't know if I'm quite making it clear, but this is really where it's a radical shift—to just trusting the simplicity of awareness of what's happening now. Not for anything else, but simply trusting the simplicity of mindfulness itself.

Our third job, and this is essential, is the willingness—of course we can't stay continuous—but the willingness, the understanding of the power of the moment to moment to moment steadiness of the simplicity of mindfulness. Without that, it's not meaningless. But where the reality, the profound and the mundane, where the wisdom can grow, the conditions for wisdom to arise, is through the momentum of steady awareness.

Because that's where we really see what's what, where we can really see how the causes and conditions come to be. Without the steadiness, we see something happen, then we pull away. Then we go, "Oh, every time I'm walking, this happens. I don't know why. I better do something else." But if we just pay attention, we start to see.

Let me read a little example Sayadaw U Tejaniya gave. Very basic, but it's probably clearer than if I tried to make one up.

So, only with steady awareness: you might, for example, feel quite relaxed and calm while walking to the meditation hall, and then you notice a subtle restlessness during the sitting. The mind is now aware of the restlessness, accepts the experience, and starts getting interested.

This is the key to all of it. We're interested. How does nature work? It isn't personal.

The question may come up, "Why is there restlessness?" But then the mind, the awareness, simply stays with this question, with the interest in the experience. At the same time, the mind also notices and feels the physical tension, which you know is somehow connected to the feeling of restlessness—for example, a tightness in the stomach. Then suddenly, there might be the understanding that there's an accumulation of small incidences of stress, frustration, or feelings of elation that lies behind this restlessness and the physical tension. In other words, wisdom starts sorting things out.

Do you get how that wasn't thinking about what this could be? It was just: this restlessness is like this. Feeling the restlessness, getting interested. How does it feel? I wonder why it's here. How does it feel? Feeling the body. Steady, steady, steady. Simple mindfulness is the condition that allows for clear seeing of the whole cause and effect process. Wisdom starts sorting things out.

And that's so hard for us to trust, because we feel like we have to cultivate the wisdom, don't we? One of the reasons we talk about all the right views—and if I'd gone into it, we'd think, "Well, I have to somehow start seeing all this in my practice." And right there, there's the wanting. We miss the wanting in trying to see the right thing. But steadiness of mindfulness isn't choosing what's better to pay attention to. It's just choosing what's here now. Steady, steady, steady. But relaxed. Aware—Guy said "aware" like a verb. And perseverance. Steadiness. Or as Tejaniya says, "Never give up." Which means when we space out: "Oh yeah, am I aware?" You're here again. What's going on? Seeing. We're here again. That simple, that relaxed, that mundane, over and over and over.

Really starting to trust that we don't—we can't—make wisdom arise. That's just some thought. We don't even know. We can't make accurate recognition or clear seeing happen, because that wanting is exactly the thing that distorts perception.

This is so obvious, but I found it really helpful. In practice, when you're really trying to be calm, or really with sincere intention trying to keep coming back and stay with the breath, or you're really trying to have your awareness stay steady through the whole walking period—somehow, back there, we think (we wouldn't put it this way) that if we want it hard enough, it's going to happen. And when it doesn't happen, it's like somehow we didn't want it hard enough.

Instead, with a steady awareness, we see: what are the causes and conditions that allow this to happen? What are the conditions that bring calm to the mind? Wanting harder? I don't think so. But we have to look and see. The more I want, the more restless the mind gets. Just keep watching. That's fascinating. It doesn't matter what's happening—it's going to reveal the profound truth if we cultivate steadiness.

So two last things. One is a tip from Joseph that he came up with at the last retreat we were teaching, which might help with this sense of continuity. He told me to say this. But it's a good one—people really liked it. Notice in practice how we may tend to have this subtle sense of priority, even though we all say there's not.

The priority being that the sitting is really the most important, where it's at. And if you can only do one thing, you do the sitting. The walking—okay, some people are learning to like it, and we do it maybe a little bit grudgingly, but we know that's not quite the whole thing. And the daily activities, the work meditation, the taking a shower, the eating, the going to the toilet—yeah, okay, that's third. When the rest of our practice is going okay, then maybe we can really give some attention to that.

So Joseph's tip is: reverse all of that. Turn it on its head. Make the most important priority the daily activities. Not to do them right, but to just remember this simple awareness. So you're scrubbing the floor, right? Do I know I'm scrubbing? That's all. It doesn't have to be feeling every molecule in your pinky as you're scrubbing and being aware of pleasant, unpleasant. It could just be really broad. Scrubbing feels like this. That's mindfulness. And mindfulness is what we love.

Just this simple awareness, learning to love it. Not knowing what's going to happen, what's going to happen next, but having that openness to discover, that openness to explore. Not having to have an explanation and a description that defines our world, but just being willing to see: oh, uncomfortable feeling feels like this—without needing to know what's going to happen next. And then we're present for what happens next.

So the three jobs: right view, simple awareness, never give up. But only moment by moment. You can't never give up tomorrow—only this morning.

CHAPTER 104

Generosity: Foundation of the Path

Carol Wilson · 1h02

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson presents generosity (dāna) as the foundational quality of the Buddha's path to liberation. She explains how all Buddhist teachings work toward purifying the mind from greed, hatred, and delusion, and how generosity directly counteracts these unwholesome states while cultivating joy, contentment, and a sense of non-separation.

Drawing from extensive experience in Burmese and Thai Buddhist communities, Wilson shares moving stories that illustrate the transformative power of dāna: nuns joyfully giving up their meditation plans to care for orphans, a money changer spontaneously donating to help build wells, and elderly villagers receiving support with profound dignity. These accounts reveal how generosity operates as a complete circle of giving and receiving, where both parties experience the happiness of the wholesome heart-mind.

Wilson offers practical guidance for developing generosity as a meditation practice, including six points from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita's teachings: attending to motivation, abandoning clinging to what is given, giving face-to-face when possible, giving mindfully with focused attention, maintaining awareness of wholesome intention afterward, and applying clear comprehension to the broader context. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching to the layman Mahānāma on recollecting one's own generosity as a powerful contemplation that purifies the mind, brings joy, and leads naturally to concentration—a practice available in all circumstances of daily life.

As Joseph mentioned the other day, I'm going to talk about generosity, the practice of dana tonight, which is one of my favorite things to discuss. It makes me happy, mostly because I get to tell stories that make me happy, and that's fun.

To start: as we've said many times, the liberation, the freedom of heart and mind that the Buddha speaks of—the simplest way we've described that is the heart and mind of non-clinging. As far as I can tell from my limited understanding, all of the teachings, all of the different ways of teaching that the Buddha offered, were about this. Nothing was extraneous, just for the heck of it because it's kind of interesting. And none of it was simply, "Well, if you can't liberate yourself, do this instead."

All of the teachings tend towards purifying the habits of our heart and mind, transforming the habits from suffering—so-called unwholesome habits—to wholesome, to pure habits. They work toward weakening the habits of greed, hatred, and confusion in our mind while feeding and strengthening the wholesome. And this matters not only so that at some future moment—which is true—only the pure heart-mind can see Nibbana, but also for what's accessible here and now. What we learn, hopefully, and what many people are already coming to trust more and more, is how to recognize when, in a moment, your consciousness has cleared from being identified with aversion or confusion or wanting.

Several people have given this example of noticing aversion in the mind and experiencing that shift—that Tai Chi move to awareness of aversion, which is itself not averse. It sounds nice, but when you really experience it, there's a sense of "oh." There's a happiness in that. Aversion is still the object, and there's a happiness in that. It's not incredible bliss where you're dancing around—just a little kind of piece of happiness. If you're not looking so hard for the big bang, you'll notice. This happiness, this joy almost, or calmness, is the happiness of the wholesome heart-mind. Just a moment of it reveals the peace of the purified mind.

There's a saying—I don't really think it's a Buddhist saying—but: there's no way to happiness; happiness is the way. And that's really what I feel in all of the different ways that the Buddha taught, as different approaches to purifying our heart and mind, experiencing this happiness, joy, and peace here and now, while also strengthening the habits so that this will continue in our mind and heart stream in the future.

Being here on a meditation retreat, of course our emphasis is on meditation, on bhavana. But in my first years of practice, I didn't really understand this so much, and I'm still learning about it. Meditation, bhavana—it's like the most interesting thing. It's as if we get really deeply pure in our heart and mind, we'll understand, we'll see the truth. But it's not all about bhavana. All the different aspects of the way we live our life are equally purifying, ennobling, and important. They all work together.

The practice, the way of life, is often described as generosity, sila (conscious conduct, moral conduct), and bhavana (the word for mental cultivation, development)—all the different kinds of meditation with their various techniques. They come from different angles, but at their core, they still share this quality of purifying the habits of mind.

I want to offer that framework as context for sharing some of my own reflections about the habit, the way of life, the happiness of generosity. Calling it a "practice" makes it sound too automatic, too dull—something you have to do. But I've really begun to imbibe, kind of by osmosis, from spending time in cultures that are primarily Buddhist, in Thailand and Burma. Not everyone there is walking around enlightened, of course—it's as messed up as anywhere, just in different ways. But one aspect I've really absorbed, the more time I spend there, is that the teachings of the Buddha are simply more inculcated in the culture, sometimes with real understanding and sometimes not, like anywhere. But generosity as a value, as a way of life, is just so woven through the culture with such a sense of joy that whenever I spend time in Thailand or lately Burma, I can't help but pick it up, even if at first I don't quite notice what's going on.

Generosity is really the foundational quality, the foundational ennobling quality at the heart of our awakening path, at the heart of the Buddha's teaching. Many, many times in the suttas, when the Buddha begins to unfold his teachings to people, he begins with generosity—bringing in, brightening the heart and mind, purifying the heart and mind, even in the listening. It turns the mind and heart in a wholesome direction.

Even on an intellectual level, this isn't surprising. If you just think about generosity, it seems quite understandable that as a practice, as something we continue to strengthen in how we relate to our lives, ourselves, our things, and others, it naturally counters greed and possessiveness of objects, of time, of views—whatever.

It counters ill will, interestingly enough. Try giving something wholeheartedly to someone while feeling ill will toward them at the same time. It doesn't work. When there's truly a wholesome mind state, wholesome and unwholesome cannot exist simultaneously.

And of course, generosity counteracts self-cherishing, the sense of separation and alienation that arises when there's a sense of "me" holding on to whatever. The act of generosity of mind, speech, and body is an expression of non-separation. It also, I find, strengthens that understanding—you feel it in different ways, this sense of our non-separation.

And I found that the more the mind inclines toward generosity, it also strengthens a sense of inner contentment. In a way, we can't give anything if there's not some sense of inner abundance, of inner non-clinging—that's clear. But also in the giving itself, in the circle of giving and receiving and joy and non-separation that comes from that, I find the sense of inner contentment is strengthened and the neediness really just weakens. The happiness of generosity is so much more enticing than the unpleasantness of neediness that the mind starts to incline toward the wholesome.

I don't know who figured it out, because even though we say awareness doesn't care—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—it turns out that the kilesas are unpleasant and wholesome states are generally pleasant. So our job is not to cultivate more aversion and clinging to those, but it's a good situation that as the mind inclines more toward wholesome states, there's much more inner happiness and peace. So generosity—it's great. I recommend it, practicing it.

The Buddha, as you probably know, when he had to set up his way of living with the monks and the nuns, was of course in India at a time when there were lots of different sects and probably lots of different ascetics, more men than women. Still, the Buddha was setting up his own group of monks and nuns with his own rules. This is from Bhikkhu Bodhi, the great translator, a quotation from the Buddha describing how he set up his monks and nuns, how they would relate to laymen and women—all on the basis of generosity, the mutuality that comes from generosity:

"Bhikkhus, householders and Brahmins are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicines in times of sickness." Those are the four requisites that nuns and monks are allowed and need to have. "And you bhikkhus are very helpful to Brahmins and householders, as you teach them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end, and you proclaim the spiritual life in its fulfillment and complete purity. Thus, monks, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

As you probably know, he really set it up so that monks and nuns are not allowed to keep food overnight. Not only can they not eat after noon, but they can't keep food overnight. So the monks and nuns had to go out every day with their alms bowl—as in the story of Bahiya last night—every day, eat the food that they receive, and that's it. Then the next day again. So even though there's a great emphasis with the monks and nuns on meditation and seclusion—"here are these roots of trees, go meditate"—they also couldn't completely isolate themselves from the lay people because there was this mutual support. The lay people were generous if they felt inspired by faith, and the monks and nuns were generous in offering the Dhamma, not only through their lives but through sharing in whatever way with any lay people who came. He set it up so that you couldn't just live in isolation, because these four groups of people—ordained women and men, and lay women and men—are all necessary. It's said even now that these four groups are necessary for this particular Buddhist sasana to stay alive. We need all four.

So he set it up that way. And in Buddhist countries, as I mentioned, it still exists, especially with the monks. They still go out every day on alms round. They can't keep food. But the peace that I mentioned before—this has been a revelation to me—comes from being immersed in a culture where generosity is such a deeply ingrained way of being, such a value that it soaks in by osmosis. And it's not just the monks and nuns and Buddhists. The revelation to me is the incredible joy and happiness involved in most acts of generosity, in the giving and the receiving. It's not only monks and nuns; it's lay people. It's really in the culture. And it's contagious.

Of course, I grew up in this culture, and people are very generous. I'm not saying only Buddhist countries are generous—please don't get me wrong about that. It's just that this is where a lot of my learning as a Buddhist practitioner and the joy of it comes from. But there's a slight difference. The way I grew up, sort of Christian, more or less Christian, there's certainly a sense of love and compassion and sharing what one has, usually with people who are needy. Well, of course, you tend not to give to people who have more than you—but time or effort, whatever. There could often be, at least the way I learned it, a slight sense of levels, of subtle superiority in giving. That's not always the case, but it could be. And one could feel good about it—nothing wrong with feeling good about it—but the sense of real joy and dignity in it? Sometimes, I didn't really grow up with that sense. Even if I was offering something to a homeless person, I would tend to feel more embarrassed or ashamed rather than a sense of joy and dignity.

And if the person receiving it accepted it in this really open, dignified way, that was like a wonderful gift. But it wasn't often happening that way.

When I first began to get a sense of this, it was a long time ago when I was at a forest nunnery monastery in Thailand. There were just maybe a few little huts for the nuns, for the women to stay in. I had a little hut, and there was a head nun who was a young woman around thirty, a very strong practitioner.

In nunneries and monasteries in Thailand, people just show up and come. You could have three nuns one day, and then fifteen nuns could just show up the next day, and you have to find somewhere to put them. It's just like that. It's not like you advertise ahead of time, "No, there's no room, you can't come." People just come. That's how it is.

So whenever there were more people than there were kutis, the first person to move was always the head nun. She was happy to give. She'd go stay in this cave filled with bat guano—I'm not exaggerating—up high. I think she liked it a little bit for the aesthetic idea. But still, there was this great joyful generosity of moving out.

I had just come from my early years on staff here, where there's what we would call the room game—what room would the staff people get to live in? And believe me, it doesn't work that the most senior person happily gives up their place to the most junior person who comes. It doesn't work that way. It's all seniority, and we all accept that. So this sense of the most senior being most happy to give—I just kept noticing that over and over, and I was quite touched by it.

Then quite some years later, the first time I went to sit at a monastery, a meditation center in Burma, I didn't really know anyone there. I was just doing my practice, and I was there for quite some weeks. You're in your own world, getting yourself all settled, and finally, after however long, you manage to come out of your own world a little bit to kind of notice what's going on around.

Like, do you notice how lovely the flowers are? That's somebody's generous mettā heart, someone in particular, who made it so lovely. She could have just thrown a couple of daisies in there, but no, she made it really beautiful. And then she changes the water when it's funky, even though it's a drag for her, out of generosity. Well, noticing that—we can let it in. There's a joy in seeing that, in appreciating the small generous acts around.

So I started to notice this in the meditation center. For example, the way most of them are set up, you come in to eat and have a certain set seat at a table—about four or five women at a table, the monks at other tables—and food would be put on the table. There are young women who work there, not nuns, who come and work. Really, they're hardly paid. Some of them aren't paid at all. They just volunteer their time and work a full week's work. They're just kind of waiting, making sure there's food and all.

I started to notice that some of the meditator women, even nuns—foreign nuns—were incredibly demanding, asking the young women, "Well, I want some hot chilies. I want more salt. I want this. I want that." And with me watching, I'm thinking, "My God, you're a nun. Aren't you supposed to be renunciant?" I had, quietly, a little bit of an attitude. But I was just sitting there watching.

The women who were working really hard—first they would try to meet each of these requests. They'd go to a lot of trouble to try and meet them. They'd go out to the garden and come back so happy they could pick a few little fresh chilies. Happy—that's the key. They were so happy to try and do whatever was asked, to try and offer that generosity. It felt really unfeigned, because I was sitting watching it for weeks.

After a while I thought, well, which is better? Sitting here grumpy and judging, or kind of opening to the joy of that heartfelt generosity about little things?

I mean, it doesn't really work to think, "I should be appreciating this." But it just starts to come in through osmosis. You simply start to notice it. And the wholesome qualities, if we're not completely covered in delusion in that moment, they're contagious. We feel them. They light us up—our heart and mind. It's really a gift just to sit there and watch the generosity of these young women.

So that's when I first started to get a sense of how uplifting that was, because I was having a difficult time. Some of those periods were difficult in my practice. And without having been told to do so, I just started to notice that when my mind was in a dark funk, if I simply did something like notice, "Oh, look at those flowers—that's somebody's generosity," something would shift. It wasn't a false thing, but the generosity and the mettā behind it would uphold me. It would bring some brightness, some faith into my mind and heart. And that would give me the strength to keep going.

So overall, the wholesomeness, the happiness of the wholesome mind shows us that our happiness really is not at all dependent on external circumstances. But it doesn't mean we can't recognize our mutuality, our non-separation—and that's one of the great things about sangha here. Of course, you're projecting. You don't really know what each other is feeling. But sometimes you just get a sense. Someone's walking by, and they seem really mindful. You just get this hit of happiness or mettā from them. Great. Don't go into big thinking about it. Let it touch you. Let it be contagious. We're not so separate.

So that's when I first started to get a sense of it. And now I'll share a few stories about how the mutuality of generosity is so imbued in the culture and how much I just kept watching. I keep watching. I just have to think about being in Burma, and believe me, this is a place with incredible poverty—much of it government-induced—incredible oppression, lots of fear. So it's not like a paradise at all. And yet, there's so much joy of generosity and kindness, a kind of generosity of heart, mettā, in the culture, in so many people—not everybody, but in so many—that I just start to think about it. Memories start popping up, and my heart just gets really open and happy. It's interesting.

Let me give a couple of examples of seeing this. One time I was staying at a meditation center right after the big cyclone a few years ago, which was like a hurricane, similar to Katrina. It had an even more devastating effect on a whole area in the southwest of Yangon and on Yangon itself. So we were staying at a meditation center just outside of Yangon. All around it was a relatively poor village. Many of the houses, which were just little bamboo shacks, had been destroyed. A lot of the crops had been destroyed, both down in the delta and in this area. So poor people were even a lot poorer.

This was a time when the government, of course, didn't do anything and actively tried to stop other people from helping down in the delta—not in Yangon—where the generosity of the average Burmese people was so manifest. So many Burmese would actually brook danger or jailing by the government to gather food together and somehow sneak down to the delta on boats or whatever to pass it out. Just your normal person, any of us—but a lot of people did this, because the government wasn't doing anything.

Anyway, at this time, a few months after the cyclone, some friends and I had gone to Burma. Other friends had known about the difficulties and had sent money with us to share with people who needed it. The Sayadaw, the abbot of this monastery, said, "Why don't we buy a lot of rice and offer a big bag of rice to each household in this village? Because that's the staple, and now it's so expensive." And he organized the whole thing. We gave the money, and he organized everything—he's a great organizer. It was something like eight hundred households.

And again, the way the generosity is done there is different from how we would do it. We would say, "Okay everybody, bag of rice here. Come get it. Bye." But there it's done really face to face and with great dignity. So they brought in trucks of rice. There's this whole room piled with rice. And then the monks in the monastery, who can't offer money, offered their time and bagged all the rice in big bags.

And then Sayadaw came and got us—me and my friend, the Westerners—and said, "You have to come and offer it. You can't just give the money and go away. That's got no heart in it." He didn't say it quite that way. He said, "You have to stand here, and each person that comes, you hand them the bag of rice."

So this was an all-day affair. The bags of rice—we're talking fifty-pound bags of rice. It would take two of us, me and my friend, to carry them. We're struggling, I can hardly lift the thing. And this little lady would come, and we're going ugh, straining with the weight. She takes the rice, throws it on her head, and goes walking out. They all do. The women carry it on their heads. The men throw it on their shoulder. Some of the women—and I have photos, I'm not exaggerating—a kid in both arms, the rice on the head, and they go off.

But there's this face-to-face exchange. It has a sense of dignity, a sense of immediacy to it. And the cycle of the joy of generosity and the joy of receiving goes both ways.

This, of course, is the area where the monks go on their piṇḍapāta, their alms round, every morning. They go on the same little routine. So one of the monks—there are only about twelve in this monastery—one of the monks, a friend of ours, a guy from Mexico, told us the next day what happened. He came back from the alms round that morning and said, "We go the same round every day, and more or less the same people come out and offer us rice. They're poor, so mostly they only offer rice. It's pretty much always the same families, the same little ladies."

He said the next day, after this rice offering, so many more families came out and offered rice—because they had a little bit extra, and the first thing they did was offer it to the monks. And then there were a few places where the families brought out their little kids, because it goes down through the generations. It was like a real treat for the little ones to be able to take a spoon of rice and put it in each monk's bowl. Just so touching, the cycle of generosity, and so normal there in that culture.

But the cycle of the happiness of generosity really runs not only within that culture, but from any kind of giving, any kind of receiving.

Another example: some other friends had, a few years before, come and visited one of the nearby nunneries, which I'll describe in a moment. They went back home, and the next year they sent a check to offer to these nuns who were trying to build a decent building to live in.

The nuns—just to describe—there are many, many nunneries around this area. More since the cyclone, when groups of two or three or four nuns would move up from the Delta because they couldn't live there anymore. Somehow they would get a little tiny plot of land, and they would build these little platted bamboo structures—like a woven wall of bamboo. You can make it in about three hours if you know how, and it lasts four or five months. The floor is just bamboo poles laid out with big holes in between. That's common. So many nunneries are like that.

This particular one was two sisters. Some years ago they had come up from the Delta and were living and studying. Many nuns study Pāli and Buddhism, and these two had been studying for some years. They were in their early forties, with a younger sister in her late thirties. At some point, the Sayadaw who was their teacher down in the Delta said to them, "There are these ten little girls, orphan little girls, and I can't take care of them anymore. I'm sending them to you."

Now, as it turned out, they told us later, they didn't have any way to take care of these little girls. They were living in a study monastery, and their plans were to go the next year and meditate, to really dedicate the next few years to their practice. But instead, they got the news: here come ten little girls.

Many nuns take on little girls—orphans, or children whose parents are really poor—and they educate them, clothe them, feed them, completely take care of them. And that's what these two sisters did. When we went to visit, they had found this little plot of land. They had built themselves this little crummy shack. And they were living there with ten little girls, describing it all while filled with light.

They didn't tell us until quite some time later that they'd really wanted to go off and meditate. We were talking through a friend who speaks Burmese, just so we could understand this properly. And they were just describing how dedicated they felt to giving these little girls the possibility of knowing what a good life is, what a life of virtue is, what a life of generosity is. They said, "If they decide not to be nuns when they're older, that's fine. That's up to them. But at least they'll know good values. They'll know how to live as a human being." Plus, they're rescued from the street, rescued from some kind of servitude.

They would laugh about how everything they have is on dāna, their food, everything. If they're given clothes, the head nun was saying, "Well, if someone gives me robes, that's wonderful. I can cut it up and make fifteen little tiny robes" — for these little cute girls in their little pink robes. They're very cute. And she was laughing, saying, "If someone gives us a little money, we can buy fifteen little sets of slippers." And these little sets of slippers are lined up. There was so much affection and dedication. She was teaching them Pali in the morning, and they all get up and chant.

At the end it came out that they really hadn't wanted to go off and meditate. So they just did a 180-degree turn for the next ten years of their lives — with joy, with so much lightness and happiness. It was really amazing to see.

So anyway, when these friends gave the check and I came back the next year, I had gone to California where they were, and I had some photos of these nuns receiving the money. You can't just hand it over — you have to put it in piles. It's like huge piles of money worth not very much, so you put it on these trays. It's always face-to-face, a very dignified offering, and there's chanting. If you offer, the nuns will all chant — a whole mettā chant, a gratitude chant, a blessing chant. It's really very beautiful and formal.

So there were photos of that. And then the next day, we ran into the nun. She'd run out, and they'd bought concrete and bricks. She was coming back sitting in a truck filled with all the building supplies they'd just bought. We could take a photo to show our friends. When I showed them the photo, it was like the completion of the circle, because they were so happy. I was just watching them. "Here's the photo. This is what we did." And their faces just lit up with the happiness of generosity.

So you're happy when you think about being generous, when you're doing it, and afterwards, reflecting on it. The Buddha really talked about this as a wholesome act. It's really beautiful, quite catchy. As I said, it's really in the culture.

I'm mostly giving monks and nuns examples because that's where I've been hanging out. But here's a simple example. Last year — it's complicated with the money, bringing in money and changing it, it's just complicated. The way it worked out, it came through a bank and a money changer. The money changing is like pseudo-black market, just put it that way. Now it's changing, but you didn't go into a bank and change money. That didn't even exist. So a guy, a money changer, would come with — and I'm not kidding — huge mounds of these kyat, and look at every single foreign bill. If it's a little bit wrinkled or has one red dot on it, they won't take it. So it takes hours. They're going through everything.

This is going on, and it's not quite like a drug deal. There's a little sleazy quality. It's not like the room is filled with light and devas, really. But it's also not illegal — it's what everyone does. One time we were doing it right in the office in the middle of the monastery.

And he said they were kind of hanging out. They were monks, but they didn't really know what to do with themselves. They had been there a while. And so Upanyaloka said, "Look, why don't you do something? You guys both have an education. There's all these poor kids around."

The way school works in Burma—elementary and even high school—even if you can go to the government schools, which have a lot of fees so many kids can't, but even if you can, you don't learn enough to pass the exams. And everything is predicated on the exams. So kids basically have to hire the teachers for tutoring in the evening. The teachers, that's how they make enough money to live, because they're paid almost nothing. And so poor kids, even if they can barely scratch together enough to go to school, they can't afford to hire anyone for tutoring.

So Upanyaloka said to these two monks, "Look, you have an education. You're just sitting around here. Why don't you start tutoring? There's a lot of poor kids around." And so they had started doing that. And now maybe a hundred kids came every evening to get tutoring.

But the thing that was so touching was what they said when we sat with them. What happened, they told us, was that when they first became monks, they were just there. They became monks and they didn't really know what to do with themselves. They didn't have a lot of purpose. But when they started working with these kids, when they started giving, their whole experience of being a monk changed. They said the joy that arose in them from giving was so much greater than anything they had known in lay life. The businessman, the captain in the military—both of them said this was happiness on a completely different order.

So we went over to see them. And it was really a great teaching in assumptions and also the happiness and the transformative quality of generosity.

You walk in—and you don't really walk in, there's no "in"—but it's just this barren, dusty land with a kind of shelter, a lean-to. That's what a lot of places are. We went in the afternoon and there really were a hundred kids there, these two monks tutoring them, and the older kids helping the younger kids. It all felt very friendly and jovial.

The two monks were... not impressive looking, shall I say. They just looked kind of schlumpy. They had clearly been chewing betel nut all their life. If you've seen that, it's this somewhat addictive thing, and if you chew it for long, it dyes your mouth and your teeth red, it rots your teeth, and you're always spitting this red. It's not really a happy sight, but it's very common. A good monk or nun wouldn't chew betel nut—and women chew it too just as much. So these guys have betel nut, just kind of standing there. Uwe Bassa and Uwe Bola.

But we started talking to them, and the younger one, the businessman, turned out what he'd been in business in was beer and liquor. That was his trade. But he finally had to beg his parents when he was thirty-three to let him be a monk.

Anyway, he starts talking to us. They'd been doing this teaching now for some time, and he was like... born again, in a good way. He said he felt like he'd wasted—he was so bright, so happy as he was saying this—he felt like he'd wasted the first thirty-three years of his life. He said, "I feel like I have a new life now. I'm giving my energy and my life to helping others, to helping the children." He said, "Really, it's like I have a new life. I want to be able to do some form of helping for the rest of my life. This is it. And if it turns out there's nothing else to do here, I'll go somewhere else and help somewhere else."

He was just filled with happiness and joy from this helping others. It was so touching.

And for us also—one of us had quite a judgmental attitude toward monks. As soon as this person would see a monk with betel nut, it was like a door slammed shut in her mind. So this was really for all of us a reminder: "Oh, yeah, maybe I have to drop that." To see the purity of heart, and to see the transformation through simple acts of generosity.

One last story in that vein, about a nun at a different nunnery nearby. She had been there a few years, maybe thirty nuns living there, not particularly bringing up orphans or running a school—they study, but nothing in particular. The head nun, Daw Sumanachari, seemed nice. She made good mohinga soup but seemed a little bit depressive, maybe.

Then she came a year before last, just after I'd left, and she talked to Daw Aryanyani, who speaks Burmese. She knew that sometimes people funneled money through her and said, "You know, there's a school that a nun started ten minutes' drive away for poor kids who can't afford public school. Now five hundred kids are going to that school." I'm not kidding—all on dāna. They have to raise money every month to pay the teachers, to feed the kids, plus the nuns have to live on dāna too.

Anyway, this nun who came to see Aryanyani said, "But the little children around here have to walk half an hour, and in the rainy season it's too hard for them. So I want to start on my place a school for the really littlest ones." She had a plot of land with two small buildings on it.

We kind of thought, "I don't know. Can she really get this together?" But what the heck? So we offered what we could.

We came back the next year, and she'd really done it. First, they pulled down, they demolished the main building that the thirty nuns were living in, and they all moved into the smaller building. That's all they have to live in. And they had the money to build a really long lean-to roof, hired several teachers, got blackboards. Then she got another company—a Burmese company, many Burmese companies support this—to build another lean-to. And she had a hundred and ten little kids coming.

And she'd hired really good, qualified lay teachers from outside. So when she came back to us, we were really impressed.

But the point is this: she came and was talking to us later that fall, describing everything that had happened. And her demeanor—even though I couldn't understand Burmese and she was speaking through a translator—her demeanor was completely different. She was radiant. She was just filled with light, so light and joyful.

What she was saying was that the year before, it was just eating at her. She couldn't sleep because she so wanted to start this school. It had just come to her that she had to do this, but she didn't know how. She was so worried about it. But now—and I wrote this down, I'm not making it up—she said, "Now the worry's all gone. Before I couldn't sleep or eat, but now I'm so happy because it's happening." She said that even though she has to work so hard to keep it going, to get the dana, to keep the teachers, to take care of the kids, and they all live in this little building, she's just so happy. She said, "All of my energy is for the children and the school, and so my mind is calm and happy."

And she looked like that. It was really quite transformative.

As the Buddha said—and the great story illustrating this comes through his disciple Anathapindika. I think someone mentioned that Anathapindika was one of the Buddha's most generous disciples. When he first met the Buddha, he had so much faith in the Dharma, in the Buddha, that he just became filled with appreciation and generosity. Right away, he offered the Jeta Grove, where many suttas that you read take place.

This story about Anathapindika is meant to show that the main aspect of generosity is not about what or how much. We tend to look at the result. But as with everything, it's the motivation. The heart of the generous act of mind, speech, or body is in the motivation, the intention to offer time, material goods, freedom from whatever—and the tuning into that, the non-clinging. That's where the joy comes from, and that's what gives generosity its power.

So Anathapindika, one of the things he started doing was every day he would invite all the monks from the Sangha in the area—like five hundred monks, which means a lot. That's what Andy Olendzki says: when it says five hundred, it means a lot. Every day he would feed them with a great meal.

King Pasenadi of that area, who was also a disciple of the Buddha, heard about Anathapindika's generosity and wanted to imitate him—or probably do better than him. He said, "He can do it, I can do it." So he decided he wanted to give alms and food to five hundred monks every day, and he started doing that as well.

But then one day, as he was on his way to visit with the monks, he learned from his servants that they would give the monks the food, but then the monks would take the food and go into the city and give it to some of their personal supporters, and then the supporters would offer the food back. King Pasenadi said, "Why are they doing that? I'm giving great food. I'm giving better food. I'm giving really good food—why are they doing that?"

The Buddha explained that in the palace, the servants distributed the food without any inner feeling, just following orders as if they were cleaning out a barn or taking a thief to court. Some of them even thought that the monks were parasites, or had negative feelings. They lacked faith and had no love. The Buddha said that when anything is given in that spirit, no one can feel comfortable accepting it, even when the meal is of the most delicious food.

In contrast, in the households of Anathapindika and Visakha, another generous woman, they welcomed the monks and regarded them as spiritual friends. A humble meal provided by a friend is worth much more than the most sumptuous meal offered by someone who did not give in a really generous, open spirit.

So this is where you see it's about the joy and the purification of heart and mind, not just about giving a lot and being seen as generous. In fact, in another place the Buddha said that even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup into a village pool or pond, and does so thinking, "May whatever animals live here feed on this"—that would be a great source of generosity, of merit. It's that movement of heart and mind. Sometimes you have water you're going to throw out, and if you just pour it on a plant and think, "May this be for the benefit of the plant," that's a mental act of generosity—something we're all quite able to do.

Once when Sayadaw U Pandita was here teaching, there was a monk teaching with him, U Nyanapannika, who was a Nepalese monk. I remember he gave a talk on generosity that I really liked—I mean, I took notes from it. I wouldn't remember one word if I hadn't taken notes. But it was a long time ago.

He talked about the practice of giving as a practice, and he gave six points. I'll just mention them, because sometimes that might be helpful. Not to make it too rigid, but just to illuminate the different aspects.

The first, of course, is that when the thought of giving anything arises, give attention to the motivation, to the volition. Really purify it. This goes together with the second point: whatever one is giving, see and abandon the clinging to it. So that it's not just this casual, "Oh, here, take it."

I have a friend who once used this word in describing something I'd given him – something I hadn't wanted. I'd said, "I don't want this," and he replied, "Oh yeah, I'll take it." "Okay, here." So that didn't really feel like an act of generosity. I never gave it another thought. But some years later, he mentioned it. He said, "That thing – I use it all the time, your act of casual, thoughtless generosity." He wasn't being mean or critical; that was an accurate description. It was casual, thoughtless generosity. And so looking at it, okay, it's more generous than not giving, but it's not really the generosity of giving attention to the volition – not "I should be generous." That's not it. Rather, it's this openness.

I heard a Tibetan teacher once say, you know, there's generosity of mind, of speech, and of body. So perhaps the thought comes up, "I'd like to give this," but then, "Oh, I just can't." He said: practice in your mind. Practice giving it in your mind. If you can't even do that, then no, okay – so we just practice there. Out of loving-kindness, out of generosity, not out of a should.

Another Tibetan teacher suggested practicing by taking a rock and giving it from one hand to the other. Just practice letting go. It's the act of letting go. We can play with it. We start to see what holding on and letting go feels like viscerally and in our mind. Sooner or later, we notice the letting go feels better. But it's not a should. So we can practice that.

Or another way of thinking about this – just of the mind, with whatever one does. I read this from Geshe Rapton, who was a teacher of one of my good friends, Fred Von Allman, and he's been dead a long time. A generous action of mind is simply this: with whatever you're doing – turning on the water, making some tea, washing your hands – just thinking, "With this act, may all beings be free from suffering." That's just an act of generosity of heart and mind. So simple. So many different ways to practice – with mind, with speech, with body. See and abandon the clinging. And whether that's time or service, it's not just about things.

The third point is to give when possible. It's not possible here when you're on retreat in silence, but when it's appropriate, to give face to face. That's the way they do it.

And the fourth is to give mindfully, with the mind focused. We're really collected, attentive to both the motivation and the act of giving. It really gives it a power and a beauty.

That face-to-face aspect – that's again something I've learned from the way it's done when you're offering to monks and nuns in Asia, and not just to them, to lay people too. It's this very formal thing. The giving is done with a real sense of appreciation, and the receiving is done with great dignity, great respect for the whole process. I find it quite ennobling on both sides, as well as joyful.

I remember one time when Sayadaw U Pandita was here, and he had been – I was on retreat – he had been talking about wanting to study Christianity and wanting to practice his English. So I got a friend to buy this very simple English book about Jesus's life or something like that. And then I'm shy – giving face to face. There's this sense of self and shyness, and "What do they think?" and all this stuff that isn't the happiness of generosity, this whole kind of self-cherishing that's rather strange. Why is it like that when it's such a joyful thing?

So I had this friend give it, and I went on my retreat here. Weeks later, when the retreat ended and I went to say my goodbye bows, he said, "Wait." And he had someone go get that book.

And he gave it back to me. He said, "Now give it to me face to face."

It was really far out. And I was like a little nervous wreck. But he was really present in the receiving, very formal. And then they say, like a blessing. Even with lay people—when he gives us some little thing, they go, "May this be a cause for your complete attainment of nirvana in this lifetime."

Imagine you give somebody a little towel and they say, "May this be a cause for your attaining nirvana in this lifetime." I mean, it's beautiful. We just go, "OK, thanks." Or, "Do you have a better one?" No—"May you attain nirvana in this lifetime." Try it. It's really a wonderful thing.

So this sense of giving with the mind focused on the giving—it ennobles both the giver and the receiver.

Another example with lay people: someone had sent money to rebuild some houses after the cyclone. And these neighbors, really poor neighbors with their own tumble-down houses, came to us and said, "There's this elderly couple with a son who's off and doesn't take care of them, and they don't have enough to eat, and their house is falling down. Could you help them?"

So we went, and they were in their 80s. The woman was almost deaf, and the man was almost blind. He can't really work, but she grows things. Their house was spick and span, so clean, so tidy. She grew little plants outside and in back. And on the days that she was well enough to walk, she would take these plants to the market to sell. That was their only income. It wasn't enough, and neighbors would give them rice and such.

So we gave money to build a house, which is not much—it can be done in a day. Then we found out they didn't have enough money for the rent. In Burma, poor people own the house, but you rent the land. And if you get kicked off, you have to leave—take the house with you. Their rent was a year overdue. This was like sixty dollars for a year, this rent. I mean, that was nothing, right? So we paid that.

Then we went back—the neighbors all said, "You come back." We went and paid the landlord, came back. And they were so dignified and elegant, really, but also happy. The man had this greatest smile, and he had a kind of homemade mandolin that he took down and was playing and singing for us. The wife isn't so smiley, but very serious. And he was doing some kind of dance. It was just this appreciation of the whole situation, this great sense of happiness and dignity.

There's no space for that shyness of giving or the shyness of receiving, or saying, "Oh, I'm not worthy to give or receive." That cuts the mutuality. It cuts the circle. But to give or receive with this dignity and this face-to-face presence is really ennobling, and it really strengthens the joy.

The fifth factor is: after giving, to continue to be mindful of our motivation. Have you ever had a time when you give and then later you go, "Ah, damn, why did I give that away?" So keep on being mindful. Remind yourself when that happens. You don't want to go there. Re-immerse yourself in the happiness of the generosity while you did it. That's really quite accessible.

And this is important: having a clear comprehension of the broader context. In other words, if an alcoholic comes and wants help, you give the help you can, but you don't give them twenty dollars to go down to the liquor store and buy more.

But generosity with intelligence applies to everything.

And I added the seventh quality, which is also receiving with the same openness. Because when someone gives and we respond, "Oh no, I'm not worthy. I have so much more than you. Don't give me anything" — that creates its own problem. Every time you offer something to people in Burma, no matter how poor they are, they're going to come and offer you something back with huge joy and dignity. And not to take it is a lack of generosity. To say, "No, no, I have so much more, don't give me that" — that doesn't work. And it's not happiness producing.

So just the last thing I want to say: there's the happiness of contemplating generosity, there's the happiness of the act itself, and there's the happiness of contemplating our past acts of generosity. This is something we don't do so much in this culture — not only with generosity but also with our wholesome sīla.

At times, when you're in a difficult space and you look around and think, "Well, looking at the flowers isn't doing it for me. Nobody's walking by filled with mettā. The leaves are falling and they're all brown and dead. I need something to bring some light in. I can't find one moment of mettā. What could there possibly be to brighten the mind and the heart?" You could contemplate your past acts of generosity of mind, speech, and body. You have to have done at least one, right? Somewhere? If you haven't, go wash your hands and think, "May this act be for the benefit and well-being of all beings everywhere." And then you can contemplate that later.

But this is from the Buddha himself. And it's a wise use of thought, a wise use of contemplation. He's talking to a layman, and it's embedded in a sutta where he gives other contemplations. But I'm just going to share the dāna one because we're running out of time.

So this is the case where you recollect your own generosity: "It is a gain for me that among people overcome with the stain of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness — freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests, delighting in the distribution of alms."

At any time when a disciple of the noble ones — and that's all of you, whether you like it or not — at any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. So just the recollection of generosity wholeheartedly is a moment of purification of heart and mind.

And when the mind is not overcome with aversion, delusion, or greed, her mind heads straight, her heart heads straight, based in generosity. And when the mind, the heart, is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the meaning, a sense of the Dhamma, and experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. And in one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calm experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated.

Thus, Mahānāma, thus the person should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children.

In other words, no excuse not to. And it makes us happy, so why not?

Let's just sit for a moment. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 105

Exploring Grasping at Views

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson offers a penetrating investigation into one of the four fields of grasping (upādāna) identified by the Buddha: attachment to views and opinions (diṭṭhi). She illuminates how this clinging operates from gross levels—political opinions, cultural beliefs—down to the most subtle levels of personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) and our moment-to-moment descriptions of meditative experience.
> Wilson explains the Buddha's three levels of wisdom: heard or acquired wisdom (sutamaya paññā), contemplative wisdom where we explore teachings in our experience, and the transformational level of insight (bhāvanāmaya paññā). She describes how genuine insight involves a shift of perception rather than logical deduction—something lets go that we didn't even know was being held, and we suddenly perceive reality in a completely different way. This understanding helps explain why insights must deepen repeatedly; the subtlety of delusion means we keep discovering views we didn't know we were clinging to.
> The talk traces how perception, when colored by greed, hatred, or delusion, leads to inaccurate descriptions of reality that harden into views. Wilson draws on teachings from Dzigar Kongtrul, Thich Nhat Hanh, and Ajahn Sumedho to show how our awareness 'snaps shut' when we grasp views, engaging in selective perception that only allows information confirming what we already believe. She encourages practitioners to find refuge not in personality or views, but in awareness itself—generating what Ajahn Buddhadāsa called 'contentment with emptiness.' This radical trust in not-knowing, while freeing, can also be profoundly unsettling as cherished self-views dissolve.

The essence of what I want to speak about tonight is an exploration of attachment to views and opinions.

Since we were mentioning clinging, upadana, today—there are many places where the Buddha spoke about four fields of grasping, he called them. Just four big areas where grasping comes up a lot.

The first is pretty obvious: sense desires. The next is grasping at views and opinions. This is a huge source of confusion and suffering. Third is sakkaya-ditthi—ditthi means view, so it's actually grasping or attachment to view of self, sense of self. Really, both of those are views, so I'm going to conflate them. And the fourth is rites and rituals, which is really talking about believing. It's almost back in the Buddha's day where there were beliefs—for instance, certain religious beliefs that if you washed yourself in a certain river, that would wash away all your previous bad karma. So he's saying attachment to that is not helpful. But we could think of it almost as magical thinking, our little personal rites and rituals.

I'm not speaking about all of those tonight. I just want to talk about attachment to view, because I personally find it really fascinating. Just a warning: I can go on and on. But I won't. I find it fascinating.

I want to start with something the Buddha spoke about: three levels of wisdom, three levels of understanding, which I think can be really useful if we realize that things are happening on all three levels.

The first is called acquired wisdom—something we've read, something we've heard, something someone's told us. Extremely useful. I mean, that's what we're up here doing, and what you read in the suttas. Acquired wisdom. Of course, because we don't know for ourselves, we don't really know what's true or not, but it's extremely useful.

The second level is sort of putting that information to use. We contemplate it. We explore it in our experience. It's a kind of using the thinking mind in a useful way. We start to understand it. Take impermanence, for example. We first hear it and think, "Yeah, it could be. Makes sense." At the second level, we're thinking about it, consciously noticing it. "Yeah, yeah, pretty much. That seems like I could accept that." But that level still isn't transformational.

The third level is bhavana-maya-paññā. Bhavana means mental cultivation. You could say that's the level of insight when we talk about insight meditation. That is the level where it's transformational.

So what's happening in a moment of insight—of dhamma insight, insight in your experience, or even insight into some personal problem or a mathematics problem or anything? It's not like you're sitting thinking about it and it goes, "Yes, that makes sense. That's the rational answer." It's a kind of aha moment. Just all of a sudden, you recognize something in a different way. It's not an experience of thinking.

The way I talk about it is that it's really a shift of perception. We recognize something in one way—that's just how it is. And suddenly, something lets go that we didn't even know was being held, and we perceive something in a different way.

You know those images where if you look at it one way, it's two vases, and then if you shift your perception, it's two faces? Both perceptions are there in that phenomenon. It's not like you get rid of one piece of paper and bring up the other one. Both ways of perceiving are there. One isn't true and one isn't false, but they're different modes of perceiving. That's a simple way of talking about it.

But really, to me, it feels like that's what's happening with insight—on a gross level or on the most subtle levels, something lets go.

And so reality doesn't change—maybe even this particular situation isn't ostensibly externally different—but because of this perceiving in a completely different, unexpected way, it opens up a whole different understanding, a whole other possibility of response.

Hopefully in some sense you know what I'm talking about, and I'm not just making this up. What the heck is she talking about? Never happened to me.

So we're waiting for the huge insight that's going to end it all, and meanwhile we're having all these little ones. "But I saw this. I really understood that craving comes and goes. And when the craving for that banana is gone, it's really gone. I don't need the banana. The freedom from craving is freedom. I really got that." So how come, two seconds later, "I've got to have that banana"? Like, I really got it.

I'm choosing something simple, but on deeper levels—deep personality patterns of real suffering—don't you sometimes feel frustrated? Like, "I really understood this. Why?" And maybe not just this retreat. People have said, and this is not unique at all, "Now I'm seeing the last retreat. I went through this. I really understood this, and somehow I forgot it." And now it's like, "Oh, right. That. I'm having to learn it again."

Well, yes. That's why it's practice. And it's also because of the subtlety—the subtlety of levels of delusion. So we keep having insights again and again and again. I'm saying this not to be discouraging, but to be encouraging. We think, "Well, now I saw it. It's over." But the perception shifts back again. Yet once we've recognized something in a different way, even when it shifts back to the other way, you know—doesn't it change something in the mind stream? There's another possibility now.

And so with impermanence, the simplicity of really getting that the suffering in something isn't not getting what I want, but the craving itself—on some level, absolutely, I know that. Maybe not absolutely; okay, absolutely for the moment, then relatively I know it, and then we forget. But that experience of really knowing—that shift of perception from "gratification comes from getting the thing" to "it's just being okay with the craving and then it's gone"—that changes something radically in my understanding.

You can't give that understanding to anybody else, right? But at the same time, no one else can take it away from you. This is the level of insight wisdom that's really transformative to us.

So how does it come about? That's what we all want to know.

You may have noticed by now that it doesn't occur through willpower. It doesn't occur from wishing it. "Okay, now today I'm going to sit under this tree, and I'm going to see to the depths of impermanence. Boom." Okay, the Buddha could do that—that's a different thing. That's adhiṭṭhāna, based in wisdom of knowing what's appropriate. That's a whole other talk. But it's not like just wishing for it. And it's not by thinking about it. Something lets go that we didn't know was clinging.

There are many different ways, but what I want to talk about tonight is clinging to view, to an idea, which at the level of our insight wisdom can get very subtle. In the world, it's not so subtle. The suffering of clinging to views—the conflict, the pain, the hatred, the violence—is appalling and shocking. Well, it's not all the other guys; it's the same pattern, right down into our practice here. So that's what I want to talk about.

So say someone told me this example a few years ago. They were in a sitting and the body just got so restless, so unpleasant, so difficult that they couldn't stand it. They stood up, and it was in a different place—they were in the back of the room and you could only get out by threading your way through all the people, and it was really, really crowded. So social shame kept them there.

But standing there, the experience she was telling us about was this: the vedana is so unpleasant, so horrible. This is causing me so much suffering. This is just horrible. I can't stand these sensations. And she was just getting completely worked up. But standing there, rather than running away, there was some modicum of mindfulness. And at some point, it shifted. Oh. This is just unpleasant. That's all that's happening. And it's not really what's causing the suffering—it's just my mind going wild.

And it changed the whole experience. It was still restless. It was still unpleasant. But the belief that this restless experience is unbearable, causing me so much suffering—that belief, that view—was just suddenly seen, and it dropped away. And so the experience itself was perceived and responded to in a radically different way.

As we all know, we can't wish that. It may not happen next time. But remembering when we experience that begins to break us out of views and descriptions of experience that we don't even know we're clinging to. We don't even know we're holding them. That's where, to me, it gets so fascinating.

So to talk about what a view is, I need to start by talking about perception, which luckily we've talked about a lot, so I don't have to go into it too much. But it's fascinating—just fascinating.

As you know, perception is that arising with each moment of contact, and it's that precise in the way the Buddha talked: the description, not the labeling like noting, but the recognition quality. What's happening? As the Buddha says, what we perceive, we think about. Now that doesn't have to be a problem; it's really quite useful.

So there's a perception a little while ago—you heard a sound, and the perception for all of you was probably "bell." And the thought, which maybe doesn't quite bubble up to thinking, was meaning: oh, it's 7:25. That bell's time for the sitting, to go into the hall, to listen to the talk. All of these perceptions, one after the other—you come in and there's a perception of where you sit, and you're a yogi, and I sit up here. You shut up. I talk. It's like all these perceptions; we string them together and describe our world.

It's useful. If every time the bell rang you were all running around—"Oh, the bell! What does that mean? Where do I go?"—nothing could happen. And it works because we have, more or less, close enough, the same description of the perception of what it means, even though whether it was pleasant or unpleasant in that moment for you is different. So that's just how we describe our world—who we are, however we self-identify. All of that is normal and useful on a relative level, on a conventional level. It's not a problem.

Of course, the first place the problem begins, before we even get into views—and we've talked about this as well—is that our perception is quite frequently not accurate. And even more frequently, when it's not accurate, we have no clue that it's not accurate. We totally believe it. We think about it. We build up the description of the world based on that perception.

Sort of. OK, little examples. And what is our perception distorted by? Our friends: greed, hatred, and delusion.

My favorite example for delusion is very impersonal. When I'm home, if I don't have my glasses on, I really don't see that well, obviously. And I like things to be clean, you know, to a certain level of observable cleanliness. So if I'm walking around my house and it hasn't been cleaned for a while and I don't have my glasses on, I'm happy. It's clean. I don't notice anything. I'm quite content. I don't tend to wear my glasses—right now you're all a blur when I'm just walking around if I'm not needing them for something. But then I'll notice. I'll be working at my desk with my glasses on and leave them on when I go into the bathroom or something, and I'm sitting there going, whoa. What's that ball of dust? What's that spider? What is that grunge over there? The perception is really changed. The fogginess of delusion is gone. That's just a very simple example, but we misperceive from delusion, and then we think about it.

Or consider when perception is colored by greed or colored by aversion. I remember one day—I don't remember where it was—but it was a really misty foggy day like yesterday, and it went on all day. I noticed for myself how when I walked outside, if my mind was in a little bit of a clinging, happy state, I'd walk out and think, "Oh, this fog is so beautiful and cozy, and the light..." You'd get all the thoughts about it. Then later in the day, as my body hurt and I was feeling grumpy, I'd walk out and think, "Ah, this is so oppressive. It's so heavy." Similar fog—not the same fog, a few hours later—but similar fog. Very different perception.

What we perceive, we think about. And what we think about, it turns into emotions, moods that go along with it. If we're aware that's happening, great—that's fascinating to bring mindfulness to. When we're not aware, then what we think hardens into a view. And without even recognizing we're attaching to it, we take that to be the true, accurate description of me or you or the fog or reality at this moment.

Dingo Khentse says, "When sense organs encounter an object, the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object—the fog, the dirt, the banana, whatever—influenced by all the accumulated habits and past experiences of your mind, the whole process is entirely subjective." Notice he's not saying it's kind of subjective, a little subjective. He's saying it's entirely subjective. "When your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm." Have you noticed that? "When your mind is peaceful, free from clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure." It's really interesting to see.

Or there's this funny story—probably you've heard me tell this before—I heard it from Charles Genoud, about a Zen master and a samurai. Too good. So this wild, aggressive samurai comes to see a Zen master with his sword, angry, threatening to kill the Zen master, screaming and yelling and calling him, "You pig! You pig!" And the Zen master, as they do, just bowed and said, "And you, sir, are a Buddha."

This even took the samurai aback a little. He said, "A Buddha? You see me as a Buddha? How am I a Buddha?"

And the Zen master said, "Well, a pig sees a pig. A Buddha sees a Buddha."

It's really more that way than we might realize. Again, it's not to take it personally, but just watch how this works. It's so fascinating.

So perception, again—perception colored by any one of these kleshas—we just don't quite recognize it. It leads to a description that's inaccurate, which leads to a view, and then can lead to acting on it. Sometimes we can see through it to accurate perception, and then the whole thing falls away.

For example, someone told me at a retreat—not this retreat, but a smaller one—that they noticed a particular yogi hadn't come to any sittings for a day or two, and they got really concerned. Which can be good. It can be good. If someone's really missing for two days, it would be good to tell us. But this was somewhere else, a smaller venue.

They started noticing after some time, "Well, they really are missing." And all the thoughts and all the worry gets going. Where could they be? They're lost in the woods, or whatever. And as the yogi didn't show up, the thoughts start to come together with emotion. And it hardens. It moves from perception to thinking about it—citta—to view, diṭṭhi. Hardened into view. "Yes, something's really wrong, and I have to do something about it."

You can see the difference between when thoughts are just going through your mind and you can recognize, "Oh yeah, it's just thoughts," versus when suddenly the view is, "Yes, something's wrong. I've got to let someone know right away"—that energy, that sense that this is an accurate description of reality.

And then this person recognized—after I don't know how long, because they were telling me later—they recognized that, oh, actually... And this is also funny, because they were just looking in the wrong place. They had a wrong idea of which place in the hall that person sat. So for two days, they went through this whole thing. And then they saw the person and said, "Oh, okay."

Some misperceptions are easy to see through. The view, the reactions—we can just kind of laugh, hopefully. Okay, great. We learn how it works. But so many others, so subtly, we don't see through because they're happening so frequently.

When the Buddha talked about hallucinations of perception—inverted or distorted perception—what he meant is that we tend to perceive what is in constant flux as being permanent. There's not a big sign saying, "Yes, this is permanent." But perception is happening every moment, and we're perceiving and assuming permanence so much of the time. We don't recognize it.

Or, regarding anicca and dukkha, we don't perceive the unsatisfactory nature of things. We perceive something as offering security, satisfaction, happiness. Or, of course, as Guy has been talking about so much, we perceive a separate identity, a separate self where there isn't one.

These perceptions, these distortions, these hallucinations of perception—of course they lead to thinking, lead to descriptions of our world, lead to how we act and respond. But they're happening so quickly, these perceptions. They're so fleeting that we don't tend to even recognize those perceptions are occurring, never mind all the thoughts and reactions that describe our world, the views that arise from them. Just such a subtle process.

The Dalai Lama said once that all of our difficulties come through mistaken perception. That's why there is so much emphasis on direct experience and true knowledge.

The emphasis here, the simplicity of moment-to-moment mindful awareness—not looking for something, because that's already too much. We're looking for some idea of what should be there. Gone, you know? But through moment-to-moment direct experience, each moment of pure mindfulness is just a moment. As I think I said last night, mindfulness in that moment is free from wanting, from greed, from aversion, from delusion—just for that moment. So there's the possibility of a more accurate perception. It's quick. It's quick. Not every accurate perception leads to insight. But the steadiness of mindfulness and simple perception is what allows for that shift, that wisdom, to arise.

So perception, when it's inaccurate, leads to the way we think about and describe ourselves, describe the world—and leads to when those descriptions are implicitly believed.

The Buddha described a view as "this alone is true, everything else is false"—if only our views telegraphed themselves quite so clearly.

I want to start by talking about how we get attached to our descriptions in a bigger realm than the subtlety of personality view, because it's the same process. Having an opinion or a view in the world isn't a problem. Of course we need it—opinions, preferences, views. It's election time. It's helpful, up to a point, to have a view. If you're going to vote or if you're not going to vote, either one's a choice, an opinion informed by whatever. Knowing that process—no problem. Just to know whether you want to take an orange or an apple at breakfast. There's nothing wrong with using opinions. It's not that in this way we give it all up and can't tell anything from anything. We're not talking about that. We're talking about grasping.

Because once we get attached, this energy of clinging, holding to a description, a view, an understanding of how we think we are, how we think the world is, what's right and what's wrong—the holding to it, to our description—we take it to be the reality. And it's as if, don't believe me, look in your own mind, in your own heart, it's as if our awareness snaps shut. It's as if we stop really looking, because now we know. This is how it is. And we often don't notice, or even allow in, perceptions that run counter to the particular view or description of whatever it is we're holding to. I call it selective perception. And we don't even realize we're doing it sometimes. Sometimes we do.

But this freezes our mind. It freezes the intimacy with experience; we're not recognizing accurately. It freezes our idea of people, our idea of ourself. And in a very subtle way, we just notice what supports our view sometimes. Because when we're really holding to a view, even though if we really look, it's suffering, it's rigidity—we're disconnected from the fluidity, from the beauty, from the intimacy, the mystery of life and ourselves—it can give us this false sense of security. We know what's right, and we stay with the people who believe the same way we do. It's comfortable.

And it's scary when our views are challenged. A lot of times we feel threatened, or anger. I mean, look around the world—incredible violence and fear from different groups of people who have different views or beliefs about anything. It can be subtle, but it can also be obvious.

I can watch myself doing this. Since you guys are really lucky to be sitting and don't have to hear all the pre-election stuff—I tell you, every four years is just, for me, so much suffering. But I watch my mind. It's fascinating. Let's go to a different year, a different election; I won't talk about this one. But in any particular one in the last some years, it's like, I have my views, what I believe. I may not think each particular person is so great, but I know one is more aligned, the best I could do anyway, with the views I have. And I totally believe that's true. I believe my view. I know it matters—it's not like it doesn't matter. So I believe it, but I can really watch and see how my mind snaps shut.

I remember when Nixon—maybe some of you weren't even born then, I don't know—I didn't want to hear any good thing about Nixon. If he came on TV and did something kind of sympathetic, I didn't want to know it. I didn't want to let it in because it messed with my view of the demon, or whatever. And I can see how hard that is, how much suffering that is in my mind. And when they have the debates with the presidential candidates, I can see in my mind, it doesn't matter for me what anyone says.

There's nothing the candidate I'm not going to vote for could say that could change my mind. Nothing. And if I go in with that view, am I likely to hear anything? Is there even a possibility that I don't have it all scoped out? No, there's no possibility. And I have plenty of friends who all agree with me. Very few people do I know who don't. And then we can't even talk about it. That's half this country. And that's even without coming to blows, without coming to violence.

So this is a delicate line we walk. It's not simple to hold. I'm not saying I've found how to do it, but this is gross—I mean, this isn't hard to notice, right? That I really hold a view, an opinion. I need to act on that view and opinion. I'm not renouncing that. But can I do that without the attachment that makes me right and them wrong, that shuts down my perception and makes it impossible to receive any new information?

It's like Krishnamurti talked about—freedom from the known. When we're attached to view, we're the prisoner of what we think we know. And then we can unconsciously make choices to only let in the information that confirms what we know. Or we hear information that discounts it and think, "Well, he's just lying. It doesn't mean that, you can't even believe it." Whatever. You can see how much suffering comes from this in the world. And that's in the really obvious cases. What about all the ones we don't even recognize?

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh: "All things arise because of their interdependence. That is why nothing has a separate, independent identity. Because of our ignorance and hatred, we accuse, reprimand, or slander one another. Each of us is a product of our family, our environment, our friends, our education, our culture, our society. These conditions lead to a certain way of seeing things and a certain way of responding to things. When we see this, we can have compassion for everyone, including ourselves."

Just seeing how much incredible suffering there is in this world from people holding different views about—you pick it—our cultural identity, our gender identity, our religious identity, our country identity, our political identity, whatever it is. I don't have to go through it. You can pick this country, you can pick almost anywhere in the world. And it's interesting to see how it's often the neighbors who are closest that have the most virulent fear and hatred, the greatest sense of their views being assaulted.

Sometimes it can be a little bit amusing when we're moving away from war and hatred and bombs to something a little less intense—just seeing how we can act on our views and how we are so entrenched in our way of seeing that we just can't even get it, that another way is equally valid.

Years ago, many years ago here, we had a teen retreat with teenagers. Quite a few of the kids had come from the city, from a whole different environment than this place. So it was hard enough—they're having to eat tofu and beans and all of that. But the cooks at that particular time were in a "sugar is poison" phase. They wouldn't serve anything with sugar. God forbid there should be any sugar out anywhere.

So these kids—I mean, they're in this really austere environment, out of the city, so many difficult things. The food, the meditation. And then they're told they can't have any sugar. It was just really too much. A few of them were really suffering.

Finally, with the intercession of one of the teachers who had to do a major intervention with the cooks, some of the kids were allowed to have a secret stash of sugar. They could go hide it somewhere. Here they come in from the city, where people are probably dealing drugs on the street corner...

And they have to go hide their sugar from each other. Pretty whacked out.

So just this sense of being willing to let go of our perceptions. "Sugar is bad for you always and for everybody." How do we let go of that? And these are views we even know we've picked up. But what do we know for sure—so for sure that we don't even think about it? We don't even question it. We don't even know that there's another option. This gets into the territory, of course, of personality view, even more than worldview.

Just to give a simple example: a couple of years ago, I was teaching here with Steve Armstrong, and somebody said something—I can't remember the whole context, but I think Steve had somehow been talking about karma. Anyway, the subject of rebirth had come up, which luckily I don't have to clarify because we have Guy, and I'm sure he'll talk about it in much more specifics and brilliant detail than I ever could. So I can just throw things in like that and not have to describe them because Guy's here. That's what's really great about teaching with a team.

So I'm just mentioning rebirth. I'm not saying anything about true or not true—who knows? But it had come up, and somebody just said something in the question period: "Well, of course we know that's not true." Just completely dismissing it with an assumption that that's what we all know. Scientifically, no way that could be true. Then he went on and asked some question. And I really thought, what's Steve going to say?

What he said was great. He pulled this example. He said, "Oh, you're so sure that couldn't possibly be true?" He didn't try to convince them. He just said, "Here's another story." There's somebody we know—we all know him—a Sri Lankan man. When he was born, at about two years old, he spontaneously started chanting in Pali. Really, really long Pali chants, in a kind of... I mean, he was two years old. He'd never heard these in his two-year-old life. And of course, Sri Lanka has a lot of Buddhism. So apparently they took him to some scholars, and they said not only is it accurate—he's chanting like the whole Satipatthana Sutta, not just a few lines—not only is it accurate, it's in a kind of ancient Pali that isn't even what the scholars of this day were using.

What do you do with that? He started remembering spontaneously lifetimes back with Buddhaghosa, who wrote the Visuddhimagga. He was a secretary or something. We know this guy. This is a true story. What do you make of that?

If we can not have to make anything of it—if we can let that openness, that not knowing, inform our mind... You get a sense? Well, I don't know what your minds did with it. You all got kind of quiet. I didn't see anyone going, "Oh, that's a crock." You just were kind of listening. So if you didn't do that, if you just kind of held that space for a minute—huh, what could that be?—you get a sense of the lack of clinging, the openness to discover, the potential to just soften.

Surrender into the mystery of this moment without having to have an explanation before, during, or after. Without having to compare it to anything. Without having to know what it means about you. Without having to know how it compares to that other person or your last retreat or what you read or what Guy said or what Sally said or anything. Just this openness to explore, to be present, yathā bhūta, with things as they have arisen in this moment.

That's just that moment of freedom from the known, freedom from attachment to view, that allows just for this moment of openness and presence and freedom to discover—a kind of real tenderness, a kind of curiosity for life. And this is what we're trying to talk about in terms of the quality of mindfulness.

When we talk about that level of Dhamma vicaya, investigation is not "Now I will understand this, and I'll put it together with this, and I'll have this in it." You know Suzuki Roshi's famous line about beginner's mind: "In the beginner's mind there are many possibilities. In the expert's mind there are few." Just to be here now, this quality of almost childlike innocence, connectedness and wonder without having to draw conclusions.

My favorite example of this, which I've often used, is the world-renowned cellist Yo-Yo Ma. He's currently involved in so many cross-cultural musical adventures, you could say. You can see in him this kind of openness to discover all different kinds of music and kinds of instruments and forms, and he brings them together. He does this Silk Road ensemble now with people from all over the world, from all different kinds of music, different scales, different tonalities. I've listened to some of it, and I have to say, I really don't get some of it. It's out there for my kind of limited view of looking. But I love the sensibility.

One time years ago, before he was doing the Silk Road, I saw in Germany some kind of TV documentary about him. All I remember is he was flying in a helicopter into the middle of Africa to visit a very simple tribe. He got out of this helicopter with his million dollar cello. They brought him to meet the head musician of this tribe—I think it was a tribe of bush people, they called them. This musician's instrument was literally a big empty oil drum, a metal oil drum onto which he had fashioned a series of strings on just a wooden pole. That was his instrument. So he was playing and singing on that, and then Yo-Yo Ma was playing on his cello. And then Yo-Yo Ma says, "Oh, let's switch!" So they switch instruments.

He had this really childlike openness. He's trying to play this guy's instrument and he goes, "Oh, I just can't play this nearly as good as you. You play it so well." And it wasn't put on at all. It was just this complete openness to discovery. I've always remembered it because I was so touched by that quality of mind that isn't building walls and separations through our views of "Well, I have this million dollar cello and this background of all this Western classical music, and I know so much—and look at this oil drum." None of that was there. Just this sense of appreciation within different cultural contexts instead of trying to reconcile all views.

The freedom from views isn't that we reconcile them all and figure it all out. And this includes views of practice, by the way—views of what's good practice, views of choiceless awareness versus concentration versus you name it. Without trying to reconcile them all into the one right view, it's the sense of not needing to hold to any view. We can use them as skillful means, but can you just imagine that possibility of not holding to any view whatsoever? It's scary a little bit. It's also really freeing.

Views of practice, as I mentioned. I love watching this in myself, because what happens is the mind has some little experience, makes up a few thoughts about it, and goes, "Oh, that's how it's supposed to be." I don't know if you notice this at all in your practice. And having the honor to sit while different people come and talk to us, we can see it happening one after the other. When you're just in your own experience, you don't quite see it.

So we can see people come in and go, "Well, good sati. I had good mindfulness because when I really paid attention to the pain, it went away." Or someone else comes in and says, "Well, my mindfulness isn't good because when I try and pay attention to this unpleasant thing, it just goes away and I can't hold on to it. I should be able to see its arising, its persistence, and its passing away, but I can't see that because as soon as I look, it goes away."

And someone else says, "You know, I'm not having emotions. And because I'm not having emotions, I'm not really getting to the meat of things. There's something wrong." And the next person comes in and goes, "But there's just so many emotions, nothing but emotions. It's really just about getting concentrated and being with the breath. I can't do choiceless awareness because it's just breath, breath, breath, calm, calm, calm. Nothing's happening."

Choiceless awareness—yes, it's awareness with all that arises. But there are thoughts, and sounds, and endless things appearing. How can I possibly get calm when all this stuff is happening? And then it's the same person rotating through all of these positions, one day after the other.

None of it is suffering if we're not clinging to the view. But when you see this—call up the thought in the back of your mind. When you're suffering, when things are not okay, when there's conflict, call up the thought: What am I really believing right now? And the thought will come up: "I'm really believing there should be no thoughts."

Don't just bang it away and say, "Oh, I know that's stupid." Yes, we know it's stupid, but that doesn't mean we're not believing it. So call up the thought and see: right now there's a clinging to that view. And that's the suffering. Great. Explore it. Is it possible to even entertain the sense of: what if there's no perfect right view of what your practice should be?

Oh my god. You can't keep judging yourself, can you? You'll never get perfect either, because there is no perfect. Just that surrender into what's happening now.

This is both incredibly freeing—freeing from the clinging, the stricture, the measurement, the limitation of attachment to view—but also, at times, it can be very unsettling, because we are familiar with wanting this sense of security. Even if it makes us totally miserable, we're upheld by our view. It's like, "I know. I know what's true. I can't ever do it. I'll never be able to do it. I'm completely hopeless. But at least I know that. And I know what's true." Opening to "Well, what's appropriate? What's happening now?"—that can be a little bit scary.

So these views of right practice, and sakkāya-diṭṭhi—the sense of me—really arise in the same way. Guy has talked about this a lot: a moment of clinging to any sense experience or to any of the khandas. But you can see, again, how there's a perception.

For instance, you're walking and there's just a slight unpleasant sensation. It's very faint. There's some aversion. And there's a whole train of thought about it: "It's unpleasant, but I'm not seeing it clearly. And this pain has been there the whole time. I'm blocked. There's something wrong." Or in the sitting, that pain in your stomach comes back. "Oh, there's that block again." You ever think that? "There's that block again. What can I do to get rid of it? How can I move through it? My practice is stuck because I keep having the same block." A whole sense of self arises, and then all the stories and memories about me and the things I haven't done and how I'm blocked, and the thoughts, right?

Then the next sitting you come and sit down, and when that starts, you just meet it with mindfulness, and it dissolves in sparkling light. "Ah, that block has dissolved because my practice is moving!" And it's pleasant. Then we start having memories that support our good practice, our onward-leadingness, and ideas about the future—like Joseph talked about, this body of light. All the memories that come up at that time support our view of ourself as being the practitioner of the ages, the next Dalai Lama in female form, whatever it is.

Selective perception. When you're feeling really horrible, you don't remember all those great moments. You might remember, but you throw them away: "Well, that was just a fluke. This is really me. This is the core." It's just taking a perception that's skewed by aversion or clinging.

A delusion is definitely there because we think it's me—a whole story of me—and we run with it.

Ajahn Sumedho talks about this self-view beautifully. He says, "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit—my views, my feelings, and my opinions. I can get caught into that world, that view of me that arises in consciousness." That's what sakkāya-diṭṭhi is: that view of me arising in consciousness. "But if I know that—that view of me—then my refuge is no longer in being the person. I'm not taking refuge in the personality or my views and opinions. So then the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends, because what we're taking refuge in is this awareness rather than in the view of me, of personality." I'm so good, I'm so bad, I'm this, I'm that. Our refuge then is this awareness rather than in trying to sustain refined experiences in consciousness, because you can't do it. Resting in this conscious awareness is what he refers to as coming home, or our real home.

It's just that simple shift—from "There's no way I can do this, and I saw this and that, and here I am" to "Oh, awareness of... I can't do this, and this and that... awareness of." The refuge is the awareness, not the clinging to the view.

He said something I found very interesting. I've often mentioned this to groups—he shared it with a gathering of Western teachers a few years ago. He was talking about personality view, attachment to our views of our personality, our sense of self. And he said he thinks the biggest hindrance for Westerners—this is just his opinion—is self-doubt in regard to trusting our insights into awareness, trusting our insights, that perception of the liberating sense of refuge in awareness.

It's similar to what Guy was talking about last night—minding the gap. That sense of just taking refuge in that gap, in that moment of non-concocting, of non-creating. Just the stillness, the silence of not creating a view or sense of self. Just this. The simplicity—so simple. That's what he's talking about: our insight into the liberating potential of a moment of awareness. Just this.

Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about generating a contentment with this. He calls it emptiness. He used many words for it. Generating a contentment with it. And seeing how quickly—this is what Sumedho is saying—our self-doubt arises. We don't tend to trust that. We don't generate contentment. We don't even believe it really happened, or if it did, we don't really think it's anything significant.

He says this happens in part because our belief in our personalities is so strong. We really have such faith in our personality views. It's so strong that that becomes our reference point. That's where we take refuge. That's what we really believe. And we wouldn't think of it as belief—we just think it's true. And so we get caught back into believing very implicitly the thoughts, the views, the story of our personality, our personal history.

All that's there—it's all cause and effect. But any of us, if we look steadily moment to moment, our moods are always changing. Our personalities have certain conditioned patterns, but they're changing all the time, aren't they? Yes. The same ones may come back very frequently—that's the conditioned patterns. But nothing's always there. What he's talking about is our believing so implicitly in our personalities.

Here's a simple example: a moment just—

Just the gap. Awareness is like this. And a moment before, it's, "Oh, there's no way I can possibly do this." And then it's so high. "What about stream entry? And what about all these things? And who am I? And what are they talking about anyway? This guy says it's like this, and then it's like that. And the Burmese and the Thais. And what about the Tibetans? And what about the Zen?" And it's hopeless. And how can we... we fall back into that. And in that moment of, "Oh, awareness," all of that drops away.

And then our habit of mind jumps back into, "Okay, it dropped away, but that's no way to live. How can you live like that? You have to have opinions. You have to know. You have to teach, right?" And that's what we believe. That becomes our reference point. It's a lot of suffering. It's a lot, a lot of suffering.

But it's radical trust in not knowing. Just the willingness to not know, to open into this moment is both freeing, but again, it is radically unsettling at times. It's not like every moment is just nice, nice, nice, leading to the most nicest, and it just goes like that.

As I said in the beginning, even with our gross views in the world, when our views, our perceptions, when our views are threatened—that we've been somehow holding to, whether it's in the world or in our view of ourself—it gives us a sense of stability. When that's threatened, that can be really scary.

Sometimes it happens in meditation. For a simple example, there's just a moment where suddenly the perception of the solidity of body goes away. Just sensations in space, you could say. And at times, that's really pleasant. But sometimes, the first time that happened, a lot of fear can come up because, where's the body? You open your eyes—okay, here it is. But it feels, you know, it's just because it's unfamiliar. And we're comfortable with the familiar.

And in terms of our whole subtle personality view, what Subhuti's talking about, we have such a strong belief in it. And the ongoingness of practice keeps... we keep coming up against the views we don't even know we're holding about ourselves, the beliefs, even when they're suffering ones. But every belief we have about ourselves, as we keep on with steady awareness, is going to be challenged, is going to be questioned. No, we can't hold with clinging to any view and really recognize the truth.

So while it's freeing, I know for me, I remember one time in retreat I recognized this. It felt like in some way, one way of describing my practice is that over the many years it's felt like a series of small little deaths of certain beliefs about who I was that I didn't even know I was holding to—like deaths of a certain sense of Carol-personality.

Now, someone from the outside would say, might say, if they were as aversive as me, "Maybe it died to you, but one would wish that it didn't really stop manifesting in the world." So don't be afraid. You don't really change into someone different. But this belief, this something holding, it dies away.

And there can be a kind of grieving. And it doesn't make any sense. Grieving for what? This stupid idea I had about myself that was causing me enormous suffering, and then there's grief when I'm seeing it's not true? Okay, grieving is like this.

Or we see a certain habit, and we think, "I don't want freedom if I have to get rid of this." Notice that kind of stuff.

There's one quotation from Stephen Batchelor that I like a lot. He says, "Emptiness is not just the experience of oceanic bliss. It is a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, self-centeredness, and seeming protection. And although it is freeing, it can also bring up great disconcertion." Disconcertion—if you're not a native English speaker, it means a kind of dis-ease. It's unfamiliar. It's confusing. Like being in no man's land.

So just so simple, we can't stand it.

But when we can just open, just radical surrender into this moment as it is, free from view, free from clinging to view—just that willingness to generate a contentment with emptiness, with non-concocting, with not needing to know and describe.

Then we're left with—I'll just end with this from Ajahn Sumedho, because it also speaks to what Guy said this morning, or last night, about the island:

"The only way to go beyond thinking and emotional habit, sakkāya-diṭṭhi, sense of self, is through awareness of them—through awareness of thought, through awareness of emotion, through awareness of views. The island that you cannot go beyond is the metaphor for this state of being awake and aware, as opposed to the concept of becoming awake and aware."

So let's just practice being awake and aware.

CHAPTER 106

Adhiṭṭhāna: Resolution and Determination

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a deep exploration of adhiṭṭhāna—resolution or determination—one of the ten pāramīs (perfections) in the Buddhist tradition. She begins with the mythological story of the ascetic Sumedha, who upon encountering Dīpaṅkara Buddha, made the vast resolve to become a Buddha himself rather than seeking personal liberation as an arahant. This illustrates how determination can span vast timescales, yet must be renewed moment by moment.

Wilson distinguishes adhiṭṭhāna from striving or willpower, explaining how wholesome determination feels like an alignment of mental energy accompanied by calmness and peace. Drawing from the Abhidhamma, she describes it as "the releasing of the mind onto the object"—a quality of decisiveness captured in the phrase "just do it." She offers practical guidance on recognizing when determination is wholesome: it arises with wisdom (paññā), truthfulness (sacca), relinquishment, and inner calm. When tinged with aversion or ego, these qualities are absent.

Through personal stories—including her humbling experience studying German at the Goethe Institute—and inspiring accounts of Master Sheng Yen's secret monkhood during military service and Tibetan nuns maintaining practice through the Cultural Revolution, Wilson demonstrates how determination supports us through obstacles. She encourages practitioners to establish clear aspirations for their practice while remaining flexible with circumstances, never giving up yet never clinging to expectations about how the path should unfold.

I decided to talk about adhiṭṭhāna—resolution and determination—tonight after it came to my mind this morning. Then, just talking with people in interviews today, perhaps because my mind was already inclined that way, it seemed like something I could see happening in people's minds. It's been a particular interest of mine. It's a mental factor, and it's been very interesting and useful for me in the last few years of my life as I've explored it. So I wanted to share that because I've been finding it very helpful.

Resolution or determination—adhiṭṭhāna in Pali—is one of the ten pāramīs, the ten wholesome qualities of mind and heart that, according to the mythology, the Bodhisatta developed over all the eons and lifetimes, bringing these ten beautiful qualities to perfection. Determination is one of them.

Determination is a very interesting quality, both in its vastness, as I mentioned this morning, and in specific moment-to-moment experience. The recognition of this wholesome quality in our mind, in our heart, as part of our meditation experience, is enormously helpful, as well as in our daily life, of course.

To talk about determination, resolution, or steadiness of purpose—these are a few different definitions. From Situgu Sayadaw, who's a prominent Sayadaw in Burma: adhiṭṭhāna can be regarded as a foundation for all of the pāramīs, for all of the perfections, because without a firm resolution, a firm determination, one cannot fulfill the other pāramīs. Of course, without some kind of resolution or determination, none of us would still be sitting here, would we? I mean this seriously.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu has talked quite a bit about it. He says it gives focus, motivation, and direction to our practice, if we're specifically thinking about our practice. And A.H. Almaas, who's not Buddhist, describes it as the quality of being unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement. Some of these descriptions might sound similar to vīriya, to energy, and I'll talk about the differences and similarities in a minute.

So: unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement, giving focus, motivation, and directness to the practice or to our life, and a foundational force for all the pāramīs, for all of our practice.

Let me describe it in vast proportions over time—this broad determination, broad resolve, broad aspiration. As I mentioned this morning, there's the period of the so-called Buddha before the historical Gautama Buddha that we know actually existed. I'm quoting from a very esteemed and revered scholar of Buddhism, Mr. Guy Armstrong. To use his language, four incalculables and 100,000 eons before our present age—which is to say a very, very long time ago. It sort of sounds like a fairy tale, right? A very long time ago, in a distant age.

There was an ascetic named Sumedha who was practicing to become an arahat. That was his aspiration, his resolve. He heard that there was a Buddha, a self-awakened one named Dīpaṅkara Buddha, in another village. He went to hear him. And basically, just in beginning to see, to hear Dīpaṅkara Buddha, Sumedha was so inspired—as is the case in these stories—just with the Buddha's wisdom, his brightness, his dignity, that spontaneously, but very profoundly, there arose in him the realization that, sure, if he became an arahat, completely awakened, that would certainly be for his own benefit and the benefit of many others he would meet. But if he actually resolved to become a Buddha in some future time, that would benefit so many more people, so much more.

So out of a sense of great inspiration and great compassion, this spontaneous, deep resolve—adhiṭṭhāna determination—arose: to do whatever it would take to become a Buddha in a future life. That was this strong resolve spreading over four incalculables and 100,000 eons. That's a long time. That one vastness of determination, of course, has to be backed up by moment after moment after moment of determination arising in the mind and heart. I'll come back to how he had to do that in a minute as I talk about it with us.

As the story goes, Sumedha noticed the Buddha was about to walk through some mud, so he flung his body down so that the Buddha and all the Saṅgha could walk over him and not get muddy. This called him to Dīpaṅkara Buddha's attention—in a good way. And Dīpaṅkara Buddha recognized, could tell from looking into the ascetic's mind, that in fact he would become a Buddha in a future age. Had Sumedha not made that resolution, he would have become an arahat right there and then. So that's how these things end happily.

That's the story in vast proportions. But you can see in smaller vast proportions—whatever particular resolve or determination, whatever you could call adhiṭṭhāna aspiration for our own life, for our own practice. I'll come back to that at the end, just to hold that as a possibility.

We don't just have to mush around, hoping something nice happens. We can really have a sense of purpose and direction. And this is not antithetical to all the instructions we've been giving all the time, which is why this has been helpful to me.

So a lot of what I want to do is talk about recognizing the quality of resolve, of determination, in our mind now—much like we recognize the seven factors of awakening. We've talked about these other factors, how when we recognize a wholesome factor and understand with wisdom how it works, and we begin to incline our mind towards it, we can actually call on it in times when it's appropriate and really strengthen that quality. So how to recognize it in our own minds is really important, because it gives us the perseverance, the courage in life and in practice to keep going.

As we've talked a lot about viriya, energy, it's quite a strong quality, but it's not striving. You've gotten that, right? I mean, we've said that. We have said that, right, once or twice. So enormous energy can be put out. It isn't striving. It's not meant to be willpower. It's not expectation trying to make anything in particular happen—which is quite difficult for us, how to put out intense energy without any idea of result at all. It just doesn't really compute, but that's what we talk about.

And at the same time we talk about this energy, we also talk about relax, observe, allow—the mindfulness of whatever arises, what we talk about as choiceless awareness. Not even the attention, but choiceless awareness, the sense of—and I say it myself all the time—that awareness doesn't care what's happening. That is just really learning to radically trust awareness rather than trying to shape or manipulate our experience. We say all these things and mean them.

And I know at times it can turn into something else. When we're not striving, but we're so afraid of striving, or we can almost be so careful not to turn our energy into expectation or some view—which I know I went on about all last week, not to have any view of what should happen—it can kind of turn into almost a sense of, "Well, just whatever happens is happening. And anything I do is striving or wanting or goal-oriented or manipulating. So just lie down and let it roll over." And how to find that balance? How do you use skillful means? How do we cultivate the wholesome? How do we recognize the klesha, even like with our attention, as Guy was saying, even meeting it fully with our attention without hating it, without wanting something different, without identifying—but at the same time without just giving up?

You know, Larry Rosenberg, who is really very, very funny at times, he used to talk about how sometimes we just get so like, "Don't give anything any trouble. We should massage the kleshas. Just let them be comfortable. Don't get upset." And so we can go on this side of just fluffing around, not really knowing how to bring clarity and strength and power to the viriya without using wanting and anger.

Mostly when we think about how to do something with a lot of force, that's when we can come with ill will, with anger. I think Joseph said sometimes anger feels good—the sense of energy, the sense of our attention, our energy is all collected and focused. And by gum, we can do something. Unfortunately, what we're doing isn't just the thing we're doing. We're cultivating aversion and suffering. But that's a sidetrack.

So to learn that there can be enormous collectedness of energy, resolution to really do something clearly, in a wholesome way that's not kleshas. You all know this. It's not like some magic thing, but just to really bring our attention to it, so I want to talk about it.

A simple example, which we've often said: when the patterns of thought are coming again and again, seven thousand times you've seen them. We've talked about this a lot. I will not go to Cowboy Dharma. But just to say, "Not now." That sense of "not now"—you know what it is? When it's not aversion, it's not fear, and it's not kind of wimpy "not now," but this real sense of, "No, I don't need to go there." You've had that experience, right? At least once, something starts in your mind: "No, I don't need to go there." And sometimes, some people were telling me today, it's amazing.

No, I'm not going there. And the whole thing just goes away. You're like, what? You really didn't need to go there. It's amazing.

That's a quality of determination. Or one way I explore it: you're really tired at night, and the metta sitting is over, and your mind is saying, "Oh, just go to bed." But there's this sense where you just make a simple resolve in the moment: I'm just going to do one more walking meditation for twenty minutes. You're not making some huge lifetime commitment, but just this sense of, "No, I'll just do it."

And that's really what it feels like. Just do it. It's not like, "Oh, I'll walk," and then you start walking, and every minute it's, "Should I or shouldn't I? I'm really tired. Maybe I should go to bed. No, I'll keep walking. No, should I or shouldn't I? Why am I doing it?" And you go, "By God, I'll just do it! I don't care!" And you stomp up and down. Neither of those are determination, right? They're not.

But that sense of just do it. And then whatever comes up in the twenty minutes comes up. You're tired. You're dizzy. You're aversive. You're yawning. You're incredibly filled with light and contentment. Whatever comes up, you just do it. There's not all that dithering. There's not all that wavering, this or that, all that energy that gets just blown away. It's all collected in the simplicity of just doing. You don't have to think about it anymore. And there's that simple willingness to be there. That's what I mean by the quality of determination, of adhiṭṭhāna.

One way of noticing how it feels—because this quality of determination, when we talk about it in terms of the Abhidhamma, in terms of different mental factors—it's one of those factors that's so-called ethically variable. We've talked about others, like concentration, for example. This means in itself it's not either wholesome or unwholesome, but it takes on the quality of the other factors that are in that moment of citta, that moment of psyche, that come together with it as determined by it.

So the quality that adhimokkha has as an energy, whether it's wholesome or unwholesome—this is the definition from the Abhidhamma—literally, I like it because I can feel this in my mind when I imagine it. Literally, this quality is the releasing of the mind onto the object. So it's like a quality of decision or resolution. It's not, "Should I go there or should I not go there?" It just releases. It just lands there. So it has the characteristic of conviction and it manifests as decisiveness. And I think really the best slogan for it is just do it. It's Nike's "Just do it." Sayadaw U Tejaniya really likes that. In fact, he has a big picture of the Nike swoosh, and sometimes he'll just hold that up for people. Just do it.

You see how that could be wholesome or unwholesome. So here we want to bring it into the realm of the wholesome, the skillful. Just do it.

So how do we recognize it as a wholesome state, as a skillful state? One aspect of how it feels—this is my experience, and then I'll talk about some ways Sayadaw U Tejaniya describes it. One way it feels is you can sense how the energy, the mental energy, just kind of comes together. It aligns. It doesn't have to be super heavy or strong, but it just comes all together, and there's a sense of calmness.

A sense of peace accompanies it. You just give attention to that, you just do it.

Here's a very simple example: in bed in the morning. The bell goes off, or you wake up—even better—at four, and you're awake, sort of. And the mind is going, "Should I get up, or shouldn't I get up? I could get up, I'm pretty awake, but then I'll be tired later." You know what I'm saying. Back and forth, dithering. Should I or shouldn't I? Is it good for me or not good for me? However long we're there going back and forth trying to analyze—just what I call dithering—it leads to a loss of energy, a kind of doubt, a kind of vacillation, a kind of weakness in the mind.

I've noticed this almost every day of my life when I have to get up. It's not my favorite moment. That one moment in the day is not my favorite. I'm not one of these "Yes, another day!" people. I know some people like that. But I really learned this, and it's amazing. The lying there, the "should I" and "how do I feel" and "five more minutes"—all of that is not pleasant. When I just tune into the quality of determination, which is simply "get up," it's really like that. All the energy comes together. It's not a "should." It's not aversion. It's not judgment. It's just: get up. Instead of the energy going into all those other thoughts, it all comes together and I just get up. It's just like that. It really is just like that.

It's not like that's some wonderful thing. But watching that quality—it's just a simple moment, not a big deal—and learning to recognize it, and then learning that we can actually call on it. The mind is much more trainable than you might believe sitting here. We can learn to recognize the wholesome, incline the mind toward the wholesome. And wholesome brings other wholesome factors, and they strengthen. That's the whole gist of meditation practice, right? Of the bojjhangas, the factors of enlightenment. And with this as well. So learning simply to recognize it.

Thanissaro Bhikkhu talks about the four qualities that come together when determination is wholesome, when it functions as a pāramī. It comes together with wisdom, with paññā, with some sense of clear seeing. It doesn't have to be the wisdom of an arahant, but the wisdom of clear seeing in that moment. Then with truth, truthfulness, sacca, honesty. With relinquishment, non-clinging. And with calm or peace in the mind. A clear, wise resolve comes together with these things.

Let me give you a very simple example so it doesn't sound so abstruse. Say you make a simple resolve here on retreat. Out of a sense of wisdom, you think, "I really would like to work with studying continuity a little bit." Now, it's wisdom rather than wanting, or comparing what someone else is doing, or thinking "my mindfulness stinks today so I've got to do something better." But in a balanced mind, you make a resolve: "Okay, the 8:15 sitting in the morning until lunch—I'm just going to be very steady. I'm going to sit. When I'm done with the sitting, I'm going to go walk. When I'm done with walking, I go sit. I'm going to really work with steadiness of attention in the so-called transition times and make that my resolve." It's not that you can resolve to be mindful every moment—that would not be wisdom, discerning wisdom. But "I'm going to resolve to really use this time like that for this week."

So that's, by the way, not a bad idea. That's a resolve that could be made with wisdom, depending on your particular circumstances—coming out of a sense of the value of mindfulness and where you're at in your practice.

And then in terms of working with the resolve, we meet ourselves with this sense of truthfulness, which is one of the other paramis. In other words, mindfulness has this quality of truthfulness anyway, just recognizing things as they are. So it's kind of like we don't kid ourselves. We don't say, "Well, I'm going to do that starting at 10, but first, just today, I really need a nap. But then tomorrow at 10 o'clock I'll start it." And then the next day we conveniently forgot we took a nap, and we really think we've been doing it. Little stuff like that. Just noticing, so that we have a sense of truthfulness to ourselves—not to anybody else—to really look and see what we're doing. And if somehow we can't do it, really can't do it, then keep bringing in the mindfulness, the truthfulness, and see why. Sometimes we do have to make adjustments.

The relinquishment is obvious. Relinquishment is just really non-clinging. When we have a particular sense of resolve or determination, of course we don't cling to the other activities that we give up in that time. We don't cling to all the other things that we wish we were doing. And if mental states come up of "Oh, just be nice to yourself and go have a tea," we don't cling to those either. We see it, we acknowledge it, and we just stay with our resolve.

What comes when it's a wise resolve, and we're meeting it with truthfulness and wisdom and non-clinging, is that it comes with a sense of calm, a sense of peace. If we're making a resolve and in really trying to do it we're getting more and more agitated, more and more upset, or more self-hatred, or more aversion, or more restlessness, there's something off about it. It's not as wise or as clear, or the motivation—maybe we're not quite seeing clearly.

For example, one obvious example: the smaller for Siddhartha Gotama Buddha in at least our historical era, before he became the Buddha. When he made that resolve, after all his years of very ascetic practice and all the things he'd been through, the night of his enlightenment, supposedly he sat under the Bodhi tree and made that resolve, right? "I will not get up until I've completely made an end of suffering"—or however he said it to himself.

I've always thought that is really interesting. That's a very powerful resolve. And then there's the story about all the armies of Mara and all the doubt and everything he went through. But what I think is interesting is that he had been through how many eons of lifetimes as a Bodhisatta, and how much very sincere, intensive practice in that lifetime before he sat under that tree and made that resolve. So there was a sense of discerning wisdom—he knew in some way that was a reasonable, a possible resolve. It was made at the right time, with a sense of the broader situation.

And that can cut both ways. I don't want to tell you don't make a strong resolve. If you feel it's time for you to sit under the Bodhi tree—we could sit under this one—and make that resolve and not get up until you're really free, and you have some sense that's possible, I don't want to squash that. On the other hand, for me, I know if I was to do that, it probably doesn't feel like it would quite be based in discerning wisdom. That's certainly not tonight, based on—you know what I mean? And it's not to put oneself down. It's just to see clearly what's possible.

Another way we can notice with smaller resolves: say you're feeling your mind, your body's incredibly restless. You're just that kind of restless all over, thoughts going everywhere. You come in and you sit down, and you make the resolve, "I'm just going to be with this. Mindfulness can be with it however it comes." I'm sure we've all made resolves like that.

Now, in terms of it really being a resolve, the resolve isn't "I'm going to sit here and the restlessness will go away." That's not from discerning wisdom because that's not in our control. But to sit and say, "Okay, I'm just gonna sit here, and as Jack Kornfield says, I'll be the first person to die of restlessness, but I'll just sit here and be with it"—that's the resolve that could be from wisdom.

And how you know that it's from wisdom, not from wanting or from ego? Because we could come in and sit down and say the same thing, but it's got that aversion behind it. Or it's got that "By God, I can do it—if that person there can do it, I can do it." And it feels like resolve, but it's tinged with kilesa. It's tinged with me-ing and my-ing, and "so that" and "in order to" and wanting and aversion. And the two experiences will be very different in that case.

So with the sense of resolve, "I'm just going to be with this," it gives the courage, the strength, that alignment of the mind to just be here.

And there's a calmness with it. The restlessness isn't calm, but the mind isn't caught in that spiral of "Oh my God, there's no way I can do this. This is impossible. Maybe I should get up." All that dithering—it's just not there. And when it comes up, that's simply included in the resolve, just part of the difficulty that we stay with for this sitting.

But when it seems like resolve yet it's really willpower or aversion, there won't be that kind of calm. There won't be that peace. It will be more and more and more of a struggle. This doesn't mean we weren't really sincere when we made a resolve and it's tinged with klesha. As we know, we just can't always tell. So this is how we learn. This isn't to say you're right or you're wrong, or that you can't make a good resolve because this is just another way that you're hopeless. It's to really explore and see, to learn when it's wholesome and when it's not, so we can call on this—not only in our retreat, but in our lives. Really, this is the discerning wisdom, the willingness to look.

And we can call on it. As I said, I've been exploring this a lot in practice too, but also in my life. Just to give you an example—it was really a strong example for me of working with resolution as a factor in my mind.

A couple of years ago, I had taken a few months off, some for retreat, but I also managed to carve out three weeks where I could—for some reason I've always wanted to study German. So I had arranged three weeks at the Goethe Institute in München. It was hard to organize all of that. My German was essentially non-existent. I was staying with a friend, and given all the variables, I was joining a month-long class but coming a week late, which they'd given me permission to do.

You take this little test, and I knew a little bit of German here and there from all my years traveling there and from my friends, but completely without structure, without grammar—just a little of this and that. So they gave me some tests and placed me not in the beginner's class, which was a big mistake, but in the second level. And then I came in a week late.

So I arrived thinking, "La la, this is going to be fun." And I walk in, and the age range in that class was sixteen to twenty-three—and me. These kids were all there gung-ho to study, already a week into it. And it's all conducted entirely in German.

I was sitting there with no clue. No clue what the teacher was talking about. I couldn't follow what we were doing in the workbooks. I was transported back into the horrors of school—only worse, because I was always okay in school. But this was like, "Oh my God, I don't know what they're talking about. I don't know what they're doing." And I have to ask these kids for help, kids who don't want to talk to granny. They just want to talk to each other about drinking beer in the English Garden on the weekend. That was really all they talked about. We didn't have much in common.

So the first day, I was just blown away. But then I'd go off and work and work and work. Then I'd come back the next day. And it was really fascinating to see the junk that came up in my mind. I thought, "Wow, I didn't know this stuff could still be triggered." Some days it was really awful. Some days I kind of enjoyed it. Then I'd try to say something in class, and I was the worst speaker because I really hadn't learned how to speak.

Anyway, I just kept going like that. And after two or three days, I'd get up in the morning and think, "Why am I doing this? It's totally for me. Nobody else in the world cares if I do this. If I never go down there again, none of them will care."

Why am I putting myself through this?

But I called on resolution and said, no. First of all, I just really wanted to do it. And whatever I do, I'm going to learn. Just go through with it. So if it's a little difficult, so what? So unpleasant mind states come up, so what? I gave myself a little talking to, and I got clear—yeah, I do really want to do it.

And so then every morning, I'd get up and I would just sit there and call in resolution. And all the "should I go or shouldn't I go" would just fall away. I made the resolution that not only would I go every day, I would never leave early, I would never miss class. And I did. I did every single thing. And I did learn a lot. No, I still can't speak German. But the main thing I learned—it was an amazing kind of retreat for me about the power of resolution in the mind. Not just to do something, but the calmness that comes with it, the clarity, just a sense of, "Yes, now this is what I'm doing." Some days it was fun, some days it wasn't, but whatever comes up is just the practice. We bring the mindfulness, we bring the resolution to it, and we go through it.

There's always going to be obstacles, obstructions, difficulties. Whatever comes up, as you know, is the path. And resolution's like, "Oh, okay." It was such a wonderful support and tool to call on. And it's really palpable—you can really experience it. So I just want to offer that. The more we get to use it, the more we can call on it here in our practice as well.

And as you'll have noticed, we really need it here sometimes, right? Pretty much everybody. Once in a while, someone has a retreat that's mostly calm, blissful, happy, and they don't feel like they need resolution. That's wonderful for that retreat. But it can set up a lot of suffering for later retreats. It really can.

I have a dear friend—I haven't seen him in years—but his first retreat was like that. And the next ten years were filled with so much suffering because he never had a retreat, or even a day of practice, that came anywhere close to that first one. Because you think that's how it's supposed to be, right? And everything else just seems hopeless. It's just supposed to be cruising. Well, mostly it's not.

As you'll have noticed, there are times for all of us in almost every retreat—and not just in retreat, but in our life—where it gets really difficult for a whole variety of reasons, with a whole variety of experiences. It can feel like we've just hit a wall. Maybe our expectations aren't being met. There are a lot of reasons.

But the commitment we're making to this radical mindful awareness, this sense of radical presence with whatever arises in our mind, in our body, in our heart, moment to moment—as maybe you've seen, it can take us to places we never would have expected. Some beautiful, some really confusing, some where you can't imagine there's any way this could be useful, wallowing around in this stuff.

And so, of course, we need mindfulness and viriya and faith and confidence. But here is where resolution is a quality we can really call on. When our sense of safety net—I like to call it that—starts to fray or starts to fall away. The safety net can be just the way you've gotten comfortable being in your life, even if it's not a happy way; we're comfortable with it. Or on retreat, there can be what I call a comfort zone.

There are all kinds of ways we keep falling into a comfort zone. Maybe it's how long you sit, or how much you sit and walk, or what time you have tea, or how much you sleep, or who you can sit next to at lunch and who you can't. Or where you do your walking. Or what mental states are acceptable and workable and which ones are not. Or just our little habits that we get into and don't even recognize. The views, of course, which I talked about last week—and how when our comfort zone starts to fray, how unsettling that can be, how difficult.

We're all going to come upon times—and hopefully more than once, hopefully even often, and I mean that hopefully—where we're hitting this wall, where our mind thinks, "I can't do this."

Or I don't want to do this. Have you ever come to a place where you say, "If freedom means having to give up this, I don't want any part of it"? Have you ever had that? Even if "this" is just the second muffin at breakfast. Sometimes it's that mundane. "If freedom means I have to always watch what I'm eating, to heck with it." That's a silly example, but have you noticed things like that in your mind? Or the mind projects further: "If freedom means I don't have any more attachment to my partner, and I can't be in relationship anymore, and we can't live together anymore—then forget it. I don't want anything to do with it." We go down some road. "If equanimity means you can't tell the difference between pleasant and unpleasant, who wants to live like that? It's all some dull gray. I don't want that." And we subtly pull back.

Or sometimes it's just, "If I have to look at this self-loathing one more time, I'm just going to explode. It's impossible. I can't do it anymore." We all have mental states where we think, "I can't do it anymore." That's just a mental state.

Ajahn Sumedho said something I thought was very funny. He was talking about some really unpleasant experience when he was in Thailand. He said, "This is unbearable. I just can't bear this another moment." Have you ever reached that place?

I remember one practice period in Burma some years ago where this mental state kept arising: "This is completely overwhelming. It's totally overwhelming." Some image would come—I can't remember what—and the thought, "I cannot take another step. It's completely overwhelming." I would totally believe it. And then the tomato would say, "I can't bear this another moment." And then I'd see that I could. You have another moment? Oh yeah. Okay. Well, I could just be with this another moment.

After some point with that overwhelming state, I suddenly realized something. Because I'd ask, "What's overwhelming?" I didn't even know what was overwhelming. Something was overwhelming. Then I realized: oh, this is just a mental state. "Overwhelm" is a mental state.

So that's the wisdom coming in that can lead to resolution. "Oh, it's a mental state." As soon as I know it's a mental state, I know from my own experience that a mental state is a combination of thoughts and mental feelings and physical concomitants. Whatever the mental state is, it comes, it goes. And I can be with it. I know that. As soon as I saw that, there's the resolution coming: "Okay, overwhelming. This really feels overwhelming. It still feels overwhelming. But the resolution can just be with it."

So I often ask myself when that comes in—"Oh, this is unbearable"—I say, "Well, what actually is unbearable about this?"

That's a question that just directs the attention back in. Okay, you can just see it. A very simple form of resolve.

Or sometimes, as I said last time, the sense of hitting the wall comes when we are starting to experience the unfamiliar in our practice—that familiar sense of who we are, our personality patterns. And sometimes when what we would think is a freeing insight arises, you walk into a situation, say in the dining room, where normally you would be filled with self-consciousness and embarrassment, and you walk in and it's just not there at all. There's just seeing and hearing and smelling, and there's no sense of "me" at all. And the actual experience is just a relief. That burden, that exhaustion of self-creation over and over again isn't happening.

And then something clicks in and says, "Oh no, how could I live my life like that? What about me?" We want to put on that old coat again that's so familiar, so comfortable. It's almost like we want to go back to the garden, the so-called pleasure garden, even though it wasn't so pleasurable. What about—who will I be if that impatience goes away? How will I be if I don't have this suffering story to relate to anymore? As Poonjaji used to say, you don't have to carry your whole past around with you on your shoulder like a corpse. Just being alive and fresh in the moment—but then who am I?

Chögyam Trungpa had a wonderful phrase: "nostalgia for samsara." I want it back. It's so familiar. And we're all going to hit places like that. This is where resolve—just learning how to have the resolve to stay with it without knowing where it goes—is so important. Because freedom from clinging, the freedom the Buddha's talking about, radical moment-to-moment awareness, it really is uncompromising. And with all of our best intentions and all that we've read, and I'm including myself in this, and all that we know, our mind really can't imagine that from what we know now. It can't.

We want to know what we're going to experience and how it's going to be and what it means—to get a landscape ahead of time, which to some extent is helpful. But at the ultimate level, each moment has to be completely fresh, opening to the unknown. And in the moment when there's the resolve and the clarity and the wisdom to do it, it's so freeing. But in the moments when there's not quite that, when we want to know, it just freaks us out. I want to know what's going on. Don't tell me I can't. I want some sense of certainty.

And so that's when bringing in the sense of resolution—not about an expectation of what will happen, but just this sense of the broad aspiration—helps us recognize that these scary experiences, these difficult experiences, these uncomfortable experiences, these not-knowing experiences, whatever comes from the inside or the outside, this is what's happening now, and so it's part of our path. It's all part of our path.

We never know. In each of us, our own path shows up different from everybody else. That's why māna—comparing and conceit—is so subtle. We all experience it a lot. But it just makes no sense. What's happening in this particular mind-stream at this moment is different from what's happening in that one, or that one, or that one, or yours yesterday compared to today. But we compare because we want some kind of certainty. No, just this.

So we never know how our path will go. But the determination—both in the bigger sense of aspiration and then bringing that into the willingness to just show up with courage, not shrinking back from whatever happens, whether external circumstances or internal—is a wonderful support on our path. And we couldn't do without it.

I want to tell you a little story from someone whose determination really inspired me when I read his autobiography. He's a Chan master, Master Sheng Yen. He died about three years ago. He was Chinese, originally from mainland China, but fled to Taiwan in 1949 when the communists won the Civil War. I sat with him a bit in Switzerland and a bit at his place here in upstate New York. He's huge in Taiwan—sort of like the Dalai Lama of Taiwan. But we didn't realize that meeting him here, because he was so simple. Loving—he just had the most loving, relational heart. Very interested in each person, very kind, very thoughtful, very simple. Just this wonderful being. And then we find out later he's a huge scholar, has tens of thousands of followers in Taiwan. A wonderful being.

And so when I read his autobiography, he talks about his life very straightforwardly. He was born in great poverty in China, again in the twenties or thirties, I don't remember exactly—very, very poor, a lot of privation. He became a Buddhist monk quite young, partly because he had no way to eat, no place to live. But he was very committed, really very inspired by being a Buddhist monk.

From the twenties and thirties onward, there was civil war in China—great hardship, often nothing to eat, lots of privation. In 1949, when the Civil War ended and the Communists took over, he realized that no one was going to be allowed to remain a monk and the monasteries were being destroyed. The only way he could get out and get to Taiwan was if he joined the Taiwanese army, because then they would give him transportation to Taiwan.

So here he was, a deeply committed Buddhist monk, but he knew he couldn't remain one if he stayed in China. So he did what he needed to do—he joined the Taiwanese army and went to Taiwan.

But it wasn't so simple. He was very committed to nonviolence, and so he ended up with a job where he didn't have to perform violence. He was committed to that. But he couldn't get out of the army. It wasn't like he could get over there and say, "Okay, thanks you guys, now I'm checking out." He couldn't leave. And it was well over ten years.

But he said the whole time, he was very clear: in my mind, in my heart, I was always a monk. He couldn't wear the monk's robes, but in his mind, he lived as a monk to the best of his ability while performing his duties.

To him, being a monk meant being a vegetarian. So usually he would never eat meat, which meant that he was almost starving much of the time, and he had very poor health. He would also use discerning wisdom—he was flexible enough to see when he was actually starving and his health was so bad that he was going to die, and then he would eat a little meat. But he took that on as having performed something that was unwholesome, unskillful. Later, when he was finally able to get out of the army, for him doing prostrations was a great way of purifying heart and mind. So he did endless prostrations to purify what he thought were his unwholesome actions. That was his commitment, his way.

After ten years of having no teacher, no other support to be a monk—living as a secret monk in the army—he found a way out. And he said, looking back, "I realized that if I did not have a very strong determination to stay a monk and to return to monastic life, I probably would not have succeeded, because getting out of my particular branch of the military service was nearly impossible."

But he had such dedication. He would spend every little short vacation going to find a Buddhist master and studying at a monastery in Taiwan, even though it was very, very difficult. An amazing being. When he finally got out, he went into six years of retreat in a cave on his own, and then became this great scholar. Great determination—but the softest, kindest, most loving person. Very, very inspiring to me, this quality of aspiration and determination.

As Thanissaro Bhikkhu says—for me that story highlights this point from Thanissaro Bhikkhu—in terms of determination, the importance of establishing wise priorities or aspirations in our practice, in our life, and then staying true to them regardless of the temptations to sacrifice them for lesser ends. This is personal for each of us. Skillful determination begins with discernment, with wisdom, and continues with it in making wise decisions.

I want to encourage all of us not to shrink from this, not to feel too caught in a sense of self and shrink back from really having a sense of what a deep and wise determination, resolution, aspiration might be for you in your life, in your practice.

As Thanissaro says, it really is important to establish a clear aspiration and then call on determination, which strengthens our energy, which strengthens our mindfulness, which leads to wisdom. And when we see, "Oh, I really can do this," our faith gets stronger again. That faith gives us confidence and willingness to act, which gives determination and mindfulness. It all circles around and supports each other. The wholesome factors bring each other along; each supports the next.

Having a sense of what is really your deep resolve, your determination—I think it's so important. You're working so hard here. And I imagine—I know for me—there are certainly times when you're putting in everything you've got, but you forget why you're doing it. It gets kind of dry and dull, or we're doing it to get more mindful. Why? Why exactly do I want to be more mindful?

And sometimes having that larger sense helps with the resolution—not to get there, but to come back, to be present with this moment now. It gives us the determination. Tejaniya likes to say, "Never give up." Never give up doesn't mean holding to an expectation. It means whatever arises, not to settle just for something good enough. "Okay, that's enough practice. That's good enough. I'm not suffering as much as I was. Let's go home." I used to do that a lot. Then you find out, guess what? It comes with you.

But never give up. Moment by moment, really bringing that quality of determination. As the Buddha said—a couple of things he said—two things I never lost sight of: not to shrink from the struggle, not to shrink from the path, and not to rest contented merely with wholesome states of mind. These wholesome states of mind are great, but not to rest contented.

So for all of us, having a sense of what the greater aspiration is gives us this determination to keep aligning ourselves with it. And whatever comes up is our path, and it will be different. What my path is differs from anyone else's.

Another story I love about determination and path—probably some of you have seen this video made a few years ago with Tsoknyi Rinpoche and some Western women who went to visit nuns in Tibet, called the Nangchen nuns, that Tsoknyi Rinpoche had historically been taking care of.

During the Cultural Revolution—those twenty years—these nuns had a monastery way up high in Tibet. Of course, in the Cultural Revolution, the nunnery was destroyed, and the nuns had to disperse. Different things happened for different ones of them. Some of the nuns died. Some were put into work camps. Some went back to their nomadic families. Some managed to flee high up into caves.

All of them, though, in their different ways—because they came back together after those twenty years—in their different ways, they described how in their path, in their heart, similar to Master Sheng Yen, they kept their path of being a nun. The ones who went back and lived at home had to disrobe. They couldn't out loud do any of their chanting or any of their practices because the communists were so on the alert that they would be arrested, their families would be arrested. So they were being secret nuns, nuns in hiding, but secretly they were keeping their practice, their determination going. Same with the ones in the work camps. The ones who went way, way high up into the caves had incredible privation. Some starved to death. Many were incredibly ill. But in whatever way, whatever circumstances came, the sense of determination was just flexible with the circumstances, while really holding true to what is the key, what's the most important, what helps them wake up.

This video was about going back with Tsoknyi Rinpoche to visit the nuns, who were now allowed to return. They were rebuilding this nunnery way, way up high. They're hauling these giant stones by hand and wood up these incredible mountains. I couldn't even walk up the mountain, and they're hauling it up and building the nunnery back again. This is how they were describing their different ways of holding to their aspiration, holding to their determination.

And then each moment, it's moment to moment—how determination, adhiṭṭhāna, manifests in relationship to this particular moment, with wisdom, with truthfulness to ourselves, and with an element of calm or peace, because our heart is in alignment with what's really true, with what's really important. And if it's not and we get all confused—great. That's part of the path too. We bring in awareness with that.

My favorite part, of course, is they took at the very end—they allowed the women videoing to go up and see the oldest nun, who they said was the most enlightened of all of them. She was lying in a little bed, and I mean, who knows, she looked 120—maybe she was 40—but she looked really old. She'd had a really hard life, and she couldn't walk anymore, so she just lay in that bed spinning her prayer wheel. One of these beings, you know, that just incredible light beamed out of her eyes, even in the video. She was smiling, and she said, "Well, I just lie here and spin my prayer wheel, and all day and all night, all I do is think: may all beings, wherever they are, may they be happy and liberated."

I thought, wow, what a life. Our lives can take so many different forms. It's not about what it looks like, but don't be afraid to come to whatever resolve is true for you, and then call on all the tools we have, moment by moment, just in this moment, to help us keep aligning. Resolution is an amazing tool.

One from the Dalai Lama. He was talking to some Western monks and nuns, and he looked out and said, "Oh, I see you're really dedicated." He said, "One day you too will become bodhisattvas in reality. And so whatever obstacles there are, however long it takes, do not be discouraged."

And that's true for us. Whatever obstacles, however long it takes, do not be discouraged. Just in this moment, we call on resolution.

And this famous passage from the Buddha describing aspects of the third noble truth, one who's awakened. This is not to compare ourselves, but to see that aspirations can go as high as is possible—not just to feel good:

One who has considered all the contrasts of this earth and is no more disturbed by anything in the world, the peaceful one, freed from rage, from sorrow, and from longing, has passed beyond birth and decay. This I call neither arising nor passing away, neither standing still nor being born nor dying. There is neither foothold nor development nor any basis. This is the end of suffering.

Therefore, the purpose of this holy life does not consist in acquiring alms or gain, or in honor or fame. It does not consist in gaining morality, concentration, or the eye of knowledge. That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that is the object of the holy life. That is its essence. That is its goal.

So let's just sit for a moment.

From Dilgo Khyentse:

Do not forget the teacher. Pray to him or her at all times. Do not be carried away by thoughts. Watch the nature of mind. Do not forget death. Persist in Dharma. Do not forget sentient beings. With compassion, dedicate your merit to them.

CHAPTER 107

Unity of Emptiness and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound reflection from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson examines the essential unity of emptiness (suññatā) and compassion (karuṇā), drawing from both Theravāda and Tibetan traditions. She presents the threefold nature of mind as naturally empty, naturally aware, and ceaselessly responsive—meaning that wisdom spontaneously manifests as appropriate response through the brahmavihāras: compassion meeting suffering, muditā meeting joy, equanimity meeting complexity, and mettā meeting simple connection.
> Wilson addresses common misunderstandings about emptiness that can lead to disconnection or nihilism, citing Nāgārjuna's warning about falling into the "abyss of emptiness." She equally explores how compassion without wisdom leads to overwhelm and despair. Through the Buddha's teaching on right intention (sammā saṅkappa), she shows how wisdom naturally purifies mental habits—greed transforming to renunciation and generosity, ill will to mettā, cruelty to compassion.
> Drawing from diverse sources including the Dalai Lama, Śāntideva, Nisargadatta, John Lewis's nonviolent civil rights training, and the Thai forest master Ajahn Mahā Bua, Wilson illustrates how genuine realization of anattā makes harmful action impossible while simultaneously opening the heart to all beings. She offers practical guidance for meeting the overwhelming suffering we encounter daily, emphasizing that our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice—simply allowing experience to be met with non-judging awareness—is itself the cultivation of both wisdom and compassion.

So tonight I'd like to just share some thoughts and reflections on the unity of the wisdom of emptiness and compassion, like two sides of the same coin, you could say.

Sometimes in our practice, not only here but all through our life, it can seem like what we're seeing or learning or hearing is more focused on the emptiness, the anatta, the wisdom side. Sometimes it can seem more focused, or we need to give more energy, to the compassion side. And sometimes, just being the way our minds work, we can set these two things up as somehow separate from one another—some kind of dichotomy, some way they're in conflict or don't go together, as if we could separate them, as if they were two separate things.

My reflection is that, of course, they're not.

The Tibetans have a wonderful way of describing the threefold aspect of the nature of mind. First, that it is naturally empty—empty of self, of any separate individual self-existence. Second, that the nature is naturally aware, naturally awake; the simplicity that knowing is the natural function of the mind, as we've been exploring. And the third aspect: that it is ceaselessly responsive.

This would mean, I interpret, that faced with any need to respond in the world, it isn't just hanging out in the emptiness of nothing matters. Rather, what spontaneously arises in the mind of wisdom is the appropriate response. In terms of quality of mind, you could say it's one of the four Brahmaviharas. Faced with difficulty, with suffering, it would come out as compassion. With joy, mudita. With a complex situation or something out of control, equanimity. With simple connecting with this moment, metta.

There's a saying Guy often quotes, which I just checked with him—he hasn't used it yet, and he said I could since it's the end. A Zen master, being asked what's the result of a lifetime of practice, answers: an appropriate response. Ceaselessly responsive.

So in some ways, to talk in very simple terms about our practice, compassion and pañña, wisdom, the deep insight into emptiness—just because we have to talk, we speak of them as two different understandings. But they support and interweave with one another, and each needs the other for freedom, for deep understanding.

In terms of compassion, it needs wisdom to be able to open, to be with the vastness of suffering, not to drown, to be able to bring in the vastness of equanimity. The Dalai Lama, speaking about compassion, said it must be derived from our insight into the emptiness of inherent self. This is where the vast meets the profound. Without the unity of compassion and emptiness, we can easily fall into despair. Because though our compassion may be strong, without this wisdom it is likely to have a quality of hopelessness, even despair. I certainly have experienced that. I imagine maybe you do sometimes. How can we possibly open to all of this? Or even just this knee pain, never mind all of this.

And on the other side, the wisdom of emptiness, of anatta, of nothing separate, inherently me, or anything inherently separate or self-existing—that can verge into disconnection. It's incomplete. It can go into this kind of view of nothing really matters, which doesn't have the quality of life, the tenderness for life that compassion has.

This is from Nyoshul Khenpo, the Rinpoche that Guy spoke about last night, whom he met in Nepal. He's speaking about the danger of what we could call falling into emptiness:

"The danger is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, emptiness, and we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion and are obscured by concepts. Nagarjuna said, it is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness. Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practices, through the ways of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

That's how it feels.

Now, I love that Guy talked about Nyoshul Khenpo last night, because you get it—he's not just some namby-pamby. He knows what he's talking about in terms of the vastness of emptiness. You get that he's someone who's speaking from experience, not from view.

So just to talk a little about each: these are just my reflections, certainly not comprehensive. This is the vastness of our whole path, in my opinion—exploring both of these and how they come together.

I thought about this question of the incompleteness of emptiness, the incompleteness of the wisdom of anatta. These are words that people have said to me at different times on retreat, about either the idea of anatta—which is very different from the experiential knowing of emptiness—or sometimes about the experience itself. You have an experience of not-self, and it's a little freaky sometimes. People have said things like: it's fearful, it's unsettling, it's alien, it's inhuman. It's basically unattractive, all the same grayness. It's disconnected. Nothing matters.

If we say awareness doesn't care what happens, well, why bother with anything? Why not just go sit in a room and do nothing if nothing matters anyway? That kind of falling into emptiness is part of delusion. There's a sense of disconnect, of a kind of emptiness in a not-good way—not something that's really onward leading when we think about it. Because that lacks the ceaselessly responsive, connected quality.

So the question arises: if it is true that there's no inherent self-existence in anything, that every arising is really empty, just as empty as any thought when you look at it and watch it disappear—if everything has that quality of insubstantiality—what's the point? That's the question, the incompletion of emptiness as a totality of view.

But the experience, as we begin to and continue to experience it and understand it, is really—as I hope you already know—this isn't something where the vastness of it may be way beyond where we are. But moments of experiencing this, we all know.

That time when, just because the energy that's bound up in this obsessive, relentless self-referencing, this undying relating of everything back to me as the center of the universe—I don't know if you've noticed, but it's exhausting. It takes up so much energy. Have you noticed sometimes when you have some insight, not even a big one, there's often a lot of energy and enthusiasm? The energy that's all bound up in "me, me, me" gets released.

But we can't think our way out of that. It's really a misunderstanding. And so when we think, "Well, how would it be?"—it doesn't make sense. It has to actually happen over and over and over.

Without that understanding of emptiness, we can think, "Well, we act in a way that's for the good of beings and all." But when it's still coming from that ongoing self-referencing, even with our best intentions, we can't see clearly.

I've used this example before, but I love it. I heard on public radio a couple of years ago a discussion about various economic theories, of which I know nothing. But this one—it sounds ridiculous—the so-called generalized theory, not really scientific, that was sort of behind the way banks and things were working up until 2008 (although I don't think it's changed) before everything crashed, was called Acting in Rational Self-Interest. The theory being that if we each act in rational self-interest—what's good for me, but rational—that will be for the good of all. Yes, we can laugh, but do we even know?

The example I gave, and this is what I love, is that apparently in London they built this bridge called the Millennium Bridge for their big Millennium celebration. It was a large, fancy footbridge over the Thames River, a big architecturally designed thing. When it first opened, on the first day when hundreds of people were walking over this new bridge—several hundred people on it at once—it was too many people, and the whole bridge started shaking and wavering from side to side. Each person there saw how it was leaning to one side. So, acting in rational self-interest, each person stepped to the other side to balance it. All four hundred people stepped to the other side, and it just made the whole thing even worse. Because it's my rational self-interest rather than being able to see the big picture. Even with the best intention, without wisdom, our perception is shaken.

So much energy for life is released when this self-referencing loosens. The ability to recognize so much more clearly is released. It allows for clear seeing and appropriate response.

And then the question comes up: okay, so there's not me and I'm not acting in rational self-interest, but... This is from Padmasambhava. Someone once asked him, "But once we've realized emptiness, can it still harm us to commit negative acts?" And he answered, "Once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything negative. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously."

Just think, in your own experience, of a very simple moment—which I trust in six weeks you've had at least, and you may be able to remember. One simple moment when nothing particular was going on, but there was just that sense of real presence. When the mind kind of clears, and suddenly the wanting or the aversion or the confusion that was clouding it just goes away. Someone was even mentioning today some experience, and they said, "Oh, that's aversion." And then everything just cleared, just from awareness noticing what was happening.

Maybe you're just outside taking a step, or seeing a leaf, or hearing the rain. Or you've been caught up in feeling judgment of somebody, and they walk past, your eyes meet, and all that falls away. You're just there with this clarity. Not comparing to past or future or congratulating yourself, but just the is-ness of that moment. Do you have a sense of what I mean? Just very simple.

In that moment, could the thought of harming someone even arise? In that moment, if someone fell or needed help, would you even have to stop and think, "What's the compassionate thing to do?"

Or what about me? The appropriate response is there, so simple. It's not a big view that we have to cultivate and adhere to and think about. It's just the natural response of the mind in that moment that's not all bound up with a sense of self-referencing. So simple, but as we know, not so easy. Not so easy.

So it's absurd to do anything negative. And what naturally arises—now we're switching into the way the Buddha speaks about it in the suttas—is that with the arising of wisdom, the link between paññā (this is in the Eightfold Path that Guy mentioned and Greg mentioned), the link between paññā, between wisdom and our actions in the world, is this second factor: right intention, wise thought.

And what naturally occurs with moments of clear seeing, with moments of this freedom—just this freedom from the contraction, from the clinging, from the self-referencing, just for a moment—what naturally occurs is that the habits of thought that lead to action, these habits naturally purify. And it's our old friends: the habit of greed, of clinging, naturally purifies. It begins to shift to renunciation and then to generosity.

Renunciation is not being a life of hardship where you have to push away everything pleasant. Renunciation is an inner attitude. This is all on the level of intention. It's the natural releasing of the clinging. Renunciation is an experience of the joy of simplicity. It's not getting out the hair shirt where you can't eat and whatever. Renunciation is the clinging dropping away, and there's just this appreciation of space and simplicity. It's a beautiful quality, which naturally then leads to generosity.

Ill will, the habit of ill will, naturally transforms into the habit of metta. And that of cruelty naturally transforms to compassion. And ignorance changing to wisdom isn't an act of intention, but that's from the insight, from the clear seeing.

So that's the link that the Buddha makes here in terms of how wisdom leads to action and how the action shows up as compassion, metta, non-clinging.

This is from Stephen Batchelor talking about Shantideva, who wrote A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, which Stephen translated many years ago. He says, "When Shantideva's closed sense of self dissolved, he did not vanish into the abyss of nothingness." It's not that, "Oh, I realized emptiness and poof." But he realized that to be empty means—what I was just saying—to no longer be full of oneself.

And then Stephen says, "For Shantideva, insight into emptiness does not merely change the way he views the world, but it also transforms the way he feels about it. The heart is opened to the anguish of others, prompting a spontaneous longing to assuage their suffering." This is a more emotional way of talking about the movement into compassion. "And yet he can also acknowledge the irrational nature of the passion to save all beings," because as a limited human being, that's impossible.

So how to hold the two? Realizing even the Buddha couldn't fix the world. He couldn't even fix all his relatives—they went to war and killed each other. That isn't what we can do. And yet, that movement of feeling, being open to, letting the anguish of ourselves and the world touch us and turn it into compassion—this is the movement from the wisdom of emptiness.

If I was to distill it, I've been talking about the question of how the wisdom of emptiness opens into compassion. But how does compassion need the wisdom of emptiness? This has been an ongoing question in my life, these two balancing.

One way I put it is: How can we continue to open over and over—because there's never a one-time anything—to open to the beauty and the suffering in this complex and beautiful world? There's so much. Just sitting here, not talking to each other, in our own mind and body, there's so much beauty, there's so much confusion, there's so much suffering. How do we continue to find the courage to connect, to not turn away, to respond in the face of sometimes overwhelming amounts of information, of suffering externally, in the face of external enmity? Or to find the courage internally not to just go to the automatic habit of response—hatred or aggression or fear?

That's the work, to some extent, that we've all been doing here together. It's amazing, ennobling work. And as you find, probably at times, it needs enormous courage. Enormous perseverance. And we must not think we're ever going to be perfect in it. But how do we find that faith, that internal wisdom?

As Martin Luther King described what the practice of nonviolence is, he said, "The practice of nonviolence means not only do you not shoot a person, you also refuse to hate a person."

This is really the depth of compassion, and that's not possible, as the Dalai Lama said, without the deep wisdom, without the deep wisdom of emptiness. Because as Stephen Batchelor says, talking about Shantideva, it changes the way we feel about the world.

There's a quote from Nisargadatta: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

How can I possibly open to all of that? And that's the answer—I can't. As long as it's "I," of course it's limited. Of course. And much of the time that's going to be our experience, sure. That's why we keep on practicing.

So both the wisdom of those moments of not-self, of not-separation, of insubstantiality, of emptiness, allows some opening into the vastness of the beauty and the suffering. And also the natural purification that comes from our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice—the natural purification that results in the changing of the habits of our mind—so that even at times when there's a sense of "I," that natural response of aversion or aggression or hatred, sometimes we have the mindfulness, the clear wisdom, and the courage not to at least act from that. It wasn't a natural wisdom that sees through it all immediately, but there's enough wisdom that we can see what's happening and come down on the purification, the wholesome side. That's what we're doing a lot in our practice here. And that counts. It counts.

I hope this doesn't bum you out too much, but I thought, in terms of what we all are in this culture, in this day and age where there's so much information—the question of how do we continue to open, not to shut down, not to go into such overwhelm that we just can't take in any more information—I think this is a really crucial thing these days because we have so much information.

I just wrote down, from today, listening to the news and checking the BBC, just my normal day's routine—I didn't go out of my way. Liberia, just a mention of how this horrible civil war that ended in 2003, and now they're estimating that over one half of all adults in Liberia suffer from some severe form of post-traumatic stress disorder. There was a whole story about teenage girls being kidnapped for sex trafficking in the United States. A story about Holocaust survivors living in Israel, and when they died, their grandson found that they had remained really close friends with some Nazis in the SS in Germany—and the whole thing that the grandchildren were going through, trying to understand how this could be, how this friendship could cross these borders. Eight people killed in a huge car bomb in Beirut. Anything about the election campaign—and that one, believe me, is a lot. A young girl in Pakistan shot by the Taliban because she was advocating education for girls, now in a hospital in the UK recovering very well. Other journalists in Pakistan threatened by the Taliban. Gold miners' strike and violence in South Africa. More wildfires than ever this year in the States. Chaos and war in Syria. Violence in Yemen. The EU thinking they might come to some agreement on bank supervision legislation at some year in the future—and it's a great thing there is an EU working together; if you read European history of the Hundred Years' War, that wasn't so long ago, or World War II, even less long ago. Various murder investigations, various sexual abuse cases around the world, peace talks in Colombia between the government and the FARC rebels. The UN still exists.

And then we have our personal stories. A great friend of mine just took her first steps on her new prosthetic leg—sent me a picture. That's wonderful. And there's suffering in it.

That's really a minimal little thing. I didn't even go into my emails. I didn't look hard. This is the kind of stuff we're flooded with. And how can we find a balance? That's one question. I'm not even hardly going to go into that, because that's the whole question. But not to either just say, "Well, it's all too much, so I'm just not going to listen to the news"—though we all go through times like that.

I've gone through times where I'll hear it all and see how I'm hearing it, thinking, "Yeah, that's a shame." It's not superficial – well, it is a little superficial. It's not knocking it away, but you just can't let it all in. You can't die on the ground with each new news story. You wouldn't get through ten minutes like that.

But I've noticed how I'll be going through the news, going through, and I'm hearing it, and then one story will just really hit me. I don't mean in a bad way, but I see the difference – somehow the mind, the heart in that moment wasn't preoccupied with pouring the right amount of milk in my tea, because I'm listening to this while having breakfast, or thinking about what I'm going to say today, or doing something else. I was just sitting there, open, receptive, not so self-concerned. And the story goes in. You really get it in its beauty and its suffering and all of that.

You see, it's that sense, that willingness to connect with an open heart and mind, which is the way I like to describe metta. When that connection touches suffering, you get compassion. When it touches a being, however they are, it manifests as metta. And in that moment, even what sounds like a suffering story, you feel that tenderness of compassion and you can hear the beauty in it.

I'll tell you another story I heard a couple of days ago. I just happened to be open at the time of hearing it. It was a lovely story. They were talking about some hospital in Boston that was about to perform one of the world's first leg transplants. They were going to transplant one or two legs to this woman. They were interviewing her and she sounded so upbeat, despite her story. I just thought, ah, there's so much going on in this world.

She was in her early forties, I think, had three children. Happily married in Texas, but after her third child was born, she got some kind of horrible infection. They didn't go into details, but the only way they could save her life was to amputate both legs and both arms – this was about three years before the interview.

She was talking, and it wasn't goody two-shoes, but she had this spring in her voice, just talking about how supportive her husband had been. She had prosthetic devices, but her husband, knowing that she really wanted more of a living experience, to be able to hold her kids – he'd been so supportive in searching this out. She talked about how wonderful her children were. There was just something about listening to her that was filled with life and vibrancy, love and suffering – kind of all of humanity in a way. I actually thought, whoa – like I can see in some of your faces now.

When I think back on it, what went in, what I really heard, was the courage and the love and the life about it, in her particular case. And that's just a moment. I'm not always open like that. But in that moment, the quality of compassion is not depressive or self-referencing or overwhelming. Compassion, like metta, like equanimity, like mudita, is one of the illimitables – unlimited. It's a beautiful emotion, one of the brahma-viharas. It is, in a way, an expression of the vastness, of emptiness, where the vast meets the profound. It's not a suffering state.

Compassion arises through the wisdom of the open heart and mind that is in connection with life, that isn't for whatever reason in that moment needing to block, that isn't colored by fear, by aversion, by "how does this affect me."

This moves into the Dalai Lama now. Let's go to him rather than me – he says things better. He talks about how compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering is. And how does that arise? By being present, by focusing on our own experience.

I know Susie talked a couple weeks ago about self-compassion and how profound that can be. It's about opening into our own experience. In that moment of self-compassion, that quality of mind isn't colored by aversion, by self-referencing, by greed. So the practice of self-compassion isn't just to make ourselves feel better and accept what's happening. It's actually the practice of wisdom that opens into the vastness, into the profound.

As the Dalai Lama says, compassion develops by deep insight into what suffering is, by being present, by opening to our own experience, and then this strengthens into a sense of empathy, a sense of connectedness with other beings. We start with what we're presented with in this mind-body, as the Buddha said, in this fathom-long body – okay, I'm paraphrasing, I don't remember his exact words – but something about how in this fathom-long body is the whole world. It's the beginning and the end of suffering. We can discover it all right here. And it does open into empathy.

Pema Chödrön quotes Stephen Levine, writing of a woman who was dying in terrible pain and feeling overwhelming bitterness.

At the point at which she felt she could not bear the resentment and the suffering any longer, she unexpectedly began to experience the pain of others. A starving mother in Ethiopia, a runaway teenager dying of an overdose, a man crushed by a landslide and dying alone by the banks of a river. And then she understood that it wasn't her pain —it was the pain of all beings. It wasn't just her life; it was life itself.

Then Pema Chodron says we awaken this bodhicitta—she's calling bodhicitta tenderness for life—when we no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. In the words of the 16th Karmapa, you take it all in. You allow the pain of the world to touch your heart, and it turns into compassion.

Maybe not right away, but this is really the natural unfolding of this practice that we're doing. Because how do we let the pain of the world touch our heart? By simply allowing the sadness, the physical pain, the loneliness, the fear, the arrogance—whatever it is this mind-body is experiencing—by allowing it to be in the light of mindfulness, in the light of awareness, to let it touch our heart. And it's already turning into compassion.

That moment of how our awareness, our attention meets this moment—this is what the teacher was speaking about regarding kamma and result. The creation of kamma in this moment is the way the mind is meeting what's arising. So however terrible or scary or annoying or beautiful what's arising is, that's the effect of previous conditions. The way the mind is meeting it right now is the creation of present moment kamma.

And so all these moments of simple mindfulness, non-judging, non-clinging—it doesn't seem like such a big deal. But this is the cultivation both of non-clinging and also of compassion, of non-ill will, of mettā. And really, in a way, our own particular experience can open to the universal.

I remember hearing Ajahn Sumedho say once that you don't need any special experiences to get enlightened. You don't have to have special extreme suffering. The circumstances of our own life are all that we need as a vehicle for awakening and for the cultivation of compassion. When we're sitting here suffering, when we're caught in traffic, when we're having difficulty with the landlord.

And not to think the other way either—that our circumstances are so difficult there's no way we can experience happiness or wisdom. Really seeing it's not about the circumstances. We're not limited or defined by our circumstances in either a positive or a negative way.

I was watching a little documentary the other night called Happy, about all the research going on these days about the creation of happiness in our minds. It was from researchers like Richie Davidson and others, though I have to say it was short on science—showing a little chart and saying "studies have shown 50 percent this and 49 percent that" without going into the details. But what I loved about it were the little vignettes of different people in different circumstances, exploring what makes people happy.

The very first one is the only one I want to mention here, because it really shows that any idea we might have that our happiness or suffering is defined by our external circumstances just isn't true. It started with this man who, in whatever way they were measuring, came up as really, really happy. They were interviewing him, and he seemed genuinely happy. He lived in Kolkata, a very poor rickshaw puller. He walks pulling a rickshaw that people ride in. These guys are really poor and work incredibly hard in the slums of Calcutta. And he was so happy.

They showed him with his wife, with his kids. He was so happy to come home. Then they showed the little shack he lived in, which, coming from our culture, it's easy to look at and right away go into this kind of pity—not compassion, but "Oh my god, how can someone live like that?" And yet he was so happy to come home, his son there waiting, so happy when he sees him, there with his wife, showing all the neighbors and how they all support each other. It showed him pulling his rickshaw and describing conditions that I would hear as "Oh my god, how can you bear it?" And he'd say, "Oh yeah, that's just how it is." Really happy. He described himself as really happy.

It was so uplifting to see. But it also showed how easy it is to take a view about ourselves or about others regarding what's possible—both in terms of happiness, and also when we're feeling overwhelmed by suffering, how we can relate to something as suffering that may not be experienced that way at all by the person.

So opening this question of compassion—how do we continue to find the courage to meet, to open to our own suffering and others'—is supported by these moments of clear-seeing wisdom, but also by our steady practice, our willingness to explore: What intention, what motivation of mind am I landing on in this moment?

Years ago I read one line that stayed with me from a teacher. I forget who it was—it wasn't a Buddhist teacher—but he said: In every moment of activity, activity of mind, body, or speech, we are committing to something. The question is, to what?

So that's not a judgment, but just a looking and seeing. As Geshe Rapten, who was a wonderful Tibetan teacher, said: How do we meet this moment? The cultivation of compassion with wisdom, wisdom with compassion, is looking and seeing. And seeing there are times when we can make a choice to act from non-ill will, from compassion rather than cruelty, rather than ill will, rather than clinging.

There was a very ongoing, difficult sangha political situation at his meditation center monastery. I don't want to go into it, but there was a lot of name-calling and power-grabbing, and he was really being ostracized. It was an extremely strange, unpleasant situation that went on for quite some months.

I was visiting there in the middle of it, and the whole atmosphere of the place was really unpleasant. There was another abbot who was basically trying to push Sayadaw U Tejaniya out, although Tejaniya was the teacher and not this other person. This other abbot was trying to get all the money and trying to work up the lay people who were in charge of running the place, saying all kinds of bad things about Sayadaw U Tejaniya. That's how it kind of works in Burma. Everything seems nice on the surface, but in the background, you tell bad stories until someone's shamed and has to leave. That's what they were trying to do.

Anyway, I was there visiting and talking to him, and he was just saying, "Well, I'm not going to leave because I'm here because of my teacher" — Shwe Oo Min, whom he reveres — "and he asked me to be here. This is his center, and I owe that to him, so I'm not going to leave."

And then about this other abbot, there was all kinds of bad stuff about him, and I said, "Well, why don't you at least tell the lay community this other stuff that's going on?" It's not gossip; it's just true.

He said, "No, this is a really interesting situation for me. This is like an examination for my mind, to see how my mind reacts in this really horrible situation. And what's really clear is I'm not going to add more akusala, more unskillfulness, to this situation." So even though it would have been helpful to give this other information, he didn't want to do it because to do it would come from an unskillful place. He said, "I'm just committed not to add more akusala to this situation."

And it was really great to see. It went on and on for months, and then, of course, it all kind of righted itself. That was a couple of years ago, and it's completely different and fine now. But to just see that quality of wisdom that meets the situation head on and then really sees what's going on here. It's not the external situation that's ever the problem, the source of our suffering or happiness. It's right here. We don't need to let ourselves become a victim of any circumstance or to think we need anything in order to cultivate happiness or compassion.

That lets me read this quotation from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche that I really like. I try to work it in every talk, so I don't know if it fits here, but you're going to hear it.

He's talking about ego clinging. He said: "The 'I' is just a thought. Thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. When the thought of anger arises in your mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive, is anger brandishing a weapon? Is it at the head of an army? Can it burn things like fire or crush them like rock or carry them away like a violent river? No. Anger, like any other thought or feeling, has no true existence, not even a definite location in the body, speech, or mind. It is just like wind roaring in empty space. If instead of allowing wild thoughts to enslave you, you can realize their essential emptiness, when you see through the hatred within, you will discover that there is not a single enemy left outside. Otherwise, even if you could overpower everyone in the whole world, your hatred would only grow stronger. Examine the nature of hatred. You will find that it is no more than a thought. When you see it as it is, it will dissolve like a cloud in the sky."

That's the wisdom of emptiness brought to bear on an experience of suffering, with an attitude of compassion. I'm not saying that's always possible, but when there is that wisdom of emptiness, we really don't have to be afraid of anything that we experience. And when we are afraid of it, that's okay too, because that's when we're cultivating, through the moment-to-moment mindfulness, the shifting of our habits. That's what's been happening here over this time. They both kind of work together.

So compassion needs, though, the wisdom not only of emptiness, but you could say another way, the wisdom of equanimity—the wisdom of knowing the uncontrollability, the vastness of experience.

Now, Susie also talked about equanimity the other night. She mentioned the eight worldly winds, knowing that this is the nature of the world. Like I said, the Buddha knew—even with his vast wisdom and compassion, he couldn't make anyone else wise if they didn't want to open. He couldn't stop the violence even in people that he knew, never mind in the whole world.

And if we have a view of compassion, which I imagine most of us do, and we don't recognize it as a view, it either becomes a should—"this is how I should act in a compassionate way." I mean, that's better than not caring at all, right? But don't we often have that? "I should be more compassionate to myself, to others." And there's a sense of not quite knowing what that means, or how do I act, or what's right in this situation. Or doing what seems totally compassionate and wise, but then the result is completely other. And we're so thrown off, or we're upset, or we blame ourselves—because we didn't have the big picture.

But mostly, we're never going to have the big picture. Life is so complex. It's so ambiguous. We can never control outcomes. We can never control or even predict, most of the time, others' responses, or know what all the situations will be, and make all the potential decisions ahead of time. Have you tried doing that about some things here? Figuring out every single thing that might happen, to cover all the bases? Forget about it.

Even in the little things, like walking into the cafeteria for lunch—where will you sit? You can't even control that. You think you can, but someone else comes and sits in your seat, and it's all over.

But take something really more complicated. Have you ever been the medical proxy for somebody who's ill and dying? I have. And even if you go through all the possibilities and you think you know what they want, believe me, the situation that arises will somehow be different from all the things that you went over. And they're not able to tell you, and you have to make your best choice as you can—the choice of what they would want, acting for them. As someone told a friend of mine, "You're not making a decision for them; you're being their voice when they can't speak."

But to be able to do that with all the compassion to really be present for the suffering, and as much information as you can have about the whole situation—the medical ramifications, what will happen if this happens, what will happen if that is done. Will they get better or will they not? Will this increase the suffering? Will this help them recover? And no one really knows. And you have to make a decision, and the next, and the next. And then it doesn't go the way you'd hoped. You make a decision thinking things will be better in two weeks, and instead it just prolongs for two months in agony. And to still be open and present, and not be beating yourself up for that the whole time. I'm not saying I could do that in such a clear way, but that's the union of compassion and wisdom. We never know. And then not to back out. And then to turn around and look and see what decision we make the next time, from as much compassion and as much wisdom as we have.

A story I've often told: Sister Chan Khong—she used to be called Sister Phong—the nun who's the associate of Thich Nhat Hanh. They both were quite active social workers, peace activists in Vietnam during the war, before they got kicked out. Because they were peace activists, neither side trusted them. That's how it is, and they got kicked out.

But at one point, Sister Chan Khong—she was only sixteen at the time. I mean, she's a firebrand anyway, if you meet her, but totally committed to mindfulness first and then action. She was thrown into jail by the South Vietnamese for distributing peace leaflets or something; I don't remember exactly what. And so she's in jail in a cell with a bunch of other women. There were two young girls, eleven and twelve years old, who were in that cell as well, along with hardened criminals and prostitutes—and her. These girls had been swept up when the South Vietnamese army had done a sweep of the village, and anyone they thought was Viet Cong...

They threw into jail, and these two little girls were part of that sweep.

So Sister Chan Khong—because her parents were well-connected and knew the police—she was released soon. And so she was being released and having a talk with the chief of the prison. It seemed friendly. So she said, "Oh, I just want to tell you, these two young girls are in there. They're just innocent. They didn't do anything. And with all these hardened criminals, it's really not good for them."

Out of compassion and wisdom and action, just communicating this. And the response from the head of the jail was, "Oh, I see the prisoners are speaking with one another. That's not good, so we've got to really tighten up the conditions here. This won't do." And that was it. That was the effect.

So if we go into anger, if we go into resentment, if we go into hatred—that's not the way of wisdom and compassion. How vast is this path? How can we do it? If it's trying to do it all, we can't. But one moment—one moment to find the courage not to land in the resentment, in the aggression, just for that moment. Even against yourself. "Oh, how stupid was I?" That's the way we would go, right? "How stupid am I?" No. We had as much information as we had, but we didn't have it all. The movement comes from compassion, and now this next situation is complex. We can't control it. How do we keep finding that?

A few weeks ago, I read from John Lewis, one of the founders of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and one of the original Freedom Riders in 1959, 1960. I just want to read this because he's talking still again about the practice, the way of life of nonviolence. And Jim Lawson was the man who was training these young students. He was a bit older than they—an African-American minister from Ohio, I think, who had been a disciple of Gandhi for a long time and was a conscientious objector. He went to jail during the Korean War, so a long time ago. And then he was giving many workshops to these young students on nonviolence, satyagraha, as a way of life based in Christian love.

This is John Lewis again. One method of practicing this approach, when you're faced with an aggressive, even despicable person, is to visualize them as an infant, as a baby. If you can see them as the innocent child she or he once was, it is not hard to find compassion in your heart.

He says, "When you can truly understand and feel"—and to me this is the emptiness and the compassion together—"and feel, even as a person is cursing you to your face, even as he is spitting on you or beating you with a stick, if you can understand and feel, even in the midst of those critical and often physically painful moments, that your attacker is as much a victim as you are, that he is a victim of the forces that have shaped and fed his anger and fury, then you are well on your way to the nonviolent life."

That's one of the best descriptions of the understanding of emptiness that I could offer. The emptiness is understanding just the causes and effects—yatha bhuta, things as they have come to be.

And it is a way of life. This is something Lawson stressed over and over again—that this is not simply a technique or a tactic or a strategy or a tool to be pulled out when needed. It is not something you turn on or off like a faucet. This sense of love, this sense of peace, the capacity for compassion is something you carry inside yourself every waking minute of the day. It shapes your response to a curt cashier in the grocery store, or to a driver cutting you off in traffic, just as surely as it keeps you from striking back at a state trooper who might be kicking you in the ribs because you dared to march in protest of an oppressive government.

"If you want to create an open society, the means of doing so must be consistent with the society you want to create. Means and ends are absolutely inseparable."

From a whole different angle, but I think that's the unity of wisdom and compassion.

I want to end with something from a very different culture and training, but expressing the same thing. This is from Ajahn Maha Boowa, one of the most renowned Thai Forest meditation masters of the twentieth century. Really very revered, but also very tough. No one would have called him warm and cuddly.

I remember when I first went to Thailand, before I became a nun, I met several Western monks who had come into town and had been practicing with Maha Boowa. They were scared to death of him. They respected him, but they were convinced that he could read their minds—which actually, I think he probably could. In Thailand in general, he was one of those teachers really considered to be an arahant.

But he's not like a Dalai Lama. Everyone goes, "Oh, the Dalai Lama!" Mahabua is like... yeah, he's great. Just to give you a sense—there's a book, I think someone may have mentioned it, Straight from the Heart, which is really fantastic. He was tough, rigid, a fighter.

So this is from him. You needed that background to hear this.

He's talking about yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, which I've talked about—the knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be:

"The mind knows and sees things as they are, within and without, through and through, and then it stays put with purity. Whatever it thinks, it simply thinks. The khandhas are khandhas, pure and simple. The body is simply a body. Feelings, labels, perceptions, thought formations, and knowing, cognizance, or consciousness are each simply passing conditions that we use until their time is up. When they no longer have the strength to keep going, we let them go in line with reality.

"But as for the utterly true nature of our purity, there is no problem at all. Those who have reached full release from conventional realities of every sort—they don't assume themselves to be more special or worse than anyone else. For this reason, they do not demean even the tiniest of creatures. They regard them all as friends in suffering, birth, aging, illness, and death, because the Dhamma is something tender and gentle. Any mind in which it is found is completely gentle and can sympathize with every grain of sand, with living beings of every sort.

"There's nothing rigid or unyielding about it. It's the defilements that are rigid and unyielding—proud, conceited, haughty and vain. When there's Dhamma, there are none of these things. There's only the unwavering gentleness and tenderness of mercy and benevolence for the world at all times."

So let's just sit silently for a moment.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 108

Right View: Making Friends With Awareness

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the Buddhist understanding of sammādiṭṭhi (right view) not as adopting correct beliefs, but as the capacity to perceive experience accurately—yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana, 'knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be.' She traces how perception (saññā) leads to thought (citta), which solidifies into view (diṭṭhi), often without our awareness. Through a memorable story about mysterious orbs in photographs—interpreted as devas by Burmese practitioners and as lens moisture by scientists—Wilson demonstrates how deeply our conditioning shapes what we 'know' to be true.

The teaching explores how saṃsāra operates through our habitual pursuit of pleasant experience and avoidance of the unpleasant, creating an endless cycle that keeps attention focused outward on objects rather than on the process of awareness itself. Drawing on Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche's teaching on renunciation as 'heartfelt weariness' with this cycle, Wilson reframes letting go not as aversion but as a wholesome, peaceful inner quality that arises naturally from clear seeing.

Practically, Wilson guides practitioners toward a fundamental shift: from involvement with objects to taking refuge in awareness itself. She emphasizes that insight can arise from the most mundane perception, since freedom depends not on the nature of experience but on the steadiness and freshness of non-interpretive awareness meeting each moment. Quoting Ajahn Sumedho, she describes how the 'world' we create in consciousness arises and ceases, while awareness itself transcends—offering our true refuge and 'real home.'

It's a kind of famous saying, a reflection on the Buddha's teachings, that to follow the Buddha's teachings is to go against the stream—to need to swim against the stream. And that means both of the common culture and society (and obviously all the different cultures, since his culture was very different from ours), but also against the stream of our mental habits, the stream of our views, and the stream of the flow of the habits and views of our culture. So that's a very famous saying.

When Steve talked about right view last night, one of the things he said was that Sāriputta said one of the two things essential for the arising of right view is to hear the voice of another—to hear right view. You're saying that kind of goes against our sense of "we can figure it out ourselves, we're smart." But I think it's speaking to this sense that we're so immersed in the habits, in the flow of the habits of our mind, that we don't even know it, don't even know how to look out of it.

This is one of the many brilliant delineations the Buddha came to. I mean, how he figured all this stuff out—really beyond genius.

In terms of how we think about things, there's perception. The six sense things are happening over and over; we've talked about that. And perception is just that recognition: seeing is happening, or "that's a plant." Simple recognition. It's automatic. It happens based on memory. What we perceive, we think about. So that leads to our thoughts, how we think about things. Those thoughts describe us, describe our world, describe how we think about things. And then the thought, the citta, strengthens into diṭṭhi, into view.

So right view, sammādiṭṭhi, and there's also wrong view, inaccurate view, micchādiṭṭhi. What we perceive, we think about. But how we think about things constructs our world. And then that becomes the view. It's not that we know we have a view—it's how we know the world is. It's not even something we're aware of. It's just how it is. And we'll talk more about this as we go on.

Our perceptions, as some of you are starting to recognize, are colored by our conditioning. Or as we're saying, even if you're just aversive or angry in a moment, it colors the perception, how you see someone. And if we're not aware of that, it colors—that goes on to inaccurate thinking, into inaccurate diṭṭhi, view of our world. So just to put out that as a possibility: things and the world may not be exactly how we think it is. And then on top of that, we don't even really know how we think it is, because it's often not something we look at.

So a little example, a story. I used to use this in a talk, and it came up in the staff dining room the other day—I was telling this story.

I spend a fair amount of time in Burma. The majority of the people in Burma are Buddhist. And where I've been spending time, and where I was when this happened, was in a monastery meditation center, hanging out with nuns and monks, mostly Burmese people, but also some Western friends, one of whom is a nun who's been a nun in Burma off and on for twenty years, speaks Burmese, and so is really in that culture. In that really committed Buddhist culture, with all the Buddhist teachings and the Buddhist worldview—which includes all the different realms of existence, different lifetimes—there's a lot of faith, and that's just part of the worldview.

We had taken a lot of photographs, and we were looking at the photographs from one specific event where there were several of us and a lot of Burmese people, and it was a dāna offering of some food that was going on. In my friend's camera, two or three of the photos showed, on some of us and in between some of us, these round—perfectly round—balls of light, you could say. But perfectly round. And they're strange looking. And I was like, "Geez, I wonder what that is."

So my friend, the one who's been in Burma for 20 years, looks at it and says, "That's devas." Devas are celestial beings. She wasn't like, "It could be" or whatever. Now you laugh, because we think that's totally ridiculous. That's the way we think. But all the other Burmese people looked and said, "Yeah, that's devas."

So another friend, who's also spent a lot of time there but has a scientific background—she's actually a PhD scientist—looked at it and said, "That's not devas. There's moisture in the lens, and it does this, and it refracts the light," and this and that. We weren't having an argument, but that's just the worldview. It's what it is. So okay, maybe something in the camera. I went that way myself. And since then, the times I've shown people back here, it's really funny to see the different things people say.

Later I looked in my camera at the photos from the same time and place, and there were those same perfectly round things of light, which I've since seen in other photos in other places. The most recent one was when I was meeting with this very amazing Sayadaw up in Sagaing, who's 98. He's just a being of light and love and laughter—an amazing guy. There's a photo of me sitting next to him, and there was one of these big balls of light in between. I thought, "Okay, that could be a deva. That one could be a deva."

My point is, does our mind want to go to who's right and who's wrong and what is it really? My point is: who knows? Who knows? And this "who knows"—this willingness to be fresh and present with an openness of not having to know, to recognize in the perception that we don't know—that's bringing in a quality of fresh, awake awareness.

But mostly we're in "I know, this is what it is," and we don't even realize that it's our perceptions coloring how we think, coloring our worldview. Someone with a completely different—not even completely different, but somewhat different—culture and somewhat different conditioning could have a different world. We run into this all the time, but this is just a good example.

So awareness practice, as we're doing here, in those moments of awareness—just bare awareness of whatever's happening without interpretation—isn't comfortable for us, is it? It's a stepping outside of our comfortable, often unquestioned worldview and self-view. And even though we're giving a lot of information, bottom line, we don't want you to just swallow what we say, because that snaps awareness shut just in the same way as our other views do. It's really this sense of looking fresh in each moment. That's the quality of awareness, moment-to-moment awareness, that we're hoping to practice, to cultivate, to get more familiar with here.

No explanation is final. And even though—and I'll talk about how being caught in our explanations is part of what keeps us in confusion and suffering—stepping outside of it, or just opening up to not knowing, is often rather uncomfortable. We like to know. Like someone said today, they don't like chaos. We want to know how things should be, even if it means we're doing it all wrong. At least we know we're doing it all wrong, and there's some comfort in that. Better than "I don't know, right or wrong. There's no right or wrong. Whatever I'm doing, that's not—that can't be. There's a right. There's a wrong. I want to know what it is."

So this sense of stepping outside of this way of being can be exhilarating. It opens us to this "who knows," this being willing to meet each moment as an unknown. But it's also one of the reasons retreats are sometimes rather uncomfortable. Because as we continue to open to awareness of each moment, we can't just keep falling back into our old habits. We will fall back into them, but we'll notice it. And sometimes they stop feeling quite so comfortable. They start feeling a little constricting, a little bit narrow.

Or we can't find them again. We want them. Someone was saying in a group today, they watched their mind when the pattern stopped—the mind going and searching for an old pattern of worry. At least that's familiar. Watch our minds do this stuff. This is great stuff to see.

So this sense of the opening, this willingness to just let awareness meet this moment with "who knows," not having to have every explanation. And if the mind does make an explanation, notice that's what it's doing without necessarily having to believe it.

This is why right view is something it's helpful for us to get another angle on—because we don't even know the views of the world, the descriptions of the world and of ourselves that we're believing, that we're buying, that are in the background of our mind, running our decisions sometimes.

In this shift into steady awareness, into not just holding to a view, mindfulness is really the heart of it all. It's still a question to me, even though I'm going to speak as if I know—but it's still a question—this simple moment-to-moment awareness. Not easy, right? We see it gets complex. But when you're actually just there, when there's just awareness of hearing, it's so simple we can't stand it, really. It's like, "That can't be anything. How can this do anything? How can it possibly be—" And we're gone. We don't even give it half a chance. We're gone, because that's the habit.

How is it so powerful? How is awareness not in itself transformative, but how does it set the conditions to open into transformative wisdom, into seeing differently? I can't answer it all now, but just offering some thoughts.

Do you know the way the Buddha talked about suffering and freedom from suffering—dukkha? He said, often, that's what he was teaching: suffering and freedom from suffering. The freedom he's talking about, and that our steadiness of awareness and the wisdom it opens into reveals, isn't a freedom of somehow rearranging all the external and internal aspects of experience so everything's nice. It just isn't. That doesn't really sound so great. And even though I might nod and say yes, notice how many times the mind gets caught up in real struggle because this thing happening shouldn't be happening, and if it weren't happening I would be happy, things would be okay, practice would be possible. Maybe there could be freedom, but not with this in the world—a little thing or a big thing.

What the Buddha is saying, and this is more radical and speaks to the right view Steve was talking about, is that the suffering from which he teaches freedom arises because of our misperception of the way things are, moment to moment. Not one big misperception—moment to moment, in subtle little things. That misperception leads to inaccuracy. We understand ourselves and the world wrongly some of the time. And based on that is how we respond, how we think about ourselves, how we try to make ourselves happy. So we respond in ways—basically with clinging, aversion, with delusion—that are trying to get rid of what we perceive as the cause of our suffering. Because our perception is inaccurate, it doesn't work.

Until we stop running like this and just sit and look—that's what we're doing, just stop and look at the mind and see how it works—with, from time to time, this fresh open awareness. Sometimes it's not fresh open awareness, but we notice that too, and then that's another moment of fresh open awareness.

One of the things I love about the translation of sammā in right view is that, in my mind, I hear it literally: right view as accurate recognition, accurate seeing. Seeing not just visual, but recognizing any moment of experience accurately, the way it is. That's what leads to freedom. I think it's so elegant, so beautiful. The Buddha's not saying get another world, fix everything, change everything, and you'll find freedom. It's: recognize how our mind and body works accurately. And the delusion that comes in the way we respond to life will fall away, even in a moment, because it doesn't make any sense. When we really see, in a moment, how craving for something that's over is causing suffering—when we see, not "Oh, I should" or "It's bad" or "They said this," but when we actually see: "Oh, wow, look at that."

It makes no sense. It's gone. It's gone. That's a moment of freedom.

I think it's so elegant that recognizing accurately—and mindfulness is what steadiness of awareness is—what makes this possible is what opens us to the wisdom that brings us to the end of confusion and suffering. Even just for a moment, moment to moment. Don't wait for it all to go away and dismiss everything else. Notice the little moments.

There's one phrase in Pali that I like a lot, that I talk about often. In some teachings, there are levels of different kinds of insights, and they're given names. You don't need to know them; it doesn't matter here at all. But one of them is called yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-dassana, which is often translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are." Yathā-bhūta—often translated as "things as they are." But as I've been told by two good friends who are Pali scholars, the more accurate translation, the more accurate verbal tense, is "things as they have come to be."

Do you get the difference? Things as they have come to be. Don't think about it too much if it doesn't land immediately—just let it settle.

In this moment, it's a sense of the movement of things, that there is no ever-separate one thing. "Things as they are" is like: boom, this is a separate thing. But "things as they have come to be"—there is no separate thing. To me, it brings in the sense that this moment, as it's arising in each of our unique experiences, is coming to be as the effect of so many previous causes and conditions.

If each of you, in your mind, starts to enumerate—what are some of the causes and conditions that came together for me to be in this moment, sitting on this zabuton?—you'll never stop coming up with things. It goes back to your birth. It goes back to your parents' birth. It goes back to the Big Bang, the beginning of the universe. It goes to the farmers that grow the food. All the conditions coming together. How can you extract anything out and say, "This is how it is"?

So "things as they have come to be" gives the sense, to me, of the intricacy, the interconnectedness, the living aspect of life. And then this moment is already a new moment, coming to be with the last moment as one of the causes and conditions. It gives just this sense of—not like nowhere to rest, but there's no way you can pull it out and say, "This is me," or "This is that." It's the interconnectedness, the movement that we call life. Things as they have come to be.

What allows for that accurate recognition? Okay, you know now, right? Intelligent awareness, moment to moment, just meeting whatever's arising in this moment. Not trying to figure it out or recognize it accurately, but just that open totality of presence.

Whatever arises, received in awareness. Maybe we know, "Oh, that's a deva." Maybe we know, "I have no clue what that is." Maybe, "Oh, that's my opinion—it's not a deva. My opinion is like this." And then the next moment arises, whatever arises in that moment.

So it should be so simple, right? It's not, is it?

Why don't we recognize accurately? Steve is going to talk tomorrow, I think, about the kleshas, the torments of mind, the difficult mental qualities that basically distort our perception—as well as causing us suffering when we experience them. So I've just mentioned them, but that's one of the big things.

There's a quotation from the Buddha talking about nirvana. Nibbāna is the word in Pali. One of the synonyms is "the unconditioned," or "the unborn"—the moment of recognition. It's not a place or a thing, but freedom from conditioned experience, freedom from suffering. The Buddha often says, "This nibbāna, this dhamma—visible here and now."

Someone asked the Buddha, "To what extent is it visible here and now?" Not in another world, not in another body, not in another experience. And the Buddha says, "To the extent that greed, that hatred, that delusion, ignorance, confusion are not present in the citta." The citta is the mind, the heart, the consciousness. They're not present in a moment. To that extent, nirvana, freedom, is visible here and now.

Ajahn Pasano, a monk in the Ajahn Chah Thai Forest tradition for many years and now the abbot of a monastery in Northern California, says about that quotation: "Thus our own direct experience is where we can recognize whether or not we're creating suffering by following lust, hatred, and delusion. In our own direct experience, we can also experience the absence of suffering and the peace that comes when these qualities—this following of greed, hatred, and delusion—are abandoned." We're talking in a moment, not forever, in a moment. This is direct perception of the results that come from putting the teachings into practice. It's what has inspired the followers of the Buddha to continue to practice and train in accordance with his teachings.

I share this not so that we become followers of the Buddha, but because it's our own direct perception, our own direct experience that's brought about, that's made possible through the steadiness of non-interpretive open awareness. Our own direct experience of both how suffering is created and how it feels when it is released, when we're not following that. This is possible, and not some esoteric attainment forty-five years from now. It's possible in any moment. What's so amazing is that in the next moment we completely forget about it and go running around after whatever it is. But then we can notice that again. So our own direct experience, yata bhuta, accurate recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment.

Back to our consideration of wrong view, the downstream way of the world, often called samsara—the sense of this ongoing search for pleasure and avoidance of unhappiness, thinking that somehow that's going to make us happy. I want to read from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, a quite amazing Tibetan teacher. It's possibly challenging. I personally find it quite inspiring, but it may be challenging.

It's a long quote, and I won't read all of it, but he talks about three fundamental attitudes in the Buddhist teaching corresponding to three paths or three aspects of our practice, which can be practiced as an integrated whole. I'm just talking about the first one tonight, but I'll name all three. They're renunciation, compassion, and pure perception.

Renunciation—what he's talking about might be different from what you think, which is giving up everything nice and going into a monastery. What he's describing here is the strong wish to free oneself, not only from life's immediate sorrows, which of course we all have, but from the seemingly unending sufferings of samsara. Samsara being this cycle of conditioned existence, the cycle of the endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status. He's defining renunciation as a kind of heartfelt weariness and disillusionment that comes with seeing the endlessness of this cycle, this quest for pleasure, gratification, approval, profit. That's what he's calling renunciation. Not that we give up things, but we see. And this is yata bhuta. We're seeing in a clear way: what I thought, what we thought was actually the way to live, the way to happiness, is actually an endless cycle that keeps us spinning in suffering and wanting and confusion.

And then of course—and I'll talk about this another time—when we see that for ourselves, naturally compassion arises, both for ourselves, but also when we see others caught in that same confusion, there's a natural compassion of heart. And the pure perception is really seeing that every sentient being has the essence of Buddhahood, the essence of awakening, the pure perception, seeing primordial purity in that way.

So in talking tonight about going against the stream, we're starting to see, starting to open to the futility, the weariness of samsara. And that's not something that's really current in the culture; it's not the messages we get. And it's often not what we want to look at.

Now, do you feel all inspired and uplifted? I know I did, but you may not. You may think, "What do you mean?" And then we think, "I can't want anything, I can't have anything. What are you telling me, I have to go sit in a room?"

Our mind goes into all this kind of reactivity. Maybe yours didn't, but some people's does, sometimes.

But let me give you a funny, slightly embarrassing example of samsara. Because samsara, the way it seduces us, isn't that we're aware of suffering all the time. It seduces us with the promise of happiness. And we get caught in it because we think it actually is happiness, that it's increasing our happiness. It keeps us looking to the next thing for happiness. And in that looking to the next thing, the awareness of how things are arising right in this moment—we don't notice. We overlook. And that delusion keeps us spinning.

So I think I've told this before, but last summer I noticed this really big time in my own experience. I happen to be a big fan of professional tennis. I love to watch professional tennis, men's professional tennis. God knows why—I don't play it. But anyway, I love to watch it. And as with many people, if you have a sport, you'll have particular players that are your favorites. So of course I have one: Roger Federer, who last year, when I noticed this, was on a big upswing. It was coming up time to Wimbledon, which is one of the biggest tournaments of the year. So I was watching the whole thing. But for some reason, my awareness of the whole process kicked in a little more strongly than usual.

And I saw this whole process. No one's making me watch tennis. I do it because it's supposed to be really enjoyable, right? So when I'm watching and he's playing, I'm a nervous wreck—which is ridiculous. I don't know the guy. What do I care? Just watch it. It's just perception of seeing and some idea. But really, it is not an enjoyable experience. But I think it is. I'm doing this for pleasure. And my friends who have been around me when I'm watching can attest to that. I was telling this story with Joseph, and he said, "Oh, really? She's not fun to be around when he's playing, if he's losing."

So I was watching this. And of course, in a sport like that, the ultimate happiness is when your person wins, right? At Wimbledon, he happened to win it. And it made him number one in the world again—all these firsts, all these big things, like the best it could possibly be. He won the thing. He got back to number one. He'd won it more than anyone else. There was nothing that could have been better. So that should be the ultimate of happiness. I was watching that.

How long does it last? How long does it last? A day.

Because then the Olympics are coming up. And it all starts over again. It all starts over again. And whatever happens there, when that's over, it all starts over again. And then it changes. And now he's not even playing so much. And his back hurts. And he's not number one anymore. And he hasn't won anything since then. And I said, ah.

This is actually a good example of samsara. Because when you don't pay attention to what's actually going on moment to moment, you keep getting caught up in it. Wimbledon's over—oh, isn't that great?—and then two days later I'm on the computer checking out what's going to happen in the Olympics. And I was in Switzerland or somewhere. I'm always somewhere else during the Olympics, trying to get the computer to work. I was with my friend in a restaurant, and she had her little cell phone. She said, "Look, Carol, it's Switzerland, so it's good to like Roger here." Everybody's always pulling it out and showing me.

And I thought, you know, the whole process—there aren't many moments of real pleasure in it. There are some moments of real pleasure, and that's what keeps you going. But none of that has anything to do with freedom. Do you get a sense of how samsara works? It's a little bit funny, a little bit obvious, but underneath, because we don't really look, we take it for granted.

In many ways—in gross ways like that, in very subtle ways—we don't have this weariness with samsara, with this endless quest for gratification. One of the effects is that it keeps us moving: okay, now it's not good, but some new thing comes up. We may not even notice the wanting, or the sense that this isn't okay, this outside thing isn't okay. And that's a mistake, because stuff's supposed to be better. So how can we fix it? How can we make it work? It didn't work this time, but then there'll be the next time. It's this endless quest. And when it's satisfied, a new one comes up, because nothing lasts.

I think it was Chögyam Trungpa who had a wonderful phrase for samsara: the urge to correct. So just notice in your mind—even when things are as good as they can be, how long does it last? And then there's the urge to get it a little bit better, a little bit better. It keeps our attention focused outward on the object: it's a good object, it's a bad object, how can I make it better? Keeping focused outward.

What we want to do—what we're doing here—is turning the awareness, the attention around, and just noticing the process. When I started noticing the process, I mean, I could have told you about it, but actually feeling it—like when Steve was talking about awareness, you're feeling how it feels. Feel that urge to correct, to get it better, to get it again. "Oh, this isn't good, but the next one will be." We won't really look at that. Just feel that onward leading, the endlessness of it. Not with judgment, but to look and see: oh, maybe there is another way.

This is what can open us to some sense of commitment, of trust, of faith—to just say, okay, let me bring this open awareness to things as they are, not assuming I know how things are. It's a shift of perception that allows us to look. It's steady awareness that allows us to see this process.

And what he's calling the weariness with it, a kind of renunciation—it isn't a kind of aversion, and it's not an act of will. True renunciation is an inner quality of mind and heart that's wholesome, that's peaceful, that's joyful. It's not like throwing something away out of fear and aversion, because that is fear and aversion. That's not renunciation. That's not wholesomeness.

So when I saw all that about tennis, I can't say I renounced tennis—that wouldn't be true. I was just watching it this afternoon. But it wasn't Roger, so it was just very interesting. And that's also interesting to see. I was watching the skill, watching what goes on. Okay, that's fun. And then they say, "Well, it's going to be a tiebreak, but we're running out of time on the TV because we have to put on the big basketball game." And they stopped it. That was it. Boom.

I was really okay with that. Okay, that's the sign—I was okay with it. That's what renunciation is. It's the not holding on. It doesn't mean you have to give up everything.

So this renunciation, it's not aversion. It's not depression. It's not "the whole world is disgusting and I'll give it all up." It's not that. But it's the sense of stepping outside of our normal way of looking at things, with an openness to explore, to recognize more accurately, without an expectation of what that means. And that's when we can begin to discover how suffering is created, how freedom arises—not when we think we know.

And as we've said ten million times, of course, the key, the place where we can put our commitment, is the willingness to wake up into awareness. Moment after moment after moment. We can't create wisdom. We can't say, "Now I'm going to see things as they are and become free from kilesa." It doesn't work. I'm sure you've tried—we've all tried. But we can wake up and notice, "Oh, now wanting is happening, and awareness of wanting is like this." And then the next moment, and then the next moment. That's what we can do.

Again, that makes it sound simple, doesn't it? That's our job, to make it sound simple. We know it's not.

So I just want to mention perhaps two ways that it gets so complicated. Not for you to hold on to—and I think you're going to recognize both of these; we've talked about them already. But just to plant a little seed of inquiry for when it starts to feel complicated or stressed or dissonant.

As Steve has said—maybe I said it, I don't know who said what—all we experience is six things, right? Over and over and over. So just think back for a moment to this day. How many times have the six sense experiences come? It's constant, endless. You couldn't count even just how many thoughts you've had, and that's only one of the six sense doors. So that's what's happening all day long, whether we like it or not.

Now, that's not a problem. But how does it get so complicated? Instead of just seeing, hearing, thinking, smelling, tasting, seeing, hearing, thinking—how does it get so tangled?

One way, of course, is through the habits of mind that we don't see, habits that feed into and emerge from this samsaric round, this assumption that getting the pleasant is going to make us happy. This is really the habit that our mind practices most of our life when we're not aware.

A sight, a sound, a smell, a taste comes. And without even recognizing it, there's pleasant, unpleasant, or neither one. We don't notice that. But in a subtle way or a gross way, we like it or we don't like it, or we don't pay any attention to it because it doesn't seem worth our attention.

And this can be big—"I really don't like that sound, it's driving me crazy"—or it can be some little sound we don't even notice. Or some little nice sound we're not aware of. We just feel a kind of "hmm," leaning toward it slightly. Or leaning away from it. Or ignoring it completely and looking for something more interesting to attend to. Over and over, all of these senses, all of these thoughts.

Even when they're neither pleasant nor unpleasant, we lean toward the pleasant. And what we perceive, we think about and use to describe our world. So it reinforces the sometimes unrecognized, unacknowledged view. It fuels this view that happiness, peace, rightness, goodness, ease in life—all of it has to do with pleasant, nice experience. And when something's unpleasant or difficult? What am I doing wrong? What are they doing wrong? How can I fix this?

And it doesn't mean we never do anything—I'm not saying that. But the underlying view that fuels samsara is: unpleasant means something's wrong. There's something I should be able to do to get things better. The urge to correct, the urge to correct.

Or we don't even notice it. In our daily life there's so much going on that we don't even notice what we don't notice, because there's just so much coming in. And I don't even have to mention how with all the media the attention span has gotten down to two and a half seconds or whatever it is. As soon as something's a little bit neutral, we're bored. And then boredom becomes a problem. But it's just another mental state. Here, we notice it. It doesn't have to be a problem.

What we're practicing—and all of us are really good at this—is in this subtle way re-acting to almost every sense experience that's coming through, even when it's very subtle. And the third way we get involved: we lean toward the pleasant, lean away from the unpleasant, and then construct a whole story about what it means about me, or to me. How can I fit into this? What is this doing to me? And we don't even notice that either. It's just another layer of thoughts. It becomes part of the fabric.

Remember Steve was talking about how we take all these various experiences and through thought weave the fabric of who we think we are? Not noticing that that's changing. The story of who we think we are is changing all the time. Again, we may not notice that.

So this is just a habit. Deeply ingrained to the point that we don't necessarily notice it until we start moment-to-moment awareness. And it seems so normal that we accept it. Like when I talked about pain this morning and I said, well, when pain comes up, of course we want it to go away. There's aversion. Of course there's aversion. That's normal—and it is normal. But don't we think in some way, "Of course I have aversion to pain. Who the heck wants pain? That's the way things are."

To even open to the possibility of freedom from suffering doesn't mean freedom from pain. It doesn't mean we're looking for pain either, don't get me wrong. But it's a whole different paradigm. And that's one of the ways it gets so complicated.

This keeps our attention, our sense of focus, involved in whatever the object is. This experience, this sound, this thought about myself, this emotion, this perception of how this person's looking at me and the way it makes me feel—all the objects. The energy, the meaning is all given to the object. We're involved in reacting to it or liking it or trying to fix it. The meaning of the world, the meaning of ourselves is largely, when unexamined, derived from relationship to object.

And so that keeps our attention turned out. We're trying to make the objects better. And of course, we bring that into meditation, because that's how the mind is working. So if the meditation—and it's whatever particular one you made up in your mind, which could change—if it's more spacious, it's better. If it's calmer, it's better. If it feels better, it's better. But it keeps us looking that way. That keeps us spinning in samsara.

Until we just stop. And what shifts is we're no longer perceiving experience as separate: this is bad, let's get a better one. Hopping from experience to experience without the steadiness of awareness that just allows for the whole series of events, cause and effect. We start to see how things come together to create this experience, how they fall apart, what causes create sleepiness, what causes create aversion. You just explore it.

But when we're focused on objects, relating to objects, it's like we're each living in our separate little bubble of me and my ideas and how each thing relates to me. And the little bubbles kind of bump up against each other sometimes, but we're all separate and our experiences are separate. And it's just not like that.

So the shift—into yata-bhuta is when we start to notice the wider, deeper, more inclusive view of experience. Not just focusing on the object, but we shift to the process.

Andrew Olendzki, who used to be the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies and is now the senior scholar there, a Pali scholar, wrote something once that I really like. He said, "As sati, as mindfulness grows, our mental attention, our mental capacity gradually shifts from the objects of attention to the process of being aware." That's exactly what we're talking about here.

This shift involves, requires, an attitude of letting go of the object, abandoning attachment to the object. It doesn't mean you push the object away—just abandoning that attachment, that involvement with the object. The mind is a dynamic process. When the mind is stuck on what has arisen, it is rigid and limited. But the mind that is letting go moment after moment keeps opening to the emerging flow, keeps opening to things as they have come to be in this moment.

Do you get a sense of that a little bit? And then watch how the mind turns it into, "Okay, this is now what I have to do." That's just what our mind does. You just notice that.

So that's really the shift—the shift from involvement and object and meaning to the process of awareness itself. To me, that's like the paradigm shift. This is my language, but it's true for me. I really feel like it's a shifting of refuge—refuge from samsara, refuge from trying to correct, from trying to get it okay—to taking refuge in loving awareness. And you really do start to love awareness. Whatever's arising, you go, "Oh, that's wanting." It's like this, and there's the feeling of the awareness of the wanting. It doesn't matter what's happening in that moment. It really doesn't. This isn't an intellectual thing, but it's a moment of... it's not complete freedom, it's not liberation, but it's such a sense of difference. "Oh, okay, it's craving. It's like this." There's the awareness. And the interest is in that awareness and the process of awareness.

So that's why we're always harping on it—because we mostly don't even notice it or recognize it. It's just so normal and no big deal. Here we simply want to recognize it, like the foreground-background shift from object to the process of awareness. And the more we start to take refuge there, to trust that shift, the sense of the awareness gets steadier and steadier. And that's when accurate recognition, right view, can start to arise of itself.

So that's really the best way I can describe the power of intelligent awareness to truly transform our understanding of the world and the way we live in it, and actually lead to freedom.

One other way—not a little thing, but the same thing in terms of objects arising so often—another way it gets complicated is this: so much of what is happening, there's still the leaning into it, the leaning out, the ignoring it. So much of what's happening is just so ordinary. What the texts refer to as neither pleasant nor unpleasant. When you're walking from here to the dining room, seeing is occurring every moment. But other than a particular object that we might glom onto, we don't often notice seeing, seeing, seeing. It's just so ordinary. There are sensations in the body or whatever. It's just repetitive, happening over and over—hearing, hearing, seeing, seeing, feeling the breath, feeling sensations—just because there's so much happening in every moment, as you're all aware.

I'm not saying we should try to catch everything. I'm not saying that at all. Please don't. You'd make yourself crazy. But this sense of it being so ordinary, this sort of waiting for something special to happen, is another way that we lose awareness. "Well, this isn't worth paying attention to, so I'll wait until something really important comes." Just notice when that's happening.

And again, awareness doesn't care. Awareness isn't more—I won't say lovable, of course it isn't lovable—but it isn't more fulfilling if the object is incredible. It doesn't matter.

It's that sense of moving into appreciation, into fascination with the process rather than the object. It doesn't matter at all what the object is.

This is something Tejaniya says a lot: our tendency, our samsaric tendency, to think bigger is better, that intense is more meaningful, means that we wait for the intense experience and think insight's going to arise from that. And all this repetitive stuff, which makes up how much of our lives—ninety-nine percent?—we meet with, "Oh yeah, right, there's seeing, there's hearing." Not really that pristine openness, that opening into the unknown.

But insight can arise with anything. It can arise from the most mundane perception. Because it's not about what the object is. It's about the steadiness of awareness, that freshness of not knowing, that time when the mind lets go of the old views that are constricting and not allowing us to recognize accurately. And you never know when that's going to happen. You never know. So that's why every moment of awareness might be it. But if you're wanting, then be aware of that.

Dogen Zenji, the great Zen master, said, "If you cannot discover the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?" So that's a form of delusion.

The last form of delusion I want to mention, something Tejaniya talks about a lot, but I'm sure you'll recognize it, is again how we take a perception of anything—the descriptions, the thoughts in the mind—and we make all these assumptions. Basically, we make up a story about what it means, and then we believe the story.

But sometimes we can see ourselves doing it. Here on retreat is a pretty good place to see that. When you're in silence, and if you don't know a lot of people here—has anyone noticed?—you see someone, you've seen them a few times, you see them come sit down, you see them walk into the dining room. You don't even know their name. And you have a whole story about them, right? What they're like, what their personality is like. I don't know how far it goes. It might just be a feeling sense. But do you know what I mean? Complete assumption.

The longer a retreat goes, the more you really start to believe it. On three-month retreats, people really can get out there about what they think other people are like. And then when silence breaks and they talk, people have told me—I'm not making this up—like in one minute of conversation, all their assumptions were just shattered. They were in love with the person. The person opens their mouth and it's like, "Oh my god. Nothing like what I thought this person was." But we believe it.

So that's an easy one to see. But we do it as making up a view, basically. We do it with practice a lot. We do it whenever we think we know. We don't recognize we think we know. You'll know you're up against an assumption, an expectation, when there starts to be friction, when there starts to be dissonance.

So let's take your practice here. "Well, I'm walking up and down. Like I said the other day, I'm just walking up and down thinking about stuff. This can't be right practice." Or someone said today, "I feel like it's really easy. It's fun. It can't be right." Notice the assumptions we're making, the stories we make up. And again, as Steve said, that's what we do about our stories of who we are.

So watch that. It's a lot of fun. It really is. If you're just watching it without judging, just with this unbiased awareness, this uninterpreting awareness, watch the stories. What particular experiences or memories or perceptions—"that person looked at me funny"—and it brings up all the bad things you ever did in your life. Notice that, and then all the bad memories that you have, and that story of me, and the feeling that goes with it. And it feels so true. It feels so real. It's real in the moment, and that feeling is real.

But the idea that story is accurate—that's not real. And then notice when it changes: the next day, the next minute. Just watching that reveals a really huge delusion.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, who is perhaps a forty-year monk in the Thai Forest tradition, a very great and respected teacher. He says: "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself—my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires—and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho." Can you relate to that? It takes off into orbit: my views, my feelings, my opinions. And I can get caught in that world—that view of me that arises in consciousness. And that's all it is: a view arising in consciousness in that moment. It's an object, like any other object.

But if I know that's what's happening—that it's just a view in consciousness—then my refuge is no longer in being that person. I'm not taking refuge in being a personality, or in my views and opinions. And so it goes away. I let it go. And the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends.

Now, he says ending doesn't mean that Ajahn Sumedho dies, or the world ends, or that I'm unconscious. None of those things. In Buddhadhamma, the world is the world we create in consciousness. That's why we can be living in different worlds. The world of Ajahn Sumedho is not going to be the same world that you create. But that world arises and ceases. And that which is aware of the world arising and ceasing is transcending that world.

So our refuge, then, is in this awareness—rather than in trying to sustain refined experiences in consciousness as our refuge, because you can't do it. Resting in this conscious awareness is what he refers to as coming home, or our real home. It's what I call taking refuge in awareness, loving awareness. And awareness includes anything.

So let's just sit.

CHAPTER 109

Five Spiritual Faculties

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson examines the five spiritual faculties (indriya) that form the foundation of balanced meditation practice: saddhā (faith), viriya (energy), sati (mindfulness), samādhi (collectedness), and paññā (wisdom). Drawing from the suttas and Sayadaw U Tejaniya's teachings, she explains how these qualities work together as what Tejaniya calls "intelligent awareness" or "the meditating mind."
> Wilson distinguishes between "bright faith" — the initial inspiration that comes from external sources — and "verified faith" that arises from our own direct experience. She addresses the particular challenge of self-doubt in Western practitioners, noting Ajahn Sumedho's observation that our strong identification with personality leads us to take both successes and failures too personally. The talk clarifies viriya as patient persistence rather than forceful effort, emphasizing the quality of "not shrinking back" from difficulty without pushing aggressively.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's discussion of vipassanā samādhi versus samatha concentration. She explains that the stability developed through awareness practice is flexible, open, and not dependent on any single object — quite different from the absorbed, one-pointed focus many practitioners expect. This balanced collectedness allows wisdom to arise naturally. The talk concludes with practical guidance on recognizing when faculties are out of balance and how they naturally support and correct each other through steady, wholesome awareness.

Tonight I want to talk about what's called the five spiritual faculties, sort of the complement to the eight thousand defilements. It's very important that we recognize both.

Remember how Steve started his talk last night? I want to read the rest of that sutta. This translation is a little different—it's from Ajahn Sumedho and Pasanno, but it's the same sutta:

"This mind is radiant, but it doesn't show its radiance because passing defilements come and obscure it. The unwise ordinary person does not understand this as it is. And so for them, there is no development of the mind"—basically thinking that defilements come, that's it, they're permanent, there's nothing else to do. "This mind is radiant. It shows its radiance when it is unobscured by passing defilements. The wise noble disciple understands this as it is. Therefore, for them, there is development of mind."

I like this passage because it shows both sides, and that's what we're doing here—developing the mind in ways that we talk about with steady, intelligent awareness. As Steve spoke so clearly last night, this leads to the wisdom that sees, feels, recognizes, and understands the torments of mind, how they work, and allows the wisdom to come in that begins to disentangle us, free us, disidentify from it.

Not at the exact same time, but together with this process, wholesome qualities are happening quite a lot of the time too. It's just as important to recognize the wholesome, uplifting qualities of mind as it is to recognize the torments. We're saying recognize whatever's there, but I want to point out that sometimes there's wholesome. And it's important to recognize these with the same non-judging awareness with which one recognizes the torments.

I'm going to talk about these five faculties tonight. There are lots of ways to discuss them. I'll be somewhat experiential and conversational, and also talking about them in the way that U Tejaniya does, his particular slant. There are many slants, so this isn't definitive, but hopefully helpful and supportive for the way we're practicing here.

These five spiritual faculties, which are going to be very familiar to you, work together. When they come together in a balanced way, Tejaniya calls that intelligent awareness. Sometimes he calls it the meditating mind. For us, when we have that experience—even just briefly—where the awareness is getting its own momentum and there's interest, and whatever's happening isn't so important but you're just there, interested, it's going along... well, there's a pretty good chance, I would say for sure, that those five qualities at least, and there are others too, are coming together in a balanced way. That's when you can see the awareness and the wisdom are really rolling along. So it's very important to recognize these.

I'll read a bit from the book. When you experience wholesome mind states—I say wholesome rather than good, because we tend to think of good as feeling good, and it doesn't necessarily mean that—actively recognize them, actively remember them. Remembering is like mindfulness. Not to hold on, but to recognize them, remind yourself that you're experiencing a wholesome mind state. Let it be conscious, not swept under the rug.

Remember that wholesome mind states are possible—this is for when you're having a hard time—and that this is what the wholesome mind state feels like. In other words, just like with the kilesas, the defilements, recognize it. Because we're hopefully meeting it with steady awareness, we'll also see the causes and conditions that give rise to it and that strengthen it. If you know why it's wholesome or how it feels wholesome, try to see that for yourself. That will help you recognize it and remember, and it will strengthen faith later when you can't recognize any wholesome mind state and you start to think there never has been one in your life. Then you can try to actively remember: oh yeah, I had that moment of faith three and a half weeks ago.

These five qualities of mind are saddha, faith; viriya, energy; sati, mindfulness, which we've talked about a lot already; samadhi, often translated as concentration but which I want to translate as collectedness or balance of mind; and paññā, wisdom. Each of these is a huge field for discussion. I can only give little snapshots tonight, but my hope is to trigger in you the interest and recognition so that you explore it in your own experience. If you take this in only as the first level of wisdom—secondhand wisdom—and just remember it, that might help you know these qualities exist. But really I want to get your mind curious, to bring it into awareness.

To start by talking about saddha, or faith: it came up in one of the groups today, and it is a key state of heart and mind for actually doing our practice. We usually think of faith as inspired by what's called bright faith—by seeing or hearing someone, or seeing something about someone else, or something we read. The beginning of faith, the first inspiration of it, generally comes from some outside source. A lot of people hear the Dalai Lama talk and get all inspired, for example.

The classical definition of faith in Buddhist countries would be faith in Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. You have faith in that and it gives you energy. But that doesn't necessarily work for us if we haven't been born and brought up in a Buddhist culture; it doesn't mean anything particularly. Sometimes when we're not thinking of faith as a quality of heart and mind, we keep thinking faith means faith in Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha, or faith in something. That's a kind of intellectual understanding. But it's not how we can experience it here.

It's a mental factor, an experience of mind, of heart. So I want to describe some of the ways it's characterized and how I experience it.

This bright faith, this first inspiration—"inspiration" is actually a good translation in English. When you think of times you've felt inspired, there's an energy, isn't there? A kind of brightness in the mind, in the body, and an uplifted quality. The manifestation of it in our practice, as Sayadaw U Pandita used to describe it, is that saddha, faith, manifests as the willingness to do. It's what gives us, for a moment, for some time, the commitment, the energy to actually say, in terms of our practice, "Okay, another moment of awareness. Okay, I will not get in my car and leave." I know most of you have had that thought. Sometimes we think we should check car keys at the door. But that willingness—sometimes it's just a moment of grim determination, heavy and forced—that's not faith. But you know what I mean by that sense of something that inspires us. It's simply the willingness to do.

And so it may be hearing or thinking about the Buddha and what he discovered. It may be seeing someone else, or talking to a friend, or reading in a book—anything that sparks in us, "Okay, there's something here, something I want to explore, something I want to discover." And of course, it's moment to moment. Sometimes it can really give us a lot of commitment, carrying us for a while. But in the beginning, this bright faith is still inspired from outside.

I feel a lot of empathy for people who are on their very first intensive meditation retreat, who haven't done a lot of practice, because the only faith you can have at that point is this bright faith. The other kind, verified faith, comes from our own experience. When we've gone through some experience and we really see, "Oh, it's really true. If there's just awareness of clinging and the clinging goes away, there's peace"—that's really true. You know it for yourself; it's verified. And that's a deeper, more personally accessible level of faith.

But even faith coming from the outside gives us confidence, gives us energy. I remember hearing on the radio when Obama was first elected president, right after, the day after. They were interviewing a young African-American woman in Brooklyn or somewhere. I still get chills. I can't remember exactly what she said, but she was so inspired to think that she could do something different, something more with her life than she had ever thought was possible for her. And you could hear in her voice that energy, that inspiration, that commitment.

We catch it from each other. That's exactly how inspiration works. That's one of the beauties of sangha. Even here, you're hitting a place where you're slumping through the day and you think, "I can't find one reason to be here. I can't remember why I came." And then somebody just walks by and something about the way they walk or the way they're practicing strikes you. And you go, "Okay, if they can do it, I can do it"—hopefully in a wholesome, faithful way. And then we take turns inspiring one another.

So just beginning to recognize that feeling when it arises in the mind is important, because it gives us the energy, the confidence, the willingness to do.

Now, this faith is not greed. Greed thinks about results. You could also have energy and commitment by thinking, "If I do this, I'm going to get that." That's not faith—that's greed. Faith may include the sense of, "Yes, it is possible to free the mind from kilesa, from defilement," as Steve was saying last night. But then the faith gives us the confidence without feeding the greed of "When am I going to get it?" Instead, it gives us the confidence to open into the moment with awareness. It gives us the confidence to drop into the moment, into the unknown, to just do the practice. That's how you know it's faith—you can feel the upliftingness, the wholesomeness of it.

Where if it's greed, "Yes, by God, I want to rid my mind of kalesha, and by tomorrow!" – if you tune into that, you can feel it doesn't feel uplifting. It may feel like it's giving energy, but you can feel the difference in your mind. And if you don't know what I'm talking about, explore and see. That's what I'm trying to inspire – to look and see. Because when it's wholesome, it's not feeding kalesha, it's not feeding defilement, and it's not fueled by defilement.

So faith is essential. Without it, we just don't have the energy, the willingness to do. Otherwise it's just, "Well, that sounds like a nice idea. What's on TV?" Or, "That's the bell in the morning? Okay, yeah, I'm not letting those guys get up before me. I'm rolling over. It doesn't matter."

All of the five faculties work together in balance. And faith needs to come with a balance of wisdom – not just intellectual, but clear seeing. Because otherwise, faith can be kind of blind, where you're so inspired by someone. "Yes, if they can swim the English Channel, so can I!" And without any training, you jump in and start to swim. That's blind faith – unless you know you're a world-class swimmer and you can do it. But faith needs to be balanced with wisdom, the clear seeing of what's actually so.

Faith, this collecting of our energy, this uplifting quality, this willingness to do, is also for many of us in this culture so important because it can help to counteract, to help move through our patterns of self-doubt. Self-doubt, self-judgment – which I know one or two people here have experienced once or twice during the course of this retreat. And it's so strong. In this culture – I don't know if it's Western culture or the rational scientific worldview or what – but certainly we know from meeting with people in meditation retreats, and I see it here, all over this country, and in Europe, it just seems to be one of our stronger conditionings. Not everybody, but many people.

Our personalities, our belief that "I'm the one doing it, I'm the one making this happen," is so strong. So we take it all so personally. If it's pleasant, if it goes the way we want, that's a personal success. If it isn't going the way we want, if it's unpleasant, it's a personal failure. And none of that is inspiring faith. That gets us really caught up in success and failure and self-doubt.

Ajahn Sumedho, whom I quoted last night – he's an American man, but he spent many years as a monk with Ajahn Chah, who was a great Thai forest meditation master. He lived in Thailand, learned Thai, taught in Thailand, and then Ajahn Chah sent him to England to bring that monastic order to the West. Once some of us were meeting with Ajahn Sumedho and he was just talking about teaching. Someone asked him, "Do you notice any difference between meditation patterns when you're working with Thai people versus when you're working with Westerners?"

This is broad, but I found what he said quite interesting. He said his opinion at that time was that one of the biggest hindrances he'd seen for Westerners in our practice of meditation is self-doubt. Self-doubt in our own insights, self-doubt in our own experience of awareness, in our own little moments of freedom, of liberation – even if momentary freedom from patterns that we suffer from. And he said he thinks it's because we give so much belief to our personalities, so much weight to our personalities, that we get caught back into them immediately.

I would put that in terms of what I said before: we think we're doing everything. It's all up to us. Even when it's going really well – say here on retreat, when there's a momentum of mindfulness and it's going along and there's no sense of personal effort and you're having fun and it's flowing – it's really common to doubt it. Even a dear friend of mine who's been a meditation teacher for years said, "Well, this can't be right because it's just going along and I'm not doing it. Somehow, it's too easy. Something's wrong." Because we think it's all about me. We get caught back into the personality pattern. And when it isn't going well, of course, it's so clear that that's our fault because we're jerks and hopeless.

But he said he's really talking about those times of just touching awareness. Or if you start to recognize these wholesome qualities I'm talking about, you think, "Well, okay, it's here now, but that's a fluke. It just came in by chance, and it'll go because it's nothing to do with me." In a way, it's not about "me." It's just nature. Just as the defilements have their nature – the causes and effects and how they behave, doing their job – so too do the wholesome qualities.

So too does faith.

But it's very interesting, this way we don't trust ourselves because we think it's all about "me," and it's cheating. This stuff just happens by itself.

Just to give you an alternative possibility, one little example. Some years ago in Burma, I was teaching alongside Sayadaw U Lakkhana, who's a Mahasi-style Burmese teacher. In the way he was teaching, he had been saying in a talk about this noting practice—whatever arises, the mind notes it, you go to it and note it. He was saying, "Note it three times. If you note it three times, it'll go away." Which, you know, forget about it. That's not what happens.

So he was saying that. And then the way those retreats work, when he would leave, the other Western teacher and I would take questions—this was a retreat for Westerners. My friend U Lamang was translating for Sayadaw, who spoke in Burmese. So somebody said, "Hey, I'm noting it three times. I'm here, I'm mindful, and it's not going away. What am I doing wrong?" And they were so upset—it was like a whole crisis. Which we do, right? "What am I doing wrong?"

So we just talked about that. Later, I was speaking with the translator, and he said, "Oh, that was so interesting. Because it's the same for us. When we note it three times, it doesn't go away. And I always wondered." I said, "Oh, and then what do you do when it doesn't go away?" He said, "We go, 'Oh, well, never mind.'"

It's an alternative possibility. You just say, "Huh, what? Oh, well, never mind." You don't have to figure out how you're failing.

So this sense of faith, of not taking it so personally. Again, Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "The problem many yogis have is that you're so used to making things happen in your life. In daily life, they're used to setting themselves goals, applying a lot of effort, and achieving what they want. Then they do the same in meditation. They want to be good, very good, the best. When they—you, we—are not as good as they want to be, they quickly become disappointed. That's why they lose faith and why they lose interest in practice."

You see? That's a faith based on getting results. It isn't really the uplifting faith—it slides into wanting. And then we do get discouraged, falling into self-doubt.

So looking again and seeing that sometimes we can actively turn to outside resources when we don't find the inner resources that bring up the faith, or the memory, or verified faith. We re-tap into that inspiration, each of us finding what works for us. Nothing wrong with that. Really helpful.

But you see, tuning into that sense of uplifting, of commitment, of willingness to practice in our mind—that is saddhā. And learning to recognize and trust that. At the same time, not taking it personally, just as we don't take the defilements personally. Cause and effect.

There's one sutta called "The Inquirer," where the Buddha is telling someone what things to look for in a teacher to see if they're completely awakened, like the Buddha himself. At one point, the Buddha says, "Yes, purified states are found—purified states of mind are found—in the Tathagata," meaning himself. "There are purified states in my mind. They are my pathway, my domain, where I live."

But I do not identify with them. There is no craving for them—just their recognition. This is here, how it arises, what its effects are.

It seems obvious, and it's true in this order, that the arising of faith, the willingness to do, then strengthens the next factor, which is virya, or energy. In the way Ajahn Tejaniya is talking about it, it's a mental factor. So we're talking about mental energy—not necessarily the bodily energy to run a marathon or something. That comes from mental energy, of course, but here we're talking about mental energy specifically.

I'm using "energy" rather than "effort" deliberately. Sometimes virya is translated as "wise effort," but for many of us, effort comes together with a sense of need, of doing to achieve, and a kind of leaning forward for a result that's fed by striving. That would be unwise effort. But here, virya as energy, mental energy in the mind—just by itself, depending on the context, it's not necessarily wholesome or one of the five spiritual faculties. There can be enormous energy in the mind directing us to do amazing things that aren't necessarily coming together with right view, right understanding, and mindfulness.

Back to my tennis example: if you watch these players, it's amazing the amount of moment-to-moment clarity and virya they have to bring up with each point. I love watching just to see the level that these qualities can be cultivated to. But is the motivation, are the surrounding mental factors, necessarily all wholesome ones? I have my doubts. There's got to be a strong element of wanting, of craving, and self-identification. I'm not saying that's a horrible thing, but it isn't wholesome. It's not purity of mind. Certainly you can see as they get frustrated in a match—okay, there's a little bit of aversion being fed too. Enormous virya, and it's not a bad thing in the world to play tennis, but it isn't the wholesome state of virya as a spiritual faculty.

So that's how we're talking about it here. We call this "ethically variable" virya. It takes on wholesome or unwholesome qualities depending on what other mental factors are arising together with it. If we want to call it a spiritual faculty, then it comes together with wisdom, with right view, with mindfulness.

As an internal experience—explore it for yourself, because we're all different and we have different access to virya—but the way we're talking about it here as mental energy is that it's not pushing. Rather, it's a sense of persistence, of patience. Not resignation, not negativity, but that quality of "never give up." Sayadaw has that big sign on the door into his kuti: "Never give up." And all that means is when you come and say, "Oh, I was aware of this and this and that, but then there was just aversion," we say, "Oh, awareness of aversion. Next thing." That's just never give up. And now this, and now this. It doesn't have to be dramatic—"Never give up, my God!"—but just showing up, showing up, showing up.

So it's a balanced kind of effort. If it's all intensity, you can't keep going with it. You get exhausted. So it's this patience, this persistence, with a quality of interest, not pushing for a result. But it also has—you can feel this—it's described as not shrinking back from the difficult.

You can notice this when some difficult experience comes up in your mind. If there's awareness, you're not trying to do it right, but the awareness is just there. Something happened today—I can't remember what—but I was doing something and some negative state came up. I guess I was thinking about this because I've been contemplating these teachings. I could just see how the awareness, the energy in the mind, when that unpleasant state came, just wanted to go, "No, I don't want to go there." And virya is just like, no, not shrinking back. Just staying here, just meeting what's happening. It's a kind of courage. Moment after moment after moment with the difficult, with the unwholesome—just not shrinking back.

And with the wholesome, virya supports what is wholesome. So let's say you're recognizing, you're feeling saddha, faith, in your experience.

It's kind of uplifting. And then virya comes in to recognize it, to meet it, to be there with it too. It supports the wholesome.

But really here, in the way we're practicing, virya shows up simply as that patient willingness never to give up. Am I aware now? Am I aware now? Notice that quality of not shrinking back.

Sometimes virya is just not there. But as we get more familiar with these wholesome qualities, sometimes you can start to actually look and recognize that it could be there—you're just not noticing it. The kilesas make more noise. The defilements, they kick up a ruckus. And so they call our attention in a wholesome way or an unwholesome way. But sometimes we can notice that virya is there.

Virya is not something I have in overwhelming amounts. I have to work with noticing it. It's there. We all have it. We couldn't even stand up without it.

Take something simple, like getting out of bed in the morning. Not when there's a huge thing pressing, but just lying there thinking, I don't know... I'm aware, and I can be just as aware like this. And if I fall asleep, so what? Whatever happens doesn't matter. When I wake up, I'll be aware again. Which, on one level, is true. But then there's another part where you can just be aware of the whole thing. You can see the kind of unwholesome craving coming in. And the awareness notices that.

I do this myself a lot. Suddenly I'll just remember—like Tejaniya was saying—I'll just remember virya. And it's kind of, oh yeah, just that meeting what's happening. It meets that unwholesome, and you just get up. No big deal.

So we can actually, being familiar with these qualities, turn to the wholesome more often than we might think. This is development of mind. This is strengthening the wholesome. But it's done with wisdom, not with wanting, not with aversion.

For it to be wise virya, wise effort, it comes together. It's not fed by kilesa. You could do amazing things. You can look like you're practicing really well, sit through a sitting without moving, absolutely committed. But the motivation could be complete aversion. You know what I mean? You think you're doing good practice, but look and see—if the motivation is aversion, it's not wise effort. It's unwise effort, because what's being strengthened is aversion.

So you can check. When you feel that you're using a lot of energy, physically or mentally, sometimes we feel like there's virya, but it feels like we're pushing, really pushing, getting fatigued just from sitting. Then just check. Check in the background the quality in the mind. It's the same thing we've been saying all along.

Look and see if in this effort that we're putting out—where it feels like, well, I'm really working hard here, this is what I should be doing—it's back to the faith issue, the not trusting. Unless we're working so hard we're about to fall on our face from exhaustion, we feel like we're not really practicing.

So look and see when it starts to feel like that. Are you wanting, expecting, or trying to make a particular thing happen? Or do you have the expectation in the back of your mind that a certain thing has to happen for it to be okay?

Just looking and seeing. And for sure, that effort is being fed by greed, by wanting. Or is the effort in some subtle way trying to make something stop happening? Back to that thing about noting—if you note it three times, it goes away. So we say, okay, let me note it, note it, note it, go away.

Almost everyone I've talked to over time, at some point here, has this puzzling experience. They say, "I know I'm really aware of this thing. I'm describing it really clearly." And then they'll kind of stop and look puzzled, and you say, "But what? You mean?" We know—"But it's still here." Implicit in that is the belief that if we were aware rightly, it would go away. That's aversion.

So wise effort is just not shrinking back from the difficult, but not pounding it with a stick either. Just here we are. Or sometimes we're using a lot of effort, trying, and we don't even know what we're trying to get or what we're trying to stop, but there's just a feeling of dissatisfaction or confusion. We don't know what to do, so we're trying this and trying that. And that's delusion. That's moha.

So then just settle back and remember: the only task is just awareness. Am I aware right now? That's all. And you see, we're back to faith—needing some faith to trust enough to do that.

Another teaching from U Tejaniya about the motivation of wise effort: he says effort that comes with a defilement is, of course, wrong effort. Most yogis make an effort with some kind of desire. Effort comes together with defilement. So you just need to be very clear whether you're making an effort with lobha, with greed, or whether there's this other quality, chanda, which is sometimes translated as "wholesome desire." I find that confusing. It's more like a zeal, an interest, a willingness. It's not a greed for a result.

He says when you make an effort with greed, with lobha, you become tense and you'll suffer. When you're successful, you'll feel very happy. And when you're not, you may become upset or even depressed. That's one of the results we can see—it's a clue that it's unwise effort.

But when the effort comes with faith, with willingness to do, with chanda—wise desire, desire for spiritual growth—you don't suffer. The mind will become stronger, more powerful, more balanced. When you "succeed," you will not feel elated. And when you "don't succeed," you don't feel upset. This is the result of right effort.

You never give up, but again and again and again, just meeting the moment. We're not elated, we're not depressed, because it's just what's happening now. What's happening now? Just the effort to meet the moment—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. There's nothing to be elated or depressed about. So that's another sign that it's a more balanced effort. It's courage, not shrinking back.

Now, mindfulness—sati—I don't think I need to say a lot about since that's what we've been talking about since the beginning of the retreat. It's just that simple awareness, not forgetting. Tejaniya likes to talk about it this way: it's just not forgetting. Don't forget to watch yourself. Don't forget awareness—just in that very simple, light, relaxed way.

Now, mindfulness—and I think hopefully you're starting to get this—doesn't have to come together with a heavy directed focus. Are you starting to at all believe that? Yet?

I know for many people, including me, who have done other practices, for many years mindfulness was always coming together with a kind of very focused quality of mind. And because they often came together, it was easy to confuse them, to think that mindfulness meant that heavy focus, that it was part of mindfulness, that you have to have that.

What we're hoping you're starting to see here is: not. That's a different quality of mind.

So mindfulness is just this simple moment-to-moment awareness—just not forgetting. Am I aware? What's happening now? It's not that we have to put it in and hold on, but as soon as you remember, here it is again. That accessible. The virya keeps us doing it.

The steadiness of awareness, as we've said ten million times already in four days, leads to momentum. It starts to get its own momentum, which leads to continuity. We're committing to continuity, but all we can do is whenever we recognize we're not aware, we're back in awareness. Continuity doesn't mean we try to hold on to every moment and that we can somehow make it be steady. That's out of our control. That's wrong effort. But that persistence—that each moment of waking up in mindfulness, we're willing to do it. The faith gives us the willingness to do it. The virya gives us the ability not to shrink back.

The steadiness of mindfulness leads to the mindfulness getting its own momentum, which cultivates samadhi, the fourth factor. And I want to say a bit about this, especially in terms of how we're practicing vipassana here.

Samadhi is often translated into English as concentration. In my experience of working with a lot of people on retreat, it's one of the qualities of mind—and again, it's ethically neutral, just as virya is. You could really have a very collected mind in service of sneaking into a house and stealing something without getting caught.

We often think of samadhi as this one-pointed, really focused, intensive concentration leading to absorption, to jhana, which is one manifestation of samadhi. But often it comes to be that that's what people call concentration, and that's what they think the factor of concentration in our experience should feel like. And because when it is really heavy and deeply focused like that, you sometimes have experiences. We like experiences because then our self-doubt kind of goes away and we think, "I'm doing something and I'm getting somewhere." So it feels good, and we want more concentration, and we get really hooked. And when you can't get that kind of concentration, that kind of one-pointed absorption, you think, "I can't do it, and everyone else can." There's a huge amount of suffering. I've worked with a lot of people suffering so much—not from not being able to do it, but from the idea that that's the only thing that means really good practice, that that's what wisdom comes from, that that's what it's all about.

So I would like to say: no, it's not what it's all about. It's one of the factors.

Here, samadhi is more... Steve Smith likes to describe it as "perfectly put together." The mind is perfectly put together. Samadhi is really a mind that's balanced, a mind that's steady, that's stable. It doesn't have to be a unification of mind in the sense of all focused and absorbed on one object, object-oriented. It's unified in the sense that all the scattered mental energy all over the place is collected and right here.

The experience we can have of vipassana samadhi—this steadiness of mind—is peaceful, but it's also relaxed. It's light, it's cool, it's flexible. Yes, it's pleasant, but this kind of samadhi is not just about one-pointed, object-oriented focusing.

I'm going to call that other kind shamatha, samatha—tranquility practice—which is a very valid and useful practice. But here, the samadhi that develops through the steadiness of awareness on whatever is happening, this vipassana samadhi, has a different quality.

Sayadaw Tejaniya says vipassana samadhi does not depend on an object for its stability. In shamatha samadhi, whether it's the breath or a light or whatever, the mind just comes. You focus, focus, focus. And as the mind does get very unified and strong and collected, it's peaceful in a way. Because as Steve said last night when he was describing the three levels of kilesa, the second level of obsessive kilesa is kind of kept away by the collected mind. When you're really focused on something, greed isn't coming up, aversion isn't coming up, doubt isn't coming up. And it is lovely—definitely lovely. But it doesn't have to just be one-pointed focus.

The way Sayadaw Tejaniya talks about it—and I'm going to talk about it that way since that's how we're practicing—he really doesn't stress focus.

In fact, he tries to help people break free from being really attached to focus. He says that kind of samadhi—very focused and one-pointed—is also kind of heavy. It's brittle, it's fragile. It really depends on having all the circumstances just right so you're not pulled out, so you can really concentrate. And as it gets heavy, wisdom isn't going to arise because you're not seeing anything else except just that one object; the mind is absorbed into it. Wisdom isn't arising there.

So Vipassana Samadhi does not depend on an object for its stability. The stability in the mind, the collectedness in the mind, comes from right understanding, from right view, which together with the continuity of awareness gives the mind stability.

How do we experience that? How can you recognize it in your practice? A lot of times we don't even think of it as samadhi because we have this other idea so strongly ingrained. As Tejaniya says, we're looking for some kind of state almost like a trance, and that's what we want from samadhi.

But this kind we're talking about is quite different—the mind is flexible, open, relaxed, awake and alert. There's a sense that whatever's arising is not a distraction. It's not like, "Oh my God, that sound is going to wreck my samadhi!" or "These people walking too fast are wrecking my samadhi," or "If I have to make that phone call, it's going to ruin my samadhi." This is a balance of mind that comes from right view—just awareness of this, without the mind constantly getting caught in liking and disliking objects. That's where we get all upset and distressed.

When awareness is simply meeting what's happening moment after moment without liking, without disliking, this freshness arises, this flexibility, this equanimity. The mind isn't fragile or brittle, so whatever's arising isn't a distraction. Learn how to recognize that, because it feels different from really heavy focus.

This kind of samadhi takes longer to develop, sometimes, on a retreat like this. And it's one of the things that people who've done a lot of practice in other styles find themselves distrusting when they try this approach—because it's like you've got no proof that anything's happening, until you start to notice the cause and effect with awareness.

I remember one time when I was sitting with Tejaniya in Burma, maybe one of the first times. As Steve has probably mentioned, there's talking there; it's not in complete silence. I was doing my walking meditation somewhere, and someone came up and started talking to me. My response was just, "Okay, the usual." I'd gotten used to it by then. In the beginning, people approaching felt like they were wrecking my practice—they don't even walk back and forth in lanes, they just walk across and through—and I'd wonder how anyone could develop any steadiness.

But by this time I was more balanced with it. I was just walking and aware, pretty present with whatever was happening. There was a sense—I wasn't calling it samadhi—but there was this sense of presence, flexibility, balance of mind, steadiness of mind. This person came up and talked. I stopped. That was just the next thing happening; I wasn't thinking about it. We had a little conversation, then I went back to walking.

And I noticed that the awareness was actually even stronger than it had been before the conversation, that the mind was steadier, even more collected. Awareness had been going through the talking, and not only was it not a distraction, it was as much a seed of strengthening awareness and samadhi as anything else.

That's a little moment of verified faith. You see, "Oh, it's a different kind of samadhi." Exploring moments like that becomes illuminating. And then, of course, as with most pleasant things, the habit of mind comes in: "Oh, how can I catch it?" That's where virya comes—just bringing awareness to that. "Oh, that's wanting." You can feel it. And then wanting becomes the next object of awareness. It doesn't have to be such a distraction if the steadiness of awareness keeps going, which is another way samadhi manifests.

The awareness, the steadiness, begins to have more and more of its own momentum. As someone said in a group today or yesterday, they started to be aware of all kinds of little stuff they didn't even know was there, things they weren't looking for. Awareness was just doing its own job. It starts to get stronger and subtler, noticing all kinds of things. "Oh, that's happening."

I didn't know that. And it's really this sense of I'm not doing it or looking for it. The awareness is just getting steadier and stronger, gaining its own momentum. That's also a way you can experience samadhi in the mind.

So the ingredients for samadhi are, of course, right attitude—not fueled by greed or aversion, not all about "me getting something." Mindfulness, the steadiness of mindfulness, and the continuity of mindfulness, just as I said. It's not a forcing kind of energy.

I would encourage you to feel free to experiment with this. Not like testing to see if something is really true or not, because that's a little bit of aversion in the mind. But don't be so afraid that you're going to wreck your samadhi that you're walking around on tenterhooks.

I think I mentioned before—I think it was this retreat—that I spent one retreat in a different style of practice with a strong kind of focused moment-to-moment samadhi. We were landing on one object and really being present with it, then landing attention on the next object, a kind of noting called momentary samadhi. But it had that element of very strong focusing. It was helpful; I'm not saying it wasn't helpful. But I didn't recognize until I was finished with that retreat that I had spent about a month in a very strongly steady, clear awareness, moment to moment, strong samadhi like that, focusing. Yet there had been this attitude in the mind...

It's like I was walking around like this, with my mind like this, trying to hold on to the samadhi. I worked so hard for this. And this is a sign that practice is working. I don't want it to go away. Identification with it, enjoying it, and wondering what it means about me. Finally, I never thought I could have samadhi, but here it is.

And when I looked back, I thought, how could I not see that? My God. It was so stressful and tight.

So here, we say it doesn't matter—just look and go, "Oh, wanting in the mind." Just playing with it and seeing. "Oh no, I better not look because that might mess up my—" Oh, look at that. Attachment feels like this. Just be free to play with it and see. It'll go away because, you know what? Everything does. And it'll come back again.

So we're not holding on, but we're really learning through wise attention what the causes are, what the conditions are that strengthen samadhi. And that's just wise attention, understanding, not taking it personally, knowing it's all just nature, seeing cause and effect, and continuity of awareness. Wishing it were so isn't one of them. Thinking, "If I want samadhi hard enough, maybe it'll come" isn't really one of the causes and conditions that brings it about.

And so we're just free to keep looking and seeing, looking and seeing, not trying to hold on to a state, not taking it personally. That's how the wisdom factor starts to manifest.

And so that's the fifth—wisdom.

Wisdom, as I think we've said a couple of times—I've certainly said in the groups—one way you can talk about wisdom is on three levels. The first level, and this is in the suttas, Tejaniya talks about it a lot but it's actually in the suttas, is what we've been discussing: secondhand wisdom. Or as Steve said with right view, the voice of another—some information. Even that level of wisdom is a form of paññā and is helpful in terms of the five spiritual faculties working together. A certain kind of practicality, a sense of the wisdom of knowing how to practice, knowing what to do. That's a kind of paññā, and that's useful.

It's not transformative wisdom, but as Tejaniya talks about how the five spiritual faculties working together are what really make intelligent awareness, he says, "I'm not talking about deep transformative wisdom. I'm really talking about this practical paññā, practical wisdom of just knowing how to practice." Knowing what it feels like when there's awareness and when there's not. Being able to look into the mind and get a feeling for how much effort is being put out or not. Just very practical stuff.

So that's the first level of wisdom—information. And the second level, combining the first and second, is this thinking about things, thinking it over, cogitating, looking in our experience and going, "Yeah, that really does make sense."

I can really see. And this has also been coming up in groups. That's often the level where we say, "I really know. For example, I really know impermanence. I know it's true. So how come I keep getting caught in clinging and disappointment?"

Sayadaw U Tejaniya says something about this a lot, not as a judgment. He goes, "Oh, well, there's a lot of awareness. You're seeing this whole process of something arising and the clinging to it, and then it goes away and the disappointment. And then you say, 'I know it, but how come this is all happening?' I say there's a lot of awareness, but there's not enough wisdom."

Because the really deep transformative wisdom is the third level of wisdom—insight wisdom—that is an effect. It's not something that we can input or wish to happen. It's not in our control, which I find hugely relieving.

So the steadiness of awareness, the balance of mind, the faith, the energy—all of that together that allows the steadiness of practice—in itself wisdom then does the work of freeing the mind and heart from kilesas. Not our wanting, not our pushing, not our trying. We can't make the wisdom; we can just have the faith and the energy for the steadiness of samādhi, the steadiness of mindfulness that leads to the balance, the collectedness of mind that allows wisdom to arise. And then wisdom does the work.

Just one last thing: all of these five qualities need to work together in balance. And they do balance themselves. You can feel when it's like that. But let me read Tejaniya's words again, since I wanted to do it more his way.

He says, "Yes, definitely, the five spiritual faculties work together. If any one of them becomes too strong, if it does too much of the work, it kind of blots out the other four. The others cannot be effective anymore. They can no longer do their work properly."

Then he qualifies this. If somebody has too much samādhi, the wisdom is not strong and cannot grow. If there's that just zooming-in focus, there's not space for the wisdom to arise and grow. The vīriya, the energy, cannot be strong because of the heavy concentration, and sati, mindfulness, is not sharp. And if those three are not working well, then saddhā will suffer. You start losing confidence in the practice.

If the wisdom faculty is too strong—and here later he clarifies, by the way, he doesn't mean insight wisdom; he said that can never be too strong—but the wisdom faculty of rational understanding, seeing clearly, being practical, investigating is an aspect of wisdom. Interest is an aspect of wisdom. If that gets too strong, if there's too much interest, intellect, questioning, investigation in that way, too much thinking, then there's no samādhi. The mind has no stability.

And this is where faith needs to balance that kind of wisdom. Sometimes this wisdom and thinking and analyzing and questioning manifests as wisdom, but we end up in big doubt. And that's where we need the inspiration of faith to just do, to just say, "Okay, awareness is like this. What's happening now?" So the mind has no stability, and again, this leads to the deterioration of the remaining faculties, and faith suffers, of course, again.

So the five faculties need to work together in balance. And they do. Sometimes you can recognize they're out of balance, like getting really focused in and you don't know what else is going on. And you don't berate yourself, but you can say, "Oh, let me just get a little interested. What else can the awareness notice right here?" You just bring in a little bit of interest. Or with too much questioning, see if you can get that inspiration, the trust, to just do again. A lot of effort and the mind's jumping all over the place—you might want to let the attention get a little more quiet, a little more settled for a minute.

So we can play with these qualities. But the most important is the recognition, really seeing through the steadiness of attention the wholesome qualities, how they manifest, how they support our practice, and how they lead to the development of wisdom, freeing our heart and mind.

CHAPTER 110

Compassion: Natural Expression of the Pure Mind

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson illuminates how compassion (karuṇā) and the other brahmavihāras—mettā (loving-kindness), muditā (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity)—arise spontaneously as natural expressions of the pure mind when awareness is steady and unclouded by greed, aversion, or self-referencing. Drawing from both Theravāda and Tibetan perspectives, she explains that these beautiful heart qualities are not separate from vipassanā practice but emerge naturally when the mind is free from the kleśas.
> Wilson explores how our habitual response to dukkha is typically aversion—pushing away, denying, or trying to hold ourselves separate from difficult experience. She offers the profound question from Joko Beck: "Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?" This willingness to meet experience with kind, steady awareness rather than resistance is itself the cultivation of compassion.
> Through personal stories, including her own journey with chronic illness, Wilson demonstrates how bringing compassionate awareness to difficult experience transforms our relationship with suffering. When we stop trying to hold ourselves separate from pain—our own or others'—wisdom naturally arises, allowing us to see clearly and respond appropriately. She reminds us that we learn to hate; it is not natural. Starting where we are, moment by moment, we discover that compassion is not something far away that we must achieve, but the natural response of awareness meeting life with openness.

So tonight, what I want to talk about is just sharing some thoughts about compassion—compassion as it is an expression of steady awareness, compassion as a natural expression of the pure heart, the pure mind, as we can explore it and experience it here in our practice.

What made me want to talk about this is mostly listening to people in the groups. Certainly a lot of what we all experience is difficult experience. That's at least fifty percent of most of our lives and a lot of the things that happen in practice. A couple of days ago in one group, the subject of compassion and metta came up. For those of you who aren't familiar with that term, metta is another state of mind and heart, translated into English usually as loving-kindness. It's a kind of friendliness, an open-hearted connection.

In the group, the discussion came up because one or two people were experiencing kind of spontaneous, strong compassion or metta just from the steady awareness. As the discussion revolved with all different people, there was a kind of surprise or finding it a bit unexpected that compassion was coming up so strongly in this awareness practice. For those of you who are sort of new to this style, one of the other kinds of practices that we teach, that we learn from our Burmese teachers, is the specific deliberate cultivation of metta, the loving-kindness state of mind, or of compassion. Those are specific practices that we do that are focusing, one-pointed practices. They work together with insight practice, with Vipassana, but they're not Vipassana. You can't do both at the same time.

I just got the impression—which could be completely wrong, as we all know; what we think we hear and decide it means often has very little connection to what was actually said or what the person meant—but anyway, I just wanted to talk about the fact that it's not like they're two separate things. It's not as if, wow, it's so strange if metta or compassion or appreciative joy or equanimity come up in the awareness practice when we haven't been really just cultivating that.

What I want to talk about, specifically compassion—just because you can only pick one, and it's very useful in terms of our experience here—is the natural expression of the pure mind, the pure heart, in the appropriate situation.

There are four attitudes of mind, attitudes of heart you could say, towards living beings that are often called the four divine abidings. They're these beautiful states of heart and mind.

One is metta, loving-kindness, which is just this open-hearted friendliness, connectedness—natural. It's sort of like you'd feel if you go out and you're just in a nice space. You're not filled with aversion or greed. You walk out and say there's two little kids playing or two little puppies playing. It's just kind of like, oh, you just naturally feel a friendliness, right? Unless you're a real meanie. When you naturally feel that, that's just naturally metta. It's no big deal. It's normal and natural when the mind isn't clouded with greed, confusion, or all caught up in ourselves.

Compassion is that quality of connected mind, the response of the heart and mind—that same open heart and mind—when it meets the suffering aspect of a being. It's the empathy, the quivering of the heart, the openness and connectedness in the suffering.

If what we meet in a being with the same open, connected awareness is their happy aspect—they're having a lot of happiness and success—the natural response is mudita, appreciative joy. This is a great thing. You don't have to have great stuff happening yourself. Someone else can be really happy, and that can bring out the happiness in us. It's true. It's a great way to be happy.

And equanimity, which as an attitude Steve talked a lot about in terms of the subtlety of the mind, but also as a specific state of mind and heart in relationship to beings—it arises basically if there's something going on with a being, someone, that we really can't do anything about. Like knowing they have their own karma and we can't fix everything. So it's the mind that's really connected. It's not disconnected. Really connected but non-reactive in response to a being's situation.

As I say, they're all natural expressions of wisdom, natural responses of the heart and mind that is pure, even just pure in a moment.

The Tibetans have a way of talking about the nature of mind, dividing what doesn't really exist into three things that you can't really separate. But this is how it is that we talk, right? No wonder we're all confused. Anyway, the qualities of the nature of mind, you could say, depending on which angle you look from. When we're talking about whatever arises being known by awareness, and all objects being equal—awareness doesn't care, all objects are equal—that's looking at the emptiness aspect, meaning empty of a separate, self-existing, isolated self. It's all connected, the emptiness, all equal. But that doesn't lead to an indifferent disconnect, which is what our rational mind might think. Well, if everything's the same, and as we've been saying, awareness doesn't care...

Awareness doesn't care. What do you mean? I want to care. It's not a gray disconnected "who cares." It's that awareness doesn't get involved and reactive. So that side is looking at the emptiness.

Another quality is the naturally awake knowing aspect, sort of like that big mind we pointed to this morning where the sound arises and it's just naturally known. It's simply a natural quality of mind. It's not like you think, "Now I think a sound's going to come in a minute, so I better crank up the knowing so I can hear it." It just happens completely spontaneously. It's an amazing thing, but it's so common we don't even really look at it. So that's what we're examining.

And the third quality—the Tibetans say this third quality is called ceaselessly responsive. In other words, it's not just cooled out emptiness, whatever happens is known, never mind. But one of the four responses arises naturally in appropriate activity when met with the appropriate person. It's not like we have to go looking for it. And sure, most of the time our mind isn't quite in that pure state—we've talked about that a lot. But I just want to talk specifically about compassion as a kind of shorthand for all of these ceaselessly responsive beautiful states of mind.

Because it may seem sometimes like compassion is far away, like we're really having to work for it. And we're so overwhelmed when we experience a deeply loving or compassionate moment. It is kind of sad to me that it seems so far away and unfamiliar, and that we're much more friendly and at home with the big Ds, as we might call them—the defilements. We don't like them, but we're really at home with them.

And it just makes total sense, even in a rational way, that in any moment—not waiting until total awakening, but in any moment—when our mind is not clouded, when our awareness is not clouded by wanting, by aversion, or by "it's all about me," that relentless, obsessive self-referencing of almost every perception... Have you noticed that? And this isn't to judge. This is just to notice. You hear a sound and it goes, "Well, I hope people see I didn't do that." Everything. "Oh, the snow. Oh, it's going to affect me. It's going to be cold tonight." It's not a bad thing, but it's just the way our minds work.

And so this self-referencing often leads—not even in a big way, but in a little way—to a kind of calibrating, managing, figuring it out, making it comfortable for myself. It might come out of fear. It might come out of wanting. The first few days of a retreat—maybe you don't remember anymore, way back there with the dinosaurs, the first few days of this retreat—but you're kind of trying to manage it. Where are you going to sit in the dining room? Where's the best place? And who's going to sit near me? And who can I stand to sit near? And who do I not want to sit near? And what's the best time to eat? And what about my job? And where am I in the hall? Getting it all sorted out. It's little stuff, right? But how much air time does it take up? Everything is calibrated in terms of what does this mean about me and my comfort and getting through the retreat.

So when that drops away, even for a moment, it's such a huge relief. And there's all this energy that's bound up in that management that becomes available for connection with life.

for recognizing the bigger picture. You don't even have to think about it. It's just naturally the heart, the mind is more open, more connected, free from resistance and self—this kind of sense of self that separates us.

This isn't some big thing now: go out and get rid of sense of self. I'm not saying that. Just notice the moments, which I'm sure you have, when you hear a sound and the first thought isn't "what does that mean about me?" You just hear a sound. And we can see the big picture, respond from wisdom. That's what we mean by the steadiness of awareness. We see the big picture.

There's a story I heard on the radio. I guess it's true—it was on public radio. I mean, you never really know. It's like too good a story; I have trouble believing it's true. But I told it last year in Switzerland, and someone came up and gave me more detail, so at least someone else heard it too.

Apparently in London, when they were building the big Millennium thing, they built this Millennium Bridge, a new footbridge over the Thames River. When they first opened the bridge and several hundred people were walking over it, this story was talking about something called enlightened self-interest, which they thought had been like a financial policy. They believed if everyone acts from enlightened self-interest, everything would be okay. This was around 2009. Something about that didn't really work. What could it have been?

So they were using this example. Hundreds of people are walking over the bridge, and the bridge starts shaking. The bridge starts really wobbling over to one side—quite embarrassing, having just been built. Everyone on the bridge acted from enlightened self-interest, but with the focus on "me." So it's leaning this way, so everyone stepped over the other way. That didn't really fix things. It just made the whole thing worse.

You get a sense of that. Even when we're trying to act in a helpful way, when it's this obsessive self-referencing, we can't see the big picture.

So that's how it is for us a lot of the time. No blame, just starting to recognize that's how it is. And this is what our practice in all its forms is for—not to get rid of it, but just to see, "Oh, that's what's happening." And we start to see through it. Everyone's experienced moments of that.

I read from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche one night. He's talking about three fundamental attitudes of the path, just from his point of view. The first one is renunciation—seeing through, getting exhausted, giving up, having a weariness, a disillusionment with some sorrow with the endless quest for gratification. Just saying, "Oh, this doesn't really work." And we've talked about that a lot.

The second attitude he talks about is compassion, which he describes this way: it is born when one realizes that both the individual sense of self and all the appearances of the phenomenal world are actually empty of any intrinsic independent existence.

That's that yathā bhūta, all conditions coming together. When one sees the suffering that comes from one's own and from others' fundamental ignorance about this—which misunderstands the display of appearances as being composed of separate, permanently existing entities—that's not perceiving impermanence, as Steve talked about last night.

When one sees how much suffering comes from this misunderstanding, one who has even for a moment understood this absence of independent existence naturally acts from the boundless compassion that you feel for those who, under the spell of ignorance, are wandering and suffering in samsara.

You get that sense when you're having just an insight and you really see, "Oh, it's just like this. What's the problem?" And you see someone else who's so caught in that moment, so caught in the fear or the wanting or the anger that we were caught in yesterday, but now we're seeing through it. That can elicit not "the stupid jerk," but real compassion. Compassion, that empathy with: wow, this suffering is so extra.

And that's really the seed of compassion.

The third essential quality he calls pure perception. He's talking about this at the most ultimate, highest level, but I'm going to refer to it at a moment-to-moment level. Pure perception recognizes the Buddha nature in all sentient beings and sees the primordial purity in all phenomena. Every sentient being is endowed with the essence, the potential of Buddhahood, just as oil pervades every sesame seed. Ignorance is simply being unaware of this potential—in us, in others—like a poor person who does not know there is a pot of gold buried beneath his hut. The journey to enlightenment is thus a rediscovery of this forgotten nature, like seeing the ever-brilliant sun again as the clouds that have been hiding it are blown away. The same metaphor.

So it's not a one-time rediscovery. When I talk about a moment of pure mind, pure citta, where there's awareness—maybe the five faculties present, but not the kilesas—this potential for accurate recognition, for seeing the wider view, for the natural arising response of compassion or metta, appreciative joy or equanimity, it's just nature. It's just the natural response.

What we're hoping for in this retreat, in any retreat, is of course that the trust in the steadiness of awareness grows in each of us, and also that we begin to have more verified faith that this is the truer, the deeper response of our natural mind. Greed and hatred and confusion seem so much like our nature. They seem like the truest thing, but they're not. And we all see that in our experience.

Let me offer a composite example, not a particular one. When Steve talked last night about the first noble truth and all the difficulties of that, you get a sense perhaps of why—I get a sense anyway, the more I practice—the Buddha, when he had to distill all his teachings down and picked four truths as the hub, felt that pointing out this truth of dukkha was so essential. Steve talked all about it, so I don't need to repeat it.

But consider: what's our habitual response in the face of any of those aspects of dukkha that Steve talked about? When we're not paying attention, just in our normal mode, what's our natural response to the unpleasant, to uncertainty? The habit is anger, right? Or dislike, or aversion, or fear. That's just normal.

The anger can be outer blame or inner blame, some way of trying to push the experience away, keep it away. And if we can't keep it away, then another kind of natural response is a passive submission, a resigned attitude: "All right, I'll just accept it. This is what's happening, and I'll just stand it until it's finally gone." You can tell from how I'm describing it that this also has an element of aversion. This is not acceptance. This is not wisdom. But sometimes that's all we know—we can just endure until it's gone, holding ourselves separate from the experience.

Or there's outright total denial that it's even going on. And isn't denial an amazing faculty of mind? It's just incredible. Denial of suffering in ourselves, outside of ourselves.

I'll tell a little story. I was in the hospital a long, long time ago. I'd been there a few days, and there was a lot of pain going on, and they hadn't figured out what it was. So I wasn't in the most balanced, wonderful state—let's put it that way. They were trying to give me an IV, and my veins had sort of collapsed after a few days, and the nurse couldn't get it to work. That's not like horrible pain, but it's unpleasant, definitely painful. Then the nurse couldn't do it, so she ran out and grabbed a doctor in the hallway. And I thought—no offense to any doctors here—I thought, "Oh no." Because the nurses are the ones who do it all the time, not the doctors. Not a good sign. So the doctor came in and started working on it. I was just wasted. Little tears were rolling—I wasn't really complaining, but just a little tear rolled out.

He just looks at me and goes, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt." Just totally dismissive, you know. And I can understand why, because the motivation was to help. But when it's so uncomfortable for us to be with our own pain—or any pain—then we can't be there for someone else. The empathy that becomes compassion isn't there because we can't be with our own pain. So I could really understand that. Not that I was analyzing it at the moment—I was just enduring. But I can really see that to be able to help, he had to cut off. So okay, fine. We all do that. Not on purpose, but our mind has that capacity. It's quite amazing.

What we start to see with the steadiness of awareness is that there's a whole other possibility, a whole other way of being, which is bringing this steady, non-judging awareness to whatever's happening. And sometimes when I'm talking about the compassionate aspect of awareness, when things are difficult, sometimes reminding ourselves that awareness doesn't care—but it can also be kind. It can kindly not care and just be with whatever's happening. And that can effect a complete change in our understanding of the situation.

Let me give an example. I'm making this up as a sort of composite. But if something's been going on, or someone here has been doing something that bugs you—whether they're making a noise, or you don't like the way they look, or they're breathing loud behind you, or you don't even know what. But you see this person, and there's aversion. You just don't want to be around them for whatever reason. Or you may know the reason, because they make this noise, whatever. And just being human, we can't help but make noises, right?

Our normal way would be either we just try and push the whole thing away and pretend we're equanimous and loving. That doesn't work, right? But what aversion does—the Buddha described it—what makes aversion grow is that aversion works by giving unwise attention to the repugnant aspect of something. Have you noticed that? Somebody or something's bugging you, really bringing up aversion. And it's their fault, of course. They're making you feel aversion. And the mind just can't stay away from that thing that's bugging you.

Thich Nhat Hanh gives the example: if you have one rough tooth, and all the rest of your teeth are fine, your tongue will go to that rough tooth like every five minutes. You're not running your tongue over the rest of your teeth. And you feel it, you get upset. You feel it, you get upset. You feel it, you get upset. It can go on for days. That's unwise attention to the repugnant aspect of something. And we just get focused in on that.

So with our steadiness of attention, we say just keep noticing, let awareness just notice the whole process. Many people have given examples of where you start to see more of the whole process. First there's that person making that sound. Then you keep watching. Oh, that's a sound. It's just a sound, being with a sound. The sound's just the sound. Then you see the person. Well, the person's just a person. Oh, there's that thought—they remind me of my third grade teacher who was so mean to me. And you kind of see that.

And in the seeing of just the whole process—I'm making this up, this was nobody's story—in the seeing of the whole process, suddenly that aversion in that moment towards that person is gone, isn't it? And you see them with new eyes.

Perhaps there's just the connectedness of mettā, of friendliness. Or maybe there's compassion. You see whatever noise they're making, they can't help. And you feel compassion, quite naturally. It's not something you have to try and create.

It may seem like a small thing, but please do notice it. The effect of steady awareness meeting what's happening—not trying to push it away or figure it out—naturally opens out of the self-interest and aversion to seeing the whole picture more clearly. And the wholesome, pure state of heart and mind arises as a response. This can all happen in just a second. The next second it can be gone; we all know that. But that doesn't mean it isn't true and isn't real in the moments we're experiencing.

Compassion, generally one way of defining it, is the tenderness, the quivering of the heart in response to the suffering of another—this empathy with suffering. It's generally described as meeting suffering, and not just another's, but our own. And that's where I really am going to concentrate the rest of this talk: meeting what's arising, the difficult experience, with just this open, simple awareness presence, not pulling back, not shutting off.

In the big picture, compassion is generally spoken of as the motivation for action. Compassion is the movement, the action to alleviate the suffering of another, which is certainly in the world of action. In the biggest picture, in some of the Buddhist teachings, the strongest, most powerful expression of compassion would be bodhicitta—the motivation, the commitment, the intention to practice, to come to full awakening in order to awaken all other beings. This real sense of: my practice is all for the awakening of others. So that's the grandest expression of compassion.

But what I want to talk about here is recognizing that in the way the Buddha described all actions, especially of speech and of mind, the seed of all actions is in the mind. All actions originate in the mind. The intention that gives rise to any action is mental. Someone was talking about this in a group, just playing with drinking tea and kind of waiting till the mental intention would arise to lift the cup. And you can play with that. You can just sit there, and sometimes when there's no time frame, you can sit there for two hours. You can play with this mental intention in the mind. It really is fun to play with this stuff.

The intention is just the little urge to speak, to move, even to think. And as with awareness, it comes together with whatever motivation, whatever qualities, whatever mental factors are in the mind. So compassion or hatred, saying something harsh or saying something loving, or just getting up and walking to the bathroom—everything comes with the intention that comes together with whatever particular mental states accompany it.

Compassionate action, the action to alleviate another's suffering, originates with this compassion, with this empathy, with this tenderness—for oneself, for beings—in the mind. And an action that might look like you're trying to alleviate suffering in others or even in yourself... you can't tell what someone else's intention is. Heck, half the time we can't tell what our own is, right?

So you could be trying to do something to help someone and really mean it, but the internal motivation could be a kind of fear. Have you ever experienced that, like being with someone who's suffering or seeing someone in a difficult situation? And you want to help, but actually what you feel is a kind of fear. In a small way, I sometimes feel this if I'm walking in a city and there's a homeless person, or someone who seems really mentally ill and wanting some money. I want to give, and I also feel a little bit afraid. And then I'm ashamed of feeling a little bit afraid. All this stuff is going on.

So I may go and offer something. In a way, that's a generous action. It's a somewhat compassionate action. But I can also see the difference between the times when it's just that movement of "Here, may this help?"—and it feels beautiful and connected—and other times when there's fear. Fear of being in the face of pain. That's a natural part of our humanness.

So here, on retreat, what we have the opportunity to explore is really the difference in our own mind, in our own heart, in the habits of our mind and heart, when the response to suffering—and here it's our own suffering—is aversion or fear versus when there's the potential for steady awareness to just meet what's happening with an openness that allows for the arising of empathy and wisdom and compassion. This is really what we can learn, what we can practice, what we can work with here on this retreat.

The Dalai Lama, as you know, is meant to be the incarnation of compassion. So how does he speak about how compassion develops in our mind stream?

How does it strengthen? The Dalai Lama says it's from deep insight into what suffering is—deep insight, which arises by opening to, by being present with our own experience. Where else can we start? And through this openness, which is precisely what we're practicing here, through this openness to our own experience, the compassion strengthens into a sense of empathy, connectedness with other beings.

Have you noticed, let's say if you're going through something difficult—whether you're ill or perhaps going through a relationship crisis or just some difficult emotional or physical experience—and you have different friends or people who come to try to comfort you or help? We can feel the difference. There's someone who wants to help genuinely, but actually in themselves there isn't the ease. In that moment, awareness can't simply be with the pain in themselves. So the helping often takes the form of "you could do this to fix it, you could do that to fix it, you could do this other thing." And it's well-meant, but it doesn't have the same sense. It just doesn't feel quite like the same kind of compassion as when someone else sits down and they can just be there with you. It's not saying "oh, I know" or anything in particular, but they can just be there. The heart, the mind, the awareness can simply flow into that pain, whatever it's engendering in our own mindstream at that moment. And it feels so different. That's the sense of empathy, the sense of connectedness with other beings in terms of compassionate action, compassionate presence with suffering.

And so here, and through our lives, this is really the field where we learn that. As the Dalai Lama said, we're exploring for ourselves our own experience without judgment. This is exactly what we've been saying—just let the awareness come into the whole process and watch what happens when we come face to face with a difficult situation.

That's why, on retreat anyway, the difficult times are so important. We always say that, and people think, "Yeah, right, you just say that to shut us up and keep us here." But they're really, truly important. We don't feel like we're being totally mindful because we think if we were totally mindful, it would all clear up, don't we? Even though we've said it a million times, don't you really think if you're doing it right, this difficult thing is going to clear up? And it doesn't. And you go through a whole sitting or a whole day and you're in and out—there's awareness and then you're lost in aversion or fear, awareness and lost in it. You think, "What's the point of this?"

But then the next day, or two hours later, or the week later, a similar kind of thing starts, and suddenly the mind is just there, touching it, open to it. The whole experience is still unpleasant, but the insight of what's really going on arises out of it. And it's a completely different, freeing experience. Out of that comes compassion or joy or love, a kind of understanding we can't get except through the steady experience of awareness.

So in some ways, we could think of it this way—this is a little too simplistic, but you can consider it like this: whatever's arising right now in your experience, beautiful or difficult (and we'll stick with the difficult ones since we don't complain about the beautiful ones, although we do get caught in wanting), whatever's arising right now, or yesterday, or in the next moment, it's the result of all the previous causes and conditions coming together. Yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be right now. In this moment, it can't be any different. So thinking "it's my fault, it's wrong," and all of that—we do that, but it's useless. It can't be any different. That's like past karma.

But how in this moment awareness, our mind, is meeting this moment—that's the creation of present-moment karma, of present-moment action. So the most confusing or horrific or boring or difficult stuff could be going on over and over. Yet every moment that there's that willingness to just meet it with clear awareness—even if you can't quite do it, but there's the willingness, or just to remember, "Okay, awareness can be kind. What's going on? I know this pain, this aversion. I can't do it. This is one big mess"—one big mess feels like this. In that moment, that's a cultivation, a development of compassion. It's how we're meeting the moment that these wholesome qualities are developed—and also the unwholesome ones. If you're meeting the moment with a hammer, if you're meeting the moment totally believing judgment and blame, then that's what's being cultivated. But as soon as you see that with kindness, you're back in a moment of compassion.

So it's always available. And whether it's difficult or whether it's beautiful, this is how we're cultivating compassion. And it's really powerful. We don't see it moment to moment until suddenly something that we've just been struggling against or fighting with or that seems utterly unbearable—suddenly the perspective shifts. Because we're able to just touch it rather than trying to run away from it.

So we start where we are. But it's really scary sometimes, isn't it? This isn't what I wanted to spend my time with. Or where I am is too mundane—that's another way you can get on yourself. I don't have big enough suffering. Does anyone here think they don't have big enough suffering? But it doesn't matter what it is. It's just the habits in the mind. We start where we are.

And it's hard because of the habits. I don't know about you, but I really see, as I said before, that the general habit to difficulty is aversion. It's as if we trust aversion and fear and anger to protect us. It feels right. We should stay separate from difficult and scary things. Of course, it's easier to believe that if it's someone out there. But that same habit of mine comes inside. So there's a pain or there's an unpleasant situation—better to stay separate from it. And all our strategies are like, how can I somehow hold myself separate?

But when there's anger, ill will in the mind, we can't see clearly. This is from the Buddha: "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, dislike, aversion, and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good or the good of others or the good of both."

So even when we're angry but trying to have good intentions, you can't see clearly your own good or the good of others. Yet somehow many of us have been, you know, raised and trained to believe that this is what's going to protect us from pain. We don't really trust the soft, kind awareness, the willingness to just be steadily with whatever's arising.

The Dalai Lama was asked one time about what looks like a lack of compassion in human society. He said, "Perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state, fueling it and reinforcing it. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger."

So this is a question from Joko Beck, a simple way to just ask yourself when we're all caught up, when we can feel we're caught in some difficult situation: Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?

I think it's a great question. Some of you are trying to analyze and see clearly and note it and get it all straight—but what's the motivation? Get the heck rid of it. Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? Can you just hear the ease, the kindness, that lets awareness come into that and see the whole thing in a different way?

The wisdom, the compassion, the clear seeing—that's really natural. All we need to do is set up the conditions for it to arise. The aversion and the hatred—it's nature, but it's not our natural being. It's not our natural mind.

Bishop Desmond Tutu from South Africa, Nobel Peace Prize winner and one of the architects of the whole reconciliation process after apartheid came to an end—I heard him on the radio once. He was in Boston, talking to a group of young men, probably young adolescent men from some of the poorer sections of Boston. They were saying to him, "We live in the middle of a culture of violence. What can we do? How can we learn to love? We have to protect ourselves."

And Desmond Tutu said, "We learn to hate. It's not natural. We've learned how to hate."

The students said, "Well, what can we do?"

There's nothing we can do. We're in the middle of this culture of violence. And Bishop Tutu said—you could hear it on the radio, but you could hear that he was looking at each person very directly—and he said, "You. You. You. You can make a difference. One person can make a big difference. Start with you."

That's what we're each doing here—starting with us. Just beginning to explore, to see if it makes any sense that we learn to hate, that it's not necessary, that it doesn't have to be this way.

One of the other ways that aversion manifests—this trying to keep ourselves separate from experience—shows up particularly on retreat, though it's present in our lives too. So many of you have mentioned it already. It's this particular form of delusion, this confusion: aversion that manifests as self-judgment. A few of you have noticed the kind of self-judgment that comes up. Do you recognize that it's a kind of self-hatred, self-doubt, arising when we feel dissatisfied with what's happening?

Have you ever noticed how sometimes the thoughts of self-judgment masquerade as wisdom? "Well, this isn't right. This isn't going right. I should have more moments of clarity. This painful thing shouldn't be happening. It's happening because I'm not a good enough yogi. It's happening because I took that nap today. It's happening because I didn't take that nap today. It's happening because I ate too much food. I'm just investigating. I'm just seeing." But we're not really getting there because, bottom line, "I'm just no good. I'm hopeless."

It masquerades as wisdom. We don't see the aversion. But the whole function of it is trying to hold ourselves separate from some experience we're perceiving as unpleasant, as not good enough. Sometimes it might just be the self-hatred itself. But that's another aspect I wanted to point out.

See if you can start to notice this, continue to notice it. We can't do it only through will. But we can start to notice. We've all been practicing waking up and noticing we're not aware—okay. But also noticing, if you can, the times when we think we're aware, we're sort of aware, we're pretty sure we're aware of what's happening—but there's still this feeling of disconnect. You feel like you're not quite landing with your awareness of what's happening. You're disconnected or confused.

I've noticed in myself, both on retreat and in daily life—sometimes in daily life it can go on longer—when I start to notice there's a feeling of alienation or disconnection, disconnected from myself, not connected with others, no empathy. I don't really know what's going on, but it's just somehow off. Do you know the sense I mean at all? Sometimes I don't know if I'm communicating at all.

When I finally notice this—after trying to figure it out and all the aversion masquerading as wisdom—I'll suddenly realize: oh, something's going on that the mind is resisting just opening into. We don't even know what it is sometimes. So I'll just stop and ask, "What's happening?" I let my attention, my awareness, just pour through my body like syrup and simply inquire, "What's happening?" Not trying to figure it out, but just landing here.

I may not get a verbal answer, but almost always I'll feel some tension, some tightness. I would say just about always, once I recognize that's happening and I simply ask, "What's happening now?"—there's something unpleasant or scary or just something I don't want to be with.

And in the being with it is the relief. Again, the empathy, the connectedness, the wholeness. Trying to hold ourselves separate from what's happening—which is impossible anyway—is the setup for separation and delusion.

Whatever it might be, even though you feel the pain, the sorrow, the grief, the fear, the sadness more fully, it's actually less suffering. There's more a sense of wholeness, of being alive. Again, a tenderness for life, a tenderness for being—including oneself, believe it or not. That isn't possible when we're trying to hold ourselves separate.

So we start where we are. Whatever we're experiencing here in our life—that's where we start. Just to touch this difficult experience: the aversion, the physical discomfort, the fear, the loneliness. We don't even know what it is sometimes.

Just to touch it with kind awareness. And then the next moment, and the next moment. Having the trust that the wisdom and compassion will naturally strengthen from this. Of course, you have to try it—you don't trust it until you see it. But do notice when it happens.

And once we touch a difficult situation, when there's wisdom present, the response we make can be much more appropriate. Because as the Buddha said, our eyes aren't clouded by ill will and aversion. We can recognize our own good, or the good of another, more accurately.

I'll tell a personal story. Quite some years ago, over twenty years ago, I developed a physical condition, an autoimmune condition. It's basically fine now—that's why I sit in a chair—but when it was developing, the symptoms were much stronger than they are now. It took a long time for any doctor to figure out what it was. There was a lot of pain and stiffness, much more intense than what I experience today.

And so, just the normal stuff that one goes through: the fear in the mind, the resistance to unpleasant sensations. One thing I really learned was when the mind would start going, "You're never going to be able to take a walk. You're never going to be able to do this or that." I was so grateful for awareness practice, because that mind would start up, and I'd see it and say, "I have no idea. I don't need to go there. That's just fear." I really could do that with thoughts about future stuff—that was just unknown.

But learning to just be with the physical experience was harder. It wasn't excruciating pain, which is a whole other thing, but a kind of heaviness, a stiffness, pain that came and went a lot of the time. And when it's frequent, that kind of dull background discomfort, it's almost easier to pretend, "No, I'm just balanced with this. It's there in the background, we're present, it's all okay."

After some time, people were saying—cold really affects me—"You have to leave here, you have to go live in Arizona, you have to stop doing any kind of work." I was thinking I was going to go to Arizona and live in a corner and never do anything.

And I gradually realized there was quite some fear and sadness, but actually aversion towards my body. The body was letting me down. It wasn't supposed to do this. And it doesn't seem to matter what age we're at. I'm sure I was still feeling, "No, it's not supposed to do this. Not yet. Not till I'm ninety-five." But that was subterranean, not quite in awareness.

Then at some point, something happened, and I recognized that sense of trying to hold myself separate from this unpleasant experience. I didn't have that quotation from Joko Beck yet, but it was the same idea, this kind of compassion. First, compassion for the body, almost as if it was a separate being. I thought, "If someone sitting next to me—if their body was doing this, would I hate them?" No, you'd feel, "Oh, that's really hard." So I came back and could feel some compassion for the body.

And then that sense from Joko Beck: well, can I just let myself rest in this unpleasant experience? And I started to meet the sensations just as they were, with kindness. Not every moment, but it was a major shift from trying to hold myself separate while pretending I wasn't—which meditators, we get really good at that.

So just really dying into it with awareness, with kindness, without any sense that this was going to make it go away, or what healing meant, or whatever. Just being with it, being with it.

And I really felt like that changed everything. I don't mean changing the disease or healing the body, but it changed everything in my mind. From a sense of fear and victimization—not being able to decide how to live my life—to being able to say, with quite some clarity, "I can do this. I can't do that."

The body can handle this. It can't handle that. But I don't need to go live in Arizona. I can wear gloves. I can turn up the heat. I don't have to just sit in a room and never do anything. I think I'll go with my friends to India and travel around—which I did. I was with friends who could take care of me. It's true, sometimes I couldn't get up into the rickshaws—they were too high—so they pushed me. It was okay.

Because of that clarity, that steady, kind awareness that let me simply be with the unpleasantness over time, wisdom comes in. You see the whole situation much more clearly, and you can make decisions based not on fear and not on resistance either, but on the clear information that awareness lets us see. I've always been really grateful for that.

So we start where we are. Whatever's arising—what are the demons that are arising for you here on this retreat? Someone phrased it that way today, but it's a common phrasing. That's where we start. Can I find it in myself to rest, just to simply rest in this difficult and unpleasant situation? And if you can't, then you just rest in that—in the "I can't." That's the next arising thing. Just one moment at a time.

I really like the story of St. Francis. Maybe you know his story. It was just one moment at a time. We never know how it's going to go for us. He wasn't born St. Francis of Assisi, right? He was born to a rich merchant. Apparently as a young man he was quite wild, ran with a wild crowd. He was kind of the leader of it—the rich young guys drinking and carousing. And at that time, there was a house where people with leprosy lived below the town. Of course, they kept people with leprosy away. People were afraid of that. If someone with leprosy—now it's called Hansen's disease—was out walking, they had to ring a bell so that everyone could hear and stay away, because there was so much fear.

Francis was very afraid. That was something he was deeply afraid of—being even close to a person with leprosy.

So at least in the biographies I've read, one of the key moments of his life, this young dissolute man, was when he was passing on his horse someone with leprosy. The tendency—he wanted to just throw down some money, because he had money. But either that time or another time, he got off his horse. He stopped. He gave the money hand to hand. He shook the man's hand, he hugged him. And it was like this direct coming into contact with his fear, with his repugnance, that changed his life. Slowly, from that one thing after another after another, he turned into St. Francis.

We start where we are. Who knows? Maybe someone here is the next St. Francis, in whatever tradition. We start where we are, whatever's going on. Can we find it in ourselves to bring this kind awareness and to see how wisdom and compassion are the natural response of the purified mind and heart? And when you forget it—never mind. There's again another moment.

Thank you for listening.

May all beings have happiness and the causes of happiness. That is metta.

May all beings be free from suffering and the causes of suffering. That is compassion.

May all beings never be separate from the highest happiness, which is free from suffering. That is mudita.

May all beings be free from delusion, attachment, and hatred, and abide in equanimity and peace.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 111

Awareness of Intentions and Purifying Aspirations

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses the perennial question practitioners face: how do we maintain awareness when we leave retreat and return to the complexities of daily life? She offers a compelling answer through the lens of intention (cetanā) and the cultivation of wise aspiration.

Wilson draws on the Buddha's teaching that "kamma is intention," explaining how the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of our actions originates in the mind rather than in outcomes or circumstances. She illustrates this with the sutta story of a blind arahant inadvertently treading on ants, demonstrating that without harmful intention, there is no unwholesome action. The second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path—sammāsaṅkappa (right intention)—becomes central as she describes how steady awareness naturally transforms intentions of greed into renunciation and generosity, ill will into mettā, and cruelty into compassion.

Through vivid personal examples—from the pull to grab a book while dressing to restlessly changing radio stations—Wilson shows how watching small intentions without judgment reveals the nature of taṇhā (craving) and opens space for wisdom and choice. She emphasizes that connecting with our deepest aspiration provides the energy and commitment needed for this moment-to-moment practice. Drawing on teachings from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and the example of civil rights leader John Lewis's commitment to nonviolence, she demonstrates how clear aspiration aligned with awareness can transform not only individual consciousness but also our capacity to meet the world with compassion and wisdom.

The basic theme I want to talk about tonight is something I began a bit the other night about awareness of intentions and purifying aspiration. But really, it's a partial answer—one of many answers—to the question that comes up at this point in any retreat: How do we keep it up, even if we could ever be aware in the first place? How do we keep it up when we leave, when we're faced with all the complexities of life? There are so many pulls on our time and our interest, and we see how hard it is to really be aware with intelligent awareness just standing in the food line, never mind when we've got so much going on at work or at home.

There's no magic answer. You know that now already. But what I want to talk about in general is awareness of intention. As Steve was talking last night when he discussed the cultivation of the paramis, those wholesome qualities, it's another way of looking at the fact that awareness practice—bringing awareness into our life, purifying the heart and mind through the wisdom that arises from awareness—is about transforming our consciousness in all aspects of our life. Every activity can partake of this purification, of this cultivation of wisdom. There's nothing that needs to be outside.

As Steve said, the three pillars of Buddha Dharma are often talked about as dana (generosity), sila (ethical, non-harming conduct), and bhavana (mental cultivation). And that covers all of our life: our thought, our speech, our actions. There's nothing so mundane that it can't play a part in cultivating awareness, wisdom, and purifying our mind and heart. There's nothing so huge and gross and difficult or fantastic that we have to put it aside and say, "No, awareness can't handle this. This is too much, or this is too painful, or this has too much to do with me." There are times awareness isn't strong enough to meet it, sure, of course. But to say that anything's outside—okay, awareness, dukkha, impermanence, anatta—it applies to everything but not this? There's no "not this." But we might notice which are the things we put in that category, because that's where we're stuck.

So how do we keep it up? How do we keep going? How do we transform our lives? The most important thing is that the cultivation of awareness, the cultivation of mindfulness, the continuing willingness to explore this and let our minds and hearts be purified and cultivate wisdom—the most essential thing to make this possible is that we have to want to. Not just, "Oh, this is a good idea," which we all do. Steve was talking about the Dharma binging—it's a funny way of putting it. But we all leave retreat saying, "Yes, I'm going to sit." Of course we mean that on a certain level.

But really, it's about recognizing the difference in your own mind and heart between when awareness is present and when it's not—recognizing the quality of your responses to yourself and life when there's awareness versus when there's not. It has to be something that you recognize for yourself as making a difference. And it has to be not just a good idea, but something you really feel in your heart, in your mind, in whatever way you put it: this is what's most important in my life.

No one can do that for us. I'm not saying you should do it. I care just in that I want people to be awake and happy, but I'm not saying you should do it. I'm saying nothing else can do it for us. And then it's hard as hell, even once we have that. But without it, we kind of drift. We do it a little bit, we don't do it a little bit, we forget why we're doing it.

Haven't those of you who've been practicing a lot hit times where you've been going along really into practice—whether it's your formal sitting or paying attention—and then suddenly, I don't know, it kind of peters out? We got too busy. Or actually, things were going so well we didn't really need it anymore. Have you noticed that one? Luckily, something always happens sooner or later. Ruth Dennison, who's quite elderly now but is one of the first women teachers in Theravada in the West, one of Goenka's dharma sisters, has a very funny way of putting things. She said, "You know, in samsara, there's always a little leak in the canoe." It'll show up. That can wake us up again.

But what I want to talk about is this: even tuning into, whether you're on a retreat or when you leave a retreat, when our awareness has been more purified—we're more tuned into it and we can really feel, yes, whatever way you phrase it yourself, this is really most important. We mean it. And we leave. But like everything, it's not a one-time motivation. It's not a one-time thought. We can't just have the thought and then it runs in the background for the rest of our life. Have you noticed that? The mind is constantly changing. Constantly changing. And the seed of all of our action, as I said last night, the seed of all of our speech, arises in the mind. It's all in the mind.

So it's not a one-time decision. Yes, now I'm committing to making the cultivation of awareness the centerpiece of my life. I can mean that. I can say that a million times. But it will express itself—or not—in the moment-to-moment choices and decisions we make in the mind. How many do we make in a day, through our whole life?

So we start to get interested. None of this is from judging, but from interest. If you leave here and you say, "Yes, I really want to see how I can continue to wake up with awareness, to bring awareness in even to the most mundane," you begin to get interested in noticing your mind, watching your mind, observing the moment-to-moment choices. We make many of them—really small, mundane choices. I don't mean every single one; don't make yourself crazy. But the choices we make... and you might notice: when do we choose awareness? And when—and why—do we choose not-awareness, which we do sometimes.

Getting interested in this really starts to turn our attention even more inward toward the mind, to see that all of these little choices, and the big choices we make—for awareness, for speech, for action, the big choices in our life, the little ones like what to have for dinner, everything—all motivation comes from within. All choices and actions originate with the mind.

The two aspects of this I want to touch on tonight are: the big one, the overarching sense of aspiration and motivation when I talk about purifying aspiration; and the practice of looking for ourselves, more than once, but really deeply and really honestly, to see what is really important in my life. What is the most important thing in my life? This is not just something superficial, but really a deep inner looking. And then how we use that deep personal understanding to support our moment-to-moment awareness practice—how we use that reference point of our conscious connection (which we have to remind ourselves of) to what's truly, deeply important in our life, and how that can support us in the moment-to-moment motivations, the moment-to-moment intentions that run the way we live.

So that's the macro sense of motivation and intention in the mind, and the micro moment-to-moment ones, as I want to talk about it.

Do you remember two nights ago when I talked about compassion as first manifesting as a motivation and intention in the mind? It all blends together, I know. But I want to expand a bit. It came up in talking to someone today and made me think I wanted to say more about this.

Wise thought, wise intention—intention being that moment in the mind when all the energy in the mind coheres, comes together in that impulse, you could say, that "about to," the mental impulse that leads to even thought (though that's pretty subtle to see), but that leads to speech and action. I remember I talked about just waiting for the impulse to lift the teacup and exploring that. That moment, that little mind-moment of intention—cetanā, the word in Pali—arises together in each moment with all the different mental factors in the mind, which makes it wholesome or unwholesome.

This wise thought, wise intention—sammā-saṅkappa in Pali—is the second step of the Eightfold Path. Right understanding, right view, leads to how we think about the world. Right thought leads to right action. And that leads to the next factors, which have to do with action: right speech, right action, right livelihood. It's very sensible. It's just how it works, very natural.

But it's not often the way we may tend, without looking, to think about or relate to how we assess the usefulness, the wholesomeness, or the unwholesomeness of our actions—that it all arises in the mind. The Buddha said, "I say kamma"—which just means action—"is intention."

But when we look at our actions in the world, there is the internal mental intention that gives rise to them. That's usually the thing we notice the least; it's the most subtle. Then there are the circumstances that may lead us to make a particular action, to make the choice. And then there's the outcome, if it's a particular action we choose. And don't we generally tend to judge or evaluate by the outcome? You know, how somebody receives it, how it works out. But as I said, that's the one that's the least in our control—yet that's the one we take responsibility for. And the circumstances around it—sometimes we're aware of them, which could lead us to a more appropriate action when we know we're not colored by our own self-interest. Sometimes we don't see them clearly.

The intention, though, is actually the heart of the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness. Let me give you a simple example from the suttas, from the Buddha. There was a monk, a bhikkhu, who was believed to be completely awakened, which would mean he would never act—he wouldn't even be capable of acting—from hatred or aversion or harming beings or greed. Wouldn't it be nice just to think about that? That it's not even going to happen that you say something from aversion or act from greed.

It's just not going to arise in the mind. Wouldn't that be lovely? Well, that's a possibility, even in moments.

Anyway, so this monk was walking back and forth in the woods, in the forest, doing his walking meditation. He was blind—I forget if I mentioned that. And some of the other monks saw him walking back and forth, and he was treading on ants, on a swarm of ants that he didn't see. He was walking back and forth and killing them.

So the bhikkhus go rushing to the Buddha, saying, "He's supposed to be an arahant! He's killing ants. He can't be." And if you read the suttas, there are many places where the rules the Buddha made for the monks and nuns come from people coming to him saying, "Oh, he's doing that, and she's doing this." You can kind of see—same kind of minds, you know. Not so different. Just because you put on robes doesn't mean you've arrived. It means you're cultivating, but it doesn't mean you're there yet.

So this is one of the places where the Buddha enunciated this teaching. He said there was no way the blind monk could have known the ants were there until he was told. There was absolutely no intention in his mind of ill will or harmfulness or even negligence, even delusion. Because sometimes we can harm beings from delusion, just not taking care to pay attention. Have you ever noticed that? I've noticed if I go in the shower without my glasses on and I see a little dark speck, I can't tell. I think it's just a bit of fluff. I have to actually go really close and look and see, "Oh, it's an ant." And if there's just that "oh, don't bother" attitude—that's delusion. Or just not even noticing that you're not bothering—that's delusion too. That's an intention of delusion.

So the blind monk didn't have that because he couldn't know. And the Buddha said there's no blame in that. There's no unwholesome action in that. Interesting, isn't it? Where we would say killing is bad, full stop. Now, once he knows there are ants there, if he were to say, "Well, I can't see them so it doesn't matter," that's a completely different intention in the mind. Can you feel the difference? And so that's really the seed.

Many of you have been noticing how much of delusion is assumption—how we're all assuming all this stuff about other people. A lot of people have mentioned it. And we do the same thing with intentions. We can never really know another person's intention, can we? So we judge by the action or we judge by how it makes us feel. But we don't know. I mean, half the time we don't know our own intentions, do we? And the same action can come from many different intentions, motivations in the mind.

The example I always give, because I see it easily in myself: there's somebody you know well and care for who has a particular behavior pattern. Maybe it bothers you, but you can also see it's causing them suffering or alienating people. And your intention, as you think about it away from the situation, is that you want to somehow share this with them. Your motivation as you're contemplating it is actually kindness, right? You're already laughing because you can see all the different ways that can manifest in actuality.

There is the possibility that one could really get in touch with the sense of kindness, the wanting to help. Get in touch with mettā for the person. Check the circumstances—you know, like you don't come in when they've just gotten back from work completely stressed out, their boss was really pounding them, and they feel horrible. And you sit down and say, "Let me give you some feedback, you know, to really help you in the world." Complete obliviousness to their state and the circumstances. So there's a kind of delusion there. It's not the pure mettā intention.

Or you want to say it, and you're waiting for the right moment. But then they do the behavior and it really ticks you off, and you decide now's the right moment. "I've been wanting to tell you this for a while." You get the drift. So the same physical words could come with so many different intentions.

And then, even if you do it with the clearest, most kind intention, how the other person receives it is completely out of our control. Have you ever noticed that?

And can we let that be without having to interpret it all?

So this is where awareness of intention is both a subtle practice and a fact of our own experience. We're not working on awareness of other people's intentions—let's just be aware of our own, seeing when we can be clear about it when we can. And sometimes it's very complex. I'm not saying otherwise. But to begin and continue to bring this into our daily life can be hugely transformative.

Don't make up a big expectation, but just as we start to notice intentions before we speak, before we act, you see that when we notice it, that awareness can really give us a moment of choice. Even in little things, simple little things—not like something horribly bad, but like getting in the car.

Sometimes when I get in the car and I'm driving forty-five minutes here—anywhere is forty-five minutes from here—I may be listening to a particular song, or I may be listening to something specific, a dharma talk or something, and that's fine. Other times I may find myself appreciating the silence, and then suddenly I see my hand going out to turn on the radio. And I pause, curious. Why? Not that I should or shouldn't, but kind of interested. I tune in, and I can see just this restlessness in my mind. I need to do that. I come back, and it's like, I appreciate this. Next moment, turn on the radio. Then I actually turn it on. Then I start noticing—because there's never anything I want to hear on the radio. So the restlessness moved out, turned on the radio. I last ten seconds. Ten seconds! I start flipping the channels. You put it on that one that scans, and then you can press it. I'm practically driving off the road out of restlessness. I'm exaggerating a little.

But watching this without any "you should" or "you shouldn't"—just watching the intention and where it leads—it really gives us so much information. This is exactly our practice here. But when we come in and say, "No, I shouldn't listen to the radio," and we get tight, we're making the action wrong, but we're not learning anything. Watching the intention, I learn a lot. And I get more and more tuned into the restlessness. So I do that much less. It lasts much less long because I'm noticing, "Oh, that restlessness. And this is increasing the restlessness. It's not so helpful. It's not actually pleasant. I don't need to do that."

And that's wisdom, making that choice. That's not me saying good or bad. Very different.

So the wisdom, tuning in—and this is where the second step of the Eightfold Path, wise intention, right intention, not just any old intention, but the ones that are onward-leading to awakening. And what's so cool about the way it works is what we've been saying all along: simply through steady awareness, noticing what's what, the unwise, the suffering intentions, through wisdom, naturally shift.

The Buddha talks about the unwise intentions of greed, of ill will, and of cruelty. Through awareness, the natural understanding that arises from awareness, the intentions of greed naturally start to transform to renunciation—the letting go of attachment —and to generosity, as Steve talked about last night. Different from "I have to be a generous person." That's a kind of forcing. But naturally: "Oh, it feels better," as he was saying.

Ill will—thinking bad about people, thinking bad about oneself—naturally begins to transform to mettā, to friendliness, to goodwill. And cruelty, which can just be cruel thoughts—it doesn't mean we're out doing anything—transforms to compassion, the ability to just be with suffering, as I talked about the other night.

And this process is natural and normal. It's not like only if you're some super-fine being. This is the natural effect of awareness seeing what's what.

How the suffering intentions work in our mind, what their effect is, and what the effect is of wholesome ones.

A friend of ours, Guy Armstrong, who's also a teacher of this, likes to say that when he looks at how this works—when he sees what we've been saying all along, that with a steadiness of awareness watching yourself do unskillful things, the wisdom that comes naturally starts to transform our habits to wholesomeness—that the wholesomeness, the purity, is more our natural state. He says that's what really gives him heart in the beneficent nature of reality. That he can really trust that.

It may not seem like it. When we look out at the world, that may not be the first thing that hits when you read the news. But when we look inward at our mind, we can really start to see that. But again, it's not a one-time thing—okay, now I see it, the habit's changed.

There's a very famous quotation from the Buddha in this regard, in the sutta where he's talking about the cultivation of wise thought, wise intention. He said, just looking at his own mind before he became the awakened Buddha, he saw that whatever one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of the mind.

Scary, isn't it? If we're not bringing in awareness. But it's just nature, it's just obvious. The natural causes and conditions—whatever habits our mind habitually thinks about, habitually goes in, that's the inclination. That's how we'll respond habitually when there's not awareness. Awareness gives us a moment of choice. That's why it's so powerful, so ultimately transforming.

I want to read you something that speaks to this—this willingness to look and work at it over and over and over. This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, and he's quoting a Buddha story. The Buddha, he says, knew a very miserly person who was unable to give anything away. So this man went to see the Buddha and said, "It is impossible for me to be generous. What should I do?"

And so the Buddha says, "Imagine that your right hand is yourself and your left hand is a poor, unhappy person. So give from your right hand to your left hand some old food which you don't like or need. Try hard to get used to this. Do this until you no longer feel miserly."

We just practice wholesome intention however we can. So the man began the practice, but he was so miserly that at first he could only give away a few leftovers or food he did not like from his right hand to his left hand. Gradually, however, he acquired the habit, and the day arrived when he did not feel quite so miserly. So then he went to the Buddha and said, "Now when I give food from my right to my left hand, I don't feel so miserly."

And the Buddha said, "Good. Now with your right hand, which you take to be yourself, give some gold, silk, or fine clothes to your left hand, which you imagine to be a beggar. Try to see if you can give open-handedly."

The man kept doing it, doing it, until of course he became a great benefactor to the poor, so generous, and became an arhat. So these stories always end that way. But look where we started. We start where we are. This noticing of the habits in our mind, in reference to what's really important—that's what can help us keep tuning in, what can help us keep practicing.

So this is when thoughts matter. And it's a training. It's a training.

This willingness to just look at the small moments of intention—you don't start with having to notice every single one. And it's not that now you have to make the totally right choice with all your actions. But just starting to look at what we do in small moments. A lot of insight can come, a lot of this shifting from unwise to wise intention.

So I'll give another very simple example. It almost sounds so silly to even mention it, but it happened to me the other morning. This is the kind of little nothing moment in our days where awareness can really show us how it can transform our lives—our thoughts, our intentions—by the choices we make.

This is so small, but I was getting dressed the other morning and I had a little book on my night table, some mystery novel. I was getting dressed, I had my time, and the mind just looked at the book and said, "Oh, I just want to have a look in that book." I could really feel the craving. I didn't even know what it was about. I didn't really want to look at it—there was nothing in the book I wanted to see—but the craving was really strong. I wanted to stop in the middle of what I was doing and pick up that stupid book and start reading it. I'm getting dressed in the morning!

I just let my awareness watch all of that. In the moment I could see it, the choice arose: let's just stay with the awareness. I made the choice—it's all really fast—stay with the awareness, don't act on the wanting. But not shut the whole thing down and say, "Oh, this is bad, just get dressed." I just watched the whole process.

I could see how that tanha, the wanting, can be so strong about something completely inane. I'm sitting there going, "No, I really want to look at that book." And I kept thinking, "I really want to look at that book." And I was just watching all of this. Maybe a minute, two minutes. Then at some point, the craving just completely died away—completely gone. I kept getting dressed. I noticed the craving was completely gone. And the sense of spaciousness, peace, and ease that's available in that moment of renunciation, in that moment when the mind lets go of the attachment to whatever—it doesn't matter to the whatever. Awareness is all that made that possible.

It seems like such a little moment. We wait for the big moments, for the big insights, but these little moments are available all the time. These are moments where the habit of craving is being naturally transformed. It will come up again in the next two minutes—don't get me wrong—but it's being naturally transformed. The habit is usually that craving arises and we just act on it without even noticing. That's the habit that runs our lives.

If we're stuck in "this is good, this is bad," that's not going to be enough to keep us looking. That just feeds our ill will, really. This is where it's so helpful to get a sense, for yourself, of your larger aspiration, your deeper sense of what's really important in your life. This is a place where you look at it honestly, but not with self-deprecation. Say it comes up: "I really want to cultivate bodhicitta, the intention to awaken to save all beings." And then your mind goes, "Who do you think you are?" Don't believe that second thought. It's not about who I am—it's about what's the intention, what's the deeper aspiration that guides my life? This is what's going to give us the strength to actually keep bringing in awareness.

I'll read you this little story from Lama Surya Das. He was talking about his teacher who died some years ago, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche. I only met him very briefly, but from all accounts, he was quite an amazingly awakened Tibetan master. He was born in Tibet, lived in Tibet and India, engaged in deep intensive practice in caves, and wandered for years as an unknown beggar in India—a kind of modern-day Milarepa. The real deal, really filled with love. A very, very deep teacher.

Surya Das was talking about the first time Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche was in France—there are quite a few Tibetan monasteries in France. He had grown up in the Himalayas and had never seen a beach. Some of his students took him to one of the beaches in France. He'd never seen a beach, if you can imagine. When he came back to the monastery, he began to give teachings about the first time he'd seen the beach and observed exactly what Westerners do there. He was giving regular teachings, and then all of a sudden he started talking about the beach, about how he and Atulku had gone to the very edge of the ocean. First he said, "It's so big"—in childlike awe. Can you imagine never seeing the ocean?

But then he started excitedly describing what he had seen. There were these people there, and instead of sitting or meditating or doing yoga, these people were just lying there, almost naked, doing nothing. And then when they were tired of lying there, instead of doing something, they just turned over. And then they lay there again for another few hours.

Kempo was truly, genuinely perplexed. He said, "Why were they doing that?" over and over. He couldn't understand it, but he had so much compassion for them. He said, "How could they waste their precious human existence?" He continued, "This lifetime is so short, so tenuous, so precious, so valuable, so necessary—a life not to be squandered but to be used impeccably, usefully, for the benefit and welfare of all. A life to be used for the future, for the next life—not just to lounge around all day in the hot sun like a big sleeping lizard."

Kempo was sincerely impassioned now. "I just wanted to go wake them up," he said. "There was a big white chair about fifty meters away, obviously the lifeguard's post, but there were two young people sitting there, so I couldn't go up. But I wanted to badly, because I wanted to climb up there and announce to everybody that it was time to wake up."

You get the sense of the deep compassion. It's not a "stupid people" kind of judgment. It's more like, "Wow, this precious human life"—from somebody who has really dedicated his life in that way.

I share this story not to make us feel bad about ourselves, but to offer an example of that possibility of tuning in. For us, not with judgment, but tuning in with this deep sense of possibility—what is really important in my life? That's up to each one of us. I'm not saying what it should be. I have my opinions, but I'm not prescribing anything. The invitation is simply to really tune into it. It's a powerful force.

What I want to talk about, mostly in terms of our dharma practice, is this sense of consciously connecting within yourself with what your deepest aspiration is. Of course it may change over time—that's fine. That's what I mean when I say we keep purifying, we keep checking in, we keep seeing what's really important. And this aspiration serves as a guideline, a strengthening, a clarifying force in terms of the smaller moments of intention, of motivation, when we have to make decisions.

It's described in some of the Buddhist commentaries that when we have a sense of our overarching motivation or aspiration—not the moment-to-moment intention but the deeper aspiration—it serves the function of collecting our dispersed energy. It helps us focus and actually accomplish things in our life, supported by reference to this deepest motivation, that we didn't even think we could do.

Without that, we tend to just go through life responding to conditions by reaction or from habit—"Oh yeah, this will be good for now"—but we're not really looking at the big picture. We can drift through life. Not being bad—we can drift through life being good people—but without a sense of a greater aspiration that can truly guide us in our choices, helping us align rather than just drift.

This is something we all know in the ways we make choices. If you have children, if you have family members you need to be responsible for, to take care of, don't you make choices in your life? You give up some things, you choose not to do certain things, you choose to do other things that may be unpleasant or not what you'd most want to be doing if you were just responding to that particular situation. But when you're making the choice in reference to "this is going to serve my child," you do it. And you do it more or less happily. We can actually bring in the compassion, the love, the wholesomeness, the generosity, and do this action that without that higher aspiration we might do out of aversion or resistance. Instead, we're doing it out of mettā. You get a sense of that. It gives us so much more strength and power to accomplish things.

We can apply this in ways that aren't particularly wholesome too, but it can give us enormous focused, collected energy when we have a higher aspiration.

So back to tennis. I was reading the autobiography of Andre Agassi, the great American tennis player. Sports are really a good way to examine qualities of mind, both wholesome and unwholesome. Agassi seemed to be quite honest in his autobiography about all the struggles he went through. He described what it takes for someone to play tennis at the highest level—and I'm sure this applies to any other sport and to many other pursuits as well. From the time he was really young, whether it was forced by his father or later when he chose it himself, almost everything he did—what he ate, how much he slept—had to be evaluated in terms of how it would help or hinder his tennis. They learn to calibrate everything. Once he got married and had kids, he'd have to think, "Can I go to the beach with the kids for an hour?"

Not if it's in the middle of a tournament. Even an hour at the beach would so unbalance his energy, so affect how he had to get it together to go play a match. He couldn't do it. And so for thirty-four years, that was his life. Everything was in service to playing the best tennis he could. That's amazing to think of. I don't want to examine what the motivations were, but that's an amazing quality of commitment and focus. So imagine if we bring that quality to awakening, or to serving all beings. What's possible for us? Then when we have to make decisions, we can refer to what's really important.

There was an interview many, many years ago I read with Aung San Suu Kyi. You're all aware of her story now. It was when she was still under house arrest and had been for quite some years. I don't remember if it was before or after her husband died, but anyway, it was during all the difficult times. And she said—I'm paraphrasing, I just remembered this in my mind—she said, "People think I'm so amazing, but I'm really nothing unusual at all. I never planned to be the icon of the Burmese democracy movement. All I ever do, if something needs to be done in the name of love, then I'll do it. That's all." Just from that clarity of what was most important to her—in the name of wisdom, in the name of love, then I'll do it. Not some other big thing.

Where our deepest motivation and aspiration takes us, we may not know. It's much more about our motivation than about specific outcomes, in terms of dharma practice, in terms of awareness practice. Yes, our aspiration can be to purify our heart and mind, or to cultivate compassion, bodhicitta, to wake up. But the form it's going to take, we don't know. So it's different from having the aspiration to earn a million dollars and really focusing on that and doing it, or like a tennis player where it's more about the outcome. Here it's really looking deeply at what's the guideline in your life. What's really important? And then realizing that it's a lifetime of moment after moment after moment of just bringing kind awareness to what it is we're doing.

From Dilgo Khyentse again: "The whole thrust of the Buddha's teaching is to master the mind. If you master the mind, you will have mastery over body and speech, and your own and others' suffering can only come to an end. But if the mind is left full of negative emotions, then however perfect the actions of your body and the words you speak might seem, you are far from the path."

And guess how mastery of mind is achieved? Through constant awareness of your mind, of your thoughts, and of your actions. Just cultivating this simple, steady awareness—what we've been doing here the whole week. Maintaining this mindfulness in the practices of tranquility and insight eventually will sustain the recognition of wisdom, even in the midst of ordinary activities and distractions. Mindfulness is thus the very basis, the cure for all samsaric afflictions.

So just this willingness to look deeply, to see what's really important for you. And if it is on the level of cultivating awareness, of cultivating freedom or compassion or something along those lines, then really trusting that awareness, that mindfulness, is the tool, is the key. Let that deeper aspiration fuel our willingness to choose awareness when we notice we might have a moment of choice.

This is how we purify our awareness over and over again, purify our aspiration over and over again. It is work. That's okay. It's at least a lifetime practice. That's okay.

This is Dilgo Khyentse again: "This time, do what is important." This time meaning this lifetime. This is really looking from the vast perspective. So he says, "Throughout our many lifetimes in the past, we have taken many different forms. We've been rich. We've been poor. We've been beaten by our enemies. We've lost everything. We have had all the pleasures of the gods."

We've been the victims of political oppression. We have suffered from diseases. And all of those experiences of happiness and suffering have brought us nothing. But now, in this present life, we have entered into the path of the Buddha. We've entered into a path of awakening. We have met learned and accomplished teachers. This time we can make such circumstances meaningful and do what is important.

If a merchant visiting an isle of jewels were to return empty-handed without his cargo of gems, he would be ashamed to show his face in public. It's the same for us, who at this very moment have such favorable conditions for the practice.

The Dharma has two aspects: exposition and practice. Exposition is only the work of the mouth, and many there are who do not practice the teachings explained. As the saying goes, many have heard the doctrine, but those who implement it are few. Even those who have practiced a little can get sidetracked and lost. So as far as the Dharma is concerned, practice is more important than teaching and talking about it. The Dharma is something that we really have to do. But we only really have to do it this moment, this moment, this moment.

Returning consciously to clarify your aspiration brings energy, brings faith, brings the willingness to do, brings the trust that this is really what's most important to me. It makes it possible for us to hang in when times get really difficult.

I want to offer two examples—one a reading, one a reflection—about the potential for acting out of habit and drifting, even when we think we're good people, and then the potential when we have deeply internalized our deepest commitment.

A couple of years ago I spent the summer in Munich. After being there many years, I decided I wanted to visit Dachau, the concentration camp they made into a museum. I went one afternoon on the weekend, and I was really glad I went by myself because I could just be quiet and move through it at my own pace.

It had an effect on me different from what I might have expected. What I might have expected was just the horror of it. And there was that, of course. But more than that, it re-inspired me. It re-energized me to rededicate to practice—entrusting practice, entrusting awareness.

The museum was set up thoughtfully, with different rooms and placards describing various aspects of the people who were interned there: all the different races, people who were gay, people who were Roma, people from different countries, Jewish people—all different kinds of people. You got a sense of the vastness of all who were there, local people, people from far away. And then there were placards describing some of the guards, some of the people who lived in the nearby village, all different aspects of the situation.

Often when they would talk about something specific that happened, they would show the range of human responses. People who were interned in the camp who were really heroic, filled with compassion, helping each other. People in the camp who were just the opposite, turning on each other out of fear. Same with the guards. Same with local people. They would always show all different kinds of responses. Each placard would have a picture of someone as an example, so it made it real, made it personal.

I was also watching all the different visitors—people from all over the world, German people and Polish people and people from Japan—going through the museum. You could see people settling, the mind just settling. They'd go from room to room becoming more and more attentive, more and more present. It wasn't like people were just chit-chatting, but it wasn't like they were just going, "Oh, horrible!" and running out. They weren't getting angry. It just hits you on a level.

What inspired me about practice was getting a sense of the vastness. You can't just say a few really evil people did this. So many people were involved. And I don't want to say this is just about Germany in World War II. We can look at how many places in the world just in the last two decades where one ethnic group turns on another ethnic group, one race turning on another race, neighbors turning on neighbors. This can happen anywhere. I don't even have to list all those places, but it's not about one country in one time period. It's about seeing: How can this happen?

And what made it personal was that I really saw—

It's mostly normal people, good people. And it's not like ten million people set out to say, "No, I'm going to slaughter the other ethnic group." It's not like in Rwanda, where the Tutsis and the Hutus made some big plan. How did all the good people get involved in that and act in that way?

And so I could only come back to my own mind, my own experience, seeing how we never know where our next step is going to go. No one in 1932 knew how things were going to end up in 1944 and 1945. Nobody could know that. And so we each make the little decisions that we make in life. If we don't know how our own minds work—and we can only know that from the steadiness of awareness—if I don't know how to be with fear, even a little fear, then if some difficult situation arises and I'm afraid to say something, I might just say, "Well, it's just easier not to do it." The fear runs the show. And it doesn't seem like a big decision in 1932 or whenever, but then it grows. It grows, and we just don't know how we're going to end up acting.

What we frequently think and ponder, that becomes the inclination of our mind. So if my tendency is to think, "That's too difficult of a situation, and it's not my business anyway"... And this could be anything—walking by, seeing two young kids start to fight on the sidewalk in New York. They could be dangerous. I don't know what's happening. They could be on drugs. I should just stay away. That's the right thing to do. And I can see I'm acting from fear. Just go. It's not a big deal. And it's not such a big deal. But our habits strengthen. Our habits strengthen.

When we just end up reacting in life, not knowing how our minds work, not knowing how to bring awareness to the unwholesome intentions... okay, but maybe I should say something. Maybe I should do something. I have no idea how I would act if I were in a situation like that. I've never been in one. I don't know. But all we can do is have this willingness to bring awareness to our intentions here and now. The littlest ones can end up having a huge effect. Because we're just all people. All our minds work the same.

So that's one way this really re-motivated me, re-inspired me. Not to say, "Oh, the world is horrible and people are horrible. Those are horrible people." It's more like, whoa—this is where our human mind can go without wisdom. Without the ability to see, without the ability to be with what's unpleasant in my own mind and to act out of compassion, to act out of wisdom, not out of fear, for some greater purpose that I can tune into for myself. We still never know what's going to happen. That's all we can ever do.

So now I want to read another thing, which is kind of the reverse—not Buddhist, but again a sense of when someone has and keeps reconnecting with the really deep aspiration in their life. And it's, in this case, supported by other people sharing it, just like we talk about sangha here—the power that can have in one's life, to guide one's life.

This is a reading from the autobiography of John Lewis, who is a congressman from Georgia and has been for many years, but he was one of the original Freedom Riders from Nashville, as a student back in 1959 and 1960. He was one of the original group of young students who founded the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, called SNCC, which when it was founded was really based in Gandhian and Christian principles of nonviolence. They were very deeply committed to that.

In this passage, he's talking about his days then, about the principles of Gandhian nonviolence, which all their actions—the freedom rides, the sit-ins at cafeterias—all of their work was based in this very deep principle of nonviolence. They were just young students, and they were being trained by an African-American minister named Jim Lawson, who had been in India. He'd been a conscientious objector in the Korean War and had studied Gandhian Satyagraha, but was also a Christian minister.

So that's the background. This is John Lewis talking:

"One of the most fundamental principles of the Gandhian notion of Satyagraha, nonviolent action, is that it is not merely a technique of achieving specific goals."

It is not simply a means to attaining political independence or racial desegregation. It is not just a tool to achieve unity and freedom in the world around us. True satyagraha, as Gandhi taught it, is about a fundamental shift inside our own souls. It is rooted in the achievement of inner unity, of inner freedom, of inner certainty—a place we find within ourselves, a calm, sure place. And once found, that place is not swayed or disturbed or affected by the thousands of details of the world around us that bombard us every day.

Then he speaks about suffering from this place. He says, "Suffering is nothing more than a sad and sorry thing without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart, an accepting and open heart, a heart that holds no malice towards the inflictors of his or her suffering. This is a difficult concept to understand, and it is even more difficult to internalize, but it has everything to do with the way of nonviolence."

"We are talking about love here—not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is a broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us."

And I have to say, this sounds exactly like what Dingo Rinpoche was saying about pure perception. I just want to note that. This is in the Christian context.

"It recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us, even in those who would raise their hand against us, those we might call our enemy. This sense of love realizes that emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, turning a person toward anger and hate. It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into himself, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence."

"And it is a practice. It is a way of life. This is something Lawson stressed over and over again—that this is not just a technique or a tactic or a strategy or a tool to be pulled out when needed. It is not something you turn on or off like a faucet. This sense of love, this sense of peace, the capacity for compassion is something you carry inside yourself every waking minute of the day. It shapes your response to a curt cashier in the grocery store, or a driver cutting you off in traffic, just as surely as it keeps you from striking back at a state trooper who might be kicking you in the ribs because you dared to protest against an oppressive government."

"If you want to create an open society, your means of doing so must be consistent with the society you want to create. Means and ends are absolutely inseparable."

That, to me, is a great example of clear comprehension of deepest aspiration and the moment-to-moment working. And to me, it's a great example of the cultivation of awareness and wisdom, metta, and compassion.

So we just start where we are, and we never give up.

CHAPTER 112

Dhamma Lesson - Evening Story

Carol Wilson · 4 min

> In this intimate evening reflection, Carol Wilson recounts a formative experience from her year as a Buddhist nun in Thailand. She describes arriving at a forest monastery in the north, where she encountered Mechi Rungduan, a head nun whose deep samādhi and committed practice immediately impressed her.
> The teaching unfolds through a simple yet profound scenario: when unexpected visitors arrived and the small nunnery's accommodations became scarce, Carol witnessed something that challenged her Western assumptions about status and seniority. Rather than the senior practitioners claiming the best quarters—as she had grown accustomed to at IMS—the head nun was the first to give up her kuṭi, moving without complaint to a cave filled with bat guano. This act of spontaneous generosity and humility, repeated consistently, revealed to Carol what genuine practice looks like in action.
> This story illuminates how dāna (generosity) and the letting go of self-importance naturally arise from deep practice. Carol reflects on how true practitioners don't cling to status or comfort, and how this immediate, lived expression of the Dhamma—rather than abstract understanding—represents the real fruit of meditation. She closes by connecting this to the practice of sharing merit, noting how generosity emerges naturally from steadiness of awareness and brings joy to the heart.

Many years ago, I was a nun in Thailand for a year, a Buddhist nun, a long time ago. This is a little story about some things I learned about generosity and humility from being with some of the other nuns.

At one point during my time as a nun, I went up to stay in a monastery in the north, in the forest. You have to understand, there aren't very many Western nuns, and many nuns in Thailand don't really practice that much. They're just living, cooking, taking care of themselves. But this was a place that had practiced nuns, which is why I went there.

When we arrived, there were monks and kutis on one side of the river, and nuns on the other—just a few, maybe six little huts on that side. When I arrived, there was a head nun who was pretty young, probably early thirties. Rungduan was her name, Mechi Rungduan. She came to meet us, and she was clearly in a state of deep samadhi. She was a very committed practitioner, which I didn't know at the time. She takes me to my kuti. She was very steady, practiced, committed—doing a lot of concentration practice in a Mahasi-style approach.

The way it works in Thailand, in nunneries and monasteries, is that pretty much anyone can just show up. You don't call and make a reservation, at least not then. This was way out in the country, but really on any given day, all of a sudden five new monks could show up, ten new nuns could show up. It didn't happen often, but it could. So if ten new nuns show up and there are only five or six kutis, where are they going to go?

This is where I really learned about letting go and generosity. I had come from being on staff at IMS for a long time at that point, and it's sort of how we think of things here. The longer you were on staff, we had this thing called the room game—who got what room. The longer you're on staff, the more senior you got, so you got the better room. That's just how it seemed to work. And it seems like that in a lot of places, right? The head people, the higher people—they get the better room, the better office, the better everything.

So when ten nuns show up, I'm thinking, they better not put someone in with me. And they didn't, because I was the farang, the foreigner. They treated me very kindly, with great generosity and respect. Everyone else doubled up, tripled up. And the first person to move out of her kuti was Rungduan.

The first one. Not like, "Okay, I guess I have to after I've jammed nuns into everywhere else." She was the first one who would leave and go stay up in this cave filled with bat guano at the top of the hill. And not a murmur—just like, of course, that's what you do.

The act of generosity, the humility of the practitioner who is really practicing. It so touched me. Not enough to give up my kuti—but I was never asked to. I saw that over and over. It wasn't a one-time thing. And some of that really stuck with me as a way of understanding: oh, that's what practice is really about. That's really what the manifestation of practice is. This is immediate practice—sharing generosity, not holding on to status, not holding on to sense of self in that way.

So that was just one little moment, one little day, but it was inspiring to me—this sense of what a life of practice can be about.

Just a little act of generosity. Sharing the merit is an act of generosity. It's a great movement of wisdom, a movement that comes from our steadiness of awareness. Generosity naturally arises. And it's a happy, joyful state of mind and heart.

May you rest well.

CHAPTER 113

Awareness of Things as They Have Come to Be

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this encouraging talk, Carol Wilson examines how the seemingly simple practice of moment-to-moment awareness can be profoundly transformative. She explores the concept of sammādiṭṭhi (right view) and how our habitual misperceptions—seeing things as permanent, satisfactory, and having inherent self-existence—keep us trapped in cycles of suffering. Through personal stories and humor, she illustrates how we unknowingly operate from deeply held views that color our perception and thinking.

Wilson introduces the Pāli term yathābhūta, which she translates as "things as they have come to be," emphasizing how everything arises from countless causes and conditions in each moment. This understanding helps dissolve our tendency to take experiences personally and react habitually to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral sensations. Drawing from Ajahn Chah and Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she describes awareness as "an act of love"—a receptive, curious presence that doesn't judge or censor experience.

The talk addresses how our habitual refuge in pleasant experiences and escape from unpleasant ones perpetuates saṃsāra, the endless round of seeking gratification. Wilson explains that the Buddha's path offers another way: bringing awareness directly to suffering when it arises, rather than running toward sense pleasure. This steady, non-reactive awareness naturally purifies the heart, allowing wisdom and compassion to emerge while clinging and aversion lose their grip. The practice requires no striving—just simple perseverance and the willingness to receive each moment with openness.

So tonight I want to talk hopefully rather simply. Basically the bottom line is I just want to encourage you to keep going. That's it.

What I want to talk about is really different ways—certainly not exhaustively—that this simple moment-to-moment awareness can be so powerful and transformative.

Remember last night or at some point Steve was saying that what we're really starting from, the angle we're beginning from in the instructions and the way we're talking about this particular technique or form of practice, is from the wisdom side, from the understanding side. And if you remember when he talked about right view, he said that understanding is what frees our minds and hearts from suffering. Really the only tool, you could say, or technique that we're offering or talking about here is just this simple recognition of moment-to-moment mindfulness, moment-to-moment awareness. And we're saying this purifies the heart and mind, this leads to the understanding that frees us from suffering.

Has that been your experience so far? There might have been moments. If there's even a moment, that's already great, because then we get a sense of how it works. But I just want to talk a bit about how this simple awareness, moment-to-moment awareness, the steadiness of awareness, can be so transformative. And what gets transformed anyway?

I think Steve said, but it always bears repeating, that all of our suffering arises not because of how things are, not because somehow we need to change things in the world. All of the suffering—not all of the pain, pain will come—but all of the suffering, this is how the Buddha saw it, arises because we misperceive. We recognize wrongly our experience of ourselves, of so-called others, of the six sense doors. We perceive incorrectly. What we perceive we think about, so we think about and describe our experience incorrectly. And then we respond, we react in a way that maybe not consciously but through habit we think is going to make us happy. And the responses coming out of misperception and confused thinking keep us confused and suffering.

When the Buddha talks about freedom from suffering, what we're talking about here isn't about some way to fix it all so that it's all okay. As I was saying in one of the groups, it's not that somehow finally we hit that moment where everything is like, "Ah, it's all over. Thank God we've got it." We're waiting for that. Secretly, look and see if you're waiting for that. It's not what it's about. And awareness or enlightenment isn't about somehow escaping from this world to a better place. The Buddha woke up in this world, lived in this world. We awaken into this world, in this mind and body, but recognizing with different eyes—using eyes as a metaphor—recognizing accurately.

We can't even imagine how something that sounds so simple could so completely change our understanding and the way we live our life. But it does.

And the basis, what allows us to even begin to recognize accurately—and you don't have to believe me—mostly we don't even know we're recognizing inaccurately. That's actually the delusion, the moha, the root of our problems. As I like to say, and friends and I have this little saying, we don't have a clue. Not a clue that we're recognizing inaccurately.

So I want to talk a little bit about that and how sati, mindfulness, which we've been calling awareness here, is just that moment of awareness that's free—what we're calling intelligent awareness—free from bias, free from assumption, free from opinion.

Just, it's like this. It seems so nothing, right? So mundane. That's the seed. That's the incredibly powerful seed, and the steadiness of that can just turn our understanding of ourselves and the world around. It completely transforms. It's not really that we're transformed—it's that our understanding is transformed. It comes in line with the way things are, the way things have come to be.

To start by talking about the sense of right view, or how we don't understand that we're perceiving inaccurately: I actually really like right view as a translation of the Pali sammādiṭṭhi. View as a metaphor is really how we see things. So we're using "see" as a metaphor for understand—it's not about actually seeing with the eyes. But right view is really the sense of how we understand ourselves in the world, the view we hold of how things are. I find this fascinating to explore because often, frequently, most of the time, we have all kinds of views about ourselves in the world that we just assume are true.

That's where we get confused and lost.

Right view is simply how we perceive. The Buddha had a great ordering of this: what we perceive is just that simple recognition—tree, person, bell. Oh, that's Carol. We're going to perceive what we perceive, and that's already complicated. That can be mis-perception.

What we perceive, we think about. We make a story: this is what it means. What we think about forms into a view of "yes, this is how it is." Mostly we're not actively thinking "yes, this is how it is"—we just know that's how it is. And when different views of the world meet each other, that's where so much of the conflict in the world comes from. It doesn't have to be conflict, but we all have views just from seeing through our different cultural backgrounds. We grow up holding different views of things, of how things are, without even knowing how it's different for somebody else.

One of the joys and complications of multiculturalism is trying to first see your own view, then understand others, and see where they connect. But we always want to think, "Well, mine's right though. I'll try and understand these other people. I'll make allowances. But this is really how it is."

So I'll tell you a little story. I was just telling this last week in Barry, but I liked it for this sense of view—how we perceive, how we think about things is shaped by the views we're believing, the views we're holding about the world, about how things are, about who we are.

This was a few years ago. I was in Burma with a few friends—two Western women who are nuns and the rest of us lay people. We were at a ceremony where dāna offerings were being given to a group of villagers who had lost a great deal in the cyclone. There were big offerings of food. It's a whole ceremony. These things are done very formally in Burma, and they're like a happy celebration time.

So that was the setting, and as always, ten million photographs are taken every time there's any kind of dāna, any offering of generosity. It's just a million photographs. So we got back and we were looking at one of our friend's cameras, photographs of different aspects of that day—us standing there handing out medicine and food, other people present.

On a few of the photographs, there were these very exact circles of light, very precise circles, not like smudges or little marks. They were just kind of on different ones of us in the photograph. So I looked at them and said, "That's funny, I wonder what that is."

Then my friend who speaks Burmese and has spent many years in Burma—you have to remember, Burma, the majority of the Burman ethnic group, which is where we were, are Buddhists growing up in a Buddhist culture. There's a complete faith in the Buddhist worldview, in different realms of existence. That's just how it is. To us that might seem quite strange, but to them, that's just how it is.

So my friend said, "Oh, well, that's devas. That's how devas show up in photographs." Devas are celestial beings. I said, "Really?"

Then our third friend, also a nun but with a PhD—she's a botanist, a trained scientist—she said, "That's not devas. Don't you know that's the way light reflects? There's probably a little drop of water in the lens..." And she went on for a whole five-minute scientific explanation.

Who knows? That's the question—who knows? Not "who's right," which is what we want to figure out. This is just how views work. The perception colors how we think about it, and the perception is already colored by the views we're living by that we don't even know we hold.

We thought it was funny. Who knew? All the Burmese people would say, "Yeah, sure, that's devas." Then we came back to the West and I was showing the photos to some friends at IMS and they said, "There's no way, are you kidding?" And they came up with another explanation: "See that light from that window? And see this? It's just her camera." But then we looked at other cameras from the same time, the same moment, and they had it too.

Since then, I've seen different photos of unusual situations that have the same thing. Like just last year, there's a photo of me and a friend with this incredible old sayadaw—sayadaw is a word for teacher, like ajahn or rinpoche—who's about ninety-eight years old.

He lives up in the Sagaing Hills, and he just oozes metta. He's one of the most amazing beings. He's been there his whole life. He remembers when there were tigers roaming around in Sagaing, and he would walk down on his alms round once a day, this huge walk. So anyway, he's an amazing guy. And there were a lot of those orbs in that picture. I started to think, you know, maybe it could be Davis. Who knows?

So my point is, the awareness—a moment of awareness is from that sense of "who knows?" But that's not so comfortable for us. It's more comfortable to land in the knowing, even if it leads to conflict. And never mind conflict with another person—conflict with our own experience.

So this sense of what we're cultivating, the quality of awareness, is this willingness, this freshness of presence—just in one moment, you don't have to try and hold it all day—of "who knows?" Whatever it is that's arising in your experience.

And so you may start to notice how many views come in when you're in conflict with your experience. "Well, this shouldn't be happening. Second day of a retreat, I shouldn't be this sleepy. It's because of..." you know, fill in the blanks. And then, "I shouldn't be thinking this. I'm getting lost in that. I shouldn't be." Why? Why shouldn't you? Because there's no "it shouldn't." This is what's happening. As Byron Katie says, when you fight with reality, you lose. "This shouldn't be happening." It should be happening because it is happening. In this moment, this is what's happening, and there's no way around it.

So the moment of mindful awareness is just, "Oh, it's like this." And if a view comes in—"it's because of this and this and the other"—fine. Recognizing that view is the next arising thought, rather than just automatically believing it.

This sense of recognizing incorrectly, responding out of the thoughts of that incorrect recognition, forms a view, and then that view colors our perception, and it keeps on circling. It keeps on circling. So that's just a little example of how this works.

In the big picture, the misperceptions the Buddha always speaks of—I'm just mentioning them, I'm not going to go into them tonight—are that we perceive constant change, but we don't actually perceive that. We perceive things as permanent. You might say, "Well, I know it's going to change later," but we don't perceive it in the moment. We don't perceive the unsatisfactory quality of experience. Somehow we think it's going to do it for us. We don't perceive the lack of substantial, separate, inherent self-existence in things. We see not only ourselves, but especially ourselves, as separate, self-existing, unchanging. And that feels comfortable and safe, but actually these misperceptions are giving rise to our continuing misunderstanding and responding to simple experience in ways that really increase our confusion and suffering.

Don't believe me. I mean, you can believe me or not—it won't do any good. Because we can read this, we can hear this. And it's useful, as Steve said—it's beginning knowledge to help us look. And we can think about it. "Well, maybe it makes sense. It's worth having a look." But it's the steadiness of moment to moment—just that open recognition of awareness of what's happening without needing to make sense of it. Without needing to have this experience fit neatly into all my little patterns. Or if you need it, you just notice the needing.

That quality of: Is it Davis? Is it the moisture in the lens? Is it possible to just be really present and open without needing to know? It's just stepping into the unknown in each moment.

So this view—really, the deep view of misperception that the Buddha talked about, that I would not say guides all of us, but it's under there probably for most of us—is the belief, you could say, or the trust in what's called samsara. Samsara being the seemingly endless round of looking, wanting, getting or not getting, leading to the next thing, leading to the next thing—the so-called endless round of rebirth. And you don't have to believe in different realms of existence, but birth after birth, moment after moment.

I'm going to read this from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. I've been appreciating this a lot lately. He says, "The Buddhist teachings describe three fundamental attitudes, which can be practiced together as a whole." The renunciation he's talking about—renunciation, compassion, and pure perception, or wisdom. I'm going to talk about what he's calling renunciation tonight, the way he's talking about it, not what you might be thinking.

"Renunciation is the foundation, the root of all the subsequent stages of the path. It implies the strong wish to free oneself, not only from your immediate sorrow, but more so from the seemingly unending sufferings of samsara"—meaning the seemingly unending cycle of conditioned existence.

So how does that manifest, this wish to free oneself from that? "It manifests as a heartfelt weariness and disillusionment"—I think the word "disillusionment" is important—"with this endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status."

And that, I think, is a very succinct definition of samsara that I appreciate. It's the cycle we are so often caught in—this seemingly endless quest for gratification, self-gratification, for approval, for profit, for getting something, for status. Basically, wanting something. Seemingly endless.

The Buddha's not saying this is bad, you should hate wanting, you should hate yourself for wanting, and you should stop it right now. No. Why do we do this? Because in our twisted perception, that's the refuge. It's like a message whispering that this is what's going to make us happy. This seemingly endless quest—you don't get this thing, but the next one will do it. This particular sitting was unpleasant, but the walking will be better. This retreat so far is a washout, but maybe next time. That lunch—I don't really like chickpeas—but dinner could be better. Or you can go on the aversive side, but it's the same thing.

And without this moment-to-moment simple awareness of just watching that process, what's so fascinating is when I describe it, you laugh. It's not like you're all thinking, "I can't relate to that at all." Maybe you are—can't relate at all—okay, that could go either way. But still it keeps seducing us. Not even seducing us—it's like it's whispering, "This is the way."

Why? What helps us see through it? And that's where we come back to awareness. Not awareness with the idea "I need to stop this," but just to turn our attention. As long as we're caught in that flow of samsara, part of the effect is it keeps us looking outward, so to speak, toward the object, toward what's happening.

Another simple way the Buddha described how we get caught in this—just the habits of our mind, and you've all seen this—is the sense of how all day, as Steve said, just six things are happening. You remember what the six things are? Thinking and mental experiences are happening, over and over and over. And you see how fast stuff is happening.

Our habit all day—not only on retreat but our whole life—what we're practicing when we're not recognizing it, is that something comes, a sight. It's mildly pleasant or unpleasant. Mostly we don't notice that, of course. But the habit is, "Oh, that's so pretty." There's just this leaning into it. It's not like you abandon your life and go running after it. Just this subtle, "Oh, that's nice. I'll look at that a little more." And a sound comes that's unpleasant, and there can be this subtle reaction we don't even know about—"Oh, I don't like that." Not even the bigger version, just "Oh, I don't like that."

The neutral—where Steve was talking about how much of our experience in the day is so mundane—we just don't even notice it. And that's becoming even more prevalent in our culture, isn't it, with all the media and stimulation? God forbid there should be thirty seconds when something isn't coming in. And so we don't even notice that neutral experience.

This is like a habit of response that's just going on all the time. And I'm not saying it's bad or good—I'm just saying this is what happens.

And what this can lead to in terms of the way we think about experience and the views that get inculcated in the background, reinforcing this habit, is that first we're deriving meaning from the objects, from what's happening. It inculcates the sense that the pleasant is basically good or acceptable.

When you think about enlightenment, do you think about your back hurting? When we think about it going well—you know, you've had a sitting where you're just filled with anger and rage—are you describing that as, "Oh, that's great, that's a great sitting"? Yeah, thanks a lot. It's not what I thought of as a great sitting. It just inculcates the sense that that's what happiness is. That's what's right, the pleasant. It doesn't help, in a way, that wholesome mental states are actually more pleasant too, but that's another story. The fact that it has to be pleasant to be good—that gets in there.

And when difficult stuff, unpleasant stuff is happening, it's so easy for the mind to respond in some way with, "This is wrong." The world out there is wrong, or I'm wrong because this is happening, and to do this right, whatever it is, this needs to be fixed. I'm not saying we can't change things in the world. I'm saying, in this moment, this is happening. That's the way it is. But the mind says, "No, this shouldn't be happening." And it's only happening because I'm bad, I'm stupid, the world is wrong—we're just lost in aversion. And the neutral doesn't even exist. So we're really in a state of disconnect from what's actually going on.

Both in a very gross way and also more and more subtly, this view takes hold: that right is pleasant and unpleasant is bad. And that the way to happiness is this samsaric search for more and better things. Whether the pleasant is status or money or people liking you or getting things, it doesn't matter what it is. It's the search itself that's taking us away from the simple recognition: this is what's happening now. Things as they have come to be in this moment, recognized accurately moment to moment—this is the avenue to freedom.

When we're caught in this samsaric spin without recognizing it, thinking that we're trying our best to be happy, we're just feeding the confusion. How to get out of it? Then we bring the same mind: "Okay, it's bad, how can I get rid of it?" Instead, bring in that awareness. Watch the whole process. Not just once, I'm sorry to tell you, but ten million billion times. Each time fresh, each time new. This steadiness of knowing is where the wisdom comes. It's really quite amazing. Also humbling.

So I'll tell you another little story about that—just recognizing how samsara works from my own life. A little embarrassing, but never mind, since everyone who knows me knows this anyway.

In terms of thinking that what we're doing will bring us happiness or joy or comfort or whatever: I happen to be a big fan of watching professional tennis, professional men's tennis. I'm a complete non-athlete. I don't know why, but anyway, I'm a big fan of this. So this is something I do for enjoyment, right? I do it because it's going to make me happy. No one else cares, it doesn't do anybody else any good. There's this belief, unspoken, that this is a really enjoyable aspect of my life. And someone spends a fair amount of time doing it—not that much, okay, but still.

So last year, when I first realized this, I went through the whole process last summer with just more steady awareness. I don't think it's bad or wrong, so I didn't have any judgment about it. But it was during the time of Wimbledon, which is one of the big tennis matches, one of the most important ones. And of course, I have a favorite player, because otherwise you don't suffer as much. If you don't care who wins, you've got to care who wins to really get in there, you know.

Friends who know me say that when I'm watching tennis, if it's two players I know but it's not my favorite player—oh, I just watch and I'm appreciating the skill. It's fine.

My favorite player's playing? I'm a nervous wreck. Really. Sometimes I have to leave the TV and go take a walk if it's the fourth set of a five-set match. I can't bear it. I have to go take a walk and come back and calm down, and then I can watch it. Maybe.

So this was Wimbledon, and my favorite player, who's one of the main guys—anyway, Roger Federer—he actually won it that year. But anyway, he won it, and it was a huge thing because it made him have the most wins of anybody in the Grand Slams. It also meant he went back to number one. In the tennis world, these were huge things.

So all the stress of watching it, I was noticing just more clearly, without judgment: I don't actually enjoy watching the match. As I said, I have to leave. I'm stressed out of my mind. It's really unpleasant. But then I can't not know what's happening either. So I'm running back and looking, and maybe I'll just look on the computer. What's the score?

And I'll say, "Oh my God, he just lost. He got broken twice. I can't stand it." I'll go away. "Oh, he's up again now. Okay, that's good." And then I'll watch. I mean, it's so bad—the year before, somebody on the board of IMS called me up the day he lost in the quarters and said, "I'm so sorry, Carol." This is a guy I hardly even knew. I was really embarrassed.

Anyway, so that's the best it could be. He won Wimbledon. He was number one. In terms of samsara, that's the most you could have. You're happy. And I really saw: how long does that happiness last? Maybe two days. Because right away you've got to start worrying about the Olympics. And then after the Olympics, you've got to worry about the US Open. And it keeps going like that.

I thought, "Oh my God." I sort of knew that in the back of my mind, but the awareness—watching it without any judgment, just: look at that. And I thought this was making me happy. So that quality of awareness lets us see what's really going on.

But do you see the quality that has to come into the awareness? It's just interest, curiosity. If we start out with the assumption that this is wrong, this is bad, you're not going to see clearly. If we start out with the assumption that this is how it should be happening—and think about this in your practice—"Oh, this is how it should be." It's so subtle. You just give this little nudge, trying to nudge things in the direction of how they should be going. It shuts down clear seeing immediately.

So when I talk about awareness as being radical, that's what I mean. It's radically present with everything, with this open unknowing. How is it now?

And awareness doesn't really have a quality of kindness. I like to talk about kind awareness, but awareness itself isn't kind—it's just what it is. But for us as humans to talk about it, you could say that the quality of the awareness we're talking about is almost like a quality of listening. You know what I mean? Like we're just hearing.

Ajahn Sumedho likes to talk about awareness receiving experience, rather than us going out and creating it somehow. So awareness is just receiving hearing, or receiving judging, or receiving sadness, or receiving frustration. Frustration is just like this.

There was a slogan on NPR a few years ago when they were doing a series of interviews about different people's lives. The slogan was: "Listening is an act of love." I like that for the quality of awareness. Simple awareness—only this moment, whatever's arising—is an act of love. An act of complete surrendering. Oh, it's like this now. Couldn't be any other way.

And it's not just to feel better in the moment, as I'm saying, but because the steadiness of awareness is what allows wisdom to arise. The wisdom that arises from recognizing accurately.

So back to the tennis example—recognizing accurately all that stuff that goes on doesn't mean it simply ends. I continue to watch tennis, but I'm more aware. As I'm watching it, it really isn't quite as fun as it used to be, I have to say. Of course, Roger's getting older and about to retire, so maybe it's that. But it really isn't quite as fun. I'm not negative about it, but I'm more aware, and so I can kind of go, maybe I don't need to watch it right now.

And that's a tiny example of what Dingo Kenzie was saying—a kind of disillusionment with the endless quest for gratification, approval, status. It's not saying, oh, it's bad and I'm bad. But it's also not saying, I will now stop craving. That doesn't work, have you noticed?

It's this sense of, oh, I want to... maybe not. The craving doesn't make sense in the moment of clear seeing. The aversion to things as they are makes no sense in the moment of clear seeing because it's just, oh, this is how it is.

The steadiness of awareness is what allows us to see the whole process, and seeing the process is what allows the wisdom—craving just drops away for that moment. It's really quite amazing, and then that strengthens our trust in the whole process, our trust in awareness.

There's a Pali phrase I like to use a lot: yathā bhūta, usually translated as "things as they are." In different lists of various kinds of insights in the commentaries, there's one called yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana, usually translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they are."

I just want to talk about yathā bhūta. Several friends whose understanding of Pali is a whole lot better than mine—which isn't hard—have told me that the more precise translation, according to the tense of the verb, is "things as they have come to be."

I really like that because there's only this moment. Awareness arising, meeting, receiving things as they have come to be in this moment—that gives me a certain sense.

"Things as they are," or when we're reacting—I like, I don't like, it's good, it's bad—what that feeds is the sense of separate, unique experiences. This is here, it's bad, it shouldn't be here. Oh, this is nice, let's keep this going. It keeps us looking outward to the experience, to the object. It keeps us involved in our relationship to the object and what it means about me. That's the big delusion, right? What does this mean about me?

Yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be. I love it because what it gives me is a more accurate sense that there's no separate thing. I mean, how did this bell come to be? It isn't some separate thing. If we start to reflect for just a moment on all the conditions that came together for this bell to be here in this moment—where can you stop?

There's whoever gave it, and it's been sitting here all this time, and Spirit Rock exists, and it's made of a certain kind of metal that was mined in a certain place, and all the men and maybe women who mined it, and then the people who had to turn it into this kind of metal, and then the people who transported it to the factory or wherever they make bells, and then back to however many hundreds of years ago when these kinds of bells were first designed. And what's the cause for this bell? What made the people who donated it decide to donate it? What made the people who accepted it decide to accept it? And because Spirit Rock is here, we're all here—and how did each of us come to be here?

You can't separate anything.

And in this moment, as I said, it can't be any different because this is how it is. Things as they have come to be. So if I'm just allowing this kind of radical surrender awareness, just receiving things as they have come to be in this moment—it gives more space and less personal reactivity.

Because so many things have come to be, we can bring in curiosity—the kind of curiosity that we bring to the steadiness of our experience here. So you come in and you're sleepy in a sitting, and instead of "Oh, now I'm sleepy, bad," it's like: things as they have come to be. Everything's arising in this moment lawfully, due to all kinds of causes and conditions. The steadier our awareness is, the more we notice what those causes and conditions are. How we respond comes out of that seeing, and then we notice what effect our response has.

And so the whole thing that might have seemed haphazard, or "why me," or "I blew it again," starts to shift. We start to see that everything is arising due to causes and conditions, affecting the next thing. And with clear seeing, that recognition, that understanding unfolds naturally.

This is again what it's so hard for us to trust. Our job is just this receiving—letting awareness be an act of love, being willing to wake up in it again and again and again, and trusting that with the steadiness of awareness, the clear seeing, the right view arises naturally. You don't have to figure it out. And in fact, we can't. Because we try to figure it out from what we already know.

Do you remember Krishnamurti? Jack was telling me that someone who sounds knowledgeable was saying nobody remembers Krishnamurti anymore, that I have to stop quoting him. Anyway, his first book, when he first broke free, was Freedom from the Known. And I think that's a wonderful phrase in terms of awareness. It's freedom from the known. We sit down and our knee hurts. "I know why my knee hurts." No, no, no—just wait. What's happening now? Freedom from the known, open to discover. And then seeing. And the trust will build that accurate recognition will give us the information that we need. Accurate perception leads to wise understanding. If we try to figure it out, we're just going to go down the path we already know.

Thich Nhat Hanh said that understanding does not arise as a result of thinking—he's talking about Dhamma understanding. It does not arise as a result of thinking, but from the long process of conscious awareness. Thinking can express or contain some understanding, but it's too limited and rigid to actually hold much understanding. So I just say that we can't think our way into it. God knows we'll try, and that's okay. Awareness just notices thinking. That was a little aside there.

Even when there have been times—and we've all had them, I'm sure—where we have enough steady awareness to see through the seduction of this round of samsara. Haven't you all experienced a time where you really see, "Oh, wanting isn't doing it"? Getting those M&Ms really didn't make my day, whatever it is. Or someone said yesterday, "It's so obvious for a moment, and then we just forget again."

Isn't that the most amazing thing? To me, that's the most amazing thing about how our minds work when they're in their confused state. Just a moment of simple awareness, in that moment of clarity when you're not fighting against something or taking it personally or making a story—it's just like this. Doesn't it all seem so simple? Does anyone know what I'm talking about? Just checking. It's like, "Oh."

And in those moments, when we've let go of wanting, the sense of ease, the sense of presence and openness to the world and connection and freedom is so palpable. Why would I want to pick up that wanting again? It's so clearly suffering and constricting.

Two minutes later? You pick it up again. It seduced us again. We've heard the siren song: "No, come with me and you'll be happy."

How does this happen? Come! It really is amazing to me.

And I would say, if anything, all these years of practice, one of the things that's really strengthened is my deep respect for the power of habits in the mind. The habits of this wanting, of this aversion to the unpleasant, of evaluating our happiness based on that and getting involved in every experience and thinking: What does that mean about me? How does this make me happy? How does this make me sad? How does that person walking across the floor so mindfully—what does that mean about me?

Do you notice that? It's amazing. Then you hate it. No need to hate it. It's not personal. Everyone's doing it. It's not personal. It's like, wow, look at how the mind works. I like this. I don't like that. This is good. This is bad. This isn't worth paying attention to. What does it mean about me? What does it mean about me that I don't like that? Wow, they really like this music. I don't like that music. What does that mean about me? What does it mean about them? It's exhausting.

Just—ah, it's like this, this music. So simple. Why do we jump out of it again? It's amazing.

So the force of habit just sucks us right back in. There's a kind of comfort in the familiar. Where do we really take refuge? We're talking about the difference between refuge and comfort. Where do we take refuge? And this is back to right view—not even conscious—when we're in stress, or when we're confused, or when something's difficult, what's the place our mind and heart, our habit of mind, goes to for refuge?

So often what we've been practicing, most of us, is that when something's really difficult, our refuge is to get the heck away from it. And when you think about it, well, of course that makes total sense, doesn't it? I don't think I should sit with pain. If I can get away from it, I should. That makes sense, right? So what's wrong with that? Refuge into the pleasant. Well, if I could have pleasant rather than unpleasant, I'd go for it. If I could have food I like versus food I don't like, I'd go for it. What's the problem with that?

We take refuge in that. We really believe it's comfortable. And then the other form of delusion is all the stories we tell about ourselves, the assumptions we make. I think I mentioned yesterday, talking about delusion—one of the aspects of delusion Tejani was discussing is assumptions we make about people. But notice the assumptions you're making about yourself a hundred million times a day. Because I'm no good, I don't understand, I'm too tired, this other practice is better, I don't know what the hell they're talking about, I had too much to eat. Or I can be aware and I am so good because of all the practice I've done, because I'm such a great person. Or who cares about that anyway, but the fact that I ate too much at dinner just shows what a kind of weak and—you know, and on and on and on.

You sit down and your breath is choppy. Oh, and suddenly your whole life story unfolds because your breath is choppy. All of it just based on assumptions.

The steadiness of awareness cuts through all of that.

Let's look at Ajahn Chah. He says, "We get so absorbed in objects and our reactions to the objects that we neglect to notice how the mind is working." This is our whole practice here—getting interested in how the mind is working. And yet, the mind is where suffering and peace are found.

I'll just read a little bit from him. "Escaping from suffering means knowing the way out of suffering. It doesn't mean running away from wherever suffering arises." By doing that, you just carry your suffering with you. But don't we think getting out of suffering means running away?

He talks about sense contact. Most of us are either afraid of contact, as if it's going to cause suffering, or we like to have contact but don't develop wisdom from it. Instead, we repeatedly indulge ourselves through eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, and mind—delighting in the objects and getting lost in them. These sense bases can entice us into delight and indulgence, or they can lead to knowledge and wisdom.

So we take everything as practice, even the bad things. When we talk of practice, we don't mean taking those things that are good and pleasing to us. That's not how it is. In this world, some things are to our liking, some are not. Usually, whatever we like, we want. Usually whatever we don't like, we don't want to see or even know about. But the Buddha wanted us to experience all of these things. Lokawidu—look at this world and know it clearly. That's our practice. Look at this world and know it clearly.

If we don't know the truth of the world clearly—and we are the world, this mind and body—we don't go anywhere. Living in this world, we must understand the world. The noble ones of the past, including the Buddha, all lived with these things. They lived in this world among people and realized the truth right here, nowhere else.

That's really our practice—just to meet suffering in the heart, to meet happiness in the heart, right here. When suffering arises in the mind, awareness is right here receiving it with that quality of interest. What is this? How is it arising? Not by thinking about it, just the steadiness of awareness. We start to see how it arises. When happiness arises in the mind, awareness is right there. Happiness is like this. How does it arise? How does it end?

Seeing that suffering arises and it ceases right where it arises. This is Ajahn Chah again: "Happiness arises and it ceases right where it arises." Our job is just trusting this moment-to-moment receptive awareness to reveal yathābhūta—things as they have come to be. And amazingly enough, that is the seed that brings that clear seeing, that brings the freeing of heart and mind. It's really amazing how that can happen. And it does happen, over and over. Really noticing that—it's like a shift of refuge. And we're practicing it here. That's really all we're doing here: practicing awareness. Just the simple recognition of the knowing.

We're just practicing it. I know you might be thinking something better is supposed to happen. You're doing this, you're humoring us, but you're waiting for the real thing to happen. This is it. We're practicing moment-to-moment awareness. And each moment of recognizing—well, so what?

Because we're focusing out on wanting something, we're in samsara. How do we step out of samsara? Through yata bhuta—things as they have come to be—with total presence and reception. Nowhere to go, nothing to change, nothing to do. Total wakefulness, this moment, and this moment.

We don't have to figure it out. I can't tell you what a relief that is. Because we haven't been doing such a good job if we had to figure it out.

Let me read this from Tejaniya, talking about this awareness, which is always available. That's how we're shifting our trust, our refuge—to recognize that it's always available as soon as we remember.

So this receptive awareness—we're not trying to create something. We're not rejecting what is happening. As things happen or stop happening, we don't forget awareness of them. We notice it stopped. We notice it starts.

And I think this is quite interesting: acceptance of an experience doesn't mean we stop being aware of it. We bring awareness along with it. Often people talk about a difficult experience and say, "Okay, I just have to accept it." And accepting becomes, "Okay, I can be with it"—as if, well, that's it, that's accepted. And a little bit the mind shuts down onto the next thing. "I did my task with this difficult one, I accepted it, what's next?"

No. What's happening now? Accepting means it's like this now. Does it change? Does it stay? Does something else happen? Who knows? Yata bhuta—this moment will lead to the next, and we never know what the next will be. So it's this constant opening into the unknown with full awareness.

In terms of how we get sucked back into samsara with these habits of wanting and aversion to the pleasant and the unpleasant and the stories of "me," there's one thing the Buddha said in the Suttas that I find both very important but incredibly poignant. It really evokes this kind of sadness every time I read or think about it, because it's so true, but it's so unnecessary.

He's talking about our habits of reacting to the unpleasant with aversion, of reacting to the pleasant with wanting, and of reacting to the neutral with just not knowing what's happening—how all of that comes to be habits in our mind.

"The unenlightened, ordinary worldling"—that's us. Or "thickster," as I've heard it more accurately translated. I love that. Thickster.

How does the thickster react? We get all upset at the unpleasant. We love the pleasant. But this is what touches me so much. He said, "A thickster, having been touched by a painful feeling, resists it and resents it." You can relate to that. Then, "In one who so resents that painful feeling, an underlying tendency of resistance against painful feeling comes to be a habit in the mind." It just comes to be a habit.

And under the impact of that painful feeling and the resistance to it, he then proceeds to search for and enjoy sensual happiness. You're feeling bad and you go to the refrigerator and have some ice cream. That's basically it. Your back hurts and you go and take a hot bath, turn on a movie. Not that any of it's bad—see, our mind goes, "No, not bad"—but just to see the habit.

So under the impact of the painful feeling, he proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. And this is the part I find so poignant.

Why does he do so? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness.

And that's samsara, right? There's no other way out of our unhappiness, out of our suffering, except to go get something more pleasant. And in the moment of looking, when we're just focused out there, it does it—it distracts us from the unpleasant, it changes it, we get the pleasant. And so that's the promise. We'll keep on doing it, keep on doing it. It keeps us looking outward.

The shift of refuge is this willingness to be aware of the problem. Unpleasant—just what Ajahn Chah said—when suffering comes up, awareness comes in right there at that suffering. And the refuge is the awareness. The escape from suffering isn't the escape from all unpleasant. It's that step out of that endless quest for pleasant into awareness itself. Ah, unpleasant feels like this.

It doesn't mean we can't make an intelligent decision to change something. We can make a much more intelligent decision when it's not coming out of reaction. So it doesn't mean acceptance where you lie down and become a doormat. But it means we bring awareness in right here. That's the only way we're going to see clearly.

The steadiness of mindfulness, the steadiness of awareness with whatever's coming—whatever's coming—gives us a kind of real freedom because we can stop judging and censoring and saying, "This is okay to bring into my meditation and this isn't. I have to meditate so this can't be arising in my mind."

I was talking to Alexis today. He said something I thought was really great in terms of this. He said I could share it—I asked, so don't worry, I wouldn't quote any of you without asking. He was talking about when he'd been sitting for some time with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, with a sense of just bringing steady awareness to whatever arises. He said it felt so freeing because it gave him permission to be totally himself. To bring all aspects of mind here in the practice, in the awareness. To be totally yourself in your practice. Nothing left out. Nothing censored. But bringing awareness along with it. It's really an amazing kind of freedom.

And how does this purify our heart and mind? You might think, "If I'm just myself, well, all that stuff we don't want to see—that's what's going to come up." As if it's not coming up anyway, right? Instead of it coming up and it's like, "Oh no"—receiving. Receiving. It's an act of love. Listen to it. That's what's arising. See how it arises, what causes it, what are the effects, what are the thoughts, what happens next. It's all just part of a lawful process. It isn't personal. It brings so much freedom from this judging—the steadiness of awareness.

How does it purify the heart and mind? Just that example I gave before: when we recognize accurately, clinging and aversion as a response just don't make sense. They just don't make sense. We don't have to decide we're never going to be aversive again. It starts to drop. That thing you always judge yourself about arises again, and though suddenly you're aware—you're aware of the judging and all—suddenly there's a moment of, "Oh, look at that. It's just like this. I know why it came." Nothing else. You don't make that happen; it happens itself.

One of our friends and colleagues, Guy Armstrong, likes to say something I really appreciate. He said it's what makes him believe and trust that reality is really beneficent—that when we recognize accurately, it doesn't increase our hatred and our dislike and our fear and our greed. When we recognize accurately, it's these suffering states that drop away, that lose their power. And what gets more trustworthy, what gets more obvious, is compassion and metta and wisdom and equanimity. Naturally. We don't have to create it.

It's really quite amazing.

I was going to close with a quote from Ajahn Sumedho, but I think it's just time to stop.

The last thing I'll say is simply this: it's just this moment—simple opening into the present, no more than that. But every moment. Tejaniya has this big sign on his door: "Never give up." No striving, simple perseverance, no looking for result—but never give up.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute.

CHAPTER 114

Practice of Generosity: Transformer of Consciousness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the practice of dāna (generosity) as one of the three pillars of the Buddha's teaching, alongside sīla (ethical conduct) and bhāvanā (mental cultivation). She emphasizes that purification of mind occurs not only through formal meditation but through all aspects of the Buddha's teaching, with generosity serving as a direct path to transformation.

Wilson draws on her extensive experiences in Burma to illustrate how generosity functions as a lived practice that brings joy to both giver and receiver. She shares moving stories of Burmese doctors donating their time at free clinics, nuns starting schools for poor children, and even money changers spontaneously offering donations after witnessing acts of giving. These examples demonstrate what she calls the "contagious" quality of wholesome states—how witnessing generosity naturally awakens the same spirit in ourselves.

The talk explores how the quality of mind during giving matters more than the gift itself, referencing the story of Anāthapindika and the Buddha's teaching that even throwing bowl rinsings into a pond with kind intention constitutes genuine generosity. Wilson explains the three times generosity brings happiness: in the initial motivation, during the act itself, and in later recollection. She concludes with a sutta passage where the Buddha recommends reflecting on one's own generous acts as a practice that frees the mind from greed, aversion, and delusion—emphasizing this as a valid contemplation practice available in any moment of daily life.

Do good, avoid evil, purify the mind. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas. You find this teaching in all the different areas of Buddhist instruction: cultivate the wholesome, abandon suffering states. That's what purifying the mind means.

Of course, this is what we've been talking about with our whole awareness and mindfulness practice—how the steadiness of awareness naturally allows wisdom to arise. As Steve has said, it's the wisdom that ultimately purifies the mind. We've been talking about that a lot.

But I also want to talk tonight about the fact that purification of heart and mind comes not only from meditation. The way the Buddha spread out his sasana, his teaching, is that all aspects of our life, all aspects of his teaching, are really partaking of this purification of mind and heart, of cultivating the wholesome and helping to change the habits of our mind and heart from our so comfortable ones—so comfortable and friendly with wanting and aversion and delusion—to change those to pure, wholesome ones, which actually are much more happiness-producing, even in the moment.

Even though my first training in Vipassana came in Asia, in the Goenka system, for some years it was mostly in the form of retreats, with no cultural container for it. In retreats like this, we learned the bhavana, the meditation, the cultivation of awareness, which really is the strongest, most powerful, most direct route to awakening, to purification, to happiness—no question. But it doesn't exist alone, as if separate from the rest of our life.

Even though we'd hear about the three pillars of the Buddha's teaching—dana, or generosity; the practice of sila, or non-harming behavior, which we took up with the precepts; and bhavana, mental cultivation in all the different ways we've discussed—I never really learned dana and sila as practices in themselves. I never learned the beauty, the joy, the depth of embracing the practice of generosity and the practice of sila as a way of life, not just to do them so that I could meditate better, which is sort of how we would take them on in those days. We understood that we have to follow the precepts because then you don't feel remorse, which is true—that's in the suttas. And we thought, "I want to not feel remorse so I can have better meditation states." All that is true, just a little bit askew in the motivation.

So all the aspects of the teaching matter. Today in the groups, it makes me want to talk about this specifically. I'm going to talk about the practice of generosity as a practice of liberation, of awakening.

I also realized something about the steadiness of mindfulness and really starting to explore the defilements, as Steve was talking about, with incredible interest. I was so proud to see that from everybody—so happy to see the defilements! "I can't wait for the next one, right?" Once in a while, you might really feel like that when you're bored. But here's what's important: while the steadiness of awareness will of course reveal the conditions that come together to create a kalesha, a defilement arising in the moment—how it comes together, how it falls apart—it's equally important to keep the steadiness of awareness to notice the moments when there's not defilement. Yes, there are such moments. We can get so afraid of seeing the pleasant, saying "the pleasant leads to clinging," so we pull back from it, and we're so interested in the defilements that we get a little skewed. It's important to recognize that the steadiness of awareness sees all of it. All of it. I just wanted to bring that out.

Purifying the mind is both seeing how the unwholesome creates suffering—not by hating it, but by being with it—and also recognizing how simple, attentive awareness with the wholesome actually strengthens it and helps it grow. This is natural. It's just a natural effect.

Here is a quote from the Dalai Lama: "When the mind is completely free of negative emotions and tendencies, it understands and knows all phenomena. It is only because there are obscuring veils between the mind and its object that we are unable to know all things. Once these veils have been removed, no new power is needed. Seeing and being aware is the nature of the mind itself. As long as the mind exists, it has the ability to know. But this ability does not reveal itself until all obscurations have been removed. This is what it means to attain enlightenment."

What we can experience and what is important to recognize, as well as how the defilements work to obscure, is that we can experience moments when those obscurations aren't there—moments with the natural nature of the mind to see and know. And no new power is needed. It's just nature. It's what we've been saying all along.

So the three pillars of the Buddha's teaching—dana, sila, bhavana—are all about transforming our suffering habits of mind.

Purifying the mind, strengthening the wholesome habits—these are not secondary practices.

But again, it's important as I talk about generosity: I'll be talking about it from the point of view of the quality in the mind, in the heart, because that's really what matters. The mind is what leads to speech and action. It's not so much that we have to give this or that, but what's going on inside of us. And so we learn to trust in the steady awareness of the wholesome, of the beautiful—or just recognizing those moments. It doesn't have to be generosity. When it is, it's a little glimpse of nibbana, heading in the direction of pure mind. It's important to recognize that.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa. Someone reminded me of him today. He was a great Thai forest monk who died at the end of the last century. I spent some time with him when I was a nun. He was a bit of a radical within the Thai Theravada Buddhist tradition—and the Burmese tradition too—which are, you know, rather restricted. Within that context, he was very radical. You might not find what he says particularly radical, but within that tradition at that time, he was very radical.

This is from a short article of his where he's talking about nibbana for everyone. Already that was radical at that time. He says, "It may be summed up that nibbana is the coolness—coolness of mind resulting from the extinction of defilements. And when we look into the fact that defilements are compounded things, conditioned experience, things that have birth and death—this shows that defilements occur when the causal conditions come together. And when those causal conditions are not present, defilements simply cease to exist."

So this is a moment-to-moment experience. Have you noticed a moment when a defilement simply ceases to exist? It's important to stay aware in that moment, not to assume. We often look away and think, "Well, that defilement just went underground." And when a similar looking one emerges later, we say, "Well, that's been hanging around all day. Here it is again. This is how I always am." We get really worn down by it, not giving equal attention or weight to those moments when the defilement wasn't there. Somehow we think, "Okay, that's a fluke, that's whatever, but here it is again."

As Poonjaji, a teacher I knew in India, said: it's like we take the past and put it on our shoulder and drag it around with us like a corpse. And that's what we're doing sometimes with our stories, with our sense of "this is what I'm suffering from so much." We might ask ourselves, "Well, is it happening now?" "No, it's not, but it was, and it will..." Notice those moments of coolness.

Here Buddhadasa goes on—he was kind of funny: "Anyone can see that if defilements are with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand it?" It's true, isn't it? "Under such conditions, living things must either die or become insane and die anyway." So you get a sense he's in there. He knows what he's talking about.

"So let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods when the fires of defilement are not burning. As a matter of fact, we could say that these periods last longer than when the fires are burning."

That's a task: check it out.

He calls this periodical nibbana, or momentary nibbana. "We have periods of rest, physically and mentally, which refresh us. Why don't we know or feel thankful for this kind of nibbana?"

He's saying: pay attention to it, be appreciative. Not grasping, but feel how those moments affect us. I would call it the steadiness of awareness—though we can be aware and the awareness is clear and pure even while aware of defilements. It won't have quite that same pure feeling as when the mind, the citta, really doesn't have a defilement in it at that moment, and there's awareness.

We tend to think, "Oh, that's such a lovely moment. Everything is so beautiful." But notice just how the mind, the heart feels. Just this—I don't know how to say it—purity. Someone said to me once, and I really liked the way she put it: "It's like the mind and heart feel squeaky clean." Just for that moment. On retreat, you tend to have many such moments, and we often think it's because the perceptions are so vivid. They do get more vivid—the flowers are so beautiful, the deer walking by, whatever.

And that's true, but then turn around and just notice—just like we want to notice how the defilements are coloring perception and the resultant thought and action—notice how the purity in that moment of mind and heart feels. Just get familiar with it. Don't take it personally, but just get familiar with it so we recognize it more, so we can start to trust it more. And steady sati, steady mindfulness and awareness, is what naturally reveals this, just as it reveals how the defilements fool us all the time.

So from that perspective, I want to talk about the actual deliberate practice, or cultivation, or recognition of the quality of generosity as a transformer of our habits of consciousness.

The Buddha, as I said, knew the three pillars of his teaching: generosity, conscious conduct, and mental cultivation. But almost whenever he'd start teaching, he would tend to start by talking about generosity to people. So it wasn't just some kind of throwaway thing. And in fact, he set up his whole Sangha, the Sangha of monks and nuns, based on working together with the lay people through generosity. It is said that the sasana consists of four types of people: ordained women, ordained men, and lay women and lay men. And you need all four types to work together. He set them up to be connected with one another, and it still works today in countries where there are ordained men and women in the Buddhist tradition. It's working. Sometimes it's working better than others, but what binds them together is generosity.

He says, "Monks, the householders are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicine in times of sickness. And you, oh bhikkhus"—so this is nuns and monks—"are very helpful to the householders, as you teach and share with them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, good in the middle, good in the end. Thus, monks, the spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

So he set it up. Lay men and women and ordained women and men mutually support one another for their mutual crossing of the flood and freedom from suffering. And it was set up, and it still is so in Buddhist countries, that monks—and at that time also nuns, bhikkhunis—in terms of food, would go out every day with an alms bowl to whatever community they were in. And the food is just offered. It's not specific to that monk. You don't ask a specific person. They just walk with their eyes down. And they still do this today. Early in the morning, they go out in a line with their alms bowl, eyes down, barefoot—always barefoot. And the lay people, not everyone, but whoever wants to, they know when it's going to be. They come running out and they're standing there, often it's just with a little bowl of rice. That's all they can afford, at least in places I've been in Burma. Little bowls of rice, or sometimes a curry, or whatever. And as the monks come, they just put some into each bowl and then the monks walk on.

It's really—I don't know—I must have somehow been there years ago in another lifetime, because there's something about the early morning, watching the line of monks go out silently and the lay people lining up to offer, that is just really beautiful. It touches my heart.

But anyway, it's set up so they can only eat the food for the day. On eight precepts, nuns and monks don't eat after the noon meal and don't keep the food over. So back in the time of the Buddha, that meant that really the monks and nuns couldn't just go off and disappear and become complete hermits. They had to stay near a town, had to stay in connection with lay people. It's really, I think, quite interesting. There could be times when one would go off on a retreat and maybe other monks would support, but generally, for your whole life, the connection was there. It wasn't like making a community of ordained people who live completely separate, out of this world. They're in this world. And the basis of that is generosity.

And so when we look at the quality of generosity in our hearts—and this isn't just intellectual, though obviously we can think this—when we look at not what you give or why, but what is going on in the heart, in the mind, that makes an expression of generous offering possible, whatever it is... It can just be the generous offering of loving-kindness that you don't even say. There's this outward movement of giving. So what's going on in the mind and heart at that time? Why is it so powerful and transformative?

And of course, some of that's obvious. When you're offering something, it's the opposite of greed and possessiveness. It's the actual movement of letting go, of renunciation, of really letting something go.

It counters ill will, quite interestingly. If you're really doing it as real generosity, try to give something wholeheartedly and feel a lot of ill will towards the person at the same time. Maybe we could throw the thing at them and say, "There, take it!" But that's not really generosity in terms of the wholesomeness in the mind and heart.

And it counters our self-cherishing, covetousness tendency. Because in the movement of a generous action of mind, speech, or body, there's a way of abandoning our self-centered, self-cherishing nature. It's this reciprocal mutuality where connectedness and non-separation are actually what's emphasized, what's experienced, as we act from generosity over and over.

Shantideva, who wrote the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, has this one little quatrain I like so much about this: "Even when I have done things for the sake of others, no sense of amazement or conceit arises. It is like having fed myself. I hope for nothing in return."

It is like having fed myself. That's the sense of the mutuality of real generosity. It's not about the thing or whatever is given. And the inner experience is one of actually a lot of happiness, contentment, even gratitude.

Ajahn Sumedho once said—and I liked this throwaway remark of his, at least it seemed like one when I heard it—"Oh, contentment and gratitude are very supportive states of mind for awakening." That's nice, isn't it? Try it, see for yourself. Contentment. Gratitude. These are states that generosity deepens and fosters because it opens us out of sense of self, greed, and ill will into contentment and presence in this moment. So generosity is actually part of the path of liberating our minds and hearts.

I spent that year in Thailand, and I've spent quite a fair amount of time in Burma in the last ten years or so—about a month a year or more. I think I mentioned the other night the nun Mei-Chi Rung and how her spontaneous generosity of offering her kuti as head nun as soon as any other nuns came kind of touched me. First, it just confused me, befuddled me. I thought, "What? Shouldn't she be looking for perks?" So it touched me, but I didn't quite get the depth of what was really going on.

The more time I've spent in Burma—and don't get me wrong, I am not idealizing this culture; there's a lot of stuff wrong, as in everywhere—but the majority of the Burmese people are coming from the Buddhist tradition. And deeply ingrained in the Buddhist tradition is this real commitment to generosity and to metta, but to generosity as a practice. Being in that culture, one is just surrounded by generosity.

What was the big surprise to me, what felt like a secret I had never really learned about in my life here, is this: we think generosity is good. We like it. We like to be generous. And we think if I have more, I should give to someone who has less. It kind of tends to go in that way. We can feel good about it, but if we feel too good, that's just being a little egotistical.

So what's the big surprise to me is how joyful—really joyful—this practice of generosity is, both for the giver and for the receiver, and how contagious this is. It's a joy that isn't just "Oh, I feel good," a kind of joy that you cling to. It's the happiness of the heart that's released its holding for that moment, of the mind that in that moment is really touching the wholesomeness of non-clinging, the wholesomeness of non-self-referencing.

And so what I have really come to love, one of the things that feeds my heart every time I go to Burma, is that whatever else goes on, there are these generous actions of giving and receiving spontaneously happening all the time—little ways, big ways—and the appreciation of it on both sides. People are looking for what they call "opportunities for generosity." That's what they say: "This is an opportunity for generosity." And they get really happy.

They have their eyes out for opportunities for generosity, not only with the nuns and monks, but also with regular people. It's just part of the culture, and so it starts to seep in. You start to feel and appreciate more and more the generosity, and actually the heart, the mind, gets happier and happier. And again, it's not the happiness of holding on. I mean, one can twist anything. A defilement can slip in anywhere and twist anything—you could get into competitive generosity. But mostly it's not that.

They say generosity gives us happiness in three times. When the motivation first arises—here's an opportunity for generosity, wow—that's the kind of happiness, the purity of mind and heart. We can feel that. Then in the actual offering, being really present, that's another moment or more of happiness in the doing. And later, in the recollection of it. At the end I'll read a sutta from the Buddha where he recommends this as a way to consciously turn the mind towards the wholesome. And that can be really useful to us at times when we're just drowning in the kilesas and the mindfulness isn't strong enough. You know, those times when we say we need to do skillful means. But there's enough wisdom to make the choice to say, okay, maybe I can just turn the mind to the wholesome. You can recollect your generous acts.

So just right now, remember some generous thing you did. See if you can do that without your mind clocking through and going, "That's not generous enough." Just any little generous thing. You opened the door for somebody with a generous heart—not like "hurry up," you know—with a generous heart. Any little generous thing you did. Just remember it. Take a moment and remember it, and let yourself feel it in a wholesome way. Let yourself appreciate it. And if you really can't think of anything, think of something someone did that was generous to you, and appreciate it in the same way. Just let it in for a minute.

This joyful, contagious quality—I feel I've learned so much about generosity as a practice, and I'll give you some little examples. There are a million. What I have to do when I prepare this talk is figure out which ones I want to use, which ones pop into my mind. Just to give you a sense of how—it may or may not work for you—but how sometimes just hearing about it awakens the same happiness and generous spirit in ourselves. That's what's so beautiful about the wholesome qualities. How can it awaken that in us? Because it's a natural effect of the pure heart and mind. It's not some weird different thing. They're contagious, and we can let that in.

Just tiny little things. I was up in Northern Burma one time years ago, and there was a Western monk who was living in the area. He was doing a kind of ascetic practice—he would always go barefoot. He wouldn't wear slippers, trying to be tough. He liked it. And I was riding in a little pony cart with the pony driver. This was years before they had motorcycles and such. There was another friend who spoke Burmese. And the pony cart driver—he knew this monk who came, and he said, "Oh, I feel so sorry for him. He doesn't have any slippers. I really want to go and give him some slippers." He didn't even know this guy. He just saw him walking around. And this kind of immediate wanting to help, to offer—it's just so lovely.

This year, in some monasteries or nunneries where they're able to, there's a place where I stay often where somebody donated money to build a building for a free clinic for the local poor villagers. It just works on the weekend. It doesn't have much in the way of supplies at all. People donate the supplies, send them from Malaysia or bring them when they visit. And the way it works is on Saturday, doctors come—Burmese doctors come on their one day off and donate their time. They work all day; a hundred or two hundred villagers come every day. And on Sunday, it's dentistry day. All these young dentists—and I swear they look about thirteen—all these young dentists come and donate their time. And it's intense, you know? In the free clinic, they really can't do very sophisticated dentistry. Let's leave it at that. But still, no one comes until it hurts so much, but they're there. And these young people, they're donating their one day off. This is not an uncommon phenomenon.

So just last month, over at the meditation center, a friend of mine who's a Western nun—the scientific one who doesn't believe in deva lights, only now she does—she lives there and her job is taking care of the Western yogis who come, setting them up in rooms, helping them get toilet paper. It's actually quite a job, I must say.

One Sunday afternoon, one of the yogis had a filling fall out, or her tooth blew up—one of those things where it really hurts. She had just come to Burma for the first time, and you can get really scared in a foreign country when you don't know where to go and you're just settling in. So her tooth hurt, but her mind hurt more, let's put it that way.

Vera said, "Well, it's lucky it's Sunday. I'll take you over to talk to the dentist." So she took her over, and the dentist in charge was a little bit older, a really lovely man, Vera was telling me. He said, "Well, of course I can't treat you here, but when I'm finished here"—at like three in the afternoon—"follow me into town," which is like an hour's drive, "to my office, and I'll open it up and do what I can." It wasn't a matter of, "Let me see, can I fit this into my calendar? When will I have time?" It was immediate.

So they went in, and it was a whole big afternoon thing. They got to his office, he did a really great job, he had all the equipment, and it was quite a procedure—not just a little filling. And then, of course, he wouldn't take a cent. He wouldn't take any money.

The woman yogi noticed that there was a little shrine—a little Buddha, photographs of this man's particular Buddhist teachers. She looked around and said, "Oh, this is what dāna is, isn't it?" Because it was this joyful spirit of "I'm so happy to spend the rest of my afternoon fixing your teeth and I won't take a cent for it." And then he turned to Vera and said, "Now you sit down, let me check out your mouth."

This complete, open generosity, this immediacy of spirit—our first tendency may be to feel shy or embarrassed, but that shuts down the mutuality. And there's so much joy in the giving that you really don't stay shy and embarrassed. You kind of open up and think, "Wow, how beautiful. Thank you so much." And there's this appreciation.

It's not like you think, "Well, now I have to go out and do something good." Maybe you do. But what happens is the wholesomeness lights up our heart and mind. So she was looking and realizing, "Oh, this is what dāna means."

I've seen that happen so often with friends who haven't quite been in that situation before, in so many different ways. After a meal with some nuns who are really poor—they're running a school for six hundred kids that they have to raise the money for every single month, living all together crammed into one little building because they tore down their other buildings to build this school for poor children. And then they invite us and our friends to lunch and lay out this huge spread that they would never eat themselves. And they're so happy doing it.

Our friends go, "Oh, this is dāna." And you can see as the meal goes on, their smiles get bigger and bigger and they get happier, and there's a sense of connection with the nuns, a happiness flowing both ways.

The next time, if you go back the next year to visit those nuns who did so much for you, they'll be so thrilled to see you. "Oh, you're the one I made mohinga for five years ago!" I mean, that just happened recently. "Yes, you're the one. I remember you. I made mohinga for you. I'm so happy to see you."

You can't not let it in. I mean, you'd have to really try hard. And as you start to let it in, you start to see: the happiness is the happiness. It feels like the mind and heart are being cleaned out, being purified. And there's a lot of other suffering, difficult stuff that goes on, but you feel like you can be more present with it, more open to it. It's really very powerful to see.

So I mentioned that nun who started the school. We're getting to know more and more of these amazing women—nuns who have probably been nuns since they were young girls, so their only education is from other nuns. They can read and write, they read the suttas, they read Pali, and they study the Buddhist texts.

And in some ways, the nunneries serve almost like a safety net for society, particularly for poor young girls who have nowhere else to go.

We've met at least eight such places now. There are many nunneries throughout the country, but among them you find these remarkable ones where the head nun or one of the women will suddenly have this vision that she needs to start a school to help these children.

Many of the nunneries take in very small little girls, either orphans or children whose parents come from the surrounding villages near Yangon and beg the nuns to take their daughters. They know the nuns can give them a better education, or at least make sure they have food. And so the nuns take them in.

One nunnery sits right next door to where we stay. It's packed, absolutely crowded. Four sisters run it. Two years ago they had about twenty little girls. The next year we visited, there were thirty. Where are you going to put them?

Every night they do their chanting for about half an hour—this is something all nuns and monks do. The sound carries over the wall from the same meditation center where I was staying. Some women yogis from Indonesia, I believe, were hearing these young voices chanting every night. One of them got so inspired that she went around to look, and she happened to be fairly wealthy. She saw these little girls and spoke with the head nuns through a translator. They told her, "Yes, and we're about to go back to our home village in the Delta, which has been devastated by the cyclone. We know they're going to ask us to take ten or fifteen more little girls. There's nowhere else for them to go."

And this woman said, "Well, you need a new building, don't you?" And she gave them the money to build one. That's how it works. That's how dāna works.

There are many places like that, and it's not even a school yet—just a nunnery. But there are many where suddenly the head nun will just get it in her head: "I need to start a school." Amazing women doing all of this entirely on generosity.

Let me tell you about one: Daw Sumanacari from the Appamata School. She's actually the nun who made mohinga for me many years ago. She's been around where we stay for quite some time, living in a small nunnery with maybe fifteen women. Frankly, she always seemed a little depressed, to tell you the truth. We never really thought much about it, though I suppose I'd feel depressed too living like that.

Then maybe two or three years ago, she came over to speak with the two Western nuns I knew. Many friends had been sending money through these nuns, and we'd been offering it to other nuns in need. She knew about this—it had been going on for a few years. Usually people don't come asking for money. You simply go and offer. It's a beautiful thing.

But she came over toward the end of our time there, and she seemed very intense, very determined. She said, "I have to start a school. I really want to start a school. It's what I need to do. I've been meditating on it."

I honestly didn't think she could pull it together, but we offered what we could—enough to just get started, enough to build a little lean-to shack. You should see how it works. They build one structure, then add a small thatch roof, find a bunch of chairs, and the next thing you know there are a hundred children there. I'm not exaggerating. Somehow they find the money each month to hire regular teachers.

It's not a lot, God knows. So the next year we came back, and that's what she'd done. They'd torn down the building that all the nuns were living in, and they'd all moved into this one tiny other little building so that they could build this kind of thatched roof place. She had over a hundred young students. She decided to do it just for the little boys and girls both in the area who were too poor to go to the government school—the ones in grades one to four, because the others walked farther, like half an hour, to this other place I talked about. But in the rainy season, it's too hard for the little ones.

So she had started this, and then she'd found support from some other Burmese companies. There are some Burmese companies that actually have a specific wing that just goes around offering dāna to worthy causes—to start schools like this, to pay for teachers for three years in a row. Then in the fourth year, the nuns have to find funding themselves. They have to have community support. But it's like a whole company where half of what they do is that, and the rest is like being in a cosmetics import firm or something. It's really amazing.

So the next year, anyway, she came back and was talking to us again through Ayya Yani, who speaks Burmese, so we could really get the translation. She looked transformed, Daw Sumanichari. This was two years ago, I think. Her face was bright. She was beaming. And this is a translation of what she said. She said, "The idea to start the school last year was so urgent in my mind that I couldn't eat or sleep well. And now it's happening. And so I'm no longer worried, even though I now must work so hard"—you know, and they demolished their building—"and we have to work so hard to find support every month for the teacher's salaries, for the equipment, to get wells, to get toilets, and take care of all the kids." She said, "But all the energy is for these children and for the school. And so my mind is calm and happy." And she looked it—her mind was calm and happy. She was radiant.

It's really interesting, the contagious quality of these wholesome states and their onward-leadingness. This is Ajahn Pasanno, writing in The Island, commenting on this sutta: "A naturalness to the training, to the cultivation of these basic qualities, leads naturally to deeper qualities. When one is generous and delights in giving, the heart tends to be satisfied and joyful. This supports the development of virtue, as a heart that is satisfied and contented easily inclines to restraint and composure. With this composure, together with the lack of remorse that virtue affords, the heart is easily settled and focused. Meditation progresses more smoothly, and the mind naturally brightens, making it suitable for seeing things as they truly are."

That's the difference in the quality of happiness, of upliftingness, of the wholesome mind—it's onward-leading. It makes it suitable. It sets the conditions for seeing things as they really are. Different from the happiness of getting what we want. It's just different. So much more contagious. And it is contagious, that happiness.

I guess last year, a group of people had brought in a bunch of money, like maybe twenty-five thousand dollars, and you had to go to money changers. Sometimes now you can change in banks, but then, no, there was no way. So you work it out. Friends we know would get the money changer in, and they would come with these stacks. I mean, because Burmese money is big, so at that point you'd have—I'm not kidding—giant stacks of money like this that they would bring in. And it's all counting it. It's a whole process. It takes half the day. And it just feels sleazy, you know. It feels like you're doing a drug deal or something. We're giving our money and they're looking at it, because if there's one little dot on the bill, forget it, they won't take it. So they're looking at it through eyeglasses and these machines. And then they give us these crummy bills that completely fall apart if you touch them. One time I tried to joke with them and said, "No, we want good ones too."

Anyway, you're there all day, and we're just doing it, but it's just normal—that's what happens. These kind of youngish men with their phones, every two minutes getting a phone call, going on, doing all their business and going through the thing. So okay, we did that and left.

At the bed and breakfast, the woman who was kind of hosting it does a lot for us. She and her family are very big supporters of many of the monasteries. So later she called Ayya Yani a couple days later and said, "Okay, I have the rest of the money that hadn't quite come through, and someone donated three hundred and fifty dollars to bring it up to a thousand."

We thought, oh, it's a bed and breakfast where many yogis stay when going to practice. It must have been someone staying there, but we didn't know who. We went back and asked her—we kind of had to pull it out of her—and she said, "Oh, it was the money changers."

They had been listening to us talking. We were just chatting back and forth about how this money was going to be building toilets for these nuns—just like that, ordinary conversation. And so they donated three hundred and fifty dollars.

Stuff like that blows us away. And you let it in, because it's like—we call it a little rapture moment, where we get a little chill. "Oh, that's just so beautiful." Let it in, because it also brightens the mind and heart. These things are happening all the time. I'll stop—I have ten million more examples, but I'll stop.

The most important aspect of generosity, again, is the quality in our mind and heart. It's the motivation, not the action. It's not like the more you give, the better the generosity is. It's not about that at all. It's about the open-handedness, the open-heartedness in the mind and heart.

There's a great story illustrating this about Anathapindika from the time of the Buddha. Anathapindika was known as the Buddha's most devoted and generous supporter. He's mentioned often in the suttas. He's the one who, when he first met the Buddha, was so overcome with faith that he went and bought at a huge price this beautiful park called the Jeta Grove. If you read the suttas, many, many of them take place in this Jeta Grove that he presented to the Buddha and his Sangha. Anathapindika is like the symbol of generosity for men—there's also an equivalent female figure.

This story about him illustrates how the importance of generosity lies in the motivation, not the outward appearance. One of the things Anathapindika did when monks were dwelling nearby was send rice gruel every morning, and then for lunch he would have "five hundred monks," they would say. Andy Olendzki, the scholar at BCBS, says five hundred means "a lot"—it just means a lot of monks and nuns. So every day he would invite all these monks to his home for the main meal, prepare this incredible offering, and serve it himself out of the generosity of his heart.

The king of that area, King Pasenadi, who was also a follower and disciple of the Buddha, heard of this and wanted to imitate him. If Anathapindika could do it, he could do it. So he also set up to offer alms every day to five hundred monks. But after a while, he learned from his servants that the monks would come and accept the offering, but then take the food into the city and give it to their supporters, who would then offer it back to them.

King Pasenadi wondered, "Why are they doing that? This food is very tasty—it's really better than his."

The Buddha explained to the king that in the palace, the courtiers and servants who distributed the food did it without any inner feeling. They were just following orders, as if they were cleaning out a barn or taking a thief to court or just doing anything. The Buddha said they lacked faith and had no love for the monks. Many of them even thought the monks were just parasites living by the labor of the working population. When anything was given in that spirit, no one could feel comfortable accepting it—even when the meal was made of the most delicious food.

In contrast, the faithful householders of the city, like Anathapindika and Visakha—the generous woman—welcomed the monks, regarded them as spiritual friends, truly appreciated them. A humble meal provided by a friend would be worth much more than the most sumptuous meal offered by someone who did not give in the real spirit of generosity.

One last little quotation from the Buddha about this: "Even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or cup into a village pool or pond, thinking, 'May whatever animals live here feed on this,' that would be an act of generosity, a source of merit."

I love that, because it captures the sense that generosity is just that spirit which connects and offers freely in whatever we're doing. And at times, when there's enough steadiness of wisdom to see, we can incline our mind toward the wholesome in this way—in ways that really strengthen the wholesome and help purify the mind from kilesa, just in little ways.

It has to be sincere. But even something like holding the door for someone—and I don't want to make things crazy around here the next few days, so don't get all worked up trying to do generous things for each other, okay? Giving each other generous silence is itself a great act of generosity, okay?

So I'll give a small example, a really small one. Just when you hold the door for someone—not the thing where you stand there for forty-five minutes and then they have to hurry because you're holding the door. I don't mean that. But when you do it spontaneously, having the awareness in your mind of just appreciation: "Oh yes, may this be helpful for that person." Something like that, rather than being thoughtless about it.

Do you see what I mean? It's such a source of happiness for us. It's not like you're looking at them saying, "See what I'm doing?" No, that's not it. Just little things, you know? You're standing in the food line and there's only two oranges and there's seven people behind you. You really want an orange, but you know, I can let it go, let them have an orange. No one else even knows. But you could have such a sense of appreciating that act of generosity. It's really an uplifting, a purification in the mind in that moment. It's a letting go of clinging and self-cherishing. It's so little, you know? But it brings happiness just to do it. And the more that we practice it, the more the mind inclines in that direction. It's a very active way of purifying.

So as I said, there's the three times that the act of generosity brings the happiness of purity, the happiness of upliftment. And that's in the first thought of it, the first motivation. Let it in, feel it. In the act of doing it, doing whatever act of generosity it is with awareness. Really doing it consciously, not making a big show—as I said, no one else knows—but just really bringing the same awareness to the generosity as we might bring to the craving or the aversion.

Don't be afraid you're going to get into egotism about it. You might. So what? Awareness will notice that. We don't have to be afraid of it because we'll notice and it'll feel different immediately. And this is one of the ways we see how kilesas cloud. So you don't take the orange and you just kind of feel a moment of happiness in the recollection of the act of generosity. It's lovely. And then later, "I am so incredibly generous." It doesn't feel the same at all. You don't need to beat yourself up about it. Just pay attention. Wisdom will let you know the difference. You don't have to figure it out.

So this act of reflecting on past acts of your own generosity—and also your own conscious sila, non-harming conduct—is something the Buddha recommends. And I think maybe we don't do it that often. It's a real conscious use of wise thought, conscious contemplation.

In little ways, I think when I was in the last few years of my parents' lives, I spent a lot of time taking care of them. And it was easy to go into feelings of, you know, you can never do enough. Whatever you do, it's never going to be enough, because you can't make it better. So it could be easy to go into feelings of either exhaustion or just feeling bad I couldn't do enough, my mind settling on the times that I left instead of staying, and why couldn't I have moved to Atlanta and lived there—whatever. The mind can go there with our tendency to self-judge and self-blame.

But try the other. Try going to the sense of really acknowledging and appreciating all the actions of care and generosity. It's not the same thing as saying, "I'm so great." But it's just letting in, oh, those things that I did, those times—it brings in a sense of metta, a sense of upliftment. You can tell the difference, and it actually makes one happier and more willing to offer more, to do more. And it changes the whole dynamic. Just reflecting on it is really very powerful.

So this is the sutta—well, just this one aspect. The Buddha is talking about different reflections. But he says this about reflecting on your own past conscious virtuous actions. I'm going to read the one on generosity; it's the same. He's talking to lay people, talking to Mahanama, a layman. "There's the case where you recollect your own generosity."

"It is a gain, a great gain for me, that among people overcome with the stain of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests, delighting in the distribution of alms."

At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed, is not overcome with aversion, is not overcome with delusion.

I'll read it again because this is the immediate moment-to-moment practice: At any time when one is recollecting their own generosity, their mind at that moment is not overcome with greed, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind, her heart heads straight based on generosity. And when the mind is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the meaning, a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma.

"Mahanama, you should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children." Basically any time.

This can feel like cheating because it's such a happy practice. Sitting and thinking about how generous I've been—doesn't that kind of go the wrong way from what we think we should be doing? But try it and see what happens. In any moment, your mind then is not overcovered by greed, hatred, or delusion.

Amazing.

I think I'll end there. Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 115

Perception, Papañca and Personality View

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines the process by which fleeting thoughts become the seemingly solid experience of self. Drawing on the Buddha's teachings about perception (saññā), feeling tone (vedanā), and mental proliferation (papañca), she traces how a simple sense contact can spiral into elaborate stories of 'me' and 'mine.' Through vivid examples—including a meditator mistaking her own breathing for someone walking downstairs—Wilson demonstrates how unexamined perception leads to suffering, while clear seeing brings immediate relief.

Wilson explores sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view or identity view), showing how this sense of self arises moment to moment through grasping rather than existing as something permanent. She draws on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche to illuminate how thoughts, even those accompanied by strong emotions, are ultimately 'like wind roaring in empty space.' The talk addresses why we cling to familiar personality patterns even when painful, and why moments of simplicity and non-fabrication (atammayatā) can feel unsettling.

The practical invitation is to observe how personality view constructs and deconstructs throughout each day, noticing how different 'selves' arise with different sense contacts. Rather than fighting thoughts or trying to eliminate the self, Wilson encourages turning attention to awareness itself—discovering that refuge lies not in personality but in the spacious awareness that can hold all experience without being caught by it.

So tonight what I want to talk about is this experience of thought—thought, perception, papañca, and personality view. It's all a train that follows. It's something that I find just so interesting, so fascinating, and we certainly all spend a lot of time in the realm of thought.

To begin with, it's important to remember—I know we've said it—but so often in meditation we come to feel like we're in some kind of a battle with thought. We feel that the better we're meditating, the less thought we have, and that the goal is to somehow get rid of thought. Which of course it's not. It's to simply understand what thought is, how it's useful, how it functions, and how it gets us so confused—through bringing awareness to thought rather than fighting it.

From Tejaniya: "When you feel disturbed by the thinking mind, remind yourself you're not practicing to prevent thinking, but rather to recognize and acknowledge thinking whenever it arises. If you are not aware, you cannot know that you are thinking. The fact that you recognize that you are thinking means you're aware." Isn't that good news? Remember, it doesn't matter how many times the mind thinks, wanders off, or gets annoyed about something, as long as you become aware of it. I know you don't believe that, but that's where we're starting from.

To begin just by talking about thought—what's so amazing to me, the longer I practice, is how powerfully we get caught in thinking, how powerfully we suffer from thoughts. Thought can be very useful, but how it runs our life! Do you have any sense what I'm talking about? It's amazing. And we get so immediately into the thought, the content. What we've been trying to point to, and you're getting it, but I just want to emphasize it, is to turn to the awareness and see what is actually a thought.

Of all the sense experiences, thought is the most ephemeral, isn't it? A thought is just a thought. That sounds like nothing, but that's actually an incredibly freeing insight.

So right now, deliberately think a thought: "There's a deer in the grass." Just think that thought. What was it? It came from nowhere, it's gone. Probably it's gone, unless I said that and it came back again. That thought is just nothing really, isn't it? It's just like smoke, like nothing. A thought energy—all thoughts are just like that in terms of the energy of thought. They come together with strong emotion or not, but when we're lost in the content we don't recognize a thought. All thoughts just come from wherever they exist and they dissolve like clouds back into space.

I can't remember when it was, but I remember the feeling of the first time that it really hit me on the insight level. I was all caught up in whatever the heck, and then: "Oh, it's just a thought." Just looking at it, it has no more anything than "the deer's in the meadow." It's just a thought. As Joseph Goldstein's teacher, Munindraji, always used to say: a thought of your mother is not your mother. Just a thought.

So we begin by exploring that, but it's so hard to believe. This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "This mind is always being carried away by one delusion after another. Thoughts of hatred or attachment suddenly arise without warning"—have you ever noticed that?—"triggered off by circumstances, and unless seen through with wisdom, they quickly take root and proliferate, reinforcing the habitual predominance of hatred or attachment in the mind."

Can you relate to that so far?

"Yet, however strong these thoughts may seem, they are just thoughts and will eventually dissolve back into the emptiness. Once you recognize the intrinsic nature of the mind, these thoughts that seem to appear and disappear all the time can no longer fool you. As clouds form, last a while, and then dissolve back in the empty sky, so deluded thoughts arise, remain a while, and then vanish in the emptiness of mind. In reality, nothing at all has happened."

Don't try to think about that too much, but just take it as a possibility. Just like that thought—"the deer's in the meadow"—it's gone. Nothing. Where did it go? Wrong question. There's no where. It's gone. Nothing at all has happened.

Somebody said at the end of the month-long retreat a year or two ago, thinking along those lines: "Oh, on this month, every day, so many thoughts, so much is going on in the mind, go through so many mind worlds." Don't you?

And then at the end of the month, I realized nothing really happened. In the whole month. Nothing really happened. It's like that. Just to open the possibility to look at a thought as a thought.

So then, again, it's amazing how thoughts get so solid that we can suffer so much from them. I mean, they're useful too. If we understand thought, we can use thought. We're not hating it. We want to understand it. But how do they get so solid? And how do thoughts get so solidly creating the story and the sense of me?

The word in Pali, sakkāya-diṭṭhi, is often translated as personality view or identity view. Steve has mentioned a few times the story of me being created. It's just thoughts. But it feels so solid.

So what I want to take us through—and of course it's much more subtle than I could talk about, but just to give a sense—is the way the Buddha described this process. We don't have to be on retreat to see it. We can see it going on in various ways all the time. But just to begin to tune in, to see how thoughts get so taken for solid and create what seems like a sense of me, and we believe the whole thing because it's unexplored, unexamined.

The place we begin in trying to describe all this is the moment of perception. Remember Steve talked about perception last night? Any time there's a sense door experience—the way the Buddha described it, say, seeing: dependent on the eye working, and forms being present, eye consciousness arises. When these three things come together—your eyes open and working, some form there, consciousness—that moment of eye consciousness is seeing. That meeting is called contact. We're not going to see all of that; we just become aware of seeing.

In that moment of seeing, perception automatically arises, as Steve was explaining. This is just happening every moment. The perception could be "room" or "person" or "bird" or "color"—whatever the perception is, it arises spontaneously. And also, at the same time, arises vedanā, that felt sense. It's very subtle: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. By the time we're naming it, that's already another perception. But these are just happening all the time. Seeing, the perception "a bird," pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. You don't see that clearly, but maybe it just feels a little nice, a little not—no big deal.

So starting with perception: what we perceive, we think about. That's just normal. And it's useful in that that's how we construct our world. It's not like it's a problem.

When I hit the bell at a certain time, we all agree, "Oh, thank God, it's the end of the sitting." We're thinking about it, but that's just the perception of that sound recognized as "bell." And it places us in this time of day, all together in a meditation retreat here at Spirit Rock. Our whole world can come out of that perception and the thoughts about it. It's useful. If we didn't have some kind of agreed perception, the bell would ring for the talk and—what's that sound? Bell? What does that mean? Where am I?

Have you ever woken up—if you travel a lot—I have a friend who says he actually likes these moments where he'll wake up and just have no clue in the world where he is, what year it is, sometimes even who he is. The perception isn't recognizing anything. But the delusion isn't making something up. You just go, "I don't know."

So, anyway, it's useful. That's what I'm going to say. Perception and the thoughts that come from it can be very useful.

And as we've been describing all along, when we ask what's the problem with the kilesas—besides the fact that they don't feel nice—the biggest problem is that when a kilesa is present in the moment, in the conscious moment of mind and consciousness at the moment of contact, we're not recognizing it. It actually distorts the perception. We perceive wrongly. We've talked about this. And we don't even recognize that we perceive wrongly.

Then the Buddha makes this little list: what we perceive, saññā, we think about, citta. All the thoughts about it, and the more we think about it, those thoughts kind of solidify into what he calls a view, diṭṭhi, of "yes, this is so, this is how it is." And then that leads to more thinking, thought, and action. So whether it's accurate perception or not, this is the process that happens.

Let me give you an example from a good friend of mine. At the last retreat I taught, someone who comes to a lot of retreats wrote me a note saying, "Please tell this story," but it didn't fit. So I said, "You have to come to another retreat." He's not here, so I'm telling it now. But anyway, it's a great story to delineate all of this.

A good friend of mine in Switzerland told me that many years ago she was sitting her first meditation retreat with Ajahn Sumedho. This was perhaps twenty, thirty years ago. At that time, there weren't Vipassana meditation centers in Switzerland, so they rented these big summer camp houses where they send school children for the summer. They're big old houses with lots of rooms, but only used in the summer—old, built of creaky wood, not insulated or very well built, very noisy.

At this particular retreat, the room they were using for the meditation hall was on what we would call the second floor, and the room immediately below, the same size on the ground floor, was the room they were using for walking meditation. She was sitting during a scheduled sitting—a formal schedule which you're supposed to follow. So she's in the scheduled sitting, following the breath, and feeling, kind of for the first time, "Finally, I can find the breath." It's just getting a little bit quiet.

And then, as I said, it was a really creaky house. You could hear everything. She starts to hear these creaks, and somebody walking downstairs in the walking room. You just can't do it quietly. Immediately she feels this aversion, which she didn't recognize of course, but it's: "They're ruining my samadhi. It's getting so quiet. What are they doing walking during the sitting time?" This is a very scheduled retreat—you're not supposed to walk during the sitting time. Creak, creak, creak. She's getting all worked up about it.

Being that it was this part of Switzerland where you follow the schedule—that's just what you do—I've been with another friend when the train was three minutes late. I am not exaggerating. "Well, this never used to happen." Three minutes late! We're glad if the train even comes.

So she's hearing the creaks. Every time the creak comes, it feeds the aversion, strengthening: "This is not the way to do it. You're not supposed to walk during the meditation time." But she was there. She wasn't going to leave because the teacher was there and you don't leave.

Finally, nothing else to do but try to give it up and go back to the breath. She managed to do that, to feel her breath. The mind calmed down a minute. And then, when she wasn't thinking about it, when she actually got a little more steady awareness going, she noticed that she was actually leaning against the wall. When she took a breath, her back hit the wall, and that was what was making the noise.

So you see the whole process right there: saññā, the perception, unpleasant vedanā—which might have been the sound but might have been the thought—the ruined samadhi, all the thoughts about it really hardening. And that takes like that amount of time. "This isn't right, this isn't the way things are supposed to be."

And then her whole background, you know, of being Swiss—it's all right there. The whole sense of "me" and "this is who I am" and "this is what's right."

And then steady awareness, without looking for something, and the perception cleared. The aversion dissolved and the shift of perception showed what was really going on. So once she saw clearly what that accurate perception was—"Oh, that's from me breathing"—well, do you think she kept on being angry at the imaginary person walking downstairs? You don't have to try and get rid of it. It's gone, right? Because it doesn't make any sense, because that's not what's happening.

That's exactly the process, both ways, that's going on for us all the time. When the Buddha talked about the hallucination of perception, the three characteristics—when we don't recognize the constantly changing nature of every moment of experience, when we don't recognize the unreliable nature, meaning we think we can land in this thing and it'll make us happy, when we don't recognize the impermanent and we don't recognize the non-self nature—it's not because we're stupid. It's not because we're just ignoring. It's because we really are perceiving so frequently, so inaccurately, without having a clue that that's what's going on. It's really called hallucination or perversion of perception.

So what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we complicate. And that becomes, just like that, the story of "me."

This is the Dalai Lama's teaching: all of our difficulties come through mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience and true knowledge—just recognizing accurately. I talk about this all the time, but it's so amazing to me, the power of it.

So I think when we're really talking about what insight is, what right view is—remember I said the first night, right view, I really like it because it's seeing accurately—I feel that insight is really a shift of perception. So you could say that my friend had an insight: "Oh, it's not that. It's this making that sound." And then if the steady awareness keeps going, you can see the whole process. "Oh, how the mind did all of that." The insight comes simply from the shift of perception that's enabled to occur through steady, non-judging awareness, as best as we can do. It allows us to recognize accurately.

So the way the Buddha described this whole process of getting lost in thought and view: "Dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises." And this goes for all the other senses, including the mind. "The meeting of the three is sense contact. With contact as condition, feeling arises"—vedana. What one feels, that one perceives. We feel it, we perceive it—happens at the same time, really. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates, one mentally proliferates. I'm not making this up; this is from the suttas. One complicates, one mentally proliferates with associations, with memories, with the whole nine yards—okay, he didn't say that. "With these proliferations, with these complications as the source, the mind, the heart, is beset. It's assailed by complications, by trouble."

Can you get a sense of that? Can you think of one remote example of when that happened to you in the last half an hour? It's not personal. This is just what the mind does.

So what we perceive, we think about. When the perception is inaccurate and when it's colored by kilesa, the thinking is colored by the inaccurate assumption and the kilesa, and it just explodes into a whole story. And so the antidote, the understanding, is again the accurate perception that simply cuts through the confusion.

So in terms of this hallucination of perception, these complications of mind in terms of creating that identity view, that personality view through thought moment to moment—I want to take us into an exploration, investigating this sense of personality view. Not starting by thinking "there is no self."

So somehow I have to figure out how there is no self and think about it, because that's the whole approach—it's just thinking about it. We're trying to understand something, but those thoughts are still coming off of an inaccurate perception, a wrong perception.

All kinds of thoughts arise. When I recognize not-self or anattā, if my self vanishes, how do I find the car keys? How do I remember where I live? If there's no self, how do I function? It can seem silly, but we can really get caught up in this. Or we think if everything's annihilated, we won't care about anything. How will we function? As if there's some solid self and we're going to have some big bang experience somewhere down the road, and the self is going to explode. And then there won't be a self and everything will be different.

Well, all that shifts is our perception and the resultant thoughts, views, actions, and understandings. Reality doesn't change. That's what's so far out. Impermanence is already the nature of things. It's not like we go from permanence and somehow everything falls apart—it's already all falling apart. We just don't recognize that.

When we perceive accurately, it may be scary at first, but we come into an ease and harmony. Just like my friend recognizing where the sound was coming from, all that fighting and hullabaloo—what will I do?—drops away. It's like, "Oh, this is what's happening." Just at ease. You can like it or not like it, but this is simply what's happening. So much simpler.

In beginning to explore and recognize this sakkāya-diṭṭhi, this sense of personality view, we can explore rather than try to get rid of it or pretend it's not there or hate it. Explore it. It's an experience that arises from moment to moment and passes away just like everything else.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, the Thai teacher I think we've mentioned, liked to say—and this is one of my favorite lines—"The sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there is grasping or clinging in the mind." All conditions arise due to causes. So the sense of self, personality view, the thoughts of "me," that felt sense of "me," simply arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. And when the grasping stops, it falls back away. This is going on all the time.

The Buddha, in one sutta, talked about the whole way consciousness works as being like a magic show. He says it's like having a magician at the crossroads back in rural India, performing all these magic tricks. When you're watching from outside, it's amazing—how do they do it? But once you get behind and see the tricks, it's just not amazing anymore, is it? "Oh, that's how they do it, okay." All the magic's gone, but you see how it is.

It's exactly the same with consciousness when sakkāya-diṭṭhi is operating, when personality view is present. We don't even recognize it as an assumption—it just seems like that's how it is. "I'm this personality. That's how I am, for better or worse." And it's an assumption. We may work really hard to change our personality and get it better, but we're still assuming that's what we are. We don't really stop to look, and it's so solid precisely because it's not examined or explored.

Ramana Maharshi said, "Ego, or the idea of self, or personality view"—you could put any of those words in there—"is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. Look closely and the ghost vanishes. The ghost was never there." So also with this sense of separate self, personality view, ego—so long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it's found not to really exist.

And that's really the function and the result, the wisdom that results from the steadiness of awareness simply exploring what actually presents itself.

One of the ways our inaccurate perception strengthens into thoughts and then into views is that we stop recognizing what we believe. Instead, we start looking for what we think we already know. So instead of having an open, receptive mind that just notices whatever's presenting itself, whether small or big, the attention becomes unconsciously skewed to recognize what it's looking for, what's familiar—in big examples and small examples.

And I remember all the times I've been clumsy and I'm not a good athlete. And I literally went back to the fifth grade when they put me in the remedial gym class—for those who couldn't throw a softball more than thirty feet or something. I mean, really. But it was with friends, it didn't really traumatize me. I didn't care about gym, luckily. But my thoughts are back there. And right away, that's my whole life. It was forty years ago, and yet here's my whole personality—this clumsy person who's not an athlete—and here I am.

And then at some point I stepped off the tub, and I looked at the curtain, and it looked okay. I looked around and thought, "Oh, it's a nice day." And I went outside and started walking, and I saw the beautiful hills, and I started walking faster and enjoying the feeling of the body, and I thought, "I really love hiking."

And where's the clumsy guy? Gone.

So now we have the person who loves hiking and nature. But that's equally just arising. And we wouldn't normally experience it that way. You wouldn't say, "Boy, that sense of self really passed away. This is a different one." But it was.

And so we start to see this—just this simple thing of exploring in our own experience, just watching how these constructions form. And we're watching them in the relative sense, noticing how sense contact triggers thought, how thought triggers memory, how memory reinforces a sense of identity, how that identity colors everything that follows. We're seeing the mechanics of it.

But then, if at any point we bring that deeper quality of attention—the awareness that's looking for what's actually here—we start to notice: Where is this one who's clumsy? Where is this one who loves hiking? And in that looking, it's not that we find nothing. We find experience. We find sensation, thought, memory, preference. But the solid "me" at the center of it—the one who supposedly persists through all these different arisings—that's what we can't locate.

This is what the practice gradually reveals. Not through thinking about it, but through this patient, curious, sustained attention to our actual moment-to-moment experience.

I can't put up the damn shower curtain, and it's hopeless, and I need someone to do things for me, and it just goes on and on. It feels really real. It feels really solid. That's who I am.

And if we're not seeing clearly, we miss that it's just thoughts and emotions. What's happening right now? I'm not back in the rehab gym class. I'm just standing on the tub with my fingers a little stiff. All these thoughts and moods are coming up. That's all that's happening. It's not the whole story of my life. It's not even me. It's just what's happening.

But as long as we don't see thought as thought, we don't bring our attention into the present moment—just what's happening, like that. It might still be unpleasant, but it's fine. But when we get sucked into not seeing thought as thought, when we get caught in the story—if I hadn't even been watching that, you know how that could really take hold. You could go into whatever. It could really take hold—one that's even more intense than that. And then we can really drop into "this is who I am."

Sogyal Rinpoche said we get into so much confusion and pain by letting ourselves get lost in whatever happens. You project a thought, then the second thought believes the first thought. Then the third, fourth, and fifth thoughts are projected. The first thought is by this time already a reality. By the time the tenth thought comes, it believes the fifth one has always been an actuality.

Can you notice that? It's all so solid. And if you turn around and just look—what is it? Thought. They're just smoke. They dissolve into nothing when we turn and look.

And so this is what we can really do. Over and over, turn and look and see. The personality view is arising and passing. It's not the same for a few moments together.

Notice tonight, tomorrow—just for fun, not with aversion (well, you can't help it if there's aversion)—but just for fun, see how many different stories of self come triggered by what sense contact. What thoughts come? See how some are more solid than others. Just see the construction of this magic show, and how when the awareness is a little bit steady and you see it coming and you see it fade away, you say, "Oh, nothing really happened." Then you think, "But that's true. You were in a rehab gym class in the fifth grade. That was true."

That's got nothing to do with it. That's gone. If it's true or not true, I don't even know. Am I making it up? I don't know. It's gone. What's happening right now is where we're going to be able to be with accurate perception.

Ajahn Sumedho says we create ourselves with our thoughts, then we attach to the thoughts and believe the thoughts, and we don't let in—this is where we get the selective perception. When we're attached to one personality belief view, we don't let in the perceptions that don't fit with that.

Notice how you do that. Notice if you ever happen to have self-judgment during this week. And even if you're aware of it, but only sort of aware of it, really the thoughts are being believed, right? Say you're judging yourself about whatever.

It could start from anything. I noticed one time on a retreat, when I could backtrack and see, I had gotten into the whole world of my entire life of self-judgment—back to all the things I'd done wrong and my bad personality traits and on and on. When I really traced it back, there had been a minimally painful sensation in my foot during walking meditation. Really minimally painful, and I wasn't really aware of it. So the aversion just kind of colored the perception, and then some thought or other came up about how I wasn't really doing it right. And then boom—gone into my whole life.

In that moment, when you're really believing that personality view, do you happen to remember all the things you did well in your life? No. And if it does come up, it's "yeah, but..." Like when I was talking about generosity practice—reflecting on generosity, reflecting on gratitude. If you're in a real self-judging personality view snit and you first start to do it, it's like, "Well, I did this really good thing." And then immediately: "Oh, you just did it because you wanted people to like you." Whatever you can come up with, it's going to be seen through that lens. Nothing else is believed.

But then the next day—like several people said today in groups—they have really good days and really bad days on retreat. You notice that? On the good days, whatever story it is about your life now, or about your spiritual life, or "I finally got this," or "everything's so clear"—whatever it is—the next day it's all, as one yogi used to say to me, "gone to hell in a handbasket." I have no idea what that means, but it's very vivid. It's like: that yesterday, that was made up. This is how it is now.

But unexplored, we would still say it's all me. It's all the same me going through this. We don't notice that these are two completely different experiences. One completely went away—we don't notice that. The other arose due to other causes and conditions, but through the same kind of magic show of creating this sense of self.

So just to stop and look, to get interested in watching how the whole thing comes up—it really gets fascinating.

A friend of ours described this one time. She labels herself an aversive-type personality, and her friends tell her, yes, that's true, you are. So one time she was feeling particularly identified with that thought and that story, feeling bad about herself and all of that. She came to sit for the day somewhere, but she was aware of this train of thought going on: "Yes, I'm an aversive person. I'm an aversive person." So she was just watching her mind over a couple of sittings, watching what thoughts came and went, what moods came and went. She'd done quite some practice by this time.

And she said, yeah, it's true—quite some aversive thoughts came up. Maybe ten percent of the thoughts that came up. All other kinds of thoughts and moods and personality stories came: moments of generosity, of calm, of sleepiness—the whole show in an hour sitting. Each one, a different arising of personality view, of perception and thoughts, and the view "this is me," and all the attendant confusion and papañca. That's the word for proliferation—papañca. And then reacting to it and suffering from it, or liking it. But usually we don't quite notice how it comes together, goes away. Comes together, goes away.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho: "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit—my views, my feelings, and my opinions. I can get caught in that world, in that view of me that arises in consciousness. But if I recognize that happening, if I know that, then my refuge is no longer in being a person. I'm not taking refuge in being a personality or in my views and opinions. Then I can let go, or it just lets go naturally, and the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends. It doesn't mean Ajahn Sumedho dies and the world ends, or that I'm unconscious. In Buddhadhamma, the world is the world that we create in consciousness."

And this is like different worlds moment to moment. That's why we can be living in different worlds. The world of Ajahn Sumedho is not going to be the same as the world your mind creates.

But both of those worlds arise and cease. And that which is aware of the world arising and ceasing is bigger than it—it's transcending that world. So our refuge then is in this awareness rather than in trying to sustain our personality view or refined experiences in consciousness, because you can't do it. Our refuge becomes awareness rather than our personality.

Just notice if your mind is going, "I don't like that." It's not saying the personality goes away, but it stops being our refuge. And as we look more closely, we see it's not a solid thing anyway. It's really changing all the time.

As we look more closely into the magic show of the perceptions and the thoughts that come with them and the moods that come with them and all the thoughts, you might start to notice—see if this is true for you, it's certainly true in my experience—that when the train of thought and description comes together with a really strong emotion, the tendency is to think that it's more true, more real. Especially difficult emotions. I've noticed that part of the makeup of the emotion is the story: "It's always going to be this way." Have you noticed that? Even though you've seen it come and go twenty times already in the week, it comes again, and it's like, "Ah, it's always going to be this way, and it always has been that way." Even though I can remember times it wasn't there, it was really here submerged the whole time waiting to spring, right?

But it's not so. Just because a thought comes together with strong emotion definitely doesn't make it more true. If anything, it may make it less reliable. But we don't have to argue with it. Remember to turn our attention. Just turn our attention on and see.

Ajahn Sumedho again—he talks a lot about this, awareness of "it's like this." He talks a lot in this language and the personality view. So he says just notice you're really angry or really sad. Notice the difference between "I'm angry" or "my anger" versus "anger is like this." "My sadness is so unbearable. I'm so sad. I've been so sad all my life, or all week"—compare that to shifting the awareness to exploring how sadness is manifesting right now. Sadness is like this. An expression of, as Tejaniya would say, sadness is just nature. This is the nature of sadness. This is the nature of anger. This is the nature of clinging. When it's "my sadness," it's so much more difficult to be with.

So just trusting to turn the attention—and then we'll see, back to seeing this nature of thoughts. This is from Dilgo Khyentse again:

"Yet 'I' is just a thought. 'I'm so sad. I'm so angry. I'm so useless.' Thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. When a thought of anger arises in the mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive, is that anger actually brandishing a weapon? Is it at the head of an army? Can it actually do things, crush them like a rock, carry things away like a violent river? No—anger, just like any other thought or feeling, has no definable true existence, not even a definite location in your body, speech, or mind."

You may feel tightness that is triggered by anger, but you can't actually locate the anger in your cheek anywhere. I love this last line: "It is just like a wind roaring in empty space."

When the feeling of strong, difficult emotion comes like anger, I can remember to turn my attention—oh, anger feels like this—and to say, let the wind roar in empty space. Awareness is bigger than the wind. It's bigger than the anger. Awareness can contain everything. I mean, it's not a thing, but it's like awareness can be with anything. So let the anger roar. The hand doesn't have to pick up a club and hit. And it roars, and we see it's really nothing.

"So instead of allowing these wild thoughts to enslave you, you can realize their essential emptiness, their essential ephemeral nature. If you see through the hatred within, you will discover there is not one single enemy left outside. Otherwise, even if you could overpower everyone in the whole world, your hatred would only grow stronger."

So examine the nature of hatred—or put any emotion in there. Examine the nature of anger.

Examine the nature of sadness, of greed, of happiness. You will find that it is no more than a thought. When you see it as it is, it will dissolve like a cloud in the sky.

Part of why the habit of our mind and perception resists this, if it does, is that sense of familiarity with personality, with belief, with the sense of me—the comfort of that. A lot of times we say, "Well, I don't want my personality, my sense of me to dissolve like a cloud in the sky."

Quite a few people have mentioned this, and many of us experience it. When you're practicing or you're in your daily life and the mind becomes peaceful, it becomes calm. There's no big story going on, no big sense of me. And often people come into this state thinking, "Nothing's happening." Kind of upset, kind of worried.

Or even more interesting is watching the mind do its thing—picking a perception and jumping on it, getting into this whole papañca of creating a suffering story. It brings a lot of energy and familiarity and a weird, twisted comfort. Because, well, thank God I'm back again. Even if I'm an angry me spinning this story, it's familiar, it's comfortable. We like this better than calm. "I thought I wanted peace, but I'm not so sure."

But we don't have to take it personally like that. Just watching the habit, the sense of self—when it goes away like that, it's very important to learn to feel comfortable. Ajahn Buddhadasa calls it, when just in the moment there's not a strong sense of self, he calls it voidness. That's the translation into English by Santikaro. It's kind of a weird translation. But let's just say those moments where you notice a personality of you just drops away.

And even if it's a difficult one—that whole self-judgment—and it just goes. People notice it just goes. It's not like you talk yourself out of it. The perception shifts. That's the insight. "Oh, it's just thought." It's gone. And in that moment, it's just kind of peace or contentment or quiet. There may be some seeing or hearing, whatever's going on. It's just peace.

Sometimes when it's really sudden and lasts a little bit, the mind can get scared. But more often it's just a sudden moment of peace, calmness, no personality view, nothing much going on. These moments, he says, generate a contentment with those moments. Really notice those little moments of experience. Not to grab onto them, for then we will, but just to notice personality of you coming together and going apart.

And when the sense of me as a failure is gone, notice it's really gone. It's not here now. Just notice it's just calm right now. Or there's a sense of happiness. I'm just feeling the breath or hearing the turkeys. That's just what's happening, nothing much.

And then notice our sense of dragging the past like a corpse: "But before I was feeling so worthless, and probably that's going to come again, and I don't want to get too comfortable with this because it's going to go away." Just notice that. That's another arising of personality view and going away.

It's really so important to let ourselves just touch this—you could call it emptiness, I like to call it the simplicity. The simplicity of the mind, the heart that's not concocting, that's not fabricating a whole sense of me or anything around whatever sense-door experience is happening. That's just landing here with what is without making any big story about it.

There's a Pali word that Ajahn Buddhadasa likes to point to: atammayatā. The best translation is "not fabricating," not concocting, really not constructing anything out of what's happening. So in that moment, it's like the mind, the heart, the awareness—it's at peace, it's independent. It's not affected by greed, hatred, or delusion.

Whatever's arising, it's met just as it is, and the mind just doesn't concoct anything around it. It's just the simplicity of being fully here in the present moment. You could call it the stillness of the non-reactive mind, but it's not the stillness of no experience. It's just the simplicity of things as they have come to be, and the deluded mind isn't making up a big story about it.

In some ways it's so simple we can't stand it, really. But that's it—just notice those moments of non-concocting, non-fabricating. Feel contentment with that.

Ajahn Sumedho also said once to a group of teachers—we were talking with him about how strongly we get sucked back into believing the personality view, all the different versions of it, and how we don't really trust these moments of simplicity, of non-concocting, of things as they are with no sense of self. We don't quite trust them. We think, "Okay, that came, but it's a fluke, it's a state, it's an experience—but really, this is who I am." Ajahn Sumedho, who worked a lot in Thailand and then extensively in the West, living in England and elsewhere, was saying that first, of course, one personality pattern that many of us really believe deeply is self-doubt, self-judgment. That's the one that gets under us, and we don't recognize it as a pattern arising—it's just the voice of how things are, telling us what we've done wrong.

He said—and this is his opinion only, but I think it's very interesting—that in his view, the biggest hindrance or obstacle for Westerners in their practice of awakening is that we have such a strong belief in our personalities. We really rely on them, take refuge in our personalities. We may hate them, but we take refuge in them. We may not even understand them clearly because we don't see their constantly changing nature. There are patterns, recognizable patterns to each of our personalities, just as our bodies are recognizable from each other. But it's all just patterns, shifting patterns.

So he says, we have such a strong belief in our personalities, we take refuge in them, and the magic show of the personality view becomes our reference point. That's where we land. And so when there's a moment of non-concocting or just simplicity, when you taste that purity, the flavor of the pure heart and mind, you think, "Well..." So easily we slip back into, "That can't be true for me." We don't believe it. We believe our personality view, and the personality view says we don't trust our moments of purity, of momentary freedom, of recognizing things as they are. "Okay, maybe, I don't know—but this self-hatred, that's really real."

Just take that in. If it makes sense to you, let it in. If it confuses you, let it go. But I think it's really very interesting.

So coming back to this simplicity of the non-concocting mind: in a moment when papañca is not being created, all this proliferation—one time the Buddha said the end of papañca is the end of suffering. Or there's that line from the Four Quartets by T.S. Eliot: "A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything."

Because in that moment, just the simplicity of non-concoction, there's no self-referencing. You're not referencing this sound back to me, this mood back to me—it's just what it is. Nothing more and nothing less. There's no comparing, there's no remembering or extending it into past or future, there's no referencing it back to me, there's no judging. It's just seeing, hearing, thinking, feeling, mood—just what it is. A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything.

The thinking mind, the personality of you, thinks, "I don't want to give up everything." But the reality of pure perception, accurate perception, is that nothing's being given up. In this moment, this is all there is. It's just recognizing it accurately. Nothing's being given up but our confusion.

I want to end with a quotation from the Buddha. My friend Fred shared it in Switzerland, but I couldn't use it there because the language is too complicated. I hope we can mostly understand it here. I like it. This is the Buddha talking about how his mind works, which isn't something you'd often hear. He refers to himself as the Tathagata.

He says: "The Tathagata does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight." Do you get a sense of what that means? There's just seeing. He does not conceive of a separate visible thing. He does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight. He does not conceive of something unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer.

And then he goes through all the senses in the same way: "He does not conceive of a cognizable thing apart from cognition. He does not conceive of something not recognized. He does not conceive of a thing worth cognizing."

He does not conceive about one who cognizes.

"Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathāgata is such in regard to all phenomena seen, heard, sensed, and cognized."

Do you get a sense of what that means? It's just—there's seeing, and that's it. It's another way of expressing that famous Bāhiya Sutta we've been exploring: "In the seen, there is only the seen. In the heard, there is only the heard."

But here he's saying that when there's seeing, the Tathāgata's mind isn't conceiving about something else that isn't being seen. It's not referring back to "me, I'm seeing." It's not thinking, "Here's something seeing and there's something to be seen." It's just not making any distinctions.

The whole experience of seeing is everything and all. There's nothing else to think about in that moment. A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything.

And in that moment, the mind, the heart is pure. The pure heart and mind in that moment is free from suffering.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

There is a poem by Rengetsu, a Japanese nun:

She saw that arising arose, abided, and fell away.
She saw that knowing this arose, abided, and fell away.
Then she knew there was nothing more than this, no ground, nothing to lean on stronger than the cane she held,
nothing to lean upon at all,
and no one leaning.
And she opened the clenched fist in her mind and let go and fell into the midst of everything.

CHAPTER 116

Three Jobs of a Yogi

Carol Wilson · 1h01

In this foundational talk, Carol Wilson offers a clear and accessible framework for understanding meditation practice through what Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls "the three jobs of a yogi": starting with right view (sammā diṭṭhi), meeting each moment with awareness, and maintaining continuity throughout the day. She emphasizes that right view begins not as philosophical knowledge but as the attitude we bring to each moment of awareness—recognizing experience accurately without the distortions of wanting, aversion, or self-referential thinking.

Wilson illuminates the distinction between mere consciousness of experience and actual awareness, using the simple example of feeling one's hand to demonstrate how naturally available awareness is when we remember to notice. She explains how suffering arises not from experience itself but from our relationship to it—the habitual patterns of grasping at pleasant experiences and pushing away unpleasant ones that the Buddha called the "second dart." Through the story of the Buddha's 45 years of engaged teaching after awakening, she shows that freedom doesn't mean escaping life's difficulties but transforming our understanding of and response to them.

The talk includes practical guidance on noticing the quality of mind present in each moment of awareness, using personal stories like mindlessly eating cookies on retreat to illustrate how we can appear mindful while missing the crucial element of balanced awareness. Wilson closes with an inspiring letter from Mingyur Rinpoche describing his wandering retreat in the Himalayas, demonstrating how this simple practice of maintaining awareness leads to profound peace regardless of external circumstances.

So how are you doing? You dragged through the first day. That's great. Especially just for new people to know—everyone who's done lots of retreats before already knows—nothing's always, but the first day can be a bit difficult because you don't know what the heck you're doing, right? And you don't know why you came.

Well, I'm not really here to tell you why, but I'll try to talk a little bit, very simply I hope. I want to start by picking up on something Steve mentioned that Tejaniya sometimes talks about. It's just a way of trying to describe very simply why we practice, how we do it: the three jobs of a yogi. Yogi is shorthand for what we use for meditators, so we're all yogis here.

Do you remember what they are? Of course not. The first is knowing why we practice—right view. Then just meeting each moment with awareness. And the third job is the sense of steadiness, persistence, continuity. I just want to talk a little bit about each of those. It's actually relatively simple.

You might think right view—to start with right view, right understanding—it's both the beginning and you could say the ending of the path of awakening. If you've at all tuned into any kind of Buddhist teachings, to think right view, that's really, when we really understand the way things are, that understanding, that actual recognition of things as they have come to be on a deep level, is what frees our heart and mind from confusion, from greed, from aversion, from suffering. So how the heck can we start with that?

Right view has many, many levels of subtlety. But on the very first level, the way to talk about it here is a little sense of knowing the attitude, why we start this practice, why we're talking so much about the steadiness of awareness. What's the power of it? Why, really?

I like this definition of meditation as we're doing it: meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. That's really what we're doing—just experiencing mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. So on this level, the right understanding is the attitude we bring to each moment of awareness.

Right view, even in this way, right understanding, is not meant—I certainly don't mean it, and I'm sure the Buddha didn't—as a set of philosophical concepts or ideas that you should write down and remember. There is some learned knowledge, like what I'm talking about tonight if you haven't heard it, and that's a sense of secondhand information. Let's put it that way. The secondhand information just can incline us to be interested enough to explore. It's not that right view means you can list the Four Noble Truths and you can list anicca, dukkha, anattā—impermanence and suffering and not-self—and it's all like this, and you write a whole thesis of it, and it doesn't change your experience one iota because it's informational but it's not transformative, really, on a cellular level, an understanding level. That's like the depth of wise understanding. So it's not a philosophical thing.

But I actually really appreciate the translation into English as "right view," because for me I experience it as quite literal: recognizing what's occurring accurately. Not how we think it should be, not thinking about it in the right way, because pretty much once we start thinking about it, it's over as far as accuracy—unless we recognize it's thinking. But to recognize what's happening accurately.

This is the power of this simple awareness we've been talking about. When we say just feel the sensation, it's like this, you might think, What? So what? I've got to sit here all day and go, "Sensations like this, sight is like this, hearing is like this, walking is like this, anger is like this, frustration is like this." Give me a break. We focus on the object. But the awareness, the power of the steady, simple, unbiased awareness, is that through the steadiness of it, without our doing, the accurate recognition of what's occurring just begins to emerge more and more. And this recognizing accurately changes the whole way we understand and thus relate to experience in our life.

So that's a huge topic, obviously, because that's the beginning of right view. I like to think about the Buddha—when the Buddha awoke, the story of sitting under the tree, awakening to the freedom from all confusion, from greed, from hatred, from suffering—and yet he lived the next forty-five years in this world.

He didn't wake up into a different world. He woke up into a world and he lived 45 years—the peaceful one, the awakened one—in a body that does what bodies do, which is sometimes it feels good and sometimes it doesn't. He'd be sick and have backaches and headaches. He had a whole sangha of monks and nuns with whom he worked, whom he really taught and shared with. And there were times when that was wonderful, and times when—well, you know what it's like working with a group of people. Times when it was organizational dukkha, organizational suffering. All the monks and nuns' rules that are in place now came about because of some behavior that wasn't so great one way or the other, and then he'd make a rule. There were wars. He had kinship with families on different sides of wars, fighting over water rights. I mean, basically it was life, the same life.

So what was different?

And this is like—it wasn't rocket science, but it took me years to actually look and go, "Oh, duh, he wasn't floating around on a cloud out of body all the time." He was here, engaged, really engaged, really caring, spending 45 years of his life, the whole rest of his life, sharing with people to help them understand, out of compassion. He didn't need to do that. He could have just gone off and really been in peaceful mind. He spent 45 years really engaged. So it's not removal from life at all.

So what was different? I'm not here to tell you how the Buddha's mind was from the inside—don't even think that—but I know some of what's different. We have intimations, and we all do in moments, moments of freedom, that what changes isn't the external circumstances. You don't stop having unpleasant experience. The more you practice doesn't mean life just gets pleasanter and pleasanter. Look in your mind—do you somehow think that's what's going to happen? You think at the end of nine days here, everything's going to be better, or else you wasted your money? And we laugh, I laugh. But when I really look in my mind, I keep getting caught in that one. "Oh, this backache. What's this doing back? I thought I conquered that one."

Anyway, what changes is the understanding and thus the relationship—the understanding of how we perceive, how we recognize experience. When we recognize it accurately, we stop looking to any experience to give us confirmation, to make us happy. We stop blaming experience for making us unhappy. So the Buddha could walk around India barefoot begging for his food for 45 years—how does that sound?—and be happy.

Once we recognize this, it's how we respond, both internally and in our actions externally. There's a quotation from Martin Luther King I like a lot where he says, "Nonviolence doesn't just mean that you don't shoot a person. It also means that you don't hate a person." And I would actually say, in terms of what we're practicing and learning here, it's from the inside out. When something is difficult, our natural response is to hate it or hate ourselves or fix it or whatever, and we're suffering.

So when we start to understand differently, we can still meet the situation and act and respond appropriately. It's not a withdrawing from life, but it's understanding what's going on in our own mind and heart—not in the other person's. That's their business. We don't even know what's going on in our own mind and heart, right? How much do we assume and project onto what other people are doing? I mean, that's just what our minds do. But come on, we don't even know why we're doing what we're doing half the time.

So this is what we're exploring here. We start to see that the suffering, the confusion, the lack of peace that's arising in our experience—that this steadiness of awareness with right view can help us see the way out of—isn't because of what's occurring. And this is a hard teaching, and we will resist it and fight it and find reasons why it's not true. But it's not because of what's occurring that we really deeply suffer. It's in the relationship. And the relationship isn't difficult because we're stupid jerks, stubborn, willfully trying to suffer.

Because we don't recognize accurately. Because we're not in practice.

It's not that some people are given the gift of awareness and some people are not. It's as natural as breathing. Have you noticed that at all today? Or are you looking for something too highfalutin?

So right now—do you feel your hand? How hard was that? Was that hard? Anybody who couldn't feel your hand? It didn't take a lot of effort, and it was immediate as soon as there was the thought of remembering, right? I doubt there's someone thinking, "I can't find awareness of how to feel my hand." It's right there. It's so there we don't even notice. We take it for granted. We're not interested.

So one way of talking about this—and I think Steve started talking about it today, and we'll probably say the same thing every night, I'm just warning you—one very simple way, and this is direct from the way Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it, very simple but helpful, is how we can recognize experience as we're practicing here. And this moment-to-moment thing directly affects what I was just talking about on the wider level of our relationship to experience and suffering.

So, mindfulness of our experience with right view. Steve talked today about how there's an object—an object arises in our experience. One way, and this is from the Buddha, we can notice what occurs as we go through the day, is that six different experiences tend to arise, keep on arising, right? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing—physical experience with the body. Those are the five physical senses. And then the whole mental realm: thoughts, emotions, moods. These are all coming and going. Has anybody not noticed that? As I said, you can't stop them from coming and going. This is what's happening. This is what we call our life. This is what we're experiencing.

So whatever's arising—say a particular sight arises, or, well, let's keep it simple, a sight, or say a twinge in your knee as you're sitting. So that arises. That is arising. It's simply the object arising. It's not personal. It's arising from whatever particular conditions have come together in that one moment to cause the arising of that particular sensation or that particular sound.

Does that make sense so far?

We don't stop and think, "What are all the things that made that sound come?" Those frogs croaking—it's just there. But once you start to go into it, it's endless, right? Any one thing you pick goes back to the Big Bang if you want to start figuring out what all the causes are, because everything's interconnected. So I'm not saying figure it out, but it arises due to lawful causes.

So say a sensation arises, right? That's the object. Any of the six senses—mood, a thought, aversion arises. The sense of that natural, not even awareness, but just the consciousness of it. The sight arises, and if your eyes are open and your eyes work and you're awake, they're seeing, right? That happens. You don't have to plan, "In a minute when this light goes on, I'm going to see." Or, "In about thirty seconds, I think the knee's going to start to throb." We don't know, and it's out of our control.

Do you get that? And yet we take it so personally.

So this knowing just happens naturally. That's not the same as awareness, as Steve said.

That's what makes the experience of seeing or hearing. The sight, the eye works, the consciousness is there, seeing is occurring. As soon as we recognize that seeing is occurring, that's awareness. And as I think Steve took you through, you get a sense of the subtle difference. When I said "feel your hand," there was probably already a consciousness of it, but when I said "feel it," there was an awareness. You're still in the same experience, but there's this subtle shift. You get that feeling of that shift from—really, we're just identified. We could say later what's happening, but there's not really an awareness. We're just not thinking about it at all; we're just in it.

So there's the object arising, the recognition of the process—thinking, seeing, hearing—that's awareness. And awareness is just as natural as consciousness. It's not some big thing you had to manufacture, was it? You just had to remember. But you see how it's so nothing special that we don't tend to notice?

Then the third piece of the way he describes meditation practice—and where the third piece is where all our confusion and suffering lies or is released—is in that moment of awareness. Nothing other than the awareness. Feeling hand, feeling twinge, seeing, whatever, just seeing. In that moment that there's awareness of what the process is, what's the attitude, the quality that's in the mind, in the awareness at that moment?

Until we even recognize awareness, never mind recognizing the quality—but once we get in the habit, which is what we're trying to cultivate here, the habit of moment-to-moment awareness, that's all—you start to notice what's the quality in the mind that's aware.

I'm going to give examples, but I think I saw some nods. You already get a sense of the difference it can make. If in that moment of recognizing that seeing is happening, that recognition, that awareness is just "oh, seeing, it's like this"—do you get a sense of how that's freeing?

"Oh, look at that deer! It's so beautiful!" No, no, no. You're totally in the object. But "oh, seeing the deer"—and it's just calm seeing, no good, no bad, just what it is. There's a kind of being there with it, but there's space around, there's ease, there's just no problem one way or the other. You don't have to do anything about it.

We don't notice that. Into the deer—it's so beautiful, and oh, I love deer, and what are their lives like? Oh, they have so many ticks, and how does it feel to me? At least they don't hunt them here. I'm so lucky, or I'm so not lucky, or I should have been more of a nature lover. Whatever—you get a sense. Gone, gone, gone. But we don't notice that. We don't notice that often.

So in this way of practice—practically really in all ways of practice—we're noticing the object. As soon as we're conscious of it: oh, seeing is happening, thinking is happening, feeling the body is happening. And when there's not a lot of wanting or aversion or stories about me, it's just that simple awareness. One moment after the other, after the other.

And with the steadiness of that, we start to recognize more clearly the processes of our life. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling, thinking, wanting. And much of the day, much of what goes on in retreat is nothing really special. Are you waiting for something special enough to notice? Probably. But it's like this—this is it. Yes, this is it. This is our life.

Come and tell us something else that happened other than seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and mental activity. And did any of it last very long at all? And then another one came—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental activity.

And then you think, "Oh my God, let me get out of here," right? What is that? Oh, that's mental activity. And there's awareness.

When you recognize what is influencing, what is affecting that moment of awareness, when you feel that sense of struggle—"Oh my God, is this all there is? I can't bear another..."—oh, that's aversion. That's awareness again. Aversion has become the object. Knowing, recognizing the quality in the mind of aversion. And in that moment, the awareness is not affected by aversion. And that's a teensy sense of what a moment of freedom is.

Do you see this? And you still might be thinking, "Oh my God, I want something different." But when we're not so sucked into the object, but just noticing the process, it can just be what it is. And it's not a disconnect, not caring—like the life of the Buddha.

It's quite present. Because we're not afraid of stuff. We're not needing to hold on to something to make us okay. We're really here, really here, for this moment, which is whatever it is.

Another way Utejniya talks about this right view is recognizing, as I said, that whatever's arising is this moment's effect of all the previous causes. This moment could not be any different. How could it be? It's here. And it's not personal, it's just nature. It's a way, a language—just nature. The nature of seeing, the nature of hearing, the nature of feeling, the nature of thinking. We all experience these things. It's not so personal.

So how does it get so personal? It gets personal when we don't see this process. Our habit is really being sucked into what's occurring, into the object, liking it, disliking it. That's the habit. We get absorbed.

So there's an unpleasant smell—I'm not picking something too horrible, right? There's an unpleasant smell and you're really sensitive to smells. So there's smelling. It's unpleasant. We don't like it. If you're recognizing that smells one object, recognizing that sense smelling is happening in the mind—"Oh my God, I don't like it, I kind of shrink"—shrinking feels like this. Tightness in the mind feels like this.

That's a language that Ajahn Sumedho uses. He was an American man originally, who's been a monk in the Thai forest tradition for forty-some-odd years. And I love the way he talks about practice and awareness. It's the same thing as just awareness of something. "Oh, bad smell is like this. Aversion feels like this."

Do you get a sense? I feel like a qigong move, a tai chi move—from the aversion, the smell, and "How could they do it? Oh, I don't like it"—to: "It's like this." It's not trying to fix anything. It's not saying that this means X, Y, or Z about me or the other person. This is what's occurring now.

And we can see much more clearly in that moment when there's not the wanting, the aversion, the judging, the "me." Unpleasant smell, tightening in the body, aversion in the mind. "How can this happen?" You see that whole process without trying to fix it, without trying to figure out where's the suffering. It's obvious.

It's not the smell. It's all that stuff our mind is doing in reaction—that's what's holding on. It's like a snowball of confusion and suffering, going and going and going. And then you think, "Oh God, and now I'm doing it, I'm making the snowball of suffering, I might as well just hang it up." But that's just the same thing. Don't go into the content of the thought. Feel that—oh, that's aversion. Aversion feels like this. Just for that moment, it becomes the object.

And what's so remarkable, in terms of introducing us to the freeing potential of balanced awareness—that's what I'm going to call awareness when it's not affected by greed or hatred or confusion, balanced awareness—is that even a moment of recognizing this is like a moment of freedom. Just to get a sense. It doesn't mean that aversion will never arise again. But we stop being so afraid of this stuff, and we get interested in what's going on. How is the mind working?

Instead of somehow secretly believing we're going to figure it all out so that we can manipulate our internal experience and the whole world so we don't have to deal with anything that causes us harm or unpleasantness anymore. I'm not saying we're looking for harm, but I'm just saying it's not in our control. If our freedom, our happiness, our peace, and thus our ability to act in the world with compassion and caring hinges on getting it all copacetic, it's not going to happen in this world of change.

There's a word that I like in the Pali language: yathā bhūta, which translates as "things as they have come to be in this moment." And that's a description of one kind of high experience of insight, you could say. Everything's momentary. Things as they have come to be. So you're stomping up and down the hill, hot and sick of the noise and sick of whatever, and you go, "Oh, things as they have come to be right now. It's like this. Just like this." And we ever so subtly shift—as in that Tai Chi move—from being all involved in the content of the object to awareness.

So whatever the particular experience is, in terms of what opens up the way to recognizing and trusting more and more this potential for freeing our heart and mind—it doesn't matter. In this practice, it does not matter what the object is. All objects are equal in terms of being an opportunity to re-recognize the simplicity of awareness. Whether it's a subtle tingling experience, a subtle breath, or seeing something, or hearing something, or smelling a bad smell, or noticing you're filled with rage—but suddenly rage becomes the object. It's still rage. But the shift is from the absorption in the object into noticing the process with interest. We get really interested: How is this working?

And that's one of the reasons this style of practice can actually be so relaxing, so enjoyable. It really can be—I know you don't believe me yet—but it can be, because we're not trying to make a particular experience happen. And when you want that, that's wanting in the mind. And right away we're saying, "This one's no good, this one I need, this is okay but it isn't quite good enough." Has anyone experienced that today? "Am I doing it right?" That's immediately—doing what right? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, feeling, thinking. It's happening without our say-so. Are you doing it right? It's just happening. Awareness doesn't care.

And it doesn't matter if you notice the first little flip of anger. It's easier if you notice the first little flip—it's easier.

But if you've stomped up and down the hill for half an hour in a rage, thinking furiously, and suddenly you go, "Oh, this is rage. Rage is like this" — that moment of awareness is just as pure. It doesn't matter whether it was awareness of an incredibly blissful state or rage. The awareness is untouched, unstained. It's just arising here in this moment. Nothing can harm it. It's always available when we remember.

But it's not our habit to remember. It's our habit to base what's important on what's happening. So here, why we're going on about this, is to give us information to help us remember, to explore and see if what I'm saying is true in your experience.

I've been practicing for many years, and I want to say one thing that I have more and more respect for. This may not be encouraging, but it's true, and it actually helps me a lot. What I have more and more respect for is the power of habit in our minds. Good habit, bad habit. You all know external habits, but the power of habit in our mind is so strong and so familiar that without some information, without putting ourselves in a situation where we consciously try to observe and see what the habit is — notice I didn't say get rid of the habit, I said observe and see what the heck is going on, what the habit is — without that, we're just enthralled to it because we don't know there's another option. This is what you might call samsara.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was quite an amazing Tibetan teacher, talks about renunciation — which we think of as giving up everything externally nice. That's not what he's talking about. Renunciation is a quality of heart and mind of joy and simplicity. This is how he describes it: "Renunciation, the foundation of the path, the root of all the stages, implies the strong wish to free oneself, not only from life's immediate sorrows, but from the seemingly unending sufferings of samsara." Samsara being that seemingly endless cycle of conditioned existence.

What do we mean by that? That sense of something arising — we like it, we don't like it, it's pleasant, it's not pleasant — and right away there's that absorption into it. "I need more of this, and this is what's going to make me happy." Or the sense of it's unpleasant — we don't know that consciously, but just that pulling away, assessing it as wrong, bad, unhappy. "Get rid of it, and then I'll be happy." But the cycle is, as he's saying, this endless leaning to the next thing, leaning to the next thing. Just a little bit out there, it's going to be a little better. Do you have any sense what I'm talking about?

And so he says that with this sense of just starting to tune into that comes a heartfelt weariness, a disillusionment with the endless quest for gratification, for approval, for profit, for status. He's not saying you hate it, but a disillusionment, a weariness. And this isn't an aversion — this is the wise understanding, the right view of seeing things as they have come to be. That when we just zone in, zoom into the object — "Oh, if next time I sit the mind's a little quieter, then it'll be better" — it doesn't matter what it is. That leaning forward, that absorption into the object, keeps us off balance, no? Keeps us yearning. It keeps us fixed there and not seeing the whole picture — the sense of all the connectedness, the cause and effect.

That sense of "this pain in my knee goes back to the Big Bang and it's not in my control; it's nature occurring in this moment" — that is very different from "this pain in my knee, this burning, what can I do? How can I fix it? How can I possibly meditate if this is happening? If I just get up and don't sit anymore, get a chair, then it'll all be okay." It's not that we don't take care of pain. It's that "then it'll all be okay." We only see the object and it's going to make me okay in the future. We don't see the whole process of what's actually happening — that wanting, that aversion in the mind, that resistance to experience as it is that keeps us in this sense of a separated bubble of me.

It's all about getting it better, getting it fixed, getting rid of the unpleasant—me, me, me. And how come I feel so isolated? How come it's never okay for very long? Because our idea of okay isn't really working.

How do we notice it's not working? By starting to notice the awareness of the process, getting more interested in awareness steady moment to moment. That's a continuity, and that's essential. We start to notice the process, and that gets so much more interesting. You start to see through. You start to notice the vastness. You notice where freedom is, and it's not by getting everything okay.

Let me give you a little example of the shift from focus on object to seeing process. It's just a simple one, but this is how it is. Our lives are made up of simple experiences.

I was on a retreat a long time ago, one of my first three-month retreats I think, and I had a car. It was way two months into the retreat. Very strict schedule, silence and all. And basically, the idea—so that was thinking arose, which I didn't notice as thinking—that I wanted some chocolate chip cookies. I wanted chocolate chip cookies. You can imagine, two months into a retreat. Very strong wanting, which if you asked me later I would have said, "Sure, I thought about cookies and I wanted them." But that's like consciousness, that's not awareness really seeing the process.

Well, I had a car. I went out into town in Barre and bought a bag of chocolate chip cookies. And overall I'm not a binger, so it's not like that. So I had this bag. I went back to my room. And I thought I was being very mindful, you know? And this is when we think we're being aware and we don't notice the attitude in the awareness.

So I was sitting in my room and I thought I was being very mindful. I was focused on undoing the bag, feeling the sensations, opening the bag. I wasn't just thinking about something else and stuffing it down. I was very present, but completely missing the attitude in the mind that was aware—for quite some time. I ate a lot of those cookies, big bag. I remember because it was like one of those aha moments, you remember. I probably ate two-thirds of the bag just sitting there mindfully, thinking I was mindful, eating the cookie, chewing, feeling it, swallow, feeling it drop down, then seeing okay another cookie, reaching, chewing. This took quite a while. We're slow, we don't notice. And this is where we can think we're mindful and not see the attitude, that third piece—we miss the whole thing.

Suddenly—but I was being aware with awareness—I suddenly got a little bigger and I noticed: oh, chewing, chewing, chewing, the cookie feeling drops down. But there was this yearning feeling in my chest, like this longing, and the cookie was missing that. It would kind of drop past that feeling into my stomach, which was getting more and more full and not very pleasant.

So I said, oh, what's happening in the mind? It's longing, yearning. Oh, it's the loneliness. That's what's occurring. The cookies—they don't really do much for yearning and loneliness, but we think pleasant sensation is going to do it.

So as soon as I saw that—ah, loneliness is like this, that's what's happening, this is what's happening—awareness just relaxes into it. There's nothing to fix. It's just like this. The resistance goes away, but there's clear seeing.

It's okay. Loneliness is painful, and I can be with that. It's just like this. This is life.

And when we open into it—we all experience loneliness sometimes—it can almost open us into compassion for the world. When you can be with your own loneliness, and you're with someone else who's lonely, you don't try to say, "Oh, buck up! Why don't you go to the coffee shop?" You say, "Oh, yes, loneliness is painful. It's like this." You see, it's all connected.

The Tibetans have a saying I love. They say, "Samsara is the urge to correct." Just notice how much we're trying to correct experience. And when you notice that leaning forward, that leaning forward—you don't have to correct that. Oh, leaning forward is like this. Awareness takes care of itself.

Our job is simply what's happening right now. Getting more and more interested in the experience of awareness. It's just a little coming and going. Trusting it more. Don't look for such a big thing. Trusting it more. Not expecting some big thing to happen.

This week here isn't so much about having some wonderful experience by the end. Not at all. It's just waking up moment after moment, learning to shift the habit by getting interested, shifting our refuge from aversion and clinging and trying to correct—to awareness. How do we do that? Not by correcting trying to correct. That's just more wanting. But by simply noticing—oh, awareness of wanting. Wanting is like this.

The awareness is always available. We'll forget for a long time, then it's there. And the more and more we just recognize it, recognize it, recognize it, it starts by itself to get a bit more momentum. It does feel effortful at first. We have to keep remembering. That's one of the reasons we come to retreat.

As Steve said, this is just our life. We can bring awareness to whatever's happening. But because the habits of getting involved in what's happening—liking it, disliking it, and the third, really taking it as what does that mean about me, all the thoughts about me—we get so seduced by that. We forget about awareness.

So we have more simplified days here, to give us just a little more chance to notice awareness. Because it's the same mind and body. It's not different, not a different process. But as the days go on and you're hopefully not on your email and texting and not doing stuff, the mind will naturally get a little bit quieter. There's just a little less of this incredible amount of input that we meet every day in this world. I mean, it's unbelievable, right? So here, there's a little less. As life is a little simpler, it's a little easier to notice what the process is. That's all. That's all we're doing—practicing that here. Just shifting.

It's so poignant to me that the habits of our mind, what has really become our refuge, is this wanting, leaning in to getting some pleasant, happy experience—or trusting that the unpleasant is bad and that this is the source of my suffering, pushing it away, being in this struggle—and then interpreting all experience as meaning something about me. Do you notice that at all? And that's just thinking. You don't have to stop that.

When we notice, "Oh yeah, thinking it's about me," that's just thinking. But when we don't notice it, we're in struggle again.

It's poignant to me that this is our refuge. We say, "Of course I want to get away from unpleasant. Of course I do." I'm not saying we need to be with unpleasant, that we need to go looking for trouble. But it's going to find us sometimes, and if we can't be with it...

We say, "No, of course that makes sense. Of course wanting pleasant makes sense." We'd go to the mat for this—this is how I'm going to be happy in this life. And then even when we know it—I know it—but the habit sneaks up through the back door.

Just keep watching. And this isn't personal. It's not personal at all. It's just deeply ingrained. It's poignant.

There's one sutta where the Buddha describes this, our habit as unawakened ordinary worldlings. He uses the example of being hit by a dart, by an arrow. You experience one form of unpleasant experience, right? And when we're not understanding, not seeing with wise view, then immediately—he says we get upset, we beat our breast, we're anguished, we cry, we tear out our hair, we get all upset. "How could this dart have hit me? How am I going to—oh my god, my knee hurts, I'm going to be in the hospital..." Second dart. He calls that the second dart.

And he says then, in the face of unpleasant experience like that, the ordinary person—the only escape they know from unpleasant experience is to go find a pleasant experience. And so it comes to underlie our mind that we resist the unpleasant and lust after the pleasant. For the ordinary person, that's the only escape they know.

This is samsara. This is samsara.

I feel such compassion, really such sadness, to think of a life that feels like no way out. No way out because the search for pleasant is endless, and nothing lasts, and there's no way to avoid unpleasant.

So this awareness, the steadiness of awareness, is essential—which is why we talk about continuity for seeing the process. In just that moment, it's a step out of samsara.

There's the unpleasant pain as the first dart, and the mind starts: "Oh no, how can it be?" Fear is like this. It's still fear. I know I'm saying it lightly. It's still fear. It still hurts. But that involvement has switched to interest in the awareness, interest in the process. How is this working? What's the actual source of the suffering here? We get interested. Is it the actual sensation? Is it the thoughts in the mind? Can I kind of see how they go back and forth? What's going on here?

And that's the key attitude that really supports us through the continuity of the day—interest in what's happening.

So that's the step out of samsara. That's the other possibility when we're faced with unpleasant or pleasant: to be with it with a calm and peaceful heart and mind. Awareness is our way to discover how that is possible.

We can't do it by willpower. Believe me, I'm sure you've all tried. I've really tried. I know how it feels when I'm caught in fear, reaction, or wanting—like wanting those cookies, wanting, wanting. Wanting is unpleasant. Try just being with wanting without fulfilling it, but really being with it.

It's unpleasant. We get the thing we want, and we don't recognize that wanting itself was unpleasant. We feel happy because we got the thing, but we're happy because the wanting stopped.

Hang out with the wanting. It's just wanting, it's just a feeling, it's just a mood in the mind—so what? Oh, wanting's like this. That sense of recognition is just a little door into the potential of freedom. It's the escape instead of just having to go get something pleasant to avoid the unpleasant. And that's just the endless trying to fix of samsara.

So here we are. That's why the steadiness through the day, the continuity, is essential. Continuity—I kind of call it dread continuity because people hear it and then they think the "should," you know, I should be aware every single moment or I'm not doing it right. I think you've discovered today that it's impossible, it's not in our control. But the idea of continuity is this sense that every moment is equally important. The sitting, the walking, the simplicity, the qigong, the simple activities help us to keep recognizing moment to moment—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, feeling, moods. But standing in the food line is just as valid and important a moment of any of the six objects and potential of awareness, or when you're sitting on the toilet. It really doesn't matter. And the steadiness through the day is where awareness begins to get its own momentum.

And so this is only possible when you get this sense—and we'll keep talking about it—of not trying to make something happen. Not this strong effort of leaning forward. We get exhausted. Not in this practice, not focusing really intensely. Like when I described eating those cookies and I'm really feeling the sensation and I get really intense, I'm missing the big picture, and you get exhausted.

So this is why it takes a couple of days here to start to trust the awareness. You've been all spaced out, you're standing in the food line, and suddenly—oh, standing is like this. I can't... what is that? What is that? Oh, wanting. Curiosity feels like this. And the interest is what takes us through the day. Not heavy focusing, not trying to be aware, but just the remembering and the interest to see how the mind is working.

So in that way, we have the precepts so we're not hurting anybody, but in this way nothing's wrong. Anger comes up—oh, you get interested, how does that work? Happiness comes up, concentration comes up, fine. We don't hate concentration. Calmness comes up, fine. Calmness goes away, fine. Noticing all of it.

So this steadiness through the day with just interest to see how the mind is working is what allows us to keep remembering, keep remembering. If every time you remember, you beat yourself up, pretty soon you don't want to come back into awareness because you don't like beating yourself up. When you notice—oh, I was thinking for who knows how long—but awareness of that, awareness is like this, you start to really shift your refuge, just appreciating awareness. And as we trust it more, it starts to get its own momentum. So that's in these days, these early days, what we're really doing.

So it's not so exciting. Just moment after moment after moment. But relax. Be present with this. And, you know, the day really does get more enjoyable.

So I saw someone out walking, just being at the stream. Now, if you're on a retreat and you're thinking, I'm at the stream—hearing, seeing, happiness, aware of this—fine. But if you're thinking, I'm at the stream but I ought to be in the sitting, then I'd be being aware, and you're not noticing that, there's this sense of struggle. But if you're at the stream and you're like off in la-la land—what helps balance awareness? If you say, I'm going to just take a hike because it's all the same, but you hike all day—because we're so in the habit of wanting and aversion and meaning, we're not in the habit of awareness—you hike all day, you have a good time, but you weren't aware at all, or you were aware for two minutes in thirty hours.

You come back, and the question is: what helps balance your steady awareness? That's how we decide. You sit for a while, you walk for a while, you have a cup of tea if you're getting really tight. But if you think you're really present, if you think, "I'll just have a cup of tea because this is boring," no way. Boredom is like this—boredom is mind, boredom is an object of awareness.

But say you go have a cup of tea anyway, just because you want one. Okay, wanting is taking you down to the tea, but you can bring awareness along with it. You don't abandon awareness just because you're doing something you know is wanting-driven. We think, "I won't pay attention because I'm not really practicing"—no, no, no. There's nothing that isn't a worthwhile object. Everything brings us back into awareness. So you bring awareness along with you while you're wanting, while you're drinking the tea, and then you notice: did it support continued awareness or not? And that's how we go through the day.

You're not trying to make things turn out the way you want them in order to be happy. We're just trying to know what is happening as it is, moment to moment. Thinking that things should be this way or that way is a kind of expectation, and this creates wanting and leads to aversion. Just noticing things as they are opens us to awareness and peace.

I want to close with a little story—a true story—because this might seem very moment-to-moment simple, maybe a little too refined or separated from life. But really, this simple practice, the commitment to it, the dedication to just this moment, the willingness to just try it and see... You don't have to know how it turns out. Awareness does its job and wisdom comes by itself.

And this is a huge relief. We don't have to create wisdom. We can't. All we can do is think about stuff. How far does that get us in terms of wisdom? With seeing what's happening as it is, wisdom arises naturally. And what's the appropriate action becomes obvious. Life becomes so much simpler in moments. I'm not saying every minute—then we're all caught up. But we know the difference. Sometimes I'll be all caught up and go, "Wow, I'm all caught up now." I know the difference between when I'm all caught up and when things are just occurring. I'm aware—the same things could be occurring in my mind, more or less. I mean, no two moments are exactly the same. But I'm aware: "Oh yeah, the mind's really going on a ride now, isn't it? The Carol story is really whipping itself up." Just like that. The Carol story doesn't go away. But that's how it is. It's a little more spacious.

But this really leads to quite a depth of awakening. I want to say it's not just some esoteric thing that used to happen. Probably a lot of you have read this letter from Mingyur Rinpoche. You know who Mingyur Rinpoche is? He's a Tibetan lama, brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche. Quite well known, well practiced in this country and all over the world. He has a big organization, and about—I don't know, maybe it was two years ago now, something like that—he let everyone in his organization know he was going on a three-year retreat. So he went to Bodh Gaya, and everything seemed like a normal three-year retreat.

But what he did—he comes from a huge family of Tibetan really awakened lamas—he was in Bodh Gaya, and in the middle of the night, he just left. He took nothing. No one knew where he was going. His brother, Tsoknyi Rinpoche, who's quite a well-known teacher and lama, put a little talk up on YouTube. They were amazed. They were so in awe. He didn't even take a toothbrush. He didn't take any money. He just left and went off, just like the practitioners of old—aimless wandering practice.

And so last fall, one of his Tibetan friends and disciples, Tashi, happened to run into him in Kathmandu. He was so skinny, with a beard and long hair, and Tashi didn't recognize him at first, as he says in this letter. But something about that person felt familiar, so he followed him. Then he realized—oh, it's Mingyur Rinpoche. He went to him and begged, "Can I at least come with you for some time?" He bought him a sleeping bag and clothes.

Mingyur Rinpoche had become really thin. He'd just been wandering around Nepal and Tibet, practicing in caves, unknown, begging for food. I want to read a little bit from the letter he wrote and gave to Tashi to bring back and put online for his friends and supporters, because it speaks to what I've been reflecting on. It's not about the externals.

He says: "I myself am wandering without any fixed location, staying in isolated mountain hermitages and other such places." We're talking about caves up in the Himalayas. And until he met Tashi, he didn't have a sleeping bag, didn't have a down coat or anything.

"I have experienced feelings of happiness and suffering, rising and falling like waves on the surface of the ocean. At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I have felt cold, hungry, and thirsty. Even when I have begged for alms, I have received nothing but insults and harsh words. At other times, I have received food and clothing effortlessly, without even asking for them, and in my mind it felt as though I were enjoying the pleasures of the gods.

"While I have experienced both happiness and suffering, the most important thing is that a deep and heartfelt sense of certainty has arisen in the depths of my being, such that no matter what happens, I know that the very true nature of these experiences, their very essence, is that of timeless awareness and vast compassion. This natural clarity of awareness is the very essence and true nature of our minds, with us from the beginning.

"Therefore, we maintain the flow of pure awareness to the best of one's ability—without meditating"—he means without focusing hard on an object—"yet not getting lost in distraction. Recognizing the importance of this, I have passed my days feeling joyful and content, wandering through the mountains and valleys and staying here and there. From my heart, I sincerely encourage all of you to practice diligently in this manner as well."

We may have lesser joys and sorrows than his, certainly lesser sufferings while we're here. But every moment offers that same chance to re-recognize simple awareness. That's enough. Just the determination, the sincerity from our heart to remember when we can, to keep showing up. And when accurate recognition occurs, wisdom comes by itself.

Thank you for being here. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 117

Perception, Thought and Views

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this illuminating talk on the third foundation of mindfulness, Carol Wilson examines the relationship between perception (saññā), thought, and the views that shape our experience. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that "what we perceive, we think about," she explores how misperception leads to mental proliferation (papañca) and suffering, while accurate perception can instantly dissolve confusion.

Wilson explains the natural process by which sense contact leads to feeling tone, perception, and then proliferating thoughts that "assail and overwhelm" us. She illustrates this with vivid examples—from mistaking one's own breathing for someone walking downstairs, to seeing a circus tent where there's only a lichen-covered rock. The teaching addresses how the three unwholesome roots—desire, aversion, and delusion—distort perception and generate unreliable thoughts we then treat as truth.

The talk also touches on the Buddha's teaching of the four "inverted perceptions" (vipallāsa): perceiving permanence where there is impermanence, happiness where there is unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and self where there is no fixed self. Wilson emphasizes that intellectual understanding alone cannot shift these deep perceptions—only steady, non-judgmental awareness of the arising and passing of experience moment to moment allows liberating insight to emerge naturally. The practical guidance encourages practitioners to become curious observers of their mental processes rather than victims of thought.

Since what we're talking about is mindfulness of mind—the third foundation of the four foundations of mindfulness—as Steve said, with the mind you're aware of everything, all four foundations. But I thought I'd talk tonight about an aspect of our mental experience that I'm pretty sure you've all been noticing pretty steadily, and that's thinking, thought. Because it takes up a lot of our air time sometimes, doesn't it?

Thinking is a really interesting phenomenon. It's just one of the six sense experiences—one of the mental sense experiences, along with emotions and other things. And it's so interesting because, well, for many reasons. But I know from talking to people here, and in all the retreats I've taught, and in my own experience, it can at times be the case that we get caught in feeling like our meditation practice is some kind of struggle with thought. Ever had that feeling? That thought's a problem somehow?

So why is that so? Some of it comes from certain forms of practice where we're really trying to get absorbed, where there's a feeling we're supposed to get rid of thoughts—that thoughts shouldn't be there. Now, you know we haven't said that on this retreat, right? I'm just checking. Because this is where perception comes in.

What's really important is when we talk about yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment—the accurate recognition, as Steve was talking about with right view. The accurate recognition of experience moment to moment, the steadiness of it, is what creates the condition for wisdom to arise. And the wisdom that recognizes accurately is what liberates our heart and mind from confusion, from suffering.

Thinking and emotions are natural phenomena, part of our experience. So what's the big problem with thought? It comes down to this accurate recognition—recognizing the nature of thought, bringing attention, awareness, meeting it with awareness of the nature of thought itself. But often we're really kind of sucked into the story. We're lost in the story of thought. You get a sense of the difference, right? And that difference is huge in terms of our experience.

When we're seeing thought as a thought—right now, deliberately think a thought. "Elephants are gray." Think that thought. Where is it now? Is that thought gone? It dissolved, but I brought it up so it's back, right? You're hanging on to it. But does that thought have a lot of oomph to it? "Elephants are gray." It's nothing. It's not even as solid as smoke. A thought is just a little blip of mental energy, gone. Can you get a little sense of that? It just arises from who knows where, it's here, and it dissolves back into emptiness.

When the steadiness of mindfulness awareness is just noticing that whole process, how can a thought possibly harm us? So we say, "Well, okay, that thought—that was a stupid thought. Pick an important thought." But the thought energy isn't different.

So how do we get so lost in it? I'm going to describe some of the ways, some of the process—not to give you information that you now have to go and make a list, but hopefully to continue to pique our interest. So that when thinking or thought is the predominant arising experience, which it often is, instead of making it a problem or wishing something better was coming up or judging the thoughts, we recognize: what's arising? Thinking. It's like this. And then we get interested in exploring: why is it so clear that thought is just poof? What's going on? What's the actual process happening?

Because if we were trying to get rid of thought, it would be a little hard to function in the world. Thought is really useful. No one here is putting down thought. It's useful when we understand it and we can use it. When we can recognize what's appropriate thought, we can pick it up. When thought has some hopeful bearing on reality—which I hate to say how rare that is—but when it has some bearing on what's really going on, when we want to put something together: incredible, creative, wonderful. But we've got to learn how to tell the difference.

And when we're not using thought, when thought's running us, aren't there times—maybe not for you—but you can feel like you're a victim of thought? Some people say, "Oh no, I don't want that thought to come back again because it's so horrible," and there's just that obsessive quality of thinking.

So here I want to just explore it, to see thought simply as another object of nature arising. But because we're so used to getting into the content, we just need practice. That's all. We just need practice in how to bring mindfulness to thoughts.

This is from Utajaniya: remember that a thought is just another object which helps us to develop awareness, perseverance, and balance of mind. As we've been saying, awareness doesn't care. A thought, a sound, a subtle sensation—it doesn't matter. But if you don't recognize thought as an object, then you will get carried away by the train of thoughts, by the content, and you lose yourself in the story. That's exactly what happens.

So can we even notice that process without any blame or judgment, but see how does that happen? What's the difference? How do we get lost in the story? What's going on? How does it feel so real? I mean, it's fascinating, really. These little blips of energy, and they're making us nuts. It's fascinating to explore. Hopefully you will pick up that it can be fascinating to explore. That's my hope.

So I want to talk about a few aspects of the process of thoughts arising in our mind, the way the Buddha described. It's all happening fast, but all the time, and some of this stuff we can see.

Back to the fact that there are six sense experiences arising and passing over and over. We've honed in on that the last two nights. The way the Buddha talks about our experience: there's a sense experience arising. Let's take seeing. Sight arises, there's an eye that works, that consciousness. Those coming together is called contact, that moment of seeing happening. Then if there's mindfulness awareness, that's almost the next moment—knowing that seeing is occurring. But leaving that out, I'm not talking about awareness right now. I'm just talking about the process of conscious knowing as we go through our lives.

So seeing occurs, hearing occurs. It could be a thought, but say seeing. The way the Buddha describes it, as soon as there's any of the six—seeing—the mind feels it as pleasant or unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. And then, right then, there's a perception, saññā in Pali, and this is very specific, what the Buddha means by perception. A quality in our mind that occurs with every contact—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, whatever. The perception is like a function of recognition. If I hold this up and you see it, whether your mind says it or not, you'd probably recognize paper. A piece of paper. You might have more specifics—Carol holding the paper, well, that's a whole thing. But piece of paper, that would be perception. Pretty simple, right? This is going on all the time.

Now, as the Buddha said, what we perceive, we think about. We describe. Okay, not we—descriptions happen. And it doesn't have to be. There could just be seeing, paper, boom. The mind is kind of quiet. And we like those times. That's part of what it feels like when the mind is quiet, but you're not comatose. There's the perception—deer—and you don't go into the whole story of Bambi. There's just deer, and there's space around it, space where you don't have to make up a story. Then there are other times the perception turns into descriptions. We use the perceptions to describe and define our world, and that is very useful and essential.

So when you, most of you, heard the kind of gonging sound about ten minutes ago, you didn't say it, but you recognized "bell." And then there would be a further perception and even a description: "That's the bell just before the talk, that means I come in to go to the talk." And it sets you in your whole world. Here I am at Spirit Rock. Maybe you don't know what day it is, but you know it's nighttime and time to come to the talk.

Unless you were taking a nap and you heard that gong and you wake up and you have no clue—do you know how that is? The perception doesn't quite come in. You don't know if it's day or night. You don't know what time it is. Sometimes that's fun and sometimes it's disorienting.

So perception is just another aspect of nature occurring with every contact, every contact with the mind too. It's not a problem. It's something we don't often notice because it goes right into liking, disliking, thinking, our judgments about it. But description—that's useful. When we're all on the same page with the perception and the description, then it works. If we just rang the bell at 3 a.m. and didn't give you anything—what the heck? Your mind would make up some reason that bell was being rung because you wouldn't have that information. So perception is very helpful. It helps us describe our world. It's useful in that way, just as thinking is useful. What we perceive, we think about, we describe, the Buddha says.

Now, where it starts to get tricky—before we even get to the thinking—is that perception is quite frequently not accurate. And so much we don't even question. I'll get to where the inaccuracy comes about, often when the consciousness, the mind at that moment, is veiled with greed or confusion or wanting or aversion. But even prior to that, even our ignorance—we just don't know. Isn't there often a sense of "this is just how it is"?

A funny example: I used this last fall. I was at a friend's house, someone I know really well. We're in her living room, and over the couch there was a throw, a blanket over the back of the couch. I said something about, "Well, put it on that blue throw, that blue blanket." She goes, "What blue blanket?" I said, "What do you mean, what blue blanket? It's your house—the blue blanket." She said, "That's not blue, that's green."

Simple little thing. We were talking about it, but I could not see green. She could not see blue. Even trying. I said, "Well, isn't that interesting? I would go to my deathbed saying that thing was blue." And she, that it's green.

So right there's a little nugget: the perception isn't absolutely irrevocable, absolute truth. It's all subjective in that way. That simplicity—what we do with the perception—we think about it, we believe our perception, it becomes a view, really. We think about it and then "this is how it is, that's what blue looks like. How could she think green? What's the matter with her?" And you see how quick we go there. How quick.

So that's a simple thing, and we had fun with it because then it takes us into where our practice is most flourishing. The quality of open awareness is just the moment experience arises into the mind—of not knowing. Mindfulness awareness isn't about "I know what this is." That comes after, even if you're using labeling. The perception comes: "Oh, that's a bell, hearing." But first, it's just that open presence of awareness, the not knowing.

But with the perception and the thinking hardening into views, there's this sense of an unconscious "this is how it is." And when something upsets that, or someone else has a different "this is how it is," there can be big trouble. But first, let's just stay with ourselves.

Perception—we often don't recognize it. We implicitly believe it. Steve's example of what we perceive is the sun going around the earth, right? That's what we perceive. We can't perceive it any other way. And we read all this. I was thinking as he was talking and now he said, "Now we all know it does." I thought, well, I've read that. I believe that, but I don't actually know that. I just know that everybody says it, and they know more than me, so I'll believe it. But I don't actually know that in terms of what our actual perception is.

This is what the Buddha described. What we perceive, we feel. What we feel, we perceive. What we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we complicate with associations, interpretations, memories, comparisons. And then—okay, I won't make it up, I'll quote it—these notions assail and overwhelm a person. And as Joseph Goldstein, a good friend of ours, a long-term Vipassana teacher, has said—he has a lot of very pithy sayings—one of them is: "We're making it all up." So a lot of the time, we are.

Let me give you an example of how this works in a kind of funny way. Sometimes perception we just don't know accurately—like blue-green, who knows what's the ultimate truth? You hear a sound and you don't know what it is. But that leads to the thoughts and the emotions and the views and the whole story. And we totally, implicitly believe that.

So a friend of mine, a good friend, was telling me about her first ten-day meditation retreat many years ago in Switzerland with Ajahn Sumedho, who is a really wonderful teacher—I mentioned him the other night. At that time there were no meditation centers, so the group rented an old house. They have these old houses in Switzerland that they use for summer camps for kids. They're really big with a lot of rooms, built without much insulation since they only use them in the summer. Wood, so they're really noisy. The kind of thing where anytime you're walking on the floor, it creaks, it bangs, you can hear the person breathing in the next room—but there's six people in a room anyway. That kind of place.

In this place, the big meditation room was upstairs, and the room used for walking, the same size, was immediately below it on the ground floor. And there was a schedule—you sit, you walk, according to schedule. And she would acknowledge herself as being very Swiss. You follow the schedule.

So it was a sitting time. She was sitting on her first retreat. Those of you on your first retreat, you know, it's tough. The third or fourth day, have you noticed your mind's getting a little cranky? It starts a little: this isn't what I signed up for. Third or fourth day, it's time for that. Don't take it personally. And it'll change, because everything does.

Anyway, she's sitting, and she said finally, just following the breath, the mind got a little peaceful. She's like, basically, thank God, you know, finally, for two minutes or three minutes, it's peaceful. And then she could hear this creak, creak, creak of somebody walking downstairs. Creak, creak. She says, "Oh my, they're completely ruining my meditation, and it's the sitting time! How can they be walking downstairs?" And she just got into, you know, sitting, looking like an angel, but in an incredible rage. How can this person creak, creak, creak? Each time she'd hear the creak, anger would come shooting up. And another thought: How can they do it? Should I get up and go? No, they're wrecking my meditation.

You can relate, right?

So the stories are getting stronger. The emotion is coming with the stories. The negativity is getting stronger. And finally she realized, what can I do? Because I'm not allowed to leave the sitting anyway—she wasn't the manager. So out of desperation, which is what we usually do, she decided to go back and see if she could feel her breath. Finally, it's like, what else is there to do? Try and be with what's actually happening.

She didn't know how to watch her mind, so she went back and just felt the breath. She took another breath, took another breath, and then with the next breath, because she was just present, noticing, she recognized she was leaning against the wall. First retreat, can't sit up straight. She was leaning against the wall, and every time she took a breath, her back went into the wall, and it made this creak. That's what she was hearing. There was nobody walking downstairs.

So that's an example of when the accurate perception comes in, that whole story vanishes. The whole story of someone walking—you really can't sustain it when the accurate perception arrives. And the anger? Well, there's nothing to get angry at. It's all gone. It just vanishes.

That's an example of the difference between misperception—inaccurate perception leading to thinking and emotion and self-story, a huge amount of suffering, completely lost in it—and then accurate perception, where the whole thing vanishes. You get a sense of how fast that goes, how quickly, and the power of correct perception to free our mind from all that suffering.

Now, she went back to feel the breath, but it doesn't have to be the breath. And that's what we're going to practice here. One could also notice, say, wow, look at this aversion in the mind, and bring awareness to that as it is in the moment. Look at these thoughts—but different from jumping in and believing the thoughts. That's what the Buddha called papañca, proliferation. You just jump in with this one thought, and how are they walking? How can they be doing this? We get really caught.

Sogyal Rinpoche describes this very well. He says we get into so much pain and confusion by letting ourselves get lost in whatever happens. You project a thought, then the second thought believes the first one. Then a third, fourth, fifth thoughts are projected. The first thought is by this time already an absolute reality. By the time the tenth one comes, it believes that the fifth one has always been an actuality.

Can you relate to that at all? We totally believe. And until we practice stepping back—oh wow, thinking is like this, this is a thought—we miss the moment of just sensing the nature of thought, which is just this poof. Instead, we're totally in the content and the associated moods and emotions and reactions and self-story, let's face it, that comes along with it.

And if I came and tapped you on the shoulder and said, "It's just a thought," you'd probably want to punch me. What do you mean it's just a thought? Don't you know what's going on? Yeah. Upset is going on. Upset feels like this. The thought is so solid.

It's interesting to see how when the perception is inaccurate—and when it's accurate too, we can have an accurate perception and also get wigged out about it—but when it's inaccurate and it really feeds into that, we get completely gone, out of touch with reality.

One of my definitions of insight is actually a shift of perception—accurate perception. The Dalai Lama says that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge.

And Thich Nhat Hanh says something I find very important: "Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking." Let me read that again. Understanding—Dhamma wisdom, he means—does not arise as the result of thinking. It is the result of a long process of conscious awareness.

It's the steadiness, the process of conscious awareness, that allows us to see—like that whole process with the noise in the Swiss house. It was the steadiness of awareness that let that be revealed. She couldn't think her way into that. She didn't have that information.

Thich Nhat Hanh continues: sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts. That's how thoughts are useful. But often thoughts are too limited to really carry all the understanding, to encompass all the understanding. That's one of the reasons we get into confusion when we're trying to talk about things—no matter what we say, it has a limitation. That's just the nature of things.

So I want to talk just for a moment again about what distorts perception, the qualities that can arise in our mind. We've discussed them before. I just want to give some examples, because then with steady awareness, we can start to notice. You can start to tune in. Sometimes the thoughts can be a clue that you're coming from a distorted perception. You can pause and think, "Wait, maybe I don't really know what's going on here." And that can be quite interesting.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was really a wonderful teacher, describes this beautifully. He says that when our sense organs meet an object, the only part the object itself plays—say this sight—is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. So the seeing: bell. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all your accumulated habits and past experiences—because that's what influences perception; if you never saw a bell like this, you might not know what it was—influenced by all of that, the whole process is entirely subjective. Blue-green, who knows?

He continues: when your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure, or lovely. You get a sense of that sometimes?

I want to give simple examples here because this is what goes on. Our awareness, our just natural being with experience, can notice at any point of it. But the steadiness sometimes lets us see the whole process. And once we start to see it's a natural process and don't take it so personally, it's kind of fun to watch.

What gets in the way, what distorts, what are the veils? Our old friends: desire, greed, aversion, ill will, fear, and delusion—which is sometimes also just not knowing. Delusion can make something up completely, but sometimes it's simply not knowing. We don't have all the information.

Here's another example, a little Zen story. In ancient times, a samurai warrior went to a Zen master. This samurai was very aggressive, wild—not really a practitioner. He runs into the Zen master with a sword and roughly starts yelling, "You're a pig! You're a pig!"

And the Zen master, of course, as they do, just bowed and said, "And you, sir, are a Buddha."

That stopped the man for a minute. "A Buddha? How can you say I'm a Buddha?" Even he knew better.

And the Zen master said, "Well, a pig sees a pig. A Buddha sees a Buddha."

It's a little bit like that. We take it all so personally, you know? So you can start to explore this in your own experience.

I'm just introducing this to begin exploring. One thing to notice: when there's wanting in the mind, when there's greed, just in the moment of the mind's arising, if we notice it, then it becomes simply the next object of awareness. We've talked about that. But when we don't notice it—and often we don't—later we might say, "Yes, there was wanting." But when it's distorting perception, we don't quite see it.

The Tibetans have a phrase I love: desire puts feathers on the object. It pretties it up. Have you noticed when you really want something—whatever it might be, a piece of chocolate cake, or going for a walk, or in your mind you're planning your next vacation—isn't it just so wonderful, so amazing? Check at the end of the retreat when it's over and you go home. Think back to all the amazing fantasies you had of what was going to happen. Just tell me if any one of them comes anywhere close to how amazingly wonderful and beautiful it seemed to the mind filled with wanting. That's just what wanting does.

When we recognize it—have you ever gone to the supermarket when you're hungry? We all know not to do that, right? Don't go to the supermarket when you're hungry. You end up buying all this junk and you get home thinking, what am I doing with this?

Here's a little example so you can get interested without taking it personally. The apartment I'm staying in, I had to buy some rugs because it's all tile floor. I have this one rug I bought on eBay, and I really liked it. It's cheerful. It cheers me up. I can feel there's a little wanting there—not a huge desire, but a bit of liking. I look at it and think, I like it.

So Franz came up just to check things out the other day, and he had a different perception. Not bad, just different. He didn't have what one of my friends calls "the love eyes." She was talking about when you first get in a relationship with someone, and she said they'd been married for fifteen years and were working through something—not bad, but you know, the love eyes aren't on anymore. The hate eyes weren't on either. You just see more accurately.

So Franz was looking at the rug saying, "Yeah, well, you know, it's like this, but..." He just saw other things about it, perceived it in a different way that I hadn't seen. It wasn't critical, just a different perception without that "Oh, isn't it so lovely?"

After he left, I was looking at the rug. I wasn't upset, but I noticed something. At first, we like wanting. So when the wanting is gone, we think, "Well, it's all flat. I don't want to live like that." That's aversion. But when the wanting is truly gone, you're just seeing clearly. I could see what he meant. But no, I still like it. I still think it's kind of cheerful. That quality of "it's so wonderful" simply wasn't there anymore. Just little things like that.

Wanting also gives us tunnel vision. We see the thing we want and everything else is in the way, or we just don't notice. Pay attention to that.

My brother used to have a hound dog—they're bred for hunting. My brother didn't hunt, and it was a lovely dog, very sweet, but that dog's nose was so highly developed that the poor thing would come into the house and whatever new smell was there, he couldn't not go to it. Nose on the ground, straight to the smell. If there was any kind of dirty tin can, they had to hide everything. I always had to keep my suitcase zipped because any smell of dirty clothes and he'd be in the suitcase pulling things out. If you let him out in the backyard, he'd just run around the perimeter of the fence with his nose on the ground. He couldn't not do it. No way.

That's how wanting drives the bus when it has taken over our mind and we don't see it. We think, "Yeah, this smell on the ground is so great. This smell is so fantastic."

Let me smell this new one. This one's okay, but this new one over here—that'll be even better. And then we think about it and get into a whole story, and we believe it.

The wanting goes unnoticed. But what am I doing here? Andrea Levine—I just saw him speak, and he was so funny about this. When we recognize that perception, that the mind in the moment is affected—the perception may be distorted, you don't know, but maybe by wanting or ill will or delusion—know this, and really know this: you cannot rely on the thoughts that are being generated. You can't assess if they're accurate. You really can't trust them. You can't believe them.

Andrea gave a simple example with wanting. You're sitting there with this big piece of chocolate cake, and your mind says, "Have another. You'll like it. It's good for you." So you eat that other one. Then as soon as you're done, your mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you." Which one is me? And then we get into the whole thing. But it's just different mental factors coloring thoughts. So we start to see that.

And even more—maybe not even more, but more immediately obvious—is the suffering with aversion. With wanting, we kind of delude ourselves. We think it's good because we think we're going to get something nice. We skip over the fact that we're really miserable right now in the wanting, because we tell ourselves we're going to get something nice. With ill will, aversion, fear, you can't really skip over it because it's telling you not only is it bad now, it's only going to get worse.

When ill will, aversion, dislike is affecting the mind, it really leads to so much thought, so much assessment. Self-judging is a form of this. I know this one very well. And it's been so freeing that when I recognize self-judging, I know it has a feeling, a quality—it's an emotion by this point. By the time it's self-judging, it's really stronger than just a thought. It has a whole feeling for me, like a cloud coming over my mind and tightness in the body and a heavy mood.

You can recognize it. It arises due to natural causes and conditions. I could therapeutically trace back all the conditions in my life. Let me tell you, you only need to do that once. Then you know. The next time it comes up, you can just meet it as it is. You know there are causes and conditions. You don't have to go, "But that's right, my mother did do that, my father did do that..." Yeah, you know that. Good. Now it's arising now, and you can really be present with it. Knowing this helps because it makes it not so personal. There are causes and conditions.

And in certain situations, I know not only the past but the present conditions. For example, if I'm really tired and my mind is fatigued, or if I've had a series of difficult and unpleasant interactions—I'm balanced, balanced, balanced, balanced—and then all of a sudden, boom: "You really blew that one, kiddo." And I can feel it coming in.

So what's been so helpful is once I recognize, "Oh, self-judging is up, ill will is up, aversion's up"—the mind is throwing out, projecting all these thoughts—and I really know I cannot rely on them. Those thoughts are unreliable. They're based on inaccurate perception. I can't try to tease out which is right: that I'm really a worm on the earth because of what I said to that person, or because of what my mother did. Or maybe I'm not really a worm, I'm just kind of so-so. No, no—I'm really great, really incredible.

You know, forget it. Just forget it. The mind can keep on spewing that stuff, but you just see: oh, thought is just thought. It's just thought coming in. You feel the mood, the feeling of the self. That's what's arising now—causes and conditions. But you just know perception's off. The thoughts are based on inaccuracy. They're not to be relied on.

Do you get a sense of how when we start to tune into this in our life, it can be so helpful in making decisions, even split-second ones? When we start to notice—and this has been so helpful to me the last few years in my daily life—I'm doing something or saying something, and I think, "Oh, I really want to go do this." It doesn't matter what. It doesn't have to be a big deal. And then I just notice, because I'm used to just noticing my mind, what's going on in the mind. And I notice it's filled with wanting.

It doesn't mean the thing I want is bad or good. It means I can't tell. It means I have no clear way, no clear perception to assess. So if I can wait, I do.

Same with ill will. If I'm really negative—"Let me go tell that person how this last interaction affected me, with all the love in my heart, because they really need to know"—and then I can feel it: oh yeah, there's a lot of ill will. I don't have to judge it. It's not about judging. Just: this is what's up now. And with the practice of watching our mind, you can see how when there's ill will or aversion, it leads to these thoughts. And if I believe it and feed it, it gets stronger and stronger and stronger. Then I'll act from it.

Seeing that—not as a should, but just watching it—this is what Steve said: the wisdom comes by itself. The wisdom of "Oh yeah, I don't want to do that." It's not like I have to go back and study the Visuddhimagga to see that I don't want to go and yell at that person out of anger. When I'm just paying attention, it becomes clear. But if you start judging the anger, that's just more ill will reverberating on itself.

It's from the Buddha. Again: "When one is dwelling with a mind oppressed by ill will and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both." He's not saying that as a criticism. He just says: oh, that's how it is.

You know, if your mind's obsessed and oppressed by wanting, and you see that in the moment—sometimes just noticing wanting arises, sometimes you can see there's enough awareness that you know it's here, you know ill will's here, but we still can tell we're identified. You can tell that. That's awareness. So then you know: okay, I can't see my own good or the good of another or the good of both. So don't trust it right now.

With wanting. With ill will. And with delusion.

Delusion is sometimes just not having all the information. And we often don't know we don't have all the information. So then we have to act, but just—this is in the kind of mundane way I'm talking now—when we act from this quality of delusion, which is both not having enough information, just plain ignorance in that way, or the delusion of misperceiving and then building a whole life story on it. And there's a kind of delusion which is making assumptions. I've noticed in my own mind, on the level of perception, I don't really have enough information—that quality of just beginner's mind, just "Oh, I don't know what this is." But notice how the memory banks, the perception, will fill in something that's kind of close, and then we're sure that's what it is.

Like, one time I was teaching a retreat in Switzerland, a different place years ago, and walking in the woods—remember walking meditation? Walking in the forest with a friend, without my glasses, which is a really great way to play with that kind of delusion and misperception in the mind, because I really can't see very well. I see enough that I can get around, and so then I think I know what's going on. I don't have a clue. And I don't know I don't have a clue, because I'm used to it. That's delusion. So I was walking in the forest—it's kind of a nice, tidy forest—with a friend.

And I looked over and saw this big gray and yellow, white-striped thing. I said, "Wow, what's a circus tent doing here?" That's what I saw—a circus tent. And I went, "Oh, a circus tent in the woods, wrecking the whole place like that." And my friend just looked at me. "Carol, go over there and look." So I go over, and it was a big rock covered with yellow lichen. But I literally saw a circus tent. That's delusion. And so much of the time we just don't know that, and we can actually build a lot more on such misperceptions than that quick moment allowed.

In terms of right view, as Steve was talking about, even in more profound ways—the liberating, accurate recognition, the yathā-bhūta that really frees the mind and heart, the accurate perception—the Buddha talks about four particular hallucinations of perception, or inverted perception, where we perceive something opposite from how it actually is. And then we believe it, and we build our thoughts and our views and our world on that. Seeing through those inversions over and over and over is really the source of liberating insight. How do we see through? Steady, steady, steady awareness of just what's occurring. Not looking for it—if you look for something, that's wanting.

Any of you who've read any Buddhism are very familiar with these. One is seeing permanence where there is not permanence. Anicca—the word for impermanence, for constant change. But the perception we often have is of permanence where there's not permanence.

Another is not seeing the first noble truth, dukkha—the unreliability, the unsatisfactoriness of experience. It doesn't mean every experience is unpleasant, but the unreliability to make us truly happy. We don't see that. We see potential for happiness. We see "this is going to make me happy." We see a sense of happiness where that isn't there, where it's dukkha, where it's unreliable, where it's intrinsically—I don't like to use "suffering" because we tend to go into aversion with that word, and it's not about aversion. It's about looking for reliability and stability where there is none.

And the third one is seeing a discrete, separate, permanent self in any moment of experience where that is not the case. It's like taking something personal where it's just conditions of nature coming together, as we've been talking about. But talking about it doesn't shift our perception. That's why, as Steve was saying, with right view we need to hear it or read it or get some sense. You think, "Okay, let's pick impermanence." You think, "Well, I know things change." You ask somebody, and they'll say, "I know things change on a big level." But if you just start dropping in from time to time—don't go crazy looking for it—how often is the perception that things aren't changing?

We know "I change." Do I look the same as when I was three? No. But that's all on an intellectual level. You get up and think, "How come I'm sick today? It shouldn't be different." We think we're just kind of the same me, whatever that is. We think we're all sitting here, kind of the same. But when the mind is quiet, in moment-to-moment awareness, no two moments are the same. They're not.

When you're lost, like we were talking about in a group with some strong, difficult emotion—it was really strong, and the person was really with it. And then noticing: it's gone. There was just a moment of happiness, noticing it's really gone. But the tendency of the mind is to think, "Well, I'm not noticing it now, but it's really here lurking around because this is who I really am." It's permanent.

So these misperceptions—and don't believe me because believing doesn't help—there are so many moments, because perception is occurring every conscious moment, so many moments in our life where the perception, unrecognized, is of permanence, is of a sense of self, is of reliability. And then all our thoughts and views of ourselves and views of the world are built on that perception. And when things don't quite mesh, like a round peg in a square hole—do you know what I mean?

One of the definitions of dukkha—the actual etymological meaning, which points to unreliability, to things not quite working—comes from the old days. It refers to the axle, the wooden rod that goes through the hole in the big wooden wheel of an ox cart. They still have those in Burma, very rough constructions. Just this round thing going through a hole in one solid wooden wheel, and it doesn't fit that well. It's rough. It's just kind of bumpy, and if you've ever ridden in an ox cart, believe me, it really is like that. It just doesn't quite go smoothly.

So the Buddha calls these inverted perceptions. And he talks about what we perceive—saññā, perception—and how we then think about it, citta. So there comes to be the hallucination of perception, the inverted perception. And then without realizing it, we're thinking from that distorted base. How many people have your date books filled up for next month? I'm having to plan for 2015. I'm having to answer questions about 2016. And if I'm not quite aware, there's this underlying assumption that I'll still be alive in 2016. Or we make a plan. I remember once Franz and I made a plan—I was flying in from the States, he was God knows where, one never knows where he is—and we were meeting in the Bangkok airport at midnight. And it really happened, which to me is even more amazing. But there are all these assumptions that everything is going to be steady.

And so we think from the point of view of this misperception, and that's the hallucination of thinking in citta. And then what we think about—as I was saying with my friend in the Swiss house—those thoughts kind of solidify, kind of coagulate into a view. A view meaning really a description of ourselves or the situation or the world. We may not enunciate it clearly, saying "this is what I believe"—it actually helps when we do because then we at least know what the view is. But it's more in the back of the mind. It's like, "this is what's true."

This is how the Buddha described view: "This is what's true and everything else is false." But we don't recognize that it's a view. If we don't recognize it, we hold to it, and then from those thoughts—just like when I'm in self-judgment and I believe the thoughts and then I start making assessments and actions from that—I just get more and more confused. It's more and more not working. That's what can go on for us until we start to understand how this is happening.

With views in particular—this sense of "this is how it is"—sometimes people talk about having some experience in meditation where everything's different from how it usually was. It's unfamiliar. Maybe a sense that the body falls away. Maybe suddenly everything's happening, but it doesn't feel like me. Nothing threatening, but it's just different. And often fear comes up because our solidity, our view—it's like the mind, the habit of mind, seems to like to be able to describe and know things. "This is how it is." Have you noticed that? We like to have it all figured out. "Okay, I know how it is." We like to have a clue.

And when we get locked into a view without realizing it, often we don't even let in consciously the perceptions that challenge that view. I call it selective perception. Think of politics—actually, don't think of politics—but I'm not going to mention anything specific. Many years ago, another president, many presidents of the United States back, one I was not fond of. And I just remember this one time, and of course that's all views and you see how it goes. But I noticed in my own mind how this selective perception worked.

Someone I could hardly stand to look at, could hardly hear the voice on television—like that, right away. They never did anything good in their life. So someone was telling me something about this president that was kind of sweet and loving and very kind, and my mind was going, "Don't tell me that. I don't want to know. There's nothing good about that person. Don't tell me. That can't be true."

Like, whoa, that's really interesting. I don't want my view upset. It feels easy—this is good and this is bad. This is right and this is wrong, right?

We've been talking about in one of the groups today, different styles of practice, and thinking, "Well, I'm doing this style of practice—does that mean this other style is wrong, or good or bad?" And that's what our mind likes to do. But it's not like that. It's not like that.

So when we get caught in a view, we sometimes literally don't perceive what's actually in front of our face.

This is another story Franz told me. I'm assuming it's true—the ghost driver. In Germany, if somebody enters a divided freeway driving on the wrong side, that can happen once in a while. You know what I mean? So all the traffic's going north and somehow you went in the wrong exit and you're driving south on a divided freeway—you can't get off. They call that a ghost driver. Don't ask me why. Because they're going to be ghosts pretty soon, I suppose.

So the story goes: the person's driving the wrong way, and sometimes they'll say on the radio, you know, they'll come on and say there's a traffic jam in this area or whatever. And so it came on the radio, and the woman was listening to it: "Ghost driver on the Autobahn between München and Augsburg." And the woman's going, "One ghost driver? There are many!" We just don't let in the perception because we're so fixed in our views. I know I'm telling funny stories on purpose, but you get a drift of how it goes.

So this sense of "me"—noticing how, and I'm touching on a lot of things that we could go into a lot of depth—but notice how one of the misperceptions I mentioned that the Buddha points to is this sense of "me," how we take things so personally. A mood comes up—it's my fault, it's me, it's like this. A sound comes—it's bothering me, it's got to be fixed. You come feeling lonely—what's the matter with me? All of that.

So this sense of "me"—have you noticed that it gives rise to a lot of thoughts? A lot of the thoughts are describing me and how I feel and what's going on. I'm not saying good or bad, but again, if the perception's inaccurate, the thoughts are not trustworthy.

So here, what we want to do is not get rid of them, not even argue with them, not try to change them, not try to fix them—but get interested in watching the whole process. Perception, what arises, the thoughts, the sensations—just keep on watching.

Two little examples for me on retreat. I was on a long retreat, just watching, watching, watching, watching, and I had watched a movie just before the retreat. Did any of you make that mistake? So it was a three-month retreat, and it was this movie The Fu- gitive, from years ago. So I'm sitting and sitting and thoughts are coming, images are coming—Harrison Ford and this and that. And when I stopped resisting it and would just be noticing—thinking, liking, excitement—happening, happening, happening... then that would go away. And then the Carol story would start coming up. Carol's this and she's doing that.

And after a while, it was just thinking and seeing and feeling—the Carol story and The Fugitive story. There was no difference. In the moment, it was thoughts and emotions and internal images. That's all that was occurring. The Fugitive was more interesting. The Carol story I took more personally. But all that was happening was emotions and perceptions and thoughts and feelings and moods. It was really kind of funny to see.

And then to see how we land in some story, some thoughts, some mood during the day—like the example I gave the woman in the group where it really is a difficult thing—and then suddenly you notice it's completely gone.

But with selective perception, we just kind of ignore that it's completely gone. And then we're back to "I was so miserable all day."

Sometimes people say, "Oh, so... oh, really? Well, then in that first sitting, the whole sitting..." "Well, no, but there was about five minutes in the middle that was really..." "And then the whole day?" "Well, no, then I had this nice walk. I went up to the top of the hill, and lunch was really good." "But then in the afternoon I had this, you know, ten minutes and it was so..."

And we don't realize we're doing that—deciding "this is me" and all of that other stuff isn't me. But watch how it's just all cause and effect.

So another story. When I was on retreat, I was sitting in my room. I think it must have been just end of summer, early fall. Very present. And there's the sound of crickets. The perception was "crickets," and that was accurate. And then with that perception came a feeling—this feeling of nostalgia, that sadness of summer ending and fall beginning. A loneliness came. That is a habit my mind goes to when I hear crickets.

So that was happening. "Oh, sadness... and oh, it's ending... and I'm so lonely here, all alone in this room. Three-month retreat—I could die here, no one would know for three days until my next interview." So that's all going, and I was really mindfully watching, just watching the whole thing.

So I thought, let's just see. I'll do an experiment. I sat down and said, okay, bring the attention deliberately to hearing the sound of crickets. And then I deliberately thought a different thought. The perception was the same—crickets. I deliberately thought, "Oh, isn't that lovely here in nature? It's so silent. This lovely end of summer." That's all I did—deliberately thought that. And the whole story followed from that. I started feeling really happy. "Oh, this peace is beautiful. How fortunate to be on this retreat, the exquisite stillness, hearing the crickets."

And that was just as real as the one before. Or not. Thinking, emotions, perception—it all comes. Watch it come, watch it go. Birth and death of a particular sense of me. It's really fun to play with that through the days.

I will end with a short passage from Ajahn Sumedho:

"Awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts or emotions or actions or speech. Awareness is about knowing these things fully, just as they are—that they are what they are in this moment. That is all."

That is all.

May our sincere intentions here, our efforts, the wholesome energy be shared with all beings everywhere as one of the causes for their awakening from suffering and confusion.

Thanks for listening. Thanks for your patience.

As you get up and go to walk, just notice what you're doing. Notice the mind, why it's doing it—without judgment.

CHAPTER 118

Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines one of Buddhism's most essential insights: the perception of impermanence (anicca). Drawing from the Buddha's teachings, she explains how developing and cultivating this perception eliminates sense desire, craving for becoming, and the deeply rooted confusion of 'I am.' While intellectual understanding of change comes easily, Wilson explores why we persistently perceive permanence in what is actually constantly changing—from our fear of loss and grief to our desperate clinging for security.
> Wilson shares a moving story from Burma about a young novice monk's death and how the village community naturally integrated this reality into daily life, contrasting it with Western culture's tendency to hide death and aging from view. She draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah on 'becoming,' the Buddha's tender exchange with his grieving attendant Ānanda, and insights from teachers like the Dalai Lama, Pema Chödrön, and Nisargadatta Maharaj. The talk illuminates how our habit of assuming permanence—in our bodies, moods, and sense of self—creates suffering, while steady awareness reveals the constant flux of experience.
> Practically, Wilson encourages practitioners to notice not just change, but how we assume permanence: in sitting meditation when pain arises and we project it lasting forever, in eating when we overlay continuity onto discrete sensations, and in our rigid self-concepts that steady awareness naturally dissolves. She emphasizes that recognizing impermanence isn't depressing but liberating—opening us to wonder, contentment, and what she calls 'radical trust' in awareness itself. The talk concludes with Hafiz's luminous poem reminding us we are 'just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.'

Tonight I want to talk about one of the key insights that liberates the heart and mind—one that we've mentioned in passing, but that the Buddha spoke about quite frequently. This is the insight, the clear seeing into impermanence, or the word anicca in the Pali language.

This is from the Buddha: "Bhikkhus"—bhikkhus means monks or those meditating, so all of us—"Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sense desire, all lust, all craving. It eliminates all craving for becoming. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all the confusion, the wrong view of 'I am.'" Those four things are like shorthand for a completely freed heart and mind.

I really like that quote because of the specificity of it: the perception of impermanence when developed and cultivated. Do you remember that we've been talking about perception? I talked about perception a few nights ago, and how one of the base, repetitive sources of our confusion is the repeated misperception. I mentioned the three inverted perceptions, one being that in what is impermanent, we perceive permanence. And we develop and repeatedly practice that without having a clue that that's what we're doing. So I really like it when the Buddha says "when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated." That's just what I want to talk a bit about tonight—pointing to different ideas about why we have this habit of perceiving permanence, and also what helps us see through it. And guess what? That thing is steady awareness.

Let me say something about this quotation I read, about eliminating all craving and all craving for becoming. That may not be familiar language to some of you. Craving eliminates ignorance, okay. The confusion of "I am," okay. But becoming—this is a very simple definition from Ajahn Chah: anything that we attach to and put a meaning on is becoming. Whenever we see anything as self or other or belonging to ourselves, without the wise discernment, without the wisdom to know that such is only a convention, that is becoming.

That sense of self experience—we become the person who wants the banana, the person who feels too hot, the person with the hurt leg. We've talked about this, but just that attaching to anything is becoming. And that becoming gives birth to the sense of self experiencing happiness or unhappiness. That's a whole other talk, but I just wanted to define what becoming is. For the simplicity of talking about it now, it's simply when there's that leaning forward, that clinging, attaching to anything—a sense desire, a view, an opinion, my leg—without the discernment to realize, "Oh, this is a convention." That's all. That's what becoming means.

Anyway, the perception of impermanence cuts through all this confusion. It's really the doorway to liberation, one of the main entryway doors. Seeing dukkha is another one—dukkha, the unreliable, suffering aspect—and the perception of anatta, of not-self, is another doorway. Different ones light up for each of us, but all three work together.

So tonight I want to talk about impermanence. In one way, it's kind of interesting because of those three, the fact that things change is really the most intellectually obvious, isn't it? I mean, no one would probably argue with that. So how is it that we don't see impermanence? Why is it so hard to see? And why do we need to cultivate the perception?

I think I talked the other night about how liberating insight is really not that reality changes, but that our perception shifts. We shift our perception and then we see, we recognize things differently, we understand more accurately, and thus we respond and react in a way that's commensurate with what's really going on.

The thing is with impermanence—the fact that everything is in constant flux—even if we intellectually may know this from our own experience to some extent, from reading science and such, it's an intellectual knowledge. And the perceptual shift that needs to come happens over and over and over; one time doesn't really do it.

I think of it as a cellular knowing, a cellular living from knowing impermanence. Not having to stop and think about it, but rather the plans, the ways that we respond as if things are going to stay the same—that just doesn't happen anymore. So that cellular knowing operates on a much more subtle level. And that's the nature of insight. That's how our understanding of reality changes.

But what's interesting to see is that when people start thinking really in depth about impermanence, it's not like the most cheery thought, usually. We may think, from the place of not really getting it on a cellular level, that it sounds a little scary or depressing. The question arises: what will it be like to live if everything's changing? How can I function? As if it's not impermanent now, right? And when we have the insight, suddenly we recognize that everything's already changing. That's what I was trying to say. This is how it already is. It's not like we're going to lose something by recognizing accurately—it can only help. It can only help.

I just want to point at three different ways I've noticed in my own mind the not recognizing, the not perceiving of impermanence—things that veer my mind away from wanting to see it.

One is our fear of the unpleasant, our habit of not being with it. When we're really opening to the fact that every meeting ends in parting, for example, there's this instinctive fear of loss, of grief, of sadness. We don't want to feel it. And we have the habit that something unpleasant is bad, right? The whole thing about learning to bring this equanimity and awareness to whatever's arising—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—but our habit is, when confronted with the potential of loss and sorrow and grief, to think "no, bad." So we kind of shut it away a little bit, even though we can't avoid it. That can be a habit.

The second thing I want to point to is the misperception, the not recognizing impermanence right when it's in our face. And the third is the inattention, the lack of attention—all the spacing out, the lack of attention to just what's in front of us, to all the aspects of life.

In the culture I grew up in—and there are many cultures within this country—but in the culture I grew up in, old age is around, but even now it's kind of not so present. Not living in a multigenerational family or house. And death in particular is tidied up, kept minimal. You don't really have it. I didn't really have it in my face. So the society was also part of the conditions of just not really seeing all the aspects of life right in front of my face as life goes on.

I want to tell a little story about this. A few years ago, I was helping to teach a retreat in northern Burma, in the hills of Sagaing outside Mandalay. It was a retreat with a Burmese Sayadaw and a couple of Western teachers, but for foreigners—mostly Europeans, Americans, some Australians—along with Western teachers and managers. This is in the hills of Sagaing, right on the Irrawaddy River, a big river. Lots of nunneries and monasteries all around, in a small village.

So one afternoon, we—the staff of the retreat, the Westerners—were walking along the riverbank. We got down just a little bit, about maybe half a mile, not even. And right there by the river, there's the road, and then different nunneries and monasteries. We came even with a nunnery where we'd been visiting for a few years. We knew a lot of the nuns, a lot of the monks, and someone with us spoke Burmese.

As we got near there, along the wall which runs right along the river—and the river is very much part of people's lives there, the mode of transportation, people plant things along it—we saw the whole community. All the nuns from the nunnery we knew, all the monks, all the lay people, lined up along the wall, all looking over the river. This was very unusual, maybe eighty people or so.

We came up. What's going on?

They said three young novice monks, young boys of twelve or thirteen, had been out playing in the river, playing in a rowboat. And one of them had gone down and hadn't come back up again. He was a new monk from far away, not so used to the river, not from around there. Some men were down trying to find him, but it had been an hour already, so you knew he was going to be dead when they found him.

The whole community was there. Some little tiny girl nuns, four, five, six years old that we knew—everyone was there. And they found the young boy's body and brought it up.

What was so interesting to us was what proceeded from that. The whole community was there, and right by the road was a big sālā—a big platform with a roof but no walls, just sitting right there. They use it for all kinds of things. They brought his body in there. Someone went to inform his parents, a twenty-four-hour ride away, so it was going to be a while before they could come.

The whole community—the monks, the nuns—everyone gathered. The little boys who had been with him ran away, because of course they were scared. So some of the monks went to find them, to soothe them, to comfort them. There was this real sense of taking care of everybody. They took the young boy, wrapped him, ran up to the monastery, got clean robes, washed him, put him in his clean robes. The little girl nuns were there, and they knew him, and they were seeing the whole process. Everybody was part of it.

Then some of the nuns and monks sat down and were going to take turns chanting, staying with him until his parents came in another twenty-four, thirty hours. And it was just all right there. Everyone was sad, all the normal emotions, but it was all part of village life.

One of us, one of my friends who was managing the retreat at the time, said, "I'm forty-seven years old. I've never seen a dead body of a person." Just the difference from how we were brought up—and more, the naturalness of it all. Because really, when we talk about impermanence, death is the big one. I'm going to talk about it in smaller ways too, but just that sense of the naturalness. Because that's how it is.

When the way things are is hidden from us for various reasons, or we're just not in the habit of noticing, it feeds our inattention. It feeds our misapprehension, our misperception, without us even knowing it. And then we get uncomfortable, afraid, ill at ease—or think there's something wrong if we feel those things. Instead of seeing them as part of life. People were sad, people were crying, people were trying to soothe the kids, and that's all part of life. Nothing wrong with it. Nothing to avoid.

So let's call this kind of resistance or denial simply that: resistance. Two aspects I want to highlight are the resistance to the sadness of loss—trying to avoid that—and its corollary. That resistance is dosa, aversion. It always comes back, I hate to tell you, to the kilesas. They're just there when we're suffering. The resistance to the sadness, and the corollary is that our mind gets into clinging, holding on, all kinds of strategies to look for some security. It's not quite so obvious, but watch and see how we're doing it.

This is human. Death, loss, sorrow, grief—it's human. It's not that it shouldn't be happening. It's part of life. And so I feel, in terms of my experience in practice, we shouldn't have the idea that if I'm practicing correctly, I won't feel grief. Or if I'm practicing correctly, sadness won't come up. Rather, it's about not resisting or judging or blaming—just seeing these as natural functions of loss in this life. But met with awareness, they don't have to be any more than that. They come, you see them, they go.

We still see the impermanence even within that. But it's human.

There's a wonderful story from the time of the Buddha about his attendant, Ananda, who served him for the last twenty-five years of his life. If you read the suttas, the discourses of the Buddha that have come down to us, there are a lot of them, and Ananda appears in many because he was always with the Buddha. He was somewhat awakened, but not completely awakened. So he's kind of a humanizer, you could say, in terms of the suttas. His personality comes through as a really kind person, a loving person. He totally supports the Buddha and has deep faith, but his function, rather than trying to keep people away, is how to get people to hear the teachings. He's just very kind.

So in this sutta—the sutta of the Buddha's death, his last days—he's talking to his close monks about the fact that he's going to die soon, and they're discussing the procedures and cremation and such things. Suddenly he realizes that Ananda has disappeared. He says, "Where has Ananda gone?" Although, of course, he knew. But he said, "Where has Ananda gone? Go find him for me."

Ananda had gone into his lodging and stood lamenting, leaning against the doorpost. He was weeping and saying, "Alas, I am still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away, who was so compassionate to me." This man has heard every talk the Buddha gave for twenty-five years. He really loves him, and he's weeping. It's just really touching. This is life.

The Buddha said, "Go find friend Ananda." And when Ananda came and sat down, the Buddha said, "Enough, Ananda, do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other? How could it be, Ananda—since whatever is born, become, compounded is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away? There is no other way."

It's not that it's bad to weep and feel grief. We do. That's just what's happening. But at the same time, we recognize there is no other way.

Then he goes on to say, "Ananda, you have been showing loving-kindness in body, speech, and mind—beneficially, blessedly, wholeheartedly, unstintedly. You have achieved much merit, Ananda. Make effort, and in a short time your mind will be free, your heart will be free of corruptions."

That's his way of expressing compassion, saying, "This is really how it is." I love that. When we might hear him saying, "Don't you get it? Everything changes," he's not saying it like, "You stupid jerk." He's saying it knowing that hearing the truth can cut through our delusion. He's saying with all the compassion in his heart, "How could it be otherwise?"

So we see that for ourselves, but without flinching away or fearing or judging the sorrow and the grief. It's going to come. It's part of how our minds and bodies work, as long as we still think there's some chance for it to be other. It's poignant.

For me, if the grief is strong, I let the sadness, let the resistance be a wake-up call. The Buddha often used this fact of impermanence as a teaching tool, as a way to just wake up and say, "Oh, I'm really upset. What's really going on here?" Not "I shouldn't be," but "What's really going on here?" And then we see how much there's a sense of wanting somewhere to land, wanting some stable ground, not wanting to lose things. But we don't need to run from that. We don't need to run from shaky ground.

This sense of using change as a teaching tool is something that's accessible to us. That's why I started with this story about the young guy dying—because death is always available.

When he knew he was having, I think, a liver transplant, he was giving a speech to graduating students at Stanford. I didn't hear the whole speech, but they said about a third of it he was talking about death, because it was imminent for him. I just want to share one quotation. He said, "Remembering I'll be dead soon is the most important tool I have ever encountered to help me make the big choices in life." He's saying when we're looking at things the way they really are, we're naked.

Those of you who remember the sixties may remember Carlos Castaneda. It's kind of gone into obscurity now, but Don Juan was always saying, "Make death your advisor." Not death as your advisor in a heavy way, but it's like, yeah, when you look at that, then what's really important? We look at that in our lives.

So seeing the habit, the fear of the fear, the judgment that something's wrong—if we feel grief, something's wrong, this shouldn't be happening. But no, this is how it is. And awareness sees this is how it is. What comes up is the next arising experience we meet with awareness. We start to see clearly the steadiness of awareness.

This is where seeing impermanence frees the heart and mind from clinging, even just in a moment. The reaction to the fact that we can't really rely on anything—this doesn't make sense, although this is what we do. The fact that everything's changing, all meetings end in parting, we will all die, we will all lose, whatever—so we react to that by clinging like crazy to whatever comes up that might give us some sense of stability or security. The mind that wants some... I don't know about you, but my mind really hates uncertainty. Not knowing what's going to happen, shaky ground. But all of life is shaky ground.

I heard on the radio, probably a couple of years ago on the news, on NPR, talking about the European debt crisis at the time, when it was really big in the news. This was completely serious. They talked about the European debt crisis, its effect on politics and government, and said—this is the quotation—"Politics is being driven by the stock markets, and the markets hate uncertainty." So they pressure this or that government, this or that political figure, and they gave examples: this person should stay, or this person should resign, or this person should do X, Y, or Z so that there can be certainty in the stock markets.

What world do these guys think they're living in? Is there certainty in the stock market? "The stock markets hate uncertainty"—there's nothing but uncertainty. This was said with such seriousness, as if that made sense. It's completely insane. But that's really it: What can I do to get certainty? Where can I find some place to rest?

The Buddha said the search for a resting place is burning. It burns our heart and mind. Not to need one is cool and peaceful. That's just the clinging—"I've got to find something I can rely on." That's samsara. It's burning. When, okay, this moment is like this—you've had moments like that here, right? Just the space around, oh, cool and peaceful. Stepping under that nirvana tree, out of the burning.

But the habit of clinging, the sense of "if I just get something steady, it'll make me feel at ease"—it's so deeply in there.

I'll read a little bit of a poem from Galway Kinnell. I really like it. It's long, but I just picked out a couple of stanzas that speak to this. It's called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight."

You scream, waking from a nightmare.

When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us. I think that you think I will never die. I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars even as my broken arms heal themselves around you. I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down. I have stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die. Little Maud, yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake screaming from, being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

I really like that. We are in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. But it doesn't have to be a nightmare. It doesn't have to be anything, because each moment can become so fresh and new when we're not holding on for dear life trying to keep things some way. I'll say more about that, but this holding on is what breeds the fear. Clinging breeds fear. Clinging breeds suffering.

I was just starting to notice this sense of how much we want to hold on. And this clinging is what keeps us from accurate perception—it's what gets in the way. Because we don't want to be in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. So first we don't think about the house that falls. It's somebody else's, or it was a mistake. We don't want to be in the pre-trembling. We don't want to be in the trembling. We actually just don't really want to know. Maybe this is going to be how it is—finally, I got to the safe place. I watched my mind do that so many times, just here, going through mental states, and finally you get to a nice one. Okay. Ah, I landed here. I finally got here. It's just such a habit of our minds.

So I started talking about noticing impermanence in the big things of death, but really the perception of impermanence is about moment to moment to moment. I once heard the Dalai Lama teaching about impermanence—I think he said this a lot. He was talking about how we think we see impermanence, but what we don't notice is how much we're assuming permanence, which is a kind of delusion. We don't notice the momentariness of change. We notice the big changes. Sometimes we don't even notice those. But we notice the big changes—when something begins, then it abides, and then it dissolves. That's sort of how we think about change. Maybe my life begins, it abides, and dissolves, even though we know we're different every moment. It feels like I'm here for these years—sixty-something, whatever—we're here, we're abiding, and then it'll go somewhere down the road. Or even the day starts, or even a sitting, or even a mood: here, it abides, it goes away.

But it's not like that. There's no abiding. There's nothing abiding for a period of time, staying the same. It's momentary. It's like nine billion plus nanoseconds in one second—I read that's some scientific measurement. And even the Buddha talked about so many mind moments in the blink of an eye, trillions. That's how fast things are changing. Changing so fast we can't literally perceive it. But then we get in the habit of our mind just stretching things out, because there is a lot of momentary change our senses can perceive when we're really steady with the awareness. We think things arise due to conditions, stay a while, then go away. No. We're not the same in two seconds. It's not the same.

There's a kind of time-lapse photography—a yogi, a meditator, told me about this, the insight she had into impermanence.

I've loved that image ever since. She was watching a time-lapse video of a flower growing. We've all seen those—where the flower kind of bursts out of the ground, and the stem comes, and the leaves come, and the flower opens and then falls down. It's far out to see.

When you're watching that, we know it's all speeded up, but that's what's actually going on. And when we see it moving like that, there's not really a place where you could stop it and say, "That's the flower." It's all the dirt and the air and the sun and the water, and it's moving, and there's grass, and something starts to come, and it turns into the woody fiber of the thing. But when does it change from air and soil and water to woody fiber and leaves and flower and falling and rotting and back to the soil? Every second, it's different. And it's not just flower, right? You can't separate it from the environment, from the seeing of it. It's all constant. Every single minute is different. Continual opening, this constant flow.

That's impermanence. Things as they have come to be in this moment—but this moment is faster than that. Things as they have come to be isn't just that we're sitting here for nine days. How much has happened in your mind since you've been here? How many thoughts have arisen? You don't even want to know. How many moods? How many breaths? It's amazing. What's interesting is how we kind of shine on and don't really take that in, even though we're seeing it.

Somebody said once at the end of a month retreat here, "It's been twenty-eight days and absolutely nothing has happened. We've just been here for twenty-eight days." But on the other hand, every moment, so much is happening. She meant in the big picture, nothing has happened. You get up, you sit, you walk, you go back to bed. But really, nothing happened, right? You go home, people say, "What did you do?" "I got up, I sat, I walked." There's not that much you can really say to people who don't meditate about what it was like—so don't try. I'll tell you that tomorrow. But on the other hand, ten million things are happening in every hour.

Noticing that—a friend said on a retreat years ago, "I've been meditating for years and years," and she had. And she said, "I've known for years, I've seen impermanence, this fact that everything's changing, just like that flower. But this retreat, I'm suddenly getting it. Oh, me too. I'm not just sitting here watching everything else change. That's what I am. No difference. No separation." What we're calling "me" is different every second. Every nanosecond.

So it's the clinging, the holding on that we don't see—not a big clinging, but just that idea, a sensation, a memory. Now we're remembering. I could come in and, like in groups, you start talking about what's going on. If you really look, it's probably not going on anymore, right? It was going on, even if you think it was going on five minutes before. I mean, that's what we have to do to talk, but it's not really happening anymore. Just changing like that.

So when we go to look for what's happening, the way we use thought usually is useful, but it distorts our perception. It can get in the way where we believe the thought rather than bringing our awareness back to the immediacy of perception—just this moment, this moment, this moment—seeing how fast everything is changing. You can't make really anything solid.

This is from Pema Chödrön.

She's talking about emptiness, but emptiness really meaning emptiness of intrinsic separate self-existence. So it doesn't mean nothing's there. You could say the flower is empty of separate flower-ness because it includes everything.

And so she says, you recognize this by not clinging, by not making a something of anything. That's what Ajahn Chah was saying. If I take the flower and make a flower of it, in that moment this is a subtle clinging. I've frozen everything. The flower has become separate from the dirt and the air and from me and from rotting. Now it's a flower. Later it'll rot, but now it's this unchanging thing.

So she says, we recognize this constant change by not resting in any experience, not making something, by keeping on going. She says everything is a verb. There's no thingness. Everything is a verb. Interesting, isn't it?

And then she told this funny story. With Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was a great Tibetan master, and Trungpa Rinpoche when he was alive—they were together in Bodh Gaya or somewhere, sitting under some tree. They were sitting together, she said, for two or three hours, just in silence, but really together, just happy and silent and beaming. And after about three hours, Chögyam Trungpa broke the silence. With a huge smile, he looked at Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and pointed to a tree. With a huge smile, he said, "They call that a tree." And they both cracked up. Just totally cracked up.

The sense of it is that we do call it a tree—that's useful. But then we call it a tree and we think it's this solid thing when it's a verb. In constant change, in constant motion.

Not that you can try to see that way. We know it's not in our control. You can't say, "Now I'm going to see impermanence every time I look around." Because the misperception, the perceiving of permanence, is such a habit we don't even know we're doing it. But bringing it into our mind and just starting to tune in, you'll notice it more and more.

And this is where the most important thing is—guess what? Steadiness of awareness. Steadiness of awareness.

Nisargadatta Maharaj—have you heard of him? He was an Indian teacher. They wrote a book of conversations with him that was translated into English really well, called I Am That. It's a great book if you ever feel like reading something non-Buddhist. Anyway, he says, "We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination."

Totally. So our job, if we start trying to think and look for something—"Let me see how everything's changing"—that's actually imagination, looking for something. We don't know how it should be. But lack of attention—that's what we're learning about. We're learning how to be interested in awareness, which is simply present one hundred percent with whatever's arising right now. That's all we've been practicing. It's profound.

That steadiness of awareness—just now, just now, just now—is how reality reveals itself. It's not like we have to figure out what we need to do to find impermanence. As I said in the beginning, that's how it is. We don't have to do anything to find it except keep showing up to what's happening right now with as much clarity and as little distortion as possible. The wisdom will reveal things for itself. We can notice when our habits of mind are falling into the habits of unwillingness to really show up. Those are habits.

They're going to come. Meet those with kindness—that's what we've been saying. Really see them. Notice them. And that's actually a clue. If I think I'm really present and I start to notice aversion in the mind, it's not like, "Oh, bad." It's more like, "Huh. That's interesting." What's the quality of not wanting to be with right now? You get interested: what's my mind not wanting to be with right now? Not a big psychological analysis, just what's happening right now? Interested to see.

So the steadiness of mindful awareness, moment after moment, is what's going to reveal impermanence over and over and over.

Just to give an example of how we draw things out and cling for stability, making steady something that we don't see change—going back to my friend who said, "Oh, everything's changing, and now I realize it's me too." We've mentioned this in terms of our idea of ourself. There's a word in Pali, sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which means identity view or personality view. That word diṭṭhi, view, is like a description we've made that we don't even realize is a description—we think it's true.

Just to see how the steadiness of awareness breaks this down, it gets really interesting. One Burmese Sayadaw, Sayadaw U Lakana, who was the Sayadaw I was teaching with in Burma that year, describes the momentary construction of personality view. Because everything's momentarily constructed and falling apart—that's the thing with difficult stuff too. It's not arising, staying, staying, staying, and then going away. It's not just the pleasant stuff that's arising and going away quickly. The unpleasant stuff also isn't staying, staying, staying. It's constantly being created and falling, created and falling.

So this personality view—the way you can see it begin in a moment is this: back to the six sense objects, the six experiences. Sometimes when you feel like there's a momentum of awareness and you're not feeling too caught in everything, you notice how there's seeing, or you're hearing, and a mood comes, a thought comes. It's just kind of coming and going, faster or slower, and there's not really a problem. You have a sense of that? You're not saying, "Oh God, everything's changing. Oh God, I need something to land." And you're not even thinking "I" anything in particular. You're not going, "Oh great, that's me." Stuff is just happening in awareness. Thinking back, you can get a sense of the peace of that.

You notice that's going along, and suddenly some particular thing arises, and—whop! That's me. We usually don't say "that's me," but that's how it feels. Something's been kind of pulled out. "I don't like that sight. I don't like this mood. What is that person doing?" We don't even realize that's a perception and a thought that we're glomming onto, or a memory. But you get a sense of how it's kind of pulled out of the flow—or really, the mind just clings, wrapping around it. And that's "me" or "mine," right in that moment. Birth of personality view.

When the awareness kind of stops then, that's when it starts to feel permanent. Steve pointed to this—how actually what we're thinking of as me, the way we're describing ourself, is changing all the time. But when we don't have steady awareness, we don't notice that. Even though it's a completely different experience, we still think it's the same me. You know what I mean?

I'll give an example. A very simple one, of a friend who used to cook here on retreats.

A very dear friend and longtime practitioner, she used to cook here on retreats. She told me one time she came to sit for the day after she'd been working and talking with friends. She was a cook, and her friends were discussing—well, basically saying—she said, "I think I'm a really aversive type person. I have a lot of aversion." And all her colleagues and friends said, "Yeah, that's right, you really do."

So she was in a stew. This wasn't really new information for her, I have to say, but on this particular day she came to sit, she was in a real stew about it. Has anybody here gotten in a stew about anything you thought about yourself since you've been here? You know how it really feels like this is what I am. I'm an aversive person.

So she came to sit down, her and her aversive person. But because she'd done a lot of practice, the sitting reminded her to have steady awareness. The reason we haven't had a schedule here is because we want you to remember steady awareness everywhere, not just sitting. But anyway, the sitting reminded her.

So she starts watching the aversion and the thoughts in her mind, the images of how the aversion was manifesting. But then she just watched what came. And she said, "You know what? Yeah, there were some aversive thoughts—maybe ten percent. But there were also some really loving thoughts. There were times of no thoughts and just moods of compassion. There were times when there was nothing to do with me at all—just hearing and seeing and sensing in the body. And then there were times of generosity." All kinds of stuff was arising, and none of it was any more her than any of the rest of it.

She saw how the clinging to the aversive thoughts and the idea—the view, the sakkāya-diṭṭhi—"I am an aversive person"—that's a clinging. There were still no more or less aversive thoughts than before. When she was just watching with awareness, aversive thoughts came, the mood was there, and then they would go. Sure, they arise. There was conditioning that led to a fair amount of aversive thoughts. That doesn't make it her. It's conditioning that comes and goes.

So with steady awareness, if you really start to have steady awareness, there's no way you can stick to the idea of "I am this" or "I am that" or "I am this type of person." You just can't. We try hard. But you can't help but see the change. And this isn't a suffering thing to see—this is incredibly freeing. All these different aspects I'm talking about, it's incredibly freeing.

The question comes up a lot: Why would I want to see things this way? Why would I want to recognize consciously, moment to moment, the instability in the world, in my life, in my body?

It's because that's the way it is. That's the way it is.

Joseph Goldstein, one of his little remarks: "Anything can happen at any time." It's really true. And then there's that reaction of, "But oh my god..."—I think you can feel it. Why would I want to live like that? Live in fear? Anything can happen at any time?

But that's not awareness. That's fear. And the fear comes up because we're looking ahead and thinking, "What if this happens? What if that happens?" We have no clue what's going to happen. We have no clue what's going to happen in the next moment. But we think we do, right? You think I'm going to keep on talking, and you're wondering how much longer.

And you're going to be sitting here and then the bell's going to ring, and then we'll say something and you'll walk out or whatever. And it's actually kind of scary that more or less that happens, because that can lock us into assuming permanence.

So one thing I like to play with when I have the space on retreat is to just start to notice not only when there's change, but how am I assuming permanence? I don't mean thinking about this a lot, but just noticing it. Notice how the mind assumes permanence when you sit down—and I just pick sitting, it could be walking or anything. You sit down and your back's hurting, you're restless, and right away the mind goes, "Forty-five more minutes." Right then, we think it's going to go forever.

People have told me, various people here just on their retreat, having some really intense physical or emotional states going on for quite a while, and suddenly there's a shift in the relationship in the mind, a shift into awareness, and it's gone like that. Gone like that. How could that be? And it's almost like we can start wondering how could it be, instead of really noticing the gone-ness. So really notice when something is gone.

This is silly, but it was like a big insight. And sometimes you get big insights with little mundane stuff. I was eating on a retreat. Very careful mindfulness. Chewing, chewing, chewing—which we can do in a style of practice where we're really being focused. Chewing, chewing. You feel the food, you taste the taste. By the way, after two chews, the taste is gone. Did you ever notice that? Chewing, chewing, chewing, and it isn't so pleasant. So you chew in a hurry so you can take the next taste. Notice it sometime.

Chewing, chewing, feeling it, swallowing, you feel it going down. And I noticed I was feeling, "Oh, here, whatever it was I was eating is going down," feeling the sensation, the food's going down. But then I saw so clearly—it was a story in my mind: "The food is going down." That was the story. The experience was chewing, chewing, there was the mashed-up food, and then I swallowed, and what I was calling "food"—that was gone. Completely gone. There was some feeling in my esophagus, but calling it the food I was chewing was just an idea.

I know, it seems silly. But these are the stuff that insights are made of. And I just kept seeing that each moment was completely different. And my mind calling it "food," doing all this stuff, was giving this solidity to things. Just—moment—what's it now? What's the experience now? What's the experience now? Noticing the gone-ness.

Noticing how you assume permanence in any way here, as I just mentioned—with mind states, with thinking we know what's going to happen, assuming we know. And noticing how when you sit down, you don't know how your body's going to feel in the next second. Do you have one clue what your next thought is going to be? What the next feeling's going to come up in the body? What sound's going to come? What sight's going to be there? Every moment is completely new and fresh.

And seeing that isn't scary. That's where the interest is, where the aliveness is. We really land in the middle of life. It's our thinking we know that keeps us in that—when someone says they're talking about the routine, you know, you go on and on and on—because we're not awake in it. And so somehow we can want that soothing of the same, the same, the same. But really, no two minutes are ever the same. You can't eat the same brownie—the second bite's a different bite.

It's usually not quite as good as the first bite. Every moment is different.

So noticing gone-ness, noticing you never know what's going to happen, but notice when we think we know what's going to happen. And just noticing how the conditions are changing so that nothing can ever stay exactly the same.

And cause and effect—how our mental states are affected by the weather. Have you noticed that? I remember one retreat years ago in England, in Wales, and I was talking to the teacher. I can't remember what my mental state was, but obviously, it was England and Wales. It had rained like twenty-seven days out of twenty-nine. It was a month-long retreat. And it was cold. Polish scout house. It was this house with freezing rooms and one bathtub for the thirty of us. And it was in our young days. You guys have no clue. And that's nothing compared to Burma.

Anyway, I was complaining, whining obviously, about my mental state, and taking it so seriously—what's the matter with me, why am I... it must have been a negative one, right? Why am I so depressed, or why don't I have energy, or why is my head heavy? He just looks at me and goes, "It's the weather." You can't claim everything as being you, you know? It's all affected by each other, and none of it's personal. Just looking and seeing that.

So noticing this. Notice when we try to repeat a beautiful state, when we try to repeat an experience and then blame ourselves because we couldn't. Nothing's ever the same, ever the same.

As I said, why would we want to perceive this constant change? The perception of anicca, impermanence, cultivated, just noticed, and repeatedly noticed—it cuts through the habit of clinging and fear. It's what really moves our perceptions, what moves our heart beyond clinging and fear. It releases us from that.

The Buddha spoke of liberation of heart, of mind, through non-clinging. It's the non-clinging heart and mind that recognizes reality accurately that frees us from fear and confusion. And recognizing, even just for a moment, how much stuff is changing—this flow, this conditioning, everything's a verb. There can be moments of fear. Let's just have it. Fear just comes and goes as conditions too. But I find it opens us to the mystery, to the wonder of life, to the sense of there's only this moment, and we just appreciate it so much more. It's not about adding to our suffering. It really releases us, even just in a moment, to so much more appreciation and contentment, really.

Contentment, because this is all there is. Ajahn Sumedho said once, "Contentment and gratitude are very supportive states for awakening." They're also reflective of the heart and mind that's really resting at ease—as the Tibetans say, resting at ease in whatever arises. So it's resting at ease, but only for the second. Just in this, in this, in this, in this.

And it really opens us into the possibility, even for a moment, of radical trust in awareness, in the Dhamma. Life is just as it is in this moment, can't be any different, doesn't need to be any different. And the freedom of heart and mind that manifests as compassion, as love, is available only in radical trust in this moment. However this moment is doesn't matter. And out of that, really the wonder, the opening to the mystery—it's not that we can't function.

Guy Armstrong has a quotation he likes to give of a Zen master who was asked, "What is the effect of a lifetime of practice?" And his answer was, "An appropriate response." When we're not distorting our perception, when we're really opening into the wonder, into the mystery, into just the sensitivity of this moment, whatever arises can be met with appropriateness. Doing the obvious—whether it's a compassionate action, whether it's equanimity, whether it's just being present, whatever it may be, whether it's getting yourself out of the way of harm. An appropriate response.

So I will just end with a little poem from Hafiz, the Persian poet, called "Deepening the Wonder":

Death is a favor to us, but our scales have lost their balance. The impermanence of the body should give us great clarity.

Deepening the wonder in our senses and eyes of this mysterious existence we share and are surely just traveling through.

If I were in the tavern tonight, Hafiz would call for drinks, and as the master poured, I would be reminded that all I know of life and myself is that we are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

If I were in the tavern tonight, I would buy freely for everyone in this world because our marriage with the cruel beauty of time and space cannot endure very long.

Death is a favor to us, but our minds have lost their balance. The miraculous existence and impermanence of form always makes the illumined ones laugh and sing.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

We are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

CHAPTER 119

Simplicity and Honesty of Awareness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the three essential jobs of a meditator as taught by Sayadaw U Tejaniya: right view, awareness, and perseverance. She emphasizes that our task isn't to figure everything out or to feel good, but simply to maintain present-moment awareness with friendly interest. Drawing on vivid examples—from watching Yo-Yo Ma encounter unfamiliar music with complete openness, to observing Tom Brady's emotional whiplash during the Super Bowl—Wilson shows how we typically oscillate between craving pleasant experiences and fleeing unpleasant ones, never resting in simple presence.
>
> Wilson explores how deeply ingrained habits distort our perception, referencing the Buddha's teaching that the unawakened person knows no escape from unpleasant experience except chasing after sensory pleasure. This pattern becomes our default mode, operating below conscious awareness like the automatic actions of changing lanes while driving. She shares a touching story of a student who, through steady awareness of her own reactivity, transformed a difficult family visit simply by seeing her defensive patterns as they arose.
> The talk concludes with wisdom from Dīpā Mā and Ajahn Buddhadāsa, pointing toward throwing experience "back to nature" rather than claiming it as personal. Wilson invites practitioners to trust awareness itself as refuge—recognizing that while the content of experience constantly changes, the capacity for mindful presence remains available, offering freedom from the endless cycle of fixing and correcting that characterizes saṃsāra.

So what I'm thinking I'm going to be talking about tonight is the simplicity and honesty of mindfulness, of awareness. We'll see if that's what I actually talk about.

But first, I have to acknowledge these poor flowers. I keep looking at them, and I feel a real kind of identification. Sometimes we're feeling really upright, filled with the beauty and joy of practice, and sometimes we're just flopping around, but doing our best. They're trying—they're kind of trying to curve up again, not giving up. I kind of love them.

Last night, Steve mentioned in passing the first of the three jobs of the meditator, of the yogi, which is one of Sayadaw U Tejaniya's fun little lines—the first job being right view. The second and third jobs of a meditator are so simple: mindfulness, awareness is the second job—the simplicity of awareness. The third job is the perseverance, the continuity, the willingness to be steady. So simple.

Our job isn't to figure everything out. Our job isn't to explain everything. Our job isn't to have our experience move in a certain direction. Our job—you may not be happy to hear this—isn't to feel good. Or you might be happy to hear it because you probably don't feel so great, so you're doing fine. You're here with some awareness, with the intention to remember to be aware when you forget. That's our job. The rest takes care of itself.

I want to talk a minute about the simplicity of mindfulness itself. We've been saying how awareness, the sense of just recognizing what's occurring, doesn't take a lot of energy, doesn't take a lot of effort. When I gave that example the first morning about seeing—and then, oh, seeing is occurring—you can say, "Oh." It's not such a big deal. Very available. The only trick is remembering. Not stressful or exhausting. So in that way, mindfulness awareness is simple.

Another way I want to describe this quality I'm calling simplicity and honesty: in a moment of awareness, of mindful presence—I'm using different ways to describe the feeling, the sense, and these are not necessarily abhidhammically correct—but the simplicity of a moment of mindful presence is that mindfulness, or mindfulness with right view as Steve was talking about, is this quality of attention where the whole psyche in that moment is really present with just the experience that's happening, just as it is, without adding anything extra. Just simple. Without preconception, without assumption, without judging, without liking or disliking. Just kind of open for discovery. I think of it as friendly interest in whatever's arising. Sounds nice.

So your knee is killing you. Awareness would be friendly interest in the sensation. Is it burning? Is it tingling? How quickly does this simplicity of sensation move to, "Oh my God, and it's only day two"? Or how do you wake up and you're in the emergency room? I mean, you're not really in the emergency room—you're here—but you wake up from imagining you're in the emergency room.

What's actually occurring? The simplicity of mindfulness would be: oh, you notice those thoughts. The thoughts aren't the problem. When we recognize thinking is occurring, great—that's the simplicity of mindfulness again. Oh, this is thinking. But the complications from sensation, not really noticing how we get into that whole story—I'm in the emergency room, and in general, not only this moment but this whole retreat is unbearable, not only this retreat but my life, and anything I can see from this moment... You get a sense of what I'm meaning?

The simplicity, the honesty of mindfulness is just what's happening now. Just meeting each moment with this kind of freshness, aliveness—just what's happening now without preconception. It's so refreshing in the moments it happens. But we can't say,

"I'm now going to be free from preconception." It doesn't work. It's such a habit. But learning to recognize, to kind of feel, to taste what this simplicity feels like, how to bring this friendly interest, and how to notice when it's not like that, when the complications are coming in.

One way I noticed this in my own experience—I think yesterday afternoon—is how it doesn't have to be a big suffering experience or a big joyful experience. Something that seems to be staying the same, something that we assume we're familiar with—this quality of simple, honest freshness of attention often gets lost.

kind of blurred away. We think we know, so we don't really pay attention. We could say we're mindful, but it isn't really. It's a simple example of how with the familiar, we stop paying attention.

The cottage I live in down the road—when I moved into it, it had just been built, so it's over twenty years ago. I moved in, brand new, everything's brand new, the paint's brand new, the floors are really good, everything's perfect. One whole dharma talk, which isn't this one, is how quickly it stopped being perfect. The way I'm using the example here is the opposite: how I stopped noticing. I keep thinking of it—oh, this house is brand new and the paint is perfect and the floors are really good. And I'll come in and I'll see all these stains and stuff on the floor and I go, well, what's that doing there? It's so new, so fresh! Because I'm not looking. I'm not looking. I'm just assuming it's the way it's always been. And meanwhile, it's had twenty-plus years of deterioration.

Does that sound familiar to anything—like in our bodies, in our habits? You just don't look in the mirror. Hey, I'm the same as I was at twenty-five. How come this and that doesn't work?

So just bringing in this freshness, meeting something new each time. This habit of dulling out is one very common pattern of mine that distorts, that is in the way, that blocks this simplicity of mindfulness, this freshness—which is just meeting each moment as fresh, each moment as new. And that's the truth. Next moment anything can happen. Each breath is a new breath. You can never have the same breath twice. Each moment of that twinging pain in the knee is really different each time. Or the reaction in the mind is different. No two moments are ever exactly the same.

We don't have to think about the next moment. It's just this sense of complete commitment to presence with this moment's experience. That's one way I think of mindful awareness. Not "I'll be present if this moment's okay"—like sticking a toe in the water, checking whether this is an okay experience to be mindful of. No, it's just here.

Someone in a group today used an expression I loved. She was realizing she'd been kind of fighting with experience—it was unpleasant experience, that's what we usually fight with—and then recognizing, in my language, just to be there for it. Quit fighting. And in that moment of what I'm calling complete commitment to presence with this experience, the expression she used was really seeing, appreciating the richness of the moment. The richness of what's going on, which is only available to us when we're totally present. Just for one moment.

The simplicity of mindfulness, of awareness, the honesty of it—just being with things as they are, not as we think they ought to be, or should be, or were yesterday. Now, I'm not saying this is easy, and it's not that we can do it with an act of will, because the habits of our mind, our emotional habits, our personality, our psyche—Steve was mentioning it last night—they're pretty deeply ingrained. That's why they're habits, and they're comfortable. But we can learn to see those habits themselves with mindfulness.

Another example I remember when I'm thinking about this freshness, this quality of fresh interest without preconceptions: it's a documentary I saw on TV in Germany years and years ago about Yo-Yo Ma.

He's a really world-famous classical cellist, very interesting guy. So just to cut it short, he was really interested in music from all cultures all over the world.

In this documentary, he flew in a helicopter into a meeting with the head music man in a very small tribe somewhere in Africa—I didn't catch what country. He flew in a helicopter, so he was meeting this head musician of this particular tribe. The guy came out, a really old man, and he came out with his instrument, which was literally a big round oil can. He'd taken off the top and the bottom so it was a round cylinder, with a big wooden stick pole—kind of like if you were holding a cello, that would be the handle—and then with some frets and some wires coming out to make the strings. So that was his instrument, which he would play with his fingers and sing.

And Yo-Yo Ma gets out of his helicopter with his literally million-dollar cello. Maybe it's only a second-string cello, I don't know how much, but anyway, he gets out with it. He's listening to this head man play and sing, just totally present—not comparing it to how classical Bach should sound or anything, just really listening. Then he plays his cello for the guy, then the guy plays again, and then Yo-Yo Ma sings, wow! And then he tried the guy's instrument. He goes, "I can't do this nearly as well as you can do it. I just can't do it." Because he could right away get into appreciating the different background, the different culture, the different form of music, and the skill it took.

What freshness of mind and seeing does that take? Not to say, "Well, that's good as far as it goes, but listen to me play Mozart." And in fact, he said, "You take my cello, you try to play the cello. I want to try and learn how to do this better, your one." I just love it. That image has stayed with me for years and years. Whenever I'm noticing that I'm feeling really just dulled out or assuming something should be a certain way, I just think of Yo-Yo Ma. I think, "Oh yeah, that freshness, that childlike innocence, that interest free from preconception."

So what we're cultivating here, moment to moment to moment, is just remembering, recognizing, getting a feel for this, learning to trust it, seeing how it works. And in a way, this quality of interested attention—Sharon Salzberg has a line I like, which is, "To pay attention is to love." You could say that in a way. This commitment to simply be fully present in this moment, what we call richness of the moment—it's a way of loving, a way of opening completely to just what is.

Why is this so difficult, you may ask? Or maybe you already know, in which case I could stop now, but I'll remind us. The habits are so deeply ingrained. And you know how the Buddha described it, but first just to say about the habits of mind in general: it becomes, I think Steve was saying in different language, kind of a default mode. In times of stress, in times of hurry, when we're not really aware, the places that our mind, our personality, our reactions tend to go under stress—they feel more at ease, more comfortable, they don't seem to take as much mental energy.

Tara Brach, in her latest book, was writing about the default modes, the habits of our minds, of our reactions. And these response habits, she said, take less mental energy because they can operate a little bit under our conscious level. She gives the example, which I liked, of driving. Probably most of us here drive, maybe not everyone, but if you drive—when you're driving on the highway and changing lanes, that's really become so automatic that there's actually quite a lot going on, isn't there, that you're doing to change lanes at sixty miles an hour with a lot of cars around you on the freeway. But it's so habitual that for many of us we can do that almost below the level of consciousness.

All these many actions are taking place. Even deciding why, and what's the intention in the mind, and what particular sense experiences give rise to wanting to change lanes. Then checking the front and the rear and the turning and all of that. Moving the body, calibrating the speed, having your attention kind of global all around in all directions, and when to come back again. There's a heck of a lot going on in that. But we can do it. There's consciousness, but we're not necessarily aware. It can be below the surface of awareness, quite natural. It's comfortable. It's a habit of mind. And so we don't necessarily clearly recognize—this is Tara again—or understand all that's going on or what's happening in that process.

So when it's a confused or suffering habit of mind, it's that same thing. We don't quite know what's going on, and we end up in this kind of fog of bewilderment, of confusion. How come everything's so off? How come I'm suffering? How come I can't quite seem to get in alignment with experience? Or how come I'm in this place of fear again?

But mindfulness, sati, awareness of the moment to moment—and this is why the continuity, the perseverance is so important—the moment-to-moment awareness of just what's occurring actually brings these workings of the mind into awareness. As Steve was saying, this becomes the next object of awareness, and we start to see what's going on.

So just like in changing lanes on the freeway, if you're more global, you'd be becoming aware of the process rather than talking to someone else or listening to music or trying to text or all the scary things people do when they're driving. And you're just noticing the movement of the arms, you're checking the mirror, the aversion to the slow person, the wanting to shift.

You can just gently, gently be aware of that whole process. This brings it into the light, and that really gives us the space to respond in a different way—from wisdom. Before, it's just on automatic.

If you want to get to perhaps the root level, the subtle level of where and how easily we get so quickly away from the simplicity of mindful awareness in any particular moment, the Buddha starts by describing our experience. Basically, he says, all we're experiencing is rapidly rotating moments of sixth sense experiences. There's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—physical experience—and then the whole mental world, which can be thinking, emotions, mental states, ideas, all of that.

These experiences arise in different ways. One physical sensation might be pleasant, one might be unpleasant. One mental experience might be thinking, another might be happiness, another might just be simple calm. But the processes are just these six things happening over and over and over. And we often say, if you find a seventh, let us know—we'd be very interested.

As the Buddha goes on to describe the experience—and I'm really not simplifying here, but just picking out the salient points for our discussion—each of those experiences, when it comes, we're very much in the habit of experiencing it as pleasant or unpleasant or neither one. But that's quick and subtle, and it's not something inherent in the experience. Take the sound of a bell: in one moment you might experience it as pleasant, in another moment you're distracted and it's just neutral, in another moment you were quiet and it shocked you so you hear it as unpleasant. It's not intrinsic to that particular sound, but rather how it comes together in our awareness, in our consciousness at that moment. That's very quick and subtle, and it's just how things happen—no big deal.

But what we spend our life practicing is: something comes up and we think, "I don't like that." Or it comes and we think, "Yeah, that's nice, I like it." Or, "It's not really worth paying attention to, it's neutral." We don't go quite that far with everything, but on a really subtle level, we're practicing this quite a lot throughout the day, throughout our life.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya says we spend our whole life—all these sense experiences happening—practicing liking and not liking. Pleasant leads to: "It's good, I like it, I want more." Unpleasant leads to: "I don't like it, it feels bad, it hurts, of course it's bad." Neutral? "What? I better send another text message."

This becomes a habit of mind. We practice it enough, it becomes ingrained. And that overlay—pleasant goes to good, I like it—then comes to mean something about me. Unpleasant becomes bad, this shouldn't be happening, how can I fix it, how can I get rid of it? It comes to describe and define ourselves and our life. It reinforces the sense that all unpleasant experience is bad, to be avoided, while pleasant is what we're here to get more of. We pretend we don't notice this is what's happening. It sneaks up.

I'm sure many of you are aware of this. I keep being surprised how it sneaks up in the back of my mind, even when I know it isn't true—that I'll be in the struggle and go, "Oh, it was pleasant and now it's not," and I'm wondering what's wrong, as if it's going to stay one way, when nothing stays the same for longer than a moment. But we keep not noticing. It reinforces this view, and it comes to mean something about me.

How much of what you've been through today, when you've been discontent with yourself, your experience, with us, with here, the food, whatever you're dissatisfied with—how much of that comes about as a response to something that isn't the way we want it to be? Instead of saying, "Oh yeah, this isn't the way I want it to be, this is unpleasant, I don't like it"—that's actually mindfulness. That's the simplicity of awareness: "This is unpleasant, and I'm feeling aversion."

I hate this zafu. It is so hard. How come I can't have one of those? Oh yeah, what's happening now? Physical unpleasant experience, aversion in the mind, thoughts arising—you're seeing the whole pattern. That's mindfulness.

We think, no, that's not mindfulness. Mindfulness means I'm sitting here and things are arising in the space of awareness, and there's no reactivity in the mind because I'm clear, I'm mindful. "Oh yes, that's unpleasant, but it doesn't bother me." That's what we think it should look like.

This is so deeply ingrained, and it often goes unexamined. It really comes to be the underlying way we're defining ourselves and describing life. So really look and see. I'm talking from how the Buddha talks and from my own experience. Hopefully it can trigger something—look and see. Use it as something to explore in your own experience. Not to say yes or no, right or wrong, or to believe it's true and then move on. Just to look and see. Because real wisdom comes from the steady awareness that lets us see how these things are working, not from believing whether something is so or not.

What gets ingrained in us—and this is really poignant—is this habit: some discomfort, something uncomfortable comes up. It doesn't have to be excruciating pain. Look and see. It can be the littlest uncomfortable thought, or a mood. It doesn't have to be the deepest trauma we've had—it might be—but it can be just a little bit of discomfort that we don't even really notice. The Buddha says our tendency is so fast.

He says the unawakened ordinary person, when confronted with an unpleasant experience—which could be just the littlest twinge—knows of no other escape from the unpleasant than to lust after, to chase after a sensed pleasant experience, sensory pleasure. He says this then becomes a habit that underlies the mind, the heart. It becomes a habit. It's so poignant.

I've seen this in myself ten million times. It's natural. It's normal. We've practiced it a lot. Something unpleasant comes—it may be noticed, it may not. If it's not noticed, we're off to something pleasant. And if you're sitting here, you can't just get up and walk out, so we're hoping you notice. You might walk out not because it's time, but because you had a bad thought, didn't like it, and better go have some tea. You can start to notice how that works. Or if you did notice the unpleasant, the whole story arises: this is bad, this is wrong, I better go get something pleasant. Of course, we don't say it like that, because the pleasant thing is "the good thing."

And so this becomes a habit that underlies our mind, the Buddha says. I find that really touching—that an ordinary person without the practice, without the understanding of this simplicity of mindfulness and the willingness, as Charlotte Joko Beck says, to just rest for a moment in this unpleasant, uncomfortable situation. Just so simple. Can I find in myself a willingness just to rest here? Not to fix it, not to make something better, not to torment yourself either, but just to have the chance to see clearly, free from preconception, free from "this is bad, this is wrong, I can't, I'm bad." No—just what's occurring now.

This is where we learn how these habits work: by the willingness to be there and see them. This sense of thirst, this yearning for the pleasant, the better experience, to move away from the difficult, the unpleasant, the conflicted—this is really one of the ways that samsara is defined. This endless round of leaning forward to the next thing, to make it better, to make it better, to make it better. Even when it's good now.

As Steve said last night, you have the best meal of your life—but how long? How long can you keep eating? You've got to stop sometime. You eat the best meal of your life and keep going until you're really sick and never want to see that food again. It doesn't work like that. It never stays perfect. So this yearning for the next, for the next, for the next—this is really samsara. This is what keeps us in this cycle.

There's a Tibetan saying, a definition of samsara: the urge to correct.

It's pretty good now, but it could be a little bit better. Or it really stinks now, so it could definitely be better. But even when it's good, it could be a little bit better. Always leaning into the next thing. This is that unconscious, not quite aware quality—not finding the peace of total presence with this moment right now, whatever it is. That's the freedom, the peace the Buddha's talking about.

But when we think of freedom—freedom from suffering—really look and see: isn't this just freedom from unwanted experience? When you come on a retreat thinking, "I really want to purify my mind and body, I really want to cultivate compassion, I really want freedom"—all of this is true. But does your bad back figure into your image of freedom? Is sciatica still going to be there? Are you still going to have those annoying relatives acting in that way? But it won't bother you because you're floating on a cloud? Are you going to have a new personality? Good luck with that one.

It's really understanding in a different way. And the support, the key, what allows this understanding to grow is the steadiness of simplicity—mindfulness, awareness, the willingness to just rest at ease in this uncomfortable situation or in this beautiful situation, this incredibly wonderful experience. Can mindfulness just meet it as it is without that impulse of "yes, now it's going to be like this forever"?

When we're in that poignant place, the habit of mind is to jump away, to make it a little better, a little better, the next, the next, the next. What I notice this does is keep the habit of mind focused on the object itself. As Steve was exploring—object and awareness, object and awareness—when we're focused on the object, it's bad, it's wrong, I've got to fix it. And then that becomes how we define ourselves, what it means about ourselves. "This is all messed up." Or "It's wonderful—wow, I'm finally getting it, I'm doing great." But we're all focused on the object, the object. Attention, the field of awareness, becomes really quite narrow. And then we're tossed around by circumstances, by our moods, by our reactions. We get entranced by our reactions to the particular experience. So that's the next thing we can be aware of—the reactions. That's the habit. But when we're not aware, then again our experience defines us. And really, it's exhausting. I don't know if you've noticed, but it's exhausting.

An example of this—how we're so tossed around from moment to moment—and this is how I'm reading the experience of someone else. At the end of the Super Bowl this year, and we're in New England so probably quite a few of you are aware of it, which I'm not a football fan—football is not my thing. But it doesn't matter where I am; someone's always watching the Super Bowl.

I heard the last minute was really amazing. I'm not even going to try to go through the whole thing, but the last twenty seconds—and if I get some of these details wrong, football fans forgive me, that's not my point, it isn't the football. So anyway, it's the last twenty seconds. New England's quarterback, you know, Tom Brady, is sitting on the sideline because Seattle had the ball on the goal line. There's like twenty seconds left. New England was ahead, but basically Seattle—it was a sure touchdown. They're right there. They're bound to get a touchdown and they're going to win because there's no more time. So my friend Guy had recorded it, and I went back and watched this last part to see.

So that's happening. And then the camera cuts away to Tom Brady sitting on the sidelines as the other guy is about to get a touchdown. It was—I mean, it cracked me up. It was total, total dejection. He was completely, 100 percent caved over, head in his hands, just to see this man totally lost.

And then, of course, the completely unexpected happens, as it often does. For whatever reason, the Seattle quarterback did a pass instead of running, and New England intercepted it, and so New England won. They cut away to Tom Brady on the sidelines. He's ecstatic. He's jumping up and down, throwing his arms in the air. It's like twenty seconds different. Not even twenty seconds—two seconds different.

This is samsara. This is how we live our lives. You can see I was a little detached. If it was Wimbledon, I might have had a different response. But I'm detached from football, so I can kind of watch the process. So that's another way of practicing mindfulness—I'm really there, but I'm not making it all about me.

That's samsara. That's what we do. "Oh my God, it's so horrible!" "This is incredible!" And then the whole boring rest of his year, right? Until he can be in another Super Bowl. What a life. Anyway, this is how we're tossed around when there's not awareness, when we're not recognizing the process but just caught in our reactions to experience.

So here, what we really want to cultivate is a moment of that sense of mindfulness. "Oh, I'm so dejected. What's happening?" Not "Oh my God, the guys are all..."—no. Dejection feels like this. Feeling dejected. Just noticing how that feels. You'll notice the thoughts, you'll notice the whole process. So there's the moment of that awareness, the willingness to rest in this uncomfortable situation, but then the perseverance, the steadiness, where we just hang with it and kind of watch whatever arises, all the different processes. And this is what allows the wisdom to arise. We don't create wisdom, but really seeing, understanding what's going on with these habits. And if they're just habits, it doesn't have to be automatic reaction.

A good friend of mine—actually she was just here, she's left now, but she's given me permission to use this story before—from doing this style of practice for many years, where we're not trying to have a particular experience but really getting that we just bring awareness to whatever's going on in the mind and body, with particular emphasis on watching the mind, the reactions of mind. Is the mind just being with what is? Or is it putting on this overlay of "it's bad, I'm in aversion, I can't see clearly" or "it's good, it's what I want more"? Just being with it.

So the example she gave, where she saw how all her years of practicing in this way had really dramatically shown up in her daily life. She was going home to visit her family in another state, and I've known her for many years, and it's always been quite difficult—a difficult family dynamic. Probably some of you can relate. And I don't know if you've ever gone to family or whatever, where you get on the plane and you have a very sincere intention and motivation, right? "I'm really going to..." Right? Whatever it is. "I'm not going to get angry when my sister acts like that. I'm going to walk in with loving-kindness to my mother even when she starts going on about 'you need a haircut' as soon as I cross the threshold," or whatever. And we really mean it.

We're not just blowing hot air. We really mean it. And you walk in the front door and boom—right? How long does it take?

So then you feel... and she said she'd go with this sincere intention, practicing compassion all the way on the plane, she gets in, and then she'd feel defeated, dejected. "I couldn't do it. All my practice is a waste of time. Here I am, back in the old patterns."

Again, we're reacting to that unpleasant situation from aversion and judging it as wrong. And again, the simplicity of mindfulness isn't there. We've kind of checked out—it's wrong, it's bad, I blew it again, I've got to wait until I can fix it. This fixing-it mentality is samsara.

So she said this time she was going home, and on the plane as she's going, she had those same thoughts—"I want to be..." But she also was just being aware of what was actually occurring, which was a lot of anxiety. She was feeling it. She was noticing, just being present. "Yes, I want to be filled with love and kindness, but at the moment I'm a little apprehensive." That's what's happening. And she just kept cultivating that steady awareness of her mind and her reactions and what was really honestly occurring.

She said she noticed, walking in the door, it wasn't just that her sister was reactive. She herself walked in already with barriers in front of her, ready to react to the expected insult. She was actually walking in with negativity before anything had even happened—which she had never noticed before. She was trying so hard to be good. Trying so hard to do the right thing. But by actually just being aware of what was really occurring, she said it was the best visit she ever had.

Because the honesty of mindfulness lets us see what's occurring. You see your own reactivity coming up to the expected insult. You notice the reactivity, and that becomes the next object of awareness. You don't have to automatically act out of it. And because we're meeting that reactivity in our own heart and mind with this simplicity, this friendly attention—not with judging, but "Oh, reactivity, of course, it's understandable how it would be there"—in that moment, that's like stepping out of samsara. It's a stretch, but just to give a sense of it.

Instead of just spinning in reactivity and judging, or pretending I'm not reactive and just blaming them, to see the reactivity, to meet it with interested awareness—in that moment we've moved from taking refuge in our normal habits and automatic reactions to taking refuge in the simplicity of awareness right then. Not trying to fix, not trying to change, not trying to evaluate. Just: "Oh, self-negativity, or reactivity, feels like this."

And in that space of awareness, that's changing the pattern right there. That's shifting the whole dynamic. Sure, it can come back again, and we notice it again. But this awareness is really shifting our refuge, shifting our habit. It's making a whole other way of responding possible, accessible. And it's not like you plan it out. When she's at ease with recognizing her own reactivity, then when the sister does say something, she already sees it and there's a kind of space—like someone said today, "Pain in the knee, but I saw the aversion in the mind." Recognizing the aversion, there's space. We're not caught in the reactivity. The same thing happens in our life. Sister says something, and she goes, "Oh yeah, that's really unpleasant. I'm with the unpleasantness." Don't have to respond out of it.

So this is really quite profound. It may not seem like very much on a retreat when you're sitting or walking. We're so used to reacting to experience, so used to being entranced by our reactions, that our habitual way feels more easy and comfortable. That's one of the reasons we take away so many of our normal activities on retreats—so we can really watch what's happening. But it's so easy to say, "This knee pain, this sound, this fear—this defines me, this is what's going on," and fall into our normal habit.

But here, just remember the simplicity of awareness. Okay, knee pain feels like this. Anger feels like this. I have a moment of really, really wanting to go have a cup of tea—and wanting is uncomfortable. Wanting is unpleasant. And it feels totally normal and natural when we want something to go and get that thing. There's nothing wrong with having a cup of tea. You might think, "This is really sick. I want a cup of tea. I should sit here and feel wanting rather than go have a cup of tea? What kind of stuff is this?"

And I'm not saying you should. There's no should. But sometimes we might get interested. What does wanting feel like? It feels totally normal and natural to move away from wanting and get the thing we want. It feels totally normal and natural when something's uncomfortable to do something to get away from it, to fix it. We've practiced this our whole life.

And it's not that that's a bad thing, but if we bring in awareness and start to see the whole process, there are times when we'll say, you know what, let me just sit down and explore being with wanting. Can I find in myself, for this moment, a willingness to rest in this uncomfortable, painful situation? Wanting is uncomfortable. So we just rest there with that awareness, that interested friendliness, and see what happens.

And sometimes the wanting—I mean it will, if you're actually just hanging with it—it goes away. But here's the thing: steadiness, perseverance, continuity of awareness. Keep with it. The wanting has gone off and then we stop paying attention because now it's calm again. We pay attention when it's really bad, when we're really suffering, when it's really high, but then in these neutral times we think, okay, it's gone, did the job, now I'll go have tea. Notice when the wanting stops and it's just calm, just peaceful. Keep on being steady with the awareness.

When we do this, we can begin to recognize and actually cultivate an appreciation. This is actually an intimation of the quality of freedom of heart-mind the Buddha's talking about. Not whether the experience is good or bad, but just that ability to be present without so much fuss, without so much identification, without making it all about me.

Steve used the phrase last night about everything being natural, it's just nature. I mean, we are nature. I think it's funny how we talk about nature as if that's nature over there, as if we're not nature. But when we start to see—part of right view—that whatever's occurring, the wanting, the habits of mind... my friend going to visit her family, those habits that came up aren't a sign that she's some kind of bad, twisted person. They've arisen through natural causes. And we can see that. It's really helpful.

Ajahn Buddhadasa was a Thai forest monk and scholar, very famous in Thailand in the last century. He died in the late 1990s. A very interesting figure. In one of his books, Mindfulness with Breathing, he was talking about how recognizing that all arising experience is nature. All arising experience. By that he means it's not my personal doing. Everything is arising due to causes and conditions that have come before, really an endless stream, such that in this moment, this particular moment could not be otherwise. It could not be otherwise.

When Steve talked about these things as they have come to be in this moment—we can't track all the causes and conditions, but we can see some of them. And this gives us a sense that it's nature. It's not something to be in contention with. When we see the causes, it really lets us stop taking it so personally.

Buddhadasa said, "We have been thieves all of our lives by appropriating the things of nature as I and mine." He explains that the Pali texts—Pali being the language the Buddhist texts were first written down in—use a phrase that was translated into English as "throwing back." He says that in a moment when the mind, the heart is free, when we're not appropriating something as I or mine, we throw everything back to nature. We stop saying it belongs to me. And we can really see how these patterns of mind and reactivity and heart get created through a series of conditions.

Here's an example, from the body. The other day I went to a physical therapist. I was having some weird pains in my back and here and there. I mean, there's always something going on. But anyway, I went to see her, and it was unusual. First it was kind of like right view, like when Steve said the voice of another. She could just kind of look at me and goes, "Whoa, I've never seen you like this," and she started explaining what was happening in my body.

And she said, "Your rib is out and it's connected up to your collarbone, and the shoulder bone is out, and it goes all the way down to your left hip and your sacrum." She's naming all this stuff, you know—all the way down to your foot and your elbow. So, okay, I just knew it hurt. But she could see all these connections.

And then she said—nothing had happened. I hadn't fallen or done anything unusual. So we just got interested in seeing how it could happen. And I remembered that the previous week I had been in a place where I was walking about a mile back and forth from a parking lot several times a day, carrying a bag. Not particularly heavy, but carrying it and walking fast.

She noticed that. She said, "Your body already has this habit of being a bit curved in like that. So you're walking, carrying something like this. And when you're in a hurry, you kind of hunch and walk fast." Over time, that becomes an ingrained pattern in the body. And then she could link all of these things she saw to that way of moving and holding.

That's really interesting. When I could see the pattern like that and trace it, I said, okay, I can understand how that could happen. It doesn't make the pattern go away, but it kind of takes it out of the realm of "What am I doing? Am I so hopeless? Am I falling apart?" You can just go, "Oh yeah, look at that. Cause and effect. It's a natural effect." And then you can work with it.

Same with the habits in our mind. Buddhadasa says we realize, okay, here's this pattern of mind. It's not mine. It's arising due to natural causes and conditions—throw it back to nature. Quit taking it all so personally. And then that really lets us just look at it.

Like I could look at this pattern of stuff in my body she was pointing at and go, "Oh, that's interesting." And then today I was just taking a walk, and I wasn't holding anything, but I could see how the tendency was to start hunching because I was a little cold. And I just noticed it, having had it pointed out to me, without getting any "Oh my God, it's hopeless, I'm going to be like this the rest of my life." Just, "Oh yeah, look at that." And I naturally stood up a little bit straighter and could feel the difference.

Yes, it's just these simple little things. It's not "Ah, everything's changed and better." But this is what starts to feed our trust in the steadiness of awareness, the willingness to look, the trusting of being able to see with steady sati, steady mindfulness, steady awareness.

Gradually, gradually our refuge changes. It shifts from just falling into these unconscious habits of reactivity—of liking, of disliking, aversion and clinging and self-blame and owning everything as mine—to something else. And this might be a little far, but it feels like it to me: a real love of awareness. A real love of this willingness to be simply present with experience.

When I notice I'm in a pattern—spinning and confused and suffering—and I suddenly ask, "What's happening now?" I might say, as I said in a group once, "Oh, big ball of confusion. Feels like this." And I just feel a lot of... I couldn't name anything. The body feels like a bunch of gunk. The mind feels even more like a bunch of gunk. And I'm just present with that.

There's a sense almost of relief that I feel—of not being in contention in that moment with experience. And then I recognize, "Oh yeah, there's awareness of bunch of gunk." Bunch of gunk, and awareness of it. And with the awareness—that's really what we can trust. The bunch of gunk is going to go. Something incredibly beautiful is going to come. It's going to go. A lot of boring stuff is going to come. Bunch of gunk is going to come back. But awareness, awareness, awareness—this can start to be where we really take our refuge. And it really becomes powerful.

So the little examples we go through in our practice here—like the one I gave about sitting and watching wanting instead of having a cup of tea—you may think, "So what? Big whoop." But these examples matter. As I showed with my friend, when we don't recognize what's going on in our mind and heart, what the habits are, what the reactions are—when we're lost in the assumptions, in the preconceptions, in the distortions—we're not just present with what is. That state is so familiar and comfortable that we don't know when it can take over in the big things in our daily life. The unrecognized habits drive the bus.

And we don't know that that's what's happening. And in a moment of stress, in a moment of difficulty, when we're not quite aware, that's what pops up.

So these little examples here—if there's a million every day—don't think, "Well, this isn't important enough," or whatever. What we're cultivating is this willingness to keep coming back into the awareness, the awareness, the awareness, because we never know otherwise.

I heard on the radio a couple years ago—I came in the middle, so I don't know if I have names—but they were interviewing two men who had been working with young men in prisons, doing kind of anti-violence work with young men who were in prison for violent crimes. I didn't really get how they were working with them, but one of them was describing a young man he'd been talking to. The young man was in prison—I don't know if it was life or how long—for some act of violence. And he said, "If only I could have back those three to five seconds when I acted in that violent way."

We never know. That's all it can take. We're just present, we're not aware, the habits drive the bus. And we all—well, maybe you don't, but everyone I know—have plenty of times that we've acted in ways we regret. It doesn't have to be that much violence, but how much stuff has come out of my mouth that I wish I hadn't said? I don't want to have to start counting. Just in the moments when there's not awareness, the habits drive the bus.

So when we start being aware, awareness doesn't end the habits. Awareness alone is not enough. You may wonder what I mean by that. Awareness doesn't mean the difficult habits, the reactions of mind, go away. But like my friend, you start to see them rather than believing them. We don't even know they're there in the beginning. We start to see them. Then there's more space and more space. And the wisdom comes in and starts to say something like, "I don't need to say that." It really shifts the whole show.

I want to end with one thing from Dipa Ma. Dipa Ma was an amazing little lady, an Indian Bengali lady. People often talk about her. She really had very profound practice and understanding—a lot of metta, loving-kindness in her heart, very deep wisdom. She was about four feet tall, the tiniest little lady, but very energetic and strong. Metta doesn't mean everything's nice and easy. She was really strong.

Joseph and I and some friends were visiting her in Bodh Gaya the year before she died. Joseph had a very long, deep connection with her. She's saying to him, "You should sit for a weekend." And he's like, "Yeah, okay, I'll sit for a week." And she says, "No, no, I mean sit down for a weekend. Sit and don't get up." That's what she meant. She was filled with metta, but a tough cookie. And Joseph being Joseph just starts laughing. She goes, "Don't be lazy." Just so simple: don't be lazy. She could do that. She could sit down for a weekend. So she was like that.

Anyway, this is from her: "There is so much sameness in our ordinary life. We experience everything through the same set of lenses—the lenses of greed, the lenses of aversion or hatred, the lenses of delusion, confusion, identification. But when greed, hatred, and delusion are not present, you see everything fresh and new all the time. Every moment is new. Life was dull before."

Now, every day, every moment is full of taste and zest. And she was just living a life in a really poor little apartment in Calcutta. Every moment is new.

That's really the simplicity and honesty of mindfulness.

Thank you for your kind attention. Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 120

Awareness Imbued With Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates how compassion (karuṇā) is not something we create through willpower, but rather the natural manifestation of wisdom when awareness meets suffering without adding anything extra. She explains how the kilesas (mental defilements) of greed, hatred, and delusion obscure our inherently radiant mind, and how each moment of pure mindfulness—that tender, quivering presence with unwanted experience—gradually purifies these habits of heart and mind.
>
> Drawing on teachings from the Dalai Lama, Pema Chödrön, and the story of Milarepa meeting demons in his cave, Wilson explores how our habitual aversion to difficulty actually imprisons the soft heart we're trying to protect. She describes how bearing witness to our own suffering—without blame, without trying to fix or escape—develops into genuine empathy and connection with all beings. The talk references the Buddha's teaching that when the mind is "obsessed and oppressed by ill will," we cannot see clearly what is good for ourselves or others.
> Wilson offers practical guidance for retreat practice: noticing when awareness is colored by aversion versus when it rests in simple presence, taking care of attitude before trying to fix situations, and recognizing that even small moments of meeting the unwanted with tenderness shift our deepest habits. She shares the inspiring example of Mahā Ghosānanda bearing witness to Cambodian refugees, and concludes with Mingyur Rinpoche's letter from his wandering retreat, encouraging diligent practice of awareness that reveals our inherent wisdom and vast compassion.

So, we've been talking a lot about the kleshas, the difficult, distorting habits, mental factors, states of mind that arise all too frequently and are so familiar. A lot of our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice is in learning to recognize, to really meet, explore, not take personally. Really the whole practice is about purifying the habits of heart and mind, the habits of citta.

But as we've been saying all along, it's not our personal effort that does the work. All we do is put in the willingness to remember: Am I aware? Am I aware? Am I aware? And the steadiness of awareness is what allows wisdom to arise. Wisdom does the work of purifying the heart and mind, the habits.

So what I want to talk a bit about tonight is one of the wholesome habits. Just to know that in the moments of pure mindfulness awareness, when wisdom is present, in that moment, greed, hatred, confusion aren't. It seems like the mindfulness, the awareness is noticing greed—it's like two quick moments together. But in that moment of mindfulness, the greed, the aversion, delusion is not being fed, is not really present in that quick moment.

There are wholesome qualities that actually arise naturally, that you could say replace them. Or more, when Steve read that famous sutta about the mind being radiant, and the radiance being hidden, obscured by the kleshas—you could think of these wholesome, beautiful qualities as being the qualities that naturally arise in response to the appropriate circumstances when the heart-mind is pure, in a moment.

One of the things I love about the way the Buddha talks about it, and our experience of how the mind works, is that it's just moment to moment. Every moment arising and passing so quickly that—this is the impermanence part that can seem unsettling. But it's what allows for change, for cultivation, for development. Maybe you've seen it: you've had some really rotten moments, long series of rotten moments, but it does change. And when we talk about purifying or noticing the wholesome, we don't have to wait until it's absolutely steady state, never going to change, and then we maybe acknowledge something wholesome arising. Just a moment, just a moment.

So, when delusion is seen through, wisdom obviously is there. It's wisdom that sees through delusion, the quality of mind. When greed is recognized with wisdom, the beautiful quality that's present in the citta is non-greed, which can also manifest as relinquishment. Sometimes I've said renunciation, but that's simply the putting down of wanting, of needing, which can lead into the ability of the heart to be really generous, because it doesn't need to hold on.

And then dosa, the hatred-aversion quality—this is how the Buddha talks about the second aspect of the Eightfold Path: intention, wise intention, wise thought. The thoughts of greed, seen through with non-greed, replaced by relinquishment, generosity. Thoughts of the aversive are divided into two, sort of. Thoughts of ill-will—instead, the mental quality is metta, kindness, friendliness. And thoughts of cruelty, or when really the awareness is meeting a difficulty, suffering—cruelty, aversion is what comes up in the habits. But when there's clear seeing, purity of heart, mind, citta at that moment, mindfulness, awareness with wisdom, then what naturally emerges instead is compassion.

Sure, we can cultivate metta, we can cultivate compassion, absolutely. We cultivate the conditions for wisdom, which is the steadiness of awareness. We can't make wisdom occur. But what I want to talk about tonight—I want to specifically talk about compassion as the natural arising, the natural manifestation of wisdom and non-aversion in a moment of mindfulness, wisdom, when the particular object is a suffering one.

So not to think this is some far away experience, and not something we have to create. Not "I need to be a compassionate person," because we know just deciding what to do doesn't work. The angle I want to talk about tonight is really hoping to encourage us to keep on going. The practice we're doing of moment to moment remembering awareness—the awareness that, as we've said a lot, that simplicity of connectedness, just totally surrendering into the moment without adding extra, without pulling away, without aversion or judgment or clinging.

That quality of awareness, when it is aware of a suffering experience, takes on the flavoring of compassion. Karuna. It's not an act of will.

How the habits of our heart and mind are purified—this is the point I'm wanting to make—is exactly through this practice. And so you may realize, since I want to mainly talk about compassion, it means I'm also going to be talking about difficult, suffering experience. Anybody had any of those since they came? Right.

Because as I think we said this morning, really appreciate the amount of commitment and at times, I think for all of us, quite some courage to keep showing up here. To keep showing up—not even the external showing up, but with your own heart, your own mind, the habits of your mind, the things that arise here. For everyone, there are times that it's enormously difficult, painful, scary, whatever your particular flavor is.

And the habits of our mind, of the world, of our life are so much telling us this is wrong, get out of here. Go in the opposite direction, fix it, fix it, fix it. Really aversion. So much the habit.

And so every moment—just the quick moment—that there's that sense of simple awareness... You know, we're waiting for the huge momentum that sees through it all, but just that moment of awareness that's willing to meet fear. No big thing happens, but that quick moment where the aversion isn't the go-to response, where we call in the awareness instead—that's a little moment of purifying the habit, of shifting the habit.

So I just want to talk different ways about compassion in terms of our practice here. Ways to notice it. Why it isn't always our habitual response—it is natural, but not always habitual. Just in hopes of encouraging us all to consciously recognize this wholesome factor, because it's so amazing, really, how it works.

When wisdom recognizes the suffering aspects—greed, hatred, confusion—when it's just recognized by wisdom, that doesn't necessarily mean it goes away immediately. But wisdom just naturally doesn't feed the unwholesome. It's not an act of will. So when you really see something is causing you suffering—wisdom sees it, not just "I think I should stop," but wisdom sees it—let me just put that down. A few people have mentioned examples of that in their experience, just little things. That's the natural effect of wisdom: we recognize that greed and aversion don't work, basically, for what we think they're doing—to see reality as it is.

The other side is that when wisdom, when the purified mind-heart in a moment recognizes beautiful qualities—compassion, wisdom, metta, generosity—the attention of wise awareness actually feeds and strengthens the wholesome. Again, it's not an act of will. It's not like an act of greed: "Oh, this feels good, let's have more of it." That's not strengthening the wholesome. But just the awareness of generosity, the happiness it brings—it inclines the mind, the heart towards more generosity.

Being with a suffering, difficult experience with compassion, recognizing that compassion is a beautiful state of mind-heart, inclines the mind towards another arising of a moment of compassion. It's so cool. We don't have to do this as an act of will. We can't. But this is where, for me, so much trust comes in—really trusting the nature of how the mind and heart works. And it gives me the faith, the willingness to show up again when it's like not really where I think I want to be in that particular moment.

To define compassion: one of the definitions of karuna is the quivering of the heart when connected with pain or suffering. The tenderness. The tender quivering, the connectedness of heart and mind when we are connected with suffering. That's just the mental quality of it, the mental factor. When it strengthens into action, it manifests as the wish to alleviate the suffering of whatever beings we're in touch with.

And the vastest aspiration of compassionate practice would be the aspiration to practice our whole life, to awaken with the intention of using our practice in order to help alleviate the suffering of all beings. That's vast and beautiful and inspiring to me. But tonight I really want to talk in terms of our practice here, by and large.

The Dalai Lama, who's kind of the world expert on compassion—if we were going to look for one of the world experts anyway—when asked how compassion develops in our experience, he said it develops from deep insight into what suffering actually is. And guess how we get that deep insight into what suffering actually is? Yes, by being really present, by focusing, by opening to the suffering, the difficulty in our own experience. Where else are we going to start?

In our own experience. As Alexis spoke about the first noble truth last night, it's really the sense that unreliability is one part. Another part is that all living beings at times suffer. Not all the time, every moment, but it's something that unites us as living beings, rather than something to be a cause of shame or alienation or feeling like it's a mistake—which I know is often the way I feel. Something's gone really wrong, we want to go hide until it's better, we don't want people to know. But actually it can be a source of recognizing our unity, our commonality.

The Dalai Lama goes on to describe that by opening to, focusing on our own experience of suffering—and obviously he doesn't say it explicitly, but it's with mindful awareness, not with aversion; we could focus with aversion, but we're clearly talking about the mind that's pure in that moment, that just recognizes it—he says it deepens, it strengthens into a sense of empathy, connectedness with other beings.

So beginning with this simple moment of being fully present, without agenda, without aversion or clinging, with a moment of our own suffering, in whatever way—big, little, doesn't matter.

Moment after moment, by itself, it starts to strengthen into empathic connection with beings. It's sort of like my particular suffering in that moment becomes an expression of the suffering of all beings. We can think our way into it, but I'm talking just in terms of our awareness here. This really can happen. It often does happen.

I remember many years ago I was in a hospital. I was in a room with three other women, and I was there for some days. One day, when I wasn't particularly feeling sorry for myself, I found myself looking around and saying, "Oh wow, look what I'm going through. There are these three women going through their own suffering. How many people are in this hospital? How many hospitals are in this town?" It was Northampton, not such a big town, but there are four or five hospitals around. And then just keep spreading out, spreading out. How many human beings at this moment are suffering some kind of real pain, illness? It's vast. Our mind can't comprehend it. But that sense of strengthening from "oh, poor me" to just "wow, this is the human condition"—that's a quality of compassion, of unity. It takes us out of our isolation, out of our self-involvement.

This is really why the difficult times on retreat are so important. I always think later, looking back, "Yeah, I learned a lot. It was so important." But in the midst of it, are you going, "Yeah, I'm so glad this is happening. I really know this is the important part, this is really the nub of the retreat. I'm so glad that I'm really lost in this total frustration for days"? But this is really where the rubber meets the road, you could say—of our practice, of awareness. I'm not saying we should feel glad, but this is where we can really start to explore.

Because what's purifying, what's arising in our present moment experience, is how things have come to be in this moment as this moment's particular culmination of all the different conditions that have come together. There's no way we can know what all the conditions are that brought this moment into being. I love when I start thinking about this—don't start thinking about it, because there's nowhere to stop. If you start, it's like Thich Nhat Hanh holding up the piece of paper and saying, "What's in this paper?" and you can't stop anywhere. You start with trees and the water and the sunlight and the people that grew it and the earthworms that till the soil, and it goes on forever. Anything is like that. If you start thinking of the conditions that brought you to this moment, there's nowhere to stop. We're back at the Big Bang. There's really no way to know what is part of this particular condition.

So that's just arising. You could say that's our past condition, that's our past karma. To sit here and go, "I'm so bad because this is happening. I'm a failure because this is happening. I can't meditate, I'll never understand the pure mind because this is happening"—that's the habit of aversion, turned inward, turned outward. That's our usual go-to mode.

But what's really purifying the heart and mind isn't that that stuff shouldn't be arising—that's out of our control. It's out of our control. But the way in that moment that awareness and wisdom is receiving that moment—that's where, in that moment, the heart-mind, the quality of the citta, is being purified or not. That's the place where the whole practice of purification of the habits of heart and mind is occurring.

So you may not think it's much. You're frustrated. "Okay, frustration is like this." And there's a moment of just being with it. You think, "But nothing happened. It's still frustrating." Okay, that moment wasn't a moment of purifying the heart. That was an aversive moment. But the one before—"Oh yeah, frustration is like this"—that is shifting the habit of aversion of heart-mind.

So that is just so important to start to recognize and continue to recognize. I find that—not that you're expecting some big bang—but just to understand how this works. How do you recognize it? Nowhere else to go. Mindfulness, awareness of the next moment. How we pay attention, how the mind meets each moment, is important. This is the process of purifying the heart and mind. All the different practices, not just this one, are all working on that level.

As I was saying, the habit is so deeply ingrained in most of us when confronted with difficult experience. I like how Pema Chödrön describes it. She says, rather than talking about suffering or difficult or painful, why not substitute the words "unwanted experience"? I like that because it really describes the experience. The experience is: I don't want this to be happening. Or really, I want it to be happening, but to someone else, not here. I'd like to read about it and feel compassion for that poor person, but I really don't want it happening here right now. I like that because it takes it right down to what's actually happening.

It's so reflexive when something painful, difficult, unwanted comes up—there's just the cringe back, the pull away. That's the aversion. That's just the habit. Let's get out of here. Let's protect ourselves from it. And the fear can come. She says many people, when she's talking about compassion for all beings, tell her, "I have so much suffering of my own, I can't even be with my own suffering. How can I open to the suffering of the world? It's too much to even think about."

So we're not saying that as a thought, what one should do. What we can do here on retreat with our awareness is really explore both the reflexive action of the aversion—the anger, the pulling away when that's occurring. When there's that klesha, that distortion in the awareness, we notice it. Just what we've been saying: notice the attitude in the mind when confronted with unwanted experience. Notice when that reaction is present, but notice when it's not present. That compassionate response of simply being able to be present with the unwanted without adding anything extra.

Pema Chödrön again—she talks about how really at core we have this tender heart, this real tenderness. That's the quivering of the heart when connected with the unwanted, with difficulty. But our training and our fear and the difficulty of it is such that we are going around as if we're trying to protect ourselves from feeling. It's scary. She uses the image of a sea anemone, an animal in the sea that has long tendrils and a very soft core, and if anything even gets near to touch it, it shuts down to protect the very soft heart. She says we're kind of like that. But we're using aversion to protect. And the very act of protection is what's increasing our confusion, our distortion, our separation.

She writes: "Kinship with the suffering of others—the inability to continue to regard it from afar—is the discovery of our soft spot." She calls it the discovery of bodhicitta. This bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, awakens when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. But when we protect ourselves so that we don't feel that pain, that protection becomes like armor that imprisons the softness of our heart. We do everything we can think of not to feel anything threatening. Does that sound familiar? We try to prolong feeling good about ourselves. But then we end up, she says—I love this image—spending our life all tensed up as if we were sitting in a dentist's chair our whole life. I can really relate to that.

But this is the habit. And this is the belief: no, this should not be happening. That's the misunderstanding of the First Noble Truth. I think someone was saying in a group today—I never know where I heard it. Did Alexis say it last night? Did someone say it in a group? Did I say it yesterday? I don't know where stuff comes from anymore. But these habits are really reinforced because that's really what's in the society around us. I find from the media in particular, when they're interviewing on the radio somebody who's just experienced something terrible—first they go up and shove a mic in their face, which is already strange, but it could be a personal tragedy or a disease or an earthquake—a really common question, I hear it so much, is: "Well, who do you blame for this?" Who do you blame?

Who do you blame? As if of course there's someone to blame. This bad thing happened, and the first thing we better do is figure out who to blame. And a lot of the time when we're sitting here, there's no one to blame but ourselves, so we turn that inward. It's really easy to say, "This is happening and it shouldn't be happening. So what am I doing wrong in my practice?" Has that occurred to anybody, ever, when something was going on? Rather than simply, "Oh, this is difficult. It feels like this right now." Opening with a tenderness, a tender quality of mindfulness and awareness. But no, it's like, "Who do we blame? This is wrong, it shouldn't be happening." Immediately aversion comes in.

The Buddha, talking to some followers, says: "When one dwells, when one lives with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will"—and just so you know, he goes on to say the same thing about greed or lust and about delusion and confusion—but here we're talking about ill will. "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, one does not understand as it really is the escape from the arisen ill will. On that occasion, one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

So explore that. Next time you notice some unwanted experience is occurring—thoughts, emotions, a sound, someone else's behavior, your body doesn't feel good, whatever it is—if you see that awareness is recognizing that immediate knee-jerk reaction of "this shouldn't be happening, what can I do to fix it?"—just notice the quality when the mind is obsessed and oppressed by ill will. There's no way to see clearly.

Whatever we try to do to fix it, coming out of that ill will, just isn't coming from any kind of clarity. We can't see clearly what's good for ourselves, what's good for another, what's the good of both.

This is something that our steady awareness allows us to see. That's why continuity is so powerful. This tendency to think "this shouldn't be happening," to blame outward, blame inward—somehow we're going to be able to fix it. And "fix it" means, as in Joko Beck's words, somehow I can hold myself separate from this painful and difficult experience. Somehow I'm here and this is going to go over there. This is the way I think about it: it's one of the basic expressions of the delusion of understanding reality in ourselves that comes when the mind is obsessed with ill will, or with greed, or with confusion.

It creates this sense of separation. A beautiful experience we can't have, a difficult one we are with, confusion we don't know what to do with—this sense of the other, of me and the other. And if it's difficult, we think we can keep ourselves separate from the other. If it's wonderful and we don't have it, then it feeds this sense of insufficiency. Something else needing to be gotten. Something else is going to make me complete. Or this has to go away for completion, for ease.

This delusion of separation and inadequacy and insufficiency continues to be fed as long as the mind is obsessed with the kilesas, because it can't see accurately. That's why it's so important to take care of our awareness rather than getting involved right away and trying to fix things. Because we're trying to fix it through the lens of ill will, of blame, of not understanding, and that just keeps the whole thing going. It keeps us looking, as Krishnamurti said—to seek the truth is to deny it. Where else are we going to find it? As Dogen Zenji, the great Zen master from Japan, said, "If you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?" It's only right where we are.

And at least thirty-three percent of the time, right where we are might be an unwanted experience. And if we're wanting it to go away in order to see the truth, right in that moment, delusion is being fed and increased. That's denying, not allowing, the simplicity of awareness and wisdom to simply recognize: this is what there is. This is reality. This moment is complete. There is no other moment.

So in a way, when I was talking the other night about the poignancy of thinking the only escape from arisen unpleasantness or ill will is to seek after pleasure—this is really the deep poignancy. It's what keeps our confusion spinning, our sense of incompleteness, inadequacy, loneliness, self-centeredness spinning.

The quality of awareness and wisdom that is simply present with openness, that tender heart in whatever unwanted experience—that's not only the arisen compassion, that's the wisdom, that's the freedom, just in that moment. But it's not necessarily the training of the habit of our mind, the way we naturally want to go.

So again, in our retreat here—a little microcosm of our life. The incidents that occur here may be rather small, although the reactions that come up in our mind may be rather large. Have you noticed that? It's just that they ran out of bananas! Why am I so distressed? Why are you having to forcibly hold your hand from snatching the banana off that other person's plate? It seems a little exaggerated. It is. That's okay. It helps us see it better.

Sayadaw Tejaniya has a line I really like. He says, "Concentration magnifies." When the mind's beginning to get a little more collected, it magnifies—we see things more clearly. But the kilesas exaggerate. So you might be really calm, really present, just walking to the meal, really present, and suddenly some desire comes up that we don't quite see. People have said suddenly they've turned around and they're halfway to whatever it is they're going to do without even noticing it. Desire gets huge because the kilesa exaggerates the importance of everything, and concentration magnifies that.

We call this, actually, in our parlance, "yogi mind." All of a sudden, something comes up that you need or that you hate or that has to be fixed, and it is life or death. We get these notes—you know, we're bursting into the office, but it's not office hours yet. You're standing there waiting till office hours so you can burst in and say, "Don't you know the kind of toothpaste you have in there is really not the best kind to have?" I'm not making up this stuff. This is the kind of thing that happens. You should see what goes on in a three-month retreat here. Just so you know, we're all in this together.

When you find you need to write a note to maintenance or the cooks or us—and it has this urgent quality of "my God, don't they know, for the benefit of all beings, let me write this note"—take a moment. Reflect a little bit. Just take care of the quality of awareness before you do that. That's for the good of all beings, especially us.

But anyway, that's just a little example—that was a sidetrack. In terms of our practice here, in terms of recognizing the difference between the kind of knee-jerk reaction of shutting down, protecting the soft heart through fear, aversion, and blame, and simply resting at ease in whatever arises—which manifests as compassion—the circumstances here are all we need. This is where we start. It's like a whole book: Pema Chödrön's Start Where You Are. We start where we are. Each little or big thing that arises that's unwanted is, in this moment, the place of practice. And it's all that we need. The circumstances of our life are all we need.

I want to read this little story from Milarepa. He was the great Tibetan yogi, the most famous Tibetan yogi, from centuries ago. It's said that he lived up in caves for years and years. He's really considered one of the most awakened beings to come out of Tibet, and he wrote many, many songs from his practice. I'm just reading little hints of this one, but it speaks to this in a kind of mythical way.

So he's been up in his cave for who knows how long—years. He was out, and his mind became blissful, and he was carrying some wood back up to his cave. This is when you're having a good day. His mind's blissful, you're carrying wood up to the cave, everything's copacetic, the practice is going well. When he arrived there, he found in the cave seven metal demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Okay, that's weird. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some were grinding tsampa to eat, some sat performing various magical tricks.

What I get out of that is they've moved in. They've made themselves at home, these demons doing all different things. As soon as Mila saw them, he became frightened.

And this is our normal response. So he meditated on his deity. He uttered a subjugating mantra—you guys go away. He performed a gaze to scare them off. He aroused his deity's presence. We're doing all the things we can do to make those demons go away, right? Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness. That's the list. But he was still unable to pacify them.

Because that's how he thought—well, these must be local deities. I've been here for a long time, months and years, but I have not praised them. So then he sang a song of praise to these beings. But you can tell it's kind of half-hearted—he did all the negative stuff first. So he ends it: "You non-human demons assembled here are obstacles. Drink this cup of friendliness and compassion and be gone."

Does that sound familiar? We're trying. We start where we are. But we bring awareness to this whole process as we're doing it, so we see what we're doing. This is wrong, this is wrong, drink this compassion and get the heck out.

So three of the demons who were performing magic did go away. But Mila was unable to make the other four go away. Realizing that they were magical obstacles, he sang a song of confidence—really of faith in his practice. He's moved from subjugating gaze to faith in his practice, and the song ends: "It is wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time, we should converse."

Three of them did vanish like a rainbow. The remaining one, though, performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, this one is very powerful. So he sang his song of the view, the pinnacle of his realization, which is long. I'll just share the ending: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. If you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk out our differences. I feel compassion for this spirit." Then he prayed to his deity: "Grant your blessings so that this lowly one may have complete compassion."

Thus Mila sang. And with friendliness and compassion and without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and so vanished like a rainbow from the Red Rock Agate Mansion.

You get a sense, don't you? With great compassion, we just open into the tender heart of this is what's occurring now. It doesn't necessarily mean that in that moment the demon vanishes like a rainbow, but the fear, the adversity, the sense of something wrong —that does vanish like a rainbow in that moment.

So we start where we are. Whatever's occurring—beautiful, great, difficult, unwanted—this is where the steadiness of awareness, allowing wisdom, purifies our heart and mind. And that's an idea, but it can be experienced. Because the difference between the blame and the unwanted and the adversity and the fear, and that tender heart just being present with what is—when we can't control, when we can't fix, before any of that—it's a beautiful, really nourishing state of heart and mind.

When we really are experiencing that openness to what is, there's no way we can confuse it with fear or disappointment or pity or blame. It's really obviously a beautiful state. Beautiful because there's no longer in that moment the sense of something else needing to be for us to be complete, to be true, to be at peace. Just what there is. Nothing in excess and nothing lacking.

So we start where we are. How do we meet our demons here on this retreat? It's not always possible to do something about them either.

He says metta—and I want to say compassion too—does not necessarily mean loving the difficult person or situation. Because sometimes when we have an idea in our mind, "I should feel metta, I should love this person," we wonder, "How can I love them? They're doing this horrible thing." And we're all caught up in thinking about it.

But he says—and see if you recognize what this sounds like—one is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, thing, person, or in oneself without creating anything around it. That's what I consider to be metta. To me, that's like a perfect description of mindfulness, wisdom, or compassion. Witnessing, really present with the unpleasantness in a person, thing, situation, or oneself, without creating anything around it. Simplicity of total presence without pulling back.

This sense of bearing witness, starting with our own suffering, can then expand out to the world. But this is where we really start. And whatever is occurring in your experience is a perfect place to begin, to continue.

Sometimes sitting here, worries may arise about some experience at home. There's nothing you can do about it now. Just meeting that. Or times of being ill, having something going wrong with the body. If you've had experiences of chronic illness or serious illness, you know sometimes there are things you can do, but a lot of the time it's really a very rich field for exploring this quality of being present with the simplicity, just what is, without adding anything extra. And sometimes there's something to do, which we can see more clearly when the mind is not obsessed and oppressed by ill will, by fear. Sometimes bearing witness is all we can do. But that is a really powerful expression of compassion.

I've always liked to read about different people and different literature and periods of time in history. And a lot of poets and writers and artists who lived through really difficult, horrific times—part of what they do, I think, in their art, in their writing, is in a way bearing witness to something that's really incomprehensible or too awful to be with. But the power of just staying with, being present, bearing witness, telling it, is an enormous power for compassion in the world.

Maha Ghosananda—do most of you know who Maha Ghosananda was? He died a few years ago, not that long ago. He was a Cambodian monk who during the time of the Killing Fields of the Khmer Rouge happened to be out of Cambodia for many years, studying in Thailand, studying Buddhism. Millions were killed in the genocide in Cambodia. It was largely a Buddhist country, and basically Buddhism was wiped out. All of his family members were killed as well. And millions of Cambodians were living in refugee camps over the border in Thailand.

After it was so-called over—the war ended and a new government came in—he went to the refugee camps. And then he led what are called Dhamma Yatras, Dharma pilgrimages. He led lay people and monks and nuns back through Cambodia, which at this time was so-called at peace, but the landscape was littered with landmines from the war. There was still a lot of fighting.

He would go to the refugee camps, and instead of stirring up anger or saying, "This is so horrible," he would simply go to the people who had lost everything, who were in total trauma and shock, and start reading the Metta Sutta. He would go in and read from the Dhammapada: "Hatred is never ended by hatred. Hatred is only ended by love." It takes such a knowing to go into such a situation and say that, to really teach it. But because it's the truth, it would inspire. And people were coming from a Buddhist background.

In terms of bearing witness, he led many of these Dhamma Yatras through the mined land of Cambodia. Even soldiers with guns would stop, put down their weapons, and come to offer flowers or bow. The poor people still living there, who hadn't seen a monk or any kind of peaceful witnessing to what had been going on in so many years—it was really, really powerful, that kind of witnessing. He couldn't change it, he couldn't fix it, he couldn't take away people's pain, but he could just show up and be a witness to that. A really powerful kind of compassion.

We start by bearing witness to our own unwanted experience.

Maha Ghosananda said—I think it was at a big demonstration in Washington, D.C. during that period when people were trying to end the use of landmines in the world—he said, and he knew from landmines: "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts." To understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to begin to remove them in the world.

Really, we can only start where we are.

I've noticed in my own experience that in times when I feel the most alienated, disconnected, caught up, confused—not just something unwanted happening, but not even knowing what's happening, just disconnected, separate, lonely—I've been noticing this for years now, but I still keep having to find my way back to that balanced awareness.

when I get present again, I see that that alienation, that confusion, that loneliness is—I want to say always, though it's tricky to say always—but I can't think of a time so far when it wasn't the case that there's something going on, something unwanted, painful, that I've gotten caught into the habit of wanting to deny, avoid, repress, not feel, not be with.

It could be some painful experience in my own body or mind—my own habits, or a physical problem that I hadn't looked at for a while and it's back. And you go, "No, this isn't back. No, this isn't what's happening." But it could also be the pain of a family member who's suffering a lot, and there's actually no way I can fix it. And seeing how the mind, the habit of holding oneself separate, then thinks, "Well, I can't fix it and it's too painful to keep showing up for, so let's check out." Even in a subtle way. You see this over and over.

So-called internal, so-called external—but in this moment, some kind of confusion, some kind of suffering, some kind of difficulty, sadness, that I can't do something about. That not quite recognizing, not quite landing in the middle with a tender heart and bearing witness when that's not possible or I haven't recognized—that sense of separation, confusion just grows and grows. It's so unsatisfying. And it's so self-perpetuating.

And then that opening to the tender heart happens. Oh yeah. Yeah, she's really having one of her hard times again. And I can't say or do anything that helps, and yet still I can be present and listen. It's so painful. Can I be with this right now? And in that landing in it, just for that moment, there's a sense of ease, of relief, of wholeness, you could say. The next moment the aversion might pop up again. But this is, you know, we start where we are. It's what we can do.

It can be extraordinarily difficult, for sure. Even just as we see, bearing witness to our own suffering—never mind when it starts to expand in the world. As I said before, in Planting Seeds, it asks: How? People say, my own suffering is too much. How do we keep our hearts open, or keep coming back to that tender heart, when confronted with so much suffering? I'm not here to answer it. I'm here to say we start where we are. But it's the same dynamic of heart and mind. Practice bearing witness with mindfulness, awareness, wisdom, with whatever unwanted situation is coming up here. Not just to make it better, but because this is really the path of purification, the path of freedom, the path of understanding the nature of heart and mind.

I did read somewhere—again, I don't know where, I don't have the reference—about the Dalai Lama, who, as you know, is so famous now that probably most, if not all, of you have seen him in various places. He's so joyful, so childlike. He jokes, he laughs, he's really so present with each person. And someone was asking him, "How can you do that?" Because he also, being the spiritual leader of the Tibetan people, meets with every person who escapes from Tibet—whether it's a monk or a nun or a lay person—they make their way to Dharamsala to talk to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and they tell him their whole story. So how many millions of stories of loss and death and imprisonment and torture has he heard? And he's so present. He's so present with each person. If someone's reciting their story, he's really there with it, crying with them, feeling with them. One hundred percent present.

And then they ask, "How are you not continually overwhelmed?" But they watch him, and he's really there. That conversation ends, the person's gone, and he's really with the next person. And he could be laughing like a child with the next person. How can you do that?

And he's saying it's because when he's with that person, he's totally present, without the resistance, without the aversion, without adding anything around it. And so it's totally that moment, and when it's gone, it's totally the next moment. It kind of passes through. There's not the residue, not the clinging of fear, of me, of aversion. This is what it is. So fully present, without adding anything around it, the next moment could be a moment of total joy.

Okay, a lot of our experience isn't going to be quite like that.

Just watch it. Back to how Sayadaw U Tejaniya describes it—when we realize we're meeting an unwanted experience, we start to feel that rub. Maybe we don't quite recognize the aversion, but we start to feel that friction. We think, "I'm just bearing witness, I'm bearing witness, yes, I'm bearing witness." And we start to see that something is going on.

Or sometimes we know something's going on because it's so strong we're drowning in it. And that happens sometimes. The fear, the pain, the aggravation, the sorrow—whatever it is—just comes so strong that even though we're aware, even though we can name it, even though we know what's happening, the more awareness tries to meet it, we're just drowning. It's simply too much.

And so that's when, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, we need to really recognize that the aversion is taking over the mind state, and we really need to take care of the awareness. Shift the attention to a neutral object, or a beautiful object.

Thich Nhat Hanh used to talk about this during the time of the Vietnam War. Before he was exiled and couldn't return to Vietnam, he worked a lot with students—college-age students who were doing social service work during the war. They were seeing horrible, horrible things. And he said, "I tell them, there's so much suffering and pain and sorrow that they're witnessing, so much violence. But I tell them: just be sure to notice something beautiful, something pleasant, even if it's little." Notice the smell of the herbs in the field at night. Someone was saying today, "Oh, there's so many robins around." You don't have to get into a whole big story, but just take in that moment—the robin, just a moment of ease. Or feel your breath, or open to hearing.

As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, it's very important to adjust your attitude first, to take care of your awareness and how you're looking at the situation, before you start trying to adjust the environment. Because otherwise we're trying to fix things, but just out of aversion. We can be practicing trying to fix, but with that cloak of aversion coloring everything.

Shabkar was another Tibetan practitioner, much like Milarepa, but he lived in the 1800s. He said, "Meditating without compassion is simply inflicting hardship on yourself." So when the unwanted comes up, just think about that a moment. We're not here to inflict hardship on ourselves. There's enough hardship in life. But we don't have to create compassion. We can just take refuge in that simplicity of awareness without creating anything extra to meet the unwanted.

But we do have to meet the unwanted. We can't skip this part and move directly to total wisdom and compassion for all beings in the world. We can't skip this part.

So really, if we can appreciate the power of it—once we can take care of our own awareness, once we can adjust our own attitude—that's when we really can move into compassionate action in the world. I've been talking about this in terms of practice and looking inward, not so much about acting. But I do want to make a point. When we've taken care of our awareness, when we're able to be present and bear witness with our own unwanted experience, then unwanted external experience, painful and difficult experience, becomes something we can meet. We experience it while remaining present. We're able to be there, we're able to see what can be useful and act not from aversion, but from a clearer seeing of our choices.

Martin Luther King, talking about nonviolence, said, "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate them."

So we're starting in the reverse way. We're starting by not hating the suffering we're experiencing, the unwanted experience in our own lives. When we don't hate that, when we're cultivating nonviolent awareness, then when the hateful is external, we have the grounding to be with that experience and meet it from wisdom and compassion. At least we have the grounding from which to start.

There was so much else, but I'll stop here. I just want to end with this, from Mingyur Rinpoche. He's another wandering Tibetan practitioner—living in caves right now. Right now. He wandered off two years ago on a three-year retreat. He's Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche's younger brother. He went to Bodh Gaya. But then he just vanished in the night. He didn't take his passport. He didn't take any money. He didn't even take a toothbrush.

He went off. Just like Milarepa, you know. It's really quite remarkable.

So a couple of years into his wandering, he ran into one of his very devoted disciples who had been with him for a while and then left. I just want to read a little bit from the letter he sent out with this disciple. He has truly been wandering around in Nepal and Tibet with nothing. Just practicing.

He said:

I have experienced feelings of happiness and suffering, rising and falling like waves on the surface of the ocean. At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I have felt cold, hungry, and thirsty. Even when I have begged for alms, I receive nothing but insults and harsh words. At other times I have received food and clothing effortlessly, without even asking for them, and in my mind it felt as though I were enjoying the pleasures of the gods.

While I have experienced both happiness and suffering, the most important thing is that a deep and heartfelt sense of certainty has arisen in the depths of my being—such that no matter what happens, I know that the true nature of these experiences, their very essence, is that of timeless awareness and vast compassion.

While all beings have great wisdom and compassion, this is not always apparent. And this is simply because they have not recognized what they already have.

So from my heart, I sincerely encourage all of you to practice diligently as well. Practice awareness.

So thank you for your patient attention. Let us practice awareness diligently.

CHAPTER 121

Purifying Our Minds/Hearts in All Aspects of Practice

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson shares a crystallizing insight that has transformed her understanding of the path: all Buddhist practices, from generosity to ethical conduct to meditation, are different angles of the same essential work—purifying and transforming the habits of our mind. Drawing on the third noble truth's definition of the cessation of dukkha as the remainderless cessation of craving, she emphasizes that freedom isn't a distant goal but something discoverable moment to moment.

Wilson explores the teaching from the Aṅguttara Nikāya that the mind is naturally radiant, only temporarily obscured by visiting defilements (kilesas). She draws on Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching that 'Nibbāna means cool'—the natural state of mind when greed, hatred, and delusion aren't burning. Rather than waiting for complete enlightenment, practitioners can recognize these ordinary moments of 'coolness' throughout daily life, whether drinking tea or observing nature, understanding that purity lies in the quality of mind, not in special objects or circumstances.

The talk offers practical guidance on recognizing wholesome states rather than only focusing on eliminating unwholesome ones, and includes the Buddha's teaching to the layman Mahānāma on recollecting one's own generosity and virtue as active practices that purify the heart. Wilson encourages practitioners to maintain aspiration without harsh self-judgment, quoting the Buddha: 'If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so.'

I know what I'm about to say may be quite obvious to all of you, but somehow in the last few years it has become crystal clear to me. It gave me a whole picture of the path in a different way.

What we've been cultivating here is really bringing awareness to the habits of our mind and purifying and transforming those habits. It's become clear to me that all the different practices, all the different parts of the path that the Buddha taught—all of them are coming from different angles of purifying and transforming the habits of our mind.

Somehow that just makes it accessible. Simple—not easy, but simple. Straightforward. It becomes a thread that unites all of the different forms of practice, instead of having to set one against the other, or thinking this is the inferior practice and eventually you get to the superior one. They're all coming from different angles of purifying these habits of our mind. I want to talk in a broad way about that tonight.

The definition the Buddha gives of the third noble truth, the cessation of suffering, is this: the cessation of dukkha is the remainderless cessation and relinquishment of craving—craving being the cause of suffering, of dukkha, in the second noble truth. For craving you can read the three kilesa: greed, hatred, delusion. The remainderless cessation. Fading away.

In that way, freedom from suffering is defined as the purified heart-mind, or as is often spoken of, the supreme state of sublime peace discovered by the Tathagata—namely, liberation of mind through non-clinging. This is what we can explore the whole way along in our practice. It's something really tangible, workable, discoverable on a moment-to-moment basis. That's what's so far out about the way things work.

I really find it quite helpful and energizing in practice when I recognize the fact that everything's changing on a moment-to-moment basis, especially in terms of looking at our mind, our heart. As Andrew Olendzki describes it—the Pali scholar and friend—he says that in Buddhism, the mind is not a subject that has objects as content. It's not a thing, but rather the activity or process of cognizing, a flow of events. When we talk about "the mind," we think of something there with things happening in it. But it's really just this process of cognition. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says the way you recognize the mind is simply by the activity, not by turning around and seeing something.

So it's changing every moment. We've recognized this, right? This is the only thing that makes cultivation and transforming the habits possible. But it's also what makes it so that we can be lost in a moment and really quite awake in another moment. It's not that we have to wait until we get to the total, ultimate, complete, remainderless, never-again-going-to-arise moment of greed, delusion, or aversion in the mind. You don't have to wait for that. That's good news.

To me, that's what makes practice not overwhelmingly discouraging. I'm serious. Because if we think in terms of having to uproot all the kilesa—every time they come we've got to get out that shovel and dig them up, and until they're all gone we're just going to be mucking around in this hopeless mess—you see how many kilesa come up in a day in your mind, right? You're not alone. None of us are alone. If we're thinking they've all got to go and we're waiting for that, it's a little demoralizing.

But if we can really get a sense of how all the different aspects of the path comprise our whole life—if that's our motivation, if that's our aspiration—then all aspects of our life become part of the path of purifying and transforming these habits of mind.

We can't control this, but the arising of greed, hatred, delusion, the arising of wisdom, the arising of wholesome states—it's out of our control, but it's not random. We've talked about that a lot. The classic line from the Buddha: what the mind frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the natural inclination of the mind, the habit.

So we come in with what we naturally think and ponder upon. You've seen all too clearly what the habits are. But all the time that you put in during this retreat—and for almost everybody here, in other retreats and in your life—all the moments that the mind is inclining to awareness, to non-greed, to non-ill will, to compassion, to interest, to samadhi—all those times are also feeding into the habits of what the mind naturally inclines towards. This is the only thing that makes it workable.

You remember when Steve read the sutta about how the mind is naturally radiant and pure. This purity, this radiance, is simply obscured by the visiting torments, the visiting kilesa. Partly they're obscured because we get so fascinated—either getting sucked into the kilesa or fighting against them, caught in the reaction and onto the object—that we forget to even notice the radiance. Sometimes it would be quite noticeable if we would remember. Same as our awareness: we don't even remember it's there, and when we do, it's just there. It's so normal.

So in a way, you could say the habits—the unwholesome habits—are learned.

Desmond Tutu, the Archbishop from South Africa, the Nobel Peace Prize winner who was one of the main architects of the whole peace and reconciliation process there. I heard just a brief snippet of him on the radio. He was in Boston meeting with a bunch of students—it sounded like they were late adolescents, maybe eighteen or nineteen-year-old young men and women from a very poor, difficult section of town. And he was saying to them, "We learn to hate. It's not our natural state. We learn to hate."

One of the students said to him, "But how can we—we live in the middle of a culture of violence. How can we possibly learn how to love?" And he just—you could hear him on the radio, couldn't see him, but you could hear him—he just turned to that young man and said, "You. You can make a difference. It starts with you, and you, and you, and you. One person can make a difference. And just know that hate isn't our natural state and it's not the only response. We don't have to just give in to that for ourselves."

I found that really inspiring from him.

There's a place in the suttas where the Buddha is talking about cultivating skillful, wholesome habits and abandoning unskillful, unwholesome habits. And he says, "If it were not possible, I would not tell you to do so. But because it is possible, I say: abandon the unskillful, cultivate the skillful." He said, "If abandoning the unskillful led to your further suffering and unhappiness, I wouldn't tell you to do so. But it doesn't." I see I don't have the right words—I shouldn't put words in the Buddha's mouth. Although, I mean, he wasn't speaking English, was he? You get the drift. "If cultivating the wholesome led to greater suffering, to unhappiness, I wouldn't tell you to do so. But it doesn't. It leads to freedom from suffering and happiness and ease. Therefore, because it is possible, I tell you to do so."

I really take that in. Really take it in. If it were not possible, I wouldn't ask you to do so.

But it takes—I feel, certainly in my limited experience and everything I've seen—it takes, as you see, how hard just on a nine-day retreat where we've cleared the decks and that's all we're doing here, how hard it is even to be aware, never mind not getting all caught up in the unwholesome.

And also maybe you've noticed how often we don't recognize the wholesome. We get so focused on getting rid of the unwholesome, which of course isn't what awareness is doing, right? We all know awareness is not getting rid of the unwholesome. It's simply being present with things as they are and allowing the clear seeing.

And what's so cool—and we've said this before—is the wisdom that comes from steady awareness, simply from recognizing accurately. That's all. The wisdom that arises when we recognize accurately: in that moment, the unwholesome is abandoned because it doesn't make any sense.

But it takes a continual renewing, I think, for each of us in our own way, of our own internal commitment, our own internal aspiration to do so. I'm sure you know how easy it is, even on retreat, but when we leave retreat—and this isn't, that's why we love this style of practice, it's not just about retreat—but there's so many more things to go and do and see. Someone was saying, how hard is it to be aware? Not very. How often do we think, "Okay, I'll be aware later"—right now, as if you can't be aware whatever you're doing—"I'll be aware later." It's so easy.

There's another place—which I searched, I wrote it down years ago and could not find the reference, so don't ask me, I'm telling you right now—where the Buddha said at one point, speaking about his own practice, that the two things he never lost sight of were not to be lax in his effort—in other words, not to just coast, which I find myself doing a lot until there's enough suffering that it kind of wakes me up again—and never to be satisfied simply with wholesome states of mind.

I find that really interesting. The way I read that is, when the kilesas are completely uprooted, that's okay, you can be satisfied then. But along the way, when it's kind of the same complacency—"it's good enough." The habits come and go, but we're not as bothered, they're not as strong. We really see a lot more wholesomeness, and this is true. A lot more generosity, a lot less aversion, a lot less getting caught in stuff. We think, "That's pretty good."

And never to be satisfied until we really, really see our hearts and minds are free. This is, to me, the aspiration that keeps renewing itself in my heart and mind in different ways.

And it's not a negative judgment. It's like an onward-leading aspiration.

I'll just give an example. Different things bring it up in me from time to time over my life of practice. I'll go for a while, and then something will inspire me into another gear, sort of like Steve said about his retreat—something really inspired him into another gear. Different times, different things.

But a few years ago—this is the one that sticks with me in this context of really purifying the mind stream, the heart stream. Not that long ago. When I was in Munich for a while, I went to visit Dachau. It's been made into a museum where the concentration camp was. All the years I've spent time in Germany, I somehow never got around to doing that.

That was the effect it had on me. It was very well set out as a museum, with lots of placards and photos of all the different aspects, all the different kinds of people involved, all the different strands. Coming through it, seeing the site—it was so big. When I went back to see my friends in Munich, they said, "Oh, but that's one of the small ones." I thought, my God, it's huge. So you get the sense of the vastness of this kind of unimaginable horror in my mind.

The placards showed all the different groups of people who were interned there—Jews and Roma and gay people and Catholics, on and on—with photos of different individuals. But also photos of guards, people who made the bread, people who brought in supplies. All the different people.

By the end of it, what hit me was: there were so many people involved. And this is just Dachau, and this is just World War II Germany. Pick your place in the world of all the horrors. There were so many people involved. There's no way my mind could make it separate and say, "Well, all of these people were some kind of inhuman monsters." It's just not possible. Mostly ordinary people—doctors, or people who lived in the village and brought in the food, or people who were interned in the camp and acted in all different kinds of ways: noble and base and normal. The whole range of humanity.

I think of any other memorial to unspeakable horrors. I read that they just opened, on the UN Plaza, the Permanent Memorial to Honor the Victims of Slavery in the Transatlantic Slave Trade. It took so long to make that. I haven't been there; I just looked at it online. Again, how many people over hundreds of years were involved? They can't all be some kind of inhuman monsters. Or Srebrenica, or Rwanda, or the killing fields in Cambodia—on and on.

This might sound strange, but this actually really inspired me in my own practice. Because what I realized is: we don't really know, until we're in a really difficult situation, how we're going to behave. We don't really know. When we don't know how our minds work, we don't really know.

I've never been in a situation even close to what any of these people were in. And I couldn't just look and say, "Well, I know I would never do that." Do what? You don't know. You make a small decision. You don't know all the ramifications. You don't know what went into it. Maybe someone comes and says, "Do this, or some harm might come to your children," and you do it out of fear. How do I know what I would do?

Looking at my own life—when we say, "Okay, I'm going to make an aspiration. I'm going to sit every day"—you really think you mean it, don't you? With your whole heart, you mean it: I'm going to sit every day. How long does that last? Some people do sit every day. I'm always really amazed when I meet those people in their daily life. Or, "I'm not going to get angry at my mother anymore." All this stuff, and we mean it. But because we don't really know how our minds are working, because we're not really present with awareness, the habits surface when the conditions are present for them.

Like some people were saying in the little talking exercise today—I thought it was really interesting—quite a few people said that with the awareness in the talking, they noticed their habits: personality habits, habits of how they tend to engage in conversation coming up. The awareness really starts to see it.

And that doesn't mean you don't do it. It doesn't mean you naturally stop, and it doesn't mean you bring in more aversion to yourself, because that's just aversion. But you say, "I really want to see."

Many people have said at different times in our groups that they're starting to notice the big dramas that used to happen on retreat aren't happening so much. But they're noticing how much more subtle craving is showing up, or more subtle aversion is showing up. And I think that's great, because it's the subtle ones where we think, "No, that's a little aversion that doesn't really matter." And then the next thing you know, you're tapping out an email that's filled with all this stuff, and you think, "Oh, I just thought it was funny," and the person on the other end is like, "Oh, God."

So really turning around and watching what's going on in our mind—that's what we can do. We don't know what the effect is going to be of many of our choices and actions. We don't know the whole circumstance. That we can't always know. But the place we can bring awareness is to the quality in the mind that's motivating this speech, this action. And a lot of times it's complex, and a lot of times we can't tell, sure. But we keep having the interest, the willingness to look.

So it's better now. When I get an email and I can feel something—"No, that's just not right. Let me tell them"—and I'm supposed to answer and give my opinion, I'm actually supposed to do that. So I start to go, but now I can feel this kind of, "But I know I'm right." And then most of the time I manage to say, "Write it tomorrow, write it tomorrow," because I can feel the aversion in my mind, even though it's masquerading as my appropriate informed opinion.

The next day, I may have the same appropriate informed opinion. Because let's face it, the aversion's there because you know you're right. And of course, the flip side of the aversive type is discriminating wisdom. That's true. But the next day, even when I have the same opinion, that aversive tinge is gone and it feels so completely different. I can write it so completely differently.

And it's the same with craving. You write something because you really want this thing to happen. The next day, when it's not so much craving, you can see the whole picture. You can see the other person's point of view. You can write the email from a much more clear comprehension perspective, not just my perspective.

So it's in the little things like that—that we bring this awareness of our motivation, of the habits of mind, into our practice.

From that I want to move into talking a little bit about the Third Noble Truth. Remembering, we're talking not about the remainderless forever, but the moment-to-moment possibility of really recognizing a sense, the flavor, of the heart-mind that's pure in that moment, that's free from clinging—the quality of mind. It's not a distant state, or a state at all. In a moment of the process of mind, heart, consciousness arising with awareness, the five faculties and no clinging, aversion, or greed—that's a moment of purity.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa. I've talked about him before, the Thai forest monk who was quite a scholar, and also, for the Thai Theravada system, a little bit of a rebel in his scholarship and the way he talked about things. For example, in his center near Surat Thani on the southeast coast of Thailand, a forest monastery, he had a big statue of Avalokiteshvara. That may seem like, so what?

But in Thai Theravada Buddhist monasteries, you don't have statues of Avalokiteshvara. It's from a whole different tradition. They don't mix. So just for that gesture alone, you can see he had a much broader view.

I want to share a few things from a talk he gave, translated from Thai, speaking to lay people, not to monks and nuns. The talk is called "Nibbana for Everyone." It's quite long, but I just want to make a few points relevant to what we're exploring here.

He says, "Nibbana means cool. Cool." And "Nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind." In Thai, as in Pali, mind-heart is the same word: citta. "It is the cool state of mind without any kilesa." So in any moment, he's saying, when there's no kilesa in the heart, in the mind, it's cooled out. It's cool.

He goes on to say, "It could be summed up that nibbana is the coolness resulting from the extinction of defilements, of torments. Now as we look further, we see that the kilesa—greed, hatred, delusion—are also sankharas, compounded things. All compounded things that arise will cease." So they're subject to birth and death. "This shows that the defilements occur when the causal conditions are present. And when those causal conditions are not present—and they will go away because every conditioned thing arises and ceases—when those causal conditions go away, the defilements simply become extinct in that moment."

I'm sure you've experienced this. When you're wanting, or you're in aversion, if you keep paying attention, suddenly it's just gone. Have you noticed that? That's the moment. It became extinct in that moment.

Buddhadasa continues, "Although the extinction is temporary—or in other words, the coolness takes place temporarily—the phenomenon has a real sense of Nibbana, even though it's not the lasting one."

I'm talking about this not from an Abhidhamma scholastic perspective, but really as a teaching tool to help us, to urge us all to keep recognizing these moments. We don't need to get lost in thinking, "But it's not really Nibbana, it's not really cessation." Just start to recognize these moments of coolness.

He says, "Temporary nibbana does exist for those who unavoidably have some impurities left." But then he says, "This temporary nibbana is that which nourishes sentient beings. Anyone can see that if defilements are with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand them?" Right? We couldn't really. He says we'd go crazy. Or we'd die. Or both.

"So let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods when the fires of defilement are not burning. As a matter of fact, we could say that these periods are more than when the fires are burning. This nourishing condition is thus normal to what may be called life or mind."

So he asks, why don't we appreciate it more? Why aren't we grateful for these moments of temporary nibbana?

If you think of it simply as moments of coolness, when the fires of defilement are not burning—these are just little moments that we can really bring into awareness. Of course, awareness is key to all of this. Awareness plays a part in every practice, in every technique, in everything we do in our life.

With this awareness, we've really been looking at the torments, the patterns that emerge, and also wholesome qualities like the five spiritual faculties. But I just want to highlight that this is a normal, natural moment of coolness, freedom from defilement. And awareness recognizing it—just recognizing, not making some big production out of it—is important. Remember, wisdom is this: when wisdom recognizes the wholesome, it strengthens the wholesome. That's just the nature of things. We don't have to hold on to that strength. That's what happens. It's so far out.

When wisdom recognizes the unskillful, the unwholesome, it doesn't feed it, because it doesn't make sense. That's just natural.

That's far out.

So this is just on the intellectual level I'm talking about, but we can start to notice it—that it's a natural, normal aspect of our mind.

The Dalai Lama, talking about the negative emotions and tendencies, says: "Once these veils, the negative emotions and tendencies, have been removed, no new power is needed. Seeing and being aware is the nature of the mind itself. As long as the mind exists, it has the ability to know. But this ability does not reveal itself until all obscurations are removed. That is what it means to attain enlightenment."

So again, take it down to one moment. In one moment—there are many moments when the obscurations are not there. And no new power is needed then, just to recognize this purity of heart-mind.

Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche writes: "This is one's birthright, one's true nature. It's not something missing to be sought for and obtained, but is the very heart of our original existential being. It is actually inseparable from our uncontrived everyday awareness, beyond willful alteration, free from conceptualizing. Unfabricated ordinary awareness, unadulterated by effort and modification."

Does that sound familiar? Only slightly different Tibetan language. "Unfabricated ordinary awareness, naked, fresh, vivid, and totally natural. What could be simpler than this? To rest at home and at ease in total naturalness."

So that's a different language, but it's just the same thing—starting to just rest at ease in natural awareness. And so, again, not looking for something but just having it in mind to notice little moments that are cool because the fire of torment isn't burning.

It could be in any moment. There's nothing special going on most of the time. You know how on retreat you'll have moments where maybe you're outside and everything—it's just the is-ness. Everything just is. You're not making up any stories. Maybe there could be thoughts or not, but you're not referencing it back to what does it mean about me, and what am I going to tell people about this, and how can I hold it. Just little kind of perfect moments.

And it could be seeing a lizard. Okay, that isn't here, right? That's in California. Here it could be seeing an icicle. That image I just said—that's an image from a retreat I did in 1975. I remember I was just sitting in a chair and this little blue lizard went by, and it was one of those perfect moments.

But so often we notice it, and we impute the purity, the perfectness, whatever it is, to the particular situation. "Oh, it's so beautiful out. The ice crystals are so incredible." Or that lizard and the quietness—"I'm on retreat." Or drinking this tea, and then you go and buy seven gallons of that tea because that was like the perfect thing. You try to go back to the same place. We impute it to that. Again, focusing on the object.

It's got nothing to do with the object. It could be any object. It's the quality of mind-heart in that moment, with awareness that the defilements aren't there burning.

So we have lots of little is-ness moments, some stronger than others. When it happens, don't stop—you can't stop and grab, because then it's gone. But just noticing more than the object, just kind of feeling what that simple quality of pure mind-heart feels like in that moment. However it is, don't put words to it or anything. It's not like you're trying to name it or call it out, but it's just kind of letting awareness come to it. It becomes recognizable. We see it is really normal and natural. It is part of our everyday experience.

But as with our tendency for intensity, we so much overlook it, just as we overlook the simplicity of awareness. We overlook it because it's so always available and so normal that we just don't even see it.

One friend of mine was describing her experience: it's like the mind and heart feel squeaky clean—like when you're cleaning a window and it's just so squeaky clean.

There's nothing there, nothing in the way. I don't know if that works for you, but I like it. You get the sense it's almost tangible.

So just start to let that in. It's really part of our life. The world doesn't change. It's not about the object. It's more this quality of mind, the cool mind, free from klesha. Readily available, it comes and goes. But if we don't even notice it—if we don't even notice it, or if we do notice it and it's like, "So what?"—okay, then maybe this isn't your path.

No, mostly we don't notice it. We overlook it because we're still looking for the big, you know, whatever it is. We're still in that somehow it's got to be really transformative, really pleasant—okay, let's face it, really something. But the world doesn't change. The Buddha woke up into this same world, you know. The way our heart and mind relates, responds—that changes because we understand differently. And we understand differently because the lens of awareness is clear. It's clean. All those moments of not being with burning defilement, what's also going on is clear and accurate recognition.

So this isn't to think about it. I just want to offer different ways of recognizing, just when it's there. Because just as you've been learning over this time—in the beginning maybe you didn't know what the heck we were talking about with awareness—it gets more and more a sense of what it is, although you can't touch it or see it or really describe it to your friends when you go home. But there's a way you know when there's awareness and when there's not. Right? Please say yes. At least sometimes. We know. It's more familiar.

And then we start to be able to really tell when there's torment coloring the awareness and when there's not. Just as we get more and more familiar with how greed and aversion and delusion feel and affect our perception, we get more familiar with the thoughts and the actions, we also get more and more familiar and at home when they're not there. So that's really key to let in. Not separate from our everyday awareness. It's not lying somewhere else.

This is from Ajahn Tate, who was a Thai forest master too, talking about this. He says: "Water in its natural state is a pure, transparent fluid. But if dye is added, it will change color accordingly. If red dye is added, it will be red. If blue, it will turn blue. But even though the water may change its color in accordance with the substances introduced into it, it does not forsake its innate purity and colorlessness. If a wise person is able to distill the colored water, it will resume its natural state. This is the same for the pure mind and the kaleshas that visit it."

So just in different traditions, different ways of pointing to the same really natural, actually very simple and accessible aspect, experience over and over of our mind and heart.

At the heart of all the practices, of course, is this moment-to-moment awareness, as we've been doing it here. As Ajahn Sumedho says, the practice of freedom is awareness. Well, it's a way of looking—I'm sure he'd go there. Anyway, awareness. But we've talked about that the whole time, so I'm not going to say more about that now.

What I want to mention—and I can only just touch on these, because each of these things is at least one whole dharma talk, don't worry, it's not going to be—is all the different practices, all the different aspects that the Buddha talks about on the path.

Of course, awareness is the overarching quality, and awareness is included with all of these practices, accompanying all of them. But they're all ways, again, of shifting, transforming the tormented habits of our mind and heart toward the wholesome. And that's not just so we feel better—that's actually what sets the conditions for the arising of moments of freedom. So it's not merely, "Oh, this is a good thing and then later you'll be better." These are, in themselves, absolutely essential aspects of freeing our heart-mind.

You see, there are different meditation practices, and also, as Steve has said, the three pillars: generosity and moral conduct, and all the different forms of mental cultivation—all important. All aspects of our life.

I know Steve talked a lot about generosity today. We usually try to give a whole talk about it, more and more, because it's so key to cultivating the heart-mind of relinquishment, of counteracting clinging. But the only thing I want to say about generosity and sīla, restraint, is to recognize that they're not heavy-duty, difficult renunciation practices. The practices themselves—moments of generosity, moments of conscious moral conduct—bring so much joy and happiness, wholesome joy, wholesome happiness. It's not like we've got to practice and practice just to have a moment, please, when there's no collation and we can appreciate something. The practices themselves are cultivating a lightness of heart, a lightness of mind.

In moments of generosity, whether it's just giving a smile, some time, listening, a flower, whatever it is—it's not the thing itself. It's the motivation, the intention in our heart. And connecting to be generous also needs a generous receiver. That's the circle.

I've spent a lot of time in Burma over the last fourteen years, going there every year. Generosity is a large part of the Buddhist teaching, and since much of the culture is Buddhist, it's quite inculcated throughout. I do mostly hang out in monasteries and nunneries, but it's not only there—it's really all through the culture, this appreciation of generosity as a practice. Everywhere you go, it just comes at you from all directions. And there's this joy, a happiness, from people. You go to a little village, and they're poor fisher people, and they come and give you this big dried fish. "Please take this, and give part of it to our friend who's in Thailand." As if we could take a big dried fish to Thailand! Impossible, but this is such full-hearted generosity, and there's this happiness in it.

I see in myself how, before, sometimes I would want to be generous but I might feel a little ashamed—it's not a good enough thing to give, or what if they don't appreciate it? That's so self-centered, really. When you're truly giving, there's just this happiness: "Please, this is what I have, this dried fish, and I want to give it to you." And so you take it in the same spirit. The alternative—"No, no, don't give me your fish, you're too poor, I don't want to take your fish"—that's so ungenerous. That's how we feel at first. But there's this sense of letting in the joy, and then it becomes catching.

There's a phrase you hear: "opportunity for dāna." That's very common—"Oh, this is another opportunity for dāna." People always have that in their mind. And just to have that awareness—"This is a chance I can offer something, this is a chance I can be generous"—it's such a lovely thing.

So we take that fish and we go away, and obviously we can't take it to Thailand. So we find a nunnery and offer it to the nuns. And it keeps going like that. Generosity moves to the next place, to the next place.

Once I was staying at a meditation center where we often stay, right after the cyclone in 2008. The cyclone hit the southwest of Myanmar but also extended up into the area near Yangon—great destruction. Many people were killed, houses were down, people really didn't have food. Much of the rice production was destroyed. We'd brought some money from friends to try and help, and the sayadaw where we were staying said, "Well, the village just around this meditation center—the people really don't have enough food." He said if we would offer the money, he would organize what he called a rice dāna.

This meant for every house in the village—and it's all very carefully tracked there, they know which houses and how many people live in each one. So we paid for it, and a whole building was filled with rice. Then the monks, who of course can't offer or use money, went in and spent their time filling all the bags with rice, because that's what they could do, and they really wanted to help too. Then each villager from each house would come and we'd offer them a bag of rice. And you always do it face to face. It's not like you make a pile and they come and take it.

The Sayadaw insisted that we come and stand there to hand them the rice personally. These were big, heavy, fifty-pound bags of rice. Ryan and I together were heaving these bags up, and then a little lady would come, go "plop," put it on her head, take a kid in each hand, and walk off. I'm not exaggerating. So all along the way, it was very personal, face to face.

The next morning, the monks went out on alms round. They still do that in Buddhist countries. Every morning, the monks go out with their alms bowls following a set itinerary in the village. Each monastery has its own route, and the village people know when they're coming. Whoever wants to offer comes out and gives whatever they have.

A friend of ours from Mexico was a monk there at the time and went out on alms round every day. He came back that next day deeply moved. He said that they go the same route every day, and pretty much the same people come out to offer. Usually they just offer a little rice—that's all they can afford, which is fine. The rest of the food is cooked for them at the monastery. In some places, still today in Thailand and Burma, the only food the monks get—and in some cases nuns—is what they receive on alms round. Up in Sagaing in the north, it's like that.

Raoul said that this day when they went out, after the rice dana, there were many, many more people out there giving rice. Some people had brought their little kids out, training them. The children would take a little spoonful of rice and put it in the bowl. Because the families had gotten rice, now they could offer some to the monks. Before, they weren't able to because they didn't have enough. And that's the first thing they did with it. That's just the flow, how it goes. And it's really happiness-producing.

So in the moment of generosity, with awareness, you can notice how the habit is being transformed in that very moment. It's not that if I give enough, I'll store up merit and then later on something good will happen. That's one way of looking at it. But in terms of our awareness in the immediacy of the moment—which is all there is—you can feel this. Let yourself appreciate it. Enjoy the happiness of generosity, and also be happy in receiving and happy for the generosity of the other person. In that moment, you can start to feel some transformation. You can see a shift from the old habits.

Similarly with sīla, with non-harming conduct—it's not just that we don't do these things. You might notice every time, even in a little way, that the motivation or the impulse comes up to transgress: to take something that's not yours, to squash a mosquito, whatever. And you don't do it.

I don't know about you, but a lot of our Western tendencies run toward self-criticism: "Oh God, I was so bad. What's the matter with me? I wanted to take that thing." Instead, you could actually notice that restraint—conscious restraint—is a wholesome movement of non-harming. In that moment, appreciate that shift of habit.

The more we pay attention to sīla and notice when the habits come up of wanting to harm or steal, when we say something harmful, we can notice how that feels. Notice the burning of the defilements. When we don't do it, notice how that's a wholesome quality of restraint. And it starts to arise more naturally, more easily. I'm sure you've noticed this.

It becomes natural and easy, and in fact the Buddha says it's not an act of will. It is normal and natural that freedom from remorse arises in one endowed with virtue. It is in the nature of things—freedom from remorse and really a kind of happiness.

I'll give you another little simple example. The simple little ones are what's important to notice. I was with a good friend of mine at Spirit Rock, a meditation center like this in California. If you haven't been, it has this giant bookstore that sells every dharma tchotchke you could ever want, all kinds of stuff. They had all kinds of little statues, and I wanted a particular one that I had seen. I wanted to go back and get it. So my friend and I went there. It's a self-service bookstore, but I didn't see this particular statue out on display. My friend had sometimes helped out there.

She knew how to get into the storage closets, let's put it that way. So we went into the storage closet, and there was one that was just row after row after row of statues. The woman who supplies this is really good at buying things and getting a lot of them. So we were going through all these shelves looking for this particular statue, taking out the ones ahead and getting to it. It was a White Tara statue I wanted.

We were being very careful. They were kind of like—not glass, some kind of plastic or something. Anyway, we're pulling them out, and at almost the same moment, we each took out a different kind of statue, a head of Manjushri with a little sword up like this. And both had—we barely touched them and the swords just snapped off, for both of us, in each hand. We both went, "Oh no!" We each broke one.

Later we discussed this. It went through both of our minds—which we didn't say at the time—we could just put them back and no one would ever know. That thought went through both of our minds. And it was so clear: it just went through and there was no temptation whatsoever. It was so clear we wouldn't do that, even though the statues weren't cheap.

So we went and got the one I wanted, and then we took the broken statues. Actually, the woman who runs the bookstore is a good friend, so we went to her office with our two broken statues, like two little kids. She wasn't there, so we're writing out a note—okay, we broke the statues, what do we owe? She comes in: "Carol! What are you doing here?" "We broke the statues. What do we owe?" She goes, "Ah, that happens all the time. We just glue it back on and sell it half price." Oh, great!

So it worked out. But later we realized how really happy it made us both that there was not even for a fraction of a second a thought that either of us would really put that back and hide it. We would have totally gotten away with it. No one would have known. But that's not what it's about. That's the freedom from remorse.

Recognizing that in yourself, rather than "Oh, I'm so bad, I had that thought"—recognize the space that doesn't act on it, the natural honesty, the natural restraint from harmful behavior, and really appreciate that. This is also an act of changing the habits of our mind, and it requires awareness.

I want to read one sutta, and then I won't go so much into the meditation practices. They all, of course, are purifying the mind—samādhi, all the different forms of samādhi, and the different forms of vipassanā. But we've talked about that here, and time is running out.

This is something I've really found helpful in terms of conscious contemplation. It's not only that our habits are purified in the acts of generosity, in the acts of non-harming behavior, but that actually we can consciously reflect later on our wholesome actions as a source of shifting and transforming the habits, of purifying the heart and mind.

So I'm reading just part of a sutta in which the Buddha is giving a long talk to a layman who has come and asked, "Where should we lay people dwell in our minds for awakening?" He says, "This is a great question, Mahānāma. And the first place we dwell is the five spiritual faculties."

Remember them? Faith, perseverance, mindfulness, samadhi, and wisdom. So they're not just for people in deep retreat. That's the first thing.

And then he talks about some conscious reflections. I just want to read what he says about reflecting on your virtues—and then on your generosity, which is exactly the same.

Furthermore, Mahanama, there is the case where you recollect your own virtues. They are unbroken, liberating, praised by the wise, untarnished, conducive to concentration.

Now this is the important part, I think:

At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting their own virtue, her mind is not overcome with greed, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind heads straight based on virtue. And when the mind is headed straight, the disciple of the noble one gains a sense of the goal, gains a sense of the Dhamma, gains joy connected with the Dhamma. In one who is joyful, piti arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calmed experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated.

It's always one leads to the next, to the next—and it's just the nature of things.

So, Mahanama, you should develop this recollection of virtue while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children.

He's not just saying once in a while. This is an active act with awareness of purifying our heart and mind and bringing in joy, leading to the mind and heart free from defilements in any moment.

The same with recollecting your generosity:

It is great for me that among people overcome with a stain of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, open-handed, responsive to requests.

And the same thing—at any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting her generosity, her mind is not overcome with passion, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind heads straight based on generosity.

I'll end with this:

You should develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children.

So the big picture: take care of your awareness in all aspects of our life.

Thank you for listening to the Dhamma.

CHAPTER 122

Opening Night - 3 Month Retreat

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> Carol Wilson opens the three-month retreat at IMS by framing this intensive practice period as a radical choice to go against the stream of conventional life—echoing the Buddha's own description of the path 2,600 years ago. She reflects on the anniversary of 9/11 as a reminder of the suffering caused by fear, hatred, and greed, while also acknowledging the nobility and generosity that arise in response to tragedy. The talk emphasizes that transformation is not an act of will but comes through affectionate awareness and curiosity toward our own habits of mind and heart.

> Wilson draws on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho about gratitude and contentment as supportive conditions for awakening, and references the Buddha's graduated teachings that begin by brightening the heart before addressing deeper insights. She encourages practitioners to consciously cultivate appreciation for the dāna (generosity) and mettā (loving-kindness) that support the retreat community, and to reconnect with their deepest aspirations.

> Bhante Gunaratana then offers detailed teachings on taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, explaining their qualities of protection and accessibility. He illuminates the five precepts not merely as abstentions but as positive practices—protecting life, cultivating contentment, calming the senses, speaking truthfully, and maintaining diligent mindfulness. The evening concludes with the traditional Pāli chanting of the refuges and precepts, formally beginning the retreat.

So tonight we begin this six-week or three-month journey together in earnest—no more messing around. We're really starting to investigate this, what they call the great matter. The great matter of life and death, the great matter of suffering and freedom, of self-hatred and compassion. The great matter that in some way is at the heart, to me anyway, of all of life. Exploring what gives, for me, all of life meaning, which is just being fully present and understanding our hearts and minds and the world as it is.

It's so amazing to me that the freedom that the Buddha spoke about—this really purifying the habits of our heart and mind, really shifting the default mode from confusion and self-dislike and fear and the illusion of separate, isolated existence that gives rise to greed and fear and cruelty—shifting that default mode to one of pure wakeful presence with this moment, that manifests in our hearts and minds as wisdom, as compassion, as all those beautiful qualities that were mentioned this morning.

One time I had a teacher who said, however you want to describe the experience, the manifestation of heart and mind of awakening, we'll all have different words for it, because there's no word that accurately describes it. So I kind of love that go-around this morning, everybody throwing in a different word. Somehow we all get the mandala, just like we're a whole mandala of people here together, exploring this together and in solitude—like Stephen Batchelor's book, Alone with Others. That's how we are here, alone with others, and both of those are essential.

I personally feel like this choice of how to spend your time for six weeks, for three months, is really radical. In this world, in whatever culture we each come from, the choice to start where we are and to really turn our attention wholeheartedly, twenty-four seven—for you non-American English speakers, that means twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week—you get time off to sleep in the beginning. But then mindfulness gets stronger, and you won't want any time off. You won't, because it's so much more rich and alive just to be awake, even when we hate what we're being awake for. Just being awake, being present, instead of falling asleep into our old habits of reactivity—it's so much more worthwhile, in my opinion.

This is really radical. The Buddha, as I'm sure you know, often described his path and his teachings as going against the stream. To really follow this path of awakening is moving against the stream of his culture and his society back 2,600 years ago in India. And so in all of our different cultures and societies, we are in some way going against the stream.

And yet, I mean, I'm certainly not a student of all the philosophies and religions of the world, but in various different ones I've read about, there seems to be a core of solitude, of the mystic, of the call to turn our attention inward to our own mind and heart. To discover not only how we suffer and to free ourselves from that suffering, but as a way to share our being, our understanding, who we are with all of humanity, with all the people that we come in contact with. We can't help it. We are who we are, and whoever we come in contact with is going to be affected by that, just as we are affected by who we come in contact with.

So choosing this period of silence to really look inward, to choose to take refuge in awareness, in wisdom, in compassion, over the comfort of our habits of mind and heart, or over just the pull of reactivity—just the pull of wanting can be so strong. Have you noticed that? So strong, and not only wanting. Just choosing to give yourself, to give the world this time is, I feel, really radical. As the Buddha said, it's against the stream of what most people in all different cultures tend to do and the messages we get.

A big reminder of why: I probably don't need to mention to those of you who live in the States that today is 9/11, the anniversary of that huge terrorist act. One out of ten zillion examples on this planet, both in the history of this country and in the history of most other countries, in the past and in the present, of how much pain and sorrow and suffering can be created by even a few people filled and driven by fear, by hatred, by greed—never mind whole huge segments of any population. And it's also an example of all the history of violence and cruelty and oppression and war and bigotry for all different reasons, whether it's ethnicity or sexual identity or wanting someone else's property or some other cause.

Of course, these acts of cruelty and violence are not always responded to with cruelty and violence. There's as much nobility and courage and generosity in the world as well. So just to say with 9/11, to keep it with one example: of course we know in New York the courage of so many people and the generosity of those who responded immediately, who risked their lives and gave their lives. There was just such a general sense of people pulling together and caring for one another. What makes me a little sad in retrospect is how we remark on that as a special thing.

I heard on the radio, and I didn't know this, that a few people got together over some years and they got the US Congress to pass a resolution making the anniversary of 9/11 what they call a day of service, to kind of commemorate it in a wholesome, beautiful way. So I thought, okay, that's great that the Congress could do something like that. And they were giving examples of lots of people in New York all over the city who were going to different firehouses—because the firemen and women were some of the big heroes at that time—just painting the firehouses or cleaning up. It was kind of lovely because the fire people were like, "Wow, I can't believe someone's coming and painting our firehouse. How amazing." And the people that were doing it were like, "This is so wonderful to do something for someone else." Which is great. So there are wonderful responses too. I don't want to just harp on the negative.

But these horrible examples of fear, greed, cruelty, violence—whatever form they take—just keep on happening in this world.

So the radical thing, I feel, that we choose in coming to an experience like this is not an escape. Of course, that's what people who don't understand meditation usually think. "Oh, you're going to go get calm." That's what people say to me all the time. "What do you do?" "I teach meditation." "Oh, I could use that. I need to get calm." You have no idea what you really face—coming face to face with all the habits in our own heart and mind, all the default mechanisms that would lead me to respond to cruelty with anger, to hatred with hatred, to feel that I need to protect by lashing out, to greed with greed.

And I'm not saying we should then think we shouldn't do that. I'm thinking more that the courage we bring to our practice of awakening is this interest, this willingness not to judge, but to really look in our hearts and minds and see what's going on here. Can I respond in another way?

There's a well-known story of the Dalai Lama. Someone was asking him, "How can it be, when your country of Tibet has been so overrun by the government of China, and so many of the Tibetan people have been killed or put in jail, the monasteries and nunneries destroyed, so many of you have fled to India—and yet you refuse to go to anger, and you still have compassion and forgiveness? How can you do that when everything's been taken from your country?" And he said, "Well, the Chinese government may have taken the country. Should I also give them my heart and mind?"

That's our choice. Not such an easy choice. It's not an act of will.

One of my teachers, a Burmese teacher named Sayadaw U Tejaniya, has little funny pithy comments. Someone asked him when he was here, "Okay, it's fine being on retreat, exploring when difficult habits of mind come up—greed, cruelty, hatred—and really being open to exploring them, not judging, not running, just seeing with affectionate curiosity, understanding, and trusting that that understanding grows naturally from awareness." Which is so cool. And that the understanding itself, wisdom itself, is the function that transforms our responses. So this person thinks, "Okay, that's all well and good on a retreat when people are in silence and enough comes up anyway. What about when we go back to life and people are basically mad? People are acting insane—not even in the big picture, but just who you run into in your life on the street. How do you deal with that?"

So Tejaniya said, "You realize that they're giving us a dhamma lesson. They're saying, 'Don't be like this.' I don't want to act like this or think like this or feel like this."

In my experience—I don't know if it's the same for you—that's not so simple, right? Easier said than done. If it were only an act of will... Have you ever thought, "I'm just not going to get angry at that person again"? Have you ever thought, in your relationship or with family members, "I'm never going to say that to them again. I'm never going to criticize that thing that drives me crazy. I'm never going to criticize it again"? And you know, how long? How long before it pops out of the mouth? Again, maybe I'm the only one. But how long? It's not an act of will.

So don't take that as a discouragement. Take that as an incredible relief. Because it's not an act of will. So when tomorrow you're standing in the breakfast line and somebody takes the last banana and your mind goes into killer mode—but you won't act on it because Bhante is going to give us the refuges and precepts—you just see. Oh wow. You stand back and go, it's not an act of will to stop it. You bring affection and curiosity and go, "Wow, look at that. Isn't that amazing?" And that shift to affectionate interest, to awareness, to not taking it so personally, but really seeing how the mind works—that's the shift that can change our world.

Moment after moment after moment, that's our practice. It's not an act of will. So just put down trying, but show up twenty-four-seven for this moment. And the steadiness of awareness is really the condition that allows paññā, wisdom, to arise.

Just the recognizing accurately. It's so cool. Once we stop trying so hard to make what we think ought to happen happen—when we really have no clue what ought to happen, but we keep on trying—we just forget it right now. Just put it down and notice what's happening now in the body, in the mind, through all our activities of the day, with affection, with interest, without expectation. That's our job.

Another quote from His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He says, "In the morning I practice to quiet and calm my mind." Apparently he gets up at like three or four every morning and practices for five hours. "And then the rest of the day, I use that quiet and calm to serve humanity."

So there's not really any way I feel that what we're doing is in any kind a running away. I mean, there's moments—God knows—we all run away. But ultimately, we're coming closer, like I think Andrea said, from A to A, but we really get to know and understand A, and then we stop fighting with reality. And that wisdom manifests as compassion, equanimity, all the beautiful things you guys said today.

So then I just want to offer, if it's helpful, a couple of reflections to start, to kind of set an attitude to begin. From Ajahn Sumedho—he's an American man who has been a monk in the Thai forest tradition, a student of Ajahn Chah for forty-something years, a really long time. I've found him quite inspiring in many ways as a teacher. And one time, I remember he said something that's really stayed with me. He said that in the heart, the mind, the attitude of gratitude and contentment are very supportive conditions for awakening.

And so I just want to mention that a minute. See that meditation isn't an isolated activity—something we do, do, do without paying any attention to what's the weather in our heart, in our mind, what's going on along with it. It's essential to include the whole package.

There are many places in the Buddhist suttas, the Buddhist discourses, where the Buddha, before he starts teaching someone, doesn't just go in and hit them with the highest teaching. Boom, you've got to understand anatta right now. Boom, there's no self. That's it. Get it. Some people could hear that, but we wish the Buddha were here because apparently he could read everyone's mind and know exactly what to say that they would be able to hear and understand. Wouldn't that be great? However, here we are.

Often he would, when beginning teachings, lead someone in what he called graduated teachings. He'd first talk about generosity and virtue, bring a lightness, a brightness, an openness to the mind and the heart, to actually move it away from being caught in wanting or fear or any of the hindrances. Because when we're really caught in aversion, caught in wanting, and don't recognize it, we can't hear and understand non-greed, because greed's saying, "No way."

So there are many suttas where the Buddha really starts by brightening the heart. It's not that we need to practice from a place of misery. You'll hit places of misery, but you can bring an interest to it. We don't have to start from there if we have a choice. And we often do have a choice. We'll talk about that in many ways.

But just these are three little reflections that came to me. You might find ones of your own that are more specifically helpful for you. But they help set a tone, help to relax, to bring the heart and mind into a receptive mode, an awake and energized and interested mode.

So gratitude and contentment. For me, often reflecting at the beginning of a retreat like this—wherever, but since this is where we are—consciously tuning your mind into various aspects that you can feel an appreciation for, a gratitude for. In a way, it's like tuning into what we call dana, or generosity, metta, or loving-kindness. It's a field that we can all be in here together, held really through generosity and loving-kindness.

I first started noticing this when I was doing retreats in Burma at a monastery, really so supported by the lay women—mostly women, but some men too—who work there, who serve the food, who do the cooking. An amazing, amazing amount of work that these women mostly do to serve all the yogis.

Yogis is the word we use in Burma for anyone who comes on retreat. All the yogis who come there from whatever country—Burmese mostly, but some foreigners. And these helpers do it with so much happiness, at least externally. I mean, I can't read inside, but there's a smile. They're going so out of their way to help you get the food you need, to help you in whatever way they can, to support your practice out of love of the Dhamma.

So this I really would feel when I was having a hard time—just kind of look around. It started to percolate unconsciously, and then I started to use it consciously. I would just notice the people around working so hard with so much joy to support me.

Now, we could go to the bad side with that and say, "I'm so worthless, and here they are working so hard to support me." That's not useful. But rather to say, "Wow, feel the metta. Feel the loving kindness, the friendliness, the generosity." And let that brighten your mind and heart, because it's a circle, a cycle. Generosity doesn't work if there's not a recipient. And so to actively receive and rejoice in that, to actually appreciate and have gratitude—this brightens our heart and mind, and it becomes a much richer, easier field to keep practicing in.

So here I look around at all the staff who are supporting us and all the beautiful touches, and the fact that all of us here together, just by our presence, are supporting one another. I think you may start to feel that as the days go on and you're dragging yourself through another walking period and someone else is going by. If they can do it, I can do it. You may not be grateful then, but later you will be. But just to consciously bring it in.

The work meditation that each of you are doing is a huge generosity to support all of us here together. As you're doing it, you can be grateful, appreciate your own generosity, and be grateful for the others. Or reflect on all the people in your life and all the circumstances in your life that are supporting you to be here. For everyone, it's a lot to be able to come here. There's people that are sacrificing and supporting and letting us be away. Really to feel gratitude for that—and that can brighten us. It's not like a chore; it's a real beautiful quality. All the generous donors that have supported IMS, that have made all these retreats possible—really appreciating that as another way of opening in our practice.

So consciously letting our heart and mind brighten through gratitude and appreciation. I often do a little gratitude practice at night just before I go to bed on retreat. Often when I start it, it's usually at the end of a day where you just—maybe you never had a day like this—where you just want to throw yourself in bed and go unconscious and think maybe tomorrow it'll all be different. Okay, gratitude. Yeah, I'm really grateful. I'm grateful the day's over. That's what I'm grateful for. And then I start saying a few other things. It's not very convincing. But you keep on going. And pretty soon, stuff just starts coming. I'm grateful I'm here and there's peace and I had enough to eat today. I'm grateful bombs aren't dropping. I mean, it just starts to flow. And then there's this energy to keep on going, to keep on looking.

The second reflection is something Winnie mentioned this morning. She spoke of lineage, appreciation of teachers. She went back to the Buddha, which is inspiring to me. That may not be what's inspiring to all of you. But again, bringing in a sense of gratitude and inspiration—to consciously call in whatever teachers have been inspiring and helpful to you on your whole path of awakening, that have gotten you to this point in your life.

Sometimes, for me, I can reflect on the Buddha and the fact that these teachings have stayed alive for 2600 years. That really does inspire me. And there's a saying, said to be true, that if even for one moment no one was practicing Buddha Dharma, then the particular teachings—not the truth, but the teachings—would die out of the world. So I always think, well, we're doing our bit here. We're keeping it alive. We're sitting with all different people all over the world. But again, whatever teachers, whatever beings have inspired your particular path—take time sometimes to reflect on that, to bring them here, to let that inspiration renew our commitment and our energy.

And the third reflection that sometimes helps me, often, is that of my aspiration itself.

This morning we just briefly mentioned aspiration, one word. And if this is something that's useful for you, to just get in touch with what's really most important to you, what deeply brought you—not only to this retreat, but to this whole path in your life.

So aspiration, not just hoping for a nice experience or something like that. That's okay, we can have those hopes. They'll only make you suffer, but you can have them. But the deep movement of your heart, of your intuition that brings you here, that brings you on your path—to tune into that, to reflect on it, and to consciously make a commitment. Not a commitment that this is going to happen, but just a self-reminder in times of difficulty: oh yes, this is what's important. Kind of like a shift of refuge. Taking this moment to consciously, for ourselves, remind ourselves of our commitment and why we're here.

And so with that, I'd like to turn it over to Bhante to take us into the retreat with the refuges and precepts.

Thank you for the wonderful talk.

So I'd like to talk about the three refuges and the five precepts. Traditionally, that's how we start this retreat, and most people think that's only for starting and don't use them in the middle or at the end. But I encourage you actually to use them throughout your practice. It's not just an appetizer.

I'm going to explain them because sometimes we take things for granted. I remember when I was teaching in Uganda, somebody wanted to become a Buddhist, and she asked me how to become a Buddhist. I said, "Oh, you know, you can take the three refuges." Then I explained, and the whole time she was frowning. I asked what was wrong, and she said, "I have a question. What if I cannot feed the three refugees?" She thought that in order to become a Buddhist, you have to feed the three refugees—the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. She was very apprehensive because she said, "That's too much for me."

So I always explain to people what this means, because I don't know—some people may not know this, though I assume most people know what they are.

In order for something to be called a refuge, it has to have two qualities. One is protection, and another is accessibility. Keep those two things in mind: protection and accessibility.

Think of an umbrella. When it's raining, you need an umbrella to protect you from the rain. Whenever you use an umbrella, you always have to protect it. If you don't protect it, there will be many holes, and next time you take it out, you'll get wet because you didn't protect the umbrella—so it can't protect you.

The same thing applies here: we have to protect the Dhamma, we have to protect the Sangha and the Buddha, so they will protect us also. This protection is actually very important. You can even ask, protection from what? Protection from tormenting mind states.

You all know what happens when you meditate. Some difficult mind states arise. Some mind states are very good, but some others are difficult. So we need protection. I think most of the protection we need is even from doubt. At the very beginning of the retreat, we might have doubt. Why did I come here? I could have stayed home and gone for vacation in Rio de Janeiro.

Actually, that's what happened to me when I came here. I came from South America. I'd spent one year in Brazil and Chile and Bolivia. I'd seen so many beautiful things, and a friend of mine said, "Krishnamurti said the truth is a pathless path."

So what are we doing here? Actually, my friend cast some shadows of doubt about this whole thing. I thought, maybe I should have stayed there. So there's doubt at the beginning, actually. We need to sail through the doubt by getting into what we call faith and confidence. Once we take the three refuges, that helps us to cultivate faith and confidence and overcome doubt. But of course, other mental states also—we are protected from them when we take these three refuges.

Then another quality is accessibility. If you are using an umbrella, you don't want to put it in the kitchen. You have to put it at the entrance of your door so that you can access it easily. If you spend one hour looking for an umbrella, that's not a good idea. You should put it very close to where you can see it. The same thing with the three refuges—they should also be accessible. It's not something that exists only in a book. It's really something that you can practice and that can help you. So that's protection and accessibility. As we go along, try to find out how you can use them for protection and accessibility.

The first one is the Buddha. Buddha, of course, means "awakened one." That's what it means. We remember the historical Buddha who figured out this path. Out of gratitude, as Carol says, we take refuge in the Buddha. In the ultimate sense, that's what it means. But in this retreat environment, we want to be able to access the qualities of the Buddha. There are many—nine of them—but at least we can summarize them.

One is purity: purifying your mind of greed, hatred, and delusion. That one you can access. You may not be the Buddha yet, and I'm not one, of course, though my name has "Buddha" in it. But I'm not one, just in case. The name means "protected by the Buddha." So yes, you need to access the qualities of the Buddha. That's the beauty of the Buddha—he didn't have a monopoly over the quality of Buddhahood. He said, you can do it. You can purify your mind of greed, hatred, and delusion. So that's the first quality: purity. The second one is compassion. The third one is wisdom. You can be deeply compassionate and you can be profoundly wise. These things you can actually access as we go. You can cultivate compassion. You can cultivate wisdom. And then you can enjoy the qualities of the Buddha. That can take you towards the path of liberation.

The second refuge is called the Dhamma. Dhamma literally means "to uphold." It comes from a Pali word called dara. It means many things depending on context, but here we can say the ultimate Dhamma refers to the various levels of enlightenment or awakening. We can take refuge in that. Dhamma also means doctrine—what the Buddha taught. So many meanings. In the ultimate sense, of course, these different levels of enlightenment are what we take into account when we take refuge. But in terms of accessibility, it's the qualities of the Dhamma.

One quality of the Dhamma is that it's well expounded. In other words, you don't have to figure this out on your own. I think that's one thing I appreciate about the Dhamma. You don't have to scratch your head to find out where the Dhamma is. It's right there.

So "well expounded" means that the practice of sīla (morality or ethical conduct), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom) is clearly laid out. That's the beauty of this teaching.

For me, when I came to this teaching, I had navigated many teachings, and I really appreciated Buddhism and meditation in general. That's how I started—I didn't start with Buddhism. I started with meditation. After years of research and searching, I found that in this teaching, the Buddha gave us the address. And after giving us the address—let's say 1230 Pleasant Street, Barre, Massachusetts—he also gave us a map or GPS for how to get there.

I appreciate that because many times I've gotten lost with just an address. But when you have a GPS as well, that's enough. The map shows how to practice, and the GPS helps you navigate. But here's the problem: people ask the driver to do it for them. That's asking too much of the Buddha. The Buddha cannot meditate for you. The teachers cannot meditate for you. You have to do it yourself. This is the path. So you can take refuge in that—knowing that you are going to do this practice yourself, and it's accessible because you have the address, you have the GPS. You just have to do the work.

There are many other qualities of the Dhamma—six of them traditionally—but we can also understand that this Dhamma is calling one to come and see. It's directly visible. It's not hidden from us. From the time we start practicing, we can see the Dhamma. We can see our mind with all its compassion, mettā (loving-kindness), wisdom, aversion, fear, anxiety—it's all there. You don't have to go far away. It's just here. We find the Dhamma in the books and texts, but really, the Dhamma is right here in this body and mind. It's directly visible. That's another quality of the Dhamma.

There is also Sangha. Sangha means community—that's what the word means. Here, as a refuge, we take what we call the Sāvaka Sangha, the Ariya Sangha. Those who have practiced and attained enlightenment—whether they are monks, nuns, or laypeople—can be qualified as Ariya Sangha, Noble Sangha, provided they have practiced the Dhamma and achieved at minimum the stage of stream entry.

You can do it. Maybe on this retreat—it's available. You can go to the first level, second level, third level, and fourth level of awakening. The Buddha said you can do it. If you could not do it, he would not be teaching it. So it's possible. We can take refuge in that—the possibility of achieving awakening. And those who have attained are role models for us. If we knew that nobody had ever attained these stages, we wouldn't be here. Why bother if it's not doable? But so many people have done it. So many people have done it in the past. The Buddha said that wherever there is the Noble Eightfold Path, there will always be people who attain awakening at different levels.

Right. That's on one level, actually the ultimate level. But in a retreat environment, how can we access the sangha? We are living here as a community. For me, having lived in a sangha, a conventional sangha, at Bhavana Society for eight years, I discovered some qualities that can be very helpful in this kind of environment.

One of them is support. Carol mentioned this as well. One of the qualities of the sangha is to support each other. When we live in a community, we need to support each other. Without that support, it's very difficult to practice. If you do one thing that is going to disrupt the community, then all the community will be affected. Let's say we all agree on noble silence, and then for some reason you get out your cell phone and hide, thinking, "Oh, nobody's going to see me," and you start calling or texting. That can disrupt us. Just one thing like that. And then we've all been talking to each other. So we need to support each other. In one way, the practice is individual, but on another level, all of us are involved together.

Another quality of the sangha is unity. We are here from different countries, different traditions, and all different shades of background, but what brings us together is unity. We are unified here under one umbrella. We are all aspiring to attain liberation. It's a wonderful aspiration, actually. Think of it. Take a moment to consider this: we all spent a lot of time preparing to come here. And when we come here, it's amazing that we are all unified under that theme. We are all aspiring to overcome suffering and cultivate happiness.

Another quality is to live in harmony. We need to live harmoniously here. At every level—when we are doing walking meditation, when we are getting our food—we have to maintain a sense of harmony.

So this is by way of protection and by way of accessibility. Whenever you take these three refuges, remember that. And it's not only at the beginning; it's also during the retreat. We use them as meditation themselves. Before you begin your meditation, you may want to reflect on the qualities of the Buddha—purity, purifying the mind of greed, hatred, and delusion. You don't have to remember all of them, but you can use perhaps a couple before you start your meditation. This is what we call Buddhānussati, Dham-mānussati, Sanghānussati—reflection on the qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. Whichever resonates with you, you can use them as you go. It's not only at the beginning of the retreat.

Another thing we do along with these three refuges is to take the five precepts. The five precepts form a container that keeps us safe here. I'm sure you're all familiar with the five precepts. In English, the first one is abstaining from killing. I don't expect you are going to be killing insects and birds here. But actually, when we look at those five precepts, the way they are framed is in a way of abstaining. And I'm sure here you have heard so many don'ts. Don't do this. Don't do that. Now you have a list of do's.

Here, abstaining from killing means to preserve life, to protect life. It's actually active. It's not only abstaining, but also you have to protect the physical environment, the mental environment, the spiritual environment. For me, I always stretch things even further. I say, okay, don't kill even your time. You know, after coming here and meditating for one week and you're not going anywhere, you might think, "No, why did I come here?" And then you start killing time.

So, yeah, when is it going to end? And the rest of the time is just walking here, taking photographs. You're just killing time until part one is finished and you go home. So I extend that precept to actually stretch its meaning—not to kill time, not to waste time. Use your time productively here. Of course, don't kill any insects or animals, but I really remind you to preserve and protect all living beings.

Then the second one is not to take what's not given. Again, I don't expect that you'll take things from here—there's not a lot, actually. This is a meditation center. But one positive side of this wonderful precept is to be generous, to be contented. It's a wonderful quality of the heart and mind to be contented with whatever is available in this facility.

I know we don't have a television. Some people actually, when they came to Bhavana Society where I practiced in a monastery, they asked, "Do you have a television?" I said, "No, no, this is a monastery." So, I mean, you're going to miss your television, your commercials at home, maybe your ice cream and all those things. Be contented with whatever is available here. That will help you very much to progress on your path as it unfolds. If you lack contentment, then it will be very difficult for you. That means contentment with the food, your walking path, your cushion.

Actually, I tell you, when I practiced in '99, I wasn't contented with my meditation cushion. I kept looking for the best meditation cushion. And guess what? I didn't find one. Because it was pain. I went through a lot of pain, actually, because I'd spent one year traveling in South America. I mean, I used to sit, but not for one week constantly. So I kept looking for the best cushion that would do the trick to overcome pain. I used to see people sitting without a cushion and wonder, how can they do that? I wished I could get a custom-made one, you know, with fluffies and all this, thinking then I could overcome pain. This can be a form of discontentment. Actually, I went back and forth between the chair and various cushions. I don't know whether the teachers noticed, but what I remember was the highest one. Really, my head stuck out because I was sitting on something like a throne.

So be contented with your cushion. Deal with your pain. Don't make yourself suffer throughout the whole retreat looking for the best cushion. Be contented.

Then the third one is abstaining from all sexual activities. Of course, in a positive way it means to control your mind and calm your senses—not to misuse your sexual energy. Yes, all the senses actually: seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, and thinking. We shouldn't agitate them. We should practice in a way that helps to make them calm and peaceful. That's how we can progress on this path of meditation.

The fourth one is abstaining from telling lies. Again, I don't expect that you tell lies since you are even maintaining noble silence. But something comes up, like when you have an interview with a teacher. I'm not saying you lie, but there's a little bit of an extension of what you see, a stretching. "Yes, I'm a sotāpanna, you know." Well, wait. There's a tendency to stretch our practice, to impress—I don't know—but there's that tendency, that excitement when you're talking about your practice with the teacher. Try to remember this precept: not to tell lies, not even fibs, not white lies.

So this is a very difficult practice because it comes up unconsciously. We just exaggerate our experience. "Oh, you know, I attained the fourth jhāna in this sitting." But you were sleeping the whole time! There's a difference between deep meditation, jhāna, and sleeping. So before you tell the teacher that you're in the fourth jhāna, you might want to check whether you heard the bell ringing or not.

These things come up. The good thing is that we've been there ourselves. We know how we have reported to teachers, and we know how we have stretched the boundaries. Don't take it as telling outright lies, really, but it's a little bit of stretching.

Then the fifth precept is abstaining from taking intoxicants and drugs that lead to heedlessness. So there's a condition there. Of course, I don't expect that you came with a martini here, or a beer, or some kind of joint just to catalyze the process of meditation. I don't expect that. I don't think you even resort to mouthwash—I've heard that people resort to mouthwash! That's not what I expected here, but the positive side of this precept is to stay sober and be mindful all the time, to be diligent.

We are going to remind you of this. One thing we will remind you of is continuity of practice, so that you don't stay forgetful and heedless.

Of course, if you are taking prescription drugs and some medication, you should not discontinue. This precept is really talking about intoxicants that lead to heedlessness. For medical reasons, you can absolutely continue to take your prescription medicine.

So now we are going to take these precepts in the Pāli language. This is your Pāli 101! I'm sure we are all familiar with them already. Just to save time, let us do all the Namo Tassa together, and then I'll do call and response when it comes to the refuges—like Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi—I'll do the whole sentence and then you repeat, alright?

[The group chants the three refuges and five precepts in Pāli]

So now we have taken the three refuges and the five precepts. Now we have started.

I wish you the very best. Reflect on these things during your practice. You can always recall or reflect on your Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. Or you can reflect on your sīla. You can say, "Okay, the last five days I haven't killed anything. I'm not stoned." You can reflect, and before you begin your meditation, if you do this for even the first two minutes, it's amazing how you can free your mind.

Reflect on your generosity—the precept of abstaining from taking what's not given. Just think about the positive side: "Oh, I'm very generous." You can practice generosity here on the cushion. Apart from giving some food in my alms bowl, there's also a lot of generosity that you're doing here.

You have generosity in letting go of your difficult mind states. That's another form of generosity—to be generous enough to let go of your greed, hatred, and delusion. That's it. You can reflect on that.

Thank you very much for your practice. I have a lot of mudita for you, appreciative joy, to see you really practice in the long term in this way. I'm looking forward to interacting with you in a silent mode.

Thank you very much for your practice.

CHAPTER 123

Meditation: Experiencing the Mind and Body Directly with Right Understanding

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this deeply practical talk, Carol Wilson examines sammā diṭṭhi (right view) not as philosophical doctrine but as the attitude we bring to moment-to-moment mindfulness practice. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that right view is uniquely powerful in causing wholesome states to arise, she explores what it means to recognize experience accurately—seeing things as they have come to be rather than as solid, separate entities.
>
> Wilson illuminates how our habitual responses to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience keep us trapped in saṃsāra—the endless cycle of grasping and pushing away. She references the Buddha's teaching on the two darts: while physical pain is unavoidable, the mental anguish we add through resistance is optional. Using personal examples, including her relationship with watching tennis, she demonstrates how we often mistake the yearning itself for pleasure, not recognizing the suffering embedded in our quest for gratification.
> The talk emphasizes that liberation isn't about floating away to another realm but involves a fundamental shift in perception. When we meet experience with bare awareness—recognizing that "burning is like this" or "aversion is like this"—without adding stories of self-reference or judgment, a natural ease emerges. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice how awareness itself remains pure and undamaged regardless of what it touches, gradually building trust in awareness as a more reliable refuge than the pursuit of pleasant feeling. She concludes with Dīpa Mā's insight that when greed, hatred, and delusion are absent, every moment becomes fresh and full of zest.

So tonight I want to talk about essentially right view, but in a very pragmatic way. It's actually at the beginning of every retreat, when I first start talking, I always end up talking about this. And I really tried to talk about something else tonight, but I just couldn't, because this just feels so important to me, to my heart, and just to understanding what we're doing.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya described meditation once as simply experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. That's the little caveat at the end—with the right understanding. Experiencing the mind and body directly moment to moment, as you know, also isn't that simple. So what I want to talk about is what do we mean by right understanding, right view.

When we translate it as "right view," it runs into our tendency to think right means wrong, I'm good, I'm bad. And then we can get our backs up about it right away. I'll actually move into that habit of our mind later on. But one thing the Buddha said about why right view is so important—and this connects to the talk last night about the four right endeavors—is this: "I do not see a single other thing so inclined to cause the arising of wholesome states not yet arisen, or if arisen, to cause wholesome states to further develop and increase, as right view. For one with right view, wholesome states not yet arisen do arise, and if arisen, wholesome states are inclined to further develop and increase." He goes through all the four right endeavors. I'm not going to go through that, but just consider the importance of right view.

The way I want to talk about this tonight is in a very pragmatic, simple way. What wise understanding, what right understanding, can we bring to our moment-to-moment mindfulness practice? What attitude do we bring?

If you look in the suttas, in the discourses, there's a lot of information about right view. It could seem as though you're talking about learning and coming to agree with a whole set of philosophical principles. It's not that. I'm not going to go into that at all tonight. But the way I love to talk about right view—the attitude we bring to our meditation moment to moment—is that it's not about philosophy or theory or believing anything. I actually really like translating right view into English quite literally as recognizing accurately what's occurring in the moment, in our mind, in our body.

So can I just explore a little bit what that means—recognizing accurately—and what's in the way? Why don't we recognize accurately, and why does that cause so much suffering? The right attitude is: it's like this. Without aversion, without clinging, then I can recognize accurately. Is there something I can do about it? Sometimes, apparently not.

What I really love about the Buddha Dhamma and what I read about the Buddha is that despite the fact that there can be millions of very abstruse and precise theories and philosophical concepts and things to learn and lists and all of that, at the core, the Buddha was really concerned with the salient points, the facts of our life. Why are we unhappy? Why do we suffer from dis-ease, and what will free us from that? He just wouldn't get sidetracked into discussions about many fascinating things that he said don't really lead to our own understanding.

What's also really clear is that everything he said—and what I'm saying tonight too—is not about believing this or that, because belief won't do it. Belief may incline us to lend an ear, to listen. But the very famous, common saying of the Buddha is ehipassiko—come and see, come and look, inquire for yourself, investigate for yourself. He's saying turn our attention to what's going on in this moment, in our experience, in our mind, in our body, so-called internal, so-called external, and see what's really going on. This is really the place where we discover the source of dis-ease, the source of freedom from that dis-ease—the seeds of both rising in our own mind and heart stream, here and now.

Something interesting about the Buddha, the so-called peaceful one: after his complete awakening, he woke up into the same world that he was living in before. The world was still filled with war, injustice, inequality, violence, greed, hatred, prejudice. The world didn't change. And he kept on living in that world and engaging in that world. But from what I can understand from reading—I'm not at all claiming to know how the Buddha's mind and heart was—from what he said, from what we can see, what changes is the understanding of what's occurring in one's experience, the understanding of what we really are, what experience really is. And that shift of perspective, that shift of recognition, then of course changes how we understand, how we respond, how we relate to whatever's going on in the world.

And this is the suffering that the Buddha says we can free ourselves from. You can't change the whole external world. But Buddhism also isn't about pacifism—you don't try to change anything. It's about: where can we start? Where does suffering begin? Where does it end in our own experience? The seeds are in our own mind and heart. So what changes? How we recognize and how we respond, internally and externally.

An example is when Dr. Martin Luther King said, "Nonviolence means you not only refuse to shoot a person, you also refuse to hate a person." So where we start is in the recognition—not even refusing to hate a person, but the clear recognition that hatred and greed and desire don't make any sense when we're recognizing things accurately. It's not like we have to somehow get out the pick and the shovel and root out every wanting that's arising in the mind. Have you tried that? Somehow another one seems to find a little hole to come in, because it's the understanding, the recognition.

What I love about right view is that when we recognize accurately, the responses that lead to our habits of desire, our habits of clinging and aversion and confusion and "me, me, me, me, me"—have you noticed that one?—what leads to those habits just stops arising. It's like they're abandoned, but not abandoned by an act of will. The steadiness of clear seeing, the steadiness of clear recognition, mindfulness, naturally is a condition for the arising of wisdom, which is the accurate recognition. It's just so cool.

One phrase that's often used to describe clear seeing, clear recognition—Bhante used it the other night—yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana, translated in the old English translations as "knowledge and vision of things as they are." But several friends recently have told me—friends who know Pali a lot better than I—that a much more accurate translation is "knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be in this moment."

Do you get a sense of the different feeling? "Things as they are"—boom, things, solid, are, not changing. That's kind of how we normally look at things. But "things as they have come to be," to me, gives much more a sense of the causes and conditions all coming together, leading to, bringing us to this moment as it has come to be right now. And it's still in flux. You get a sense of the movement, of the interweaving of all the conditions giving rise to this moment, which is itself a cause and condition for giving rise to the next moment. Things as they have come to be. It keeps me from landing in solidity.

For example, very simply: think about all the causes and conditions that you even know of—and we don't know a lot of them—that have come together to allow you to be sitting here right now. How many? We can start with all the obvious ones, whichever ones are obvious to you. You're healthy. Somewhere back there in some other world, you decided to come here. And here you are. You made all those decisions. The people that support you. The money to come. You're healthy enough. Those are the obvious ones.

But then there's all the other ones that go back to just the fact that we're alive. That your parents got together, or you wouldn't even be here. That there's food to eat. And where does the food come from? The farmers who grow the food. And how do the farmers grow their food? What families support the farmers? How did the food get here? What about the people who drive the trucks and drive the trains? And then, of course, we're using gasoline. So whether we like those oil fields or not, up in Canada, they probably had something to do with the fact that we're sitting here. Because even if you walked, unless you grew the food and you didn't use any fertilizer whatsoever—anyway, we're all connected to everything. If you keep going, where can you stop?

To me, it goes back to the Big Bang. I was reading this book by Bill Bryson about science, and—long story short—he's talking about the static on TV, and some of that static is actually generated from the cosmic rays that came from the Big Bang. So if you're really bored and you watch the static on the TV, someplace you're seeing the universe as we know it coming into existence. That's kind of far out, this whole concept, but things as they have come to be—where do we stop?

It takes away the solidity. We start to experience just a little shake-up of the views that we don't even know are in the background, coloring our perception. This brings us to the distortions of perception. This is really the key to why we don't recognize accurately.

And we don't recognize the distortions. But when we see things as they've come to be, this sense that you can never just stop and say, "Now it's this, separate from anything else." It's like a time-lapse movie of a bulb growing into a plant—there's the stem and the leaves and the flower, and then the flower wilts and drops off and goes back to the earth and turns into earth. And if you kept watching that, where could you stop it at any time and say, "This stem is separate from the bulb"? It's separate from—now it's just stem, now it's just flower. It's like that. There's no kind of resting place, which we hate when we want one. But when it's just "this is how it is in this moment," a whole lot of our sense of confusion and distortion goes away.

So this is really at the heart of awakening—awakening from confusion, from disease. The heart of awakening isn't about moving into some other plane, floating off on a cloud somewhere. It's really, at the most profound level, a fundamental shift of perception. A fundamental shift of how we recognize the nature of reality in a moment—just in a moment. How we recognize affects how we think and describe, respond and react. It's at the heart of everything.

And we can see this even in a little moment when you have what we call an insight. An insight can be personal, psychological. It can be about something that's going on in the practice. But when we see the shift from being caught in the "meanness," the taking it so personally, to seeing just this cause-and-effect process—it's just nature. These particular causes lead to this condition in this moment.

And wishing this moment were different—has anyone ever wished this moment were different? How useful is that? How can this moment be different? It's impossible. Byron Katie, that teacher in California, said, "When you fight with reality, you lose." This moment is this moment. It can't be different. But when we shift to see causes and conditions, taking it so personally, our confused reactions just pop away.

A few of you have given examples like this. Sitting, for example, and there's a lot of pain, wherever in the body. And then sitting with the pain, however you're particularly reacting, responding to it. And then recognizing a lot of aversion in the mind, whichever form that aversion takes—whether it's outward hatred, inward judgment, just basic, pure, unadulterated aversion. Everything's getting worse and worse and tighter and tighter, and there's either a sense of "What's wrong with me? If I could do it right, it would go away," or "If this idiot didn't give us forty-five-minute sittings, I wouldn't hurt." Whatever. We're all wrapped up in the reactions.

And then there's a moment where you see: oh, the pain arising is natural, just natural. If the body sits in a position for some amount of time without moving, pain's going to arise. And the amount of time changes all the time, depending on the conditions of our body at that particular moment. It's just nature. There's nothing personal in it. And then, just seeing that, the personal goes out. Often it's like, "Oh, the aversion is completely extra and actually unnecessary." I mean, this isn't something we're telling ourselves—"Oh, you're bad, this is unnecessary." It's like we just see: oh, this is how it is. Unpleasant physical experience. Aversion is not a necessary response to that. Boom—sometimes the whole bubble just bursts. And it's just what it is.

Now, this isn't always what we might think it's going to be like to have insight. Usually we imagine the bubble bursts, the pain goes away, the mind is really filled with light and bliss, and then we think, "Oh, I got it." And sometimes I feel so much compassion when someone comes in and says it's their second or third retreat, and their first retreat they had the great retreat—filled with light, filled with bliss, all this wonderful stuff happened. I think, oh, I'm so sad for you. Because now you're going to spend God knows how long trying to get that back, never believing that this other stuff going on is actually where we're going to learn the seeds of confusion and the seeds of peace.

None of you believed that, did you? But it's true.

So that's why it's so fascinating, but also important, to recognize what are the distortions—to even see if there are assumptions, ideas in the back of our mind about what's good, what's bad, what's right, what's wrong—or just how we interpret experience without even recognizing that we're interpreting, because it's so familiar. We don't even know it's a view. We just think, "Well, this is just how it is."

So the classic—well, I just want to read from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, one of the classic descriptions of how we keep getting caught.

As the Buddha said when he first woke up and wasn't so inclined to teach—and as Bonnie mentioned—he said, "Oh, there are some beings with a little dust on their eyes, a little distortion, not so much." And he was really moved by compassion, it's said, because when he looked around, he said everyone wants to be happy. We all share that. And in our confusion, in our not really understanding what the potential is, what true freedom from dis-ease is, in beings' efforts to be happy, they keep on doing just the thing that keeps them spinning in confusion, in suffering. And so that moved him to compassion, it is said.

The classic description of this is samsara—that seemingly endless cycle of leaning into, wanting, becoming, getting, losing, the next, the next, the next. Whether you just talk about it in this one life or over lifetimes, it's plenty enough to talk about it in this life to get the sense. Most of you have heard the phrase "ocean of sorrow," right?

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche describes it as a form of renunciation, which coming off of Bhante's talk the other night, I appreciate. He talked about renunciation as the foundation, the root of our path. It "implies not only the strong wish to free oneself from life's immediate sorrows, but more profoundly, the wish to free oneself from the seemingly unending cycle of samsara, which arises from a heartfelt weariness and disillusionment with the endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status."

Let me read that again. Does it resonate at all? The heartfelt weariness and disillusionment—that may or may not resonate—but the endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status. I'm projecting some, of course; I don't know how you all feel. But the quest for gratification, status, approval—I'm assuming most of us would say, yes, you can see how that certainly is a source of suffering and we'd like to abandon it.

But samsara shows up on an even much more subtle level. That's really what I want to talk about tonight: the habits that come in, how we're perceiving moment to moment here with our mindfulness practice.

This can be a challenging teaching, this idea of renouncing the quest for gratification. We might say, okay, approval and all that—we don't need that. But gratification? I didn't really sign up not to have any more gratification. But what are we talking about with that? He's not saying it's bad, but futile. How does it keep us? What keeps us on this path, even when intellectually we know about it?

Just some ways of describing it: that leaning forward, that sense that the next—when Guy talked about sense desire, but it's not just with sense desire—that this next thing will make me happy. That happiness and gratification and peace is going to come from just getting that thing we lack. You get a sense of how it keeps us off balance. It keeps us believing that yearning. As Guy said, we even almost misinterpret that yearning as a kind of pleasantness. It's comfortable anyway, because it's so familiar. Even though it keeps us off balance, this sense of insufficiency—of I'm not enough, this moment isn't enough. Even when things are pretty good, could it always just be a little bit better?

There's a Tibetan saying that describes samsara as the urge to correct. Look at that in your practice. What's happening now? That's the steadiness of mindfulness. It just could be a little bit clearer, a little bit steadier, whatever. That little movement is the movement out of peace into the whole world of wanting and becoming and losing and wanting and becoming and losing.

So it keeps our attention focused outward on the next gratification. It keeps us focused on the object, on the thing. And what we don't see is the vastness, the connectedness, the non-separation. We just see this thing: it's going to be good, it's going to be bad, it's all about me and gratification and getting everything copacetic. We can't recognize accurately what's really going on, because we're not even really looking at what's really going on. The perception is colored by this wanting, by this view that we don't even recognize, because without turning awareness onto our experience, we don't even know there's any other option. That's what's so sad. We don't know there's any other option.

Awareness practice is kind of like a shift to the bigger picture. And we can see, when we're wanting success—or when samsara is keeping us trying to get a new thing, a new thing—and we can see we're not getting it, that is a little more obvious that it's suffering. Although we forget and go for the next new thing.

But what's even more insidious to me—the most insidious aspect—is what Guy mentioned, where we confuse the yearning, this moving, this always trying to have some kind of pleasant feeling, we confuse that with pleasure, with happiness. And because we don't turn around and look at the experience, we just keep looking to the next thing and may not even recognize it.

I know this makes us sound like doofuses. So let me give you a personal example, which will make me sound like a doofus, but that's okay.

I noticed a couple of years ago—and this, for me, was a great description of saṃsāra—because if we knew it was suffering, if we knew it was making us unhappy, we'd be motivated to stop. But we think it's making us happy. That's where it's so insidious.

So for some reason, I'm a big fan of watching professional men's tennis, which is odd since I'm the most unathletic person you could ever meet. But I am. And so I watch it, I get really involved, and it's the only sport I watch. When I've talked about this before, people always come up to me about all their other sports—"Yeah, I really know what you mean, I could never understand sports until I started watching..."

Anyway, I don't do it to make myself miserable. I do it because I think it's enjoyable. I think it's enhancing the quality of my life. Obviously I have a lot of choice about what to do with my time and my life. So I hadn't really explored it until two summers ago.

Of course I have certain people that I most appreciate watching—I'm trying to put it in neutral language. Me and fifteen million other people enjoy watching the same person, so I'm hardly unique or creative about it. But anyway, two years ago this guy was about to win Wimbledon, which is the most prestigious of all the tournaments, and it would have been amazing if he did because at his age it would have put him back to number one—the best possible outcome it could be, right?

And so that happened. It was the best possible outcome. And you're so happy. For how long? A day, two days, not every moment of those days for sure. And then it's over because the Olympics are coming. It's all gone. You have to go through the whole thing all over again.

And then I started noticing what's actually going on when I'm watching a tennis match, when this guy's playing. Am I actually enjoying it? No, it's torment. You can ask my friends who've watched me watch. It's really torment. Sometimes if it's a tie in the fourth set, I have to leave and go take a walk. I just can't bear it. I don't even know the guy. I probably wouldn't like him. That's a whole other thing—what is this all about? It's a fascinating look at the human psyche.

But anyway, I'm doing it because I think it's enhancing the quality of my life. I'm doing it because I think I'm enjoying it. And I'm a nervous wreck, and I hate being nervous. I dislike suspense. I'm watching it all for the occasional amazing shot, which is like a tenth of a second—wow, that's amazing—then it's gone. At least they replay it, so you get it twice, then it's over.

So then I started to look: wow, what am I putting myself through?

So I haven't actually completely stopped, I have to say. But with steady awareness, you can't hide from yourself anymore. It's not quite as totally—I can't really pretend that it's completely pleasant. It's clear to me that it's samsara.

And to me, I love that as an example, because with the big suffering stuff, that's not a hard sell. But with this, it is. And it's not like someone telling me it's bad. It's just the steadiness of awareness of what's actually going on in my mind and body, in my perceptions, without any judgment. I wasn't trying to say I'm bad or good, just asking: what's really going on here? And whoa—it's really different from my idea of it.

This is where I think samsara continues to seduce us. Because until we know or trust really deeply in our heart from our own experience that there's another way of relating to experience, one that offers a different way of peace and happiness—until we know that for ourselves, we don't know any other option.

This may be a somewhat simple example, but I can get quite discouraged sometimes just looking at how this quest for pleasant experience, basically, where it gets us in the world.

I was listening to the BBC this morning. I always like to listen; there's always something interesting about how the world is. So today, they mentioned it was the fifth anniversary of Grand Theft Auto 5, the video game. I'm completely ignorant of video games, so they were describing it. This was all very serious on the BBC. They were interviewing the woman who was the announcer, interviewing all these men—not kids going, "Oh, awesome!"—but very serious, professorial video game expert types. I have no idea what makes somebody a video game expert.

They were talking about how it's one of the crowning achievements of creativity, with very artistic visual qualities and satirical humor. Going on and on about it. Apparently, it's one of the most popular video games of this generation.

So the newscaster asks, "But is it ultra-violent?" And they played some clips of some of the things that are incredibly violent, misanthropic. And these experts say, "Yeah, misanthropic." I looked up misanthropy—here's the definition: hatred, dislike, or distrust of humankind. So these experts are going, "Yeah, okay, it's misanthropic. So what? But it's creative."

And she said, "But isn't it dangerous?" "No, not dangerous. Sure, it's violent. But you don't have to do violence. There are other really cool things you can do in the game too. You have a choice." And the misanthropy, that's just a side note. They're going on about how amazingly creative and wonderful this is.

Okay, easy for me—I'm not sucked up into that. Someone else could say that about tennis, I grant you. But I don't think it's really quite the same. Just to see where we go... And actually, what was more shocking to me wasn't the game or how they described it, but these really serious professor types completely jumping over the violence and the hatred of humankind, saying, "Well, that doesn't matter. That doesn't make it dangerous"—never mind if 135 million people are buying this thing. What's getting put into the minds of all of us?

We can't do anything at that level about what other people choose to put in their minds and how they choose to look at what's coloring their perceptions. But we can do that for ourselves.

That's what we are doing here.

The classic way, of course, that the Buddha describes one of the habits of misperception that we get into—and you all know this, this is nothing you don't know, I just read it again from the sutta because it always deeply touches me—is how the Buddha describes all of our experience, the "all," as simply kind of rotating sixth sense experiences. Has someone said that here? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching with the body, and the mental world of thinking and emotions, formations. That's all that's happening, over and over and over. As Joseph says, seventeen billion times in a moment, fast. But that's it. And then we just construct all these explanations and worlds out of it.

So these are happening over and over and over. And what we're really good at practicing is: something comes—a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste—and it comes together with that, our minds feel it very subtly as being kind of pleasant, or kind of unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is something we often don't notice, and we'll talk about that more in the instructions in a few days.

But the net effect, just in a general going through our day, is we really practice: as things come up, if it's pleasant, we like it, or we think it's good, or we don't even know we like it, but there's the leaning. If it's unpleasant, it's assessed as off, bad, wrong, gotta be fixed—something. If it's neither pleasant nor unpleasant, it's either okay or we don't really notice. It doesn't mean much about me, so it's not very interesting, right?

We practice this; we've practiced this our whole life. It's not bad or good, but it's so comfortable, so familiar, so "how it is," that this becomes the lens through which, when we're not aware of it, we assess and evaluate experience. If it's on the pleasant end of things, it tends to be seen as acceptable, or good, or going in the right direction—even if we don't even get into clinging. The bliss states, for instance—very few people come and say, "You know, my practice really stinks. I sit down, the mind gets calm, and bliss arises. I'm really having a problem with this." Very few, until they understand.

The unpleasant, just subtly unpleasant—that becomes the lens through which we evaluate so much of experience. It's bad, it's wrong, I'm wrong, it shouldn't be happening, whatever. And so we're right back in that cycle of samsara: get rid of the unpleasant and get more of the pleasant. Not only just to feel good, but because the unexamined deep belief is that really, pleasant is the best we can do as human beings, that this is where freedom and happiness lie. But we don't say that to ourselves—that sounds rather simplistic.

And I'm sitting here blabbing this, telling it to you, I've said it a million times, and I look at it in myself and I still get amazed. Even when my mind's in a fairly present, subtle state and I start to feel I'm kind of glitching on, caught up on something, I sit and look at it and go, "Oh, wow. Holding onto the pleasant again." Not just holding, but thinking the pleasant is right and unpleasant is wrong. Let's just call it that way. And then we get into struggle with it.

Here's the Buddha. Now this is the part that is always very poignant to me. The obvious: he talks about an "untaught worldling," which is a word in Pali. When he feels a painful bodily feeling, he or she worries and grieves, laments, beats her breast, weeps, and is distraught. So she thus experiences two kinds of unpleasant feeling: bodily and mental. Have you noticed that? It's as if you were pierced by a dart, and following the first being hit by a dart, you shoot yourself with a second dart. My knee hurts, I'm so bad, I'm so awful, it's so wrong. The two darts.

What does an awakened person do? They experience one sort of bodily, physical, unpleasant feeling. And that's all, this peace around it. But this is what unawakened people do when we don't look: having been touched by a painful feeling, we resist it and resent it. We pull away, we push away. And under the impact of that painful feeling, one then proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness.

Why? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness.

I find this so poignant. We don't know of any other escape from painful or unpleasant feelings except to go grab some pleasant feeling somewhere. Can you relate to that at all? It's not that there's anything bad about it—it's just that that's the only way we know.

If we don't know that there's a path, if we don't know that the real freedom of our mind and heart doesn't mean we have to get away from all unpleasant feelings—because that's impossible—but that there's a peace, an ease that allows our heart and mind to rest fully in this moment. Pleasant moment, unpleasant moment, neither pleasant nor unpleasant moment. Fully, without resistance, without clinging, without making up a whole story about what it means about me. It's just this.

You get a sense of how much ease that brings. A painful feeling in my knee—we're picking simple stuff, but it's also very true with our complex personality habits and our deep-seated tendencies toward self-hatred or blame or shame. All of these are brought about by understandable causes and conditions, arising in this moment. We can understand those causes and conditions, so they're valid. But the arising itself is extremely unpleasant, scary. Whether we then turn that unpleasantness back on ourselves with more blame, or whether we turn the aversion outward on the world, either way we're in the spinning of more wanting, more aversion—back in the futility of samsara.

And that moment of "Okay, pain is like this. Self-hatred feels like this"—one of my teachers uses that languaging a lot, and I've found it enormously helpful. I'm all caught up in some story, and I think I'm being mindful. I'm naming every thought, I'm looking at all this stuff. But I'm missing the big picture, the giant fire that's coloring my whole mind that's paying attention.

The Pali word for aversion is dosa. I like it. Short, sweet, clear—it colors a lot of territory, and I don't get so caught up in the story. Instead of going, "Aversion to myself, that's based on my past conditioning, and that's loneliness, that's alienation, oh I see the thought, I see that..."—just dosa. Dosa is like this. Oh.

In that moment, it's unpleasant. But awareness can just totally be there without needing to move away, without needing an explanation, without needing to do anything—just open, present, touching it with kindness. Or a really beautiful pleasant experience, same thing. Wow, bliss is like this. No big story about me, no big explanation, no going in, no pulling away. Instead of the struggle between "Oh my knee, and what's going to happen, and like Monty was talking about—the hospital, I'll never walk again, and what about the past, and what about the future, and me me me"—just: Oh, burning is like this. You actually feel the burning more clearly. But that's okay.

I really feel this—I've experienced it so many times. This is my daily life too. I'm not just talking about sitting on the cushion, particularly with complicated mental and psychological patterns. Like for me, self-hatred is a big pattern. And I know a lot of the past history—personal, familial, societal—the conditions that have given rise to this pattern in my particular individual psyche. And then I recognize that this particular individual pattern is also representative of something larger. I'm not the only person in the world who experiences this, I'm pretty sure.

When I'm fighting it or trying to understand it or trying to do something about it or trying to own it, I'm still subtly caught in the belief that it's unpleasant and it's bad, it's wrong. But when I can say, "Oh, self-hatred feels like this"—there's this feeling of complete relief that comes when I know my full awareness has just landed in what's really happening with no more contentiousness. Non-contention with reality. In this moment, it feels like this. There's an ease that comes.

That is what the Buddha is saying. For one who doesn't have a path, what is a cleaner, a more sure escape from unpleasant feeling? It's simply to open into what's happening now with simple, pure mindfulness—without assessment, without self-reference, without judging. Just: it's what it is.

But if we don't do that, he says, the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feeling comes to be a habit in the mind. And then the tendency to resist unpleasant comes to be a habit in the mind.

And the tendency—this is my language—to have no clue about neutral feeling becomes a habit in the mind. Habit, because that's what we do over and over. That's all. It's just because it's what we do.

And so I feel so grateful just to know that there's another possibility. A lot of the time, my mind goes back into the habit. But even recognizing the habit is, again, a moment of awareness. "Oh, yeah, I'm really caught in wanting. It feels like this."

So the mindfulness—what it does, the steadiness of mindfulness that we're trying to cultivate here, this moment after moment after moment—first is that bare attention, as I just described. Just learning how to bring a mind that's in that moment, as Tejaniya says, with the right understanding. Meeting what's happening now, just as it is, without judging it. Pleasant—good. Unpleasant—bad. Neutral—who cares? No. Just as it is. Just as it is.

And the steadiness of that represents a shift. Generally, we're so engrossed in the object—and this is another thing samsara does: get this, get rid of that, me, this, that—that we don't see the big picture. So with our steadiness of mindfulness, of awareness, what's really happening is we're shifting from entrancement with objects to seeing the process. How is the mind working? How is confusion and suffering arising in this moment? How is it dissipating? How is it being abandoned? How does it not arise in this moment? How does wholesomeness arise? We're really getting more interested in that.

So when we speak of awareness—Ajahn Sumedho has this line: "Awareness is the point that includes," meaning it's just at this moment, but in this moment it includes everything, anything. Or the way I say it: awareness doesn't care, meaning awareness doesn't have preference. It's not that you can be aware of something so horrible it's going to damage awareness. That can't happen. We can forget about awareness, but once you remember again, does awareness seem kind of ragged? Does it seem like it got a little worn out? Does it seem like somehow it got all dirty? No. Awareness is just pure and vivid and clean, always. When we again remember a moment of mindfulness, here it is.

The way I think of it is that for me, the love of awareness or the trust in awareness gradually becomes—in the habits of my mind and heart—stronger or more reliable, more trustworthy than the love or trust in the search for pleasure. As long as my comfort, my love, my trust, my refuge, even unconsciously, is in pleasure—if that's where I find my comfort—then subtly, in the big stress moments, that's where the mind will go.

But more and more, we start to really experience just those little moments. Notice them, those little moments that are so freeing, when it's just the awareness of something pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, either one. Just that ease when the whole construction of "me" and "good" and "bad" and "this" and "that" and "what did they say" and "what do I mean" and "what's going to happen"—ah, burning—falls away. Just notice the peace, the freedom, the space that comes from that. Because noticing these wholesome moments also reinforces the trust, the confidence, your own confidence from your own experience. That's the only place it can ever really come from.

So in recognizing process rather than being caught in objects, let me give you a couple of examples. One very simple one that I like, again from Tejaniya. He said, very simply—and this isn't even meditation—someone knows a car is passing, right? You're aware that a car is passing. He asks, "Is this meditative awareness?" And he says no, anyone knows a car is passing. A dog knows a car is passing. What's the difference? What would make it meditative awareness, where we're aware of process?

His way of saying it is: How do you know you are aware that a car is passing? What are you aware of that's actually happening? So you would notice if there's the sense, the experience of hearing, the experience of seeing. And then you'd be aware of the mental process—the sense of hearing, maybe the perception of car, or the mental image of car. You get a sense of really recognizing the process that's happening, versus just "oh, a car is passing." We don't really look at it otherwise.

Do you get a sense of what that means? And to me, it's a lot more interesting.

What was really happening just then? Because there's only those six things: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body, mental constructs.

Another way to understand how these habits the Buddha talked about—the dart of aversion to the unpleasant, clinging to the pleasant, not noticing the neutral—how they come to distort perception. Starting to explore that is, again, also moving into process.

So I think Guy said the other night, but it's just looking when there's real greed in the mind, that real taṇhā, that thirst, that leaning forward. As Guy said, focus on the thirst. But notice the effect in the mind—how it kind of narrows and limits our perception. And what we perceive, if we're perceiving the thing we want, the Tibetans have a saying that wanting puts feathers on the object. You know, it makes it look so much more attractive. If you see it later and the wanting is gone, you think, "Huh?" Have you ever bought something, like something to wear, and you get it home and you go, "What was I thinking?"

Or an example I often give: I was walking in the desert in Yucca Valley a few years ago. And I love it there—the few animals, the Joshua trees, the space, the clarity. I just love walking in the desert. And one morning I was walking there, and the thought came through my mind, "Maybe I'll see a tortoise." They have these large land tortoises. They're few; you don't see them very often.

And I was quite happy until that thought came—which could have just come and gone. The thought itself is not a problem. But the clinging—ah, that thought was pleasant. And I glommed on: "Yeah, maybe I'll see a tortoise." And then I didn't recognize until I got home that the rest of the walk was, "Where's a tortoise? Where's a tortoise?" And all of a sudden everything became not tortoise, not tortoise, not tortoise. Everything I would look at, all I wanted was the tortoise. And nothing else counted.

That's what wanting does. It shuts us out. It really narrows and limits and imprisons the mind.

Aversion does the same thing—the pushing away of what we don't like. But have you noticed that when something's occurring that you don't like and you push it away, somehow it seems to expand and take over the world? Is there a sound in here you've heard that you really don't like? And can your mind just go, "Okay, one sound," and pay attention to something else? Oh no. It's married to that sound.

Thich Nhat Hanh gives a great example. If you have one little rough tooth, can you keep your tongue off of it? The rest of your teeth are fine. You're not running your tongue over your teeth all day. But that one rough tooth—forget about it. And then the aversion gets stronger. And you feel the tooth, which makes the aversion stronger. And then the aversion completely colors everything. And then if some poor soul walks in front of you while you're filled with this aversion over this rough tooth, you're like, "I can't believe they're doing—" whatever judgment comes out. And then you think, "What's the matter with me? Judging, I'm so horrible." And the aversion is just coloring everything.

Can you relate to that at all, or am I the only one?

And until we see it, we don't know. When we see it: "Oh, aversion is like this." I'm serious. It's not like every moment is like that.

But it can really be, oh, aversion. I'm so glad to see it. Really. Because once we see it, we can feel it. Aversion is unpleasant. So it's the same thing—we don't want to be with it because it's unpleasant. But you can feel it. You can relax into it. You don't have to, as Pema Chödrön says, spend your life walking around tensed up as if you're sitting in a dentist's chair waiting for the next unpleasant experience to hit. It's just like this. I haven't yet managed to do that in the actual dentist's chair, but I think about it.

The third delusion is neutral feeling, and it manifests in two ways. One is, of course, that it's all about me. This is really the third delusion, and it's so much fun to notice—really, it's fun to notice if you don't take it so personally. And it isn't personal. Every single person here, unless one of you is completely liberated—and I don't know, maybe you are—but otherwise, we're all sitting here, and so much of what happens, whatever it is—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, never mind thinking—how many degrees does it take to come back to me? They talk about six degrees of separation. I would say probably not even one degree of separation, right?

Somebody walks by—oh, they're walking better than me. Somebody has a pair of shoes—I'd like to have a pair of shoes like that. Somebody makes a noise, or you make a noise—what's everyone thinking about me? It's amazing. Oh, the fall is so lovely, and I'm so lucky to be here in it. Just to notice this. Not to judge it. Because the judgment becomes, "I shouldn't be thinking about me. I should be more enlightened than to think about me." Forget about it. It's going to happen. But it isn't personal. Just notice it. It's really fun. And then it's not personal.

The last thing I want to say is that the other way we get lost in delusion is—and this is one of the reasons it's so hard to maintain the steadiness of awareness—that so much of our experience is just simply mundane, repetitive experience. Why do we get bored with walking? We're waiting for something worth paying attention to to happen. Why do we kind of zone out brushing our teeth? It's not really compelling—okay, brush the teeth, big deal. But when's the insight going to come?

How much of our experience is just this moment again and again and again? How many times do we get out of bed and brush our teeth and go to pee and put on our socks every day? Every moment's different. And so this kind of glossing over, dulling out with the mundane, waiting for something worth paying attention to, waiting to get an insight from—this is, again, the same thing as being caught in samsara. So just wake it up in this moment with the simplicity of awareness.

I'll end with a quote from Dipa Ma, this little Indian lady who was an amazing, amazing yogi, just filled with metta and concentration. She was remarkable. She said: "There is so much sameness in ordinary life. We are always experiencing everything through the same set of lenses. But when greed, hatred, and delusion are not present, you see everything fresh and new all the time."

Every moment is new. Life was dull before. Now every day, every moment is full of taste and zest.

So let's just sit quietly with taste and zest.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 124

Faith (Saddhā) and Determination: Allies of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 1h03

In this talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the challenging waves of emotion, memory, and difficult mind states that often arise during intensive practice. She normalizes these experiences as essential purification processes, explaining that when mindfulness and concentration deepen, unconscious patterns naturally surface for release.

Wilson introduces two mental factors (cetasikas) as powerful allies of mindfulness: saddhā (faith) and adhiṭṭhāna (determination). She clarifies that saddhā is not about believing doctrines but is an experiential quality that brightens and purifies the mind, creating willingness and confidence to continue practice. Drawing from the Abhidhamma, she describes how faith clarifies the mind like clearing muddy water and manifests as non-fogginess and resolution. She distinguishes between wisdom followers and faith followers, encouraging practitioners to discover what personally inspires their practice—whether devotion to teachers, verified experience, or understanding the Dhamma.

Regarding adhiṭṭhāna (determination), Wilson describes it as a collected alignment of energy around wholesome motivation. She identifies four qualities that accompany genuine resolution: wisdom (paññā), honesty, relinquishment, and calm—noting that authentic determination feels steady rather than agitated. Through personal stories including her challenging experience learning German and the inspiring biography of Master Sheng Yen, she demonstrates how these qualities support perseverance through difficulty, transforming obstacles into practice opportunities.

So just as I was walking in here tonight, it's such a beautiful night with Venus, and it's so still and lovely. And then I walked in here, and it's really hard to imagine how wild it could be inside your little heads, what's going on. Sometimes it can seem so dissonant—one, the other, and all of it is samsara.

My sense at this point in the retreat... long retreats kind of go in a wave. Not everybody's in the same place, but there's a kind of a flow that we can sometimes feel. And so my personal sense, my limited sense from just some of the people I've been meeting with, is that you guys are cooking. It really may not be the recipe you thought you were ordering. It certainly may not be the one you want. But I just want to say that this is what the practice is.

It's easy to think, when we talk about the instructions and talk about the steadiness of awareness and all the subtleties of what we see, that it should be a certain way. And then you just get hit upside the head with really strong patterns of thought, memory, the emotions that go along with it, and in really intense waves. Has anybody experienced such a thing? And often that may come after you've started to feel a little calmer, started to feel there's a little more steadiness. "Okay, I got it licked." And then suddenly —whop.

As Pema Chödrön says, it can be helpful to think not so much that we're being with the unpleasant as with the unwanted. Because that helps us see what's really the suffering in the mind. I don't want this stuff. I want to look at intention. But instead, there's a wave of memories that we may have had conscious access to, but all of a sudden everything we ever did that we feel remorse for comes up. Or something triggers unworthiness and self-hatred and it just comes in like a cloud and starts distorting every thought that arises. Or rage. Or guilt. Or grief.

All of it's valid. And often it's not new information, but the thoughts will come, and then this flood of memories will come, together with the strong emotion that was generated at the time it happened. And it goes in waves, of course. And you can feel like... most people do feel like... A yogi years ago used to come in and say to me, "It's all gone to hell in a handbasket." And I'd think, what does that mean? I mean, you get a drift of what it means. What's a handbasket? I'd get sidetracked in that. But the sense is: this isn't what's supposed to be happening, and I'm certainly not growing in awareness and wisdom through this.

There's no question it's difficult. We can feel like we get filled with doubt, filled with self-recrimination. We get sidetracked into the story and the memories. We think "overwhelm"—like someone said today, about to be overwhelmed. It can even be a little bit overwhelmed.

But what we don't realize often—most of the time, everyone I've talked to—is that you think it's just overwhelmed and you're just lost. It gets so strong and you're feeling the grief or the anger or the rage or the remorse or whatever it is, to the point that you need to go and just sob for a couple of hours. And our tendency is to think, well, this has blown it, and maybe somehow I can patch my practice back together.

But this is what's happening at this moment. It's these cycles of... Someone reminded me of a way of speaking. There are cycles of purification of heart and mind, and then purity. The two go back and forth. The purification in a way is when all this stuff is coming up. You feel you're being overwhelmed, but there's really mindfulness still running through it. We often don't recognize it because the emotions and the thoughts are a lot stronger than the mindfulness, but we're still meeting it. With awareness there's a shift in how we're being with it from our regular daily life. And in fact it's coming up so strong, deeper into retreat, as a result of mindfulness and concentration. As the mind gets purer, the conscious or unconscious habits of kind of keeping stuff down aren't being fed, and boom, boom.

I remember one retreat I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, who was a very tough taskmaster. You come in, you report—note, note, note—how it's supposed to be. And I had utmost confidence in him, and I really felt his deep compassion. So I wasn't really afraid of him somehow. In the interview—every other time, yeah, but not in the interview.

I was having one of these times that went on, off and on, nothing steady state for days, where a memory would come up, and a kind of grief and loss, and I would just be sobbing, sobbing. And I would be noting "sobbing." I'd go in and just describe what happened. I wouldn't give the story, I'd just describe what happened.

And he was so happy. Because he said, "This is dukkha. This is understanding dukkha."

Just what Bonnie talked about last night. We would like it if we got these little messages—oh, dukkha, dukkha, now I get it, it's like that, la la la, that's a little bit of dukkha, I see, it's suffering. It doesn't work like that. We don't really see what's feeding it until we're spinning in it. And then we pop out. The mind calms down, something else goes on, you're just eating lunch and tasting that little burst of flavor or whatever.

Then there can be a period that's more calm where you're just feeling the breath or watching the walking steps. And that's kind of like the purity of mind in that time—where the mind isn't distorted by the fear, by the kilesas, by the self-judgment. And they support one another.

So I just want to say this is happening for many people, and it's a very important part of the practice. Just seeing how changeable it is. From the purification to the purity, from contraction to expansion, from wild west to oh yeah, la la la, just feeling the lifting and feeling the pressure. It's like nature, right? Just changeable—how could it be otherwise?

What I want to speak about tonight is two qualities of mind that can help support us. Two wholesome qualities—there are many wholesome qualities that come along with mindfulness—but I want to call our attention to these two in particular. Because there are times when it's going wild like this, or you're bored out of your mind, that could be it too. There's mindfulness, there's awareness, we're pulling it along, but it could use some support. It's getting some support, but I want us to recognize these two qualities tonight.

Because the way this works is huge, like firestorms, and then it passes, it's calmer, then the firestorm may come up again. Have you noticed? It's the same stuff, but maybe it's a little bit less intense. These patterns—don't expect them to completely go away. Please. Or if you do expect that, notice it, and don't give it a lot of energy.

But what does go away is the stickiness. It's like the Velcro. The me, me, me. You know how Velcro starts to get worn out and then it doesn't really stick and then the thing comes and it just doesn't stick at all? It's like that.

So I can feel a wave of self-hatred coming in. That's one of my favorite friends. If I don't recognize it, it's distorting everything, every thought I have. I can kind of now feel it coming in like a wave. I can see what triggered it, and without having to analyze my whole history—I know it, it's enough already—I can just feel it coming in. Sometimes the immediate cause is just that my mind is tired. I don't have to go looking for a big thing. You feel it come like a wave and go, okay, self-hatred's here now, feels like this. Don't trust anything your mind tells you as long as it's got the blinders on. That's how it is. Nothing personal. Passes out.

So, the two mental factors, qualities of mind I want to point us to tonight are saddhā, usually translated as faith, and adhiṭṭhāna, which Bhante spoke about, usually translated as resolution or determination. I'm going to speak about them tonight quite specifically in terms of recognizing them in our heart and mind, how they can support our practice here. Because they're both really huge topics and there's so much to say about each one, so I'm being quite specific in the way I want to speak about them tonight.

They're allies—allies of mindfulness. Not only in the difficult times, the unwanted times, but in those unwanted times when we can't quite find the strength of mindfulness, we can sometimes find these. Other times too.

So, mental factors—what do I mean, how does that work? First, I just want to mention: we keep talking about the mind. The mind does this, the mind sees that. And in listening, I hear—maybe you don't hear it this way—but I hear how it could easily sound as though the mind is some steady thing that's doing stuff and recognizing, some kind of blob, usually up here, but wherever it is, as if it's a thing. But to point out: the mind, what we're calling the mind, is actually a dynamic process that in itself is cognizing the flow of events. It's not a steady state thing, kind of cognizing the mind itself.

This is Silananda, who was a Burmese Sayadaw and scholar. He spent quite some time in California and has since passed on. He's describing the two component aspects of what we call mind in this form.

First, consciousness—remember, this is a test. Guy spoke about consciousness, one of the five aggregates, viññāna. You remember that? It's just that natural knowing faculty, very simple. Consciousness is arising in every moment of contact, and consciousness is that which is aware of an object—the basic awareness of an object.

The other component part of the mind are all the mental factors arising in that moment, in that consciousness. Silananda explains that mental factors are what influence a moment of consciousness. They arise together with the consciousness and modify it.

So really, what we're calling mind is this moment-to-moment arising of viññāna, consciousness, and various mental factors—whole bunches of them coming together. What we're calling an unwholesome mind state is when the mental factors are kind of led by greed or aversion or hatred or fear, confusion, not knowing what's going on. A wholesome mind state is when those are absent—it could be led by compassion, it could be led by mindfulness, it could be led by concentration. But they come with several of them together, not all by themselves.

I just want to clarify that in the way I'm talking, faith, saddhā, and adhiṭṭhāna—resolution, determination—are mental factors. They're qualities of mind that arise together with mindfulness and other wholesome states. They're not by themselves, but sometimes they're the stronger one, and we can recognize them.

For instance, one moment of citta—citta is a word that includes consciousness and the mental factors together—one moment of citta with sati, with mindfulness and wholesome qualities, makes it more likely that it will influence the next moment. Hence, continuity is really helpful. It starts to build up the momentum. Same way when the Buddha says what we habitually ponder and think about, that becomes the inclination of the mind. It's like the laws of physics, like inertia. A body in motion tends to stay in motion. We kick the wheel of mindfulness, it's easier to go. We jump on the wheel of aversion, it's easier to roll. It's nothing personal. That's what's so interesting to watch.

So that's the way I want to talk about these factors—in terms of recognizing the quality, what their effect is in our own mind, in our practice.

Faith, saddhā. The first thing I want to say is that many people in English have various relationships and reactions to that word. Some very positive, some not so comfortable. Faith, saddhā, as a mental factor, as we experience it in our mind, is not about believing something. Often we hear it talked about—if you're reading the suttas, saddhā is faith in Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. And it can easily come to seem like, "I have to believe these things—right view, the whole list of things, and what the Buddha and the Dhamma and the philosophy say—to become a card-carrying Buddhist, and that's what faith means." People can have different reactions to this.

On one retreat a couple of years ago, one of the teachers mentioned faith. It wasn't in terms of "you've got to believe this," just mentioned faith as a wholesome, supportive factor. And in the questions and answers the next day, a man said, "So you mentioned the F word"—which for you non-English speakers, I can't really elaborate, but it's not a good thing. It's a word you don't really want to say, not a nice word. That illustrated his relationship to the concept of faith from his past history.

That's not what we mean in terms of a mental factor. It's a practical, experiential factor that uplifts and brightens the heart and mind. It brings this quality of brightness, expansiveness, energy.

And it's essential in the way that the Buddha described the path. When he talks about the five spiritual faculties—five qualities of mind that, when there's momentum of mindfulness, when we talk about intelligent awareness, all those five faculties are there together to some degree, not always balanced. The first one is saddhā, faith, which leads to viriya, effort and energy, to sati, mindfulness, to samādhi, balance and collectedness of mind, to paññā, wisdom. And they cycle around and support one another. So it's not like faith is just a nice thing—it serves a very essential function in our onward leading on the path, in our practice.

The Abhidhamma can be interesting in this regard. There are descriptions of each of the mental factors—what they feel like, how they are in our experience. I'll just read a little about saddhā: "It has the characteristic of trusting. Its function is to clarify, as when a muddy lake becomes clear." So you can see the difference between doubt and faith. Doubt asks, "What's going on? What should I do?" In faith, there's "Oh, it's like this." There's a brightness, a clarity. "Or to set forth, as one might set forth to cross a flood." Sayadaw U Pandita would describe this quality, this aspect of saddhā, as a willingness to do. That's how he would describe its effect—it gives a willingness to do in the mind. To do what? To show up for the next moment. It's that brightness, that energy. "And it manifests as non-fogginess, as confidence, or as resolution." So you can see these are really supportive qualities: confidence, resolution, willingness to do—which is how it leads into viriya, into energy, into the willingness to just keep showing up.

This uplift, this brightening of the heart and mind, is actually what enables one to even begin—it purifies in that moment, just for a moment, the heart and mind so that we can actually hear the Dhamma, so we can hear how things are. When we're distorted and clouded with confusion, with longing or aversion, we can hear the Dhamma, but it doesn't really quite get in. Has it ever happened that you've heard something you've heard a million times before, Dhamma-wise I mean, and you suddenly think, "Oh, that's what that means"? And it can keep happening on deeper and deeper levels as the mind is brighter, clearer. So this is a key aspect of our own practice, our own path.

There are many suttas where the Buddha, when he begins to give instructions to someone, looks through an assembly—you know, that amazing mind he has—thinking, "Okay, who here is ready to hear the Dhamma? Who here is ready to hear how it is? Whose mind is ready?" He'll look and see. There's one sutta where a poor beggar afflicted with leprosy comes to the edge of the sangha thinking, "Oh good, here's a big group of people. Maybe somebody's giving out food." He sits down and sees it's the Buddha. He thinks, "Oh, nobody's giving out food, but I might as well just sit and listen." And the Buddha looks out and recognizes that this man—Suppabuddha was his name—is ready to hear the Dhamma. So the Buddha looks, and it's not about anybody's state in life, or how rich or poor, or their background, or their gender, or anything. He just looks and knows: this person is ready to hear.

But then he doesn't start by blasting them with anattā. He always starts with gradual teachings to bring the mind along. He talks about generosity. He talks about sīla. He talks about different aspects of conditions and karma and renunciation in order to brighten the mind. The mind becomes bright, purified, pliable, free from hindrances—and then it's able to hear the Dhamma in that moment. So, in a little bit of a way like that, saddhā has that function in our mind in moments.

In terms of faith, it's said the immediate cause is something that inspires, that arouses that faith—something to place faith in. Classically in the suttas, it's the three refuges: Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha, which Bonnie talked about so beautifully the other night. But it doesn't have to be that. That's where we get sucked into the object again and think, "I have to have faith in that." Instead, it's about looking within. I want to drop this in for you: as you go through the day, tune into what it is that inspires you, that re-inspires, that deepens—what you can access as your own faith. Faith in terms of what brightens your mind in the difficult times. What helps you remember or strengthens a sense of trust and confidence? Depending on how your mind works, it may be confidence in the teachings, confidence in the Buddha, confidence in your own verified experience—which is called verified faith—or confidence in someone who has really inspired you, where thinking about them brings it up again. That's called bright faith. Look and see.

There isn't a right thing, but knowing what it is for you matters deeply.

This practice of awakening is not like, you know, being into Formula One and thinking about a certain kind of car brightens your mind. We're not talking about that. I just want to be sure that's all clear. But to look for yourself—this is really important.

Another aspect of faith that's true for some people, though it doesn't have to be, is that sometimes saddha is thought of as synonymous with devotion. You've probably noticed here in this particular place that the way we're teaching, devotion isn't a huge aspect of how we're presenting things—which is more reflective of us than anything else. But faith is often inspired and strengthened by this quality of devotion, which can be this real sense of placing one's heart upon, being inspired by a teacher, by the sangha, or by thinking about the Dhamma. But it doesn't have to be that, because we're all different personality types.

A while ago, some of us were having a group discussion with Ajahn Sucitto, who is an Englishman, a monk in the Amaravati tradition from the followers of Ajahn Chah. He's one of the followers of Ajahn Sumedho—a really lovely and, I found, quite inspiring and deep person. He's been a monk for thirty-five years, I think. We were just having a discussion, a bunch of Western Vipassana teachers and him. We'd been sitting a retreat with him, and in those monastic-style retreats, there's just a more natural emphasis on devotion, which manifests through chanting—chanting a lot of the homage to the Buddha, the qualities of the Buddha, chanting the qualities of the Dhamma, the qualities of the Sangha. Bringing that to heart, to mind, over and over. And people at those retreats love it.

He was saying to us, "Well, what do you all do to inspire faith? Because here these people love it so much, and you don't do it." And the people that come here love what we do. We said, "Yeah, they're the ones who come here." And in some of the retreats we do, there are people who really miss that devotional element, for sure. And there are other people like that man who talked about faith as an F-word. There isn't a right or a wrong.

So I'm just encouraging you to look and see for yourselves what lights you up. Devotion—it may be the qualities of the Buddha or the Dhamma or Sangha teachers. But I want to encourage you to tune into what's been meaningful for you. If you are devotional, what lights it up for you? Who have been your own teachers, your own inspirations? It doesn't have to be a Buddhist person. Whatever it is that really lights you up and brings that energy, that cohesive energy, that brightness in mind that kind of purifies the heart and keeps you on the path for the next moment. Sometimes it's surprising where it can come from.

I don't particularly think of myself as a devotional type, although I have to say it tends to come in more and more over the years. So now I find in my little house I have photos of some teachers who've just really been meaningful and inspired me. Ramana Maharshi, who you may know as an Indian saint in southern India who died in 1950—before I was even born—but lots of photos of him around the house. And when my mind's all caught up and the velcro is really working well, I just kind of look at a photo. It's hard to stay all worked up when I look at a photo of Ramana. He's just right.

But even more surprising to me—and I'm just giving this as an example—several times I've gone to Tiruvannamalai, his ashram in Tamil Nadu in southern India. He went there after his awakening, when he was sixteen or nineteen years old, because he was drawn to the mountain, Arunachala, as a holy mountain, an inspirational mountain to him. As you come up to it, it's just flat, flat, flat. And then there's just this big hill rising up in the middle of the flatness. He spent the whole rest of his life there, built his ashram around it, and really felt that it was all about Arunachala, all about the mountain.

So, okay, fine. I went to the ashram, which is a lovely ashram, really well organized, and I really like being there. And over time, it's like the mountain just starts coming in, coming in. You just look at the mountain. And there's a saying Ramana always used: "Arunachala, thou dost root out the ego of those who hold thee in their heart." Something like that. And I'd think, yeah, right. Because I'm from New York. I'm a cynic. The mountain's rooting out ego in my heart? Give me a break.

Mountain's just sitting there.

Well, I have a long photo of Arunachala on my altar, which I look at every day, and I cannot explain it. But luckily with saddha, you don't have to explain it. You just look at what's the effect. It brightens. I'm getting chills talking about it. I have no clue why. But when I tune in, it's the effect of saddha. It brightens my mind and heart in that moment. There's an energy, an uplift, an openness, a willingness to just look at what's going on. It's really quite amazing. So look and see what's true for you in that way.

The Buddha talked about various kinds of followers in different suttas. I'm just going to briefly mention a part of one sutta. In terms of what I'm speaking of here, he comes down to two types of followers who are not yet completely enlightened.

He says, what is an individual who is a Dhamma follower? This is the case where someone, not yet awakened, but with a certain degree of reflection through wisdom, has come to an understanding, an agreement with the teachings proclaimed by the Tathagata. In other words, you've really looked at it, thought about it, and it makes sense. You've kind of taken the teachings into your own mind and heart. I would call it a wisdom follower in our investigation language.

And this person has these qualities—see if you recognize them: the faculty of conviction, or saddha; the faculty of persistence, or virya, energy; the faculty of mindfulness; of concentration; and of wisdom. So the five spiritual faculties beginning with conviction. But this is a wisdom follower.

And then he says there's another type of individual who is a faith follower, a saddha follower. This particular individual, not yet awakened, but having seen with discernment, has a measure of conviction, of faith in and love for the Buddha. And I would add the Dhamma, the Sangha, whatever your particular faith in and love for is. And this person also has these five qualities, the five spiritual faculties.

I just appreciated that—the Buddha noticing there are these different ways. Both of them arouse faith, saddha, this conviction which is onward leading to the other five spiritual faculties. So just seeing what our personality type is, what works for us.

In the Dhamma follower, which I always thought I was more of—but maybe not, and we all can have both—it tends to be that what really can bring that brightness, that lighting up in the mind, is just starting to see how things work, getting a sense of insight, just noticing.

And this is true for everybody: what we call verified faith. When you have an experience that confirms some of what we've been understanding and it just happens by itself, and then—oh, wow, that's really true. So many people have said that.

An example that quite a few people have told me about: some really familiar, unwholesome train of thought starts. You've been watching it, fighting with it, whatever. It starts up, awareness comes and notices it, and all of a sudden the mind, the wisdom says, no, let's not do that now. And it just vanishes. And you didn't do it. Wow. Notice that. That really can lead to verified faith. Oh yes, this Dhamma makes sense. I can see it's actually occurring the way that I've read about it. So it moves from just intellectual agreement—yeah, it makes sense—to actually noticing.

The Buddha talks about the importance of why it's really beneficial to know, to let others know and to know for yourself, that real awakening is possible. That it's not just some kind of cockamamie idea to keep us being mindful. That it really is, as he so often said, if it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so.

And so a moment when your heart-mind is pure, freed from the defilements, the kleshas—that's just like a little mini doorway in.

But to really know that this is possible is, as the Buddha says, really important. You don't talk about it or describe people who've awakened just for flattery or for any self-serving reason, but because there are faithful people who are inspired and gladdened by what is possible. If we never hear about it, we can never know.

There's a lovely book by Ajahns Pasanno and Amaro called The Island, which is a compilation of many suttas and other teachings about all aspects of the quality of sotāpanna, the first level of awakening in the Theravāda schema. It's really well organized, with lots of sutta references and their own commentary. But what I'm going to quote is the very last quotation in the book, from Yogi Berra. Do any of you remember who Yogi Berra was? You non-Americans will have no clue. He was a baseball player and manager of the Yankees, and he's kind of well-known for all these statements he would make that don't quite make sense—but if you think about them, they do. So this is their last quotation, from Yogi Berra: "If you don't know where you're going, you will wind up somewhere else."

So, the wisdom follower has a sense of the Dhamma. And the faith follower—again, seeing what we can actively bring in when we notice we're caught, when difficult situations are just too strong and we're caught in negativity and fear—what can we use to brighten the mind? If it's reflections on the qualities of the Buddha, the qualities of the Dhamma, the qualities of the Sangha, if that brightens you, bring it in.

There are suttas where the Buddha talks about directed and undirected meditation. He describes when you're meditating: "A monk is abiding, contemplating body as body, ardent, fully aware, mindful"—you've heard that before, right? And bodily distress arises, or mental sluggishness that scatters the mind. See, he knew this stuff happened. So when you're really lost—not just momentary sluggishness—this is skillful means, not running away. Then one should direct the mind to some inspiring object: the three refuges, but also your own generosity, your own sīla, your own non-harming conduct. These are important aspects of contemplation that bring up faith and brighten the mind.

And he says: when the mind is directed to some inspiring quality, happiness is born. From this happiness comes joy. With a joyful mind, the body relaxes. With a relaxed body one feels content, and the mind of one who is content becomes collected. Then one recollects, "The purpose for which I directed my mind has been accomplished. The mind has been brightened, purified." So one withdraws attention from that particular inspiring object and returns to undirected, choiceless awareness.

You see, this is actually a skillful use of thought, of contemplation. And what it's doing is inspiring faith. This inspiration of faith is onward-leading, supporting this willingness to do, this quality of vīriya, of effort.

And that leads to the next mental factor I want to talk about: determination, adhiṭṭhāna. It's not the same as vīriya, effort, but you can see how they come together. Resolution, variously described—Thanissaro Bhikkhu describes it as resolution in the mind that gives focus, motivation, and direction to the practice. But I want to say that even in a moment, we can recognize it. Ajahn Amaro describes it as being unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement.

This is one of the ten pāramīs, one of the ten perfections: resolution, determination. And it can be a very strong force to support vīriya and support our practice. Personally, I didn't really hear it talked about much in terms of moment-to-moment awareness—how it could support practice in that immediate way—until the last few years, when I've been exploring it more in my own experience.

It's often talked about in the big picture of vast lifetimes. The legend goes that in a previous era, the previous Buddha—the Dīpaṅkara Buddha, so long ago, in another world cycle, another lifetime—there was an ascetic called Sumedha who was so inspired by that Buddha that he made the resolution, the adhiṭṭhāna, that however long it would take, he too would become a Buddha. He would go through all the necessary wisdom practice, all the purification of heart and mind, so that he too could be of such immense benefit to beings. So this is the vast picture.

And then, if you read the whole collection of the Tipitaka, the Buddhist texts, there's a whole series called the Jataka Tales, which are supposedly all these stories of the different lifetimes of the historical Buddha we know—Gautama Buddha—and all the different lifetimes and the ways he was working to purify his heart and mind. That's the long view.

Tonight I'm talking about the moment-to-moment view, just to give you a sense. I'm just taking a little slice. But the point is to really start to recognize the wholesome, because when we recognize the wholesome, the mind can more easily incline towards it.

When we talk about the qualities of courage, of perseverance, the willingness and ability to be with the difficult—but not with striving, right? To really keep being there, but then we say, "but not striving, not expecting, not pushing." Or when we talk about choosing not to feed the unwholesome but inclining the mind towards the wholesome, where some series of difficult thoughts come up and we've been fighting them, but then we go, "No, not now." This quality of strength that isn't coming from either aversion or clinging or me-ing—what is that? How do we access that? That can be a tricky place, no?

This is one of the places where we can start to feel this mental factor, this energy of resolution. It's really what we can call on for skillful means. The best I can describe it in myself is that I feel it in a moment as a kind of collectedness and alignment of energy around a particular motivation.

I'll take a really simple example: waking up and being in bed in the morning and having to get up. Well, that happens every day. But there's this state where, whether you're on retreat or not—let's say you're on retreat—you wake up, it's not the alarm, you're kind of lying there, "should I, shouldn't I," aversion, you're kind of fluffing around. That's what I call it—fluffing around. It's so cozy in the bed, I'm all snuggled in, should I get up, shouldn't I get up? Wanting and aversion, all of this.

And then, for me, the resolution is when the thought, the intention comes: "Just get up." Not "Just get up, you stupid, lazy person." Just: "Get up." And the resolution is that in that moment, the energy all aligns—just get up—and you just do it. You just do it.

Sayadaw Tejaniya often says that: "Just do it." In fact, sometimes he'll just hold up a big sheet of paper with a Nike swoosh. He'll just hold it up—just do it. Rather than this dithering.

It's different from forcing, it's different from doing it from aversion, but it really counteracts what I call flabbiness of mind. I know none of you would make this mistake, but there's this sense of feeling like we're just being with whatever is. So I'm lying in bed: "Okay, there's aversion, yeah, there's tiredness, yeah, it's snuggly, it's nice, okay, snuggly, nice, feels like this, yeah, yeah, yeah, yeah." Just do it. Get up.

You can feel the difference. And the first thing you might think is, "Oh, that's just being choicelessly aware." Yes, but there's a certain place for inclining to the wholesome. I'm picking a simple thing, but this is really where we can explore this quality.

Adhitana, resolution—as you can see, it's a factor that could be called ethically neutral, meaning that quality of collecting around a motivation, just doing it, doesn't have to be around a wholesome thing. I don't have to elaborate on that. That's how many things get done. But in terms of Dhamma practice, of course, it is wholesome because it comes together with mindfulness, it comes together with wholesome faculties.

I want to describe resolution as a parami. Don't get all crazy trying to remember, but just notice the four wholesome qualities that come together with resolution, with adhitana. I'll give a simple example of how we can see them supporting one another, and the difference from just a kind of forcing. Because it can be tricky. We can think it's simple resolution, but it's got that forcing quality. We all know how subtle that is.

The four qualities that come together with adhitana are wisdom—pañña, wise discernment—honesty, relinquishment or non-clinging, and calm or peace.

Let me give a simple example of how they go together. In terms of wisdom, wise discernment, even just beginning as a resolution comes up in the mind—is it even reasonable? I always thought it was very interesting, the story of the Buddha. He made this great determination to sit under the Bodhi tree: "I'm not getting up until I'm awakened." But he'd been doing intensive practice for six years before he did that. He didn't do that on day one. So there was some sense of clear, wise discernment.

So for us, we won't always know. But for example, say you decide, "I'm going to sit for seventeen hours straight without moving." Now for some people, at some times, that is quite possible and supportive. For a lot of us, a lot of the time, not so much. Knowing that, just knowing what's reasonable.

Take another example. We often recommend to people, just as a way of settling and strengthening the continuity, to take a period—if you're not already doing this, maybe you're all already doing this—take a period like the morning from the 8:15 sit until lunch, or from after lunch until tea, and just stay really steady. Sit, walk, sit, walk, don't do anything else. That's all. Just do that. Now one could make a resolution: "I'm just going to sit, walk, sit, walk." I would say generally, with discernment, does that seem reasonable? Does it seem useful? You don't have to write a thesis about it, just checking in and seeing. So that's the discernment part.

And the truthfulness, the honesty, is just being honest with seeing what we're really doing. So if we make that resolution, just very gently, and we're doing it, but then, "Okay, well I'm just going to go and have this little cup of tea and come back," and we somehow pretend we're not doing that—you know what I mean? We just kind of decide that didn't count. It's not quite the clear seeing, the honesty piece, that's all. Honesty is just part of mindfulness anyway: what's really happening.

The relinquishment is kind of obvious because when there's a resolution to do one thing, we're relinquishing other possibilities. Getting up in the morning is relinquishing more snuggling in bed. Sit, walk, sit, walk for four hours is relinquishing whatever else. Just very basic.

And the fourth, which is interesting, is calm. This I find one of the useful ways to check if what I'm doing is truly a resolution or kind of forcing or aversion.

For example, sitting and there's a difficult experience—let's just take pain in the body. And the idea comes in: "I'm just going to stay with it, see what happens." Well, you know all the different energies that could be feeding that motivation, right? And so if it's just the clear seeing, if it's the adhiṭṭhāna, there would be the discernment: "Okay, it's not that I have a bad knee and I'm going to hurt the knee." That's clear seeing, you know? And I know people that have hurt their knee from not using that discernment. That's different from fear and discernment. And the honesty: "Okay, just be with it and see what happens." And relinquishing moving.

But the calm is this: when it's from this resolution, all the energy just collects, it's just steady, just do it. There's not all this wavering, aversion, forcing—"Should I? Shouldn't I? I'm doing so great. I'm doing so bad. By God, I'm not going to move"—all that extra stuff that leads to agitation of mind, agitation of body. When it's a sense of resolution, it's like all the extra energy that's just floating all over the place just comes together in that resolution. "Oh yeah, just do it." Just for that moment. It's quite calm. And so that's something you could just kind of tune into: wisdom, truth, relinquishment, and calm.

I really want to encourage learning to and getting interested in exploring this in little ways in our practice, because the more we recognize these wholesome states, the more easily the next moment of citta, of mind, inclines toward it. And you know how we can remember a wholesome state and kind of call it up. We can use it. And the faith, our confidence, the willingness to do, gives us the trust also that the resolution is possible, that we can do this.

Let me give a couple of examples, kind of a close, personal one. It's just to show that this isn't only about being on retreat. This was an experience where I was really consciously working with this quality, and I learned so much about adhiṭṭhāna from it. This was about two or three years ago. I had a summer where I took some months off of teaching, and I arranged to study German for three to four weeks in Munich. I'd been wanting to do this for a long time. My German friends may wonder, talking about resolution after twenty years—resolution of learning German was noticeably lacking. But anyway, I decided I really wanted to do this. So I set it all up. I was in this class.

I came in a few days late. They didn't put me in the beginning class—they placed me in the next level up based on some little test I took. But the knowledge I had of German was very spotty, just from hanging out. No clear grammar or anything.

Anyway, I was in this class, coming in a few days late. I was all happy. I was staying with a friend in Munich, I loved being there, and everything was great. And I come in, and from the first moment, I hadn't a clue what was going on. The class was not big, maybe eighteen kids. That's the operative word—kids. Aged sixteen to twenty-three. And me.

It was a really interesting group from all over. A couple of young men from Turkey, from Spain, from Mexico, from Portugal, from Denmark, from Mozambique. All there really wanting to learn German, to come and study mostly, to enhance their careers. So it was a really interesting group of kids. Kids.

Right away, I felt... really? I looked around. And then we had to do a lot of work in pairs. Of course, the instructor was speaking in German, and for the first day, I went into total panic. I had no clue what he was saying. We were supposed to do these exercises, and I'm like, what are we supposed to do? So much got triggered in me—really just like what's going on for you here. All kinds of inadequacy and feeling old. I don't usually feel old. I felt old, I tell you. Being absolutely the worst in the class. I was back in school and I was like, what is this? I was just doing this for fun. And I was really, really in a panic.

Just as an aside, I find how valuable it is to put oneself in situations like that, outside of our comfort zone, because we really learn. First, I got so much more respect—in a way, for all these people, immigrants, people coming from other countries, immigrating for refuge or for economic reasons or whatever, and they can't speak the language, and the general population isn't that helpful, and just what it is to go through that. Growing up a white American in suburbia, everybody around me spoke English. I never had to give it a thought. And I spend a lot of time in Europe and I feel humiliated about two-thirds of the time when I'm hanging out with my Swiss friends. It's like, okay, what language do we want to speak? French, German, English? Schweizerdeutsch? Or maybe I could go into Italian? And I say, well, here I am. It's going to be English. Pretty clear, it's going to be English.

So this sense of real appreciation for people who have to navigate that—that was one thing.

And the other was what it's like not to be able to learn so easily, or to know what's going on, or to read so easily. That hadn't been my particular problem in school. It was here. So just appreciating that, getting outside of the comfort zone.

Anyway, it was amazing to me, the emotional stuff that was getting brought up. We'd be paired up, and I knew no one wanted to work with Granny because—I mean, they were respectful, but I didn't know what the heck I was doing, basically.

That's why they didn't want to work with me. Half the time I wouldn't even understand the exercise. Still, I'd learn things, and then I would spend all afternoon doing my homework. That's what I was there for, and that was all fine.

And then after the second day or so, I woke up and thought, "Why am I doing this? Nobody else cares. I'm doing this for me. And this is horrendous. I could just cut and run. I'm not going to learn enough German that my German friends will even know the difference if I did it or not."

But then I thought, "No, this is really for resolution." I'm just going to do it. And it became my practice. I said, "I'm going to do it. Everything that comes up around it is the practice."

So every morning I'd get up early and sit. Every day was different. Some days I was fine—I just went down and it was kind of interesting. Some days I woke up in a panic. Some days I woke up feeling like the stupidest person on earth. Some days, whatever. But I just made the commitment: I'm going to do it. I'm going to be with whatever comes up. I'm not going late. I'm not leaving early. I'm not missing a day. That's just it.

And I learned so much about the power of resolution. It brings us into the ability to be with all the other stuff that's going on. You really see the emptiness of all of it—all of it. You can do what's important to do while the mind's doing all its stuff, and you're embarrassed. Okay, embarrassment's like this—that's okay. You can make a choice for the greater good.

So that was really a huge learning for me about this quality of determination.

I'll close with one other story of determination, on a bit broader scale, from the biography of a teacher who really inspired me and many of my friends. He died just a few years ago—a Chinese Chan master, Master Sheng Yen. A really very profound teacher, but also in who he was: so kind, so relational. I just had the good fortune to sit maybe two retreats with him, one in Switzerland and one in upstate New York at his center.

He was so kind. The second time I went, even with so many students, he recognized me and called me by name right away. Then you find out that in Taiwan he has a huge monastery with tens of thousands of students and nuns and monks. He's like the Thich Nhat Hanh of Taiwan—a huge teacher. But so kind, with such deep teachings.

He wrote an autobiography. I'm really condensing it here. He grew up in mainland China, in the 1920s or so—a very hard life, a lot of suffering, not enough food, very harsh.

And as a young man, he became a monk in the Chan monasteries. It was tough, really tough—not even having enough food, working extremely hard. I won't go into the whole story, but he became a very devoted monk, deeply committed to his practice and to the monastic life.

In 1949, there was civil war in China, which made conditions even worse. When Mao Zedong and the communists won the civil war, he was living in a monastery in Shanghai. He realized his only chance to remain a monk was to get out of mainland China to Taiwan. He had no money, nothing. The only way he could escape to Taiwan was to join Chiang Kai-shek's army, who would bring him over. So that's what he did—a monk joining the army to get to Taiwan.

He had to disrobe. But he says, "In my mind, in my heart, I was always a monk." It wasn't as though he could simply arrive in Taiwan and say, "Thanks a lot, I'm leaving the army now." That was not an option at all. He said it was extremely difficult to get out of the military. For ten years he was in the army, yet in his heart, always being a monk.

One of his rules of training was to be vegetarian, but the army food wasn't vegetarian. As much as he could, he would eat around the meat, taking only the vegetables, until sometimes he was truly starving, really unhealthy. Only at that point would he eat a little meat. But then he would feel that was an unwholesome act. The way he worked with his unwholesome karma was through prostrations—he would do many prostrations, not from a sense of "I'm bad, I have to do this," but as a way of devotion, of bringing in wholesome energy in his mind.

He had no teacher. He had no support. After some years, he began to find teachers. And finally—without going into the whole story—somebody helped him find a way to get out of the army after ten years. It was really unusual; he said it was extremely rare that anyone managed to leave that branch of the military. But he got out, and immediately went on a six-year retreat.

A quotation from him: "Looking back, I realize that if I did not have a very strong determination to return to monastic life, I probably would not have succeeded. Getting out of that particular branch of the military was nearly impossible."

Determination—but just moment to moment. The determination to be a monk in his heart.

We never know where it's going to go. Maybe what seems impossible can become possible with a combination of faith, determination, and of course our mindfulness practice.

Thank you. Let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 125

Exploring Perception and Sense of Self

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a practical exploration of the Buddhist teaching of anattā (not-self), emphasizing that understanding comes through direct investigation rather than conceptual thinking. She draws on the Buddha's comparison of consciousness to a magic show and Ramana Maharshi's description of the ego as a ghost that vanishes when examined closely.

Wilson examines how perception (saññā), one of the five aggregates (khandhas), shapes our experience and creates the conditions for a sense of self to arise. Using vivid personal examples—from debating whether a blanket is blue or green, to the arising of attachment to a favorite mug—she illustrates how clinging to perception leads to identification and suffering. She traces this process through the middle links of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination): contact leading to feeling tone, craving, grasping, and the birth of a sense of 'I' and 'mine.'

Drawing extensively from Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teachings, Wilson encourages practitioners to notice both the birth and death of the sense of self throughout the day, and equally important, to recognize moments of śūnyatā—emptiness of self—when the mind is simply aware without fabrication. She references the Aṅguttara Nikāya to describe how an awakened mind perceives without conceiving of a seer separate from seeing. The talk concludes with teachings from Ajahn Jumnian, Nyoshul Khenpo, and Dōgen, pointing to the simplicity of unfabricated awareness that lies beneath all mental construction.

So tonight I'd like to pick up and explore a bit more one of the many really interesting themes that Winnie mentioned last night, particularly the one about exploring this sense of self, or as I like to think of it, demystifying the sense of self.

As we know, the teaching of anatta is quite central to the way the Buddha taught, and the understanding of it really can be quite freeing in the moment. But our tendency so much is to think that it's something we have to understand by thinking about it. And thinking about it—have you noticed what happens when you think about it? Does the sense of self seem to get a little bit stronger? The more we think about it, the worse it gets, because it's got nothing to do with thought. And then all the questions arise: well, if there's no self, who does this and who does that? But the thing is, there already isn't. Nothing changes except our perception.

As Winnie was saying, I think this idea that we have to get rid of something and then we'll be free—no. It's like this: I think I'm probably not the only one, but I do experience quite frequently a very palpable sense of self. Do you? So it's an experience like any other experience. We can explore it.

Remembering that everything the Buddha taught was quite pragmatic—to free our minds and hearts from confusion and suffering, not to add more conceptual philosophical overlay to our already crowded minds—I want to offer just a few ways of exploring this in practice. You'll find your own as well.

The Buddha said one time that consciousness is like a magic show. And I want to say the sense of self is like that. He describes a magician at some dusty crossroads in Bihar back 2,600 years ago. Kids and people would come and be so fascinated by the magic, but as soon as you see behind the curtain what the trick is, it loses all its interest, doesn't it? Oh, that's just what's going on. So the sense of self is just like that.

Ramana Maharshi said a similar thing. He said the ego—I'm substituting the idea of self—is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. When you look closely, the ghost vanishes. It was never really there. So also with a sense of separate self: as long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it is not found to really exist.

Our ideas about having to get rid of this thing already posit a sense of existence based on just not really looking, not really noticing what's happening. So that's what I want to talk about tonight: how to investigate, how to look into it.

One clue comes from the Majjhima Nikaya, where somebody asked the Buddha—put succinctly—what is it that liberated ones know? And you've heard this; we all know it intellectually, so that's how we know there are different levels of knowledge, because this won't be news, but we're not liberated yet. Nothing whatsoever should be clung to. That's the phrase. What is it that liberated ones know? Nothing whatsoever should be clung to.

This is like the first clue to help us explore when this sense of self arises, rather than thinking we have to somehow get rid of it or blame ourselves. It's more like seeing what's really going on. Nothing changes except perception shifts, and how the perception shifts affects everything else—how we think, what we believe, how we act.

Where I want to start in this bit of deconstructing the magic show tonight is with perception, which again we've already spoken about. It's great on the three-month retreat because I can refer to things without having to explain everything from scratch.

So we've talked about what perception is: that quality, one of the five aggregates, arising in every moment of consciousness, of sense contact—discernment, recognition, memory. It's very useful, isn't it? Perception is really how we construct, describe, and define our world. Without perception, it would be extremely confusing walking in here. The bell would ring—what's that? What is that supposed to mean? What am I doing here?

What are we supposed to do here? Without perception, which is based on our memory and experience, things could be quite messy, couldn't they? And so when we have conventional agreement with our perceptions, things more or less function. We get along.

So perception is essential. It's not like we want to get rid of perception, which we couldn't anyway. We appreciate it. But as we've said, and I think Bhante talked about it, different ones of us have talked about it, perception is really a function of memory. And so perception, in each moment, is informed by all of our past experience. Our personal life experience, our familial history, our cultural history, the society, the education, the people around us. Not that we have time to clock through all of that and see. But even without it being distorted by greed, hatred, or confusion, perception is already informed by all these experiences.

And so what seems so—we believe, often—is really like an attachment to the implicit correctness of our perceptions. Have you ever noticed that? "Yeah, that's just how it is."

I'll give you a simple example. I'm going to try to give simple examples, not complicated ones, because it's the same process. I was at a friend's house—actually, it was Sally, Guy's wife—and I said something about the blue throw, the blue kind of cover that was lying on the back of the couch. She goes, "What blue cover?" I said, "You know, that one right there." She goes, "That's green." I said, "No, it's blue."

So I really tried to see green. I couldn't. She really tried to see blue. She couldn't. It's so interesting. We didn't come to blows about that. We were both willing to let it go. But to really see, even thinking that, and then you have the thought, secretly, "It's blue." There's nowhere to go. You could call in a third person. There's this sense that there's an ultimate truth, and blue is it, right? Knowing Sally, I'm sure she felt the same about green.

That's a simple thing, right? But you really can get a sense from that if a perception goes a little bit farther. Again, as when Bhante spoke about papañca, the classical phrase from the Buddha is: what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we complicate—with associations, with memories, with ideas. And then if that thinking and complication happens, just happens, to be fed by some kind of craving, or some kind of aversion, or some kind of identification—whoa, it really can get out of hand quickly.

So I'll give another example of that. I had a lot of examples, but I'm giving this particular example by request. You know you're getting old when people say, "I really want you to tell that story again." You feel like an old performer, like an old singer, and they want to do their new songs, but people go, "We don't want to hear your new songs. Sing that one from the sixties." But it is a good example. It shows how easy it is, and this is where clinging comes into our perception, and we complicate it.

So this friend told me this, a good friend, who was many years ago sitting one of her first retreats in Switzerland. She's Swiss. And at that time, it was a retreat with Ajahn Sumedho, who was her teacher. There were no retreat centers in Switzerland at that time.

It was probably at least twenty years ago. At that time, whoever organized the retreat would rent a place, and Switzerland has these big old houses scattered throughout the lower mountains where children go in the summer for camp. They have tons of room, but they're built really poorly—no insulation, old wood—so very noisy, very creaky. I'm sure some of you can relate to that creaking noise when you're trying to sit.

The way this particular place was laid out, the room they used for the meditation hall was on what we would call the second floor, and immediately below it, on the ground floor, was the walking room. So imagine this building, but without all the stuff in between, following a structured schedule just like here.

She was in a sitting period, struggling as one tends to do in the early days of a retreat, especially a first retreat. She was just starting to feel like she was getting concentrated on her breath. Finally, a moment of calm. It was a little quiet. And then she heard someone walking downstairs in the walking room, because it was so noisy that every step made a sound. Creak, creak, creak, creak.

We've really tried to soundproof here, but it's impossible to completely soundproof against other human beings just living. So anyway, this person is walking—creak, creak—and she thinks, "They're ruining my concentration. But this is a sitting period. No one's supposed to be walking during a sitting period." It just started feeding aversion: the thought about someone walking when they shouldn't be, and it's a sitting period, and we're all supposed to follow the schedule.

This fed into her own particular nature—maybe colored a little by being Swiss, but also her own sense that this is the right way to do things, that you do what you're supposed to do. She imposes this on herself. So she's getting really worked up. At some point, seeing there was nothing she could do—she wasn't going to get up and run downstairs and yell at them because she wasn't the manager; she might have had she been the manager, but she wasn't—she was getting into such a snit that she finally thought, "Okay, let me just come back and be with the breath."

She brought her attention back and was able to really land in the breath for a moment. As she truly felt the breath, in that moment the mindfulness—and this is really the power of a moment of pure, simple awareness—that whole story, that whole papañca, just wasn't arising. She was simply able to feel the breath.

Without the overlay on perception, she happened to notice that as she breathed out—she was leaning against the wall—her back went against the wall and made that creaking sound she had thought was somebody walking downstairs.

At that point: wow. You never would have discovered that by thinking about it. As soon as she saw it, she didn't have to try to let go. That whole construction, that whole concoction, just completely disappeared. It's not like you're releasing it—it simply goes away by itself because accurate perception doesn't support it. Do you see what I mean?

This is the power of mindfulness: to recognize something accurately. We don't know what we don't know. We can be holding on to perceptions we haven't even recognized, along with all the constructions that arise from them—getting into conflict with ourselves, with our belief systems, with others. I don't even have to take it any further to where this leads in the world.

This is why we're cultivating, why we're practicing, this moment-to-moment simple freshness of attention. It doesn't seem like it's so much. You come in and describe whatever's going on, and I say, "Oh yes, great, you're aware of it." That doesn't really make you feel good, does it? It's a horrible thing happening, and I'm saying, "Good, you were really aware of it."

But that is really the thing. The sense of freshness, almost of wonder, in a moment of awareness, in a moment of presence with whatever's there, allows just for that sense of, oh, maybe recognizing freshly without quite so much overlay on the perception.

And as I imagine you probably know, I know for me, it's not so easy. Even with wholehearted intention, even with all I know about this, even when I'm aware, I just want to bring fresh perception. Already that's an overlay. "I want fresh perception," you know. It's not so easy.

Someone who's been a real inspiration for me over the years—no one I know personally, but just as much as I can tell from reading and listening—is the cellist Yo-Yo Ma. He's quite a world-famous cellist, based in Boston actually, trained in the Western classical music tradition. But how he inspires me is this: the times I've seen videos of him or read about him or heard him on the radio, or seen how he began this Silk Road Ensemble, he seems to really embody this kind of openness and freshness and interest and a kind of wonder when meeting musicians and instruments and other kinds of music from all different cultures.

Once I saw a video where he arrived somewhere in the middle of a small tribe in Africa and got out of the helicopter with his million-dollar Stradivarius cello and met this old tribal leader who was the chief musician of that tribe. His instrument was literally a round metal oil can on a stick with nails and a string coming out on the stick to make strings like the strings of a cello. And so Yo-Yo Ma, in this video, he plays, then that guy plays, and he goes, "Wow, that's so amazing, let's trade instruments, let me try and play yours." And the man is going, "Oh, I can't play yours, you play it so well." And it's like this sense of total interest.

For some years, he's been the guiding force behind this whole group of musicians, constantly changing, called the Silk Road Ensemble. The Silk Road—the whole area from the Middle East and Central Asia, Mongolia, China, Persia, Turkey, India. And so he's meeting with these musicians from all these areas with their different kinds of music and composing and instruments and different ideas of melody and timing, coming together and writing together, performing together—he with his cello, they with their instruments—really making this blend.

And so it's just really inspiring to me, his openness. And I love the idea, right? Loving the idea wholeheartedly, I listen to the music. I want to like it. I really want to like it. And my mind's like, "But..." You know, I can get it. That Mongolian singing is beautiful, but... And just, my perception from my cultural history can't relax into it. So I can intellectually appreciate. Then I listen more and listen more and I can start to get there. And I just see how difficult it is, even with good intention.

So I think, wow, he's so amazing. This is what he was writing in the forward to their first album. Remember, I think it was Winnie talking about Jared Diamond, when people met back in early days, you always had to suss out who was safe. So he's in a way referring to that. He said that when two people meet, within seconds an assessment is made on whether to trust one another. We all know how destructive it is when there's no trust. If there is some trust, an exchange might take place. As this trust develops over time, the exchange can lead to the best of all possibilities: creativity and learning. To me, this recording is an answer to that question—what happens when strangers meet?

I love it. That seems to be his attitude. He just does so many different things. So I take it as an inspiration, but I also take it as seeing how deeply and subtly ingrained all our past experience is that colors perception, that informs perception. And that's just normal. That's just how it is. So there's nothing wrong with this, and we're not always going to notice it. I'm just describing this and trying to use more simple examples just to see: this is how the process works.

And so then, in terms of perception, remember, I think it was Bonte who talked about the inversions or the distortions of perception—where we see what is in constant change as being permanent. We don't recognize impermanence. We don't recognize the unsatisfactory nature. We, in fact, perceive things as being going to give us lasting happiness. And we don't recognize the insubstantial, no-lasting-self nature of things. We perceive experience as being me or mine.

So it's on this level of perception that the whole magic show of that feeling sense of self starts. Again, not to say that's a problem, just to begin to recognize: oh yeah, sense of self starts with perception.

Perception leads to how we think about things, citta. How we think about things leads to our views, our opinions. So the view of self, the view of identity—sakkāya-diṭṭhi in Pali, identity view—is just being created moment to moment. It's not some lasting thing, but arising in a moment out of perception.

And when there's a moment of being attached, clinging to perception—we may not recognize it, but back to that blanket, the blue-green blanket, my insistence that it's blue, the way I couldn't see it otherwise—there's still a kind of clinging to that perception. Or maybe not to the perception so much as to that subtle sense of "but I'm right." So that's already into a view. It goes just like that: I'm right. But it starts by clinging to perception.

And just like that fast, when the thoughts have hardened or coagulated into a view, there can be a subtle clinging—just that little sense of "this is how it is, I'm right"—and our open awareness kind of snaps shut, is how it feels to me. I stop really noticing fresh. Like, say, listening to the music and I'm really trying, and then all of a sudden I get tired and go, "Well, that's really interesting, but I just can't appreciate it. I don't know how to appreciate it." And something just turns off. The freshness isn't there anymore. The open awareness isn't there anymore.

In terms of ourselves, what happens when we have a view—well, I'll get to that later—it's what I call selective perception. It snaps shut. So if there's a sense of "me, I'm so angry," and we've attached to that without really looking at how that whole thing got created, but just "oh, I'm so angry"—which is either "I'm so bad" or "I'm so good," but "I'm so angry"—then do you notice how, instead of just the open perception noticing whatever's arising, there's what I call selective perception? The awareness, the consciousness, starts picking up and noticing whatever particular sense, experience, or thought arises that reaffirms the view that the mind is attaching to at that moment.

"I'm such an angry person." And then all the memories will come of all the angry times, if you're identifying as bad. Or if "I'm so angry because they're acting so inappropriately," then all the different ways they're being inappropriate will come up. And all the other times—which are probably a lot more—when there's no anger, nothing special going on, or you're feeling loving, those don't seem to come into the mind at that time. Or if they do, they're dismissed.

It's actually a great moment—someone just shared this today—when you have the habit of getting lost and identified with any particular self-description like that. "I'm so angry, I'm so bored," whatever. And it starts, and you're in it, and "this is how I really am, this is my core." And suddenly, from practice, from all the times it hasn't been, something comes up: "But that's not true. It's not true I'm always like this. Just five minutes ago I wasn't like this." Wow! It starts to break apart.

So, starting with perception and then moving from that, I want to talk a little about when we can begin to get interested in this felt sense of self. Not the thinking about it, not the idea, but the actual experience of it—this felt "me" or "mine."

Once I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, and in that practice you note every moment. I was going along quite fine, and I just started noting whenever a sense of "me" would arise. I would just note it, because it's just another arising experience, just like anything. Sometimes it was an image, sometimes it was a felt sense, sometimes it was a thought. It's always something different, which is interesting to see.

So I tried—it was a mistake—I tried to describe to him, "Okay, and so I note whenever sense of 'me' arises." And they just, you know, he and the translator just cracked up. "Ha ha ha! She's noting atta! She's noting atta!"

Sense of self. Ha, ha, ha. There's no sense of self. Ha, ha, ha. It was what friends of mine would call a cross-cultural experience. We both just missed each other. But anyway, it was all right.

So the way I want to talk about recognizing this sense of self—I'm taking this way of speaking about it from Ajahn Buddhadasa, the great Thai meditation master, scholar, and forest monk who died in the nineties. I spent some time in his forest monastery in the eighties when I was in Thailand for a year as a nun. He was a scholar and, within the Thai Theravada tradition, a bit of a radical, a free thinker. He wrote a book that was translated into English as Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree, where he talks extensively about recognizing and exploring this sense of self.

This is what he said: "The sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind." I think that's such a great description. That's all it is—just a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. So what? It's no big deal. It comes, it goes when there's grasping and clinging. A friend of ours put it this way: I want, I need, therefore I am.

So this condition means it's a construction, a sankhara, a coming together due to conditions. And like any other condition, any other object, it can be recognized in awareness. Hearing, seeing, sense of self. We don't have to make it into this big deal: "Oh God, the sense of self is here. When am I ever going to get rid of it? It's here so much. I'm never going to get enlightened." And it just turns into this enormous thing. That actually takes the attention away from simply looking at: What am I calling sense of self? What's the experience right now?

This is almost prior to the whole construction, the whole story, the whole "I'm so this and that." It's just the original clinging. With awareness we can start to notice it. It can actually be fun to explore the arising and passing, the birth and death of sense of self.

Since the sense of self arises in a moment of clinging, it can arise with any sense contact, including the mind. It can be with anything. But I'm going to pick some simple examples where you can really see it clearly. Again, an example from my own experience, but it happens—arises and passes—hundreds of times in a day. When we get into reactivity about it, assuming it's here so much or it's always here, it becomes so familiar that we don't really notice that every time, it's different too.

A very simple example: someone was telling me on another retreat that there was a bowl of candy out in the back. They were walking very mindfully through the dining room, and suddenly there was seeing—bowl of candy. They saw very clearly how a sense of me wanting candy arose, just like that. Just wanting and sense of me. Then they kept walking. The image of the candy faded, sense of me died. Birth and death, just like that. Notice it over and over.

Another little story, similar but a bit more expanded. I was on retreat here once some years ago—a while ago, because we used to have not all this homogeneity of green mugs, every mug the same. We used to have all different mugs that people had brought and left here. It was kind of fun. So I was on retreat, and I would walk in, take a mug, whatever—they were all different, different sizes, different everything. Nothing.

But partway into the retreat, a couple of months in, I took a mug, I'm drinking my tea in the morning, and suddenly the thought arose: this is really the perfect mug. It's the right color, it just fits my hand, it feels good to drink out of. And I really became aware of "me and my mug" arising in that moment. I could see the clinging, but instead of thinking, "Oh no, I shouldn't cling," I could just see it. Before that, stuff was just happening. And I asked myself, should I keep it? And the answer came: no, just put it down. I put it down. That birth ended. So that's birth and death of the sense of self.

Starting there, that's a very simple example of dependent origination—the middle part that we can watch—which is a profound teaching. I can't begin to teach it fully right now, but most of you are familiar, I know. The Buddha describes twelve links of how suffering, beginning with ignorance, arises and ends in death—in a moment.

In one of the ways it's described in the suttas, it unfolds over two or three lifetimes. But another way it can be seen, and this is how Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about it, is that especially the middle part, we can really, at times, see it happening in our experience.

Starting with ignorance and going to the middle part: there's consciousness and contact. There's a sense organ, object, consciousness, and contact. So in the case of that mug, there was touching. And contact leads to feeling tone—this isn't new information. Touching, pleasant. Feeling tone, without real awareness, gives rise to tanha, to craving, either wanting or wanting to get rid of. You feel that craving.

Now, Ajahn Buddhadasa describes how craving leads to grasping—that's just the stronger version. Someone said craving is leaning into, and grasping is when you grab hold. So Ajahn Buddhadasa describes that when we get to grasping, it becomes the feeling of "I and mine." We're leaning into, and then I grasp that mug. The birth: Carol, I and mine.

This leads to bhava, becoming, which Buddhadasa describes as the feeling of having and being—having my mug, being I, having my mug. Each stage is just a little bit stronger than the one before. And from bhava comes birth. And from birth: old age, sickness, disease, and then death.

So you see how really quickly, in that moment, it went from sense contact to the pleasant, to the leaning into, the grasping, to the birth of Carol and her mug. Put it down, walked away, the whole thing died. Gone. Birth and death in a moment, really gone.

Now, this happens quickly. We're not always going to see it. Don't make yourself crazy, but sometimes we can. Ajahn Chah has a lovely way of describing it: all twelve links of dependent origination go so fast. It's like you're in a tree, and you fall out of the tree, and you pass twelve branches on the way down—whop, whop, whop—you hit the ground and land in suffering. You passed all twelve branches, but you didn't really have time to stop and examine each one. You just land—whop—here you are, in the middle of not getting what you want and suffering, or what you want is going away and suffering.

But with our mindfulness, the mindfulness can pop in at any time and we can really see this. And if we're not hating it or fearing it, it's really fascinating to watch.

So back to the same silly example of the mug. The next day I came in, and I did kind of look for that mug. Already there's a little complication. Before, it had just been free and easy and natural. I walked, I picked, I took.

There was just space. Now, though... and the mug was there. Oh, okay. So I took it. Drinking out of it, saying, "Oh, this is right. This is perfect." The whole nine yards again.

And then this time, I thought, "I think I will actually save this mug. I'll take it to my room. I can take it to my room." Now, in this retreat, I was moving really slowly. So taking it to my room—because that was the only way I could really be sure no one else took it, right?—my room was way at the end of what used to be the Catskills. So I thought, okay, I'll take it to my room. And then I thought, but if you take it to your room, by the time you creep down there and get the mug and creep back in here to breakfast, breakfast is over. This isn't going to work.

And so my mind's going, and it's all getting so complicated. I really was in the suffering of that. I mean, this isn't huge suffering, but how many times a day does the mind do this? And at some point: "Oh, you know what? Put it down. Put it down." And the whole thing just dropped away in that moment. I really put it down.

But this is a great chance to explore: what does that sense of self feel like? It's really the contraction of grasping itself, you could say. What had just been free and easy became restricted, contracted, complicated. I'm planning. I'm scheming. My attention's narrowed. There's tension. How do you get past all these people? Everything gets complicated and unpleasant because of—you know, it's not the mug—that sense of I contracting around that.

Watching the whole thing with mindfulness, honestly, no problem. Even watching all the complications of my mind, when the mindfulness comes in, the complication becomes: "Oh, look at that object, look how grasping creates sense of self, look how it creates complexity, isn't that interesting?" Put down the mug, watch it drop away, walk out, and notice the next time it arises. And you know, it's really fun to see. It arises, it fades and dies—over and over, hundreds of times a day.

So rather than judging it, or thinking if we do it right it's got to stop, we learn to start trusting more and more the power of the mindfulness, the awareness, to simply see: "Oh, this is just how the mind works in this situation." This is how what we call identification—it's really clinging to a perception or a thought or any of the sense experiences, any of the five aggregates Guy mentioned: consciousness, perception, any sankhāra, which is any emotional formation, vedanā. Often we're clinging to pleasant, or with tanha, pushing away, clinging to getting rid of the unpleasant feeling, not recognizing that and lost in the story.

But with each particular one, when the magic trick is seen through, it's like, "Oh, that's what's going on. This mug isn't going to make me happy for the rest of my life. It's just a magic trick." Put it down. It goes.

And on the other side of that—not the other side, but the alternative—just as, and this is back to Ajahn Buddhadasa, how he talks about it: just as it can get interesting to recognize birth and death of sense of self, how does it feel, what am I calling sense of self in this moment, hundreds of times in a day, so just as it's born, so it dies. He says it's really important that we recognize all the moments that are—now this is using Buddhadasa's language—what we call empty of sense of self, which is also true, maybe even more moments of a day.

So he's, in his way of talking, describing suññatā, which is usually translated as emptiness. He's describing that as meaning empty of sense of self. That's how he's describing emptiness.

And he says, moments where there is no particular sense of me or mine arising are not a state we have to create. These are just moments of simple—what you might call the mind—just being aware. This is truly normal and natural. It's a natural quality of our mind, just being aware when the attention isn't distracted in all this construction and concocting and creating around a particular clinging. It's not like some amazing state we have to achieve, some big explosive blowout experience to finally recognize and have a moment of anattā.

As much as we get interested in noticing the birth and death of self, notice the death of self and just these moments where nothing much else is happening. It's just these moments he's calling suññatā—empty of sense of self. And we're not distracted.

There's a word used sometimes in the suttas, not frequently. Again, Ajahn Buddhadasa was picking it up: atammayatā, which is translated as a state of not being made of that. I know it's a little complicated, but you could understand it as the mind that is not constructing, not fabricating, not concocting. Or as Ajahn Amaro describes it, it refers primarily to the quality of experience prior to all the subject-object division, all the stories we tell. Just that moment of isness.

There are so, so many moments like that in every day, but we don't often notice them because our habit is to incline toward the concoctions. Inclining into whatever stories arise from attachment to a perception or a feeling or that little sense of self. The sense of self in itself is just another fabrication, another thing. It doesn't have to be a big story. But we tend to get more entranced by the stories, by the concoctions, and not quite notice just the simplicity of the silence of the non-concocting mind.

So again, as Buddhadasa is saying, do we notice? He says it's important to generate a contentment with what he calls voidness, this emptiness. We talk about noticing when experience is neither pleasant nor unpleasant, noticing when nothing's really happening—so what, you're aware. When there's no big whoop at all, pleasant or unpleasant, how often when there's nothing special do we kind of dull out, space out, find ourselves just waiting for the next me, the next birth of me to arise?

Are we uncomfortable in just that simple—even to say calm is too much—just the in-between, before anything special is happening? Notice: if a thought ends, a mood ends, a sensation ends, and it's just space, do you feel you've got to jump back to your breath? Jump back to something. Something's got to be going on. Fill up the space. Have something to note. Know what's happening. Can't just be space. It's like a little bit uncomfortable sometimes.

So he's saying start to notice the neutral, when so-called nothing is happening. Generate a contentment with that, or incline the awareness toward it. You might just notice the space between thoughts, or between actions. If you're eating, you probably jump up the second you finish your last bite—well, probably not here, you're all slowing down—but boom, jump up. Just take a minute. Just be in the space a minute. There's nowhere to rush to. The space between breaths, the space between experiences. Just beginning to find an ease with that.

And assuming, "Well, this is the moment that there's no me. I'm looking for the moment of..."—forget that. You'll do that, and that's another sense of self arising. Then that's just the next arising experience.

Buddhadasa again: Normally we don't notice this emptiness, this voidness of sense of self because we're so involved with experience, so involved with concocting conceptual thoughts. I love that word, concocting. It's kind of like putting things together, but it has a quality of throwing things together in some kind of weird way, concocting. So it doesn't give us a chance to recognize just the empty nature of awareness, the natural nature of awareness.

I want to read a description from the Buddha. I like this because—

Here the Buddha is describing how it is in his mind, how his mind perceives things, speaking to the monks. This passage is a little dense, but I hope you can stay with it. I love it. It's from the Anguttara Nikaya.

He's saying, "Thus, bhikkhus, the Tathagata" — meaning himself — "does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight." This is the corollary to the Bahiya Sutta, which you got a double dose of last week: "In the seen, there is only the seen." So he's describing how that is in his mind.

He does not conceive of a visible thing apart from sight. He does not conceive of something unseen. He does not conceive of a thing to be seen. He does not conceive about a seer. Do you get a sense of that? The seeing is just the seeing. He's not thinking about what else is there to see. He's not thinking about what isn't being seen. He's not thinking about a seer seeing that. Seeing is just what's happening.

And similarly for hearing, similarly for things sensed, similarly for a cognizable thing — he does not conceive of a cognizable thing, which is any mood, any emotion, any thought, as apart from cognition. So what's happening? Thinking is happening. He doesn't conceive of a thinker who's thinking a thought, or of something that's worth cognizing, or of something that is uncognized. "What is it I don't know? What could I know?" No — just cognizing is happening.

Can you imagine that? Just the peace of it. It's so simple we can't stand it, but just the peace of it. It's just this. And even the sense of self is simply something cognized in that moment. "Oh, sense of self." And the peace of it.

I'm going to read a few more things describing it in different ways. This is from The Island, that book by Ajahn Pasanno and Ajahn Amaro, but it's actually from a disciple of Ajahn Mun, another Thai forest master named Luang Por Dun. He's reformulating the Four Noble Truths. That might be a little grandiose, but I love the way he expresses it in terms of what we're talking about here.

"The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering." You know what that means? It goes out — like when Ajahn Chah says the mind goes out and disturbs the sound. Hearing is just hearing, but the mind that goes out and complicates is the cause of suffering.

"The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering" — the First Noble Truth.

"The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering" — the Noble Eightfold Path.

"The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering" — the Third Noble Truth.

I just like that as a very pragmatic way of tuning in to the Four Noble Truths. I find it very useful.

So what we're doing, what we're practicing here, is the mind learning to see the mind clearly. Without bias, without judgment — just how is the mind working? Nothing to be afraid of in it. Nothing to be afraid of about recognizing this sense of self. Because awareness is stronger.

Awareness can be with anything. Just keep on bringing in the awareness, and we see more clearly how the mind is working. And as we recognize more fully how the mind is working, there's less and less suffering about it.

So, inclining the mind toward just some ease, some comfort, just some recognition with these—I call them little nothing-special moments. Instead of looking for the big light show, just the nothing-special moments. Or noticing when we're jumping out. Often, you know, any suffering sense of self and concoction feels better than just... peace. Just nothing. Because it's so familiar, the sense of me.

But again, back to Buddhadasa, Ajahn Buddhadasa. I think Guy mentioned those two Pali phrases: ahankara and mamankara. I-ing and my-ing. Notice they're verbs. I-ing and my-ing. Just constructions that the mind creates in a moment and then fall away when the conditions change. And they're changing all the time. So we're just here to explore that.

I want to read a couple of other ways of describing this, just to end. Just describing the simplicity of it.

This is from Ajahn Jumnian, another Thai forest master: "At some point, the mind becomes so clear and balanced that whatever arises is seen and left untouched with no interference. One ceases to focus on any particular content, and all is recognized as simply mind and matter—empty processes arising and passing away of their own. Perfect balance of mind with no reactions, and in this time there is no longer any doing."

Now, don't think about that as a goal to be reached and stayed in permanently. It's just a description of moments, the way the Buddha was talking when it's just this, and the mind doesn't go out and concoct a whole story about it. It's just this. Whatever arises is recognized and simply left untouched with no interference. One ceases to focus on any particular content, and all is recognized as simply mind and matter arising and passing away.

From Nyoshul Khenpo, the wonderful Tibetan Dzogchen master, he said this kind of recognition, this simplicity of awareness, is not something missing to be sought for and obtained, but is at the very heart of our essential nature. He calls it unfabricated, ordinary awareness. So don't go looking for something so special in these moments. Just unfabricated, ordinary awareness, unadulterated by effort and modification. Naked, fresh, vivid, and totally natural. What could be simpler than this?

That's the trouble, like I said before. It's so simple, we can't stand it. We want to go out and make a story. What could be simpler than this? So get out of the construction business.

In just little moments, just recognizing—the space, the silence, whatever way it comes for you, the calm, the nothing-special, the birth of self, the death of self, the creation, the complexification, the death of that—all of it is just mind and matter arising and passing. No need for interference.

And then this is from Dogen, the great Zen master, just to end: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things. To be enlightened by all things is to dissolve the barriers that seem to exist between oneself and others."

So let's just sit quietly for a minute.

What could be simpler than this?

CHAPTER 126

Wisdom Needs Compassion; Compassion Needs Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the essential unity of wisdom and compassion in Buddhist practice. She explains how wisdom without compassion can devolve into a cold nihilism where nothing seems to matter, while compassion without wisdom can lead to despair, burnout, or actions driven by fear and anger rather than genuine care. Drawing on teachings from Padmasambhava, the Dalai Lama, Śāntideva, and Nāgārjuna, she illuminates how true understanding of emptiness (suññatā) naturally opens into compassionate response—when we are no longer 'full of ourselves,' the heart naturally moves toward the suffering of others.
>
> Wilson emphasizes that our meditation practice is itself the cultivation of compassion. By learning to meet our own suffering with tender, open presence rather than aversion, we develop the capacity to bear witness to the suffering of all beings. She offers the definition of compassion as 'the tender quivering of the heart in response to suffering' and shows how this quality strengthens through deep insight into dukkha gained through our own experience. The talk includes a teaching story from Milarepa about facing inner demons, illustrating how the final refuge is always placing oneself fully in the mouth of fear with compassion.
> The talk concludes with powerful examples of wisdom and compassion in action, particularly the nonviolent civil rights activism of James Lawson and John Lewis. Wilson shares how Lawson's ability to find human connection even in violent confrontation demonstrates the transformative power of a 'graceful heart'—one that recognizes the divine spark in all beings, even those who cause harm. This bearing witness, whether to our own pain or to societal injustice, is presented as authentic compassion that neither fixes nor flees, but remains present with an open, tender heart.

Tonight I'd just like to share some thoughts on the topic of the unity of wisdom and compassion. You could say wisdom needs compassion and compassion needs wisdom for completeness. Luckily, they both naturally turn into each other, so it's not something to worry about.

The view, the understanding of emptiness, of non-separateness—that no thing exists with separate intrinsic existence—this can, just on its own as an idea or an incomplete understanding, converge into disconnect. It can start to seem like nothing matters, like nihilism.

And compassion without wisdom is when we just can't hold it, when we turn away in fear, drown in the grief, or try to act from compassion out of an idea of a "should" but without the deep understanding of wisdom. Even with our best intentions, the actions can start to come from our desperation, our fear, our anger. And so the two support each other.

I want to talk a bit about that, and then speak more about how our practice here is the most powerful way we are cultivating and developing compassion. We've talked about wisdom a lot.

When we say—a phrase I use often—that awareness or mindfulness doesn't care, it doesn't care what it's mindful of. I'll read a quotation that Winnie mentioned last night. You see how just hearing the sense of it is quite beautiful, but the mind that's just hearing it without really the gut-level understanding can think, "That doesn't sound so great to me." This is from Ajahn Chah:

"At some point the mind becomes so clear and balanced that whatever arises is seen and left untouched with no interference. One ceases to focus on any particular content, and all is recognized as simply mind and matter, an empty process arising and passing away of its own. A perfect balance of mind with no reactions. There is no longer any doing."

On one level that can be quite inspiring, on the wisdom level, as we're touching that potential of peace, of non-doing. But the old thinking mind can come in, or when it's an incomplete understanding—which it is, let's face it, for most of us most of the time—people often express, "Well, if nothing matters, what do we practice for? If nothing matters, when we awaken we're not going to care about anybody or anything. We're not going to be motivated to do anything."

That's a big question. If everything's all equal, we won't appreciate nature, we won't appreciate beauty. There won't be love, there won't be compassion—just some big, dull, empty blob of existence. "I'm not really so interested in that." Or people quite seriously say this sounds alien, inhuman. More than just a little uninteresting: a cold, empty void. Indifference.

So that's one side—the mind thinking about it that's separate from the experience. Because in the experience you don't think, "Oh, this is just dull and blobby." You think, "Wow, this is really free." But thinking about it, these doubts can come up.

The other side is again the incomplete understanding. Padmasambhava talks about the view and action—where we fall into the view. Not the idea, but the gut-level, real understanding of the emptiness of separate me-ness, of things, of this non-interference, this ability to just be with whatever arises, with peace and spaciousness. But it can fall into what's called "falling into emptiness."

Padmasambhava says the view—this real understanding, this wisdom that frees the heart and mind—is the most important thing. However, do not let your action slip in the direction of the view. If it does, you will fall into the evil views of demons prattling on about how goodness is empty, evil is empty. That sense of "It's all empty. Awareness doesn't care. I can do whatever I want and I'm free and it's empty and I'm creating no karma, so it just doesn't matter." Have you ever heard or read that kind of thing? It can seem like a logical outcome, but that's not what the Buddha is saying at all.

Stephen Batchelor quotes Nagarjuna: "Buddhas say emptiness is the relinquishing of opinions. Believers in emptiness are incurable." When emptiness becomes a view that is held to—this is Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche describing it—"It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality." In other words, sad to see those of us stuck in samsara. "But far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness. Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through the ways of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to re-emerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

Now don't get scared. I know that sounds like some of what we've been saying. But it's a one-sided, limited view—it's when emptiness is taken up as a view, not as one's real gut-level experiential understanding. That kind of falling into emptiness is not the wisdom of seeing things as they are, not the wisdom of the Buddha.

But in my limited experience, and in everyone I've seen and talked to as well, if we simply continue with our mindfulness practice as we're doing...

In moments where we're really experiencing, touching, recognizing various aspects of equanimity of mind, as I read from Ajahn Chah, or in a moment when all thoughts, feelings, emotions, and sensations are arising and passing and there's no need to fixate on anything or pull out any one as important—when we really are experiencing that, not just thinking about it—in those moments, the natural response of the mind or heart, if a response is necessary, from the mind that's empty of the obsession with self, is the response of compassion, of metta, of appropriate response to circumstances.

Exactly because all of our energy is not bound up in the relentless, obsessive self-referencing that goes on. Again, I'm talking moment to moment. This isn't like we have to think about way down the road, one time, one big blowout. But moment to moment.

You can notice this for yourself over the days. In times when you're not having one of those moments, but one of those moments is occurring—and there's awareness, just presence with the is-ness of things, as we've talked about a lot—there's no big sense of "me." You're just sitting, drinking tea, taking a walk, looking at the leaves, whatever you're doing. Just present. Would a thought of harming arise? Does it make any sense? If someone comes by and you can tell that they're sad, and it's just this moment of pure is-ness, does any kind of resistance or aversion or blame come up? It just doesn't make any sense. It doesn't come up. It's not like we have to somehow manufacture compassion.

When in that moment the energy is freed from this need to protect, from this fear, from this relentless self-referencing—that's the natural response when faced with the suffering of a being or of ourselves. The real experience, the real understandings that come to us over and over in all different ways, of the emptiness of not-self, just deepen our experience and the mind's tendency to move into compassion rather than fear and anger.

A couple of quotations from Stephen Batchelor, from the introduction to his translation of verses from Nagarjuna's Verses from the Center. He's talking here about Shantideva, who was a teacher in India in the seventh century, the author of one of the most famous texts, Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. Stephen also translated that text, and he says that when Shantideva's closed sense of self dissolves—and this can just be in a moment, we all know this—he did not vanish into an abyss of nothingness. In fact, Batchelor says, to be empty, to know emptiness, is to no longer be full of oneself.

And when one is no longer full of oneself, that insight into emptiness does not only change the way one views the world and oneself; it also transforms the way one feels about the world and beings and oneself. The heart is open to the anguish of others, prompting a spontaneous longing to assuage their sufferings. And at the same time, there's the wisdom that can acknowledge the somewhat irrational nature of the idea that one could save all others as a limited human being.

So there's the sense of the wisdom of the vastness, and the natural deepening response of the heart that touches the anguish of others because it can no longer be afraid to touch the anguish of ourselves.

And so the famous quotation from Shantideva: "When I've done something for the sake of another, I don't feel amazement or conceit. It is just like having fed myself. I look for nothing in return."

That's really more the sense. One is no longer so full of oneself. And what opens up from that is actually the ability to be more tender with oneself and others. But with the eye of wisdom, we can recognize more clearly what needs to be done, if there's anything that can be done.

There's a story I use often that I heard on the radio, but I've been told it's true. A few years ago, when the Millennium Bridge opened in London over the Thames River—it's a walking bridge—it was a big deal. The first day it opened, hundreds of people were walking across. It was a big celebration, quite a fancy thing. Anyway, so many people were walking across the bridge that it started shaking and wobbling, back and forth. They were telling this story as an example of what was called... well, it's gone. That's why I write things down. I think I know, and then it's gone.

But anyway, it's a kind of rational, enlightened self-interest—something like that. If you act out of enlightened self-interest, that will be for the good of all. And they were using this principle in relationship to economic policies that led to the 2008 "good-of-all" occurrences in the economy.

So anyway, all these people are walking across the bridge, and it starts to shake. Everyone acts from enlightened self-interest. It starts to lean to one side, so everyone steps to the other side. They all step to the other side, all four hundred people, which completely throws the whole thing off balance. Each single person meaning well, but from the limited view of my self-interest, you can only see so far. You all do the same thing, can't take in the big picture—which the wisdom of emptiness is more able to do. It's just a simple example, but that's kind of how it works.

And the other side of Padmasambhava's quote, where he says don't let your actions slip in the direction of the view—acting from the view that nothing matters. But on the other hand, if you let your views slip in the direction of actions—in other words, if you act without having the view, the understanding of emptiness—even when we're trying to act in the best possible way, like walking on the bridge, we can't see clearly. We can start acting from what we think is compassion, and it may be for a while, but the depth of the intention—we can't keep it up by willpower.

The Dalai Lama says—and he's Mr. Compassion, right?—compassion must be derived from our insight into the emptiness of inherent self. This is where the vast meets the profound. Without this unity, we can fall into despair. He says with wisdom, knowing that people's suffering is avoidable, that it is surmountable—now to me that sounds depressing, but he's saying knowing that from the wisdom of emptiness, our empathy for our inability to pull ourselves out leads to a more powerful compassion. Once we really see that there's no me to protect, there's nothing to do but compassion for all beings. That's just what arises. But without that wisdom—this is the Dalai Lama—although our compassion may be strong, it is likely to have a quality of helplessness or even despair.

Have you ever experienced that? Just in the sense of when we're faced with what comes at us every day here, never mind the world. It's something that is probably one of the ongoing questions and examinations of my life, part of my practice, my exploration all these years. I'm nowhere close to really getting it, but I keep exploring and being inspired by it. Really, the question of compassion to wisdom: How can wisdom help compassion? How can we continue to open again and again in this complex world of so much beauty and so much suffering, of so much tenderness and so much horror? I mean, that's my experience of the world—sometimes more of one and sometimes more of the other.

But how do we—just listening to the news any given day. I'm going to spare you the litany tonight; I don't think there's any need for it. We all have our own. But just listening to the news: huge world global horrors, small individual cruelties and violence and bigotry and ignorance. Take your pick. Yes, there are beautiful things too—don't get me wrong, I don't want to just be one-sided. But talking about compassion means we're talking about suffering.

And so some days it's like, how can I find the courage and the spaciousness of heart and mind and the wisdom just to sit here and listen for ten minutes? Some days I have it. Some days there's a real sense of connectedness, the heart's really touched. Some days it's just—oh my god, it's so overpowering and everything in me wants to shut down. And some days I don't turn it on.

And I'm not saying there's a right or a wrong, but that's the question that lives at the heart of this work: How do we keep opening? How do we find the courage to keep reconnecting with the tender heart—the heart that's willing to just drop into our own suffering with tenderness, without going to hatred or despair or fear or indifference?

Sometimes the mind will go there. That's not always in our control. We all know that. But there are times we can notice a little choice: Do I let myself connect with this or not? And really starting to notice—how do we keep finding that wisdom, that courage, that tenderness over and over and over again? To me, that's kind of the whole koan of practice.

The wisdom and the compassion feed each other and cycle around together. As one gets deeper and more powerful, so does the other. But as Winnie said so eloquently last night, it's not linear. We can't assess. And everything else she said, which I hope you remember.

So how do we find the strength, the wisdom to be with the difficult, to be with the unwanted? I want to talk a little about what compassion actually is in terms of a mental factor, a mental quality—starting in terms of our practice here together, not theoretical, really quite specific to what we're doing. And I'm sure this is not news to any of you.

The definition of compassion is really the state of heart and mind that meets suffering with empathy—any kind of suffering: physical, mental, emotional. One actual translation is "the tender quivering of the heart in response to suffering." Meeting the suffering with an open presence—not shut off, not pulled back, not judging. Sounds like mindfulness, right?

Now, often compassion is spoken of as more than just sitting there feeling sympathetic—"Oh, poor suffering"—but as the actual motivation to act, the impulse, that deep urge that Stephen Batchelor was talking about to alleviate the suffering of others. This manifests in that deep intention of bodhicitta that we talked about the other day—a very strong motivation in some traditions to go through the whole path of awakening in order to come back and be present to alleviate the suffering of all beings. A vast motivation.

We don't have to start there. But even if you think of compassion as needing action to alleviate suffering, in our understanding of the way the Buddha taught, all action—the seed of action—is intention. We've talked about this: that movement of mind and heart that leads to action, that little impulse that comes informed by whatever qualities are present in the mind and heart at that moment, motivating action. Since the seed of all action is intention, the seed of compassion is in the intentions.

So here in practice is the perfect place where we begin to recognize—and this is really the key—not so much what's happening, but how the heart and mind in any particular moment is meeting and responding to what's arising. When we're talking about compassion, we mean that open heart and mind connected to suffering. When some aspect of suffering comes, we don't have to fix it. Where we're really deepening in compassion is in how the mind and heart in this moment is simply meeting this particular suffering.

You don't have to evaluate: Is it a big enough suffering? Is it a stupid suffering compared to everybody else's in the world, so it doesn't count? No—that's dosa, that's aversion. This is not just a laboratory. This is the cultivation of compassion, just as much as wisdom.

The Dalai Lama, talking about bodhicitta and deep compassion and how it develops, said that real compassion, true compassion, develops through deep insight into what suffering is. Yes, there is no way around that one. Deep insight into what suffering is. And how does he say this arises? It arises by focusing, by opening to, by being present with our own experience of suffering. Nowhere else.

As this deepens, as this becomes a more natural response—opening, closing, opening, closing—you may find times when compassion just naturally strengthens. And this is the Dalai Lama again: it strengthens into a sense of empathy and connectedness with other beings. Through compassion—this is why compassion is a Brahma-vihara, a divine abiding, just like metta—all beings suffer at some point in their lives. All beings. And compassion is this quality of measureless heart and mind that, just by touching suffering with an open, tender presence, without judgment, without holding, our particular suffering opens into the universal.

This is why the difficult times of retreat—and life too, but we're talking about retreat, though it's the same in life, no different—why they're so important.

We cannot judge what's unfolding in the midst of difficulty. But it's not simply that we go through the hard times saying, "Okay, okay, I know I'm learning," just waiting for it to be over. You can't tell in the middle—we simply can't. But often, looking back later, you may see it clearly. I certainly can look back and recognize that the retreats where I learned the most, not in an intellectual way, but where the most change happened, the most opening, the most wisdom arose—these were always the most difficult times. Because that's where wisdom has to come together with compassion, meeting what's actually happening at that gut level where part of you is screaming, "I'm out of here!" But there's nowhere to go. So you can beat your head against the wall, or you can open. And we will beat our heads for a while, until we see it doesn't work.

I'm quite serious about this—I don't want to make light of it. These parts of retreat, just as in our lives, are invaluable. This is really what it's about. And there's no way around it. We don't get to bypass it. I think Winnie said it humorously last night, but we don't get to simply declare, "Oh yes, I really get suffering. I'm open to suffering. I'm not resisting it. I really understand compassion"—just like that, the way I said it just now. It doesn't happen without this deep grokking of it. That doesn't mean we won't fight it. But that's exactly how compassion and attention develop, right where we are.

This takes tremendous courage and trust, and you're all doing it here. I want to keep supporting what you're doing and reflect that back to you. We start where we are. It's the only place compassion and wisdom can develop.

To me—and this is my own personal take, not from a Buddha—the essence of metta, and the essence of compassion too, where they truly begin, is with simple connection. The heart-mind openly, completely connecting, just sinking into what's happening without a "so that," without fear, aversion, or greed. This sounds very much like mindfulness—it's not so different. But that connection, when heart and mind meet suffering in that open way, is what blossoms into compassion.

Yet as we've all seen, for most of us most of the time, this is not our default mode. The Dalai Lama was once asked why there appears to be such a lack of compassion in human society. He said perhaps we simply pay less attention within ourselves to compassion and caring—we reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense we fully embrace hostility and anger as emotional states, fueling them, reinforcing them. If we were to give the same energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger.

So first I want to emphasize again: that's what we're doing here. Noticing anger is different from reinforcing it. But the initial shift involves recognizing our habitual patterns. When we're not aware, when we're operating from our automatic modes, facing really difficult suffering—whether physical pain, aging, grief, trauma, or external injustice—often it's as if, at least I see this in myself, unconsciously I trust aversion to protect me. Or anger to protect me. Or fear to protect me. That's where the mind goes.

What is aversion? The essence of aversion in any moment is that the mind pulls back from experience. It doesn't want to be there.

Whether it's fear and going away out of fear, or whether it's anger and aggression, it still pulls away from the experience and then blames someone else.

Whereas the essence of compassion starts with connection. As Joko Beck says, can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? That's all. I don't have to do anything else. Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?

The answer might be, "No way." But you can be aware of that. That's already different—seeing the jumping away, the closing down, the shutting off, as if to protect.

Pema Chödrön has a lovely image. She talks a lot about compassion and how we really start where we are. Just this image of how we close to protect ourselves. We think we're protecting our vulnerable self from suffering. We shut down like a sea anemone—you know, those sea animals with tendrils that close up like that if you touch them. And she has this lovely image of us closing to protect our tender and vulnerable heart.

So we think, as best we know, that with the aversion and the fear, the shutting down, the tensing up, the resisting of suffering, we're protecting our tender and vulnerable heart. But we're not really. The more we protect, it takes an enormous amount of energy. It shuts out the potential of connection and tenderness. And again, Pema Chödrön says it's as if we spend our whole life walking around all tensed up like we're sitting in a dentist's chair. Something bad might happen, something bad might happen, something bad might happen. Compassion is not possible when it's like that.

How we meet this moment arising is the cultivation of wisdom and compassion. What's arising in this moment is, as I hope you're getting, out of our control. And for whatever's arising, there are valid causes and conditions. How do we know they're valid? Because this is what's happening. We can't change that because it's already happening. How our mind is meeting it is the place, the movement from the habit of fear and aversion to the tenderness of compassion.

So when you think you're sitting with pain—a pain, a pain—and it's not going away and you're always in aversion, but you really look, there are lots of moments that are not in aversion. It's just with it. It's just calm. It's just peaceful. But then the aversion comes, or then all the "how can I fix it" comes. But then there are some moments that are calm, peaceful. Those are cultivating, developing, learning to trust more the power of compassion. It may not look like much at first.

Let me read you a story from Milarepa. Remember, Guy talked about Milarepa, the Tibetan yogi with the calluses on his bum? He was really one of the most famous, and a great poet. I'm going to edit this severely, but there's like a thousand and one songs, many songs of Milarepa. This is one story of what went on all those years he was sitting in the cave developing those calluses. I'll read part of it and make my little editorial comments as we go along.

Mila's mind became blissful and he carried some wood back up to the cave.

So this is like you in meditation. You've become blissful and you come back in to sit.

When he arrived there, he found in the cave seven metal demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some were grinding tsampa—barley flour—and some sat performing various magical tricks.

So you get it? You come home all blissful and here are the seven demons, and they've made themselves at home.

As soon as Mila saw them, he became frightened.

So just like us, he became frightened.

He meditated on his deity. He uttered a subjugating mantra—you know, a very fearful mantra—performed a gaze, aroused his deity's presence. He brought in all his protectors. Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness.

That's usually our order, isn't it?

Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness, but was still unable to pacify them. So he thought, well, these might be local deities of the place, and although I've been here for months and years, I have not praised them. In other words, we haven't even recognized they're here.

So he sang a song of praise—I'm cutting it short because it's very long—and it ends: "You non-human demons assembled here are obstacles. Drink this cup of friendliness and compassion and be gone."

Does that sound familiar?

So three of them who were performing magic did go away, which unfortunately only gives us the sense we can keep on trying like that. But he was unable to make the other four go away.

So then he sang a song of confidence—really a song that called up his faith: "It's wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time, we should converse." And then three of the demons vanished like a rainbow.

He's slowly softening, but you can hear, right? Not quite.

The remaining demon performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, "This one is vicious and very powerful." So then he sang a song of view, the pinnacle of his understanding, really going to the depth of his practice. It ends with: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. So demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We will talk out our differences. I feel compassion for this spirit." Then he prays to Lord Vajradhara: "Grant your blessings so that this lowly one may have complete compassion."

Thus he sang, and with friendliness and compassion and without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and so vanished like a rainbow.

The pinnacle of wisdom and compassion. But it's always the last resort of what we're used to. Here we're learning it right, over and over again.

The essence really of compassion is connection. Just this simple willingness to be present, tender awareness as much as we can. You could call it bearing witness—bearing witness to our own difficulty, our own suffering, which opens into others.

James Baldwin has a line that I like very much: "An enemy is someone whose story we have not heard." And I think that starts with our own suffering. When it's an enemy, it's someone, something whose story we have not heard. Same when it's projected outward to someone else.

So we start here with our own personal dukkha in whatever form—physical, mental, emotional—just being able over and over to touch it, to be with it, to bear witness to it. Not to make it go away, but just to be there. And it does open into a sense of connection with all beings.

Whether it's grief, chronic illness, the fear of some new and life-threatening illness, loneliness, the sadness of those we love suffering—whatever your particular flavor is—when we're able to be with it, to stop making it the enemy, to hear its story, it may not seem like there's much compassion. But this being able to bear witness translates naturally into bearing witness, being present for others going through that same suffering.

You can really feel the difference. Compassion doesn't always mean we fix things. But it means we're able to stay there with an open, tender heart. Because we can be with our own suffering, we can be with another's.

I've seen this with sickness, with illness, with grief. You know when someone comes really well-intentioned, cares, wants to help, but doesn't have that ability to just touch with their own self the suffering? There's a little bit of fear in it. Years ago I had a chronic illness, and so many dear, wonderful people came with so many ideas about how to help. But I could really feel the people who wanted to help yet had this level of fear, this level of basically "get better so we don't have to be around this." That's crass, but you can feel the discomfort.

And then other people come—same with grief—and just know. It's just how it is. I know how it is. I can be here with you. I don't have to fix it.

You can feel that, that bearing witness. It's a powerful form of compassion. It doesn't mean we each have to go out and be Gandhi, but it starts with being present to whatever measure of suffering is arising in our mind and body right now. From there, it can move to a much greater scale.

For the remaining part of this talk, I'd like to read a few examples from others, because they express this much better and much deeper than I can.

This sense of bearing witness can move from our own personal realm—being able to be present with friends, with people who are suffering—to something larger. And when we're present with a calm eye and heart, if there's something to do, we can see more clearly. Sometimes there's not.

I think this bearing witness is something that often shows up in the realm of artists—bearing witness to large societal areas of horror.

One example I've always admired is the Russian poet Anna Akhmatova, one of the most famous poets in Russia of the twentieth century. She's mostly well-known because during the years of the Stalin terror, she could have emigrated. Many of the people she knew left Russia, but she chose not to. She chose to remain in her country, specifically to be a witness to the horrors of the Stalinist terror and the starvation, which she did experience. Her first husband was shot by the Stalinist army. Her second common-law husband and her son were both imprisoned in the Gulag for many years, and her second husband died there. So it's not like she was some disconnected witness.

I want to read a little snippet from one of her longer poems, Requiem, written between 1935 and 1940. It's a long poem about those years of Stalin's terror. Just this beginning, because it so touches me—the power of being able to be present with an open heart. It can really make such a difference. It doesn't fix things. But this is compassion as well.

She begins Requiem: "No foreign sky protected me. No stranger's wing shielded my face. I stand as witness to the common lot, survivor of that time, that place."

And then, instead of a preface, she writes: "In the terrible years of the Yezhov terror, when the most people were being arrested and sent off to the Gulag or killed, I spent seventeen months waiting in line outside the prison in Leningrad."

What this means is that anyone whose family member had been taken—they would just be disappeared in the night, you never knew where they were—would stand outside the prison in Leningrad all day, every day, with packages, hoping they could just get to the front of the line and give a package of food or something that they hoped would reach their loved one, whom they didn't even know was alive.

So she's not exaggerating. She spent seventeen months waiting in line outside the prison in Leningrad with hundreds and hundreds of other people. "One day, somebody in the crowd called me by name." She was famous by this time, so someone called her by name. "And standing behind me was a woman with lips blue from the cold who had, of course, never heard me called by name before. Now she started out of the torpor common to us all and asked me in a whisper"—everyone whispered there—"'Can you describe this?' And I said, 'I can.' Then something like a smile passed fleetingly over what had once been her face."

Just that power to be present and to communicate it, because she was so present to it all. And we can hear it because it's a natural aspect of our humanness to meet suffering with compassion. It's not some rarefied thing. When we're not lost in our own self-interest, that's what emerges.

Being fully present, bearing witness—that's one aspect.

Two other aspects I want to mention briefly. One is the complexity that arises when we do move into the realm of action. We must remember to start and keep coming back to the motivation of compassion, of wisdom, rather than assessing ourselves solely by our actions. Because that's how we can act with the most wisdom amid the complexity of life, knowing—as we're starting to know—that we have no control over the outcomes of any action we perform. There are so many complications. We don't even have control over the outcomes of actions just about ourselves, never mind in the wider world, never mind other people's responses.

So how do we act from the most wisdom and compassion and then not take it personally when it doesn't turn out how we want? How do we not fall into despair or anger or hopelessness? Believe me, I'm not saying I have this one licked. I'm just bringing these up as what is involved.

One complexity, not simple but common for many people—at least at my age—is what happens when you're designated as the medical proxy for someone, say for your elderly parents. That entails all kinds of decisions. You'll have no idea what they'll be, and they had no idea what they would be when they asked you to take on this role. You can never figure out in advance what's going to come and what the decisions are going to be.

And you never know—you make the decisions as best you can. You don't know. Sometimes the best decision you could make leads to a lot more suffering for a longer period of time. Really. How do you stay with that? And stay open and present with the compassion, present with the suffering, and not fall into self-judgment or want to turn away because it's too painful to watch?

And I really see—I saw for myself, and I did this with both my parents—I saw for myself: when it's about me, there's no way to see clearly. If the decision is colored, tinged by "I'm going to be uncomfortable," or "That's what they think they want, but it's not what I think is best for them," or "I know more than..." or "I just can't stand to see that, so even though they wanted it, I can't do it"—all of that doesn't let you see clearly. It's not a simple example, but a common one that's very, very complex. And it's not like you say, "Okay, now I'll do it from compassion," and it stays like that. We have to keep reconnecting, keep seeing what's going on, and have compassion when we blow it. We will, because of course we won't have all the wisdom, and then we'll fall into fear, we'll fall into overwhelm, we'll fall back into the habits of aversion or blame or whatever our habit is. We stop suffering right there, and we start again. We start again. We start again. But life is complex, so just trying to do the right thing without wisdom—you see how we can get lost.

And this is just more from the news, but how attachment to view, combined with trying to do what's for the good of all—let's not even get into politics, but that's kind of where this goes—views for caring for life. This is a bit of a radical example, but where it can go: you have people who are anti-abortion and then end up wanting to kill doctors who perform abortions. How can you get there from compassion? Compassion to one side and murder on the other side, held by view. That's falling into views. Whereas compassion is coming back, coming back, coming back to see that the seed of action comes from our intention. And our practice here, being with our own suffering, is how we keep on purifying the intention, finding the courage over and over.

So I just want to read from two or three people who have examples of acting in the world over and over in very difficult and threatening situations. I'm not saying these people are perfect or anything, but they have the deep wisdom of the power of compassion and love to counter terror and violence and fear—and then the need to keep reconnecting, repurifying. It's never a one-time thing. None of these people do I know, of course, but they have really inspired me over some years of reading about them.

The first is a man named James Lawson. Probably a lot of you know who he is. He's a doctor of divinity, still teaching now at 85 years old. He is even now considered one of the leading theorists in this country on nonviolence and nonviolent activism. He was really one of the leaders in the whole civil rights movement starting in the 1950s, doing huge trainings for all the freedom riders and many of the civil rights activists on nonviolent civil rights activism. Really powerful.

He was a follower of Gandhi. Even during the Korean War, he was a conscientious objector. He could have gotten out of going—he could have been deferred because he was a minister—but he said that wouldn't be fair. So he went to jail as an anti-war activist. I turned on the radio one day, and they were just interviewing somebody. I didn't know who it was, but I just started listening, and halfway through I thought, "Wow, that must be James Lawson." And it was. I got so excited just hearing him. He was saying—this is a quote—"I discovered a strength and power in me when I was in jail to live out of my own conscience." He continues to teach nonviolent workshops, working for immigrant rights, rights of Palestinians, workers' rights to a living wage, civil rights. He's involved in all kinds of causes and in teaching nonviolence.

I want to read a little example of the simple but incredibly courageous and powerful way that he brings a sense of connection into a really violent situation. This is a description given to the writer by a person who was involved, Bernard Lafayette. This was in Nashville in 1960 during a demonstration for integration. As the demonstrators were walking along, some young white toughs came and started beating them up. They grabbed the guy at the back and started beating on him. Bernard Lafayette, who's telling the story, threw himself over the man to protect him. All of these guys had been trained by James Lawson, who was there. While this was going on, Jim Lawson walked over. He didn't rush over.

He said he walked over very calmly, as if to a longstanding appointment. When he arrived, that shifted the attention of the guys who were beating to Lawson. Bernard remembered that he just seemed so confident, so relaxed, as if this was just normal for him.

The leader of the toughs, when he saw Lawson, became really enraged—obviously at his coolness—and he spit on him. Lawson just looked at him and asked him for a handkerchief. The man, stunned, reached in his pocket and handed Lawson a handkerchief. Lawson wiped himself off.

Then he looked at the man, dressed in this leather motorcycle jacket gear, looked at the man's jacket, and started talking to him. Did he have a motorcycle or a hot rod car? A motorcycle was the answer. Jim asked a technical question or two, and the young man started explaining what he had done to customize his bike. Amazingly, Bernard thought, these two men were now talking about the levels of horsepower in motorcycles. A few seconds earlier, they had seemed to be sworn enemies. By this time, the guys on the ground were up and walking, and the line was moving again. Jim and the young man were still talking about the man's motorcycle. In that brief, frightening moment, Jim had managed to find a subject which they both shared and had used it in a way that made each of them more human in the eyes of the other.

I just find that so powerful—the simplicity of that connection, finding the humanness in such a difficult situation.

The theory of this is explained further by one of his students at that time: John Lewis, who as you probably know is now a congressman from Georgia, has been so for many years, but he was one of the students, one of the original Freedom Riders. This is from his autobiography, where he describes the principles of Gandhian nonviolent action as he learned them from James Lawson:

"One of the most fundamental principles of the Gandhian notion of satyagraha, nonviolent action, is that it is not just a technique to achieve specific goals. It's not just a tool to achieve unity and freedom in the world around us. True satyagraha, as Gandhi taught it, is about a fundamental shift inside our own souls. It is rooted in the qualities of inner unity, of inner freedom, of inner certainty."

Inner unity is concentration, inner freedom is wisdom, inner certainty is faith. It's the same thing.

"And once found, that place is not disturbed or affected by the thousands of details of the world around us that bombard us every day."

Then, to bring in suffering, he says:

"Suffering puts us and those around us in touch with our consciences. It opens and touches our heart. It makes us feel compassion where we need to. But suffering can be nothing more than a sad and sorry thing without the presence on the part of the sufferer of a graceful heart, an accepting and open heart, a heart that holds no malice towards the inflictors of his or her suffering. This is a difficult concept to understand, and it is even more difficult to internalize, but it has everything to do with the way of nonviolence.

We are talking about love here—not romantic love, not the love of one individual for another, not loving something that is lovely to you. This is broader, deeper, more all-encompassing love. It is a love that recognizes the spark of the divine in each of us, even in those who would raise their hand against us, those we might call our enemy. This sense of love realizes that the emotions of the moment and constantly shifting circumstances can cloud that divine spark. Pain, ugliness, and fear can cover it over, turning a person toward anger and hate. It is the ability to see through those layers of ugliness, to see further into a person than perhaps that person can see into themselves, that is essential to the practice of nonviolence."

That is one of the most profound things I've read about compassion and wisdom.

I had one other story, a man from Burma, but it's a little long, and I think I'll just end here.

So, thank you. Let's just sit quietly with a graceful heart for a moment.

CHAPTER 127

Generosity: Transforming the Heart

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this talk, Carol Wilson examines generosity (dāna) as a foundational practice in the Buddha's teachings, not merely as a preliminary to meditation but as a powerful path for transforming consciousness. She explains how the Buddha typically began teaching with dāna, followed by sīla (morality) and bhāvanā (mental cultivation), establishing generosity as essential rather than secondary to the path.

Drawing from extensive practice in Burma and Thailand, Wilson shares moving stories that illustrate the profound mutuality of giving and receiving. She describes villagers who, upon receiving rice donations, immediately came out the next morning to offer rice back to monks—their first instinct being to share what they had received. Through these accounts, she reveals how generosity counters greed, fosters contentment, and dissolves the false sense of separation between giver and receiver.

Wilson presents practical guidance for cultivating dāna: attending to the volition behind giving, abandoning attachment to what is offered, giving face-to-face when appropriate, and maintaining presence throughout the act. She emphasizes that the Buddha taught recollection of one's own generosity as a meditation practice that literally inclines the mind away from greed, aversion, and delusion. Referencing teachings to the layman Mahānāma, she shows how contemplating our generous acts leads to joy, rapture, calm, ease, and concentration—the same qualities developed in formal meditation.

Sometimes in the middle of a meditation retreat, with all our talks and discussions, everything is naturally about meditation—that's what we're here for. But we can forget, we too sometimes can forget, that everything the Buddha taught, as far as we understand, was for the purpose of really transforming our consciousness. Purifying our heart and mind, inclining to the wholesome, abandoning the unwholesome mind states, the suffering mind states.

And it's not only meditation. Meditation is like the central tool, a wonderful tool, a really powerful tool. But in the Buddha's teachings, meditation is not a complete path. It doesn't exist in isolation.

As I think we've said earlier, often when the Buddha would start to teach somebody, he wouldn't just begin with, "Okay, this is dependent origination, get it"—unless he knew they could, and occasionally someone could. But he would usually start with dana, or generosity, and talk about sila, morality, and talk about bhavana, mental cultivation. Tonight I want to talk about the first of these—generosity—as a training, a transformative quality of heart and mind, as part of the teaching and as a way of life.

I suppose the secret for me was this: we always think generosity is a good idea, right? Probably no one dismisses it outright. Sometimes you even hear, "I'll be generous because I can't meditate, but meditation is really where it's at." As if generosity were a lesser practice. But really, generosity as a practice is not about what it looks like, or what you give, or being appreciated. This quality of open-hearted sharing is, in the moment of generosity, a deep source of happiness, of joy, of transformation of heart and mind.

Obviously it counters greed—that's apparent. If you're being generous, unless it's something you really don't want (which doesn't actually count as generosity), you're working against that grasping tendency. But also, when one is truly generous in the moment, there's a sense of contentment, of sufficiency. It fosters and strengthens the sense of connectedness. When the heart is generous, it's not filled with ill will or separation. Generosity counters the false sense of separation and neediness. It's really very powerful.

What I mostly want to communicate tonight is something I didn't realize—almost like it was a secret—until I spent a lot of time practicing in Thailand and Burma. In those countries, where the teachings of Buddhism are woven into the culture and the majority of people are Buddhist to varying degrees of practice, generosity has a particular presence. It's in the culture in a profound way.

I don't mean to say we're not generous in this country. There's enormous generosity in the West—this real sense of volunteering, of offering our time and energy, not only during crises but at other times too. There's great philanthropy here. I certainly grew up with the sense that generosity is wonderful.

But for me—and I'm only speaking for myself—there was often a little bit of a "should" attached to generosity. One should be generous to those less fortunate. Just a little hint of differentiation: I can give because I have more. Which is fine, but what I didn't understand until I spent a lot of time on the receiving end in these countries is the incredible happiness and joy that arises in the mutuality of giving and receiving as a natural way of life.

I don't mean everybody in Thailand or Burma embodies this perfectly, but it's simply a way that exists there. I've learned so much and imbibed a great deal about it. Tonight I'll share some little stories as a way of communicating how contagious this is—the sense of joy in generosity of time, of small things, of food—and then the sense of joy and dignity in receiving. Both go together. It's not that the generous person is generous because they have more while the poor person who receives is lesser. Not at all. The sense of dignity, joy, and mutuality is an essential aspect of generosity.

The Buddha actually set up his sangha of nuns and monks and laymen and laywomen with the idea of sharing, of generosity, as a central connecting principle. This is a quotation from the Buddha:

"Bhikkhus, Brahmins and householders are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicines in times of sickness. And you, bhikkhus, are very helpful to Brahmins and householders as you share with them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end, with the correct meaning and wording. And you proclaim the spiritual life in its fulfillment and complete purity. Thus, bhikkhus, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

Mutual support. The way he set up the bhikkhu sangha—the community of nuns and monks—was such that they had to live near lay people, so that every single day they would go out to receive alms for food.

And you can't keep food overnight. Completely reliant on the generosity of the lay community for the requisites of food, lodging, medicine, and robes. You couldn't just live a completely separate life, collect everything you need, and go off and isolate yourself. There's this sense of mutual generosity. As lay people are generous to support the Sangha, the Sangha comes and shares with lay people—both their sila, their conduct, and the generosity of sharing the dhamma—so that laymen and women, ordained men and women, support one another, not living in isolation. He really set up his sangha in this way. And to some extent, it still works like that, a little bit, in the Buddhist countries—in Thailand and in Burma.

I've spent more time in Burma these last years. I just love seeing in the morning, if you're in a meditation center, monastery, or nunnery—the nuns only go out twice a week, but the monks go out every morning—early in the morning, in a line, barefoot, with the alms bowl and eyes downcast, walking around the local villages. There's a little novice boy who runs ahead ringing a bell, so the people in the village know the monks are coming. If they choose—no one has to do anything—if they choose, they come out and offer some rice, some food, whatever little food they can offer. And it's not in a personal way. The monks don't look up and say, "Oh, hi, thanks so much, nice to see you again." It isn't personal. It's offering to the Sangha for the continuation of the Dhamma and the Sangha.

There's just something about it—early in the morning at dawn, walking barefoot in silence, people coming out. I don't know, I must have been there in a previous life. I don't really know if there are previous lives. But there's something about it that is just so touching, walking across the fields.

The nuns go out in Burma twice a week, and you can see—because sometimes you can trail along after them, they let you do that—you can see there's a happiness in the people who are offering. They choose to get up early and come running out just to offer, take off their shoes, offer their rice, bow and go away, one handful in each bowl, and that's it. There's this real happiness that comes from that, a kind of mutuality.

Just to give a sense of how it works both ways: a few years ago I was staying in a monastery slash meditation center, where lay people could be there meditating. It was right after a big cyclone had hit part of the area southwest of Yangon. This was in Yangon. Thousands and thousands of people were killed, lost their lives and their land. It came into Yangon too, so this whole area was quite affected. Around this village, it's already very poor, but people were even worse off than usual. Crops couldn't grow, rice couldn't grow because the salt water had ruined the rice fields.

In this monastery where we were staying, some people donated money, and the Sayadaw, the head of the monastery, organized what's called a rice dana for every family in the village. He was offered the money, and he organized and brought huge truckloads of rice. There was a whole building filled with rice in the monastery. Then all the monks—because monks don't handle money, they can't go and purchase things, but they can work—all the monks who wanted to help would get bags and fill them with rice and sew them up. In Burma everyone has to be registered, so they actually know the name of every family in the village. Every family got a little chit, and then they would all come on this one particular day. A few of us who were there practicing were enlisted to kind of hand it over.

One beautiful thing is it's not done anonymously. It's not this sense of "We don't want you to know who's giving, and you should just take it and be ashamed that you need anything." It's all this sense of really valuing both the offering and the receiving as an aspect of happiness and purifying our heart and mind.

Everyone would line up from the village, come forward, and we would each take turns heaving these fifty-pound bags of rice to each person. These little ladies would come. It would take two of us—another friend and I—to lift this bag. We're handing it to her, and she goes plop, puts it on her head, and goes running off. I'm exaggerating. But every time, she'd have a kid on each hand, or one kid, and plop the rice on and off she'd go. Everyone was different. Some people really looking at you. Some people you could see felt maybe a little funny.

But anyway, we at first felt awkward. We didn't want to think, "Oh, we're so wonderful, giving you rice." But then you start to just feel so happy at the mutuality.

So people went off with their rice. And the next morning, the monks went out on their alms round. There's always the same trajectory—each monastery has its regular route. Another monastery nearby would have a slightly different path, so the same houses don't have to choose which monastery to support.

The next morning the monks went out, and they know which houses usually offer. There was a friend of ours who was a monk at the time—not a Burmese guy, actually a Mexican guy. He came back that morning and he was really touched. He said, "We went out and now there were so many other people offering rice." Because they'd received rice yesterday, now they had rice, so they could offer some back. And that's the first thing they did with it. They came out in the morning, and they brought their little kids, having their children give the offering of rice back to the monks.

He was so touched. I was so touched when I heard it. Just that sense of how—and it's so often that way—when people in Burma get something, the first thing they think is, "How can I share this? Who can I offer some of this food to? Who can I help with my time?" It's just so deeply embedded. That kind of mutuality—I've run into it ten million times.

Sometimes being a foreigner coming, I go with some friends, and other people have offered us money to take to nunneries that are poor, that are just trying to get going, or that have forty young orphan girls they're supporting on their dāna. So we have some money from friends that we give. It's not a lot. And when we first started doing this, many of the nuns would insist—they'd come back to our meditation center in a few days and insist that we, about four or five of us, whoever was there, come and let them offer us lunch.

We'd think, "No, no, you hardly have enough." We felt abashed, ashamed. We didn't want to take the little they have. But that cuts the whole cycle of mutuality. This sense of shutting down to receiving is actually a lack of generosity of heart.

So we realized we should go. And we really would be offered these amazing meals. I have some photos of round tables just completely filled with twenty, twenty-five little bowls of different curries and sweets and fruits for four of us. It's embarrassing as heck. And then you see—this is what the thirty women and little girls in the monastery have, more than they'd have to eat in a week. We know that. Whatever we don't eat, at one place we're pretty good friends with, they take it and parcel a little bit out to the little girls, who are all so happy. They're saving it. They're going to parcel it out for days, what we didn't eat.

But to go and not eat, or not go—that's so ungenerous. It's a whole different energy. Say, no, we go and try not to eat? You cannot. You cannot go and not eat. They sit there: "Eat. Eat. Have some of this. Have some of this." It gets to where it's almost a nightmare. "You have to eat this. You have to eat this." You learn how to eat really a lot, three times more than you want, and then actually stop while there's still some left—it's more than you can ever eat—but to really stop being abashed, stop feeling bad about it, and just feel the happiness of receiving the generosity, seeing how happy the nuns are to be able to offer.

It's really contagious. After a while, it's not a sense of "I should be generous." It kind of started like that for me: "Oh, everyone's so generous. I should really try to ramp it up a little bit." But after a while, it really is contagious.

And I'm saying this because it's a sense of the heart, the mind becoming happy, not feeling so separate, not feeling so isolated, not trying to find a parity—well, did I give as much as they gave, or is it equal, or whatever. It really doesn't matter. It doesn't matter at all. It's this movement of open-hearted connection that's really incredibly powerful.

And I want to say it's not just a thing with ordained people. I mean, I hang out mostly in monasteries or meditation centers because that's where I go. I'm not saying everybody in Burma or Thailand is amazingly generous, just like not everyone here is. But it's amazing how often it pops up.

So this is another story from maybe two years ago. Again, I was with a couple of friends, and some people had offered money, and we were going to a money changer. It's a whole palaver that's changing now, but you couldn't change money at banks—that's unheard of. So you'd go and find a money changer through friends, and we're in this room and the money changers come. We were changing quite some money. And in Burma, the money they give you is big notes—a thousand note is equal to about a dollar, and they're big. So it's like this huge pile in the middle of the room, and you feel like you're doing a drug deal or something. It's really weird, except we're in an office in the middle of the monastery. It's still technically illegal, but this is what everyone does.

So anyway, these guys are really professional, these young guys, counting and calling up: what is it for Australian dollars? What is it for euros? What is it for dollars? And they have these little glasses. If there's the tiniest little dot, they won't take the dollar bills. And then they give you these chat notes that are falling apart in your hand—they won't take a hundred dollar bill with a little dot, but anyway. So they're looking at it, there's this pile in the middle of the room, and we were talking to our Burmese friend who was organizing it for us. Because it takes a long time, an hour or two, we're just hanging out. She's someone who's a big supporter of many monasteries and nunneries, so we were just talking about that and what we were doing, and how mostly this money was probably going to go to build toilets in nunneries or to help support these nun schools.

Then a couple days later, the woman who had been there called us up and said, "Oh, a new donation came in—like four hundred dollars." We asked who, and she just said, "Anonymous." We didn't know. We thought—she runs a B&B—maybe some friend, some meditator had come through. But when we went to collect it, she said, "No, it was the money changers." They had heard what we were talking about. They heard what the money was being spent for—for nuns. And then they just gave four hundred dollars.

It's so cool. Because you think of these sleazy guys, you know—and that's my total projection. It was just so touching. It's a thing that kind of gets in there. And I'm just telling these stories because I find it contagious.

It's not just Burma, so I want to tell a couple other stories. This one from the States. I cut it out of a magazine, the New York Times, ages ago—it must be at least ten years ago; I don't have the date on it. From Detroit. Talking about a man named Matt Dawson, who at that point had worked for the Ford Motor Company for fifty-nine years. He's seventy-eight years old. He could have retired a long time ago, but he drives a forklift. He does as much overtime as possible—seventy-eight years old. He earns about a hundred thousand dollars a year so he can give most of it away. He said he's given more than a million dollars to schools and charities since 1994.

"I get joy, happiness out of this," he said at a news conference. "I can go home and sleep good."

Matt Dawson only went through the seventh grade in Shreveport, Louisiana, before he came to Detroit. And all he's done is work, work overtime. He's divorced, has a grown daughter. He says, "You know, I was raised like that—to help others. I have more than enough." For Dawson, more than enough doesn't include vacations.

He drives a 1985 Ford Escort and has a little one-bedroom apartment. "A big house, a big car, that doesn't excite me," he says.

The first recipient of his money was the United Negro College Fund, which got $50,000 in 1994 and has received $180,000 since then. He's given $200,000 to Louisiana State University, $112,000 to churches in Detroit and Louisiana, $20,000 to the NAACP, $10,000 to community colleges, and now he just gave $431,000 to Wayne State University for scholarships. Amazing. "Because it makes me happy. I can go home and sleep good."

So don't go thinking, "Oh, I should be better than I am." Let in just a kind of appreciation for how these wholesome states are contagious, because it touches that same inclination to the wholesome in us. When we can tune into this—when we talk about the pleasant, it's not that we're trying to avoid pleasant. Wholesome states often have a quality of pleasantness that's onward leading. As we can really appreciate it, whether it's our own generosity or receiving generosity, even just hearing about it can brighten the heart and mind. That's a kind of wholesomeness that is quite useful just to soak in, you could say. If you turn to grasping, that's completely different. But this is a kind of wholesomeness that really is onward leading and strengthening—strengthening our mind and heart and transforming the habits of our mind.

Another story, this one from a letter. I'll keep it anonymous—from an American woman. She's writing while donating some money to a particular cause, and she says, "I've been on the verge of quitting a job I no longer need, and I've been wondering if or how this job serves me. I've decided to keep the job for five or six more months and give all the earnings away to causes that I love. This is the first of many. So thank you. This gift brings me great joy." She's thanking the people she's giving money to! "This gift brings me great joy and opens a whole new chapter of work as dāna, work as generosity to the world."

It stops feeling like who's giving and who's receiving. It really stops having that sense of "I'm the giver, you're the receiver" or vice versa. It's just that mutual action of generosity, which takes two sides—that brightens and uplifts the heart and mind of all those involved, that lets go of clinging, that opens to connectedness.

One other story I just read off the BBC two days ago. It's called "A Strong Woman in Muzaffarnagar in India." I'll paraphrase it. Apparently in this town of Muzaffarnagar, there was fighting between Hindus and Muslims last month. Some dozens were killed. The BBC reporter Joanna Jolly went there with her local colleague and translator, Joydeep. There was a lot of anger, neighbor pitted against neighbor. But she'd heard of a Muslim woman who had adopted a little abandoned Hindu baby, and she just wanted to meet her. She's going as a news person.

She said they went there, and as they were walking toward this woman's home—this was a place where Hindus and Muslims had lived together peacefully for years, but now there was all this violence and fear—a crowd of maybe a hundred men formed around them. They pressed in close. It felt really threatening, but she wanted to go. Her colleague whispered that he was worried. "Let's hurry," he said.

What they found was, in the arms of this tiny woman, a tiny baby. The men said this little baby girl had been found ten days ago in a ditch, newborn, being mauled by dogs. This really poor Muslim woman had taken her in. They were convinced the child was Hindu, but it was only the generosity of this good Muslim woman that had kept her alive—even though she had eight children of her own.

The newswoman wanted to meet this woman. She said the woman was thirty-six but looked decades older. As they sat talking, the child was really tiny, didn't look very healthy, but the woman was just holding her in her arms and said, "I hope she'll grow up and go to school and get a government job. Then she can take care of me."

The newswoman said she wondered if this little girl could survive at all. She couldn't see any food in the courtyard, nor anything suggesting there was any money to look after her. "We have a rule as journalists not to give anything to the people we interview."

And it's a rule I've always followed. But the thought of the baby not having food was too much for me.

So she said to her translator, "I want to give some money." And she had to do it very secretively, of course, because there's this crowd of a hundred men crowding around, kind of threatening. So she hid it in her hand and went to shake hands with the woman, which is unusual—women don't shake hands in India. But the woman did it and could feel the money.

And so then they went to leave. She said the crowd of men came around, they were shouting in her face, they were demanding money, and she was really scared. They were trying to push their way back to the car. She said, "Just as I was beginning to wonder whether one of the men would hit me, I felt a warm touch around my stomach. It was the woman. She put her head on my shoulder, affectionately it seemed, and slowly but surely she guided me through the angry crowd. She would not let me go. Another man started shouting in my face. She held me even closer and didn't let me go until I was safely inside our car."

"The money I had given her was nothing. Certainly it wouldn't make much difference. I wasn't expecting anything in return, but I felt she had repaid me a hundred times over, with a kindness and strength that humbled me."

It's that feeling of how just a little gift from the heart can evoke so much more strength. That gift of the woman's willingness to see her safely to the car had a really profound effect on the journalist, which hopefully will, as they say, pay it forward and keep on going. There's this sense that we never really know the effect generosity is going to have. It really can transform us.

So, last story from Burma about how generosity truly transforms our consciousness.

This is a story about two men who became monks in their thirties. Often in Burma, when people become monks, they ordain quite young for various reasons—they just grow up in that way. But these two men had become monks in their middle thirties.

The reason I know about them is that at the meditation center where we were staying, one of the resident monks—one of the things he likes to do is go out in the community, see who needs help, and facilitate something if he can. So he had met these two monks. They just had this little dusty plot of land with a little old crummy kuti on it. They weren't doing much. They were just kind of hanging out there, seeming a little lost. They weren't part of a big meditation center. They weren't particularly meditating. They didn't have a big teacher. They weren't particularly studying. So they were monks—they wanted to be monks—but they kind of didn't know what to do with themselves.

So U Nyanaloka, the monk at the center, said, "You know, you guys should do something." He suggested that the way schools work in Burma, if you go to the government school—if kids can afford that—in order to actually pass the exams, almost always the kids have to go back at night and pay the teachers for what's called tuition after school. Without this extra tuition, they don't learn enough to pass. That's the system. And this neighborhood was really poor. He said, "There are a lot of kids here that maybe go to the government schools, but they can't afford tuition. You guys are educated. Why don't you just start offering after-school tuition?"

And so they took it up. Then U Nyanaloka took us to meet these two monks—very interesting men, U Tena Basa and U Wepola. They didn't look like your typical spiritual monks. One had been a captain in the military, and the other one had been a businessman. When we asked him through a translator what kind of business, he said he'd been selling beer and things like that. Even so, his parents didn't want him to be a monk, but somehow they both wanted to quit their lives and become monks. They both chewed betel nut, which if you've ever seen it—your whole mouth turns red and disgusting and your teeth rot out.

It's not an uplifting look.

Men or women. And one of our friends has this real bias. If there's any monk or nun that's chewing betel nuts, he goes, "Betel nut chewing monk, betel nut chewing nun." And right away, it's really hard to see past it. So he says, "These are betel nut chewing monks."

But anyway, we went and they were having this after-school tuition. There were about a hundred kids coming and they were just teaching them to read and write, all ages up until about sixteen. We talked to the younger monk later, and this is more or less a direct quote from him. He said he felt like he'd wasted the first thirty-three years of his life just living a life, being a businessman. He said, "Now I'm giving my life and energy to helping others, to helping the children. I feel like I've been reborn." He was so uplifted when he was talking to us. He said, "I have a whole new life and I want to do some form of helping, some form of giving for the rest of my life. If it ends here, if there's no more way to help the children here, then I'll go somewhere else and do it for them there."

You could really see the transformation, the onward-leadingness. Whatever led him to become a monk, this everyday act of generosity, of offering what they can offer to these kids, was really changing his heart and mind. This is the Buddha's teaching. It's not just to be nice—it's really to purify. It's onward leading.

When one is generous and delights in giving, the heart tends to be satisfied and joyous. This supports the development of virtue, as a heart that is satisfied and contented easily inclines to restraint and composure. With this composure, together with the lack of remorse that generosity and virtue affords, the heart is easily settled and focused. So then meditation progresses more smoothly and the mind naturally brightens, making it suitable for seeing things as they truly are. This is from Ajahn Pasanno, but it's a paraphrase from things the Buddha says in many places.

At the heart of the practice of generosity—at the heart of all action—isn't how it looks or what someone else thinks or how much one gives or how much of one's time. It's all in the intention. All action, the seed of action, the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness, is in the intention of mind and heart.

Let me read a little story from the time of the Buddha. One of his most famous lay supporters was called Anathapindika. He was considered the most generous male lay supporter of the Buddha. You hear about him a lot. When he donated to the Buddha and the Sangha the monastery, the dwelling at Savatthi, the Jeta Grove—you see that in many suttas. They'll say, "On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Savatthi in Jetavana, the monastery of Anathapindika." The Buddha spent nineteen of his forty-five rains retreats there.

So Anathapindika was filled with faith, filled with happiness from when he first met the Buddha. He got so inspired and was incredibly generous throughout his life. This story about him gives a sense of how generosity isn't about how much you give or about merit, storing up merit for future lifetimes. Sometimes you hear that—not in the suttas, but sometimes I would hear it in Thailand or Burma. "Well, I can't practice, but I'll be generous." Which is great if we're cultivating and opening our own heart. But sometimes there's a sense that we're storing up merit in the merit bank for our next life. Every open-hearted, generous act does create wholesome karma. But the Buddha's not saying, "Be generous so you'll have a happy life." For Anathapindika, it's really this sense of coming from love and the joy that it gives.

This one story gives a sense of the importance of intention—that it's not what's given, but the intention behind it.

Anathapindika supported the Sangha enormously. Besides giving the Jeta Grove, he would offer breakfast to all the hundreds of monks and nuns. He'd make sure they had their robes and their medicine. And every day, several hundred monks would come to his mansion and he would feed them a great meal.

So the king of the era, King Pasenadi—who you'll also often read about in the suttas—heard about Anathapindika's generosity and wanted to imitate him. It's kind of like the comparing mind we were talking about last night. "He's being generous, I can be generous too." So the king decided to supply alms every day for five hundred monks and had five hundred monks coming to his house and offering them food.

Andy Olendzki, the head scholar at the Center for Buddhist Studies, a Pali scholar, says that 500 usually means "a lot," basically. It's shorthand for a lot.

So the monks were coming, but after a while, the king heard from his servants that the monks would come, get the food he offered, but then take it away with them instead of eating. They would go into the city and give it to their supporters, and then their supporters would offer the food back to them, and then they would eat it. The king was puzzled, saying, "Why? I'm giving you really good, tasty food. What's this all about?"

So the Buddha explained to the king that in the palace, he just had his servants distributing the food, and they did it without any inner feeling, just following orders as if they were cleaning out a barn or doing any other chore. In fact, they lacked faith and actually thought the monks were parasites. They had completely the wrong attitude. And so the Buddha said that when anything was given in that spirit, no one could feel comfortable accepting it, even when the meal was of the most delicious food.

In contrast, the faithful householders of the city, like Anathapindika and Visakha, who was the most generous woman, really welcomed the monks as spiritual friends. A humble meal provided by a friend would be worth much more than the most sumptuous meal offered by someone who did not give it in the right spirit.

So this is really where the purification of our habits, the purification of our heart is occurring. Not in the amount, but in just that willingness to share.

The Buddha again: even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup—like when you rinse out a bowl of food just to wash it out—just throws the rinsings of a bowl into a village pool or a pond while thinking, "May whatever animals live here feed on this," that would be an act of generosity. It's really this sense of how it is in our heart. So it's never a sense of "I can't be generous, I have nothing." It's not that at all.

In fact, one time we were in a small fishing village, a pretty poor fishing village, visiting, and a friend who had been there a couple of years before hadn't been able to get into Burma. But some of the people we met there remembered him. So this one pretty poor fisherman remembered him and said, "Oh, he's in Bangkok, he can't come?" And all he had was a big old dried fish. But he said, "Please, take this dried fish to your friend in Bangkok." So we were like, okay. But it's so touching, really. It's really so touching. It's so sincere. And that's all he has, the dried fish. Just this immediacy of giving.

So we took it. Of course, we weren't going to Bangkok for ages. So then we thought, okay, what do we do with the dried fish? And we took it to the next monastery we were at and offered it for a meal. And that's how it goes. It just keeps going on and on.

I say that like it's funny, but I could get into a kind of superior attitude, like, "Oh, dried fish is stupid." But it's so beautiful that one offers what one has. And that's just as much a deep generosity of heart as some billionaire giving a million dollars and writing a check without even thinking about it. Which one is the generosity the Buddha was pointing to? The generosity that's really transformative?

One time when Sayadaw U Pandita was here teaching, the translator, a monk from Nepal, gave a talk on the practice of giving, the practice of generosity. He had just a few steps to consider, so I want to mention them, because I really wrote it down and I've remembered it all these years. Don't go crazy thinking this is how you have to do things, but it just makes a few points.

So, the practice of giving. The first is, of course, when you first have your first thought of giving, take a moment and really give attention to the volition, to the intention in our heart and mind. So it's not just some thoughtless act. Even when we have the thought "I want to give" but can't quite do it. You know how it is sometimes?

The Tibetans have a wonderful teaching I love. When you want to give and you just can't do it, just practice. Take a stone in one hand and practice giving it into your other hand. Just practice letting it go and receiving. You can kind of keep upping the ante from stones to some good food to some money or whatever. But just practice.

So that's the beginning: just giving attention to the volition. Not about being perfect, but seeing what's true.

Then, whatever it is that one is deciding to offer—whether it's time, whether it's service, willingness to lend an ear to a friend, food, whatever it is—again, it's like purifying your volition. Try to put aside, to abandon, whatever clinging there may be to it.

You know, there's this sense of "I really don't want this anymore, I'll give it." We can even barely do that. And then there's something else—a thought comes up, "Let me offer this." And it's a really pure volition in the beginning, and then we're about to offer and this voice says, "But maybe I might use this sometime in the next ten years. I really like this."

I'll see that sometimes. I want to give away clothes. Something is sitting there, hanging there—I haven't worn it for ten years. And I'll pick it up and go, "Yeah, but maybe..." And I think, "What is that about?" More than I could ever need. I don't mean beat yourself up, but just watching. This is like purifying the volition, abandoning attachment to it. So we're really giving.

And the third aspect—and this is interesting—when it's appropriate, which is not here on silent retreat, it's not appropriate. But when it's appropriate, there's something powerful about really giving and receiving very directly, face to face. I know we have this thing—I mean, we don't all, but somehow I get the sense in this country that to give anonymously is really a lovely thing because you're not getting all the credit for it. But there's also something very powerful about the simplicity of giving face to face, wholehearted giving and wholehearted receiving. Even with little things.

In Thailand and in Burma, where this is very much a part of the ordained culture, you go and offer flowers, you offer food, you offer support to the nuns or the monks. Whatever it is, a little thing or a big thing—if you go to a nunnery and offer even a big pile of money, it's like a little ceremony. You put it on a tray, and then you kneel, and you hold the tray, and the nuns that are receiving it hold the tray, and they'll do a whole chant of mettā, a blessing. They're blessing you for your generosity, wishing you mettā, wishing, "May you soon attain nibbāna."

People say that there. You offer something and they say, "May you attain nibbāna in the shortest possible time." Can you imagine?

A friend of mine was offering just the food dāna at a monastery—you know how we do here, that's where we got that. Every day people go and hand over money to buy the food for all the meditators that day. She had done this before, but she was blown away. She offered it to the woman who's the secretary at the monastery, just handed her the money, and the woman took it. Face to face, you look, you're both holding it, and she said, "May you attain nibbāna in this retreat." And my friend was like, "Wow."

Doesn't that really imbue it with a sense of respect and dignity? Not just, "Oh yeah, thanks, okay, here's the money, boom." But "May you attain nibbāna." It's an appreciation both ways.

And so that happens a lot. When Sayadaw U Pandita was here one time, and I was on retreat, I had heard about—I don't know—anyway, some book I wanted to offer him. And I was on retreat, so I had a friend buy the book and give it to him, and I was happy with that. I came out of retreat, and he said, "No, you have to hand it to me directly."

It was really interesting. I was embarrassed. I felt shy. I wasn't at all comfortable. I mean, I wanted to offer the book. I was glad he had it. Let's be done with it. But he made me sit there and very formally hand it to him. And he received it very formally, really one hundred percent present.

It was such a powerful teaching for me. I don't know why I should be embarrassed to just offer a gift. It's really a strange thing—some weird sense of self. But just this appreciating of the act.

It's not about me. It's not about whether the gift is good enough. There's no judgment. It's just strengthening that movement of generosity of heart—that really completes the circle.

And that leads to the fourth quality: when we're giving, give with the heart and mind really present. Really in touch with the giving, really focused on the intention. Do it with 100% presence. Which, of course, we're doing with everything we do—I know. But to really do that.

I was thinking about how often I'll write a check to Amnesty or whatever, and that's nice. But it can become just another item on the list: pay the electric bill, pay this bill, pay Amnesty, pay that. Wait a minute—really do it with a sense of presence, with a sense of appreciating the generosity. That's very important, even when you can't get a return.

Or there's a place where you can put food for the food bank—every month, people bring canned goods. And I notice how sometimes I can just be in the supermarket and buy a few things, run in, throw them down, and go. It's so different to go buy the things with full awareness of the generosity. Not like, "I'm so generous, aren't I great?" It's not that. It's the sense of happiness you feel just being able to offer, just being able to move out of your own little world. And then when I go put the food down, just be present while I do it. That's all. There's no one there to see. There's no one there to know. But it really is very different from just doing it as another errand.

And then, of course, after the giving, continue to be mindful of volition. Because as we know, everything changes. You give something away and then think, "I wish I'd given fifty dollars less. What if I'm short at the end of the month?" Just notice that. That's all. Just notice it. You don't have to let it take over.

And have a clear comprehension—a broader awareness of the larger context. We can't always know everything, but it's not that you have to give just because someone asks, no matter what. There's such a thing as giving that could be damaging to you. It could be that you're giving to someone who's an alcoholic and you know they're just going to buy more vodka. You don't really want to support that. There could be another way to be generous to them. It's about really looking and seeing. It's not that you should give anything, anytime.

There's a story about this in the suttas with Anāthapiṇḍika again. He had a nephew who would come to him—and Anāthapiṇḍika was really wealthy, like Bill Gates today. He could give and give and give. So the nephew would come and ask for a whole bunch of money. Anāthapiṇḍika would give it to him, and the nephew would go gamble it away, squander it, then come back and ask for more. Anāthapiṇḍika would give more. The nephew would gamble it away, get into really bad straits, and come back again.

After the third or fourth time, Anāthapiṇḍika said, "Okay, this is the last time. I'm not giving you any more money. You're just wasting it and ruining your life."

Same thing happened. The nephew came back again. This time Anāthapiṇḍika gave him some clothes, gave him some food, and said, "I'm not giving you anything else after this."

The nephew went away. Same pattern. He came back again. And this time Anāthapiṇḍika really gave him nothing.

Sometime later, the nephew was found outside the walls of the city—dissolute, starved to death in the gutter, or died from drink.

So you can imagine Anathapindika felt horrible and went to the Buddha, saying, "Oh my God, what did I do? I should have..." And the Buddha said, in essence, "No, no, no, you did right." He said there are some people you cannot help. There are some people who, in a particular situation... Remember, he has the vision of lifetimes, so this isn't just about one lifetime. This person was simply so caught in negative mind states that he couldn't break out of them. Your giving and giving and giving wouldn't have helped him. I just find that interesting, to have a sense of the broader context.

The first time I went to India, there was just so much poverty, and coming from the States, never having traveled much before—when I first went, I was nineteen—I was like, "Oh my gosh," the suffering was just overwhelming. In a sense, I could have given away every single thing I had and all the money I had with me in the first hour, easily. And it would have helped people a little bit, but you can't touch the depth of it. How do you deal with that? It doesn't mean you have to give away everything or else you're not generous. You consider the whole context.

The seventh element I would add is for us to receive in that same open, present, mindful way. Because as I was saying, receiving is an essential part of giving. For me, I've found that I've learned so much from receiving joyously and appreciatively.

The last thing I want to mention about the practice of generosity is not from that talk anymore, but concerns not only the giving and the receiving. This is something the Buddha speaks about in the suttas—the value and importance, the use of wise thought, wise contemplation, of reflecting on your own generosity, and also reflecting on your own sila, your own moral conduct.

So at times when your mind is really caught in negativity—remember a few weeks ago I talked about what cultivates brightness of mind, confidence, faith—when you can't be mindful, when you can't find anything good, sit and actually contemplate your own generosity. Not your lack of generosity, but really incline the mind to tune into, to remember the wholeness. It's like previous kamma, previous intentions of generosity, ripening as appreciation and memory in the present moment.

A very simple example: if you've ever spent some years taking care of aging parents, you may know how, however much you do, it's very easy to feel that you haven't done enough because there's always so much more one could do. At least that's my experience. I can think of all the ways I should have given everything I had, I should have stopped my life, I should have moved to Atlanta, I should have done this, I should have done that. The mind can really turn negative or guilty.

But try really inclining the mind to the beautiful. Actively contemplate all the acts of love and generosity. Just bring them up. Not "I'm so great"—that's an ego thing—but just let them start to come. And sila too. This is a very powerful aspect.

I want to close with a quotation from a sutta where the Buddha is talking about this. What I'm reading is about recollecting your own generosity—he says exactly the same thing for recollecting your own sila, your own non-harming conduct. He's talking to a layman:

"This is the case where you recollect your own generosity, thinking: 'It is a great gain for me that among people overcome with the stain of possessiveness, I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests, delighting in the distribution of alms.'"

So really thinking about that, thinking about the happiness of it.

"At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, at that time her mind is not overcome with greed, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion."

It's literally inclining to the wholesome. It's literally transforming our consciousness, the habits of our mind.

"Her mind heads straight based on generosity. And when the mind, the heart is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones has a sense of the meaning, has a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma."

And then the same thing I read before: "In one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calmed experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes concentrated."

"So, Mahanama, you could develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking..."

while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children. In other words, any time.

And that's a really wholesome use of thought.

So I just encourage you all to recollect your generosity, recollect your wholesome conduct, and notice how in that moment your mind is freed from greed, hatred, and confusion.

This is the path the Buddha is teaching us.

Thank you for your attention. Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 128

Retreat Opening

Carol Wilson · 49 min

> This opening talk for the three-month retreat features Bhante Buddharakkhita and Carol Wilson explaining the traditional foundations of Buddhist practice: the Three Refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the Five Precepts (pañca-sīla). Bhante illuminates how taking refuge operates on both ultimate and practical levels—the Buddha representing awakened potential and qualities of purity, compassion, and wisdom; the Dhamma as natural law that upholds and supports practitioners; and the Saṅgha as both the noble community of awakened beings and the supportive qualities of unity, harmony, and mutual care.
>
> Carol Wilson offers a rich exploration of the Five Precepts as profound practice in themselves, not merely preliminary requirements for concentration. Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, she presents the Buddha's teaching on the "five great gifts"—how abstaining from harm offers freedom from fear, hostility, and oppression to limitless beings while simultaneously receiving these gifts oneself. She emphasizes that working with ethical conduct cultivates the discerning awareness that sees the seeds of suffering and wisdom arising in the heart-mind.
>
> The talk concludes with Bhante's practical acronym SPACE for retreat success: Slowing down, Silence, Patience, Perseverance, Attention, proper Attitude, Continuity, Concentration, Contentment, and being Expectation-free while Enjoying practice. The formal taking of refuges and precepts in Pāli is included, establishing the container for intensive meditation practice.

Good evening everybody.

As you know, tonight will be the formal opening of the retreat where we'll talk about and take together the refuges and precepts.

But first, I would like to introduce the sixth member of our teaching team who arrived today, Alex Haley, sitting under the tree over there in the corner—kind of our pseudo Bodhi tree. Alex Haley is in the Spirit Rock IMS teacher training and he's here to assist us, offer sign-up interviews, and various other things. You'll be really happy to have him. He comes from Minnesota. Thank you for coming, Alex. He'll be here for the first three weeks, and then Aaron Treat will come for the next three weeks.

When we start retreat, we always take three refuges and five precepts at the minimum. So I'll explain what are the three refuges, and Carol will explain about five precepts. And then we will take all of this in Pali language. I think all of you have a paper. If you don't have a paper, raise your hand—there are some papers on the table outside that you can get.

Before we take them, let me explain what are the three refuges. The refuges are the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha. In countries like Burma, I heard that monks and nuns and lay people take almost one year practicing this. It's a meditation in itself, though here we use it just to start the retreat officially. But it's really meditation itself—you can spend a year just reflecting on these three refuges. Here it's just going to be used as a start, and you can use them in your practice.

So we start with the Buddha. Buddha is a Pali word which literally means "awakened one." That's what it means. And the Buddha, as you all know, is a historical figure who lived in India and attained enlightenment. Somebody asked him whether he's a god, and he said, "No, I'm just awake."

The good thing about the Buddha is he never monopolized his qualities of enlightenment. He said in one discourse, in the Majjhima Nikaya, that you can also become a Buddha. You can overcome greed, hatred, and delusion. In other words, you can enjoy the qualities of the Buddha. It's possible. You can become a Buddha yourself, and you also have the potential to become a Buddha.

When we take refuge in the Buddha, there are two levels. One is the ultimate level. At this level, we actually recognize the historical Buddha and also we recognize the potential that we can also be awake. Another level is to really think of the retreat environment here and how you can apply this. The qualities of the Buddha are many, but we can perhaps summarize them as purity, compassion, and wisdom. In a retreat setting, we can actually cultivate and practice these qualities of the Buddha. We can purify our mind. We can be deeply compassionate. We can be profoundly wise. We can actually cultivate these qualities of the Buddha.

Then the Dhamma. Dhamma is another Pali word which is very common even in Hinduism. It means natural laws. Literally it means "to support." It comes from dara or dham—the Pali word meaning "to uphold." So Dhamma is what upholds us. It upholds us here in the practice. In other words, it really supports us so that we don't enter into tormenting mind states like difficult emotions. If we practice the Dhamma, we are not affected so much by these emotions, and if they come, we can deal with them using the Dhamma. When we go to refuge in the Dhamma in the ultimate sense, it means the four stages of enlightenment. And then, in final enlightenment, of course, Nibbana.

That's what we aspire for.

In a retreat setting, we can talk about the practice of Dharma itself: the practice of morality, ethical conduct, the practice of concentration, the practice of wisdom. The entire practice that we are going to undertake here is Dharma itself. So it's accessible. In a retreat setting, all the teachings you're going to receive are accessible to you.

Traditionally, six qualities are given to describe the Dharma. It is calling one to come and see directly. It is visible, timeless, immediate. All these qualities of the Dharma are valuable. When you practice Dharma, you can see for yourself, right here. Directly visible—that's one quality of the Dharma. Leading onwards—it leads to awakening, it leads to peace, it leads to happiness. That's where it's inclined. So we can take refuge in that.

Sangha, the third refuge, literally means community. In our monastic tradition, we live in a sangha in a monastery—the ordained sangha. But in this situation of taking refuge, it means the Arya Sangha, the noble sangha, those who have attained enlightenment. They may be ordained or not ordained, but we uphold them. They serve as role models for us. They have done the work, and now it's us doing this work. We want also to be part of them.

In a retreat setting here, on another level, we can take the qualities of Sangha. In our monastery, these qualities are unity, harmony, and support. We support each other. We come from different countries in our monastery, and here also we come from different countries, so we need to support each other. We are united under one umbrella, and what is that umbrella? We are all aspiring to attain awakening. That's what brings us all together here, irrespective of culture or country. We have the same aspiration: to be free from suffering and to cultivate happiness. We are in one club, in other words.

In order to maintain that unity, we need to support each other and be harmonious in terms of what we have to do here—perhaps keeping silence. If you don't observe silence, you are going to disrupt others. Then we are not supporting each other because of our behavior. So it's very important to remember these qualities: unity, support, and harmony. These qualities are accessible during the retreat here.

And on the ultimate level, of course, remember that when you go to the refuge today, Sangha is actually upholding the noble Sangha, the Sāvakasangha—those who have heard the Dhamma. Another name is Arya Sangha, meaning the noble Sangha. Those are our role models.

Then you're going to ask: where are they? Are they in Paris or New York? They are there. The only thing is they don't make it to the newspaper. That's the unfortunate part, but they are there. Even the Buddha said that wherever there is the Noble Eightfold Path, there will always be people who are awakened, people who have actually realized the path.

This question comes up: "Bhante, have you ever seen an enlightened being?" Well, they are there, but they don't advertise themselves. We can rest assured that when this path is existing, there are people who are practicing, and they have realized it.

So these are the three refuges that we are going to take in Pali language.

One of the many things that I love about the Buddha's path, about this path that we're all on together, is that in my personal limited understanding, all the different aspects of the path that he taught—each of them singly, and then all of them together—are for the purpose of purifying our heart, our mind. They are for seeing through and transcending the habits, as Bhante mentioned, of greed, of hatred, and of confusion.

And so when we begin by taking the refuges, the appreciation and contemplation of each refuge is a practice in itself, which in itself brings a kind of purity, a concentration, a focusing of the heart and mind. I've seen nuns in Burma whose main practice is the contemplation of the qualities of the Buddha. While it's not a practice that particularly speaks to me personally, seeing the effects of it in the brightness of their minds and hearts, the focus of their minds and hearts, is really beautiful. You can see it's a practice that is onward leading, that's purifying the heart and mind from greed, from confusion, from self-centeredness.

Working with the precepts, with ethics, with conscious conduct in a similar way is one aspect of the path. When I first started practicing, of course every meditation retreat was founded on taking the five non-harming precepts as an integral part. It was respected, but it was always kind of like, "If you do the precepts, then your practice can proceed better, more calmly"—which is true. But I feel it didn't give enough respect or power of understanding that just working with these five guidelines, these training guidelines of non-harming behavior, is in itself a very deep practice of purifying the heart and mind, of cultivating wisdom, of seeing through the suffering that arises here in our heart and mind when we're driven by, consumed by greed, by hatred, by confusion.

To see that the suffering which manifests through our actions begins from the seed of confusion in our heart—this is profound. And when we are really taking on as a practice giving awareness to our actions, using as a guideline these five training precepts for restraining ourselves from actual behavior of body and speech that is harming, it's not just an external guideline that we mindlessly adhere to. It's a reminder to bring awareness, this kind awareness, this quality of discerning interest, into seeing what's going on in our mind and heart when we have the impulse to act or speak in a harming way.

So when we restrain, that's great—that's a movement of wholesomeness, a movement of non-harming. And noticing why, how it feels when we act out of harm, how it feels when we act out of non-harm, what the effect is both ways—this is a discernment of steady awareness that, in working with these precepts, is really cultivating quite deeply. It's leading us into a deeper purity of heart, a purity of mind.

I ran across a lovely sutta from the Buddha about the eight streams of merit, streams of the wholesome, nutriments of happiness. The first three are going for refuge in the Buddha, in the Dhamma, in the Sangha—that they bring happiness to our hearts, to our minds. And then the other five streams of merit are what he calls the five great gifts. And that happens to be abstaining via the five precepts.

This is what the Buddha says about the five great gifts: "Here, a noble disciple, having abandoned the destruction of life"—so we recognize this is the first training guideline, to refrain from harming living beings—"abstains or refrains from the destruction of life. By so refraining, she or he gives freedom from fear, freedom from hostility, and freedom from oppression to limitless numbers of beings. And she or he, in return, enjoys immeasurable freedom from fear, from hostility, and from oppression or affliction. This is the first great gift, the fourth stream of merit that leads to one's welfare and happiness."

I just think that's so beautiful. By refraining from harming living beings, one is giving this great gift to measureless beings, and is also in the same way receiving this gift of freedom from fear, hostility, and oppression.

And similarly with the other four training guidelines, the other four precepts. He uses the exact same language: a noble disciple abstains or refrains from taking what is not given—the second precept; refrains from harming oneself or others with one's sexual energies—the third; refrains, abstains from harsh, false, and abusive speech—the fourth; abstains, refrains from liquor and intoxicants, which are the basis for heedlessness.

I know you are all familiar with these five training guidelines, but to really think of taking them on in this context—that each of them is a very powerful and quite profound area of exploration in our lives. They're not simple, as I'm sure you know. Just take the first one, refraining from harming living beings. Easier said than done, even with our full, wholehearted intention.

So taking these on, we explore with awareness what's going on in our mind and heart if we harm—what was happening, what's the effect for others, for ourselves. When we don't, when we refrain, can we even tune into the possibility of offering this gift to limitless beings of freedom from fear, from hostility, from oppression? That may not be immediately accessible to our minds.

I know many of us tend to focus more on all the times we've thought about doing something, breaking the precepts, rather than actually noticing all the moments of restraint. Or just even tuning in to ask: How can my not stepping on this ant be a gift to limitless beings?

But we don't know. We don't know.

What's the effect on the world of a being—a very famous being like the Dalai Lama? Someone who we quote all the time because he's famous, but he's so amazing in terms of his refusing to take on hostility, to act in ways that are harming, even when he himself and so many of his people are themselves suffering under great cruelty and oppression.

There is one quotation I read from him. As usual, people were saying, "How can you continue to not give in to anger when the government of China has so oppressed your people, your country, killed and imprisoned so many, destroyed nunneries and monasteries?" And this is one of—you know, pick one of ten million examples of what the Dalai Lama says. This one: "Maybe they have taken my country, but need I let them have my heart, my mind as well?"

The effect someone like that has on the world—just reading things he says—we don't know the effect that our commitment to acting from harmlessness, to the best of our ability, might have. And our commitment to keep bringing in awareness to our motivations when we act from harmlessness and when we act from harm. Don't stop paying attention. Keep exploring, see what's going on, learning to understand with this eye of wisdom, this heart of compassion. Understand when the seeds of suffering arise in our hearts and we act from delusion. Don't turn away. Pay attention and see.

This is part—half—of our journey here. To really meet with wisdom and compassion the seeds of suffering in our mind and heart and see how they form, how they act, to see how with the eye of wisdom they lose their power. That's why it's hard. We're going to hit all kinds of stuff here.

But the other half of our journey is seeing the seeds of compassion and the seeds of wisdom that also arise here in our mind, in our heart. And seeing how they flower—how it's really almost like magic. How clear seeing in wisdom, when it sees a suffering aspect, it doesn't feed it. So that which doesn't make sense, leads to non-clinging. When wisdom and discernment sees the wholesome, it naturally feeds it. It grows. It's like magic, but it's actually lawful. We don't have to do it with an act of will.

So following, taking on these five precepts as training guidelines—as the Buddha says—then it follows naturally that we are free from remorse. It's not from an act of will. It's the law of nature. Freedom from remorse leads to calmness, leads to happiness, leads to concentration, all the way up to awakening, as Bhante said. So this isn't just something we do so we can have better concentration. It's actually a very profound aspect of our path.

So just to remind you what these five training guidelines are. Again, the first is—and this is what we'll be chanting together in Pali, and I know it's on the sheets in English—the first one is to refrain from harming living beings. Again, this is all intention.

The second one: we take the training guideline to refrain from taking what is not given. Obviously stealing, but you can see how what's cultivated in each of these is a wholesome, beautiful quality of mind. In this case, contentment. Inner contentment. What we have is enough. Not needing to feed greed.

Ajahn Sumedho, who's a wonderful teacher, a monk in the Thai forest tradition, said one time—I heard him say—that contentment and gratitude are very supportive conditions for enlightenment. So get contented. Don't take what's not given, and don't even want it, and then you'll be happy.

Anyway, not taking what is not freely offered. And exploring: what does that mean? Hmm, that shampoo in the shower—I know that's not the one that they offer here. It looks nice, let me just check it out. Now probably no one cares if you use that shampoo in the shower. But it's not that. It's checking out what's going on in your own mind and heart. Are you using it and hoping nobody comes, putting it back and drying it off so no one can tell? What's going on in your mind when you're doing that? What are you cultivating?

A lot more suffering than the lousy shampoo is worth. Don't even wash your hair, forget it. But notice what's going on in the mind. So taking the precept not to take what's not freely offered.

There's a great story of Guy's from when he was on staff here. We were on staff together many years ago, but it was his story. It concerns both taking what's not given and the fourth precept, which is not using false speech.

One evening during probably the three-month retreat, he went back into the kitchen, into the big walk-in refrigerator, and opened it up. This was a long time ago—probably most of you here weren't even alive, so it's definitely not any of you. He opened the fridge, and there's a yogi in there with his hands in the date box. Being the gentleman that he is, Guy said, "Can I help you?" And the yogi said, "I'm looking for the maintenance office." So that's two precepts in one. We'll try to go the other way, right? But anyway, not taking what's not freely offered.

The third precept in our lay life is not harming ourselves or others with our sexual energy, which is quite complex, as we all know. On retreat here, we take the fifth precept, which really, if you were taking eight precepts, becomes the third precept—which is celibacy for the period of the retreat. In lay life, the lay five precepts, it's not celibacy. But for the period of the retreat here together, we take the precept to be celibate, just not to act on any sexual energy. Which isn't saying there's anything wrong with it. I actually see it as part of noble silence in a way—really keeping our energy with ourselves and for our practice.

And the fourth training guideline: not to use false speech, not to lie, not to use harsh, abusive speech. I know you talked a lot today about noble silence, which makes that all easier. Working with wise speech is a tough one in our lives. It's just so easy—in the mind, out the mouth. Or in my case, out the mouth before it actually came into the mind in any conscious way. But it's a big one to work with. Here, mostly noble silence helps. Or you might watch some of the things you say to yourself and see if they're harsh or abusive. Just a hint.

But there will be a few times you'll need to talk—sometimes in the work meditation, if you need to check with the cooks or the housekeepers, if you have some questions, if you need to talk to the manager about something, in the interviews. Not to go nuts about it, but just tuning in and seeing why we're saying what we're saying.

There's a guideline of the Buddha, a very simple one about wholesome speech: A statement with five factors is well spoken, blameless, and unfaulted by the wise. Which five? It is spoken at the proper time. It is spoken in truth. It is spoken gently—in other words, not harshly. What is said is beneficial to the best of one's knowledge. And it is spoken with a mind of goodwill.

So this, of course, is the best of all scenarios. But it's just something to bear in mind. Not that you're going to have time to stop and check everything before you talk, but later, sometimes, if you say something to the cooks or the managers or in an interview and you walk away feeling just kind of a little funny—that's how I feel when I know I've shot off my big mouth. I go away and I just feel kind of... off. And it's different from putting oneself down, but it's the sense that comes of having acted in a way that isn't quite wholesome. You just feel a little off.

And it's then really interesting to just explore and see: ah, that was said, and it really was completely unnecessary. It wasn't bad, but it was completely useless. In terms of beneficial, not so much. That could be all it was.

You don't judge yourself when we transgress or go against one of the precepts. It's not like then we hate ourselves. Oh, okay, bring in the awareness, see what happens. We can tell what's the effect of going against one of the guidelines, what's the effect of refraining. This is where the discerning mind of wisdom comes in, and we naturally begin to incline more to the wholesome. It's not that you get out the whip.

It becomes a movement of love and faith. It's just so much more happy to refrain from harm than it is to act in a harming way. This understanding becomes more and more integrated into who we are.

The fifth precept addresses refraining from alcohol, from intoxicants that are the cause for heedlessness. This one is quite clear. The one thing we want to say to everybody is that if you're on any kind of steady medication for any reason, please stay with it. The Buddha is talking here about recreational intoxicants and drugs that cloud the mind. But anything you need—if you're on pain medication or any kind of medication—please continue taking it. The precept does not refer to that at all.

So these are the five precepts: a great source of investigation, of happiness, and of wisdom.

[The group then recited the traditional taking of the precepts together, chanting the preliminary homage, the three refuges, and the five precepts in Pali.]

Strive on with diligence. Now, since we have some time remaining, I would like to give you some tips for meditation retreat. I want to share something with you because I've attended many retreats and I've had many people saying different things. I want to remind you how to be successful in a retreat.

You have to remember one word: space. Not spacing out—spacing out is another thing entirely. You don't want to space out during the retreat. You want to remember the word "space." Give yourself enough space.

This is an acronym I've come up with that really helps to put things together. The "S" stands for slowing down. If you want to be successful on a retreat, slow down. When we come to meditate, you need to slow down. In other parts of life—in the business world, in daily life—you can go faster. The faster, the better there. Here, the slower, the better.

I remember when I came here in 1999. Carl was a teacher and Guy was a teacher. I was really racing, but there were some yogis who were walking so slowly. I thought, "How am I going to walk like these yogis?" It was amazing. They were role models, just really walking slowly. I learned from them, and I experienced it in my own practice—whenever I slowed down, I could see things clearly.

You see that fan? It has slowed down. You can count the blades. You can see the cobweb. But if it's running very fast, you can't see.

So if you cannot really slow down your body, how are you going to slow down your mind? It's impossible, because the mind runs faster than the body. If you cannot control your body, how are you going to have a handle on your mind?

So this is a good reminder. These are just tips, actually. Slow down—that's the first one. S stands for slowing down. You observe yourself. I cannot emphasize this enough: the more I slow down, the more I see things in the body-mind process. Of course, you have to be careful—when you're going to the bathroom, you need to find out what speed helps you to be more mindful. There are certain areas where you have to adjust the speed.

Now another thing: S also stands for silence. People have talked about this already, so you know what silence means. Most teachers have mentioned it, and it supports your practice.

P stands for patience—Joseph talked about that—and perseverance. Perseverance means applying wise effort. Patience with the unfolding of your practice, with the way your practice unfolds. Try to be patient, even when you have done so many retreats.

Every retreat is different. Maybe the last one was an easy one and this one is difficult. Or perhaps it's the other way around. But if you want to set yourself up for frustration, equate retreats. "Oh, I did a ten-day retreat with Goenka and now I'm here—it should be easy." No, it's different. Every time is different. So be patient with the unfolding of your practice.

A in SPACE stands for attention—another fancy word for mindfulness. Pay attention to everything. Don't leave out anything, whether you are eating, in the bathroom, or dressing. This is our practice as monastics. When we are dressing, putting on these robes, we have to reflect on them as we are turning them, as we are tying them. So it becomes part of meditation. When you are dressing, when you wake up, when you are drinking—attention to everything.

I remember when I was practicing with Sayadaw U Janaka. I used to go there thinking that I was going to report about my walking and sitting. As soon as I entered the interview room: "How's your daily practice? How about brushing your teeth?" I said, "Oh, what's this actually?" This is Sayadaw. I think Rebecca has also practiced with Sayadaw U Janaka—he is amazing. Daily practice is very important. Attention to everything, excluding nothing. That will accelerate your practice.

A also stands for attitude—proper attitude towards the practice. Not pushing things, not indulging in them, not ignoring them. Somebody will talk more about developing proper attitude.

C—here C involves a lot of things. I learned this C when I was practicing with Sayadaw U Pandita here many years ago, in 2003 I think, at the Forest Refuge. The teacher said to me, "Oh, Bhante Buddharakkhita, you are protector of the Buddha—now you should protect the C's." Then he told me about the C's.

C stands for continuity.

Continuity of your practice means one mindful moment after the other. Not one hour mindful, and then one hour where you just lose it and you're in another space somewhere. You become a space cadet. You don't want to become a space cadet. You want really to link one mindful moment after the other so that they become stronger.

Actually, that's why even these clothes are stronger—because it's one thread after the other. You can do like this, you cannot make a hole. But if it's just one thread, let's say if there's a hole here and you start with one thread and it's not supported by the other threads, then it's so weak, then it can break through. Remember, how you gain concentration easily is through constant mindfulness. It's continuity of your practice that's going to help you a lot.

C also stands for concentration—stay focused. It's also contentment. We've talked about contentment. Be contented with your practice, because you'll see people who are really going into their practice very fast, very wonderful yogis. In the first two days they're just concentrated, and you are really struggling a lot. Be contented with your practice. Don't compare it with others. Just be contented with what's arising in your experience, with what we have to offer here, the retreats and all that we have to offer. Concentration, contentment. Concurrence is so philosophical—we'll talk about that during dharma talks. So we stay with those three C's: continuity, concentration, contentment.

E stands for expectation-free. Yes, I mean it. When I did my retreat here, whenever I went for an interview with Joseph, I would come down and there was already a signpost on this path: "There's nothing to expect." For me, that was an amazing reminder. Because I really, I mean, I came from far away. I expected something here, you know. From the airplane, I came from South America, and before that I was in Africa. I was expecting something. And then after one week, something was not coming. What's wrong with me, actually?

Expectation is actually very good before you come for the retreat. You have to get somebody who's going to water your plants, look after your dog and all that. It's no problem. Before coming here, no problem. But when you come here on a cushion, it gets in the way. "Okay, I'm going to sit here. Oh, yeah, last time I was in Burma, I got into jhanas and all that. Yeah, now I'm here." Then you expect in one sit to get jhanas. First one, second, third, fourth, enlightenment—expecting all these things. It might get in the way, actually. There's a saying that if you want to have a bad sit, have a good one the first morning. I'm not saying that you shouldn't have a good one in the morning. But if you have a good one in the morning, and then the next subsequent sits, I'm telling you, it's really difficult, especially if you're somebody who's an expectation freak. You're in trouble. So, expectation-free.

Another E: actually enjoy your practice. E stands for enjoy. Yes, not attachment to your practice, but really enjoy it. In fact, the Buddha said that those people who are enlightened, they continue to meditate. And somebody asked, "Why?" It's for abiding in peace and happiness. It's a vacation, in a kind of way. You came here, you're on a retreat, you retreat from difficult situations. And then settle back in your practice. And that's what the Buddha talked about—joy, actually. Joy is part of the practice. In Buddhist teaching, joy is one of the conditions, one of the factors of enlightenment. When joy arises, you feel happy. And in fact, it's the precursor to concentration.

When I teach myself in Uganda and other venues where I teach alone, I tell people: breathe in happiness, breathe out happiness. Breathe in peace, breathe out peace. I tell people when they're breathing to connect with something that they aspire to—happiness, joy.

So I think that's a culmination of our practice—to have happiness, peace, enlightenment, awakening, joy. I would say joy, but in order to fulfill it, we must learn to enjoy. Not through attachments, but actually through cultivating joy so that you can proceed on your practice. Because sometimes when we have difficult mind states, sometimes we can't settle our mind and body.

But if you really relax and just send metta, loving-kindness—"may I be well, may I be happy"—and all that, then you can actually cultivate these states of mind.

So remember SPACE:

S — Slow down, silence.

P — Patience, perseverance.

A — Attention, proper attitude.

C — Continuity, concentration. You can also add contentment.

E — Expectation-free. Or simply: enjoy your practice.

I hope that helps. At least that's what I use as a template when I go for retreat.

CHAPTER 129

Faith: Giving Confidence for Our Path

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this comprehensive talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson illuminates the often misunderstood quality of saddhā (faith) as described in the Pāli suttas. Rather than belief in doctrines, saddhā is presented as a mental quality that uplifts, brightens, and clarifies the mind—described in the Abhidhamma as functioning like a muddy lake becoming clear. Wilson explains how faith operates as part of the five spiritual faculties (indriya): saddhā, paññā (wisdom), vīriya (energy), sati (mindfulness), and samādhi (concentration), which work together in balance during meditation.

The talk distinguishes between "bright faith," initially sparked by external inspiration, and "verified faith" that develops through direct experience of the Dhamma. Wilson explores the Buddha's teaching on Dhamma followers and faith followers, noting that both types possess all five faculties but may have different entry points. She shares how devotion can manifest differently for practitioners—whether through traditional practices like Buddhānupassanā (contemplation of the Buddha's qualities) or through what she calls "devotion to awareness itself."

Practically, Wilson addresses how to work with faith when difficult mental states arise and the mind shrinks back from experience. Drawing on a sutta where the Buddha instructs monastics to direct attention to inspiring images when scattered, she encourages practitioners to consciously contemplate what genuinely inspires them—teachers, the sangha's support, or simple acts of generosity around them—as a skillful means to restore the uplifted quality of heart that gives confidence to continue meeting each moment with full presence.

So tonight, what I am going to talk about is the quality of mind, of heart, of faith, which is given quite an importance in the teachings, in the suttas.

Last night, Winnie mentioned how all the aspects of the path work together, kind of come together and support one another. And as maybe you're seeing, and probably you all already knew anyway, this path, this retreat, requires a huge commitment, doesn't it? Over and over. Not just a one-time commitment—you got here, you thought that was the big commitment, and it wasn't even starting yet.

This perseverance, this commitment, and with wise attitude, the commitment is simply to meet each arising moment fully, wholeheartedly, with open, interested attention, without wanting, without aversion. How do you do that? How do any of us really cultivate that quality of energy, of effort, that we can continue to meet the moment? It takes a huge effort, but it's not the effort of wanting, of pushing, of aversion. Where does this come from? What is it that gives us this energy that leads to mindfulness, to wisdom?

The Buddha spoke often about five faculties—five spiritual faculties they're called—five specific qualities of mind and heart that we can experience, that we do experience, that we can recognize, that circle around and support each other. Sometimes they're talked about in a linear way, because that's how our minds work, that's how we can talk. The first one is faith, which is balanced with discerning wisdom, and this balance is what gives us the energy to do. So there's faith, wisdom, energy, mindfulness, and collectedness of mind, or concentration. These five qualities are in balance whenever the meditating mind is balanced—these five qualities are there.

One of the ways the Buddha talks about faith, saddha in Pali, is as the first, the initiating, of these qualities. It's the quality of mind and heart that you could say kick-starts the energy. It's the quality that opens us and gives us this confidence, this energy, this willingness to do, but from another motivation than wanting, than aversion, than our usual "me, me, me, what can I get?" So that's why I want to talk about saddha. It's a beautiful quality of heart and mind.

The translation into English of "faith," as with all English words, has a lot of different baggage and connotations for different people. Some people might find it a beautiful word, but one time we were teaching a retreat, I think it was at Spirit Rock, and one of us teachers talked about faith, and someone said humorously, "Oh, you mean the F word?" They weren't really thrilled to hear about faith.

So just to say from the beginning, this quality of saddha is not at all about believing in or signing up to a certain set of beliefs. The faith the Buddha's talking about here is a quality of mind. It doesn't mean that to be a card-carrying Buddhist Vipassana practitioner, you have to sign up to a certain set of beliefs. To me, that would be more deadening than enlivening.

We all have different relationships to faith in our personal history. Sometimes it's a very supportive idea. Sometimes it's been the description of a certain set of beliefs that we felt has been put on us, that we had to follow, and that we have somehow come into reaction to. But here, as far as I can tell, pretty much everything the Buddha taught is speaking from a practical, experiential point of view. What qualities help us wake up?

The quality of faith, saddha, is a mental state, a mental quality that we experience in our heart and mind that we can recognize. It's not about concepts or views or ideas, but it's a quality the effect of which is that it uplifts and brightens the heart, brightens the mind. It brings in a sense of inspiration. So it's a quality that we can feel.

The Abhidhamma, which is complex but has kind of nice descriptions of all the different mental qualities, describes the function of saddha as to clarify, as a muddy lake becomes clear. I'll say in a minute, I didn't used to quite understand that, but lately it's been making more sense. Another function is to set forth. The manifestation, the way it shows up, is again non-fogginess of mind. So those of you who are just falling asleep, all the fogginess—a little inspiration of faith can sometimes bring a jolt of waking-up energy. Non-fogginess as removal of the heart's, the mind's impurities, those qualities that are causing us suffering in the moment. And as confidence, as resolution, or as Sayadaw U Pandita describes it, faith, saddha in the mind, gives us the willingness to do. And that's the next quality of the five faculties: viriya, energy.

So, to talk a bit about this sense of faith as a quality that uplifts, that brightens the heart, the mind, that energizes in a wholesome way, that clears it—it's a really great thing to begin to tune into. In a minute I'll talk about seeing each for ourselves what does inspire this quality of faith, of inspiration. But how does it clear? How does it function as giving confidence?

So in clearing, you could say in clarifying the muddy lake, in clearing impurities of mind, it's as if it opens our heart, our mind, our views to another possibility.

For most of us—I want to say all, but one should never say all—for most of us, the way that we live is caught in confusion, in delusion, in not recognizing the way things are accurately. Like when Joseph talked about impermanence the other night. It's not that that's something that's going to become true if we wake up, right? It's already true, but we don't recognize it accurately. And there are many ways that we live in a world of concept, as Andrea was talking about, and views that describe ourselves and describe the world that we don't even know. We just think this is how it is.

And so we tend to consciously notice what fits our view and not notice what doesn't. It's just a limitation on how we can experience the world, and that's what we think is possible for us—it's a vision for us.

The sense of uplift, of inspiration that can come with faith is a kind of opening of the mind, of the heart, past the limitations of the comfortable, to be open to the unknown, to be open to a vision, to a possibility we hadn't even thought of.

This doesn't have to just be in spiritual experience. In 2008, right after President Obama was elected for the first time—that seems like an age ago—I remember the next morning after the election, reporters were interviewing people, because there was, in many quarters, a real excitement, a euphoria almost. This reporter had gone into communities interviewing young African-American women and men, late teens and such. I remember this one young woman they talked to who had clearly had a very difficult life up to that time and hadn't really felt that there was much possibility for her to go to school or to do anything that she wanted to in life—really clearly, as is so often the case, living in a situation where opportunities weren't freely offered.

But she was saying, "Oh, you know, it just gives me so much faith, so much inspiration that if he can be elected president, I can go to school and learn how to be a hairdresser."

It was really so touching. This is really the sense of confidence that comes with faith—the sense of opening past the views we held, for good reason, but thinking there's nothing much possible for me. It's like, oh, there's another vision. And that faith, that opening, that uplifting energy of the mind or heart gives the confidence, the willingness to do.

In terms of talking about faith as one of the spiritual faculties, in terms of our practice here and in our whole life, the Buddha would often begin offering teachings to someone by considering who could hear the Dhamma. But he would realize their mind isn't quite in the uplifted, open place for it. So he would give what he would call the step-by-step talk, graduated teachings.

There's one sutta I like where the Buddha's surrounded by his sangha—nuns, monks, lay people—he's teaching the Dhamma. And there's a poor sick person, actually a leper, a poor wretch of a person as it's described in the suttas. He sees this crowd and thinks, "Oh, maybe there's some food over there. Maybe if I go over there I can get some food." So he goes over, certainly not intending to hear the good Dhamma. But he's just sitting there and thinks, "Oh, there's no food, it's just the Buddha talking, but okay, I'll sit here. Might as well listen."

The Buddha, who could of course tell what was in everyone's mind, looked out in the crowd thinking, "Who here could hear the Dhamma, where it could really go in?" And he sees this guy, Suppabuddha—that was the sick man's name, the poor leper's name—he could hear it. But he sees the mind is kind of closed, not in the uplifted receptive place.

And so he starts with a step-by-step talk, which he always starts by talking about generosity, the qualities of generosity, the qualities of non-harming conduct. He goes through a whole list—renunciation, the dangers of sense pleasures—and then, this is the language: "When he perceived that his mind was ready, uplifted, clear, then he gave the teachings particular to the Buddhas, of the Four Noble Truths."

This language, to me, describes the quality of saddhā in our heart and mind. Just this sense the mind is uplifted, it's clear, it's flexible, it's open and ready to hear the Dhamma. This quality of faith is really essential to let us open in here, to just be with what's going on.

It's described initially as bright faith—something usually external, first and maybe again and again, triggers this quality of uplift in our mind, in our heart. For each of us, there's been something, and there continue to be things. We can actually use this as a contemplation, consciously contemplate, come back to what is it that can elicit this quality of saddhā in our mind, in our heart.

Like this young woman thinking about President Obama being elected—but then the bright faith isn't about putting the truth onto that person, thinking I need that person to do it for me. What that bright faith offers, whether it's a person who inspires you, or hearing the Dhamma, or reading the Dhamma, whatever it might be for you—it's not about putting the energy onto them, that quality of devotion, although devotion can be an aspect of faith. But it's not giving over the power to anything outside. Rather, it's that external stimulus that elicits that quality of brightness and uplift and openness in our own mind and heart.

This is called bright faith. And as that gives us the energy to do—like maybe it gave that young woman, maybe she really did go to school and learn how to be a hairdresser.

That would be the viriya. And then the mindfulness, the determination to do it.

So as we open with bright faith in terms of our Dhamma practice, as we continue to practice, it becomes more and more what's called verified faith. It's not so dependent on that particular external stimulus because we come to know for ourselves, in deeper and deeper ways, the truth of the Dhamma. But even when we start with bright faith, it's not about putting it onto someone else. It's about eliciting this willingness to do.

What the heck is it we're doing? How is it different from wanting? And this is where it gets really interesting to me. Because the faith, the confidence of this wholesome quality of saddhā, isn't about getting something we want, or feeling good, or getting the result we want. The confidence is really in the willingness to basically give ourselves wholeheartedly, with awareness, into this moment just as it is. Without holding back. Without having a "so that."

So it's not a willingness to do such that if I do X, Y, Z, in three days I'm going to be a stream-enterer. I mean, our minds might think that. But then we start practicing and that is not the energy of faith—that's the energy of wanting. It feels really different. We'll flip back and forth, but you can really tell: wanting is not inspiring. It gives us energy to do, God knows. How many things have we done in our life that come from wanting? A few, you know. It gives us energy to do, but it's not opening. It's not uplifting. It's narrowing and self-referencing and exhausting. The energy of faith is quite different.

So the willingness to do, to meet this moment with our fullness of presence, with awareness, no matter what this moment is presenting. But there are a couple of different ways that faith might manifest for us, because we're different personalities. Here I want to talk about the sense of devotion, because for some people that really is the manifestation of faith for them.

The Buddha talks about two kinds of followers in the suttas. He talks about Dhamma followers and faith followers, which I think is really interesting. The faith followers—he uses the word saddhā, faith—but I want to say, in the way he's talking about it, I would substitute in English "devotion followers," because both types have faith.

The Dhamma followers are disciples in whom the faculty of wisdom, of the five faculties, the discerning faculty, is predominant. They develop the noble path with wisdom in the lead. Faith followers are disciples in whom the faculty of faith is predominant, and they develop the noble path with faith in the lead.

But—and I'm paraphrasing here—a wisdom follower is one who is not an awakened person yet, but someone on the path who has sufficiently gained a reflective acceptance and understanding of the teachings proclaimed by the Tathagata. I think I'm more that type. In my early years, a lot of what I learned and what really inspired me came from reading suttas, from reading a lot of the Buddhist teachings that I would get from Sri Lanka, from the Pali Text Society. Actually, I didn't know anybody else where I was living who knew anything about this, so it was that or nothing. But that saved my life. I would say that was really inspiring to me. It wasn't that I was some awakened being, but reading and hearing the Dhamma in that way, it just made sense and went deeper and deeper. And it inspires faith, that sense of uplift.

A faith follower, the way the Buddha describes it, is one who has sufficient faith in and love for the Tathagata, which is how he described himself. Both of these followers actually have all five faculties, so don't think it's one or the other. All of them have these five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration or collectedness, and wisdom. And they all balance. So it's not one or the other, but we can see in ourselves maybe a predilection to move in one direction or the other. Not to think there's a right or a wrong—really see that for yourself.

This sense of devotion, I think, can be really appreciated if that's the type, if that's what lights up the energy for you. Look and see for yourself. Remember, maybe it was on the opening night with Bhante, we talked about this meditation, Buddhānussati, where you contemplate the qualities of the Buddha. I was saying that in Burma, many of the nuns I know, that's their main practice.

And that practice in itself doesn't—you know, I don't hate it or anything—but it doesn't wake up this quality of energy in me. But being with the nuns who practice it, I can see that for them it does. When they're practicing this, they become quite radiant, filled with joy and incredible energy and commitment and confidence to live their lives as very simple renunciates. And the ones I know, they're living pretty tough lives—living very simply, taking care of a lot of little orphan girls, or starting schools that they run for poor children, all on dana every month. I mean, really amazing commitment. And I can see the inspiration, the faith that comes, and how that feeds all these five faculties.

And they then become a source of inspiration for me, because what's wonderful is we can catch it from each other. So that particular practice doesn't inspire a lot of faith in me directly. But being with someone whose faith is up—that inspires faith in me. There's a way we can use that with each other.

But we're all different. Last year, I was teaching a retreat in Germany, and a young man came—a young German guy who lived in Shanghai. And he had, just the previous year in Shanghai, had his first introduction to Buddhist practice. I don't think there's so much Buddhist practice really available in China, but he had gone to a five-day retreat with the Pure Land Buddhist school. He said it was in a really ancient monastery with Pure Land Chinese monks, and to him it was so inspiring. He said just the ancient quality—they spent a lot of time together chanting and circumambulating, walking around the statues of the Buddha, chanting. The whole sense, he said, was just so spiritual. It really brought up faith in him.

And that gave him the energy, the confidence, so then he came back home to Germany and did an eight-day Vipassana retreat with us last year—his first real retreat like that. He said that devotional quality really inspired faith in him. But he also said he didn't have any tools at all from that in terms of how to watch his mind or how to practice. So then he found it opened him up to hear the Dhamma, and he really was embracing mindfulness practice and the Four Noble Truths and all of that. That's really kind of how it works.

But there are other people for whom that's not going to be so inspiring. As I said, when I first read the suttas, or when I first heard the First Noble Truth talked about—which, you know, when Bhante mentioned it last night—I found that incredibly inspiring. It's like, "Oh yes, this is how things are." Instead of people saying, "Oh yeah, it's going to be okay, things will be okay, it just gets better and better." But it isn't just getting better and better. "What's the matter? I should be happy. I've got nothing to complain about." And then I heard the First Noble Truth. "Oh yes, that makes total sense." Great faith would come up, and that gives a confidence to practice.

So it can be interesting and helpful for each of us to just look in your own experience and see what inspires you. And I've found for myself, even as I say I'm not the devotional type—maybe that turns out not to be true. Maybe what I'm seeing for myself is that the two qualities of faith follower, devotion follower, and Dhamma follower, wisdom follower—it all ends up coming together one way or another.

So for me, the devotion turns out to be not to a being, not particularly to a sense of the memory of the Buddha, although I'm quite inspired by many of my teachers. The devotion turns out to be a love of awareness itself—a complete confidence, complete love of the awareness of this moment. Which can lead into, when the awareness is more or less pure, an embracing of this moment. Or not. Then you embrace that you're not embracing this moment. But a real sense of confidence in awareness. Confidence in the Dhamma, that it reveals the truth.

So I'll tell a little story that for me personifies this—I don't know if it works for anyone else. It was maybe, actually it's a long time ago now, fifteen or twenty years, when I first visited the Ramana Ashram in Tiruvannamalai in southern India, in Tamil Nadu. Ramana Maharshi, if you don't know, died in 1951. But he was really considered one of the great awakened beings, one of the saints of India in the last century. He spent all of his life from the time he was sixteen until he died at the base of this small mountain, Arunachala, in this little village of Tiruvannamalai. An ashram grew up around him, and he really, from what one can tell, seemed quite awakened—very inspiring.

So this ashram is still there, and it's very well maintained, very well managed. There's what they call a samadhi—it's a different use of the word than how we use it—which is kind of like the marble tomb where he is buried, with a big building around it. The ashram is there at the base of the mountain, and the mountain is one of the things Ramana would speak of often. He would say, "O Arunachala, you root out the ego of one who meditates on you in your heart."

So it's a sense of really freedom from confusion, from greed, hatred, and delusion.

The ashram honors Ramana, but it's not about mere devotion to him. It's really there to support all the people who come—which is millions of people over the years from all over the world—to wake up themselves. So it's not like a dead place, like a museum. It's really alive, oriented toward awakening.

And I say millions of people come there from all over, so every evening there's a big hall, bigger than this, where all the guests can sit along the side, and the men and women who run the ashram come and do an hour's chanting. You sit and listen—it's one of the things to do. You listen to the chanting, and right behind is the open room with the samadhi, with Ramana's tomb there. Then after the chanting you go to dinner.

The chanting is led on the men's side by the man who's the president of the ashram, who runs the place. And as the chanting is going on, and all through the day, people are walking around circumambulating the tomb. It's something one does when one's there. And watching people do it—all kinds of people, and myself included—you can see, as much as you can tell from looking at someone, all the different ways that people do that.

Some are really showy, prostrating around, and you can tell there's a wanting so much to feel the truth, to wake up. You can just feel this energy. Some people are just walking around chit-chatting, just la la la, and then they go away. Some people are just so grim, trying so hard. So much different stuff.

And I could see that in myself. There were times I'd just be walking around, but there were times I'm like, "I have to really be present so I can wake up." Does that sound like anybody's walking meditation? Right? Just—ugh! And it looks like you're really doing it, but the motivation isn't this upliftingness of faith. It's wanting. And they feel so different when you notice it, but we so easily slide into "Ugh, I gotta wake up." "No, oh no, I spaced out in that moment." "Oh, Ramana, Ramana." What can he do? He's gone. Just like the Buddha, they're gone. What's here now?

So, all of that. I was watching. And on this particular night, the chanting ended. Every night the president of the ashram would go in, and all the people—two hundred people—you go in, you sit on the floor in rows, and the president and the other people who run the ashram come and ladle out the food. They serve everyone their meal, every night and every lunch.

So he finished the chanting, got up—this very simple man—just got up, very simply walked around the tomb, and went and served the dinner. No huff, no fluff, no big show, no prostrating. Just get up, walk around the samadhi, go serve dinner. Day after day after day, year after year after year.

And to me—of course, I don't know how much is projection, I'm aware of that—but what it really said to me, this is the quality of devotion. Just the simplicity of awareness in this moment. Just the simplicity of: you get up, you walk around the samadhi, and you go serve dinner. To me, that's really the devotion to the everyday simplicity and honesty of awareness.

And that's really what we're cultivating here. Not looking for a better experience, but you get up, you brush your teeth. You feel grumpy, like Winnie said yesterday, or you feel great. It doesn't matter. Just get up, and you notice how things are, and you brush your teeth, and you come and sit. You go wash the pots, you take a walk. You just feel whatever it is. It's the awareness that the faith, the saddhā, gives us the trust, the confidence to really open into. It doesn't matter what's happening, but the saddhā, the faith, gives us the confidence to give ourselves completely to this moment—whatever it might happen to be—with nothing held back.

Here is a quotation from Ayya Khema, the great German nun and Buddhist teacher. She's talking about faith. She says that the willingness to give ourselves to our path wholeheartedly is not a one-time decision. It keeps on deepening. This is like the verified faith. As long as we're still looking for a loophole—a loophole means some way out, looking for some lasting happiness in this world—

Then our commitment to our spiritual path is not complete. This isn't about judging—it's just about looking and seeing. "Okay, I'll open to this moment so that it gets better." You know, all the "I'm being mindful, but it didn't work." How often do we say that? "It didn't work. What am I doing wrong? Because it's supposed to get better." Only when we've realized that there is not another way out will we be ready to really give ourselves to the path.

I don't say that so that you take it as a way to put yourself down—not at all. But more in the sense of seeing. It deepens. It deepens. We don't have the confidence or the trust to just really give ourselves to awareness of whatever's happening when whatever's happening is difficult. Or it so doesn't match the unrecognized view we have of how things are supposed to be. Winnie last night was wonderful when she was describing what the perfect day would be like. And we laugh—ha ha ha, we don't really think that. Yeah, right. We wouldn't admit it, maybe. But when you get up grumpy and everything goes the other way, it's like, "I'm not giving myself completely to this. No way."

But the confidence, the trust, the faith in awareness—what starts to happen is a shift of motivation from wanting, from somehow looking for experience to affirm ourselves, to confirm ourselves, to give ourselves some sense of importance, of getting somewhere. Don't you want to know you're getting somewhere? This open awareness where you're just floating around, noticing whatever arises, and you're not having any experiences, not getting more clear—doesn't that drive you crazy? Don't you want some proof you're getting somewhere?

But the real surrender: Where do you think you're going to get? Where is there besides this moment? There's nothing else besides this moment. Dōgen Zenji, the great Zen master, said, "If you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?"

So whatever's occurring in this moment—beautiful, difficult, a moment of faith, a moment of aversion, a moment of hearing, a moment of pain—this moment is the Dhamma speaking to us. It's nowhere else. And faith, this uplifted quality of heart and mind, gives us the confidence again to say, "Okay, it's like this right now." Just a kind of surrendering or giving ourselves into this moment, nothing held back—not in order for something better to happen, but because of us right here.

What's really started to shift for me, getting stronger and stronger, is that this devotion or this quality of Dhamma follower starts to be that the trust, the confidence in awareness, in mindfulness, becomes more trustworthy and more interesting than our habit of liking and disliking whatever is occurring. Our habit of getting entranced by aversion and greed and self-stories—those things will still come. But we get more interested in the awareness. It just feels so much more reliable and true and freeing, and always accessible when we remember. Awareness isn't just accessible when pleasant things are happening or when unpleasant things are happening. It's whenever we remember.

So this is the shift from expecting or thinking we know, to simply loving awareness itself—that's my language. Then we don't keep evaluating by the quality of what's happening. And then we can start to see that all of our six sense experiences—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical sensations, and then the whole mental realm of thoughts, emotions, moods—those are the six sense experiences. They're just occurring, over and over, across those six doors. All of them, any of them, serves to re-trigger our recognition of awareness. There's nothing outside of it. We don't have to wait for a better experience.

And this gets to be really so wonderful, because you can sit down and be having just the most awful, useless sitting. I know we always tell you no sitting's useless, but don't you feel like some of them are useless? You say, "I'm just sitting here and it's restless and it's foggy and I'm sleepy and what's the point? I might as well just be in bed—it'd be more pleasant, that's for sure. Useless."

And then you come tell us, and we say, "Oh, but there's awareness of fogginess." And you go, "Thanks a lot. I needed you to tell me that." Right. But we mean it. We mean it. And just so you know, if you're on my interview list, I'm going to keep on saying that the whole time. You don't even have to come because that's what I'm going to tell you.

You tell me something, and I say, "Oh yeah, and there's awareness of that." That's so far out! Because over and over again there will be that shift where you're sitting there foggy, and then—oh, awareness of fogginess. Awareness of fogginess. And this love of awareness will come, just for that moment. You see, awareness doesn't care if it's aware of fogginess or aware of bliss. Awareness isn't better when it's aware of something pleasant. We can be aware of anything.

So just starting with something simple—I had this example written down. I was at home washing a teacup. I'm a little bit attached to my two perfect teacups, I have to say. I don't want to break them. When people stay in my house, I put them up high. I say, "Use anything you want, but not those two teacups." And they say, "We wouldn't dare, we wouldn't touch them."

So I was washing my teacup this one day, very carefully, and then I became aware—I'd been really mindful, mindful of the movements of the teacup, but I wasn't noticing the attitude in the mind. The mindfulness wasn't complete. It was mindfulness with the attitude of wanting. I was being very careful with my movements because I didn't want to break the teacup. Do you get a sense of how we can be mindful in order to? That's a sort of mindfulness, but it's not the mindfulness of faith. It's not the vīrya that just dies into what's happening. It was the wanting.

So, okay, there's klesha. There's the torment in the mind of greed that I didn't see. But all of a sudden I became aware of the greed. Our tendency could be, "Oh, I'm not being mindful well enough because there's greed." Okay, that's aversion. But what happens with true mindfulness? "Oh, that's greed. Oh yeah, look at that. That's greed." And then the awareness of greed—the awareness becomes more interesting. It starts to grow and gain its own momentum.

It wasn't like I said, "Oh, I have to really love awareness here." It was more like, "Here's awareness. Oh yeah, that's—oh, that's greed. Oh yeah, greed is like this. That's how greed feels in the body. That's awareness of greed." And then I noticed the next thing, and the mindfulness just starts to get its own momentum again. Anything, everything that occurs can be the trigger back into awareness.

That's why we talk so much about continuity. It's not to gain something. You think you've wasted half the day—like when you were saying if you're not walking, you're wasting half the day. But then you suddenly wake up. You're drinking tea, your seventeenth cup of tea of the day, and it's only ten in the morning. But suddenly you become aware. You feel a sensation. You're drinking the tea. You notice the absolute disgust—"I can't stand another sip of tea. It's disgusting. I'm going to float away." Oh, aversion's like that.

And then you touch it—you palpably feel the awareness. It's like, "Great, here we are again." And that awareness leads to the steadiness of mindfulness. It starts to get its own momentum. That's the concentration. And then the wisdom, the clear seeing, the recognition of what's wholesome, what's onward-leading, what's not—that's not an act of will. That comes by itself.

So this example I'm making up—the seventeenth cup of tea, the disgusting something, and then, "Oh, I really don't need any more tea right now." And you get up and you go, "I think I'll just do walking meditation." Really with that tone of voice, not with judgment, not with blame. Oh yeah, wisdom sees this is really more supportive of my awakening right now—get up and walk. And you'll see that happening more and more as the retreat goes on. We say it gets a little bit easier to remember to be mindful. In the beginning, at the end of every walking pass, you try to think, "Do I need to go to the bathroom yet? No, not yet, I have to do another one." And after a couple of weeks, you don't even think about it anymore. It's happening naturally.

But notice this. Notice how the faith, the confidence, brings the energy, the willingness to do, and then we start to love the awareness. The mindfulness gets its own momentum. The mind steadies and the wisdom comes, you see more clearly, and that again cycles around and feeds the faith, feeds the uplifting quality. And so it keeps spiraling deeper and deeper. We need that. We need that recommitment, because it does get difficult. It's difficult in the beginning, and it gets difficult in different ways as we go on.

One of the descriptions of viriya, energy, is the quality of mind, of heart, that does not shrink back. To shrink means to pull back from the difficult. So when something difficult happens, there's that uplifting of faith that gives us the courage: "Okay, I can surrender into this moment too, with awareness." Not pulling back, but surrendering into this.

Because it does get difficult in different ways. We have to keep finding that faith again, that recommitment. Stephen Batchelor, once talking about emptiness—emptiness of sense of self, the sense of awakening—said, "Emptiness is not just an experience of oceanic bliss. It is a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, of self-centeredness, and seeming protection. And although it is freeing, at times it also brings up great disconcertion." It feels very uncomfortable, confusing—like being in no man's land, where we're not in the realm of the familiar. We can't quite figure it out the way we're used to doing. And so then, again, we may call on faith to give us the uplift, to give us the energy. This too—not to shrink back.

So I just want to say one last thing: when you're finding yourself at a difficult time, noticing it's hard, when your mind is shrinking back, you can actually consciously use deliberate reflections on what brings up faith and inspiration in your heart and mind. Even though this is a deliberate contemplation, it can be very useful when we feel the energy is really getting lost, when we feel like, "What am I doing this for? I'm picking up and putting down my foot—why? To feel the sensations? Why? Who cares?" You ever have a moment like that? I do, often. Then I'll just do it again because the faith is really natural, and then it goes away. But sometimes we need to call it up.

So look and see for yourself. Think about it: What has inspired you, uplifted you, brought you to this path? There can be different things. For me, often I'll think about the teachers I've had, the people in my life in different ways—they don't have to be Buddhist teachers—but those who have exhibited some quality of compassion, of wakefulness, that when I think of them, that upliftedness, that energy, that openness, that willingness to do, comes into my heart, into my mind. A sense of gratitude, a sense of inspiration.

Or sometimes we can't find it even in ourselves. What I've found—and this unexpectedly started to occur for me one time when I was on retreat in Burma, during a really difficult retreat, getting quite caught in some heavy mental states—was that just trying to think of my own teachers or what inspired me, it just didn't cut it. I couldn't get there because the heaviness of the mental state was too strong. But then, in a situation like this, because we catch it from each other, we can actually use the external surroundings, use the sense of sangha. There's no way we're doing this in isolation. You may wish you were in more isolation, but we're not in isolation. And we really support one another.

That is one of the meanings of Sangha.

So I noticed on this retreat in Burma how well the people who were running the retreat center were taking care of us all—so many yogis from Burma and all different countries. The great generosity and metta with which the people who were working in the kitchen would do everything they could to satisfy people's little needs, the amount of care and kindness and metta that was just all around supporting me. And that actually uplifted my mind and heart, brought back faith, brought back openness.

So I would say sometimes if you're here and feeling that way, and you notice another fellow meditator—sometimes you can just feel that they're in the flow. Of course, we never really know. But as Joseph or someone was saying, you can tell when someone's just spacing out, and you can tell when someone's really there in that moment. And you think, "Oh, right. There really is a point to this." It can brighten our mind and heart.

Or I look around and notice the great generosity and metta from the staff. The care that goes into—just look at the flower arrangements. When one is dying, they put up some new beautiful arrangements. Somebody put great metta and generosity into that. Just look around and let it in. It doesn't take much. Because it then elicits that quality in our own mind and heart. And then again, there's the energy to take the next step, to notice the next thing, to bring awareness to this sense of shame or fear or aversion.

And I'm not just making this up as something I thought was a good idea. The Buddha also talks about it. There's one sutta actually given to nuns. Ananda is talking to nuns and then he and the Buddha are talking together. I'm going to paraphrase it a bit.

The Buddha is saying, "Here a nun, a monk abides"—you may recognize this phrase—"contemplating the body in the body, ardent, fully aware, and mindful." Do you remember Andrea talking about that phrase? He's saying they're just in the four foundations, leading away from the unhappiness that comes from wanting the things of the world. And as one is abiding, contemplating the four foundations of mindfulness, it could happen that a bodily sensation arises, a distress, or a mental sluggishness, or a mental distress. So the Buddha is saying this could arise—something that scatters the mind, that gets us confused. He recognizes this happens.

And so he says: you're practicing, a bodily distress, a mental sluggishness, a mental distress arises, and your mind gets completely scattered and lost. At that time, the nun, the monk, can direct her mind to some inspiring image. The word is image. And he gives the example of using the image of the Buddha. But I'm going to substitute here for whatever elicits faith in you. You can actually consciously—you're completely scattered, you're lost—it's one way that we can use metta, as Winnie was talking about. Metta for many people, just the quality of metta, inspires and opens the mind and heart. Or it can be contemplating or just bringing up some inspiring person, inspiring teacher, some of the examples I gave—but really to contemplate what brings up faith in you.

So do this for some time, and as this happens, you start to see that the sluggishness recedes, the distress recedes. He says happiness is born. From this happiness, from this joyful mind, the body relaxes. A relaxed body feels content. Just in case you thought we were making up this relaxation stuff—this is the Buddha. Joyful mind relaxes the body. A relaxed body feels content. The mind of one content becomes collected.

She then can reflect: "The purpose for which I directed my attention to an inspiring recollection has been served, so I can withdraw my attention from that." And that's called directed meditation. And then I just withdraw my attention from that and don't direct the mind to anything in particular. Just notice whatever's arising. Back to our mindfulness practice.

So this is from the Buddha. Using the sense of faith, and then it leads through all the five faculties to wisdom and keeps on spiraling deeper into faith.

I think that's enough. Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 130

Understanding Dukkha: The First Noble Truth

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson offers a fresh perspective on the First Noble Truth, explaining why this teaching about dukkha actually inspires happiness rather than despair. Drawing on Bhikkhu Anālayo's etymology of dukkha as the ill-fitting axle hole of an ox cart—that constant friction and unreliability running through all experience—she distinguishes this understanding from the limited translation of "suffering."

Wilson explores the three aspects of dukkha articulated by Sāriputta: dukkha-dukkha (the suffering of painful experience), viparināma-dukkha (the suffering due to change), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (the inherent unsatisfactoriness of all conditioned phenomena). She examines how our resistance to reality—through denial, inattention, and misperception—creates the second arrow of suffering. The Buddha's teaching in the Two Darts Sutta reveals how untaught worldlings know no escape from pain except seeking sensual pleasure, creating deep habits of aversion and craving.

Through personal stories, including her experience of grief after her sister's death, Wilson demonstrates how opening to difficult experience without resistance transforms suffering into simple presence with what is. She cautions against the "dukkha lens"—a subtle aversion to life disguised as wisdom—while showing how genuine understanding of the First Noble Truth naturally ripens into compassion. When we stop holding ourselves separate from our own suffering, we become able to truly be present with others in their pain, recognizing dukkha as the shared human condition that connects rather than isolates us.

What I want to talk about tonight is the First Noble Truth, because it actually makes me really happy. I get quite inspired thinking about the First Noble Truth. It's both obvious and also quite profound, and we misunderstand it—which is really why we suffer.

The First Noble Truth is the Truth of Dukkha, and dukkha is often translated into English as "suffering." I think that's a limited and not so helpful translation. When we hear the word suffering in English—the First Noble Truth, suffering—it easily slides into the glib "life is suffering," which of course is not what the Buddha was teaching. When we hear suffering, it's pretty easy for the mind to slide into some aversion along with that. It just kind of comes together. And I'm pretty sure the Buddha didn't enunciate and teach the First Noble Truth to elicit aversion in our minds at all, but exactly the opposite.

In each of the Four Truths there's an action to be performed. The First Noble Truth of dukkha is to be understood. Why? Because the understanding—not just intellectual, but really on a cellular level, which is our whole life of practice as we keep going deeper and deeper with it—that understanding frees us. It frees us from confusion, from suffering, from reactions to life that are based on inaccurate recognition of reality.

Just to start with the word dukkha, I really like the way Bhikkhu Analayo, who's quite a scholar, describes or discusses the translation of that word. One way he breaks down the word in Pali is two parts: duh meaning difficulty and ka meaning actually the hole, the axle hole in the wheel of an ox cart. You might wonder where we're going with this, but these old-fashioned wooden ox carts have big wooden wheels with a hole in the middle where the axle—that pole that runs between the wheels—fits. And it doesn't really fit in a very smooth, frictionless way. It rubs. There's disharmony. There's friction. It's just that little rub. It's never really smooth and comfortable. If you've ever ridden in an ox cart without padding, trust me, this is a very accurate description of dukkha. It just rubs. It just doesn't quite fit.

Another way he describes it is a kind of discomfort, uneasiness, not standing in an easy way. Or as Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it, the basic unsatisfactoriness running through our lives. This isn't just the suffering of unpleasant experience—of course that's included. It's much broader and actually more liberating to understand than that. It's this sense of unreliability, that friction, even when everything's all together.

As Ruth Denison, this wonderful German-American teacher, used to say, it's just the little leak in the canoe. There's always just some little something. And even if there's not something, our minds make something when we don't see. This is how sick the mind is: I walked in here, I looked at these lovely flowers—they're lovely—and I thought, but the last ones, I liked them better. I miss those last flowers. They had that purple. How do we get through life? But this is what the mind does when we're not watching. And then we take it up and we make it really a problem.

Let me read you two definitions from the Buddha. Sariputta, who was the Buddha's chief disciple, was answering a question to someone who asked about dukkha, and he said there are three types of dukkha. First is the stress, the discontent due to pain, due to difficult experience, called—obviously enough—dukkha dukkha. The next is the dukkha due to change, that what is beautiful and pleasant changes, the constant fluctuation—viparinama dukkha.

And the other is sankhara dukkha, the dukkha of all conditioned formations, of all compound fabrications—that they're never really going to be satisfying.

Let me talk a little bit about the first two particularly.

The first, the obvious one, dukkha dukkha, is what we usually think of when we think of the first noble truth. It's the way the Buddha described it, the noble truth of suffering: Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering. Sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair are suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Union with what is displeasing is suffering. Not to get what one wants is suffering.

All of that—and I'm using the word "suffering" here—I would call all of that suffering. We're aware that we don't like any of those things. But what's the Buddha talking about when, after everything he understood, he decided, "This is how I want to package what I understood to teach, to free your heart and mind"? And he starts by saying, you know, all these painful things are suffering. It's like, "Duh!" How is that going to free us?

But what's so fascinating, even just on this level of the very first aspect of dukkha, the dukkha dukkha, is that we don't really understand or believe that this is just how life is. He's simply describing reality the way it is. So we go, "Yeah, right, we all suffer." But when it happens—when it actually happens—how does our heart and mind react?

And this is where it comes to be so freeing. Yes, this stuff happens; that's dukkha dukkha. But the first noble truth that's not understood, that contributes to the suffering the Buddhist teachings can free us from, is the reactions in our hearts and minds. The fire of longing, the fire of aversion that comes from misunderstanding life as it is, from misperceiving life as it is.

And so we keep on, moment after moment—again we'll see and then we'll forget—we resist reality as it's arising in the moment. So much of our experience when we're consciously suffering is that we're in contention with what's happening now. Again and again, we're either pushing away or somewhere looking for that stable state that's going to be reliable. And the Buddha is saying, in terms of all the aspects of dukkha, that there is nothing that's reliable.

Dukkha as one of the characteristics of existence, along with impermanence, anicca, and no separate self, anatta—the Buddha describes these over and over as an aspect of all conditioned phenomena. All, not just some. All conditioned phenomena. So all aspects of experience are included in the first noble truth of dukkha—not just the obvious difficult ones.

And so there's the fire of aversion and the fire of longing. We keep thinking something here is going to be reliable, secure. We don't recognize accurately. And because we don't tend to really deeply, cellularly get it—this is how life is—when something difficult comes, even the obvious difficult: aging, illness, failing at something, losing one's job, something difficult happens, so often there's this sense of, "I did something wrong. How come this is happening to me?" As if blame, surprise, or shame are warranted, as if this is a mistake. And if we could get it right, this kind of mistake would stop happening. Did you come here to stop those kinds of mistakes?

There's a spiritual teacher in California, not Buddhist, but probably many of you have heard of her—Byron Katie. And she has a great line: "When you fight with reality, you lose."

And so this aspect of not recognizing the simple way that things are—all the birth, aging, death, sickness, gain and loss that happens to everybody at some point, over and over—not recognizing it, the way we respond out of not recognizing, is really moha, delusion.

The suffering from these tormented reactions is really from the base root of delusion, which shows up in a couple of ways. It shows up through denial—just denying what's actually occurring in front of our face. Through inattention—we just don't notice. And then misperception—actively perceiving something in a way that's inaccurate. These forms of delusion at different times are supporting, are not understanding, are not living in harmony with this truth of how things are, the noble truth of dukkha.

Let me tell a story, a very simple, simple story. Not some big suffering thing, but this sense of how even when things seem to be going fine, that little leak in the canoe is running through and we don't tend to notice.

When I was growing up, when in my early twenties, I started to realize I had really bought the story that things just get better and better.

You grow up and get your life together, and all of that. But I really was buying it. And I didn't have any obvious horrible thing going on, but I wasn't happy. And I thought, what's the matter with me? I have nothing to complain about.

And even when we do have stuff to complain about, many people here come and say, "Well, this is going on and it's really difficult, but other people in the world have it so much worse, so I shouldn't even complain." It's like we shunt it aside, we don't want to look.

So when I first heard this teaching, I was like—oh, huge breath out. I'm not insane. It's not like I'm some kind of weird, negative person who can't be happy. It's just that I wasn't seeing the whole picture, which steady mindfulness lets us see.

So I'll tell you this story, a simple one like that. Some years ago, I was on staff here in the winter. It had been very cold, gray, snowy. And so another friend who was on staff, a guy, we decided we wanted to go to the sauna—which is nowhere near here. Don't even get your hopes up. Not that you need one today, but it's like a half hour drive away. So in the cold winter and ice, we said, "Great, we're going to go to the sauna."

Now, I'm going to describe it as it really happened, but not as we saw it. Because what we said was, we went to the sauna, we came out and said, "Wow, that was great." And then we talked about other things. But I'm going to describe what actually happened.

So we decide to go to the sauna. We have to bundle up, we get in the car, and it's really cold for like the first ten minutes till the heat comes on. So we're cold and bundled and driving in this crummy weather and ice. We get to this place where the sauna is. It's not the nicest spa in the world. And then we have to separate. So I don't know what his was like, but the women's locker room was kind of grody—kind of grungy and cold. I always like to be barefoot in there, so it was cold and damp. Take a shower. It's unpleasant. Get in the sauna.

Great. It's fantastic.

Like, how long can you sit in a sauna that is really nice? Yeah, five minutes maybe. Then you start to sweat and get a headache and it's too hot. You think, "No, but I came all this way." So you stay a little longer. Then finally you have to get out and take a cold shower. I hate cold showers. Take a cold shower. Oh God. Then you can go back in again. But it's never quite as good as it was the first time. You can't stay quite the same amount of time, but a little bit. You do that for a while and finally, okay, that's over. Come out to the grody locker room. You're all cold again. By the time you get dressed, you go out. I met my friend who said, "Wow, that was great."

And that's what life is like. It is. It's a constant fluctuation—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

So now you might be saying, why would I want to look that carefully? I want to pretend everything's great. Well, good luck to you. If it worked, none of you would be here, believe me.

It doesn't work, because that's not how it is. It's just not how it is.

My mother was a really lovely woman, very resolutely positive, you could say. One time she visited here when I was on staff. You know, it says "metta" over the top of the building. Now, I don't know where she picked this up, because she respected what we all do here, but she didn't really know anything about it, wasn't that interested. She said, "Oh, metta—that's kind of the opposite of dukkha, isn't it?" I said, "Wow, where'd you learn that?" And then I described dukkha, and she said, "Oh, but I don't have any dukkha. I don't suffer."

It's not that it's true, but you're seeing here part of what makes retreats so difficult. You're seeing it, all of you—the opening into the unpleasant. Even little, nudgy unpleasant can be really hard, can't it? Never mind the big stuff. And depending on our particular habits, some of us have spent a lot of time perfecting how my mother was: "No, I don't suffer. Going to the sauna. It's all great." We don't want to look at it, because if we see the unpleasant, we feel we'll be thrown over. But that's denial. It's inattention, but also denial—just not seeing what's happening.

I read a book about Russia in the 1990s. The man who wrote this book was interviewing people who had been in the gulag under Stalin, who had survived it. After the Soviet Union broke up, he could find people who would actually talk about it—they wouldn't have really talked about it before. So he was just interviewing different people during that time.

The book was really about that, but to me, it seemed to be about the power of denial. He quoted George Orwell in talking about the courage of perception, the power of facing unpleasant facts. And this writer noticed that during the thirties and forties under Stalin, when so many people were just arbitrarily arrested—we're talking twenty million people, not one or two here or there—those who tried to avoid arrest by lying low, by hiding, moving from place to place, had a very good chance of success. However, people rarely tried to do that. Despite mass arrests, almost everybody believed, "It can't happen to me." It's like how we feel about death. Can't happen to me. So people would deny the bad news because it implies worse news. If I'm about to be arrested, it would mean the whole system has gone mad—which was true. But that's too much to let in. It can't be true. So you just deny the whole thing and don't take appropriate action.

The power of denial is very strong. And even though in some way we feel like this is our protection from the difficult, from the painful, it's actually what keeps us in a sense of alienation, of isolation, of disconnect. There's a sense of believing I can somehow hold myself separate from this unwanted experience, from this painful, unpleasant experience. Do you ever notice that in your mind? Probably not so clearly like that. Something's happening, and we do everything we can to fix it because it shouldn't be here. And somehow I can hold myself separate from this.

When there's still in us this habit—and it's so deep—of holding ourselves separate from the unpleasant... We've talked about this, this aspect of mind called vedana, the sense of recognizing the unpleasant and how easily that moves into pushing away. Recognizing, or not recognizing, when the mind feels something is pleasant, and how easily that moves into wanting. Neutral, and how easily we miss that altogether. It's not a given that this has to happen, but it's such a deeply practiced habit of our mind. It's like in this mind that doesn't really exist, that has no base, there's a deep rut. I don't know where the rut is, but there is a deep rut that the mind just falls into.

Unpleasant... wrong, bad. It's not just, "Oh, I don't like the unpleasant, let me hold myself separate." It's like, "This shouldn't be happening." And you see that even in little things on retreat. The breath is a little tight, and all the stuff that can get going in your mind—what's wrong, how to fix it, the teachings—all because it's tight, it's a little unpleasant. That's all that's happening. But somehow it feels like it shouldn't be this way. It's so deep. And also in life, when something difficult happens.

Often I've seen when someone is ill or develops—maybe not like a flu or something, but some kind of chronic disease, some really difficult thing—that people often feel a sense, and I've experienced this myself, a kind of alienation, of isolation. It can almost be like shame. What did I do wrong that this is happening to me? Or when something difficult happens in life, or we're separated from what we love, it's either that you don't want people to know, you feel ashamed, or the mind throws the aversion out and looks for people or situations to blame. Both of which are aversion, which doesn't see clearly, rather than recognizing: this is what's happening, and we're all together, at different times experiencing really difficult, painful stuff. This is life. It's not some weird mistake.

I remember years ago I developed a kind of chronic autoimmune condition. I was doing everything you do to work with it, but at some point I noticed—and I've talked to a lot of other people who've been spiritual practitioners—there can be this idea, not quite reaching consciousness, that if I was really a good practitioner and my mind really wasn't all knotted up with delusion, I wouldn't be sick. That if you could really practice correctly, your body wouldn't somaticize stuff and you wouldn't get sick. I know that sounds crazy, but I know I'm not the only one who feels that.

At one point it occurred to me: Ramana Maharshi died of cancer. And I just started going through all these examples—everybody dies of something. They get sick, they die. It's got nothing to do with the idea that if you really have it together, you're not going to get sick, your body's not going to get old. Follow it to its logical conclusion—it's nuts. We laugh, but look at what the mind is doing and how in this world of absolutes, we get these perfectionist ideals. It's just supposed to be better and better and good, and if something goes wrong, it's because you somehow blew it or someone else did. And right away, we're in contention with reality. This is denial.

Freedom. Freedom from fear. Liberation of mind is not about getting rid of unpleasant experience. It has nothing to do with it. Absolutely nothing to do with it. Yet our habit is so strong.

There's something the Buddha said in a sutta where he talks about the two darts that always moves me, actually, quite a lot—about how these habits get developed. Many of you know the sutta with the two darts, where he talks about the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened one. An unawakened person is as if hit by an arrow of physical pain—they get upset, they lament, they beat their breasts, they scream and yell. It's like they shoot a second arrow at themselves. That's the two arrows. And an awakened person gets shot by an arrow and... nothing. They don't shoot the second arrow.

But following that, he says something I always find moving. He's describing how in a normal person experiencing a painful feeling, they resist it and resent it. So the underlying tendency of resistance against painful feeling comes to be in the mind, comes to underlie as a habit of mind. Do you get that? We resist the unpleasant, the painful, and so the tendency to resistance of painful comes to be a habit that underlies the mind.

And under the impact of that painful feeling, one then proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. Why? Because—and this is the line that really gets me—an untaught worldling, a normal unawakened person, does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness. So then a tendency to lust for pleasant feelings underlies the mind, along with the tendency to resist unpleasant feelings and a tendency to not know what the heck's going on with neutral—a little different from how he said it.

He says one does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings, or the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. That really—I don't know—it's so poignant to me that people in the world, without a path, experiencing something unpleasant, the only escape they know is to go lust after something pleasant. That's samsara in a nutshell. If that's how we grew up, if that's what we've learned, if that's what we've unconsciously taken in—and the Buddha's talking about a deep habit.

No wonder we struggle so much, even when we have the information. We think, "Okay, open to the unpleasant—that's the path to freedom." And we go, "Okay, yeah, okay, maybe." But when the difficult actually comes, it's not like we can just do that. Not so often. Because the habit is so strong: go for the pleasant, that's the only escape. For those who don't know.

But as the Buddha is saying, awakened people do know of the escape, other than just lusting after the pleasant. And the escape begins with understanding this First Noble Truth. Because when we understand that it's not about getting more pleasant or getting rid of unpleasant—when we understand that it's not about thinking that the presence of difficulty in our life is the cause of our real deep suffering, our unhappiness—when we understand that there's no way to be free and happy with these difficult conditions just isn't true. But we can't just take that on board. We can't just say, "Oh yeah, that's a good idea, and now I'm going to do it." We have to keep looking, keep looking, see for ourselves if that's really true.

So this is what retreats are for, in a way. That's why, in a perverted way, sometimes we teachers—when you come in and you're suffering, not when you're suffering big time, but with little sufferings, even if it's big time to you but it's a little thing, not really a life-changing thing—we're like... we're not masochistically happy you're suffering. That's like when Winnie says, "We'll bring you back to look at what's going on here," because this is the path to freedom. If we just said, "Okay, let's fix all the conditions so God forbid you don't have to be together with this unpleasant experience in your mind," that's not doing you any favors.

When I first started teaching—because first we have our own neurosis, yes, hard to believe, I know—but a big one is wanting to be liked. And it took me a while to really learn that when people come in and they're talking, my job isn't to take away your suffering, which I couldn't do anyway. I mean, if I could wave a wand and it was really gone, that would be one thing. But my job is to support, as Winnie said, the opening into the investigation of what really is the suffering here, to support that with wisdom, because that is the way into freedom from suffering, not by avoiding it all.

So when you start noticing thoughts like: Why is this happening to me? Why now? What did I do wrong? How can I get that other one back? I've blown it. It's all over. I'm out of here—that one comes along—I'm going home right now. This is hopeless. How could this happen? Whose fault is it? I don't want anyone to know, I'm really ashamed of this. All this stuff—it's all the ways that we're taking it as personal.

And you know how alienating, how isolating, how this sense of separation from others and from life arises when we meet the difficult with this way of relating. But what's so touching about dukkha, the First Noble Truth, is that all conditioned phenomena are shared. This is the way it is for all of us. We're all going to get sick. We're all going to fail sometimes. We're all going to have choppy breath once in a while, pain and whatever, our own particular story.

And so as I go on, I'll say that really the opening into dukkha is more and more the opening into compassion. It's the movement from alienation and separation and shame into the opening into all of life as it is. And this opening out of aversion and fear and greed is the opening that purifies the heart and mind. It actually allows the recognition of things as they are, the recognition of liberation, of nibbāna.

So when we are—even in the little thing or big thing, it doesn't matter—able in a moment just to surrender into the difficult, just as it is, to open our mind and heart, to stop resisting, I think you'll find that the sense of it being unwelcome, unbearable, really changes. It really changes. When you're not in contention with this moment of reality, we really can experience the ease and peace of mind and heart.

That is, some say, the natural ease and peace. And even very intense suffering states, it works in the same way.

Just a little example. A few years ago, my sister died suddenly. It was a very intense time—all of it was very intense—and I was her main person, handling everything. So I experienced quite some grief, which is normal, right?

It was very interesting. At the time it happened, I had come off a period of intensive retreat for a couple of months earlier that year, and I just felt like I'd been quite awake in my mind—really present, not resisting things so much. It was an interesting time. And then this happened out of the blue.

I noticed that with that kind of grief, there was no way my mind could say, "This shouldn't have happened." I mean, it happened. You can't say it didn't happen. This is what happened. It's so clear. There was no way I could get into any kind of self-judgment or blame for feeling grief. You know, for those of us who have self-judging as a tendency, we're pretty good at finding all kinds of squirrely ways to bring it up when it doesn't make any sense. But I couldn't then. It was just—of course there's grief. Of course. Even though it was so strong, it surprised me.

What was so interesting is that over some months, the grief would come and go—nothing stays all the time. It would be very intense. And there was just no resistance in my mind about it. I would really be with it, really intense. And it would really go. It wouldn't last too long. It would just come at all odd moments of the day and night. I had a very full schedule the rest of the year, and I had to keep doing what I was doing. Sometimes it was harder, and I couldn't always do extra things that I would have liked. But again, it's like, okay, this is just how it is. There was so little resistance that it was amazing to me.

At those times when the grief would be coming really strong—and grief is grief, it's not like grief suddenly feels like something else; it's heavy, you cry, all of that—but without the resistance, I couldn't, even at the time, call it suffering. It's just what it is. Not good, not bad, just what it is. I learned so much from that.

I noticed over time, after months, that some kind of resistance, some impatience, started to come into my mind. It would come up with just a little thought—"Okay, you know, let's move on here," or "It's time," or "You shouldn't be feeling this anymore"—whatever stupid story the mind made up. But there would be a little bit of resistance, and it was a completely different experience. Then it became more alienating, more separating, more dragging me down, more isolating. Very interesting.

But at the time when it was just what it was, no resistance, no contention—when I was opening to what was happening—one is also open to all aspects of life. I remember during the peak of that time, some friends in Germany, really dear friends, took me to this incredible garden show. They have one every two years that moves around to different places. It was in Koblenz that year. Acres and acres of all these flowers—it's amazing.

So I was in this grief, we go, okay. But it was so beautiful that it brought such happiness to my mind. I remember thinking, "Wow, flowers are nice and all, but I never totally got it—that flowers are amazing, that they bring so much happiness to the world just looking at them." There was something about it. It's like you just open to all of life when it's like that.

So explore that, explore that other aspect of the First Noble Truth—that of change.

And this is where I really want to ask you to look, because this is where we see that dukkha, the First Noble Truth of dukkha, is not just about unpleasant experience. The Buddha said all feeling, all feeling, vedana, is included within dukkha. And so even now, if we're thinking of dukkha as unpleasant, difficult, then it doesn't make sense, does it? But all feeling is included within dukkha.

This was Sariputta's lion's roar of awakening. It's something he saw. Wow—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It's all included within dukkha because it's unreliable. It's liable to change. There's nothing to hold on to. Like the Buddha said, separation from what is loved. It doesn't mean that we don't appreciate pleasant or that pleasant stops being pleasant. It just can't offer us anything more than that fleeting moment of pleasant experience.

So not just buying this, but look, explore. The Buddha said that dukkha either ripens as confusion, ripens as bewilderment, or it ripens as search. So when you're in resistance, in contention with experience—whether it's unpleasant or something beautiful has changed, and you feel that, you're fighting with reality—let the dukkha ripen as search.

Ajahn Chah put it a different way, saying that there's two kinds of suffering: the suffering that leads to more suffering, and the suffering that leads to the end of suffering. So take your pick, moment to moment. And the ripening as search just means get interested. Look.

It doesn't mean we start being afraid of pleasant or the beautiful. The Buddha said what is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it. A lot of times people get into the reverse of chasing after pleasant. This is a major dharma practitioner propensity—to almost hate the pleasant, right? God forbid I should feel something pleasant because I might crave. And craving's bad, we know craving's suffering, so we're pushing it away. But that doesn't work either. It's seeing what's really so, not trying to manage the world. That's the same way of trying to manage the world. It doesn't work. And then we think pleasant's bad—it's not.

Or people start thinking, well, everything just becomes kind of all the same. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—it's all dukkha, so what's the point? And that's a way that we can get a little bit lost. In fact, some years ago, I actually think it's a way that we misunderstand the First Noble Truth, and we can actually fall into a kind of aversion to life. Aversion to the pleasant, aversion to life—it's all dukkha, so what's the point?

And there are periods—and this will really cheer you up—there are phases in practice, in deep practice, where sometimes it's like having the dukkha lens on. Where maybe we haven't really been, like my sauna experience, where you start seeing the steady awareness, not just noticing the unpleasant, not just noticing the pleasant, but the steady continuity of awareness. You start to see the constant changing—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—there's nothing to hold. There's nothing to rely on for happiness. The unpleasant too is changing, but you can't hold to anything. So what's the point?

With the dukkha lens, I remember well one retreat I had. I'd walk into my room, and I had a plant hanging. I'd walk in and I'd go, "What's the point? It's just going to die." And really, it wasn't funny at the time. You're just seeing that's true, but it's not complete, right? I mean, it would be nice to water it and let it live for a while in the meantime.

Or I remember seeing a couple on staff who had just gotten together—this was a long time ago—and they're walking down the driveway holding hands, and I'm thinking, "Yeah, well, good luck." I gave them six months. Recently I found out they're still together, just so you know. But who knows if they're happy?

But this kind of dukkha lens that gets on is not... I thought I was really kind of clever, seeing in this way, kind of busting myself out of attachment. But it really isn't.

It leads to something unbalanced, a kind of nihilism, and it feeds aversion. It's not what the Buddha was talking about.

I love that he speaks in terms of the pleasant, that pleasant feelings are included within dukkha. But he's saying there is pleasant feeling. We just need to understand the gratification in it, the danger in it, and the escape. Even though he talks so much about the dangers of sense pleasures, he never said they're not pleasant, never said we can't appreciate them.

There's one sutta where he's talking about his practice before he was the awakened Buddha. He was really exploring what the gratification in the world is. And he said, whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, that's the gratification. If there were no gratification in the world, beings would not become enamored, in love with the world. But we do. There is gratification—he's not saying there isn't. But mostly, like worldlings who only know to seek pleasant feeling when it's unpleasant, we stop there. We don't keep searching.

So that's the gratification—pleasant feeling. But he keeps looking. What's the danger? The danger is that the gratification is impermanent, subject to change, unable to give us any satisfying, reliable happiness. This is the danger. And the escape is the abandoning of desire and lust for the world. He's not saying we hate the world and it all becomes one dull gray thing, but that we abandon the lust for the world.

Without craving, we often think something's missing. Something is missing, but the thing that's missing isn't actually what was bringing us to feel alive. It's poignant to me that so often the craving, the wanting, the attachment is what we're so used to, what we so connect with the pleasant, with happiness. When that's gone, at first we don't recognize that the peace and ease of non-contention, of really opening fully into this moment, is such a greater happiness than this more raucous happiness of attachment, of craving.

So I think this putting an aversion lens on is just something to bear in mind, to be aware of if that's happening for you. Because as I say, I thought it was so clever, but it's just aversion. As the Buddha said, when one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, by aversion, and does not understand as it really is the escape from the arisen ill will, on that occasion—and it's only moment to moment—one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both.

When you notice you're sliding into this ill-will aversion lens, it doesn't mean avoid the unpleasant, but turn your awareness to that. And if it seems like you're getting blinded by aversion—maybe a really difficult emotional state or a complex emotional pattern keeps coming up, for example, here—you can explore it, be with it, be open to it, like the grief I was describing. But then it keeps coming, or it's at night and your energy's low, and you can feel yourself getting sucked into a vortex of it. Do you ever feel like that? You can kind of know what's happening, but it just pulls you in. Ill will, aversion, fear becomes beyond overwhelming, and the more you try to be mindful, the stronger the ill will gets.

When you notice that, that's when we talk about skillful means. Refresh your awareness. It's not the same as running from the unpleasant, but that's when you really see it's not helpful to just keep feeding the aversion. You can't see accurately. So at that point, deliberately shift your attention to something more neutral. It's not running away—it's refreshing the awareness. Whether it's opening to hearing, feeling the breath, going outside and doing some walking, being with the sound of the wind, whatever it is. You're not abandoning awareness, but you're moving away from just spinning in the ill will.

Even with our best intentions, the habits of our mind to react to the unpleasant with aversion are so strong. The denial, the resistance, being in contention with reality—it's such a strong pattern. But keep noticing, because the steadiness of awareness, this continuity, is what sets the conditions for liberating wisdom to arise. All you have to do is be steady with awareness and you'll see this constant fluctuation of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It just keeps changing.

At times, the fact that there's nothing lasting in our experience to rely on for happiness can engender fear. But keep looking—fear is just another mental state too. This leads to real freedom when we're not looking for happiness to what can never give it. Happiness is available. It's such a sense of not being in contention with reality, opening into how things are in this moment.

The last thing I want to say is that in some ways, I think the real jewel at the heart of our experience lies in understanding the First Noble Truth, in fully opening into just this moment of reality—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—without unrealistic expectations, without pushing away.

The jewel at the heart of this understanding is, of course, wisdom, but it's also compassion—deep compassion. The Dalai Lama often says that compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering truly is. And this insight begins and strengthens from being with our own experience of suffering.

I've seen over and over in my own life how a particular experience of suffering—going back to that grief, that particular experience of grief or pain or illness, and we've all had our own stories—feels particular to us: my story, my past, my situation. When we stay in that resistance—"Why me? Why this? Why now?"—not understanding that this is simply the way life is, the effect of that resistance is to feed the sense of alienation, discontent, loneliness, separation, failure. Take your pick. That's the suffering—the suffering of isolation, of being the separate, isolated, lost little self.

But when, even in some moments, there's this opening into our own particular experience of grief or suffering or pain, you find that it's like magic. Not just in the first moment, but it opens out of being my particular grief to this particular expression of grief, which is an aspect of life shared by all humans. This is a particular expression. This moment of happiness is a particular expression of happiness that at one point or another is something all humans experience.

When we're not afraid to be with our own illness, our own aging, our own grief, then we're really able to be fully present with an open mind and heart for the grief, the illness, the pain of someone else. Because we know it. This is life.

Instead of trying to navigate our separate lives, putting on a good face and getting the most we can out of it, there's this sense of release. Pema Chödrön talks about how when we're trying to avoid suffering, we walk around tensed up our whole life as if we're sitting in a dentist's chair. We put that down. We're just open to whatever this experience of life in this moment presents—if it's my grief, if it's your grief, the grief of the world, the pain of the world.

There's a whole other talk on compassion, so much more to say about it, but you can really feel this for yourself, can't you? If you've had a particular difficult experience, say a chronic illness—I've had that—many people come, really very sincere, caring, wanting to express their sympathy. But I could really tell the difference. Some people cared and wanted to help me, wanted to do something, but the feeling underneath it was, "This is so uncomfortable to be with, let's fix you." With all the caring in the world, but that not understanding: yes, this is how it is. This is the First Noble Truth. Sickness is going to happen. I can be here. But no, it's too uncomfortable because we can't be with our own.

And then when someone else would come and you'd feel, "Yeah, it's tough, isn't it?" Sometimes there's nothing else to say or nothing else to do, but we're able to be really present, heart-to-heart, bearing witness. Because we know this is how it is—in ourselves and in others.

Openness to dukkha ripens as freedom.

I want to end with a little letter from someone that really inspires me, conveying this sense of how when we understand that life is both the beauty and the suffering, and that opening to all of it brings us deeply into wisdom and compassion, this luminous nature of heart and mind.

This is from Mingyur Rinpoche. Do you know who Mingyur Rinpoche is? He's a Tibetan Lama, the brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche, quite a practitioner, and a well-known teacher around the world. Almost three years ago now, he set up his whole teaching organization globally, but then he let everyone who runs his organization know he was going to go off for a three-year retreat.

He went off. He was in Bodh Gaya in India, about to start his retreat. Everyone thought he was just going to go to a monastery and do the retreat there. But what he did was, in the middle of the night, he just left. He told no one where he was going. He just left and went off to be a wandering yogi on retreat where no one knew where he was.

Online, his brother Tsoknyi Rinpoche, who's a great teacher, said, "He just left. He didn't take his toothbrush. He didn't take any money. He didn't take his passport. He didn't tell anyone where he was." It's easy for me to say, but I can't imagine doing that. Yet there are people still doing that in this world.

He went off and no one heard anything from him. Tsoknyi Rinpoche was saying, "Our mother—I'm worried about our mother. She's so worried about him." After about a year and a half, one of Mingyur Rinpoche's really close Tibetan disciples happened to see him in Nepal, in Kathmandu.

And he said he looked so skinny, he just saw him from a distance, he had a beard and he looked so skinny, he didn't recognize him right away. But something about the way he walked was familiar. So Tashi followed him along and then he realized—oh my gosh, it's Mingyur Rinpoche.

And so he begged Mingyur to let him come along with him. He gave him food. He gave him warm clothes to wear. And he stayed with him a while. And then Mingyur asked him to leave and gave him this letter to bring back and post for his friends.

So I just want to read this little bit from his letter. And now he's off. He's still off doing that now. No one knows where he is.

So he says: "I myself am wandering without any fixed location, staying in isolated mountain hermitages and other such places. I have experienced feelings of happiness and suffering, rising and falling like waves on the surface of the ocean. At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I have felt cold, hungry, and thirsty. Even when I have begged for alms, I receive nothing but insults and harsh words. At other times, I have received food and clothing effortlessly without even asking for them. And in my mind, it felt as though I were enjoying the pleasures of the gods.

"While I have experienced both happiness and suffering, the most important thing is that a deep and heartfelt sense of certainty has arisen in the depths of my being, such that no matter what happens, I know that the true nature of these experiences, their very essence, is that of timeless awareness and vast compassion.

"Suffering ripens as search. Search ripens as freedom."

Let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 131

Concocting Sense of Self: An Exploration of Anattā

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson offers a practical and accessible exploration of anattā (not-self), one of the Buddha's most liberating yet often misunderstood teachings. Rather than approaching anattā as a philosophical concept to think about, she invites practitioners to bring mindful investigation to the actual experience of how a sense of self arises and dissolves moment by moment.

Drawing on the teachings of Ajahn Buddhadāsa and his book "Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree," Wilson explains how the sense of self is a "concoction" — assembled quickly from sense contact, vedanā (feeling tone), perception, grasping, and proliferating thought. She illustrates this process through relatable examples: attachment to a favorite mug, reactions to cold wind, and how a simple sound like crickets can trigger an entire worldview of nostalgia and mood. The Buddha compared consciousness to a magic show — once we go behind the curtain and see how the illusion is constructed, it loses its hold on us.

Wilson emphasizes that we don't need to get rid of the sense of self — there isn't a permanent one to eliminate. Instead, practice involves noticing both when self-concoction arises and the many moments when it's absent. These "moments empty of self" are normal and natural, not extraordinary states to achieve. By bringing satipaññā (mindfulness and wisdom) directly to these experiences, we see the impermanent, constructed nature of self-view, which naturally loosens our identification. The talk concludes with Mary Oliver's instruction: "Love yourself, then forget it, then love the world."

Last night, in part of her talk, Winnie described the quality of investigation—how it's not thinking about things, but this quality in the mind of really interested attention.

So tonight I'd like to, taking off on that, talk a bit about using this interest, this investigation, to explore in our own moment-to-moment experience one of the core teachings of the Buddha, one of the freeing teachings: that of anattā, so-called not-self. Everybody's favorite subject. But it's so freeing. And it makes people a little bit nuts when we don't really just look at our experience, but when we think about it.

The Buddha wasn't teaching philosophical concepts. He wasn't saying, "Let me give you some new things to think about." The understanding of anattā, of not-self—we don't come to that recognition by thinking about it. But that's what we try to do, think our way out of it, and it just spins and spins and spins until we feel a little nutsy about it. It is definitely a loaded concept.

As soon as we bring up not-self, a lot of people's practice becomes like they're trying to get rid of the self. "I know there's not a self, but I still have one. So how do I get rid of it?" The sense of self came up, and so it's as if there's something here that, once we really break through some barrier and have some blowout experience, just completely gets rid of the sense of self—and then you're home free. Are you waiting for that? Or else there's the question: when the self goes, who knows where the car keys are? Stuff like that, all those endless questions. I think I made my point.

But what I really hope this talk can do is serve as an invitation to drop all the ideas and the concepts and the worry, and just actually bring an interested, mindful attention to exploration of sense of self. Just discovering, exploring it, seeing what's actually going on there. Because—and this might not be news—it's not that you have to get rid of yourself. There's not one. It's already like that.

It's just like impermanence. It's not like everything's permanent and once you see it, then everything starts changing all of a sudden. It's the same with not-self. Really, at the heart of our not quite understanding, our mistaken relating to experience as if there's some lasting, self-existing self, is that we don't perceive accurately. All that changes—reality doesn't change, but our perception shifts. We perceive wrongly, and then we think and act and carry on and react from that. Without actually just taking a look at what's really going on, we're lost in a world of assumptions and misperceptions without even recognizing it.

So that's the way I want to invite us to explore tonight. This is an invitation to investigate, just with mindfulness, not with thinking about it. First: what is the experience in any moment that you notice, that I'm labeling or calling "me" or "mine"? Not pretending we're not having that experience. Doesn't it arise frequently? The sense of me, the sense of mine. And also, just bring interest, awareness to moments of experience—to a moment when there isn't a sense of me or mine.

To use Ajahn Buddhadasa's language—he was a great Thai forest monk and meditation teacher—he talks about moments that are empty of a sense of self. Empty in that way. He's not saying we have to stop having or experiencing a sense of self, because we do. It comes up all the time. But I don't know how it is for you—for me, and I know I'm not the only one, the sense of me or mine is so familiar that often we either don't notice it, or it's so familiar we assume it's always here, not noticing when it's not. And we don't really look at what we're calling me or mine. It's simply another arising saṅkhāra, another arising experience. But when we take something for granted, when it's so familiar, we stop looking. "Oh, here I am again." What are you even calling me? If someone grabbed you and said, "What are you calling me?" you may not even know, because it's just assumed. Here it is. I didn't get rid of it yet.

So our job is to get interested—not hating, not with pre-assumptions or preconceptions—but just to see what actually, in this moment only, not a whole philosophical treatise, in this moment, this sense of me... what's the actual experience, just right now? Bring mindfulness and wisdom, sati-paññā, right to that point.

Ramana Maharshi expressed it this way: "The idea of self is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. Look closely and the ghost vanishes. It was never there. So also with the sense of separate self. So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it is found not to exist."

This is really a great description of our practice—to look closely. But not even assuming it doesn't exist. Just look closely at what we're calling me, I, mine in any particular moment.

The rest of the talk I want to offer comes from a couple of different angles, and you may find your own way in.

What's interesting about the sense of me is that, starting from misperception, it's a concoction. I like that word. It's just made up of a bunch of different experiences strung together really quickly, concocted out of a moment of sense contact with grasping. There are hundreds of these concoctions of me or mine throughout any day. But when we really look closely, we can see the arising and the strands that come together, and how they come apart again when conditions change.

There's one sutta where the Buddha talks about consciousness as being like a magic show. The sense of self is the same way—like a magic show. He describes being at a crossroads back in his time, where there's somebody putting on a magic show. You sit and watch, amazed, wondering how they do that. It seems so real. But if you could go behind the curtain and see how it's all put together, the whole sense of reality is gone. The sense of wonder vanishes. You see they're doing this, they're doing that—that's how they create this illusion. It's exactly like that with our sense of self.

The way I want to start exploring this tonight is really from the point of perception, which we've talked about a bit—where this concoction begins for us. I just happen to love that word concoction. In English, it has a sense of a bunch of stuff thrown together, perhaps without much pre-planning, not exactly a recipe which is all planned out, but grabbing a little of this and a little of that and throwing it all together. And here you have a sense of me—a little haphazard.

Starting with perception: we've discussed it as one of the five aggregates, a mental quality arising in every moment of sense contact. It's that quality of recognition based on memory, discernment, which usually leads to thinking.

Now, perception is definitely useful. In a way, it's how we define our immediate world, how we place ourselves in experience. When you heard the bell ten minutes ago, you not only recognized "bell," you knew it was the bell at a certain time of day. The whole context came with it—you're supposed to come in here and listen to a Dhamma talk. You know who you are and where you are and why. There's a whole lot that comes into that perception of bell.

It's useful, right? If you had to figure it out every time you heard a bell—"Right, okay, I know it's a bell, but what does it mean? And who am I?"—or if you walked in here thinking, "I'm in here, but there's no me, so which zafu do I sit on?"

At this relative level, perception is extremely useful. No one's saying we want to get rid of it. And the thoughts that come with it, that give us context—again, extremely useful. We couldn't get along without it. Sometimes we start to think, "Oh, got to get rid of that." Not at all. But we want to understand it.

The tricky thing with perception is that, first of all, it's personal. It's informed by our life experiences, by our past. There's a lot of cultural conditioning in perception. So there's not one accurate perception that's true—which we want, this one accurate truth that's the same for everybody. We can trust our perception so completely, not knowing that it may not be the same for other people. It's actually kind of amazing to me how much we manage to do things together, given how different our perceptions can be.

I was at a friend's house, a good friend, and she had a blanket thrown over the back of her couch. I said, "Oh, could you hand me that blue blanket?" She looked at me puzzled. "What blue blanket?" "On the back of the couch." "No," she said, "that's green."

We really went back and forth about it. I could not switch my perception and see it as green. It was a blue blanket, no two ways about it. But she couldn't switch and see it as blue either. So is there some accurate truth somewhere in between? It's aquamarine and we're both partially right? Who knows?

That's a simple example, very simple. And our perception in that moment wasn't even colored by greed or aversion. But throw a moment of greed or aversion into the mix and that can completely distort everything. The kilesas—never mind delusion—completely distort perception.

Do you have a sense of this? When you're really angry at somebody, really angry, and you look at them, the way they look becomes ugly. They didn't used to be ugly, but now they're ugly. You just see it that way. Or when you're really infatuated with someone and you look at them—oh, just everything about them is so endearing! The way they shuffle their feet, the way they slop their food around, it's all so endearing. I don't know where that came from.

But when the wanting isn't in the mind anymore, you hope you didn't make too many strong commitments while it was there. A friend of mine made a really good comment about this. She's been married for a while, good friends of mine, and they're very committed—it's a good marriage. But she said, "You know, the dynamics change. A few years in, for both of us, the love eyes are gone. The love glasses are off." Which didn't mean they don't love each other, but those love glasses where you see everything as just so lovely—that perception shifts.

This is where wars and views start: from perception that we believe is simply how things are. It's so easy to attach to perception. Grasping can come into perception. "No, that's a blue blanket." That's grasping. Right then, with the arising of that grasping of perception, there's a sense of me taking a stand on the blue blanket.

I could give a whole talk on views, which I would love to do, but this isn't it. You can really draw this out and see how quickly we're at war—attachment to views, often based simply on perception, and right away that sense of me arises.

As the Buddha goes on to say, what we perceive, we think about. We do. What we think about, we complicate—with associations and memories of perceptions. This is what becomes papañca, the whole proliferating story. It's the concoction arising from perception and clinging, not recognizing whether it's accurate or not, spinning into a whole sense of me. And it doesn't have to be particularly negative or troublesome. Just see how it happens. Get interested.

Let me give you a simple example. I was in Burma at a meditation center, walking up a little path toward a Bodhi tree that had been planted with a concrete circular wall around it where people walk in circumambulation. I was just walking up, not even as far as to the back wall, and there was a Burmese nun walking around, circumambulating the tree with her hands in añjali. I see that—that's my perception. The nun walking around the Bodhi tree like this.

And there was a sense of happiness, of faith. "Isn't that so lovely, that sense of faith?" I had a whole series of thoughts as I was walking. "That sense of faith, it's just so touching that she's walking around like this."

And then, for whatever reason, another thought arose: "It's just a tree. She's walking around worshipping a tree. What kind of faith is that?" This all happened in the space of about two seconds.

That thought came up, I grabbed hold of it, and there was a little bit of unpleasant vedanā with that thought. I grasped that, and the whole sense of self shifted. As I was walking up, those were two distinct concoctions of self that were created.

They weren't the same one. One was a sense of me really filled with faith and happiness, and then it turned into something a little bit aversive—my opinions and views about trees and faith and blind faith and all of that. That wasn't the same concoction. Those were two separate concoctions.

I got up there and then I had an accurate perception, which is she was walking around texting on her cell phone. The world has changed. And so I just laughed. And with that, the whole concoction dissolved. It just dissolved. When there's accurate perception like that, all the worldview that was built on the inaccurate perception just dissolves away. You don't have to get rid of anything. It's like, "Oh, that." And just in that moment, the whole sense of self dropped away too. I didn't do anything with it. It was just gone. It's great, you know, and then there was just a moment of no particular concoction.

So when the perception is accurate in that moment, the whole magic show, the whole concoction of sense of me, just falls apart. Because there's nothing to hold it together. It's not like you have to get rid of anything, but you see that this whole construct of perception and liking and disliking and thoughts—you know, it could go on a lot longer than two seconds—when you see what's accurate, the whole thing just goes away. When the clinging goes away, the whole thing goes away. You don't have to do anything, you don't have to get rid of sense of self, you don't have to worry about it coming. We just get interested in watching how that happens.

So this is the essence really of insight—a shift of perception. It's not about breaking through to some new world where there's not a self and everything's impermanent. It's a shift of perception over and over and over. It's like those pictures where they draw a thing, and if you look one way you see a vase, and if you look another way you see two profiles of faces. You can usually see one or the other, but you usually can't see both at the same time. But once you've recognized each, both modes of perceiving can be recognized in that experience. Or like those magic eye pictures where 3D hockey players pop out if you look at it correctly. Until you can do that, all you see is just little abstract forms. And if you can't do it—like my mother, for example, could never do it, and it drove her crazy—you never know that's there. You only perceive in one way. But when you perceive the other way, even if you can't always, it shifts something in our mind stream, in our understanding. We may still have many more moments of perception the other way, kind of like the relative way of looking—me, me, me, I, I, I, mine, mine, mine. There's a lot of that. But there's that sense of knowing it's a construction. It's coming and going and we can see that. It takes the oomph out of it. You don't have to be so afraid or aversive or try to get rid of sense of self. It's just another arising mental formation. Sankhāra—the sankhāra aggregate—like anything else. We make such a big deal about it by not looking at it, by assuming permanence, by really grasping at it and identifying.

So we want to explore that. That's what I want to talk about here.

Ajahn Buddhadasa—by the way, he wrote a wonderful book about much of this, translated into English and called Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree. Not now, but later, if you're really fascinated, you might want to have a look. I use a lot of the way he talks about things when I talk about it. So he says: the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind. Explore and look for yourself when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. It's simply a condition, a process, like anything else that we experience—a mental, physical process that we can explore by simply bringing mindfulness, truth-discerning awareness, to when you have a moment where you feel "me." Instead of going off into a whole reaction to it, just turn around and recognize in that moment—not thinking about it, but bringing awareness to what's "me" in this moment. Sometimes it just feels like a little physical contraction of grasping.

Sometimes there's a mental image. Sometimes the thing that's clung to—which is often a thought or a description of oneself or a mood—is the thing one sees: "Well, that's me." But just notice, because then you'll start to recognize that each time it's something different. It's not the same thing that you're always coming back to, and that's really interesting to see.

So the sense of self, mere mind, can be born when there's contact—consciousness making contact with any of the six sense objects—and there's craving. It doesn't have to be born, but it can occur with anything, gross or subtle, and it really doesn't matter what. The sense of self is born hundreds of times a day with contact with any sense impression, and it dies equally as many times as it's born. There's not the one that didn't die hanging around in the background. Equally, it dies. And it can get really fun to just keep noticing it.

This is just an aside. I tried once when I was on a retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita, where you note every moment, giving a very soft label to whatever's arising—a very, very strict Burmese Abhidhamma way of understanding things. So I was doing this, what I'm describing. I had no sense of me, and I'd notice, "Oh, self," and it would be like a sensation or an image or a thought. And it was really helpful because it was just blasting apart any sense of permanence. But I should have known better. Anyway, I tried to describe to him what I was doing. I said, "Oh yes, I'm noting sense of self whenever I see it." He and the translator got a big kick out of that. "Ha ha ha, you think there's self! Ha ha ha, she thinks there's self!" I never could get that across. But I hope I can get it across to you, because it was really interesting. It was. It is—to see how it's born and dies over and over.

I'll give this simple example that I use a lot because it's just so mundane, but that's where we can really explore here on retreat, watching this. This was on retreat here quite some time ago. You know how it is—you go in, you get a mug. But this was a long time ago. We didn't have all this uniformity of crockery that we have now. At that time, there was the same shelf with mugs, but just whatever people had left here over the years. So every one was different. You'd go and get a mug.

I'd been on retreat a long time—it was a three-month, I guess. Take a mug, get my tea, do my thing, sit down. It was just all very simple and smooth, and I wasn't really paying any attention. It didn't matter. But one day, as I was drinking my tea, the sense of pleasant feeling about that particular mug came up, and I sort of half noticed it, half not—like Joseph calls "more or less mindfulness." It isn't really. I didn't notice the craving. Immediately: "This feels really good on my hand. This is the perfect mug, and the color's nice too." And I could feel in that moment this whole movement—it goes just from pleasant feeling to liking it, to grasping it, to trying to think about how I can save it, how can I have it tomorrow, what can I do. All like that. That's the birth of self. And I started thinking, "How can I keep it? Maybe I can go put it in my..." Too much trouble. Put it down. I put it down, took it to the dish room, left—death of self, right there.

And that's the whole dependent origination, right there. We haven't gone into it a lot, but just the middle part of it—where the Buddha described how we can watch the chain of suffering arising from a moment of craving, of leaning in. This middle part, which we can watch over and over here in our practice, is where there's sense contact and there's a pleasant or unpleasant or neutral feeling. Without awareness, with pleasant we lean in—there's wanting. With unpleasant we lean away. Either is craving. It attaches us to the object either way. And then that craving strengthens to grasping, to really holding on, grasping right there. And that grasping—is what Buddhadasa calls having and being. And that moves into becoming, into birth—birth of a sense of self—into suffering and death of self.

So if you don't think about this as a whole lifetime thing, but moment to moment to moment, just sitting there—ah, pleasant feeling, this is really nice, I like this mug—"me and my mug" is born in that moment. And then the grasping, the having and being, the person who has this mug, who wants to keep it. And then you put it down and walk away—death of self. So death of self isn't necessarily a suffering experience.

Notice when there's that sense of craving, clinging, grasping that comes in. And this is mild, right? This is where we can explore it. We're not talking about your most difficult personality pattern or the most important thing in your life, but it's the same process. To watch it here, to see what's the effect, to explore when you notice that—what does the grasping, the craving, feel like experientially? What's the effect in the mind, in the consciousness? We can really start to notice this.

For me, when it comes as "oh, my mug," we don't notice it initially because in that moment I was focusing on the pleasant feeling and all the concoctions of how can I get more and what can I do. We get enthralled by that whole view and the stories, the papañca, not noticing the actual effect. What had been simple and easy—walking in, quite present, relaxed, fairly equanimous, noticing what was happening—suddenly everything kind of zooms in and narrows. Mentally, physically, you can almost feel it. I can feel wanting, grasping in the mind. It's like a physical contraction. It feels like, almost half the time, that's what sense of self is for me—this physical contraction. What had been wide open and noticing whatever becomes really zoomed in, restricted. Consciousness is restricted when there's wanting and aversion in the mind. The Buddha described it this way. We can experience it. Not with judging, just to see. What had been open and wide becomes really centered on this little green mug. It becomes the most important thing in the universe just for that second. Put it down, walked away.

But the next day, I didn't totally put it down. I walked away and pretended I wasn't looking for it, but I just kind of—you know, you pretend you're not. This is denial, but it doesn't really quite work. Saw it easily, took it up, went through the whole thing again. And this time I really started thinking about how I could save it. So what had been simple got really quite complicated.

Well, you can't leave stuff on the windowsills even then, so I'd have to take it to my room, which I could certainly do. But I was doing a very slow style of practice. And it would take me—I'm not exaggerating—to walk from the dining room to my room, twenty, thirty minutes easily. I thought, okay, I'm going to take it to my room. And then before every meal, I have to walk back there. So it's like an hour to go back, get the mug, come back. I thought about it for a while, for a few minutes. Then I said, you know what? Forget it. Put it down, and then it really went.

And there's that sense of ease, of space, of peace, when there's not the concoction of self going on, when we put it down. That's equally important to notice. Because just as there are many, many moments in a day where there's birth and death of the sense of self, there are also many—and this is coming back to Buddhadasa again—many, many moments which he talks about that are empty of sense of self.

He says, in translation, that this is truly normal and natural. It's not some special esoteric state of mind or heart we have to create. We think, "I have to have a moment where there's no sense of self, where there's no self"—we don't even say "sense of self," we say "self." "I want a moment where there's no self, because it's always here." But that's because we don't look and see. As Buddhadasa says, it's really normal and natural. It's the natural state of mind and heart when we're not distracted by our reactions to sense contact, by our likings and our dislikings and what we think about it, our perceptions and all of that concoction.

When we're not distracted by that, there's no sense of me or mine coming up. And you can't make a big project of it, because then it becomes a "me" trying to look for something. But just let it go there, kind of in the back of your mind, to see how often, how many times a day, those moments arise when maybe nothing special is going on. It may be a pleasant experience or an unpleasant experience—it doesn't matter what's happening. But often there's a kind of pleasantness to it, the pleasantness of non-clinging, the pleasantness of that non-narrow, non-gripping quality of consciousness, when everything isn't zoomed in and focused on something.

We each describe it in different ways, although sometimes we don't quite recognize what's happening. It's simply a moment of non-concoction of self.

We tend to think—whether in sitting meditation or any other time, drinking tea, going to the bathroom, walking, whatever—we tend to think, "Oh, it just wasn't so easy," and there's that kind of struggle. You're trying to notice, you're trying to be with things, you're trying to get it right. We all know that one. Then you have a sitting or a walking or a dance, and it's just flowing. It's all just coming and going. "Finally, I'm getting it right." We have to add that. We just can't leave well enough alone.

But that sense of how it's going, how it's going right—our habit is really to make something of it about me. So it may be just free and easy for a moment, but we may not quite notice what's free and easy: things are happening without adding a me or my story on top of it, not needing to react to whatever's occurring.

But then pretty soon, our tendency, for many of us, is to get kind of seduced, distracted back into the sense contact or the content about it. And then it's like, "Okay, so I have to describe this in my interview. What's actually going on is like this, and how's the mindfulness, and how's that, and how can I make it happen again?" And all of that starts again.

But just noticing in those simple moments that there's no me or mine arising in that moment. Sure, it comes after—that's okay. But many, many moments throughout the day there's just the sense of, I don't know, isness. Things are as they are. It may be calm, it may be something difficult happening, but the concoction of me isn't occurring around it.

You might notice when the grasping of me dissipates. It's not something we do, but it dissipates. Notice the difference.

Here's an example: my system is kind of sensitive to cold, and I tend to get a little aversive around it. I can watch that happen, that pattern. So if I'm out walking and there's cold wind—the other day I was out walking and it was cold wind—I'm aware of the cold wind, but I could see my body tensing and the aversion. And the little voice says, "Ah, it's hard for me being in the cold wind." So that's the whole construction of a sense of me from the unpleasant vedanā. And then my memories, my perception of my body and my past history, and I don't like it. It's very fast, you know. And so there was a little bit of struggle watching it, but that's the sense of me.

And then at some moment, really what I did was just get a little more mindful. Instead of going more into those thoughts, feeding those thoughts—and hating the thoughts is also feeding them. You know that, right? "I shouldn't be having all these thoughts about me." Same difference. It doesn't matter. Instead of giving them attention,

I just let the awareness come back to the sensations of cold, just the bare sensations. Sati-paññā right at the sense contact, not in order for something, just to be here with what was happening.

And in that moment, just being with the sensations of vibrating and cool or whatever, the grasping, the aversion just dissipated because it wasn't being fed. And then there's just this sense of coolness and sensations and walking and no real sense of self in that.

This isn't some amazing liberating moment. But it's moments that we experience so frequently. So just let it in a little bit, because again this is also recognizing aniccā, impermanence. And what really starts to cut through our misperception—our misperception of self as a solid thing, and our misperception that it's steady, constant—is when we see that something's coming and going all the time. That just starts to get in cellularly, and we just can't take it so seriously anymore.

It's really amazing how seriously, as soon as I'm in here—that whole issue, whatever it is, a mug or the pain in your back or the mood you're having or it's fall and everything's dying, whatever it is—becomes so serious. And when the clinging goes, when buying into that whole concoction dissipates, it's just what it is. Even if all the same sense contact is still there. The misperception goes away, and that changes everything.

So, just letting it be in the back of your mind: when we're not distracted, when we're not seduced and obsessed by sense contact and our reactions to it, it's just normal and natural that there's no particular sense of self coming, because it's a created experience. It's a concoction that's fed by greed, by aversion, and by delusion.

We're all getting really familiar with these as our good friends. They accompany us a lot of the time—greed, hatred, and delusion—but not all the time. And so that's why we try to emphasize how important it is to see these torments when they're in the mind, because they distort perception, they lead to all this papañca and assumptions and suffering. But it's equally important to notice when they're not present, when there's wholesomeness in the mind—whether it's equanimity or concentration or mindfulness or calm or mettā, whatever. Just to notice both the presence and the absence of the confusing and of the wholesome.

Buddhadasa also talks about noticing this to generate a contentment with these moments of emptiness. Because they're not like some big event usually. A lot of times you may notice, "Okay, nothing much," and we're kind of waiting for the next big arising of self. Even if it's suffering—nothing's really going on, and we're waiting for something to happen. There's nothing. Have you noticed?

I'm probably not the only one whose mind does this. In a somewhat calm period, you're present, there's that little bit of sense that not much is going on, and you don't quite notice it. Then the mind comes up with some cockamamie story—a suffering one even—something that didn't even happen that you could get really angry about if it was going to happen. And you sit there and the mind's spinning it out and you think, "What is going on?" It's like, "I'd rather have a suffering sense of self than no sense of self," because it's just so familiar. But once you notice it, you can't take it too seriously anymore.

There's a sutta from the Buddha that I really like because he's describing how his mind works, in the sense of the magic show not being created. He says, "The Tathagata"—that's how he refers to himself—"does not conceive of a visible thing as apart from sight." Do you get that? There's seeing, the experience of seeing. He does not conceive—the commentary says he does not imagine—a thing out there to be seen in its own right. He does not conceive of that. So there's just seeing. He does not conceive of a seer. In other words, he does not conceive of being an agent behind the seeing. So that just doesn't arise in his mind.

There's seeing. He's not thinking, "Here I am doing the seeing, seeing that." Our habit is to do that—"Here I am seeing that." But I'm not saying this so you can get in a fight with that habit. We can simply see that it's just another arising thought.

This is what's so cool about awareness. It's not like awareness has to stop and say, "Oh no, here I am conceiving about being the agent of seeing—it's all over, I'm caught in sense of self, hang it up." Right there, bring in the interest and see, "Oh, okay, what's that sense of self right there? Oh, you just feel some grasping." You don't have to deconstruct the whole sense of the seer and the seeing and what does it mean and the Buddha doesn't think it and is there something out there or not and if a tree falls in the forest and nobody hears it, does it really make a sound. You don't have to do any of that.

You can just notice. The seer and the seen, and "Oh my god," a sense of me feels like this. Satipaññā, right there. Right there. You never have to go anywhere else. All it takes is the willingness to keep turning around and looking, to keep turning around and looking. What are we calling that sense of me?

So, as I said, one way is exploring that sense of grasping when it arises in the body. Notice, if it's true for you, how it can tend to narrow the mind, the consciousness, make a sense of limit, of separation.

Just explore that. See how it is when there's suddenly an arising of a sense of me that wasn't there before. Instead of going "oh no," just see what that's like. See what it's made of. See if it really comes and goes. Don't believe me. Look and see. See if you can find the same sense of self all the time. Come back and tell us. You know, maybe this is all wrong and there's really something. Look and see for yourself.

Because it doesn't change anything for any of us just to hear it—we all know that really well. But to just get interested and explore, to see what some of the things are that we tend to grasp at. That's why the five aggregates, when they're called the five aggregates of grasping, it's exactly that. The five ways the Buddha broke up our experience to talk about it. And at any moment, when one of them is the site around which grasping comes, that's where the sense of self arises.

But we can explore very simply. Body is obvious—we've talked about that a lot. You can see when there's an unpleasant sensation and go, "Ah, my knee hurts," just feeling that contraction around it. Or as Andre was talking about, often we have an image of the body that's not the body at all. We'll have an image of "I don't like the way my hair looks today." That's actually not the body—that's a mental experience. But unpleasant vedana, we grasp at it.

Just notice. I have a dear friend who lost her leg to cancer a couple of years ago, a long-term practitioner. And she's used it as such a fascinating exploration, seeing how her mind works. It's going, "How could she say that's me?" But it feels like some part of me is gone, yet it certainly can't be me. And then, of course, there's the whole weirdness of phantom pain, which is a totally bizarre thing. She has that quite strongly. Walking—she loves to walk. She walks and hikes all over the mountains, I want you to know, on her prosthetic leg. She's planning a trip to Ladakh where she'll hike for five days. She's doing great. But there are times she can hardly walk because the leg that isn't there hurts so much when she takes a step. What the heck's going on? How can we call that me? It's just experience, kind of an empty space.

Vedana, the pleasant-unpleasant-neutral, is a big place where this sudden grasping can come in and we don't notice it because it's so quick. Most of the examples I've given have been that. It's so fast. Have you noticed, as we've talked about it, how really quick and ephemeral this pleasant feeling is, this unpleasant feeling? It's so quick, just like that, arising and passing in every moment, different feelings.

But as Ajahn Buddhadasa says again, notice the wave-like nature of pleasant feeling. It comes and goes so quickly. And then he says, just at times, contemplate your life. How many of the decisions you've made have been to get more pleasant feeling? And it's so nothing. It's really amazing to have a look at it like that.

But as you start to see the pleasant feeling and how the grasping comes around it so quickly, it leads into the whole world of emotions and thoughts and the stories about ourselves and personality view, just like that. Chökyi Nyima, who is a wonderful Tibetan teacher—Rinpoche, he's Chökyi Rinpoche's brother—he says, "Watch the fickleness, the unfaithfulness of the mind, how easily it is influenced just by a pleasant or unpleasant sight, sound, thought, into an immediate mood." Can you notice that?

Just so quickly we can go from a little bit of unpleasant feeling to the whole mood of our life. Have you noticed that here? Any sense contact can do it.

Once I was on retreat—I don't remember what time of year it was—but I was sitting in pretty quiet surroundings, and I heard crickets. Just the sound of crickets. I was aware of the hearing, aware of the perception of crickets, and it had, for some reason, a kind of poignant quality. I'm not even sure if it was pleasant or unpleasant, but there was a vedana that I grasped at, and immediately, from crickets, I went into this whole story of autumn and the ending of things and the poignancy of life and how you can't count on anything. You know that kind of mood? Nostalgia and sadness. I was kind of wallowing around in it. Me, me, me. Just like that—from a sense contact and an unpleasant feeling.

And then I noticed it.

So I went back, because the sound was still happening, and I said, "Crickets." And then I deliberately thought, "Isn't it wonderful to be able to hear nature in a place like this? Isn't it lovely that the trees are turning red?" I deliberately brought up pleasant thoughts, and just from the pleasant feeling of those thoughts, immediately all the moods followed. Just like that, just as real as the other one. "I'm so lucky to be here in this beautiful place in nature in the fall." It was just as real as the other—maybe thirty seconds apart. How can we take this stuff so seriously? But it's really fun to see how it happens, just from a quick little vedana that we don't notice.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho. He's talking about just such an example. He says, "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit. My views, my feelings, and my opinions. I can get caught into that world, that view of me that arises in consciousness."

Do you get a sense of what he's saying? He's not saying there's some solid me out there. It's a view, a series of thoughts that say "this is how it is" that we hold to as being true. And it's just a sense experience, a sankhara arising in consciousness. That's all it is. Turn around and look at it.

He says, "But when I recognize that, then I'm no longer taking refuge in being a personality, in my views, in my opinions. And then as that dissipates, the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends." That doesn't mean Ajahn Sumedho dies, or the world ends, or that I'm unconscious. In Buddhadhamma, "the world" means the world that our mind is creating in consciousness—which is why we can seem to be living in different worlds.

So our refuge then is no longer in being Ajahn Sumedho. Our refuge is in this awareness, rather than in trying to sustain refined experiences in consciousness as our refuge, because you can't do it.

And I want to say this: we're talking about one moment of refuge in this moment of awareness. Don't extend it into the future with thoughts like "I can't do it." Just in one moment.

When I saw that whole world of nostalgia and crickets, when I just saw that as a concoction arising in consciousness, that mindfulness right there—that steady mindfulness—became the condition for wisdom to come by itself. The clear recognition, the accurate perception, comes by itself. You don't have to try and create it. It's like, "Oh, concoction." And it dissipates. In that moment there's refuge in awareness. There's nothing else in that moment one needs to do.

Just continue to keep exploring how these worlds, these worldviews arise and change. I've given you a couple of examples; there are millions. And even the most difficult emotional and personality patterns can be seen this way.

Right now in the retreat this last week, it seems like really a lot of you—and it's kind of normal at this time in retreat—are finding that deep and difficult emotional patterns, personality patterns, are coming up into awareness. When Andrea talked about yogi mind, sometimes that can trigger really deep suffering, because some little event can activate a pattern we've experienced our whole life with a great deal of belief. And it's hard.

This is part of practice—to see it. Even that, even when you feel like you're spinning and lost in it and it feels just unworkable, if you can keep on bringing mindfulness right to the sense door, you'll see that none of these are lasting that long. They may be coming up frequently, but in between your horrible self-hatred, there'll be a moment when you're just sitting there thinking, "What's for lunch?" We tend not to notice that. We think, "Oh, it's been all day. When can I go to bed?" And then you start thinking for a while about your vacation last year, and then you come back to "Oh my god, this is..." But just notice that. Just notice—it doesn't mean it isn't painful. But just because it's painful doesn't mean it's any more me than the other.

So just trusting the steadiness of awareness, the accurate perception will come in. It can't help it. That's why the continuity is so important. Accurate perception isn't changing what's happening—it's seeing what's happening more clearly for how it is. And this is where we begin to be able to trust the awareness, to take refuge more and more. It's hard when something is so difficult or so familiar, when we're so sucked in and just spinning in it, to take refuge in awareness, because sometimes you feel the difficulty more clearly. But that's, as we start to see, impermanent as well. It's painful sensation, it's painful vedanā, but it's changing too.

The awareness and the clear seeing is so freeing from the confusion that comes from this holding to a sense of self that the trust, the faith, just gets stronger and stronger. Ajahn Sumedho says we're taking refuge in the awareness.

So just to end with another invitation: as much as you notice, it can be fun—play with it. Noticing birth and death of self, explore what's the concoction, what's the grasping to at the moment, and really give yourself the space to notice other moments when there is no concoction going on. There's plenty of those moments. They may be calm, they may seem a little spaced out, but there's awareness there. Not the moments when you're really zoned, but when there's awareness—just no big concoction.

Notice if you're kind of leaning into the next experience. Give yourself a moment of space. You finish one bite of food—give it a second before you put in the next one, if that's possible. When you finish eating, if you notice your mind going, "Okay, now go wash the dishes," just take a moment. Notice the space between activities. I don't mean create three hours between activities, but just notice. You're feeling your breath, you're aware of thinking, a thought's like this—it ends. Just be aware for a moment of the space, without having to jump onto the next arising experience because God forbid another thought might come.

Just be content with voidness, as Buddhadasa says. Be content with these moments where there's no particular sense of self. The moment between birth and death, the moments between thoughts—just appreciating that.

I'll end with this little line I like. It doesn't really fit, but I like it, so that's how it goes. From Mary Oliver: "Love yourself, then forget it, then love the world." That's how it works. When we're not all wrapped up in these births and deaths of ourself and we're not fighting them, then there's the space to love the world.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 132

Purifying Mind and Heart

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson unpacks what it truly means to purify the heart and mind (citta), drawing on both practical experience and Abhidhamma psychology. She begins with the Buddha's description of Nibbāna as directly visible whenever the mind is temporarily free from the kilesas (defilements)—greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Rather than viewing purification as scrubbing away impurities from a static self, Wilson presents the mind as a constantly arising process where each moment of consciousness co-arises with various mental factors (cetasikas), some wholesome and some unwholesome.
>
> Wilson explores how the kilesas function as "makers of measurement," narrowing and distorting our perception, creating a sense of separation and self-centeredness. Through vivid examples—from searching for desert tortoises to the universal meditation experience of becoming hyperaware of swallowing—she demonstrates how wanting and aversion constrict consciousness. She then presents the Buddha's three-fold path as addressing three levels of defilement: sīla (ethical conduct) works with transgressive kilesas expressed through action and speech; samādhi (concentration) calms obsessive mental proliferation; and paññā (wisdom) sees through the latent tendencies that can arise unexpectedly.
> The talk emphasizes that purification isn't about eliminating personality patterns through willpower, but about meeting whatever arises with kind, curious awareness. Wilson shares a moving example of a friend who transformed difficult family visits simply by watching her reactive patterns with mindfulness rather than trying to override them. This shift from doing to wise seeing allows the natural extinction of defilements when their causes aren't fed, revealing the "periodical Nibbāna" that, as Ajahn Buddhadāsa notes, nourishes us throughout each day.

We have been speaking frequently about how an aspect of this practice is about purifying the heart and mind, or we talk about cycles of purification and purity. Winnie was mentioning that at the end of her talk last night. So tonight I just want to talk a little bit about what we mean when we say purifying the heart and mind. What do I mean by it?

This has been something that's been really interesting and illuminating for me in my practice and my understanding of the whole path in the last few years. It's my current understanding because we know it's always moving and shifting. But really it seems to me that all aspects of the path that the Buddha taught—not just meditation, but all the different aspects—are different ways that he's offering to us to purify the habits of our heart-mind. The whole path is about shifting these habits from the suffering ones that are rooted in greed and hatred and confusion and delusion, toward taking more refuge until the habits of wholesomeness become more our refuge, more natural. And this is not just a good idea—it's the whole teaching.

In fact, this is the way the Buddha describes Nibbana. Someone asked the Buddha, "What do you mean Nibbana is directly visible, inviting one to come and see, immediate, to be personally experienced by the wise?"

The Buddha answers: "When, Brahman, a person is impassioned with lust"—that's the word for greed, lobha—"depraved through hatred"—that's all the different forms of ill will, hatred, fear—"bewildered through delusion, overwhelmed and infatuated by delusion, then she plans for her own harm, for the harm of others, for the harm of both, and she experiences in her mind suffering and grief. But when lust, hatred, and delusion have been abandoned, one neither plans for one's own harm or the harm of another, and so forth, and does not experience in her mind suffering and grief. In this way, Brahman, is Nibbana directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, worthy of application, to be personally experienced by the wise."

So he's basically equating the immediate experience of Nibbana, the real freedom of heart and mind, with the mind and heart that is free—temporarily or forever, but even temporarily—of greed, hatred, confusion. That's what we're talking about in terms of purifying the heart and mind. It's not just about feeling good. And it's not a should, or about being good or being bad. It's really just seeing what's causing suffering and what's not, and this is what he points to.

To me, it's really fascinating to explore all the different ways that we are doing this here and in our life. One way this has been helpful and illuminating to me is in terms of the many different meditation practices. Just within Vipassana, there are so many different mindfulness practices, and then there are the samatha concentration practices, and then other kinds of practices.

I don't know about you, but it can be in my mind at times to think, well, which one's the best? Or which one's better? Which one should I be doing? Which one will I get more out of? Or which is the real one? For those people who can't do the real one, that's probably the one I'm doing—and which is the real one that's going to take me to the breakthrough? That's what we're here for, the breakthrough. This purifying the mind stuff, okay, that's what they tell us when we're lost in self-hatred, when our fear is coming up again for the ten millionth time, and they say, "That's okay, that's great, that's purification." We go, "Yeah, right," and walk out thinking, "What's the real one?"

But this is what's so cool: it's all the real one. And it takes it all, believe me. It takes all the different practices at all the different times of our life. Because the habits—I don't know if you've noticed—the habits of wanting arising, or ill will arising, or fear, or anger, or delusion, they come up a lot. Have you noticed that? That's good. That's the beginning of purification, to notice it. Seriously.

But do you notice how much they come up? And have you noticed how as your practice goes on—you've been here four weeks now—and whatever you may think is completely irrelevant, but all of you, your practice is deepening. Your practice is getting more profound. You're coming to see more subtle layers of stuff, which is both beautiful—the wholesome qualities of heart and mind you're seeing too, very important, equally to recognize with the so-called torments, or so-called defilements, or kilesas. I might use the word kilesa rather than defilements, which I really don't like as a word, and I don't want to keep saying greed, hatred, delusion, greed, hatred, delusion, so I may just say kilesas.

As your mindfulness gets steadier, and your mind gets a bit more collected, you actually, at times, notice these difficult qualities more than before. Has anybody noticed that? And then you think, "Oh God, it's going backwards. It's worse." But no, we see it on more and more subtle levels, which I'll talk about. And this is essential.

This understanding is essential. But only when we're meeting these difficulties with right understanding. Otherwise, it becomes unbearable. And even with right understanding, once in a while it's unbearable.

So to begin exploring what makes purification possible, what allows the habits of mind to shift—just a brief two-minute foray into Abhidhamma, which is really a twenty-five year study. So, two minutes.

When Winnie was talking about us being an open system, this relates directly to how we understand purifying the heart-mind. We use two different words in English—heart and mind—but in Pali, citta means both. There's no sense of split; it encompasses the whole mental activity, the psyche.

It's an open system. When we talk about mind, we're not talking about some static entity, some self-existing thing that does things and decides things—as if purifying it means we get out the scrubber and start cleaning with steel wool, scrubbing and scrubbing until finally we have this pure lump of mind.

It's not like that at all.

As Andy Alinsky puts it very succinctly, the mind is not a subject, a thing that has objects as content. Rather, it is the activity or process of cognizing the flow of events. Just as the body is, so is the mind an activity, a process arising moment to moment and passing moment to moment, like everything else.

Here's a quick Abhidhamma foray—I don't want to get sidetracked, but the way it's described, a moment of mind or psyche involves consciousness, which we've discussed as one of the aggregates: viññāna, that simple quality of knowing. This arises in every moment, the pure knowing of an object. In itself, it's neither wholesome nor unwholesome. A sound comes and there's that knowing. Labeling it as "hearing" is then a mental factor.

So any moment of consciousness arises together with various mental factors—these are the sankhāra aggregate. Various mental factors co-arise with consciousness in a moment, forming what you might call a moment of mind, citta.

In the way Abhidhamma breaks this down, it identifies fifty-two different specific mental factors. In any moment of consciousness, many of these arise together—it's not just one at a time. Don't go nuts trying to see them all. We're simply using this framework to help us observe the obvious things.

For example, there are seven mental factors called universals that arise in every moment of consciousness: contact, where consciousness meets the object; vedanā, feeling tone; saññā, perception; cetanā, volition; ekaggatā, one-pointedness. Yes, you who thought one-pointedness meant being deep in the fourth jhāna—it's actually a universal factor, just the quality that allows the mind to know for an instant that something is happening. There's also attention, and something called life faculty, which sustains the vitality of consciousness and the mental factors just long enough for that moment to exist.

Just to give you a sense of how intricate this becomes—and I'm really not going to go further—many mental factors arise together in one moment of consciousness, and they come and go. Consciousness is a living, changing experience, always changing.

Along with the seven universals that are always present, other factors come and go. Some are wholesome—leading toward happy states, toward clarity—and some are unwholesome. Altogether, they identify fourteen unwholesome factors and twenty-five beautiful ones. Just so you know, there are far more beautiful ones than unwholesome ones. We simply tend to notice the unwholesome ones more because they really make a mess of things. But the wholesome ones are numerous, and many arise together.

Of the unwholesome factors, the three roots are delusion, greed, and hatred. Delusion is present in any unwholesome moment of consciousness—always. Greed or aversion may not always be present; there are states with just delusion alone. But if greed is present, delusion is there too. The same with hatred—delusion accompanies it. However, greed and hatred never exist simultaneously. These factors come and go, just as all the beautiful states do.

Among the beautiful states, nineteen beautiful qualities are always present together. Just as an example: faith, mindfulness, non-greed, non-hatred, neutrality of mind—which is equanimity, called tatramajjhattatā in Pali, for your information.

I love that. Tatra majjhattatā. Standing in the middle of everything, kind of—equanimity. And tranquility of body and mind, lightness of body and mind, quite a few. And then others that come and go with specific consciousnesses.

So it's complicated. All that we don't need to know. But the thing that we see that makes it interesting is that because every moment consciousness is arising new, it has the potential to be different. It is different in every moment. It's not steady state. But it's not that it's just random and haphazard—oh, this moment the mind is completely filled with hatred, the next moment maybe it'll be completely filled with bliss, who knows, let's hope.

It's not an act of will, right? We've all tried that. "May my mind be peaceful. May metta arise." I know that sounds like the practice, but I mean just like an act of—okay, may metta arise, may this ill will stop now. It doesn't work. It's lawful. It's not random. But as we've seen, it's not in our personal control.

Because the changes are lawful, in the most simple way: whatever is present in one mind moment makes it that much easier for it to arise in the next. I mean, that's not rocket science, right? You've probably noticed—if you're really angry about something and you really stew on it for a moment, what's likely to be in the next mind moment of consciousness arising? Probably not, "Oh, isn't life beautiful?" It's like, "I can't believe it, I can't believe it." It kind of topples over. As the Buddha says, what the mind frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the natural inclination of the mind.

So whatever mental qualities are arising frequently, frequently, frequently—it becomes a habit. That becomes the natural inclination of mind. But this is equally true for the beautiful qualities as it is for the difficult qualities.

And so this is where it can get really interesting to explore how the mind works. What is the experience, the effect in the mind, in the heart, in our thoughts, speech, and actions when the qualities in the citta in that moment, when the habit of greed or ill will or fear or delusion is running the show? And what's it like when the beautiful qualities are present? To really explore the nature of both.

The only way that is really possible, I think, is what we've been doing here—cultivating mindfulness, this quality of just interested, kind attention. What really helps is to bring this attitude of curiosity to it rather than the attitude of, "Oh my God, this is so ugly to look at. I can't believe my mind."

I don't have to tell you, right? We take it so personally. That's why I love it when Winnie last night gave us the big picture back 25,000 years in time, when we can't really know the cause of anything, but the cause contains everything. And the night before, multi-universes from Joseph. Go all the way out there back to the Big Bang—and maybe that's only one universe out of multiple ones—or go back 25,000 years or even longer to the first Homo sapien. It's hard to take it quite so personally when you see the aversion coming up in the mind or the wanting coming up.

If you can remember: oh, this is like a scientific, heartfelt investigation, both of the nature of suffering, but also just how does the human mind work? Here's an example of it. They all kind of work the same. It's amazing to think. We all have our different personal stories and personal history and all.

But if we get really interested in looking and seeing, we can begin to perceive the nature of greed. How does it work? How does it do its job, to use U Tejaniya's language? How does aversion work? How does it do its job? How do faith, mindfulness, and wisdom work? How do they do their jobs? And it's mindfulness, of course, that allows us to see all of this.

Coming back to the Buddha's teaching, his pointing to nibbāna as directly visible when the heart-mind is free from kilesa—and the reverse of that being that all of our internal suffering comes from these three roots of greed, hatred, and confusion in our minds. For me, when I look around the world, all the human-imposed suffering out there—not natural catastrophes, but the human-imposed suffering—and we can list it all: war and religious intolerance and racism and poverty and economic injustice and crime and abuse and fear, all of it going on and on and on. You can see it. You can really see it as kilesas acting out through the body, speech, and mind of beings.

When looking on that level, when one has the "noticing the kilesa" lens on, it could be overwhelming. There's so much of it. You can really see it though. But then, when we look in our own minds and see how much suffering arises when the mind is filled with ill will or aversion and it leads to speech or action, how much suffering there is when we're aware of it—then when we notice other people acting that way, that's where the connection comes, the natural compassion.

That doesn't mean what people are doing is okay. Just like it doesn't mean that if I'm acting from ill will and that's really suffering, I should go ahead and break the window because I want some fresh air—it doesn't matter. It doesn't mean we do whatever. It doesn't mean the horrible actions are okay, not at all. But it shifts us from responding from knee-jerk ill will to being able to respond from compassion. That's wisdom. That's the wisdom that changes the whole show.

And that wisdom comes from the steady mindfulness that's exploring these suffering habits in our mind, and all the practices that help us in various ways to shift that. Because just as it's true that all the suffering comes from these difficult states, it's equally true that we—all of us—experience beautiful states as well, perhaps even more so. Moments when we're not driven by greed, by hatred, by confusion.

This is true in the world as well. Look around the world, and if you put on the wholesome lenses—you don't get it so much from the news. Every now and then the news will tell you something really good somebody did. You have to kind of listen for it. But just looking around the world, there's beautiful stuff: acts of great love and courage and compassion and generosity. Everywhere you look—famous people, people you don't know, little things on the street—when you're looking for that. And we see that in ourselves too.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa, from an article he wrote called "Nibbana for Everyone," which should be encouraging. He was quite a scholar, but in this long article he's talking about nibbāna. He writes that nibbāna may be summed up as the coolness of mind and heart that results from the extinction of kilesa, from the extinction of defilements in the mind. Whenever they're not present, there is what may be called nibbāna, whose meaning is "cool."

He's making a pun on the Thai here, because apparently—I don't speak Thai, although I spent quite some time there—a lot of Pali words have made their way into the language. They talk about cooling rice; they say the rice has "nibbana-ed." So he's making a pun. He had quite a sense of humor.

But he goes on to say that because the kilesas, the defilements, are conditioned experiences—aspects that come into the mind and go, as I was describing—they have birth and death like anything else. And when the causal conditions are not present, the defilements simply become extinct. It's not like an act of will, getting out the hammer to get rid of the kilesas. When the causes that are feeding them stop feeding them, they simply don't arise.

It's so much easier than thinking we have to do that. We just explore and see what's feeding it. What starves kilesa? What feeds the wholesome? And by observing this through steady mindfulness—cause and effect—what's so wonderful is that what feeds the wholesome is actually steady mindfulness leading to wisdom. When wisdom recognizes wholesome qualities, they get stronger. We don't have to make that happen. In fact, we can't, because when we try to do it, we only know how to do things from wanting and aversion. But when we notice faith, it brightens the heart and mind.

When we're truly noticing mindfulness and awareness, appreciating them, it becomes so much easier for mindfulness to arise in the next moment. And what starves the kaleshas is the same thing: wise attention, wisdom. When wisdom recognizes what's going on with the kaleshas, it's not an act of "Oh, this is bad, stop." It's more like seeing. So many people have described these little moments of seeing wanting for something—perhaps wanting a particular mental state, as someone was describing—and seeing how the states are just changing, changing, changing, sometimes so quickly. Wanting comes up, and you see the state go away before you even recognize the wanting. It doesn't make sense anymore. You don't have to say, "I'm going to stop wanting that state that already passed." The wanting just dissolves. It becomes extinct simply through the steadiness of clear seeing and wisdom. This is what starves the kaleshas.

So he's talking about this—back to Buddhadasa—that when the conditions aren't present, the defilements simply become extinct. And although this extinction is temporary for all of us, in other words, the coolness takes place temporarily, it still is a phenomenon that has the real sense of nibbana, even though it's not the lasting one.

Anyone can see, he says, this temporary nibbana which nourishes we sentient beings, though we still will see the difficulties arise from time to time. Anyone can see that if the defilements were with us all day and all night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand them? Cast your mind back. Do you really, really think that the defilements have been with you all day and all night, every second without ceasing? We couldn't bear it. Under such conditions, we'd go mad.

So let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods when the fires of kalesha are not burning. And in fact, we could say that these periods last longer than when the fires are burning. Periodical nibbana keeps us all alive and well without any exceptions. We survive because of this kind of nourishment. This is truly normal and natural.

Just like last week when I was saying to notice not only when the sense of self arises and passes, but also to notice the moments when it's not there—it's equally the same. We bring this interest, this exploration, to how the kaleshas arise and work, what feeds them, what starves them, how they function, how they create suffering, and what helps to purify and shift the habits. We also bring equal interest and non-identification, non-selfing, to all the moments of coolness, of non-defilement, because noticing that equally is equally important. This is really essential to our path of awakening.

As the Buddha said, if it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so. It's not easy. And as we go on and explore, as I mentioned at the beginning, what we start to see in terms of exploring how the kaleshas show up and what helps to purify the habits is that they're tricky little devils. They can be incredibly gross and obvious, or they can be really quite subtle. This is what we want to explore with interest, not taking it personally.

To begin with recognizing how these roots work on a simple level: when you recognize greed or wanting in the mind, when you recognize ill will or aversion, when you recognize delusion or confusion, or you have some vague sense that there must be some confusion because you have no clue what's happening—you can guess there's some delusion going on. That's one level.

But knowing that even in our complex and deeply habituated personality patterns, our deep traumas and sufferings—which are much more complex and which arise for most of us over and over on retreat—it's not that you're always going to see the clarity of greed, hatred, or confusion in the middle of those experiences. But even our complex, difficult emotional states are triggered by one or two of those roots. You may not see it at the root, but exploring how these roots of suffering work on a simpler level is one of the great things we can do on retreat. And then sometimes you can start to see how they function on a more complex level.

We begin to explore how these qualities, when arising in a moment of mind, a moment of consciousness, distort perception and lead onward to suffering. The Buddha once said that lust, greed, hatred, and delusion are makers of measurement. Makers of measurement. What that means is that they impose limitations upon the range and depth of the mind—creating a sense of here, a sense of there, a sense of somewhere to get to.

I'll give you some simple examples.

I talked some about that last week, but I'll say it again. Noticing when you become aware of wanting in the mind—and this is easier with little things—but we want to get into, "Oh, okay, here's desire," rather than getting focused on what we desire, or why we shouldn't desire that, or talking ourselves out of desiring it, or pretending we don't desire it and going and getting it, or whatever it is that we're doing. What's much more interesting is to take your attention and turn it onto the desire itself, onto the quality in the mind. And notice, just noticing, like it's a scientific experiment. What does it do?

I'll give this example I often use, but it was a good one. I was in the desert in California, teaching in Yucca Valley years ago. I love walking out in that desert. They're very peaceful in the early morning with Joshua trees and a few little animals, but you don't see much. Occasionally there are these large land tortoises, and it's really special to see one. You don't see them often.

So I was out walking and just feeling peaceful and open and present. And the thought came, "Maybe I'll see a tortoise." Which could just come and go. But it didn't just come and go. It landed with wanting, with greed. And this is what keeps thoughts going—it's not the thought. We don't see the greed underneath it, or we don't see the aversion underneath it, even though we may see the thought.

I noticed how this affected things. What had been just really present and open became present wanting to see a tortoise. So I'm walking, completely focused, looking, looking, looking, and the mind is like, "That's not a tortoise, that's not a tortoise, that's not a tortoise," looking, looking, looking. Completely different experience. Absolutely the mind is narrowed and limited and measured. Where's the tortoise? Here am I. Where's the tortoise? And before there had been no sense of that at all.

Really interesting. This is what happened. Oh, forget the tortoise. Settle back. Just what is. Notice the difference. The second one is a moment of purity. The greed dissipated. The greed will dissipate eventually because everything changes. Feeding it would be, "Yeah, I need to see a tortoise, I need to see a tortoise." At some point, noticing the tightness, bringing the awareness to the tightness, okay, just let it be. The craving dissolves by itself from wisdom. Playing with that, seeing how that works.

Same thing with aversion. Have you noticed? With aversion, it's more like the mind shrinks back, but it tightens and narrows. Have you noticed how when something brings up a lot of aversion in your mind, you're married to that object just the same way as if you were really grasping at it? If there's a loud, disruptive sound and there's aversion to it, have you noticed how that kind of takes over?

Or have you ever had a time—maybe I shouldn't say this because it'll trigger it for people—it happens to almost everybody on retreat, where all of a sudden you notice you're swallowing a lot. And it drives you crazy, as if you weren't swallowing before. And then all you can notice is how much you swallow. And the aversion builds, and then you think everyone in the room is waiting for you to swallow. No one else is—I don't know what it is, but it's a well-known meditation phenomenon. Sooner or later, if you haven't had it yet. And then you'll find, a week later or a day later, you never even notice it again.

You wonder, "What was that all about? Am I still swallowing?" What was that all about? It was all about aversion, that's what it was all about. Just boom—it takes over the world. Notice that. The maker of measurement, it shrinks and narrows our consciousness.

And then, of course, as I talked about last week, it's all about me. But one way to understand this sense of measurement—I like the way Sogyal Rinpoche talks about it. He says that in Tibet, when they're measuring to build a house, to measure the foundation and make what we call the footprint of the house, you stand there holding a string. From you, you measure the string out as far as it goes, and then from you, all the way around—that's how you make the measurement of the house. He said that's like the sense of self. Everything's measured from here. Everything's measured from me. Every sense experience becomes: What does it say about me? What does it have to do with me? Just noticing that again really narrows and constricts the world.

And even anything that happens comes to feel like a message from the universe. Have you noticed that? So I was thinking, if that day I had seen a tortoise, the mind goes, "Oh, the universe is really all coming together to show me a tortoise." The whole universe is conspiring to let me have my desire. Or the universe is all conspiring to make these unpleasant sounds happen to me. Why me? It's this sense of narrowing, restricting.

So notice how it works. It works like that for everybody. Notice when it comes, when it passes.

And then as we start to get a feeling for it, there will be times—in our more difficult, really deep strong patterns—sometimes they're just so strong that all we can do is be really present with them with kindness. That's already the purification process. Because the habits, the knee-jerk habits, are that we meet stuff with greed, hatred, and delusion and keep on feeding it. That's kind of what we learn in the world. To meet a difficult state of heart or mind with kindness, with friendly interest, with even just simple awareness—that moment is the purification of consciousness.

We tend to think that purification means this bad stuff is going to stop coming up. When am I going to purify my whole personality? I think I said this last time, but it can't hurt saying it again. I've been waiting. I've been waiting a long time for my personality to purify. And so have my friends. Just in our meeting this afternoon, my closest friend asked, "What's a remedy for her personality?" This is what we live with. No one here—I've pretty much given up. I'm much more at ease with it. That's the purification.

The purification is meeting what's arising in the mind and heart right now. It's not about changing the object. So there will be times when our patterns are so strong, all we can do is meet them kindly. That's shifting. That's purifying.

But then there are other times when we can start to see—for instance, self-judging, which is a pattern that many of us have. Now I can recognize when it comes into my mind. I can feel the energy like a cloud. And I know it's dosa—aversion, hatred mind. I know that. I know that's the root. I can feel...

Dosa, which is the Pali word for hatred—I actually prefer this term because it encompasses a wider range, all the many gradations of aversion. I can feel it, and I can see how each moment of aversion that I'm identifying with—"Yeah, that is really bad, you are really horrible, you are really hopeless, this shouldn't be happening, you should be better by now"—just distorts the perception and makes the next moment more distorted, more affected by ill will, by hatred. It turns into a downward spiral. Does that sound familiar to anybody?

So that's going to happen. It's going to happen. But what we do is we start to get interested in exploring how. In these simpler moments of kalesha, we're getting a sense of how they feel and how they function. Then there will be times when the mindfulness is steady and strong enough that you can really explore within the complicated pattern. I can really see the aversion in the self-judging, and I know how it works well enough. I know I can't trust any assessment or any thought that comes out of this mind when self-judging is distorting perception. So when you recognize self-judging and then you're trying to assess how good your practice is, forget about it. Just recognize, "Oh, that's aversion in the mind. Feels like this." That's the shift from being caught to changing the habit. This is what we're talking about with purification.

When I talk about all the different ways the Buddha offered us different aspects of the path, how they're all working and helping us in different ways, shifting these habits —each of these is a whole talk, so I can only mention them briefly. But he talks about three levels, just as a way of describing how these kalesha, these torments of mind, show up in our experience.

The first, strongest level—the English translations are always so Victorian and odd—but the translation is something like "the kalesha of transgression." Let's just say it means you act it out. The greed, the hatred, the confusion is so strong that we speak or act from it. And what is the purification practice for this? It's sila. It's taking on as practice a relationship to the five lay precepts, or the eight precepts, or the 227 precepts, in whichever way we do it.

When the energy of the kalesha is so strong—and we all know this—it comes out our mouth. Or look in the world: people act from it. We can rationalize forever, but you can really see when we're paying attention how strong it is when we act, when we say the thing, when we do the thing, when we steal, whatever it might be. The practice of sila, the practice of restraint, is a very powerful practice of purifying the habits of the mind and heart on this really strong level. And I sometimes think I never quite appreciated it enough.

Restraint—consciously refraining from wrong speech—that's actually one of the wholesome mental factors in the Abhidhamma. Restraint, wise speech. Or restraining from wrong action: stealing, lying, killing, all of that. Wise action is one of the beautiful mental factors. And wise livelihood is one of the beautiful mental factors.

Of course, you'll still notice we may consciously not act from greed, but you'll still notice the greed in the mind. But there's that beautiful quality of refraining, of restraint, and that's really important to notice. So whatever you have been doing in your life before here, I don't know, but probably there was a lot of refraining from unwholesome speech and action. And here, all of us together being on at least the five precepts —consciously take it in. Notice all the times that you haven't acted out of greed or out of anger. Out of delusion is harder to notice, but those two are easier.

We tend to judge ourselves because we're still seeing the greed: "I'm so greedy and I'm not going to go get seconds on dessert, but I'm so filled with greed." It's easy to sit and judge that rather than noticing the beautiful quality of restraint. And because it's lawful—what we practice, toward that the mind naturally inclines—you start to notice. I hope you start to notice. I'm putting it in your mind to look and see if you notice that restraint starts to come more naturally and easily.

I'm just picking food because for some people it's complicated, for some people it's just an obvious example. But I remember my first long retreat here. I'd be first in the food line, or soon anyway, soon after the food came out. And there was one guy—I didn't know anybody—he would come ambling in twenty-five minutes after the meal was served. And they didn't keep refreshing the food like they do now. He'd come ambling in and there'd be some things left and some things not. And I thought, "God, he must be enlightened."

He just comes in and eats and leaves, and I'll never be like that. But now I notice when I'm on retreat, I don't think about it. It's nothing, it's not an act of will, but just somehow, from many years of practicing refraining in different ways—as soon as you want something, you go get it—no, we don't. Whatever it is, it doesn't matter what. That refraining from acting out of greed is strengthening this wholesome quality of non-greed.

So just recognize that in all your time here, all the moments of the day. It's not every moment—there are moments when greed isn't there. You're not strengthening non-greed; it's already not there. But notice when there's conscious refraining from action, or just when it doesn't arise, when it gets more natural and easy. That's a quality of the habits of mind and heart purifying. Sīla is a powerful practice—conscious conduct in our lives.

Generosity, the practice of generosity—not so much about what one should give, that's a whole other talk—but the quality in the mind of the joy of sharing, the joy of connectedness. It's really a beautiful, joyful quality. You can't share much with things here, and please don't start with each other. But we're giving each other the generosity of heart, the space to be quiet with yourself. That can be a generous act. Refraining from going and talking to someone can be an act of generosity. Appreciate that. That's a letting go of craving.

This is a whole other teaching of the Buddha, a practice that's really a powerful way of purifying the habits of greed in particular, but also ill will, and also of separation. When you're really offering something to someone, the sense of separation goes away. And if you really are, from your heart, offering something—even a smile—there's not ill will present in that moment. There's open-hearted generosity. It's one of the beautiful states. The beautiful and the unbeautiful don't coexist in any moment.

So there's generosity. The second level is called obsessive kilesa. And this is, I'm sure you know, when the thoughts are just spinning—thoughts of greed, thoughts of ill will, thoughts of delusion—on and on and on, obsessive, obsessive, obsessive. This is one we get to make really good friends with here on retreat. It happens a lot in life too.

And what practice really helps us cool that out, balance that out, is samādhi. So you're going to see this is sīla, samādhi, paññā—the three parts of the Eightfold Path. Samādhi, collectedness of mind, is what starts to purify, temporarily, the obsessive kilesa—the spinning, spinning of ill will, wanting, delusion.

We've talked about how in samādhi, this collectedness of mind, when there's some concentration, the hindrances are kept away. And it's really quite interesting to see, as the mind gets more and more collected—and I don't mean it has to be one-pointed, but collectedness of mind, samādhi, all the samatha practices, all the brahmavihāra practices, or ānāpāna, being with the breath—but it's also what we call momentary samādhi, khaṇika samādhi, which is the steadiness of awareness, of attention, on changing objects, which is very much our vipassanā meditation. With that, as the attention gets steady, steady, steady—have you noticed we've mentioned continuity once in a while?—steady, steady, steady, that's what leads to the collectedness of samādhi.

And as the mind gets collected, the hindrances don't really, they can't really—the strong ones, greed, hate, ill will, doubt—they don't really get in. And as the mind gets more and more collected, more calm, even greed and lust, anger, agitation, don't really arise.

This is one of the reasons people like the collected mind, the concentrated mind, so much. Partly we like it because we think, "Oh good, I'm finally getting somewhere." Okay, that's not so wholesome. But partly, when there's that sense of collectedness—it can be with mettā, or it can be when people come and say, "Oh, the awareness, the mindfulness is just kind of flowing by itself and things are coming and going and there's no real problem. Whatever's coming, it's interesting"—there's a sense of there being no agitation, no anger, no wanting. It's just whatever's coming is seen. That's the kind of purification of mind. The torments aren't arising.

And as one practices, really very one-pointed into jhāna practice, the power of the collected mind gets really strong and you can really taste the sense of purity. But it doesn't have to be that strong. We can taste it, notice what the pure mind feels like—the mind that isn't driven by wanting, by agitation. Sometimes, before we've started practice, we may have never even really noticed that that's possible.

And when you feel it, even just a little, it's like, ah, just this coolness, this peace. It's the mind that isn't distorted by the kleshas. One person described it to me as feeling like the awareness is squeaky clean—you know, like when you're cleaning a window and it's so clean it squeaks. There's just nothing in the way.

So we notice that. Of course, later greed can arise for it, because this is a temporary purification. But it is really shifting the habits of mind. First we're even getting a sense that this is possible. I remember many times in practice where the peacefulness and happiness of the mind that isn't riddled by kleshas is so much more peaceful and happy than any sense pleasure I could think of. Any. Every sense pleasure starts to seem really gross compared to that. Which is why we can get so attached to certain kinds of concentration. That attachment part comes later, and that isn't helpful. But in terms of the obsessive defilements, it's the collectedness of mind that really helps to shift the habit.

But it's conditional, of course. And so when the conditions that lead to the collectedness change or go away, the habits of klesha can come back in again. Not can—they will. Sometimes, slowly, slowly, the purity can last a while and we can rediscover it. We learn to appreciate it. We learn how to feed it. But once in a while you'll have a period here where you feel really focused, and then somehow it shifts and you feel like you're just hit over the head by some really strong, difficult emotional state. And you go, "How did that happen?" Because it's kind of like the steadiness lifts up and the old habits come roaring back.

So this is the third level, called the latent kleshas—the underlying tendency for one of the kleshas to arise given the appropriate conditions. It's like if the seed is there, you give it water, it's going to sprout. Don't let this one make you feel hopeless and discouraged. But it's why things are going fine, fine, fine, you're really focused, and all of a sudden you let up—oh, let me just enjoy the trees—and whop. Where did that come from?

And it can be little things. Someone told me a few years ago, on retreat here, on a three-month retreat, they were very mindful, noting everything. They were walking past the breakfast table after breakfast was over, just noticing: walking, looking. And then all of a sudden it was like a different part of them—their hand just went out and grabbed an orange and took it and kept on going. And they're like, "What? Where did that come from?" They didn't notice the wanting come up, and the acting felt like, whoa. Not that it was bad to take an orange, but it's just like, where did that come from? It can be like that, very small, or it can be really big.

And so here, what the practice is, is wisdom—clear seeing. The Buddha said these underlying tendencies for the kleshas to come about are not seen through by an act of will or by doing, but by wise seeing. This is where our steady mindfulness comes in—to just be with it, not to fix it or hate it, but to just be willing to stay present. Because we never know when a sudden old habit will emerge. We just never know. I don't mean this like a scary thing. I mean, this is why we want to take refuge in awareness.

So, okay, two examples to end. One is on the scary side, but just shows how we never really know. When a latent defilement comes up so strong that we act it out, it could be just a few seconds, and it could change our life. I was listening to an interview on public radio last year with two men who were working with young prisoners—young men who were in for life, or for many, many years. And they were talking to one young man who was in for life. They didn't say what he'd done, but some violent things. I'm assuming murder, but I don't know. And he said—this young guy, the men who worked with him were reporting it—he said, "You know, I just wish I had back those three to five seconds of my life where I did this violent act, for which I'm now in jail for life." Three to five seconds.

We never know. Now, the more we have been practicing all these other aspects—of sila, of generosity, of samadhi, of mindfulness—the chances are our habits are really getting so purified that it probably wouldn't come to that for any of us.

But still, we never want to abandon wise seeing. And it's not an act of will that the purifying happens, but simply through watching to see.

I'll end with this last example from a good friend who has told me I can use it. It's mundane, but this is our life—why seeing is what allows the wisdom, the paññā, to arise, which by itself dissipates the habits, changes, purifies the heart-mind.

This friend's family lives quite distant from where she lives. I've known her for about thirty years. It's been quite difficult when she goes home to visit—just her mother and sister now—and it's always challenging. Every time she goes, with all her years of practice, she makes that affirmation: "I'm going to go home and really work with mettā and not get sucked into the dynamics and not get sucked into being negative." Have any of you ever done that? We know how that works.

So she always does this. She goes home and tries it, and it's a really difficult situation with her sibling. After a retreat here a couple of years ago where the emphasis was really on what I'm talking about—just bringing kind awareness to watch the habits in mind and see how they work, trusting the mindfulness to bring the wisdom, and that that purifies by itself instead of trying, because by trying we don't even let ourselves see what's happening—she said she got on the plane and started her usual routine: "Okay, when I walk in the door, I'm going to be really kind, I'm going to be really..." And then she said, "Wait a minute, let's just watch the mind."

So she started watching, and she saw that as soon as she got on the plane, her mind went into reactive mode. She got resentful and resistant. She was saying things like, "Oh, I'm going to just be nice, filled with love and kindness," but underneath she was thinking, "Oh, with Mom and my sister, this is going to happen." She saw her mind, her heart, building up this whole story. And she just watched it—how the aversion was coming as a habit.

When she was watching with awareness, really present with it, that was already purifying, because she wasn't feeding it. And delusion feeds it. We pretend it's not there, and it keeps on working under the radar. So she was watching the whole thing. She walked in the door and she saw how as soon as she walked in, she was ready for battle. She just saw that in herself. Instead of feeding it, it relaxed. And she saw when her sister came, she was ready to have a difficult interaction before her sister opened her mouth—didn't even give her a chance.

She just watched like this. She said it was the best visit she ever had. Because she was able to be with her own process. And just by trusting the steady mindfulness, she was able—not by an act of will, but by wisdom—to see that the processes, the habits, were being purified.

This is what's available to all of us. All of these different aspects support us. So when you're having a really bad day and you don't have one moment of mindfulness, contemplate your sīla. All the acts of restraint. That's wholesome. That's changing the habit of mind from self-negativity, from dosa, to something beautiful. Just for one example.

Okay, that's enough. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 133

Wisdom and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential unity of wisdom and compassion in Buddhist practice. She begins by examining how an incomplete understanding of emptiness (suññatā) and not-self (anattā) can feel unsettling, even alienating, when divorced from the warmth of compassionate connection. Drawing on teachings from Nyoshul Khenpo and Nāgārjuna, she warns against falling into the 'abyss of emptiness' where nothing seems to matter—a conceptual trap rather than liberating insight.
>
> Wilson presents the Tibetan understanding of mind's threefold nature: empty of separate self-existence, naturally clear and knowing, and ceaselessly responsive with compassion. She uses the image of Green Tārā—serene in meditation yet poised to act—as an embodiment of this union. The Dalai Lama's teaching that real compassion must arise from insight into emptiness prevents us from falling into hopelessness when facing the world's suffering.
> The talk offers deeply practical guidance for cultivating bodhicitta, the awakened heart. Wilson emphasizes that compassion develops through intimate presence with our own suffering, however ordinary it may seem. She shares the Dalai Lama's capacity to be fully present with each person's pain without carrying residue—demonstrating how emptiness enables rather than blocks empathy. Through examples ranging from walking meditation in Burma to the Freedom Riders' nonviolent resistance, she shows how wisdom and compassion together enable courageous, effective action. The teaching reminds us that each moment of meeting our experience with kind awareness is sufficient—we need no special circumstances to cultivate liberation.

Tonight I want to talk about the unity of compassion and wisdom. You could say wisdom needs compassion and compassion needs wisdom—which luckily happens naturally like that.

To talk about how wisdom needs compassion: when we talk about, and sometimes even experience, the wisdom of emptiness—emptiness meaning empty of separate, intrinsic self—it doesn't mean nothing's there, but there's no reliable separate anything to hold on to. We've talked about that quite a bit. The sense of not-self, the sense of everything coming and going. We say whatever thought occurs, awareness doesn't care. Whatever experience happens, just be aware of it. One isn't better than the other.

There can be at times a beginning sense of understanding this or experiencing it, but not fully. And so while a deep understanding of this, or even moments of it, is freeing, there's also oftentimes—I'm sure many of you have experienced this, I certainly have—when the idea of emptiness, of not-self, of awareness doesn't care, is actually felt or experienced as rather unsettling. To say the least, unattractive. I didn't really come here to find out everything's all the same and awareness doesn't care and whatever I think doesn't matter and whatever I do doesn't matter. It's not just to move everything into some dull grayness. People have used words to me like uncaring, alien, unattractive, inhuman. You get the drift. Sometimes even when we experience this it's kind of scary, because there's no reference point.

This is a kind of incomplete aspect of wisdom. It's true, all that, without the judgments about uncaring and alien and inhuman. The sense that there's nothing to hold on to, that in a way, in the purity of mind, it doesn't really matter what's arising—that's true. But if that's the only way we experience it, it can lead to a sense of disconnection, a kind of disillusionment. It verges into the incomplete aspect without the connectedness of compassion. It can sound as though emptiness and not-self is a very uncaring, disconnected state or experience.

This is from Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a great Dzogchen master: "The danger is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, or emptiness, and we err on the side of the absolute—like everything's empty, nothing matters—in a nihilistic fashion, and we are obscured by concepts."

Nagarjuna said, "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness." Nagarjuna went on to say, "The Buddhists say that emptiness is relinquishing opinions. Believers in emptiness are incurable."

So you get a sense of the difference. The experience is one thing. The belief, the concept that it's all empty, it doesn't matter—that's something else entirely. Back to Nyoshul Khenpo: "Those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do." Which we've been saying, right? There's nothing to do. But knowing that from a deep understanding is very different from a little bit of knowing combined with the concept that it all doesn't matter, there's nothing to do. You know, the kind of crazy wisdom where two people are fighting over a cat—just cut it in half, it doesn't matter. That kind of thing. Nothing matters.

So that's wisdom, but not complete wisdom, because it doesn't have the compassion, it doesn't have the connection.

The Tibetans have a lovely way of describing the natural nature of mind, of heart, as threefold aspects—although all three come together, we split it up just because we have to talk about it. All mind, all experience has the quality of being empty, empty of any separate self-existence, what I was just saying. And at the same time, in those moments of spontaneous knowing, natural awareness, the natural clear knowing quality of mind-heart is always available, always present.

We've said that—the simple way we've been saying it—awareness is always accessible when you just remember.

And the third aspect of that, in the moment when there's the clear awareness which is always accessible, knowing with the understanding of the empty nature, the third aspect is that the natural expression of mind of heart is that it is—the Tibetans use the phrase—ceaselessly responsive. Meaning that in any particular moment of experience, if a response is appropriate, that natural response will be that of compassion or metta, whichever is appropriate, equanimity—of the brahmaviharas—but call it compassion for simplicity. This is the natural and ceaselessly responsive nature, the active nature, when the heart-mind of emptiness is called upon to respond.

And when you put that all together, that's where we really get a sense of the depth of the freedom the Buddha is talking about—this unity of wisdom and compassion.

Now, at the same time, compassion needs wisdom or we so easily fall into the vortex of despair. We get overwhelmed, we take it all personally, we just can't be there. You know all of that—or falling into righteous anger. So without the depth of wisdom of emptiness, we can certainly cultivate compassion. Of course, we don't have to be perfect in any of this, but the real depth of compassion needs both.

This is from the Dalai Lama, who says: without the unity of compassion and emptiness, we can fall into despair. Real compassion must be derived, must arise from our insight into the emptiness of inherent self. This is where the vast meets the profound. Otherwise, though our compassion may be strong, it is likely to fall into the quality of hopelessness or even despair.

Have you felt that sometimes? It feels like it's really compassion, but it so easily tips into the quality of hopelessness, of despair.

And so our practice, where we're cultivating wisdom through the steadiness of mindfulness, we're also naturally developing compassion. Sometimes one seems more up, sometimes another seems more up, and sometimes they come together in a lovely way. But they keep on developing—one and then the other, and then they come together.

One expression of this that I really like is the statues of Green Tara. I don't know if you've ever seen that—she's a Tibetan goddess of compassion. I have a little one at home that I really like because to me it depicts this blending of wisdom and compassion. So the statue—she's sitting there really in meditation, really at ease, totally relaxed, clearly in meditation, but the eyes are a little bit open. Not this sense of complete pullback from the world. And I'm sure if you've ever seen the Green Tara icon, you know that one of the feet is resting up on a lotus petal, ready to get up if action is called for. At that moment, action isn't called for. So there's the deep serenity of wisdom, of meditation, but always—not like, "Oh my God, I've got to do something!" No, that's hard, that's not it. Total serenity, but as soon as the appropriate action is called for, it naturally arises. Doing the obvious, as I heard one teacher say—not holding oneself in readiness. It's the natural response of wisdom.

Nyoshul Khen again: someone who realizes that all phenomena are empty and who realizes or recognizes the non-existence of self will naturally have spontaneous compassion for sentient beings who do not realize this and so continue to suffer through delusion and clinging.

And you don't have to think, "Oh, that's somewhere way down the road, impossible for me." Again, remember, everything is only moments—only this moment. To me, that's one of the most freeing teachings in my practice, because when I find my mind thinking, "Well, how can I ever be that compassionate? I was just having these horrible thoughts about this other person yesterday..."

Right now. Right now is all we have to work with. That's a huge relief, and it makes everything possible.

So, remember—last week I was talking about working to purify the habits of heart and mind. And I think I suggested noticing moments in your own experience when the heart-mind is pure, when it's not being distorted by greed, hatred, delusion. And I know another time I said: when there's no sense of self. Notice those moments.

Think back, if you can think of one. As I said, they're just simple moments. When you're really present and awake, just with this moment, just as it is—as someone was describing in an interview, just being totally present with what is—there's no problem in that moment, is there? We can't imagine why there would ever be a problem again. We don't have to wait long, but in that moment of the pure heart and mind, whatever it is—whether it's just walking, seeing the leaves, drinking tea, just standing—there's just that purity, that simple total presence, not thinking of me or other.

In that moment, could you imagine, if there was some being in front of you having trouble, that you would act from aversion or cruelty? The natural response of compassion would just naturally spring up, wouldn't it? Can you imagine doing anything harmful or cruel from that space? It just doesn't occur in that moment.

And so in terms of some little chipmunk that needed help, you may not know, you may not have the information of what would be the most supportive, helpful thing to do. So we don't always have omniscient wisdom. But in that sense of the wisdom of emptiness, the wisdom of not about me and other, the movement to compassionate action would just naturally arise. You wouldn't have to think about it.

Later you could think about and analyze and beat yourself up when you weren't in such a pure space anymore. But at that time, it's just the natural way that the mind of wisdom and compassion functions.

And so wisdom needs compassion, but compassion also needs wisdom. Because we don't have the big picture. Even when we're not really taken over by greed or confusion, but just a little bit caught in the sense of "I" — even if we're meaning well, wanting to do good — our vision, what we can see, is going to be narrowed and limited in that "me and other" space, if you know what I mean. "I want to do something good for the environment," but somehow it's always coming from me. We just can't see. Instead of "me and other," the wisdom shifts it to "we." And out of that "we," a more appropriate, compassionate action can come.

I'll give you a very simple example — not even compassion, but just that shift out of "me" to "we" that lets one see the situation in a more holistic way. This is such a simple example. Some years ago when I was on retreat at Shwe Oo Min Meditation Center in Burma, there were a lot of people there, and I was doing some walking meditation. It's not so orderly, you could say, as here. There are no special walking rooms, just places outside to walk — a narrow walkway here, verandas outside of the meditation hall, anywhere outside you can walk.

So I was walking, and here, you know, if we start walking one way we assume everyone else will walk in the same direction, and we're all very tidy about it. God forbid someone should go crosswise. But there it's just kind of whatever. I had my little space, walking back and forth, and people are ambling this way and that, coming right towards me, and I'm... well, you can imagine. Maybe not, but... No one walked into me, but I was in a decent open space, thinking, "Okay, well, let's all try to walk for the well-being of all." I wasn't really aversive, but there was that sense of me trying to coordinate it, you know — psychically. I mean, I wasn't really talking to anybody, but psychically. "We're just walking here, we're just all walking together, one big mishmash."

But then something let go — which, as we know, can't be an act of will. Something let go and I quit seeing it from this perspective of how all these people were in my way. Actually, it's working. Nobody's actually walking into anybody here. It's working. I just walk back and forth, and someone seems to be walking — well, they are walking directly towards me, that's true. But when we get to the point, before the point of contact, one of us turns. Okay, what's the big problem? One of us turns. Maybe it's me, maybe it's them. But someone turns. Keep on walking. Actually, there was no problem. And I was there for weeks, and it was always thus. As soon as it wasn't that sense of me having to take care of it for all of us — but especially for me — and I was just seeing the big picture, oh, it works. Maybe they move, maybe I move. One of us moves in the big "we," and it all works out.

It's simple, but it makes a huge difference. That's, in a little way, how compassionate response and clear seeing can arise when so much of our energy isn't caught up in this relentless, obsessive self-referencing.

Without wisdom, we can have wonderful ideas of compassion and act in great compassionate ways, but it doesn't have the real depth, the staying power, because it's not coming from the deep wisdom of not "me and other" but "us" — and that "us" includes everything. But when that obsessive self-referencing is just a little bit released, so much energy is available for life, for awareness, for appropriate response, for compassion. And that's how it naturally shows up, which is a nice thing.

So then, in a way, the question of compassion with wisdom — the one that comes up for me — I sometimes feel like this has been one of the great koans in practice. You've probably noticed how a lot of spiritual practice is really paradoxical: one thing's true and then the exact opposite is true, and they're both true, and you can't figure it out, but you somehow have to understand it. It's like that with this. For me, this balance, this dance of emptiness and compassionate action — cultivating wisdom to be able to really act in wise and compassionate ways from a depth, not just from an idea, and not then just getting into the wisdom that's so serene and removed — I feel like a lot of my life is kind of back and forth, back and forth. Trying to figure it out, which is of course hopeless, but dancing back and forth between those two, making teensy, teensy little understandings, and then I didn't understand anything, starting over. It goes like that.

But how, with the depth of wisdom and compassion, do we continue to open our hearts, our minds, in this complex world of beauty and suffering?

And these days, it's hard enough, I find, to find the courage—not just the willpower courage, but the courage of the tenderness of wisdom, of compassion—to keep opening in the face of even our own overwhelming suffering. Each of us, at times, experiences suffering that is overwhelming. Just to open to our own. And then the way the information world is these days, there are all the people we know, all the people we care for, our family and friends, and then just to be able to be present in the face of all of their suffering. And then there's the media. Just one day of listening to the news can—well, some days one can be somewhat present. Some days it's more than the heart can take in and it shuts down. At least that's my experience. It's an overwhelming amount of information.

So how do we continue to find the wisdom and the courage to open, and the courage to be present? And if we respond, how do we not go to the response of fear, of aggression, of hatred, of self-righteous anger—if we even have enough wisdom to have the choice? How do we not fall into and wallow in the internal space of despair, or feeling, as the Dalai Lama said, that it's hopeless, there's no way I can open to this, so forget it? It's like all or nothing.

Somehow, I notice in talking to different people, and I have the same tendency myself—we either have to do it all, and we have to do it all right now, and if we're not doing it completely perfectly, we're hopeless failures. I don't know if that relates to anybody, but I've certainly picked up that little tinge once in a while in interviews. And so it's like this: I should be able to open to all the suffering in the world right now, and when my heart shuts down, it shows what a selfish, deluded person I am. Right? Those are our two alternate choices. Not really so helpful.

But to see that we really need both—the inner reflects the outer. We need both. And that's why we have this practice.

There's something I read from Martin Luther King one time, just a short line, where he said, "Nonviolence means we not only refuse to shoot a person, but we refuse to hate them." I love that, because to me it gives the sense—it's not superficial. It's already quite profound that we refuse to shoot a person, we refuse to hurt a person with our actions. That's already wonderful. I mean, if that could just go in the world, that would be fantastic. But on the depth of all of our actions, our heart and mind really transforming, purifying, so that we're like the Green Tara—the spontaneous response in a moment is wisdom and compassion.

For this, the purification, the practice, the looking at suffering has to really keep coming in on a deeper and deeper level, deeper into our own experience, so that the transformation is real. Not only do we refuse to shoot, we refuse to hate. And we have enough awareness, enough self-knowledge, enough mindfulness to actually notice a moment when we have a choice. No, I'm not going to go to hatred now. And we all know there are plenty of times we don't have that choice. But that's why we're practicing—to even see that choice is possible, to see that there's another way, and to learn to trust that.

So how does this happen? I wanted to read something from the Dalai Lama in terms of opening to so much suffering without falling into despair. I read one time—I don't have the exact quotation, I just remember it because it went in, so this is a complete paraphrase, not his words. But the person interviewing him was describing how, as I'm sure you know, he is the person who receives the histories, so many suffering histories of so many people. Any Tibetan refugee who manages, especially in the past, to escape from Tibet could get to the Dalai Lama and would tell their story. It's endless histories of loss and murder and losing one's family, nunneries and monasteries destroyed, imprisonment and torture. Endless. If I read just one or two, it's like, oh my God, how can you live after that? How can you take it in?

And he'll be there, totally present for each person who comes. No matter who it is, whoever he's talking to, he's so present. All of him is there, like you're the most important, only person in the world at that point. Total presence, which is really an act of love, isn't it? An act of compassion.

So he'll be there, hearing this history, really in it, often weeping, really completely empathetic, as long as it's there. Then, when that person leaves and the next thing happens, he's totally there in the next thing. He could be with another person and they're laughing and joking, or he's going to another teaching in a completely other space.

It's this sense of—not because he didn't care that such presence was possible, but precisely because he's so fully present, just in this moment, empathetic, crying, with no resistance. And so the next moment is just as total, and there's no residue.

So it's not "how can I open to all of it?" I can't. That's exactly it—"I" can't. The "I" is somehow the resistance, the limit. We do the best we can, but when there's no "I," experience is just passing through. So he's really there, really empathetic, completely compassionate—and with the next person equally so, even if that might be a joking, happy moment. Empty of separate self and yet totally connected and empathetic in the experience. This is the union of emptiness and compassion as it shows up in a person's activity.

Compassion is sometimes defined as the quivering of the heart. I like that because it actually feels like that, kind of—the quivering of the heart in connection with pain or suffering, our own or another's. The tender heart. When the Dalai Lama or Tibetans talk about it, they speak of bodhicitta, which is the most noble aspect of compassion—the noble or awakened heart. It's described as the great motivation to cultivate compassion and awakening this noble heart in our own heart and mind in order to bring all beings to awakening. That's a vast aspiration of compassion. But even just to talk about bodhicitta as the noble heart, the tender heart, this quivering of our heart in response to suffering, this kinship with beings.

So the Dalai Lama, saying that of course cultivation of this is possible, asks: how does it develop? He says—you can guess. Maybe you can guess. From deep insight into what suffering is. And how do we develop that insight? By focusing, being really present, he says, with our own experience of suffering. We don't have to have some giant, amazing experience. We all experience plenty of suffering—and happiness, as Winnie was reminding us last night. We got there in a circuitous way. But the suffering that we experience is exactly where we start to learn in a cellular way what compassion is, as we learn how to open into, to meet our own suffering, whatever form it takes, with this tenderness of heart.

This is the Dalai Lama. He says that compassion then begins to strengthen and becomes a sense of empathy, connectedness with other beings. And this is not like an intellectual thing where we should try to make this happen, because then it just becomes pushing some idea. So don't worry about it or push for it, but notice—because it really does happen that way.

Sometimes people think, "Well, my suffering isn't so much compared to..." and they'll name how much other people are suffering. There are always people going through far more horrendous things than we are, even though there are plenty of people here going through horrendous things. But that's a way of saying, "Well, mine is really nothing. I don't have the right to even worry about this, or even meet it as suffering, because it's so nothing." That's a pushing away. That's a denial. That's making it personal and sidestepping the whole issue. It doesn't matter what it is. Any kind of suffering that we open to with this tender heart, with this quality of mindful awareness—non-judging, totally present—can really move into this empathy, into this sense of connectedness. The expression of my particular suffering becomes the suffering of all beings.

Pema Chödrön quotes Stephen Levine, writing of a woman who was dying in terrible pain and feeling overwhelming bitterness. At the point at which she felt she could not bear the suffering and resentment any longer, she unexpectedly began to experience the pain of others—a starving mother in Ethiopia, a runaway teenager dying of an overdose in a dirty flat, a man crushed by a landslide and dying alone by the banks of a river. She said she understood that it was not her pain; it was the pain of all beings. It wasn't just her life; it was life itself.

And Pema Chödrön says, "We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence." In the words of the 16th Karmapa, "You take it all in. You let the pain of the world touch your heart, and it turns into compassion."

Again, this happens by itself. We don't have to be expert at it. But this is why—and I think Winnie said this last night—the difficult times in retreat are so important. They're so important. I've talked about this in terms of purification, but really, how we meet presently arising experience is the point of purification. What's arising in this moment? Someone said, "This shouldn't be happening." We always think this shouldn't be happening. But that doesn't make any sense, because it is happening. And if it is happening, it should be happening, because all the conditions have come together such that this moment is like this. It can't be any different.

But how the mind-heart of awareness meets this moment—that's the place where compassion and wisdom are cultivated. How we meet this presently arising moment, when we meet it with clear mindful awareness, is the arising of the compassionate intention, the wise intention, as Winnie talked about. Just to meet what's happening with kind awareness. It's certainly not our—in the world it may not be the main go-to modality. The Dalai Lama says someone asked him about what looks like a lack of compassion in human society.

And he said, well, maybe we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state, fueling it or reinforcing it. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger. And so, that's what we're practicing.

But have you noticed that sometimes when you're really in a difficult spot, all of a sudden metta or compassion arises, and it's like, whoa, where did that come from? Who was that? And that's lovely to notice. But do you notice how other times, when we're tired or it's happening again, the go-to thing is more a sense of aversion or judgment?

Here's a little story that exemplifies this. I was staying with a friend in an ashram in southern India, near Tiruvannamalai, but it wasn't Ramana Ashram. It was a smaller one. And in the middle of the night, like one or two in the morning, we started hearing these incredible whacks. I can't even do it—so loud. Whack, whack! Just like some really loud, hard thing hitting the floor. And this went on for the rest of the night.

We got up in the morning and were walking out, and we could see into another room, the main center room in the ashram. There was a little bed, one of those charpoy beds, and an old Swami was sitting on the bed. Really old, with a long beard, in his orange outfit. He was sitting on the edge of the bed with this long, thick rope that looked like he'd made himself out of tying all kinds of rags together. It must have taken him years to get that many rags. So this thick rope about this long, and he was just sitting there on his bed with all his strength, just flapping it on the floor. He'd been doing this for hours by this point. Whack! Whack! Whack!

So we asked, what is he doing? We couldn't ask him directly—he was too engrossed. "What is he doing?" They said, "Oh, he's keeping the demons away. He's keeping the hindrances away. He's getting rid of them."

Isn't that what we do? Whack! Whack! Whack! Get rid of this ill will! Get rid of this sleepiness! Get rid of this doubt! Whack! Whack! That's not really the most useful approach. It doesn't really work, and it's exhausting. It takes huge energy to be fighting with all our experience.

Pema Chödrön gives another lovely image. I like it a lot. She compares our heart, our tender heart and mind, to a sea anemone. Do you know what that is? It's a little creature that lives in the sea, and because it has a very soft center, it closes around itself to protect itself. She says, you know, we think, "I have enough suffering of my own, I can't let in other people's suffering," or "I can't even let in my own suffering," so we close around to protect ourselves.

And she says, we think we're protecting ourselves, but really when we close off to anything, we're also closing off to ourselves. Notice that—when we can't be with some aspect of our own suffering, do you notice we don't get to be with the beauty either? We're just disconnected until we figure out what's going on.

I love that image. Instead of judgment, it's like, "Oh, it's a sea anemone closing down around the soft center." But then we see that's actually what shuts us off. And we start to learn—and this is what we're learning through practice—that the place of strength and wisdom and courage, that which actually gives the understanding and the natural response of compassion, is the softness. It's the wisdom that actually lets us just be with that tender heart, whatever it is that's occurring.

We don't have to take on the whole world. Just starting with our own experience here. Whatever it is that's going on in your practice.

So that's why these periods are so important. The difficult times—not just to get through and think, "Okay, they're important and I'm through it, thank God, we're on to the next thing." You'll look back, I'm pretty sure—I can't say for everyone, but I know for me—times that I've had retreats that were really difficult, where you think, "Oh my God," and you come staggering out of it. None of you here will come staggering out. You'll all come out floating on clouds of bliss. But once in a while, I've come out kind of reeling, thinking, "Oh my God, that was so hard. What was that about?" But you find out later it was about so much. Those are the retreats where so much was learned, in my experience. The kind of learning that really makes the mind and heart stronger, more courageous. It lets go of a lot of confusion through being with the suffering, seeing how it's created, how the mindfulness and compassion being with it allows it to dissipate.

And then it comes up again. And we're like, "Oh no, I saw it once. That was enough." No, it wasn't. Ten million times will be enough. And again, and again, and again. And we think, "Oh my God." But instead of that, notice each moment. It's a deepening of the potential for this anemone to open. And for that moment of meeting it with just simple mindfulness, just simple acceptance—not in order for anything, not to make it go away, not to have a big "aha" moment, but just because this is the moment that life is presenting right now. There is no other moment of life than this one right now. And our choice is to shut down to it or to, as best we can, meet it with kind awareness and compassion. We don't always have that choice. But that's okay. Then we notice we're shut down. That's a new moment that we have an opportunity to meet again. But there's ever only this moment.

And so it's so important—we can't skip this part. It's like we want to cultivate compassion by really understanding it, but let's jump over this horrible part here in the middle where we have to keep on swimming back in this stuff. And it's not even like... sometimes it's really intense. Sometimes it's like, "This is such a stupid thing." Like when I talked about swallowing the other day. It seems like a stupid thing, but the amount of suffering could be huge. Don't denigrate it. Don't push it away. Really meet it.

Shabkar, who was a really amazing Tibetan yogi from the early 1800s—he wrote An Autobiography of Shabkar, it's a huge book, mostly in poetry—but he was a really amazing yogi. This is just one line of his. He says, "Meditating without compassion is simply to inflict hardship on yourself." I think that's worth remembering. I'll say it again: Meditating without compassion is simply to inflict hardship on yourself. And there's enough of that.

So we can't skip this part, because this is really where the depth of wisdom of emptiness meets the depth of compassion, and compassion moves from an intellectual idea—which is useful, that can guide us to do wholesome actions—but it moves from intellectual to really that cellular depth of wisdom, like the Green Tara. Because without that, I know there are times I want to do a compassionate thing, but if it's not really from myself, if I'm still caught up in me or in fear or protection or whatever, then if it comes to the crunch, when things get hard, sometimes compassion's not what comes out. We're back with the old swami hitting ourselves with a rope—or someone else, in the crunch. So it has to really be like a cellular understanding. Not just an idea.

And then compassion and wisdom of emptiness is not about not acting. Incredible response, incredible courageous response and proactive actions are possible when it's really moving from this depth of transformation of heart and mind—that even faced with violence and possible death, the coming from compassion and wisdom is still accessible.

Just an example, back to Martin Luther King: you not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate a person. A few months ago, I saw on TV a special on PBS—it was a commemoration from a period of the civil rights movement in the 60s. This was a period from the Freedom Rides in 1961.

For those of you who are American, and also probably a lot younger than I am, at that period in 1960 and 1961, a group of young college students—African-American college students from a divinity school in Nashville—had formed a group they called the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. They were really very active in the civil rights movement. They thought up and began, or maybe didn't begin it, but they're the ones who carried out what was called the Freedom Rides.

At that time, buses that went interstate were supposed to not be allowed to be segregated, but in certain states in the South, they enforced segregation anyway. They had separate waiting rooms at the bus stops and all. This was against the law, but the country wasn't enforcing the law. So these students came up with the idea of having these Freedom Rides—just having groups of their students, African-American students but also white people from all over, riding together on the normal buses, Greyhound and Trailways, getting off at the stops and just going into the waiting rooms together. That was it. That's all they were doing. And unbelievable violence came, especially in Alabama and Mississippi.

That's a whole long story, but the point I want to make is this: I saw an hour-long program going through it, and I'd read a lot about it, but it had some videos of some of the people and then interviews with some of the people involved. The video must have been made just a few years ago, because one of the people I know is dead now.

At one point, the video was interviewing a man named John Siegenthaler, who was a special assistant to Robert Kennedy, the attorney general. JFK was the president, and Robert Kennedy was the attorney general—the head legal person in the country. So it was really his responsibility to be enforcing the law, but also to be protecting these Freedom Riders because they were being subjected to horrific violence.

Kennedy sent John Siegenthaler down to Montgomery to talk to the governor of Alabama to get him to protect the people. The governor wouldn't even talk to him for a while. In one particular incident, Siegenthaler managed to bring it to an end. Those Freedom Riders were finished.

John Siegenthaler was talking now, remembering: "Good," he thought. "I really did something. I managed to get this particular incident done. I got the governor to agree to do something." He was feeling kind of proud of himself.

But then he hears from the young students in Nashville that they're sending more people. He's like, "What? What's the matter with them? I just managed to cool it out, and they're sending more people? This is crazy."

So he got on the phone, and who he was talking to was this amazing young woman named Diane Nash, who was part of this group. They were using her as the organizer. She wasn't doing the ride herself. She would stay in Nashville and talk to everybody on the phone. She's talking to Robert Kennedy, and she's organizing the whole thing. If you read anything about her, she just seems to be the most amazing person.

First I need to read from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee's statement of purpose, because this is the depth they're coming from. This was written by James Lawson, who was training them in nonviolence. He was a Christian minister, still alive, one of the main proponents of nonviolence.

He says: "The philosophical or religious ideal of nonviolence is the foundation of our purpose and the manner of our action. Nonviolence, as it grows from Judaic-Christian traditions, seeks a social order of justice permeated by love. Through nonviolence, courage displaces fear. Love transforms hate. Love is the central motif of nonviolence. Love is the force by which God binds man to himself and man to man."

This is very Christian language. "Such love goes to the extreme. It remains loving and forgiving even in the midst of hostility. By appealing to conscience and standing on the moral nature of human existence, nonviolence nurtures the atmosphere in which reconciliation and justice become actual possibilities."

So these kids—they're kids, nineteen, twenty, twenty-one years old—have been training in this depth of nonviolence based in love and forgiveness, in the face of violence. They've been training deeply in this, and it also meshes with their Christian faith. So it's not just an idea. They're going into incredibly violent scenarios.

They're sending more people on the bus. John Siegenthaler gets on the phone to Diane Nash, and he's thinking, "Well, here's this young girl. I just have to get her to understand reality."

He says, "I was trying to get her to call them off, and I was getting more and more frustrated." He said, "I said, 'Don't you get it?'"

Don't you understand? Somebody might even be killed."

And she said—she said, "You must understand. At night before leaving, we each made out our last will and testament. Yes, we know someone will be killed. But we cannot let the power of nonviolent protest be stopped by violence. So we must continue."

And he was—this is like fifty years later—he was in awe even then. He said, "I really, really learned from this young woman." And the last thing he said was that he had been talking to Robert Kennedy, and Robert Kennedy said to him, "I was just on the phone with Diane Nash. Who is Diane Nash?" She's like this amazing person.

So that's a huge depth, right? It's possible. I mean, that's one of the more inspiring examples I know in this country. But that's like on the cellular level—that's how we're working here, on that level. It doesn't mean that we always have to act. I just want to show you that compassionate action and wisdom is not about passivity at all. But compassion doesn't mean that action is necessary, because often action isn't possible.

In a way, I'd say for me the essence of compassion, where it begins, is with connection. That's really the wisdom of a mindfulness that just connects with our own experience. The simple power of bearing witness—bearing witness to our own experience—allows us to be courageous and able to bear witness with another.

James Baldwin wrote once, "An enemy is someone whose story you have not heard." And I often think that about ourselves. When we're feeling like we're our own enemies, fighting against our own experience, it's just a story we haven't heard. Can we just listen into our own experience? Listening is an act of love, an act of presence, of bearing witness.

Here's another simple example of how just the willingness to turn our attention openly to something can be the wellspring of compassion in a very simple way—and how disconnect is what doesn't allow compassion.

It's very simple, but I was listening to the radio once a couple of years ago. There's all these stories, and you kind of half-listen. There was a story about a man—they were interviewing a man who was a BBC war correspondent, so he was used to talking on the radio—who was talking about a disease called Huntington's disease, which is a deterioration of the nerves that is genetic. It goes from father to son, and it hits in middle age. His father had died of it, and his elder brother had died of it. It hits in middle age, and you only live a few years. All the nerves deteriorate, and you die. There's nothing they can really do.

So he was talking about this. His father and brother had both died of it. He so far hadn't come down with it, but he was just at the age when his brother got it. It's the kind of story where you could be listening and think, "Oh yeah, that's a shame." You mean it, but sort of—that's a shame, on to the next, oh that's too bad. I was doing that, but then somehow I just put down my breakfast and listened. No big deal, but I just turned my full attention to it and listened.

He was just talking about how—very matter-of-fact—and you just think, what must that be like? He said, "Every day when I'm walking to the store to get the newspaper"—he lived in London—"I'm thinking, is this going to be the day when my leg just starts to tremble a little bit? Is this going to be the day when I notice the first symptom?" Knowing pretty well what the trajectory would be, having seen it in his father and his brother.

All it took was just listening. It went in so deeply, in a way of just—oh. The compassion, the empathy of what must that be like. And then the big picture, of course—that's true for all of us. He just had a more specific thing he was wondering about. But in a way, that does apply to all of us. It's not some big deal, some big world-changing thing, but just that willingness to connect—that's how compassion arises.

And without the connection, that disconnect is where atrocities are possible. I just read this yesterday—it's a horrible quotation from Stalin, who said, "The death of one person is a tragedy. The death of a million people is a statistic." This is the man who had twenty million people sent to the gulags and killed. But I thought, you know, it's true. That's why sometimes it's so important to tell stories—to get a sense of one image, like that man with Huntington's disease—and then I can understand, oh, that's what it must be like for those people.

You might get really involved with people who have that particular disease. We kind of need an immediate connection to get a sense of it.

So, we're not going to be perfect. We're not perfect in wisdom. We're not perfect in compassion. But the willingness to keep noticing, the willingness to just keep on reconnecting, to keep on cultivating, to keep on purifying—it's never going to be perfect.

This world, in my experience, life is so complex. Things are really ambiguous. Even with the best of our intentions and compassion, situations are complex. We often don't know what's the most useful, helpful thing to do. Can we be with that, not be frozen, and still act? And if we do the thing that doesn't lead to the result we thought would happen, can we meet that with compassion and equanimity?

A not-so-simple example: if you've ever had to be a medical proxy for someone—which I've been for both my parents and my sister—it's extremely complex. You can sit down with a person and go through every possible idea you could think of, what could happen and what they want. Guaranteed, what really happens won't be on that list, because it'll be some different combination of things. And so one makes the best decision one can from compassion and from wisdom. You really don't know. Making a decision to do a procedure that could really heal for some years, and it turns out that it just prolongs agony for two weeks and they die. Or you make a decision not to do a procedure and the person dies, and you never know what would have happened otherwise.

That's how life is. We don't know what would happen the other way. Can we just meet that ambiguity with the most wisdom, the most compassion we have? We're not in control. We keep saying that, and we're really not in control. Recognizing that makes it more possible to keep working.

Sister Chan Khong, the nun who is sort of like the closest companion of Thich Nhat Hanh, wrote an autobiography some years ago. She talks about being very committed to social action, very committed to mindfulness and compassion. At one point, she and Thich Nhat Hanh had been denied reentry to Vietnam during the war because they wouldn't take sides, and so both sides didn't trust them and kicked them out. After the war, the Vietnamese government was arresting a lot of monks and nuns and artists. Sister Chan Khong was quite involved in a letter-writing campaign. Whenever she'd hear one was arrested, she'd write letters to the government.

But this is from her: "Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew I had to do walking meditation." Is that what you do when you feel angry? "I have to tell them what's wrong," no? She said, "I needed walking meditation. Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities had acted. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to listen, easier to cooperate."

I just love that. And this is from a woman who'd been a Buddhist nun and practicing really hard since she was sixteen. Just like, what's the reality of it? I'm angry. I choose not to act from anger, but I choose to act. So my job is to meet my own suffering here, this anger, with wisdom and compassion. And when the wise intention is available, then I can act with wisdom.

So we just dedicate our lives. It's the work of our whole lives. It's not about ever getting perfect. Something Ajahn Sumedho wrote years ago: the ordinary suffering of our lives—we don't need special suffering. The ordinary circumstances of our lives are enough to get enlightened with. The ordinary circumstances of life are all we need to teach us wisdom and compassion. It's everywhere we look. We don't have to go looking for anything special.

And I know for me, when sometimes my own particular story seems to be taking over my mind, I just keep on practicing with it. Even something as simple as being hungry—there's a way at some point you can be with it, and it can turn into empathy.

Wow, this is so nothing—and there are people who go to bed every night without food. You can turn that against yourself, or you can turn it into compassion and let it help you connect with what's going on in the world.

At other times, when I feel too overwhelmed in some particular story of my own, when the mindfulness isn't strong enough to be present with it, I turn the attention outward—to seeing, to hearing.

But also, the messages of wisdom and compassion are coming at us from everywhere. The Four Noble Truths are speaking to us constantly—in the animals, in nature, in the woods, in snakes dying on the roads, in little chipmunks storing their nuts.

When you hear a siren going by—whenever I hear a siren, I try to think: usually it's a fire or an ambulance, and somebody's life is really changing right now. I don't know how. I don't always remember to do it, but I just try to let that in. We are the world and the world is us.

We don't have to look for anything special. All we have is this moment, this moment—and it's enough. It's enough. It doesn't matter what's happening. How we meet it is the cultivation of wisdom and compassion.

I want to end with this line from Pema Chödrön, speaking about bodhicitta: "At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness or open space."

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 134

Poems from the First Buddhist Nuns

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson brings alive the voices of the first Buddhist nuns through their enlightenment poems preserved in the Therīgāthā. She begins with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's stepmother whose courage and determination (adhiṭṭhāna) led to the establishment of the bhikkhunī saṅgha, demonstrating that awakening is equally available regardless of gender, caste, or social status.

Wilson shares the profound stories of nuns from vastly different backgrounds: Paṭācārā, who went mad with grief after losing her entire family and became one of the most compassionate teachers; Candā, a destitute beggar who found freedom through the Dhamma; elderly women like Bahuputtikā, praised by the Buddha for her diligence despite physical weakness; and Puṇikā, a servant woman whose confident understanding of kamma allowed her to teach a Brahmin about true purification.

Through these poems, we encounter practitioners who struggled for years before awakening—like Sāmā, who practiced for 25 years without peace, and Mittākālī, who was controlled by anger and self-centeredness. Their voices remind us that the path was never easy for everyone, even in the Buddha's time. Wilson emphasizes that these are real people whose internal struggles mirror our own, making their eventual liberation both relatable and inspiring. The talk concludes with an invitation to become 'true daughters and sons of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace.'

So tonight, it's going to be a little bit story time. It's always kind of hard to find a balance for what to talk about on this night when half of you have one foot out the door and the other half of you are really deep in silent retreat.

What I want to talk about is something that makes me very happy to talk about. You know, we're always referring to the Buddha as the source of our teachings and practice, and as we always say, he's a real person. But sometimes, to me, you can almost start to get the feeling of myth. He's so perfect.

So what I want to talk about tonight is some of the nuns, some of the women who were nuns during the time of the Buddha. We know about various of the monks and nuns if you read the suttas. If you really go through them, you get a sense of them just being real, normal people—except the ones you hear about are all enlightened. You don't hear about the others. But the different personalities, different reasons in their life that they came to the Buddha's teaching and the practice, different courses of practice, some easy, some difficult—it gives me a sense of these as real people. And even though it was a long time ago and the external conditions are different, internally we haven't changed very much.

There's a lot, but I just want to talk about a few of the stories of some of the different nuns and read their poems, because there are some poems from nuns and some poems from monks that are in the suttas—their enlightenment poems. To me it gives a real life, a voice to these distant people. It's not just some people who gathered around the Buddha 2600 years ago, and we give lip service to it but really know for us it's hopeless because they were so much better and different. I just love sharing about them.

There were, of course, many women who joined the order of nuns, and they had all different ways of manifesting, just as we all do. Some were very strong women who became great leaders, became great teachers, either in the way they spoke the Dhamma or in sharing compassionately with other women who joined. Some were just very quiet, simple practitioners—you don't hear much about them except for their poems. Some were young, some were old, some were rich, some were poor—the whole gamut of different kinds of people. So I just want to share a little bit, some of the poems that I particularly like, and give a sense of the women.

To start, of course, one has to start with the woman who was responsible for convincing the Buddha to begin an order of nuns, because he didn't do so right away. I don't want to spend too much time with Mahapajapati Gotami, because her story is the most well known. But she was the stepmother—really the aunt—of the Buddha. His mother died when he was a week old, and her sister, Mahapajapati Gotami, was also married to the Buddha's father, King Suddhodana. I guess kings at that time, or leaders, whatever they were, had various wives and various courtesans, and they had a whole show going on. So anyway, she was the stepmother; she raised the Buddha, married to the king.

At some point in this period in India, the strata of society was extremely rigidly held in terms of caste system, and women's roles were really defined in relationship. Their social status was decided by their male relatives. They didn't really have much autonomy and freedom at all. It would be, you know, your father, then your husband, then your son.

Of course, Mahapajapati Gotami was quite devoted when the Buddha left the family and came back as the Buddha and was teaching. He was teaching to his family, and his son became a monk and got enlightened, and his father got enlightened, and Mahapajapati Gotami began to get enlightened. They were all quite devoted.

So at some point, her husband died—the king—and her son, well, the Buddha was her stepson, was already the Buddha, and his son became a monk, and then her son and her nephew also became monks. So she didn't really have any man. In one way she didn't have a social status; in another way she's like, "Wow, free! Free at last! I can try and do what I want." And there were a lot of other women in similar situations. She was really a leader.

There was a period when her side of the family and the Buddha's father's side of the family, the two clans, got into a dispute—really a war—over the water rights in a particular river. So even, you know, that's how it was then, that's how it is now. Quite some men got killed, but the Buddha came and gave a very inspiring discourse to the men who were fighting, which we don't have recorded, to stop the fighting, to stop the war—which he did. And they all got really inspired. As the texts say, they all went off and became monks.

So that left a whole other bunch of wives and mothers and daughters, like, "Okay, well now what?" So they were all quite inspired too. But at this point, there wasn't a bhikkhuni sangha, a nun's sangha. So Mahapajapati Gotami got really inspired and went to the Buddha and requested that it would really be good, lord, to ordain a women's sangha. And again, I don't want to go into the whole thing because it's a whole discussion, but for whatever reason, he was very reluctant to do so. He said no, he really didn't think so. And I think it was societal.

So at that point, he wouldn't do it. But she—and this is where her courage shows, but also her faith, because she was filled with faith. She wasn't being arrogant and demanding. But it's the dedication, really—the parami of adhitthana, of resolution—which is a very powerful sense of knowing wholesomely what one must do and then having the courage and the energy to do it. That can be as simple in your practice as when you're getting lost in a particular train of thought for the seven million and thirty-fifth time, and you see it, and the mind goes, "No, I don't need to go there."

It's not aversion. It's a collecting of energy, really clearly, around what is wholesome—just "no, I don't need to do this," or "yes, I need to do this." It's a really powerful quality in the mind.

So she possessed this quality, this resolution, but it was really based in her devotion, in her faith—not only in the Buddha, but in the teachings, in awakening. She basically, as we say, wouldn't take no for an answer.

The Buddha went off, as he did, two hundred miles away. He was always traveling. So she gathered a group of women who followed her, because she was a great leader, and they shaved their heads, put on orange robes, and walked barefoot the two hundred miles to where the Buddha was. She arrived outside where he was teaching and just stood there quietly, but crying.

And this is where you get a sense of the people around the Buddha. Ananda, who was the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life—also a cousin—took total care of the Buddha with great love. He was also the person through whom many people would have to go to get access to the Buddha. One thing I love reading about Ananda, comparing it to different guru scenes I've been around where there's a big teacher—as they get more well-known, there's always a little inner circle of people protecting them. Their job is to control access: who gets in, who doesn't get in.

Ananda saw his job as getting people in to hear the Dhamma. You never hear him saying, "Oh no, you can't come, he's too busy now." It's always, "Get them in, come hear the Dhamma." He was a very beloved person. And being the Buddha's cousin, he would also be related to Mahapajapati Gotami.

So he saw her out there crying, and this is where he really interceded. He came and said, "Blessed One, are women able, Lord, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of stream entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arahantship?" You know all those from Bhante's talk the other night, right? The test.

And the Buddha said, "Yes, Ananda, of course."

Then Ananda said, "Well then, since women are able to realize perfection, and since Pajapati was of great service to you—she was your aunt, your nurse, your foster mother; she even suckled you at her own breast—it would be good if women could be allowed to enter into homelessness."

And so, basically... okay, you put it that way. Very good. I'm rephrasing it, but I imagine it was more or less like that.

But the thing is, once he agreed—that's the point. He was absolutely clear, and this was a radical aspect of the Buddha altogether: in terms of wisdom and compassion and potential for understanding and awakening, there is no difference in terms of sex or gender. There is no difference in terms of what caste or level of society one belonged to. There was no difference if you were rich or poor, if you were the Brahmin caste who controlled spirituality at that time, or you were the lowest—not even a caste—the so-called outcastes, called Dalits now, that people wouldn't want anything to do with. He said: no difference.

And so once he established the Sangha of nuns, it was in the same way open to anyone—any woman who was sincere, coming from any background, sincere in wanting to practice, sincere in faith. And once he embraced it, the Sangha of nuns grew quite rapidly.

Mahapajapati was a great leader because she was the one who had the courage and energy to begin it, and many women came with her. So I'll just read a little bit of her poem:

Homage to you, Buddha, best of all beings, who set me and many others free from pain. All pain is understood. The cause, the craving, is dried up. The Noble Eightfold Way unfolds. I have reached the state where everything stops. I have been mother, son, father, brother, grandmother—knowing nothing of the truth, I journeyed on. But I have seen the Blessed One. This is my last body, and I will not go from birth to birth again. Look at the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort. This is true homage to the Buddhas.

I like that last line, because that's you. All the disciples together, your energy, your sincere effort—this is the best homage we can give to all the Buddhas.

So Gotami really manifested enormous energy, courage, dedication, and resolution. Because of her, many, many women had the opportunity to join the Sangha. And they were from all classes and all life situations. There were some who were like queens or consorts to kings.

She was from a well-to-do banker's family in Savatthi, and as was always the case, her parents arranged a marriage for her with someone from a similar background, a similar caste. But she had fallen in love with a servant, which there was no way that would ever have been sanctioned, and so they ran away together. They had to run far away so that her family couldn't come find her. And her husband had even more reason to want to run far away because they probably would have killed him if they'd found them.

So they ran away and were living in another city, another little town. When she got pregnant, she wanted to go back to her family, and the husband understandably procrastinated. So they didn't make it with the first child. When she got pregnant the second time, she really begged, and even though he procrastinated, they finally started off. She was quite pregnant when they finally started off to go back to her family, but they had waited too long.

On the way, on the trip, she started going into labor. And of course, this is like one of these stories—of course, then at the same time, she's out in some field somewhere going into labor and a horrendous, horrific kind of cyclone storm starts. So her husband goes off to some distance where there are reeds and things to try and cut some reeds to make her some kind of shelter. He's out of sight of her, and she's with the other little two-year-old and having a baby. He gets bitten by a poison snake and dies.

She of course doesn't know what happened. She's just lying out in the field in this storm. She has the baby, and then the next day—what to do? He didn't come back. So she starts with both children, comes across his body, is devastated, but keeps going.

She gets to a little river near her parents' village where normally you could just walk across it, but the storm had been so humongous that it was a huge torrent. There was no way she could walk across with her little toddler and her baby. So the best she could do was to leave the toddler—toddler means like a two-year-old little child—and with the newborn baby, walk across the river, put it down, go back. Yeah, you see trouble coming, right? Go back and get the other one.

So while the baby's on the one side and she's in the middle of the river with the other child, a giant bird of prey comes and takes the baby. She gets all upset, and the other child gets swept away.

She manages to get out. She's completely—not completely, but close to crazy. She gets to her village, asks the first person she sees, "Where are my parents?" And the man says, "Ask me anything, but don't ask me that." She says, "What do you mean?" He says, "Well, that huge storm, it stove in their house, they were killed. That smoke you see is from their funeral pyre."

So this was in the space of 24 hours. She just went completely mad, completely out of her mind. And so for some years she was just wandering around, utterly out of her mind, wearing ragged clothing, and whenever she'd get near town, people would throw things to make her go away. The better side of human nature.

And at one point, after some years, as she was mad and wandering around, she came to the Jeta Grove where the Buddha was teaching. And again, people on the outskirts tried to drive her off—"Get out of here, you're crazy, go away." But of course the Buddha saw her and beckoned her to come over and just looked at her and said, "Sister, recover your presence of mind." And she did. That's why he was the Buddha. He could do things like that.

So she did, and someone gave her a cloak, and then she sat down and said, "Help me," and told him her story. And he said—and this I love because it's like the power of really speaking the truth, the compassionate truth, but the straight truth. You know, I can see in myself how the tendency might be to think compassion means saying, "Wow, that is unbelievably tough. No wonder you're crazy. I would be too." And that's compassionate. But the Buddha offered real compassion. He said, "Don't think that you have come to someone who can help you with that. In your many lives you have shed more tears for the dead than the water in the four oceans." He's saying this with compassion, but this is how it is. "I can't change this for you." And he kept on going. He said, "Yet when we ourselves die, no one can help us. No kin, no teacher. When we die, no one can be there for us or help us. Even in this world, our family cannot end our suffering."

You can get that. He's not saying it in a harsh way. He's saying, this is the truth of things. And she could hear it. It brought her back to her senses and it really went in. And then he told her about the Eightfold Path and the path of his teachings. And at that point, she asked for the going forth, which is to take the three refuges. And he took her to the community of nuns and she became a nun.

I love that because of the power of compassionately speaking the truth. But you can also get a sense—at least I do—that one can't speak like that unless one really knows it. If it's intellectual and I'm saying, "Yeah, well, no one can help," it just doesn't have the depth unless you're speaking from absolute depth, from knowing that. And from that, there's really this depth of compassion. He's saying it because it's the most helpful thing he could say.

So she became a nun and practiced for quite some time before she awoke. And her poem is one that I like very much because it describes the moment, the moment of her awakening. And you'll notice that it is something you hear sometimes—we're always trying to kind of give a sense of it—she's moving from a period of really concentrated, focused practice, and then she just kind of relaxes, and she's in an everyday activity, and in that moment, her mind wakes up. So that's in the poem. Let me just read it:

I've done everything right and followed the rule of my teacher.
I am not lazy or proud.
Why have not I found peace?

Can you relate? See, that's what I mean. It's not different.

Bathing my feet, I watched the bath water spill down the slope.
I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse.
Then I took a lamp and went into my cell, checked the bed and sat down on it.
I took a needle and pushed the wick of the lamp down.
When the lamp went out, my mind was freed.

Just that moment. You get a sense of it?

From really strong concentration and focus to just relax, but with care and presence. As my lamp went out, my mind was freed.

So you can understand how she would be a source of great wisdom and compassionate support to other women who came into the Bhikkhuni Sangha. And so she is the one whose name is mentioned the most.

I'll just read you one other poem, from a woman named Chanda. Again, another horrible suffering. This woman Chanda—her husband, her parents, and her children all died in a plague. You know, this was a tough time. There were wars, and plagues, much like now. And when a woman had lost all her family, there wasn't social security or really any kind of safety net. So she basically became a beggar, just had to go from house to house begging for food because there was no family at all to support her.

This is her poem, Chanda:

I was in a bad way, a widow, no children, no friends, no relations to give me food and clothes. I was a beggar with a bowl and stick and wandered house to house in the heat and cold for seven years. But I met a nun who had food and drink, and I went up to her and said, take me into the homeless life. She was Patachara. Out of compassion, she guided me in leaving home, encouraged me, and urged me to the highest goal. I took her advice. It wasn't wasted. There are no obsessions in my mind.

I love that the first thing Patachara did was give this starving woman food and drink. You know, that sense of compassion. And then, when she said that she wanted to enter the homeless life, took her in and taught her the Dhamma. But the first thing she did was give her what she needed—food and drink.

"There are no obsessions in my mind." Isn't that nice? Wouldn't that be nice? It would be nice. We all have moments of it. Remember that, keep noticing that.

There are so many directions I could go from here. I think I'll talk about older women first. Quite a few nuns joined when they were older. Some of them had husbands who wouldn't want them to become nuns, but after their husbands died, they were able to join the order.

Sometimes people say in interviews—women and men, of course—they say, "You know, I started practicing, and I'm so old," however old you started, "and look at these people who are starting young. It's so inspiring. And I'm starting old—is it too late for me? I don't have enough time. I'll never make it."

So just to see that this was true then as well—I'll talk about a couple of these women.

One, her name was Bahupitika. She became a widow. She was fairly well off and had —there are two different versions—in one she had ten children, and in the other she had fourteen children. And her husband died before she did, so she had to be strong.

When her husband died, and she had quite some money, she said, "Why don't I just divide the money rather than holding on to it? I'll divide it between all my children"—let's stick with ten children—"and their spouses, and then they'll take turns taking care of me," which was the appropriate thing in the culture, that the children did take care of their elders.

So she did that, and she would spend a little time in one son's house and then go to the next daughter and husband's house, and like that. But after a while, she noticed they were starting to resent her. She'd be there and they'd start muttering, "Well, you'd think she didn't have any other houses to go to. Why does she have to stay with us for so long?"

After a while she thought, "Who needs this? I'm going to go ordain." So she went and ordained with the Sangha. But she was quite old by this time, elderly and rather weak.

What's interesting about her—just to let you know the end now—the nuns were often described as the nun or the monk who was most known for teaching, most known for wisdom, or whatever quality. Bahupitika was the one most recognized by the Buddha for her diligence, for her perseverance.

She was quite weak, and as a really junior nun, even though she was elderly, she would wait on and take care of the other nuns. But all she could really do was bring them water. And she thought, "I entered the order in my old age, so I want to be really diligent." So she would practice all night, stay up all night practicing and doing walking meditation.

But because she was quite old and weak, she was a little shaky and also tired, so she would do walking meditation all night with one hand going along the wall or holding onto the trees, simply because she felt too weak to walk unaided. But she would just keep on practicing all night.

At one point the Buddha heard about this, and he appeared to her and simply beamed her with radiance and appreciation. She became—I don't know if it was at that exact moment—but she became an arhat. And the Buddha declared, "This is the bhikkhuni, the nun, most known for her diligence, for her energy."

So you never know. It's never too late.

A little side story, and this might be apocryphal: they said that before she was awakened, her job was bringing water to the nuns. And if you read all the suttas, you'll see that with the groups of nuns and the groups of monks, it's like groups of people anywhere—all different personalities, more or less nice, more or less able to get along with each other. Really, there's lots of friction. You read how many of the Vinaya rules came about because of stuff like that: "So-and-so's doing such and such," and "Oh really, is he? Okay, we need a rule."

So in this case, apparently, as she was waiting on the nuns, some of them weren't treating her very nicely. I don't know exactly what they were doing—making fun of her, little put-down remarks, "you're too old" or something. But technically, in terms of unskillful speech and behavior, it's really not good karma to say or do unwholesome things to anybody, but particularly to an arhat. You don't want to insult an arhat with aversion. It's not good.

And so when she awoke—you wouldn't know, and you also don't go around talking about your own attainments, particularly as monks and nuns. You just don't do that. It's not appropriate. So she's not going to show up and announce, "I'm an arhat, you better be nice to me now." But at the same time, out of compassion, she didn't want the nuns to say something that would cause their own suffering later. So she's trying to figure out, what can I do?

Apparently—and again, this is why I say it's apocryphal—she had developed some psychic powers. So when she was bringing them the water, she used her energy to heat it up psychically. When they saw that she could do that and was bringing them hot water, that was her way of telling them, you know, out of kindness. And then they really realized.

It's kind of interesting, all these back roads.

So she was the one most appreciated by the Buddha for her perseverance, for her energy. Her poem I don't like so much, but there's another older woman, similar to her, named Dhamma. I'm going to use her poem instead. I don't like all the poems—you're getting this through me. You can read the book and read the other poems if you want. There's lots of them. I have to choose.

My teaching point is with Dhamma, who's another similar older woman. Again, she waited until her husband's death and then ordained. Her poem describes her moment of waking up, which occurred because she was out walking with a cane and was so weak that she fell over.

This is her poem:

I wandered for alms.
I leaned on a stick.
My whole body was weak and trembled.
Suddenly I fell down and could see clearly the misery of this body.
My heart was freed.

I love that.

So whether it's seeing the misery of the body getting old, the misery of our body being sick—you don't have to wait until you get old. You get sick. Just seeing, instead of resisting... We get sick. It's a chance for awakening. Is that how you felt when you got a cold last week? I'm saying it lightly, but I mean it.

This is a chance to awaken. How do we choose to look at what's happening? This is the misery of the body. Seeing this, my heart was freed. That willingness to meet what's happening—of course, just with non-judging attention—and then it moves into the wider space. Oh, this is how it is. Every body gets sick. Every body—I mean body as body—dies. Every body gets old. Seeing that, we can go the way of self-pity, and sometimes we do, that's okay, until we really learn: oh, this is how it is. The heart can be freed. Same for them, same for us.

Okay, I'll tell one that isn't so much about suffering. There are some that aren't so much about suffering.

This is a woman named Punika, and I like her because she's very confident and gutsy. Her role in society was as a lower-class servant—almost like an indentured servant, I would say, nearly a slave, where she didn't have the freedom to come or go. It's not like she was working for wages. She was working for a rich family, a family that was very dedicated to the Buddha.

What's interesting, as you read about Punika and some others too, is that these servant women, or almost slave women, actually had more freedom to come and go than the really high-caste, well-to-do women. The wealthy women were kind of sequestered; they couldn't just go out and hear the Buddha speak, whereas the servant women could. So there are different stories where the servant women would go out, hear the Buddha talk, and come back and report it to the women for whom they worked. They were sharing the teachings in that way.

Punika's job was to go and get water in the morning from the river, which was very cold, hard work. She had been going out and hearing the Buddha teach quite a bit, and she was a stream-enterer at this point—the first stage of awakening—from listening to the Buddha teach. As Bhante was talking about, one of the fetters that dissipates at stream-entry is doubt. So at this point, her faith, her confidence in the truth of the Dhamma and in the power of the Dhamma to free the heart and mind, was very clear and strong. To me, she's an example of the courage and confidence of speaking the truth of Dhamma to power.

The story and her poem unfold like this: She was down at the river in the early morning to get water for her mistress. At that time, it was one of the beliefs of the Brahmins that in certain rivers you could wash yourself and they would function as holy rivers—this wasn't the Ganges, but similar. You wash yourself and it washes away all the evil deeds you've done, all the bad karmic results.

She was down there and a Brahmin comes down to do this. And you'll hear how spunky she was. She says:

I'm a water carrier. Even in the cold, I have always gone down to the water, frightened of punishment or the angry words of high-class women. But what are you afraid of, Brahman, that makes you go down to the water? Your limbs are shaking with the bitter cold.

The Brahmin, whose name was Udaka Suddhika, replies: But you know why, Punika. I am doing good to prevent evil. Anyone, young or old, who has done something bad is freed by washing in water.

Punika says: Whoever told you you are freed from evil by washing? The blind leading the blind! In that case, all frogs and turtles would go to heaven, and water snakes and crocodiles. Thieves, executioners, and other wrongdoers would be freed from their bad karma by washing in water. If these streams carried away all your old evil, they would carry away your virtue too. You would be separated from both. Rather, don't do that thing, the fear of which leads you down to the water. Stop now, Brahman, and save your skin from the cold.

She's pretty spunky, right? And he listens to her, because she has so much faith and confidence—she knows what she's speaking of. He says: Lady, you've brought me back. I will give you the robe I bathed in.

She says: Keep your robe. I don't want it.

I love Punika. She continues: If you are afraid of pain, if you don't like it, then do nothing evil, either openly or in secret. For if you do, even if you get up and run away, you won't escape its pain. If you are afraid of pain, if you don't like it, take refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha.

Train in the precepts. That is good.

So of course he listened and took refuge. But I just love that exchange. She went and spoke with the Buddha, who then spoke to her master, who freed her so that she could become a nun—which is why we have her poem.

You can hear her personality in those verses. Someone else could have that same confidence, that same faith, and not be quite so spunky about it. But it's really coming from speaking truth to power, from knowing the truth. That confidence. You see, when we have some knowing of the truth, however our personalities are, we're going to express it in a way that somehow is shared in the world. We share our wisdom, we share our light when we have confidence in it, when we have faith.

That's why we're always encouraging you to trust your insights, to trust your practice. It's not just for you—it's for everyone that you come in contact with.

I'll tell you one more story that isn't about suffering. The woman who was known by the Buddha as the foremost in preaching, the foremost in expounding the Dhamma, was named Dhammadina. She was the wife of an important man named Visakha in the town of Rajagaha, and had a very happy marriage. Very settled, upper class, well-to-do. And he went out—again, the women stayed home while the men could go out, the servants could go out. So he went out one day and heard the Buddha teach. He became quite inspired.

When he came home, usually they would be friendly—he would eat and invite her to eat with him, he'd greet her. But this time he came home and just walked right past her without speaking. She thought, "I wonder what's wrong? Well, when we eat, he'll invite me to eat with him. We'll talk about it." But he didn't. He just ate and ignored her.

So she thought—and I love this, it's so like what we do—"What did I do? What's wrong? Why is he angry at me? What could it be?" Taking it all personally, trying to figure it out.

But of course he wasn't angry. He called her and said, "You know, after hearing the Buddha, I'm so inspired. I've been thinking about it, and I want to renounce the world and become a bhikkhu. So if I do that, I'll give you all my wealth, all my money. I want to take care of you. What do you want to do? You could keep my money and stay here in Rajagaha, or you could go back and live with your parents. I'll support whatever you want."

She thought about it and said, "You know, I want to renounce also. I also want to become a bhikkhuni."

He said, "Great!" and sent her off in grand style, on a golden palanquin carried by attendants. She went to meet the Buddha, became a nun, traveled to a distant village, practiced, and became awakened.

After some time—we don't know how long—she happened in her travels to return to Rajagaha. And lo and behold, her husband Visakha had not managed to go off and become ordained. He was still living there. But he was still very inspired by the Buddha. So he approached her—not as his former wife, but as an awakened being, as an awakened nun—and very sincerely asked her a whole series of subtle and profound questions.

I won't go through it all because it's quite long. It's an entire sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, and it's the only sutta, really, that is a series of questions where a woman, a nun, gives all the answers.

At the end of this whole series of questions, these subtle, profound ones, she finally said, "Okay, that's enough. Go to the Buddha and really get the full teaching from him if you have more questions."

So her ex-husband went and told the Buddha the whole exchange. And the Buddha said, "Just as she answered—that's exactly what I would have said. Just as she said, so you should remember it."

And so her words became what they call Buddha-vachana—the word of the Buddha. It became, in the Majjhima Nikaya, an entire sutta that is Dhammadina's answers to her husband. She had an easier route to awakening. And her poem is actually in the Dhammapada. As the foremost in expounding the Dhamma, she was truly recognized in awakening and in teaching as equal with men.

And in those days, for a man to go to a woman to learn Dhamma was extremely unusual. And to have the Buddha say, "Same, same—I would have said the same," extremely unusual.

Here is a little poem from Dhammadina:

Eager for the end of suffering, full of awareness—that's the way. When one's heart is not attached to pleasure, we say that woman has entered the stream.

Just simple. Eager for the end of suffering, full of awareness—that's the way. So Dhammadina, of course, became one of the great teachers among the nuns.

Now, a couple of poems that I particularly love. These are from women who, after they became nuns, really had a tough time—the opposite of those stories where the Buddha gave a talk and five hundred people became arahants. These are women who really had to struggle. And I find it inspiring to know this. We think, "Well, in these days where the Dhamma is kind of going downhill and we don't have the Buddha to teach us and we struggle—but back then it wasn't like that." But for plenty of people, it was a long life's journey, even with deep commitment, even after having joined the order.

The first is a woman named Sama. She joined when her best friend, who was a queen, was killed. Both were deep followers of the Buddha. So Sama became a nun, but she was suffering for a very long time. This is her poem:

It was twenty-five years since I turned away from home, and I hadn't had a moment's peace. I had no peace because I did not know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Buddha. Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died.

"I had no peace because I didn't know my own mind. Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert."

I don't know how it is for you, but I really feel a real person there. Twenty-five years without a moment's peace—and you thought six weeks was a long time! But you hear the commitment, the dedication it takes. And of course, if she came to me, I'd say the same thing I'd say to you: I don't believe for a minute that for twenty-five years you didn't have a moment's peace. For sure there were some moments. But it feels like that. It feels like that. And you hear—it's tough. It takes deep, deep commitment and perseverance for everyone.

Another similar poem, from a different woman. Her name was Mita Kali. Before she became a nun, she heard the Buddha preaching the Maha Satipatthana Sutta—that's the long discourse on the four foundations of awakening, of enlightenment. Just to say—can you imagine getting to hear the Buddha teach the four foundations of mindfulness? Wouldn't that be something? I mean, amazing.

So she heard it, and she became a nun. And the reputation was that she was actually a very difficult person—very angry, very self-centered. This is how it's reported. And she changed gradually. Not overnight. She was quite angry and self-centered and struggled a lot.

This is her poem:

Although I left home for no home and wandered full of faith, I was still greedy for possessions and praise. I lost my way. My passions used me, and I forgot the real point of my wandering life. Then as I sat in my little cell, there was only terror. I thought, this is the wrong way. A fever of longing controls me. Life is short. Age and sickness gnaw away. I have no time for carelessness before this body breaks. And as I watched the elements of mind and body rise and fall away, I saw them as they really are.

I stood up. My mind was completely free. The Buddha's teaching has been done."

You see, we lose our way. Our passions use us. We forget the point of our wandering life. But the remembrance is just as close as the forgetting, however long it's been. Same for her, same for us.

I'll give you two more short poems. One I find humorous, and one I simply like.

The humorous one is from a woman known only as Sumanagala's mother. Not much is known about her story, except that she was clearly a wife and mother, and from her poem, she was evidently extremely happy to no longer be living the domestic life. We don't know what happened to her husband or son, but this is her poem:

"Free, I am free. How glad I am to be free from my pestle"—the pestle being the thing that grinds grain. "My cooking pot seems worthless to me, and I can't even bear to look at his sun umbrella. My husband disgusts me. So I destroy greed and hate with a sizzle, and I am the same woman who goes to the foot of a tree and says to herself, 'Ah, happiness,' and meditates with happiness."

Nothing personal. It's simply that the renunciate life has an element of deep happiness also. It's not all struggle and suffering. Just the peace of happiness.

This last poem is from a woman named Uttama. Again, not much is known about her, but she came from a Brahmin family. She is simply describing her moment of awakening:

"The Buddha taught seven factors of enlightenment. They are ways to find peace, and I have developed them all. I have found what is vast and empty, the unborn. It is what I've longed for. I am a true daughter of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace. I have ended the hunger of gods and humans, and I will not wander from birth to birth. I have no thought of becoming."

So let us all be true daughters and sons of the Buddha.

Thank you for listening to the Dhamma.

CHAPTER 135

Right View at the Beginning: Why am I Practicing?

Carol Wilson · 49 min

In this foundational talk from a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the essential question that shapes our entire meditation practice: why are we doing this? Drawing on Sayadaw U Tejaniya's definition of meditation as "experiencing mind and body directly with right understanding," she examines how our motivation and view determine whether practice becomes transformative or simply another activity in saṃsāra.

Wilson explores the Buddha's teaching on three levels of paññā (wisdom): heard wisdom, intellectual understanding, and the direct intuitive insight (bhāvanā-mayā paññā) that actually transforms how we live. She explains why understanding impermanence intellectually doesn't stop us from clinging, and how the phrase "yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-dassana" (knowledge and vision of things as they are) points to what meditation actually cultivates. The talk includes a poignant critique of how wrong view can lead sincere practitioners to years of dissatisfied effort.

The practical heart of the teaching lies in shifting attention from the content of experience to the process of awareness itself. Using examples from daily life and her own practice—including a memorable story about chocolate chip cookies—Wilson demonstrates how recognizing "wanting feels like this" or "aversion feels like this" creates a refuge in awareness rather than reactivity. She draws inspiration from Mingyur Rinpoche's recent letter about wandering practice to illustrate how this understanding brings peace not by changing circumstances, but by freeing the heart from habitual patterns of grasping and aversion.

One of the most expansive yet simple definitions of meditation that I've heard recently comes from Sayadaw Tejaniya. He describes meditation as experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. Very simple. All-inclusive. And the key point I really want to talk about tonight is this: experiencing the mind and body directly with the right understanding.

In a very important way, you could say that the beginning, the most important aspect—not just as we begin our retreat but as we continue whatever phase we're in, in our life of awakening, our life of awareness—is that we bring to our meditation, to the whole day, the understanding that we begin with right view, with right understanding. This is the first step on the Noble Eightfold Path.

You might say, "Right, if I had right view and right understanding, I wouldn't need to be following the Noble Eightfold Path and sitting here meditating." But as with everything, there are degrees.

In a simple but comprehensive and profound way, to talk about right understanding in terms of beginning a retreat, in terms of where we are in our practice, is to have some understanding of why you're doing this. Really deeply, why mindfulness? Why an intensive meditation retreat? But even that's too narrow. Why do we need to experience the mind and body directly, with or without right understanding? What's the point?

This is a question that doesn't have one philosophic answer, something we can read and study and say, "Okay, I know this is why," because that doesn't cut it.

The simple answer is that the right view, the reason for our practice and meditation, is the cultivation of wisdom. Wisdom—a buzzword that could mean many things. As I mean it here, the wisdom that the Buddha is pointing us towards, the wisdom that develops through our wholehearted commitment to moment-to-moment awareness, to whatever's happening right now. The commitment is to the awareness, not to what's happening. And that's the biggest shift.

The wisdom isn't about coming to a particular insight. "Oh, now I've got an anattā insight. I can chalk it up, write it in my books, and when I leave, I'll be a better person." That might all happen, and that would be cool—nothing wrong with that. But the way we know to do things is to do something for a result. A very wholesome result. Yet with that in mind, it can often be the case that we become so focused on trying to be mindful correctly, being more mindful, being mindful of every moment, that it becomes an activity I am doing to achieve a specific result. If you get a sense of this, you'll see it's just another activity in saṃsāra. "Now I'm doing mindfulness. And if I do it right, I'll get whatever my particular story is." But we'll get something, because we wouldn't do anything if we weren't going to get something for it, right?

This isn't the wisdom of the Buddha. But this is all we know. If we said nothing good is going to happen, everything is going to keep on going just like it is, the world is going to keep on spinning, you'll be happy, you'll be sad, you'll suffer, you won't, everything will change, you're really not going to get any better than you are right now—and you've got to really put out effort to be present for every moment—would you come? Probably not. At least not in the beginning.

The wisdom that arises through this willingness to relax into mindful presence with whatever's happening, without resistance to this particular moment, without fixation or holding on—"Now I've got it, let's hold on to it"—without getting lost in the story of what this particular experience means about me, whatever it is. It's just this.

The wisdom that arises from that is different from what we might expect. It's simply the potential, the possibility of recognizing reality just as it is.

You might think, "Big whoop. That's what I signed up for?" Well, you know what? That is a big whoop. Because in terms of how the Buddha describes what's going on in our mind, how we suffer, why we suffer—and we'll talk about that the whole month—it's not because what's happening is bad.

It's not because we're messed up. It's more like, why are we messed up? Because we don't recognize what's really going on. And so we keep bringing these misconceptions to our meditation practice and turn it into another endeavor to try to make ourselves different and better. And when that doesn't really meet our expectations, we're lost. What do we do now?

But the wisdom of the Buddha is so radical because it completely undercuts this view. This is what you call wrong view. And the right view—simply the right view of just starting our practice—is the willingness and the trust that through moment-to-moment mindful awareness, we can recognize when the heart and mind is fully present without being distorted by greed, wanting something to be different, aversion, hatred, or fear.

These states can be there, they can be recognized, and they're simply another arising experience. But when we don't recognize greed, fear, and "me, me, me," then it completely distorts our perception. We recognize inaccurately. We respond to the situation to the best of our ability, but since we're recognizing it wrongly, our response—which is usually trying to make ourselves happy—just doesn't work. And we don't know why.

You've all practiced a lot. You know what I'm talking about, I hope. You have some sense of what I'm speaking of.

What the Buddha's pointing us to is so radical. He's not saying you have to change everything. It's: stop trying to change everything and really, really, a hundred percent land here in this moment and just let it be as it is with full commitment and presence. And the moment-to-moment clarity, purity of heart and mind that's present is the condition—and we call that mindfulness—it's the condition that allows for accurate recognition. That clear recognition of things as they are cuts through our confusion, our distorted responses, and the way we act in life that keeps our suffering going.

There's a phrase in the Pali, yathā bhūta ñāna dassana, which means "knowledge and vision of things as they are." It's one of the highest understandings.

So why we practice with a wise view to begin with is just to have the sense that it's not ultimately about somehow changing myself or being a better person. I mean, that's all great, that stuff happens. But it's not about that. It's not to get something. It's to have this willingness, this trust—just this trust to be so present and awake with things as they are—that the clear seeing changes our whole understanding of ourselves, of one another, of life, of what we really are.

It's radical. It completely cuts through. And we can hear it.

The Buddha talks about three levels of paññā, of wisdom. I find this very helpful because they're all aspects of wisdom, but only the third level is truly transformative of how we live in the world.

The first level of wisdom is what you would call heard or borrowed wisdom. It's when we hear things. I'm sitting here talking to you, and if this is something you've never heard, you're hearing it. Whether it's wisdom or not, that's another story. But it's when we hear things or read things, learn about things, and we go, "Hmm, okay," and it's going in. That's often the kind of wisdom I learned in school. I could memorize it, I could say it back, I could say I know it. But it doesn't change us. It doesn't change how we live in this world or understand the world.

The second, intermediate level is our intellectual understanding. We contemplate this heard wisdom—what we've read, what we've learned. We take it to heart, we think about it. Yeah, that makes sense.

So talking about impermanence, for example, as we often do, as you're all very familiar—it's one of the deep insights where we can all say, "Yeah, I've heard about impermanence. It totally makes sense. I don't argue about impermanence." Probably no one here is going to really argue that impermanence doesn't seem to be true, right? It's not rocket science.

And yet—and yet—does anybody here ever find their mind and heart still clinging to something you know is going to change? Do you ever find yourself clinging to something that's been gone? It's already gone. Maybe it's gone a second, maybe it's gone ten years. Maybe it never even existed in the first place, except as a thought.

So that intermediate level of real cogitation—that makes total sense, but it doesn't quite transform our understanding.

And then the third level is really bhāvanā. It's called bhāvanā-mayā-paññā, which is insight, intuitive wisdom. It's when you have one of those "aha" moments—and I'm sure you've all had them. You can have it in daily life: if you're doing Sudoku and suddenly you go, "Oh, that's the number that goes there!" It just pops up from somewhere. Aha, and you just know it.

So it is with our Dhamma wisdom. With impermanence, there will be a moment where—wow, yeah, it's all really changing. A moment. It doesn't last forever either, but you get a sense of the different levels. And so the paññā that is cultivated through our trust and steady awareness, the one that really changes how we live, is this third level.

Mindfulness, even in the form of sitting and walking practice, is not an end in itself. It's not about getting the technique, because you'll hear there are all different techniques, and that can be really confusing. If you think it's about getting the technique right and becoming more and more perfect, you keep hearing, "Well, you could be with the breath, or you could be with hearing, or if it's better for you, be with the body." And you want to say, "Just tell me what to do so I can do it right! This is just driving me crazy." We just want to know how to get it right.

But it's not an end in itself. It's a supportive condition to relax into full presence and awareness of this moment's experience—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience, thinking, emotions, whatever. And this is the radical thing: it doesn't matter what mindfulness is aware of. Because it's not about the what. It's about learning to recognize and trust, over and over, the mindful awareness itself. Whether you're sitting, whether you're walking, whether you're eating, whether you're trying to space out, whether you're just waking up from three hours of spacing out—it doesn't matter what. You'll find it's even possible to be aware while you're spacing out. But then it's not really spacing out anymore, is it?

It's about that, not about getting it right.

This is quite broad, as you can see. It's not about a meditation retreat or a forum, or sitting and walking enough hours so then the rest of the time you're free. It's not about this incredible effort to get somewhere. It's about our whole life. Meditation, real meditation—that practice of awakening, the process of awakening—isn't limited to some form.

This form obviously we think is tremendously helpful and supportive, because we get so lost in what's happening in our daily lives. There's so much happening that we get easily distracted. We forget to notice that there can be awareness of what's happening.

Have you noticed that today? Do you know the difference between knowing what's happening and recognizing that you're aware of what's happening?

Right now, are you seeing me? Yes? Okay. Were you aware that seeing was occurring before I asked you that? Did you get a sense of the difference now when I ask, "Are you aware that seeing is happening?" Seeing, if your eyes were open—some of you had your eyes closed—but if your eyes were open, you were seeing. Notice how, until I mentioned it, we don't tend to be aware of the process.

Now, did it take a lot of energy and effort to be aware that you were seeing? No, it doesn't. It just takes remembering. That's what our practice is—remembering. And it gets more and more interesting.

The awareness of the process of seeing is actually what we're cultivating. Seeing—how many sights do we see in a day? Some are beautiful, some are ugly, most of them are neutral. We're not even aware what's going on. We wait until there's something really good to see, like the Super Bowl.

Then we're really into seeing. Big whoop, then that's over. Then there's something else to see, like a tennis match—now that's really good to see. But then it's over. Then there's a sunset, and then there's something beautiful, and then there's something ugly, and most of the time there's nothing. And we think it's all about seeing something better. Get a better object. Same with how we feel inside, same with our moods, same with our emotions. This is the wheel of samsara. We forget. We're so sucked into what's happening that we forget that the process of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking—that the awareness of the process is our practice.

I read this from Bhikkhu Anālayo in his book from a few years ago about the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Foundations of Mindfulness. This is actually from a footnote where he's quoting Jack Engler, who's a well-known psychologist and meditator, a friend of ours. He's theorizing that one of the reasons Western meditators may progress more slowly is the tendency to become absorbed in the content of awareness rather than continuing to attend to the process of awareness.

So that's really what we're cultivating with our moment-to-moment mindfulness. Sitting, walking, eating, whatever—to keep remembering to notice the process of awareness. It's not stressful or difficult. It doesn't require huge energy. It doesn't have to be exhausting. But remembering it... we just get so sucked into what's happening and our habits of "what does it mean about me." The habits of our mind are so strong. That's nothing to criticize. This is just yathā-bhūta, seeing things as they are. It's not personal.

But without having a little sense of right view of why we're practicing, then we can, with our greatest commitment and sincerity and effort, really do meditation practice for years and end up feeling dissatisfied, a failure, or feeling it's useless—because we're doing it from the wrong understanding.

I want to read a little bit from an article someone pointed out to me in the New York Times yesterday. Someone was writing an op-ed piece—I won't say his name—but he's talking about mindfulness and meditation. He said he's a 25-year mindfulness meditator. He didn't say Vipassana, but that's clearly what he's been doing. And clearly very dissatisfied, let down.

Let me read a couple of things, because this is like the trap we can so easily fall into. It's kind of heartbreaking to me.

He's saying people talk these days about the promise of mindfulness—that mindfulness meditation will reduce your blood pressure, reduce your social anxiety and depression, improve your relationships, including your relationship with yourself. Meditation in the right doses, he's saying, is also valuable as a means to relax the body, to quiet the emotions, to refresh one's energy. There's growing evidence that meditation has health benefits.

Now you've all heard all of this, I imagine. And not to say it's not true, and not to say what's good or bad, but if that's why one is meditating—and it might be—then either you get that and good, okay, done, it's over, or you don't get it and you really have to find another way. Maybe yoga, nothing wrong with yoga, or take a pill or whatever. It's limited.

He goes on to say, "What I haven't seen is much evidence that meditating leads people to behave better, improves their relationships, or makes them happier. In the modern world, meditation is far more effective as a technique for self-management than as a means of personal transformation, much less enlightenment."

This is someone who's been doing mindfulness meditation for 25 years, very sincerely. And that may be some of your experience. I'm not here to say what anyone's experience should be. But I can speak for myself, and I know not only for myself, that what makes me so sad about that is clearly he's bringing such a wrong view to the whole reason for doing it. When that goal comes from misunderstanding, then the way we go about it is coming from our inherent misunderstanding, and it's just another thing we're doing. It's so sad.

As he goes on, he's clearly seeing meditation as a very specific, limited activity, distinct from mindfulness in life. So that point I would really like to get across. Hopefully you all know that. The specific form of meditation that we're doing here—whatever you're doing internally, the sitting, the walking, the being in silence—this structure isn't with the rest of your daily life. But what we're cultivating, this recognizing the process of awareness, is not in any way limited to a meditation retreat or to depths of deep samādhi concentration. It's about recognizing awareness, whatever's happening—subtle, gross, busy, thinking, no thought, lots of energy, no energy, you're sick as a dog, you're feeling great. It does not matter. As long as we're conscious...

awareness is available and accessible. The structure of the retreat is simply to give us really supportive conditions to help us keep remembering and recognizing, because the habits to do otherwise are just so strong.

Why? I don't know. We won't even go there. One of the things that will make you crazy, according to the Buddha: the workings of karma and the beginnings of things. So don't go there. How are things now? Yathābhūta—things as they have come to be in this moment.

What really drew me to the Buddha's teachings—I mean, I was practicing before I understood it was the Buddha's teachings, but when I started reading extensively about them—is that the teachings are so pragmatic, so practical. What really got him, at least according to the mythology and the texts, what really got him doing his own inquiry and got him to awaken and then to try to share what he saw with others, was grappling with the basic dilemma of life and death. Why do we suffer? And why is it that in only wanting to be happy, we continue to make choices that keep us spinning and suffering?

He saw that after he awoke—that's what motivated him out of compassion to teach. But what got him to look for himself was simply this: we all want to be happy. We don't want to die. We don't want to be sick. Everyone gets sick. Everyone dies. Everything we love goes away. We have to be with things we don't want. And that is how it is. So far, there doesn't seem to be another way. And if you'd found one, I bet you wouldn't be here.

So he's really grappling. And when he woke up—this is also what I love—when he woke up, the Buddha, the awakened one, the peaceful one, he wasn't living on a cloud in some other realm, in some other world. He's still living in a body, with kinspeople who got into fights over water and killed each other, people coming in and being totally obnoxious to him all the time, the monks getting into arguments, the nuns getting into arguments, the laypeople always trying to prove things. Can you imagine if all the people wandering around practicing were coming up to you and wanting to engage you in debate every day and prove you were wrong? What a nightmare. And he didn't live in another world. Yet his heart was free.

So it always got me looking: what's the difference? What's the freedom of the Buddha? And looking then, because it sneaks up in the background, the wrong view in my mind—why am I on this path? If I'm really honest, I'll look and see: well, maybe then I won't have a bad back anymore. Maybe my personality will get a little bit more friendly, finally. You see those things back there. It's great to see them. When we don't see those ideas, that's what's running us. When we see it, we go, "Oh yeah, there it is again. Wanting, wanting. If I do it, I'll get better."

But awareness trumps wanting. Awareness of wanting. Wanting is like this—and you're back in awareness. There's no experience we can have that blocks awareness when we remember it. You don't have to stop thinking to recognize awareness. You don't have to only have a particular sensation or feel your breath or only have subtle emotions. You can be really angry, a little bit out of control—hopefully not here—but you can even be aware of that. So don't put some particular way awareness should look onto it. Just keep re-recognizing and keep trusting it.

And so this, I mean, another thing I found very inspiring, an example of this waking up and still in the same world. Many of you have probably read this. You know Mingyur Rinpoche? He's a Tibetan Lama, the younger brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche. Very well known, very renowned.

About two years ago, he had his teachings organized and he said, "I'm going off on a three-year retreat." But he didn't just go to the forest refuge where it's really nice and cozy for a three-year retreat. He has many people who love him and are very connected to him, and he knew people would want to support him. So he kind of snuck out of his hotel in the middle of the night. As his brother said on the website, he didn't even take a toothbrush. He didn't even take any money. He just snuck out and went off like you read about in the old days, off to just roam and practice. No one knew where he was for two years.

Now just recently he sent a letter out. He'd run into one of his supporters who had begged him after two years, "Would you let me be with you?" And so they were together and then he sent out this letter. I found it so inspiring because this is present day. This is why I teach—because of this possibility of undercutting our understanding of what really brings happiness.

He said: "I myself am wandering without any fixed location, staying in isolated mountain hermitages and other such places. I have experienced feelings of happiness and suffering, rising and falling like waves on the surface of the ocean. At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I have felt cold, hungry, and thirsty. Even when I have begged for alms, I received nothing but insults and harsh words. At other times, I have received food and clothing effortlessly without even asking for them, and in my mind, it felt as though I were enjoying the pleasures of the gods. While I have experienced both happiness and suffering, the most important thing is that a deep and heartfelt sense of certainty has arisen in the depths of my being, such that no matter what happens, I know that the true nature of these experiences, their very essence, is that of timeless awareness and vast compassion."

He says, "This natural clarity of awareness has been with us from the very beginning. It is the very essence and true nature of our minds." And then he offers the koan we're all faced with: "One must maintain the flow of pure awareness to the best of one's ability without meditating, yet not getting lost in distraction."

That encapsulates the whole thing. I found it so inspiring because this is somebody writing just a couple of months ago.

And "not meditating," I would say in terms of what we're doing here, means not thinking of meditation as that guy writing in the New York Times described it—as a separate, specific activity done by me to get somewhere, somehow separate from the rest of my life. It's all meditation.

"Without getting lost in distraction" means, as Jack Engler said, not getting so lost in what every experience means about me and how it can fulfill me and make me feel better or worse, that we lose sight of the simplicity of awareness. Knowing that you're seeing right now. Knowing that you're feeling. If you're feeling sleepy, knowing you're sleepy. Awareness of sleepiness. Any object, any experience points us back to awareness.

That's what non-distractedness means. It doesn't mean clamping down, shutting out all thoughts, only focusing on one thing. That can be useful for cultivating shamatha, cultivating a real steadiness of mind, but that's not what he means here by non-distractedness. And it's not what I mean by awareness that we can recognize connected with any object. Non-distractedness means simply recognizing awareness.

When we are just in moments—when you experience that flow of awareness, that non-distractedness—there's nothing that can happen that's a distraction. That loud noise, that person running up and down the steps above your room last night—that's hearing. That's awareness of hearing. That aversion arising in your mind, that blame, all the pictures of that person, the notes you're going to write, "How can they be here?"—that's aversion. It feels like this. Awareness of aversion.

"Big whoop. I don't want to be aware of aversion. I want to be aware of bliss. That's why I came."

Okay. Wanting. Wanting. Feels like this.

I know it sounds a little silly. Try it. Keep trying it. You'll come into an interview and say, "So and so is happening." Oh, really? Great. It's like this.

It comes to be such a refuge, such a relief, such a source of happiness—even though the practice isn't about making us happy. Happiness arises when the mind lets go of clinging to wanting it otherwise. When it lets go of aversion and pushing away. "Oh right, I'm furious with that jerk running up and down the stairs." Anger feels like this. I do this a lot. I notice, "Oh yeah, awareness of anger." After a while you don't even have to say that. But it's like a Tai Chi move—from being lost and absorbed in the experience of anger and what it means about me, justifying or blaming or blaming yourself and the whole nine yards, to simply: "Oh, anger and blame feels like this." You don't have to do anything about it but recognize the awareness. Over and over, this comes to be such a refuge.

And that space of recognizing just what's happening is what allows for yathābhūta ñāṇa dassana—clear recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment.

So what changed in the Buddha's awakening, living in this world? What changed for Mingyur Rinpoche? As he described it, the deep certainty in his heart, in his mind—this third level of paññā—the deep certainty that no matter what happens, "I know the true nature of experience is timeless awareness and vast compassion." That deep certainty. We have moments of it, and we lose it. But notice in those moments, just the simplicity of being with awareness, how our heart and mind then responds to experience from that place is very different.

What changes, what frees our heart and mind, isn't that all the situations around us get better—that's out of our control. It's not that we get a better personality. It's that we're no longer caught, even just for a moment, in reacting and responding to life from these habits of aversion pushing away, of greed holding on, and of telling the story of me—of having every experience need to fulfill in some way "me," or else it makes me suffer and we must get rid of it. That's what you call saṃsāra.

Dingö Khyentse Rinpoche has something I've really liked a lot lately. He's talking about the three fundamental attitudes which arise and which are the foundations of our practice of awakening. The first one is renunciation—and that's what I want to talk about for a moment now. The second is compassion; the third he calls pure perception, or that accurate recognition, yathābhūta in Pali.

But renunciation, as he's describing it—he's not talking about the renunciation of not eating at night or not wearing jewelry or sleeping on the floor, that kind of thing. He says the foundation of renunciation, the root of all stages of the path, implies the strong wish to free oneself from the seemingly unending sufferings of saṃsāra. Saṃsāra being the seemingly endless cycle of conditioned existence. This wanting and getting, or wanting and not getting, and either way, leaning into the next moment, leaning into the next thing, pushing away from that. Wanting, getting, wanting, getting.

With this renunciation comes a heartfelt weariness and disillusionment with the endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status.

Let me read it again. And this isn't a should or an idea, because that doesn't work—it just makes us feel worse about ourselves. But this sense, just for a moment—we'll have it for moments and then we get hooked in again—but a moment of heartfelt weariness or disillusionment with the endless quest for gratification, approval, profit, and status. That's saṃsāra.

And when we don't have that right view of trusting awareness, when we don't simply look at and watch how this cycle is playing out, then we just get sucked back into it again. So with this right view of the process of awareness, moving from content to process, you don't have to stop that cycle, but we see it. Without awareness, we don't really quite notice that's what's happening. Awareness can change the whole thing.

We think, "Okay, this time it didn't do it, but next time it will." This time I didn't get it, but next time... or, "This time I did get it, but now it could be just a little bit better. Just a little bit better." You bring that to formal meditation too, right?

No matter how good a retreat you've ever had, don't you hope this one's a little bit better? There's a Tibetan definition of samsara as the urge to correct. So just notice—you're doing walking meditation, and you think, "But I could feel it just a little bit clearer if I tried a little bit harder." That's the cycle of samsara.

How does sati, how does mindfulness shift that? It's not like you come in with a hammer and declare, "This is bad, I'm going to stop it right now." I mean, I've tried that. Have you tried that? "I am now going to give up clinging. I'm going to stop wanting things." It doesn't work, right? That doesn't work. We try it and then we get aversive because we couldn't stop wanting. "I understand very clearly—I talk about it all day long. I know that wanting doesn't work. So what's the matter with me?" And then you're in aversion. Both of these responses are all about me, me, me. Awareness is different. Awareness is like, "Oh, wanting is like this." It's a movement from the object to the process.

I'll tell you a simple little story of where that happened years ago, many years ago, on my first three-month retreat. This was bad, so don't do it. I had a car, and it was like two months in, an oblique November in Massachusetts. I just got this—what I thought was a yen for chocolate chip cookies. I can say it's only the first day of this retreat, so you can't be too far along in these things yet. And it got bad. I mean, it got really bad. I had to have chocolate chip cookies. Just so much wanting.

So I got in my car and drove into Barry, and luckily there's not much else you can do in Barry. I bought a bag of cookies and brought them back to my room and sat there. I thought I was being mindful. Chewing, chewing, swallowing, swallowing, chewing, chewing, swallowing. I went through two-thirds of that bag—and it was a big bag too. That's not something I normally do, just to say. Two cookies is usually enough. A whole bag? Something else was going on.

But I didn't quite recognize it for a while. Chewing, chewing, swallowing, swallowing. And suddenly, awareness clicked in and I saw what was really happening, which was wanting. Oh, the cookies—there's this pain, this yearning. It was kind of like here, but the cookies were dropping past it into my stomach. They weren't really touching the yearning at all. It's like, "Oh, that's wanting. That's what wanting's like."

To me that's just a little example. If we don't stop and look, we just keep eating the cookies. We get to the end and go, "Well, I guess it wasn't chocolate chip. I guess it was oatmeal I needed." We just don't get it. That's samsara—what the heck's going on? But suddenly we go, "Oh, awareness. Wanting feels like this." And that's the difference.

In samsara, wanting, yearning, loneliness, aversion—it doesn't feel too good, does it? And our whole ethos is: if something doesn't feel good, something's wrong, make it better. You want something? Go get it, and then you'll feel better because the wanting goes away. We say, "Just hang out with wanting feels like this." And people go, "Huh? Huh?" Go to someone on the street and say, "Just hang out with wanting feels like this instead of going and trying to get a better job. Just hang out with it." They'll say, "I don't think so."

But try it. That's the shift to awareness. We don't have to respond. In fact, with wisdom, with clear seeing, there's not the urge to respond. "Oh, that's just wanting." Not to do anything about it. Doing things about it just keeps it going. "Oh, that's just wanting." And awareness of wanting is just that. You've taken refuge in the awareness again, and it really can stop being a problem—in that moment.

I mean, I've done this a million times. It'll come up again. So what? We're not saying it should stop. We're just saying, let's see what's really going on. "Oh, wanting feels like this." The habit of mind is to move away from it. Just stay with it. You're back in awareness. And there's peace. There really is peace. Even with wanting, it's just some sensations. It's just some energy in the mind. It's also just awareness and compassion when you bring full attention to it. You don't have to fix it.

So with steady sati, with steady mindfulness, the interest becomes the process—not the what, not how to fix it. It changes everything. Steady, steady, steady. The reason we have this structure is because we have to just keep remembering. The habits of getting lost and distracted together are so strong. That's just how it is. But the more we practice, the more steady we are with it, the habit of awareness—of recognizing awareness, of trusting awareness, of really loving it—gets stronger and stronger.

I call it a shift of refuge. Our refuge, what we grew up with, what I grew up with—refuge is to go after pleasant, get rid of what's unpleasant, do whatever we can to bolster our good sense of self. That can be helping other people, that can be doing anything. But at the core of it is the me, me, me.

The shift of refuge to just appreciating awareness rather than evaluating it by what's happening—it's so much easier. It's so inclusive because there's nothing in our mind, in our heart, in our experience, in other people, in life that needs to be shut out. There's no barrier, no differentiation that needs to be made. There's no judgment—"My awareness is better than your awareness." I mean, who owns awareness? Nobody. "My awareness is better because I'm aware of really subtle tingling sensations in my finger and you're only aware of aversion, so my awareness is so much better." I think that's awareness of me-ing. But awareness is untouched. It doesn't care. Or as someone else said, it's not that it doesn't care—it cares, but equally for everything. Take your pick.

And so our practice here is really about just cultivating this shift of refuge, just in one moment, and then in this moment, and then in this moment.

I think that's all I want to say. Thank you for your attention.

So please come if you'd like.

*

And so our practice here is really about just cultivating this shift of refuge—in one moment, and then in this moment, and then in this moment.

I think that's all I want to say. Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 136

Seclusion (Viveka)

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this talk from the 2014 February Month Long Retreat, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of viveka (seclusion) across its multiple dimensions. She begins with kāya viveka (bodily seclusion)—physical withdrawal from people and the overwhelming flood of sense experience—drawing on wisdom from Thomas Merton, Thích Nhất Hạnh, and Ajahn Chah to illuminate why such withdrawal supports clear seeing.
>
> Wilson then examines restraint at the sense doors (indriya-saṃvara), carefully distinguishing wise renunciation from aversion. Using practical examples—from being distracted by beautiful views on retreat to habitual phone use—she shows how bringing sati-paññā (mindfulness-wisdom) to sense contact differs from suppressive tightness. The Buddha's teaching that sense experience itself isn't problematic, but our imprisonment by habitual reactions to it, becomes central.
> The talk progresses to citta viveka (seclusion of mind)—the stillness of the non-reactive mind that doesn't concoct stories around experience. Drawing on Ajahn Buddhadasa's emphasis on atammayatā (non-concocting) and Luang Pu Dun's reformulation of the Four Noble Truths, Wilson points practitioners toward recognizing moments when awareness meets experience without proliferation. She acknowledges that seclusion also creates space for 'demons' to arise—difficult mind states previously avoided through distraction—referencing the Desert Father Saint Anthony's twenty years of solitary struggle. The teaching concludes with the Buddha's instruction from the Bhaddekaratta Sutta on the 'better way to live alone': dwelling at ease in the present moment, free from desire.

Beautiful night, huh? Did you notice? There's something about how the beauty of nature, the moon and the clouds, can bring the mind into a kind of space and quietness sometimes. It's just lovely.

So tonight I want to talk about seclusion. The word in Pali is viveka.

When we first think about seclusion, we tend to think about it in terms of seclusion from other people—periods of solitude, periods of being alone. And this is a really important, respected, even vital part of so many spiritual traditions, isn't it? Times of renunciation, of solitude, of aloneness.

I want to share some reflections on that: the value of it, why we would do it, why it's so helpful. But also, in the way the Buddha talks about it in the teachings, seclusion isn't only about being secluded from other people. There's one quotation from a sutta where someone's asking the Buddha, "Do you know, sir, emancipation, release, seclusion for beings?" And Bhikkhu Bodhi, the great translator, notes that those are three designations for Nibbana: emancipation, release, seclusion for beings—that word viveka. So in that way it's being used as seclusion from dukkha, seclusion from the kilesas, from greed, hatred, and delusion. This idea of seclusion actually has a lot of different depths to it.

On the first level, which is really quite profound, there is this sense of spending some periods of time—and some people choose their whole life—secluded from other people, a life of being a recluse or a hermit. And in a small way, that's what we're all doing here. This form of intensive silent practice is really coming from a life of seclusion. And even though you may feel like you're more with people here than you ever are in your life—eighty of you all jammed together all the time, thinking "Please, seclusion, what do you mean?"—at least, hope to God, you're silent. And that's a little bit moving in that direction.

But it's a huge part of spiritual traditions. Jesus in the wilderness. The early Christian mystics. A few years ago, I was with a Swiss friend, and we were traveling in southern France. We went to visit in the Dordogne, in southwest France, two or three Tibetan monasteries that he knew—he was friends with some of the people who ran them. Two of them were under the auspices of the Karmapa, and one was a Dzogchen monastery.

What was interesting is that, not being in the Tibetan tradition, I wasn't really aware of these places. We got to one of them, and although it was Tibetan, all the people there were not Tibetan. Some were monks and nuns, some were lay people, but all different cultures—mostly Westerners, Europeans. They had just begun three-year, three-month, and three-day retreats. You've heard of that in the Tibetan tradition, right? It makes our three-month retreat seem like nothing.

They had just begun one. In a separate little enclave—there were four enclaves—over a hundred people had just started. In one of the enclaves, it was their first three-year retreat. In another, it was their second. In the others, it was their third. In still others, it was their fourth. So this is just quietly going on in France. All these hundred people on these three-year, three-month, and three-day retreats—their fourth one in a row. Can you imagine? They come out, earn a little money, and go back in again. Just to say: this is a tradition that's still alive in the world today, not only back in ancient times.

So how does this serve our aspiration for awakening in this practice? Whether we choose to be even more of a secluded person, or if our practice is really to awaken in daily life, here we are practicing a form of some kind of renunciation and seclusion. How can that be helpful?

I want to read from Thomas Merton, the American Trappist monk who was always drawn to being a hermit and mystic, but was always being called back by his superiors and not allowed to go be a real hermit. This is an encapsulation of something he said about the desert fathers—the early Christian desert fathers who went off into the desert completely alone in Egypt for practice: "The search for solitude is a journey to discover the inner self."

The monks fled to the desert to become ordinary. If they had gone there to be extraordinary, this would have meant taking the world with them as a standard for comparison.

I like that. Not that I'm a special person, but just more and more ordinary. But then still, why do we need, at times, to flee the world, to get away from the world, to discover how truly ordinary we are? You think, "I already know I'm really ordinary." But you don't really want to be ordinary. You want to be extraordinary. How can we be happy to be just ordinary?

Anyway, why do we need to get away? Thich Nhat Hanh speaks to this—why we would take time away from all the activity. Because it's not just this first form of seclusion called kāya viveka, or seclusion of body. We first think of it as being separate from people, because we get so caught up. But it's also about being removed from so much sense door activity, which we've touched on before.

So Thich Nhat Hanh is talking about both of these. He says, "We have lost our taste for silence. We do not know how to be with ourselves without something else to accompany us." He says a book, a telephone—you can tell how old this is. I would say with an iPhone, with our tablets, with our computers. Think about it. You don't have to think very long, do you? Go to a restaurant. How many people can sit there, never mind if they're alone, even when they're together, sitting there on their phones? Have you ever noticed that? Or we were somewhere recently, a restaurant with young people who looked like they were on a date, sitting there in pairs—but all on their phones. Really, to be alone without something to accompany us.

Thich Nhat Hanh continues: "The first thing for us to do is to return to ourselves in order to recover ourselves, to be our best, to reorganize our lives so that we do not allow society to colonize us." I actually love that line. He uses it in a few places. We don't even recognize how society and the norms around us are colonizing us until we take some time away from other people, from the flood.
