So it's not just that in the moment we get into clinging or aversion—it is that. But without recognizing this kind of pattern happening, it comes to be the way we evaluate ourselves, the way we evaluate the world, the way we give meaning to ourselves. And it also really is strengthening the sense of me. It's all about how is it affecting me? How do I evaluate me? And then how do I evaluate others?

Any discontent, any suffering—this always arises from unpleasant. And a lot of the time, the sense contact is a thought, an idea that's unpleasant. A lot of our confusion and going down the rabbit hole of negativity and self-judgment is from thoughts that are unpleasant. And then we judge them as bad and wrong. And because it's all about me, I'm bad and wrong and hopeless and useless, and I should only have pleasant, good thoughts.

Of course, even talking Buddha Dharma encourages this split, right? We talk about wholesome and unwholesome. And as it happens, wholesome states of mind tend to be more pleasant than unwholesome states of mind—that is true. But we don't have to add on top of it, you know, the judgments. But we do. So we're starting to see how we do that.

Ajahn Buddhadasa—I think maybe Greg mentioned him—was a Thai forest monk and teacher from the last century, very scholarly. I spent some time at his monastery a long time ago. And he said once, looking, if you start to notice this going for the pleasant, going for the pleasant, going for the pleasant, start paying attention. He said ninety-five percent of everything you do is for the sake of pleasant feeling. That may not be the right amount, but look and see. When we make a decision, when we decide what to do, when you decide where to sit in the dining room, when you decide what kind of tea to have, when you decide what to eat or not eat at lunch.

You don't have to add a "bad" to this. You don't have to add a judgment to this, because then we can't see clearly. It's like just seeing cause and effect. How does this work? It's fascinating. Of course we prefer pleasant if we could have it—that's not the problem. It's the attachment.

Some of the main effects of this, unexamined: it keeps our attention, our sense of what's real, of what's going on, always kind of looking outward. Even when it's about our own inner experience, we're looking outward to what's making me feel bad or what's making me feel good. We're always kind of leaning into, as Gregory describes, that leaning into the next pleasant experience, leaning into the next experience to make this one okay. It keeps it going, keeps it going, but it keeps the focus narrow. Me and other, me and good, me and bad—how can I control experience to get it the way I want it to be? And we can get really involved in that.

It doesn't mean we can't make choices, but when we're really thinking that if we get it all copacetic, all pleasant—even though we know everything's changing—don't we keep doing that anyway? We think, "Well, this is good now. Oh, it changed, but this next one will be a little better." There's a lovely Tibetan Buddhist phrase: the definition of samsara is the urge to correct. We just always could make it a little bit better. And since nothing's steady state, that never comes to an end.

Also, because of this narrowness of focus, it really...

It strengthens the sense of me and other, right? Because we're always leaning forward or leaning away. It strengthens that sense of me and other. And again, it's this narrowness of perception, narrowness of the world.

And when that's just for a moment dropped—and that happens in or out of retreat, moments when there's just a minute of awareness, mindfulness, of whatever, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, it doesn't matter—but just being. Let's say you're sitting, drinking your tea, and you're just there, tasting the tea, not making any story, not "me." And there's a sense of... you don't sit there thinking "there's a sense of vastness," but there's not the sense of narrowness. There's just the sense of—anything I say is too restrictive. Me and the world, it's like, this is just... it's all this. This is what's happening now. Everything is like this now. Not "I'm like this and mommy this and this has to go and this has to..." This is it for now. And it's just this sense of ease and peace.

On retreat—I know my first retreats that I would do, I didn't really understand what was happening at all, but I could remember moments. I'd leave the retreat and I'd remember a moment. I remember one retreat in particular, I thought, that was like the most... I was sitting somewhere, and that's what happened. It was just so clear, and everything was beautiful. I remember that blue lizard. It was the most beautiful blue lizard, and there's something about that place in California and that lizard that was so perfect.

But it's nothing to do with that. It's to do with a moment of just pure, awake presence where the heart, mind, energy is all collected and present without wanting or aversion or separation. It's like, ah. It's just perfect in this moment because there's nothing in excess and nothing lacking—because you're not thinking in those terms.

But even so, our habit of attributing everything to the environment or to others or to experience—we often miss that that's happening in this moment of conscious awareness. We think it's the externals, right? So that's something that we lose by being so focused in.

And then we just... we can be so like, it's like we're trapped. We're just tossed between pleasure and pain, pleasure and pain, our whole life, like ping-ponging back and forth. Does that make sense?

I have this one memory that to me personifies this being tossed back and forth between pleasure and pain. It makes me laugh. I was watching the Super Bowl one time. So I ask in advance the forgiveness of anyone here who's a football fan, because I'm not going to get any of the details correct at all. I don't remember what year. It was the Super Bowl. I was with friends who were totally into it. But I remember just this at the end.

So I know the Patriots were playing, and Tom Brady was the quarterback. I can't remember who the other team was. And this was right at the end. So again, I ask your forgiveness—I'm totally not a football fan. But it was like the last two or three minutes, something like that. And the Patriots, something happened. They didn't have the ball. The other team had the ball because my memory is Tom Brady sitting on the bench. And the other team did something where they suddenly got a touchdown or whatever, so they were ahead and there's like hardly any time left. And the camera panned to Tom Brady, and he was like the picture of total dejection. Total. I mean, physical, mental. It was funny because, you know, I don't know him. It was just funny to see how total —total dejection, like his whole life in that moment of losing.

But then because they'd made a goal, the Patriots got the ball again. I can't, again, I totally don't remember what they did. But whatever they did, it was some amazing thing, and in two minutes they made some points and they won. So it was totally, you know, amazing if that could happen. So then they panned to Tom Brady again. And he's like—he wasn't just kind of, "Oh, isn't this nice?" He was ecstatic. He's leaping around.

He's grinning. Between those two minutes, his whole life encapsulated in each of those moments. I always keep remembering that because it seems to me that's what we do. That's what we do. And it doesn't end with the Super Bowl. It's everything—it's lunch, it's sleeping, it's everything. And as long as we're trapped in that, that's what we are. We're trapped.

So our process here, bringing in steady awareness, what it's doing is fieldwork to see what's actually feeding this habit. One of the meanings of the word Dharma, or Dhamma, is the law—the law of how things are. And so dependent origination, one of the key teachings of the Buddha, shows that all things happen lawfully. In other words, if you plant a seed, it's lawful. If it's an apple seed, you're going to get an apple tree, however much you might pray for mangoes. That's what it is. The cause leads to a lawful effect. And the same thing's going on in our bodies, in our minds, in the habits of our mind.

So we can start to look with the steadiness of awareness and see what the seeds of dukkha, the seeds of suffering and confusion, are in our moment-to-moment experience. What conditions lead us to getting more caught? What conditions lead us to seeing more clearly? Because wisdom—recognizing accurately the quality of wisdom that arises in the mind—really does see in a moment: "Oh, this holding on isn't really serving me." And instead of willpower, wisdom just puts it down for a moment. You'll only experience just a moment: "Oh, I don't need to do that." And it's different from hating it or pushing it away. "Oh, I don't need to do that." That's a moment of wisdom, clear seeing. And more and more of those moments are what really start to give us access to peace and ease.

This is where we talk about the key role of vedana, the feeling tone. This is why the Buddha made it the second of the four establishments of mindfulness. He's breaking out all of our experience: established mindfulness of body, established mindfulness with vedana when it's arising, established mindfulness with citta—all the qualities of mental states—and then with the dhamma, with how different things in the mind function. He broke it out, in my opinion, because he highlighted it so much. Understanding vedana through clear seeing is such a key to helping us release these mindless habits we have, where we don't realize how we got there because we didn't recognize the vedana.

I want to talk about this from one of the teachings of the Buddha, one of his suttas, one of his discourses, where he describes this. I have always really liked it. Many of you know it—it's called the Dart, or the Arrow. I like it for two reasons. One, it starts out by saying: what's the difference between an awakened or enlightened person and a regular person? So he gets our attention. He's going to tell us what the difference is. That's useful.

The second thing is, in this sutta he's really explaining how the habit gets reinforced. The seed of suffering is always greed, hatred, and confusion—these qualities in the mind called the three roots of confusion, of suffering, that the Buddha always points to. And we can feel when they're present. We get confused and we suffer. And they're habits. It's not that we're willfully wanting to do this—they're habits. We get sucked in, partly from what I've been describing.

So he's describing here how these habits get reinforced. I just find it so practical. I want to share it a bit and talk about what the sutta says. That's how he starts it: what's the difference between an awakened person and a regular person? He calls this regular person an "untaught worldling," but I always have trouble saying that.

I'm just going to say we normal folks experience pleasant feeling tone, we experience unpleasant feeling tone, and we experience neutral ones. The well-taught noble disciple, the awakened person, likewise experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling tones.

So just in case, lurking in the back of the mind, hidden, is the unseen belief that we really think we're going to get rid of all the unpleasant experience in life if we get awakened—forget it. Hang it up. That belief is keeping us spinning. That's just another form of samsara, keeping us spinning toward the pleasant. And then every time there's something unpleasant and we're lost, we think, "Oh God, I'll never be enlightened because this unpleasant thing is happening." No. Awakened and unawakened alike experience all three.

So what's the difference? A regular person, when they are touched by painful or unpleasant bodily feelings—say you're having an unpleasant pain in your body—that person worries and grieves. He laments, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught. You get the drift. Your knee hurts. "Oh my god, my knee! The ambulance! And this, and what are they doing, and we're sitting so long..." And if you're lucky, it stops there.

So he thus experiences two kinds of feelings, two feeling tones: the bodily unpleasant and the mental unpleasant. The Buddha says it's as if you were hit with a dart, and then on the heels of that first strike, you're hit by a second dart. Really, it's more that we hit ourselves with the second dart. The second arrow—hence the name of the sutta.

So that person will experience two types of unpleasant feeling. You get a sense of this, right? It really makes sense. And it may not just be a bodily unpleasant feeling. Often, I'd say even more when we're on retreat, it's a mental unpleasant feeling—like judgment, for example. And then we hit ourselves with another dart, an endless regression on how bad that is, how bad we are, why that person shouldn't be doing whatever they're doing, in or out.

So this is where it gets interesting. Being touched by that painful, unpleasant feeling, the regular person resists it and resents it. Okay, makes sense so far, right? We resist it, we resent it. So then in one who so resists and resents the unpleasant feeling, the underlying tendency of resistance against painful feeling comes to underlie the mind. In other words, it becomes a habit, a tendency. When there's unpleasant, the habit, the tendency is that right away resistance and resentment come up. Can you relate to that? Normally, yes, that's what happens. It becomes a habit.

And then under the impact of that painful feeling and the resentment, the person proceeds to enjoy or to look for some kind of sense pleasure, some kind of sense happiness. And why? Because a regular worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sense happiness.

I find that so real and so poignant. He's not saying sense pleasure is bad. He's just describing the habit of resistance to unpleasant feelings. We just think, "Of course there's resistance." We don't even notice that because we didn't notice the unpleasant to begin with. And the next thing the mind does is go look for some sense happiness—whether it's looking for a pleasant fantasy if you're stuck sitting on the cushion and there's nowhere else to go, or going to have a cup of tea, or going to the fridge for ice cream. Out in our life we can get ourselves into a whole lot more complicated trouble going for some sense happiness because we're not seeing clearly.

And so then the underlying tendency, the underlying habit to lust, to crave for pleasant feelings, comes to underlie the mind. You get a sense of this, right? It's really happening like this, again and again and again. It seems so real. The person who does not understand, who does not know according to facts—just according to the way things actually are—the arising and ending of these feelings, or who doesn't really understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings, in one who doesn't understand that, the underlying tendency to ignorance and confusion in relation to neutral feelings comes up, and that becomes the third habit.

So I just want to say a bit about these things, but it's really, really interesting.

Seeing how quickly it becomes a habit with unpleasant to lust for pleasant, how both of those—resistance and craving pleasant—are such deep habits that underlie the mind and how frequently they're reinforced. This is the thing: the lawfulness is that a habit is something you keep practicing.

Seeing it once, in that moment of really seeing—"Oh, look, I'm craving for thirds at lunch because I'm just not feeling very good. Oh, I don't need to do that. I can just be with not feeling fine"—and there's a peace that comes with that. And that's a moment of freedom. But that's a moment. And that moment doesn't go on for the whole rest of our life. How many more moments, not only here but in our life, are we practicing from these habits?

This isn't to be demoralizing. This is to be realistic, so you don't get too discouraged when we really see clearly something isn't helpful and five minutes later the mind is doing it again—because it's been practicing it for however old you are. It's been practicing it. And so just to be realistic: actually the power of clear seeing is stronger. The power of wisdom is stronger. But one clear seeing isn't enough to wipe out a whole lifetime of habit. That's why we practice. We're just practicing awareness.

So Chokyi Nyima, who's a Tibetan Lama—he's actually the brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche and Mingyur Rinpoche—he's talking about renunciation or weariness with samsara. But what he means by weariness is just getting weary of this endless, endless, back and forth, back and forth—pleasant, unpleasant. And he said: watch your mind, watch the fickleness of the mind, how easily it is influenced just by a simple pleasant or unpleasant sight or sound or smell or thought into an immediate mood. And that immediate mood goes into a whole world of story.

Can you notice that? Notice that in the sitting or in the walking. I think when I was giving the walking instructions the other day, I was alluding to that. You can be walking, and there's just a beautiful sight. "Ah, the spring. It's so beautiful." It's pleasant. And it goes into a whole world. Three minutes later, someone cuts across your path really close—and not even too close, you didn't have to put on the brakes—but they intruded on the beauty of the nature and the oneness of experience that was completely ridiculous, and boom, unpleasant, boom, you're off into a whole other world. And then you know where that goes five minutes later: "I am hopeless. I am useless. How can I think I can practice with my mind?" Endless, endless, endless.

And when we start to notice vedanā, it's a trip. As Chokyi Nyima says, how fickle the mind is. Pleasant—boom, into a whole world. Unpleasant—boom, into a whole world. Neutral—we're completely spaced out. Let's go look for something to happen. It's neutral, right?

And watch your mind. When I first saw this, it was like, "Oh, my God." The mind will cook up an unpleasant fantasy rather than be neutral. Something that never happened, but it might happen. It might happen next year, and this person might say—I mean, you're really pissed off. And why?

What was the point of that? I'll tell you the point of that. I got to feel really pissed off. I got really strengthened.

When it's neutral and it's just like this, when you're really aware in that moment, there's that sense of it's all here, the vastness, there's no problem. But when it's neutral and we're not really quite aware, not aware of the neutrality, it's kind of, well, what's happening? I didn't come here for nothing to happen. Let's get some juice going. Let's have something happening. Let's go. This is the underlying habit of neutral.

It just touches me so, what he says—that we normal people don't know of any other escape from unpleasant feeling, from unpleasant experience, except to lust after pleasant sense pleasure. As long as we're in that cycle without looking, we don't even know there's another option. As Greg was talking about last night, substituting a higher pleasure until you really don't need to substitute at all.

But this is where, back to the sutta, when the Buddha says the normal person doesn't understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. That's a phrase he uses frequently—gratification, danger, and escape with something. Bhikkhu Bodhi, who is one of the, I would say, three main translators and interpreters of the Pali texts into English living at this time, describes it beautifully. He says these are three movements in the unfolding process of insight: understanding the gratification, understanding the danger, understanding the escape. Not saying one's bad or wrong, but just understanding them.

So in terms of the gratification of going for sense pleasure, the Buddha talks about understanding the gratification. I looked up gratification in the dictionary. To gratify is to satisfy or please, to give pleasure by satisfying desires or humoring inclinations. I thought that was good. The Buddha says, if there were no gratification in this world, there wouldn't be clinging. But when he talks about the habit of clinging, of craving for the pleasant, when he discusses the Four Noble Truths, which we'll explore later, he picks a specific word for the second truth, the cause of our confusion, our suffering. He picks the word taṇhā, which translates basically as thirst. It's really this quality of thirst. I need this. I lean into it. That's what we're talking about here.

And the gratification is, first of course, obvious—something is pleasant, and we like that. That's a gratification. But unwise attention to the gratification gets us lost. So gratification is, he goes on talking about in the Second Noble Truth, this taṇhā, this thirst, accompanied by delight, relishing experience, now here and now there. I love that phrase. I watch in my own practice when there's craving for something. Pick little things here. And you're not judging it. You're just bringing steady awareness to it. Judging it, then you can't see clearly. So when there's craving, when there's wanting, great. Awareness of craving feels like this. See what the gratification is. See it clearly.

I've also seen sometimes we confuse the actual feeling of wanting itself. I've noticed how that can be confused with actually being a kind of gratification. You almost think the wanting is pleasurable. Look and see if that's true for you.

And then I've noticed, as I was saying, in terms of neutrality—I would see how, like when I was doing self-retreat at home, just a mellow, quiet retreat, just practicing awareness. My phone's there because I would stay in touch with people I needed to through texting, just because I was alone for a month. And I could see, doing walking meditation, the phone's over there, and if there's a little bit of dullness—not a lot, just a little bit of boredom, a little bit of neutrality—I think, well, what can I do now? There's this sense of, oh, I could check the weather. Any damn thing, you know, it doesn't matter. It could be something like, oh, I could go outside and pick flowers.

I mean, it doesn't have to be that the thing we want is anything wrong with it. But noticing that wanting and how it gives a sense of enlivening—we confuse that with what being alive feels like. Wanting, you know. Boredom, neutrality—no, no, wanting. So we want, and we confuse that enlivening, or think that that enlivening... what's getting enlivened again is the sense of me wanting. So explore that. I've seen this a lot, and I think it's really interesting—it kind of wakes us up. This can be a kind of gratification. So explore and see for yourself: what's the gratification? And always the sense of me gets a little bit stronger in that.

So he's not saying there's no gratification, but explore and see what it is, what it is for you.

And then what's the danger? What's the danger? And of course, the first danger the Buddha mentions is that everything is impermanent. And not just that at some point it goes away—nothing is steady state.

So that sense of gratification... we all know how it is online, right? You go online or on your phone to check one thing. Maybe not when you need to know it, but for, like I said, some kind of gratification. How common is it that you stop at that one? You check the weather—okay, that was enough, right? Five hours later, or whatever, how many things have you done? How good are you feeling? Not very.

But it's like that moment, that little moment of gratification, pleasure—it doesn't last very long. It never does. But because we keep leaning into the next, we don't see it. So that's the first danger. That's the real danger. Everything's impermanent. And if that's what our mind is leaning on for real peace, for real ease, it's completely unreliable.

So with steady awareness, we start to see that. We start to see the endings of each gratification instead of not noticing that and moving into the next. We start to see how unreliable it is, how it feeds sense desire, how it keeps us caught. The more we're in this habit of resistance to unpleasant and craving for pleasant, as we start with our steady awareness to notice what's happening in our consciousness, in our mind and heart, you'll start to notice—look and see, you don't believe me, but you will—the mind isn't happy. It's in a tumult. It's just always back and forth, back and forth. Even when it's not huge suffering, it's not at ease. It's not at peace. It keeps us looking in the wrong direction. It's a kind of torment.

One of the translations of the word for greed, hatred, and delusion—kilesa—I think someone mentioned this, often translated as "defilement." That's not a great translation. "The torments of mind," I think, is a good translation. If you're aware, if you notice, when there's real greed in the mind or real aversion or fear or delusion, we're not happy campers. The mind really isn't at ease, the heart isn't at ease, and our actions or decisions aren't clear because we can't recognize accurately.

So these are all some of the dangers. Explore for yourself. It keeps us from seeing accurately, and we can't make great choices either because we're not recognizing what's really going on. You know, that second quart of ice cream trying to be happy—wasn't a great choice, maybe. It wasn't a great choice. With clear seeing, we could have done something different. Just resting at ease with the unpleasant actually can bring peace.

So those are the dangers. And the escape—normally we think escape is getting the heck away from unpleasant. That's the escape. But that's not the escape. The escape, as the Buddha describes it, is the abandoning of desire and lust for the world, for the pleasant. The abandoning. This is the escape. The abandoning of the cravings for the world.

Not abandoning the world. That's not what he's saying. And when he says "the world," he's talking about this round of six sense contacts. That's what he means. So abandoning the lust, the craving, the desire for particular experience—the world. He's not saying abandoning the world. That's very different.

But tuning into this possibility of escape is something we can only start to trust when we recognize these little moments of that possibility. Because thinking about it, even if we think it sounds nice, without even a moment of experience of the peace of non-clinging, without that, it's just an idea. It doesn't quite go in. Because, you know, the pleasant feeling, that enlivening of wanting, that sense of me feeling happy—we don't really want to give that up. We'd like the unpleasant to go away and for there to always be pleasant. That's why I said in the beginning, that's not going to happen. The freedom is different from that.

But part of the danger is we don't want to give that up. And we can only imagine that as the only pleasure. That's what he's saying—without steady practice to see that there's another possibility. The quality in the mind-heart in a moment when it really does put down that clinging, put down that aversion, can just rest at ease with whatever's arising.

I think it's Joko Beck—I always quote this—but I think Joko Beck said it: Can I find in myself, in my heart, in this moment, only for a moment, the willingness to rest in this confusing and unwanted experience? Just for a moment. Just be with this like it is.

Steady awareness, unbiased awareness. It's not made better by pleasant. It's not damaged by unpleasant. And as we start to recognize and trust the mindfulness, the awareness more, instead of being so glommed into getting meaning from the experience, positive or negative, we can be more with the awareness. Oh yeah, that's really unpleasant. Awareness is noticing that. It's a whole different experience.

Like I described with the lizard, when I recognized what was happening, then there was the peace in the mind that wasn't clinging. It's like, ah, I don't need a particular external experience for that. I can start to really trust from experience—oh, this clinging. Watch. Just be aware when the clinging is there. Keep walking with the clinging and keep just noticing it with awareness. And at some point, it will stop. I promise, because everything stops at some point. And then keep on being aware. And you might really see that the peace and ease that comes is actually the ease we wanted from getting the thing we were clinging to. The peace that comes from clinging—you get the thing, the clinging stops. That's what creates the sense of ease. But it doesn't last because we're putting it on the object.

So it's not about giving up the world.

Back to the sutta, though. He's saying, what's the difference with an awakened person? So you can guess: with an awakened person, when they experience unpleasant, painful feeling, they experience a single feeling, a bodily one. They do not worry, grieve, and lament, beat their breasts and weep. They're not distraught. So when they experience one unpleasant feeling, they experience one unpleasant feeling. That's it. Having been touched by it, they don't resist it, don't resent it. And because we're not in reactivity, there's not the underlying habit to go clinging for something. It's just like this now.

Ajahn Sumedho is always talking about this receptive conscious awareness. And he uses the phrase, what he calls, "Oh, it's like this now." I use that a lot in my practice. I can feel the mind kind of trying to figure something out or in reaction, and I go, what's going on? And instead of trying to figure it out—oh, it's like this now. And the total awareness just drops into: it's like this.

Maybe it's unpleasant, maybe there's hardness in the heart, maybe the mind is agitated, but that's like this now. And there's no more resistance or clinging in that moment. Seeing it clearly, just as it is, without struggle—that's the way into peace and ease.

That doesn't satisfy our intellectual mind, but this is nothing to do with the intellect. It's that sense of the happiness that isn't based on pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling.

Here's what the Buddha says: When an unawakened person experiences one of these feelings, we experience it as though we're chained to it, as though we're joined to it. It's like this unpleasant feeling where we're just totally chained to that and all the reactivity. But an awakened person does not experience it as one chained or joined to it. There's an unpleasant feeling, a neutral feeling, a pleasant feeling tone. It comes. It's like this. It goes.

"Such a one, O bhikkhus, is called a well-taught noble disciple who is not chained, who is not fettered by birth, by old age, by sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair." He's not chained to this suffering. What a powerful statement. And the Buddha is basing it on just exploring this very subtle but happening-every-moment experience of vedanā.

There's something important I wanted to share about opening into the absence of torments. Really, the absence of clinging doesn't mean we abandon the world. It doesn't mean we don't act. It doesn't mean we don't have responsibility. But in the absence of torments, the mind, the heart manifests rather than through greed—it doesn't respond through greed or aversion. It responds through the brahmavihāras. It responds through friendliness, or through compassion, or through appreciative joy if someone's happy, through equanimity. These arise more naturally in the consciousness, in the mind-heart that isn't distorted by wanting, by aversion.

It's not personal. Neither is the wanting or the aversion personal. These are like lawful habits that arise. And so through the steady awareness, we're actually setting up conditions that lead to clear seeing, that lead to the wisdom that changes the habits.

And that's why being with the difficult stuff, as difficult as it is, doesn't mean your practice is going wrong. I mean, we're not always with difficult stuff, but we have to be sometimes.

That's why Greg was saying, you know, maybe you have wonderful, wonderful experiences. I said to someone today, if on your first retreat you have these amazing, brilliant experiences, what I say is, I'm sorry. Because I have a friend who, for ten years, said that happened on his first retreat. And for ten years he thought that's what's supposed to happen. Every retreat he was just in miserable agony trying to make that happen again. But the real wisdom comes from seeing how these things are created.

So back to the escape—when we're not caught, even for a moment, in these torments, there's the space in the consciousness, in the heart-mind, to discover this real peace or joy or ease or happiness, whichever way your particular consciousness describes it. That's available to us with the steady awareness that isn't caught in identification or reactivity. It's only available when we're not caught in the clinging or the aversion.

As the Buddha says of Ananda: "This is peaceful. This is sublime." The stilling of formations—just all the hoo-ha stops for a minute. It's so peaceful. It's sublime, the stilling of activities, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, just the putting down, as Greg described last night, the ending of craving, disenchantment from all the stories, nibbāna.

But just touching a moment of that, just when there's nothing going on, instead of going, "Let's cause some dukkha here, let's whip it up," notice—is it possible to even incline towards the peacefulness, towards the non-complication? Our habitual intellectual mind isn't too jazzed by that. But start to notice when it's like that. It's peaceful. And that grows and grows. The appreciation of that, the inclination to peace, to happiness, that grows more and more. And the habits of clinging and aversion—we notice them more. They get more obvious.

They get more gross. But in the noticing of them, with conscious awareness, we're not feeding them. They're not being fed. They may get big, but if you can keep aligning with awareness, you watch how they rise, you watch how they fall, and then notice—yes, this is peaceful. This is sublime. Just let it in. Just let it in.

And then in the next instant, some big craving comes up. You can only laugh. You might as well laugh. This is it. But then this is another chance—just awareness of craving. It's like this. It's peaceful. You don't have to do anything about it.

To end, I'll share a quotation from Pema Chödrön: "When we wake up, we can live fully without seeking pleasure and avoiding pain, without recreating ourselves when we fall apart. We can let ourselves feel our emotions as hot or cold, vibrating or smooth, instead of using our emotions to keep ourselves confused. We can just feel them. We can give up on being perfect and instead experience each moment to its fullest."

Just that last line—if we give up on being perfect and just bring in awareness and experience each moment to its fullest, life takes care of itself.

Thank you for your kind attention. I hope something was useful.

May the wholesome energy of our sincere intentions, our sincere practice together, be shared and benefit all beings everywhere. Truly, we practice to purify our own hearts and minds and to share that with all beings.

CHAPTER 188

Power of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this opening retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates what she calls "the liberating simplicity of mindfulness" (sati). Drawing on the Buddha's pragmatic approach to ending suffering, she explains how our moment-to-moment experience through the six sense doors becomes distorted by deeply conditioned views (diṭṭhi) that we don't even recognize we hold. The most fundamental of these is our unconscious assumption that pleasant experiences are "right" and unpleasant ones are "wrong"—a view that generates endless reactivity and suffering.
> Wilson emphasizes that right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is not about adopting correct beliefs, but about learning to recognize experience as it actually is, free from the overlay of our assumptions and conditioning. She shares a teaching story from Sayadaw U Tejaniya about simply resting in hearing rather than fighting with sounds, demonstrating how clear seeing naturally dissolves disturbing reactions. The steadiness of mindfulness, she explains, creates the conditions for wisdom (paññā) to arise spontaneously.
> The talk concludes with a moving account of an elderly practitioner who found their final years to be "the most interesting time of my life"—not because of external circumstances, but because of the profound aliveness discovered in each moment of pure presence. Wilson encourages practitioners to trust this simple practice: being fully present for just this next moment, without pulling away or creating stories about experience.

Goenkaji, a long time ago, used to start each evening Dhamma talk by saying, "The first day is over. Eight more days to go." And believe me, I was dying in those retreats. This is Kush.

But the first day can be pretty long, no? Sometimes not, but yeah. I imagine some of you feel a little bit tired? A little bit blasted? That's normal. It won't stay that way, but it's such a shift from our ordinary life, whatever that is. This is somewhat different, one way or the other. And so sometimes we're tired, or just because we're not doing so much, the mind just wants to shut off.

But also, realistically, many of us come into this from whatever our lives have been —more busy or stressful. Sometimes just getting ready to come is stressful. And we get here and, quite legitimately, the mind and body are tired. So not to make any problem about it. You can take a little nap after lunch, whatever—take a nap in your sitting.

When you wake up, you wake up. There was a lovely Sri Lankan monk years ago, long gone now, and he would say that on any retreat, you'll get as much sleep as you need, on or off the cushion.

I just want to normalize it. You don't need to be judging yourself, and you don't need to be—what my mother used to call—"awfulizing," projecting into the future: "Oh my God, eight more days like this." It won't be. The next moment won't be like this.

So I just wanted to talk a bit tonight about mindfulness, sati. Sometimes I like to talk about what I think of as the liberating simplicity of mindfulness, of awareness. I mentioned to my colleagues the other day that Thich Nhat Hanh used to talk a lot about this. I think his first book was called The Miracle of Mindfulness. Actually, when I first heard it, I thought, "Oh, la la." But it is a miracle. It is a miracle—the power of mindfulness to start transforming our suffering habits, our suffering relationships to life.

Something that I've always so appreciated, that has always drawn me to the teachings of the Buddha—as far as I know them from reading in the Pali suttas—is how extremely pragmatic he seemed to be, even though there are books and books and reams of material. He always said that of all the things he knew, he knew so much. He said, "How much I know is like all the leaves in the forest." But he picked up a handful of leaves and said, "This is what I'm teaching, because it's all you need to know to free yourself from suffering." And that's what he was concerned with, even though there is all this philosophy and stuff we can study. It's fascinating. It can really relate to our lives, to our practice. But it isn't necessary.

The Buddha was really concerned with the salient point of our lives: the suffering, the discontent, the dis-ease that we all experience in one way or another. And he asked really practically: Why? Does it have to be this way? Why are we discontented and suffering? Is it necessary? If not, what's a way to understand it better? What's a way to live differently? How does this suffering arise? How does it cease?

So that, in a way, is what's taking us into this practice. And at the core of it is this quality of awareness, of mindfulness. The pragmatic part of the Buddha is that he's saying, "Let's look and see what's bringing about suffering, unhappiness, dis-ease in my mind and heart." Not the whole world—in my mind and heart. What's bringing it about? What conditions bring it up? What conditions allow for it to release?

As Mingyur Rinpoche says, very practically too, if we want to be happy, we must recognize the causes and conditions that lead to well-being. Similarly, if we don't have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how can we possibly expect to free ourselves from it? Or as Joseph always talks about, his teacher Munindra used to say, if you want to understand how your mind works, sit down and look at it. Let's really look and see what's going on.

And this is like the whole core of the Buddhist teachings—that nothing just falls from the sky without causes and conditions. Everything is very lawful in the sense that if something is arising, there have been all kinds of conditions that led to it. It didn't just drop from nowhere. So we can start to look and understand it. And this is where mindfulness is really the key.

Why can't we just see how things are? Why do we get so confused? When the Buddha talked about his Eightfold Path, the path of practice, it begins—and really the path begins and ends—with right view, right understanding. Of course, in the beginning of the path we don't have complete understanding, but we have some sense of right view. And that's the core of it. So I want to speak a bit about what I mean by that, this being the beginning and the ending of the path.

I'm talking about this word view—ditthi—not as a belief, not as a philosophy. The Buddha's not saying you have to have right view meaning you need to master a million Buddhist teachings. When we talk about understanding them, understanding the fact that everything is impermanent, you could say that's right view. But he's not talking about—and here I'm not talking about—right view as learning and adopting a set of beliefs. Going around saying "everything's impermanent, this is right view" does not, as an intellectual belief, transform our understanding and our heart. It does not transform our suffering. Try it.

When we go around holding something as a belief, thinking "this is true"—that's one of the ways ditthi, or view, is defined in the suttas: the belief that this is true and everything else is false. We don't say that in neon lights, of course, but that's what's happening. The Buddha actually says that people with views, attached to views, go around in the world annoying one another.

So when we're talking about right view, it's not about saying, "Yes, everything's impermanent, and you're suffering because you don't know that everything's impermanent. But I do, and I'm right, and you're wrong." That's the same thing. That's the same samsara we're suffering from. He's not talking about that.

What he means is much more simple. The word that always comes to my mind is elegant. View, using the English word, I like because it points to appropriate view—the way we see, the way we recognize our moment-to-moment experience. Right view, or accurate view you could say, or wise understanding, is recognizing this moment of experience, our self and the world as it is, rather than through the veil of all our assumptions and views and beliefs that we don't actually even recognize we have, because they range from gross to very subtle.

When we're in the grip of a view, or we're looking at the world through a view, and we don't quite recognize it accurately, then the way we think about the experience doesn't match reality, the way we respond doesn't match. This is where we get into what are called the disturbing emotions: greed, hatred, anger, fear, self-centeredness, separation. All of this comes from recognizing inaccurately, responding in a way that our inaccurate recognition tells us is going to make us happy, then being completely confused because that doesn't work. And we don't know why it doesn't work, because the way we're understanding the world isn't in alignment with the way it really is.

So I'll give you an example of how view works. Really, in some ways, the whole purpose of mindfulness and all the techniques around it is to keep introducing us to how to bring our totality of presence and awareness into this moment, free from all the assumptions—and even to understand that that's possible, to get a feeling that that's possible—and then recognize. I say "see," but it's not really visual seeing. It's more recognizing, just being with what's happening as it is.

Ajahn Chah, I think I mentioned the other night, was saying: in a nutshell, the point of the teaching of the Buddha is to transform one's view. It is possible to change it. It only requires looking at things, and then it happens. And that is the essence of the steadiness of mindfulness. Looking at things—not trying to figure out which things to look at so we can put it all together. That's just coming from our misunderstanding. Looking at what's naturally arising in this moment. And there's never any other moment. In this moment, what's naturally arising—not what we think it should be or how we think it ought to be. How is it now? The steadiness of mindfulness is what allows for clear recognition to arise.

It's based on our conditioning—our society, our cultural background, our experiences. We don't have to get rid of that, but we can recognize when a particular view is operating. When we don't recognize this, that's when we clash.

It can be kind of fun to see the differences, actually—if you're looking from outside and you're not so attached. If we leave politics and certain other things out of it.

An example: I was in Burma a few years ago with some friends. At that time, staying in monasteries in the central part of Burma meant being immersed in a very Buddhist culture, with deep faith in the Buddha's teaching and the different realms of existence. This faith in various levels of existence was something everyone had grown up with.

Several friends and I, along with a bunch of Burmese people—monks and sadhus—were going to a small village to offer a donation of rice to the villagers. This is a very joyful occasion, very much part of the culture. When there's a donation of rice, all the donors are there, all the village people come, and it becomes a big event done with tremendous joy—and ten million photographs of everything.

So we were taking photos, different friends taking photos. Later, when we looked at the pictures on the camera, in several of them there was this perfectly round, bright light appearing in the images.

We're all looking at it, and the Burmese people say, "Oh, that's devas." Devas—celestial beings. "That's devas." And all the Burmese people agreed: "Oh yes, that's devas."

Then one of our friends—who is actually a nun in that tradition but happens to have a PhD in biology and botany, coming from a very scientific, medical background—she says, "No, there's no way. That's a watermark. A little moisture got into the lens. There's no way that's devas."

So who knows? Our tendency is to ask, "Well, which one's right? We've got to figure out which one's right." But that's not the point. Who knows what's right? It might not be either one.

What's interesting is that a year later, this same friend was in southern India at the ashram of Ramana Maharshi. Every full moon, people walk around the whole mountain, Arunachala—about a ten-mile walk. People come from all over India for this. It's a huge pilgrimage. Millions of people bus in. I'm not exaggerating—a million people walking around this mountain at night.

My friend was also doing it, and she took a lot of pictures. When she looked at her photos, there were these round deva things all over the place. And she said, "Ooh... maybe it is devas."

Who knows? It's not that there's a right answer. But we have different information, and the information we have and believe—that's how we describe our world. That's how we create our world. That's what it means to us, and that's how we might respond.

Our sense that we need to know—"If I know, then..."—when that takes over, the quality of freshness of attention, the wonder, the curiosity that comes with mindfulness that's open to discover, all of that shuts down. "Well, now I know what it is. It's a watermark. It's moisture. It's devas. That's it." And the curiosity goes out.

But no—it's just fresh. It's like this. We're not meant to settle on it. That's a little example of not being about getting it right.

But when we're believing that, if either side had really believed it, you could easily get into struggle or conflict around it. And in other kinds of views, we get into struggle or conflict with our moment-to-moment experience once in a while. Anybody notice today any moments when you weren't totally at ease and at peace with your mental or physical experience? Any moments of that? No, everything's totally copacetic, right?

So there are lots of different ways one could talk about this, but I just want to start with the really obvious tonight—in terms of the views that are affecting the way we relate to our experience that we don't quite recognize, because it seems so obvious and normal. But it's what's leading to, what's giving rise to, our sense of dissonance, our sense of being not at ease with things as they are.

Because a lot of times people think the freedom the Buddha's talking about means that finally all this crazy stuff in the world and everybody is going to stop. When you think about—or don't really consciously think, but in the back of your mind—what freedom from suffering might look like, what liberation might look like, are you still going to have backaches? Are your relatives still going to be as obnoxious as they are now? Is this stuff still going to go on? Are people in the world still going to be so crazy, getting involved in wars and such? If we don't really look at it, somehow on the surface level it's easy to say, "Oh, no, of course that goes on." But on the background level, somehow everything gets kind of nicer in there. And that's not the kind of thing he's talking about.

It took me a while to realize, but when I looked at the Buddha's life, when he woke up, he didn't spend the next forty-five years floating around on a cloud. He was walking barefoot around northern India, begging for his food. And the monks and nuns that he was training—they were wonderful people, but if you read the rules for the monks and nuns, every rule came about because of some stupid thing that the monks or the nuns were doing. He said, "Okay, I guess I have to make a rule about this. Don't do this. Don't do that." His relatives would get into wars about water rights. All kinds of endless sadhus would come and want to argue with him. To me, that's like the worst—every day some sadhu would come and just want to argue with him. The world didn't change, is my point. But he was known as the Peaceful One.

And that peace that he's offering us the chance to explore—with the tool of awareness to bring us in to see—is the peace that comes from a mind and heart that's at ease with things as they are. And that's only possible when we actually are present with things as they are, not as we wish they were or think they should be.

So this one habitual assumption is one of the root views we are caught in, and we don't see it. I'm sure those of you who've done practice a lot before are well aware of it. But that doesn't mean it doesn't keep sneaking in the back door or the front door.

One way the Buddha described experience—very basic experience—is through six sense doors. There's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical sensation, and then the whole mental realm: thoughts, emotions, all the mental experience. And those things are happening over and over through the day, right? In one way, he said, there's nothing else going on but that. A lot of it's mental, and it gets all complicated, but if we're really looking, it's thinking, it's mental experience, emotion, physical sensation, sound, seeing. All these things are coming and going. Don't believe me, but just look and see and let us know if you notice something else. No, seriously. But check it out first before you write me ten million notes.

So these things are coming and going, and we're so in the habit of thinking... Some feel pleasant. Some feel unpleasant. Some are kind of neither one nor the other—we don't notice that so much. But it's so immediate. We like some things. We don't like some things. And that can be quick and subtle. Or we kind of don't have much feeling, or we kind of ignore some things that are happening. And because things are happening quickly, we don't tend to notice that. But we've spent most of our lives practicing this. And so, basically, if something's kind of pleasant—say there's a sound, say at the end of the sitting you hear this bell, and we didn't make it a nice, quiet sound.

It might not be pleasant for everybody, and it might not be pleasant for you every time, but this one time it's pleasant. We don't notice hearing pleasant without steady mindfulness—it's just, "Ah, that's nice." Nothing wrong with that. But when we don't notice it, that's nice—that's the reality, that's a nice thing. Not even sound and then pleasant and liking it, just "that's nice." And that's how it should be.

Then something unpleasant happens. You're sitting in the meditation, and you just feel this heaviness come over your face, your body, and your mind goes, "Oh no, sleepiness. Oh my God, and there's thirty more minutes to go. What am I going to do?" So you're not seeing this as a lot of different experiences. It's one big unpleasant experience. And that's wrong. It shouldn't be happening. It's wrong. Either I'm doing something wrong, or this whole stupid retreat and meditation is stupid, or why is sleepiness happening? There's some way it's not okay. And that's just a little thing, sleepiness. It's a pretty normal thing.

Of all the people I've talked to over a lot of years of retreats—and I've talked to a lot of people, and in my own mind as well—there are many things people enjoy, many things they suffer. The amount of suffering, mental suffering, that people have expressed to me about the experience of sleepiness is unbelievable. Unbelievable. And you look at it, and what is it? For the love of God, you're sleepy. What's the worst that could happen? You fall asleep. Oh my God, you fell asleep, the end of the world. But I'm not exaggerating the amount of suffering that people put themselves through.

This is the suffering the Buddha's talking about—not the fact that there's sleepiness, but the reactivity to it. And the reactivity comes basically on this aspect I'm talking about. Because it's unpleasant, and the deeply held assumption that we go through our lives with is that unpleasant is bad or wrong. Either the experience itself is wrong and shouldn't be happening, or there's something wrong with me and I shouldn't be experiencing this. And then we do something else to try and make it more pleasant.

Rather than with steady mindfulness seeing just what's happening—a simple experience like sleepiness—or say there's a pleasant experience and we get, "Oh, this is wonderful, this is good, this is how it's supposed to be"—it coheres into a lot of thoughts and emotions and reactions around it, a whole story. To the point where—I'll go back to sleepiness because it's a simple experience—the story that coheres around it is so complex and so fast that we don't even, without mindfulness, without this just simple, steady attention to the experience—there's no way to unpack it. When people come in suffering so much from sleepiness, it's the whole package that's really wrong and bad. And the only way to fix it is to somehow get rid of that experience. Is this making sense?

With the pleasant, it can be the same thing. Maybe you haven't had enough time yet. But say you have a sitting, or say there's ten minutes of the sitting, and it's just peaceful. Why is it peaceful? Because there's not any wanting, and there's not any aversion going on. You're not fighting with experience. That's why it's peaceful. But we don't necessarily notice that. It's peaceful because the body feels good, because finally I'm doing it right. And this is how it's supposed to be. And after six or seven days, it's going to always be like this, because this is what we're aiming for. This is what freedom feels like. It's peaceful.

And we just get sucked into that so quickly. It's all around pleasant or unpleasant, liking or disliking. And we take our meaning from that—the meaning about ourselves, the meaning about experience, what it means in the world. This is what keeps us in the cycle of samsara, of always wanting something better, something new, wanting to get away from the unpleasant, and defining ourselves and the world by that.

We know something isn't working, but we don't exactly know why. It's because this sets up a view that we don't quite see. It's such a deep assumption, such a familiar habit that we don't even notice it. We take it for granted, sort of like gravity. Pleasant is right. Unpleasant is wrong. We don't even notice pleasant or unpleasant—we just feel that this is right and this is wrong.

The view is the attachment to that. Of course we can tell the difference. Of course if we had a choice, we would tend to go to the pleasant. I'm not saying otherwise. But that doesn't have to come with the view wrapped around it that absolutely this is the only right way, and this is what it means about me, and this is what unpleasant means about me—that I'm hopeless and useless.

So we're practicing this all day long, this one particular confused view. And when we're experiencing through the veil of that, we can't even recognize accurately. This is where mindfulness comes in, where we want to learn to trust the simplicity of awareness, what's actually happening. What's actually happening?

When sleepiness comes, what's the actual mindfulness? It's just meeting the experience. Today, Winnie offered feeling sensations in the body, or hearing, or sensations of breath. Take hearing, for example. Our tendency would be: that's the bell. And it may feel pleasant or not, we like it or we don't, we may notice that or we don't, but that's the bell.

But what's the actual experience? It's just pure hearing. And if a thought comes —"that's the bell"—that's fine, but that's a thought, that's not the hearing. Of course it comes, but that's not the same thing. And if it's "oh, I like it" or "I don't like it," that's fine, but that's another thought. That's not the hearing.

What we're training is how to really trust the simplicity of mindfulness. It takes a willingness to just rest into the experience. As much as we're holding back, that's a little bit of the aversion, the fear. You can't rest right into it. Mindfulness is right in there, just as it is—without assumption, without any story, without holding back, without our comparing. It's just like this.

That's not our habit. But when there is a moment where we just drop in, then there's clear seeing and the response can be more appropriate.

Just a little story from one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He tells about himself when he was in training in his monastery in Burma. His teacher was giving a dhamma talk, with many monks and lay people sitting in the hall. Outside the window, some work was going on—there's always some work going on in any monastery in Burma you ever sit in. So it was really noisy. That's normal, not an aberration.

He was sitting there trying to hear his teacher, and this was really noisy outside. He found himself getting really angry and agitated at that noise. "I want to hear my teacher, and they're making so much noise." Then he'd be hearing his teacher for a while —"Oh, that's what I need to hear"—and then the noise would intrude again, and he'd start getting angry and agitated. You can imagine, right?

And finally, at some point, he noticed what he was doing. Wait, what's actually happening? Let me just look at that.

So the sound started outside, and he just allowed his attention to rest in the hearing. Oh, it's just hearing. All the agitation—that was extra, mind reactivity. But when he was just resting in the hearing, at that moment, it didn't come up.

And then his teacher would start talking, and he's just resting in the hearing of that as well, not getting caught in the wanting. And then he said, "Oh, it's just hearing, hearing." All the wanting and the aversion wasn't arising anymore in those moments—just the simplicity of hearing.

And then he thought he could see clearly. Oh, I could just move closer and hear my teacher better. Because you can see more clearly when all this fretfulness isn't going on —"it shouldn't be like this, it shouldn't," and "I like it, I don't like it." It's just hearing. He could really see that's all it was—hearing—and everything else was reactivity, made up. And then you can see clearly.

That's what we're practicing. It seems simple, but that is what we're practicing. We start very simply with feeling the sensations in the body, the breath, or hearing, just because the mental realm, as you can see, is so fast-moving and complex that it's difficult to be purely mindful of the mental activity, especially in the beginning. It's just too active.

But that's what we're doing. We're cultivating the simplicity of mindfulness—just meeting what's happening. Body sensations, hearing, and it'll move to thoughts and whatever, just as it is, whatever the experience is. Not just for that, but really what we're doing is cultivating again and again this clarity of totality of presence, free from all our assumptions and ideas and comparisons and all of that.

So then you might notice if there's a time in the sitting, a walking, an eating, where you're feeling present and it's fairly easeful. Not completely, but just fairly easeful. Notice—don't make any big deal—but just notice the quality in your heart-mind at that time that is easeful.

Because I know for myself, in the early years of practice, when it was easeful or nice, I would attribute it to the situation. "Oh, this is such a nice cup of tea." Or, "It's so peaceful, it's a lovely day today, and it's so nice out here in the country," and la-di-la-di-la. We're attributing the peace to external circumstances. We forget to turn around and look. It's peaceful because the heart-mind is fully present, collected, and it's not caught in reactivity and liking and disliking. It's not fighting with what's happening now, but present with what's happening now.

We tend to think something's not good and we pull back, but actually the surrender into this moment, the totality of presence, is the way into the ending of suffering, just in a moment. It's useful to notice.

But then you try to recreate it. You go back and sit in the same place and look at that same tree and have that same kind of tea. It never works exactly the same, does it? Because it isn't. No moment's exactly the same. Our mind and body have changed. Somebody else is sitting next to us that we didn't want to see. Someone sits across and gets in the way of our view. The water's not hot enough. The tea feels old. But it's got nothing to do with any of that. It's the quality of presence of mind-heart that isn't fighting with what's happening.

John Samedo, talking about awareness and mindfulness, says, "It's not about making value judgments about our thoughts, our emotions, or our sensations, or whatever happens. We're not making value judgments. Awareness is about knowing, being with these things fully, that they are what they are at this moment." That's it. They are what they are at this moment.

He goes on to say—and this is me paraphrasing—as we expand our experience of mindfulness to all our experiences, which we will in a few days, then this becomes a kind of total freedom to receive life as you experience it in this moment. No more trying to say, "This is okay to happen. This is not okay to happen."

So even though we're giving instructions—let the attention come to the breath—we're not saying, as Woody said, we're not saying the breath or the body is somehow better than other experience. We're just using a skillful means, a more simple, easily accessible arising experience—sensations, hearing, breath—to help us keep cultivating, keep recognizing this simple, steady mindfulness.

But mindfulness doesn't reside at the breath or the body or in any particular place. So when Woody said today that when you recognize you're lost in thought, and there's that moment of mindfulness again—he said that's a good thing. It is. That's a moment of mindfulness. You don't have to go back to the breath to get back to mindfulness. It's right there. In that moment—oh, thinking was happening—we appreciate that's a moment of mindfulness, mindfulness that thinking was present. And it's right here. The thinking was also right here, because there's nowhere else we can go but this moment. We just weren't aware of that. But as soon as we were—oh, thinking—that's a moment of mindfulness. We appreciate how that feels, what he described as the difference between mindfulness of thinking and being lost in it.

And then for now, we're saying allow the sensation of breath or body or hearing to arise into the forefront of mindfulness as a way to simplify, as a way to help us continue recognizing the mindfulness. But it's not that breath or any other experience is somehow better, or that mindfulness only exists there. These are just techniques to help us recognize it more and more, because we're so inured to our habit of deciding this is okay, this isn't okay, choosing this, rejecting that, judging ourselves or whatever is happening. Just get simple. Learn to trust the simplicity of mindfulness, free from the overlay of our views and conditioning. It's so simple in one moment, right? But as you see going through this, it's hard. It's difficult. One of the reasons is that it's not our habit.

But also because our conditioning—our subtle assumptions and views and preferences—that's going to stay. We're still going to have preferences, of course. But we're so used to this conditioning, and it can be so subtle, so embedded in us, that just deciding "Now I'm going to drop these views, I'm not going to be caught anymore in wanting and aversion toward pleasant and unpleasant, I'm just going to be present with clear mindfulness and let things be as they are"—we can't just do that. It would be nice if we could. This is why we start to appreciate the conditioning, the power of our habitual patterns. With mindfulness, we see that too, and then it's okay. We know this conditioning is affecting how I like or don't like this experience. That's fine. That's different from declaring this is good and this is bad. We can see, oh yeah, look how that is. Mindfulness is just noticing that rather than taking it personally.

Am I making sense? Does that land?

Another example came to mind today of how we can get caught, rather than resting in that fresh, open quality of mindfulness—that sense of openness into the unknown. Each moment is the unknown. Not dragging in all our opinions, all our previous experience—that is so difficult.

So this came up: someone I've had great respect for, a kind of hero of mine over many years, is Yo-Yo Ma, the classical cellist. He seems like a wonderful person. He does really good work in the world. And I've seen various videos where he has this quality of really open, interested wonder about all kinds of things, but particularly about music.

I don't know if you know, but in the year 2000 he started this project called the Silk Road Project, which has been going on now and has grown quite large. What he did was bring together, with this open, fresh attention free from assumption, musicians from all over the world. It's a huge thing now. The first one was called the Silk Road Project because he was bringing together musicians from all the different countries along the old Silk Road—Mongolia, China, Persia, Iran, Central Asia, North Africa, Turkey, India, Western countries, and later Finland. Okay, Finland wasn't part of the Silk Road, but it expanded over time.

He'd bring together musicians and the instruments from their countries. And it wasn't that he would have the Chinese musicians play with certain Chinese instruments—though they would do some of that, really beautiful—or Mongolian throat singers, really beautiful, or classical Western music. But the thing he did that's so amazing is this: he would bring together, say, someone from Iran, and someone from Mongolia, and someone from India, and someone from the West. They'd get together and write music, bringing together all of those traditions into one piece.

So it might be some of the Iranian music, some of the Indian instruments, some special Chinese kind of flute, and the classical cello or violin, and different kinds of tonalities. I mean, it's really wild. And he'd bring it together.

So you can see I get really enthusiastic. I think it's so wonderful, this openness, this bringing together. And in my mind, I think how incredible that you can do that—bringing together musicians who are then writing music where they're mixing all the different ways and the different instruments from all over the world.

I still think that. But that's in my mind.

When I actually listened to it on the first album—and there have been many more since—I kept listening. And my ear couldn't like it. I wanted to love it; I love the idea of it. And if I hear each separately, you know, if I hear the Chinese instruments, it's beautiful. Same with the Iranian. But when they put it together with the Mongolian throat singers and the classical instruments, my ear just can't hear it in a relaxed way. Much as I want to, much as I think it's wonderful.

That kind of amuses me in a way. And I keep trying. But I see it's not right or wrong. I can see that thinking about embracing a view isn't transformative. And it doesn't mean that I have to like it. But can I just listen totally free of assumptions and conditioning? Yes, so far not. There might be moments one can. But just looking to see—this is what the Buddha is saying—looking and seeing how the mind works.

Now, there's not suffering in what I'm describing, unless I get upset because I can't really go, "Wow, I just love this. Let me listen to this in the car all the time." I start and then I go, no. If I got upset about that, then that would be suffering. But I can see, oh, that's how it is now. I love the idea, but the ear is just used to what it's used to, and I'd rather hear Chopin piano nocturnes. That's just how it is. It's not good or bad. And someone else would be completely different based on their conditioning, and that's not good or bad either.

But just to see—I like looking at these different levels—to see how it is, not to think we can think our way through these things. We're so used to, many of us, thinking that we can understand through thinking. That's what mindfulness is helping us drop underneath. The thoughts can be useful, can turn our mind to the Dhamma. We had thoughts that brought us to this retreat. Thoughts are useful. But then we turn our attention into just the simplicity of presence, just as we are.

As mindfulness is remembered more and more frequently, gradually it develops its own momentum. In other words, it gets easier and easier; it starts to happen more. You know, like our old habits happen by themselves. We don't think, "Now let me cultivate a little bit of greed and aversion." No, it happens all by itself and knows how to do it very well, thank you.

So we're learning to cultivate mindfulness. We come to appreciate moments of awareness more than we appreciate our entrancements with our reactions of mind to whatever is arising. Let me say that again. We come to appreciate moments of awareness more than we appreciate the entrancements with reactions of the mind to whatever is arising.

For example, about recognizing thinking. Thinking. We appreciate that moment—ah, awareness is here again, thinking—we appreciate that, rather than getting entranced by our reactivity and our judgment and our ideas about what should be happening. We're entranced by that. But instead we say, oh yeah, here's awareness again. Oh, and judging is like this. And we're more appreciating the awareness.

That starts to become a bit more natural. And as Sayadaw U Pandita says, when mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, this is where the steadiness comes in. You can't stay steady through the whole day, but the willingness to try and remember—the sitting, the walking, the eating—that's why this matters. Practicing once and then forgetting doesn't work. It's the steadiness, and that just takes time and patience.

When mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, wisdom arises. There will be insight into the true nature of mind and body. That's really the whole game. The steadiness of clear seeing, the steadiness of mindfulness of just what's happening by itself, is a condition for wisdom—paññā. Not thinking wisdom, but the wisdom of really recognizing, insight into the true nature of mind and body.

And one of the beautiful things about when there's really that wisdom that's recognizing—it's not an act of will, of personal will—but when wisdom recognizes how things are, the confusing reactions naturally drop away. Like Sayadaw U Tejaniya's story about the sound. When the wisdom was just present—oh, that's just sound—all the suffering reactions dropped away. That's a natural effect of wisdom. I love that because it's not like you have to figure it all out and then somehow put it down. We can trust that the steadiness of mindful awareness is setting up the condition for this to happen.

So I just want to end with a little inspiring story of a friend of mine who's passed away. This person was a long-time meditator, probably one of the more accomplished yogi meditators among just regular people that we knew—someone who'd done a lot, a lot of retreats. A person that started in their middle age, not when they were young. A person who lived a very rich and full life outside of here, who had done many things in their life, really quite accomplished. So they had a very rich life and done a lot of practice. And so, really, very wise. The sort of person the Tibetans often call a "secret yogi"—someone just living a normal life, where regular people wouldn't know anything special about them, but they had really quite profound wisdom.

I was visiting them when they were in their nineties, the last couple of years of their life, living in a nice assisted living place—they had some money. Just in a little apartment. The body was frail and couldn't really go out and do much. I was just having a visit and they were saying, "You know, this is the most interesting time of my life."

Yeah. Sincerely. This was a very sincere person.

And I said, "Really? But you've done so many interesting things and practiced..." They couldn't practice formally that much anymore. The life seemed so constricted, you know?

They said, "No. No, it's like... it's all right here in this moment. When I walk across the room to the little kitchenette, that's everything. All of life is present here in this moment, walking across the room. When I'm putting the tea kettle on to heat, that's everything. The totality of presence in that moment. And life is so alive. Every moment is so interesting."

Dipa Ma said a similar thing: every moment is so interesting.

And this was so completely honest from this person. And you realize the interest is not in the activity. The interest isn't in the object. The interest is in the quality of wakefulness in the heart and mind, that quality of presence—and what I would call the purity of the citta, of consciousness. Purity meaning just not in any kind of dissonance. Not trying to hold back from the experience because it's maybe unpleasant or not good enough. Not half present and half thinking about something else, but just here with it. Just walking across the room is all of life. It's really quite amazing.

And I heard later, when this person was in hospice, they said the same thing: "This is the most interesting time of my life."

So that's really the direction, this quality of simple mindfulness. It seems like nothing special, or like work, in the moment. But it's really taking us in this direction. The freedom is this quality of real presence, freedom of heart and mind in this moment without pulling away, without making it a story.

So just having the trust, the faith, to be present for this next moment.

That's it.

That's it. That's all we can do.

Thank you very much for your kind attention.

May the beneficial energies of our sincere practice together be a cause of our own awakening from suffering and confusion. May it also be a cause and condition for all beings to awaken from suffering and confusion.

CHAPTER 189

Power of Steady Awareness to Change Our Relationship to Life

Carol Wilson · 48 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the transformative power of recognizing our innate awareness—something so close and available yet consistently overlooked. Drawing on teachings from Sayadaw U Tejaniya and insights from Anam Thubten, she describes how we habitually get pulled into whirlpools of worry, fear, and blame, losing touch with our natural dignity and capacity for compassion.
> Wilson explains the three aspects of vipassanā practice: experiencing mind and body directly (simple sati), maintaining continuity moment to moment, and holding right understanding (sammā diṭṭhi). She emphasizes how the subtle arising of 'me' and 'mine' in relation to vedanā (feeling tone) creates the conditions for afflictive emotions to multiply. Through careful attention to this process, we can discover that awareness itself is never disturbed by what it knows—the awareness of embarrassment isn't embarrassed, the awareness of pain isn't suffering.
> The talk offers practical guidance for retreat practice: trusting awareness rather than seeking meaning from objects, recognizing that even mundane experiences are doorways to awakening, and understanding that we don't attain awareness but rather learn to recognize it. Wilson quotes Ajahn Chah on how one who knows the Dhamma has a mind at peace that naturally resolves difficulties, neither lost in delight at gain nor excessively upset at loss—truly knowing the world clearly as a lokavidu.

I guess I'm going to talk about awareness tonight. It's all I ever talk about—it seems like it's all I ever talk about because it's what I always want to talk about. It's so amazing, the power of recognizing our innate natural awareness as it becomes steadier and steadier. It's so liberating. And awareness is so available, yet it's so overlooked by us in our life.

You know, it's like the Tibetan saying: it's closer than your eyelids, yet you can't see it. And then when we do notice awareness of something, the something that we're aware of pulls us in more. Even if we dislike it—"I dislike it"—there's a lot more juice in that than "oh, awareness of dislike." So we get in there. But awareness itself is such an amazing, liberating, beautiful, freeing, completely natural, no-quality non-thing.

I'll talk a little more, just a bit of elaboration really, about our practice here—the practical way we cultivate steady, stable recognition. Simple awareness. Simple recognizing of what's happening, whatever is happening. And how this really works to open our heart and mind from the dream of constriction and reactivity and loneliness and fear, to the potential to just be here with oneself, with others, in a different way. Still here, though.

We're all familiar with the Buddhist story—I won't go into that. But the point, really, is that when the Buddha awoke and declared himself the peaceful one, truly free from the torments and suffering of the afflictive emotions, living a life of ease and peace, the point to recognize is that the world didn't change. He was living in a human body, with a human mind, with other human beings, and the nature of the world didn't change. The freedom, the peace he discovered was not about somehow making everything better. It didn't mean the body doesn't get sick. It didn't mean any of that.

So what is this peace, this freedom? What's the direction he opened up and pointed to—found in so many other spiritual ways too? And what is the direction we can begin to glimpse in little moments? Start to get just an intuition, an apprehension of how this is really a possibility, in moments here and now. How can conscious awareness—the steady, mindful awareness of just what's happening—affect our understanding of the world in such a way? Because that's what changes: the understanding. How we understand ourselves and understand the world. And the responses and reactions and qualities that arise in our heart and mind based on that understanding.

Here's an example. A while ago I was listening to a talk by Anam Thubten, a Tibetan lama who lives in the Bay Area in California. I like him very much. He's funny, but he's very—I don't know, I just like him. He's tuned in. This really stuck with me. It was last year, but it could be now. It's just more and more true. He was talking about the really challenging times that we're all living in, how really distressing things are.

And he said: any of us can so easily be overwhelmed by the challenges—personal, in the world, whatever particular one is hitting us at a certain time. We're so easily overwhelmed, as if pulled into a whirlpool of worry, of fear, of anger, self-blame, other-blame. We're spinning in this whirlpool of really suffering emotions and thoughts. Can anybody relate to that at all?

Sometimes it's such a habit we don't even know. The particular thing that distresses us comes up, or we hear something, or we read one line of the news—that's enough often—and into the whirlpool we go. Sometimes we're just spinning helplessly in it. Other times, even when we've been cultivating awareness and wisdom, we can still be sucked in.

And he says—this is him—we're swirling in this whirlpool, in this world, and it's kind of the way of the world. It's often, in my opinion, exacerbated by how things are set up. For example, I don't know if you've noticed, but often when you see on TV that there's been some kind of disaster—something like a cyclone, not even something deliberately caused by other humans—some news person runs up to someone whose house has been destroyed, sticks the microphone in their face, and says, "Who do you blame for this?" Have you noticed that? So often asking, "Who do you blame?" As if this should be the first response, the first thing someone should say, immediately. If anything bad happens, there's definitely got to be someone to blame. And often we blame ourselves.

Sometimes, when I've seen this—I mean, I could be projecting, I don't know what's in the person's mind—but they look kind of taken aback. And then they seem to clock in, figuring out who they should say they could blame.

We feel compelled to blame someone. But this cycle can become so consuming that, as Adam Tesfon says, when this happens we lose touch with the natural dignity of love, compassion, and wisdom. When we're spinning in this swirl of fear, anxiety, and blame—whether directed at self or other—we've lost touch with what the Dalai Lama spoke of, our true human values. We've lost touch with present moment awareness. This brings us back to Anantapta.

He says we practice in order to re-recognize awareness, again and again. How can that be so powerful? Because when we're not just sucked into the swirl but suddenly aware of the swirl, something shifts. It's not that all of that magically disappears and we find ourselves living on some cloud of peace. But the shift from being sucked into that swirl of pain to the awareness of it restores that confidence, that taking refuge, that trust. In that moment, we're with awareness rather than giving all our energy and belief to the emotions and the story as being who we are.

We practice to re-recognize awareness, and with it comes access to kindness and compassion. These we can offer to the world. That's what Anantapta is saying, and it's an amazing power that recognizing awareness can have.

You don't have to believe what he's saying or what I'm saying. I'm offering it as an example, as a pointing—something to have a look at in our practice, in our time here. It doesn't have to be the huge swirl of the most suffering experience. It can be stubbing your toe walking up the stairs and thinking, "They should have a sign on these stairs!" Or someone saw you stumble and now you're thinking, "Oh my god, I'm so embarrassed." That's a little mini swirl, but we can get caught in it.

Practice just the awareness of embarrassment. It feels like this. It doesn't mean the embarrassment goes away, but that velcro that sucks us in, that being the embarrassment, wondering what they think—it changes completely. Awareness of embarrassment. The awareness itself isn't embarrassed.

Little things. Check it out. Explore it. The steadiness of awareness is incredibly powerful. So that's our practice.

One definition of Vipassana meditation that I like—this comes from Sayadaw U Tejaniya, but it's not unique to him, and Alexis alluded to it this morning without saying it directly—is that Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly, from moment to moment, with the right understanding. Sometimes Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls that the three jobs of a yogi: experiencing the mind and body (that's simple mindfulness, simply recognizing what's happening), from moment to moment (that's the perseverance, the steadiness, the continuity through the day), and with the right understanding (that's what makes it right mindfulness—not "I know what's happening" while being lost in thought).

I'll say a little bit about each of these.

So knowing, experiencing the mind and body directly. Simple sati, samma sati, right mindfulness as it's described in the Noble Eightfold Path. None of this is anything you don't already know. You've all been practicing, you all know mindfulness—the awareness, the attention, simply being with what's arising. So simple, just as it is, without adding anything extra.

A sensation arises and you know it. You can just feel it. Maybe perception—that recognition, just a factor of mind—comes in and notes "tight" or "hurts" or something. It's just that. Sati recognizes it as that and leaves it as that. It's free from elaboration, from preference, from judgment, from wondering what it means about me, from comparing to how it was yesterday, from how we wish it was at another time, from thinking it means we have to go to the hospital. It's simply sensation.

Can you get a sense of how totally easeful our lives could be if we could really live like that? And immediately the mind goes, "No, you can't just have sensation, because you have to function."

You can't just be hearing sensation, sensation. You have to know that the sound of the bell means you get up and walk out.

Once I was on a retreat myself, a three-month retreat, and I'd been sitting quite a while. It was deep into it. I was practicing not exactly in this style—a little more directed attention—but still the same mindfulness. Basically, I would just be noticing what happened. So I started coughing. Cough, cough. I'd feel tickle, tickle. Cough, cough. Notice hearing, seeing. There wasn't a lot of elaboration at this point. It was pretty mindful.

And then at one point: cough, cough—oh my gosh, I've got bronchitis. That was a thought. But at that time, I used to get bronchitis quite a lot and I'd get really sick from it. So that thought had a little bit of oomph to it, unnoticed. "Oh my God, I've got bronchitis." Then: cough, cough, tickle, tickle. I didn't have to do anything. And the whole thing calmed down. I could just be noticing.

But it doesn't mean you don't know what's happening. If the coughing had kept getting worse, without being reactive, the thought "this is bronchitis" could arise. There'd be the sense: do I need to go to the doctor? Do I not? Thinking arises. Thinking is known. Mindfulness can be aware of all of the six senses—all the physical and the mental sense. We can know what's happening. That's not the same as all the reactivity and elaboration that comes when it isn't quite mindfulness, when we're getting confused with the reactions. And that's where everything goes wonky, right?

When it's not just hearing or seeing—say you're sitting here feeling tired. Okay, feeling tired is like this. Awareness notices tiredness. And really, it's not a problem. It's tired. It doesn't mean it feels good. It doesn't feel good. It feels like this.

What makes the difference here? The right understanding that the Buddha talked about, that Uteshanu is talking about—when we are mindful with the right understanding, what allows it to be simple without adding all this elaboration is when there's not that adding to the experience of me or mine.

A sensation arises. And you can see this in your own practice. It doesn't need some great esoteric deep concentration to see it. It could be something simple like a little niggle in the back. You just feel it. You're just aware and noticing things. And then—like my bronchitis—suddenly the thought comes: "Oh my God, this could really be a bad thing in my back."

Now, if that thought isn't noticed, already it's become my sensation, my back. That thought comes up and there's a little bit of fear, a little bit of aversion. The afflictive emotion has started to kind of feed off of the mindfulness, and it starts to distort the mindfulness. So what was just a little sensation now is my back, my pain. How long can I sit with this? The aversion starts getting stronger, there are more thoughts about it, we start having memories of our past life—I mean this life, past times in this life. We'll just stay in this life; it's enough to deal with. We start worrying about the future, start looking at everyone else, start thinking: who's to blame? Those teachers for making us sit so long.

This was the stupidest thing I ever did in my life—and on and on the mind goes. We're way, way down the line from simple sensation or simple unpleasant feeling. This is where the afflictive emotions, the torments of mind, come up and multiply. And it all starts from that subtle sense of me, that subtle sense of mine, which is arising. It arises and passes. It arises so much of the time. But there are times when it doesn't.

When these kilesas, these torments, are not recognized—when something arises and we don't quite see them—that's when it's not the simplicity of mindfulness. That's when we've got the beginning of a little mini whirlwind, or a really big one.

One other thing that can happen in the way we're practicing here, with just awareness noticing whatever's occurring: maybe nothing particularly difficult comes. Just seeing, hearing, sensation. And then suddenly it's like—boring. There's nothing, so what? Seeing, hearing, smelling—so what? I mean, we want to bring an awareness that leads to some insight. It's called insight meditation, right? So shouldn't there be something a little more interesting than hearing, hearing, oh that person's coughing, okay coughing, I don't like it, okay not liking?

It's boring. Again, we don't quite recognize this as one of the afflictive states, but that's delusion covering over. It's a subtle disconnect. When we're saying boring, too mundane, not really interesting enough—there's a subtle pulling away, a subtle aversion. And I see for myself that this could be present a lot in life. When we're actually feeling rather at ease, not caught in a lot of wanting or a lot of aversion, it can be like a pseudo heading towards equanimity. Oh yeah, it's peace. Uh-huh, yeah, it's fine. It's nice. Okay, it's like this. Whatever. You want to go out? Whatever. It's all equanimous. No—it's all disconnect.

But when there's that genuine relaxing, that opening, that really committing and trusting to just open with fullness of presence into this moment, whatever it is—as Dipa Ma said, who was a wonderful Bengali woman with really profound, deep practice, who died in the late eighties or early nineties—she said: when you're really awake, nothing is mundane. Nothing is mundane.

When awareness is recognizing experience—that being confident, having confidence, resting in the awareness rather than looking to the experience to affirm us or give us meaning or feel good or feel bad—just awareness is so... it's not necessarily joyful, but it's just alive.

And so that's why I keep wanting to talk about it and keep inviting us all to keep recognizing more and more. Because it's such a little shift—from being aware of an unpleasant sensation to being in the unpleasant sensation. The sensation doesn't go away, but that shift to the awareness of it, somewhat like what I was reading from Ajahn Tuffon though that was a stronger experience—it's amazing because the thing is still occurring, yet the suffering about it is gone. Even if it's just a quick moment. And when you recognize that, it's not me recognizing; it's just like that, just obvious.

As we go through the practice—and our practice here is just moment after moment remembering, that's all, nothing special—

All these so-called mundane experiences—everything, everything that arises—we can be aware of. Each moment becomes a doorway to simply recognize: oh yes, awareness again. Oh yes, here's awareness. Oh yes, awareness of hearing. Awareness of boredom. There's nothing awareness can't notice.

And as we go through the days, awareness gets a bit more natural. What really becomes natural is that we trust it a little more. We have a little more confidence, a little more willingness to recognize it. It's not that we don't recognize it because we're recalcitrant or obtuse or stupid—it's that the habits of our mind, the habits of how we've learned to relate to life, are just so strong. These are the habits that bring us into identification with experience and into the reactions of the afflictive emotions.

One of the main ways these habits form is moment to moment to moment. But because they form moment to moment, they're also ceasing moment to moment. Remember, nothing's more than a moment.

Something Ajahn Sumedho said—I liked how he described it. He was describing how we live in these bodies, how we are these bodies and minds. He says, and I like his phrasing, that we live as sensitive forms. In other words, the five sense doors and also the mind are experiencing constant input, aren't they? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, emotions. If you close your eyes, as Alexis said, there's still kind of visual images. You can stop your ears, but there's still some sound going on. We're not trying to shut anything out—and you couldn't even if you tried. You couldn't go through the day, you couldn't go through five minutes, without constant sense input. That's what our life is: the five senses and the mental one.

And as the Buddha described—and you all know this—every sense contact you experience comes with vedanā, with a quick feeling tone in the mind of it being either slightly pleasant, slightly unpleasant, or kind of neutral. The Buddha thought that little experience of subtle pleasant or subtle unpleasant or neutral with each contact was so important to bring mindfulness to that when he taught the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the discourse Alexis talked about on the four foundations of mindfulness, he broke experience into four different areas. The first is the body. The second is vedanā. He broke that out as being absolutely key to explore.

Why? Because with the steady awareness of seeing how it works, the truth reveals itself, and we can stop getting so caught in the habit.

So let me just describe it a bit. This constant sense contact, from the moment we're born, arises together with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. This is going on, arising and ceasing, arising and ceasing. You get the drift? It's kind of understandable, in a way, how frequently we tend to space out when we're not really aware, and how we tend to get caught in our reactions to pleasant or unpleasant. We seek sense experience, but—maybe this isn't true for any of you—I've certainly noticed there are times when I'd really like a break from the constant arising and passing, arising and passing: pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, unpleasant, seeing, hearing. You don't even realize, you know. But if there's a little bit of reactivity in you—not at all of them, but at many of them—that's one of the reasons things are so tiring. We don't even notice that.

So the right information is this: there's a sound, slightly pleasant. That can be noticed, and that's all. The right information is that's just what's happening. Awareness notices. There doesn't have to be anything extra. As soon as the sense of "me" or "mine" comes in—that sound is unpleasant, my unpleasantness is bothering me—there's the constriction. Even though it's little, even though it's very subtle at first, that's the beginning in that moment of the afflictive emotion.

"It's so hot. Heat, heat. I'm hot. I'm really hot." Just that little bit of difference. We're not saying right or wrong, good or bad. We're saying we can bring awareness to notice this too. This is where the steadiness of mindfulness through the day allows us to... We don't even have to look for it. Just stay steady with awareness. Keep coming back when you realize it's gone.

You can't help but notice the difference. Notice how as soon as the sense arises that "this sound is bothering me." And if you stay with awareness, you can notice a little bit of tightness, a little bit of thought—what can I do? What's the matter? That person is making that sound and they are making me feel aversion. That shouldn't be happening.

Susan and I were just laughing because in a way I said, no one else can make us feel aversion. Aversion arises in our heart and mind when there's unpleasant, and there's a sense of holding on to that unpleasant and really falling into the spiral. Awareness can recognize, "This really feels unpleasant." And that's it. Nothing extra.

But you see, as I'm saying this, that doesn't sound like amazing, wonderful freedom, does it? You didn't come here and say, "Oh, I can sit and feel my back hurting and say, 'Oh, that's just unpleasant sensation, nothing extra.' And they're telling me that's freedom." I don't think so.

But we start where we are. And you will have like the subtle, "Oh, my back's hurting, okay, pain, it's just pain, it's just pain." And the clinging to the aversion can be so subtle that we don't quite recognize it. We're trying, really trying to be mindful, and in the back of the mind—way back there—if I'm mindful correctly with this unpleasant sensation, that means it goes away, right? Because I said that that's freedom. Freedom means this unpleasant thing's going to go away.

That is such... it just keeps getting in there again and again and again. I can't tell you how often I'll find being with something—I'm really quite aware, I know there's awareness, I noticed the thoughts of aversion, so I'm really aware—but it's still... you can still feel you're caught. You can still feel that little swirl is going on, and you start trying to look and see what's the swirl, but the looking is colored by aversion. I'm looking to see why am I swirling and why is this stupid thing still here when I'm being mindful?

It keeps slipping in, slipping in. And then, because we keep practicing, you recognize, "Okay, I don't like it, I don't like it, I think I'm mindful, I don't like it." And suddenly, suddenly—because when we're with awareness, awareness can be with aversion, awareness can be with greed, simply another thing happening. The aversion and the greed might be strong enough that they keep arising and you really bring awareness to them. But at some point, the attention is feeding the awareness, not the greed. At some point, that clinging, that velcro drops away, and it's just, "Oh."

And it really is just sitting there with a sensation, and there's no problem. It might not last long, but notice when that happens. That's what I mean by the sense of a subtle apprehension, starting to see how these things can work. It's really quite... it turns into a real voyage of discovery. A real voyage—how is the mind working? How do these afflictive emotions arise in this heart-mind in this moment? And how do they cease in this same heart-mind in another moment?

All we need to do is just step back into this moment of noticing what's happening. We don't have to figure it out intellectually. We don't have to try and change what's happening. Life is doing itself. Simple awareness is just to notice that. Notice that without adding the story of me to it. And when that story comes up, awareness notices that too.

So what we're really starting to do is trust—trust more and more and more the simplicity of awareness. Our habit is to look to the objects, right? A really beautiful experience or some wonderful experience happens in the meditation, or something wonderful happens in your life, or something difficult happens, or just a sound you don't like. But the habit is, with the pleasant, the unpleasant, we're so used to taking pleasant as good, right, the way it's supposed to be. Unpleasant is bad, wrong. There's something wrong with me or something wrong with the world.

We go to blame if that happens. Neutral experience we don't notice at all.

And without being aware of this pattern, that's where we get into the wanting—always leaning into something nicer, something better, or holding on to what we have. The pushing away, trying to get rid of the stuff we've decided isn't good. It's always about what does this mean about me? How is it fulfilling me or affirming me, or making me feel that there's something wrong with me because this is arising?

Do you get a sense of how complicated that makes everything? And it's completely our habit. So walking out of here, you start noticing, "Oh look, I'm doing all this me-ing." Of course you are. We all are. It's also not personal. It's just a habit, and awareness notices that. You just get interested in seeing how this works. Seeing how—oh, just be with what is. Just be with what is. But I don't like what is. Okay, be with not liking.

We don't trust that at first because we're so used to getting our sense of meaning from objects, wanting the good ones and wanting to get rid of the bad ones. We're just caught in that. It's like gravity. It seems so true we don't even recognize it.

That's how this moment-to-moment steady awareness is so radical. Because it's like—just really drop into what's happening now and know that you're noticing it.

Why it's so difficult—and that's a whole other talk—is because all of our habit is to get the heck away if it's unpleasant. And if we're trying to get away, there's no way of recognizing what's actually happening. So that's why it's practice. That's why we talk about the huge swirl that Anam Thubten talked about, or all the pain in the world, or something difficult in your life. What's useful about being on a retreat is you can work with... it's the same way the mind works with stubbing your toe. It works in the same way. Use these little experiences. That's why we talk about the steadiness through the day. Whatever you're doing is mindfulness practice, because that's where we're really going to go on this voyage of discovery and see how the mind works.

So don't try to think, "I shouldn't have aversion." That doesn't work. When aversion comes up, how is it? How do you recognize it? How does awareness notice aversion?

As Ajahn Sumedho always says—instead of going, "Aversion's like this." That doesn't help everybody, but it helps me a lot. When something's going on and I'm trying to name it, I'm trying to see it, but it feels too busy—I can tell there's efforting, I can tell there's doing. I'm not spaced out, but... "It's like this now." I don't even try to name it. It's like this now. Attention completely opens, drops into the body-mind. It's like this now. You just open and feel it, just for that moment.

It's a world of difference—the shift from identifying with something to awareness of it. It's so nothing and it's so everything.

So that's why being on retreat, seven days and seven nights, with all the little stuff that goes on—each moment is equally valuable for recognizing awareness, for letting the steady awareness show us how the mind works, how suffering is created, how when the afflictive emotion isn't being fed, the compassion comes, or the mettā for oneself, or the generosity—how that naturally comes. So many chances to see that, and it doesn't have to be any kind of wonderful experience. Some of the biggest insights, where you suddenly think, "Oh, I really see it"—

It can come just from—I don't know—touching the silverware and feeling the coldness. One time I remember I was very aware of eating and chewing and swallowing, and then I swallowed, and it was so clear. I mean, this sounds silly, but that's how insights are sometimes. It was so clear that the food was gone. It's gone. It's really gone. I mean, this is huge—wow, it really was here, and now it's really gone. It's turned to something else. Little things, you know. That's how it is.

Don't be waiting for some big lights-going-off moment, thinking that you're sitting here with tinnitus in your ears, sick of listening to me talk, wishing you could go to bed. That's the moment, because this is the only moment we have to really be here.

So this starting to, and continuing to, really bring our confidence, our trust into awareness—it's a beginning to abandon our entrancement with experience, with samsara, this endless round of sensations and wanting and losing, wanting and losing, just wanting more and more sensation.

I heard this advertisement on the radio last week. It was for Disney World, going on about this and that, screaming and yelling. And right at the end, the announcer says, "Disney World. Every amazing feeling ever, and all at once." Oh my God, it sounds like a nightmare. But that was their ultimate advertisement to get you to come. This is the world we live in. Then I thought later—what if that was true? What would the poor six-year-old kid do, having had every amazing feeling you could ever have all at once? What are they going to do for the rest of their life?

Anyway, when you put it like that, it's kind of nice to put down that entrancement. It's beyond kind of nice to be able to just be present in this moment without all the reactivity, without needing it to be other, without needing something to fulfill me. And we can only begin to know and trust this from our own experience.

I'm just up here trying to share, hopefully just to entice you to keep looking, because this sense of steady awareness is always available. The movement from identification and wanting and aversion to "oh, it's like this"—it's always available. When the afflictive emotions are so strong, yes, sometimes we can't quite notice awareness. And as we go through the days, that's one of the ways we can offer little tips about meditating: how to take care of our awareness, to move it away from the all-compelling difficulty to something more neutral. You'll hear us say it's not about getting a better object—it's about what supports recognizing awareness, taking care of awareness.

So we start; every moment the Dhamma is revealing itself. That's why, as we go through these days, the perseverance—the third job of the yogi—is this: of course you can't be mindful every moment, of course not. Don't even think that. Or you can think it, but just notice you're thinking it. When we've forgotten, the next moment can remind: "Oh yeah, right—touching. All right, stepping. All right, thinking." And it doesn't matter what was going on before. We're here again. We're here again.

As we said, this becomes more natural. Right now it's not natural because we're entranced by what's occurring, entranced by objects. As we get more established, you can kind of fall in love with awareness in a way that isn't personal. We still know what's happening—maybe more clearly, because we're not so gripped by it. We can respond more appropriately, from wholesome states, from wisdom, from non-clinging, from non-blame, from non-greed. We can perhaps have a clearer sense of appropriate action.

So in our week here together, as we said, we're really not trying to achieve something in a short time or a long time. I know—this is what our minds know how to do. You don't come here for seven days without thinking you should have something to show for it at the end. If you do, it won't last anyway; nothing does. But we're here to have all these moments to practice recognizing awareness.

That's an incredible gift in the world. As Anam Thubten said, in any moment when we can relax back into awareness, that sense of dignity arises that allows for the beautiful qualities of heart and mind to emerge. And that's then what we share with the world. When we're lost in our afflictive emotions, that's what we share with the world.

So we're not trying to achieve something. We're simply using this time, whatever we're doing, to practice recognizing awareness. Starting from mindfulness—what's happening now? And then recognizing that we're aware of what's happening now. That's all. So simple.

And once we start to trust that a little, when we can relax into it a bit, we stop thinking subconsciously that we have to have some kind of worthwhile experience to be mindful of, something to talk about—not just seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting. When that starts to relax, when we start to trust the recognition of awareness, everything begins to shift. That's really what we're doing here.

As Ajahn Sumedho says, awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts, our emotions, our sensations. It's not about making value judgments. Awareness is about knowing these things fully. They are what they are at this moment. It's a kind of total freedom to receive life just as it's arising in this moment, just as you experience it. You don't have to fix it. You don't have to make some meaning. You don't have to say, "What does it mean about me?" Just receive it as it arises in this moment. That's why continuity is so key.

Here's another little practice hint from Sayadaw U Tejaniya. As we go through the day, whatever's arising, awareness of it—very simple. But remember, we're not trying to create something. We're not rejecting what is happening. And as things begin to happen, or they stop happening—say something difficult stops happening—we don't forget awareness either. A lot of times when we're really working with something and it goes away, we think, "Oh, thank God!" Like when the bell rings: "Oh, thank God!" We just forget awareness. But we don't forget. Acceptance of an experience does not mean we forget about being aware. Acceptance means we're really more present because we're not struggling with it anymore.

I want to end with a couple of short quotations. From Mingyur Rinpoche: "Discovering our own awareness allows us to access the natural steadiness and clarity of the mind, which exists independent of conditions and circumstances, and independent of our emotions and moods." This is a big one to start to trust. Awareness is aware of our emotions and moods, but it allows us to access the natural steadiness and clarity of mind independent of our emotions and moods. Awareness does not increase or decrease whether we are happy or sad. We don't attain awareness. Rather, we learn to recognize it.

And the effect this can have on our life—I want to read one thing from Ajahn Chah. He was a great Thai forest monk, a meditation master from the last century. He was the teacher of Ajahn Sumedho and kind of the founder of that whole school of monks and nuns from Amaravati. He was very down to earth. I just picked this book up somewhere: Everything is Teaching Us. Just the name is good—everything is teaching us.

So: "Whenever a person's mind enters the Dhamma, then the person has well-being. The person has a mind at peace. The mind then has a way to resolve difficulties. When pain and illness afflict the body, the mind resolves it naturally, understanding this is natural and not falling into depression or fear over it. Gaining something, we don't get lost in delight. Losing it, we don't get excessively upset. But rather, we understand that the nature of all things is that having appeared, they then decline and disappear."

With such an attitude, we can make our way in the world. We are loka vidū, knowing the world clearly. The Buddha was said to be the loka vidū, knowing the world clearly. But when we're seeing just as it is in this moment, knowing the world clearly, then samudaya, the cause of suffering, is not created. Greed is not born. There is wisdom, knowledge of things as they really are, and it illumines the world.

This is a lot to take in, but it really does arise from our willingness to just keep cultivating the simplicity of steady awareness.

I'd like to sit quietly for a moment after this sharing.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 190

Exploring Awareness of Thought

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this comprehensive exploration of the mind's relationship to thought, Carol Wilson investigates why we habitually privilege thinking over direct experience, despite thoughts being the most ephemeral of all sense experiences. Drawing from her own retreat insights and the teachings of Ajahn Buddhadāsa, Ajahn Sumedho, and Ajahn Chah, she illuminates the concept of atammayatā—the quality of non-fabricating or "not concocting"—as a doorway to understanding how we continuously construct our reality.

The talk traces the mechanics of papañca (mental proliferation) through the chain of vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), and thinking, showing how these quickly coalesce into views (diṭṭhi) and a solid sense of self (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Wilson offers Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu's insight that saṃsāra is not a place but a process—"the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them"—and demonstrates through relatable examples how our perceptions, shaped by memory and conditioning, generate elaborate mental constructions that we mistake for reality.

Practically, Wilson encourages recognizing moments of peace and non-fabrication, noting that calm and the absence of kilesa (defilements) are themselves valuable—we need not always seek dramatic positive states. She invites practitioners to look directly at thoughts, investigating their empty nature rather than following their content, using Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche's teaching about the lion who looks at who threw the stone rather than chasing the stone itself. The talk concludes with the liberating possibility of resting in awareness without alteration, where thoughts arise and disappear like ripples in water.

Tonight, I just wanted to share some reflections on the phenomenon of thought, of thinking, and the different ways it shows up—how we get caught, and so forth. None of this is going to be new to you. I'm just touching on a few different points that are interesting to me and have been helpful, hopefully to you as well.

A few years ago, I was doing a self-retreat, and for some reason at that time, the quality of thought became really interesting. Not the thought itself, but the way that the conditioning of my mind would give thought so much more importance and meaning than many other experiences—even though when I'd look directly at a thought with awareness, clearly it's just empty. So that's known on one level, but then to keep seeing how the attention, and maybe the belief, would keep privileging thought and the content of thought. Not always, but so frequently. And it just got really interesting to me, exploring it when I wasn't aggravated with it.

I was noticing how we take the thought description as a more real, accurate description of reality than what it was actually describing. There's a quotation from Audubon, the bird naturalist, who said that if there's a choice between the drawing of the bird and the bird, trust the bird. With thoughts, it's like trusting the thoughts describing the knee pain rather than feeling the sensation. That's a simple example—it gets more convoluted. But it's just kind of like, why? It's so empty. Why does this keep happening? And then it doesn't, as we know, just stop with the one thought.

I wanted to start with mentioning a word that's not often in the suttas, but Ajahn Buddhadasa spoke of it in the last years of his life. He was a great Thai forest bhikkhu, meditation teacher, and scholar. The word is atammayatā. It basically means "not made up of that." What it really points to is the quality, the state of heart and mind of non-fabricating, of not concocting—which I actually love, "not concocting." Not constructing. Based on non-identification prior to the quality of thought making distinctions between self and other, just not fashioning anything.

This is really, in a way, the highest peace—the heart and mind independent of responding or reacting to experience. It's not exactly nirvana, but it's up there. I just love this non-concocting idea because we can use it to explore ourselves, all the different kinds of ways that the habits of our mind do concoct out of experience. That's what Andrea was speaking about when she discussed the concoctions of sense of self the other night. It's a concoction, a fabrication.

Ajahn Sumedho talks about this too—how we create our world and ourselves. It's a concocted state of being, moment to moment. A concoction of the five khandhas, the five aggregates: a concoction of physical form, of vedanā (feeling tone), of mental states and concepts, of perception and consciousness. These things are happening often with thinking. It's not only with thinking, but thinking often holds the concoction together—this sense of "me," even though it's arising separately in each moment.

So in terms of thought, there are different ways thought creates, fabricates a reality, a concoction that just seems so real when we don't think to look at it. And sometimes when we do meet it with awareness, it still seems so real because we're so used to it. Ajahn Sumedho frequently talks about how we create a sense of self with our thoughts. Is that familiar to you? And you can't create a peaceful self. So try it out. Not that you haven't, but it's really interesting. You can't—because the concoctions, the fabrication, aren't actually in alignment with what's really going on.

In the broad way, we create a sense of self from thoughts and stories.

We're telling ourselves stories all the time. This is one of my current favorite quotations from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, who is one of the three living foremost translators of the Pali suttas into English.

He's talking about samsara. Samsara literally means "wandering on." Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live—you know, we're living in samsara, the place we leave when we go to nibbana. But in early Buddhist texts, samsara is the answer not to "where are we?" but to "what are we doing?" We're samsara-ing.

I love this. He says: "Samsara is not a place, it's a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart, the mind creates another and you go there. At the same time, you bump into other people who are creating their own worlds too."

Does it make sense? We never know what's going on with ourselves. We think we know what's going on with someone else, but they're in a completely different world. Things don't match.

This is on a really obvious level of our thoughts. We can just see how—and a lot of you have brought it up in the groups—even in one sitting, all these different worlds come. We're up, we're down, we're equanimous. We're seeing all our childhood failures. We're feeling so inspired. We're remembering some weird thing that happened. We're really upset about that person who looked at us cross-eyed, and then it turns out they weren't even there. There are all kinds of worlds we're creating. And without awareness, it's like we jump from world to world and still feel like it's the same me. Can you relate to this at all?

This is samsara. This is what we call the rounds of rebirth—never mind different lifetimes, but moment after moment being reborn into this particular world. This particular world of feeling hungry and wishing you had a good hamburger. This particular world of loving to look at all the beautiful young animals and feeling so fortunate. This particular world of feeling so tired you just want to fall on your face and never have to come into the meditation hall again. On and on and on. Some are obviously more difficult and more compelling than others.

But when we just start to tune in this way, to see how thought is concocting all these worlds, it's amazing. What's amazing is how much we don't recognize it. When we start to practice, when we're sitting, when awareness is just noticing thoughts—and then of course we get into what feeds them—we start to see those worlds. We start to see how it's changing.

It often comes together when people describe it in groups. They say, "Wow, it's amazing seeing all of this, the ups and downs and the coming and going." And just the sense—this is my language, not anyone else's—of awareness noticing this, and somehow there starts to be a sense of release from having to be the inhabitant of all those worlds.

Even in just one sitting, when you're not buying into each new world, isn't it a relief? It doesn't matter so much what's coming up. Isn't that a relief? We don't have to take our stand on every thought and mood and emotion that comes through. No wonder we're exhausted in life—we feel like we have to own each of those. Just having awareness receiving, letting it come and go, not concocting around it, is an incredible ease and peace.

So noticing, always noticing the concoctions—but just notice those moments of ease when it's not happening. You don't have to concoct anything around it. There's nothing to say about it. But I'm always encouraging people to notice these moments. You could call them a moment of alert awareness in which the heart-mind is free from kilesa. It's just a moment of presence, of is-ness, of just not creating anything. And often it's not necessarily ecstatic or anything.

It can be quite neutral, quite peaceful.

And so a lot of our cultivating awareness isn't just noticing the unwholesome, the suffering qualities in awareness, but also noticing the peace, noticing the wholesomeness, noticing the absence of kilesa.

We were saying in one of the groups today, talking about when there's not aversion, not ill will—and appreciating in the Theravada language, dosa is the overarching word for the kilesa of hatred and all its many subsets, down to the tiniest irritation or aversion. In the Pali, the way it's talked about, it doesn't jump right to metta. Instead there's a-dosa—the "a" is a negation. So, no dosa in the mind. That's lovely.

Metta is like a stronger mental state that we feel, and it's beautiful. It's not dosa either; it's metta. But it doesn't have to be metta to not be dosa. You don't have to feel love for all the world to recognize: there's no ill will, there's no aversion. It's just this.

Peace. You don't have to get attached to it. It's not what maybe you're looking for in the beginning of practice—we're often looking for something more positive. But this is just the peace of no-dosa.

Now, another way of understanding how the mind, the thoughts, and the mental states go out and concoct and create—maybe you've heard this. It's quoted in Ajahn Amaro and Ajahn Pasanno's book, The Island, which if you haven't seen, is really wonderful. It's a great compilation of many suttas and references, and also teachings from Ajahn Chah, since he was their teacher. It's all about awakening, sotapanna, enlightenment—just really good, with lots of quotations.

This is something from Ajahn Chah that I'd seen before. He's describing one way suffering and concoction happen when we're caught in thoughts. It's a kind of redescribing of the Four Noble Truths.

He says: "The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering."

Do you get a sense of that? Does that ever happen? The mind going out to satisfy its moods—this is, of course, without awareness.

"The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering." That's the first noble truth. He turns it on its head.

Then he says: "Seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering." That's kind of what we're doing—awareness of the mind. Seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

"And the result of seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering."

I like this, because turning it around makes you actually think rather than just running through the truths one, two, three, four. It also feels very much in alignment with this cultivation of steady awareness—the mind seeing the mind clearly.

Even in a moment, many of you have experienced this: when the mind is going out, caught up, there's suffering—maybe you wouldn't put it that way—and suddenly awareness recognizes clearly what's happening, and the suffering in that moment ceases. That's exactly this, just in a moment.

So that's another way to explore. Because it's thoughts, usually—the mind going out to satisfy its moods. But how does that usually manifest? This brings us to the next aspect, which you're all familiar with: how much of the mind going out to satisfy its moods is triggered by the reaction to vedana?

A lot, right? Maybe all. We don't want to say everything, but a lot.

You all know vedana—I'm assuming you know what we're talking about. The response to vedana. It's so pervasive. This isn't new information: when there's pleasant feeling, the habit of the mind is to cling.

We're all like, "Yeah, we know that." We do. So why? Why does it keep happening? Unpleasant—push away. Neutral, neither pleasant nor unpleasant—like the mind of delusion, you just don't notice it.

Actually, a few people have mentioned boredom coming up, and then bringing interest to boredom and seeing how it changes right away to something else. I love that. Boredom is one manifestation of awareness just not being quite connected to experience. Boredom is kind of like the deluded response to neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

I find looking at so-called neutral vedana really interesting, if vedana happens to be an aspect of experience that is naturally presenting itself to you in these days. I'm not saying you need to go out and explore vedana now—I'm not trying to direct practice in that way. But at different times, different aspects of our experience, as we're getting interested with the awareness, as the awareness is getting more steady, we start to see the cause and the effect, how the concoctions come and how they fall apart. At times like that, vedana might just start to be noticeable, just popping up. So explore it then. It's really interesting.

What I was going to say is that neutral vedana—I find it really fascinating in my own experience, but also talking to people over the years who come in for interviews and bring it up. Neutral is the way in to the experience of calm, the experience of peace. It's not the high of bliss. It's not the intensity of some incredible suffering that we know we're learning from.

Over all the years that I've taught on three-month retreats, people often come in and they're in practice—they're not just checked out, they're in practice—and they say, "Nothing's really happening. Stuff comes and goes," and they can describe it, but they feel like there's nothing. No mental states happening. "What's the point?" Really, over the years, I'll ask, "What about calm?" And they go, "Oh. Oh, calm. Yeah, yeah." It doesn't occur to them to notice calm. This isn't one or two times—it's common. And in our culture now, God forbid there should be thirty seconds we're not looking at the phone or on the internet or somehow feeding ourselves.

So it's fascinating. Again, non-aversion—it's peace, it's calm. It's not some big hullabaloo. And noticing it: this is peaceful. This is sublime, as the Buddha says—the non-creation of formations. So that's my little piece on appreciating when boredom comes. Wow, what's going on here? Then boredom's gone anyway, but just exploring it.

In terms of how vedana keeps catching us, Ajahn Sumedho said something in a talk that stuck with me. He said we are very sensitive forms. This mind-body experience that we're living—we are very sensitive forms. And we experience our life as constant vedana. Vedana is arising at every moment of sense experience, at any of the six sense doors. Every mind moment, as experience is arising, vedana is arising along with it. We're rising and ceasing, and it doesn't stop. It doesn't take a break.

So we're very sensitive. This is how we're experiencing life in these forms—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It doesn't have to be a problem, but that's how it is.

Don't believe me, and don't believe Ajahn Sumedho, but just notice from time to time. When things are coming and going very quickly and awareness is truly present—feeling pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—sometimes when there's that little or stronger coagulation of self around the experience, it can really feel oppressive. Of course, that's a little bit of aversion in the mind, but it's like so much is happening every moment. Please stop.

But when there's not that coagulation or aversion or clinging, just coming and going, coming and going, coming and going—it's fine. There's no leaning into the next moment, no wishing it would stop. It's just this. And it's gone already. As soon as you notice, it's gone. There's no comparing it to the past because there's only now. That's just how it is.

So we're sensitive forms, as Ajahn Sumedho says. But again, we all know this. The habits, though—Roy's been talking about the strength of the habits of mind: greed, hatred, confusion. These habits arise in a moment from this visceral, seemingly instinctive reaction to pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. We can notice it with awareness. It doesn't have to be a problem. Even the reaction doesn't have to be a problem. We're going to see that many times.

I could give three whole talks on this alone, so I'm really condensing because it's fascinating. But we can truly see it. It's not a problem that this happens. It's not a problem that we have aversion to it happening. Of course, nothing's a problem when awareness is there. But this is just to see how the concoctions keep happening so quickly and so frequently. One of the major beginning points of this construction is vedanā arising in the mind—pleasant, unpleasant—so quick.

It's so fast: from the pleasant thing not quite noticed to a whole world created of thought. So quick. And it can just be a simple world. A smell, a nice smell, not really noticing the pleasant quality. And within thirty seconds, you've gone from "What's for lunch?" to what you like, to your favorite bakery, to what you're going to do when you go home, to the dinner parties you're going to plan. My first three-month retreat, I planned all these dinner parties. Endless planning of dinners. I never gave one of them, but endless planning of dinner parties.

It's just—that's not a bad concoction, it's just a simple thing. But it can happen just like that, from the pleasant or from the unpleasant. And it can go to much stronger ones. I don't have to go into that.

We're so seduced so quickly into believing the thoughts. Pretty soon we don't even recognize that that's what's happening. The thought-constructed world becomes the description of the world. Never mind that back there with the dinosaurs, there was a moment of pleasant feeling that we didn't notice. We're way off in our world.

And this, of course, as we all know, is the phenomenon that's called papañca. It's also called conceiving. The Buddha talks about the tides of conceiving washing over one. Papañca is another word for this proliferation.

So feeling, vedanā, arises in every moment. And as the Buddha says, what one feels, one perceives. It's often said that feeling and perception seem to arise right together. One feels a pleasant feeling—it's a smell—and the perception arises: that smells like bread baking. It just comes right together.

It's like a little concoction, but that's not a problem. That's just what's happening.

When it turns into another world—this is the whole rest of the formula of papancha. What one feels, one perceives. And this is, of course, without balanced awareness. What one perceives, one thinks about. Oh, bread baking, some thoughts about it. What one thinks about, one complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas. And these notions then assail and overwhelm a person.

Something as simple as "that smells good, bread baking"—and we end up... I don't even know where my mind just ended up, I don't even want to say. But you could end up in horror. You could end up in some wonderful world of what you're going to... all over the place, just like that. Just like that. So fast.

These are the tides of conceiving that overwhelm and assail a person. You know that story about the monk who painted a picture of a tiger on the wall in a cave, and it was so realistic that when he turned around and looked at it, it scared him? That's what we're doing—concocting with thoughts, with this papancha.

I just want to say, in terms of awareness of thoughts, wherever we're noticing them: simply because a thought arises in our experience together with a strong emotion or a strong force or mental state does not make it more true or accurate. Sure, it calls our attention—awareness, noticing. What are the hooks? What's the mental set? What's going on with it? But so often when a thought is insistent or really coming with a lot of grief or a lot of wanting, we're overlooking the concoction and again giving the power to the content of thought.

And that's what's so amazing, because of all the experiences, all the six experiences, thought is by far the most ephemeral, the most empty. When you really look at a thought, what is it? Just this energy. Whatever the content is, that's just content, but all thought is just... And when strong emotion comes with it, we can sometimes miss that and give all this meaning to the thought. But in my experience, just because there's a lot of emotion doesn't make a thought more accurate. In my experience, it makes it a lot less accurate. It doesn't mean not notice it, but not so much believing it.

So: what one feels, one perceives. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates with associations, memories, and ideas. And these notions then assail and overwhelm a person. These are what you could call the tides of conceiving that wash over a person.

From vedana to saññā, perception—this place here is really where all the construction takes off into the ozone, if we're not quite aware at that point.

Thich Nhat Hanh—I read this so many years ago, before I even understood it, but it stayed with me because it seems true. Thich Nhat Hanh said all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. He's saying all. The Dalai Lama says something very similar. That is why there's so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge. That's really what our awareness is: just receiving direct experience. A perception is a direct experience, recognizing the perception, but not necessarily assuming the perception is accurate.

Of course, we know this. Perception is based on memory. So I don't know why I'm into bread baking. I don't know why that popped up, because I haven't smelled it and I haven't thought about bread all day. But that's the one we're sticking with. The smell comes up, perception of bread baking. Now, if you come from another culture and you've never smelled bread baking, that wouldn't be the perception that arose. The perception might be linked to something else that was familiar, or it might be not knowing.

Perception is so much based on memory and our own particular experience—our particular personal experience, our cultural experience, the experience of our family group, our cultural group, our ethnic group. Everything we've been through is affecting the perceptions that we have. Again, this is sort of back to what Thanissaro Bhikkhu was saying: because from the perception we create these worlds, and we're in our own world, and we think everyone else's is the same, but their perceptions are different. And so that's why there's so much colliding.

It's fun on retreat. Some people have mentioned this. When you notice that there's been a perception which you didn't quite recognize and your mind has been reacting to it—this frequently happens—and then something happens that bursts the bubble and you see that your perception was completely wrong? I love when that happens.

Like when I'm in the dining room on retreat and someone walks in the back that for whatever reason I have a reaction to. And who knows why? When it's a small group, you know each other a bit more. But you know how it is on big retreats when you haven't met anybody and you don't know anyone. Yet by this time, you would have some kind of opinion—maybe subliminal—about everyone. So the perception of the person is affected by that.

Someone walking by, there might be a sense of ease or there might be a little sense of pulling back. Maybe it reminds me of that person back when I was in school who was really a jerk and I didn't like being around him. But we don't question these things. Someone walks by, or they're sitting at the table near me eating, and I just kind of feel uncomfortable—like that kid in school I always had to eat lunch across from, and for some reason I just felt yucky. The poor person! He didn't do anything.

So you feel like that, and then the mind can go on and on and on, and then I turn and look, and it's not that person at all. That's happened to me more times than I can say. And then if you're really aware, the whole thing can just pop. The world pops. But if you're not quite aware, then you go, "Oh no, how stupid am I? And what was I thinking?" And then we're in another world—a different one, not a nice one either, but the same process. That's seeing how the perception can form a whole thing.

One woman told me once, years ago, she was working in an office—let's call her Helga—and she came in and went to work, and then someone she worked with, a friend, was really frowning and just giving her what they'd call a stink eye. Then the friend went off without talking. So the whole day Helga was thinking, "What did I do to her? I thought we were friends. Why is she so angry?" And every time Helga happened to see this woman, it was already colored by "Why is she angry at me?" She just saw the anger and went through this whole thing. You can imagine the whole day.

Then by the end of the day, somehow she had a conversation, and it was a completely made-up thing. Completely. The woman was having something sad happening at home. She hadn't even looked at Helga. She hadn't even noticed Helga. She was in her own world over there. But Helga had spent the whole day creating this world of suffering and self-blame and other-blame out of a perception that went unquestioned.

So it's easy to do. This is one of the great things about silence on retreat. Because once we start talking to each other out of our confused perceptions, sometimes it clears things up, but sometimes it just explodes. Here we can do the inner work. The other person really doesn't know what's coming up in your mind, so don't worry about that. We can just watch what the mind is doing. We're all doing it. Let's face it.

Joseph used to say—way back in my early days when I was sitting a three-month retreat, probably Jack actually, this sounds more like something Jack would say—imagine if there was a big screen and all of our thoughts were projected up on the screen. How horrible would that be? Horrible! So luckily we just have to explore our own ridiculous thoughts. And if we can laugh at them, just look at this. How do we believe them when we're looking at them? They're so ridiculous, most of them. Well, mine are. Maybe yours are all really deep.

Just looking at them and saying, how can we believe that?

So perception is a real driver for this. As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, the second thought believes the first. By the fifth thought, you're thinking, "Oh yeah, that's really true." By the tenth thought, you don't even know where it started, but this concoction has always been so, and this is the truth of the world. And how long does it take for ten thoughts to come? Boom.

So saññā – perception – drives vitakka – thinking. The perversions of perception: do we see inaccurately? Then we think inaccurately, like Helga making up all those stories about the other person working in her office. We think inaccurately. But then that's thinking. The tenth thought, as Sayadaw says, strengthens into diṭṭhi – into view. And this is like a stronger concoction of thought.

The bottom line view, of course, is sakkāya-diṭṭhi – view of self – as Andrea talked about. And that's kind of like the driver for all our confusion and suffering, really, arising moment to moment. But any view – it's basically a description that's really held to. As I read in one sutta, the Buddha says believing a view is like thinking, "This alone is true. Everything else is false." Well, that sounds so harsh. But when we look at this, Ajahn Sumedho says that without awareness, we can be totally committed to our views. Totally.

And views aren't just views of sense of self, views of the world, views of politics – God help us – views of ourselves. It can be Dhamma views. I don't know how many discussions I've been in or sat on the edge of where Dhamma views are so held to. And it's not about right or wrong, but these are concoctions of mind. Attachment to view is really one of the strongest ways, unrecognized, that we're caught in the concoction of thought. And as we see in the world – we could talk about this for hours – when attachment to views clashes, that's what's going on everywhere, right? So much suffering, so much confusion, so much pain. This is really the heart of the tides of conceiving.

And papañca – the congealing around the view of self – is really the perception, the thinking about, the view, the idea. You could say a view is an idea: "It should be like this" or "This is how it is." That often isn't put into words at first, at least in practice here.

I think Andrea has spoken to it, but several people have mentioned this feeling: awareness is flowing, awareness is there, noticing stuff, and then feeling you're in a place where it's kind of stuck. You don't know what. You don't know what's happening. Awareness can be with stuckness, or maybe aversion or something, but there's this feeling of something going on that's difficult and can't quite just relax – let it come up in relaxed awareness.

And then often – I've seen this many times – okay, relax into it. It just feels like it's not good enough. I was doing walking meditation one time at Shwe Oo Min, and it was fine. There was awareness, noticing what was happening, there was no problem. And then I just started to feel some tension. And the mind started saying, "What's the problem? What's the problem? It's just things coming and going. What's the problem?" And sometimes when I would just kind of let the awareness get quiet, just see what's going on that's not being seen – then the view popped up: "Oh, this isn't good enough."

Well, what does that mean? Whatever's happening isn't good enough. That's an endless view, right? Because it can always get better.

Not recognizing that view, it was kind of behind everything that was happening. Not good enough, not good enough, not good enough. Views about what's supposed to be happening in practice, views about how awareness should feel—any view about practice happens so frequently and slips in so insidiously.

In all my years of practice, at different times, something happens while you're practicing, you're caught up in some way, and suddenly there's an insight. It opens up and you say, "Oh, that's what's happening. I'm thinking it should be like this, but I can just relax and let it be." And it's a real insight. Insight isn't a thought—it's like, "Aha." But then often there's a thought or two expressing the insight, a way of knowing, and that's fine. There's nothing wrong with that. And there's that sense of ease, of freedom. "Oh yeah, that's how it is."

I remember watching this during one three-month retreat. Within—I don't know—two and a half seconds, it would start to formulate in the subconscious: "Oh, now this is how it's supposed to be." And right away, I was free from that, but now this is how it's supposed to be. The mind just wants somewhere to land. "It's supposed to be like this." So we have some way to make ourselves miserable by always trying to make it be like this and beating ourselves up when it isn't. Why do we do that? I don't know, but we want somewhere to land.

So noticing views—the perception leads to thinking, leads to a view: "Ah, this is how it is." And this is where the view of self, the tides of conceiving, the tides of papañca as the Buddha describes it, wash over a person.

In one sutta where he talks about the tides of conceiving, he's saying one should not neglect wisdom, paññā—just seeing clearly. Not creative, but just not neglected if it's there. One preserves truth, cultivates relinquishment, and trains in awareness. Train for peace. That's a nice little group—that's another whole talk. But one should preserve truth. And in a way, in our practice, in our awareness, it's just what's happening now. That's all. Just what's happening now. Cultivate relinquishment. Train for peace. Preserve, not neglect wisdom.

The tides of conceiving, of papañca, do not sweep over one who rests upon these foundations. And when the tides of conceiving no longer sweep over one, one is called a sage at peace.

So what's conceiving? The Buddha goes on to say: "I am" is a conceiving. "I am this" is a conceiving. "I shall be, I shall not be, I shall be possessed of form, I shall not be possessed of form"—past, future. All the "I am," just as Andrea was saying the other night, whatever form it takes—just notice. That's a papañca, that's a conceiving, that's a construction in this moment. You don't have to think all that stuff, but just kind of notice it.

As Bhikkhu Bodhi further elaborated, the tides of conceiving are thoughts and notions originating from the three papañcas. Papañca is described as having three roots, three different qualities in mind that are drivers of papañca.

One is craving. Wanting. Something comes up and craving really drives that concoction of thought, like we talked about.

The second driver of papañca, the second root of conceiving, is conceit—māna. And you know how māna is defined in the Theravada texts? It's defined as the sense of the mind comparing: that one is better than another, one is equal to another, one is less than another. So we look at the comparing, but really the heart of that comparing is the conceit of me and other. That's why even "equal" is māna, because there's that subtle—and this can be very subtle—conceit of self, conceit of other. And this, even very subtle, is one of the three big drivers of papañca, of thinking on and on and on.

And the third: diṭṭhi, views.

So these are the three roots of conceiving, the three roots of papañca, the three qualities in the mind unrecognized that just get us so far so fast: craving, sense of self and other—that little sense of me—and views. Views and craving are the most obvious, of course.

And whenever—I think when I'm answering email, this is actually a good time for me to really practice. I don't always, but to practice feeling when there's a view. Answering some business email, or we have different emails about things going on here—policy and various matters. Too often, too frequently. Threads with several people. And we do have to give our opinions. That's what the email is, right? You have to give your opinion. You can't just say, "No, I don't feel like responding. I don't want to get into views." But I mean, we all feel like that. We'd rather just not engage. So this is how we have to function in the world.

When the email comes in, if I have a modicum of awareness—and sometimes I do, sometimes I don't—it comes in and it hits. Some things you can just feel. There's calm. I don't feel a tide of conceiving. I'm not thinking "there's tides of conceiving washing over me," but I just feel calm. I look, I think, and I can write an answer.

But there are other times when I read it and right away—it doesn't have to be a huge thing; if it's huge, I notice, okay?—but it can be just a little uh, a little tightness, and this sense of yeah, but this is really clear how it should be.

The three personality types, you know—the greed type that transforms into the faith type, the aversive type that transforms into discriminating wisdom, and the deluded type that transforms into equanimity. The aversive type just means the mind tends to notice the unpleasant before it notices the pleasant. It doesn't mean you're running around angry all the time. That's what greedy types think. I just want to tell you it's not so.

But there is this sense of discriminating wisdom—sometimes you think it's discriminating wisdom, but it's aversion. That can definitely happen. And so the email will come in, and if I'm not aware, it's just so clear what the appropriate response is and what should happen. I send it off, and half an hour later it's like, oh. There was a little tinge. It may still be mostly that I was right. But there could have been a little tinge of aversion, which definitely makes it harder for the person to hear.

But it's view—that's what I'm talking about. The sense of view is I'm right. It's obvious how it should be. And in that, even in a little thing, attachment to view, there's not the space to let in that someone else is looking at it in another way that never occurred to this mind. It never occurred because the view completely limits us. So whether it's sense of self, or politics, or what we think happened—it's endless. Exploring views is really, really important.

There's one place where the Buddha said—I think it's in the Sutta Nipāta—and the colloquial translation, he's talking about the suffering, the pain of attachment to views. He says, "People who are attached to views just wander around in the world annoying one another." So we can see that.

There's another place where he says, "The end of papañca is the end of conflict." The end of papañca is the end of conflict because we're not creating a sense of self or other. Or as Bankei, the Zen master in Japan, said, "Don't set yourself in confrontation with anything." It's just this—not adding anything extra, not conceiving a me, not conceiving an other.

This is from the Buddha. I like this. It's a little bit long, but I like it.

If the mind is left to its natural flow without any alteration, the present thought will not stay very long. When the present thought occurs, if we think it should not occur and try to stop it, that blocks the expressive power of awareness. But when the present thought first arises and we recognize it, we can just rest in the natural flow of that recognition without any alteration. It's like ripples in water—as soon as they arise, they disappear without a trace, which is the characteristic of thoughts. There is absolutely nothing solid, true, or imperishable about a thought. Just exploring thoughts in that way, even when the content seems really intense.

I'll end with this little poem about continuing the natural flow of thoughts without trying to change: "Whether eating or sleeping, going or staying, whatever one does, there is nothing more than this—even in the teachings of the Buddhas of the three times."

That's the freedom from papañca, from conflict, from atammayatā. There's nothing more than this.

Thank you for your patient attention.

Let us just be quiet for a minute, and then we can chant the sharing of blessings together.

This is an example of how thoughts are also useful. When we understand that they are intrinsically empty, we can use them—like words to share the merit, to cultivate the wholesome. We don't hate thoughts. We simply recognize their nature.

Let us chant together.

Now let us chant the verses of sharing and aspiration, through the goodness that arises from our practice...

CHAPTER 191

Wise Attention

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), one of the most practical teachings in the Majjhima Nikāya. The sutta addresses how the āsavas—the most subtle level of mental defilements including craving for sensual pleasure, craving for becoming, and ignorance—can be abandoned through wise attention (yoniso manasikāra).

Wilson begins by explaining the three levels of kilesa (mental torments): the level of transgression, which is balanced by sīla; the obsessive level, balanced by samādhi; and the latent level, which requires paññā (wisdom) to uproot. She then guides listeners through the Buddha's seven methods for abandoning the āsavas: through seeing (wisdom and the Four Noble Truths), through restraint at the sense doors, through wise use of requisites, through patient endurance of difficulties, through avoiding what feeds unwholesome states, through removing arisen unwholesome thoughts, and through developing the factors of awakening.

The teaching emphasizes that wise attention isn't about controlling experience but about noticing the quality of awareness itself. Wilson shares personal examples illustrating how everyday activities—from eating to shopping to relating to discomfort—become opportunities for practice. She highlights the importance of recognizing what feeds versus what starves the kilesas, encouraging practitioners to explore these dynamics without judgment throughout all aspects of life.

I want to share about a particular sutta of the Buddha's that I've always liked a lot. It so exactly talks about this way that we're practicing. It's also considered a very important sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, the Middle Length Discourses—it's number two. It's called the Sabbasava Sutta, or "All the Asavas."

Let me try to explain asava. I'm going to keep it simple because there's a lot of information. Don't try to remember it all. It might get a little wonky. This is practice too—being aware as you're sitting, listening, noticing whatever comes up in your mind. As Ajahn Sumedho always says when he begins to talk, this is just a period for reflection, for taking in and noticing whatever is happening in your body and mind. In one way, there are a lot of different things the Buddha's saying. In another way, it's just one thing. The whole sutta is saying the same thing over and over.

Asava is a word that doesn't have a good translation. It's sometimes translated as "taints" or "cankers"—these are weird old words. It refers to a category of the kilesa, the defilements. I don't like that word either, so I'm going to use kilesas. In a way, these represent the most subtle level of defilement, the deepest level, almost the latent tendencies, you could say, that "defile, bring renewal of being, give trouble, ripen in suffering, and lead to further birth, aging, and death." They are specifically referred to in the sutta as craving for sensual pleasures, craving for being or becoming, and ignorance—like the ignorance at the beginning of dependent origination.

But what I love about this sutta is that the Buddha isn't hammering on about what they are. The main point of the sutta is wise attention. He's giving different ways that by how and what we pay attention, and the quality in the mind that's aware, these deep-rooted tendencies can be abandoned. It's often said that when they talk about someone who's completely awakened, an arahant, it's one who's no longer experiencing the asavas. But what I love about this sutta is that it gives seven different ways of how we pay attention—things we can give attention to, how we give attention—that will abandon the asavas. It covers all different aspects of our life. It's very broad. I've always loved this sutta for years because he's talking about how we give attention, what's wise attention, what's unwise attention, to the different things we're doing in our life. It's not just about really refined sitting on the meditation cushion.

First I want to talk about something that's in the suttas, but I heard Sayadaw U Pandita first speak about it. You could call it describing how the kilesas manifest in our experience and what helps to abandon them. It's the three levels of kilesa, three levels of habits of mind and what helps them to transform, to be abandoned.

The first level is called the level of transgression. This means the kilesa is so strong that it serves as an intention—we speak or act from the kilesa. Transgression. What protects us is sila. When we're cultivating sila, when we're tuned in to sila, it's just enough of a reminder that we won't act on greed and take something that isn't ours. It's not the level where you never act on greed, you never take a second bite of a cookie or something. We're really talking about the level where we're doing something egregious, harmful—hitting someone, saying something really appalling. The level of transgression is pretty obvious. We all know when we've acted from that level: strong greed, strong aversion, strong sense of me. And the cultivation of sila, the tuning into sila, protects us from that.

I really love that—how all the different aspects of practice aren't just something to do so you can get to the really subtle stuff. They're all, in their own way, supporting freedom of heart and mind. So we expand our idea of practice to include everything. I know it already does, but just in case something isn't included in your idea of practice, we keep expanding it.

The second level is called the obsessive kilesas, obsessive torments. "Torments" is a good translation for kilesa—they feel like that. I'm pretty sure we all have experienced this. This is when the torments are just creating spinning thoughts, thoughts of greed. Anyone experience that?

Thoughts of me, just obsessive – that's exactly the word. It's like, "Please shut up." Just, "Oh no, not this again. Why?" We all know that. I don't have to spend any more time describing it.

And what balances this, what protects us from this, is the collectedness of heart-mind, the steadiness – samādhi. It doesn't have to be one-pointed samādhi, but also the way we're cultivating it here: the steadiness, the balance of mind. When the mind is collected in that way – and we all experience it – that it's temporary, but the stronger kilesas, the obsessive quality, doesn't get in, basically. It doesn't arise so much.

Of course, with really focused concentration, that's more obvious. We can even think thoughts don't arise. And it's also more obvious how temporary that is when the conditions for the really focused concentration go away. But also in what we're cultivating here – the collectedness, the unification of mind, all the qualities brought together – stuff happens. But I know you've all experienced at different times, not always, but at different times when some sense experience or some object comes up, or a thought that would have driven you nuts or led into obsession at another time, and it doesn't.

Does anyone experience this? You just see something, and nothing happens. It's just the next arising thing. That's an experience. It's really, really helpful noticing this. It may just be calm. It may just be a kind of spaciousness. "I thought there'd be big trouble from that thought, but there's just space." Noticing that strengthens our faith, as we're always talking about. It strengthens the sense of confidence, the sense of appreciation that there are moments of heart and mind, moments awareness picks up, when the kilesas aren't running riot – when maybe they're not even manifesting in that moment.

So this is where the collectedness of mind, the steadiness of mind with right view, wise view, is the protection against the obsessive qualities of defilement. But as we know, that doesn't uproot them completely. It tones it down, and we can really appreciate it more. But sometimes, especially if you've been in really focused concentration – it doesn't have to be, but it can happen – when that goes away, it seems like the kilesas were just lurking around the edges, and then it's like they can party. It's just like, "Whoa!" It doesn't have to be like that, but sometimes it is a bit flippy. This way that we're practicing doesn't tend to be so hot and cold like that, but it can still happen. The kilesas come back – they're not abandoned. But it's very, very helpful to see this and to understand how it works.

And then the third level, which in a way we're talking about with āsavas, with this sutta, is more the level called the latent torments. And this is like, you know, give me a break. It's the potential. They're not arisen yet, but it's the potential for the torments to arise given the appropriate conditions. They're not manifesting at this point, at this latent level. But as they say, it's like a seed – it might just sit dormant, but given the appropriate conditions, the seed will sprout.

So when he's talking about abandoning the āsavas or the latent tendencies, it's really on a very subtle level that he's talking about, which I want you to remember as we go through the different ways he describes wise attention.

You can see it just in little ways, maybe here. Someone was telling me once on a three-month retreat – I think they were at the back table after the meal, and they were planning not to eat. They were walking past the tea table, and there was just a big bowl of oranges. They were present, clear, not spaced out – because then you'd expect something to come up. Present, clear. But just for some reason, all of a sudden the hand went out and grabbed an orange. And they said, "Who did that? It wasn't me!"

But you can see that. You're just minding your own business, you're pretty present, and all of a sudden – boom – this thing of aversion just comes: "How can that person do that?" It's like, "Whoa, where did that come from?" Don't take it personally, but this is just seeing, "Okay, okay." So we keep cultivating wise view, wise attention. This is why we deepen our aspiration, why we keep going.

And what abandons the latent tendencies, he says, is paññā – wisdom, wise seeing, really understanding. And that's where he goes on with this sutta. So this sutta is really, really pragmatic. He gives seven different ways, but this sutta is, he said, "a discourse on the exhaustion of the āsavas in one who knows and sees, not in one who does not know and see." So he's talking about wise attention.

And this is what he says: "When one attends unwisely, both unarisen taints arise and arisen ones increase. When one attends wisely, both unarisen taints do not arise and arisen taints are abandoned."

Now, does this sound familiar? I really hope. I really pray it sounds familiar. Because it's exactly what we've been saying all along. And what's the quality in the awareness?

So the quality of unwise attention—when we're attending to experience and there's greed, aversion, or selfing in the mind that goes unrecognized—the unarisen taints arise, and more arise. When the awareness is with right attitude, then it's the reverse. This is really very basic, and I love that this is the central point, the driving force of everything he's saying.

But then he gives seven different aspects, seven different ways this plays out in our lives. I just want to mention each of these. They won't be new, I think, but I've often found it helpful to have different lenses through which to examine what I'm doing.

He starts, of course, with taints that can be abandoned by wisdom, by seeing. It's quite long, so I won't read the whole thing, but he's saying that when one doesn't understand, when one pays attention to dhammas—and dhammas here simply means experiences—that are unfit for attention, or when one attends in a way that is not wise, the taints arise.

What dhammas are unfit for attention? They are dhammas such that when one attends to them, the unarisen taints of sensual desire, being, and ignorance arise, or the arisen taints increase. So it's not really about declaring this is bad and this is good. It's about paying attention to a particular thing and how one pays attention. We're watching and seeing what feeds the kilesas, what starves them.

How does one attend unwisely? It's lengthy, but you can see it's through the lens of "me." He gives examples: Was I in past time, or was I not? How was I in the past? Having been what? What will I be in the future? How shall I be? What shall I be? Having been what, what shall I become?

You get a sense of this? We do this, right? Maybe not quite so elaborately. And we think it's so important, so very important, not noticing that craving and confusion and doubt are strengthening, strengthening, strengthening. We think the content is so important. But the content is unfit for attention precisely because it's unwise attention. And the more we pay attention to that content, the stronger the unwise attention gets. It's just a cycle. That's all he's saying.

He goes on to explain that when we attend unwisely, one of six kinds of views arises—all different views of self. You're attending: What was I? What's going to be? Whether it's what happens when I die, or what's going to happen when I leave here, or what's going to happen tomorrow at lunch—it doesn't matter what.

One of these six views arises: "Self exists for me," or "No self exists for me"—which can be a view, you know, not an insight, just a view. "I perceive self with self," or "I perceive not-self with self." You see, back in that time, the various ascetics who would come to talk to the Buddha would get into these really nitpicky discussions that make you crazy to read them. So I'm not going to make you listen to all of that.

You get the idea. As we're attending to a particular experience, and the attention starts feeding these views of "me"—what am I going to be, what was I, I'm perceiving myself, whatever—a view is forming. The kilesas are getting stronger.

So our job is to notice that with wise attention. And the Buddha says the well-taught disciple of the noble ones recognizes when dhammas are unfit for attention. When this is happening, they recognize it.

And how does one attend wisely? First, by not attending to dhammas unfit for attention, and by attending to those fit for attention. Unarisen taints don't arise and arisen ones are abandoned. So one attends wisely basically through the lens of wisdom, of the Four Noble Truths, as the Buddha describes it here: This is suffering, the origin, the cessation of suffering. This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering.

That doesn't mean every time there's awareness of an experience, you've got to run through the Four Noble Truths in your mind. You know that, right? But it means there's that sense of clear seeing, of wisdom. So all those thoughts—of me and what was I—arise, and there's a sense of recognizing that holding to those thoughts is leading to suffering. The cause of suffering is the clinging. The way leading to the ending is to see that clearly, and the clinging drops away. You don't have to run through all of that. But that's what's going on when there's wise attitude in the mind, when there's wise attention, when we see that. Experiencing that over and over and over really strengthens our visceral understanding of it. You're really seeing that.

The fitness is not inherent in the object—like, that object's bad to pay attention to, and this one is good. Because we can make these little rights and wrongs in our mind. So many people have mentioned it; we just tend to do that. The fitness really, in this context, is always coming back to: what's the quality in the mind that's aware? If in really paying attention to something—and I'll describe ways later how it becomes so clear that greed is arising—okay, maybe in that moment, in that situation, this object is not fit for attention. It's really not inherent in the object. It's just seeing: paying attention with this quality of mind is feeding kilesa. And wisdom sees that and can put it down.

So the Buddha is saying, one who could do this—when one attends wisely in this way, fetters are abandoned in them: embodiment view, doubt, and holding to rites and rituals. So that's basically describing stream entry. Just looking at things in this way. These are called the taints that can be abandoned by seeing.

And now he goes through, I think, five different ways of how we relate to experiences in our life. And this is why I love this sutta, because it's really saying how we pay attention—with wise attitude in the mind, right view, wise attention—in different aspects of our life, can actually be a cause, a conditioning for the abandoning of taints. He's not saying, just do this because you've got no other choice, and then when you can come and meditate, you can see. It's like what I was describing from Ajahn Chah this morning: it doesn't have to always be subtle experiences to see this stuff.

The next category is asavas that are abandoned by restraining. This is like restraint at the sense door. One reflecting wisely—so it's always with wise attitude in the awareness—one abides with the eye faculty restrained, and then it goes through all the other senses. "While fever of defilement might arise in one who abode with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no torments or fever of defilement in one when he abides with the eye faculty restrained."

So what does that mean, restrained? Of course, it does mean some kind of restraint. It doesn't mean going around blindfolded, restraining, don't let anything come into the sense experience. It doesn't mean it has to be hugely ascetic. It's really, as I think Ajahn Buddhadasa called it, sati-pañña—mindfulness and wisdom at the moment of sense contact, at the sense door—so that there's reflecting wisely, meeting the sense experience with awareness, with mindfulness and wisdom, just seeing what's happening here. The awareness is right there. It can just be there at the sense door. It doesn't have to go and proliferate so far, so fast on one sense contact.

That there can be just a little sense contact, a pleasant or an unpleasant, and boom—the papañca we talked about—just off so quickly, so quickly, and believing it. But restraint doesn't mean holding tight and not letting that happen and being afraid to look. It's not that, because that's unwise. That's cultivating aversion. But this satipañña is really more and more about what people are describing: just this presence with wise attitude at the moment of sense perception. Seeing what happens. And how often different people have mentioned it as just seeing—and no big story comes. Or experiencing a pleasant taste and it's just that. Not a whole other thing has to happen. This is really wise attention at this point. It's not just avoiding.

Once, some years ago, a friend who was on staff at the retreat center was working with restraint. So he decided he really didn't want to get lost in sight and lost in all this greed. So he walked around for three days blindfolded. And they say, that's not it. We can shut stuff out, and maybe one would notice there was less wanting. And then when you take it off, maybe you notice more. I mean, that could be a wise way to go about it. But sense restraint doesn't mean that. It just means paying attention, seeing what's going on, and also seeing how far it can go when we're not meeting it with wise attention.

As Ajahn Chah says, "When the nose smells an odor, just leave it at the nose." I've always liked that. Just leave it alone. It's happening. We leave it alone. That's sense restraint. So it requires just this interest to see what's happening.

A hint from the Buddha, in terms of seeing—another way he's describing satipañña at the sense door: "On seeing a form with the eye, one does not grasp at the signs and the features." And this is interesting, because you're not going and saying, you see someone that you think is really attractive and grasping at this, like, "Oh, look, the hair's really nice, and I really like how they dress." Or you smell, and it smells like a nice lunch—"What's that smell? Is that potatoes? Or what could it be?" It's not quite papañca, but you're really like, "Oh, that smell, that smell." You're going into grasping at the obvious things that are pleasant. Or aversive.

If you notice aversion to something—I guess I'm the aversive type—the greed type, probably much more what I just said. But the aversive type is like that, where something's unpleasant, and then the mind focuses in, "That's just so awful. Look at that. It's just so uneven." Focusing in on the little things. It might not be huge suffering, but this is lack of restraint at the sense door. And the aversion is just slowly increasing. It's being fed in that moment.

So when we notice, "Oh yeah, aversion's like this," you just leave that thing as it is. You don't have to fix it. This is a really interesting thing to explore. It doesn't mean having some kind of idea of how you have to restrain the senses, that you have to be somehow ascetic, that you have to keep it simple. But it can help. You explore and see what helps to support less craving, what kind of feeds it.

This is just from memory, not his words exactly. But the essence was this: you're feeling overwhelmed. So much stuff is coming in, pleasant and unpleasant. You like it, you don't. It's all coming in. He said, well, you don't have to sit there and open all your windows and open all the doors and try to listen to everything the neighbor is saying and turn on the TV. You don't have to invite everything in and then feel lost in craving and aversion. You can be a little more simple.

So that's also a kind of restraint at the sense doors. But not "I should be simple." Not like I have to be incredibly ascetic, or I shouldn't eat much. You could look externally like you're being really restrained, but internally you could be feeding aversion and clinging just as much.

I know U Tejaniya used to say—people would say, "Oh, you stopped your lay life to live as a bhikkhu, and that's so much giving up." And he'd say, "There can be just as much tanhā, just as much craving, in the life of an ordained person. It's just that there's less things you can direct it to. But that doesn't mean there's less craving. There's just less things."

It's really about looking internally. And looking at signs and nuances—something that's really interesting. We're not doing this with aversion, but noticing, say, what's the quality in the awareness when we're giving attention to something beautiful? Like nature. Sometimes people get into, "Oh, it's so beautiful. It's bringing happiness, it's eliciting joy," and that's fine. But really noticing the quality in the mind that's aware, because the same thing could be wise attention, or it could be increasing this sense of "I need more, I need more, I need more." And it can be subtle.

Sometimes—and this isn't helpful—practitioners notice that and think, "Well, true freedom from craving means I have to somehow avoid beautiful or pleasant experience because I'll crave." We might crave. We're here to learn about it—that's okay. But it's not about avoiding out of some kind of aversion. It's really about learning. Really notice: "Oh, it's beautiful. This is peaceful. Oh..." And then suddenly you don't quite notice the wanting coming in, but you're planning a hike for the next afternoon, or you need to go somewhere. It kind of creeps in. "Oh, okay. That's interesting."

That's interesting. You can explore. What was the quality of the attention? How did it move from just being present? It's beautiful. Leave it at the eye door. How did it change? This is a wonderful exploration through our whole life. Not to do the right thing, but to learn. This is really how the subtle aspects of clinging and aversion come up and kind of drive things. We don't notice when they're coming up subtle—until they're not at the subtle level anymore. Now they're at the obsessive level. How did that happen? I was just so peaceful.

So there's no judging in this. It's just exploring. This is one place to really notice how we pay attention to things.

Shankara, who was an Advaita master, said, "Cease dwelling upon sense objects and peace will arise in your heart." It doesn't mean don't notice, but the dwelling on—"Wow, this is so nice. Oh, this is so horrible"—the dwelling on, the meaning.

So these are just different ways to explore this restraint.

This one is called Āsavas Abandoned by Using. The Buddha is saying that reflecting wisely, one pays attention, one notices: What is the quality in the mind? How does one use things? What is the attitude with which we use things?

This is what he says: "Reflecting wisely, a bhikkhu uses a robe for protection from the cold, for protection from heat, for protection from insects, flies, wind, burning, and for the purpose of concealing what disturbs conscience. So reflecting, one uses alms food not for amusement or intoxication or vanity or for embellishment, but for the endurance and care of the body, the continuance of the body, for ending discomfort, for assisting in the holy life. And considering thus: 'I shall terminate old feelings'—like being hungry and eating food—'without arousing new feelings of greed, and blameless shall I live in comfort and health.'"

Then, since it's for bhikkhus, he continues with how they use their resting place, how they use medicine—because those are the four requisites that one can have. But for us, I think it's really interesting noticing the quality in the awareness when we use things. How do we relate to food? Moment to moment, not in the big picture, but noticing what gets fed.

I remember when I was first thinking about this on retreat at the retreat center. Sometimes there's an extra apple or banana, maybe the bananas have run out. And I'd think, "Well, I'll just save this for later." There's nothing wrong with that—there's plenty of food, it's not taken from anybody. But noticing, I would notice after a while how much extra work that was. You have to get the thing, wrap it up, put your name on it, put it in the fridge, save it. Then you think, "Do I want it now or later?" "Can I take it to my room? No, there are ants." All this extra hoo-ha! And what was going on? It's different from saving something because you really need to have, say, a boiled egg in the evening for your health—that's a completely different quality in the mind that's aware.

So we're noticing this. Is the way we're using something feeding the wanting? Or feeding the aversion? Or feeding the "me, me, me" in comparison, whether you think you're embarrassed or whatever it does? Noticing how that's working, how burdensome it could be—I started to notice. When it's just simple, you just take what you need and don't take extra if you don't need it. A little bit hungry later? That's okay.

Now, I'm not saying this is what one should do. I'm not saying to set up an ideal. But noticing—I started noticing for myself. I used to arrive at meals early, in time in case some aspect of the food ran out and there wouldn't be enough. Then sometime after a while, I stopped doing that. I just didn't think about it. And it was so free and easy. You get there, something's run out, but there's something else and it doesn't really matter. And where do I sit? I just sit wherever—so free and easy. The difference is simply not the "me," not the kilesas being created.

So just play with this in all aspects of our life. Do we take more than we need in terms of the environment, in terms of how much energy we use? Again, this isn't a view that we're trying to meet. If it is, then with wise attention you notice: What's the quality in the mind as you're trying to meet the view? "It's good, it's bad, I'm good, I'm bad"—that's more subtle kilesas coming up. So this isn't about meeting an idea, but just noticing. Go into a store when you're shopping for clothes—just noticing. Not that there's anything bad about buying clothes, but we're always paying attention to what's feeding and what's starving the kilesas. Sometimes notice how craving is just looking for something to land on.

I mean, in the old days when you had catalogs and you'd shop through them – you didn't want anything, didn't need anything. But you'd sit down with a little restlessness and start looking at the catalog, and you'd keep going until you found something you could want. Now it's a million times worse with the internet, my God. "I'm bored, let me go to Amazon." This is great practice.

We watch the relationship in the mind without judgment. What's feeding kilesa? And of course, this comes from the sense behind it – that we really, in some way, feel and honor the suffering that comes when kilesa is running the show. And that we feel and honor those moments that are kilesa-free. Oh, it's just peace now. You're looking at Amazon. No, I don't want anything. You put it down. Ah, peace. How long does it last? That's another question. But noticing those moments of freedom from kilesa, freedom from torment – that's very, very strong.

I remember one time I was listening to a Dhamma talk Ajahn Sumedho was giving at Spirit Rock. At Amaravati, when they have a retreat, like a ninety-person retreat, they ask everyone to take eight precepts. There might be medical reasons for exceptions, but basically everyone's on eight precepts. So he was talking away, giving the talk, and he was laughing. Usually people laugh along with him – he's pretty funny. But on this occasion, he said, "I happened to go in the dining room and look in the refrigerator – it's called the yogi refrigerator, where people can save food and have their name on it and stuff – and it was so full of things." And then he said, "Well, how would it be if we just donated everything in that refrigerator to the homeless?" Dead silence. I cracked up. You could tell – I mean, I could just project because I wasn't seeing everyone's faces – but anyway, exploring this, the attitude with which we use things. I love it that he brings this in.

Okay, the next one. How does he phrase it? Āsavas that are abandoned by – this translation says "enduring." I would say tolerating, or really more patience. So the quality of being with things that are difficult, with the quality really of patience, which is non-judging acceptance, not pushing away, not creating aversion or wanting.

And he gives the examples of how āsavas can be abandoned by patience, by tolerating. "Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, and contact with gadflies" – which we can all relate to – "flies, wind, burning and creeping things." Just that. We all have plenty of time to explore this. Is it even possible when that tick starts crawling up your leg? Not that you should have a moment of patience necessarily. But anyway, it's more the ones you can't avoid. Like when I walk home down the hill – just the last couple of days, I ran into Vlad yesterday. We stopped to say hello for one minute, and like fifty-five thousand flies just swarmed around both of our faces. It's like, okay. You don't have to answer, but the taints that can be abandoned by patience, by enduring.

And then he goes on: "ill-spoken, unwelcome words, arisen bodily feelings that are painful, wracking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life." He's not messing around.

These are things that, in a way, we can't really do something about. Because in the next section, he does go to avoiding. He's not saying you just subject yourself to everything, but for the things we can't avoid – how can we meet them with patience so that we're not cultivating more greed, hatred, and confusion?

I remember, again, a talk by Ajahn Sumedho where he was talking about the first years in Thailand. The monks had these heavy robes. Have you ever been to Southeast Asia in the hot season? It's hot. It's really hot. When I was a nun, it was like that. You wear these long sleeves, and you're inside this kuti with a tin roof, and the sun is just baking it. It's hot. So he was talking about sweating through his robes in his kuti, and after hours thinking, "I can't endure this another minute." Have you had that feeling here sometimes?

I can't endure this another minute. And then I'd find that I could. And that's so often how it goes—oh, I can't endure this another minute, and then I'd find that I could. The next minute is like a completely different moment. It's really quite wonderful.

I love practicing in Asia for this reason. It's incredibly supportive for an aversive mind to really learn the patience of equanimity. In a situation that seems so unbearable or unpleasant, with no way to be at ease with it, later I could be really happy and at ease in just the same situation. It's not exactly the same, because the conditions in the awareness, the conditions in the mind are different, but really seeing how this is so—this comes from just this attitude of being with, just as it is, and exploring it.

When I was a nun in Thailand, there was this place in the jungle with only a few nuns and only one Western nun—me. I'd be in my kuti, and it had a door and a screen, which was really nice. But people would come up and stare in to see the Mechi Phalang sitting. "Oh, look, she's sitting!" I hated that. And whenever you'd go out, "Oh, Mechi Phalang's walking!" with all the noise and commotion. You go through that feeling of, "I can't bear this another moment." And then you find that you could. And then you discover that particular situation isn't actually the cause of suffering. It really wasn't. To discover this for ourselves—it may not stay, but to discover it—is very energizing and freeing. You really learn so much. I've developed so much more ease and equanimity in difficult situations. Not always. Every time I go back to Asia, I have to get over it again, but it doesn't take so long.

I actually value it hugely, because one of the ways that I get lost is through comfort. Too much suffering, too much difficulty, may be more than one can stay balanced with. But too much comfort, for me—I can have a modest, pretty comfortable life, I'm not opposed to comfort—but when it's all comfort with nothing difficult, I just zone out. So I notice that, and I pay attention.

This is the Buddha's advice to Rahula, his son: "Rahula, develop meditation that is like the earth. For when you develop a mind like the earth, arising agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Because just as people throw clean things and dirty things on the earth—excrement, urine, spittle, blood, everything—and the earth is not horrified, the earth is not humiliated or disgusted because of that, so just so, develop a mind that's like the earth. And then arising agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain."

Then he goes through all the different elements—water, air, fire, and space. Whatever's coming, it won't invade your mind. It comes, it is like it is, it goes—when there's this mind of patience, of non-reaction.

But it's not just that you have to be patient and stay with anything. He's so practical. I really like this. The next category is pains that can be abandoned by avoiding. This is what we've been saying: when what you're paying attention to or what you're being with is just so strong and it's feeding the kilesas so intensely, it's unwise attention and unwise attitude in the mind to stay with that thing. He's calling it "avoid," but what we mean is turning your attention.

He says the bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, avoids a savage elephant, a savage horse, a snake, a stump, a bramble, a cliff, a cesspool, a sewer. Reflecting wisely, he avoids unsuitable areas and frequenting unwholesome friends. Really paying attention.

I like this because he's not saying you should be completely balanced and at ease no matter what's happening. He's not setting that up. He's saying: look and see what's supporting and feeding the kilesas, and what's supporting their abandoning. Sometimes being with something that's just too difficult—the savage elephant or the inner danger, when something's coming up too strong—that's when we turn away.

You know, we talk a lot about when there's past trauma coming up and it's just so strong. There's awareness of it, but at some point, often, it gets so strong that we'll say, it's time to turn the attention away and balance the mind. And no one ever wants to do that, because they want to end it. But it's really looking at not the result but what's starving kilesa, what's feeding wholesome mind, and what is it time to avoid, to turn the attention away from.

I really like that the practice isn't idealistic. We're not saying, "If we really understood the Dhamma, we would be able to be with anything with somehow a mind of peace." But that's just not how it is. Look how it is: you're trying to be with something and it's just feeding, feeding kilesa. That's unwise attention.

Something U Tejaniya says: if what you're doing, and you're really aware with right attitude, what you're doing is just causing the kilesas to get stronger and stronger—stop doing that thing. Stop paying attention to that thing. It's not rocket science. We get so caught up in views.

But of course, there are things that are supportive. We don't have, you know, like in the airport, CNN blaring in the background. We do say it's really helpful not to be on your devices. We do have silence. There's all kinds of things that are supportive of not feeding kilesa and also being able to see more clearly. It's not being extreme, it's just being reasonable. But he's really saying this is in order to see what's feeding wholesome mind states. This is what helps the abandoning of the kilesas. And remember, when he talks about abandoning of the āsavas, he's talking about the deepest level of freedom, not just some little thing.

So just put this out: next time you think of kilesas getting too strong, and you realize you need to shift and not be with this thing, not pay attention—don't need to go, "Because I'm a failure, because I couldn't have good enough mindfulness to be with this thing, I have to change my attention." That's not helpful. It's more like really appreciating your motivation to abandon the āsavas and how you're being present in this moment with this thing. So really looking and seeing.

Sometimes the avoidance may be a little bit difficult. It may be avoiding something that we like. Like when I was saying about comfort, there's a certain way I get too comfortable. Okay, just avoid lying around in bed for twenty-four hours, whatever it is—eating too much, whatever it might be for you. That feeds kilesa. But it's not about feeling deprived, because over time, the more we notice...

Like people coming here—just the other day I was at the doctor's, and the nurse was asking, "What do you do?" I never used to say what I did, because people thought it was weird. But now they're like, "Oh, that's so cool." They have no clue, but they go, "Oh, that's so cool." And then they say, "Oh, does that mean no talking?" Well, yeah. This particular show? Well, this one's a month. Just a month. "I couldn't even do a day." So you don't start with a month. You start with a day. But people say, "I could never do that. I could never do that."

So we all have these things—"I could never do that." But over time, what we're avoiding here, we're avoiding talking in order to be able to be more present. Over time, we start to see that that avoidance, that simplicity, is easy. The same also with renouncing things. It starts to lessen the kilesas. You start to notice it. It may take time. Over time you notice it, you don't notice it right away. But gradually, noticing the beautiful qualities—they're more available. They're increasing more. You may not be able to point it exactly to the fact that you're not quite as comfortable, or you may not be able to point it to the fact that you haven't been on your computer for a while—I mean, that one's more obvious.

But just looking over time, life's getting more simple. You don't push yourself into things that increase the kilesas and confusion. Just start to notice. And I'm sure for all of you over the years of practice, the beautiful qualities of heart and mind show up much more than they used to. They're more familiar. And then, oh, okay, they're familiar—maybe we don't appreciate it as much. But anyway, knowing that you can really avoid what's feeding kilesa.

And then this sixth one, and this takes wise attitude too, is removing. And so this is—remember hearing it through wise view—"here a bhikkhu reflecting wisely does not endure an arisen thought affected by desire, ill will, cruelty." So this is right thought. He abandons it. And I'm going to read this language just because the language comes out so harsh, but we don't have to hear it in that way, just as I read the Four Right Efforts the other day. "He abandons it. He does away with it and annihilates it." A little harsh, but that's the language. "He does not endure arisen evil, unprofitable dhammas. He abandons them. And what taints and fever of defilement might arise in one who did not abandon these thoughts—there are no taint or fever of defilement in one who removes them."

But I would say, if you don't buy into the harsh kind of annihilation language, take on the possibility—and it's really maybe more than we recognize. This is speaking to adhiṭṭhāna, to resolution, and to wise discernment.

So we'll start with thoughts. More often than we think, reflecting wisely, one does not endure an arisen thought affected by sense desire, ill will. One was like a clear insight moment in my practice. It wasn't sitting practice—I was at home. And some years into my practice, cause and effect, and an old, old pattern of really self-denigration and self-hatred came up. And I was quite aware of it, noting it, noticing it, feeling it, each thought, noting each thought down the road. Not thinking about why, but being really present with it—but in it, in it, in it. And it wasn't like being free.

Suddenly, just a thought came: I know this. I've seen this ten million times. I don't actually need to explore. Why don't I just turn, change the channel to mettā? And it was like that. It wasn't from aversion. I said, okay, I'll just say a few mettā phrases, it works or it doesn't. So I say the four phrases. The second time I said the four phrases—totally mettā. And that whole self-hatred thing had just vanished. And that was really interesting to see.

When we say we can really—when the mind can get in habits, right? Of going with the negative, of going with the greed. And more often than we might think, when there's awareness, when there's some right view in the mind, you can notice it and you can say, you know, don't really need to go there. So it's abandoning it, it's removing it, but it's really just turning the attention to the wholesome. And if it's from aversion or it's from greed, it won't work. You'll still feel all caught up. But often we do have the feeling that I have to be with this no matter what.

So you ask, why? That was my question: why do I have to be with this? Just turn to mettā. And it's like, cultivate the wholesome. And there's a kind of resolution, adhiṭṭhāna, just a willingness to do that.

Another time when I was doing walking meditation, not so long ago, some years ago, I was walking and some little thought came up of some little email I could have sent. It was just a tiny little bit of aversion, but funny, you know. I was always like, oh, that's amusing—it's just a little aversion, doesn't matter. And I thought, wait a minute, it's aversion. It matters.

Don't overlook it. Not to beat myself up, but no—this is really this subtle level. This is the resolution. If we want to really understand freedom, to free the heart and mind, then we notice when it arises. We don't think, "Well, this was just so little, it doesn't matter."

That was a really impactful insight for me. It really deepened my resolution, really deepened the determination to be willing to see whatever's arising. It's not personal.

And then you start to see that really, more often than we realize, you can change the channel. You know—"I would just love to have this thing, I would love to have this dress"—and we're just thinking, not with judgment, "I don't really need to do this." You just come back and feel your hands or feel your feet or take a breath. It's not out of aversion. It's just out of knowing, "I don't need to do that."

Joseph calls it the sword of wisdom. But that's when it's a little stronger. And sometimes, again, the sword of wisdom can't be wielded with aversion. So you have to have a mind of awareness to see that there's not aversion. But there are times when it's a little stronger: "Oh no, why can't I do this? No."

And adhiṭṭhāna—when it's with wholesomeness, when it's a willingness not to get caught in aversion, when it's with clear seeing—adhiṭṭhāna is a quality in the mind of resolution. It's one of the ten pāramīs. It collects all the dispersed energy: "No, I'm not going there." And we can call on that. It's a strength of heart and mind.

We don't just have to flounder around and think, "Oh, the aversion, the greed, I'm caught, what can I do?" It's enough. Bring in some awareness. And if it turns to aversion, you'll feel it right away. And you'll go, "Okay, this isn't the time for that. What is happening? Aversion." Maybe this is the time to shift, to do something else, one of the other approaches.

But I think this is really important to recognize: none of it's me, none of it's us. We don't have to hold on to the beautiful thoughts in our mind. We don't have to hold on to the difficult ones either. And the more we see the emptiness, the more we see that it's all causes and conditions—the aggregates coming together and going apart—the more you can see it's actually much more workable. We don't have to think so much like prisoners of our minds and our thoughts and what's going on. "That's enough with that one now. I can really change the attention. I can change what I'm doing. I can stop doing that thing that's feeding the wanting and go do something else"—whether it's getting up from sitting and going for a walk.

And so doing these things from the sense of wise attention and wise view, rather than that contracted feeling of "Oh, I couldn't do that, so I've got to do this." You see how we go to that? But really appreciating that everything we do, everything we pay attention to, how we do it—paying attention with wise attitude in the awareness—can be a supporting, contributing condition for the abandoning of the most subtle kilesas. So it's our whole life.

The seventh approach I'm not going to go into now—I've just mentioned it in passing. It was about developing the seven factors of awakening. So also developing wholesome qualities. That's a whole other talk, but there's that too.

But I really wanted to talk about these middle approaches, about how we live our life. And the quality of wise attention is always available to us. The quality of awareness, and what's arising in the mind that's aware, is always available to us.

So that's really how everything comes together—it's just saying one thing. How you pay attention and what you pay attention to. Is it increasing unwholesome qualities that have arisen, causing new ones to come? Or is it like abandoning them? Are wholesome qualities arising that haven't yet arisen? Are wholesome qualities being increased and developed?

And this is just an exploration for our whole life.

Okay, so that's enough. Thank you for your kind attention. Like I said, you don't have to remember any of it except that one last thing, which is what we've been saying the whole time anyway.

So let's end with the acts of generosity, of sharing merit with all beings and with ourselves.

CHAPTER 192

Aspiration and Resolution

Carol Wilson · 54 min

In this reflective talk, Carol Wilson examines two of the five strengths from the Tibetan tradition—resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) and aspiration—exploring how these qualities sustain our practice both on retreat and in daily life. She distinguishes resolution as a pāramī from mere willpower or striving, describing it as a calm, collected quality of mind that gathers dispersed energy without aversion. Unlike a New Year's resolution, true adhiṭṭhāna brings relief from the exhausting cycle of dithering and second-guessing.

Carol emphasizes the importance of consciously connecting with our deepest aspirations, noting how aspiration differs from expectation or wanting. When we touch genuine aspiration, it uplifts and brightens the heart, strengthening faith and our willingness to show up moment after moment. She warns against the subtle shift from aspiration into yearning or measuring progress, which creates suffering rather than liberation.

Drawing on inspiring stories of Burmese nuns whose lives embody resolution and generosity, Carol encourages practitioners to find their own sources of inspiration—teachers, lineage holders, or ordinary people on the path. She briefly touches on the remaining three strengths: familiarization with awareness, cultivating wholesome seeds through sīla and generosity, and nibbidā (disenchantment)—that peaceful dispassion that naturally arises when wisdom sees through the emptiness of self-centered pursuits. The talk offers practical guidance for maintaining practice amid changing conditions.

I just thought I'd offer a few reflections inspired by a list I read from Dilgo Khyentse called "An Explanation of the Practice as a Way of Life." It's called The Five Strengths—five qualities that really support practice, waking up in our life. The five strengths are the power of resolution, the power of familiarization, the power of wholesome seeds, the power of disenchantment (nibbida), and the power of aspiration. I took the list, but what I'm talking about has nothing to do with anything he said. I just like the list, and then my own thoughts emerged from it. Mostly I'm going to put together resolution and aspiration and focus on that.

My idea is this: since the conditions we're in will be changing more radically than they usually do day to day in a couple of days, we're all faced with continuing to cultivate and trust and develop our moment-to-moment awareness as the conditions get more demanding or louder—more things coming. As the demands come, how can we continue to support ourselves? Really, our resolution and aspiration is the main thing. There are ten million different ways to help us remember, but what's really at the core is the commitment, the resolution, and our aspiration to awaken.

There's a line from Thich Nhat Hanh I read way back in the beginning of my practice, but I often think of it in terms of continuing to commit myself to a life of Dharma, of awakening. He said: "Do not let yourself be colonized by society." I think of that so much. Not to be negative—it's just so easy for us to fall into the habits and patterns that we grew up with, that we're used to, and that are coming at us from every direction. Not to be fearful, but just to be realistic.

The more we continue to commit to the habit of awakening, to the path of awakening, the more we're really bringing it into our life, the more we're aware in our life. In my experience, the more wisdom, the more awareness there is, the more is called forth from us. In some ways, life is more harmonious, but in other ways, we're really opening much more deeply to the way things are—which is all beauty, but also our own suffering and confusion. We become more empathic, more connected. We can't just close off to the confusion of the world, but we meet it with a wisdom eye, not just overwhelmed—usually—but sometimes.

I've found that the more we practice, the more faith there is, the more aspiration, the more commitment. But that's because more is called for. I don't know anyone who's really practicing who says practice just gets easier. We trust it more. It becomes more who we are. It becomes more our way of being. In that way, it's absolutely easier. It's not like you go for a week and then think, "Oh yeah, right, awareness. Oh yeah, right, the Dharma. Oh, the precepts—I remember that." It just becomes part of our being. In that way, it's easier. It doesn't even feel like practice. It's more who we are.

There's another line, I think from Dilgo Khyentse, that stays in my mind: mingling our mind, mingling our hearts with the Dharma so that we die without any thought of Dharma in our mind. What that means to me is we don't have to think about Dharma, because that's what we are.

So I've found that the more practice becomes part of who we are, the more we're motivated to keep finding ways to recommit, to call up our resolution, to call up our aspiration—rather than just thinking, "Oh no, now the retreat's faded, and I have to wait for the next retreat." In fact, it stops being about retreat or not retreat. It's about recognizing we don't have to do this alone, and we can't do it alone. Don't be afraid to find ways.

And that's what I want to talk about: ways to truly re-inspire ourselves, get in touch with our aspiration again, find that energy of resolution just to keep going. So that's where I want to begin—resolution, and then resolution in terms of aspiration, those two together. I'll say a few things about the other three if there's time at the end.

I could give a whole talk on resolution. It's a fascinating quality of mind, a translation of the Pali word adhiṭṭhāna. It's a mental quality—not like an idea, not your New Year's resolution where you make some concept: "I'm going to go to the gym every day." We know how that works. That's just an idea in the mind, a thing, a concept.

Resolution in this talk is one of the pāramīs when combined with wisdom. It's a quality of heart-mind. Just like greed, just like samādhi, just like mettā, we can recognize and become familiar with the presence or absence of this quality of resolution in the mind. I find it so interesting because it's not something I ever thought about or recognized in my regular life, or even in the first years of my practice. But actually tuning into it has been very helpful when I remember. It can be very helpful.

The way it's described is as a steadiness of purpose. It's a mind that is unwavering in the face of disappointment and discouragement—it just keeps going steady. They give the image of something steadfast, like an upright stone pillar. But I think that's not exactly the best image because it sounds inflexible, like "That's my New Year's resolution, I'm going to do it by gum no matter what." And that could be aversion. It could be a little disconnected. It might not have wisdom.

So it sounds inflexible, but it's not. It's a quality of mind that collects our dispersed energy, collects our scattered commitments and brings them together with a focus and a sense of just moving onward, doing what needs to be done.

We know how to do things. We know how to do things that are difficult, that require energy, that require commitment. But often, before we tune into resolution—just in our normal life, and we see this at the beginning of practice—the way we know how to do things is really by pushing or striving. Or there could be a little tinge of aversion. Maybe, I don't know, you've got to get up every day and make breakfast for the kids. That could be different on different days. For one thing, you have to do it—pretty much you've got to get up and feed the kids. But that could be done with mettā, done just with love. It could be done with aversion. It could be done with lots of different things.

Or coming on retreat. Getting up every morning on retreat. As you know, you could have lots of different mental states. So what's the quality of mind that keeps one getting up, going through the routine, doing the sittings, doing the walkings? That could come from striving. It could come from trying to look good. It could come from a real commitment, but with this energy of aversion pushing behind it. You know what I mean, right?

But the sense that comes with resolution doesn't have that overtone of striving or being disconnected or aversion. It's actually very calm, collected. I call it, in my experience, the opposite of dithering. "Should I do this or should I do that? Should I get up?" You know how exhausting that is?

I've used this in other talks, but the example where I really saw it in my life these last few years: in the morning before breakfast, especially when I'm coming up to teach and I'm on a schedule, I do about fifteen minutes of qigong. I enjoy qigong—fifteen minutes just helps me connect. Here too, but sometimes at home when I don't have a schedule, it's actually even harder.

But I would just sit on the couch and think, should I have the tea first? Maybe I'll just have some tea. Should I do the qigong? Well, why not? I could do it later. After breakfast, I could do it. And it's just dithering. Should I or shouldn't I? But no, I'll just sit another few minutes.

And then when I recognize resolution, it's just kind of the energy—just do it. In fact, that's really what it feels like. Just do it. You just get up and do it. It's not forcing. It's really a relief. Because instead of the energy going back and forth—that's really exhausting, sitting on the couch and dithering. Should I have tea? Should I do this? Should I get up? Should I lie in bed five more minutes? I mean, that's horrible, isn't it? And on and on and on. And by the time you get up, you feel lousy.

So sometimes U Tejaniya used to just hold up the Nike swish. Just do it. He would just hold it up. Just do it—without any kind of aversion or judgment.

It collects the dispersed energy. It's really a very interesting quality. It's a relief, and we can feel it. You can actually feel it. Just do it. It collects it. You do it. The mind is calm. It's not going in all these directions. You're not thinking about should I or shouldn't I. Not anything. It's just the energy's there, and you do it.

This is a very accessible quality of heart and mind that we can consciously tune into. We all know it, but we can consciously tune into it. It's one of the ten pāramīs in the Theravada tradition when it's supported by wisdom.

On its own, resolution is like an ethically neutral quality of mind, meaning that in the moment of kāja, in the moment of citta, it could be paired with unwholesome states. Like you could really have a lot of resolution to go and do something unwholesome—to do something really greedy, to rob a bank, to do whatever. You could have a lot of resolution. But that's not the pāramī.

When it's combined with wholesome aspiration, that's different. Or it can be neutral, like me doing qigong. It's not super wholesome. It's not unwholesome. It's just kind of neutral, calm. There's equanimity. So that would be wholesome. That would be a pāramī. It doesn't mean the resolution has to be to go save the world. It's just combined with a wholesome mental factor.

But in terms of our life of practice, in terms of working together as supported by paññā, wisdom—or if you translate wisdom as discernment, I find that really helpful. Because the discernment can go along with perhaps a wholesome intention of compassion or a wholesome intention of strengthening the body. But the discernment is also about seeing if the appropriate conditions are there for the resolve.

Like I'm sitting here—I could make a resolve to go into fourth jhāna right now. That would not happen because the conditions aren't here. And we often, without the discernment of wisdom—and in practice we can really do this—we collect the energy: "Yes, now I'm going to do this." But the conditions totally aren't there.

I like the example of jhāna as a specific state because, as Sayadaw Tejaniya says, there are very specific conditions we can see in the mind and body that support the arising of one-pointed concentration. Wanting it to happen is not one of them. If we could just remember that and really believe it, it would save so much suffering.

When I first started thinking about the wisdom and discernment that goes with resolution, I considered the story of the Buddha's life and the story of Buddhism—the big resolution he made when he sat down under the Bodhi tree and said, "I'm not getting up until I'm completely awakened," in whatever language he was using. And it happened that night. So somehow he had the discernment to know. He didn't do it six years prior. The first thing he did when he went out as a renunciate wasn't to sit under the Bodhi tree and declare, "I'm not getting up until I'm fully awakened." No, he went through six years of incredible practice and seeking—concentration practice, starving himself, really finding the way. And when he did have the discernment to sit under the tree, that was really coming from wisdom about the conditions, and from faith and trust in what he knew. I think that's always been really interesting for me to consider.

I'm thinking of this because of the last time I was in Bodh Gaya. We were visiting Dipa Ma—it was the year before she died. She was a very deeply practiced Bengali woman, about this tall, really tiny, a little grandmother. And she was so—not fierce, but just really committed. She said to Joseph, "Joseph, you should sit for a weekend." And he said, "Oh, yeah." She said, "No, sit for a weekend. Sit down for the weekend and don't get up." He just started laughing. She said, "Don't be lazy." She meant that from her ability, from her practice. For her, that was not a crazy thing to say. For him, maybe a different thing—I can't speak for him. I don't know if he did it or not.

So that's the sense of resolution—when it's supported by or when it's supporting our aspiration, not just in practice but in our life, the aspiration that we bring to our dharma life. When I say practice, I don't mean formal sitting and walking. And I don't really mean being on retreat. I really mean, at this point, the way we've been here and the way I'm talking now—I really mean our life of commitment to Dharma. And I want to say commitment to awakening, but that might not be your aspiration. I'm not here to tell you what your aspiration should be.

But I want to talk about how supportive it is to keep tuning into what one's aspiration is. Because it has been—you all know it—and it will again get hard or flat, become just a memory where you're not feeling connected to the wakeful energy. And instead of going, "Oh no, I can't do it," really taking the time to reflect, to tune in to what is truly, truly important to you in your life and in your life of Dharma—which hopefully stops being a separate life—and really allowing ourselves to feel it deeply.

Because aspiration is different from expectation. Aspiration is really this heart-mind sense of, as I said, what's truly important, what's possible, why we're practicing—whatever words you want to use. And when it's aspiration, the quality it brings to our heart and mind uplifts. It uplifts our energy.

It uplifts our heart. It brightens the heart and mind. It strengthens faith. And that faith strengthens our willingness to show up again.

We might think, "Okay, this might be a really hard thing that's going on in my mind, a really hard response to something in the world. Can I have another moment of confidence in awareness? Can I have confidence in cultivating the wholesome instead of just going down the old rabbit hole of habit?"

So aspiration, when we touch it, really brightens this for us. It helps us in whatever way is appropriate to how we practice. It's different from wanting or expectation. But I know it's easy, the way we think about things, to get confused.

Because aspiration could be, say for example, to completely awaken from suffering. That could be one's aspiration. And the way our minds work, we can think, "Well, that's a goal, right?" It is looking at a possibility. If there was no possibility—if it was like, "Just practice and nothing's ever going to change, your mind's going to stay the same as it is, we're just going to fluff around, it's hopeless, but keep on practicing"—we need a little sense of what's possible.

But that's like a sense of, "Oh yeah, that's possible." And the aspiration feeds the willingness to be here now, to completely surrender into this moment with awareness and wisdom.

But when that same aspiration—to fully awaken in this lifetime, whatever it is—when the quality of mind relating to it turns, as it will at times, into a subtle yearning or expecting or judging or measuring how far to go, anything like that... you get a sense that instead of completely surrendering into wakefulness here, it has started leaning forward. And that's the little movement that gets all of samsara going again.

But you can tell it's different from the quality of aspiration because it isn't uplifting. It's like, "Oh no, it's hopeless. Why am I doing this? This is useless." I don't have to go down that road. You can tell the difference. It really isn't that subtle when it gets going.

Because that can be a habit of our mind, don't use that habit as a reason not to really land in your aspiration. I think it's so important not to be afraid, to really open to—in your own heart and mind, you don't have to tell anybody else, you don't have to write it on the bulletin board—but in your own heart and mind, really touch into: What's most important to me?

We know the habits get triggered quickly. We know that we can lose the sense of faith. But truly tuning back into the aspiration can change that. Give yourself time to do that again and again, especially when we feel lost. That's what can get the faith going.

When we're in touch with our aspiration—say the aspiration is to awaken in this life—whatever way you are practicing, working with awareness or cultivating concentration, this aspiration is supported by the quality of resolution. Because it's not that you make an aspiration and that's it, right? It's every moment.

There's a saying I read years ago from some teacher, one Buddhist teacher, saying: in every moment the mind is committing to something. The question is, to what?

If we look at that with interest—and you have to look at it with interest, not with judgment—when we see "to what?" we'll find it's things like: I want to take a rest. I'm a little bit hungry. This is too much trouble. What's it connecting to? We look and see.

It's moment after moment after moment.

So the idea, the connection in your heart-mind with your aspiration—even if it's just a feeling, it might not even be words—but that can support the resolution to the little choices we make, the bigger choices. Not every single moment. Don't make yourself nuts. But just really seeing in the little choices, "Oh, what's my aspiration?" I mean, that already feels like too much.

But a lot of people here have described just an exploring in ways that were interesting. Seeing something in a little moment that wasn't important in life, but in that little moment seeing craving come up where they didn't expect it. "Oh, look at that. That's craving for that." The craving was seen with awareness and could just go. That kind of thing.

The resolution, the willingness to meet it with awareness, to be interested. Remembering that again and again and again. The resolution to when we have bigger problems, choices that we have to make. And we never know what's going to happen whichever choice we make. Quite a few people have brought up needing to make some kind of choice and just seeing all the stuff that goes on with that, all the thinking.

And somehow there can be this secret belief: if you make the right choice, everything works out. And if you make the wrong choice, it's just all dukkha. It's like we keep thinking that there's some fairyland where everything is going to work out. Forget about it.

But when we're tuning into aspiration, what I find is that it helps us more easily align with checking what's the motivation as we make the choice, rather than looking for the result of what we want. Checking in with awareness, tuning into the present moment, letting the decision—even just a little one—come out of awareness and out of wholesomeness when we see it. So the resolution just gives us the strength of mind to do it. Or to get up and do the Qigong. Or in a day—I'm not saying you need to sit every day—but it's really helpful just to remember awareness.

I was talking about Thich Nhat Hanh one night, maybe it was the first night, where he was talking about just coming home to ourselves. And I found that just in daily life, if I just sit down—and that just happens to be the posture, sometimes I'll do walking—it could be for thirty seconds. But that commitment of taking the posture, in a way it's like taking the quality in the mind. It's really reminding my mind, "Oh yeah, awareness is the main thing here." It's more important than getting my toast right away. It's more important than whatever. It's not saying it, but just doing it. Just doing it. This is where the resolution really supports us. It's just simple. It makes it easier. But I'm saying it so we can call it up to our minds sometimes. We need to call it up to our minds, and we can do that.

So tuning in for yourself again and again. What's the aspiration? What lights up your heart and mind? What keeps you going? What's kept you going this month? What will keep us going on this path as we continue?

Ajahn Sucitto was saying once, he was going on about faith, and he said, "It's such a beautiful aspiration to transform one's consciousness." He said, "So few people in this world seem to have that aspiration." And it really takes faith—trust and confidence in the truth of the teachings, the truth of the path, or confidence in awareness, or however you want to say it. Confidence in your own commitment, in your own practice. It really takes connecting again with the aspiration and confidence because it's so easy to fall into skeptical doubt.

It's just the information that's coming in from so many other avenues. If we're just kind of—not that you have to be on your guard—but if we're just kind of really not quite aware, which often we're not, it gets in and starts feeding the old habits. And then you find yourself all caught up and go, "Wait a minute." Just—I say sit. It doesn't matter if you sit. It's just take a moment. What's happening now?

Right. Awareness. Being really present with things as they are—so much more helpful on the path than giving in to skeptical doubt. We might say, "Oh no, I'm lost again. It's all over." No. Recommit. Reconnect with the aspiration.

So what works for you to discover, to rediscover? It takes a lot of humility, right, and courage. You just keep beginning again, rediscovering. You say, "Okay, I got really lost in this reactivity for this day, for this week, for whatever it was." But now's now. Meeting this with humility, rediscovering—that's beautiful. That's not a failure. Trusting that, seeing what helps.

In my life, in the last few years, I've been realizing how much support I get for reconnecting with aspiration and with the reality of the potential for awakening by consciously tuning in to other people, dead or alive, that are inspirational. Really, this sense that we don't have to do it alone. And in fact, it's too hard to do it alone. We always talk about sangha, living sangha, and of course that's wonderful when we have it. But even more than that, I've been consciously reminding myself—and I'll give some examples, because I like to talk about it for one thing, and I get to, but it's also really supportive.

One is just sometimes consciously reflecting on your particular lineage. As far back, all the beings who've been real teachers for you—it could be in this form, it could be in another form. Just right now, my old piano teacher when I was in elementary school popped into mind. She was a Christian Scientist. She was like a pseudo-grandmother. But there was a way that she really inspired me toward goodness and love. I hadn't thought about her in ages. That just arose now. But we all have lineages like that. And it can also be the lineage back to the Buddha, whatever it is. But consciously calling on it, instead of our kind of Western notion that we're independent, we do it all by ourselves—as if that's intelligent.

Really, thinking about whatever your particular lineage is, it can be devotional or not. I'm not a particularly devotional type, so I wasn't doing this for a long time. But when I think about different teachers of mine, especially when I'm on retreat and the mind is quieter and you can kind of feel them in your heart, I feel so much gratitude and appreciation. And then just using that gratitude as this wholesome energy to re-strengthen, to recommit to our aspiration, to turn our energy back into cultivating what we value.

I've also thought often of different beings alive in my life on the path—people I share the path with or that I've met. And it's not that they have to be extraordinarily realized. When Menandria spoke about Ujjayanta the other night, that really hit me as very inspiring. It took me back to this place in Sagaing where I've been every year for twenty years. And it really touched me, but it also reminded me of other beings that truly inspire me.

I'll share a couple of stories to make a point: it doesn't have to be someone who seems incredibly enlightened. There are so many people one might come in touch with who have various aspects that are incredibly inspiring. And inspiring in the way that it touches that potential in our own heart and mind. It wakes that up. That's, I think, why it's inspiring.

So one of the nuns I know from Burma—a few of us would go every year and offer support. I visited her, so I happened to know her story. When she was about nineteen or twenty, she was really, really ill. Her family was a farming family in the country. She wanted to become a nun, but they wouldn't let her. Actually, a lot of the nuns had parents who didn't want them to go be nuns. Her parents wouldn't allow it. She became so ill she was almost dying. The parents were having to call doctors.

There are many stories of families that use all their money on medical care for one member of the family. This just happens all the time. So they were doing that, and then they were about to have to sell their house and their farm. She convinced them to let her go be a nun if her sister would come too. This was because her faith was so strong. She's someone who has really strong faith, and as I said, her practice is powerful – mostly at this time, Buddhānussati, which is really reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha. This would brighten her mind and heart and bring forth this faith, which would bring steadfast resolution. She was committed because she felt so much faith in wanting to be a nun that it would heal her.

So her sister and she both got ordained when they were about nineteen or twenty. She showed us in her little nunnery – at this point started with a small bamboo nunnery near Shwe Oo Min, near Yangon – they had a little Buddha rupa. There's always a Buddha rupa in any nunnery or monastery. And she said, "This is the first one we bought." She said, "When I cut my hair, which was really long and beautiful, I could sell it. And we used that to buy this Buddha rupa." They were so proud of it. It was just so touching.

She did get well. She amazingly did get well, because this happened maybe twenty years ago. Then she and her sister came to Yangon and went into a nunnery or a meditation center, usually run by monks, by a Sayadaw. They really wanted to meditate, to really reach Nibbana. So they were there meditating for some months.

And then from her home village down in the country, the head Sayadaw of the village – each village would have that Sayadaw, the monk teacher – said to her, "There are a bunch of poor young girls, either orphans or only have one parent, and their parents want them to get schooling but can't support them." This happens so much there with nuns. And he said, "I'm sending them up to you to take care of." They didn't ask for this. But this is just what happens.

So she made a complete 180-degree turn. She left the meditation place, went and got a tiny little piece of land, probably got the money from their parents. This was near Shwe Oo Min. They started by building a tiny little bamboo hut, and the young girls came – like ten of them, fifteen of them. And then the two sisters were completely devoting their lives to taking care of these girls. They become little nunlets, so cute, taking care of them and supporting them so they can go to school. All of the support is on dāna – the rice they receive and a little bit of money on dāna to take care of these girls.

This is not an unusual story. You can go to hundreds of places like this. But we happened to know Daw Tara and speak with her. The sense was that it was a real 180-degree turn. They wanted to meditate, but now this is the path. She was so committed to these girls. "We want to give them the chance to have a wholesome life. They don't have to stay nuns after they grow up, but we want to give them the chance" – basically, not to have to go on the street. She didn't talk like that, but essentially, not to starve completely.

You can see the affection. You can see the care. You can see the love. And it wasn't like, "We're doing this until they're gone and then we're out of here." Because it's never going to happen – they keep sending new young ones.

But the tenderness, the generosity, and the absolute commitment to this path—to me this is really inspiring as an example of how your life is your path. It's all about awakening.

At the same time, Dodra, who is kind of the smarter one, is studying to be a Dhammacharya, which is the path available for the simple nuns—someone who doesn't have a lot of education and not a big place or a lot of support. It's a Pali Dhamma training that takes years and years of study for these nuns, kind of like five years of successive tests. I know many nuns who may be studying this for ten or fifteen years before they manage to pass it, but it's a huge big deal when they do. So she's been studying this, and she did finally pass it.

But this sense of just the complete giving over, out of generosity and love—but it's the Dharma practice. It's the awakening practice. It's not something else. So that was very inspiring to me.

Another friend, who I don't want to name, I've known for maybe thirty years—not a Burmese person—of practice and really committed to practice, and like a normal person, like all of us, with hard times, hard mind, hard life. This person ordained as a Burmese nun I think it must be seventeen or eighteen years ago now. I know her really well. We work together with a couple other friends, and we offer support to nuns in Burma. So she's spent a lot of time in Burma, but not all the time there.

Watching her really closely over these years of being a really committed nun—in the Burmese tradition, they don't get much support. She can't stay there all the time. She's a homeless nun. She has to leave, but now she can't even get back in. They wouldn't even give her a visa this year.

Watching her over these years, I can't even know how hard it's been, how demanding. And it's not that it was a natural fit with her personality. So there are a couple times when it's so hard, and I say, "Why are you still doing this?" She says, "Because I really want to purify my heart and mind. And this is how I'm seeing, this is how I'm doing it." And she is doing it. It's really so inspiring.

When I think about it—I'm just used to being around her and I don't always think about it—but when I think about what she's gone through in all these years, and it gets easier and it doesn't, the situations keep changing, it's really inspiring to see what someone can do. Talk about resolution. This woman has incredible resolution and incredible aspiration. And it's really been work. It's not like, "Oh yes, I'm just a nun and everything's fine." It's been work. Very, very inspiring to me.

So think, see who comes to your mind, who inspires you, who really can wake up this energy. It really touches me just to see these people. And then it wakes that up in us. And they're regular people. Don't make them into something like, "Oh, I could never do that." They're regular people. Everywhere you look.

One other nun—Dasumanachari. The first time I ever went to Shwayumen, I don't know, 2006 or something, there was another nun with a little nunnery right around the corner. There's a lot in that little area. A poor nunnery. A little nunnery. A friend took me there first because the friend was offering money so that she could put electricity into her place at this time.

We knew her over the years. Fine, she's a little bit depressive, but there's a nunnery with about twenty nuns and just doing their thing. And then one year—I'm not sure how long ago, maybe ten or fifteen years—she came by when we were all there, usually there in the winter. Friends give us money and we're offering money to different nunneries.

She knew that, and we offered her money. She came to us before we left and said, "I really have this vision." She's speaking in Burmese, but one of our friends translates. "I really want to open a school for poor kids."

Some of the nuns do this because—and this was even before the civil war—a lot of poor kids couldn't afford to go to the government schools, even though they're supposedly free. So some nuns and some monks start Sangha schools that are free for the children. To have the school means that nunnery or monastery is running the whole operation on the dana that they're offered. They hire teachers at a regular rate. They have to have donations to build the building or the lean-to or whatever they need to keep it going. They raise money even for the uniforms for the kids—all on dana.

So she came and said she had this vision to start this school. Like I said, she's... you wouldn't have seen that as a possibility in her. And what we offered was not nearly enough to do it, but it was kind of a seed starter.

We came back the next year, and it's still running now. She came and she had done it. She'd started this school—I think at that time she had 150 little kids, up through what we'd say fourth or fifth grade, that would come every day. She was having to hire teachers. They don't get a huge amount of money, but she's hiring the teachers. She had given up most of the living space for the nuns. They'd moved into the one little building and built a big, open-air lean-to and gotten money for desks and gotten some support from organizations in Burma that offer assistance. Some big companies used to have a little wing that would be like a donation generosity wing, and they'd offer money to nuns and monks and schools and such.

So she came and she had this thing going, and it's gotten only much, much bigger. And she—this is the point—she was like transformed. She was just glowing. She had so much more work, so much more responsibility, because it's all on her. But she was filled with light.

What she said was, "It's so much responsibility. I have to raise all this money and the buildings. I'm exhausted." But she was radiant. She said, "Now my citta is calm. My mind is calm. My mind is peaceful." And it was really true. You could see it. And it wasn't a one-off thing. Every year it's bigger, and she has more going on, more teachers, more students. It's really amazing to see the aspiration married to the resolution, and really that coming from the faith, and the generosity coming from the faith. I think she's one who practices Buddhānussati, just looking at the qualities of the Buddha—that really brings up her faith.

So just seeing what's possible. Really tuning in. That helps me. That helps me to reconnect with aspiration, to bring up this energy.

I know I have to mention the other three really quickly. But I just want to say other ways, some that we've mentioned. Like when I mentioned the Buddha saying to contemplate your sīla, to contemplate your acts of generosity—really take time and tune into that. Previous acts in your life of wholesomeness. Or even just tuning into, as some people have mentioned, thinking, "Where am I going with this practice?" And then reflect on the last ten years of your life, or how things were before you started practicing. Really let that come in so that our faith in the Dhamma, in the Buddha Dhamma, the faith in the truth of how things are, and that that transforms how we are with life and how we live—you can't overvalue that. I think it never hurts us to do it again and again and again. Whether it's reading, whether it's being in nature, whether it's listening to the ten million things available online or videos you can see—that can be inspiring.

I would say show some care when you're choosing what to engage with. Not just anything. There's a lot of garbage out there too. But really pay attention to what's inspiring for you. Notice what the effect is. If it's just making you feel envious or critical, that's not helpful. For now, put it down. See what's feeding the wholesome. That's really what matters. Strengthen that.

Find ways to give attention to your intention as you're doing things. Mingyur Rinpoche mentions this, but many teachers do. Just noticing, say, the intention of generosity. Contemplate that in your heart. Feel how lovely it feels, the intention of generosity. And then when you're doing little activities, you could consciously bring in the motivation of generosity. If you have a service job, consciously infuse it with that motivation. "I'm cleaning the floor. May all the yogis and the staff appreciate the clean floor."

My first three-month retreat I sat, my job for a month was cleaning the toilets. And I really got into it. It just made me happy to make clean toilets for everyone to use. That's not an ego thing. That's having wholesome motivation as we do things. It transforms activities.

The Buddha himself, when talking about generosity in different suttas—there's one where he says to the monks and nuns, when you rinse your bowl after eating and throw the dirty water into a little pond, even then you can think, "May whatever beings live in this pond be able to eat from the rinsings of this bowl." That's an act of generosity. How much does that take? Just remembering. I think of that teaching all the time.

Consider how different our life becomes. Instead of "Oh God, I have to clean the floor again," we think, "May beings really appreciate this floor." It's no more work. It's actually less work. And it's really feeding the wholesome. So that's just another idea I'm offering.

One last thing I want to say: please don't be shy or afraid to really connect with your aspiration. Let it be what's true for you. Not "Oh, I couldn't have the aspiration to awaken. I'm just a little nobody." That's not serving you or anybody else. It's just an ego thing.

When you feel that sense of inspiration, dhamma inspiration, just let it come up. That's all you have to do. Just tune in. Don't be afraid. The Buddha said two things he never lost sight of: not to shrink back from the difficult, and not to rest contented merely with wholesome states of mind. I like that. It's not a "should," but it's recognizing when we hit that place of "okay, this is good enough" and come out of retreat thinking "this is good enough." That's the trouble though—how long does it stay good enough? Something always happens. Not to rest content with merely wholesome states of mind.

But as I think Andrea said the other day, he also said, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so." So see what's true, but don't sell yourself short. Let the aspiration be as vast as the Dhamma is vast, because we are the Dhamma.

So I just mentioned the power of familiarization, which is basically being familiar with our practice—in this case, familiarity with awareness—so that we really have confidence in it, we recognize it.

We've been spending the month of your practice recognizing it. Familiarization with how the mind feels when it's lost in aversion and greed, how it feels when it's free from kilesa—those moments of coolness that Andrea mentioned, that Ajahn Buddhadasa speaks of, those moments when the heart-mind is free from kilesa. Familiarization with those moments. They happen a lot. They happen in life. We can recognize those. We can know we've experienced this, we know awareness is able to be with anything. We're familiar with that. We can call on that to remind us, to strengthen our faith, to keep us going.

Wholesome seeds—well, we've talked about that. Just cultivating the wholesome, cultivating sila, cultivating generosity, really strengthening those qualities in heart and mind, as I read the other night. Even that has the effect of really uprooting the asavas, the kilesas. It's not like we practice generosity so that we'll have a good rebirth or something. The moment of generosity is the moment of non-clinging—the moment of non-clinging to sense of self or things. Just tune in. In a moment of generosity, the heart is happy. It's open. There's a sense—not even connection, but self and other, that delineation is much more gone. Real generosity, you know. Whatever it is, even if it's just a smile. It's a powerful practice of freeing the heart and mind from greed. Sila, the same in its way. We've talked about that before, but not to think that's just an ancillary practice to get ready for the real thing. It is awakening practice.

And the fourth, nibbida, which is often translated as dispassion. Let's translate it that way—not translated as disgust, as it's sometimes rendered. All these negative translations, you know, from back in the 1900s or whenever it was.

I wrote a little piece about nibbida. Disenchantment is actually a very peaceful, a very calm and peaceful and spacious quality of heart-mind. It's described as losing one's taste for, or not delighting in the flavor—really losing one's taste for the fascination with all our experience and the fascination with sense pleasures. We're often experiencing this: losing the fascination, losing our taste for the narrowness that comes with our self-centered perception and self-centered way of living. And after a while, it's not every moment, but there are moments where it's just, "Yeah, what about me?" It feels so unpleasant, so separating, and kind of the nibbida just puts it down. It's not disgust, but the mind just loses the taste for it. There's no nourishment there.

The example that's often given is of a dog that's really hungry, and it finds this bone that's been bleached in the sun for ten years. And it's gnawing on the bone, but there's absolutely no nourishment there—no marrow, no nothing. And so it just puts it down and goes away. That's nibbida. It's actually a cool, settled, and clear moment of heart and mind. It really comes from a lot of wisdom. And sometimes it arises just naturally from wisdom.

Contemplation and reflection, at times, can support it. Reflecting on—say, I'm getting all involved in something, and suddenly: this is all about clinging. It's all about me. Not a judgment, but just feeling that. The contemplation of the complications that come from following on this wanting, from this doing. It's just a reflection. And the mind goes, "I don't need to do that. The peace is so much more." The mind just inclines to peace. It's a lovely experience.

Or the other way that's mentioned is consciously inclining the mind towards the peace, the peace of Nibbana. There's this saying of the Buddha's that I like a lot. He says, "Here, Ananda, having gone to the forest, to the foot of a tree, or an empty hut, a practitioner reflects thus: This is peaceful. This is sublime."

That is the stilling of formations, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, cessation, Nibbana.

Even momentary. Just incline the mind in a moment. What can I do now instead of that? Ah. This is peaceful. Just in this moment, the relinquishing of acquisitions. No formations arising. The ending of craving is peaceful.

That's something we can familiarize ourselves with—just noticing that more. It's not going to be fed too much in the regular daily culture. But this is what we can support in our lives.

So those are just some reflections, hopefully in some way helpful in your ongoing practice.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Let's share the blessings that we are so fortunate to receive with all beings.

CHAPTER 193

Liberating Simplicity of Awareness

Carol Wilson · 46 min

In this evening talk from a U Tejaniya-style retreat, Carol Wilson illuminates the profound yet overlooked nature of awareness itself. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Chah, and Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she explores how the simple act of recognizing awareness—without adding judgments, preferences, or personal narratives—creates conditions for liberating wisdom. The talk addresses how we habitually overlay experience with unexamined views, taking things personally and creating elaborate stories from neutral moments.

Wilson examines the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) through practical examples: how we miss the constant changing nature of experience (anicca), grasp at things expecting lasting satisfaction (dukkha), and assume a solid self at the center of every interaction (anattā). She shares a compelling story about a colleague's misinterpreted frown to illustrate how quickly we construct suffering through unexamined assumptions. The teaching emphasizes that right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) isn't about adopting correct beliefs, but about meeting experience without the veils of our preferences.

The practical guidance centers on Ajahn Sumedho's counsel to have confidence in receptive awareness, especially during difficult emotions. Rather than rejecting any experience, practitioners learn to recognize that self-judgment, grief, or anger simply feel "like this"—another arising to be witnessed with the pure awareness that Ānanda Thubten calls "true nonviolence." Wilson concludes with Upāsikā Kee's teaching: "What is, is. What is not, is not. No need to add anything extra."

At the almost end of a day that sometimes can seem rather long, sometimes not—but anyway, it's almost over. And then there'll be another one and another one and another one. So there's no point thinking about it. There's only this moment. And that is so freeing. When there's only this moment, what's the problem? You don't like this moment, okay, but not liking is like this. What's the problem?

What I want to talk about tonight is just basic, kind of 101 introduction to awareness, which many of you who've done these retreats a lot have heard before. But I could remind myself about the quality, the power of awareness every single day and it wouldn't be too much. That's what we're doing here.

I like to call it the liberating simplicity of awareness, of mindfulness. If you think about it, which I often do, this aspect of our experience that we've been talking about—just this simple awareness of whatever's occurring—it's not a thing. It's kind of an activity, but it's a completely normal aspect of all of our experience, completely natural and normal. We so overlook it because it seems like nothing special.

What's amazing to me to contemplate is the incredible power of the steadiness of this awareness when we take refuge in it, rather than taking refuge in and trusting all our thoughts. The steadiness of awareness sets up the conditions for liberating wisdom—completely liberating from whatever's occurring.

Liberation not from the things we don't like in the world. When most of us first start practicing, somehow we think that nibbāna or freedom means all this junk stops happening. Please, God. Things get better. People get nicer. We don't get angry ourselves. Everything just is somehow better.

But the liberation that comes from the steadiness of awareness, from really taking refuge again and again and again, is not from this world. It doesn't remove us from experience of the world. In fact, we just surrender more fully into this moment, like I said in the beginning. The liberation is from the confusion, the suffering, our mistaken and confused understanding of experience, which takes us into worlds of wanting, aversion, confusion, me and other, and all kinds of descriptions of what we think is happening—which isn't happening at all.

The liberating power is incredible. I just want to talk about that tonight, pointing to things we all know but to help us remember, because we forget. We forget to trust awareness, we forget to notice it, and we forget to have confidence in it.

One of the definitions Neal really likes, of mindfulness awareness: Vipassanā meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly—not thinking about it, experiencing it directly—from moment to moment, with the right understanding.

Those are, in a way, three components. They're not separate, but three angles. Experiencing the mind and body directly, from moment to moment—not just once in a while—with the right understanding.

You might think, as I used to think: okay, I forget sometimes, but generally I'm aware, right? I know what's going on. I know I'm sitting here and I'm not in the dining room. I knew when I was eating, I was eating. I'm not completely unaware. How can it be so liberating? What's the difference? How is this mindfulness, this awareness different?

Part of it is that it comes with right view, and part of it is just the quality of the awareness itself.

Ajahn Sumedho—the American monk in the Thai tradition, he's ninety now but still at Amaravati, retired but giving lots of talks that are streamed online—one of his descriptions of awareness, and this is really his thing, his confidence in awareness: Awareness is not about making value judgments about our thoughts or our emotions, our sensations, or whatever's happening. Awareness is simply about knowing these things fully as they are, what they are in this moment.

And knowing means not the knowing of thinking about—"Oh, this is a tingling sensation." It's just that fullness of being with it, knowing it with awareness. Sometimes knowing is used in that way of "Oh, I'm aware of it." Knowing is like this. Not making any value judgments.

Can you just, for a moment, imagine how simple that makes life? Just notice going through the day—you see somebody do something, and the habit of mind makes some little judgment. They mean this, or they have that kind of personality. It doesn't even have to be negative. Just some little summation, putting them in some little box. Why? It's just a habit.

But just think: somebody does or says something, and there's no need to make any judgment about it whatsoever. There's no need to sum it up. There's no need to say that's what the personality is like. There's no need to add anything to it. Thinking about it is one thing, but just notice as you go through the days—in the moment that happens—how it's like, ah, it's so simple. Life can be so much more simple than our mind makes it.

You still know what's happening. You're not stupid. You're not disconnected. You're more connected. When we're caught up in all our judgments—it means this, that's the kind of personality they have, and I wonder what that says about me because I think that about them—that's not simple. That's complicated. And the more that goes on, the less actually connected we are, the less we actually know what's happening. We're living in this world of complication. How long does it take the mind to do that, from seeing to complication? We can get so far so fast.

And in terms of talking about right view, right understanding—when that's what's taking over, all these complications—we believe that. We believe it. And that's not the right understanding that we're talking about with this sense of pure mindfulness.

Another quotation, I think this is also from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "This awareness is a kind of total freedom to receive life just as you experience it in this moment." A total freedom. Don't think of it—explore it through the day. Something comes up in your mind, you think it shouldn't be there because of whatever. This awareness with wise understanding is total freedom. You don't have to have any opinion. Oh, this came up. It's like this now, in space.

When we're talking about the steadiness of mindful awareness through the days here—the sitting, the walking, the eating, the mindful movement, whatever—more and more you'll be noticing this: what's happening in the body, what's happening in the mind. The reaction in the mind to what's happening is just another mental experience. And as we start to and continue to recognize a simple moment of awareness—oh, not liking is like this—and we're not needing to add anything to it or to push it away, just this total freedom to receive life as it is.

I love these quotations. I read them to myself all the time.

This one is from Sayadaw U Vivekananda. A moment of awareness, pure and simple. Just in a moment. Not trying to create anything. Life is coming and going, doing its thing. We don't have to create anything. Not rejecting what is happening. As things happen or stop happening—a sound, a thought, a sensation, my talking, whatever it is—as things happen or stop happening, don't forget awareness.

And acceptance of an experience—say there's a difficult sound, the experience is difficult, there's aversion, and you're struggling with it—you say, "Oh yeah, aversion's like this." Acceptance of the experience: there's a sense of ease that comes from that. Acceptance of an experience does not mean that we let go of being aware.

I don't know if you can quite follow this. Sometimes when we know we're struggling—I must be in reaction, I must be making a judgment about—oh, judgment is like this, ah, just receiving. And that sense of release, that sense of ease. Then sometime, in the back of the mind, because these habits of wrong view are really very subtle, more and more subtle the more we look—the back of the mind thinks, "Ah, I got it. I got to the place of ease and not struggling. So that was the job. And now I can quit being aware."

We don't exactly say that. But it's like, "Oh, okay, I got to the relaxed place. That's good enough. Now I can take a break." It's as if we're doing a job, getting to some place. But we're not doing a job. We're not doing anything—except remembering, once in a while, that we can remember awareness. And then it starts to get its own momentum.

All the sixth sense experiences are happening by themselves, right? Sitting, walking, seeing, hearing, sensations in the body. Do you have to look very far to notice something happening? Did you have any moments today when you couldn't find something happening to be aware of? You might have. Completely blacked out, nothing happening. But that's a thought already happening. Sometimes we're looking for something we think is worth being aware of—and that's a different story. But there's always something. Try to stop things happening. That's like a nightmare.

So life is doing itself, with this receptive quality of connected awareness: "Oh, it's like this now. It's like this now. It's like this now." And with that continuity, we start to allow wisdom to recognize more accurately what's happening, rather than our mistaken assumptions.

I want to talk about this sense of right understanding—or as Alexis mentioned, so-called right view. It's tricky using the word "right," because if you say right, then there's wrong. And if we have right and wrong, the habit—at least in English—right away you have a dichotomy. One's good and one's bad. Then we go for the good and we don't want the bad, and we're into this conflict. It doesn't mean that.

But in terms of accurate view, what's meant by "view" here? Really, in the mind, it's how we recognize and understand ourselves, the world, a particular moment of experience. So a view, in the most obvious way, is a belief—a belief system. We all have them. That's fine when we're aware of it. If I have a belief that I'm a Buddhist and I have ideas about what that means, fine. That's a belief, a view. But when I don't recognize that it's operating, when I'm looking at the world through that view, putting it as a template on experience and evaluating what experience means through that lens—and we don't even know we're doing it—that's how we get out of touch with what's happening.

I'll give an example I often use, which is kind of obvious. But first I want to read this from Ajahn Chah. He said, in a nutshell: "The teaching of the Buddha is to transform one's view."

It is possible for the view to change—view of ourselves, view of experience, view of the world. It only requires looking at things, and then it happens. That's really, in essence, what starts to happen and deepens through the steadiness, the continuity of just one moment of this simplicity of awareness. As Ajahn Sumedho says, just surrender—and it's like this now. Without anything extra. And not looking for anything. It's just like this. It's like this.

It's like this.

And gradually, as the awareness gains its momentum, actually the views that we don't even know we're holding start to show up. They start to be noticed with awareness as another thought, as another assumption, as another belief—which is fine to see. But not seeing is like gravity. We don't think every moment about gravity, we don't walk around thinking, "I'm being held down by gravity." That's just how things are.

I'll give you this example. It's a broad example, but it works down to very subtle levels. I've often used this because it was such a fun experience. Some years ago, I was in Burma with friends, and we were with a group of people giving a dāna offering of bags of rice in a poor village. It's all done very formally there, and it's really lovely. It's not like you just buy some rice and make a pile and people take it. You offer it face to face. It's received. There's blessings. It's just a lovely experience.

So we were in this small village offering in this room. And later—you always take pictures, ten million photographs of every dāna offering there ever was, and then you look at them all—so later we were looking at the photographs from a couple of different cameras. And in some of the photographs, there were these perfectly round light circles. Perfectly round.

We're looking at those, and a couple of our Burmese friends said, "Oh, that means devas were there." Devas are celestial beings, they're bringing luck. Devas are said to be drawn to the wholesome, drawn to generosity, drawn to what is good. So there were devas there, liking it.

Then one of us, who was actually a nun but also a scientist, said, "That's not devas. That means there's a little drop of water, a little drop of moisture in the camera." She was positive. They were positive. And our kind of way of thinking was, "Well, which is the right one?" That would be right view—which is the right one? And if I get the right thing to understand, then I know it. That's how we tend to approach it. And that's what freezes us up.

Just to end this story: our scientist friend, a couple of years later, was in Tiruvannamalai in southern India, where Ramana Maharshi has an ashram. On the full moon night, literally millions of people come to do pradakshina, to walk around the mountain. So she was there on a full moon night, with people walking around—it really could be a million people. And she took a lot of photos; she's a photographer. Then she sent me pictures. They had all these perfect light circles. And she said, "Oh. I know there's no moisture in my camera. Maybe it is devas." Who knows?

So views can change. And the point of right view is not putting our belief system onto our assessment of what's happening. It allows for another possibility to emerge. When we know what it is, it slams the possibility shut. And then we can't see—not in this case, there wasn't suffering—but in our own experience, we can't recognize with awareness how confusion and suffering may be arising in our heart due to a kind of mismatch between our opinion of what's happening, our idea of what's happening, and what's actually happening.

We don't see that because our view—so-called wrong view—is so strong we don't even know it's there.

So awareness, with right view, is simply meeting experience, not through the veils of our preferences and beliefs. Just receiving what is, however it is. And we can't just do that by thinking about it, because we don't know what we don't know.

In the Buddhist teaching, of course, the very strong views that arise from misperception—that we don't recognize accurately because our perception is distorted, overlaid by view—what the Buddha always talked about is that we don't recognize the impermanence, the continual changing nature of all experience. Always. Intellectually we may know it, but intellectually knowing is not the same as meeting experience with wise awareness free from any overlay of our opinion. We don't even know it's an opinion. We might say, "Oh yeah, I know everything's impermanent," but in the moment of seeing, there's an assumption of permanence we don't quite catch. Sometimes. Not always, but sometimes.

These are the examples the Buddha gave, perhaps the most subtle. In experiences of suffering, for example, because everything is changing and we don't realize that, in any moment we place a particular clinging onto some experience: "This is going to do it for me." How often do we do that? We may not say those words, but in our mind it's like, "Ah, now everything's going to be copacetic. I got it." How long does that last?

Finally, we don't see the inherent suffering, the discontent, the dis-ease. We don't recognize it, and we think this beautiful whatever it is—from a brownie to a new relationship, to a new job—this is going to be the thing that makes everything okay. We still don't see that. We see it as beautiful, so we get lost.

And of course the third misperception, which is usually talked about as seeing anything as being a self-existing entity—either me as separate, self-existent Carol, like this, or even this bell as a self-existent bell that's always been like that. One way I heard a Tibetan Rinpoche talk about this recently—I liked it. He didn't even go to self or not-self. He just said the third misperception is that we think we see things how they are, but we don't see things how they are. And we don't recognize that.

I'm sure many of you have heard of Thich Nhat Hanh. He's passed away now, but he was very famous, and one of the ways he would talk about this particular perception—with the bell, with anything—he said the bell is only made up of non-bell elements. Have you heard him talk like that? Whatever you pick is made up of all other elements, and it ends up connecting with everything in the universe. Where do you stop? So there's the bell, there's the metal, there's the fire that shaped it, there's the people that dug the metal out of the earth. How did the metal get formed? How did the earth get formed? How were the people fed? And the sun and the food and their ancestors and the earth? You go back to the Big Bang. You take anything. And is the Big Bang even the beginning of things? Or in Buddhist cosmology, that's just one out of endless eons. So, who knows? And if you're thinking, "Well, I don't believe that," that's fine. Who cares if we believe it or not?

But the sense is that without recognizing it, our habit is to perceive things as separate, ongoing, self-entities. And from that perspective, that's really one of the misperceptions, one of the inaccurate views, that leads so quickly into confusion and suffering from just any simple experience. Do you know what I mean? All of them do this.

Some people, though, find that the way to see this more clearly is in the changing nature of things, and that starts to become obvious. With steady awareness, you can't not notice change. If awareness is at all steady, there's no way not to notice change. Because how long does one thought last? How long does a sensation stay exactly the same?

I mean, if you're really steadily aware, you'll see that nothing lasts for more than a second. You might think it does, but that's because we quit paying attention and we're thinking about it. "This pain in my knee has been here all day." But if you really just surrender into it, it's changing all the time.

Some people find clarity through the sense of the unsatisfactory nature. You think this soup is going to really set you up for the day. The first bite is so perfect—it's cold and warm and tasty. The second bite, it's nice. The third bite, it's kind of so-so. The fourth bite, you're already thinking about something else. And by the fifth bite, "Yeah, I'm done with this. What's next?" We don't notice that without steady awareness.

And the third one is just that whatever's happening tends to be taken personally. This one is the one that goes so far, so fast. With awareness it's just another thought, another view that's noticed, no problem. It's not that we have to get rid of anything. Remember, awareness with right attitude is not to reject any experience. It's not to make anything happen. It's not to stop paying attention when we feel at ease. It's just to keep noticing.

But notice how with these views that we don't recognize, this is where the confusion and suffering comes so quickly.

Here's an example from a friend of mine. I'm sure you can relate. She went into work, and as she went in, there were a lot of different people in the room. One of her colleagues, as the colleague came in, looked at her with a frown and with a really angry look. But they didn't speak. The colleague went off and was doing their work.

So my friend was like, "Well, what was that about? What's she so angry about?" You see right away—not even a view, just the assumption: she was angry and it was at me. "What did I do?" And the whole day, every time she'd see the colleague from a distance, they didn't have interaction, and the colleague wouldn't be smiling. "Well, what's the big deal?" She's going through, "What did I do? What's her problem? The least she could do is come and talk to me about it." The whole day. Can you imagine? This isn't so far-fetched, right?

This is what we're doing. This is what is occurring. And we think we're present.

In that situation, she might have thought, as she did, that she was aware. She was aware of the look of the person. She was aware of her thoughts. She was aware of being angry. She was aware of feeling hurt. But she wasn't aware of the sense of taking it personally and the assumptions that led to. And that that led to all these different thoughts.

At the end of the day, when she connected with the person, not only was the person not angry, the person hadn't even been looking at her. The person was completely involved in something going on in their life at home and had nothing whatsoever to do with my friend—who had spent the whole day making up incredible stories. And so sure of it.

You see how we do this, right? Can anybody relate to that? This is what we do.

So with awareness, we're not simply going to decide, "I'm not going to get caught in any of these assumptions." No. But we keep bringing the awareness and say, okay, I feel angry now. As we become steady with awareness, we start to notice more—oh, an unpleasant look. And that's our habit. Something's unpleasant, we don't like it, we pull away, or we get angry, and we take it personally. If she had been smiling, it would have been nice—oh, pleasant. Everything's great. That's pleasant. We feel good, and we take that personally too, though we don't notice it.

This is why the steadiness of awareness is so important. We start to notice: oh, unpleasant look; oh yeah, I feel angry. And then we start to recognize what anger feels like. Remember, we're not rejecting any experience. Any experience that's arising is a doorway, a gateway to awareness. There's no experience that's better to be aware of than another.

The freedom that comes from not getting lost in fear and aversion doesn't come from saying, "Aversion is bad, push it away. I'm going to pretend I'm not angry and make up a different story." I mean, we try that. It works for a little while, but it's not true freedom. Freedom comes from recognizing: oh, aversion feels like this. It's not personal. Through steady awareness, you see how it came about through causes and conditions. It feels unpleasant, it's like this, and it doesn't have to go anywhere. It doesn't have to spend the whole day making up stories.

And then imagine there's no aversion—I'm making this up now—no aversion, you're doing your work, then you happen to catch sight of her again and she still looks really sullen. So you have awareness. Oh look, she looks sullen. Oh no, is she mad at me? Oh, look at that again—taking it personally. And you just see that. You don't even try to stop it, but you see it. It changes everything.

This is where it becomes—it's really sometimes fun, actually—to just be taking refuge in the awareness and watching what comes up, feeling how easeful it is not to make a "me" out of all of it. Not to have to believe it, but to see how it comes to be.

I think Alexis mentioned this, but I'll give you the same example from myself. You know the certain views we have of our personality? I think he mentioned self-judgment, being down on yourself. It's such a habit. And I think as we're looking, we can see how particular habits of our personality have been formed.

For me, self-judging, lack of self-worth—that's a strong one. Going through my life, I can see how it was created through experience. I know how it was created. I know how it's been fed. And I'm really familiar now with how it feels when it comes up. I can recognize it with awareness because it's so habitual. It's a habit based on conditions. The particular conditions present themselves, you push the button, and self-judgment might come up.

It doesn't mean every time it does. Sometimes the condition might be that I'm tired and somebody looks grumpy. Or I could go home and be tired and think, oh, I don't like how I said that. And that could be the end of it. Or that could continue, depending on whether I'm tired and awareness isn't very strong and there's aversion, or a lot of other things happened, or I got a nasty email. All these things come together.

But recognizing how it feels—and it's so clear as you get familiar with your habits and maintain that steady awareness—we can say, oh, I don't like how I said that. Oh, I don't like how I said that. Ah, self-judging feels like this. It's simply the next arising experience. It's arising due to causes and conditions. When it's recognized as simply another condition, it doesn't have to go away. It stops being a problem.

It doesn't start being pleasant. But we're not here to get rid of unpleasant. And secretly, in the back of your mind, keep looking—because it slips in there: This shouldn't be happening. It's unpleasant.

Well, every experience is pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral in our mind. And they are not all going to start being pleasant. Ever. So get over it.

Unpleasant doesn't have to be a problem. Oh yeah, unpleasant is like this. And I recognize that's what's happening. Actually, I don't recognize—awareness recognizes. It's like, ah.

We start to... it's not really "we" doing this. I don't know how else to use language. We start to and continue to take refuge in the awareness rather than in the experience of what's happening, what it means about me, or my ideas about what's happening. And sometimes when we really do this—oh yes, the awareness of self-judgment is like this—it can feel like the trust, the attention, is really landing in the awareness, because there's a sense of ease even though the thing is still happening.

But for most of us, this isn't our habit. And as I said, awareness is so difficult precisely because it's so—you don't notice it, right? It's always available. It's so close, so much a part of our experience, that we really don't even notice it most of the time. We don't pay attention to it. It doesn't have all the juice. Self-judging? That has some juice. If we want that kind of juice, we can keep feeding it. Awareness is like this—quiet, unassuming. It's hard for us to trust, but that's what these retreats are about.

This isn't about having some great experience by the end. When I go on retreat now, for however long, even if in the back of my mind there's something like—not that this will be the one that does it, okay, finally I got over that—but maybe something good will happen, right? Something. I'll feel a little... whatever at the end. But really, it's like this: six days or three weeks or a month or however long of many, many moments to practice recognizing awareness. What a gift.

It doesn't matter what's happening. You're having some really lovely, blissful, quiet experience? Great—awareness. You're walking up and down in a fury? Great—awareness. Whatever is happening all day, in all our activities, each moment is a new moment to practice recognizing awareness.

And each moment, there's no big thing that happens. We don't get lights going off. So we tend to—often it's neutral. And we like pleasant, we don't like unpleasant. But neutral? Boring. Something needs to happen. And often nothing's happening externally, so we make up something internally.

Watch. When I first saw this, I couldn't believe it. I watched my mind on retreat make up a completely unpleasant, suffering scenario of what might happen when I went home—if I saw this person and they said that. Anger. Hurt. On and on.

But at least there was a sense of me getting upset. It was better than calm. Aware and calm. It's like this. Just to notice that.

So we start to really learn how to have confidence in awareness, and it takes our willingness to keep practicing. Again, with Ajahn Sumedho, I learned so much from him about this particular area because it's what he talks about all the time. Some years ago I was at a retreat with him somewhere, and he was in a group—it was a bunch of teachers, so maybe he was letting his hair down, though someone can't really let his hair down because he doesn't have any.

But anyway, he was talking about how even then, after all these years of really knowing the freedom of this resting with awareness, seeing the impermanent nature of all experience, being fully with it but not taking it personally, knowing that deeply—even so, he was going through a period of really a lot of difficulty at Amaravati, opinions and decisions. And he said, "You know, I'm the abbot and I'm making the decisions, and a lot of people really hate me, don't like me." He said, "My personality doesn't like that. It's really hard, really feeling all the things I feel." And he said he was going through that, and then at some point he made a really firm commitment to himself, a conscious vow in a way, to have confidence in receptive awareness.

He knew that, of course, but there's a way we get lost in our stuff when it's really strong, when external experiences are really difficult, eliciting really difficult internal experience. Caught in our stuff—caught in grief, anger, really resisting or blaming, and really suffering from it. So he made this really strong commitment to remember to have confidence in awareness.

That really means when you're feeling grief or anger or self-righteousness—self-righteousness is a very difficult one—to have confidence in awareness means you're aware of it. "Oh, self-righteous, grief, I see you." But that's not it. Awareness is just right here in it. Self-righteous grief feels like this. Really drop in, but it's awareness receiving rather than being in it. I can't really say it better than that, but explore it. It really feels different. There stops being a fear in that moment of feeling the thing, because it's just what it is, and awareness receives whatever it is.

Once we can see that in the little things, the trust, the confidence in the liberating power of this steady awareness grows in our heart and mind because it becomes our experience, this conscious awareness.

Anam Thubten, a Tibetan Rinpoche, talks about this just dropping into awareness. He says, "Dropping into being the pure witness to whatever is being experienced without holding on to or rejecting any aspect. Dropping into being the pure witness." He was saying that this is true nonviolence, true ahimsa. When we're really dropping into our experience fully like that, the effect is nonviolence, compassion, openness, non-separation. That's what allows compassion to arise, not the fear of what we're experiencing.

But we don't have to go to that level. We simply practice remembering awareness of just this moment. How's the body feeling? Hearing is happening. There's some thought. You don't go looking for anything—just remembering awareness.

Thich Nhat Hanh calls it coming home. I was listening to a talk of his. Since he died a few years ago, YouTube has so much material—it's amazing. Sometimes I want a little twenty-minute dharma hit, and there's a lot of Thich Nhat Hanh teachings available. Some I like more than others. In this one, he was talking about loneliness and the illusion of connection. He was discussing devices—this was about ten years ago—and how we think we're so connected. We're texting this person and emailing that person.

I'll think, "Oh, in a single day I was connected with people in Singapore, someone in Burma, someone in Indonesia, a couple of friends in Switzerland, then my friends here." And this is an idea—so I'm really connected. But he's saying that's the illusion of connection.

Meanwhile, we're walking and we don't even know we're walking. Maybe you're making your dinner, but thinking about how you're connected with someone in Singapore. You're not actually connected with either one. It's an illusion.

So he talks about the act of just sitting down and being here fully in your body—that's connecting. Feeling your breath, feeling aversion, really present with it—that is connecting. That's really the miracle of mindfulness as he talks about it.

You come home. And you find, as we go through the days here with awareness, in a moment of really connecting—say, with breathing—we're not trying to hold on to it, we're just feeling it. Or you're walking, and ah, just landing, feeling the feet. Awareness doesn't have to be tightly focused.

As we start and continue to just trust this relaxing into awareness, something shifts. "Oh yeah, I'm just walking, coming home." Suddenly we start noticing more. You might notice other feelings in your body. You start to notice thoughts that are coming. You suddenly notice hearing, or feel the coolness of the air, or smell the rain. You're not looking for any of that. But as we take more refuge in awareness, the experience of the world starts to open up—internally, externally—because we're not choosing. He really calls this coming home. And that, I often think, is what awareness is about: not trying to achieve, just being here.

I want to end with one short quotation from Upasika Kee, who was a Thai laywoman from the last century. There's a book of her teachings called Pure and Simple. She was a very powerful yogi—and tough. These Thai forest women and men are serious practitioners, as we are.

She said: "What is, is. What is not, is not. No need to add anything extra."

If we could live that simply, just in one moment. What is, is. What is not, is not. No need to add anything extra.

And just in this moment, remember awareness. That's it.

If you're falling on your face and you need to go to sleep, you go to sleep. It's not about what it looks like to anybody else, or even to you. What's happening now?

Okay. Good night.

CHAPTER 194

Steady Recognition of Awareness Untangles Confusion

Carol Wilson · 51 min

> In this heartfelt dharma talk from a U Tejaniya-style retreat, Carol Wilson reflects on the tenderness of human existence and our universal longing for happiness. Drawing from the Buddha's compassionate motivation to teach, she examines how moment-to-moment mistaken perception—rooted in moha (delusion)—gives rise to the afflictive emotions and cognitive obscurations that keep us spinning in confusion.
> Wilson explores the practice of cultivating steady, receptive awareness as taught in Sayadaw U Tejaniya's approach, emphasizing that we don't create awareness but simply learn to recognize it. She illuminates how vedanā (feeling tone) triggers rapid chains of reactivity: from a simple sensation like cold, the mind quickly constructs entire worlds of wanting, aversion, and self-centered thinking. Quoting Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu, she reframes saṃsāra not as a place but as a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and moving into them.
> The talk offers practical guidance for retreat practice: observing how selective perception operates when the mind is "obsessed and oppressed" by ill-will or craving, noticing the arising and cessation of mental worlds, and recognizing how awareness itself remains untouched by what it observes. Wilson draws on teachings from the Dalai Lama, Mingyur Rinpoche, Ajahn Sumedho, and Anam Thubten to show how steady awareness naturally gives access to love, compassion, and our innate dignity—qualities that emerge when we stop being servants to greed and aversion.

Just sharing in the groups over the last couple of days, but today particularly, I was feeling something I often feel—the tenderness, really, of being human, of living this life as a human being on this earth.

It's not easy. Being human, there's a lot of tenderness to it, but there's a lot of beauty and love and kindness. There's also sorrow, difficulty, loss, pain, fear—all of that. It's part of being human. There's no way around it. It's part of what we signed up for without knowing it when we took birth in this form.

Sometimes you just feel it more tenderly than others. And the sense of all of us here—I mean, all humans—we want to be happy. We want to live with ease. As Mingyur Rinpoche says, everything we do, every move we make is in the pursuit of trying to be happy. And that's, of course, really normal, natural.

I was feeling the tenderness of that and also really appreciating all of us here in this situation, sharing in the groups and in your practice. Just sitting here in this last sitting and looking out at all the people sitting so quietly, all kinds of stuff going on inside. I don't know all your intentions, so I'm projecting, but assuming there has to be some level of really sincere intention, motivation for understanding, for freedom, for ease. You couldn't even still be here after four days of doing this without that really honest, sincere intention. People can't stand it otherwise. And it's really touching.

I remember a friend's mother said to me once, "What do you do? You mean there's no TVs?" It's like a whole other level of reality.

So it's natural that we want to be happy. And I'm sure all of you know this—I'm not saying anything you don't already know—but how the Buddha was really moved out of compassion to teach when at first he was thinking it's too much trouble to try and really share what he had seen in his awakening because it's subtle and hard to see. People won't get it. And he was really moved, this is the story, moved to compassion. With his all-seeing mind he could see how much everyone wants to be happy, and in trying to do so, is doing so from confusion, from misunderstanding, and doing the very things that keep us spinning in the confusion, in the suffering, and not really knowing why we're doing that.

Do you get a feeling for that sometimes here? We're really sincere, and we might have a little moment of really being free—you see the potential—and then we're spinning in the stupid story again. Really in it. Not just "oh, I'm sort of in it," but really in it. Or am I the only one?

It's kind of a mystery. So there's a tenderness to that, for me, with our sincere motivation and the effort and the willingness to be here and all the wholesomeness, all the beauty. And it just calls forth so much patience and willingness to look and willingness to really walk this path. It's not easy. This is compassion.

This is the first noble truth, of course, of the Buddha—that this unsatisfactoriness in life, this being human, includes the beauty and it includes the difficult. And the beauty also doesn't last. The difficult also doesn't last. Nothing lasts. Nothing's steady state.

But the suffering that awakening frees us from—and I know we're all knowing this now—isn't what we would originally think in the beginning of our practice, or when we're doing, as Mingyur says, just trying to be happy. The idea of happiness, the idea of freedom of heart and mind, as we've said before, is basically this: difficult stuff should stop happening. I shouldn't feel grief or loss or whatever.

And so the freedom that really the Buddha's teaching and awareness is taking us into is different from that. It's not a freedom that gets rid of the stuff we don't like, but it gets rid of the sense of me not liking. That's a whole different angle. We can't think our way into it.

But you'll recognize it when I say it, because I think I've already said it fifteen times.

All of our difficulties—this is the Dalai Lama now—all of our difficulties come from our moment-to-moment mistaken perception. Perception is a very specific term in the Pali. It really means how we recognize experience in a moment. We recognize a person, we recognize a clock, we recognize this as a retreat—that's perception. Moment-to-moment mistaken perception. Because we don't recognize accurately.

And so this is one aspect of the moha, the delusion that Alexis mentioned. We recognize inaccurately. And this ignorance, this inaccurate recognition—this is still the Dalai Lama—is really what feeds the 84,000 destructive, obstructive emotions, the afflictive emotions, and the cognitive obscurations.

I like that phrase: the afflictive emotions. And I like how they put in 84,000. But we can stay with greed, hatred, and confusion—that's enough. The 84,000 are just subsets of that. And cognitive obscurations. I like that because it's not always afflictive emotions that are confusing us. It's not always that we're feeling aversion, or we're in greed. We can feel quite balanced. But the moha, the confusion, the not recognizing accurately, can still be clouding the consciousness, the citta, and producing inaccurate perceptions.

And why is that such a problem? That's what we'll go into—how these inaccurate perceptions feed our confusion and reactivity, and we get so lost so fast from what's actually true.

In any particular moment where the mind, the heart, consciousness is present and clear—and everything's moment to moment, right?—there are moments when the consciousness isn't obscured, when we're not caught in greed or aversion or resistance, when it's just clear and no confusion is emanating from that. In those moments, there are still different qualities of mental states in the consciousness, but those are when the beautiful, wholesome qualities shine out. It could be equanimity. It could be calm. It could be loving-kindness. It could be compassion. It isn't always like some big, overwhelming emotion. It could be very subtle and peaceful. Or just peace. Just the heart-mind that isn't fabricating some whole story of problems. Just that moment of peace. And then it's over and we jump into the next thing, which I'll talk about. But this is what naturally shines out—the beautiful qualities.

So the path of our practice here, we're talking about really recognizing and cultivating the recognition of this receptive, natural, conscious awareness, just the simplicity of steady awareness. Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a great Tibetan Dzogchen master, said our dharma practice works in two ways. One is to recognize the nature of the non-deluded mind, the non-deluded heart. And the other aspect is discovering how the deluded mind works. Both of these are going on.

A lot of the time here, what we're doing is learning, discovering how the deluded mind works. But we maybe don't really recognize that we're learning that. We're just hating that it's here and wanting to get rid of it. But the simplicity of how it works—it's not that wisdom is allowed to arise because of the steadiness of receptive awareness and we get to sidestep the difficult stuff. The way that the wisdom really arises as to how the deluded mind works is by clear recognition, by—I hate to tell you, but you already know this—hanging out with the difficult stuff.

And it's so often on retreat, or in life—but we'll stick with retreat because it's a little microcosm. It's the same mind, right? Whatever's coming up here, the way the mind works on retreat, it works the same way in our daily life. We just have a little more space to explore it here.

But so often, you know, we really feel like the practice isn't going well, or we're hopeless, or we're caught in aversion, or we can't recognize awareness. Or it was going great, but now we're bored out of our mind—and what are we going to do? Whatever, 84,000 choices.

And going back to what the Buddha saw in the beginning, our go-to habit is: this is wrong. And once I understand this, it's going to stop happening, and I've got to do something to get rid of it, right? That's just where we go. But it's not like that. It's really by being with. It's like you had a choice—you don't have a choice. You're being with it because it's here.

And when we say again, really accept the moment—because this moment could not possibly be different. Everything's come together. All the conditions that have come together to make this moment, it's like this. How can we wish this moment was different?

How the mind, the heart, the awareness meets this moment is setting up conditions for the next moment. But this moment is as it is. How do you know it should happen? Because it is. Because all the conditions have come together.

And so it's really by—when these difficulties or unwanted experiences arise... I think it's Joko Beck, maybe it's Pema Chödrön. Instead of thinking of it as dislike, just think of it as unwanted. And that's true, right? This is an unwanted experience that's happening right now.

But the steady awareness—that hopefully you've noticed, because we say this no matter what you tell us, right? We just say, okay, be aware of it. How can you bring awareness into this? Receive it with awareness. That quality of awareness that isn't judging is what allows for the wisdom to start to come in, to begin to understand how the deluded mind works. If we just think we're waiting for it to go away and then it gets the way we want it and we can just be happy in that, we've learned nothing. We've learned nothing.

And for me—and it's not only for me—I've had long retreats. There are periods on retreats that are sometimes really difficult. Sometimes there are moments that are difficult, moments that aren't. But sometimes, on some retreats, we call them dukkha retreats. If you look back, if you've had a lot of years of practice, I'm sure you can look back and think of particular retreats where you're like, "What is going on? Dukkha, dukkha, dukkha." And they're not all like that.

And in the middle of it, even though you're really bringing awareness, you're practicing, it doesn't mean you're doing something wrong. But our subtle background idea is still: if I'm aware right, it's going to go away, right? How many times do you say, "I was really, really mindful, but it's still here"? It slips in.

And you can't really tell, mostly, in the midst of really learning to bring awareness into the difficulty. You don't really see until kind of later the effects of that. I mean, sometimes for me, after a period that was really difficult—and maybe it could be in life too, it doesn't have to be on retreat. Bringing the same awareness in life, it's the same. And you may think—you can't even tell sometimes. Are you just spinning in it? Are you just kicking your heels and caught and spinning? Or are you really learning how to bring awareness, how to meet it differently? And sometimes you can tell—a moment of seeing it differently—but a lot of times you can't until later.

Sometimes a similar thing comes up, or you find yourself in another situation, and you see that there's a level of freedom from identification with that experience. The experience doesn't necessarily stop arising, but there's a different relationship to it—a kind of freedom from being so identified with it. It's not that you can clock how you're learning and how much freedom is coming, but you'll notice it later.

Learning to trust this more and more can give us a sense of faith, confidence. When the garden isn't growing as fast as you want—and it never will, as Nisha was saying last night—we can have confidence that the steady, non-judging awareness, just remembering that, is the only personal effort we can put in with this style. But something is happening. Something is happening. It's not in the way that we think, because the way we think is based on misperceptions.

So let me say a bit more about awareness. This is from Ajahn Tejaniya, trying to describe how this receptive awareness—I mean, it's just part of us—is like being the pure witness to whatever is being experienced. With difficulty, sometimes that's hard, but also with the beautiful, still being the pure witness without holding onto or rejecting experience.

It's really a different sense of being fully present, really being the witness to the suffering in ourselves or in the world, really feeling it. It's not like a removed, "Oh yes, that's suffering. Oh yes, this is happiness. I'm the pure witness." It's feeling it. And the more that receptive awareness is really receiving, we actually feel it more completely, but without rejecting and without holding onto experience. This is the doorway. This is what allows for compassion for ourselves, compassion for others.

I was listening to a talk online from a Tibetan Lama, and someone asked him at the end, "Can you say in one word what the Buddhist teachings are?" Which, you know, that's kind of a silly question. But I thought he came up with a great answer. He thought about it a minute, and he said, "Empathy."

Empathy is really—and then he talked about it—but really that comes from just being able to be with the suffering, to be with the beauty. When there's that empathy of feeling it in ourselves, we're naturally able to be with it with others. Actually, the sense of self and other isn't so much there when there's empathy. I thought that was a lovely answer.

As we cultivate trust in the simplicity of awareness—we don't create the awareness, we just learn to recognize it—this is what makes a vast understanding and response to life become possible. We start to see through our misperception of being separate, of being an independent me. We're not so much constructing the world through that misperception, that self-centered lens. That's really the ultimate misperception that gives rise to all the others—this self-centered sense of me, separate from others, where everything refers back to me.

Sogyal Rinpoche once gave an example of this sense of everything referring back to me. He described how in Tibet, when we're going to build a house and we're making the footprint for the house, we start with the center stake. Then we have a long measuring rope, and from that stake we measure all the way around to get the dimensions of the house. He said that's like the sense of me—the center point of everything, and everything is measured from that sense of me. That's really the ultimate misperception.

This practice addresses the habit that leads to the habits that blind us: the habits of wanting, the habits of resistance, of aversion, the habit of reflecting that everything's about me. This is really where we get lost, from that misperception. And we can't just talk our way out of it because it's unconscious. Like I said, it's like gravity. I don't think "me"—something just happens and me noticing that happens.

Joseph tells a story that illustrates this perfectly. It's small, but it shows what happens. He was sitting a retreat here himself, and you know, he's tall, so he stands out. Plus people know who he is, so everyone's looking at him. He was standing second in the lunch line, just like here, and the first person went to help themselves to the soup or whatever, and the big pot still had the lid on it. So the person picked up the lid, and it dropped on the floor and made a heck of a racket. You can imagine, when you're all standing in silence—a heck of a racket. And everyone's looking, because everyone's lined up. He says his first thought was that he wanted to turn around and go, "It wasn't me."

That's what we do. Whatever's going on, how does it affect me? That's the point.

In a moment, in any moment, when there's that receptive awareness—really present with what's happening, that sense of empathy—then you may think, well, you're not doing anything. You're just receiving. But when the perception isn't clouded by confusion, as Anam Thubten says, the heart will know what to do. We don't have to think, "Oh no, if I'm just being receptive, I can't function, I can't do anything." No, no. The heart will know what to do. It becomes clear. It's just obvious. So learning to trust that.

There are lots of ways of talking about how we get so far away so quickly from just the simplicity of experience. Tonight I'm focusing mostly on thoughts, because that's a good way we get lost. But let's start with Vedana—you know Vedana, feeling tone, right? Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Any sense experience—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, or emotions—the mind, the citta, experiences it as having a quality of pleasantness or unpleasantness or something kind of neutral. This is subtle and quick, this feeling tone, Vedana, something the Buddha talked about. And I think it's so brilliant that he could notice that. Because as you know already, and I'll say again, it leads so quickly into so much confusion when we don't notice it.

Ajahn Sumedho puts it this way: we live as sensitive forms. This is back to the tenderness of being human in my mind. We live as sensitive forms. In other words, there's constant Vedana, feeling tone, arising in our mind—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—with every sense experience. And that's constantly, twenty-four seven. It doesn't take a break. So we're really sensitive forms. The hearing is neutral, or it's a little bit pleasant, or it's a little bit unpleasant. We don't notice it most of the time, but this is going on. This is our experience. The sense doors—it comes with a sense of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It just makes a little impact in the mind.

We often don't notice, and often it's just subtle enough that nothing comes from it. But because it's so frequent—it's so frequent—there are plenty of times when it makes a bit more of an impact. Say it's really cold. You go out and it's really cold and windy, and it really makes an impact. You notice. Maybe you don't recognize the unpleasantness, but you notice it. Or maybe you love it when it's cold, so it's pleasant. It's not like the coldness is inherently pleasant or unpleasant. It's how it's impacting this particular being at this particular moment.

With the right information, or right view as Sayadaw U Tejaniya would say, there'd be a sense of: coldness. It's unpleasant. Cold is like this. The body's feeling shivering. Shivering is like this. It's just what's happening. But with misperception, which just comes in right away, it becomes "I'm so cold." Do you get the difference? It's adding a whole "I'm." Cold feels like this, but "I'm cold"—which goes almost immediately to "I don't like it. I didn't bring the right clothes. What's the matter with the weather in Massachusetts? What is going on?"

In two seconds, you're into disaster. It takes no time. Me, me, me—and then you see someone else walk by with a really good down coat, and you don't have one, and then you're into all this wanting. Then you're saying, "Okay, okay, I'm really trying to boycott Amazon, but I'd really like to go back to my room and order a down coat, because I could get it here by tomorrow."

If you've been here on the three-month retreat—I've been teaching it often, not recently, but for thirty, thirty-five years—the last some years, it's been a really different experience. You come in and there are piles of packages in the foyer halfway through. Where are these coming from? And then you realize the retreatants are back in their rooms ordering stuff online, and it's getting delivered. This is really true. It used to be that occasionally somebody's partner would send them some cookies, but now it's unbelievable.

That's a digression. But that's where we go. That's where we go. You could be there, you've walked out, you've felt cold, and thirty seconds later we're down that rabbit hole. That's how fast it happens—when we're not recognizing accurately the misperception that "this cold is happening to me." That "me" has a sense of clinging, a sense of tension. Not to judge it, but just to notice the difference, how it feels. "Oh, cold is like this" versus "I'm so cold." Playing with that, noticing how it works.

And of course, as I said, it doesn't stop there. As soon as there's "me," there's pleasant or unpleasant. Pleasant is the same: "That would be so nice. Let me go get more." There's a judging of experience. Pleasant experience is good—it's supposed to happen, it's normal. Unpleasant—there's something wrong with it, or with me. Something to do. And it just spirals, spirals, spirals.

That's the afflictive emotions getting going, right? And as soon as they're getting going, you can't actually recognize what's really happening. This is where we're talking about just what's really happening. "It's so cold and I don't know what to do and I have leftover bronchial stuff from when I had bronchitis in December..." And if you ask, "What's happening?"—"Well, I have bronchial problems and I might get sick." But what's actually happening? Oh, there's tickling. An aversion. That's what's happening.

It's really hard—how hard it is—to simply rest in "Ah, it feels like this." Because it feels so real. This is where we really get lost, if we can't just appreciate the simplicity of awareness. The thoughts take us. And so quickly, so quickly, we create a world in our thoughts, right? And we believe it. We believe the description. Maybe I'm not the only one—the mind comes up with a description of thought, of liking, of disliking, of what's wrong with this, of how it should be, what's really going on. And then, without even recognizing it—because it was ten seconds from feeling the cold or hearing an unpleasant sound to "How can that possibly be happening?"—we're gone. And we really don't even know that that's just a created world of thought. We really think that the mental thoughts are the actual description of what's happening.

Have you heard this? A long time ago I mentioned that Audubon, who was famous for recognizing and drawing birds, said: if there's a drawing of a bird and there's the actual bird, and the drawing is different from the bird, believe the bird.

And so we're learning, with awareness, what's happening in just the simple sense experiences. Come home, as Thich Nhat Hanh says. It's an act of real wisdom to just not have to sit. You can walk. You can be doing the dishes, whatever you're doing. Come home to just this moment—which includes thinking, but recognizing thinking rather than being lost in the content.

What's happening now?

But we get so lost. You probably also know this story about long ago, a monk who was living in a cave, and he painted a picture of a tiger on the wall. It was so realistic that when he turned around and then turned back, it scared him. That's what we do. That's what happens.

As Ajahn Sumedho says, we concoct these worlds based on the reaction to pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. That actually colors our perception. A whole story comes up, and we're inhabiting that world without even knowing it. We think that's the world.

This is from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, an American monk in the Thai tradition. Perhaps you know who he is—he's one of maybe three living translators from the Pali into English of the Theravada Buddhist texts. He has a monastery in Southern California.

He's talking about samsara. You know the word samsara? It's usually translated as "wandering on," which is considered this life. He says samsara literally means wandering on. Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live. We often say, "Oh, samsara—there's a lot of suffering in samsara." Samsara is about birth and death, suffering. It's just a place, the place we leave when we go to nibbana.

But in the early Buddhist texts, samsara is the answer not to "where are we?" but to "what are we doing?" I love that. What are we doing? Samsara is not a place—it's a process, the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart—the world of being really cold and needing a better down coat—then you come inside and that world is gone. We create another one and go there.

At the same time, you're bumping into all the other people who are creating their own worlds. They're living in their world; you're living in your world. We're bumping into each other. And lost in these worlds, we don't even know what's really happening. This is the essential misperception. This is how we get so far so fast.

Ajahn Sumedho says this is like a concoction. We concoct the whole world of being cold, or coming back in and being in a nice warm retreat center and feeling safe. Or you come in and it's a nice warm retreat center, but then somebody walks past and you think they're looking at you with a stink eye, as they say in Hawaii. And you think,

"What did I do?" You don't feel safe. What's going on? You can't talk. Then you've got a whole other world in two seconds, and they don't even know you were there—they're in their own world. Who knows what their world is?

But we don't even think that. We just think we're in our own world. We're concocting these worlds again and again and again, concocted based on the perception, based on the feeling tone, the mental states that come up, the thoughts that come up about it, the concepts. We're living in our own world without even knowing it. So complicated, so quickly.

As the Buddha said when he talked about this: what we feel—vedana—what we feel, that we perceive. You walk out, unpleasant cold, you perceive it as cold, or however you perceive it. A hell realm of freezing, the cold hells, whatever you perceive. It's amazing, it's invigorating—whatever your perception is. Just like that.

The Buddha taught that what we perceive, we think about. And what we think about without awareness, we complicate. This is still from the Buddha. We complicate with associations—all our associations of coldness—with memories, all our memories of coldness, and everything we've ever read.

All our concepts, all our ideas—all of this happens from thinking in the blink of an eye, doesn't it? And then the thoughts keep going, going, going. And then the Buddha said these thoughts turn around and assail a person. They turn around and attack us, basically. Just like painting the tiger on the wall. It's exactly that.

This is what we do again and again and again without recognizing it. We wonder—we might think we're mindful, but if there's not the steady awareness that we've been talking about, we might jump in and see aversion to the cold and then not notice all those worlds. And a little bit later, we're eating in the dining room and we're in another whole world of greed or shame or judgment or embarrassment—whatever the particular world we're in—without quite recognizing it again.

Ajahn Sumedho says we don't often recognize how flighty our minds are. I'd say our attention is so flighty. Without the steadiness of awareness, we don't notice the cessation of one world and the beginning of another. That's why we're talking about this: when we have steady awareness, you really can see. You can see this whole process, like I was just describing. When I described the cold, you could see how that happens.

So with steady awareness, not abandoning awareness no matter what happens, we start to see these worlds come together and fall apart, come together and fall apart. The more we see that, the less able we are to keep identifying with each one. I mean, it's exhausting, isn't it?

Look tonight. Look tomorrow. Just notice the pleasantness or unpleasantness. Notice as the thoughts start creating a world. Notice the world that comes up, and keep noticing when it dissipates. Or maybe you don't actually see it end, but later you notice it's gone. Notice that. And how many in a day?

If we're identifying with each one: this one's happy, this one's not happy, this is pleasant, this is not happy, I'm so ashamed, I feel incredible, I'm so bored, I'm feeling peaceful, this is the stupidest thing I've ever done, this is so amazing, how could anyone not... It's exhausting. And that could be in ten minutes. It's exhausting when we're identified with each of those. But it's fascinating when we're really exploring it and not taking it personally.

Time goes fast when you're the one talking. Not so much for you. It's two different experiences.

One point I wanted to make about this: why sometimes it seems like we spend—those of us up here—a lot more time pointing to the kilesas, the difficult qualities of mind: greed, hatred, confusion. We talk about the beautiful qualities too, but we really give an emphasis to awareness recognizing when the heart, when the mind, when consciousness is clouded by kilesa.

Recognizing that wanting is present is very different from not recognizing it. Or aversion. Because we can be mindful—I can say I'm mindful, and I'm going to keep using the cold because it's easier than making up a new example every time. I can be aware of cold and think I'm quite mindful, quite aware. There's awareness, but not noticing the reactivity, not noticing the aversion. We all know this, right? It's like there's layers. Cold, cold, cold—and then the mind gets going. Then you realize you're caught in something, the whole story. What's happening?

Oh, it's really unpleasant. Aversion's like this.

But without recognizing—when awareness doesn't recognize that we're seeing through the lens of aversion or the lens of greed—that's where we get so caught. The whole story keeps going and we can't see what to do. We can't act appropriately. We can't recognize accurately.

And this is from the Buddha. I think without knowing, we don't recognize that wanting or clinging, aversion, resistance, or the sense of me—everything filtered through me—is present. That masks what's actually occurring. And this is really the basic misperception we're running around with in our life. We're just not quite seeing what's really happening.

The Buddha said, "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill-will..." And that's how it feels. Our heart-mind is oppressed when there's ill-will, when there's aversion in it—oppressed by craving, oppressed by delusion. The sense of me, me, me at the center of everything—it's an oppression if you really feel it. When that's happening, one does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill-will. What's the escape from arisen craving? What's the escape from arisen delusion? We don't understand that. And on that occasion, one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both.

He's really saying that when we don't see that those are present, we can't recognize accurately, and we can't see what's for our own good or what's for the good of others. Why? Even if we think we're well-meaning, even if we want to do something to help someone else in the world, but it's coming from greed or anger or self-righteousness—we just can't see clearly.

So explore here. That's what retreats are good for. They give us little examples to explore. Notice. It could be fun, really, going through the day.

If you start to notice, say there's some greed. Pick food—pick something easy, right? Say there's a smell coming, and you think, "Oh, there's going to be mashed potatoes." I don't know where that came from. Mashed potatoes, and you really like mashed potatoes, and it's ten in the morning. You feel the greed coming up. And you notice the greed coming up, sort of, but then you're caught in it. Notice how when there's greed coloring the perception, it affects what we see.

With greed, it's sort of like—you know, there's this saying: a pickpocket only sees a saint's pockets, doesn't see that the person's a saint. You see what the greed wants and you don't see anything else. You have that sense—there's only two bananas left and there's four people in front of you, and you want to just elbow them aside. You try to think of a way: "How can I just go by and take..." It's like you don't care about anything else. The greed blinds what you see. Or the aversion works in the same way. Selective perception, I call it.

Notice if there's something here—a sound, or God forbid, someone, or something—and the mind has just got an aversion going. Notice how that thing seems to be ubiquitous. It's everywhere. If it's a particular sound, that's all you hear.

Sometimes we get locked onto someone we don't even know. We get what we call Vipassana romance or Vipassana vendetta. And it's nothing about the person, because you don't even know them. But there's something about them that gets wanting going, or aversion going. Either way, you see that person all the time. You know, you think, "They're deliberately putting themselves in my way." And people really—I mean, seriously—we don't even notice other stuff.

And this happens within yourself, when you're feeling self-judgment. There's a wear of self-judgment, but you're really believing it. So that's aversion.

Aversion in the mind. And then what aspects of thoughts come up, what memories arise that you believe? If you think, "Well, but I did that good thing," it's like, "Oh, that's a crock. No. What's really true are all the bad things you could list about yourself." And you say, "Well, let me say some good things," and you go, "No, that's not true." The perception is just glomming onto the negative. And that's all we can see.

That's how, when the mind is obsessed or oppressed with aversion, it can't see clearly. There's some beautiful, there's some unpleasant, there's this, there's that—it's changing every moment. We don't see that. How often do you come in and say, "This has been going on all day"? Coming here, you've been feeling this boredom, or whatever it is, all day. And in that moment, we think that.

When you notice yourself thinking it, check in and see. How long, in steady state, did that actually last before a moment came in thinking, "I wonder what's for lunch?" "Oh, but I'm really such a horrible person. I'm really done today." "Well, you know, it's kind of nice out. Maybe I'll go for a walk." "Oh, god, I'm really so..."

Notice selective perception and see how it works. This is awareness helping us see how the deluded mind operates. It works the same in the world, in big things. And I won't go into any content, but I can see there are people I don't want to see anything good about. I really don't want to let in anything good. I can see my mind doing that. They're all bad. They're all good. And that's just not true for anything. Selective perception blinds us. And mostly, it's about ourselves. We don't notice the cessation.

So watch yourself through the day here. Play with it. Notice with simple choices as you go through the day—we get used to bringing awareness into the quality of our mind. I often say, as an example, when you go into the dining room, you have to pick where you're going to sit. Notice how the mind chooses that. There's no right or wrong. But you might notice: Is it wanting that leads the show? "Oh, that's a good seat over there where I can see out the window and no one's sitting across from me." Or is it aversion? "I don't want to sit next to that person, and here I don't like to sit because it's too close to the line, and that's too close to the tea station." Or is it that you just don't even know where you're sitting—you just plop down? Explore it. It's not right or wrong.

Explore going through the line. Explore thinking, "Should I take an extra apple and save it for nine o'clock tonight when I'm really tired?" And how many apples do you pile up because you save them? And then they're rotting back there. Notice what you go through. It's really interesting.

If you don't make it right or wrong, the awareness starts to get more subtle, more tuned in, really seeing. You can see wanting arise, the impulse to save the apple. Whether you save it or not doesn't matter. But we don't have to be servants of the greed, of the wanting. We can see it.

We can feel wantings like this. If we don't see them, they do their job, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says. Wanting has one job, and it does it well. Aversion has its own job, and does it well. But when we bring in awareness, we can see how these forces act. They do their jobs, but they come and they cease. We don't have to be driven by them. We don't have to be afraid of them.

This is why the steadiness of awareness really starts to help us see through these stories, these different worlds that are being created. We can see them being created—that's okay. But we can see them coming, and we can see them falling away. We don't have to be caught in them.

I'll end with something Anam Thubten says about the practice of awareness. When we can be with awareness, even though the habits are there, the awareness itself is untouched. Awareness of aversion is not averse. Awareness of being caught up in a story—the awareness isn't caught up in the story. It's watching. It's with it.

He says, "We are easily pulled these days into the vortex of fear and worry and anger. It seems to be swirling in the world." So easy to get pulled into that, and then we lose touch. He says we lose touch with awareness. We lose touch with our innate dignity. We lose touch with love and compassion, which are natural states, because we're lost in the vortex of aversion and fear.

So we practice to re-recognize awareness—awareness of fear, awareness of anger. But re-recognizing awareness, he says, when we're recognizing awareness, there's natural access to love and compassion, to dignity. Awareness offers us access to that again. And that's what we offer to the world.

It's a lot to think that just this simplicity of awareness can make that possible. But it does. It's not us. It's not something we create.

He talks about conscious awareness, his language for it, as "awakened attentiveness." It's not something that's created. We can't create it. We can't make it happen. It's not like a refined meditative state. It's simply recognized because it's completely natural, normal, always available. It's so simple that we overlook it.

I'll read this, because I love it, from one of the schools of Mahamudra Tibetan teaching—the four faults of natural awareness:

It's so close, you can't see it.
It's so deep, you can't fathom it.
It's so simple, you can't believe it.
It's so good, you can't accept it.

It's so amazing, and it's so nothing.

Thank you for your attention, whatever worlds were being created as we all sat here.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 195

Receptive Awareness All the Time

Carol Wilson · 12 min

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson explores the essential quality of maintaining awareness throughout the entire day, not just during formal sitting and walking meditation. She emphasizes that the awareness cultivated in this practice tradition is fundamentally different from directed, focused mindfulness—it is a gentle, wide, receptive quality that doesn't grasp or strain to know experience clearly.

Carol offers practical guidance on how this awareness manifests in daily activities: walking to put on shoes, standing in the food line, or moving through any moment. Rather than trying to focus intently on sensations or label experiences, practitioners are encouraged to simply know what they're doing with a soft, background awareness that grows naturally over time. She shares her own journey transitioning from Mahasi-style directed attention practice to this more receptive approach, acknowledging the challenges of releasing habitual efforting.

The talk addresses working skillfully with difficult experiences like physical pain and aversion during sitting meditation. Carol teaches that awareness isn't about enduring until discomfort passes, but about honestly recognizing when aversion is being strengthened rather than observed. This "meditation for adults" means knowing why we do what we do, trusting ourselves to find our own rhythm, and allowing awareness to become a natural companion and refuge—a 24/7 practice that is relaxed rather than exhausting.

The power of the revelatory aspect of this practice grows through our willingness to remember awareness no matter what we're doing throughout the whole rest of the day.

That's one of the reasons we like this format here. Even if we were teaching a retreat in a more structured retreat center, we wouldn't have regular sitting, walking, sitting, walking. We'd have times that we meet and talk, but then the rest of the day the schedule is open for you to find whatever most supports your remembering awareness.

The walking meditation is similar to the sitting in terms of instructions. It's not, as in some forms of meditation, mindful walking where there's a real structure—that you should go particularly slowly, or that you need to bring the focus just to the sensations of the foot and leg. It's the same as what we're doing in sitting. And then moving through the day, whatever activities arise.

The one aspect I want to emphasize is that the quality of the awareness, the quality of this remembering mindfulness, is a very gentle, wider, receptive quality. It's not about—say you're in the food line—it's not about the mindfulness where there's a sense of "I need to be mindful of feeling my feet on the floor so I don't get lost," or "I need to notice the thoughts in my mind, notice the judgment." There can be this little bit of trying to hold on to mindfulness, or trying to know clearly the way the sensations of the foot feel, or know clearly what's happening as I'm standing in line. That wanting to know clearly, that kind of focus—that's way extra. That's not practicing to trust.

In the beginning it doesn't feel like much, this general receptive, wider field of awareness. When you're walking out of the hall, you're not trying to focus, but you know you're walking. You may feel the whole sense of the body, the sense of space. It may be that hearing comes up. It may be that you notice seeing. It may be that you realize you're thinking about what was said and how can I do it—and then all of a sudden you realize you didn't know you were walking, but you knew you were thinking. So it's just not trying to make the experience be a certain way, but remembering to know what we're doing.

This gentle, background awareness starts to feel more natural. It starts to get more steady, more running in the background. When I say the sense of knowing what you're doing as you're walking to put on your shoes—it's like knowing what you're doing, maybe feeling the body, knowing you're hearing, noticing you're seeing your shoes—but it's not thinking about it. You're not labeling what you're doing. There's not that gripping. It's just this gentle quality: you're feeling your body or your mind, you know you're putting on your shoes.

You let the awareness grow by itself. You're not trying to do it. We do have effort. The effort is just as Andrea said: Am I aware? As soon as you drop that in, you're aware. After a while, you don't even have to say it. You're just tying your shoes and suddenly—oh yeah, aware. It pops back in. And then there's nothing you have to do with it. As soon as there's awareness, it's knowing what is, broad and precise, and that's that moment of awareness. We're never trying to change it or make it better. It's more and more just this awareness that comes with us, that starts to accompany us, that becomes more and more natural and familiar.

Through the day, what gives this practice the wisdom factor is the willingness to remember that. Of course we forget ten million times, but the willingness to remember, whatever you are doing—this is a twenty-four-seven practice. Not having a steady schedule isn't a way of saying kick back, you're not working so hard. It's a way of saying there is no moment that isn't available for awareness, no matter what's happening.

The first times I was starting this practice, I found the walking and the moving through the day actually fed my understanding of it much more than the sitting. Because in the sitting, I would get more caught up in the habits of meditation. If this is new to you, you'll see that.

I did Mahasi practice for years, which I love. It's just different—much more directed focus. It took me quite a while not to be in some kind of struggle. "No, don't direct the focus. Relax. No, don't. No, relax." It was like a nightmare for a while. But in the walking and the moving through the day, somehow the habit wasn't as strong, although I love slow walking.

In fact, the first time a few of us were at Shwe Oo Min with U Tejaniya a long time ago, we were doing walking back and forth. I was with Narayan and Myoshin, two other teachers. We thought we were walking at a normal pace. He would say, "Walk at a normal pace." We thought we were. No way. He'd come up, stop you—he moves around like that. "Why are you going so slowly?" Just like that. "This isn't slow. You want to see slow? No, just walk normal." It was impossible in the beginning. But that's all fun. You're just watching that. It really doesn't matter what speed. Walk slow if you want, but be aware—not because you should.

So it's really whatever you're doing. And in terms of sitting and formal walking, yes, extremely helpful, because the more simple our activities are, the easier it is for us to remember awareness. Sure, you can do it with everything. Sure, go on your computer. Go back to your room and—please don't—go on your computer and say, "See if I can be aware while I'm looking at the news." For goodness sake, let's get real. Keep it simple.

So sitting and walking are really helpful. The amount that you sit and walk isn't some "should" or some ideal. It comes from you being really present. Say in the sitting, you realize—not just "I'm sick of it, time to go," or "It's forty minutes, time to get up"—but you're actually relaxed, aware. What's the motivation to get up? Awareness notices. "Ah, I'm bored." It notices boredom. You get up or you don't, but there's awareness of boredom and responding to it. Or there's awareness of boredom, it passes, and then you're sitting, and it's calm again.

Same with the walking. But if you see in the sitting, for example, that you're sitting with quite some pain, you're aware of pain—so there's awareness. I mean, there's also the sitting where you're not aware of the pain; you're filled with aversion and you pop up and go. Okay, that happens. You can be aware of that too. Be aware of that. Know that's why you stopped sitting. Just knowing why you're doing what you're doing.

We call it meditation for adults. You know why you're doing what you're doing. And ultimately it's about what supports your continued awareness.

So when I started to say you're in a lot of pain, you're aware of the pain, the aversion is growing, you're aware of the aversion—and you all know how to do this. It's not like a goal in this style that you should be aware long enough until the aversion goes away, or you're aware long enough and the pain goes away. Forget that. We all get caught in that, but forget it.

Sometimes the mindfulness isn't as strong as the aversion or the clinging. We all know this happens. Awareness can notice that too. So you notice that in this particular sitting, the pain is strong. You're aware of the pain. The aversion is getting really strong. You're aware of the aversion. But what's actually occurring is that the aversion is growing and growing and growing. You're saying, "I'm not getting up until it's been an hour." You're gritting your teeth. You're clenching your hands. You're cultivating aversion. That's not really what we need—we know how to do that well enough already.

So just see with wisdom: "Okay, this is strengthening aversion." We all have different thresholds for this. Sometimes you can see it, and awareness comes up enough to be with the aversion. Sometimes not. And it's not like you're going to get it right or you're going to blow it. If you get up too soon, you've ruined your retreat? Come on. You're just watching.

But if you feel like you're feeding aversion, it's perfectly wise, perfectly skillful means, to end the sitting with awareness.

The same applies in walking. You're walking and it feels great, back and forth, back and forth, and you realize it's been a while, it's really comfortable, and you haven't actually been aware for the last fifteen minutes. You're just drifting along pleasantly. It might be time to shift the posture. Awareness in any posture is simply what brings us back into the moment.

So that's all I wanted to say today. But it's so gentle. It's not stressful. It's not tiring. You might feel tired these days—physical tiredness, sure. But if the way we're remembering awareness is bringing up tiredness, that's a sure sign we're putting in too much personal effort. And that's a useful feedback system. "I don't want to be aware." Okay, relax. You're aware right then of relaxing. That's all it takes.

Something is always happening—that's samsara. Something is happening every mind moment. Awareness is available just to notice that. It's happening anyway. Awareness can simply notice it. It becomes our friend. It becomes our refuge.

So just explore this as we move through the day. Twenty-four seven, just relax. Just relax. I think that's okay.

Find your own rhythm.

Trust yourself.

Finish here.

CHAPTER 196

Explaining with Interest and Awareness How Kilesas Function - To Trick Us into Confusion

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a penetrating exploration of how the kilesas (defilements) operate at subtle levels to keep us confused and suffering. Drawing on teachings from Thich Nhat Hanh, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and His Holiness the Dalai Lama, she explains that nibbāna is fundamentally a cooling—relief from the burning fires of greed, hatred, and delusion. As Buddhadāsa taught, we all experience temporary nibbāna in moments when the mind is free from these afflictions; if we didn't, we couldn't bear existence.

The talk focuses particularly on how saññā (perception) becomes the gateway for kilesas to reassert themselves. Wilson explains the classical progression of papañca: unrecognized perception leads to thinking, which hardens into views (diṭṭhi), which then 'assail' us. Using vivid examples—from mistaking a lichen-covered rock for a circus tent to the different perceptions of a bathroom depending on one's mental state—she demonstrates how perception is always conditioned and how the fundamental misperception of a solid, separate self (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) underlies all our difficulties.

Practically, Wilson emphasizes trusting steady awareness rather than trying to catch every moment of arising. She shares Sayādaw U Tejaniya's teaching about 'collecting data' and having 'right information'—recognizing that 'heat feels like this' rather than creating elaborate stories of suffering. The talk concludes with passages from Sāriputta showing how even the subtlest traces of lust, hatred, and delusion obstruct the measureless liberation of mind, inviting practitioners to explore these processes with curiosity rather than judgment.

So tonight, I just want to talk a little more about this inexhaustible subject, the kilesas. We never have enough of them.

Thich Nhat Hanh says at one point, "Nirvana is cooling." You know, the word nirvana actually means cool, like the rice is cool. Nirvana is cooling—cooling from the fever of anger, of fear, of greed. Cool from the fever of kilesa, which are due to wrong perception.

And Ajahn Buddhadasa says the same. Probably many of you are familiar with the article that's been published in English for many years from one of his talks called "Nibbana for Everyone." It's an interesting article where he's talking to Thai lay people who, at the time he gave the talk, many had the belief that nibbana was something in the past or only for radiant, enlightened people or something. So he was just saying nibbana is for everyone because he said the same thing that Thich Nhat Hanh says: nibbana is cool. The fires of kilesa are burning, burning. And we all experience temporary nibbana.

Buddhadasa was a Thai forest monk, quite a scholar. He died in the 1990s. And within the Thai monastic tradition, he was a little bit outside the framework in how he interpreted things. For instance, in his monastery Suan Mokkh, he had an Avalokiteshvara statue up, which is quite unusual there. I spent some time there a long time ago.

So anyway, he says we all experience temporary nibbana, moments when the mind, the heart, the citta is free from the kilesas. It's cool, free from the burning of the kilesas. He says this because if the kilesas were burning all the time, if we never had a moment free from them, we couldn't bear it. We couldn't stand it. We'd either go crazy, or we'd die, or we'd go crazy and then we'd die. We're going to die anyway. But he's saying the fire of the kilesas is unbearable if we didn't have these moments of temporary nibbana.

One of the mysteries to me—there are many mysteries to our intellectual mind—is why don't we see this? First, why don't we notice the temporary nibbana? We do sometimes as we're practicing; you'll see those. But just recognizing why is it so pleasant? Because the kilesas aren't burning in the heart, in the mind.

And why do we not see on the deepest level how much burning and suffering is coming from our addiction to these kilesas? On one level, it's obvious. Like I was saying this morning, I think I read from Sayadaw U Tejaniya where the gross levels—we really need to know them so we don't act in harmful ways. And it's not a mystery. We know that those levels are suffering. But the subtle ones—how do the really subtle levels of kilesa work in our heart and mind? How do they keep us so fooled and so lost?

There are many ways this happens, and this is just going over things you already know. But it's really fascinating to me how this works.

If you read it, he seemed—from that book, only that book—very kind. It was a great book, but he didn't come down with a sword too often. But there was one point where he said to his students, in some way, why do we keep suffering? Because you're not, in some way, really committed enough to freedom from suffering. And he said, if I told you what it was really like, all I would hear is the sound of cars driving down the driveway.

I think that's first noble truth stuff. If I told you what it was really about, you'd be out of here. You're all past that because we kind of know. We kind of know, right? But then all of a sudden it hits us upside the head again. I thought I... maybe not you, but me.

We need to thoroughly understand how much the three unskillful root qualities of mind are torturing and tormenting us. And again, this takes right view in the awareness. Otherwise, we just spiral down into more negativity. But we haven't quite learned this lesson fully yet. We don't learn our lesson the first time, the second time, the third time. The Buddha stopped it three times, but like someone said in a group today, it was more like a million times, right?

We only turn for help from the wholesome qualities when we realize that the unskillful qualities are running our lives and we can no longer stand them. If you can read that without adding aversion on top of it—sometimes his language is very, well, it's in translation—but if you just allow those moments when really you can no longer stand this, without piling aversion on top, it brings up a kind of determination. Like an adhiṭṭhāna. Not "I'm going to make this go away"—we know that doesn't work—but the sense of, okay, I'm not going to drive my car down the driveway. Here we are. What is our support here?

Just—guess what—the simple receptive awareness. That is a completely reliable support for whatever's going on. We make our determination: okay, let's meet this again. I feel like I can't bear to see this stupid, painful habit of mind one more time. I completely understand it. Obviously not.

The kilesas are really sneaky. Have you noticed that? They're really sneaky—not the gross ones, but the subtle ones. They keep tricking us back into identification, craving, and suffering. The way I want to talk about how they sneak in tonight is on the level of perception, saññā, which Andrea talked about. This quality, one of the five aggregates arising in every moment, is a mental quality that simply recognizes what the sense experience is. "Hearing" could be a perception, or "that's the bell" could be a perception.

I'm sure if you've ever listened to me, you've heard it, because I talk about it all the time. But His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Thich Nhat Hanh, Ajahn Sumedho, other teachers—on and on—they keep saying, in the Dalai Lama's language, that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. And that's what I find so fascinating.

Just even on the basic level, perception is conditioned. The way we recognize something is based on our memory, our experience in life, our family, our background, our culture, the way we've been brought up, the experiences we've had. So somebody might recognize something one way and someone else would call it something else. Often it's not like there's an absolute right, and often our perceptions are incorrect anyway.

Here's a simple example of how perceptions can be different—and you can't necessarily bring them together. I was at a friend's house, and I said, "Would you hand me that throw, that blanket, that blue blanket on the back of the couch?" She said, "What blue blanket?" I said, "That one, the blue blanket on the back." She said, "That's not blue, that's green." She couldn't see blue, and I couldn't see green. It was interesting. We didn't get in a fight about it. It was just okay.

But just to see—to both of us, that was the absolute perception. It was blue. And even trying, I couldn't see green. So no big deal. But this is going on all the time. And if we're not aware of perception, we so often identify with it, don't even know. We just take it to be the accurate experience of life.

And this is where, of course, His Holiness and Thich Nhat Hanh are talking about the basic misperception. The basic misperception, of course, is not seeing impermanence, not seeing dukkha, the unsatisfactory. But really the basic one is the perception of any experience as being solidly me or mine, separate from all other things. That's the basic one.

And as His Holiness says—another quote I love—basic ignorance of this, of the nature of reality, gives rise to the 84,000 destructive emotions and cognitive obscurations. I just love that. The 84,000. You can knock it down to three, right? The big three. And cognitive obscurations. So in a way, that's how sometimes there can be delusion in the heart-mind without greed or aversion. And then it's like cognitive obscuration. You just don't see clearly.

If you don't recognize that delusion is present, which we often don't, it's sort of like walking in fog. We see something or perceive something at a sense door, we don't really quite know what it is, but we don't recognize that, and the mind makes something up.

I remember years ago I was teaching in a place in Switzerland where there was some forest, and I was walking through it. It's not like a huge forest, you know, a little patch of forest. And I was walking and I saw out of the side of my eye—I said, "Well, what's a yellow striped circus tent doing here in the middle of the woods?" That's kind of weird. There was no questioning. I saw a yellow striped circus tent. I didn't even look, didn't even question. That's what we do with perception.

Well, one way or another—I don't actually remember if I was with someone and said it, or I told them later and they said I was crazy and we went back and looked—of course, it was a big gray rock with yellow lichen on it, kind of in stripes. Of course there wasn't a circus tent. But I love it when the misperception can be perceived so quickly. Because even something simple like that, you can reflect on it. I really, there was no question, that's what I saw. Well, we're doing that all the time. Not "we," but perception is making perceptions all the time.

As many people have said already in the last few days, they notice the perception of self coming up. That's fine. Noticing it is fine. The problem comes when perception is arising in every moment and it's not always the thing that awareness notices. And then what we feel, we perceive—this is the Buddha, of course. What we perceive, when we're not recognizing the self, we think about. And as we think about it, we complicate it with associations, with memories, with concepts and ideas. And then this hardens into a view.

You know, this is the classical definition of papañca, right? Starting from vedanā and perception—they both come so close together you can't really tease out which is first. But unrecognized, still around, these perceptions, these concepts, these ideas, these views—unrecognized, they're clung to. The clinging is like the sense that we know this is true. You don't even think of "me clinging." It's just, "This is an accurate description of reality." Unrecognized, then these concepts turn around and assail a person.

Do you ever feel like that? Like a lot, right?

And so this is how we get so far, so fast from any particular perception, and get lost. As André was saying, we wake up and wonder what planet we're on. Just from—oh yeah, circus tent. I could have gone into a whole story.

This is from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, talking about samsara. This is how it works. Samsara literally means "wandering on."

Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live—we're living in samsara, the place we leave when we go to nibbana. But in early Buddhist texts, and Thanissaro Bhikkhu is quite the early Buddhist scholar, samsara is the answer not to "where are we?" but to "what are we doing?" We're samsara-ing. It's not a place; it's a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart, the mind creates another one and goes there. At the same time, you bump into other people who are creating their own worlds. We wonder why we don't all get along, why there are so many different views. That's really samsara.

And this creation of worlds is just like what I described—from perception that's unrecognized and basically clung to, just assumed. That's accurate.

Ajahn Sumedho also talks about samsara similarly: samsara and nibbana are not places to go but modes of perception. I like this a lot—modes of perception. Samsara is when we're interpreting experience through the perception of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, separate self. When that's the perception, and then that leads to thinking, whatever interpretation of experience through that lens—that's the cognitive obscuration. That's the beginning of a world. So fast, through the lens of sakkāya-diṭṭhi. That's how complex worlds come into being so quickly.

Without steady awareness, we don't even notice. We wake up in this world, we wake up in that world. But with steady awareness, we can really notice. We can really start to see and get interested in how perception is affected, colored by whatever quality is in the mind in the moment of perception. It isn't really a steady-state thing. I couldn't have gone back and seen that rock as a tent anymore because I had the information—the ignorance wasn't there.

Someone said in a group, and I hope you don't mind I'm using this because it's so perfect, about how what's in the mind really affects perception. The person said they were going into the bathroom feeling like, "Now I have to spritz everything and clean it all off," and it just feels like drudgery. Just noticing that—fine, fine practice. But then another time, going into the bathroom and thinking, "Oh, everything's so sparkly! All the metal is so sparkly and shining and light." Same experience, right? A different day, different experience. The quality in the mind is different.

With just kilesa—even just a subtle not-liking, or a subtle sense of "me, I have to do this"—it makes the whole experience what it is. Walking in without the kilesa, just a sense of openness or pleasantness—"Oh, look at that!" The attention, the awareness is fresh. It's not already distorted by tiredness or clinging or dislike. And so some other aspect, some lovely aspect of brightness shows up.

This is going on all the time. It's really fun to watch, to see. It certainly starts to take the solidity out of our perceptions and the trust—I mean, it doesn't make it so you never trust perception, but it does take our absolute certainty: "This is how it is. This is how it is." And that's important. That's so important.

It goes back to the description of papañca. You know this: saññā, perception, leads to citta, to thinking about—which is just what he's saying. What's felt, what's perceived, leads to thinking about. If the perception is distorted, then the thoughts coming out of that perception don't really have much bearing on reality, because they're coming out of that perception.

And then the citta, how we think, hardens into ditti, into view. The view is a description of the world, or a description of myself, or a description of anything. And when it hardens into view—not recognized, being identified with or held to—the Buddha describes view as thinking, "This alone is true. Everything else is false." But we don't have that little warning sign which would tell us, "This is a view." We just know. You know that this is true and everything else is false in that moment.

And as the Buddha said, when we're attached to a view, those who are attached to views just go around in the world annoying each other. It's more than annoying, right? Andre and I were talking today, and we were both saying that views are kind of—I don't know if it's the bottom line—but really, what's giving rise to violence and terror, all the stuff that's going on in the world, is coming out of views. Attachment to views. We can have preferences. We can certainly prefer one thing to another. We vote, we do whatever, of course. But it's that attachment: "This is right and everything else is wrong." So much suffering.

And this is on the unrecognized level when they talk about sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. This is what's going on. We don't even know it's a view. We don't even recognize it's a perception, because we think this solid thing is having the perception. And so it can get really interesting to keep exploring.

I'm just bringing these up as points to look at. We see it. And in the steady awareness, there are times when this really shows up. Just be steady. Don't look for anything. Just be steady. You can see it happening. And all this solidity—it doesn't even fall apart—it just stops being so solid. And it's really kind of cool. There's a sense of freedom. And then, you know, the next minute maybe another whirl starts.

Ajahn Sumedho—I like the way he says this. I hope it's not too depressing to you. That all depends on how the mind takes it. He says we live in these bodies as sensitive forms. So there's constant vedanā, feeling tone. Constant. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Arising and ceasing at the six sense doors. Constantly. It never ceases. And we all experience life like this.

Do you get a sense of that? Sometimes, especially on a quiet retreat, when there's holding to it, we really can feel what seems like this constant barrage of contact, contact, contact—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—at the sixth sense door going on all the time. Other times, if there's not a holding, that awareness can be there of contact, contact, but there's not a sense of resistance. That's when it's just like this. No past, no future. Just like this. No resistance, no holding. You wouldn't even say flow, because that's like flowing from this to that. It's just this.

We can experience it different ways. But when Ajahn Sumedho said that—I've heard him say it a couple of times—I thought, "Yeah, that's right." Constantly. It never ceases. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

And it's so fast. The habits of the mind—with pleasant, the wanting; with the unpleasant, it's bad and wrong; with the neutral, to space out—and all of that comes from a sense of me. It's so fast. Of course, these habits forming from these kilesas will pop up from time to time. It's just so fast.

So there can be a lot of awareness and receiving, and it's not really forming. And then we kind of lose touch with the awareness, get lost in the thought or here and there, and then it's all solidified again. Not to take that personally or get discouraged, but rather to have an appreciation for just how much this is going on all the time. Not thinking, "I've seen how sensation comes and it's pleasant and then there's craving, so it shouldn't bother me anymore because I've seen it." This is happening in what—seventeen million moments of consciousness in the blink of an eye? Okay, maybe that's an exaggeration, but it's a lot. It's a lot that's happening. Of course it's never going to be that the awareness is about catching each one and deconstructing each one, and then there's freedom.

But the more we're seeing how it works, then those moments—those temporary moments of Nibbana, as Ajahn Buddhadasa said—when you really can notice the vedanā coming in, or maybe you notice the perception giving rise to thoughts and just not cling to it, and you really experience in that moment the coolness of not coagulating around it as "me," or the kilesas are just not there. You really experience that. And then when the fires come back again, we can trust, have confidence in the awareness to notice those too. That's just the next thing arising.

We can really trust that the more steady the awareness is, wisdom is what comes in and really starts to see how it's working. We don't have to catch it every minute. Just trust the awareness. And people have said they've noticed times when suddenly some clinging that was going on just stopped. No big deal, nothing they did. It's like that. Notice that. Not make a big story—because then it's clinging again. But just noticing. Nothing personal. I didn't do something. It was just nature.

Steady awareness, free from kilesa. Noticing how kilesa is arising, conditioned, how it functions, how it passes. Awareness isn't the kilesa. Awareness noticing is what gives rise to wisdom. And the wisdom really doesn't feed that. It puts it down. You can trust that. And feeling that, there is that little moment. It can be just a moment, but let the awareness consciously be aware of the taste of that. It's just a little passing moment, not some big lights going off—"Oh my God, I'm having a rapture moment!" It's just a little coolness.

Which is one of the reasons I find awareness with neutral to be a really interesting place to explore. Because with neutral, at times we tend to get bored, or we space out, we look for something. But the boredom is kind of the kilesa response to neutral. Neutral is really also on the wisdom end of things—it moves into peace, calm, equanimity. They're more like cooled out.

So just a little moment—if you want to call it temporary Nibbana, which is where the fires of kilesa stopped or didn't come up in that moment. It's not like, "Wow!" It's just—don't ignore it though. Don't hold on to it. If you hold on, it's gone anyway. It'll go anyway. But just notice it. Notice it. Don't be looking for some big thing. Like Ajahn Buddhadasa said, we all have lots of moments like that. And then we go, "Oh, cool."

Now, you know, and then that moment's gone and new moments come. But it's really worth exploring.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about this sense of vedana and perception coming, coming, coming. He talks a lot about having right information. Right view comes from right information. As I mentioned in one of the groups, one of the times he was here—not the zero-ten-zero time, a different time—he was always talking about thinking of steady awareness as collecting data. The mind is collecting all this data, and you're just being aware of all these little things as you go through the day. No big anything. Kilesas come and kilesas go, but it's like you're collecting data. And you start to have the right information. When we have the right information, which is right view, then the experience, the vedana, the perception, doesn't have to go into a story.

This is just basic mindfulness 101. Right view means when you're really hot—like in Burma, often it's really hot—right information is: oh, heat feels like this. Not: oh my God, I'm so hot, I'm going to die. Just: heat is like this. That's right information. Or "sound is bothering me"—wrong information. Right information is: sound is arising, it's like this. Unpleasantness is arising, it's like this. The thought "I don't like it" is arising, it's like this. But as soon as there's a "me" that puts it all into a story, then we're coming from wrong information. And that's where judgment arises, and afflictive emotions, and views, and we come into conflict with others. It can turn into a whole spiral pretty quickly.

To use a simple example, again back to Myanmar. Any time I've ever practiced there, in any monastery or nunnery or meditation center, there are always little villages around. The idea we have here of this holy silence—forget about it. I remember when we were starting the Forest Refuge, I was on a committee. At one point we were having a conversation—this will make me look a little hard-ass—but we were having a conversation, it had been here a year or two, and people were saying, "Sometimes when there's a sitting in here and someone goes out that door right there, people in the hall can hear it open and close. We should make it so it's quiet." And I was in one of my moods. For the love of God, you know—this life!

Anyway, so back to Sayadaw U Tejaniya. When you first go to practice in Asia, if you've been practicing over here, you've got to get over it really quick or you suffer big time. Anywhere—up in Chazwa, up in the Sagaing Hills—in the villages whenever there's a wedding or a birthday, they rent these giant speakers, as high as up there. If you're walking through the village and you see one, you go, "Oh, God," because the ceremony could last up to three days, twenty-four-seven. Loud, as loud as it can possibly be.

In fact, I remember one time we were up in Chazwa, which is way up the hill with a little village down there. It was a three-day one. And I remember thinking, I wonder if I went down and paid the person a hundred dollars, would they turn it off? I was kind of serious. A hundred dollars at that point would have been huge. But then I thought about it. No. Then everyone else would go rent things so they could get a hundred dollars to turn them off.

Somebody told Sayadaw U Tejaniya that story. Because the story I started to tell—he loves this kind of stuff. We were sitting one time, and the same thing was going on.

But one day—I'm not exaggerating, maybe embellishing just a little—there were four different celebrations going on at once. Four different ones, equally loud from all directions. You can't even imagine. And it goes on... okay, maybe they stopped at two in the morning, these ones. You can't ignore it.

And he would—he loved it. He goes, "This is so good for practice." And he means that. You don't complain about any condition. He's like, "Look at your mind. Where's the suffering? That sound can't make you angry. That sound can't interrupt your practice."

And it's really true—you can't get away from it. So you can either make yourself miserable or work with it. It's really interesting. You watch the mind go in and out, in and out, but it's so clear. There are times when it's so averse you can't stand it. Other times you get sidetracked into something else and don't even notice it. Other times the sound is coming and it's just what it is, and the mind isn't creating anything around it.

It's really interesting. Right information is just: this is what it is. And when the aversion comes: this is what it is. Wrong information is: me, they shouldn't do it, I'll pay for it, what's going on, what's the matter with these people, why don't they make these places quiet? Or: this person is snoring in the hall, they shouldn't be doing that, they're bothering me. And it just spirals and spirals and spirals.

This is where views come in. This is where our suffering comes in.

So with steady awareness, we just keep exploring that. We can be aware. We can really appreciate the awareness rather than believing all the stuff our mind makes up. It doesn't stop the experience from being unpleasant, but it makes a huge difference.

I'm a lot better with sound at night than I ever used to be. I'll tell you that.

Because of all that, I want to read this from Ajahn Chah. Because these complex worlds—that's a world I'm telling you about, it's a story—but that was a huge world going on with those sounds and my mind and everything.

Ajahn Chah says: "The things of this world are merely conventions of our own making. Having established them, we get lost in them and refuse to let go, giving rise to clinging to personal views and opinions. This clinging never ends. It is samsara, flowing endlessly on. It has no completion. Now, if we know conventional reality, then we'll know liberation. If we clearly know liberation, then we'll know convention. This is to know the Dhamma. Here there is completion."

So that's it—the worlds the mind is creating and we're moving into. Just what he's saying: clinging to it, from aversion, and we don't know that. We just keep doing it, doing it, doing it. But with awareness, we can know conventional reality. That's what's occurring.

And those times when we really see how this is all created—it doesn't stop it, and we still feel it. Conventional reality is right here. We're in it, so to speak, but not of it. And seeing that just changes the whole thing.

When we really know conventional reality, that's why I would say awareness is the doorway. Any object is a doorway to awareness.

Any object. And the steadiness of awareness is what gives rise to wisdom, which is the doorway to seeing through the distortions of perception and feeling and story and view, to things as they are. It's fun to see.

So watch the complex worlds arising and dissolving all day long. This is fun. They're all about me—all the worlds are about me. Watch how long one world lasts before another one comes. How many different worlds have you been in today? And they're all about me, me and other, me and other. We can just watch the concoction and all the effects of it. Some last longer, some are more real than others. And we're all having different ones.

It reminds me of a moment—I don't know, last year sometime—I was on a long-haul flight, walking down the aisle of the plane, one of these twelve-hour flights. You could see the TV screens on the back of the seats, big enough that you could see what each person was watching. And it was really kind of fun as I was walking down. I thought, everyone is engrossed. I could see all the different worlds they were engrossed in, all the different stories. Everyone here is sitting completely absorbed in some completely other world. Over here was some kind of martial arts thing, over here was a love story, over here were some monsters, here was a vampire movie, here was some mafia thing. Everyone completely absorbed. And that's what we're doing, only without the movie screen. We're making it up ourselves, and we're all in different ones.

So we watch. The steadiness of awareness reveals it. If we're just willing to keep coming back into awareness, we don't have to hold all this stuff I'm saying, because reality reveals itself.

Ajahn Sumedho asks, do we notice that what arises ceases? Sometimes we just notice we're in this world, and later we notice we're in that world. But he says, do we notice what ceases, or do we jump right into the next story, the next view, the next perception? Most people don't notice the cessation of concoction, he says, because our attention is too flighty. We don't notice things ending, but we might notice we're in a new one, and that's already good. Because our attention is so jumpy, we don't always notice the ending of things.

Craving is like that. When we have steady awareness, we really can see it end. But when we don't, we can see craving, then we don't get what we want, or we get what we want and it goes away—but we don't quite notice that. We don't quite notice when the craving ends or the aversion ends. We notice that it's gone, later. So seeing the ending—you can't make that happen, but it comes as our attention is less flighty. That's what we're cultivating here. Reality is going to reveal itself.

Again, Ajahn Sumedho says we create ourselves through our thoughts. And our thoughts cannot create an ultimately peaceful self. We keep trying though. But really, see if your thoughts—don't try to think new thoughts, you've got enough—but see if they create an ultimately peaceful self.

And watch what I was talking about this morning, about how when the kilesa is present in the mind, it colors perception. How perception can be different—like that bathroom example—when there's different qualities in the mind. Again, this takes the personal out of it. It clearly just becomes a process.

And you can also see the willingness to notice when the kilesa is just a little bit present—just a little, maybe it's a one. When awareness is steady enough and there's not the reaction to the wanting, and you can see it really, really subtle like that, that's when it's really interesting. You don't have to slam it with a hammer. You can be aware and kind of see: how does it go? What does it do? How does it color things?

You know the Tibetan saying that craving puts feathers on the object? When you want something, it just makes it look so nice, whatever it is. Have you ever had that experience where you want something and you don't get it, and the next day or the next year you think, what was that about? Unfortunately, sometimes that's with people, a relationship, and you're in it, and the next year you go, what are we doing in this relationship?

Or with aversion—when aversion is distorting perception, the thing looks so unattractive, doesn't it? Or the person looks unattractive. But then later that's gone and there's metta, and it's a completely different experience. Noticing that with interest, not taking it personally at all, but really seeing.

And we start to see how more and more we feel how the kilesas really are tormenting us—because we buy into them. With awareness watching them, it's not so tormenting, and they don't last so long.

Again, we've said over and over, the Buddha talks about feeding and starving in terms of wise attention. When balanced awareness is the quality in the mind and attention is given to wholesome mental states—any of the wholesome mental states—that feeds it. Not that it makes it last longer, but it nurtures it, it nourishes it. So really, when you notice wholesome states, love or peace, just let your awareness feel it. Let awareness settle into it, not jump over to the next thing. That feeds it.

And if this kind of balanced awareness is giving attention to one of the kilesas—to craving, for example—awareness can really watch craving come and do its thing, but it's not feeding it. It's not keeping it going. It's watching. It's starving it of nutriment. It's not awareness's job to stop it. That's not how we think of awareness. Awareness just notices. The steadiness gives rise to wisdom. It's wisdom that puts down the kilesa. But this is starving it, not giving it its nutriment.

But when the awareness and the attention is focused on kilesa through the veil of wanting, aversion, me, me, me—without recognizing it—that's feeding. That keeps it going. Like when you get really lost in aversion to a sound, thinking they shouldn't do it, I shouldn't have to deal with this, and you're really lost in that. As we all know, that keeps it going, feeds it. But attention that's balanced and doesn't have kilesa in it starves the kilesa. So just watching how that works.

The Buddha said, "When one dwells or lives with a mind that's obsessed and oppressed by ill will"—or by craving or by delusion, he says the same thing three times—"when one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, craving, or delusion and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

I find that powerful. I think of it often. When the mind-heart is obsessed—and obsessed just means the greed, hatred, or delusion is there and we're identified with it—even when we think we know the right thing to do, we just can't see clearly.

I've seen so often, say with aversion—it can be just a little aversion. You get an email and you have to answer. It's so clear what the right thing to say and do is. Or you're in some meeting and something happens. It's so clear. And then later, the aversion's gone, and hopefully I didn't answer the email. I look and I can see a whole other aspect that was not available to the mind, to the awareness that was colored by aversion. It's just not available.

But aversion in particular has this flip side of really thinking it's right. Well, so does greed—it's obvious that's the good thing to do. You just wait until it's gone, keep paying attention, and then you see, oh, I couldn't see clearly then.

So just knowing that serves me so much, not only in my life and keeping me from actions, but in practice too—just watching my mind in sitting or in daily life when something is going on and I think I see what I should do or what I have to figure out. I just tune into the mind and I can tell there's doubt or there's wanting or whatever. I just know, okay, this is present. So it's fine that it's present, be aware of it. But this is not the time to think I can trust whatever answer my mind's coming up with.

The thoughts are unreliable when they're coming through the veil of kilesa. That is something my mind knows now from experience. So if I don't recognize the veil of kilesa, the same thing happens—you get lost in it. But if I think I know what to do, and then I notice, "Oh no, I'm really feeling aversive," I understand: okay, this isn't the time to make the decision. It might be the next moment, or it might be in a year—it depends how long it takes. But this understanding has saved me so many times. It's been so freeing and so helpful to see that.

The last thing I want to share starts from Ajahn Sumedho and then moves to something from a sutta, where he's talking about conscious awareness. It's kind of back to views and the division and conflict that comes when we're attached to our view, internally or externally. He says, "Our unity with ourselves or with each other lies in conscious awareness, not in trying to create peace out of ideals. We can't find permanent peace trying to create a peaceful world of separate individuals." We are all different and we can't help it. We want different things and we react to different things—that's just how it is. Different things bring up greed, different perceptions, and that's just how it is. Conditioned phenomena are unstable. I find that so interesting, this sense of attachment to views and not seeing them at the root of so much confusion within ourselves. Never mind the world—within ourselves it's the same. We're representatives of the world, the way our heart and mind works.

Just a bit from the suttas, which speaks in the most subtle way to how the kilesas obscure liberation of heart-mind. I'm condensing this—there are two different suttas that say the same thing. In one, Sariputta, one of the Buddha's two chief disciples, is talking. In another sutta in the Majjhima, a layman named Chitta is saying the same thing. They're asking about the different kinds of deliverance of mind, liberation of mind: the measureless deliverance of mind, deliverance by nothingness, deliverance by emptiness, deliverance by signlessness. That's the technical part we don't need to worry about at this point—it's very, very subtle. How are they the same? How are they different?

But this is the point I want to get to. With all of them, they lead to vast, measureless deliverance of mind-heart. But Sariputta says—and this is the key, what connects them all—"Lust is a maker of measurement" in terms of the measureless liberation of mind. Lust is a maker of measurement. Hatred is a maker of measurement. Delusion is a maker of measurement. With any of those present, measureless deliverance of mind is not available. Then the same lust, hatred, and delusion—it is a "something" as compared to nothingness. Lust, hatred, and delusion are makers of signs, makers of concepts, determining things into existence, as Ajahn Chah says. When lust, hatred, and delusion are there, this is what prohibits the measureless, signless liberation of heart and mind. We're talking about really subtle levels here.

And to me, this is—I guess sad is the way I feel about it. It's so subtle. The kilesas just get stronger and stronger, but on this subtle level, these are the obscurations the Dalai Lama is talking about, what obscures our basic goodness, the true nature of mind. And it's sad that we keep getting tricked back into that. We keep getting tricked back in.

This is where Suzuki Roshi says, just have the willingness. And the rest of the sutta ends with unshakable liberation of mind, unshakable deliverance of mind, when the heart-mind is empty of greed, hatred, or confusion. So there's from the subtle to the really gross and unmissable.

And watch it. Trust in the awareness. Whatever level is showing up, it doesn't matter—don't go looking for another. It's the same process from the gross to the subtle. That's how Goenka used to teach, moving from the gross to the subtle. He would say that all the time. He was my first teacher a long time ago, and I really practiced with him in person, not through the videos. That was a long time ago. I didn't know what he was talking about. It was my first retreat.

So this is really worth exploring with a steady attention. Welcome it. Craving feels like this—let's see how it works. Aversion feels like this—let's see how it works. Oh, just kind of quiet. Coolness feels like this. Just see how it is. And the next moment arises.

So those are the little points I wanted to make about this tonight. Thank you for your kind attention.

Let's end by sharing the blessings. First, really appreciate the wholesomeness, the goodness that has arisen in our hearts and minds. It's important to appreciate this at any point, but at the end of the day is a good time to really let in the goodness, to feel it, to honor it—not just saying, "Oh, all these days I had all this affliction," but noticing all the wholesomeness. So first we take that in: may it be a cause for my awakening. And then out of generosity, we share it with all beings. It's a nice way to end any day, especially days of practice.

CHAPTER 197

Transforming Habits of Greed, Aversion, and Delusion

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines how the Buddha's teachings on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) can transform our habitual patterns of greed, hatred, and delusion across every dimension of life—not just on the meditation cushion. Drawing extensively from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she presents the Buddha's framework of seven methods for abandoning the āsavas (taints): through seeing, restraint, using, enduring, avoiding, removing, and developing.
> Wilson introduces Sayadaw U Paṇḍita's teaching on the three levels of kilesa: transgressive (countered by sīla), obsessive (countered by samādhi), and latent (countered by paññā). She offers practical guidance on how wise attention differs from unwise attention—it's not about avoiding certain objects, but about how we pay attention. When attention dwells on gratification or grievance, the kilesas grow; when attention rests in simple, receptive awareness, they naturally diminish.
>
> The talk emphasizes sīla as a profound contemplative practice rather than mere rule-following, highlighting the beautiful qualities of hiri and ottappa (conscience and wise fear of wrongdoing) as the 'bright guardians of the world.' Wilson shares personal examples of choosing wholesome mental states, demonstrating that we often have more choice than we realize in which thoughts we follow. This teaching invites practitioners to see every moment of daily life as an opportunity to explore what feeds suffering and what starves it.

A couple of quotations from the Buddha.

The Brahmin Janusoni approached the Blessed One and said to him, "It is said, Master Gautama, Nibbana is directly visible. In what way, Master Gautama, is Nibbana directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, worthy of application, to be personally experienced by the wise?"

Gautama says, "When, Brahmin, a person is impassioned with lust, depraved through hatred, bewildered through delusion, overwhelmed and infatuated by delusion, then they plan for their own harm, for the harm of others, for the harm of both, and they experience in their mind suffering and grief. But when lust, hatred, and delusion have been abandoned, they neither plan for their own harm, nor for the harm of others, nor for the harm of both. And they do not experience in their mind suffering and grief. In this way, Brahmin, Nibbana is directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, worthy of application, to be personally experienced by the wise."

You see, you can't get away from the kilesas.

One other very familiar quotation—I'll use Ajahn Amaro and Ajahn Pasanno's translation: "This mind is radiant, but it doesn't show its radiance because passing defilements come and obscure it. The unwise, ordinary person does not understand this as it is, and therefore there is no mind development in the unwise, ordinary person. Bhikkhus, this mind is radiant, and it shows its radiance when it is unobscured by passing defilements, passing kilesas. The wise, noble disciple understands this as it is. Therefore, there is development of the mind in the wise, noble disciple."

So development of the mind—cultivating and exploring the abandonment of the habits of greed, hatred, and delusion—this is what we've been talking about all along. And as the Buddha says, it's when these qualities are absent in the heart-mind that Nibbana is directly visible.

I want to talk a bit tonight about the fact that in the teachings of the Buddha, mind development is not just something we do on retreat. As much as we say that steady awareness, receptive awareness, is the condition for paññā, wisdom, to arise—and this is perhaps the most profound and powerful and always accessible way of really understanding how these qualities obscure peace and allowing the kilesas to be abandoned—our whole life, all aspects of our life, the Buddha viewed as opportunities for this work. We can meet all aspects of our life with this interest, this willingness to use everything to explore, to discover how to transform these habitual responses of wanting, of aversion, of "me, me, me," of confusion, of looking at the world in an upside-down perspective.

It's not that the development of the mind has to wait for retreat. And the way the Buddha talked, it's not even all about meditation. He said everything.

There's far too much for me to go into tonight. I'm going to cover a number of things but not be able to explore them in as much depth as I'd want. But I want to give you a sense of the ways the Buddha talked about looking at aspects of our life, looking at how with our attention and awareness we're meeting experience. We can learn, with attention, to meet this moment of experience, seeing when we meet it in ways that create more suffering, that feed the kilesas, that keep the habit going. And we can learn to meet this moment of experience in ways that truly abandon, even just for a moment, the creation of kilesa.

As I said, there's a lot, but I'll use one conceptual tool: the three levels of the habits of mind. I first heard this from Sayadaw U Pandita, who called them the three rounds of kilesa—three different levels of intensity at which they show up and wreak havoc in our lives and minds.

The first level, the strongest level, he called the kilesa of transgression. It's so strong that it manifests as the motivation for speech and action. This is when the kilesa is really going to town. What counters it, the habit that strengthens and protects us from being lost in it, is sila—non-harming behavior. I'll talk a bit about that.

The second level is called the obsessive level, which I think everyone here can relate to very well. This is being caught up in obsessive thoughts, the torments, just feeding and feeding. Familiar? Wanting, whatever—just caught up in it. What protects in the moment, what can shift the habit, is actually samadhi, the collectedness of mind. It doesn't have to be one-pointedness, though that's one way. But as you've all seen, as the mind and attention get more stable and balanced, we're not tossed around. There's right view in it, so things that arise don't elicit so much reactivity. There's less aversion, less greed, less selfing. I know everybody has been saying they're seeing selfing so much, but that's actually a sign of wisdom seeing. Before that, we don't even know. So don't be discouraged about that—that's actually the mind starting to balance out. The aspect of our life that we can pay attention to, so as not to feed kilesa in this obsessive form, is samadhi, the balance of mind.

The third level is called the latent or underlying level—the level that isn't manifesting now but is just lurking there, waiting to cause trouble, although there's no "there" for it to lurk. This latent level is what the Buddha called the asavas.

The asavas are a category of—sometimes it's translated as "taints." It's a strange translation, not a great one. Asavas is a very specific category referring to the very, very subtle level of kalesa that really isn't manifesting, but the tendency, the habitual tendency, if met with the right conditions—as Thich Nhat Hanh says, if those conditions are watered—it's like a seed that will sprout.

The asavas are described by the Buddha very specifically as three: craving for sensual pleasures, craving for being or becoming, and ignorance. And ignorance covers everything. So those are the three asavas. And the quality that helps abandon this level of kalesa rising, as he says, is not abandoned by acts but by wisely seeing, by wise attention.

So I want to talk a little bit about those three in light of one particular sutta of the Buddha. There's no way I can cover it all, but I'll introduce it and then you can look at it in your own life. I love this sutta. It's called "All the Asavas." It's basically talking about different ways that our mind can employ wise attention in connection with any particular experience—how we pay attention and what we give attention to. All of this is possible because of awareness, and it can either feed the asavas or starve them.

This might sound subtle, but as I go along you'll see it's not just about sitting on the cushion. The Buddha is talking about all different aspects of our life. That's why I love this teaching, because he's addressing the most subtle level of kalesa. In other places he says the person who's completely free from all asava arising is basically an arahat. So he's talking about very subtle levels. But he's not just saying you have to go into fourth jhana and this and that. He's talking about different activities in our life and looking with wise attention, with interest, with steady awareness, and seeing: How are we paying attention? What are we paying attention to? Is it increasing kalesa? Is it increasing wholesomeness?

Does that sound familiar at all from anything we've said? It's exactly, in some ways, what we would often quote from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: what you're paying attention to, see what's happening in the mind.

So in this sutta, the Buddha says there is an exhaustion of asavas in one who knows and sees, and not in one who does not know and see. Who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention. Yoniso manasikara is wise attention in Pali.

He says: when one attends unwisely, both unarisen asavas arise and arisen asavas increase. When one attends wisely, both unarisen kalesa do not arise and arisen kalesa are abandoned.

He goes through seven different ways of attending wisely. I'll describe each one as we go through it. You don't have to remember them all, but just see what lands in you as a way you can bring this into your life. This is about our life. This is about every single aspect of our life. There's nothing in our life that's outside of this. That's the main reason I want to talk about this.

As soon as you're thinking, "I can't be aware with this," or "I'll practice tomorrow," you're blowing it off. But everything in our life is included. All of us here—you wouldn't be here this month, you wouldn't have all been practicing as many years as you've been practicing, if you didn't really deeply believe or know in some way that your heart and mind can be much more free than it is, and that you care about that. So we have to remind ourselves that we care about it, again and again, because the other voices are so loud and so familiar. This is just another way of trying to plant that seed to help you remember.

I'm going to break this down because the Buddha talks at length about the first way of seeing wise attention. This is really, I think, the important thing. What dhammas—and in this usage, dhammas just means things that are arising—what dhammas are unfit for attention that one attends to? They are dhammas, or things that arise, such that when one attends to them, the unarisen taints of sense desire, being, and ignorance arise, or the arisen ones get stronger.

These are the dhammas that are unfit for attention. But the interesting point here, and this is really what we've been saying all along, it's not that those dhammas in themselves are the problem. It's the way we're paying attention to those things.

Something in itself may be neutral, beautiful, or difficult. It's not that the thing itself is unwise attention, but as we're focusing on it, as we're giving it attention, we can see whether the kilesas zoom up or not.

The example I think we've used here, and Sayadaw U Tejaniya would always use it: When somebody does something, says something, and it elicits anger in your mind or some other difficult emotion, you're aware of it. But if you keep looking at that person—you're sitting there being with anger and then you look at them again—what happens? The anger kind of squirts up. And so we keep looking, getting more and more anger. This is unwise attention. It's not that that person is an unwise object. It's the way we're paying attention.

Or say there's a sound that's unpleasant and it's really eliciting a lot of thought: "How can they do that? How can they make that sound? How can they mow the lawn when I'm trying to meditate?" Pick your own version. We can be sort of aware of the aversion, but the focus keeps being, "How can they do that? How can that sound be like this?" And the more attention is given to that object, the greater the aversion grows—even though we think we're with balanced awareness.

If the attention is just, "Okay, sound is like this," you all know what happens. With something strong going on in you—a story and all the stuff the mind does to try and avoid it—it's feeding it, feeding it, feeding it. But when you suddenly allow attention to just land on it and feel, "It feels like this," it may still be difficult, but you can see that with wise attention, the kilesas aren't growing, growing, growing. A sense of wisdom can come in. It's just like this.

This is something we can pay attention to all the time in our life—this kind of wise attention.

So I'm going to take that and then go back to get a sense of his very beginning description of what wise attention is and how we can use it in all three of these levels. The aim is to see, to realize when it seems like we're getting more lost in the kilesas—and not just the "what" but also: What can I do? "Oh no, I'm overwhelmed. Can I trust awareness?" We know we're with awareness, but still, it's going on.

You can just have a look and ask: What is the attention singling out here? What aspect of the experience is it singling out? As the kilesas are growing, growing, growing, try shifting to another aspect—from the thought to the feeling, from the thought to the sound, from whatever it is. Just try shifting the attention to something else and see. Stay and watch to see if it really starts to go down. We can use that.

We can use that with sīla too. I think it's a wonderful thing to mention sīla not just as "we should" or just as non-harming behavior with these five precepts that we're supposed to follow. That's not it. It's really seeing, looking deeply with wise attention at what the actions, the thoughts, the moods that lead to action—what's feeding kilesa, what's not.

What prompts non-harming behavior, or restraint from harming behavior? Consciously refraining from doing something unskillful is itself a wholesome motivation and a wholesome act. So instead of thinking, "Oh, I wanted to do this bad thing. I didn't do it, but I'm so bad because I wanted to do it"—which is just feeding more kilesa—instead notice: "Oh yes, I saw the potential to do it. I consciously refrained from doing it."

That's a wholesome motivation. And so with wise attention, you can bring the attention to that wholesomeness rather than spinning into the negativity, and see that the kilesa isn't being fed.

With sila, with a real commitment to noticing how we are in our life, how we act—it's a very profound aspect of our practice and of purifying our heart and mind, and it's always available to us.

I'd like to read a few things from teachers I appreciate, just to offer a sense of the depth and power of giving wise attention to our motivations, our speech and action, and the effect it has on ourselves and on the world.

From Mingyur Rinpoche: "Our behavior, how we relate to the world around us, even in very difficult situations, becomes the most reliable means of protecting our mind from anxiety and frustration." The most reliable means. Difficult situations, inner or outer.

And from Ajahn Sucitto, which I quite like, speaking about the five precepts: "It's not a superficial practice. The transcendent point is not what it looks like not to do these things—not following the precepts for appearances—but what they call forth, what it takes in our heart and mind to keep them, to follow them, and the effects that they have on your life."

So it's an ongoing, moment to moment, really deep attention and exploration. What does it call forth in our heart and mind not to tell a falsehood? Not to harm someone with our sexuality, or ourselves? Not to take some little thing that is not offered? It's not like, "Okay, I didn't do it" or "I did." It's really, really attending with wise attention, resting in what's arising, resting in awareness, truly exploring what comes up, how it feels to act in these wholesome ways, the effect it has on your mind, the effect it has on the world around you.

Again from Ajahn Sucitto: "Morality carries with it the strength of restraint, the empathy of concern for how one's actions affect oneself and others, and the clarity of discerning the difference between short-term happy feelings and long-term well-being."

I like that one a lot. Short-term happy feelings—"I'll just take this, no one will know"—versus long-term well-being. But you can break it down simply to what's feeding kilesa.

We always use this example: you're in a place like this retreat center and someone left their shampoo, and you think, "I could use their shampoo." Of course you could—no one's going to care, right? But just to notice it wasn't offered, and you put it down. What's the effect on the heart and mind? That wanting comes up, or that feeling bad, or that "I hope no one sees me" kind of thing. You put it down, you don't do it, and you're protected. The heart and mind is protected from the kilesa, and the wholesome is fed. It's such a little thing, but it's so uplifting. So purifying.

Notice in your mind when this becomes more and more normal and natural, when you hardly have to think about it. You can trust your heart and mind that you're not going to do these things. Some temptation might arise—you kind of look at it—but you have this freedom from fear that you're going to act in inappropriate ways. It's a wonderful feeling, because it's really strengthening the wholesome, really helping to abandon the greed and the aversion.

From the Buddha: "Wisdom is purified by sila, and sila is purified by wisdom. The combination is the highest thing in the world." That's from the Buddha, so you can't argue with that. And he says a wise person is known by their actions.

I think sila is such a beautiful practice—so rich, so subtle—and something we're faced with in so many moments of every day. We can't say there's no place to practice awareness, no place to remember awareness, no place to bring wise attention. Just seeing that.

Do you know what also protects and strengthens our commitment to non-harming behavior and awareness? Two wholesome qualities of mind, perhaps you've heard of them: hiri and ottappa. They're called the bright guardians of the world. According to the Abhidhamma, these two beautiful qualities are present in every wholesome state of mind. There are many beautiful qualities present, which perhaps I'll read tomorrow morning. But hiri and ottappa are present in every wholesome quality of mind. And ahirika and anottappa—the reverse—are present in the unwholesome qualities.

They had these not very onward-leading, rather Victorian translations: "moral shame" and "moral dread."

But that makes them sound really negative when they're actually beautiful qualities, guardians of the world.

You can think of hiri as conscience. It's more inward-looking, and it's like—well, maybe it's like disgust or fear, but really it's that it's painful to think of doing something harmful. It pains us. Conscience is probably a close connection. You think of doing something that causes harm, and you can almost feel pain in your heart, in your body. And when you do something harmful, the pain of that—because we keep paying attention. As the Buddha says, if you do something unskillful, do it with awareness. Don't turn off the awareness. Do it with awareness. And then the pain, the discomfort of that in oneself and others serves as a wake-up call. So hiri really protects us from our own potential for painful actions, helping to decondition the greed and the aversion.

Otapa is more outward-turning—like awareness, like fear, tuned into not wanting to elicit the painful results that would happen when you do something unskillful. You do something unskillful and people will not like you, or in a kinder way, you realize that you've hurt somebody, caused some pain. It's tuned outward, protecting us from causing pain to others with our actions, and to ourselves as well. And these are called the bright protectors of the world.

Ajahn Amaro was saying in one talk that when Ajahn Sumedho bought Amaravati and was building the new hall there, he had two statues put on each side from some statues he'd seen in Thailand. These aren't that common—I don't think I've actually ever seen one. But they're like deities, Hiri and Otapa, the two deities, the bright guardians of the world, one on each side going into the Dhamma hall. I love that.

Thinking about it, "moral shame, moral dread"—that doesn't do it, right? It just makes you feel bad. But thinking of these as beautiful qualities, or as Sayadaw U Pandita said, that living with sīla actualizes our sense of oneness with others—it really does. In actualizing a sense of oneness with others, it's also not feeding the sense of me, me, me. It's tuning into a sense that our actions affect one another. You can't do something in isolation.

So this is what I wanted to say about sīla, but really I'm encouraging us that this is a great and always available aspect of life to meet with awareness and wise attention. We can see what's feeding unwholesome states and what's starving them, what really brings up the sense of ease, of non-harming, of appreciating that, of a calm mind. Or as Andre read from that one sutta: for one who follows precepts, for one who follows sīla, there's no need for an act of will for freedom from remorse. It's just cause and effect.

So that's the first of the three—working with sīla for transgressive kilesas. The second one, obsessive kilesas—I don't think I need to talk about that since we've spent a month looking at how awareness and steady mindfulness with right attitude works with obsessive defilements. I don't have time to go into that.

So back to the latent ones, because I want to give you a glimpse of some of the other aspects of our life, how the Buddha talks about using wise attention with awareness—wisely considering, wisely reflecting—to serve to abandon the kilesas, abandon the āsavas.

The latent tendencies—I mean, you must have a sense of this. You feel like you're going along some days, quite aware, the mind is calm, you're not feeling wanting or aversion. And some little thing just happens, and out of nowhere, craving or aversion just springs up. Has that ever happened to anybody? It's like the "out of nowhere" bit, though—you're walking along, and someone told me once they were on retreat at their retreat center, and they were walking past the tea table. They were like, "These apples, I don't want them. I'm fine." They really thought they didn't want them. And as they walked past, their arm went out and took an apple and walked behind. Who did that? Greed did that. Greed was driving the bus at that moment.

So that's a little thing. But these tendencies can just spring up in unexpected moments. And that's a funny example. There are some not-so-funny examples.

There's a lot of not-so-funny examples. She must have had one recently. I, of course, haven't. I can only use other people's experiences because I can't think of one.

But there's one I always use because it's actually extremely poignant to me. I heard on the radio a few years ago—came in in the middle of some interview on public radio. I didn't know who the interviewer was or who they were interviewing, but it was clearly an interview with young men who were in prison for serious crimes, in prison for years. I want to guess murder, but I don't know—serious crimes. And the young man was saying, "You know, sitting here, I wish so much that I had back those three to five seconds"—when the urge to do whatever he did just came up and he acted on it. Three to five seconds.

I can relate to that, right? You're just going along and something happens and this aversion springs up. Luckily, I think we must have enough awareness that it wouldn't move to physical harm. But plenty of times you're just minding your own business and some little thing happens and—how can they do that? Just read the news. Just so strong. And it can die away really quickly too with awareness. It doesn't have to go on and on and on and take over.

But just to get a sense of what he means by these latent torments, and not to be discouraged, but just to know it's possible to meet them with awareness—and to then also pay attention, give more awareness to how we're paying attention to experience.

So I'll just go through these other five ones that the Buddha mentions, because they might not be what you'd expect.

The first one is how asavas can be abandoned by restraining. Restraint at the sense doors. And all of these he says, "Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely..." He says that for each of them. "Reflecting wisely, abides with the eye faculty restrained. While asavas and fever of defilement might arise in one who abides with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no asavas or fever of defilement in him when he abides with the eye faculty restrained"—or all of the faculties restrained.

This doesn't mean tight, never looking around. One time years ago—I guess it was a three-month retreat—someone who was on staff was sitting for three days. He said he wanted to really restrain at the eye door. So he walked around blindfolded for three days. That's not what we're talking about.

And again, this is reflecting wisely. So we're noticing, whether it's the eye or the ear or thinking, when it's unrestrained, when it's just flowing out. We go outside and we're walking, and you can see the difference. It's not like, "God forbid I should look around"—it's not that. But we're walking and, "Oh, the chipmunks! Oh, the birds! What kind of bird? Where can I go see that?" And you're going here and you're going there. Then you think, "Someone told me they saw a bobcat the other day..." All of this coming from a seeing or a hearing and thinking, and not noticing it, not with wise attention. The attention is on how interesting that would be. It's on the gratification from the pleasant, rather than on noticing that through that seeing without wise attention, greed is growing, growing, growing, growing.

So restraint at the sense doors is just seeing, being right here with it. That old quotation from Ajahn Chah: when we hear a sound, the sound doesn't bother us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound. And that's it.

Clearly, restraint—it's not like there's some rule of how restrained you should be. But reflecting wisely, with wise attention, we notice what's feeding the kilesas. Aversion does the same thing. You get caught up in, "How could that person do that? When I get home, I'm going to say this..." And we're in the thought.

And sometimes it's out of our control. Even with wise attention, of course, the papañca has taken over. And when we recognize it, then with awareness, we can land again in something concrete here.

But other times, it's not that it's taken over, but the sense door is just a bit unrestrained. So there's that thought that came up, that memory that could just be met with wise attention. It's unpleasant. But no, it's unrestrained. So the attention to the unpleasant aspect gets stronger, stronger, stronger. The unwise attention is paying attention to what's wrong, what that person did wrong, what I don't like. And it balloons. Or the same—you pay attention to that lunch the other day. It tasted so good. Unwise attention to the gratification of the pleasant is an interesting place. This is so nice. How can I get it again? It's not like it's evil. But if you notice that, yes, just a little bit of craving grows and grows and grows.

So this is a good place for awareness to let us explore wise attention in terms of gratification, in terms of the reverse of gratification. We really grasp at something. So, clear awareness. And the restraint—it can go into our life too. Just paying attention, as Thich Nhat Hanh would say, we don't have to leave all our doors and windows open all the time in our life and just let everything come in, everything come in.

And we can look at this with our receptive awareness and right attitude. So this isn't about saying you're bad or wrong or something. I should never watch television because it's bad and adharmic or something like that. It's not that at all. It's bringing wise attention to what we do. So if you're watching TV or reading a book with attention, just noticing what's being fed in the mind. You could watch something on TV that's quite inspiring and it's uplifting. You can watch plenty of stuff that isn't quite inspiring. It might just be flat and bored and you're tired and it's helping you relax, but it's not really increasing kilesa. You could notice that.

Or you can notice—I've noticed more now when I turn something on, like eight out of ten times, I don't make it past five minutes. And it used to be, I thought, Oh, this is bad, but it's just five minutes. After five minutes, the mind is just not happy. It's like a little bit, These people, they're so nasty. What do I want to watch that for? And I just turn it off. But it's different from a judgment. I can watch something that's really stupid that I'd be embarrassed to tell people I watched. But it's not feeding a lot of greed or it's not feeding a lot of aversion in the mind. So we pay attention to that. But we don't just let everything come in, no matter what. So we each will find our own way in our life, in the way that we live. Restraint at the sense doors.

Once at the end of a three-month retreat in integration and asking questions, I was with Joseph and someone was saying, you know, they found after a retreat they go home and they'd go to a dinner party. They remember this, and they just felt they didn't really enjoy it—the conversations were kind of meaningless. What could they do? How could they not feel like that? And then we both said something. And then I thought, and I finally just said it, though I didn't know if it was really what I should say: "Well, one thing is you could quit going to dinner parties." And Joseph said, "Yeah, actually, really." Not that they're bad, but you're paying attention and you're seeing the sense doors are unrestrained and it's just feeding negativity. It's feeding kilesa.

So it's not a judgment on the thing. Again, as with wise and unwise attention, it's our commitment to our own heart and mind—to see what's feeding kilesa and what's starving it. Because we care about ourselves, we care about awakening, and we care about the world. So it's not a beating yourself up thing. It's out of love. It's out of compassion.

Okay, the next one is āsavas abandoned by using. "Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely uses their robe only for protection from cold, for protection from heat, for protection from contact with gadflies, flies, wind, burning, creeping things, and for the purpose of concealing what disturbs conscience."

You get the drift. I like this—it's reflecting wisely. It's the attitude with which we use things. I love it that he puts that in there. Are we using something like food? Great, we need to eat. It's fine to appreciate it. But are we using food for emotional comfort? Again, this isn't intellectual. It's paying attention in yourself. Am I using food, you know, when something's really good and you taste it, you eat it, it feels fine? And then we're using it more to feed wanting, to feed wanting. If you're aware of how you're feeling, your stomach's really saying, "I've had enough now." But we keep on going, keep on going, using it just to feed pleasant feeling.

We're saving stuff for later. I remember on retreats, over at the retreat center, sometimes I'd want to save a little bit of food for if I was hungry at two in the morning—which never happened. But if I was hungry at two in the morning, I would have this little bit of food. There used to be all these shelves and all these rotting little things of food. And how much extra trouble it is, like with that mug I talked about. Save the food and put it there. Do I want it or do I not want it, or should I eat it? And then there's more food. There's always more food here. You're not going to starve. And then it's all piling up, and then it's embarrassing, and you don't want to clean it out because yogis are watching you. And it goes on and on.

The attitude with which we use things—take what you need. Again, this isn't like an ideal in the mind. It's just really noticing. It's so peaceful. It's so liberating. Life is just so much less burdensome. You take what you want and you put it down. You're done. With food, with clothes, with whatever. Not being too much of a strain on the planet. Just using how much water we need. Just, you know, whatever we can do—again, actualizing our oneness with others. But this is with wise attention. Paying attention to how we're using things. Is it feeding greed? Is it feeding shame? Is it feeding kilesa? Or is it that sense of ease where you can put it down?

I remember the very first three-month retreat I sat. I was new to the whole thing, and you project all kinds of stuff. There was enough food, but in those days there wasn't a lot of extra. I think we had cheese like three times in three months or something. People paid six dollars a day to sit there at that time, so the budget was a little less. Anyway, there was enough food, but I remember I would always be there in time in case something ran out.

There was this one guy who I totally projected onto. I don't even know who he was. He would come in twenty minutes late, twenty-five minutes late to lunch, cruising in, carrying his offal food. And I would think, he must be enlightened. He must be so enlightened that he can come in late, and the food's gone, and he's just mellow about it. I had no idea what was going on in his mind. I didn't even know who he was.

And a long time later, years and years later, in the middle of a three-month course, I just noticed I had stopped caring. I was coming in really late, and I would just take whatever was there, and if something was gone, it was gone, and I really didn't care. It wasn't any big deal. It's so relieving. It's so simple and easy. You take what you need. You don't have to feed the wanting. Just noticing this, the attitude with which we use things—I like that a lot.

The next one is what I would call actually patience, although it's translated here as enduring or tolerating. "What āsavas can be abandoned by patience?" Here a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with gadflies, flies, wind, burning and creeping things. Remember, they're out in the woods—there really are burning and creeping things. He endures ill-spoken, unwelcome words, and arisen bodily feelings that are painful, racking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life.

We're talking some serious patience here. But the Buddha's not saying patience like, "whatever." It's the attitude in the mind, the wise attention that can help not feed the kilesas. That's what it's about—really seeing that it's possible, not always, but to meet this experience. Many people have said there's this receptive awareness that's just receiving an unpleasant. Mostly we don't have to be patient with pleasant, but when there's receiving an unpleasant, as of the awareness, you get that sense of equanimity, of non-reactivity. That's the quality that's feeding the wholesome and starving the kilesas.

We can't force patience, but we can incline the attention in that direction. Like what I said from Ajahn Sumedho about sweating through his robes and thinking, "I can't bear it, I can't bear it." Have you ever had a moment when you felt like that? And if I keep the awareness on "I can't bear it, I can't bear it," what keeps getting stronger? "I can't bear it. I really can't. This is unbearable."

But when I just drop the attention—seeing with wise attention, reflecting wisely, that's just feeding it, feeding the aversion—drop the attention back into sweating, hot. It's like this. It's like this. That's the patience. That just shifts into wise attention. In that moment, it allows—not always, but often—the kilesas to just dissipate, to be abandoned.

But it's possible then. But with all kinds of things, with words—when people say something to you that's rude, how hard is that to really be patient with? It's really interesting to explore all the different places in our life.

When I was a nun in Thailand—and that's a long time ago—I stayed in a kuti in a forest monastery. I really just liked to be private and quiet, but you're the falang nun, you know, the foreign nun. And in a lot of the meditation centers in the woods, they're like parks. People come, lay people come. This was up north. Lay people come to spend the day, have a picnic. It's in beautiful spots in the woods.

And so I'd be walking and they'd come up in your face and take a picture. I mean, you can't overtly be rude, at least, right? But they'd come up in your face and take a picture. I'd be in my kuti—like a screen door—and they'd come up and be staring in the screen door. "Oh look, the farang nun is meditating," you know, stuff like that. Definitely aversion would arise. Definitely.

I could put up a cloth so they couldn't see into the window. But it's like, okay—patience. Patience. If I focus on "how can I stop that," it just grows. If I focus on "I don't like it," it just grows. It's like, okay. It's like this now. Unpleasant. It's over in a second. They take a picture and it's gone. I stew on it for half an hour. I mean, who's causing the problem here?

So patience. The Buddha said in the Greater Discourse to Rāhula, his son: "Rāhula, develop meditation that is like the earth. For when you develop a mind like the earth, arising agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Just as people throw clean things and dirty things—excrement, urine, spittle, and blood—on the earth, and the earth is not horrified, humiliated, or disgusted because of that, so develop a mind, a heart like the earth."

Then he goes through all the different elements. But that's just a way to think. It's just, okay, this horrible thing was said to me. It's like this now. Tuning into the quality in the mind with wise attention, reflecting wisely.

The next one—and you might be surprised—is avoiding things. The Buddha is not saying every horrible thing, you have to go right to it. Here, a bhikkhu reflecting wisely avoids a savage elephant, a savage horse, a savage bull, a savage dog. Okay, we don't have that here. A snake, a stump, a bramble, a chasm, a cliff, a cesspit, a sewer—we can avoid all of that. Reflecting wisely, they avoid wandering to unsuitable places. Reflecting wisely, avoid frequenting bad friends, unwholesome friends. Reflecting wisely—so that wise companions. "So while taints and fever of defilement might arise in one who did not avoid these things, there are no taints and fever of defilement in one who avoids them."

I think this is a really important one too, because sometimes we have that sense that to be really mindful means you can just be with everything, and you should just be able to be with everything. And he's saying, no, you don't have to be with everything. And again, it's with wise attention.

wise friends, not avoiding good friendships. It's not like you're judging them. You're noticing what happens, what's fed in your mind and heart. It's always about what's going on in the mind and heart. They may be lovely people, and the more you hang out with them, the more you get into greed, the less you want to pay attention to your mind, the more you just get into some papañca, useless chatter. And you're paying attention and you're feeling not so wholesome, not so good. And it's not about putting them down—it could be a lot worse. Of course, it could be a lot worse. But just to say it's not about judging them. Like the dinner party example: lovely people, but it's just not supporting what's important to my heart and mind. So we see that.

Sometimes avoiding may have a little tremor of loss. It's a choice we're making from wise attention not to feed kilesa. But also, it's practical. It's not idealistic. We don't come here to have a retreat to try and understand wise attention with TVs up here like they do in the airport, saying you should be able to be really present no matter what's going on. We have it in silence. When you're having a bad hindrance day—you're just lost in hindrances—and someone else comes up and talks to you, it's not a good scene, is it? One time many years ago, I was on a retreat with my partner, who was also on the retreat, a long retreat, and we happened to run into each other and started talking. We were both in a really ratty hindrance state of mind, and it was such a bad idea that we talked to each other. The hindrances—forget it, you know?

So we avoid. We don't have to let go to the most difficult thing. We're not trying to do this in Times Square. If you're in Times Square and you can't get away, then we use wise attention: what feeds and what starves, how can we cultivate patience, how can we have restraint at the sense doors—there's all these different things. But it's not expecting that if I really could practice, I could be with anything. No. Avoid what's dangerous. Avoid what's completely unnecessary. Avoid what feeds in you getting more and more into greed and aversion and me, me, me.

Okay, we're getting there. The next one is removing. Avoiding would be more like when I put the cloth up so the Thai people couldn't see in—I was avoiding that. Removing is a little bit more tricky because it's talking about not feeding certain mental states. "Reflecting wisely, one does not endure, does not feed an arisen thought affected by sense desire, by ill will, by cruelty. One abandons it. Does not endure arisen unwholesome, unskillful states."

Now, we can only hear that with the wisdom from receptive awareness that it's not a judgment—that there are times we all know when we don't have the choice. We totally know that. And he's not talking about that. But he's talking about something that's really interesting to explore with our wise attention: there are times, more than we might realize, when we can actually choose what thoughts to follow and what thoughts not to follow. More than we might realize. And this isn't a choice out of aversion—"I don't like this, I don't like this"—but really seeing with sati-paññā, with wisdom and receptive awareness: I don't have to go down that road. I can go here.

There are times we don't have that choice, and the steady awareness helps us learn how these kilesas work. We all know that. But this is from that sutta where the Buddha was walking and he's really seeing when he had thoughts of greed, thoughts of aversion, thoughts of cruelty. It was for his own suffering, for the suffering of others, and there was nothing useful about it. And then he resolved not to follow those thoughts, to abandon those thoughts. But when thoughts came up of compassion, of kindness, of non-ill will, of generosity, he looked and he said, "I can see no harm that can come from those thoughts. Even if I thought them for a day and a night, there could be no harm, except perhaps the mind and body would be tired out, so that I would rest." It's so practical.

So this is something to think about: not getting into judging when we're caught in this stuff, but recognizing the potential with wise attention that more often than we might think, you can make the choice.

Now there's one more thing. I'll give you an example—I think I've used this in some groups. A few years ago, I was sitting, not on retreat, just at home. And something triggered a pattern of self-judgment, which I have been looking at for fifty years. I know all about it. It's coming up.

So I'm being mindful. There's this thought. There's this feeling. I wasn't reacting. Just noticing, noticing, noticing.

And the thought came up: I don't need to explore this. I've been down this rabbit hole ten million times. Let me change the channel to metta.

It was just like that—just a kind of exploring. So I simply substituted metta thoughts. "May I be free from danger. May I be happy and peaceful." I just said the four phrases, just like that, without trying to feel metta, and without aversion or running away. Just changing the channel.

By the second repetition, the mind and heart actually shifted—that quality, that mental state of metta, arose, and the other was gone.

I thought that was really a huge learning for me, because it wasn't aversion. I could have been just as mindful of the self-judgment, but why? We can actually consciously cultivate the wholesome with wise attention.

And this, I think, is a really huge thing for us to learn—very different from "I've got to be with it to the bitter end for the one hundred fifty-eight million billionth time." No. Be happy. May all beings be happy. Maybe just come back to mindfulness of something else.

I'm using that tone of voice because it's really like that. It isn't a reaction.

So start to look and see with wise attention. With wise attention, we can consciously cultivate the wholesome, consciously starve the unwholesome.

Okay, that's enough. You get the drift. But do it. Do it. This is what our life's about. And it doesn't lead to more suffering. And it doesn't lead to being shut off from people. I gave the example about unwise friends, but it doesn't mean we're cutting off friendships. It just means we're meeting the world with more wholesomeness and less reactivity—because we're meeting ourselves that way too.

And every moment's a chance to explore.

So thank you.

CHAPTER 198

Mundane and Supermundane Right View

In this talk from Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of sammādiṭṭhi (right view), distinguishing between its mundane and supermundane aspects as described in the suttas. She begins by establishing the foundation of receptive awareness practice—that steady, flowing quality of attention where whatever arises becomes simply an object that reintroduces awareness, whether pleasant or unpleasant, mundane or profound.

Wilson explains how supermundane right view emerges naturally through sustained awareness practice: the direct, experiential recognition that all phenomena are arising and passing, empty of lasting self-existence, equally doorways to awareness. She describes those moments when the heart-mind is free from clinging and aversion—not through force, but through the simple non-creation of confusion in that moment of clear seeing. Drawing on Bhikkhu Bodhi's translations, she contrasts this with mundane right view: the understanding of kamma, that actions have causes and results, and the recognition of how wholesome actions of body, speech, and mind bring happiness while unwholesome ones bring suffering.

Practically, Wilson addresses a common confusion in practice: when to simply rest with what's arising versus when to skillfully redirect attention. The key, she emphasizes, is taking care of awareness itself—not making things the way we want them. She reminds practitioners that mundane right view, far from being secondary, is essential groundwork that allows wisdom to arise. When the heart-mind is not clouded by wanting and aversion, the shift of perception that recognizes freedom becomes possible.

When we first begin with this style of practice, when one first begins and we're all trying to get the felt sense, the trusted sense of steady, receptive awareness—which includes not holding on, as we've said ten million times—it takes a while to start to feel the flow of it, to trust it, and to really get a sense of what is meant by awareness with right view.

Right view is a huge topic, but by now I know that everyone we're speaking to has, at times, really experienced—not intellectually, but intuitively, experientially—that sense of the mode of receptive awareness. When you can say it's flowing, it's steady, and whatever's arising, as Mingyur Rinpoche said, is simply an object that reintroduces awareness. Whether it's something beautiful or something difficult, whether it's mundane, whether it's clinging or aversion or love—whatever's arising, there's this sense of "it's all here." That flowing awareness with right view, you really can at times get a sense of how that could move toward a taste of freedom, really.

People have said that when something difficult comes up, a pattern, they can feel it's coming. It still feels difficult, but there's that little shift you can't really describe to someone else—into the awareness with it, not of it, but with it, rather than in it, fighting it or trying to figure it out. Like, "Oh, it's still happening, but it isn't suffering in the same way. It's still unpleasant, but isn't suffering."

Different people have said this in different ways. And when it's like that—which it isn't always—you don't have to think about it, but that is really almost supermundane right view. The right view that it's all coming and going, whatever it is. Whatever it is introduces us to the nature of Dhamma, the nature of life. There's nothing to be preferred. There's nothing to be shut out. And everything comes and vanishes.

It really starts to highlight or give us more of a felt sense of the emptiness side of things—empty of its own lasting self-existence. When the awareness is steady, everything's arising due to causes and conditions. Some of them we don't see because they can stretch way back, but we can see that coming together, we can see whatever's happening coming together, doing its number, falling apart, the next thing going, going, going. The more we are trusting and resting with this receptive, steady awareness, the more this just soaks in. Not thinking about it, but it soaks in. It gets a little harder to take everything so solidly and everything so personally.

And then, at some point, it isn't so hard because everything's changing, and we're resting in receptive awareness. As we all know, sometimes whatever's occurring—not that it's pleasant or unpleasant—overwhelms the awareness. In the beginning, with instructions, I know it's confusing when we try to give the sense of receptive awareness with whatever's happening, but also teach that if it's too much, you can use skillful means to redirect the attention, to take care of the awareness.

Often in the beginning—because that's what we know, though not only in the beginning—the mind takes it that when aversion or clinging comes, it's bad and we need to redirect the awareness. Or when something unpleasant comes, we think, "Oh, it's overwhelming the awareness, I need to move it." But it isn't overwhelming the awareness—it's just that we don't like it. Or we have the idea that the kilesas should not be occurring. That's a view we have. It takes long conscious awareness before we really understand experientially that aversion can come up and be known and felt, and it passes, and it doesn't matter.

Awareness doesn't care if it's aversion or bliss. I care. I want bliss. I don't want aversion. And everything's locked into place. Awareness doesn't care. And that's the turning in the direction of freedom. It doesn't care, but it's present.

So in the beginning, it's confusing for all of us. We don't know: when should I redirect the attention? What should I do? This is coming up. I can't be with it. But mostly we can be with it. Not very frequently do we truly need to redirect.

I remember a long time ago, I heard a talk by Ajahn Sumedho about practicing in Thailand, in a kuti. Those kutis have tin roofs. If you've ever been in one in the hot season with the sun beating down—I have—you want to die. They are so hot. And he said he'd have three robes on, these really heavy robes. And he said, "I'd be sitting, sweating through my robes, thinking, 'I can't bear this another minute.' And then I'd find that I could."

That's what it's like.

That's just another minute. "I'll bear this another minute." Okay, it's like this.

So it's definitely confusing. But as we come to trust receptive awareness with right view, and more and more see that whatever our skillful means might be, the motivation is taking care of the awareness—not making things the way we want, but taking care of the awareness.

When something difficult arises, or it could be something wonderful, but it comes up and it's so strong that it has overwhelmed the awareness, basically you've lost connection with awareness. It's not like, "This is just strong and hard to be with." It's overwhelmed. And you all know what I mean by now. At that time, that's when the right view is really to take care of the awareness. That's when we consciously have the intention to redirect the attention to something just neutral and easy to be with. Because what we're doing is refreshing, rediscovering, refueling into that quality of awareness. And that's what we're taking care of.

When we talk about right view, there are these two modes. One is: anything coming and going is all equally empty, equally just what it is in the moment, equally a doorway to awareness. On the other hand, really through the steady awareness, we come to understand what brings confusion and suffering on our regular mundane level. The steady awareness helps to see that.

That gets less confusing as we go along. As we understand experientially how the awareness is, then we understand that we can, with it, really see: How does greed get so strong that it completely takes me over? What experiences—not asking yourself, but watching—what experiences increase greed to the point that it's taking over? Or aversion, or fear, or whatever? Not that it's bad that it's there, but to the point of taking over.

I wanted to say a little about right view in the way it's talked about in the suttas. This is a vast topic, and I'm condensing it to five minutes. Using Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation, the Buddha talks about mundane and supramundane right view. I feel like we're working in those two sides of the coin—you can say two realms, but really two sides of understanding—back and forth all the time.

When it's flowing, when everything is just coming and going, it's approaching that quality of right view, that sense of a shift of perception that recognizes things in a different way and frees the heart and mind from confusion, sense of separation, and clinging in that moment. Supramundane.

And then when we're either caught in stuff or really watching and seeing that if I keep doing this it leads to more greed, and can consciously shift—we feel like that's a doing. That's different from just whatever's happening, whatever's happening doesn't matter. But then seeing where it does matter and making a conscious shift, a conscious choice—this is what you could call mundane right view.

I want to share what the Buddha says about them, but first I'll read this from His Holiness, talking about nirvana and regular life:

"To find happiness, it is indispensable to have a correct view of the nature of mind and the world. Someone who has the wrong view about nature cannot follow the path of transforming a habit to realize liberation. What is meant by right view is not faith or believing in any particular dogma, but a clear understanding that is reached through thoroughly examining reality."

That's what steady awareness makes possible—thoroughly examining reality moment to moment.

"This kind of examination will refute the belief in the independent existence of things, which is the root of our distorted vision of the world, and replace it with right view."

This also implies, in Tibetan language, a recognition that the nature of freedom is the essence of our own mind—pure, without confusion. But it also involves identifying the factors that keep us from perceiving that nature, so that it becomes possible for them to be abandoned, for us not to feed them.

That's a way of talking about mundane and supramundane right view. It's huge, but when the Buddha talked about mundane right view, he was talking about knowing the Four Noble Truths—not just intellectually, but in our hearts. It's not completely transformative, but that way of looking at the world is very important. He said if it really came down to one thing, you could say it's the understanding of kamma: not all the complications of it, but the understanding that actions have causes and results. And not understanding that, he says, is what keeps us really bound in actions that cause suffering.

This calls on us to see what Joseph describes as the big picture of mundane right view. It's learning to see what qualities in the mind, what qualities in the heart bring us suffering, and how our wholesome actions of body, speech, and mind—even though they're still rooted in the realm of desire, even though they're not coming from freedom—really have the effect of bringing us happiness in this world.

The Buddha says this is a very important aspect. He's not saying, "Oh, that's second class." He says it matters how we live in the world in a way that brings ourselves and other beings happiness, ease, love, compassion. How to live in the world without actions of speech, body, and mind that cause more confusion and suffering for ourselves and others. This is mundane right view, but it's very, very important. And it's actually what makes it possible for the awareness, the wisdom, to arise to actually see—more clearly. Supermundane right view—the shift of perception that allows for the understanding of freedom—is only possible when the heart-mind is not clouded by wanting, aversion, or the contraction of self.

So working with this mundane right view, the real sense that actions have effects, have results, that it affects me, it affects others, that nothing is outside of that—this is really, really key.

And in fact, when the Buddha went on to list very mundanely, you could say, the ten right actions—this is under right view, under his description of sammā diṭṭhi—he's talking about the level of action, which I think you know. I'll just read them quickly to see how obvious but important it is. These aren't rules where if you don't follow them you're bad. These are things to pay attention to, because paying attention with awareness to the causes and conditions that lead to wholesome actions and their effects, and the causes and conditions that lead us to unwholesome actions and their effects—this is the information, as the Dalai Lama said, that allows for the habits to transform. So it's not a secondary thing.

You know the unwholesome actions; the wholesome ones are just the reverse. The first are bodily actions, basically the precepts: destroying life, taking what is not given, wrong conduct in regard to sense pleasures—essentially greed and sexuality, but wrong conduct. It's not saying brahmacharya, it's not saying celibacy, it's saying not hurting people or yourself.

Three bodily actions, and then four verbal actions that cause suffering if we don't see the greed or the aversion that's giving rise to them: lying, false speech. And it's interesting because he says somewhere in the suttas that a person who will deliberately tell a lie is capable of doing anything. He really has very strong things about truthfulness. Then slander, harsh speech, and idle chatter. So speech is a big one. And maybe if some of you practiced a little with speaking yesterday, maybe you saw—you already knew how powerful it is, how quickly it gets into the mind, how quickly we may lose awareness of the subtle level of this intentionality.

And then three mental actions: covetousness—he's not just saying greed, he's saying covetousness, when you want something that belongs to somebody else. Check it out, how unpleasant that is. Then ill will and wrong views. So wrong views is basically major suffering. But then you flip those to not doing those, and that's right view.

I say this not so you have to remember it all, but to see how he's saying wholesome action is at the heart of right view. Mundane right view, really given attention and care—which our steady awareness allows us to see—understanding comes naturally through steady awareness. We know that. And this is part of the path to awakening. It's not something lesser.

In terms of supermundane right view, to use Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation: I know I always think of it this way. What's really supported me so much in my years of practice is the understanding, the trust, that mind is arising and passing moment to moment. To think of something that arises and has to stay like that—then there's no way we can... we think, how can I have a mind that never has any kilesa coming up? It's impossible! And we think way down in the future.

But as we've both talked about, and in groups, just in that moment when being with something, when that shift to awareness with wisdom comes in, the clinging, the aversion, the me-ing about something is gone. It's gone. Really gone. And awareness is still there. And there's just that sense of coolness, of freedom, of ease, of however it is for you.

That shift of perception takes the solidity, the perception of solidity, the perception of me, the perception of problem, the perception of lasting—and it just evaporates in that moment. Nothing goes away. It just stops being created. And in that moment, just that potential for a moment, we all can experience that. Can't hold on to it. Can't hold on to anything. But just recognizing gives a sense of the peace, or the coolness, or whatever word works for you, of the heart and mind free from that sense of self-clinging, aversion, me and other. You're not saying all that stuff. It just isn't being created in that moment.

The perception of the shift, the fundamental shift of how we recognize and respond to moment-to-moment experience. I think Andrea said in her talk last night this one particular phrase: things as they have come to be in this moment. It's just, back to Sayadaw: it's just like this. But with this, that's what is really allowing for the non-creation in this moment of the torments, of the confusions.

Not that we have to chop them away with an axe, but in the moment of seeing clearly, receiving as it is, they're not created. They're not born. Always that potential is available.

And so in a way, that's kind of how I feel about awareness practice as we're doing it here, which is just a form of practice. There are times when that sense of the heart-mind can be free—not even thinking of heart-mind. It's just that the experience is so clear and crisp and bright, whatever it is. And we don't have to do anything. It's so clear we don't have to do anything. Anything we do just mucks it up.

But then at another time, it's all confusing. There is a sense of personal effort—a little bit—not to change anything, but to look at what's happening there. There's awareness here. What will help refresh the awareness? How can I take care of the awareness? So there's a little bit of seeing and doing, with some intellectual wisdom that comes from past experience. That's useful—the first level of wisdom, what we've heard. The middle level is what we think about it, what we've learned.

So sometimes when we're feeling all confused, we can call on that. What's going on? Awareness—I can't feel it. What would help refresh the awareness? Not "how do I get rid of this?" No, no. What would help refresh the awareness? That's right. You remember: oh, just feeling my hands, being with hearing. "Oh, it doesn't feel good." It doesn't matter. I'm aware, aware, aware. And we start to trust that more and more and more.

So there's really nothing to do, but occasionally there's a little something to do. And finding these two, I think, kind of correlates with the two aspects of right view in a very simplistic way.

That's just what I wanted to share today.

May the beneficial energies generated from our sincere practice together be shared with all beings as a support for their freedom from confusion.

Just now. Keep going. Nothing else to do but be aware.

I just remember this story Joseph told us last night. Years and years ago at a Yucca Valley retreat, there was a lovely monk from Sri Lanka who collapsed during a talk—he had a little heart attack. He was okay afterward, so they had the emergency people come, and they were asking him questions to see if he was alright. They said, "Do you know what day it is?" And Joseph said, "No one here knows what day it is."

So we're in good company.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 199

Some Benefits of Continuity of Awareness

Carol Wilson · 50 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines why continuity of mindfulness is the essential condition for liberating wisdom (paññā) to arise. She begins by clarifying that the Pāli term citta encompasses all mental experience—both thoughts and emotions—before exploring the Buddha's teaching that Nibbāna is directly visible when the mind is free from greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). When these kilesas color our perception, we cannot see our own good, the good of others, or the good of both.

Wilson draws on Thanissaro Bhikkhu's insight that saṃsāra is not a place but a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and moving into them. She explains how perception (saññā), which arises with every sense contact, becomes distorted by the kilesas and leads to papañca (mental proliferation). Using vivid examples, including a memorable story about a meditator who blamed creaking floors on another person only to discover she was causing the sound herself, Wilson demonstrates how accurate perception instantly dissolves suffering that was never truly grounded in reality.

The talk addresses the three perversions of perception (vipallāsas)—seeing permanence in the impermanent, satisfaction in the unsatisfactory, and self in what is not-self. Wilson emphasizes that insight doesn't change reality but reveals what has always been so. Quoting Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she encourages practitioners to notice kilesas when they're at a 'two' rather than waiting until they reach an 'eight,' and reminds us that with steady mindfulness, we need not fear anything that arises in the mind.

So tonight I wanted to offer just a few thoughts on why the steadiness of mindfulness, why the continuity, is actually the key piece—the condition that allows for liberating wisdom, paññā, to arise in the citta.

By the way, someone asked today in a group, what's the difference between heart and mind? I think I'll just clarify so I don't have to keep saying heart-mind. In Pali, the word citta is translated as all mental experience—thoughts, emotions, all of that. Sometimes here in the West we've had to make that distinction. We kind of think about the mind as thinking and the heart as emotions. And so a lot of times we have gotten in the habit of saying heart-mind to convey that it's all connected. So I feel like just saying citta instead of heart-mind. That's what I mean by it. It's all the mental activities.

So I wanted to talk about why the steadiness of mindfulness is really the key condition that allows for liberating wisdom, for paññā, to arise. There are so many different ways I could talk about this.

To begin with, starting from the top, there's this quotation from the Buddha. At one point someone came to him and asked, "In what way is Nibbana directly visible here and now?" He gave a long answer about how it is directly visible, inviting one to come and see for oneself, to be personally experienced by the wise. He says when lust, when greed is abandoned in the mind, when hatred is abandoned—there's a paragraph for each of them—when delusion is not arising in the mind, in each of those cases, Nibbana is directly visible.

When the mind is obsessed or overwhelmed by—or really in our case, when it is just colored by—greed and we don't recognize it, or by aversion, or by delusion, which those three come together in what's called the three defilements or kilesas or poisons of the mind, when they're present in the citta, in the mind stream, and we're not aware of it, Nibbana is not available. That's really the deepest suffering that comes from these qualities.

He says when any of those are present, you can't see clearly, you can't see your own good, you can't see the good of another, and you can't see the good of both. A lot of times people say, what's wrong with clinging when you're just having a pleasant feeling about something? You're not hurting anything, and it's in the moment, and it feels pleasant, and it is onward leading to have more pleasure, and that becomes the habit. But when clinging is in the mind and not known, we can't see our own good, we can't see the good of another, we can't see the good of both.

These are habits of mind—greed, hatred, confusion. The absence of them, cultivating moment-to-moment mindfulness, can also become a habit of mind. But these so-called poisons or kilesas, they're not inevitable. They come and go like everything else. And so the quality of clear seeing moment by moment by moment, the steadiness of that attention, is what allows for the wisdom to arise to actually see how this is working, how we get lost, how we can come out of getting lost. It's not theoretical, it's not like something I said or you heard me say.

The steady awareness—why it's so important—is that the awareness is receiving whatever happens, not picking and choosing. "This is bad, so let's pretend it's not happening. This feels good, so let's go there." We know how to do that. We've practiced that twenty-four-seven since we were born. But we really want to learn how the steadiness of awareness without selecting what's worth being aware of is how we can actually learn in this way how these states affect our mind.

Thich Nhat Hanh said, along with everyone else, all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience or true knowledge. That's exactly what we're doing here—direct experience. But until we start getting familiar with what awareness is, what mindfulness is, we don't even know what direct experience is. We feel like we're some steady-state being, but it's really some concoction coming together and falling apart, coming together and falling apart, and we call it "me," and it's changing all the time. And we don't even know it.

This is one of my favorite quotations from Thanissaro Bhikkhu, about how we get so confused, how we're living in the world so confused. Samsara—you know the word samsara—it literally means wandering on. Many people think of samsara as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live. We're in samsara, we're suffering in samsara. The place we leave when we go to Nibbana. That's what a lot of people think. But in the early Buddhist texts, which he's a scholar of, samsara is the answer not to "where are we?" but to "what are we doing?" It's not a place, it's a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart, your mind creates another one and you go there.

Can you relate at all? At the same time, you bump into other people, all of whom are creating their own worlds too. And we wonder why we can't communicate so well. This isn't like an exaggeration or something. He's really describing what we think our life is without direct experience. We're just kind of lost in these worlds, lost in these worlds. And it is just going on from one to the next to the next to the next. We keep trying to make it a little bit better, right? We get this world a little bit better, not really seeing that it's still going to come apart too when we don't see clearly.

Ajahn Sumedho—he's an American man, most of you probably know who he is—anyway, he's ninety-something now, still giving dharma talks. It's amazing. He says a similar thing: "Samsara and nibbana are not places to go, but modes of perception."

So we're coming to perception. Samsara is when the perception of experience is seen through the lens of delusion—of me, of what he calls sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which is a word in Pali meaning personality view or identity view. It's a form of moha, of delusion, of the third poison, you could say—that's taking any experience to be me or mine and then perceiving whatever's arising through that lens. And that's what he's saying is samsara: sense of self. That's the core wrong perception, the misperception that keeps the whole thing spinning—one world coming into another, another, another one. And until we have the direct perception, the direct experience again and again, that allows for the sudden accurate perception to see, "Oh, it's not like that"—until that can happen, we can think about it all we want, but that just solidifies the whole thing.

So nibbana, he's saying, is the mode of perception free from this confusion, free from sense of self. In other words, just recognizing more accurately. I've always loved that about the Buddha's teaching and the way he describes it. In some ways, the way he describes freedom—it's not that we're going somewhere else, just as Thanissaro Bhikkhu says. We're simply perceiving things as they are, accurately. It's like we don't need to create some new thing. We just need to keep having the willingness to land here, to land here, to land here, in this moment, as well as we can—free from expectation, free from thinking "I know what's going to happen"—just surrendering into this moment. But with this quality of heart that's interested, aware: "Oh, it's like this now. It's like this now. It's like this now."

I could do that, you know, twenty-four-seven. And because we want something a little more obvious, something showing that something's happening, we tend to lose our patience with that. That's why we're up here talking, talking, talking—trying to get you all to just keep remembering, to just keep remembering. And it's like, as someone said in a group, we can go days or an entire retreat and there can just be one moment where somehow the kilesas, the great hatred, clears away. And there's the awakeness and the awareness and interest. It just clears away, and the perception is accurate. And there's that sense of, "Oh, all the confusion, the sense of struggle—it's just not even that you put it down, it's just not there." And there's the sense of just ease. It's not like fireworks going off and everybody's bowing to you. It's just, ah. It's just ease. There's not all this hoopla going on.

But so, I want to then go talk about the hoopla a little bit—that's how we get so lost, so far, so fast in these worlds. So I mentioned perception, and I'll start talking about that.

Many of you know, but just to clarify: perception, in terms of how the Buddha speaks of experience, is the translation of the word saññā in Pali. And it's one of the mental experiences that's said to be arising in every mind moment, every moment of citta. So the way he describes it—I think Greg's talked about some of the sixth sense experiences, right?—that's all that's ever happening. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, some physical sense experience or some mental experience—that's all that's ever happening. And we make up all this stuff, my God, but that's all that's ever happening.

So a sense experience happens, and our sense organs—so say a sound, something happens to make a sound, the sense door is working, your ear is working, and there's consciousness. When those three come together, there's the experience of hearing. That's called contact, the experience of hearing. Very simple. And it's just all conditioned. It's nothing personal. Happening all the time, isn't it?

Every moment that we're awake, this contact is happening.

In that moment of contact, a couple of things occur. Perception arises, which is this quality of recognition—how our mind recognizes that experience. And at the same time, the vedana, the mental experience of it as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, they're coming quite right together.

Perception is essential for functioning. You hear a sound and the mind just knows, "That's the bell," or "That's the lunch bell"—so it's even more specific. And then the bell at six in the morning is, "Oh, that's the wake-up bell." Now, it may be a completely different felt experience internally, right? The same kind of sound. So the perception can be different depending on the state in our heart and mind.

But even more than that, perception in itself is conditioned. And we tend not to particularly notice—we just think, "Oh, that's what it is. That's the robin. That's the bell. This is a zabuton." We just take our perceptions for granted. But perceptions are conditioned by our culture, by how we grew up, by our past experiences. Some sound that may be quite neutral or lovely to one person may trigger someone else's past trauma and be a scary sound. It's not that there's one right perception, but our tendency is to just completely believe, "Well, that's what it is."

This is a fun thing to explore, actually. When I first realized this, I was visiting a friend, and I just said to her, "Would you pass me that blue throw on the back of the couch?" She goes, "What blue throw?" I said, "That one." She goes, "That's not blue. That's green." We both tried, we both practiced. I could not see it as green. And she could not see it as blue. We didn't come to blows about it.

But that quality—that goes to the world, right? Look at the world. And I'll go into how that solidifies. It goes from the perception to what we think about it, and on and on. "This is true. This is a view. I'm right and you're wrong." And we don't even notice it. Boom, like that.

So perceptions are often inaccurate. And we don't know. Is there a really right one there, blue or green? Is there really an external perfect reality and we just have to figure it out? Don't waste your time. It's all conditioned.

Once we see how perception is conditioned by our memories and experience, we can also start to explore how each moment of perception can be distorted—is distorted—when there's the kilesas, when there's wanting or aversion or delusion, a sense of "me" in the mind stream, not really recognized. It's like we're looking through those glasses. Like I said with the bell, you could really see the difference. Seen through craving: "Oh, that's great, lunch!" Seen through aversion: "I don't want to get up—oh, bad bell." But more than that, the kilesas can so distort perception that we aren't anywhere close to what's really happening.

It's interesting to watch. There's a nice Tibetan saying that craving puts feathers on the object—it makes it look really much more attractive.

And so, I mean, pick a relationship when you're first getting into one, and the other person is just—everything's so wonderful about them, right? It just is. You just don't see anything wrong, which, if that didn't happen, you wouldn't get into a relationship. So, you know, it gets you there. You're lucky if some of it stays. And later, if—God forbid—it happens that the relationship ends, and you're thinking about all the stuff that you're seeing now that led it to end, you could say, well, that was all there in the beginning. I could actually see it then, but the mind was like, oh no, no, that doesn't matter. There's only this beautiful stuff, there's only this beautiful... And at the end, it was like, only this bad stuff, you know?

When you're angry, someone you look at looks ugly. When you're in love with them, they look beautiful. They're just being them.

So we can't—like the Buddha said, when there's greed or aversion in your mind, you can't see your own good or the good of another. You can't really assess the situation accurately when it comes to act. But if we don't recognize that, we don't know it's there.

How do we recognize it? Yes, of course—the steady awareness, the steady awareness that's willing to hang out when we start to recognize there's some greed or there's some aversion. It isn't like, oh, aversion, let's not go there. It's like, oh, get interested in it. How does it feel? How does it act? What's going on with it? When we see clearly the power of correct perception, all the negative or afflictive thoughts, craving thoughts, vanish.

Last year—I think it was last year—I was teaching a retreat at the Forest Refuge, and one of the meditators came to me. We'd been there about a month, so this was about three weeks in. It was just a great little example of noticing how the quality in the mind completely changes perception. This person's job was cleaning the bathroom. And they said they'd been going in, not like massively averse, but just, I've got to clean the bathroom. In their cleaning, it was just a little kind of dull and heavy.

Then one day she went in, and her mind was just feeling really bright and happy. She went in and said, oh, all these fixtures, they're so bright and shiny! They're just kind of glowing. It's so lovely in here. And she could even say, okay, you know, I don't think the fixtures are a lot different than they were yesterday. Probably not. That's what the mind does.

So that's a simple one. It's fun to see. Or sometimes on retreat—maybe there's too many of you and it hasn't been long enough—but after a while, in some way of never looking at anyone, you get everyone pegged anyway. And there's the ones you like, the ones you don't like, you know. Or just the socks—you know who it is. Then your mind goes through the reactions that you've made up to this person.

So you're sitting in the dining room, and this person who you have a little reaction to—not even knowing their name—and you see them walking by towards your table, and you're like, I'm not going to look though. I'm not going to look. You're sitting there not looking. Then they sit down, and finally you can't help it. You look. It's not that person at all, right? And you say, oh! All that, all that hoopla. Oh, it's this whole other person. And it completely vanishes. It completely vanishes because it doesn't make any sense.

That's insight. That's how insight works on a much more profound and subtle level. I try to make it funny because then we can really explore it. But this is going on all the time. Don't take it personally.

So I have to organize my mind here. Which direction do I want to go?

There's a sixth sense experience happening all the time. And with each sense experience, there's perception and a pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling that comes with it. As you know, one of the deeply, deeply ingrained habits of the unaware mind is that when it's pleasant, some wanting arises. When it's unpleasant, there's aversion, a pushing away.

Just like when some person walks by—the perception is "someone I don't like"—and all this unpleasant thought comes up. Just noticing how that happens is really different. It's not feeding it.

But how often is this happening? Every moment of the day, these sixth sense experiences are occurring. Some perception of the other is arising, some subtle pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral tone. And it doesn't always engender craving or aversion. Sometimes stuff just goes by—it's neutral, there's no reaction to it. This happens more often than we realize, because we tend to get hung up on the ones where there is a reaction.

But just to realize how quickly everything's happening—this is a piece of starting to have some respect for how and why our minds get so caught up so quickly in these stories. There's just so much happening so quickly.

With steady awareness, it's not like everything goes into slow motion and you see each sense experience and the perception and the vedanā. But sometimes, with a steady awareness, you do kind of notice how these building blocks, how this concoction comes together. And that can be really interesting to see—the perception and the vedanā, and then that goes into thinking about it, into papañca.

As the Buddha said—let me read this: "What one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas. And then these associations and these complications turn around and assail us."

Can you relate to that at all? This is what's going on. I don't want to say twenty-four-seven, but it's going on a lot. You're just minding your business, somebody walks by, there's just a glimpse. Actually, what was really seen was a glimpse of color. That was the accurate perception—a glimpse of color. What was added was the idea that it's this or that person. That thought experienced is unpleasant. And then it's thought about, it's complicated, and these notions turn around and assail one.

This is without awareness, without mindfulness. It's not that this happens with every single sense contact, but this is what happens when we're getting lost. And then it turns into a whole world, like Thanissaro Bhikkhu was talking about.

"The tides of conceiving sweep over one who is not aware and mindful." That's from the Buddha. The tides of conceiving. And sometimes it feels like that—just sitting here and this tide of this story comes over. And it goes away. And then the tide of that story comes over, the tide of another story.

And then we don't want to know that anymore. So we just dull out or go and say, "I'll pick this story and get lost in it for a while." That's when we go off into thinking about stuff. Even if it's a suffering story—at least I don't have to notice all these other ones. It's just too exhausting. Saṃsāra is exhausting.

Of course we're tired. My gosh, this is what's going on in our lives. We're constantly reacting. We like this. We don't like that. We like us. We don't like that. We don't like this. What does everyone think about me? What do I think about them?

And this is, as Ajahn Sumedho says, we're sensitive beings. This body is sensitive. There's perception and vedanā going on all the time. And when there's not steady awareness, the reactions to this, the papañca, just goes on with it, and then it strengthens from thinking about it. It hardens into a view—this is true, everything else is false. This is what's really happening. We don't even know anything about perception and vedanā, and yet we're certain this is what's happening, and all our reactions are, of course, right. Anything else is wrong. Until it changes five minutes later, but we don't notice that. We're in a new world.

So I just want to give you an example. Many people have heard this, and someone here could tell it better than me, but I know you like to hear it, so I'm telling it for my friend sitting back there. He knows what I'm about to tell.

This one story I really like because it's so perfect for this—it explains the whole thing. A good, good friend of mine was sitting for her first meditation retreat many, many years ago. I won't say where, because it would help identify her. But she was sitting, and it was in a rented facility. This was before there were all these centers. It was an old house that had been used for a summer camp, so it didn't have a lot of insulation—a really creaky wooden house. And it was her first retreat. You know how first retreats are. They're not always so wonderful.

So she's sitting in the meditation hall that's upstairs, and the walking room was down underneath it. Creaky old house. She's sitting there, and it was a sitting period, and she said whenever people were walking, it was so creaky—you'd hear everybody walking. It used to be like that in the walking room back there. When people would come in, all the floors here would creak. One of the years I was the manager, I think '84 or '85, the other manager, Rand, got on this mission. He really got on this mission to try and fix the floors so they wouldn't creak coming in, because people would be sitting and they'd hear someone walking out there. Which is actually good for practice. People can walk. It can creak. So what?

But anyway, so this was the sitting time. There's noise, and she heard someone walking in the hall downstairs. She was, of course, on her first retreat, trying to be with the breath. She's supposed to be with the breath. She's clearly not having a good time, in some aversion. And she hears the creaking, and—ugh—how can somebody do that? That's not right. That's not right.

I have to say, this person is from a culture where things should be done properly. That's not right. This is the sitting time, not the walking time. And that person shouldn't be making all that noise. It's wrecking my meditation. How can I be with the breath? So this went on for a while.

And then for whatever reason, she said, "Well, I'll just go back to the breath."

So she went back, tried to feel the breath. And then she did feel the breath. And then she realized she took a deep breath. She was leaning against the wall, and when she took a deep breath, her back went into the wall. And that was making the creaking sound that she was hearing.

Luckily, no one else heard. It was clear, right? In that moment, all the anger at that mythical person went away. It's just gone. That's what insight is. That's what insight is.

I want to break this down because that's how it works. Being with the breath, the hearing arises, and there's perception. The perception was, "Is somebody walking?" So that's already an inaccurate perception. It hadn't come to the aversion yet, but inaccurate perceptions can also be based on ignorance. We don't have all the information. Notice how the mind tends to make something up that approximates what it is. And if we don't know that we don't know—we really thought that was reality—that was based on ignorance.

And it was unpleasant. So the perception and then the story about it and then the unpleasant moved into aversion. And then the aversion, the thinking about it, turned into all the memories and associations. And it hardened into the view: one person should not be walking during the sitting time. They are wrong. And because they're wrong, it's messing up my practice. That was not an opinion. That was the explanation of reality, right? And that's what we do. It's solid, solid.

And if she hadn't, for whatever reason, brought the attention back to the breath... We didn't have a lot of wisdom then, but that was sort of adverting the attention. When we say, "Okay, you're getting lost in something, shift the attention to something more neutral to take care of the awareness"—without knowing it, she was doing that. She sank back into the breath, and at that moment, the story wasn't happening anymore. She just felt the breath. And because there was steady awareness that wasn't at that moment colored by the aversion anymore, it was just with the experience—oh, it perceived in a completely other way, more accurately, because it wasn't colored. And in that accurate moment, just a fraction of a moment of accurate perception, the whole story is gone because it was never true to begin with.

So that's actually a very powerful statement of the power of accurate perception. You can see the power that greed, aversion, confusion, delusion—it's all about me—have over our mind. And we can experience it on the grosser level like this. At first we don't recognize it's aversion, and we just think it's righteous indignation at this person who's being really thoughtless. But then later we can say, "Oh yeah, that's..." All it does is create suffering in the moment and the suffering of confusion.

And if it had been a retreat where you could talk—thank God for silence—how often would we have said something? On the three-month retreat, there's often someone who has a little cough, and there'll be a cough drop on their pillow. We beg people not to do it. A cough drop on the pillow. "Here, maybe this will help your cough." Mettā. It's always fine mettā. I mean, how deluded can you get? The person doesn't feel mettā when they're reading it, I'll tell you that. You have to process it for half an hour because they took it in another way.

So thank God for the silence on retreat. But it goes into more and more subtle ways, what the Buddhists call the vipallāsas, or you could call them distortions of perception. Joseph likes to call them hallucinations of perception. And this is taking us into what has been mentioned quite a few times: the three characteristics. The distortions are, although things are always changing, the perception is one that doesn't see change.

The perception is of permanence. The distortion regarding dukkha, as Devon was talking about last night, is not recognizing the unsatisfactory nature of things. The perception is that this is going to give me happiness, satisfaction. And with anatta, the perception of no solid self here, the distortion is the perception of a solid self—me.

These perceptions arise moment to moment to moment. They're not solid state. But because we don't even recognize that, because they're so familiar, arising so frequently, this is the level the Buddha is talking about. When the heart and mind, even on this subtle level, is obsessed or colored by wanting, by aversion, by the confusion of me, we can't see accurately. We simply can't see accurately.

These distortions are really moment to moment. They might be seen through, and then they come back because they're so familiar. The sense of self just feels so familiar that many people assume it's something that's always here and that we need to get rid of it. But that's an assumption based on an idea.

The more we can just practice, just cultivate a bit of trust and keep falling back into this moment of simple awareness—whatever's going on. Remember, we've said a few times that mindfulness can be with anything. So we think you have to be mindful and get rid of this sense of self. But as Ramana Maharshi said—I have this quotation in my mind—the sense of self is only real because it's not examined. It's only real because it's not investigated. When you really look at it, I'm paraphrasing but this is more or less the quotation, when you really look at it, you see that it was never there. It vanishes into thin mist. Just in one moment.

Notice if hearing that your mind kind of jumped: "Oh, I got it! And then it'll vanish and be gone forever." That's not seeing impermanence. Notice.

The more we can cultivate steady awareness, you can start to notice the distorted perceptions. Notice when you're perceiving permanence in a way. This isn't like a judgment, like "I've got to see." Just notice. When we assume that I'm just going to keep talking until a certain time and we're all going to keep sitting here—that's an assumption. That we're going to wake up in the morning, that the cooks are going to be here to make you breakfast. Once in a while it hasn't happened. There have been a couple of times they didn't get here in time and breakfast wasn't ready. You never know.

But you can just notice when you're sitting and you go, "Oh no, this knee pain, and it's thirty more minutes—I can't bear it." That's an assumption of permanence. Just little things. So just go, "Oh, look at that. Look at that."

There's a sutta where the Buddha talks about the perception of impermanence. And he's talking about perception. The perception of impermanence is what allows for—basically, it leads to liberation. The perception of impermanence. So we think perception might not be much, but that's the place of being lost in confusion or freedom. Just this moment of perception, of seeing something in a different way.

When the mind isn't clouded with these thoughts—"Oh yeah, this pain's going to be here"—and then you notice the next moment you were lost in a thought. You don't know if the pain was there or not; you have no clue, because something completely other was happening. And then in the next moment there's the pain, and the mind goes, "See, it's always here." We didn't notice the gap because of the lack of steady mindfulness.

This is really where the steadiness of receptive awareness is so powerful. And we have to practice it because our habits are so much to check out when we don't like something or we get a little bit bored. So that's just why we keep reminding: come back, come back.

That's why I've said it in a few groups. It's so common. We say, "Well, this is always going on." I'm going to say never. I probably shouldn't ever say never either. But I won't let someone get by with "This is always happening." Nothing is always happening.

When you find your mind saying "always" or "never," that's a great clue. Check it out.

Some of you might think, "Well, I wasn't aware of that pain, but it's still here and it was there before, so it must have been there in the meantime." That's a thought. That's inverted perception. That's a hallucination of perception.

But we don't have to figure it out. Can we have just the simplicity of trust? Just: what's happening now? We get all confused, and then—okay, just what's happening now? Just what's happening now? And the steadiness starts to reveal what's always been so.

That's what's so powerful about the quality of insight: it isn't changing reality. It's not like we have to get somewhere where everything becomes impermanent. We don't have to get rid of some solid self and then live in some ego-free bliss. There's no solid self now. There's no solid self. There's no me there. And we're not living in ego-free bliss either. You can keep bringing in awareness and see it comes and goes. It comes and goes. Nothing's steady state, including insight.

So the insight can be really deep—you can have a profound insight into the truth of change, that nothing's reliable. Really deep. It's transformative, but not steady-state transformative. Are we waiting for that one insight where we don't have to be mindful anymore? Forget it. Just forget it.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who's one of my teachers—I was saying this to my colleagues this morning—he talks about the three kilesas as like a street gang. He said they get out on the street, trying to cause trouble. And greed and aversion are the ones you really see; they're out in the front. But delusion is like the mafia boss in the background who's really running the show.

So you can have a really deep insight. You really are, for a while, free of inverted perception. You're not creating a sense of self. You truly see that different things are arising. And then—it doesn't have to happen, but everything's conditioned, including moments of mindfulness.

You know, maybe you've done retreats and you're really quite aware afterward, really interested, paying attention. And then more stuff comes in. It takes reminding ourselves, and then there's a little bit of thinking, "I can kind of coast on this, right? I've been aware. It's here. It's much more available than before. So now I can coast." And we coast, and it's there. You remember, but a little bit less, a little bit less, a little bit less.

And what happens when there's not that receptive, wakeful mindfulness seeing what's happening? Then the street gang gets busy. It's like the kilesas just want to come out and party. That's what they do. They fill a void. If there's a void, something comes into it. Something's always arising in the citta.

Ajahn Sumedho says we create ourselves through our thoughts, and we cannot create an ultimately peaceful sense of self. I want to drop that in because I find it really interesting—we keep trying, but we can't create an ultimately peaceful sense of self. This is how we can practice with it: just moment to moment, in little things, noticing the difference.

We can notice sometimes when we're caught up in the inverted perceptions, and sometimes you can notice it and explore bringing in receptive awareness in little things.

I'll give an example. Say today it was really hot—I'm making this up—and you're walking outside, aware, and then feeling really hot. There's a kind of knowing it, but not really receptive awareness. What Joseph calls "more or less mindfulness awareness." You know you're walking, you know it's hot, you vaguely know there's aversion, but not really. If someone came up to you and said, "Is there aversion?" you'd go, "Oh yeah, sure, I know it." But you weren't really aware, receiving it, being with it.

So there's the heat, and the mind is saying, "This is too hot, I shouldn't be walking," or "You shouldn't even have retreats in this kind of weather, why don't we have it somewhere else, this is bad for my health." And the citta—all the memories, the thoughts come up—what I need to do, and about my heart, and ice packs. I was watching the French Open, and they have these heat waves, and these tennis players have ice packs—why can't I have an ice pack? It would be better for us, why don't they give us that? On and on.

And you don't realize it's suffering. We just think this is justified behavior in our mind. This is a world we've entered into. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, complicates the whole thing. And then this becomes, as the Buddha says, agitation through clinging. Clinging to the idea, clinging to the aversion, clinging to "this shouldn't be happening to me"—whatever it is, there's clinging to it.

If it's a condition that keeps going and you kind of wake up and feel how you're in this, it can be interesting to just stop a minute. Okay, just simple awareness. What's the actual perception right now? Just walking. Walking. There's heat. Heat feels like this. Just—heat feels like this. And maybe it feels unpleasant. The mind goes, "Oh, I don't really like it." Okay. Unpleasant thought. Aversive thought. There could be an aversive thought. It doesn't mean those don't happen. It's just awareness of it rather than completely identifying with it.

So there's the heat. There's dislike. There's aversive thought. It's unpleasant. And that's it. There's nothing else around it. It's just what's happening. It doesn't mean we have to only have pleasant, clear experiences for awakening, for insight. Oh, that's what's going on. Agitation through clinging. Release of agitation through non-clinging. Just—it's this, it's this. Actually more present with the heat. It's just heat.

There's another story Sayadaw U Tejaniya likes to tell about a yogi, a meditator who was practicing in Burma, where it can get really hot. Really, we're talking hot. Once I was a nun in Thailand, and in the hot season, you're in this little kuṭi with a tin roof, and the sun baking down, and you have to wear long sleeves and everything. That's hot. It's good to explore aversion and just how it can be hot and peace at the same time.

Anyway, so he's describing this yogi. It was so hot. The yogi was telling him, "I was in so much resistance."

I mean, this is crazy. I can't do this. Human beings can't live like this. And on and on the mind went.

But then suddenly something shifted. He had been bringing awareness to it, yet was really lost in it at the same time. But sometimes when you keep surrendering into mindfulness—you feel lost, but you can keep bringing in the mindfulness—and suddenly it shifts.

You realize: My body's really hot, but the mind isn't hot. The mind is cool.

And that's the shift to wise view, to wise understanding. It doesn't make the unpleasant situation go away. If you could only all really believe that and not forget it. Wisdom insight doesn't make the unpleasant situation go away, but the agitation through clinging does go away. And that sense of peace, it's just the relief of: Oh, it's like this now. That's how it is, however it is. It's so obvious, even though it's just a second. The difference is so obvious.

And so the more we can practice, the more we can really learn to trust that, to really see that the more steady our awareness becomes, the more there's continuity. We watch as the worlds are concocted and the worlds fall apart. Another one comes up and it falls apart. We're not trying to stop that from happening. We're just sitting back, receiving life as it's arising in this moment with this interest: How is it working? How do the kilesas in the mind create confusion? How does the absence of them lead into peace and a sense of freedom?

We're just watching to see. And don't believe anything I say or you read. Watch and see if that's really so.

Ajahn Sumedho says most people's minds are so flighty, so jumping around, that we don't notice the cessation of things. We don't notice the ending of things. So that's something to attend to in this bigger picture of the worlds that are being created—not even the subtle worlds of misperception, but the big worlds. We jump from one to the other because we often don't notice that one world ended and another one started. But the more we notice that sense of impermanence, that's what also allows for the perception of no separate self.

Just a couple of last things. Again from Ajahn Tejaniya: the benefit of continuity, of steady mindfulness, is it allows one to observe the aversion from the unpleasantness, or the greed from the pleasantness, in its infancy—when it's just starting up, when it's manageable, before it is full-on in your face and you can't look at it, you can't be mindful of it.

He would get into different moods on different retreats, but he would talk about this. Whenever there's kilesa in the mind—wanting, aversion, or delusion—if you can see it, think of it as being on a scale of how intense it is, from zero to ten. You know, like when you go to the doctor and there are those little smiley faces that go into a frowny face and you're supposed to say how much pain you're in. I never know—compared to what?

So he was talking like that, and he's saying: Most people notice aversion or greed in the mind, and it's like at a two, and you think, "Oh well, it's not very strong. It doesn't matter. I don't have to pay attention to it." There's some aversion, like when you're walking and it's hot, and you think, "Yeah, yeah, there's some aversion. It doesn't matter. It's not really bothering me."

This is really where we should bring attention. As soon as you notice it, let the awareness fully feel: Oh, aversion is like this. But we wait until it's an eight. And then it's so strong, it's hitting us in the face, and the mindfulness isn't equal to meeting it. We think, "Well, I'm in overwhelm. I've got to change something." And then we are in overwhelm and we need to shift the attention.

But starting right at the beginning—don't be afraid to let mindfulness be with whatever's happening. Whatever's happening.

Sayadaw U Pandita said to me once in an interview—and again, he wasn't soft and fuzzy. But something difficult must have been going on; I don't remember what. He said, "You know, when you have steady mindfulness, you don't need to be afraid of anything that comes up in your mind."

And that was so helpful to me. Fear might be what's coming up, but you don't have to be afraid of it. Mindfulness can really be with anything. So don't go, "Oh no, I shouldn't see it. If I see it, it's going to get worse." No, it's going to get worse if we don't see it. So just really seeing how it is.

I think I'll just end with Upasika Kee, who was a Thai laywoman, a very profound practitioner from the last century. There's a book of her teachings called Pure and Simple. She was pretty heavy duty, I'll say. But anyway, I'd just like to end with this one quotation from her:

What is, is. What is not, is not. No need to add anything extra.

That's our practice.

CHAPTER 200

Working With The Judging Mind

Carol Wilson · 47 min

> In this warm and practical talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most persistent challenges in meditation practice: the comparing and judging mind. Drawing from Suzuki Roshi's teaching about the four kinds of horses, she illuminates how our tendency to evaluate ourselves as better or worse than others—what the Buddha called māna (the conceit of 'I am')—creates unnecessary suffering. Wilson notes that according to the Theravādan model of awakening, this comparing mind doesn't fully dissolve until the final stage of enlightenment, offering practitioners compassionate perspective on this universal human tendency.
> Wilson shares candid stories from her own practice, including her early competitive impulses during late-night sittings and the challenges of teaching alongside renowned teachers like Joseph Goldstein and Jack Kornfield. She explores how this judging mind manifests everywhere—in the meditation hall, dining room, walking practice, and in our broader cultural conditioning around competition and worthiness. The talk examines how perception (saññā), the third of the five khandhas, naturally categorizes experience and how easily this leads to comparative judgment.
>
> The practical heart of the talk offers multiple approaches for working with the judging mind: the self-compassion break developed by Kristin Neff and Christopher Germer, using humor to shift from 'my mind' to 'the mind,' and cultivating what Wilson calls 'relaxed, interested, kind awareness.' She emphasizes that sincere effort—rather than any external appearance of 'good practice'—is the true measure of our meditation. The talk concludes with Jennifer Wellwood's poem 'Unconditional,' pointing to how meeting our difficult experiences with willingness reveals the inherent completeness already within us.

Good evening.

I'd like to start off the talk tonight with a favorite passage of mine from Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, a wonderful classic dharma book by Suzuki Roshi. He says:

"In our scriptures, it is said that there are four kinds of horses: excellent ones, good ones, poor ones, and bad ones. The best horse will run slow and fast, right and left, at the driver's will, before it sees the shadow of the whip. The second best will run as well as the first one does, just before the whip reaches its skin. The third one will run when it feels pain on its body. The fourth will run after the pain penetrates to the marrow of its bones. You can imagine how difficult it is for the fourth one to learn how to run.

When we hear this story, almost all of us want to be the best horse. If it's impossible to be the best one, we want to be the second best. That is, I think, the usual understanding of this story and of practice. You may think that when you sit in meditation, you'll find out whether you're one of the best horses or one of the worst ones. Here, however, there is a misunderstanding of practice. If you think the aim of meditation practice is to train you to become one of the best horses, you will have a big problem. This is not right understanding. If you practice meditation in the right way, it doesn't matter whether you are the best horse or the worst one.

When you consider the compassion of the Buddha, how do you think the Buddha would feel about the four kinds of horses? He would probably have more compassion for the worst one than for the best one. When you are determined to practice meditation with the great mind of a Buddha, you'll find the worst horse is often the most valuable one. In your very imperfections, you'll find the basis for your firm, way-seeking mind. Those who can sit perfectly physically usually take more time to obtain the true way of meditation, the actual feeling of practice, the marrow of practice. But those who find great difficulties in practicing will often find more meaning in it. So I think that sometimes the best horse may be the worst horse and the worst horse can be the best one."

Comforting, isn't it? Unless you happen to be one of those yogis that sits in full lotus and is just cruising along—in which case there's hope for you yet.

It's so easy, and such a strong inclination, to see ourselves in relation to others, to see how we're doing. How do we compare with others? Am I a good yogi? Am I one of the worst yogis here? Have you seen that in your own practice?

Bhante talked about this yesterday: the Buddha's teaching on mana, a Pali word often translated as "the conceit of I am." By conceit, he doesn't necessarily mean "better than"—that's often how we use the word in English. Rather, it refers to any kind of separating ourselves out and getting caught in selfing.

In the stages of enlightenment, as many of you know, in the Theravadan model there are four stages: stream entry, once-returner, non-returner, and arhat, the fully enlightened being. At various stages, different fetters or obstacles fall away. You might be comforted to know that the conceit of I am doesn't fall away until you are fully enlightened. So if you find yourself comparing and selfing, one way you can think of it is: well, you're no higher than the third stage of enlightenment.

This is what the Buddha had to say about this tendency of mind: "One who thinks oneself equal to others, or superior, or inferior—for that very reason disputes. But one who is unmoved under those three conditions, for that person notions of equal or superior do not exist. An accomplished person does not by philosophical view or by thinking become arrogant, for he is not of that sort. For those who are free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions—such as these, they wander about the world annoying people."

And you can guess who is most annoyed by the mind that gets into this. Especially on a silent retreat, nobody knows what's going on in your mind but you—which is both the good news and the bad news.

So I want to talk tonight about this tendency to compare ourselves and to judge ourselves, others, and life: the judging mind, the comparing mind.

When does it happen for you? Have you noticed when it tends to arise? Particularly on retreat, in the more social situations—like sitting down at the table in the dining room and there are people near you. Notice what the mind does.

There's somebody eating very mindfully. "Oh, look at Miss Mindfulness over there. So impeccable." Or, "Oh my goodness, how much they put on their plate. Wow." Or, "I dropped a fork. Everybody knows."

Walking practice is another very common area rife with the judging mind, the comparing mind. I think Pante was talking about it the other day. You see somebody who's walking so slowly—"Wow, look at them." Or, "Who are they trying to impress and prove?" The same exact stimulus can have a very different response just a couple of hours later. You see somebody walking fast and it's, "Gosh, they're just themselves. They're not trying to prove anything. I wish I could be that unpretentious." Or, "Don't they get it? Why don't they slow down? Think you're in New York or something?" The mind will just go everywhere.

And particularly—not only what they're looking like outside, but what am I looking like in here.

On one retreat here many years ago, in my early days of practice, I really got into slow walking. I tend not to do it in that extreme way, but I mean, I really went for it. So it would take me about forty-five minutes to go from the hall to the bathroom, or to my room. But I loved it. I was just really—as you might find out—when you get into that groove, it just feels so good and you're not trying at all. So I don't want to discourage those who are into that. It's beautiful when you're practicing that way.

But I could see myself—when I was all by myself, I was just really delighting in it. Lifting, moving, placing. When somebody else would come by, I'd have a whole different reason for practicing that I started to notice and name. I used mental noting to a great extent. And after a while, I'd be noting: "Lifting, moving, looking good. Lifting, moving, looking good, looking good." Because that was what was going on in my mind.

And we come from such a competitive culture, those who are, for better or worse, living here in the U.S. "We're number one, we're number one." And probably most countries have that feeling of pride. Even if you go to football games, they sell the foam fingers with the index finger sticking up—number one, number one. There's a tremendous pressure that gets put on a culture that values being the best so much.

And we do it whether it's our country—which is different than having pride in whatever particular characteristics your country has and feeling really appreciative of your heritage and your past. But when it gets into comparing, "We are better"—the mind just tends to do that. Whether it's our religion, or our meditation. "I'm a Vipassana meditator. Yes. I'm of the Theravadan school, the real teachings of the Buddha. Oh, those Zennies and Tibetans, they just kind of took the Buddha's teachings and ran with it."

Or Buddhism and Christianity and all the great world religions—just think how many wars, how much hatred, over each body of teachings trying to understand the incomprehensible, all pointing to the mystery in their own way.

Or whatever class or ethnic identity. And again, so much pain in seeing ourselves as better, or internalizing "not as good" from all the messages in the culture. Or not even realizing that it is so internalized, whether it's privilege or internalized oppression. The great wounds in our culture, our society, in humanity—it doesn't matter what culture you come from, there is othering that happens, the comparing mind.

And it also is true within our own being, intrapersonally. My body—taller, shorter, curlier hair, straighter hair—priding ourselves on it or not. Or our mind. "I have a clear mind. I have a creative mind." And whatever you've been gifted with, it's something to really honor and appreciate—your uniqueness. But if it gets into comparing, "I am more creative than maybe everybody here"—the mind will go any place.

Even to the point where our neurosis can become a badge of honor. I remember going to college and reading a lot of existential literature—Camus and Sartre—and just feeling like the more screwed up one is, the deeper you are. I'm pretty deep because I am messed up inside. And those happy people are just shallow. Now I'm teaching about awakening joy, but that was what it was back then. "Oh God, how shallow. Don't they see what's going on?"

So when for you—I'll invite you to take a moment and go inside to make this relevant to your own experience—when does it come up? Here on retreat or in your life, that comparing mind, either "not enough, not good enough" or "better than." Without any judgment, hopefully, just seeing the humanness in it. Remember, no higher than third stage. But just see how it gets activated and how painful it is.

I'm remembering now—I hadn't planned on telling this story, but it comes to mind around competitive practice. In the first years of practice, I was really wholehearted, gung-ho, and I still am in my own way, though it looks a little different on the outside now.

Late night sittings was one place where I could see this happening. "I'm going to be the last one here." And then at some point, I caught on to myself and I said, "I think I'm going to be the next to last one here. That's really cool. And I can let go of being the last, even though I know I could be the last." Yes.

I remember going to Joseph in an interview and saying I was seeing my mind do this thing, and it was really humbling. And he told me a story—I don't know if he shares it these days—but in his early days of practice, he said, "I had exactly the same trip going on with my sitting." He said when he was in the Burmese vihara in Bodh Gaya, there was this guy from Denmark in the next room. The wall didn't go all the way up to the top, so you could see if the person's light was on. And Joseph was determined to sit longer than the guy next to him. Every night that Danish light stayed on. He went through months of practice, and finally when they spoke, he said, "How did you do it? You never went to sleep." The guy said, "Oh no, I just slept with the light on."

It's amazing. And it can happen even in the dharma seat. It's not that once you get to the dharma seat, this doesn't happen. In my earlier days of teaching—this is in the 80s, about 35 years ago—when I started teaching bigger retreats in the major leagues, we'd go down to Yucca Valley, a big retreat center in Southern California. Joseph would give a talk one night and just blow people's minds with clarity and depth of wisdom.

Then Jack Kornfield would give a talk the next night and just hypnotize everybody with his magical spell. Sharon Salzberg would give a talk and tears would come down, the whole audience weeping with loving kindness. And then I'd have to go on. And I knew if I was in the audience, I'd be saying, "Get that guy off and get Goldstein back on." It was really painful.

So here's the punchline to the story. This went on for some time, the first couple of years. And it just got so painful that I went to Ram Dass, who was one of my two main teachers and mentors, along with Joseph. I said to Ram Dass, who was really impactful in my life—how many people here have read Be Here Now? Yeah, for those younger than that generation, that was a book that changed everything, just changed my life.

So I went to Ram Dass and said, "You know, this is crazy. It's so humbling to give a talk and just know that I wish somebody else were up there." And Ram Dass said, "You know, Joseph Goldstein's already taken. Why don't you just be the best Jamie Barr you can be?" I went by Jamie in those days. And it took me a while to really get that—oh, maybe I have something to say in my own way. But it was a while to get there.

We all are unique expressions of life that have never manifested in the unique way they're doing through you. But it's really painful, that prevalent comparing mind, when we believe it. And it's ultimately rooted in the sense of not being good enough, not being enough. That somehow, if I were only a bit more, then I'd be okay. We measure ourselves against impossibly high standards, or against what our last retreat was like.

You notice that? You remember the very last few days of your last retreat, where finally everything just falls into place, and you say, "I want to do this again." The hook comes back at you. Then you sign up, and you find yourself thinking, "Gosh, there's so much sleepiness and restlessness. It's not like it was." But you forget how it was at the beginning of that other retreat.

Somehow it's all rooted in the fear of not being good enough—this sense of unworthiness or self-judgment or self-hatred. Sally mentioned the other night when the Dalai Lama was here. I was at that retreat. It was in 1979, just a few months after the Dalai Lama came to the States for the first time. It was in this very room, and he had a Q&A, and somebody asked about self-hatred. Like she said, it took a while for him to get the concept. Until finally he said—this is after two and a half months of people practicing—he looked at this person and said, "You're wrong. You're absolutely wrong."

Can you imagine? After two and a half months of sitting, the Dalai Lama saying, "You're wrong." But he said it with tremendous compassion. Something like, "What makes you think that everything else is part of the fabric of life, and somehow you're a mistake? You're not good enough? This is real misunderstanding."

But we do it. There's a teaching from A Course in Miracles, a Christian body of wisdom, a beautiful set of teachings. And there's this one line I love that says, "Believing in your littleness is arrogant, because it's preferring your own opinion to God's." What makes you think that somehow you're a mistake or you're not good enough?

The Third Zen Patriarch, in probably my favorite piece of Dharma wisdom, has this line that I love. It says, "To live in this realization—to live in the highest realization—is to be without anxiety about non-perfection." To live in the highest realization is to be without anxiety about non-perfection.

That's when you know you've really made it—when it's okay to be perfect. It's okay to be perfectly you, just the way you are, instead of trying to be perfect, which is never possible. That's not what humanness is about.

So first, how does this happen? How do we get into this complication? We were talking about the five skandhas, or five khandhas, the other day. The third khandha—there's form, there's feeling tone (pleasant, unpleasant, neutral), and then there's perception. Perception, as we said in that question and answer period, is the recognition of what is here. "Oh, this is a bell." Your brain or your mind files it, compares it, and places it in your previous experience with a name and the familiarity or non-familiarity of something you've encountered before. "Oh, this is a bell."

And then it's just a hop, skip, and a jump—just one little connection—to the mental formations about that perception. "Oh, this is a pretty big bell. Not as big as some bells that I've seen. Oh, this bell has a sound a little bit higher than the one that I know at home." The mind starts to compare. And in that comparison, there is better or worse that often slips in—particularly around us.

To see who you really are is to see who you are without, as the Buddha says, those notions of superior or inferior—but simply this particular expression as being unique. Each individual expression of life has its own beautiful quality. Ajahn Sumedho talks about it in one of his books as the shining through of the divine. There it is, shining through us through a special manifestation. But what it is that shines through, we can't even take credit for. And so when you feel you're not good enough, you're creating a separation that really doesn't have to exist.

One Tibetan master, Trungpa Rinpoche, I remember him saying once: "Timidity is just another ego trip."

Here's Marianne Williamson—perhaps you're familiar with this. She says: "Your playing small doesn't serve the world. There's nothing enlightened about shrinking so that other people won't feel insecure around you. We were born to make manifest the glory of God that is within us. It's not just in some of us, it's in everyone. And as we let our own light shine, we unconsciously give other people permission to do the same. As we are liberated from our own fear, our presence automatically liberates others."

There's another quote I appreciate from Nyoshul Khenpo, a great Tibetan master. He says: "Buddha nature, the essence of awakened enlightenment itself, is present in everyone. Its essence is forever pure and flawless. Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore it or overlook it are deluded. There's no way to enlightenment other than by recognizing Buddha nature and authentically identifying it within one's own stream of being."

So that's one way you can think of what we're doing here. When we, at the beginning, took refuge in the Buddha—what does that mean? On one hand, there is that amazingly inspiring being who lived twenty-five or twenty-six hundred years ago, who showed that awakening is possible. But he showed it's possible for all of us. When you take refuge in the Buddha in a more fundamental way, you're taking refuge in your own capacity to awaken. It's a very profound thing to take refuge in the Buddha right inside. It means you can't—if you really get it—you can't pretend that you're not enough.

You might know this intellectually. It's a whole other thing to embody it.

And this is what we're doing more and more. I'm sure you've been touched and inspired by the Buddhist teachings that have made sense to you. And little by little, it's a matter of moving from the conceptual to the embodied. That's why we're practicing here.

There's a beautiful way of thinking of the teachings. First, you hear the Dharma. Probably when you first heard the Dharma—like when I read Be Here Now, or maybe when you listened to a teacher—something touched you deeply. Wow.

Then there's understanding the Dharma, where it's really starting to make sense to you, more than just a kind of inspiration as a possibility. "Oh yeah, I understand. I'm starting to understand."

Then there's realizing the Dharma, where you have a true, verifiably faith-inducing understanding. "Oh yes, I get it. This is more than just an idea. I really see it. I really get a glimpse of it. I'm realizing what it's all about."

So hearing the Dharma, understanding the Dharma, realizing the Dharma—and more and more, after you realize it, then there's being the Dharma, where this is your home, this is where you are living from, and it's not just an accident or a glimpse. You might forget, and until you're fully cooked you undoubtedly will forget, but this becomes more your home base, your perception of reality.

This is a process that we're in that takes a lot of patience, a lot of persistence, a lot of kindness. And I want to talk a little bit about both working with the comparing and judging mind and some attitudes that will help you in this process.

There's one issue that's so central where the comparison comes in: evaluating how your practice is going. "Oh, I was pretty clear that time. This must be going pretty well. I think it's happening." Or, "Oh my God, there's just so many emotions. I'm just this mess of emotions and going through a lot of tissues here."

Or it can go the other way, where you see people really having emotional catharsis and then you say, "Wow." One of my first retreats I went to, I was sitting and everybody around seemed to be crying and going through lots of tissues, and I was just sitting there—in, out—with my breath. And I went to Joseph and said, "I don't know if I'm doing it right." I thought, "I don't know if I'm getting my money's worth." But it was more that everybody seemed like they were going through such deep transformations, and I was just sitting there feeling my breath coming in and going out. What gives?

And he said, "Don't go looking for trouble. It'll find you soon enough."

And it did.

But we have all kinds of ideas about what good practice looks like. Hindrance-free yogi, deep slow-walking yogi, whatever it is, and we measure up against that. It's really impossible to tell where your practice is by what it looks like from the outside.

Sometimes you can be in very deep dukkha land and think, "Oh, what was the point of coming here?" not realizing this is going to be the richest retreat. This is where the gems will be discovered. This is where I'll face my fear and see it's possible to not only survive, but see I have capacities for courage and strength that I didn't know were here. I can even see through fear. But while you're going through it, it just seems like nothing is going right.

Or just the reverse—"Hey, I've been feeling really good these last week and a half or so. I'm really going now." And it might be really going well, but it might be just that you're coasting and not playing your edge. You don't know.

But here's one thing you can use if you want to get a sense of your quality of effort: rather than looking at the external, keep checking in with your sincerity. That's the key ingredient. Just your willingness to show up as best you can, and willingness to come back when you see you've gone. Your sincerity will sometimes lead you to do very different things, if you see that you're doing whatever you're doing in support of your practice.

And so you might notice, "Oh, what I really need to do now is just really follow the schedule and not take breaks and just give myself wholeheartedly to it." But it might mean, "I need to have a cup of tea and just chill out. I'm trying a bit too hard now. I need a walk in the woods. I need to sit here and be willing to touch my pain."

It doesn't look any one way on the external. It's about getting in touch and seeing: Why am I doing what I'm doing? And if there's a sense that you're doing it to support your practice—"I'm doing this so that I can really show up fully"—good practice.

So it's more about your sincerity of effort, your sincerity of intention, than what it looks like. And only you know. That means you have to give up looking any particular way for others. "What are they going to think of me?" You don't have to worry about it, because they're worried about what people will think about them. We're all absorbed in "What are they going to think of me?" without realizing that everybody is having that same internal thought. Don't worry about it. Just stay connected to something in you that loves the Dharma enough to come here on a retreat of six weeks or three months, something that says, "I want to wake up"—or whatever it is that's touched you.

A few things to keep in mind about working with this judging mind, this comparing mind. One is kindness and compassion with your process. And forgiveness for all the ways that you don't quite measure up. We need a basis, a grounding of kindness, in order to create enough safety and refuge and heartfulness to see clearly. If we're struggling and trying to fit ourselves into some imagined idea of good practice, that very struggle is contracting in the mind, and you'll be working against yourself.

So I'd say, for myself, the essence of my instructions—I think I'll be giving instructions tomorrow, so I'm going to remind you again—the essence comes down to being interested in what's happening, being kind with what you see and kind with whatever your experience is, and having a sense of ease and relaxation where you're not contracted. That's it: a relaxed, interested, kind awareness.

Interest is really the key. I have a birthday card at home that I've never given away because I love it so much. On the front is this baby—almost an infant—and he's holding in his hand a booger right out of his nose. And there he is, mesmerized, fascinated. You open the card and it says, "You always were easy to entertain. Happy birthday."

I aspire to booger-hood! Just letting your natural interest bring you in, just for the sense of wonder. It's amazing.

As the meditation deepens, as the mindfulness gets stronger, you want to pay attention. Here's a little insight into the process. At the beginning, it takes some effort to be here. It's true, because we're so used to going to past, future, fantasy, whatever, and it takes effort to bring yourself back. But as you put in that effort to be mindful, the mindfulness starts to get stronger. And when it gets stronger, you see more. And when you see more, it's more interesting. And when it's more interesting, you want to pay attention. And so it keeps pulling you in. "Yes! Oh, the present moment—it's so cool!" Have you ever had glimpses of that?

The alternative is if you say, "Well, if I'm mindful, I'm mindful. If I'm not, I'm not. That's okay, I'm just going to be... I'm going to lighten it up this time."

It won't really happen if you don't put in a wholehearted, sincere effort. And if you're not consistent in your mindfulness—and continuity is the key, continuity of awareness no matter what you're doing—then your mindfulness isn't so strong. When it's not so strong, things aren't quite as interesting as your fantasies. When they're not so interesting, it's boring. And when it's boring, you don't want to pay attention. Heaven forbid anything but boredom, which is a whole other talk—a very profound thing to explore, but for another time.

When it's not so interesting and you don't want to pay attention, when the mindfulness is weak, it continues to be uninteresting and you're on a track toward just intermittent mindfulness. So interest is the key. Letting that sense of wonder pull you in. At the beginning, you might need to trick yourself or pretend that it's interesting. But after a while, as it gets stronger—oh yeah, this is really interesting. Really amazing to see life so vividly. And everybody here has done retreats, so you know what I'm talking about.

Interested, but relaxed. Not pouncing on experience, just relaxing enough so that the mind is at ease. And I like to make it like a game. That's what makes it a bit more fun for me, because it's easier to pay attention when it's fun. So I'm just playing the awareness game. It doesn't matter how long I've been gone—oh, there I am. Come on back. It's just the game of awareness. Or walking—let's see about walking. How interesting. There I am like a baby taking my first steps. Just what is going on here with walking?

So interested, relaxed, and kind. Which means whenever you see yourself wandering, or see whatever is arising and it's difficult, there's the kindness that's right here.

I want to teach you, since I have this chance now, one way to bring this kindness to your experience. Some of you are familiar with this, but since this is one opportunity I have to share it with everyone, I want to offer you the self-compassion practice that is so helpful and effective as a way to hold difficulties.

This was developed by Kristin Neff and Chris Germer, who've done a lot of retreats here and at Spirit Rock—who've kind of packaged in a simple formula what we do here. So this is the self-compassion break.

When you're really having a hard time with the judging mind, or with your meditation not going as well as you'd like, or you're confused—very simple, a few different steps.

First step, the way I like to do this—this is my own variation and it's a little bit different than what Kristin and Chris said, but they said, "Yeah, that sounds good. You can do it your way." So what I do is start off by putting your hand on your heart, because this physiologically releases oxytocin and soothes the system. Just try this. Put your hand on your heart and notice what it feels like as you do that. There's tenderness. If you don't do anything else but just do that, that's good enough.

And then they offer a few different reflections, three different reflections. You can use your own words, your own variations. Maybe I'll put them up on the board so you don't have to worry about remembering.

First one: "This is a moment of suffering," or "This is hard." Just acknowledging—oh, this is hard right now. This is a moment of suffering.

Second reflection: "Suffering is a part of life." And you might think of all the people in the world who are going through what you're going through right now, and just include yourself in there. Suffering is a part of life.

And third: "May I hold my suffering with kindness and compassion."

This is suffering, and suffering is a part of life.

And may I hold my suffering with kindness.

As you're doing this, you can be both the one receiving that comfort and the one giving it. There's a wise one that can hold that hurt one, that confused one inside. It's a kind of coming into wholeness.

So that's one way to hold it. Actually, I'll share with you my own version of this that I used with the judging mind for quite some time in my early years of practice. I was just looking at the judging mind, because I saw I really had a judging mind—maybe even better than yours. And I really wanted to work with it.

So this is what I would do. At some point I said, I need to change my relationship to the judging. You might close your eyes again as you do this so you don't feel too self-conscious. Just imagine that you had a really harsh judging thought. And you can try this out. Put your hand on your cheek and feel the tenderness in the cheek as you silently say to yourself, "Oh, judging, judging"—like it's okay, just judging. Feel the tenderness in the noticing.

I did that. That was my main practice for about two years, both in retreat and at home in daily life. It wasn't like I did this each time, although I did it a lot at the beginning. You know, you can kind of surreptitiously just touch yourself. But what happened after a while was the tone in my mind started becoming softer and softer to the point that that was the response: "Oh, it's okay, dear." And then whenever I'd have a judging thought, it became another opportunity to practice compassion—letting the Quan Yin right inside of you do the noticing. Because she or he is right in there.

So, self-compassion, forgiveness, just for all the times those habits have been created. They're just habits of mind that need to be held with kindness.

Another way to work with the judging mind is having a sense of humor. If you can move from "Oh gosh, look at my mind" to "Look at the mind do its thing"—if you go from "my mind" to "the mind"—that's a huge shift, because then you're not taking it personally.

To laugh at this mind—on one retreat here, it's interesting, being here I get in touch with all of those moments. On one retreat, again working with the judging mind, there is this line from the Third Zen Patriarch, the same one that I quoted before: "The burdensome practice of judging brings annoyance and weariness." That made a lot of sense to me, so I played this game. Every time I'd notice a judging thought, I'd tack on "the burdensome practice of judging." Particularly in the dining room: "Oh my goodness, look how much food. The burdensome practice of judging." I would go through a meal saying that about fifty, seventy-five times. After a while, the only thing I could do was laugh. Look at the mind. "Oh God, doesn't she eat any food? Is she a bird? The burdensome practice of judging." And laughing makes a huge difference.

Another thing is seeing the emptiness of the thoughts, how empty they are. They've come from nowhere and return to nowhere. Joseph has a very good instruction about this, by the way, that I highly recommend you trying. He says if you're sitting in the hall and you're bothered by your thoughts, just imagine they're coming from the person behind you. Very effective, you know. You just kind of picked up radio waves. For all intents and purposes they did, because you don't say, "Oh, I think I'm going to have some neurotic thought of doubt right now." It just comes on its own. To not take it personally—there's tremendous freedom in that.

When you start seeing through that taking responsibility for your thoughts, and you see how empty they are, there's tremendous freedom. You see all those thoughts of judgment and comparing as just habits, mental fabrications to be seen through.

So: kindness, compassion, forgiveness, a sense of humor, seeing the emptiness of the thoughts, and really learning to give yourself the same benefit of the doubt that you give to everybody else.

Just your own sincerity. That's good enough.

So I'll close with a poem that I love. Actually, I can't pull up the one I'd planned, but I'll close with a different one—there were two possible endings.

This is about the courage to take a look inside and be with everything, which is really how we learn to see all the beautiful qualities within. This takes courage. And I want to share this beautiful poem about the willingness to go to those difficult places and discover that you have everything you need. There's no comparing yourself with others. There's no comparison when you see it, when you see that everything is right here.

This is called "Unconditional" by Jennifer Wellwood:

Willing to experience loneliness,
I discover connection everywhere.
Turning to face my fear,
I meet the warrior who lives within.
Opening to my loss,
I gain the embrace of the universe.
Surrendering into emptiness,
I find fullness without end.

Each condition I flee from pursues me.
Each condition I welcome transforms me and becomes itself transformed into its radiant jewel-like essence.

I bow to the one who has made it so,
who has crafted this master game.
To play it is pure delight.
To honor its form, true devotion.

So let's sit for a few moments.

Thank you very much for your attention. See the Buddha right inside. That's where she is. That's where he is.

CHAPTER 201

Disturbance is the Path

Carol Wilson · 44 min

In this profound talk from the Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson contemplates the relationship between mind and the activity of mind, drawing on the wisdom of Thai Forest masters including Ajahn Ṭate and Ajahn Chah. She explores how samatha (calming, samādhi) and vipassanā (insight, dhammavicaya) work together as complementary tools for liberation—like two ends of the same log, or a knife that needs both blade and backing to cut through suffering.

Wilson shares a personal story from her time as a young nun at Chithurst Forest Monastery, when deep meditation brought up primal fear rather than peace. Ajahn Sumedho's guidance taught her that when deep patterns arise from the deconstruction of self, patience—not forceful confrontation—is the skillful response. This leads to her central teaching: disturbance is not an obstacle to practice but becomes the path itself. The five hindrances (nīvaraṇa)—sensory desire, aversion, dullness, restlessness, and doubt—are territories we work with daily until they're uprooted.

The practical instruction centers on containing these hindrances through body awareness, breathing with constriction and difficulty rather than trying to fix from a sense of self. Wilson emphasizes trusting awareness itself, which is connected with wisdom, healing, and transformation. She reminds practitioners that moments of knowing these states as they are—seeing them as dhamma, as nature rather than self—nourish the seed of liberation. The Buddha's similes illuminate the fruit of this work: feeling freed from debt, sickness, prison, and servitude, arriving at an oasis after wandering through desolate territory.

One of the meditation masters of the Forest School of Thailand, Ajahn Tate, who was a contemporary of Ajahn Chah, said that we practice so that we can know the difference between mind and the activity of mind.

Tonight I'd like to contemplate and reflect on how we practice to bring about that insight using two frames and two approaches that complement and inform each other: samatha, samadhi—the calming, steadying, jhanic path—and vipassana, dhammavijaya—the inquiry and insight. These two are necessary for the cultivation of this insight and for the path itself.

Practicing here at the Forest Refuge in this space and in the quiet stillness, we have a great opportunity to see how the mind is, how it moves, where it goes, where it dwells, and its activity. More often than not, that activity is mostly what absorbs our attention. Particularly if we're not intersecting the flow of the mind with some path activity, our normal awareness is really concerned with the activity of mind—how it flows incessantly, how it's connected with the sense of me and my narratives, and within that, the sense of time: what's memory, what's gone before, where we're going. It can be quite difficult to come out of that stream of the narrative thinking mind and to turn attention beneath or beyond or behind it. Because, you know, who are we if we're not thinking? What are we about if suddenly the sense of what we've been and where we're going starts to unravel? It can be very disconcerting to feel underneath that. You can feel a bit lost, a bit footless, a bit goalless. It can bring up some perhaps ambivalent feeling tones—anxiety, fear even.

So it's a very profound area to contemplate.

I remember when I was practicing in the monastery under Ajahn Sumedho at Chithurst Forest Monastery in the UK. We would do long retreats, anything from a month to three months every year. Sometimes they would be three-month winter retreats, and sometimes in the summer, six weeks of personal retreat. I was on one of these personal retreats, which I often used to feel like a bit of a failure at. I would notice that I practiced a lot better when there were a lot of people, a sense of sangha and holding. Left on my own, it was quite challenging, especially as a young nun with my mind bouncing all over the place. But I worked at it.

During one of these retreats, I had this moment when I was sitting late one night and the mind just stopped. What arose wasn't actually peace—it was just this enormous sense of terror and fear. It was very primal. What then arose in my mind was that I created a strategy: I had to actually face this down, this very primary fear. The structure of the self is often wound in with this energy of fear and desire, moving toward something and moving away from something. When you feel that in a very raw sense, at a very energetic level, it's quite overpowering.

In my mind, and in the approach of the training in that style of practice in those days, there was this sort of warrior style. You just take everything on, head on. I had this idea that I should actually increase the fear so I could really practice with it—that I would take myself out into the forest and practice at night and scare myself to death and see where that went.

I had the wherewithal somehow to approach my teacher and just check if this was a good strategy. I thought he would probably be quite pleased. But actually he said he didn't think that was a good idea. He said that when these deep patterns come up, these deep reactions from the disintegration or deconstruction of what has been constructed and what we've relied upon, what you actually need is a lot of patience. Not to just push through and send your system into shock and overwhelm, but to be very patient and keep working with the core of the practice through samatha vipassana—calming and insight—and to let these states dissolve and fade away in their own time. You can't just crush what arises and what is difficult to be with.

That was a relief. I was let off the hook. It felt very true and very right and very good guidance for working at a deeper level, as we are doing now when we sometimes face not very easy states that start to arise in the space we have here.

The mind and the activity of mind—the mind in and of itself, the citta, the unobstructed citta, heart-mind—as Ajahn Chah said, is already free. It has a quality of awareness. In that awareness, conscious awareness, there is this quality of knowing, knowingness. Not so much knowing about things and cataloguing things through our filing cabinets of information. It's a knowing that exists before we know things as an object and have names, before we pull out of the interwoven nature of reality some discrete entity and have a name for it, catalogue it, and have a story around it. This is me, this is you, this is a tree, this is a bird, this is good, this is bad, and so on. Before we do all of that, the actual fundamental nature is just a pure knowing.

This word pañña, or prajna in Sanskrit, has within it the etymological meaning of a sense of before we know something. Wisdom is before we go out and objectify something. This pure state of knowing has an almost unknowing in it, a sort of unpackaging, stripping away of how we've designated ourselves in the world.

To turn and to rest and to recognize just the fundamental state of mind is in some ways the easiest thing, because it's our natural state. But in other ways it's the most tricky thing, because we are caught up in the activity of being shaped by what moves through the fundamental space of the awareness of the heart.

In samatha and vipassana, samatha is just beginning to calm some of that activity through what we've been doing: bringing attention to the body breath, the foundations. This is a very profound teaching. It's also very simple. We might wonder, what's the higher path? What's the real teaching? But actually this is pretty core and essential and profound. It's the teaching and practice that the Buddha used on the night of his awakening.

It's the practice he taught extensively. It's the practice we come back to again and again—just this simple returning to how it is within breath and body.

As we do that, going a little bit beneath the cognitive frames, we have some ground from which the activity, particularly the vacī-saṅkhāra, the mental activity, can begin to settle to some degree. And this unification, as we've been practicing and talking about—the samādhi, beginning to taste some of the pleasure and the peace of feeling the body, mind, and heart unifying within awareness, suffused with awareness, with this fundamental nature of mind, and that sense of coming together, not being disparate, not being pulled all over the place.

So this samatha is one of the bedrocks of the practice. And it's based upon training attention to what is an object of awareness, which in this case is body and breath. It can be sound, it can be color, it can be sky, it can be candle flame, it can be mantra. But for our primary purpose, we are using the first foundation of breath and body, so that attention isn't just being dragged here and there but has a steadying point of contact.

As this samatha and calming is developed in this very patient practice—as we talked about, Ajahn Lee, the Thai Forest master, would say this is like that bridge that spans the fast-running river. You have a pillar at one side of the river and a pillar at the other side, and that middle pillar going down through the deep currents of the river. It's a bit like the middle pillar of samādhi among the three factors of the path, going right down through the deep currents of the mind.

It's not easy. It takes a lot of patience. It's a lifetime practice, because those currents are very strong, currents of the mind. And when we have some steadiness, that current actually gets more highlighted because we're not just following the momentum of it. But still, it's a very important aspect of the training—to train the mind breath by breath, moment by moment. And then we get caught up, and then how is it now? We come back and we start again.

In some ways, you don't really achieve it, achieve some great—I mean, there are the deepenings of peace. As Ajahn Chah said, "Peace, more peace, more peace"—the jhānas and so on, the deepening of steadiness and unshakability and absorption. But generally speaking, it's pretty fragile for most of us, as it gets interrupted and life crashes in, or the patterns from within emerge. But it's still very important.

Sometimes we don't even recognize how much samādhi is there. It's not always perceptible, because we're sitting in a field of it. So it's not just us—we're contributing to that field, all of us together. When we come here, we're supporting that quality of samādhi. But you notice it if you sit for a few weeks and then you go outside, you get on the freeway or something. You'll notice that the state you're in is different than everyone rushing along, moving very fast. It's just hard to see here; you haven't got that mirror so much, and it's hard to recognize it. But there is a gathering that just happens from being present and being in this context, in this container.

In many ways, the deepening of samatha, samādhi, jhāna—this steadiness, stillness, absorption—is quite dependent upon the container: non-distraction, non-interruption, a certain ability to sit with the content of what's emerging without getting overwhelmed, a certain level sometimes of body health so you have some energy, some strength.

Some of the fruits from that: you can feel some more peace, perhaps pleasant abiding, some clarity, perceptivity. There's also the healing aspect of the path—very healing for the body, for the psycho-emotional dynamic of our feeling tone. It can be very soothing. There are many benefits from the samatha.

However, it's also dependent on these circumstances, and if you take away the container, you can feel the diffusion of that gatheredness. Often when people leave a retreat and they say, "I'm losing it," what they really mean is they're losing that sense of the container and that feeling of gatheredness. When the samādhi deepens, it's a very different quality, a different sense of time, a different sense of space—something slower, grounded, rooted. You don't feel so pulled around. And that can disperse with the impingement of contact and the world around, and also with the impingement of what emerges from our own patterning and the flow of the mind itself.

This is why samatha is always balanced with, and provides the ground for, the wise discernment—the dhamma-vicaya, the contemplation of dhammas, the investigation of dhammas, or what's sometimes called vipassanā—to inquire and to see into the nature of the mind and its activity.

Ajahn Chah would sometimes say that samatha is a bit like a stone you put on grass. You put that stone on the grass and the grass doesn't grow, and you think, "That's great, all the problems have gone." But he said if the stone gets knocked off and the right conditions arise, the hindrances, the dukkha, arises.

Another way that he talked about this: when he came to the West for the first time and saw Westerners engaged in meditation, he was quite interested because these retreat forms weren't really how they practiced in Thailand—they came more from the Burmese lineage. They didn't really practice these kinds of retreat forms so much. So he was quite interested in these ten-day, one-week retreat forms that people were doing.

But then he came up with an interesting observation. He said, "You Westerners, you're a bit like people that have a good lawyer. You get into trouble and then you ring up your lawyer to spring you out of jail." He said, "You're out there in the world and you get into trouble and you go off on a retreat. But you don't yet understand what gets you into trouble." You need to understand what mechanisms generate that sense of dukkha and struggle. If you haven't yet resolved or transformed or overturned the hindrances, you go back and the conditions help you sort of get yourself together, but if you just rely on that peace from samatha, then you haven't got the complete picture.

Ajahn Chah would also say that there are two kinds of peace: the peace of calm, from samatha, and the peace of wisdom, which arises from insight. And the peace of wisdom is an unshakable peace. It is the unshakable deliverance of the heart, which is the ultimate fruit of this practice—the heart, the citta, the mind in touch with the world.

It feels, it can wobble and it can feel, but it's not completely flooded and shaken and overwhelmed with what is impinging upon our experience.

So we've already, I'm sure, been exploring and practicing these two complementary tools of what brings about freedom, stability, healing, and clarity. And they're not really that separate. Another image Ajahn Chah used is like a log. If you want to pick up a log, you pick it up by both ends. One end isn't really better than the other. And it's like samatha and vipassana—the two ends of the same log.

Or he said it's like a knife. If you want to cut through something, if you just have a blade with no strength, no back to the knife, then you haven't got the power to cut through, to see through the hindrances, the dukkha, whatever is catching us.

Or he said it's like a candle—this is another image he used often. Sometimes samatha is a bit like building a candle. We can build a really, really huge candle, but if we don't light it, it doesn't illuminate anything. We get peaceful and peaceful and peaceful, but that wisdom quality is perhaps not being nurtured. On the other hand, if we're just trying to light a candle and see what's going on but we've got no wax, then the flame just blows out and we get caught up in the patterning, caught up in our conditioning, caught up in our reactivity.

One thing that is difficult for many of us—certainly for me and many fellow practitioners I've known for years—is equating the sense of being more peaceful with things going well, with being good, and then feeling that disturbance means something's gone wrong, that we're a bad meditator. But actually, it's often the disturbance that activates the need for insight in meditation. In some ways, you could say the path becomes a path of allowing ourselves to be disturbed. Disturbance is the path. It's not in the way; it becomes part of the path.

When we can't control the state, when we haven't got the conditions, when we get sick or aging or we lose our faculties a bit, when we're not in a peaceful situation, we get triggered. And if we're just relying on the peace, then we don't really have any ability to deal with what is probably ninety percent of our life.

So the seeing into requires the breath steadying, but also opening the mind, opening the awareness. This can be a choice—we can sometimes just move in and out of that. Sometimes we're just developing samatha and really want to explore that, and that's a very good practice to keep working at. We might just say, "Not now, I don't really want to look at that state," and turn the attention back. Sometimes we do that and it keeps rising. And so then it's an opportunity to explore what's arising, what's happening here. We change our attitude—rather than "this is disturbing me" or "distracting me," we explore this as an opportunity to contemplate this dhamma.

And the dhammas that disturb us, that we will be contemplating, will be within the teaching form of what's traditionally called the hindrances—nivarana. Just to mention these: I know we've heard about them a lot. But they still trick us, don't they? We still forget. We still get carried away. We still struggle with them. So it's really important to name these territories and realize that each of them is what we'll be working with every day until they're uprooted, until they're transformed, until they no longer trick us or overwhelm us.

The first one is very powerful. It's kama tanha, kama chanda—the energy of wanting, wanting something else. Have you experienced that today? There are different forms, and we'll look at some of the different forms of that tanha, that thirsting energy. The translation "sensual desire" is often used, but in this particular formulation, it's looking at the desire to absorb into a sensory experience. I think when we're in this kind of space with very little sensory stimulation, we really get to see that energy wanting something. This isn't about being a bad person or something being wrong—it's a dhamma, it's nature. When we identify with it and it becomes "me," then it becomes a sense of self and a struggle. But when it arises and we recognize, "This is the mind in a state of wanting, it's a dhamma, it's nature," then we can contemplate it.

This is sati sampajañña—mindfully bringing clear comprehension, mindful attention, contemplation, and awareness. How is this? How does it move? What are its narratives? What are the thought forms? And where does it take us? Then, not to follow it, not to follow that movement, and to feel the agitation in that.

So much of the practice is about containing these hindrances as they arise. That's where you need the strength—like the back of that knife or the wax of the candle. You need some steadiness to contain, especially if desire is strong, or its opposite: aversion, irritation. It can range from a subtle sense of just feeling a bit off to even rage. Something comes up—a memory, someone who upset us, something that happened—and we think, "I don't really want to deal with this. I'm here on my peaceful retreat." And it crashes in. And then, there it is.

And it's very painful. But to remember, as Ajahn Chah would say, desire, hindrances—this is the path. It's not outside of the path. It's actually building our path of awakening. The strength and the enlightenment qualities needed to support our awakening don't arise in a vacuum. They arise from working with the dukkha, from working with the hindrances. So it becomes, "Oh, okay. How then am I going to be with this?"

This middle way of not absorbing into experience and continuing to inflame it, and not repressing or turning away, but to tolerate, to contain. A really good way of working with these two quite strong energies—these first two hindrances—is to go beneath, to see the cognitive thought forms, how they perpetuate. Those are connected with the sense of me. If you notice, within all those narratives there's a star character, which is me and my opinion about it all.

But we can also explore going beneath the cognitive. This is where the practice of body awareness is so important—into the body and the felt sense. How does this feel underneath? Not to do that to try and fix, but to just bring pure awareness there. Breath, attention. Breathing with the constriction, breathing with the fire, breathing with the discontent, breathing with the longing and the wanting, breathing with the lust, with the hate, with the rage, with the upset. Just feeling where it is in the body, and trusting—because you're not trying to fix it from the sense of self. We're trusting awareness, the fundamental nature of mind, which is connected with wisdom and intelligence and healing and transformation. So our job is very simple. It's not to sort it all out, but just to bring awareness to the point of contact where the hindrance is felt. Breathing there.

The same applies to dullness, though it's more difficult because we go dull, shut down, don't want to do it, don't want to be here. It's connected with aversion, and it can be psychologically profound—this sense of "I just don't want to be." It's an aspect of desire, the desire not to be. It's quite painful to feel, so we go dull. These are habits of shutting down, of not being fully embodied. The mind also has subtler ways of dullness—just sort of sliding into sleep when we're not necessarily tired. It's just the hindrance.

Being able to bring some inquiry to that, the energy of inquiry—"What is this?"—can help. Open the eyes, shift the posture, bring a little bit of energy to explore that state. It's quite hard to explore, actually. It's easier in some ways to explore something with a lot of energy, like desire and aversion. With dullness, it's more like, "Oh, where's the bed? I just shut down." But what we can do is not have a big ambitious project about it. We simply say, "Can I stretch my awareness a little bit around this state? Bring a little more attention, stay with that. Where is it in the body? How does it feel?" Before we just slide along with it.

Similarly with restlessness, which we can really feel. Restlessness and doubt—those two are very connected, the last two hindrances. Anxiety, insecurity, lack of confidence, not being sure. These kinds of worrying. This is often a default place we go to, just worry, anxious. It's connected with that doubt and the restlessness of mind. When the Buddhist lists talk about the ten fetters and the overcoming of each on the path of awakening, the maturing of full awakening, one of the last to go is restlessness of mind. So we're going to have to be patient with these energies, from subtle to quite coarse, to quite profound sense of doubt that projects onto the sense of self. "I don't know what I'm doing, why am I here, where I'm going. I haven't got a clue, I'm useless." Or "I don't know about all of this, I don't know what to do."

To be able to tolerate this is profound—to be able to tolerate doubt, to know that that which knows doubt isn't doubtful. It can be confident. It's important to see this is just doubt, mind in doubt, because it happens a lot. And it has this seduction—this feeling that I've got to come up with a plan, some clarity, be firm and sure. But it's okay not to know. Just tolerate that state. I don't know. But I know that I'm aware and I'm present. I'm just here, and that's enough. Simply here, watching and being with the activity of mind as it's rising and passing, manifesting and shaping the sense of self within the fundamental awareness and presence of conscious attention.

Ajahn Chah spoke about this. When we have the experience of hindrances, when we find ourselves triggered and different states arise, feeding the activity of mind—particularly that which is difficult to be with—he said to know and watch your heart, and to know that it's pure. Its fundamental nature is pure, but these states come in and colour it.

the awareness, the heart, the citta. So he said, be like a tightly woven net—catch what arises and examine what's present before you react.

That's very good advice, by the way. How often do we react on strong emotion or feeling, and then we have to live with the karma of it and clean up the mess? So to practice with these states in this container, we have the space to really get to know very thoroughly how they operate within us. So that when we get triggered and they arise, we don't just get shaped and reactive and pulled along, but we can know: "That's desire, that's wanting. I can let it go, let it be. I don't have to be born into that." Or: "That's aversion, I'm really averse. Just be patient, just soften." Whether it's dullness or restlessness or doubt, agitation, worry, fear, anxiety, and so on—just to recognize that a moment of knowing these states just as they are is a moment of nourishing the seed of liberation. It's not a wasted moment. Sometimes these states can get more fierce before they begin to lose their intensity, before they lose their power over us.

This work that we're involved with here, it's not a magic wand, really. One sort of wishes it was. Take this pill—blue one or red one—and out of the matrix, boing! Even that wasn't an easy path. It's why it's called practice. So we just pace ourselves. We're in a long stream of practice and awakening. And as mentioned on the first night, from the text, the path activity in and of itself breaks up that which obstructs. And then the fruit of that path activity arises according to the Dhamma. We don't have to manufacture the fruit. We're tending the ground so that fruit can arise.

But it is important to recognize moments of the fruit, actually, because they're always here. We might not be in the ultimate jhana, but there's a little bit more peace. There's some more interest and inquiry into what's really happening here. What is this state? I'm really interested in this. How does it feel? I can be with this. I can breathe with it. And then perhaps a moment of really seeing through its density, its seduction, the sense of me-ness about it, and realizing: "Oh, it's Dhamma. It's just nature. It's not self. It's not defining ultimately who I am. It's anicca—arising and passing and pulsing and lacking any substance."

The Buddha said that once you're working with and seeing these hindrances, the fruit of that, as you become less entrapped by them—he said you're going to feel like someone who's free from debt. The heaviness, the sense that you owe something, that you're burdened by something, starts to lift. Or it's like being free from a sickness. You don't even know that you're suffering from this kind of sickness until it starts to lift and you think, "Oh, I feel pretty good. There's some space, there's some joy, there's some energy, there's some authentic sense of well-being, some clarity."

It's like being freed from prison. When we're caught up in the hindrances, it's like the mind has become imprisoned, has lost its true nature. Or it's like being free from servitude—you're not just being pulled around by this state and that state. You have choice, agency. "I don't really think I want to go down that route." That's what mindfulness will do. It will deliver us and give us more mindfulness, more choice. "I don't need to be pulled down there." And that's very liberating.

Or he said, it's like leaving a desolate territory. You've been a long time in a barren, desolate place, and you come to an oasis where there's a pool and coconut juice.

I'm elaborating now—I don't think that was in the suttas—but anyway, you have that feeling of enjoyment, pleasure, the pleasure of being alive. You're reclaiming your human nature: kindness, compassion, well-being, empathy, clarity. The spiritual faculties start to naturally emerge. We can divert them, certainly, but they are inherently present within this true nature of mind. They begin to become visible for us.

So little by little, whatever has been happening for us today, or if we've had any difficulties—never give up on yourself or this practice. Remember, that's part of the practice. Sometimes I can feel completely done in, lost and overwhelmed. But remembering that it's always possible, whatever is happening, to return again and again to this moment, this breath—we find our way back to the path, one breath at a time.

Attending To The Immovable

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound retreat talk, Ajahn Kittisaro explores the essential shift from grasping at changing conditions to resting in the unchanging ground of awareness. Drawing from the encounter between Venerable Anuruddha and Venerable Sāriputta, he illuminates how even accomplished practitioners can remain bound by conceit, restlessness, and anxiety when focused solely on spiritual attainments rather than turning toward the deathless (amata).
> The talk weaves together teachings on yoniso manasikāra (wise reflection) and avijjā (ignorance), using the beautiful similes of guest and host, and dust dancing in sunlight from Mahāyāna sources. Just as guests come and go while the host remains, and dust moves while space stays motionless, all experiences arise and pass within an unmoving awareness. Kittisaro connects this to the Buddha's declaration that the heart is inherently luminous (pabhassara citta), though we lose touch with this original brightness when confused by what moves through it.
> With characteristic warmth and humor, Kittisaro shares his own journey through serious illness and how Ajahn Sumedho's permission to simply 'let go' became a gateway to peace. He encourages practitioners to notice the silence underlying all sound, the space containing all form, and to trust that peace is always here and now (sandiṭṭhiko, akāliko). The teaching offers a gentle yet radical invitation: rather than endlessly polishing conditions, we can rest into what Ajahn Chah called 'doing everything with a mind that lets go.'

I take this opportunity to offer some reflections on the Dharma.

As we enter the heart of our retreat, this very precious opportunity we have to be in a place conducive for wise reflection—the Buddha used the phrase yoniso manasikara, which we translate as wise reflection. Tonight I'll talk a little bit about that, about some of what it encourages us to ponder.

When there's a lack of wise reflection, when we're making assumptions in a compulsive, conditioned way about what is true, what is false, what is mine, what is yours, what should be, what shouldn't be—that lack of wise reflection the Buddha called avijja. Vijja means seeing clearly. The prefix a means not—not seeing clearly. It's translated as ignorance, a kind of ignoring of the actuality. We're imagining that our views and opinions are the truth, but there's an unconscious ignoring. We're not really using this instrument we have, this precious instrument within us, inherent in our nature—consciousness that can discern, that can wisely reflect, that can align with and know things the way they actually are. When there's the avijja, when there's the ignorance that the Buddha talked about, it is the condition that gives rise to all suffering.

So we've all made the effort, the commendable effort and not easy effort, to let go for a time. It's like a gesture of what the Buddha called viveka—leaving the life, the habits, the daily routines, the responsibilities. Yes, they come with us, but we're leaving that circumstance for the sake of retreating, for the sake of cultivating this wise reflection that can illumine the nature of things and liberate us from that which gives rise to and perpetuates suffering, distress, conflict, confusion—what the Buddha called the whole mass of suffering.

I'd like to start with just the outlines of an encounter, a story recorded in the scriptures, the Buddhist teachings, of a meeting between the Venerable Anuruddha and Venerable Sariputra. Sariputra, you remember, is one of the Buddha's chief disciples, foremost in wisdom. This encounter took place before Anuruddha was enlightened. Already he was formidable, a bit intimidating. But he approached Venerable Sariputra because they were colleagues. I don't know if he said "friend" or "venerable sir," but he was respectful, I'm sure.

He said something like—I don't have the exact words recorded—but something like, "My divine eye can see clearly the multifold, thousand-world system." Already at that time he was known for his samadhi; he was good at mindfully staying present. And he was already known for being foremost at this inner vision, being able to see the subtle realms in all the different directions. "With my divine eye I see the thousand-fold world system," he said. "My energy is aroused and unsluggish." He went on to say, "The mindfulness is unshaken. The body is calm. The heart, the citta, the mind is concentrated, singular. But I still suffer. This heart is still not liberated."

When Sariputra answered, he said, "Friend, when you have that thought—'my divine eye, foremost in the Sangha, that can see the thousand-world system'—that is connected to your conceit, this idea about yourself." He said those thoughts of your energy being aroused and unsluggish, the mindfulness unshaken, the body calm, the heart concentrated—that's connected to your restlessness, always having something else to do, somewhere to get to, something to accomplish. And he said, "That thought, when you have the thought 'but I still suffer, the mind is not liberated' from what's called the floods that sweep us and carry us away—when you have that thought, it's connected to your anxiety."

This next phrase is interesting. Sariputra said, "It would be well when those thoughts arise to let them be, to just abandon them and turn your mind to the deathless. Turn your mind to that which never dies."

I'd like to talk this evening about this slight adjustment, slight but profound, of our attention that is so important. It wasn't long after Anuruddha took up that instruction that he was freed.

Remember, when we chant every morning the qualities of the Dharma, the Buddha is talking about this timeless, peaceful nature. He says it's always here and now. It's not somewhere else. We chant it every day: sanditiko—that means this peace, unshakeable peace, is not somewhere else. Akaliko—it's not bound in time.

It's not only available when I've done it all right and feel I deserve it, or when I've experienced enough pain. It's timeless. It's not just for a Tuesday or a full moon or when Jupiter is at mid-heaven—timeless. It's ehipassiko, always inviting us.

So what could that be? What is the Buddha telling Anuruddha, who is being honest about his situation? With his divine eye, he could see all these forms. He was being mindful, making effort. His samādhi was good. But he was doing stuff. And this recurring thought kept arising: "But I'm not free, I'm not enlightened."

The Buddha didn't say you must crush those thoughts. He didn't say you must obliterate them. Something more like abandon—rather than being preoccupied with them—he was talking about a softening, a widening, a letting be. Don't pay attention to that. Turn your mind to that which is not coming, not going.

This is a very important principle in the Dharma. The Buddha once said this heart is luminous. It is already luminous. But we lose touch with it when we get confused by what's moving through the heart. This is a clue. The heart is luminous, but we lose touch with what the Buddha called, on occasion, the original brightness—this source, this true nature. The phrase he used was pabhassara citta, radiant heart.

We lose touch with this when we get confused by what's moving through. What's moving through now? Tuesday night, Dharma talk, Kittisaro Dharma talk. Right now the sounds are touching the heart, but do they just stay there? They dissolve. But sometimes we don't notice what's moving through the heart if we're busy reacting: "I wonder how long he's going to go on tonight."

A little aside: once Ajahn Chah was giving a Dharma talk underneath his hut in Thailand. In the jungle, amid the sounds and the dark, he's in his chair giving the talk. A little way in, one of the novices grabbed his flashlight and turned it on. A beam of light opened up into the room and found the clock on the wall. Big mistake. There was a collective gasp—all the monks knew what that meant. That talk went on for hours.

I won't go on for hours. But notice: we lose touch with what's actually moving through the heart when our thinking takes over—"Oh, it's good, it's not good, I'm wondering if... will it be... like it, not like it." What if we come to the actuality right now? The sights of this hall, shifting as our attention moves and we blink. Those impressions are coming and going, appearing and dissolving in the heart. The sounds.

"Dharma talk" might sound like a noun that could get sent off to the library, given a title. Might be a great talk or, "Oh golly, that was an ordeal." It sounds like a thing. But as we have the chance, through wise reflection, to illuminate a Dharma talk, we find it's full of holes. Sounds that keep dissolving. The Dharma talk appears and dissolves. The sensations of our body, mixed with the sounds of the talk, feeling tones—a cascade of shifting and changing, which we've been contemplating as anicca.

Turn your mind to the deathless.

When one really notices change, notices what's arising and ceasing, noticing these thoughts, we can also, with just a slight shift of attention, notice what is not changing. The sounds are shifting and changing within an unmoving listening. That's just a name for it—an unmoving awareness. That's another name.

The name is coming and going. The sounds are moving within the true nature of the name. In the Tao Te Ching, Lao Tzu said, "The name that can be named is not the eternal name." Any name is going to be dissolved. God, the supreme reality—dissolves. Nibbana, with a capital N—it's a name.

The first disciple who had a breakthrough after the Buddha's awakening was one of the five ascetics the Buddha used to practice with. When the Buddha was trying to figure out who might understand his realization, he remembered them. They had a lot of faith in the Bodhisattva, the prince, because he had left all that behind. He was the super-duper ascetic—he could eat less, endure more pain, make more effort than anybody.

You all remember that they abandoned Siddhartha when he had gotten so emaciated and realized he wasn't getting anywhere. He had that memory under the rose apple tree as a child, and he knew he needed to leave behind these ascetic practices. That's when he returned to being with the breathing. He knew he needed to eat something to have the strength to do that. He accepted that offering from Sujata of milk rice, and the five ascetics just left him. "Slacker. He's reverted to luxury."

But after the Buddha was awake, when he was wondering who to try to share this with, he knew they would understand. He saw with his inner vision, his awakened vision, where they were—outside of Benares in the Deer Park. He made his way there, and as he approached, at first they said, "Hey look, he's coming. We'll let him sit down if he wants, but the slacker—we're not going to do any special things for him." But they couldn't help themselves. They couldn't help but make some gestures of respect.

When he declared he was awakened and would teach them, they said, "That's a bit too far. You're the slacker. You've reverted to luxury." Three times he said, "Look, I've realized the way. You practice it, so will you." They kept saying, "Look, you've reverted to luxury. That's impossible." They had some views.

And then he said, "Have I ever talked this way? Have I ever lied to you? Do you ever remember me lying to you?"

Somehow that penetrated their heart. They listened. He gave that first discourse on the Four Noble Truths. And at the end, the Buddha exclaimed—he saw what had happened during the discourse, during that talk—that one of the disciples, Kondañña, had broken through, had an insight. So he exclaimed, it's right there in the sutra at the end of the discourse: "Kondañña knows! Kondañña knows!"

What does he know? The Buddha restates it: he knows whatever has the nature to arise has the nature to cease. Whatever has the nature to arise has the nature to cease.

Doesn't sound very spectacular. But as I was speaking yesterday morning, that cultivation, that recognition of the changing nature, is so profoundly liberating. We start to see all the things that we think were me and mine, and as we see them coming and going, arising and ceasing, there's the recognition: what is it that's mine? As we see what comes and goes, we start to get the experience of the heart that remains—that which is aware.

Kondañña—it's not in that first sutra, but in a Mahayana discourse, Kondañña speaks a little more about what happened to him, what helped him break through. What's called entering the stream. He touched Nibbana. He knew the deathless.

So when Sariputra is encouraging Anuruddha, "Turn your mind to the deathless," that's what happened to Kondañña in that talk. He realized what he hadn't seen before—what was not coming and going.

He spoke about what helped him see that. He put it like this when he was recounting that experience. It was in an assembly where different disciples were talking about how they broke through. He said, "Of the elders now present in this assembly, I receive that name, Añña Kondañña—the one who knows. Because I was enlightened to the meaning of the words guest dust. Guest dust. And I realized the fruition."

And then he gives two similes. These are really helpful, I've found in practice.

It is like a traveler who stops as a guest at a roadside inn, perhaps for the night or perhaps for a meal. When he is finished lodging there or when the meal is finished, he packs his bags and sets out again. He does not remain there at leisure. The host, however, does not go far away. Considering it this way, Kondañña went on, the one who does not remain is called the guest, and the one that does remain is called the host. Guest, then, means what does not remain.

Like in this talk, the sounds, the words are guests. They do not remain. That's the first image.

Again, the second. When the sky clears up, the morning sun rises with all resplendence, and its golden rays stream into a house through a crevice to reveal particles of dust in the air. The dust dances in the rays of light, but the empty space is motionless. Considering it this way, what is clear and still is called space. What moves is called dust. Dust, then, means that which moves.

We've seen that—the dust, the light, the dust dancing. What if we wanted the dust not to dance? What if we were trying to make them move a certain way? What if we want the guests not to come and go? It is the nature of dust to dance. But what if we let the dust be dust? This gives us a clue when Sāriputta told Anuruddha, "Don't worry about those thoughts. Turn your mind to the deathless." When the dust is dancing, what if we just widen our vision and notice what is not dancing? The space remains untroubled.

Now we can look at this phrase, wisely reflecting—yoniso manasikāra. It points to the same phenomenon. Yoni means womb. It's talking about a space that then gives birth. It's the matrix, the context. Manasikāra means to do. Mana is the mind. So yoniso manasikāra is letting, putting the activity of mind into the womb of awareness. Wise reflection could be called radical reflection. It's returning to the root.

Every sound, every guest of moods and experiences is coming and going, but what remains? When the sound ends, do we just keel over dead? There's still the listening. There's still the knowing. There's the unmoving refuge. Buddha.

So right now, many of us are seeing we're not as accomplished as Anuruddha. But everyone here, we have some effort, some wholesome effort that's really been practiced. There's been some cultivation of presence. We definitely experience, I suspect most of us, some sense of struggle and stress. But Sāriputta and also the Buddha and certainly Ajahn Chah encouraged us to notice what happens if we get so caught up in trying to just get it right—always becoming, always getting on to a little more samādhi, or trying to get rid of that and thinking, "Well, as long as this is there, there's no way I can have a breakthrough."

What if we just let it be dust dancing? All right now, these sounds, these sensations, whatever we happen to be feeling—the mood, the thoughts—just as they are, can we let them be what they actually are? They're conditions that come and go. They're guests. That's their nature. It's like dust dancing. Trying to get the dust to stay a certain way is a recipe for frustration. The Buddha compared it to trying to grab air. You try to grab it, you reap weariness.

Ajahn Chah used a more earthy example. When we want conditions to be what they can't be

We're wanting a happy feeling to stay. We're wanting the painful feelings to be gone. We're wanting that sense of peace and understanding to be solid. But as we start to notice anicca, we realize that actually every sight, every sound, every feeling, every taste, every smell, every sensation, every perception is just like these sounds—becoming otherwise every instant, like the dust dancing.

And yet, looking for certainty in that which is uncertain, as Ajahn Chah said, we're bound to suffer. He said it's just like going up to a duck and saying, "Why aren't you a chicken?" I mean, ducks are all right, don't get me wrong, but you know—quack, quack. Think, if you cockle-doodle-doo, you could wake people up! Think of the good karma. I don't know if quack-quack is that good karma. He said it's like wanting a duck to be a chicken. Yes, that's what we do when we're wrestling with conditions.

By turning the mind to the deathless, what if for a moment we just let the feelings, let the sounds, let the moods just be as they are? And just widen the attention to notice what remains. Listening is so helpful. The sounds come and go, but the listening remains. The knowing remains. Resting in it.

The womb of awareness is wider. When we're contracted around the particularization, the atomization, we get contracted around me and this and that. We forget that every experience is happening within this ocean-like, boundless presence. So wise reflection is not denying the conditions, but recognizing how they return to this womb, this space, this matrix of awareness.

So it is said: just as form is to space—we're noticing the forms in this room, but we're also recognizing the relationship of these forms to space. We're surrounded right now by boundless space above, below, and all around. It's a fact. Just as form is to space, and silence is to sound, so too is awareness to all experience.

So for a time, rather than—we might still have liking this form, not liking that one—we can just let that be. We're not crushing anything. Whatever the habit happens to be, let it be for now. But just contemplate: just as space is to form, you can't have forms without space. We get so contracted around our opinions about forms that we don't realize—we're coming for this meeting, then in a while this room will be empty. The space remains. Forms come and go. As silence is to sound.

So, just a slight adjustment in our practice. It's not crushing anything. We still notice the thoughts and sounds, but we're noticing that they're coming and going within a silent listening. This is called radical reflection. It's called the Śūraṅgama Samādhi in this famous Mahayana discourse, because śūraṅgama means durable, unshakable. The deathless doesn't shake. The dust dancing in the sunbeam—it's supposed to shake.

So all the feelings we're having now, even the opinion, "Oh gosh, I don't know what this is. I don't know if I can really do it. I haven't had much samādhi. Usually you only have a breakthrough if you really..." What if we let that be dust dancing? That's dancing within a silent listening. Letting be. Letting things come and go by relaxing.

No matter how much we do. That's why Anuruddha couldn't do it. We keep trying to do it. In Zen they call it trying to polish a brick, hoping you get a mirror. It's squeezing the samādhi, wanting a little more, having to get the feelings just right. It's endless. Or as the Buddha said, it's like cooking sand, hoping you're going to get a nice meal.

He said this clinging at conditions and wanting them—my body, my feelings—wanting those to be stable, that's the problem. That's why recognizing change is so important, because as we see, all these things we're clinging to are shifting, changing. They're like a waterfall.

When we walk up close to a waterfall, it might be a famous waterfall. "I'm going to go see so-and-so waterfall." You might feel an attachment to it. "We've got one of the best waterfalls." But as we get close to it—the thunder sound, the incredible mist—waterfall sounds like a thing, but as we then try to grab it, one can just appreciate it. It's like that dust dancing. When we really start to recognize that actually this life of ours is a cascading waterfall of sights and sounds, feelings and thoughts, wanting that to stay in a certain form is dukkha. That's why there's the relinquishment. That's the insight then into "not mine," because how could it be mine? It's not even a thing. It's an ever-flowing stream.

That's why the bowing is so important. Yes, effort. And a lot of us have beautiful effort here. Effort's important to cultivate presence and investigation and seeing change. But if there's only that yang, trying to get it right, that's the cooking sand hoping for the good meal. It's polishing the brick wanting the mirror. It's still sitting there asking that duck why it's not a chicken.

At some point there's the—and for all of us, we don't have to wait till things are perfect—there's that turning the heart to the unmoving. That's not somewhere else; it's our nature. It's right here. The silence is before the sound. Every sound dissolves.

Our teacher called it "minding the gap." He encouraged us to, yes, notice the thoughts, but even take a simple one: "I'm sitting." Listen to that inner voice, that inner sound. "I'm..." and notice it's vibrating. "...sitting..." and then notice it dissolves. Do we keel over dead? That moment after the thought is just bright knowing. He encouraged us to mind that gap, to attend to the deathless, to this womb, to this original brightness.

The Buddha called it this: "It is this primal bright essence of consciousness that can bring forth all conditions. But because of conditions you consider it to be lost. Living beings lose sight of this original brightness."

It's not somewhere else. It's always right here, inviting us. When we bow, when we relax, when we trust that it's not that we have to get somewhere else—that's endless. "No, no, no, excuse me. When I get there, I'll talk to you. I've got to get there. I've got to get rid of this." That's how conditions can cause us to lose sight of what is always here.

Every sound, every impression emerges and dissolves back into this original brightness. Again, the Buddha put it like this: "It is this primal bright essence of consciousness that can bring forth all conditions. Because of conditions you consider it to be lost, and then living beings lose sight of the original brightness. Therefore, though they use it to the end of their days, they are unaware of it, and without intending, enter the various destinies of birth and death."

So encouraging us to—yes, there's wonderful effort, but let's not overlook the soft effort sometimes. The just letting things be just like this. And honoring the perfection. The guests are showing themselves; our patterns are showing themselves. "Oh, but I should have been beyond this by now. I mean, I thought... I mean, it was really going good."

So-and-so really tripped me up. I'm not blaming anybody, but I can't believe they call themselves a meditator. I mean, you'd think there would be some screening or something. I know, I know, I shouldn't be worrying...

Just with whatever the pattern is, can it just be perfectly? When it's "me and mine," there's one big heck of a wrestling match going on. But when it's Dharma, then it is Dharma. It's part of nature. Let the dust dance. It's the guests coming and going.

What remains? What is it that's not coming and going? We rest into that. It's this ground of the heart.

I was such a doer. I wanted to do all the toughest practices because I was so strong. I used to be a wrestler. I could walk on my hands in my early days as a monk—a hundred yards. I used to teach the monks aṅga yoga before dawn in the early... I was just a postulant, making extra effort, doing this and that. And that wasn't bad. It's not bad to make effort. But I was just... I didn't have any sense of this. What does it mean that the peace is always here and now, always inviting us?

Well, it took a heavenly messenger to help me. I got typhoid fever, almost died. Months and months of diarrhea, then the fever, then urinating blood, and then really sick. I ended up being laid out for three years. I had to lie down pretty much for three years, feeling a bit like a failure, seeing all kinds of doctors. My teachers, my Western teachers, were worried about me. I was seeing all kinds of healers and doctors. When we moved to Chithurst Monastery in England from Thailand, I had this little attic room where I could just be sick. But I was still trying to get better.

Ajahn Sumedho remembered I was so strong. He remembered me when I had so much energy, and he so wanted me to get better. Then one day he realized, Golly, I'm just putting a burden on Kittisaro. I didn't know that's what he was thinking when I was lying there on my floor. I felt like I had a spear in my side for years—just burning, indigestion, internal bleeding. Really pale and thin and collapsed. He came into my room and sat down on the floor next to me and said, "Kittisaro, I just want to apologize."

I said, "You want to apologize?"

"I want to apologize that I've been putting all this stress on you—wanting you to get better, wanting you to get better, wanting you to get better." He said, "Kittisaro, I give you permission to die."

He didn't smile. He just said, "I give you permission to die."

And the relief. I cried for joy.

It's not that I didn't know these practices then, but that really gave me permission just to let being sick be being sick. Let it be a heavenly messenger. Let each of us honor our heavenly messengers—our karmic conditions appearing to us perfectly. Dissolving and flickering in this luminous heart that's never gone anywhere, never will go anywhere, is unstained. This original brightness is not somewhere else.

But that gave me permission. And I loved lying down. That was my practice. Each out-breath, I let go.

What's so wonderful when you're really tired and let go—the floor, the ground holds you. I kept letting go into this ground of awareness. There's a ground floor. It's our nature. Each out-breath, each sound, each word dissolves into this. Each out-breath, letting go. Really contemplating what remains. Pleasure and pain, they are perfect as they are. What remains?

We can do this. We don't have to get typhoid and lie down for three years. In ordinary moments—when Ajahn Chah was walking on alms round with the monks one day, he pointed to a really large boulder. He turned around to the monks and said, "Is that boulder heavy?" The monks were thinking, what is this, a trick question? "Yes, Luang Por, yes, Venerable Father, it's heavy." And Ajahn Chah said, "Nah, it's not heavy if you don't try to lift it."

All of us have patterns. Is the pain in the back heavy when you're trying to shift it, wrestle with it? Is being sick heavy? Yes—when I wanted to try to get better so that I could be a real monk and really do the right stuff, that was carrying a big boulder. When Ajahn Sumedho said, "You have permission to die," I had permission just to let it be. It was still painful, but I wasn't adding anything. It was just relief.

In moments we'll notice ourselves wrestling something, pushing, pulling. And this is important. It's not a waste of time. The Buddha didn't call it a First Noble Truth for nothing. Suffering isn't a waste. As Ajahn Chah would say, if it was a bad thing, he wouldn't call it a noble truth. So we open to it and get a sense for this wrestling. But as we practice letting be, letting go, and trusting that we're letting go into what is always here and now—that's what the Buddha taught. This peace is always here and now.

Even moments of noticing when we're generating suffering, and then a moment when it's just what it is—this is very important. Turning our mind to the deathless. Letting the dust and the sounds keep arising and dissolving into this unmoving, ever bright, fathomless, silent listening.

I'll give Ajahn Chah the last words tonight. I'm so grateful for his example and the example of my teachers—Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Sumedho, Master Hsuan Hua—and for my fellow practitioners, who keep encouraging each other.

From Ajahn Chah: "Do everything with a mind that lets go. Do not expect praise or reward. If you let go a little, you will have a little peace. If you let go a lot, you will have a lot of peace. If you let go completely, you will know complete peace. Your struggles with the world will have come to an end."

May the blessings of this day be shared above, below, and all around. Blessings don't belong to anyone. The more we relax and let them be and let them flow, they expand exponentially—like a pebble dropping into a pool, sending ripples in all directions effortlessly. As we breathe out, so too may the goodness and blessings of our lives extend in all directions, touching all space, all forms, blessing all beings.

CHAPTER 203

Four Modes of Progress and Working with Difficult Emotions

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this engaging talk, Bhante Buddharakkhita draws from the Vitara Sutta (AN) to illuminate the Buddha's teaching on four modes of progress in meditation: painful with slow comprehension, painful with quick comprehension, pleasant with slow comprehension, and pleasant with quick comprehension. He emphasizes that these are not fixed categories but fluid states that can shift from moment to moment, encouraging practitioners not to label themselves or compare their experience with others.
> The talk explores how the five spiritual faculties (pañcindriya)—faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—influence our progress, and how sharpening these faculties can transform painful practice into pleasant practice. Drawing from the Vitakkasaṇṭhāna Sutta (MN 20), Bhante offers five practical methods for working with unskillful mental states: substitution (replacing unwholesome thoughts with their opposites), reflection on the danger of negative states, redirection (bringing attention back to breath or body), retracing (investigating the root causes of difficult emotions), and resolution (making strong daily determinations through adhiṭṭhāna).
> Through personal stories from his monastic life—including memorable encounters at airports and a night spent meditating in a Thai cemetery—Bhante illustrates these teachings with warmth and humor, demonstrating how even experienced practitioners face challenging mental states and can work skillfully with them. The talk offers accessible guidance for transforming our relationship with greed, hatred, and delusion in both formal practice and daily life.

And my friends, I'm inspired by your practice. It's almost two weeks, in case you don't remember. It's so inspiring, really. And I think each of the teachers here is inspiring because they have been through it, they know. Three months. All these teachers you see here have been really practicing, and all of you have been practicing too. It's so inspiring to see other people really practicing.

So today I would like to talk about four ways of progress and working with difficult mind states or emotions.

Maybe by now you are beginning to ask yourself what you got into, especially if you have never done six weeks. You're wondering what's going on here. It's hard, it's painful. Is that familiar to you? I know, when I was here in 1999, the first week was so painful. And I was going to be here for three months. I had also signed up for the New Year retreat, so after three months, then another New Year retreat. I was wondering, how is it going to be for the next three months plus a New Year retreat? I think it was led by Rodney Smith. Sometime less than a week. But all the same, I was really trying to project what was going to be down the road.

So I want to talk about these four ways of progress. These are not failures, in case you fit in any of the categories. It's not failure, whether it's slow or quick. I'll draw from a discourse of the Buddha called the Vītara Sutta from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, the numerical discourses of the Buddha.

In this discourse, the Buddha talks about four ways of progress. And maybe you can relate to them. One of them is painful practice or progress with slow comprehension. Is that familiar to you? Another one is painful progress with quick comprehension. What about that? Another one is pleasant progress with slow comprehension. Maybe some of you fit in this category. The fourth one is pleasant progress and quick comprehension. How many of you fit in that? I wish all of us fit in that category.

It's very important not to put yourself in a pigeon box and say this is where I belong. It's just pointing towards the way we progress, how the practice manifests, because you can switch. And this is not for the whole six weeks, by the way. Not for three months are you going to be fitting in one category. You can change from day to day, from one sitting to one sitting.

But what's very interesting about these four ways of progress is not to take it personally in case the practice is very painful. Not to take it personally, or not to compare with others who seem to sit comfortably and really cruise in for three hours, while for you, within twenty minutes, it's so painful.

So this is very helpful to know—that different people have different mental faculties. In Pali, these are called indriya, the five mental faculties, and they will change also. The first one is faith and confidence. The second is energy, effort. Some people have a lot of energy. They can sit until morning, maybe two AM, maybe eleven. The third one is mindfulness. It's also a mental faculty. Some people are very good at mindfulness.

They walk slowly, every time, all the time. These are simply different mental faculties at work.

And then there is concentration. Some people have more concentration than others. Some have moment-to-moment concentration, while others have really deep concentration. Those who practice the jhānas can even count them—one, two, three, four—and it goes to eight. Some people are good at that.

Some people are good at wisdom. They can discern details, the elements, and all of this. Wonderful people. And I've seen it at the Uganda Buddhist Center. My mother became a nun, and she is good at faith—faith and confidence in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. I have another devotee who is a staunch Buddhist. He can talk and talk about everything. But when it comes to faith, he has so much. So I've seen this happening actually.

I'll talk more about these five spiritual faculties—how to arouse them and how to sharpen them—in my next talk. But in this talk, I would like to discuss what makes progress painful, and how we can convert that pain, how we can shift from painful to pleasant, at least for a moment.

This is about the mental states that make practice difficult for us, painful for us, very stressful for us. These mental states are three: greed, hatred, and delusion. We can bunch all unwholesome mental states into these three.

Perhaps to help you understand how these mental states manifest in our daily life here at IMS, we can start with something very familiar to us: the notes board. How many times do you check the notes board? One time, two times, three times—reading the same thing again? We encourage you to check at least once, but it's amazing. It's truly amazing. Sometimes I pass by and see how this bulletin board becomes the focus of our attention throughout the day.

Usually, there's not much that changes, actually. There are some changes, no doubt about it. I don't want you to miss anything important—I don't want you to say, "From that last talk, I'm going to stop checking the bulletin board." But try to be moderate in how you check it. There might be an underlying state of mind called greed—that desire for stimulation, that urge to keep looking. Because we read newspapers daily, and now there's no newspaper. Now there's the notes board, a little substitute. So check your mind. See how it goes.

There is another mind state that perhaps you already know about: aversion, anger, hatred—these are all basically the same thing, given different names. You can check this today itself. How is the weather? Is it too hot? Do you like it? It depends where you come from. Me, I'm from Uganda.

But there's something coming up. Maybe it will be a little bit cold in another four weeks. And there's a tendency for me to not like the weather. Even though I can't do much about it, still there's resistance. Because I grew up in Uganda, and I went to India for five years. I spent five years in Sri Lanka. I spent two years in Thailand. So I like it when it's warm. For me, this weather is okay. But when you come from—we have ten countries represented here—yes, I've been to some countries which are cold. And maybe this weather is not good for you. And then there's aversion.

So try to watch your mind state as you go through the day.

Then there's a whole mind state called delusion, the deluded mind. Do you know what that mind state is? Deluded? Some people ask me, "How do I know that I'm deluded?" Of course you are deluded! Actually, most of the time as a teacher, as a monk, I've learned a lot from questions. People ask me so many questions and I say, "Wow, thank you very much for uploading!" Because most of the time I download—I come here and then go back to Uganda, I leave some stuff here. But most of the time when people ask me questions, I say, "Wow, that's a very interesting question."

So, what is delusion? A mind is said to be deluded when it's distorting reality. Taking things which are impermanent, it takes them to be permanent. "I'm angry for the rest of my life"—no, you've been angry for the last two hours. Anger is changing all the time. So that might be a deluded mind. Fixating. Taking things which are impermanent to be permanent. Taking things which are really suffering and taking them to be pleasant. Taking things which are of selfless nature and taking them to have a self. Taking things which are not beautiful, and the mind takes them to be beautiful. In other words, it distorts reality.

This reminds me of an instance that happened in Japan. Cows were dying because of drought. It was a dry season, and they kept giving these cows hay—very dry, brown, very dry—so they didn't eat. They didn't like it. So what the Japanese did was start manufacturing glasses, goggles, with green color. And they put them onto cows. I'm telling you, they ate every single bit. It's just amazing. They didn't even leave a blade of grass which was dry.

It's amazing what goggles we put on in our life that can distort reality.

Here's the good news. The practice is there for us to put on the real glasses.

Not the green goggles, the red goggles, and all that. Because we tend to see life according to our glasses, our goggles, our prism. That's how we see the world.

Sally and all of us are giving this series of practices that helps you to see things clearly—to see things as impermanent, as unsatisfactory, as selfless nature. And also the talk yesterday: seeing the body as the body, not just through your goggles, through your lens. This is very, very interesting.

Now, as my focus today is about these mind states, I would like to tell you that the life of a monk is not as easy as you think. You might think, "Wow, this monk lives in a monastery. Everything is very easy for that monk." And you might think maybe it's so difficult for you. But I'm telling you, it's not easy as a monk—mostly when I'm traveling, actually. Not so much in the monastery where people know me. Like in Uganda, people know me. I have followers. My mother. They know me. It's very easy. They feed me. We meditate together, chant together. It's very easy.

But as soon as I step out of the monastery, life becomes a little bit hard. I have to practice in the same way of practice. Not different. Not only in Uganda, but also here when I was staying in West Virginia for eight years in the monastery.

I remember one incident that challenged me very well. It's very vivid when I even speak about it—how I had to look at my mind state. I think that was 2007. I was scheduled to teach at Spirit Rock, the POC, People of Color retreats, and I was told that I was the first one to break the ice, open the retreat, give the five precepts.

So I left the monastery, arrived at Dallas airport with my alms bowl. I think you have seen my alms bowl. Have you seen my alms bowl? I put it in the check x-ray and then people told me, "What are you carrying? It's confusing the machine. We've never seen it."

I said, "What? You've never seen an alms bowl?"

"It's that we don't know. Please bring it out. Get it out."

I said, "This is my alms bowl. I eat from here."

It brought a lot of problems.

Another time, somebody asked, "We need to check you, we need to check you."

And then I said, "Please, you can check."

They said, "Please stand there. Male assist, male assist."

I looked at the time. Actually, it was getting close to my flight to California. And this is a five-hour flight, and that was the day the retreat was going to start. Some of you may have been on that retreat, I don't know.

But anyway, what happened is they kept on calling, "Male assist." There was no male assist. So I looked around. I said, "My flight is going to leave very soon."

Finally, a male assist came. And I said, "My flight is departing very, very soon."

He said, "Well, we need to check you."

I found that I was really thinking about losing my flight, having to go back to the monastery, which is one hour and a half away, and somebody just dropped me there and left.

So it had implications if I really missed the flight. I started to think about what would happen when I miss the retreat in California—how am I going to eat? I found that the mind was racing through all these mind states: fear, aversion, and all these things.

The male assist started to tell me, "Okay, please, I'm going to touch you." Then I said, "Please, it's all yours."

But as I was thinking about missing my flight and all that, my mind was getting tighter and tighter. So to loosen my mind, what I did was say, "Wow, thank you for the wonderful massage!" We all laughed, actually. It's amazing how everything was changing in the situation.

And then I thought it was over. He said, "Please, now sit down. I want to check your legs." And then he was doing this, touching my feet—I had socks on. It reminded me of 1994 when I did my first retreat in India, at Tushita. There was a Canadian who was teaching reflexology, and I had spent a lot of time having one. So I said, "Wow, this is wonderful reflexology!" And we laughed.

Then another time he said, "Okay"—I thought actually it's over. The second time, the third time he said, "No, just wait a minute. Just step here, step here, step here." Wow, the memory came of when I was in primary school in Uganda. We used to do gymnastics. I said, "Wow, I've spent a long time without doing gymnastics. This is so beautiful!" So we ended the whole thing and I said, "Thank you very much for the wonderful day." And then he told me, "You made my day wonderful."

This showed me that actually we can change our situation in life. We can change it if we want, or if we are ready. So if you have a painful meditation, it doesn't have to be painful. You can change. You can change your situation.

Up to now we have given many, many instructions, many ways on how to deal with the mind and feelings. We've talked about mindfulness. Can I talk about it again? I think you've had enough of it. By the way, can you have enough mindfulness? No. The more the better.

So the way you can actually transform your painful experience into pleasant experience is to be mindful of these mind states which are difficult. Some mind states are not so difficult. Let's say delusion—after all, you are deluded, so maybe it's not so difficult. It may also be pleasant.

Let's talk about greed. Greed is not so painful, but it can be very painful, especially when you go through your day with this attachment, this desire for the next sit to be better. Not to say that you should not have aspirations—you should have aspirations, as Carol talked about. We should aspire for the next sit to be peaceful. But we should not get so attached to how the next sit is going to be, with too many expectations and all that.

I'm going to give you a few ways on how to deal with difficult mind states, drawing from a discourse called the Vitakkasaṇṭhāna Sutta, which we find in the Majjhima Nikāya. It talks about how to deal with obsessive thoughts—how to deal with obsessive thoughts that make our practice difficult.

But before I do that, I would like to draw your attention to these five mental faculties, because some of you may not know where the Buddha mentioned them, but I just want to remind you. Sally has given beautiful talks about right mindfulness. These are words of the Buddha. He said, "Here in this teaching, in this dispensation"—in Pali, "bhikkhus," and you know who are bhikkhus now—"a bhikkhu dwells contemplating the body in the body," and it goes on, "feelings in feelings," and so on, "ardently, with mindfulness, and with clear comprehension."

So there are three mental states, or mental faculties, mentioned here. One is effort, another is mindfulness, and another is clear comprehension—sampajañña.

That's another way of saying wisdom. But the discourse doesn't seem to talk about faith and confidence as a mental factor—yet it's implied. Actually, when the Buddha is talking about practicing mindfulness and effort, it's implied that there's also what you call faith and confidence. How would you end up here without faith and confidence? How would you start practicing mindfulness or breathing without faith and confidence? At least you know that the body is breathing and the mind is aware that the body is breathing. That's faith and confidence. The discourse, of course, doesn't clearly mention that this is the five mental faculties, but it's understood. Even concentration as a mental faculty is implied, because how are you going to move from mindfulness to clear comprehension without concentration?

Some people are complaining, "Oh, I don't get concentration." Actually, there's what we call moment-to-moment concentration that you develop when you practice mindfulness. So please keep on practicing mindfulness, even when you are experiencing very difficult states of mind. That's the first way of sharpening and really making sure that the practice can progress a little bit faster, not too slow.

When the Buddha is talking about these four modes of practice, he's describing different combinations. For the first one, he talks about when you have excessive greed, hatred, and delusion and you feel pain and sorrow. He's talking about when the five mental faculties are dull and not sharp. So you have to sharpen them by the practice of mindfulness. This is very important. And we have to reduce greed, hatred, and delusion—that's what I'm going to talk about. But this is just a reminder for you, because you may be wondering why the practice would involve painful progress and slow comprehension. That's the reason. It's slow comprehension because the five faculties are dull. And it's quick when the five faculties are sharp, very clear—with faith and confidence, mindfulness, effort, concentration, and wisdom. When they're sharp, there will be quick comprehension. But it's painful, of course, whenever there are mental states like greed, hatred, and delusion.

The best progress is when it's pleasant and quick. That's when you have reduced greed, hatred, and delusion, and the five mental faculties are sharp. Pleasant progress with slow comprehension occurs when there's no excess greed, hatred, and delusion, but there are dull faculties.

I think this is very important, but I don't want you to get caught up in labels. You know, "Yes, I'm a meditator who has pleasant and very quick progress"—and you label yourself. In the monastery in West Virginia, people used to put labels on themselves: "Silent Yogi." This was to help them not have discussions with the staff at the monastery. Here, you're not going to hit the newspaper of Barre—what's the newspaper in Barre? Maybe the Barre Gazette. You're not going to make the news that your practice is pleasant and quick. But don't get disappointed either. No need to have labels.

The key is: How can I make my practice, which is slower, a bit quicker by sharpening the mental faculties? How can I make it more pleasant by actually learning how to deal with unskillful states of mind, like greed, hatred, and delusion? And then you can transform them into skillful states of mind.

Now, a very common phrase used in English is "difficult emotions" or "negative emotions." This is a little bit difficult for me to understand. I understand, experientially of course, difficult emotions. But the word negative—I never understood why people call emotions negative. Difficult, I understand. I've gone through a lot of difficult emotions, in case you're not sure.

You still want to hear about my experience of difficult emotions? Before I give five ways of how to deal with them, we have time. We can enjoy the ride. What difficult emotions do I go through as a monk? Because there's a tendency for people to think that monk life or nun life—monastic life—is very easy. And for us who are not monastics...

It's very difficult. I tell them the difference between monastics and lay practitioners—there's only one difference. The way we practice, all of that is similar. The difference is that monastics don't have excuses not to practice. That's the difference. We don't have excuses.

You can say, "Oh, today I cannot practice because I was busy. I have to go to a wedding, there's dinner, I cannot practice mindfulness." Yes, yes, you're right. You are very busy. I understand. But for us, you cannot go to your teacher with such stories. As a monastic, you cannot go to Bhante Gunaratana and say, "Oh, I was busy teaching in Brazil, and I didn't have time to practice." You cannot do that. So that's the difference, in case you're curious.

Let me give you another experience, in case you think monastic life is easy.

In 2006, I left West Virginia for Bangkok. It was a long flight from Dulles airport to London. I waited twelve hours in Heathrow before I could board the connecting aircraft—twelve hours in a stretch. Then I traveled from London to Bangkok for a conference. I arrived at around 8:15 p.m., went out of the airport, and there was nobody to pick me up.

I was wondering what was going on. Can you imagine traveling from Washington D.C. to London, waiting twelve hours, then another twelve or fourteen hours going through Moscow, arriving in Thailand at 8:15, and you don't see anyone waiting for you? That's something, as a monk.

Sometimes as a monk it's very challenging when you are going to give a talk on how to overcome anger and anger is arising. Can you imagine? You're scheduled to give a talk on difficult emotions and here you are, going through them. That's a bit of irony.

So at 8:15, 8:30, I have no phone. I can't call anyone. I stayed in the airport the whole night. Breakfast time came—no breakfast, no one appeared. I thought maybe they would remember me at 8:15 a.m. I looked around. Nobody.

Meanwhile, I was getting really hungry. And difficult emotions were arising: Am I going to be left here forever? What am I going to say as a monk? I knew that fellow monks were the ones organizing this ride, but they had dropped the ball. Breakfast time, still no breakfast.

Since it's a Buddhist country and I had my alms bowl, someone told me, "Go around and get some food." I was getting ready to go out with my bowl—you can receive food in Thailand this way. But then the telephone attendant said, "Wait, wait, don't go. I'm going to bring you food."

I sat down patiently, really saying to myself, "Wow, that's amazing."

She came up with a sandwich with bacon, which I don't eat at all. I have allergies to bacon, beef, and basically anything with four legs.

So she brought a sandwich. I couldn't say, "Please take it back." You see, monks simply eat whatever we receive. Whatever doesn't mean that if they put bacon there you have to eat it, but we receive it, and then we have to bless people. As I'm doing this, I'm sitting there very hungry, thinking, what can I do with this sandwich? I opened it and started scraping off the bacon. It was dry. I'm telling you, I ate it, and I will never forget that sandwich.

Then I sat down and waited. And waited. And waited. Meanwhile, I'm getting impatient. Twelve o'clock comes—missing lunch. I thought, what's going to be my first word to the person who has made me go through all these emotions? Worry, fear, impatience, you name it.

So I started drawing from the Buddha's teaching. I thought, yes, let me go through the Buddha's teaching. What tools am I going to use? I was amazed. I found some tools that worked for me. As soon as I saw the first person, I simply said, "May you be happy. May you be peaceful."

Here are a few things I want to share with you that I thought worked. I've tested them. I'm not a person who's just reading the Tipiṭaka—"Here are the Buddha's words." No, no. I'm a person who is sharing things that I've actually tested, that I've gone through, and they work.

Here's the discourse that works very well. It's called the Vitakkasaṇṭhāna Sutta. The Buddha here is telling us that whenever you have a thought of anger, a thought of greed, a thought of aversion, a thought of fear—all you have to do is substitute. Replace it with the opposite.

Now, what's the opposite of greed? Generosity. Letting go. It works. Just let it go.

For me, when I forget my umbrella in Sri Lanka, where I spent five years and it rains a lot—when I can't find my umbrella, I say, "Wow, may the person who's going to use my umbrella enjoy it." I just let go. It was always amazing: when I let go, I feel peaceful. Instead of saying, "I liked this umbrella that was given to me by Guy Armstrong, and I miss it," I found out that just letting go, wishing people to be happy—those who actually got my umbrella—brings peace.

Sometimes I go to a monastery with Birkenstock sandals. I go out and I can't find my shoes. I say, "May the dogs enjoy my shoes." It's amazing how shoes disappear in monasteries in Asia because they have dogs, and the dogs like shoes for some reason.

But one time I was in Malaysia, in a monastery in Kuala Lumpur. I could not see my shoes. I said, "There are no dogs here. Monks cannot take my shoes, of course." And they were Birkenstocks from Germany—very good shoes. I like them. I keep getting the same thing again and again. And monks, we don't travel with many things.

We have only one pair of shoes.

It was quite amazing. At 10 a.m., I woke up and couldn't see my shoes anywhere. I searched—no shoes to be found. I thought to myself, it's not the dogs, and it's certainly not the monks who took my shoes. As it turned out, there was a German monk who also happened to like the same style of shoes, and we had simply shared them without realizing it—code sharing, you might say. They were preparing to take me to buy new shoes when suddenly my shoes reappeared. It was remarkable how they turned up.

So anyway, letting go is very, very good. I had to let go of my shoes. And when they came back, there was no difference in my mind. This is the practice.

When there's a thought of anger, what should you do? Metta—loving-kindness. It's always better with metta. You can't have too much of it. I've heard that some people are afraid of cultivating too much loving-kindness because they worry that others will take advantage of them. I don't think so. The more metta, the better, the merrier.

Whenever there's aversion, send a little bit of mental loving-kindness. With delusion, you cultivate wisdom—reflecting on impermanence, the selfless nature of things, seeing phenomena in that manner. When there's fear, what should you do? You should cultivate courage. Have courage. Perhaps you're afraid of pain in your meditation. What should you do? Have the courage to extend your sitting for a few minutes—maybe two minutes, maybe five—and then see how it goes.

Substituting the opposite mental quality for whatever difficult state you're experiencing is very, very effective. I've seen it work for myself. Perhaps try it and see how it works for you.

The next method is called reflection on the danger of the mental state you are in—the difficult mind state you are experiencing. Here I should mention that I prefer to use "skillful" rather than "positive" state of mind, and "unskillful" rather than "negative" state of mind. This distinction should be very clear. I don't want to use positive and negative so much. I prefer skillful and unskillful because this involves a psychological distinction that perhaps I will give a talk about later. What's the difference between skillful and unskillful? That's another talk entirely. Otherwise, I'll stay here for another hour, and you're going to develop some difficult, unskillful states of mind yourselves.

So this next method works very well: you reflect on the drawback, the danger of a particular state of mind. Let's say it's anger. What's the danger of anger? The Dalai Lama said that anger is only one letter missing to become danger. If you write "danger" and "anger," they differ by only one letter—the letter D. So whenever there's aversion towards your fellow yogis who are walking too slowly, who are eating too fast or too slow, or toward anything that rises before you like Mount Everest—

So many people—we are here together, and actually it creates a lot of mind states, you know? So say, reflect on your thoughts of aversion towards a mind state or an inanimate object. Reflect: "Oh, whenever I get angry, I feel stressful. I feel unhappy. I can't sleep." When you do that, the unskillful state of mind can subside.

I can compare this with when you are driving. You are not driving now, but just have a sense of imagination in daily life. When you are driving and see what you call a police car—the one who's going to give you a ticket—what do you do? Do you increase speed or reduce? What do you do? Everywhere I've been—Sweden, Finland, I've been everywhere—you find people will give you a ticket if you are driving very fast. So what do you do? You increase or decrease? Of course you decrease. Why do you decrease your speed? Because you are going to get a ticket, a fifty dollar ticket, and that's not fun.

So the same thing when you have a negative, unskillful state of mind, and then you are indulging yourself in this negative state of mind—what I call an unskillful state of mind—and you reflect, "Oh, I'm going to suffer. This state of mind leads to stress. This state of mind leads to restlessness. This state of mind leads to whatever danger you have experienced"—then you can drop that thought like a hot brick and continue with skillful states of mind. Skillful states of mind you continue to cultivate.

So the next method: the first one was replacement or substitution. The second is reflection. Now, if that doesn't work, you redirect. The third method is to redirect your mind to something skillful. And we have given a lot of instruction about that method. Come back to the breath. Come back to the body. Feel the body. When the mind is wandering, please come back to the breath. Come back to the body. That works wonders.

In my experience, I've already shared with you—you remember when I was at Dallas airport? I redirected my mind to massage, to reflexology. So instead of thinking, "Oh, this person is wasting my time. I'm a monk. I keep 227 precepts. I don't have a single knife. I don't have a bomb." Instead of running this kind of thing—and it's easy to go through that actually, because I mean, what are you going to find in these robes?

But again, I go to some places and they search me. Even Bhante Gunaratana—we were teaching together in California. He's a monk. My teacher is now, I think, ninety. But when he was eighty-something, we went to San Francisco. They were searching and searching this monk who is not going to have a pin. They think that he's carrying something. It's not their fault. I'm not saying that's their fault. But it's just the perception. It's amazing, this perception we have—that you cannot even perceive who is somebody who is calm and peaceful. My teacher is pretty calm. He was doing like this and this and this. It's amazing.

So redirecting your mind—from maybe greed to the breath. Maybe when you have a lot of aversion towards everything, towards your fellow yogis, towards the schedule, towards meditation, towards yourself. I mean, we can have a lot of aversion just about anything. So you can redirect your mind to the breath. Breathe in deeply. You can do it now, okay?

Redirect from my talk and come back to the breath, okay? Let us try it. Feel the body sitting here. You have done it.

This is like when you are talking with somebody. You are in the middle of a conversation and someone says, "Can I talk to you, Bhante?" So you say, "Okay, just wait. Give me a minute." And then you look at Annie—wow, wonderful meditation!—so you talk to Annie. And then you go back. You go back, and... what were you talking about? You have forgotten what you were discussing. Isn't it?

I think this has happened to you when you are talking to somebody and someone all of a sudden interjects. By the time you go back, it's not the same energy. You have lost the storyline. So it helps.

The Pali word for this is very interesting. The Pali term is amanasikāra, which is fascinating because the Buddha talked about mindfulness, and here he is talking about asati—which means "not mindful." So the literal translation is "pay no mind"—pay no attention to the unskillful state of mind. What I call redirecting your mind to something wholesome. In the bigger picture, it can be taking a walk. You simply get up and take a walk, and then come back. By the time you return, you feel fresh again.

So the fourth method that works also very well is retracing—going backwards to find the springboards. Why are you the person who is always having fear? Why are you the person who is always having anger? Who is having difficult, painful mental difficulties? You try to go back and trace the origins.

This happened for me in Thailand when I was meditating in the middle of a cemetery. I wanted to see ghosts. There are no ghosts in America—do you have stories about ghosts here? Not so much. In Thailand, many stories about ghosts!

I was meditating in the middle of the cemetery because I was very curious. I wanted to know exactly how a ghost looked. Every time I would ask friends in Uganda, they would say, "Well... somebody told me the ghost looked like this." I went to that person and they said, "Oh no, somebody told me the ghost looked like this." And I kept going and going but never found somebody who could tell me precisely how a ghost looked in detail.

So luckily, in 2007, I went to Thailand. A monk told me there was a place in the middle of the cemetery where I would see ghosts there. I said, "Let me test the Buddha's teaching. Let me go there. If a ghost is going to come, I'll go with my robes and follow wherever the ghost takes me." I was ready—due to my frustration in Africa that nobody had ever told me precisely how a ghost looked.

There I was, deep in the forest, meditating, when fear arose—because I already carried that fear within me.

Branches breaking, and I thought it was a ghost.

So what I did was retrace. Why am I having fear now? I started retracing, and I found out where the fear was coming from—it was aversion towards these lions and tigers eating me, breaking me apart. I had tremendous aversion towards tigers. And I kept investigating: why am I actually having all this aversion? I found out that actually I'm attached to my life. Maybe not surprised, but it's amazing how much we are attached to our life, even as a monk.

But I said, no, forget about it. If this tiger gets me, I've done a good job introducing Dhamma to my mother. She's a nun now. She'll be able to hold the fort. My work in Uganda is established. I'm ready to go with the tiger. Ready.

But again, it was not working. I was still unsettled. I asked, why am I unsettled even with this kind of acceptance? I found out—wow, ignorance. I'm ignoring the truth. Then I discovered I was worried about dengue fever and malaria, all mixed together. It's just amazing.

For me, there's something that has humbled me in life—it's the mind, how it works. The one thing that is very fascinating for me is how the mind works. It's a mystery. It's a mystery.

With all good intentions to face a ghost, I was racing through mind states one after another. But retracing actually helped me so much. I found out the root, the root of all this stuff, and I was able to drop the whole thing. I just dropped it. There was no fear. There was no aversion. There was no attachment.

Finally, the last method. This last method works very well, and I practice it to this day. It is called resolution—making a strong resolve. Wherever your mind states take you, every time you go through a painful mind state, you make note of it, and you make a strong resolution. In Pali, we call it adhiṭṭhāna. Adhiṭṭhāna means determination. Make a strong determination. Nobody is going to do this for you. You have to do it yourself. Make a strong determination.

When I was at IMS, someone sent me this card. I still travel with it—it's from His Holiness the Dalai Lama. I received it in 2000 when I was at IMS. My friend from England sent me this card. This thing you see here, it has been with me everywhere I go. I read it and say, wow, this is what I need. This is what I need.

And I'm going to read it for you. Making a strong resolve works.

This is the fifth technique—the way to transform unskillful states of mind into skillful states of mind through strong determination every day when you wake up.

A Precious Human Life.

Every day, think as you wake up: Today, I am fortunate to have woken up. I am alive. I have a precious human life. I am not going to waste it. I am going to use all my energies to develop myself, to expand my heart out to others, to achieve enlightenment for the benefit of all beings.

I put myself included—I don't want to miss the boat as a Theravada monk, you know. Mahayana, Theravada—to achieve enlightenment for the benefit of all beings, including myself.

I am going to have kind thoughts towards others. I am not going to get angry or think badly about others. I am going to benefit others as much as I can.

Every single day, as soon as I wake up—for me, this is like my meditation in the morning. I set up the stage for the day.

Here is a question: Are you going to get angry as the day opens? With this reflection, since the year 2000, I found out that yes, you will get triggers—this and that, big triggers. But you are going to remember. And as the saying goes, mindfulness is not difficult; what is difficult is to remember to be mindful.

That is the fifth method: strong resolution.

Thank you very much for listening. Let us sit together for a moment or two.

The arising of difficult or unskillful mental states is beyond our control. But mindfulness—right mindfulness—and wisdom can make a difference between being painful, being caught up in thoughts and difficult mind states, and being free from them.

May you have a pleasant and quick mode of progress.

Thank you very much.

CHAPTER 204

Aspiration and Courage

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the inevitable difficulties that arise in intensive meditation practice—not just the hindrances, but the deeper challenge of having our unexamined views and expectations confronted by reality. She explores how our assumptions about what practice should look like, informed by subtle habits of craving pleasant experiences and averting from unpleasant ones, can lead to doubt and confusion when things don't unfold as expected.
> Wilson distinguishes between aspiration and craving, explaining how genuine aspiration turns the mind toward the wholesome without the narrowing quality of taṇhā (craving). She offers the Four Noble Truths as context for understanding the radical nature of the Buddha's teaching—that freedom requires seeing through our most familiar mental habits, which feel as comfortable as "an old bathrobe."
> Drawing on personal examples including Burmese nuns, monks, Gandhian nonviolence, and a remarkable Tibetan refugee practitioner, Wilson illustrates how connecting with inspiring figures and teachings can rekindle our motivation. She emphasizes that awakening is not a self-improvement project that confirms our sense of self, but rather a courageous opening into the unknown, moment by moment. The talk concludes with Śāntideva's bodhicitta aspiration, offering a vision of practice dedicated to the welfare of all beings.

So tonight I want to just offer some thoughts about reconnecting, motivating our aspiration and courage.

At this point on the retreat, I'm talking to various people and it's totally the normal time. Some people may be starting to notice that this practice can be challenging. Have you noticed that? And not in the way you expected it to be, which is really the main challenging part.

This is really normal. The first most obvious way is just that second week, third week, the hindrances come up, as John talked about last week. I don't want to go into those a lot, but that's just really kind of basic what happens. The way I think of it, it's like a two-year-old having a temper tantrum. You're saying we're going to sit and walk and pay attention to what's happening, and it's like, "No, I'm not going to, and you can't make me. I'll get angry, or I'll get into desire, or I'll just get restless or sleepy or doubt." We just kind of go, okay, okay, fine. You have your little tantrum. We keep on going. We keep on sitting.

So that's the least of it. The hindrances are the least of it. That's obvious, even though it's a lot of suffering.

There are lots of ways, but what I want to talk about tonight is some of the ways it starts to be challenging: really our ideas, our views, maybe not quite realized, our expectations of what practice is or how it should be going or what's good—they all get challenged, one way or another. And we tend to take that personally and not recognize quite what's happening. And it's really difficult, which is why I want to talk about aspiration.

Just a couple of simple ways. I could give the whole talk just giving examples of how that happens, but I don't want to do that because you each have your own examples. But just two simple ones that I've noticed from talking to people the last couple days.

One way is sudden change in the practice. You're going along and you think finally the mindfulness got more steady, or the mind got more calm, or things were happening fast, or whatever. In your mind, there's the view that this is good—definitely it'll be more pleasant. We never think it's going well when it's less pleasant. So it's more pleasant, or it's more easeful, or it's matching some idea you have. And then suddenly, through no fault of yours, it changes. It just changes. You're going along fine. You didn't do something wrong. And suddenly the clarity's gone. You don't know what's happening. Everything's flying all over. That calm and peace is restless.

How many of us go, "Okay, that's what's happening now"? For a moment we try that, but secretly we're trying that so it goes away, right? No, that's what's happening. Then we think, "What did I do wrong?" That happens.

Another way that people are seeing too, and we will more and more, is you're going along and you're seeing things—you're seeing impermanence, say, in different personality patterns. Or just take something simple: the habit of wanting. Just wanting to be first in line for breakfast. And seeing that, and the suffering of it—the awareness really sees through it, feels the suffering of that wanting. In that moment it lets it go. You think, wow, I really see in all the ways in my life I need to be first, the whole nine yards. Yeah, I really got this.

I understand it. The suffering of craving, of my personality patterns. And, you know, that's great. Really, there was wisdom seeing it.

And then the next day at breakfast, you're dying because you've got to be first in line. And you go, "Why? I saw this. I know this. It's over. Why is this happening again?" Or you come back to another retreat and you go, "Again? This? Again? Didn't I go through this to a great degree of suffering the last time? I got it. I've handled this." Apparently not.

But you get a sense of what I mean, right? I'm not just talking off the top of my head—how we suffer from that, not so much from what's happening, but from the idea that it shouldn't be this way. Somehow I did something wrong in practice, or I understood it. Why is it back? There's a way we take it personally. And then what comes? Doubt. Huge doubt. In yourself, or in the technique, or in the Dharma, or in what we're telling you, or in whatever. And then the whole thing can start to spin.

It's not going to stay that way. This is normal. But I just want to speak to it, because what really could be starting to go on here—this is different from just the hindrances which come up—is in each of these simple examples, the big suffering is, of course, not wanting to be with the unpleasant, wanting the pleasant. That's almost always the bottom line, identifying with it. But it's also our views. Maybe we don't quite recognize they're in the background—views of what practice is supposed to be, how it's supposed to work—and then unrealistic expectations.

This, I think, is big time. Certainly for me. Our tendency in this speedy culture is to expect results quick, quick. We're not getting it. This is a whole life process. And that's already quick. If you look at how the Buddha talked about it, he's talking about eons of lifetimes. We'll just stick to one. But Sharon always talks about the first year IMS was opened and they got mail addressed to the "Instant Meditation Society." That's kind of what we think. Okay, I saw it. I got it. It's over. Let's move on. What's new? What's interesting? Greed again? No, I'm not interested in greed anymore. I got that one.

I'm making this sound simple, but I think it's really the radical nature, the profundity of what the Buddha is talking about—what real freedom from suffering is. We talk about it in the Buddhist context, but I'm not an expert on any other religion.

The little bit I know of other traditions suggests that at the heart of any mystical aspect of religion is the same kind of radical nature—seeing through the normal, culturally conditioned habits of our mind on a very deep level.

As I think I said the other night, or one of us did, the Buddha always said his teachings are kind of taking us against the stream of the current, against the main part of society—not everyone, even then. And of course, externally, just coming and doing this is really not the normal thing in the big picture.

What I want to talk about now is how we're coming up against the wall where our expectations aren't being met, where our ideas that we don't even know we're holding are being challenged. And this is so unsettling to us. It's in the really subtle—well, sometimes they're gross, but they're also very subtle—habits of our mind that are creating the suffering moment to moment.

So the Buddha's teaching is radical. Radical in looking at this. It encompasses all aspects of our life. His teaching that the real freedom of heart-mind is in a moment, or altogether, when the heart-mind consciousness is free from the greed that is clinging—whether it's taking the form of greed or aversion—and free from the delusion of not recognizing accurately, of taking it personally.

This he laid out in the Four Noble Truths, which I'm just going to name—it's a whole bunch of talks in itself. The radical nature of the first truth is the fact of dukkha, of the unreliable, unsatisfactory nature of all phenomena, all existence. It doesn't mean everything's bad or unpleasant, but not reliable in terms of lasting satisfaction. Everything.

Just even looking at life that way—wow. Most people don't even want to think that. And it's so radical, because it's not just the unpleasant things, it's everything. That's a whole other talk.

The second truth is the cause. As you know, the Buddha named the cause of our suffering, the cause that he is offering us tools to understand, and the understanding will free us. The word in Pali is taṇhā, which literally translates into English as thirst. This quality of craving can manifest as greed wanting something, or as pushing away the unpleasant. And it's not about the object—it's about this quality in the heart-mind, in the consciousness, just this leaning forward, this pushing back that clouds and distorts pure perception.

The real suffering of it, suffering in the moment, is that it keeps us from recognizing accurately. But what it really keeps us from recognizing accurately, when it's present and unrecognized, is the liberating truth of the pure heart and mind, that radiant nature of heart and mind. Someone read that quotation about the potential of recognizing the non-separation—that it's not me against the world, that Ubuntu that I read from Desmond Tutu last time. The sense of connectedness. The real pathos, I think, of craving is not only that it's unpleasant in the moment, but that we hold on to it and it's what keeps us from recognizing the truth. And the truth liberates. It's not that we have to figure something out.

The third truth is that there is an ending of this dukkha, of this unsatisfactoriness, of this moment-to-moment suffering that arises in our heart in a moment and ends in our heart in a moment. This is often called nirvana, and it's often described by the Buddha as the mind-heart in which greed, aversion, and delusion are not arising. Even the arhat, the so-called completely enlightened model, is one in whom even the tendency for greed, hatred, and confusion to arise has been cut off at the root. It's completely gone, not arising at all.

But along the way, even as Sayadaw U Pandita would say, a moment of mindfulness when those kilesas are not present—I'm going to use that word kilesa, I don't have to keep saying greed, hatred, delusion, and I don't like "defilements," so I'm going to keep saying kilesa—when they're present and unrecognized, we can't see clearly. But in a moment when they're not, and there's mindfulness, wisdom, we can call that a moment of freedom. We can taste that. We can recognize, as we go through our practice here, a moment of clarity, and then the next moment the wanting comes up, the aversion comes up, the sense of it's all going wrong comes up. And that's why the fourth truth is the path—the way of practice, the way of life to work with this, to come to understand it. Because it's radical.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, who for him the Four Noble Truths was really his major practice of his life, exploring it. This is just one little thing:

Living the Four Noble Truths as a daily practice and understanding them as a profound reflection provides a context for your entire life. But to sincerely live in this manner is not easy in modern life with its conflicting push-pull forces and confusing cultural messages as to what is valuable.

And I think this is where—and I don't think it's just modern life, because the Buddha wasn't living modern life, and he was saying the same thing. But as Bhikkhu Bodhi said, it's a lot harder, he said, in an age of easy pleasure. And that might be different from the Buddha's time. I like that: in an age of easy pleasure, the values of really understanding the Four Noble Truths, of renunciation and compassion and wisdom—it's a harder sell. It's a harder sell these days.

So what I'm saying is that the radical nature of the Four Noble Truths, and the subtle habits of reaction in our mind—the second noble truth, the craving, aversion, and wanting coming from identification with anything—these are so familiar, you could say. They just feel like the way things should be. It's cozy, like an old bathrobe you put on. That's just where we take refuge. And we recognize it sometimes in big things, but not when it comes around and starts to impact the way we assess or think about our practice.

And this is a sutta I love. Actually, I think Bhante referred to it—the two darts—the other night, where we hit ourselves with the second dart, aversion to something unpleasant. Well, the Buddha goes on in that sutta to describe how these habits of aversion and clinging and delusion are moment to moment arising and strengthened through this not recognizing what goes on, the ephemeral nature of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral sensation, just coming and going.

So he says very simply, whenever there's an unpleasant and the person beats their breasts and laments, as Bhante said, then it comes to be an underlying habit in the mind of resistance to unpleasant. It just feels normal. You go up to anyone—not just on the street, anyone here—you say, "Your hand hurts and it's unpleasant. Shouldn't you move away?" Yeah, right. Why should I stay with this when I can move my hand? Give me a good reason. And you can't really give a good enough reason when there's that mindset going on. But anyway, it becomes the habit.

And under that underlying habit—this is the Buddha again—of resistance to the unpleasant, the only escape a regular person, a worldling, knows is to go for some pleasant sense experience. That's the only escape an ordinary person knows from the unpleasant. So you experience something unpleasant, and we go to some pleasant experience. In the world it could be pick up the phone, turn on the TV, have some ice cream, go to your video, whatever it is. Here it might be the pleasant fantasy. Doesn't matter, but just to see—and to me that's so sad—that the only escape a normal person knows from unpleasant is to lust for pleasant. And so that becomes a habit, he says, that underlies the mind, this craving for the pleasant experience. And then he says when that's going on, in terms of neutral, you don't even notice neutral—what? And so then delusion underlies neutral, just to say that.

So this is one example. We can see it in the big experiences, like my little story I made up of craving to have breakfast. We can see it, and then we're surprised when it comes back again. But as the Buddha was saying, as Ajahn Sumedho was saying, we're noticing a moment or two of this real mindfulness, really seeing through, being able to hang out for a moment of awareness with the unpleasantness of craving. Wanting in itself is an unpleasant experience. So what do we do to get rid of it? We get the thing we want. Is it the thing we want that's making us happy, or is it that the craving went away? Check it out.

You can just sit and be with craving, craving, craving, craving. It'll eventually go away. I promise. Because everything does. Keep paying attention. Often you feel that sense of peace. Oh yeah, because the craving's gone. Yeah, it'll come back. But anyway, so we see it in those big moments.

But we may not recognize—well, we won't, because there are so many mind moments—how familiar these underlying habits of mind are. It's unpleasant. It's like that informs, for so many of us when there's not wisdom, it informs our worldview, really. When we're not quite aware, what we think is good, what we think is bad, what we think is good practice, what we think is bad practice. And when you hit one of those moments I mentioned in the beginning—it's going along fine and suddenly it all goes wonky and you think, "What did I do wrong?"—most of us, the mind's just going to start coming up with analysis. It just does that. That's okay. We can recognize that.

But mostly, we sort of recognize it while we're also in it. And the analysis itself is going to be informed by—if we don't quite recognize it—the worldview. You're looking at it through the lens of pleasant is better, unpleasant is worse. Something's wrong, you know? And so already the confusion is distorting the analysis, and we go deeper and deeper into confusion and doubt.

That's why I can say I really got this. Tejani is the one who first pointed it out to me, but I see it so clearly now, and it's such a relief when I can recognize that once my consciousness in a moment, my awareness is... I can be aware there's doubt, aware there's aversion or greed, but you know how sometimes the mindfulness really notices aversion, and you're really noticing it.

You can feel that the attention, the mindfulness is clear. You can trust that. Other times... not so much. There's aversion, but you can also feel—as someone said today—that you're embodying it. It's really here. Or doubt. Or greed.

When you know that, the thing that really is so freeing to me is to know that whatever thoughts are coming, whatever analysis, whatever you're trying to figure out is moving through that lens of kilesa. You can't rely on anything it says. It may be true, it may not. You can't trust whatever assessment comes up because it's through the lens of kilesa.

Knowing that, for me, it's like a huge relief. "I've got to figure out what to do. What's wrong with my practice? It's not like this..." Oh, you're totally in kilesa. It feels like this. All I can do is just sit and walk and notice as best I can and trust that steady awareness takes care of itself. "No, I've got to do something. I've got to fix this. That's not good enough." So just knowing that—okay, I just can't rely on anything the mind says right now. It'll keep on trying, you know. But I recognize I can't rely on it. That's really so relieving. If I could hand you that, I would love to.

Because what I want to explore tonight is this: when we're in that phase of running into this kind of hitting the wall—not just that it's difficult, but you're feeling that sense of something being shaken up, something untrustworthy, you don't really know where to stand, your assumptions aren't matching reality, your unrecognized views of practice are being challenged—it's really unsettling. And usually it's unpleasant. What's occurring may also be difficult in itself—physical pain, emotional trauma. You just don't feel like you have a handle on anything. For a moment, it changes.

But the point I want to talk about tonight is something that over the last few years has become more and more helpful to me, something I didn't used to call on so much. At these times, rather than trying to figure out how to practice correctly—because it's through the lens of kilesa, you can't tell—you just keep going steady. But also, tune into and reconnect with your deep, real motivating aspiration in your life, in your practice.

There's no right or wrong here. You can't do this wrong. It's a way of beginning with reflection, but it's not intellectual thinking—though that may be how you start. And there's no right way it should feel. But when I find myself feeling shaky, worn down, low energy, trying to remember to practice but maybe thinking "why?"—or maybe it's just dry and dead—then I just take a moment. Really just get quiet with yourself. It can go differently, but start by remembering or tuning into your aspiration: how you began your practice, why you're doing it now.

Let me backtrack and say what I mean by aspiration. Aspiration is a form of intention, a form of motivation. The intention that arises in any particular moment with any particular action of thought, body, or speech—that's one kind of intention. Aspiration is something more overarching, a broader sense of deeper purpose. What's really important to me? It can become a support, a reference point. It gives us a sense of resolution and courage to keep being present for a larger purpose than what's immediately in front of us.

For example, not even particularly dharmic, but we all know this—if you have children...

There's plenty of times—assuming you're a halfway decent parent—when you do something that wouldn't be what you would normally want to do, or that's really hard for you, or scary for you. But you do it without question, because it's for the well-being of your child, out of love for your child. You get a sense of what I mean? It's a bigger purpose, not just the moment-to-moment thing.

So in terms of aspiration in our practice, it's about tuning in—and this can change as we go through practice, as we have deeper understanding, as different things motivate us. But how is aspiration different from craving a goal?

The thing with aspiration, the way I'm talking about it, is that it's supportive in terms of turning our heart, mind, our consciousness toward the wholesome. Say, for example, at times my aspiration would be to really free the heart and mind from kilesa, to be of benefit to all beings. Those are the words. When there's a moment that my heart and mind are really in touch with that—wow, that might be a potential in this world—when it's truly an aspiration, the mind isn't looking forward, leaning forward, one eye on the goal. Because then you feel that sense of tanha.

Tanha can be for awakening, or it could be for an orange. It's the quality in the heart-mind that makes it tanha, not the object. And so you can feel when it's not this wholesome aspiration—when you feel that narrowing, the frustration, the "I could never do this, I'm a piece of garbage." That's not aspiration. That's wanting and aversion.

But aspiration may be this sense of: Wow, is that really possible? And thinking, for example, the Buddha often said, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so." Just think that. And so then it comes back—aspiration brings a sense of brightness, of lightness to the heart, to the mind. It can energize. It just says, you know, okay, I can be with this another moment. That's how aspiration is different from expectation, from wanting—which leads to doubt, frustration, and self-involvement.

You can flip back and forth, but explore it and see. All of us—none of us would be here without some sense of aspiration. And as I say, the words I just said as an aspiration can really inspire me at some point. Or I could be lost in an aversive, self-judging mind state, and I hear that and think, "Yeah, fat chance. Who do you think you are?" Then that's not working at that moment.

So I want to say: find ways. As you go through the days, it can be a kind of wise reflection to take time, at various moments, to just reconnect with what your aspiration is. It may be words, or it may be—and this is what I've been doing more and more lately, and it really helps—it turns the mind to the wholesome, takes me out of just the self-identification, and brings in this real sense of: yes, this is the potential of this path. It does go against the stream. We need support in our aspiration.

So with wise reflection, you can bring in a sense of what helps you reconnect with that. For me—and I'm just going to give some examples, you find what's true for you—at times it's different people I've met who are manifesting different aspects of purity of heart-mind, or different aspects of devotion. These rekindle that aspect in my own heart-mind. I mean, we're not inspired by somebody externally. We're inspired because it's touching that wholesome quality in our own mind-stream. Otherwise, it just misses. We don't know what they're talking about.

So one of the ways is just remembering. When I'm with something a little bit difficult, and I'm thinking, "Ah, I'm sick of this already. Let's move on to something else"—I just remember I really have a commitment to awaken, not just for myself, but to be of benefit to some beings in this world. That gives resolution, a sense of willingness to hang out with it another moment. It broadens things. If it's just for me, okay, a little aversion is good enough. It's not too bad. Let's move on. But if it's for all beings—no, that isn't good enough. That little bit of aversion comes out in something I say, and I can see it reverberate in the other person. Which is, you know, me and the other—not different.

It's not okay. But not okay in a way of not judging—rather, it's a recognition that we must come back and be with it.

I remember something Ajahn Sumedho was talking about when he was in his early years in Thailand as a monk in his robes. You've seen what the robes are—they're not cool. And in the heat of Thailand, in the hot season under a tin roof, you just cook. I've known this from personal experience; you cook. And so he was sitting there, just sweating through his robes hour after hour, day after day. He said, "I just couldn't bear this another moment." And then he'd find that he could. Just that—"I can't"—and then he'd say to himself, "What's so unbearable about this?" I often will say that, just for a moment. Okay, I can be with it.

That sense of tuning in to the aspiration—not just for myself, but for greater benefit in the world—that brings the courage, the resolution, which is one of the paramis. This quality of willingness to do what is wholesome. So that's one way.

Another way, as I was saying, is thinking of different people at different times who can inspire wholesome qualities of awakening in us. I'm going to tell a couple of stories, but you'll have your own, whoever it is. And it doesn't have to be Buddhist. It doesn't have to be that the person is totally perfect. If we're waiting to be inspired, to have our aspiration renewed, only by a completely awakened, perfect person—well, few and far between, huh? But wholesome, beautiful, awakened qualities—there are really a lot more of these, here and there, if we open to notice them and then take them in. It can really inspire us.

So, a couple of little stories.

I've been going to Myanmar every year for at least a month since 2001, and so I've come to know many nuns. There are many, many nuns in Burma. Most of the ones I know are relatively simple people. This one woman, Daw Uttara—"Daw" is just an honorific; women are Daw, men are U—she became a nun when she was around twenty because her health was really bad. She came from a farming family, a little bit poor, not really poor in Burmese terms, but she was really sick. She realized her family was about to sell everything they had, including their house, to pay for her doctor, and she didn't want that. She'd always kind of wanted to be a nun anyway, so she became one.

And she had so much faith. She said she had really long, beautiful hair, and when she shaved it, she sold it. Then she used that money to buy her first Buddha rupa, a Buddha statue. Many of the nuns I've met—their main meditation practice is actually Buddhanussati, recollecting the qualities of the Buddha. That brings them great faith, great inspiration. It's not my practice. I think it's beautiful, but it doesn't do that for me. That practice doesn't do it for me. But being around the nuns who are doing it, seeing this quality of devotion and faith, how they bring that into their lives—that helps to deepen my aspiration to purify the heart-mind.

So Daw Uttara was a nun, and she moved from her home village down in the Delta after a big cyclone when people lost their land and their lives. She was living around Yangon, and she and her sister nun went to a meditation nunnery. They really wanted to meditate. Not all nunneries or monasteries are meditation ones, but that was really what she wanted to do.

But her head sayadaw, her teacher in her home village, called and said, "No, there are these ten orphan girls. We're sending them to you to take care of."

Many nuns do this—take care of poor girls and orphan girls from their home village. There's no safety net, no other place for them. Sometimes parents send them because it's the only way they can get an education, or they'll be taught good values, or they'll simply be taken care of. So these young girls are sent, and then the nuns take them in. They become little nuns, and the older nuns care for them.

So Daw Uttara and her sister did a U-turn.

Her commitment was to awaken, to meditate. But now she had these ten little girls—now there are fifteen or twenty. And what I saw was how she made this complete U-turn. Not like, "Okay, I've got to do this; I'll make the best of it." But rather, a turning grounded in faith, in devotion: "Okay, now this is the life. This is what life is presenting, and this is the path of awakening." No question about it. And you can see there's so much love and so much friendliness and so much care for these little girls. It's not an easy life. But just to witness that.

When I think of her—I'm not saying everything is all perfect—but when I see that willingness to embrace whatever is coming with a heart of devotion and stay true to one's commitment to awaken, but then recognize, "This is what it's about right now: loving and caring for these little girls." She says, "Okay, when they're grown, and if they don't want to stay nuns, that's fine. But they've had these years where we've really taught them how to be a good human being, and we've kept them safe. They don't have to go out on the street. They can choose whatever life they choose, but they've had a really good foundation. And then we can go off and meditate."

So that's one way. That inspires in me that sense of faith and surrender. It inspires me—and that's what practice is. Not about getting it the way I want, but this willingness, this ability of total trust and surrender to how things are right now.

Sometimes I think of just a person, just their being. There's another monk up in Sagaing, Ujjayanta. Very simple. He's the sayadaw of a very small monastery, only about three or four monks, up in the hills of Sagaing. We go to visit him every year. In fifteen years, he doesn't look like he's aged a day. He lives this quiet life, and he just... he doesn't know too much English, but you walk into the place and it just feels peaceful. He's a real metta being. That's all. It's not like we have these great wisdom discussions about the Abhidhamma. Just this simplicity—metta, metta, peace. I just love being there. We go and hang out, sit with him, visit, and after fifteen minutes there's nothing really to say. He's had his visit, so then we go on our way. But I have his picture on my desk. I'll just look at it, and it sparks that in me, and that deepens again my aspiration, my willingness. Okay, let's keep on with this practice. Let's keep on with this awareness. It turns the mind to the wholesome.

Here's another example, completely outside of Buddhism—a daily life one. Actually, it was just last week. One morning I was listening to the news. As you can imagine, I can get downcast. Sometimes just listening to news or seeing how things are, I think, "What am I doing on this planet?" I feel like everything is the opposite of what seems important to me. I don't know—I was telling Guy this story, and it didn't really go over with him, so maybe you'll also think this is weird. But anyway, this was it, last week.

The last piece of the news was about a big ceremony in Moscow. They were unveiling a new statue, and over 200,000 people came to this grand ceremony. The statue was huge, as they do in Russia—five meters tall on top of a giant pedestal—honoring Kalashnikov, who died a few years ago. Kalashnikov, who invented the AK-47 and other such lovely weapons. They were really honoring him as someone who brought honor to the fatherland with his creativity and his integrity, on and on—all these people celebrating.

But that's not just about Russia. I mean, that kind of thing is not abnormal. And they said he wasn't around to see this, but he had been a little disappointed. He was proud of what he did, but he was a little disappointed that some of the people who used the AK-47 weren't the right people—like drug cartels used it, criminals used it. He wasn't so glad about that.

I'm just kind of listening, thinking: what world am I living in? And actually, that left me feeling somewhat dejected. It was not deepening my aspiration in that moment—it was more like, huh?

But the same day, not much later, in my email inbox came a daily writing from a Christian mystic society. And it was talking about Gandhian nonviolence. The same day. I thought, you know, I just want to read a little of it because it reminded me: oh yes, this is also here. We just have to open our eyes and see it.

So I found myself reading where they were quoting Mahatma Gandhi: "Love is the strongest force the world possesses, and yet it is the humblest imaginable. Living a nonviolent life is no easy task. It requires courageous love drawn from the very source of our being."

Then they were quoting Thomas Merton on our dualistic mind—how we see evil as very cut and dried. This is good, this is evil, and the only solution is we've got to eliminate all evil. But Merton says: "Nonviolence, on the other hand, comes from an awareness that I am also the enemy, and my response is part of the whole moral equation. I cannot destroy the other without destroying myself. I embrace my enemy just as much as I must welcome my own shadow. Both acts take real and lasting courage."

And then there was Gandhi's coining of the term satyagraha, because "passive resistance" didn't capture the active and powerful nature of nonviolence. Satyagraha combines the Sanskrit word sat—which translates as being or truth—with graha, meaning holding firm to, remaining steadfast in. So satyagraha, nonviolence, is translated as truth force: holding steady to the truth coming from within, or soul force.

And that brought to mind Martin Luther King. Having read a lot about him, I know that "soul force" is really the language he used for the whole depth of nonviolence—this courageous, incredible way of meeting horrific circumstances from an inner place of love that is only possible when it springs from connection with truth. Whether you want to call it God, or we would want to call it Dharma—just the way things are, reality as it is.

When we're connected with that, in a simple moment when there's no kilesa, the thought of harming doesn't arise. The notion that the only response to difficulty is aversion or harming—it becomes so clear that's not true. In that moment, you know.

And again, this soul force—there are people doing that, living from that, acting from that in the world now. John Lewis, the longtime representative in the House from Georgia, who in his autobiography talks a lot about soul force. He was one of the original members of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, which led the Freedom Rides in 1959 and 1960, and helped organize the March on Washington in '63. This sense of people now in the world still connecting to and acting from this depth of understanding.

The reading continued: "To create peaceful change, we begin by remembering who we are in God"—this is Christian language, but who we are in truth. Gandhi believed the core of our being is union with the truth. From this awareness, nonviolence flows naturally and consistently.

So again, just this sense for me of finding in different places—and I write them down and I'm saying them to you—because it re-inspires in me my own aspiration. And that aspiration is, in terms of my practice, just to find the courage, the willingness, the humility in a way, just for this next moment to show up. Not to figure it out, but to actually have the courage to know we're not going to figure it out. It's exactly not about our figuring it out—it's just the opposite. It's about freedom from clinging.

This freedom of heart and mind is absolutely uncompromising. There's not some part we get to exclude. And so as we practice, as our minds become more subtle, as we land in our views—it includes all views, all our ways of understanding. Even with our most sincere intentions, our sincere practice, we're going to be surprised, undone. We have to be, if the practice is working.

That's why when you're having these difficult times, we know the practice is working. You think it's not, but we know it is. If everything's all nice and safe and secure the whole time, going just as you like it—no, it's not really happening yet. So with our most sincere intentions, we can't imagine what it's supposed to look like, how it's supposed to be.

We want to know ahead of time. We want to know the path. We want to chart ourselves on the path, right? We want to know exactly where we are, even if that makes us feel like garbage because we're not where we think we should be. And even if we've read the path, you've read the progress of insight, you know it all—that just makes it worse. Because you never really know where you are, and we want to know. And you can't. You just can't.

So these times of confusion, they're really valuable. They're important moments in our path of awakening. Because what's required—we want to know where it's going to be, but what's required is this commitment, this willingness, this determination, this adhiṭṭhāna, which is just a moment of: okay, I can just be with this now. Like when Annie talked about it the other night, as Joseph calls it, "the sword of wisdom," where you just go, "not now." It's not with aversion or clinging, but it's a kind of collecting of the energy. Okay, I can just be with this for a moment. That's what's required—just to be with what is, this full commitment to open into the unknown.

It's not going the way we think. We have no clue where we are. We've lost a sense of path. We're not feeling safe and secure. Great. Just take a moment and say, "I can just be with this now." Trust in the awareness. Trust in that simplicity of just meeting what's happening.

Awakening, enlightenment—it's not a self-improvement project. It doesn't make us feel all better about ourselves and secure and safe. And I know, the sense of self... it's not like there's a self we're getting rid of. But the sense of me—when I try to imagine what it is, of course we imagine from the sense of me: I'm going to feel so good. I'm going to be floating down the street, the essence of Kuan Yin, the goddess of compassion. In a subtle way, it's kind of feeding us, confirming our sense of me.

Now, non-clinging—it's radical, it's uncompromising. The sense of me is what gets seen through. It's not what gets confirmed. And so at some point, all of the subtle holdings are going to be challenged. And sometimes it's scary, and then it'll be, "Oh wow, it's so freeing." And then, because these habits are so pervasive, the next day you thought you were free, they're back again. Okay. I thought I couldn't bear it, but then I found that I could. It's like this now. How can this be? What's happening? It's like this now. It's like this now.

This is really the courage, the determination to just moment to moment to moment open into the unknown.

I found without continually coming back and seeing what helps reconnect with my aspiration—there are times, for all of us, we just don't have the energy to do it. I mean, it's like that. But find what helps you, what re-aspirates, re-inspires, re-reminds you of what's really important to you in life.

So again, for me, I'll end with one more story. A friend was just telling me—a friend of mine and a long-term meditator yogi has been involved for some years in what's called the Tibet Oral History Project, something that the Dalai Lama actually asked her to do. What she does is she interviews Tibetan refugees, really elderly Tibetan refugees in India, in the States, wherever—just to get their stories, just to get it down. Not necessarily teachers or nuns or monks, just all different kinds of people.

So she actually gave me the whole interview. I'll just pick some highlights of this particular woman, an elderly woman. She interviewed her when she was seventy, in 2013. She's living in the States now, has been for many years. This is one of those stories where you read it and you think, well, this is the kind of stuff you read about Milarepa, or what people did in Tibet—these old, fantastic practitioners. But today? Couldn't possibly do that. And so this is her brief story.

She came from a nomadic family, well-to-do. When the Chinese were invading in 1959, they were trying to flee with her whole family. They got involved in a firefight, and her family was killed—many people were killed. She was shot in the leg. She was captured and taken back to her village and kept under house arrest, just living in her village.

But she had this deep commitment to escape, to get to India. Her deep commitment was that she wanted to be able to offer prayers for her parents. One must offer prayers when parents pass away, and there was no opportunity to perform prayers there. She also wanted to study and practice the Dharma. That was her deep commitment.

So she managed to escape. The whole long story—it took her almost a year. She's wandering. Some people help her. She's freezing. She doesn't have food. But she manages a year wandering around in Tibet without much to eat. It's a year after she was wounded, so she could walk okay. She gets to Mount Kailash with a friend. She's not in India—she's at Mount Kailash. And she really wants to practice.

So she stayed seven years at Mount Kailash, living in caves and practicing the Dharma, doing prostrations all around Mount Kailash. She ran into a lama who showed up after she'd been there a while. He sounded like he was really a tough lama—not like, "Oh yeah, you're doing a good job, keep going," but a radical sword of wisdom lama that really inspired her practice.

Let me share a couple of things he said. He says to her, "You really have to cultivate love and compassion as well as wisdom to really awaken. So how do you relate to the Chinese?" She said, "Well, to be really honest, I feel like they're my enemy." And he says, "Yes, of course you do. And you're doing really good practice. But you keep practicing like this, and the enemy will not be the enemy but like your relatives. If you can love your so-called enemy without any degree of difference—if you can learn to not make this difference—this is really part of what you need to do to really be free."

So she goes, "Okay." Well, she put in a tremendous effort to do this. It was really hard. She's not saying it was easy. It was really hard. "I exercised again and again, even while eating and doing pilgrimage and prostrations around the mountain, meditating, putting in every effort I could, concentrating single-mindedly on this. I couldn't do it for almost two years."

Imagine—just like, "I couldn't do it for almost two years." But somehow she did.

So now she's in the States, an old woman, just describing her experience. She said, "I can't really talk in great detail about the Dharma and the practice because no one really will understand. It's so subtle. But what I understand is the important benefit of peace. Through practicing peace, one realizes that the problems I suffer are also felt by the other person. When I face difficulties like illness and pain, when I feel happiness—I feel that is also felt by the other person. The suffering I experience is felt by the other. Whatever I feel, the other has the same feeling. If one understands that perfectly, the feeling of wanting to harm another person, of being spiteful and other things, just disappears automatically."

That's the sense of it—in a moment of wisdom, the hatred doesn't arise. That's just how it is. You don't make that happen. Take it as moments, not as you have to be that way completely. That's how I do it.

But she's really seeing that, you know? This is how she lives. And what my friend said when she met this woman, what she was really impressed by—before she heard her story—was just her great kindness. A great sense of love. She came in and the woman was just doing whatever she could to make my friend comfortable, offering her things, and this very simple, down-to-earth kindness and wisdom. You can feel that sometimes in people.

So that's another story that inspires me. This is a real person, not reading about Shabkar in the eighteenth century.

See what's true for you, what helps you. If this is helpful—to re-inspire, to reconnect to your aspiration, to give you energy and courage and uplift to open into the unknown again for this next moment.

I'll close with this from Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, quoted by the Dalai Lama. This is a vast bodhicitta aspiration, but it brings up that inspiration, that energy in me. So I'm reading it for myself, because it makes me really happy:

And now, as long as space endures, as long as there are beings to be found, may I continue likewise to remain, to soothe the sufferings of those who live. The pains and sorrows of all wanderers, may they ripen wholly on myself. And may the virtuous company of bodhisattvas ever bring about the happiness of beings. May the teachings—the only remedy for suffering, the source of every bliss and happiness—be nurtured and upheld with reverence, and throughout a vast continuance of time endure. May precious bodhicitta take its birth in those in whom it has not taken birth, and where it has been born, let it not cease, but swell and increase ever more and more.

Let's just sit a moment.

Thank you for your patient attention.

CHAPTER 205

Respecting the Defended Heart (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 42 min

In this heartfelt retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a profound reframing of how we relate to our psychological defenses and patterns of clinging. Beginning with the traditional practice of dāna (generosity), sīla (virtue), and paññā (wisdom), she explores why letting go can feel so difficult when we live in a world marked by systemic harm, violence, and disrespect for human dignity.

Wilson draws from the Abhidhamma's description of clinging as sticky like meat in a frying pan, and shares the traditional story of monkeys trapped by their unwillingness to release sweet coconut meat. Yet rather than approaching our grasping with judgment, she invites practitioners to honor the defenses we've developed as survivors of difficult conditions. This represents a compassionate reinterpretation of working with lobha (greed/attachment).

The talk includes the Buddha's teaching about monastics who transformed hostile tree spirits through mettā (loving-kindness), illustrating how safety comes not from shutting down but from the lawful power of wholesome intention. Wilson explains the law of kamma—that caring intentions inevitably bear fruit—as a foundation for faith in the practice. She offers contemplations from the Visuddhimagga for cultivating joy and strength, including reflecting on the Buddha's complete freedom from defilements and the inspiring example of the modern arahat Dīpa Mā, who found liberation through devastating grief. The talk concludes with Joy Harjo's 'Eagle Poem' and an invitation to honor both our beauty and our defended places with equal respect.

There are many different ways to name the awakening practice. One traditional approach is through the practice of dāna, sīla, and paññā—the Pali words for generosity, virtue or non-harming or ethical living, and wisdom. I wanted to use this gateway as our entry point.

The Buddha said that generosity was one of the easiest ways to come to awakening because that movement of the heart in giving liberates us from clinging, holding, or attachment. When we reflect on how that energy lives inside of us, it's easy—when we turn our minds to it—to see the innumerable ways that we are generous: the simple expression of holding the door while others go through, or how gracious some of you are when we as teachers step into the lunch line. You're not like, "No, this is my place, you can't come in." You're like, "Yes, yes, step in." And there are countless other ways that you have expressed your generosity.

In acknowledging generosity, we also acknowledge its opposite: the holding on, the clinging and attachment, the contraction. It feels almost amazing when we consider that if generosity is a practice that leads to liberation, why is it actually so difficult? The Buddha pointed specifically and repeatedly to this particular force that lives inside of us—called clinging, greed, desire, or holding on.

In the Abhidharma, which is a compendium of mental states linked to the arising of consciousness, there are definitions and descriptions of all these mental factors. It's said that clinging is like when you're frying meat in a pan—interesting that they came up with this—and how sticky it is. You know how the meat sticks to the pan. Clinging is that stickiness when we feel the opposite of the open-hearted flow.

There's also another traditional story told in relationship to this, also culturally specific, about how farmers protect their crops from monkeys. I don't know if you've lived with monkeys. They're so smart. In South Africa, at the Cape of Good Hope, there are many wild monkeys, and as soon as you open your car door—there are lots of signs warning you—they are in the car. They are fearless, sniffing around for food, because most tourists going to that part of Africa have food in their cars.

So the farmers protected their crops by taking coconuts and cutting the top off so that there was this sweet flesh exposed. But they made the hole just small enough—or just large enough—for the monkey to put its hand in to grasp that sweet flesh. And even when seeing farmers coming to grab them, or maybe even do other things to them, the monkeys couldn't let go. They would hold on to that sweet meat.

This reminds me of how tenacious we all are, holding on in our different ways. When I reflect on my own holding on, and our holding on as it emerges through the group interviews, I am moved to acknowledge in one way why the holding on is happening.

Because over and over again, one thing this culture doesn't do—historically and continually, apart from in activist circles—is acknowledge the impact of what it means to live in a world driven by ignorance. Our experience of not feeling safe in the streets, in the fluid gender expressions that we have, living with that even in the Bay Area. All the increasing violence being targeted towards trans people, and especially trans people of color—there's more and more violence towards those of us in our community with that expression.

Or what it means to live in a country where the deepest striving is for profit, and the impoverishment of so many people, and the resulting struggle of so many of us. The impoverishment of those countries that have been colonized by large industries where wages are so low. Or when we hear about Harvey Weinstein and the sexual abuse of those women—sixty women—we're not surprised, because so many of us carry that in our lives. Young girls and women, and those of us who don't identify within the binary and are gender fluid or non-conforming, we carry that. It's no surprise to us. And how deep and profound it is to live in a culture where that's going on, and is going on.

Naming this is to acknowledge how understandable it is that each of us has grown the defenses that we have, and how we hold onto behaviors that express those defenses. Because in a world that didn't acknowledge our fragility and the tenderness of our hearts and beings, in a world that hasn't respected us—and that lack of respect is so pervasive—we have gathered whatever has been available to us to survive. We are survivors. And in some ways, those defenses worked, because we are here.

In acknowledging these defenses, it's easy—upon hearing the Dharma—to want to get rid of them. You remember in the sharing that Dal talked about judgment, and Larry said that while the practice might be not to judge the judging. Here, the practice might be not to judge the defense, or to want it not to be there, and to go into more of a cycle of wanting.

So perhaps, as communities, in acknowledging the conditions and how we have survived in those conditions, the practice is to honor and respect.

those defense mechanisms, and that holding. And this is a whole new way of talking about greed. So if you are a conservative Dharma practitioner, you might be thinking, what is she saying? But at least in this aspect of it, it makes sense to me. It makes sense in these conditions. If there's time, I'll go back to some of the more traditional understandings of this flow of energy.

So there is then this invitation to turn towards ourselves with understanding and respect. With the faith of knowing that those energies—caring, presence, understanding, respect—we are creating a new way of learning how to be safe. Because we sense and know, even if it's conceptual, that actually safety doesn't come from shutting down. We understand why we have shut down. No blame, no shame. And we also want to offer a new way of relating to what our protective mechanism has asked of us. That new way of relating rests with these qualities of the heart and mind.

Let me tell another traditional story of the Buddha. It was during the rains retreat, the traditional three-month retreat. The Buddha said to the Sangha, go out into the forest and practice. And so the Sangha went out into the forest. Now, in Buddhist cosmology, there are different realms, and in these different realms there are different spirits and energies. Some of these spirits were living in the trees and were quite happy there—until they became rather upset when the Sangha arrived. Basically: "Hey, you're in our space. You're sitting in our forest." So they started making sounds that disturbed the Sangha, moving the trees, essentially irritating the practitioners. And the Sangha felt they couldn't practice there. It was horrible, and it was frightening.

So they went back to the Buddha and said, "No, we can't practice with all these scary energies." And the Buddha said, "Go back and offer wishes of kindness and well-being and happiness to the trees and the tree spirits."

The Sangha was at that point where we all find ourselves in relationship to these places of doubt: Can I trust that? Can I let go of my defense and fear for my safety to actually offer kindness and well-wishing—for themselves and for these tree spirits?

And the energy of that kindness, that love—we know it, don't we? We can feel it. When we enter into a space, or when we're with a friend or a partner or any expression of life, those moments when the love is palpable, the waves of it. We can feel it not just through an idea but physically. That energy becomes the field in which the heart opens. And so the hearts of these tree spirits opened, and in that touch, they moved from wanting to get rid of the Sangha to protecting the Sangha.

This reminds me of the Las Vegas shooting. Perhaps you heard that in all that chaos, a woman had fallen down. A young man, seeing her fall with the bullets pouring down from that high hotel room, lay on top of her to shield her. Those moments of caring and protection that come from love are, the Buddha says, the real safety and protection. And that's what this path is offering us.

So we are not to take this invitation to love as a way to bang and hammer ourselves. Not: "Look, defense, you're not loving! Look, I'm supposed to offer..." No. Because we are being called to honor our history and have faith that the offering of kindness and acceptance over time, because it's lawful, will bring about the opening of the heart and mind.

There are many physical laws in the universe. I'm an insomniac, and I have been listening recently—I listen to YouTube all the time through the night when I can't sleep. My big thing lately is listening to Brian Cox and others talk about the Big Bang, about two black holes fusing together 130 million years ago, and how over the multi-billion years since then, the gravitational waves traveling at the speed of light have finally reached us. And that's how we know what happened.

That vastness operating according to physical laws—it feels very reassuring to me. Something about realizing I'm part of something so huge, spanning eons. Which actually the Buddha talked about. He said there have been eons and eons and eons, and we're just beginning to name that through science—through the Large Hadron Collider, that enormous reactor where they're shooting protons and neutrons at each other.

There are physical laws that govern the universe. And the Buddha said that there are laws that govern the mind.

And he named that very complex set of laws as the laws of karma.

One of the simplest dynamics in how karma operates is this: for any wholesome intention, for any wish or blessing that has as its root caring or patience or kindness or mindfulness or love, that will be the outcome. This is an immutable law of the mind. If we have an intention to care, an intention of respect for something, absolutely—we might not know when—but absolutely the consequence will be a flowering, a manifestation, an expression of that energy. We don't know exactly how or when, but it will happen.

It is this law, this law of conditionality, that can become the basis of faith, and has been the basis of my faith for years and years. When I touch those places of grasping and holding on, where I wish they would open and they're not, I can offer: "I understand why you're here. And I want you to know I'm learning how to care for you and be patient." As I reflect on that wish, there comes this faith and strength that maybe in the next second or moment, or maybe in the future, that energy will manifest in relationship to this tightness and holding.

And if I continue to offer it—which is what we do with the metta guidance that has been offered, or the coming back into mindfulness: "May I come back and be mindful and present. May I not abandon myself"—whatever those beautiful intentions you have been working with, each one of them is building the conditions for that opening. Because in the environment of presence and love, there is the opening. That's the law of the Dharma.

When Lisa asked the question in the group sharing, "How can I let go? How can I let go of holding on to wanting things to change? How can I let go of that wanting?"—then we explored different aspects of calling in the beautiful qualities to hold the experience, to hold what was underneath that wanting, to hold the wanting itself. And in generating that field, things begin to open.

It is a purification process. And the purification process means that in the opening and that sense of well-being, we feel the delight of it, and we're like, "I got that one!" We're grooving. And because when we feel open, when things have opened and it's so much more pleasant, it's easy to forget that we're in and on a journey, and that actually each opening at some time will lift the next layer of defense that is asking to be met in the same way. And so it is an ongoing process.

So then I want to address: what happens when there's an opening and then all that stuff comes up and it's huge and it's big? How do I hold it? I'm saying to myself, "May I respect you," and then there's just this total wave of everything, and there's no way that I can even say that because it's nauseating. What happens when we offer these beautiful energies and we find ourselves so contracted? What do we do to help create a little more rest in order to sustain that opening?

One of the most beautiful cultivations of rest for ourselves when we feel swamped in this process is the traditional contemplations from the Visuddhimagga on the cultivation of joy. And joy is one of the great qualities for bringing rest and strength to ourselves on our journeys.

The first is to contemplate wise attention, or mindfulness, or awareness. The second is remembering the virtues of the Buddha. The third is rejoicing in the Dharma. The fourth is rejoicing in the virtues of the Sangha. The fifth is considering your own virtue. The sixth is remembering your own generosity. The seventh is considering the virtue of those evolved beings in other realms. The eighth is reflecting on perfect peace. The ninth is avoiding persons overwhelmed with anger. The tenth is reflecting on the suttas. And the eleventh is inclining the mind towards joy.

Because there isn't a lot of time, I'm going to speak on just two of these. One is what it means to contemplate the virtue of the Buddha, because it's a very traditional contemplation. And I love this contemplation because I have known myself, my own mind, and so many of us—teachers and sangha and students—who have moments of insight, maybe more than moments of insight and awakening, and are still sometimes held in the grips of these defenses and attachments. And what it is to contemplate a mind that is far away from all of them.

There is a person, a human being, who practiced the practice that we're practicing, who has come to a place where nothing—nothing—can get close to the strength of that peace and open-heartedness.

So it's said, and I love this: He has abolished all hundred thousand kinds of trouble, anxiety, and defilement described as greed, hatred, and delusion, as misdirected attention, as consciousness, as anger, enmity, contempt, domineering, as envy, avarice, deceit, fraud, obduracy, presumption. As pride, he has abolished haughtiness, vanity, negligence, craving, ignorance, and the three roots of the unprofitable kinds of misconduct. All defilements, stains, fictitious perceptions, applied thoughts. And I am only reading a little bit of pages and pages and pages.

It is said the Buddha stands utterly remote and far away from all defilements. They can't come near. So beautiful—it feels like the equivalent of all those eons of life, how magnificent that is. And that mind that is so far away from the defilements, how that's for us too, not just for a remote statue or representation, but is the offering for us. Us saying to each other, one moment at a time, walking the path to become remote from all those energies.

It might be that the Buddha doesn't do it for you—too far away, you've never been to, you know, just haven't read any of the stuff I'm talking about, and it's like, nope. So then I wanted to talk about Dipa Ma, who was considered an Arahant. She died in 1984, and a lot of our teachers studied with her. I'm going to read a little bit about her because she also, her mind ended up being far away and remote from all these defilements.

In ten years, Dipa Ma lost two children, her husband, and her health. In her mid-forties, she was a widow with a seven-year-old daughter to bring up on her own. Both her parents were dead. India was far away—she was living in Burma. And she was overwhelmed with grief and confusion. "I didn't know what to do, where to go, or how to live," she said. "I had nothing and no one to call my own." Months went by and all she could do was cry, holding a photo of Rajini, her son, in her lap.

During the next few years, her health continued to decline and her condition became so serious that she felt her only hope of survival was to practice meditation. She reflected on the irony of her situation. When she was young and healthy, she had wanted to meditate and been prevented from doing so by her husband. Now responsible for a child, totally exhausted and in despair—facing death, her doctor had said—she felt there was no other option. She would die of a broken heart unless she did something about the state of her mind.

She asked herself, "What can I take with me when I die?" She looked around at her dowry, her silk saris, and even her daughter. "As much as I loved her, I knew I couldn't take her. So I said, let me go to the meditation center. Maybe I can find something there I can take with me when I die."

At the lowest point in her life, the Buddha appeared to her in a dream, a luminous presence. He softly chanted a verse from the Dhammapada, one of the very early teachings: "Clinging to what is dear brings sorrow. Clinging to what is dear brings fear. To one who is entirely free from endearment, there is no sorrow or fear."

When Dipa Ma awoke, she felt clear and calm, and she knew she had to learn to meditate, no matter what the state of her health. She understood the Buddha's advice: if she wanted peace, she had to practice until she was free of all sorrow.

Joseph Goldstein tells a story of when he invited her to come to Insight Meditation Society. They were walking down the road, and in that part of Massachusetts there's this amazing color that happens in fall. The pond close to the center was reflecting all these colors, and Joseph said to Dipa Ma, "Isn't this exquisite?" She didn't say much, so he turned to her and asked, "What is in your mind right now, Dipa Ma?" And she said, "Only equanimity and mindfulness, wisdom and loving-kindness. Just that."

There's something so beautiful about contemplating what one of us has opened to, and that this is possible for all of us. So that is one of the contemplations—resting the mind in. Maybe not the Buddha, maybe not Dipa Ma, but someone who has touched you or inspired you. That one quality, perhaps, that's like, yes, that touches my heart and I want to contemplate it and keep it close by.

And then to contemplate our generosity, which is what we began this exploration with. In our culture, we are not really supported to think about what we have achieved or what we're able to give. But in this practice, there is this invitation: every time we give—to take time to reflect—not to think conceptually, but to open to the blessing of that generosity, how it felt in the body, and the gift that it was.

The Buddha said you can contemplate the same generosity over and over again. If there's just one time you have been generous, you can contemplate that. If it's simply that you held the door open for someone behind you to walk through—to contemplate: yes, that beautiful quality that is living inside of me. Can I acknowledge it? Can I bow down to it? Can I respect it? And in doing so, strengthen it so that I have the strength to hold the process that sometimes feels so difficult.

So here is a contemplation by one of my favorite poets, Joy Harjo, and one of my favorite poems. It's called "Eagle Poem."

To pray you open your whole self to sky, to earth, to sun, to moon, to one whole voice that is you. And know there is more that you can't see, can't hear, can't know except in moments steadily growing and in languages that aren't always sound but rather circles of motion. Like eagle that Sunday morning over Salt River, circled in blue sky, in wind, swept our hearts clean with sacred wings. We see you, see ourselves and know that we must take the utmost care and kindness in all things. Breathe in knowing we are made of all this. Breathe knowing we are truly blessed because we were born and die soon within a true circle of motion like eagle rounding out the morning inside us. We pray it will be done in beauty, in beauty.

So acknowledging our generosity, bowing down to it. Acknowledging our resistance and defense, bowing down to it. And calling in this amazing capacity—through the power of intention—to create the conditions to strengthen what is beautiful and to heal what is grasping and closed and defended.

In this way, may we grow together in beauty.

CHAPTER 206

Liberation and Mindfulness (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this opening retreat talk at Spirit Rock, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of mindfulness (sati) as the direct path to liberation. She presents mindfulness not merely as a technique but as loving awareness—a quality that transforms our relationship with experience at three distinct levels.
> The first level involves becoming present to the content of experience: the sensations, feelings, and thoughts that arise in body and mind. Wilson explains how this expands our "window of tolerance," allowing us to bear pain and pleasure with increasing equanimity. The second level reveals the process nature of all phenomena—their arising, changing, and passing away. Drawing on the Fire Sermon (Ādittapariyāya Sutta), she describes how we begin to see the impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), and selfless (anattā) nature of all conditioned experience. The third and most liberating level is mindfulness of consciousness itself, where we shift identity from being caught in experience to resting as awareness—becoming "the one who knows," as her teacher Ajahn Chah taught.

> Wilson weaves together teachings from multiple traditions, personal stories from hospice work, and contemporary neuroscience research on meditation's effects. She emphasizes that freedom is available exactly where we are—"this very body and this very mind is the place of liberation"—and that our practice ultimately serves not just personal awakening but the healing of a world burning with greed, hatred, and delusion. The talk culminates in an invitation to discover that wisdom sees "I am nothing" while love sees "I am everything," and between these two, life flows.

Ringing the bell before a talk makes it sound momentous, but actually I just like ringing the bell. We received it on the opening day of this retreat hall. We were thinking we needed a bell, and then magically San Francisco Zen Center sent us a gift, saying, "We think you need a bell." And we did. So thank you, Zen Center.

You've completed one day of retreat practice. A few of you are on your first retreat, and many of you have done quite a few retreats—yet it still is a process of settling down. Tonight I'd like to talk about the core of our practice together. I'd like to talk about mindfulness, or what I will also be using as a synonym: loving awareness.

If you read in the Buddhist texts, they begin in the most wonderful way: there is a path for living beings to realize well-being and liberation, to overcome sorrow and grief and lamentation and despair. I think Spring talked about that. And it's the practice of mindfulness. In other texts, it says mindfulness is all-helpful—that mindfulness is the gateway to liberation and freedom. And so I want us to think together, those of you who've been practicing for a long time and those who are newer, about what this means and how it operates for us.

There are two ways to function in the world. One is without mindfulness. This is sometimes called the samsaric way, or cyclic way of living. Because without mindfulness, without some sense of awareness, when experiences arise, what arises with them is habit and reactivity. We get fearful, we get caught, we're blind—we like it, we don't like it. Without mindfulness, we live in a somewhat unconscious set of patterns that simply enact the conditioning around us: the cultural conditioning, the educational conditioning, and so forth.

As we do this, not only is there not much sense of awareness and freedom, but unfortunately, those patterns build. Because they're based in delusion, in fear, in a sense that we can't trust the world, that we have to protect ourselves. This is called the body of fear, and it grows.

Having just come back from teaching with Trudy in China, being in Asia, talking to people in Singapore and Korea—as those societies have modernized, there's a tremendous amount of stress. There's all the great prosperity that's happened, but there's also extremely high suicide rates among children in Korea and Singapore and parts of China who are being driven to be ambitious and fulfill the goals of their parents or society. And then there's the grief that comes and the struggle. All of this is a samsaric way of being, where things continue to operate but there's not a sense of inner freedom, of mindfulness, of being able to step back and really listen in a wise way.

If you read what is called the Fire Sermon, one of the first major talks of the Buddha, he begins: "This world is burning. This world is on fire"—which is something that I think you can taste in the air here. So it's not just metaphorical. But then he goes on: In what way is this world burning? It's burning with the fires of greed. It's burning with the fires of hatred and ignorance. It's burning with the fires of delusion. And these fires cause immense suffering. We can see those forces as they operate in the world and, to a certain extent, in our own lives when we're caught in greed and grasping, hatred and fear, ignorance and confusion. That's the samsaric nature, the repetitive nature of unconsciousness.

After his enlightenment, as the myth tells it, the Buddha surveyed the world with the eye of compassion in all four quarters and saw that there were beings suffering everywhere, in different ways, from delusion and greed and fear. And he saw that it would be possible to teach them a way that brought inner peace, liberation, wakefulness, ease, a sense of trust, graciousness. The way that he taught was to offer what we're doing here: the training and practice of mindfulness.

Now, whether you're a long-term practitioner or somewhat new, you don't have to wait more years to find freedom, and you don't have to go on a long retreat in Thailand or Burma or travel to the Himalayas. Freedom and well-being is available exactly where you are. I mean, where else would it be? This very body and this very mind is the place of liberation. It's the place we can get entangled and lost and habitual and repetitive and reactive and fearful. And it's also the place where trust, graciousness, wakefulness, and compassion can be born.

As we find these qualities, or as we mature into them over the years of practice, we also bring them to the world that so much needs them. You're all familiar with the passage from Thich Nhat Hanh where he says that when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive.

And so as you train and practice in this great art of mindfulness and loving awareness, you become that person on the boat of the world that so much needs it. The invitation, however many years of practice you have done, has two sides to it. One side, which Spring spoke about this morning, is an invitation to ease.

This is from Zen Master Ryokan, the most beloved poet in Japanese history. He writes, "If someone asks what is the mark of enlightenment or illusion, I cannot say. Praise and blame, wealth and honor are nothing but dust. As the evening falls, I sit in my hermitage and stretch out both feet as an answer."

And so there he is in his mountain hermitage—praise, blame, gain and loss, wealth and honor. What is the mark of enlightenment? I stretch out my feet in answer. There's something so gracious and lovely about this. He's not in conflict with the world.

So one of the invitations for your practice is to find ease in your heart, in your body, in your mind. And the other, which is a complement to that, is the invitation of fearlessness.

Fearlessness doesn't mean you won't have fear. Anybody in this room not have fear? Raise your hand. You can have your money back. It doesn't work that way. Fearlessness is something else. It is the steadiness, the courage, and the discipline to be present for this world with graciousness and ease on one side, but also with your full being. This is the invitation of practice—both ease and a kind of fearlessness that grows as we sit and walk.

When you think about where we're going on the spiritual path, the goal is not so much to get somewhere, but rather to open to the mystery of life. As it's said, the mystery of life is not a problem to solve, but a reality to experience.

I think about sitting with one of the teachers from Spirit Rock, Marlene Jones. A couple of years ago, she had heart failure. Unfortunately, where she was in the circumstances, it took a long time for the paramedics to get to her—fifteen or twenty minutes. So she had no oxygen to her brain for a long time. They got her to the hospital, iced her down, put her in a coma, and brought her back out. For a week they tried everything they could to get any response from her. Nothing. They did all kinds of tests—brain dead, zero.

So sitting with her family, together we decided it was time to take her off all the life support machines. I was holding her hand and looking at her, saying, "Marlene, you know, you've been so important and such a great colleague. You're dying too soon. I'm going to miss you, and there are so many things you could have done with us. But the least you could do is give us a sign." Sort of teasing her a little bit, trying to make the people sitting with her—her daughter and so forth—smile a little as well.

And as soon as I said that, two tears rolled down her cheeks. A week, nothing. The doctors prodding her, the different electrical brain monitoring and so forth—nothing. "The least you could do is give us a sign," and then the tears.

Who are we? Who are you? What is that spirit that was born into your body and that will also leave your body when you die? I could tell lots more stories, but you get the idea—that we actually live in mystery. To be a human being is the most remarkable, mysterious thing you can imagine.

I was at the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering a couple of years ago. I don't think that will be happening again soon—but I'm going to leave that aside. I was able to give one of the key talks there on the Buddhist teachings of wise society: treating all members of society with respect, coming together in harmony and leaving in harmony. Taking care of the vulnerable—the young, the elderly, those who are sick, the women. This is a way, said the Buddha, that a society prospers and does not decline. And care for the environment. There's a whole text about wise society.

But it's also not all that different from what you'd find in the great spiritual traditions around the world—from the Native Americans, from the wisest teachings in Jewish and Christian traditions, from Native traditions in Africa, and many other places.

The difference, and what made this conference so compelling, was that while these are beautiful visions of wise society, there's actually a way to do it. With the five thousand studies and neuroscience papers in the last few decades on mindfulness and compassion, it's now in school systems—tens of thousands of them—in clinics, in business, in the arts, and so forth. I have a big packet that was sent to me called "Mindful Nation," signed by the eighty-five members of the British Parliament Mindfulness Group.

We can only hope that this initiative is transmitted across the pond to our side sometime soon.

With mindfulness comes an invitation to freedom here and now, where we are. It's the only place we can find it. And it manifests on three different levels. Call it mindfulness or loving awareness.

The first level of freedom is our ability to know and be present for the content of experience. So we're sitting with our breath and our body, and we have tension and pain and pleasure and ease and tingling and heat and fire. We learn how to sit with it. We can name it gently: this is tingling, this is tension. These are the different experiences we have. But as we sit and the body starts to open, we become aware of the content of our body experience—all the sensations and feelings that make up our embodied life.

What grows with this, in neuroscience terms, is called the window of tolerance. Because we live in a society that is pretty much terrified of pain. We live in a culture of comfort. Too cold? Turn up the heat. Too hot? Turn on the air conditioning. Do whatever you can to make yourself comfortable. If you're uncomfortable, the problem is out there.

But here's the thing: is there anybody in the room who doesn't have discomfort or pain in their life, in spite of all those attempts to keep it at bay? You don't have to bother raising your hand. This is simply the way it is—praise and blame, pleasure and pain. We have it all.

And so if we can actually be with the content of our experience, we start to find a freedom already. Freedom with pain, freedom with tingling and tension and hot and cold. Instead of being reactive, mindfulness allows us to be present for that experience.

Of course, it can get more extreme. Trudy and I had dinner in Hawaii while visiting some friends, and the world-famous magician David Blaine was there doing card tricks that I couldn't imagine how he accomplished. He said he loved doing them especially in front of scientists. He showed us videos he'd done with Stephen Hawking and Bill Gates, and they were going crazy asking, "How could you do that? What's the physics of this?" I just said, "This is really good magic."

He was talking about how he pushes his body to extremes—he's the guy who hung in a glass box over the Thames River for forty-three days, only drinking liquids without eating. He's an extreme kind of guy. I talked about living in a monastery where our training was to master the postures by sitting for twenty-four hours without moving, or standing for twenty-four hours without moving. He said, "Oh yeah, I once did twelve days standing without moving." I said, "Okay, you've got me there." But it felt like there was some kind of brotherhood with him.

What happens when we learn to be mindful is that we can actually tolerate this world rather than be frightened of it. And it's not just a personal freedom that comes. As James Baldwin writes, "I imagine one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

When we can't bear our pain or our fear or our insecurity, we project it out onto others—onto the communists, or the black people, or the yellow people, or the native people, or the Muslims, or the immigrants. It was Russia for a while. I think Russia is coming back as an enemy du jour; it's going to have a recurrence now. But we project it out because we live in a way that we can't bear the reality of insecurity. And yet, insecurity is the truth of the world.

So we learn more and more what it's like to be present for our body. In the same way, we learn how to be present for our feelings—the tears and joy and grief and all the things that will come up on retreat.

Here is a story from Frank Ostaseski, who started the Zen Center Hospice and is a good friend I've been teaching with recently. He writes about a woman named Jillian who worked in publishing. Her mother developed Alzheimer's, and Jillian decided to bring her mother to live with her and arranged for a caregiver. One day she came home and walked into the living room to find all her beloved books, including her favorite Buddhist texts, scattered across the floor. Her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty books. I'm going to give them to my dentist." You can sense the mind state arising in Jillian.

And she became immediately angry, trapped and caught up, and started to scold the caregiver. "How could you let this happen? How could you let her do this?"

And the caregiver, who wasn't caught in that drama, replied, "Madam, today I pack the books up. Tomorrow I will unpack them. If this gives a sense of control to a woman who has lost so much, well then, that's okay with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

You can feel the graciousness of heart and the ability to be with uncertainty and change that's in that story. And this is why we call it loving awareness. We start to learn a graciousness with the body experience, with the feelings that we have, with the mind states that come. Because we'll have all kinds of views arise. Your mind tells you, "You're doing well. You're not doing well. The world is a mess, but it's so beautiful." And everything in between, because the mind has no pride and just keeps spitting out stories and plans and wise things and fearful ones and beliefs and so forth.

When I was eight or nine years old, probably around nine, we lived in Buffalo, New York—lots of snow. There was this huge snowstorm with icy winds, and my twin brother and I, along with my other brother a year younger, decided to go out and play. We got all wrapped up, but the wind was blowing wildly. My twin brother was a lot bigger than I was. He played football, and I was not a football player, we'll just say that. Much more robust. I was really skinny then, and I was shaking and shivering. It was freezing cold and I'm shaking out there. He looked at me and said, "It's not cold."

I said, "What do you mean?"

He took off his hat. He unwrapped his scarf. "It's not cold." The wind is blowing, freezing. He took off his jacket. Pretty soon he had stripped himself down to the waist and started dancing around saying, "You just think it's cold. You just think it's cold."

I remember this for my whole life. There was something about him, even as a young boy, knowing that mind states determine how we live in this world. And I didn't have to be caught in "Oh, it's terrifying and it's cold and I'm frightened and I'm shivering and I have to go inside."

As we become aware of the content of experience and can see the stories we tell and the beliefs, we go, "Oh, that's a belief. That's a story. How interesting." But we don't have to get caught in it.

Now the next level of mindfulness is mindfulness of the process. Those of you who've been practicing for some time over these months and years, as you quiet your mind and open your heart, the sense of freedom of being able to be with experience begins to shift because you start to look at the process of body and mind and senses in the world. What you see is that it's all impermanent. It's all arising and changing and passing away. And selfless, in the sense that you don't choose your thoughts—I hope not. Anyway, most of them in there you wouldn't choose. You don't choose your feelings very much. You certainly don't choose your body sensations. And you see that it's ephemeral, insecure, subject to change, subject to pain. This is the way it is. Everything you pay attention to arises for a time and vanishes. All of it.

In the time you listen to this one sentence, fifty thousand cells will have been born in your body and fifty thousand will have died. That's a billion in a day. Your body is always dying and being reborn and remaking itself, as is your whole idea of yourself.

As you start to see the process of experience, then a different kind of freedom comes, because you realize it's all changing and you don't want to hold on to it. Otherwise you get rope burn.

I remember walking with Ajahn Chah one day out on alms round, and there was a big boulder in the field nearby.

And he said to us, "Is that boulder heavy?" And of course we said to the master, "Yes, it is." And he said, "Not if you don't pick it up."

That was a kind of pith teaching about seeing the process of life and realizing that we can tend to it. We can respond, we can care for our family, our community, and the world, but we don't have to grasp it—because it's ungraspable. And there grows an ease with birth and death, joy and sorrow.

So the second level of freedom comes when we start to see the nature of things and we get easy with it.

Frank Ostaseski tells a story about a woman who died at Zen Hospice, and one of her sons was twelve years old with Down syndrome. They were afraid to bring him—Tommy—because they didn't know how he would understand his mother's death. But Frank said, "Let's try it out." The father said, "Maybe we should talk to his therapist." Frank said, "Bring the therapist along. We'll work it out."

So Tommy went in to see his mother and stood there for a bit. Everybody was frightened that he'd freak out. He looked at her and said, "What is gone?" Just kind of in wonder. "What is gone?" He looked at his mother for a while, and Frank said, "What do you think, Tommy?" He started to talk about the Transformers movies, where one thing would transform into another. "She died. Maybe she'll turn into something else." Very wise.

Frank said he stood there with him, realizing that Tommy was trying to understand in his own way. And then he did a kind of remarkable thing. Frank said, "Is there anything else you want to say to your mother, or do with your mother?" Tommy went over and first touched her very gently on her cheek. Then he began to smell her. He sniffed her whole body, from her head all the way down to her feet.

Frank said he remembered one time driving in New England when a car ahead of him had hit a deer and killed it. There was a fawn with this mother—the deer that had died lying on the side of the road, and the fawn coming and sniffing its mother, trying to understand what happened. He said standing there with Tommy was so tender and so mysterious, to have him just go and be there and smell his mother. And then Tommy said, "Yes, okay." And he walked out.

This is us. We're in this mystery of birth and death. To know the process of things gives a profound sense of freedom—that it is natural to be born, natural to die, natural to have birth and death and joy and sorrow and praise and blame and gain and loss. There grows a graciousness and an understanding.

And then the third level of mindfulness arises: the mindfulness of consciousness itself. Content, process, consciousness.

My teacher Ajahn Chah had practiced as a monk in the forest for about ten years, very ardently. In those days the forest had tigers, and everybody got malaria pretty much. He did all these austere practices and lots of deep meditation—had visions and profound insights and so forth. He finally went to see the greatest master of that time, another Ajahn named Ajahn Mun. He told him all about his practices and said, "Do you have any guidance for me?"

Ajahn Mun looked back at him and said, "Yes, Chah. You've missed the point." He said, "Those are just experiences. Dissolve your body into light, have a great vision, have some deep insight, overcome pain and pleasure and so forth—those are like movies. You get a war movie and a documentary and a romantic comedy, your love story. They all come and go. The only question for you to ask for your freedom is: to whom do these happen?"

So turn your attention from the content, or even the process of the experience, back to the knowing, and become the one who knows.

And this invites a shift of identity. "You live in illusion in the appearance of things," says Kalu Rinpoche, a great old Tibetan Lama. "There is a reality, but you do not know this. When you remember, you will discover that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. That is all."

So there's something for you to reflect on for the next nine days. What it's pointing to is this—let me see if I can say it much more simply, because this is really a key to liberation.

When you look in the mirror, you notice you've aged, right? We all have that experience. Losing its fur and sagging and doing the things that aging happens—wrinkling and all those things. But the weird thing that's very common is you don't necessarily feel older. You know how common that experience is. And that's because it's only your body that's aged. Your body exists in time. It grows. A little child, then an older child, then a teen, then a young adult, and it goes on. And then it gets older and it dies.

But the awareness that's looking at that body in the mirror doesn't exist in time. And it says, "Oh, well, how are we doing at this stage of life? Hmm, lost some more fur," or whatever your commentary on it is. "I wonder how much longer this one will last." Because, you know, you get it from Avis and then you have to turn it back in or something like that, right? It's just how it works.

So you start to look into the mystery of who you are, and you turn your attention back to become the awareness itself, to look into who you are and to become the knowing, the one who knows.

And you know this already in yourselves, you know this in your being. Alice Walker writes, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was, and it came to me, that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and I run all around the house." When it happens, you just can't miss it.

Walking in the high mountains, listening to a piece of sacred music, making love, sitting there with someone who's dying, or being there at the birth of a new human being—it's a really wild thing. Here's another person, you know, coming out of someone's body. It's wild. And you go, okay, all right, I don't really have the kind of intellectual answer, but I'm present for this mystery of life itself coming out of nothing.

And you start to become the witness. You start to trust that you can rest in awareness itself. And this level of mindfulness gives you, as Ajahn Mun said, the greatest freedom of all. The freedom to sit with birth and to sit with death.

And when you have this freedom—I think of my good friend and colleague and teacher, Maha Ghosananda, who was the Gandhi of Cambodia, nominated for the Nobel Prize many times. I've told these stories so often. But he went back after the Cambodian genocide and the Khmer Rouge and spent fifteen years leading people back to their villages on foot, saying, "You can't go in a bus or a car. You have to reclaim your land step by step with chants of loving kindness. Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed." Walking through the jungles and the killing fields, ringing a bell and chanting all the way back.

He was somebody who had had this very deep training. And he knew—all nineteen members of his family had been killed. There was a way in which he knew how to return to the world, because the end of this process of mindfulness from content to process to consciousness itself doesn't end in some kind of spaced-out realm. Rather, when you enter and discover that who you are is nothing, and being nothing you are everything, as Kalu Rinpoche said, then the world is your family. Then you return and you enter the world with a wiser heart and with a freer spirit, no matter what happens.

Now as you continue to practice on this retreat, you will sense these levels as you go through what are the foundations of mindfulness. As your body opens up more—and Christiana is going to talk more about it tomorrow evening—you can learn how to be present for your body, not by striving, but as Spring talked about, with a graciousness or an ease. And you let your body settle. Or if you can't be with your breath, you can pay attention to your hands or to the sound that's around you. But you keep gently coming back and steadying your attention.

And as you do, of course, at the content level, you become able to be aware of the different pains and tensions and the things that are carried in your body. But at the same time, you also will start to find moments of ease and pleasure. Joy is one of the factors of enlightenment, peace and equanimity other factors of enlightenment.

For those who are experienced practitioners, one of the best instructions you can have is to look for the moments of ease and the moments of joy and the moments of presence, and invite them to expand. Let the sense of well-being that comes, that starts to come periodically as you sit or you walk—invite them to open, dwell in them, rest in them. You start to shift the figure-ground from the struggle with the body, even though sometimes you have to sit with things that are quite difficult and painful. Instead, you also invite a sense of ease and peace and well-being. This shift becomes really helpful.

Then as your mind gets quieter and you shift from content to process, the experiences of the body and the senses begin to break up and pixelate. Every sensation that's tight in the body, or the sounds you hear, becomes like many little vibrations. Whatever seems solid starts more and more to become visible to your mindfulness or your loving awareness as a kind of vibrating energy field that's full of life and not solid at all.

Trudy and I were at a conference together with Elissa Epel, and she works with Liz Blackburn at UC Medical Center here. Liz got the Nobel Prize for discovering telomeres. Part of their research, which completely shocked them, was that after eight weeks of meditation practice, the telomeres—which are the caps on the end of chromosomes that protect them and keep them longer alive—actually grew and extended. They couldn't believe it. They replicated it a few times. They were afraid to publish it because people would think they were kind of kooky. But that wasn't what she talked about. We kind of knew that.

She talked about some new research. Part of it—and I really want to read this study to figure out how they did it—is that they studied the telomeres in a community that had a big disparity between rich and poor. Those who are poor, as you would expect, had frayed telomeres. The stress and the poverty and the racism and all the kinds of suffering affects the body very deeply. But the thing that was interesting is that those who are wealthy in that community, even if they were in a gated community, their telomeres also had diminished. It's as if the cells of your body are tuned in to the environment. You are not separate from your environment. It's really wild.

So as you get deeper and quieter, you start to see the body as an energy field. Yes, you can be with the content, but you see the process of life itself. And then there comes the mysterious thing that happens where you both love the body and tend it and care for it because it's really precious—and yet I think of this quadriplegic who came to some Dharma teachings. I can still hear his voice at one point where he said, "I've discovered I am not the body." He'd been unable to move for a number of years. He said, "I've discovered I am not this body. Hallelujah!" He shouted it out. And so there's both the care for the body, but in this paradoxical way, there's also an understanding that you rent it, you use it, you love it, you care for it, but it's not who you really are.

In the same way, these levels work with feelings. You notice the content of your feelings. As C.S. Lewis wrote, you will discover inside "a zoo of lusts, a bedlam of ambitions, a nursery of fears, and a harem of fondled hatreds"—and every other feeling in between. I won't read it, but I have a list of five hundred different feelings.

So you start to see the content of the feelings and you're able to be present for them and to name them, acknowledge: "This is sadness. Sad, sad. This is excitement. Excitement, excitement." By naming the experiences, like naming the dragon, there comes a kind of freedom in relationship to them. Then, as that goes on, there comes a kind of maturing, because people often don't even know what they're feeling.

I have a friend named Arturo Bihar who was the vice president of Facebook for a while. His job, among other things—he was an engineer—but then he was in charge of problem solving for Facebook. He said, "So I was also the complaints department. And because we have nine hundred eighty million users, it didn't take very long to get a million complaints." Talk about a complaints department. He said about a third of them were engineering problems. He gave them to the engineers and they fixed them. That's what engineers do, mostly, if they're good. But two-thirds of them were the problems between people.

You posted a picture of me that I don't like, I don't look good in it. You posted a picture of my children—how dare you? You said that thing about me. It was conflict between people.

At first, he sent the boilerplate policy: if it's lewd or lascivious or hateful, then we'll take it down; this is our policy. Nobody was happy.

So then he realized they had to do something about these complaints. He thought maybe it would be good if people contacted each other. He started sending out a message: "Why don't you talk to the person that upset you? Message them." But then he realized people weren't very skillful at that. So he said, "Why don't you tell them what upset you and how you felt about it?"

After a little while, he found that people didn't know what they felt. So he sent out those little emoticons—angry, sad, whatever. You can show them how you felt about it. And then he suggested, "Why don't you get curious and ask them why they posted it?"

The people who answered would say, "Well, I thought you looked good in that picture," or "I love your children. I thought it was a great thing. I'm so sorry." It turned out that in ninety-five percent of the cases where people talked to each other, the conflict was resolved.

As Arturo said, "I get to teach social and emotional learning and conflict resolution skills to nine hundred eighty million people."

But this is something we're learning in a much deeper way in ourselves—to recognize what we're feeling. Often that means recognizing the trauma, the deep hurts carried in our body, the stories that come with it, the emotions, and being willing and able to be present for the content of it all.

Then something very interesting happens. Because you feel both the suffering you've been through and the beauty of your life, you open yourself to that. You become able to bear your measure of tears and your measure of sorrows. As the heart becomes more tender, as you've practiced—and many of you have for a long time—you actually become more sensitive. But you also become more courageous and wiser. You're able to tolerate both the tears and the joy of the world, to bear witness to them.

Then you receive something called the tears of the way, which are tears that are poignant. You feel the sufferings of the world and you see its unbearable beauty, and you let your heart be touched by them all.

The fact that we don't know this in our culture... As someone said, I'd like to take every mother by the hand and walk them next to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and have them read aloud the names of everyone who was lost before anybody votes for war. Do not send a man to war who does not know how to weep.

When we talk about our body politic, the conflicts that are happening and have happened—if that person isn't weeping, they're not paying attention.

So we become more sensitive, but we also increase our capacity for love, for presence. As we do, we start to see the river of feelings that make up human life: fear and longing and love and grief and loss and delight, the feelings of connection and creativity. We can bow and name them. Fear is like this. Longing is like this. Love is like this. Sadness is like this. Connection is like this. We start to inhabit, to feel—this is the nature of human incarnation. We see the process of life itself rather than taking it so personally.

Then we look at the mind—the third foundation of mindfulness—and the thoughts. This becomes really important as those of you who've practiced for a long time have matured, because we're talking about how we live and embody this, not just on retreat.

In the Buddhist texts it says: Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you worse than your own mind untrained. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than a trained and tame mind—not even the most loving parents or loving members of your family.

You start to see the stories and the attitudes, the content of it all, the whole inner dialogue that you build your sense of self and world out of. It's sometimes rather alarming for those who come on their first retreat. It's like you're stuck in Motel 6 late at night and the shopping channel is on and you can't turn it off. You start to realize that ninety-five percent of what's in there is reruns—the same bad show as from yesterday, or good show, whatever.

They keep repeating themselves. The mind secretes thoughts like the salivary gland secretes saliva. It just does. But you also begin to notice the attitudes that you glom onto, that you get attached to. This is right and this is wrong, and so forth. You start to see those different thoughts and attitudes.

And then, because you've been practicing for a while, you get to do what my beloved Trudy has taught me about, which she calls an attitude adjustment—where you see, okay, this is an attitude, but it actually doesn't have my best interest in mind. And you begin to realize that you can shift from one particular view or attitude to another. So you start to know the content and the stories, and you don't believe them so much. You don't take them so seriously. The stories of unworthiness or the stories of grandiosity, the stories of success or failure—you know what your mind does, all of those kinds of things.

And there comes a shift of identity where you're not so much identified with your thoughts. It becomes more about the process. There's that wonderful story I'd like to tell of Ram Dass coming back from India with his beard and beads as Baba Ram Dass, teaching, and a woman in the front row waving her hand saying, "Ram Dass, you're teaching all these Hindu things, Hindu guru, but aren't you Jewish?" And Ram Dass said, "Yeah, I am actually. I was bar mitzvahed, Jewish." And then he said, "There's a lot I love about Judaism. The Hasidic masters are like the Zen masters. If you read Buber's Tales of the Hasidim, they're fantastic. And the Kabbalah has all these maps of the levels of consciousness that are a great match to all the great Hindu teachings I like." But then he said, "Remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side." He was, of course, very witty as well as deep.

Because your identity is not your parents. And it's not even your gender or your race or your class. Those are things to honor and pay attention to, and without acknowledging them, we can have a lot of suffering. But that's not fundamentally who you are. As you become quieter, you start to see, oh, that's only the personality—when you look at the thoughts in the mind. Like your pet. You've got it. Unfortunately, in some cases you've got a mutt, one of those adopted from the shelter. But you start to realize that the thought structures and the beliefs and the things you've been told about yourself—not only can you adjust your attitude, but you can also step back from them and see that those are just thoughts coming and going. They're like bubbles in a stream, and they don't last.

And it doesn't take that much. Here's a letter I received:

"Dear Jack, I really don't know how to talk to you directly, but I wanted to express how grateful I am just to be aware of your teachings. I found out about you through Duncan Trussell's podcast last year"—he's a kind of dharma comedian with a big following among millennials, and I did some things with him. The letter continued, "Little by little, your ideas of loving yourself and having compassion kept inching their way toward what I guess is my heart. They soothed me in darker days and given me a glimpse into a more loving reality for myself.

"Tonight, I finally gave in and tried meditating. I decided, after hearing you speak through my phone for months and months, I'd finally give in and just sit with myself for a while. I'm not sure I've ever cried tears of joy like that in the twenty-one years I've lived so far. For the first time, I stopped and really held my anger that I latched onto, my anxiety, my hatred, and everything else I criticized myself about, with softness and compassion, without judgment. And all of a sudden, I felt like I really could be loving to myself in the same way that I want to love others. I finally got some relief with what I felt inside, and I want you to know that I love you for it. Thank you so much."

It doesn't take that long. You don't have to go to the Himalayas. Maybe you have to come to Spirit Rock, but that's another story.

So you start to see these layers of mindfulness—that acknowledges the content, that sees the process, and then steps back. And the shift of identity, as Thomas Merton says—Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic—"There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fount of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from unseen roots of all creation, welcoming me tenderly, saluting me with humility and humanity." He's talking about his meditation, that all these things come unbidden—the joys and sorrows—but underneath, as we shift our identity and become the one who knows, there comes a spaciousness, a freedom, and a beauty.

And that's the fourth foundation of mindfulness, which is mindfulness of the dharma, of the laws that are operating. For example, the law of cause and effect.

That if you practice anger, guess what becomes more your habit? Anger. And not only that, if you plant seeds of anger by getting angry at lots of other people, guess what you will get back? Anger. If you plant seeds of love and practice love in yourself, that's what will grow. And you plant it in the world, that's what will return. If you plant greed in yourself, that's what will grow in you. And so you start to see this is very impersonal actually. This is simply how consciousness works.

And then you begin to see the emptiness of it, as it says in the Dhammapada and the Diamond Sutra: like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream. Things arise—thoughts, feelings, experiences, whole years. I mean, what happened to 2016? It's back there with Y2K. And also back there with the Great Depression and the Egyptian empires and dynasties, all in the past. It went back to emptiness. There's this, and then it disappears.

And as you get quiet, you start to see—whoa, wait a second, it seems very solid, but all there is, is now. All there is, is this present. And as you become more and more able to rest in the awareness of this, you become the one who knows. There's a shift in reality for you. The experiences of the world still arise, but there's a sense of spaciousness, openness, graciousness, and of deep love.

As my teacher Nisargadatta in Bombay, the old guru, said, "Wisdom sees that I am nothing and love sees that I am everything, and between these two my life flows." Because as you get more empty and if you look to see who am I—am I the little awareness inside here, like that's yourself—you look and you can't find anything except that it's aware. There's no self, nothing separate. And you start to realize that awareness is what the world is made of, consciousness itself. All things born out of consciousness.

And from this place, you realize that it's your family then. This is who you are. Wisdom says, I am nothing. Love says, I'm everything. Between these two, my life flows. Mother Teresa puts it one way. She says the trouble with you is you draw your family circle too small. Life is your family. You come out of life. You are life. And you are what life is born from.

I think of Sharon Salzberg, our dear friend and colleague, who was walking down the street one day in Seattle when a somewhat toothless homeless man came up to her and said, "Don't you know me? Don't you know me?" And first she had to stop because we've had a lot of students on retreats—and I was at my 1978 three-month retreat, or whatever it could have been. But it turned out it wasn't somebody she literally knew. But she said the moment was so affecting to her when he said, "Don't you know me?" Because he's one of us. He is one of us. He's one of our family members.

And as you get emptier, or as you learn to rest as awareness itself, you discover that this is what's real. This, and love. Because in the end, the point isn't to perfect yourself. It's to perfect your love. To be able to open the heart and mind and realize that, as the texts say, "Oh nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember your true nature. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. Everything is waiting for you."

The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and seen the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you.

I feel so grateful to have had the years of practice and training where I've learned some of these things I speak about in myself. Sometimes I don't really know how people can even get through great difficulties without having some inner practices. It's so much harder. And I also just feel grateful that we have a community together to remind one another. It's welcoming and revolutionary—who you really are.

There's a freedom and an invitation. The beautiful thing that the Buddha says when he speaks about freedom is this: If it were not possible to free the heart and mind amidst all the changing circumstances of the world, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible—and possible for you—I offer these teachings.

You are sitting at the bedside of the world, the world of birth and death and joy and sorrow, and you're learning how to do it beautifully.

CHAPTER 207

Worldly and Unworldly Feelings

Carol Wilson · 1h03

In this illuminating talk on the second foundation of mindfulness, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's nuanced teaching on vedanā (feeling tone) from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). While we typically recognize feelings as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, the Buddha made a crucial further distinction: whether these feelings arise from worldly sense contact or from unworldly renunciation. This differentiation opens profound understanding about the nature of genuine happiness.

Wilson explores how worldly pleasant feelings—those arising from sense pleasures—contain hidden dangers including attachment, strengthening desire, and inevitable suffering when they change. Drawing from the Majjhima Nikāya, she recounts how the Bodhisatta's memory of childhood jhāna revealed that pleasure divorced from sensual craving could be the path to awakening. The talk includes the teaching exchange between the arahant nun Dhammadinnā and her former husband Visākha, where she explains that the underlying tendencies of desire, aversion, and delusion do not necessarily accompany all feelings.

Practically, Wilson identifies accessible gateways to unworldly pleasant feelings in daily life: the joy of generosity, the warmth of the brahmavihāras, the ease of keeping precepts, the simplicity of retreat life, and the happiness born of concentration and insight. She also addresses unworldly unpleasant feelings that arise in meditation—experiences of dissolution, fear, or despair—explaining how these lead not to aversion but to the liberating disenchantment that precedes awakening. The teaching invites practitioners to discern these different feeling qualities in their own experience without overcomplicating the practice.

Last week I spoke about the relationship between dukkha and non-self, anatta—how they relate to one another, the ungovernability of things relating to the sometimes afflictive nature of the physical elements, the whole process of aging, decay, death.

Tonight I'd like to discuss aspects of the second foundation of mindfulness: mindfulness of feelings. In Pali it's vedana. The Buddha placed a tremendous emphasis on this particular way of establishing mindfulness. Mindfulness of feeling, of vedana, plays a critical role in understanding both how our lives are unfolding with regard to suffering and happiness, and it also plays a critical role on the path to awakening.

In English, the word "feeling" can have a wide range of meanings. At one point I looked it up in the dictionary, and feeling had thirteen different usages. It can mean "I feel a sensation," or "I feel this way about something," or "I have a feeling that something is going to happen." There's a wide range of meanings, but in Buddhism it has a very specific meaning, and I think you're all familiar with it. Vedana, as it's used in the Buddhist teachings, refers very specifically to the taste we have of an experience—that is, whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

Every experience we have through all six sense doors, the mind included, comes with this quality. With every sight or sound or smell or taste or sensation in the body or mind object, we experience it as being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. When we're mindful of these feeling tones, it begins to decondition our habitual, very deeply habituated tendency to grasp at the pleasant, to have aversion for the unpleasant, and to space out or be deluded about what's neutral.

The Buddha's instructions in the Satipatthana Sutta are extremely simple in terms of how to be mindful of these feelings. It's so simple we generally just overlook it. He said when feeling a pleasant feeling, or an unpleasant one, or a neutral one, one knows: "I'm feeling a pleasant feeling," "I'm feeling an unpleasant feeling," "I'm feeling a neutral feeling." It couldn't be more simple. As these feelings arise, the instruction is to know: this is pleasant, this is unpleasant, this is neutral.

But then the Buddha went on in the Sutta to further delineate these three types of feelings in quite an unexpected way. And it's this further delineation which opens us to a deeper understanding of suffering and of happiness in our lives. He divides these three types of feelings—pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral—into worldly ones and unworldly ones, or spiritual ones.

In this delineation, mindfulness of feelings goes beyond its simple affect. It also points us to look at the origin of these feelings. What's the genesis of the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feelings? What do they arise from? This further delineation, when we look a little deeper at feelings—not simply knowing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, but looking further at what they are based on—has tremendous implications for our lives.

As we might expect, the Buddha talked of worldly feelings arising from contact with sense objects: the ordinary sense objects of sights, sounds, smells, tastes, sensations, and mind objects. We enjoy a good meal. We feel a soft touch. A pleasant worldly feeling arises—a pleasant feeling based on a sense contact. Or perhaps we feel a painful sensation in the body, or a really unpleasant smell, or a jarring sound. That's an unpleasant worldly feeling, something unpleasant based on a sense contact. Or there's just an ordinary sight as we're walking around, seeing things that are neither particularly pleasant nor unpleasant. This is a worldly neutral feeling. This is ordinary—just the ordinary play of our lives.

Unworldly feelings are something quite different. These are feelings—again pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—that are not particularly arising based on sense contact. These unworldly feelings arise based on renunciation. This takes a little exploration to understand what this means and what the implication is.

In Western culture, for many of us the idea of renunciation doesn't particularly inspire us. It's not a cultural value. I mean, with all the email spam you get, do you ever get a message that says "Renounce"? Probably not. But I've gotten lots of email spam for this or that: "Increase your desire"—as if somehow that's a good idea. Because in our conventional way of understanding things, we often think of renunciation as a kind of deprivation, something that might in the end be good for us but which we don't particularly want or enjoy in the moment.

But there's another way of understanding renunciation, really getting to the heart of what the experience of it is like, not what our thoughts about it are. This other way of understanding renunciation is really understanding it as non-addictiveness, where the mind is not addicted to different pleasures of the senses.

From this perspective, renunciation holds out the possibility of happiness now, because I think we can all at least have an intuitive sense that the mind is a lot freer and happier when it's not addicted to whatever it might be. The less addicted we are to the seductions of sense pleasures, the less commotion there is in the mind. Our minds have a chance to settle, to come to a place of ease. In this non-addictiveness—which is really another word for renunciation—the mind rests much more naturally in a place of spaciousness, of openness, of ease.

Just think for a moment what your mind would be like if it wanted everything that was advertised on television. With every commercial that came on: I want that, I want that, I want that. It would be like a hell realm—just that energy of wanting, of grasping, of desire, the relentlessness of it, and the inability to finally satisfy it all. In that simple example, we can see why we often mute the commercials. It's just so nice not to hear it and to have the mind be at rest.

This is what the Buddha meant when he said: "What the world calls happiness, I call suffering. And what the world calls suffering, I call happiness." The world thinks, yes, let me enjoy every possible sense pleasure—and generally for the world, that is happiness. That is what the Buddha called suffering. And what the world would call suffering —like coming to the Forest Refuge, not speaking to anybody, being in silence, all the renunciations that you have here—wiser ones call happiness.

The distinction the Buddha makes between worldly feelings and unworldly feelings —that is, feelings associated with sense objects versus feelings associated with renunciation—when we begin to see that distinction, not theoretically, not intellectually, but when we're really experiencing it in our practice and in our lives, it opens up much greater subtleties of understanding about the path and the choices we make. We get a substantially different understanding of what constitutes happiness. This is not an insignificant part of the teachings.

But it also runs counter to our general conditioning, because almost every message we receive throughout our lives tells us that happiness comes from accumulating more and more sense pleasures. This is generally where people look for happiness. They want to be in pleasant surroundings, have pleasant food, have pleasant feelings in the body. This is simply the normal way most people live. And of course, these sense pleasures do bring a kind of happiness. The Buddha doesn't deny that, and we know it from our own experience. When we have different pleasant sense experiences, pleasant worldly feelings, we do feel happy for a time.

The problem is that these sense pleasures, these pleasant worldly feelings, also contain within them hidden dangers. We might call it the downside of the pleasures. They do bring happiness—we know that from common experience. But how often are we really examining our experience carefully enough to investigate the downside, to even be aware that it is there?

Consider a few examples of these hidden dangers that we either don't think about or overlook. One very obvious example is that sometimes the pleasure itself, the sense pleasure itself, is ultimately harmful. We see this in dangerous addictions—whether to alcohol, tobacco, drugs, sex, fame, or wealth. When these addictions are powerful, we can see in people's lives how harmful they can be. That is one hidden danger.

Another, which we all have some experience of, though perhaps it lessens as our wisdom grows, is that if we become attached to these pleasant worldly feelings from any pleasant sense contact, the more attached we are and the more we believe that is where happiness resides, the more we suffer when they change—and of course they always do. So that is another hidden danger: the danger of attachment and the subsequent suffering that comes.

A third hidden danger, which usually goes unnoticed but is perhaps the most dangerous of all, is that when we're not mindful of these pleasant worldly feelings based on sense contact, we are unconsciously strengthening the power of desire and wanting in the mind. Every time we go for another pleasure and another, thinking it will bring us lasting happiness, what we're doing is strengthening the very habit of desire, of wanting. Because the more we do something, the more likely we are to do it again. Unknowingly, we may be reinforcing this habit pattern of desire.

In the teachings on unworldly feelings, the Buddha is pointing out a very different kind of happiness, a very different kind of pleasure. Unworldly pleasant feelings are still pleasant, but they're not based on sense contact—they're based on renunciation. The Buddha is saying that with these kinds of pleasant feelings, there is no hidden danger, there is no downside. These unworldly pleasant feelings actually become the basis for our whole spiritual path, become the basis for our awakening.

And the bodhisattva, before his enlightenment—his understanding of this distinction between pleasant worldly feelings and pleasant unworldly feelings opened the pathway towards enlightenment for him.

I'll read from the text, from the Majjhima Nikāya, the Middle Length Sayings. This is the Buddha speaking, reflecting on his years of self-mortification:

"Whatever recluses or brahmins in the past, present, or future have experienced painful, racking, piercing feelings due to exertion—this is the utmost. There is none beyond this. But by this racking practice of austerities, I have not attained any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. Could there be another path to enlightenment?"

So he tried the self-mortification and realized that didn't work. Then, as I'm sure you all recall, he remembered as a young child sitting under a rose apple tree while his father was doing some kind of plowing ceremony in the kingdom:

"I recall that when my father the Sakyan was occupied, while I was sitting in the cool shade of a rose apple tree, quite secluded from sensual pleasures, secluded from unwholesome states, I entered upon and abided in the first jhāna, which is accompanied by applied and sustained thought, with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion. Could this be the path to enlightenment?"

Following on that memory came the realization: that is the path to enlightenment. And this next sentence I think is really the key point: "I thought, why am I afraid of that pleasure that has nothing to do with sensual pleasures and unwholesome states? I am not afraid of that pleasure since it has nothing to do with sensual pleasures and unwholesome states."

So the Buddha is pointing out a whole realm of experience—pleasure based on these unworldly pleasant feelings, secluded from unwholesome states. And he saw that it's through this kind of happiness that the whole path unfolds.

There's an important message for us here about the role of joy and happiness on our path. Very often in hearing the teachings, there's so much emphasis placed—rightfully—on the great truth of dukkha and its causes, on the need for right effort, for heroic effort at times, on the danger of continually indulging sense desire. It's sometimes easy, as we're engaged in the path, to overlook that essentially this is a path of happiness, of increasing happiness, leading onward to happiness. Let me repeat that: this is a path of happiness. That's the point of it. It's easy to forget at times, in the midst of one's particular struggles.

One discourse describes King Pasenadi from the Buddha's time, who himself was quite indulgent of sense pleasures. He wasn't one of the Buddha's most fervent disciples. But one time he visited the Buddha and described what he saw when visiting the Buddha and the order of monks and nuns:

"Here I see bhikkhus smiling and cheerful, sincerely joyful, plainly delighting, their faculties fresh, looking at ease, unruffled, subsisting on what others give, abiding with a mind aloof as a wild deer's."

It's a wonderful characterization of the simplicity and the joy and the ease of people who are practicing not for worldly sense pleasures, not for worldly pleasant feelings, but who are enjoying the happiness of the unworldly pleasant feelings. And after his enlightenment, the Buddha declared of himself that he is one who dwells in happiness.

Beginning to get a sense of the distinction between these two kinds of feelings—worldly and unworldly—we can see they have far-reaching ramifications in terms of the conditioning in our minds, the conditioning of our actions, and the choices we make in our lives.

In the time of the Buddha, there was a very wealthy merchant named Visākha. He lived in the ancient city of Rājagaha. Both he and his wife had realized the third stage of enlightenment, anāgāmi, non-returner. They were very adept practitioners. Soon after they had attained that level, his wife ordained and became the nun Dhammadinnā. She quickly became an arahant, and the Buddha declared her to be the foremost nun in expounding the Dhamma.

At one point, Visākha, her former husband who was still a layman, went to the now-nun Dhammadinnā with a series of questions. Visākha asks: "What habitual tendencies underlie pleasant feelings, unpleasant feelings, neutral ones?"

Dhammadinnā replies, as we might expect: desire or lust is the underlying tendency conditioned by pleasant feeling; aversion is the underlying tendency conditioned by unpleasant feeling; and delusion is the underlying tendency regarding neutral feeling.

What's important in hearing these teachings—it's so easy to just hear them on a conceptual, intellectual level, but that's not the point. It's always to hear this and reflect back: what is my experience of this? Use the words to really look at your experience. See for yourself, reflect for yourself: when pleasant feelings come, do you ever experience desire for them, wanting them to continue? When there are painful feelings, do you experience the dislike, the aversion, the resistance? The delusion, the spacing out with neutral ones? The Buddha is really talking about our experience.

So this is what we would expect from Dhammadinnā's reply: we get attached to pleasant feelings, we resist unpleasant ones, we're deluded about neutral ones.

And just as a reminder about the importance of understanding this conditioning, the Buddha said that without abandoning these underlying tendencies—without abandoning desire for the pleasant, aversion to the unpleasant, and ignorance of the neutral—liberation is impossible. This is a tremendous charge to us, and it really frames what our practice is about. We're practicing the deconditioning of these tendencies because that is what frees the mind.

These teachings, although challenging for our practice and our lives, are teachings we're all familiar with. But then Visakha, the former husband, goes on to ask the nun Dhammadina another probing question—one that opens up this whole other realm of unworldly feelings. He asked, "Lady Dhammadina, do these habitual tendencies of desire, aversion, and delusion underlie all pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings?" He's asking whether, with every feeling that arises, these are the underlying tendencies for all of them.

She replies that these habitual tendencies do not underlie all feelings. They do not have to be abandoned with regard to all feelings. When the Buddha heard of her reply, he approved it, saying, "Dhammadina is wise. If you had asked me the meaning of this, I would have explained it to you in just the same way." He's giving his seal of approval to this answer.

What Dhammadina was pointing out was just this distinction between different kinds of feelings—between the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings based on sense contact, and the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings based on renunciation. This sets the framework for our understanding.

The question for us is: how do we apply these teachings? How do we apply them in our practice? How do we apply them in our lives? The challenge is that as we're living our lives in the world, we find ourselves engaged with both kinds of feelings. Many worldly feelings arise because we have all of this sense contact, and there are also times when unworldly feelings arise. It's interesting to start paying attention to the difference.

Generally in our lives, we go about seeking sense enjoyments. This is part of what our life is, especially as lay people living in the world. Even though we know their limitations, even though we know some of their downsides, still this is a big part of our lives—just the enjoyment of pleasant sense experience. And we know, in the ordinary course of our lives, that we do have aversion to unpleasant situations, to unpleasant sense experience, even though we know that aversion and resistance just cause more suffering. We have some wisdom about it all, but still these are very strongly conditioned habit patterns. We all partake of this. It's just our normal lives.

So on retreat and in our lives, we want to pay attention both to sense contact and to our reactions to it. We begin to get more mindful. There's sense pleasure, and we see the desire. There's unpleasant sense experience, and we see the aversion. A big part of our practice is becoming mindful of these worldly feelings and the reactions they condition.

But we can also practice recognizing the unworldly feelings, and this is something I think we don't often do. That's why I wanted to emphasize it tonight, because in terms of understanding our path, it's tremendously helpful to recognize and become clear about what these unworldly feelings are—the ones that arise in the course of our meditation, in the course of our lives—because this has tremendous implications for our practice.

On some level, you all do recognize unworldly pleasant feelings as being a source of happiness in your lives, or you wouldn't be here. If you were just looking for worldly pleasant feeling, would you come to the Forest Refuge? I don't think so. You'd be at the beach, or you'd be where sense pleasures abound. But we're all here, so there's some big part of our minds that already understands: yes, there's another kind of happiness, another kind of pleasant feeling different from what comes through sense pleasures. We are already attuned somewhat to these unworldly pleasant feelings.

But still, we might have some doubt. At different times we wonder: is this really going to be the condition for my happiness if I give up attachment to sense pleasures? The Buddha addressed this directly. He said—and I love this line—"Now you might think that perhaps these defiling mental states of attachment, aversion, and delusion might disappear, and you might still be unhappy." How could I be happy without desire? We might think these states could disappear and we'd still be unhappy. "That is not how it should be regarded. If defiling states—greed, hatred, and delusion—disappear, nothing but happiness and delight remain." It's the defilements of mind that are the cause of suffering, and the absence of those defilements that brings happiness.

So when we understand this, we no longer are deluded into placing our hopes for happiness in worldly pleasant feelings, because they just condition more desire, more attachment, more defilement.

Now, we may not yet be fully enlightened—possibly not. But all along the path we do experience many moments of non-sensual joy, of unworldly pleasant feelings. And I want to point a few of them out so you can begin to recognize that unique kind of pleasure and happiness that comes as we practice.

We experience non-worldly pleasant feelings in every moment of generosity. Generosity is an act of renunciation—we're giving something up for someone else. We experience the non-worldly pleasant feeling when the mind is free of stinginess, free of grasping, free of holding on. Every time we're generous, just think of times when you gave out of love, out of compassion, out of gratitude, out of respect. It's a very pleasant feeling. We feel happy, we feel joyous in those moments of generosity, and it's a very accessible gateway to happiness.

Practicing generosity is why the Buddha often began all of his progressive teachings with teachings on generosity—because it's such an easy way to connect with these unworldly pleasant feelings that bring a genuine sense of happiness in our lives. It's a very good practice to undertake.

Just as an example, it's a practice that I've really worked with over many years. One little way of practicing it—and it's been very interesting for me to watch my mind in doing this—I've undertaken the practice, as best I can, of when I have the thought to give something, to do it. Not to second-guess myself. Because very often we have a generous thought: "Oh yes, I'll give that to somebody," or "I'll do something for that person." And then we have all kinds of second thoughts: "Oh, that's too much," or "I really want it," or whatever. We second-guess ourselves and often we just let the thought of generosity pass by.

So the practice of actually acting on it whenever the thought comes has been very powerful. Sometimes it's just little things, and sometimes it's been really big things. And never have I regretted it. You might think, "Oh, then I'll be sorry I gave that." It's not like that, because the feeling of generosity is this unworldly pleasant feeling. It makes us feel good, as well as, of course, making the other person feel good. So it's a wonderful practice to attune ourselves to this quality of mind, to what unworldly pleasant feeling is about.

We feel non-sensual joy in the practice of the brahma viharas. When we're practicing metta, or compassion, or mudita, or equanimity, there's just that simple, warm-hearted connection that's not dependent on sense contact. It's an unworldly pleasant feeling.

There's one beautiful expression of this—and of course there are many—but the Zen poet, hermit, and monk Ryokan, a wonderful, wonderful figure, in one of his poems wrote: "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all the people in this floating world." You can just feel the love and compassion that he had, expressing it in that way. That's a happiness, that's a joy that's not dependent on sense pleasure, on sense contact. It's an unworldly pleasant feeling.

Sometimes we see this quality, this really beautiful quality of humanity, emerge in times of great suffering. Sometimes when there are great natural disasters or man-made disasters—like the Boston Marathon bombing—or when something terrible happens, there's an outpouring of support and generosity and love. This is coming from people not expecting anything in return, and it's not based on any particular sense pleasure. It's coming from an unworldly feeling of love, connectedness, compassion. So we know this; we can relate to this.

We feel a non-sensual joy in the following of the precepts. We're renouncing harmful actions. Again, remember, unworldly feelings are based on renunciation—so the renunciation of harmful actions. There's a joy that comes; it's the joy of non-remorse, of non-regret, when our minds are just clear. We all know from our practice, having in the course of our lives done our fair share of unskillful actions, how often they'll come to mind in the practice, and they are a cause of regret or remorse. So when we are committed to the precepts, even having done, as we all have, various unskillful actions, once we are recommitted to non-harming, there is a wonderful unworldly pleasant feeling of ease of heart.

There's the unworldly pleasant feeling of just the simplicity of being on retreat. For most of us, our lives are so complex and so busy, with so much going on.

I'm sure you share this experience, but I know when I go on retreat and that first moment of just closing the door behind me and entering into a place of silence—it's blissful. You can just put everything down.

In contrast, sometimes when I'm meditating at home, I might be sitting up in my study. It could be dark, but there's the little light on the computer, the surge protector, the printer, the router, this and that. It's like general headquarters for my life—just a reminder of how busy and connected we are.

So appreciating the unworldly pleasant feeling of simplicity, of the renunciation that comes from being in a situation like this.

We experience unworldly pleasant feeling in states of concentration, where the mind is secluded from unwholesome states. As you know, when we first come on retreat or are just getting started, our minds are often restless and agitated in their reactivity to worldly feelings. Pleasant, I like; unpleasant, I don't like. So there's a lot of agitation in the mind. But as the mind settles and becomes more concentrated, less reactive, it becomes secluded from those unwholesome states, and we experience an unworldly pleasant feeling of composure, of stillness.

This kind of happiness is much greater and much more fulfilling than any kind of worldly happiness we might experience. Dipa Ma once sat in an absorbed state for three days, and said the Buddha could stay in that state for seven days. So just think for a moment: what sense pleasure could you enjoy for three days straight? Could you eat for three days straight? Or listen to music for three days straight? Or indulge your fantasies for three days? You'd be exhausted. And we would take refuge at last in what Munindra used to call "the worldling's highest pleasure"—sleep. Because sense pleasures don't have that power.

These unworldly pleasant feelings, born of seclusion, born of renunciation—there is a purity to them. They are divorced from unwholesome states of mind.

In just the examples I've given, and I'll offer one or two more, these are all things we've touched. We may not be sitting in samādhi for three days in a row, but we've all touched the happiness of generosity, of the non-harming of the precepts, of simplicity, and of some degree of concentration. So we all have an understanding and a taste of what these unworldly pleasant feelings are about. It's important to see the difference between them and the worldly pleasant ones. And this is something we don't generally do. We generally don't make that discernment.

There's the pleasant worldly feeling of insight, of understanding. The texts say: if the pleasure and joy experienced in vipassanā happiness, which is complete with the seven factors of awakening, were divided into 256 parts—I have no idea where 256 came from—but if vipassanā happiness were divided into 256 parts, one single part of that joy and pleasure exceeds the worldly joys and pleasures of kings among humans, devas, and brahmās. So great is the joy and pleasure inherent in these factors of awakening.

We want to remind ourselves of this and also to pay attention to it, because it's so easy to get caught up in the course of our practice and overemphasize the struggles we have, or the worldly unpleasant feelings and the dukkha that comes both from the feeling and our reaction to them. We just often miss the more subtle but also more profound aspect of these unworldly feelings. That's why I'm giving such emphasis to this tonight—so we can begin to recognize them, open to them, and appreciate them, because they are the source of genuine joy and happiness in the way we live.

It's also important to look at the unworldly unpleasant and neutral feelings. Unworldly doesn't mean only pleasant. There can be unworldly unpleasant feelings, and you're familiar with this. Often in stages of meditation, sometimes just at different times, we're seeing impermanence from a particular perspective. We're seeing the continual dissolution of things, and there's no place to take a stand. We're tuning in to the insecurity of phenomena. There are times when that can become fearful, and we can feel a lot of misery or despair in seeing that. At those times, enlightenment may really seem very far away. It feels like what Saint John of the Cross called the Dark Night of the Soul. Or there are stages of insight where, because of the particular stage we're in, unpleasant physical sensations become predominant. It's not for any other reason; it's just that in that stage of insight, that's what happens. This is an unworldly unpleasant feeling.

But these feelings, these unpleasant unworldly ones, play a critical role in our path of awakening. So again, it's important to understand them. The unworldly unpleasant feeling, rather than conditioning aversion, leads to disenchantment and disillusionment. This is something we read in the texts a lot: being disenchanted, we become dispassionate, and through dispassion, the mind is liberated.

So it's the unpleasant unworldly feelings that come in the course of practice—they're not conditioning aversion; they're conditioning disenchantment. And that disenchantment in the mind, that disillusionment, leads to dispassion. And it's dispassion which leads to awakening.

But one of the problems for us just in listening to this is that the words in English—disenchanted, disillusioned, dispassionate—don't sound that appealing to us.

"Oh, that person's really disillusioned"—we tend to think they're a little depressed. But when we look at the actual meaning of the words, it's really quite different. Being disenchanted means waking up from the spell of enchantment. We wake up into a fuller reality. We see this in many great fairy tales and myths: somebody receives a kiss from the good fairy, and the person wakes up from the slumber of enchantment.

It's very easy to see this process of disenchantment at work in our practice. Just watch those times when the mind is caught up in some desire, in some wanting. It might be for some little thing, or it might be a full-blown obsession. Pay attention to the next time the mind is caught by wanting. Notice the feeling of it. Really experience what it's like to be caught up in the wanting mind, in the mind filled with desire. We can feel the pleasant worldly feeling of it—it might have a worldly pleasant aspect. We want something desirable, something pleasurable. It energizes us. Maybe it's longing to be with somebody, or wanting a favorite food.

But then, if you can, notice that moment when the wanting disappears, when the desire passes. And it always does. Has anybody had a desire that didn't eventually pass? Whatever has the nature to arise will pass away eventually. If you notice that moment of going from being caught in the wanting to the end of wanting, the end of desire—that's the experience of going from enchantment to disenchantment. It's as if we wake up, we're let out of the grip of something, and we experience the unworldly pleasant feeling of the ease of not wanting.

Does this seem clear? It's so much a part of my experience, because the wanting—just to see over and over again how seductive it is. Those worldly pleasant feelings, they just seduce us again and again and again. We become enchanted by them. But if we're paying attention to that moment when we come out of it, as pleasant as the wanting might have been in its own way, it's much more pleasurable to be disenchanted, to come out and simply rest in a place of ease, of openness, of spaciousness. Through disenchantment, we experience the unworldly pleasant feeling.

Unworldly neutral feelings we experience often when we're in a state of equanimity. Rather than spacing out, as with worldly neutral feelings, with unworldly neutral feelings based on renunciation, the mind comes to a place of tremendous equanimity, impartiality. There's a tremendous purity of mind at that time.

So how do we practice being mindful of all these different kinds of feelings? The Buddha in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta gave really specific instructions, and it's simply a summary of what I've been describing: "When feeling a worldly pleasant feeling, one knows, 'I feel a worldly pleasant feeling.' Feeling an unworldly pleasant feeling, one knows, 'I feel an unworldly pleasant feeling.'" The same with worldly unpleasant, unworldly unpleasant, worldly neutral, unworldly neutral feelings.

If you've connected with some sense of the meaning of this distinction, just investigate a little bit. Explore, pay attention to the different kinds of feelings that come up in the course of a day, based on whether the feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—is coming from sense contact or coming from renunciation.

The caution here is not to make this too complicated. It would be very easy, and I could easily imagine this happening, to spend an hour trying to figure out: Is this pleasant or is it neutral? Is this worldly or unworldly? Be watchful of that. You don't want to make this too complex, too confusing. Rather, use this as a general framework of understanding for the second foundation of mindfulness, and begin to notice the difference in your experience between sense pleasures and what we could call Dhamma pleasures. Feelings are involved with both. But see if you can begin to distinguish the difference between worldly sense pleasures and the unworldly or spiritual Dhamma pleasures. The more clearly we can see the difference, the more we can begin to make wiser choices in our lives, and it becomes much clearer what our aspirations actually are.

I'll close with a few verses from the texts:

"Just as many diverse winds blow back and forth across the sky—easterly winds and westerly winds, northerly winds and southerly winds, dusty winds and dustless winds, sometimes cold, sometimes hot, those that are strong and others mild, winds of many kinds that blow—so in this very body here, various kinds of feelings arise: pleasant ones and painful ones, and those neither painful nor pleasant. But when a bhikkhu who is ardent does not neglect clear comprehension, then that wise one fully understands feelings in their entirety."

This is really exploring feelings in their entirety—the worldly ones conditioning desire, aversion, and delusion, and the unworldly ones leading to dispassion, leading to awakening.

"But when a bhikkhu who is ardent does not neglect clear comprehension..."

So there's something here to explore. But do it, if you can, just from a place of interest—without obsessing about it and without letting the mind get confused by it all. Simply begin to sort out this very important distinction, and see the effect of that in your practice and in your lives.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 208

Shifting Perspective towards Freedom

Carol Wilson · 1h08

> In this talk, Carol Wilson guides practitioners through an investigation of what we take to be ourselves, drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā): form (rūpa), feeling tone (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness (viññāṇa). She explains how our habitual identification with these constantly changing processes creates suffering, and how mindfulness practice offers a way to see through this constructed sense of self.
> Wilson begins with accessible examples from her own retreat experience—bird neighbors, turkeys on the porch, and traffic—to illustrate how our fixed perspectives create unnecessary friction. She then unpacks the concept of personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), one of the fetters said to be abandoned at stream-entry, and introduces the Buddha's vivid metaphors for each aggregate: foam on waves, rain bubbles, mirages, hollow banana trees, and magic shows. The teaching from the Saṁyutta Nikāya about the king searching for the sound within a lute beautifully illustrates how no essential self can be found when experience is carefully examined.
> The practical invitation is to investigate these aspects of experience directly through mindfulness—not to arrive at intellectual conclusions, but to gain liberating insight through sustained observation. Wilson encourages practitioners to hold themselves with compassion throughout this humbling process, recognizing how deeply conditioned our habits of identification are. She closes with an embodied practice suggestion: to engage in evening activities like drinking water, brushing teeth, and going to bed with genuine mettā, treating oneself with the same care one would offer a beloved friend.

I'm happy to get to spend some time with you again this evening speaking about the Dhamma. First I want to take a moment to appreciate all of our good fortune in being here. It's said that to encounter the Dhamma is rare, and to have the conditions in your life where you can go to practice is also rare—conditions of health, well-being, finding teachers, being in a place that's peaceful enough to do a retreat. You can also appreciate your own wholesomeness, your own sincerity and goodness in choosing to spend the week like this, or for some of you, several weeks.

I feel that for myself also, even on the side of being a teacher. I can tell every time that I'm teaching that this is good for me. I get to hang out with wise people who encourage me to also manifest in the wisest, best way possible. In some way, all of us are on a kind of Dharma detox diet. When you take out all the other inputs you normally take in—all the TV shows or conversations or cartoons or whatever you would otherwise be inputting—and for this week, all that you're taking in is the Dhamma, it's a very purifying activity.

We're in a solid place in the middle of the retreat. We're in the midst of it now, so you're definitely cooking, whether you know it or not. I encourage you to take your own ideas about whether things are going well or not with a grain of salt, or sometimes a giant shake of salt. We're in this cauldron, this process of purification here. The heart and the mind are in some ways being cooked by the Dharma, by your practice, by holding the precepts. Sometimes I think of these square zabutans, and even the chairs, as little Dharma cooker burners. Every time you come in and sit, you're being cooked. So don't worry about what's happening or how many times your mind wanders. Just come back, put your sincere effort in, and the cooking will happen.

I'd like to talk to you about an aspect of the teaching that could be helpful for understanding what we're doing here and for being able to investigate your experience further. There's an aspect of the teaching that describes the way in which we take ourselves to be things. We take ourselves to be solid. We perceive there to be a "me" who is living this life. I want to engage in some inquiry with you through some of the Buddha's frameworks about whether this is actually so in the way we might experience it to be.

There's something called sakkāya diṭṭhi. Diṭṭhi means view, as in sammā diṭṭhi, right view. This particular view is called personality view or identity view, and it is said to be lifted—we are said to be relieved of it—when we reach the first stage of awakening.

Now, just briefly on this matter of awakening and enlightenment stages. You remember the last time I was speaking with you, I was talking about gravity and understanding nature. In a way, you could consider awakening as alignment with nature, alignment with the truth. In this process of practice, this process of human development and evolution, many people report that as they sit, they find themselves reliving a lot of things that have happened to them and also remembering a lot of things they have done that they might regret—things we've said, actions we've taken, sometimes even from a long time ago, when we were very small.

If this is happening to you, this is a normal part of this aligning process. To me, it's partly a recognition: as we come into alignment, we recognize the ways in which we may have been out of alignment. We experience the pain of that, both the impact it might have had on others, and we might feel some remorse about that, which is actually considered a wholesome thing. So if that's happening for you, allow it to be there.

Notice it. If there's a sense of regret or remorse, feel that. Try to avoid steering into guilt, which is when there becomes a sense of self around it—"bad me," "I did this," "I'm always like this." Feel the pain of it, and then forgive yourself. Allow it to be released.

In this process of alignment, it's said that there are different stages in which you sort of click into alignment more fully. When you click into that next level of alignment, you still might be wobbling around, but within a smaller range of wackiness, you could say, or delusion. There are several clicks that can happen. In the first click, you are relieved of this personality view, identity view, sakkāya diṭṭhi, which has to do with a false sense of individuality—a false sense of being a completely separate, independent, controlling entity.

So I'll give you some examples of that. We have a view, for example, that I am this body. That would be considered a certain identity view. Either I am this body, this body is me, there's a me who's in this body somewhere, or there's a me who owns this body. And you could say in our practice of mindfulness, we have the opportunity to investigate these claims in some way—to see if this is actually true.

The Buddha very helpfully outlined several different elements of our experience that we have a habit of mistakenly taking to be ourselves. This question of self or not-self is a well-known dilemma in Buddhism and in philosophical pursuits. In one of the suttas, the first one in the Dīgha Nikāya, he talks about sixty-two different views that were held at the time, and he basically refutes each one in various ways—views about the identity of self, views about life, views about cause and effect. In some ways, we've kind of whittled things down, so there may not be as many prevailing views today, but there are still a couple of views about self and not-self that persist.

And yet, in some ways, the Buddha himself didn't really take up this question of what you are or are not. The question he was more interested in helping us with is this question about suffering and the end of suffering. In this approach, the practice we're doing and our inquiry can be focused more around understanding how things work. How does it work that we feel like there is someone here? How does it work that suffering gets created? How does it work that suddenly there is an adversary in our life? What's going on there, and what is the way to be free of that?

This is really a different approach to the question—in some ways, very practical. The Buddha points us to different factors of our human experience that it's particularly helpful for us to understand in order to be free. So our inquiry is more into how what we call a human being, or what we call ourselves, actually operates. And mindfulness is a really helpful tool in trying to understand this.

This is partly why, for some people in the practice, I've given this advice—and others have too—what if you suddenly found yourself in a human body? You're like an alien who has been suddenly embodied. I know there are various films of this sort where an alien comes to Earth and takes up some human body. And in these films, the alien is actually really interested—how do the hands work? What does it feel like to walk? They're trying to drink water through their eyes and then discovering the mouth and what that's like. So what would it be like if you really took this fresh approach to understanding what it is to be a human being? What is this experience like? And then to be particularly interested in the aspects of experience where we start to get snagged, where there's some friction in the flow of experience—where there's a creation of suffering, of difficulty, of strain, of stress.

We have this experience of having a particular point of view and of feeling embodied. But I would suggest that this idea of a "me" in this is actually just a story that we have. This is a mental factor which, when we examine it more closely, doesn't actually have the kind of continuity that it seems.

The Buddha talks about this as one of the distortions that we have. There's a word called vipallāsa—distortions. And this framework of distortions, which can actually be applied to many different areas of life, is where we might have a view, and then that view informs the way that we perceive things. Based on that perception, we then have more thoughts. We think about things in a certain way, and that reinforces our view.

I'll give you a more mundane example of this. In the place where we're staying right now, in the campus here lower down, when I first came to my room, I found that there were some bird neighbors who had taken up residence. There's a bird's nest right above, near the door of my room. And I live in the city, in San Francisco, so when I come here, I get to be in nature. I both enjoy nature, but I also have this sort of idea of myself as someone who likes nature, right? I was just expounding this view actually to Jozen earlier—yesterday, I think it was.

So at first I was happy about these birds, these swallows. But then the first morning I found that my neighbors are on a different schedule than I am. About four a.m. they're all chirping, and the day has already begun for them. Very loudly. So then I had a different idea about my neighbors. Actually, first I accused Greg of chirping—Greg is my human neighbor. And then he told me it was not him. So then I found it was the birds.

You know, this view also arises: "Oh, this is my place. This is the Spirit Rock teacher place."

And then a little later in the day, I was trying to write the Dharma talk, and it turns out on the other side of the residence there's a nice roof that's very shady, and a group of turkeys likes to hang out there. They're actually not noisy, but they do poop a lot. So there I was, trying to write a Dharma talk—this very high-level activity—and there's a whole bunch of turkeys sitting one foot from me on the porch. I don't know if they could or couldn't see me, but they're looking at me and just pooping.

At first I had this idea: What are you doing here? This is my residence and you're pooping on the porch. But the mind has this view, and in this case, the view is based on human dominance, honestly. There's a certain unperceived human dominance—the humans have built these domiciles, and so this is my place, and you are smaller than me, and you are birds, and thus should be inferior and should know your place. It wasn't played out like this, but really there was a perspective like this.

Fortunately, my mind in some ways doesn't like to hang out in these perspectives too much. I feel like one of the benefits of practice is that we can become less and less tolerant of certain kinds of suffering. So rather than drill down and really hunker down, there's a way in which the mind is like, "What else is possible?" There's always at least one other perspective possible in a situation.

Through practice, this happens almost automatically, and sometimes it feels kind of like those robot vacuum cleaners. If they bump into a wall, they come back, and they'll go like this, and they'll keep going until they find some exit. The mind doesn't want to hang out in these areas of oppositional suffering, so it keeps searching.

In reflection with my turkey neighbors, it was like, "Oh, actually I'm here for this week, but maybe it's their residence. Maybe I'm visiting their area, not they're visiting my area. And maybe if it bothers me that they poop on the porch, I can sweep that away." Then it's interesting being a Dharma teacher because sometimes one's own advice comes back. Recognizing yourself as part of nature. So then it's like, "Oh yeah, actually it's kind of cool to have these birds around." That became somewhat more okay, even though the same thing was happening—even this afternoon they were looking at me and pooping while I'm writing this Dharma talk.

With the ones in front, I realized I could put on earplugs. Also, they've been here before me. And then I started to notice—rather than being caught in my view of "What are you doing? You're wrong"—that every time I opened the door, the bird would fly away. It seemed scared. I am much bigger than this bird, so when I open the door, it gets scared and flies away. This happens every time. I started to tune in: this is actually disruptive to their life too. I think they're being disruptive to my life, but there's another perspective from which I'm interrupting their life as well.

Even just some shift that way—there's a way in which we usually assume ourselves both to be here and also very substantially to be the center of the universe. Everything is in relationship to me, to what's good for me, to how I want things to be. This can cause a lot of suffering, as well as being actually false.

In a more mundane way in regular life: there's a billboard on an area of the highway where there's a lot of traffic. The billboard is for a bicycle coalition, and it says, "You are not stuck in traffic. You are traffic."

That shift from "everyone else is a problem to me, I have this thing I want to do"—that's the view—to "actually we're all in this together in some way." There's this flow of traffic, and to the other people, I'm in their way. We're all just trying to get home.

In an even more impressive way, a friend of mine had told me about a time that she was mugged in Oakland. Someone had a gun, and it was late at night. She and her girlfriend were coming back from somewhere, and the person told them to put everything they had in their pockets down on the ground and then run. So they did that. She said she only had about four dollars and a chapstick, and the keys too.

So I asked her later, "Weren't you scared? That's a difficult experience."

And she said, "Yeah, I was scared, but actually I could see that he was scared too. He was holding the hand with the gun and it was shaking. So we were both scared."

This friend is not overtly a practitioner, but that's good practice—shifting perspective. It's not just about you. Even in these extreme situations where it feels like you're being wronged, where this is clearly a problem, where your view is that you are the victim in this—what if we had the ability to access multiple perspectives? The world would be a very different place.

So what can help us in this? Here in retreat, we have a good opportunity to actually investigate in a more detailed way: What is it that we take to be ourselves? The Buddha gives a particular scheme that I've found helpful, which concerns the five aggregates—particular areas of experience, particular ways in which our experience of self gets constructed. It's helpful for us to look into these.

We've already been examining several of them in our practice, but I'd like to mention them all, including a few that haven't been discussed yet.

The first one is form—the physical form. This one we've been practicing with from the very beginning. Usually we take this experience of the body to be a solid entity that we call "myself." Now scientifically, this is also not true. The body is not fully solid. It is actually a mass of shifting and changing cells. Blood is always flowing through. Cells are being born and dying. Everything is always in motion in that which we call our body. And in our experience of it, when we pay attention, we can notice that the experience itself is constantly changing. There is some experience of solidity, of fluidity, of mobility, of temperature.

The Buddha gave metaphors for each of these aspects of experience. For this one, he said it's something that might seem solid but is actually totally insubstantial. The body is like the foam on ocean waves. Through the motion of the wave coming in, sometimes at the top there are bubbles that seem to collect, and it almost appears to be something solid. But it's so insubstantial—it's going to hit the ground and dissolve.

A second aggregate the Buddha talked about is vedana, or feeling tone, which Greg mentioned and we discussed this morning. This quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant is actually present in every sense experience—every sound, every smell, every taste, every touch, every mental object. Every sensation has a valence of this sort.

We frequently misperceive this as something solid, something permanent, and as actually being ourselves. We misperceive a body sensation that is unpleasant to be ourselves. We label it "my knee pain," and then we have mental thoughts about that, and we proliferate and create a whole world. When we tune into this in more detail, we notice that feeling tone is actually constantly changing. In this way, it's not ours. It's not me. It's not mine. And it's not changing in the way I would like it to all the time. So I can't really own this. If I owned it, I'd make it do what I wanted, which would be to get more and more pleasant, period.

For feeling tone, the metaphor the Buddha gave was bubbles arising from raindrops on a puddle. It just arises from conditions in a moment, and then it's gone.

Investigate this and see. Check it out. There can be very interesting things to learn. With feeling tone, one area where you can notice this particularly well is in eating meditation, which you have several opportunities for during the day—or even drinking tea meditation, something like that.

Because there are ways in which the feeling tone can be both surprising—like this thing you thought would taste pleasant is actually not as pleasant as you expected. Or when you tune in, the opposite: you thought it was going to be unpleasant, but it's actually pleasant. You can also notice how you can't make it last. It comes, it goes, it fades out so quickly. And when you tune into that, you get a sense of how poignantly futile our attempt to line up pleasant experience for the rest of our lives is as a strategy for well-being.

The third aggregate has been mentioned briefly but not elaborated on so much. This is saññā, or perception. This is a mental factor that involves labeling or recognition that happens automatically in our mind. Sometimes it happens verbally, with a word, and sometimes there's just a knowing without the word. For example, when you take a fork from the silverware drawer, you don't always say "fork" in your mind. Maybe sometimes you do, but you're aware this is the implement with which you can eat your salad. This is an aspect of thought, and when we're talking about mental objects, it arises to the level of a label.

I was speaking about this when we were doing guided meditation with thinking or mind objects. It's noticing when this labeling comes, how it comes without your script. And what's particularly interesting is to notice when it is wrong—when we misperceive something around us. For me, sometimes it's misperceiving something in the environment that I think might be an animal, and then I realize it's actually just a moving leaf or a bush. It's helpful to recognize how often we're misperceiving in this way.

A friend of mine from the city came out for a retreat in springtime. Some of you might have been here in the spring when the creeks were running full—as Greg mentioned, there was a lot of rain. She told me the first night that she kept hearing these sounds and was thinking, "Wow, there are so many car alarms here. Why don't people turn their car alarms off?" And then she realized it was actually frogs. But her city perspective interpreted the sound as car alarms, as something happening that needed attention.

The particular perception that's most helpful to examine is, of course, this idea of "me" or "mine" that arises in relationship to our body, to experience, to things. The metaphor the Buddha used for perception was of a mirage—something that seems like it is a certain way, but as you approach it, you can see it's not.

The fourth aggregate is called sankhara, translated various ways, but we'll call it mental formations. Perception is one of these, but this category includes aspects of our mental life that arise—all of the emotions, your intentions, all of this. And as Joseph was saying this morning, we can take these to be me or mine. "I own this anger" or "this anger is mine," or even "I am angry, I am this."

The metaphor the Buddha gave for mental formations is about a banana tree trunk. We don't have too many banana trees here, but I've seen them in tropical places. A banana tree is basically like a big stalk. It looks like a solid tree, but it's empty inside. What's interesting for this metaphor is that it's kind of like a big blade of grass with these empty chambers within. And yet it has this huge, fancy production of bananas. The comb of bananas is very big and kind of showy—like strong mental formations. Yet when you examine it, it's actually also empty. It'll fall down. There's nothing there, nothing at the core.

So notice if you have these beliefs sometimes that "I am this emotion, this emotion is me"—or even "I am in this emotion, this emotion is in me," that there is a me related to this.

The fifth aggregate may be the more unusual one to consider, which is viññana, or consciousness. Even the knowing that arises with a sense experience itself is not me or mine. And this too, as it arises with a sense experience and then fades—the metaphor is that it's like a magic show. This consciousness is that which appears and reveals all of the others, this knowing quality.

In our practice, we have so far been examining objects—the experience of the body, body sensations as an object, thoughts as an object, emotions, the energy that moves through, mind states as an object. It could be that even if you're getting pretty good at seeing those all as not me, not mine, coming and going, it can be helpful to turn around and see whether there is a kind of hiding place for identity in the knower. The knower sometimes is also like "the meditator," the one who knows, the one who is directing the practice.

And it's very subtle, the identification that can be there. But also, it's not to be found when you examine it. So I encourage you to check this out. Is there anything personal, permanent, controlling, independent entity in even the knowing? Does it have any characteristics that could be called me or mine?

In some ways, you might feel like, well, what's the problem with that? If I'm able to not cling to or attach to or identify with the body, emotions, thoughts—aren't I doing pretty well? That's pretty good, right? Probably alleviated ninety percent of suffering there.

Ajahn Mahabua, who is one of the forest masters, says whenever there's a center in the knowing, there is dukkha. This is the thing: whenever there is some identification, whenever there is some clinging, however seemingly subtle it is, there still is something we need to protect, something that we want to prevent from being harmed. And something that can be held in opposition to the rest of the world, whether it's experience or birds or the weather or body sensations.

The Buddha pointed these out, particularly these five, as areas for investigation specifically for the purpose of ending suffering. And I really appreciate this. It was like, well, there are these processes by which we seem to exist, and here highlighted are the ones in which we tend to get caught. And here's a practice of mindfulness, a practice of settling the heart and mind and being able to investigate these and to see through this for yourself. Not because you heard it in a lecture or because you read it in a book, but because you've seen for yourself.

As we investigate this body and mind, this human experience, we can see that there's nothing really there in the same way that we usually perceive it to be. This always gets a little bit tricky because there is a way in which we certainly feel like, ah, but there is this uniqueness to this body. Certainly when I'm drinking water, I'm feeling that and not this other person. So it's not saying that there's not a uniqueness to experience or to arising moments, but it's a little bit more like everything is constructed. Everything is constructed, everything is concocted in some way. It arises causally and then it will pass away causally also.

The best metaphor for this, I think, is the rainbow. A rainbow appears and it's beautiful, but it's not really a thing. It's an appearance that's there because of the way the light is shining through the prism or the mist, the rain. But when those things shift, which happens rather quickly, then it's gone. But was it really there to begin with? You can't really take the rainbow home. You can't package it. It arises causally and then when those particular causes and conditions end, it also is no longer apparent. In some ways, this is true about everything in our environment and most particularly about that which we call ourself.

Here's a story that the Buddha told about this, a metaphor for this as well. Supposing there were a king who had never heard the sound of a lute before—a stringed instrument. This king hears the sound of the lute and says, "Wow, that's so beautiful. It's so delightful, tantalizing, intoxicating, ravishing, enthralling. What is this instrument?" And then the people would tell him, "Oh, that is called the lute." And so then he says, "Go and fetch me the lute."

They bring the lute, and then he looks at it and says, "Enough with your lute. Fetch me just the sound. It's the sound that I want of the lute." And they say, "Well, you know, there are many different pieces of it. There's the wood and the skin and the neck and the frame. And when you play it with a certain human effort, then the music comes, but it's really just all these different components."

So the king impatiently says, "Enough with that. I'm going to get the sound." And so he breaks the lute into ten pieces—and still, of course, can't find the sound. Then breaks it again to a hundred pieces and pulverizes it, and still the sound is not becoming apparent. Finally he decides to burn it in a fire. And having burned it, there's just ashes. So then he's winnowing the ashes, looking for the sound in that. And still it's not coming, obviously. And then eventually the ashes might get washed away or blown away in the wind. And he would say, "Oh, it's a sorry thing, this lute, whatever this lute may be. People have been totally deceived by this." You can't find the sound.

In the same way, the Buddha says, a practitioner can investigate all of these aggregates—can investigate form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. And through investigating these can see whether there's any me or mine or I am within that. And no thoughts of me or mine or I am can be found within these.

So really what we learn as we attend to these is that there is this way in which we could be simply recognizing ourselves as nature—the arising and passing of each of these aspects. But unfortunately, because of delusion, we have a tendency to cling to these, to some aspect of this. We have this tendency to believe these, to take this to be ourselves. And then as they change, particularly as they change in ways that are not pleasing to us, we suffer.

In some ways, through repeated observation of the nature of these different aspects of what we usually call ourselves, through practicing this different kind of knowing with mindfulness, it's possible for us to see over and over again the ways in which the me, the mine, the I, is not found within this. And through this, there can be an effortless letting go, almost in spite of yourself.

The beautiful thing in this teaching is that we're examining, we're able to examine this process by which we're having experience and trying to understand that. And in this way, we have all of the equipment that we need for complete liberation, for complete alignment, right here in this body and mind system.

The Buddha offers another example about how we can relate to this—that these different aspects we usually take to be ourselves cannot actually be ourselves. They're not under our control. They're constantly changing. There's no inherent me or mine in that.

He says, "What do you think, monks, if a person were to gather or burn grass, twigs, branches, and leaves that they found here?" You can imagine here with all the high grass, what if they collected that? You might see the caretakers doing that. "And what if they were going to burn that or throw it away? Would the thought occur to you, 'Oh no, it's us that this person is gathering or burning or cutting down?'" And they say, "Oh no, because those things are not ourselves, nor do they belong to us."

"Even so, monks, whatever is not yours, let go of it. Your letting go of it will be for your long-term welfare and happiness. And what isn't yours? Form is not yours. Feeling is not yours. Perception is not yours. Mental formations are not yours. Consciousness is not yours. So let go of these, and your letting go will be for your long-term welfare and happiness."

On the way, of course, in this exploration, a lot of what we encounter is ourselves doing the opposite—clinging, misidentifying one or more of these to be ourselves. So in the practice, it's also really helpful to hold experience, to hold oneself with a lot of compassion.

Sometimes people come and they're frustrated because they say, "I've been practicing for weeks now, or a certain number of years, and still the mind is wandering, or I got duped by this emotion and was roiled around in it. I spent a lot of my time painting pictures of tigers and running away from them."

My advice is to allow yourself to be very humbled by the power of these habits of mind. It's a very humbling Dharma practice. Very, very humbling. And it's good to hold oneself with a lot of kindness and compassion too. Because you can include however long you have been practicing against however much the rest of your life was when you were not practicing. And if you believe in past lives, then you could include all of those as well. So our efforts here are good. Our efforts here are worthy. Trust that you're learning, you're cooking, whether you know it or not.

But the habitual strategy, the habitual view, the strong view is going to be: I am this body. I am these feelings. I am these emotions. The habitual view is going to be that the road to happiness is by aligning all circumstances to please me, to get everyone to agree with the way that I see the world, and to try to get everyone to follow my script. And as I mentioned, this includes humans and non-humans also. We want the birds to accord to our wishes, and the sounds, the weather.

So a lot of kindness in this approach. Interest and kindness.

Now, we've been doing the mettā practice here for some days, and I know we've practiced with the mettā for yourself. One instruction that could be helpful for the rest of the evening—I'll offer this for you—is to see if you can practice with yourself as you're walking and even as you're doing the things in your evening routine to get ready for bed, as if you were doing them with a quality of kindness.

If you're drinking water, what would it be like to drink water, to feed yourself lovingly? You do it with some care and attention. If you were actually feeding or giving drink to someone you cared about, you would do that with some intimacy.

You do it with some carefulness. What is it like if you brush your teeth with a sense of love, of metta, caring for this body, this precious body? What would it be like if you wash your face, change your clothes with a sense of goodwill, of kindness, of metta? What would it be like if you put yourself to bed with a sense of metta, tucking yourself in? Would you fling yourself on the bed? Would you fling someone you loved onto the bed?

The answer to this is not in words. It's a kind of koan of how we approach life. Like so many things in this practice, it's a lived answer—how we can care for ourselves, how we can care for others. In this way, we're cultivating this loving attention, this kind attention. And when we include that with curiosity and investigation, these are all excellent ingredients for living a good life, both here on retreat and when we go out into the world.

These qualities are also essential for gaining the insight, the kind of deep understanding that leads to greater and greater alignment with the truth, greater and greater freedom from suffering, spending less time in the caves of delusion and more time in freedom. That freedom gives you more space to connect with the world in ways that are true, to connect with nature, to connect with what matters most.

If there are aspects of what you've heard tonight that interest you, I encourage you to investigate them. If there are things that seemed cryptic or confusing, you can either hold them in the question mark basket, you can leave them on the floor here, or just take them as a hypothesis that you're in the laboratory of experience, able to check out for yourself.

Thank you for your practice. May we all be well cooked today and throughout the entire retreat.

CHAPTER 209

Applying the Practice

Carol Wilson · 44 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the various landscapes practitioners encounter along the spiritual path. She acknowledges the common trajectory from initial inspiration—when the teachings feel revolutionary and results come quickly—through the inevitable plateaus where progress seems to stall. Wilson emphasizes that these quieter periods are natural and call for cultivating patience (khanti), one of the qualities the Buddha highly praised.
>
> Wilson offers detailed guidance on the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa): sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill will (byāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). She illuminates how each hindrance tells us something untrue about ourselves or our situation, and how we habitually take refuge in these false narratives rather than in what is genuinely liberating. The key teaching is recognizing hindrances as impersonal conditions rather than identifying with them as "who we are."
> Practically, Wilson encourages meditators to trust their own wisdom in discerning what approach their practice needs—whether throwing oneself in with wholehearted energy or making subtle shifts of attention. She highlights the transformative power of small adjustments: softening the belly, connecting with the breath, bringing a bit more kindness toward oneself. The talk concludes with an invitation to clarify one's deeper intention for practice and to meet whatever arises with honesty, curiosity, and compassion rather than judgment.

So I'd like to begin by just commending everyone here for taking the time out of your lives to come and give yourself this time of retreat. It takes a certain wisdom and a certain kindness to do that, or sometimes a certain desperation. So it's great that you made it here and that you give yourself this time of settling and deepening and opening.

It's not always an easy process. Pretty much everybody here has been on retreat before, so you know that already. We can forget in between retreats how challenging they can be while you're in the middle of them, and then you get to the end and you really feel the fruits and it's like, "Oh, that's great, I want to go back." And then you return to retreat and often the first three days are pretty challenging. A lot of stuff comes up and there's a huge change of gear from the life you've just come from to this very contained and quiet experience where not much is going on. So it's commendable to go on retreat once and even more so to go on retreat numerous times. It takes a certain wisdom that knows this is good medicine and it's worth staying through the challenges.

We just had our first couple of practice interview groups today, and it strikes me that people are in very different places in their practice. There are people who are really new to the practice and people who have been practicing a long time, and those in between. I want to speak a little bit about how we apply ourselves in the practice.

When we first start, for many people at the beginning, it can be really inspiring. It's so uplifting to find in this world that's so much oriented around materialism, consumerism, and being a person, that there's this teaching—this teaching of emptiness and of change and of transformation from who I am when I begin to the potential of being a fully awakened being. That potential is there for all of us, and that can be so hugely inspiring. It still inspires me daily. In the beginning it can bring a lot of energy, a lot of delight, and a strong commitment and energy for the practice.

When we're in that place where it's early days and we're just discovering the practice and the possibilities, we're applying the practice and getting the results often quite quickly. It's often like that in the beginning—you really feel the results of the practice, and it's fantastic. It is wonderful. So at that time when we're beginning, it's really good to throw yourself in fully, even a little recklessly.

I was grateful to have nuns around me when I started practicing, who would encourage me to go past my limits. They would encourage me to do things that I wouldn't consider doing, things that would challenge my perception of what I could do and what I want, who I am and what I can and can't do. So I would try—okay, sister so-and-so is suggesting it and she's keeping an eye on me, so all right, I'll have a go. It was quite insightful and it opened things up.

There's a time when we can get into a flow of energy where you just want to completely apply yourself to the practice and keep an edge—keep that edge of not having quite enough sleep, eating just a bit less than you really need, practicing that extra half hour or hour. There's a time for that, and it can be a very potent time. So if you're in that place, it's really good to explore. It's also important not to force. It's not about forcing, but about knowing where the edge is and just going a little bit further and seeing what happens.

Then there's a time when we've been practicing for a while where things are settling down and we don't get such quick results anymore. It can seem like maybe there's something wrong because we used to get all of those insights, and now it's kind of a plateau. But that's a natural part of the practice. It's meant to be like that. In the beginning we're making huge leaps and bounds because it's new. And then after a while it's not so new anymore. The breakthroughs that were just on the surface waiting for us to realize have already happened. And perhaps the deeper insights are still a little obscure. So we can be in that in-between state.

This is also an important time in our practice—not to give up. We might give up thinking we're not getting the results we think we should be getting. But actually this is the time to be cultivating patience. The Buddha highly exalted patience as a practice, the supreme practice of patience. So that's the time to be cultivating patience and also to get a little bit more subtle with what we're seeing, with our expectations. We're honing down our attention to the little things, the little changes. It might just be a period of endurance. I certainly had some time where it was just faith, really, that was keeping me going—trusting that the Buddha knows what he's talking about and not being interested in going off in a different direction.

And there's not an awful lot happening. This went on for a couple of years. So I just kept going. The meditation over that time was not very fulfilling. There were not many insights. The predominant feeling I was experiencing was not blissful or joyful. It was quite humdrum, really. It wasn't painful either, just sort of ordinary. And then sometimes doubt would arise—maybe I've made a mistake, maybe I've done something wrong—but it felt kind of too late because I was already committed to this path.

And then there would be remembering: okay, well, what's good in what's happening now? There's living an ethical life, keeping good ethics. This is really, really important. And that's good, that's better than what I was doing before I started practicing. And keeping a certain level of discipline. I'm not a highly disciplined person by nature, which is why I entered a monastery—it provided an external discipline that was really helpful. So keeping a certain discipline, that's good. Even though I wasn't experiencing many fruits of the meditation, I was still putting the time in, still sitting, watching the breath, getting to know what was going on in my heart.

And then learning to receive feedback from others. This is also one of the benefits of living in community—you get to hear how you are, to see yourself from other people's perspectives. And sometimes it's a little disconcerting. So then learning to receive feedback and thinking, okay, maybe I need to work on that a bit more. Those kinds of things would be going on, even if the actual experience of the meditation practice wasn't that great for a while.

And then we keep going and things shift and change. At some point the joy returned and a certain subtlety could come back. And then the practice has gone through many different landscapes. It's not that it just arrives in one place and stays like that. And that in itself becomes a teaching—that this is a spiritual journey going through many landscapes, and not to give up. Not to give up and turn back, not to give up and just sink down into a swamp, not to refuse to climb that mountain ahead. It's a journey. We keep going, we keep taking another step.

And then there's the time when we need to really assess what is happening in our life and in our practice, to look really carefully. Sometimes we just need to make a subtle change. And sometimes it's when our life seems most challenging, most difficult. Things can build up so huge that we feel like, oh my goodness, I can't possibly face this, it's just too much. What am I going to do next? I don't know.

Sometimes those big times, those overwhelming experiences—my experience has been that what they need is just a little shift of mind. Ironically, just a little shift of mind. From "oh my goodness, it's all too much, I've got to keep it away" or "I've got to dive in and let it consume me"—to just being a little bit more connected to the breath. Just letting the belly relax a little more and soften. Subtle things. Just having a little bit more kindness towards myself. A little bit of interest rather than trepidation about what's going on. These slight shifts of attention are huge—they're like night and day. And it's not a rational thing, it's counterintuitive. It seems like when something's really big, we've got to do something really big to deal with it. But sometimes it's just very subtle shifts that help the whole thing to change.

We're experiencing this life all the time through our conditioning, our perceptions, our fears and desires, hopes and regrets—all of that. If we just keep looking through the same lenses, we keep seeing in the same way. So it's about changing the lens a little bit, or maybe peeking underneath the lens if we can, and seeing our experience fresh—meeting it in the moment rather than treating it as this huge thing in my life that I don't know how to deal with. Instead: well, right now, what is that experience?

This retreat situation is a wonderful support for this, because we've all taken ourselves out of our ordinary life situations to come here. Life's going on out there, and it's going on in here too. We meet our life situation right here in this environment, in this safe place where there's nothing much happening other than a lot of holding, a lot of loving, a lot of support. And then there's what we brought with us. We can meet that right here, without having to have it all sorted out for when we get home. Just now, how it is in this body right now. In my belly right now, in my heart right now—not so much in the mind. The mind tells all kinds of stories. But we can drop down from the thinking into the body, allowing the body to be met, listening to it, meeting the tensions and stresses. Softening around them. Taking a breath.

It's amazing. Taking a breath is kind of miraculous. You can be in the most intense situation, and then you just take a deep breath.

Everything stops for a moment, and there's a different perspective. Then there's a choice, because we've given ourselves a little bit of space.

So there are times when that's the appropriate way to meet our practice. And we have to discern for ourselves. There's nobody who can tell you, "Okay, now you should do it like this. Now you should totally throw yourself in and really push yourself to the edge. But now it's time to be really subtle." You have to know that. Your wisdom has to know that. And we all have that wisdom if we listen. The wisdom is there, and what we need to do changes. We only know what to do by giving the space to look and listen inwardly. So this is a great opportunity for that.

I also want to mention the five hindrances, which I usually speak about, because I think they're really important to know about. We tend to identify with these and believe in them. The title of this retreat is about taking refuge in what is true, but we often take refuge in what is not true. And each of those five hindrances is not telling us the truth.

The first is sensual desire—having the mind pulled out into sensuality. This is the story that if I just have this nice thing, this delicious thing, this beautiful thing, this comfortable situation, whatever it might be, then I will be whole and everything will be well. That's the story of sense desire. And there may be people here who know how that goes. First of all, it seems harmless enough. You just have that little something and it's nice and you feel good. Then maybe you feel like, "Oh, I need it again." And then, "Well, I'll be fine as long as I have that every day. Twice a day, three times a day, five times a day. I need it."

So that's what happens with sense desire. It never actually satisfies us longer than the shortest of times. And because it gives that little satisfaction, we think it's really doing the job, but it isn't. It's keeping us more and more caught up. It's like drinking salt water. If you're thirsty and you have a drink of salt water, you think, "Oh, thank goodness." It tastes a bit off, not quite right, but thank goodness. Then it just makes you more thirsty and more thirsty until it wears you out completely. That is the truth of sense desire.

It's the first hindrance and one that we all know very well, probably experiencing it numerous times a day. It can latch on to any of the six senses, including mind. So knowing sense desire as sense desire, and if we can, letting go. If we can't help following it, then follow it all the way through. Follow it through the wanting, the getting, the becoming one with, the gratification—how that's there for a while, then it falls away, and then there's the sense of lack again, and then the reaching out to something else. Seeing that whole process. And perhaps noticing the adverse effects on our own body and mind when we repeatedly follow sense desire.

Getting to know it, getting to know its trickery, and also having patience. It's not like the intellect can know it and then we're done. The emotions, the karma, the wanting is still buying into it. The rational mind, clever though it is, doesn't rule us as well as we would like it to. It's the yearnings of the heart. So we need to go deeper than just the rational. The rational can help, but it's meeting the yearning that actually transforms our addiction to sense desire.

Then there's ill will or aversion, which can be anger, resentment, hatred, irritability, impatience. All of those come under the category of ill will. And this is something we can also take refuge in, oddly enough. I'm sure everybody knows people who defend themselves behind an aversive personality. There's having an aversive personality and knowing it and working with it. And then there's having an aversive personality and believing in it and using it as a defense, as a means to remain right and separate and controlled and safe. It feels safe, but it isn't.

So we can take refuge in the hindrance of ill will, and this is surely a wrong refuge. With ill will, we get to know the feeling—where it resides in us, who we put it onto, the cause of our ill will.

It's not me, it's them, it's that—it's because of those things out there that I'm feeling this. So it seems like that, but really it's arising in the heart, in one's own heart and mind. And that's the only place where we can transform it. We can try to change other people, and if they're willing, they might change a bit. But it probably won't be enough to sort it out in our own heart, because our own heart is generating that ill will.

In this world, in this imperfect world, there will always be something wrong. There will always be something to complain about, always something unsatisfactory. It's made like that. So if we're always looking outside of ourselves for the cause of the ill will in our own hearts, we'll always find something to blame it on, and we'll never experience the freedom of having a heart that is free from ill will. Most of us experience it sometimes and then sometimes we don't, and that's nice. Some experience it more than others.

Getting to know when the hindrance of ill will has arisen, getting to know that that's what it is—it's a hindrance to enlightenment. We don't have to annihilate it. We don't have to have more ill will, judging the ill will, getting into layers and layers of one ill will over another. We don't have to do that. We just need to know it. This is aversion. It feels like this. It's really unpleasant. It's really unpleasant and I don't want to feel it. And then we know that. Then maybe knowing that gives us a little bit more space where we can let it be there and be felt. And then maybe we can bring a little kindness to it, a little mettā to the ill will. Then it starts to feel relieved.

If we don't know it as a hindrance, we believe it. We either believe it's who we are, what we are, or we believe other people are the cause of it. And so we're taking wrong refuge.

The next hindrance is sleepiness and dullness, or sloth and torpor. I've been experiencing quite a lot of that today myself. This can also arise during the changing of gear that we're doing here, from our lives before to this, and also being all together in a group like this. Everything kind of wants to shut down. It's all a bit too much.

Knowing that, for myself today struggling in the meditation with dullness—there's a lot of dullness and a lot of unconsciousness—there's also a knowing that this is what's going on now, and why, and that it will change, and also that I need to put in a little bit more energy. That's different from "Oh no, I'm just such a hopeless meditator" or "How embarrassing, all these people are seeing me nodding." That's selfing, and that doesn't free us; that just gets us more entrenched. But it's more like: okay, sleepiness, dullness, the body is heavy and dull, the mind is sleepy, the eyes are sleepy. There are things we can do—stand up, open our eyes, take some deep breaths. And maybe at the beginning of a retreat, the thing to do is to take a rest. The first day or two is often helpful. Take a nap, if I may say that, and then be more refreshed. But don't keep doing it throughout the retreat. That's buying into the hindrance again.

Then there's the hindrance of restlessness, which we all experience in different ways. The mind being restless, coming up with lots of thoughts and ideas and opinions. Or the body being agitated, restless. Knowing restlessness—it's very believable. We feel like we've got to move from it. When there's restlessness, we feel like we've got to do something. All we need to do in this context is know: this is restlessness and agitation.

Worry and anxiety also come along with restlessness. They kind of come together. It's like a little bit too much energy that's not grounded—the opposite of sleepy and dull. Too much energy that's ungrounded. And then we start worrying, getting agitated.

Knowing that as restlessness, the hindrance of restlessness and agitation. Not me, not mine, not personal, not personality, but a hindrance that is arising in that moment. We can use things like being particularly aware of the out-breath, letting go on the out-breath.

That can really help to ease the restlessness. And also focusing more strongly on the breath—sometimes that can help to just pull ourselves out of the restlessness. We have to experiment ourselves and see what works.

Sometimes just bringing the intention of calming this body, calming this mind, calming the bodily formation, calming the mental formations. Sometimes just that intention, those words, can help to ground us a little bit. But most important is the mindfulness and the understanding that this is a hindrance, not who and what I am. This is changing.

And then the hindrance of doubt. So whenever I say you have to use your own wisdom to know what to do, I'm sure lots of people will be going, "But what am I supposed to do? Should I do this? Should I do that? Am I at the beginning of my practice? Am I in the middle? What do I do?" So then that happens. We do that. I used to really want someone to just tell me what to do. Just tell me. And it's like, well, no. You have to know. I have to know. We have to know for ourselves.

Doubt will come in and it'll keep us spinning for eternity if we let it. So once we find ourselves caught in doubt—should I do this or should I do that? What should I be doing? I'm not sure—then we recognize, "Oh, there's doubt. The hindrance of doubt is present in the mind."

The way out of that endless loop of doubt is understanding one of the tricks of doubt, one of its lies and stories: it tells us that if we just stay with this long enough, if we just keep thinking about it, we're going to get the answer. Just keep going around long enough and you're going to get it. It's there somewhere. So that's the story, the lie of doubt.

Whereas the Buddha recommends us to use our discernment. What is the most wholesome thing to do? What is the most beneficial? What is beneficial? What is not beneficial? What is wholesome? What is unwholesome? And you may find that this can be very clear: "Okay, that's unwholesome, I'm not going to do that. I'll just work with this, it's more wholesome."

It might be that whichever way you go is going to be wholesome, so then you go into doubt again. But the thing is, if it's wholesome both ways, it doesn't actually matter which way you go. You just choose one and do it and see what happens. And if it's not going the way you think it should be going, or where you want to go after some time, try the other one. See what happens.

Because it's not like life is set out in some clear trajectory and we just have to know exactly what we do when. It's influenced by what we bring to it in the moment. Our life unfolds through what we bring to it in the moment. This is why knowing what is wholesome and what is unwholesome is really, really important. Because if we're carelessly cultivating unwholesome qualities and justifying them in our minds, that's influencing how things will be for us in the next moment, and the next, and the next. And so we get more and more entrenched.

Whereas if we can recognize when we are defending or justifying or judging or desiring or complaining—all of those things—or getting caught going round and round in circles not sure what to do, when we recognize, then we can choose to do what is wholesome. And sometimes we can drop what's going on and turn towards something that actually cultivates something more directly wholesome.

So there's ill will. I remember one of my first retreats I did in Amaravati, I had so much anger towards the person teaching the retreat. I felt so angry because there was so little silence. I just wanted silence.

I wanted to sit with other people in silence. There was almost no silence through the whole retreat—everything was guided. It was driving me crazy, and I was getting more and more angry. At one point I realized this isn't going to change, and it's a ten-day retreat. I need to do something. So with that energy of anger, I started to practice metta. And then the anger, the energy of anger, started to turn into the energy of metta. By the end I was totally blissed out on metta—I loved the teacher.

So sometimes it's like that, where we actually turn the energy around. And sometimes we can't do that, and all we can do is bring mindfulness to what is going on. We're holding it within our mindful awareness and we're not acting on it. That's already very powerful.

Sometimes the habit is so strong that we can't help acting on it. Then we act on it and we need to bring the discernment, the clarity, and the honesty to acknowledge: okay, I lost it there, or I'm going down that road again. I know I'm doing it and I kind of can't stop right now. I know it's not going to have good results. And then maybe we can acknowledge it to the people we live with. Because when we're not able to hold those kilesas with mindfulness, they spill out onto other people, and other people have to deal with them. The energy that we can't deal with—that's what happens. When we can't manage it, we generously give it to other people. And then they have to deal with it in whatever way they are able to, or not.

Once we start to wake up to that and be aware of it, then it becomes the humbling practice of acknowledging it. That can help give us an incentive to get on and start transforming the stuff that's here, because we don't want to keep being in that position where we're dumping on people and then having to apologize all the time. It's just kind of humiliating.

So these are ways that we can gradually transform the habits of our hearts and minds—transform them into the path, the path of awakening. It's not about becoming a good person who's all nice all the time, sweetness and light. It's not about that. It's about truth, and about aligning oneself with what is wholesome, what is good. And sometimes truth is hard to hear, hard to receive, hard to know. It's not always nice. But it's truth. So it's good. It's beautiful.

There are many ways that we can take refuge in what is not true, and if we don't have that simple map of the hindrances, we can so easily just get caught again and again in them—take them to be who and what we are, or take them to be caused by something outside of ourselves, or justify them. It's important to remember that we're on a path, there's a direction we want to go in, and then there's a road going off to the right with flashing neon signs saying, "Come this way, come this way." If we're not mindful and we don't know what's going on, we just get duped by it. We just go there. "Oh, that looks interesting. Let's go down there and see where we get to." And then we get way off track into some place we never wanted to go.

So to remember, to keep in mind the bigger intention of our practice. And if you aren't quite clear what it is, then take this time to get clear over these days. What is the greater intention of my practice? Am I just looking for a little bit of calm? Or is there something a bit more profound, a bit deeper, that's brought us here, that's drawing us to keep turning towards what we find here?

The path unfolds differently for every person, every individual. Who knows why and how and where it will take us. But we just need to know what's going on here, on our own path, where we are right now on this path of practice. That's all we need to know. We don't need to compare ourselves to others. We don't need to judge what's going on. We just need to know it and acknowledge it and take a step from here—or a leap, sometimes, from here. And wherever we are is good. It's good, and it's not the end.

So there's not a dead end here. If we turn and look and feel, "Oh my goodness, I'm just such a mess. After all these years, I'm just such a mess" — it can be like that. And then, well, sadhu, sadhu, sadhu. There's an ability, there's a strength and an awareness that can turn towards that mess. Without that, we're just going to pretend we're not a mess for the rest of our life. But with the awareness, we can turn towards it with some kindness, some understanding, some listening, and start to turn it around.

If when we turn and look here and we think, "Wow, I am so awesome, I am the best in the world," then you better ask a few more questions. Go and spend a bit of time with your family and ask them what they think about you. Don't stop there, because if that's where you've come to, it's not the end.

So we need to just keep on looking really honestly and keep on meeting our experience honestly — not being harsh towards ourselves or beating down on ourselves, but being interested and kind and encouraging.

When we apply mindfulness and turn it onto what's going on here, and what we find is not very inspiring — which sometimes it is like that — we can get too involved in what we find. We get too involved in the object of our mind and not enough in the awareness itself. Every time mindfulness arises and we turn and see what's going on, this is a wonderful moment. This is an awakening moment. If we're awakening to what is beautiful and inspiring, that's wonderful — there's joy in that. And if we're awakening to what is kind of grungy and uninspiring, that is also wonderful because it gives us a chance to transform. And if we're turning to what is kind of nothing in particular, if we can turn towards that and stay with it, that's pretty inspiring. That's not easy, and it's a large part of our lives, so it's actually very important.

So we have this time and these supportive conditions to turn towards our own body, mind, and heart. To learn to trust our own wisdom and exploration. And to experiment a little bit with what we find. What's the right thing to do? Don't just do what you've always done. Experiment a little bit. Be interested, curious, creative. And we will see what transforms over these days.

So I'd like to offer that tonight.

Anodana yantama kathaya sadhu karam tatamase. Sadhu, sadhu, sadhu. Anumodana.

CHAPTER 210

Suffering and the Illusion of Self

Carol Wilson · 1h07

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of the Buddha's fundamental teachings on suffering and selflessness. She begins with the First Noble Truth, examining the three kinds of dukkha: dukkha dukkha (inherent painfulness), the suffering arising from impermanence, and saṅkhāra dukkha (the suffering of maintaining conditioned existence). Wilson emphasizes the importance of opening to suffering rather than resisting it, noting that resistance actually feeds our pain while closing us off from the wellspring of compassion.
> The talk illuminates a critical distinction between compassion and sorrow—while both respond to suffering, sorrow contains aversion whereas true compassion does not. This difference fundamentally shapes our capacity for skillful action in the world. Wilson then turns to the Second Noble Truth, identifying the root cause of suffering as the deeply conditioned illusion of self. Through vivid examples—concepts of place, time, ownership, and self-image—she demonstrates how we live within mental constructs we mistake for reality.
> Drawing on the Buddha's analysis of the five khandhas (aggregates), Wilson shows how what we call 'self' is merely a constellation of physical sensations, consciousness, and mental phenomena, each arising and passing moment to moment. The talk concludes with the liberating insight that through awareness of our identification processes—with sensations, thoughts, emotions, and even awareness itself—we can recognize the empty, constructed nature of self and abide in natural clarity. As she quotes Kalu Rinpoche: 'When we understand this, we see we are nothing. And being nothing, we are everything.'

There's one basic teaching common to all the traditions of Buddhism, in whatever culture or country it manifests, and that is the teaching on the Four Noble Truths. They really encapsulate the dilemma that faces us and the possibility—the experience, the realization—of freedom.

One of the things that's so amazing about Dharma practice is that it's like a hologram. Whatever part we look at, whatever perspective, whatever angle we're coming from, any part reveals the whole, if we look deeply enough.

So what is the first noble truth of the Buddha's teaching? The first noble truth is the truth of suffering. The Buddha saw the basic problem inherent in existence because he saw that in the realm of conditioned phenomena, suffering is inherent, inevitable.

What does conditioned phenomena mean? It's simple—it means everything. Everything that arises out of conditions. That's what conditioned means: things which arise out of causes. So everything in the phenomenal world is a conditioned phenomenon, and therefore unsatisfying.

The Pali word for suffering is dukkha, and there's a wide variety of translations. It means suffering, unsatisfactoriness, unreliable. How do we experience this? The great task for us is somehow to bring the abstraction of the teachings to connect with our actual experience. To study it as philosophy or comparative religion may be of some interest, but that's not really what transforms us. We really have to connect it to our own experience.

So what is this truth of suffering? The Buddha talked of three kinds. The first kind are those experiences which are painful in themselves. He called this dukkha dukkha, just to emphasize the point. This suffering that is painful in itself is really pervasive in the world. A lot of you are working right in the midst of it. We see political and social injustice and exploitation in so many different realms—the pain, the suffering of war, of violence, of cruelty, of hunger. These are conditions which are suffering just in and of themselves. They're painful to be with.

We can feel this dukkha dukkha, this pain, in our own bodies. When we have painful sensations, or through the process of getting older and weaker, getting sick, getting diseased—and often the process of dying is a painful one. We can see this suffering in the world. We can see it in our bodies. We can see this suffering in our own minds, all of the painful, unpleasant mind states. And there is a long list: anger, hatred, fear, boredom, jealousy, despair, discouragement, frustration, loneliness, unworthiness, self-hatred. Enough, enough already.

What's important is that we recognize this, that we're really open to it as a significant part of life experience. This is part of being alive. As I mentioned the other night, it's not that it's a mistake. This is part of our experience. This is the first kind of suffering that we can really connect with, be with, open to. It's in the world, it's in ourselves.

The second kind of suffering is the suffering that comes out of the impermanence of things. It's really the suffering of conditions being unreliable. We keep looking in our lives for happiness, for a lasting happiness in this conditioned world, and it never quite arrives. Have you noticed how we live our lives very often just waiting for the next nice event? The next vacation, or the next weekend, or the right relationship, or whatever.

And it's always, it seems as if this completion or happiness is always just ahead of us. If only this happened, if only this happened, if only this happened. But of course, even when they do happen, it is happiness for a time and then it's gone. Because the very nature of all conditioned things is change, impermanence. If we're looking for a lasting happiness in that which is not lasting, it's not a good move. Because we're looking in an arena which cannot provide what we're looking for.

And yet, we keep doing this. Sometimes in reflecting on this, I think back to all the wonderful experiences, the different ones that have happened in my life. Where are they? They were wonderful at the time and they're gone. So this is another kind of dukkha, another kind of unsatisfactoriness—really connecting with the unreliability of phenomena to provide a lasting happiness for us. So we can finally maybe start looking in the appropriate place.

There's a third kind of dukkha, and the Pali word for it is sankhara dukkha. It's the suffering of having to expend energy to keep things together. I told my house story the other night. It was great—I moved into my house and I was really enjoying it. But after a very short time living in it, I made this great discovery. I discovered that not doing anything, it got dirty. And that I had to clean it.

So my mind made this connection between this first noble truth, the truth of suffering, and the second law of thermodynamics, which I know almost nothing about, except the general principle that things tend toward disorder. Systems tend toward disorder. And so to keep them in order, it requires the input of energy. We're here for ten days. Our clothes get dirty. They need to be cleaned. We need to do whatever we do to have enough to eat. There's always this expenditure of effort and energy just to keep things together. So that's another kind of dukkha, another kind of suffering.

It really comes down to something very simple, this first noble truth. It can be summed up. All of these different kinds of suffering can be summed up: when we're associated with what we don't want, it's suffering. And when we're separated from what we do want, it's suffering. This is the push-pull that's happening throughout our lives. When we're with what we don't want, we suffer. When we're separated from what we like, we suffer. When we resist what comes, there's suffering. When we hold on to what's changing, we suffer.

So one question arises: so what? Why should we pay attention to all this? People seem to be living their lives who never give a moment's thought to any of this. Why should we? Why should we make this enormous effort?

I'll tell you. I'm not taking any chances. Because it really takes a very great kind of openness, and really a great courage, to see what is actually there. It's very easy to live—and I think we do much of the time, and many people do most of the time—it's very easy to live in a state of resistance, in a state of avoidance, in a state of denial. You're probably dealing with it a tremendous amount—people who are just not willing to open to see what is actually going on, the suffering that's there.

There's one story which epitomizes this tendency. A friend of mine told it to me. It was a story of his grandfather in the early forties, driving with his father

So the grandfather was driving with his son, and it was December 7th, 1941. They heard on the radio the news of Pearl Harbor. And the first thing the grandfather said to my friend's father was, "Don't tell your mother."

Now that's a hard one to avoid. That takes a real special effort. She probably finally found out. Of course, what's instructive is that we can laugh at that, and yet in our own ways we're all doing it. So we really need to see how it is that we avoid or deny or resist.

There are two very important implications of this way of living. One is that very often, in the very process of resisting whatever unpleasantness or suffering, the resistance is actually feeding that which we don't want to let in. So it's not a very productive strategy.

Just as a few examples: when there's pain in the body and we resist it rather than open to it, what's happening? We're tensing behind it, creating more pain. Our very avoidance of it is strengthening it. And the same thing happens with our resistance or avoidance of unpleasant thought forms or mind states. The more we resist them, the more they're fed, because we're imputing a reality to them which they don't actually have.

When we resist feeling anger or sadness or whatever it is, or certain thought forms in the mind, when we resist them and we don't want to see them or feel them, we're actually feeding them because we're giving them a concrete reality which in their nature they don't have at all.

An image came to mind some time ago as a way of relating to all of these unpleasant aspects of the mind which we might have a tendency to resist or avoid. I thought of it particularly with regard to the hindrances—desire and aversion and sleepiness and restlessness and doubt—but it could be anything. It could be states of fear or cruelty, whatever we don't want to let in.

It reminded me of kids in Halloween costumes. On Halloween, kids come to your door and they're all dressed up. The pirate comes—do you get frightened? Probably not, because you know it's just a kid in costume. So you give them candy or whatever. All of these thoughts, all of these thought forms which seem so fearsome to us are nothing more than kids in Halloween costumes. If we believe the costume, then we resist. "Get away. I don't want to be with you. Leave my doorway." When we see that it's just a costume, it's no problem at all. We can have a real loving relationship with them.

So this is the first implication of avoiding or resisting suffering—that we're actually feeding it. There's a second implication, which perhaps is more touching. When we live in a way that closes us off to the experience, to the awareness of suffering, when we become defended against it or armored against it or protected from it, what happens is that we are also closing off the wellspring of our compassion. And so it's a very significant consequence.

How does this happen? Compassion is that feeling in the heart that wants to alleviate the suffering that exists in the world, in other people, in ourselves. It's that movement to action. It sees suffering, it's open to it, and it wants to do something about it. That's the power of compassion.

It's described really beautifully by a little haiku poem by Ryokan. He was an eighteenth-century Zen poet, hermit, and monk, with very wonderful poetry.

He said, "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all of the people in this floating world." That's a feeling of compassion. "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all of the people in this floating world."

What opens us, what connects us to this feeling of compassion is precisely our ability to open up to experience the suffering that's there. So this realization of the First Noble Truth is essential. It's like the foundation of our spiritual path.

There's a very critical discrimination that has to be made here, and it's particularly critical for people who are already open to suffering and trying to alleviate it. That is the distinction between compassion and sorrow. These are two very different mind states. Both of them are responses to suffering—we can feel compassion, we can feel sorrow—but in sorrow there is aversion to the suffering, and in compassion there is not. It's this distinction which then leads to very different kinds of responses.

We really have to see this clearly. If we respond to suffering with aversion—aversion to it, we don't like it—the reactions that come from that aversion are sorrow, anger, hatred, fear. These become the motives for action, and they're not very constructive motives. When there's openness to the suffering rather than aversion to it, then our response is one of compassion.

Do you see the difference between these two? They start from a place that's very close. It's said that sorrow is the near enemy of compassion, which in Buddhist jargon means that it's a mind state which looks like compassion. We can mistake it for compassion, but it is not. These are two states of mind very close, but they end up in very different places.

Sometimes it's hard to see how we cannot have aversion to the immensity of suffering in the world. As you deal with the problems that you deal with and perhaps contemplate even much larger ones, how can we not feel aversion or hatred or anger towards the things that are going on?

I think it's helpful to look at our own experience of suffering because it gives us insight into the importance of this distinction. You're sitting here in the hall, sitting with this agonizing pain in the knee. Does hating the pain contribute in any way to its alleviation? No. It just further creates a struggle. The hating of the suffering, the hating of the pain, the aversion towards the pain does not contribute to the alleviation of it.

If you're sitting and you're having a run of awful mind states, awful thoughts—you're the worst person in the world, thoughts of cruelty and revenge, just imagine your worst kinds of thoughts—does hating those thoughts in any way alleviate the suffering of them? No. It just further pollutes the whole internal environment.

If we can be with the pain in ourselves—the pain in the knee, the painful thoughts, the painful emotions—with a sense of caring, with a sense of loving, with a sense of openness as opposed to aversion, then it is much easier to actually alleviate, to create a healing space. And the same thing that's true for us is true for the suffering in the world. Aversion towards it does not help.

So we need to see, we really need to examine within ourselves and learn to discriminate between the feelings of sorrow which may come and the feeling of compassion. We must get very clear about the difference.

This is a really difficult practice. It is not easy to open ourselves to suffering, to really be open—not with aversion, not with hatred—but just to let it all in. It's precisely because this is our practice that the realization of the First Noble Truth is the practice of compassion. To the degree that we realize, we open to, we're aware of the suffering that exists in ourselves and in the world, this is the practice of letting everything in, not holding anything aside. We let all the conditions of the world in. We let all kinds of people in—our friends as well as our adversaries. We let all the sides of ourselves in.

This past year I saw two movies which really had quite an impact on me. They both had the same theme: how compassion grows from letting suffering in. One was Schindler's List, of course. And the other was a movie called Romero—I don't know if you saw that. It was about the archbishop in El Salvador.

And both of them started with beings who were in the midst of tremendous suffering but basically closed off to it in one way or another. Both movies portrayed the gradual opening of these people to the suffering that was around them, and the outpouring of compassionate action that took place. What was quite amazing was that even though they were documenting the most horrendous suffering, both movies were tremendously inspiring to me because they showed the power that can come when we open ourselves to this—open ourselves with compassion rather than sorrow, with openness rather than aversion. That's the key. That's the key point.

All of this is summed up again in a Japanese haiku. I love Japanese aesthetic because it's so exquisite. There's another little poem by Isa, who I've mentioned before. It says: "In the cherry blossom's shade, there's no such thing as a stranger." It just expresses for me this quality of opening to it all, of letting it all in. In the cherry blossom's shade, there's no such thing as a stranger.

So this is the first noble truth of the Buddhist teaching. It's about suffering and opening to it, and the compassion that comes from that.

The second noble truth of the Buddha's teaching is the cause of suffering. Why is there so much suffering in the world? Mostly we relate to it, both in ourselves and other people, on the level of symptoms. We're dealing with the symptoms of the suffering. What the Buddha saw—and this is the greatness of enlightenment—was the root cause of suffering. Why is it in the world? Why is it so pervasive?

No matter what we do, and this came up the other night in a little discussion, we can make our best efforts to really alleviate the pain that's here. But as long as there is greed in the mind, as long as there is fear in the mind, as long as there is hatred in the mind, as long as there is ignorance in the mind, suffering will continue. Because at its root it's not a question of fixing something. We want to fix what we can. We want to alleviate the symptoms. But the real root of it are these basic forces in people's minds. It's because of greed that there's so much injustice. It's because of hatred. It's because of fear. These are the underlying causes.

Now there's one aspect of ignorance which actually underlies all of these other unwholesome forces in the mind. There's one source point for suffering. There's one root cause. It is the great hallucination of our lives. We are living in a massive hallucination. And that is the very deeply conditioned idea or concept we have of self, of "I." Our lives embody this. They revolve about this notion of self, this notion of I. It's the construction of a reference point—a reference point of I to whom all experience is happening. So everything comes back to this: I'm feeling, I'm thinking, everything's back to that reference point.

As soon as there is the construction, the fabrication of the sense of self, automatically following from it is the sense of other. If there is self, built into the feeling of self is the feeling of other. So from the very beginning there is separation, there is duality. And it's in this context of self that so many unskillful actions proceed.

If there's a self—and whether we consider this personally, a personal self, or our national self—what happens? As soon as there's this notion, we need to defend it, we need to protect it, we need to gratify it, we need to aggrandize it. All of these unwholesome actions are happening based on this notion of a self, an I, a me, a mine. And it's this concept of self to which all suffering adheres.

What is so amazing about all of this is that we're making it all up. This is the hallucination. It's not something that is real. It's not something that is true. But it is a massively ingrained habit of mind. What does it mean to say that there's no self? Because often we hear it—

And for a major part of our mind, it doesn't make any sense at all. What does it mean to say there's no I, there's no one behind the process to whom it's happening? Who came here? Who's sitting in the hall? If there's no I, there's no self, who are all of you? Not to speak of me. Who has memories? Who falls in love? Who gets angry? All of these questions arise, and they're very commonsense questions.

We're talking about something that is very deep and very profound, something that goes well beyond our conventional notions of what is true and what is real. Sometimes people, even in hearing the notion of selflessness, get afraid. Perhaps the mind conjures up this image of just disappearing in a great cosmic flash—suddenly you're here and then you're not here. Oops. What will my family think?

But it's really not that at all. The deep understanding, the realization of selflessness—that is really the jewel of the Buddhist teachings. It's at the heart of a free mind. So how can we begin to understand it? How can we begin to touch that realization?

In order to have a framework for understanding what selflessness means, we need to look at the very great extent to which we live in the world of concepts. Because self is simply another concept. But mostly we have no idea how much of our experience of the world is really an experience of concept, not of reality. And that's why we get deluded into thinking that self is also true.

I'd like to give you some examples, but let me frame it first. Most of you are probably familiar with the famous parable of the cave in Plato's Republic. It's a very good metaphor for this. There's a cave, and people are chained in the cave in such a way that they can only face the back wall. Behind this row of people is a fire, and then there's a procession of figures going by, engaged in all the activities of life, casting shadows on the back wall of the cave. The people who are chained in the cave and can't turn around—all they see are the shadows. And so they take the shadows to be what's real, what's true.

Sometimes one person perhaps makes a great effort and loosens the chain and turns around and says, "Oh, there's fire, there are figures—the shadows aren't real at all. They're just a reflection of reality." And maybe with even greater effort, they cut the chains and can go into the sunlight, into freedom. To the extent that we are living in the world of concept, it's like being chained in that cave.

So what are some of the concepts that in many ways dominate our own lives personally and condition so much of what's happening in the world? I'll mention just a few—there are endless examples.

One of them we could call the concept of place, as if the world is actually divided up into separate states and countries. There's one story which reveals something ridiculous about this. It was told to me by a Greek friend who was traveling to India. Because she was Greek, she couldn't go through Turkey, so she had to go up through Russia and down through Iran, which was then—this was years ago—open. She described the border crossing between Russia and Iran. She said it was the middle of no place. Just a big, dry, barren, arid expanse. There was a dry riverbed, and over the riverbed was this huge bridge. In the middle of the bridge was a big iron gate, locked from both sides. Just picture the scene: we're in the middle of no place, nothing around for miles, and there's this bridge with a gate in the middle.

And to cross from Russia into Iran, the guards from one side had to go and open the gate, the guards from the other side had to go and open it, she had to get her passport stamped, and she crossed the border. It's like a Fellini movie. And yet, had she not done that, there would have been serious consequences, because people are very attached to this notion, to this concept.

You know, our attachment to this concept of place obscures a much more natural order of things. And there are many examples. When you think just of post-colonial Africa and how the countries were carved up, often without regard at all to the natural tribal alignments—so much of what's happening now is because of conflicts coming out of that arbitrary concept of place. Or even within the environmental movement, dealing with environmental issues. The difference between having to address them state by state, county by county, as opposed to perhaps looking at a whole bioregion and its interdependence. But our boundaries, our concepts, have fixed things in such a way that it obscures a more harmonious relationship.

That's just one concept. Another one, which perhaps touches us personally more directly—this is huge—is the concept of time. We have created concepts of past and future which dominate our lives. It's very instructive to look incisively at what our experience of past and future actually is. We take these things so for granted, we never really stop and examine. What is this thing we call past? How do we experience it?

It's amazingly simple. We're sitting here, minding our own business. Certain kinds of thoughts come—recollections, memories, images, remembrances. We make a category. We make a concept for these kinds of thoughts or images. We call them "past." And then somehow we toss it behind us, as if the past is a reality back there. Yet when we look carefully, how do we ever know the past? It's always as a thought in the moment.

This was the great and wonderful insight in Proust's masterpiece, Remembrance of Things Past. I read this years ago. I was in the Peace Corps, those long Bangkok afternoons. I plowed through those two thousand pages. The last—I mean, it was a wonderful book, but the last fifty pages were mind-blowing, because the whole book led up to this transforming insight: that the past is in the present. That's how we know the past, as a thought in the present.

Likewise the future. This great, big, looming future about which we have anticipation, hope, excitement, despair, whatever. What is it? How do we ever experience the future? We're sitting, certain thoughts come, certain images come. We label them "future," toss them out there. The future is out there waiting for us, waiting to get us.

You know, a thought is very light, very light. But the concept of past and future? Mountainous. To be walking through one's life carrying these mountains on one's shoulders—no wonder people feel burdened. But when we really see it, that's just a thought in the moment. It's a thought we may want to explore and deal with and respond to, but it is just a thought. There's an amazing collapse into the moment when we see this, when we realize this. The whole weight of past and future are gone. It's really quite amazing.

But the concepts are so ingrained, and we invest so much reality in them, that we go through life shouldering this burden. In the course of a day here, in the course of a sitting, in the course of one walking period, how much time is spent lost in thoughts of past and future? It's enormous. It's most of our lives, because we don't see it for what it is.

Some of my most profound insights come from my favorite genre of literature, which—Proust notwithstanding—is spy books. How often in these kinds of junk books they'll quote some highbrow person at the beginning. It gives them a certain legitimacy. Well, one of these books quoted St. Augustine. It was a great quote. It said, "If the past and future really exist, where are they?" I know why I'm reading this stuff.

Look to see how thoughts of past and future condition how you feel about your present experience. A very good example: on retreat, thoughts of time. "Oh, only two more days. I wish it lasted for another month." And so there's a certain feeling generated by that thought. Or it might be, "Oh, two more days. How many more mental notes do I have to make? I can't wait to get out of here." Both of those are simply thoughts. That's all. They're a momentary thought passing through. If we see them as a thought, there's almost no impact. When we take that construct of time to be real, it creates a whole world for us.

I could go on at length about this. Concepts of place, concepts of time, concepts of ownership. People have the idea that they own things. What does it mean to own something? "This is mine!" Mark Twain wrote a wonderful story about horse traders in Russia. He told the whole story from the horse's point of view. And the horses had no idea they were owned by anybody. They were in relationship to various humans—some were kind, some were cruel—but the idea of ownership never entered their nice little heads.

We may feel that... well, imagine how you would feel coming into the room and seeing somebody sitting on your cushion. You probably wouldn't go crazy, but there'd be a moment. There would definitely be a moment. "What are they doing on my seat?" This is another form of the idea of possessiveness, of ownership. "This belongs to me."

I want to say, before going further, I do not mean to imply that concepts are not useful. All of these concepts are useful—the concepts of place, of time, of ownership, and some of the others. We need to use them. But it's when we get attached to them, when we start taking them to be the reality rather than simply a mental construct that happens to be useful in a particular situation—that's where we get lost. That's where we're in the dream.

Concepts of place, of time, of ownership. Concepts of self-image. We create a lot of concepts around our self-image—our self-image in the world, our self-image as yogis. There are so many self-image stories. As you know now, since the third grade I had this self-image that I couldn't sing. And let me just say: certain self-images are true. They're not all false.

But to the degree that we get caught in them, it limits us.

So anyway, I was teaching at Naropa in the early years, in '74, '75, in Boulder. And I thought, well, I'm going to really work with this. I'm going to burst out of this prison. There was a class called "The Natural Voice"—kind of a new age singing class—but that's for me, I thought. So I signed up for this class, and it took a lot of courage because this image was very strong; I was identifying with it a lot.

So I go to class, and the first few classes are great. It's all group exercises and group singing, and I'm really having a good time. Then one day the regular teacher couldn't come and a substitute teacher came. She was an expert in Balkan folk singing. She had us line up in a circle, and one by one she sang a note and we were supposed to sing it back to her—match her pitch. I knew I was in very big trouble.

So we're going around, and it's getting closer and closer to me, and I'm getting more and more uptight. I'm really feeling it. She finally gets to me. She sings some note. I sing something back. It's not even close. It wasn't even in the ballpark. She was a very determined woman. She kept doing her thing. I kept trying to replicate it. Finally, the regular teacher came in. And quite skillfully, she started where I was rather than where she was, and note by note led me up to that place. When I finally got there, the whole class started to applaud. It was one of those moments.

These experiences, as they are, if we can either at the time or afterwards put them in a larger context—it was instructive because I saw the degree to which I was caught in a certain image of myself, in a certain inhibition, in a certain reluctance, and the amazing effort it took to try to break through that. We imprison ourselves in the images we create. We might create images of ourselves of being very smart or very stupid, beautiful or very ugly, very heroic or very cowardly, very this or very that. Whatever it is, it's a mold. We've just created a mold and we've poured ourselves into it. So we want to look at those personas that we create, because these also are concepts.

The last concept—which is getting back to the subject, and really it's the root one, the root cause of our suffering and the suffering in the world—is the concept of self. We have created a notion, we have created an idea of someone, of some being to whom experience is happening. But that is an illusion. And when we look carefully, we see that it is not true. When we drop into the flow of experience, we see that instead of it being this—referring back to a "me"—experience is happening like this. Everything is arising and passing. Everything remains the same. Same thoughts, same feelings, same images, same emotions, same sensations. But we're seeing them as empty phenomena rolling on. We're not claiming them as being I, as being mine.

The really important question in our practice is to see how it is that we keep creating this concept of self. Why do we keep creating it? Because it's pervasive. We go up to anybody on the street—"Do you exist? Is there a self?"—and they'd think we were crazy. So it's very deep, really deep in our conditioning. We need to examine very carefully how it's created.

The reason we fall into the illusion of self, the reason we get lost in this concept, is because mostly we are not paying attention to the composite nature of our experience. Every morning we look in the mirror and we say, "Yeah, looks like the same guy as yesterday. This must be Joseph." And there's a kind of continuity to that.

And so we assume, yeah, there's a being called Joseph. But when we look carefully at experience, not just that surface appearance of things, when we look deeply, what is it that I'm calling Joseph? This is a name, this is a concept which I'm putting on a certain constellation of experience. When we look carefully, we see exactly what those experiences are, and we see that they're also continuously changing.

The Buddha laid out very clearly what the constellation is, and it's simple. It's really simple. What we call Joseph, self, I—each one of us—is a constellation of physical elements. We experience different sensations. We sit here and you feel pressure, tightness, tingling, the whole range. There's a whole range of physical tactile sensations. That's one aspect of the constellation. We experience consciousness, knowing. That's another part of the constellation. We experience all the mental phenomena—the thoughts and emotions and images. Each one of these in each moment is arising and passing away. Nothing lasts long enough to be called self.

When you're sitting and you feel the pressure in the knee, you don't say, "my pressure." When you're just there in awareness, it's just pressure arising. That's what's happening. It's not self. It doesn't belong to anybody. The thought arises and passes away.

But there's something more than this. Even when we get a little savvy, when we really are seeing that what we call self is a constellation of experiences, there's one other process that we get very involved in and which creates the felt sense of I. That is the process of identification with these elements.

Okay, we've gone past the appearance. We see, yes, there are sensations, there are thoughts, there are emotions, there are images, there are sounds. We see all the components. But still, unless we're very aware and attuned, in each arising we identify with it. And out of that identification, we create a concept.

I'll give you some examples of this. We're sitting. There's the pressure in the knee. As soon as there's an identification with that feeling, we create a concept around it: knee. We build a further concept: my knee. Knee, my knee—that is not the pressure. That's all a mental construct. There's knee, there's my knee, there's my knee hurts. And then there's the whole world of reaction to that: I hate it, I can be with it, I can bear it, I can't bear it. Do you see how the I is being built up on top of a very particular moment of pressure arising? That whole world of I is just a mental fabrication. It's a whole series of concepts.

We identify with thoughts in a big way. Even when we begin to see the sensations as being quite impersonal, the thoughts that are arising in the mind—we get lost in them, caught up in them, identified with them over and over again.

I'd like to suggest a few experiments. In the next sitting, imagine every thought that arises as coming from the person next to you. It's just a way of loosening this identification with thought, as if they belong to someone. One of my teachers had a great phrase. He said, "The thought is the thinker." There's no thinker apart from the thought. The thought is thinking itself. But because we usually are not aware enough, the thought arises, we get seduced by it. We get caught up into that thought form, that mind world. And we start living in what the Buddhists call the six realms of existence—the lower realms of suffering, the higher worlds of pleasure.

Notice, in the course of the day, how many times we inhabit a mind world created by thoughts. You think of your family while you're here.

Maybe you're missing them. The thought of your family is not your family. It's a thought. But it looks like your family, it feels like it, and so we get lost in it. And then whatever attendant feelings arise—love, or missingness, whatever. Or you think of work, or you think of... Our life is a progression of little cartoon bubbles of thought. They're mind-created worlds in which we are imprisoned, until that moment of awakening: "Yeah, that's just a thought." And you're right back with the next step on the ground.

What is so amazing about bringing awareness to thought is that when we're not aware of them, they are so incredibly powerful as to dominate our lives. We are led by our thoughts. And when we are aware of them, we see that they're nothing. They're just these little, ephemeral blips, bubbles in the mind. They have no power at all. Tremendous freedom in realizing the insubstantial, empty nature of thought. And it doesn't matter what the thoughts are. They can be the worst thoughts in the world—if you see them as a thought, they come, they self-liberate. There's no effect.

We identify with sensations, we identify with thoughts, we identify with emotions. Anger comes, happiness comes, generosity comes, kindness comes. To the degree that we identify with them, we create this notion of self. "I'm angry, I'm happy, I'm sad, I'm kind, I'm generous." We are building that construct of self in our identification with the emotion. It is anger which angers. It is love which loves. It is kindness which kindnesses. There's no one behind it to whom it's happening. Each of these emotions, each of these aspects of experience are doing themselves.

The last thing that we identify with—and most subtle—is awareness itself. We identify with the knower and so create the sense of witness. "Okay, I know everything else is changing, everything else is impersonal, everything else is not me, but I'm the one who's knowing it all." As soon as we identify with awareness, with consciousness, we obscure the natural empty clarity which is its nature. Awareness doesn't belong to anybody. If we look carefully, if we're really attentive, we can recognize and abide in the empty nature of awareness itself. And from that space, everything is simply appearing and vanishing, appearing and disappearing in this great, clear, open space of awareness, of emptiness. They're synonymous.

Through the awareness of suffering, we open to compassion. Through the awareness of selflessness, we open to wisdom. And this is what our practice is about. As we see how the sense of self is constructed, as we begin to see that it is just a concept, a mental fabrication, we abide more and more in that place of emptiness.

And it's expressed—and I'll end with this, finally—in a little poem by Li Po, a great Chinese poet. He said, "We sit together, the mountain and me, until only the mountain remains." We sit together, the mountain and me. We sit together, the breeze and me. We sit together, the thought and me. We sit together, the sensation and me. We sit together, the mountain and me, until only the mountain remains. We stop constructing the sense of I, the sense of self. And then we start abiding just in the natural purity of things.

A summing up of all of this was expressed very beautifully by Kalu Rinpoche, one of the great Tibetan masters. He said, "We live in illusion and the appearance of things. There is a reality.

We are that reality. When we understand this, we see we are nothing. And being nothing, we are everything. That is all.

We live in illusion, in the appearance of things. We live in the world of concepts and constructs. There is a reality. We are that reality. When we understand this, we see we are nothing. And being nothing, we are everything.

That is all.

Let's sit together for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 211

The Experience of No-Self

Carol Wilson · 44 min

> In this profound exploration of one of Buddhism's most challenging teachings, Carol Wilson examines anattā (not-self) alongside the other two characteristics of existence: anicca (impermanence) and dukkha (unsatisfactoriness). She describes how practitioners often encounter experiences where the sense of 'I' naturally fades—during meditation on the breath, body awareness, or simply witnessing thoughts arising and passing without an owner. Yet she notes the paradox that arises when the 'I' returns to claim these very experiences of no-self.
> Wilson offers a crucial reframing: rather than getting caught in the duality between self and no-self, we should examine whether suffering accompanies our sense of 'I.' When suffering binds to the self, it creates extraordinary substantiality and fixation. She cautions against elevating either no-self or a 'higher self' into ultimate categories, noting how easily spiritual ego can arise from such views. The Buddha himself used 'I' language regularly while teaching liberation.
>
> The talk culminates in pointing toward what lies beyond the relative experiences of self and no-self—a shift of attention toward the ultimate, toward liberation itself. Wilson suggests that genuine realization brings steadiness that remains unaffected by the dance of phenomena, freeing the heart and mind from suffering. This contemplative dwelling on freedom, truth, and liberation—rather than endless work on states of mind—may be what finally brings the spiritual path to completion.

The subject for this evening's talk is self and no-self.

Any length of time of exposure, generally speaking, to these kinds of teachings in this kind of facility will as a rule bring a person to hearing about and exploring what is often referred to as no-self or non-self. The area and issue of self, its appearance, the "I" and the "my" in this world—this is what we purposefully bring into focus. We look at our relationship to the question: What am I? Who is this? What is it to be in and of this earth and existence?

It is also spoken of quite regularly that there are three features or aspects of life's experience which we need to address with as much care and awareness as we can bring to them. This comes from direct quotes in the old texts of the Buddha and has been passed down from one generation of spiritual practitioners in the Dharma tradition to the next.

The first of these three characteristics of existence is impermanence—the field of change, both at its larger level and in its moment-to-moment unfolding. We've spoken about this during these days here, where awareness of change serves as a very important means and vehicle in life for staying in touch with the unfoldment of existence. So much difficulty arises in life through the mind's inability to live with change: change arising from within, change in the features of existence, and change coming through our senses. This awareness of change is not presented as the ultimate truth of existence, not as any absolute whatsoever, but as the way we experience existence through the mind and through the senses. We become aware of the feature of change, and we are told it is well worth our while to concentrate on it, giving genuine attention to it as a duty, as a dharma in our day-to-day life, being very clear about it.

Another characteristic of existence and our experience of it is the aspect of suffering, both in its large and formidable forms—personal and at larger levels of life—and also in its various expressions of unsatisfactoriness, known as dukkha in the tradition. These two characteristics of change and unsatisfactoriness we can witness and know and experience in a wide variety of circumstances. To some degree, the very apparent feature of change, of impermanence, informs us and tells us of the unsatisfactoriness of things. It helps reveal to us time and time again how little real control we have over anything, inwardly or outwardly.

Sometimes, of course, the feature of change works for our benefit. There are times when something is continuing and our greatest wish in life is for it to end, to pass, and therefore there is a corresponding relief. One is grateful for change, for something to finish, for something to be over with. In other relationships to change, however, there is something very painful and extremely difficult to deal with. That dynamic, that interaction, goes on.

As one looks in the field of change, inwardly and outwardly, there is something unsatisfactory about it. Nothing can be relied upon. Nothing can give real security. There is nothing we can truly stand upon in terms of states of mind, states of body, or states of the world—because it all changes. Even the continuity of life on earth has no assurance for any human being, and at a global level you and I are becoming more aware of all of that. Therefore a certain fragility faces existence. Why? Because of the field of change, the activities of coming and going, and all that we as the present living generation have to work with, face, and deal with.

But then we come to the third aspect, feature, or characteristic of existence, and that is what is called anatta. The first is impermanence, the second is unsatisfactoriness, and the third characteristic is anatta. Atta means self—it means "I" and "my," it means ego. And anatta means not-self, not-I, not-ego, no-I.

In spiritual practice, people often report, "I've never had such an experience of no-self, no-I. I don't know what's really meant by that. I can't relate any of my experiences to something I could describe as having no I, no self, no me, no my taking place." Others can clearly and distinctly recall such situations, either in the near or distant past.

In relationship to this experience, we first need to observe and notice attentively the normal conditions of consciousness, the normal viewpoint which we as people on the earth come to agree about. A normal mind, an everyday conventional viewpoint, says: I am sitting here, you are sitting there. Through that mutual acknowledgment and understanding of oneself in relationship to other selves, we have our existence. We have a sense and some knowledge of who we are—one self appearing in contact with another self. All of that is the world of self.

Then this characteristic mentioned in the teachings speaks to us of no-self, of not-self. At the immediate level upon hearing that, it seems irrational, illogical; it doesn't fit in with my everyday normal mind. But the experience of not-self or no-self can be known and experienced in many different ways, and thus at times we may not be clearly aware of what we mean by it.

Let me take two or three examples. In relationship to any particular object of meditation—during these days we've explored breathing meditation, body awareness meditation, and states of mind meditation—quite naturally and frequently enough, the thought and the deeply rooted idea of "I" arises in connection with that. "I am breathing in and out. I am putting my attention through the body. I am experiencing these emotions. I am observing my thoughts." All of that is quite appropriate in description.

But it can be, and for some there are periods and moments, when the "I" doesn't seem to have a relevance. It doesn't seem to be really what's happening. It's as though the "I" is really an appendix to the simple, still conventional truth of what is taking place.

And thus there can be that simple, pure awareness—undiluted, in fact, by the "I"—where breathing in and out is just going on. There's a consciousness, of course, which apprehends it, and it's just consciousness in relationship to inhaling and exhaling. It's just an event. The potency of the "I," which says, "Well, I am breathing in and out, and this is my breath, and this is my body"—that strength and that potency and the idea of substance of "I" begins to drop and fade away.

And it's just sitting on this earth. There's just breathing in and breathing out which is going on—rather pure, rather undiluted—and the "I" itself doesn't seem to have any significance, any relationship to that. Thus the response is much more in impersonal terms than personal terms.

These may be short-lived experiences, but in the impersonal light they matter and give great support to spiritual awareness, because they begin effectively to question the substance of "I." The no-self awareness, the no-self experience—or the non-self awareness and experience—acts as bringing a certain light to life, to existence, to the immediate existence. It just questions—one may not be realizing it consciously—but just questions the authenticity of "I," the substance of it, the reality of it, whether it really has an ultimately true existence.

But as I say, it's not the only expression in life of not-self or no-self. There can be, in our experience, this dropping and fading away of "I," and in its dropping and fading away, there's the sense of just life unfolding itself. There's just the process of things which is going on.

And one looks in quiet reflection, in the immediacy of experience, and one might just see the aging process as an example—just going on moment to moment, moment to moment. No "I" on the earth, no matter how much will or effort, can stop that process which is going on. One is quite clear about it, and the clarity about it reveals unequivocally the non-I-ness of the process. It just goes on as it goes on as it goes on.

Awareness, in this case, sees that going on, and we can't arrest it. We can't live in eternity. We can't have an endless continuity of existence. Why? It's no-self. It's non-self. It's the process of life unfolding itself. And when that's clear to us, inwardly, and with some depth to it, we say, "Ah, this is what no-self experience is, what non-self awareness is."

As I say, it helps to sober up the truth of life, the everyday conventional truth of life. It helps to make our experience of life stand out much more clearly, because we are beginning to understand and know what not-self or no-self is.

Just as that can be applied to body in the long-term view, but also in the momentary view, it applies equally to our thoughts and our feelings and our emotions. The experience and the revelation of them doesn't always carry "I" and "my" with it. Thus we can speak from direct experience and say, "Here is a stream of thoughts just going on. They seem to have a kind of drift or life or momentum of their own." There's no owner, no self that owns these thoughts. There is just that witnessing which sees thought as thought as thought—arising and passing in the consciousness. That is just going on, and it's awareness which shows it.

But of course, in such experiences, either during or immediately afterwards, the "I" can arise, as it easily does, and says, "Oh, I have had a no-I experience." And it can produce a kind of conflicting or paradoxical relationship to that.

Whether it's seeing thoughts as thought but no owner, no real thinker; seeing and witnessing impersonally, with that intimacy that's necessary, feelings as feelings, waves as waves, emotions as emotions, bodily life as bodily life—in the experience of all of that, which is just life revealing itself in that impersonal light I referred to—when experiences like that do register very well and very clearly for us, it's quite natural and organic that in response to that, the "I" will arise and say, "I had this experience."

The "I," in connection to immediate memory or in the actual event taking place, the "I" as the deeply rooted sense, an idea that we have, does surface. It does present itself. It does draw that conclusion. And so one can find oneself, as I mentioned, in a kind of paradoxical or difficult situation.

Because it seems like one thing—no self, life just unfolding, body is body, feelings are feelings, perceptions are perceptions, thoughts are thoughts, emotions are emotions, states of mind are states of mind—they're just unfolding themselves, sometimes with "I" as it were embedded in it, sometimes not, just taking place. But a dilemma can arise because, as I say, either at the time or afterwards, it seems like the experience of "I" in life is giving confirmation to no "I."

One can find oneself, as some practitioners do, genuinely on the horns of a dilemma. Which is true? What do I accept? What do I believe? What's my normal state of mind, so to speak, or consciousness? Do I live and abide in a view of life that it's all no-self, non-self, and that's the ultimate truth of things, and I pin a great deal of faith in that? Or is my everyday experience of life very much in the conventional mode, where I keep confirming life through "I," through "I" and "my," and that's basically the reference point for existence—what is connected to, and sometimes stuck to, "I" and "my" existence? And therefore, whatever comes to "I" and "my," I take to be the reality, to be the truth, to be the way things are.

So in our awareness and in the seeing that takes place, as I said, the duality of life can have genuine and invaluable experiences of reality.

No self, non-self—whether arising through a specific perception, an unexpected experience, a developed experience, or the general process of life—all these and many other ways can keep revealing no self, no I, just events, just process. And yet, still the revelation of I and my arising happens. And there we are, our life going by, day in, day out, I and my rising, and no I and my showing itself.

And we ask: Is that it? Is that the truth of life? Is that the kind of final reality of our existence—a movement back and forth between experiences of no I, no me, no my, no self, and then back to I, me, my, and self, sometimes with a vengeance? This movement, this fluctuation between the two, seems to express our inner life and its unfoldment and its revelation.

Given all of that, it would be unwise, I would say, and unskillful, to highlight no self into something transpersonal. The Buddha never did it. The teachings needn't do it either. We might suddenly start saying, "Well, if I'm really going to live with the truth, then I would need to abide much more frequently in the no-I experience, because that's the real truth, because the I is a total lie, a total deception, a total fiction, and therefore totally untrue." But human experience has never supported that. Neither have the teachings of awakening, and certainly not the Buddha who, like other human beings, used with regularity the language of I in his teachings—fairly clear and self-evident.

So if in our experience of life we begin to elevate one no-I experience—spontaneously in meditation, when out in nature, when all the roles have dropped away, in a sudden perception that can take place, in the very descriptions that we speak about life just going on—it's all no-I language that's being used. You and I use it regularly. The poets have used it frequently. It's a common appreciation and realization. And then the I arises and appears and shows itself.

Here is the significant factor. It's not so much the presentation of I or its non-presentation in the ways that I've been speaking about. The question is: with the I, is there suffering? With the I, is there suffering?

The I itself, in a way, is not I. In a way, it's not I. It's another manifestation of life, another presentation that comes. There's been a dwelling on the character of I, I, I—but in a way, it's not I. This very I itself is an I which is shared with all humanity. That sense of I that I have when I sit here, that feeling of I, that quality, that notion, that deeply rooted idea or perception that I have, is the same I everywhere. The feeling of I, the notion of I, the experience of I, the quality of I, the language of I, the concept of I—this is something pervasive. In a way, it is not I, as much as the experiences of not I that arise occasionally, sometimes with some insight, some realization, some penetration into these things.

There's a kind of evenness of awareness, an evenness of seeing, which stops this distinguishing between I and my on one hand, and not I, not my on the other. There's a kind of sameness to it all.

What makes the difference, as I pointed out a few moments ago, is this: with the I and my, is there suffering in it? Is it locked, bound up with suffering? When it is bound up with suffering, our distinction as a supposedly separate self is the strongest distinction. When we're free from that I and there's spaciousness, expansiveness, warmth or love or contentment or equanimity or stability or calmness, and there's not a grasping upon that, there's a sense of interconnectedness which comes easily and naturally for us.

But when I am suffering, it brings—and is the one factor which brings—an extraordinary degree of substantiality and reification and hardness and emotion and fixation to I. Suffering does that more than anything else for the I.

So as we explore that and bring our awareness to all of it, looking into the nature of suffering, of dukkha, of unsatisfactoriness, it naturally makes less of I. Because the I can't get separate from that suffering. And our capacity—inwardly, outwardly, together, with ourselves—then begins to help us change the conventions of perception, change the social norms and viewpoints that we have, and in fact begin to make a shift of consciousness.

There is a shift of consciousness which the teachings express again and again—a shift which is a final shift, a shift which is for once and for all. There is an end to the spiritual path, an end to spiritual practice, and therefore that shift brings everything to completion. The issues of I and no I have resolved themselves.

People in spiritual practice, in this duality of moving backwards and forwards, with all the exploration that it takes—looking at what is I, what is not I—can also get confused, understandably so, by language which I think is not helpful and not useful: the language of the higher self and the lower self, the language of the self with a capital T and a capital S, the language of a transcendental self or a pure soul.

Though that language can be used, it needs to be employed with extraordinary caution because of the confusion that can arise. The Buddha himself, and the healthiest aspects of the tradition, have never elevated self into some ultimate category. How easily in these fields the ego can confuse itself for all sorts of unsatisfactory motives and latch on to "I am the supreme self"—the conceit, the arrogance, the power tripping, the ego that can flourish when one is fastening or grasping onto the self with a capital T and a capital S.

So if we can, in our awareness of experiences of I and no I, of self and not self, keep it as much as possible within the relative fields of experience—both of which we know, both of which we comment on in various ways—without elevating no-self to an ultimate category, which Buddhists have done from time to time, or this elevation of the self into an ultimate category, which has also taken place, most noticeably in the Hindu tradition.

If you say there's this movement, self and no-self, going on side by side or simultaneously together, where is the consummation? Where is the end of all this exploration, all this endeavor, all this inquiry? What's going to bring it to a final, once-and-for-all completion in which there's no self-deception left, no falling back into the dualisms, the backwards and forwards between self and no-self, between me and this, that, and the other? What is that shift which is spoken of with such assurance through the sages for generations—that which, as I say, has a finality to it, and the experience of life confirms that finality?

A number of you in this hall have had tremendous exposure to spiritual teachings and practices here and elsewhere, in fact worldwide. It can be rather easy, understandably so, to be almost constantly and consistently working on the relative. Working on the relative is to work on the state of mind. To work on the relative is to work on the I and the not I. Working on the relative is to work on the relationship to bodily experiences and all those processes I referred to earlier.

And it might need—and it can be scary and generate some doubt and difficulty—to really lose interest, and I mean lose interest, in working so much, so long, and so hard on states of mind and states of body. Somewhere in all of that working upon all of that, one has to say to oneself: enough is enough is enough is enough. Whatever the forms and strategies one has employed for that working on mind—remember, including emotions and every form of inner human experience—to be able to say to oneself, and this is no easy undertaking for a thoughtful and caring human being, enough.

And of course that can generate some restlessness. But what if I stop all of that? If I stop that, then what? Perhaps the attention needs to make a shift from the known and the familiar, which is heart, mind, and body, to that which is unknown and which is not of any of that.

It's as though we need for this a different type of concentration—the Buddha has referred to this, I may add—a different type of concentration, a concentration of that which is not mind and body. And the language for that, if one likes and uses language, needs to have a feeling response to, and is in fact ultimate in its feature, for those who have the language for that.

That language may be truth. That language may be ultimate dharma. That language may be liberation. That language may be enlightenment. That language may be God. That language may be realization. That language may be emptiness, which makes everything possible.

So one is actively forgetting, purposefully and quite deliberately, the incidental and irrelevant events that go on in the name of heart, mind, and body, and puts the concentration, so to speak, elsewhere—quite off that and quite onto that which is ultimate.

For some people, that shift of concentration, of attention, from relative matters—heart, mind, body, being in the world—to the focus and concentration and attention upon that which is ultimate, which is the fulfillment and the shift that matters, some feel, understandably and appropriately, no wish to bring a language to it, no wish to use a word.

The Buddha himself has been extremely and unusually cautious about using a word. Sometimes he'll say nirvana, sometimes he'll say liberation, sometimes he'll say the truth which never changes, sometimes he'll say enlightenment. Never fixing a particular word and keeping and identifying with it strictly again and again. Using language, I think, remarkably skillfully, so that we don't get a fixation about some word.

What is that to concentrate on which is not heart, mind, body, and the things going on around us? It requires a special kind of sense. So if one takes as an example: freedom. True freedom, and the understanding and the realization of freedom which is nirvana, which is the truth, which is liberation, which is enlightenment, which is God. What is that freedom? What is this freedom? What is this liberation? What is this enlightenment?

And the events of mind and body are quite marginalized, quite peripheral, because one is exploring and finding out what it is to realize the ultimate truth—not to be shy nor afraid of actually bringing that final and fulfilling element of the spiritual quest to completion. And therefore I say it's a certain kind of concentration, a certain kind of interest and focus. Why? Because we're willing to go from the known, which is oneself in the world, to that which is unknown.

But that which is unknown, in its shift, transforms everything about the way that one sees life. Everything, once and for all. And it's genuinely and authentically liberating.

But we may have to forget our self and our no-self. We may have to just put it aside. Those discoveries which can take place, which are immediacy for us, can of course happen quite spontaneously—not through any concentration, not through any special attention to words, not through losing interest in that duality of life of "am I or am I not," "what shall I do or shan't do," and all those dualities, the pleasant and the unpleasant that we were hearing about in the inquiry this afternoon. The realizations, of course, can occur which are liberating and have a steadiness to them.

Therefore, in that steadiness, it's the one valid means, the one instrument that a human being has to know if they've realized something. If they've realized something, it's real. If it's real, it stays steady. If it stays steady, it's not going to be lost by the events of the world. And if one hasn't had realization but has had invaluable and important experiences in the spiritual life which come and go, it's not a realization. Realization makes real, makes steady, makes present—not affected by the dance that goes on around us. And sometimes we do get confused between what we've realized and what we've experienced.

Here we're interested in experiencing and staying steady with the truth of things. The truth of things has got nothing to do with impermanence, nothing to do with unsatisfactoriness, and nothing to do with no-self. That's just the conventional way that you and I apprehend existence and function in it. But what is the truth of things? That which stays steady, not subject to coming and going, not subject to unsatisfactoriness, and not subject to the presence and absence of self. What is the truth?

As I say, that can be apprehended, realized, through spontaneity. And for some, that spontaneity comes in various ways. It can also be realized through the processes which we engage in the spiritual life—in the commitment to spiritual practice, the urgency and the love of the quest for what is the truth. Not something to cling to, to make an ideology of and completely misunderstand the truth of things. What is the truth of things?

And that contemplative indwelling is something which I would say often gets forgotten and neglected. What is liberation here and now? What is that which stays steady in spite of the movement of birth and death? And if we can allow ourselves to dwell and contemplate and reflect and abide in these things, perhaps that will be a contribution to that realization.

Otherwise we get caught on those common horns of dilemma which I hear frequently in and out of retreats, where sometimes one will speak in ways of just being. Nothing to do, nothing to gain, nothing to benefit from, nothing to pursue, nothing to run after. Just being. And it's an important and invaluable aspect of spiritual teachings.

And one will also hear from voices like mine and others: just being—that isn't enough. Just having a depth of calmness and stability and just being present and being with life in a personal or impersonal way—that isn't enough. And that does generate the sense, of course, of something more. And so one can go back: well, if I'm just being there, then perhaps it can come spontaneously, and that approach is valid and useful and significant. And if it's just being, then perhaps I need to do something more to accelerate, to bring something about—that shift which has its own finality to it. And there are experiences and movements where we can go back and forth between these approaches.

More important than the question of being and the question of doing is: what is the truth of things? What is this liberation which is spoken about and has been and will be spoken about from one generation to the next? What is this freedom?

And as I said, one of the features of that realization is, in terms of heart, mind, and body, it takes so much—and in some cases all—of the suffering that's tied up with the inner life. It takes it out. Because the inner life is freed up from it.

And all these things are what we speak about when we speak of finding God, living with God, being with God, knowing God, dwelling with God—if that language is comfortable for us. And it's nothing theoretical or abstract or distant or whatever. A person knows what that means. And for someone who says the word God—G-O-D—"I can't relate to it, it means nothing to me"—fine, fine. One doesn't ever have to introduce the word God. There is another word: what liberation is, what freedom is. And for some, not that word also. All can fade away from consciousness.

So let's be as clear as we humanly can with our relative experiences of life, which I've been referring to—their place in life, their usefulness in life—and that which is truly, truly.

And then we pay the greatest respect to life, to the truth of things, to the nature of things, and to what it is to be.

May all beings live with awareness and insight.
May all beings see deeply into the nature of things.
May all beings taste daily liberation.

CHAPTER 212

In Search For Self And No-Self

Carol Wilson · 52 min

In this profound exploration of identity and liberation, Carol Wilson traces the human journey from childhood conditioning through the cultural pressure to 'be someone' to the spiritual quest for no-self (anattā). She examines how our sense of self develops through the authorities we encounter as children, and how we become trapped in the tyranny of appearance and performance as measures of self-worth.

Wilson offers a nuanced perspective on the Buddhist teaching of no-self, cautioning against both the endless pursuit of a 'real self' and the spiritual bypassing that can occur when we try to deny or transcend the self through rejection rather than wisdom. She points out how even profound meditation insights can become appropriated by the self—'I saw no-self'—missing the deeper understanding that freedom is not about getting rid of something substantial, but about dissolving ignorance itself.

The talk culminates in a teaching on ignorance (avijjā) as the belief in separation and duality as ultimate reality. Wilson guides practitioners toward discovering what cannot be made into an object—a suchness that embraces all form and appearance while being limited to nothing. Using the metaphor of clouds in a vast sky, she points to an awareness that holds all experience without being dependent upon any of it, inviting us toward genuine freedom rather than simply a better or more spiritual self.

What I'd like to speak about this evening is the search for self and the search for no-self.

The self is clearly a very central figure in our lives. It's the axis around which revolves our stories and our dramas, our histories and our searches. The self is the link of continuity through which we weave together our past, our present, and our future. It is a central figure in our joys and in our sorrows, our successes and our failures, our hopes and our disappointments. It is clearly an enduring companion in our lives.

It seems that there is no experience that is complete without the self to make it happen or to have it happen to. At times we feel good about ourselves. At times we feel bad about ourselves. Rarely do we feel indifferent about ourselves. The self is like the monster under our bed, like the dragon in our closet. Even in those moments when we are not so conscious of it, it seems that it is lurking somewhere, waiting to pounce. It is clearly something of enduring interest. There's almost nothing more interesting to us in our lives than ourselves.

What I'd like to do this evening, firstly, is to reflect a little bit upon the history of the self. What we understand about it, how it has evolved, and what role the self actually plays in our lives in this moment. Is it a help to us? Is it a hindrance? Is the self a friend or an enemy? Is it real at all? Or are we simply shadow boxing with a shadow partner, engaged in an endless dance with an insubstantial shadow?

The spiritual journey is, one might say, a journey to discover who we are, if we use that in a very cosmic context. There are entire spiritual practices devoted to this one single question—to sit hour after hour, day after day, month after month, and year after year with this one single question: Who am I? That question is an endeavor to discover what is actually true and genuine, a quest to discover what is authentic, and also a quest to discover what is false, what is just conditioned and constructed and built.

The search in the spiritual life to discover who we are really mirrors much of the searches and choices that go on elsewhere in our lives. In a way, we might say that our lives are a map of our search for definition. Our lives are a kind of record of searching for self, searching for an identity that we feel in harmony with, that we feel is authentic. This search is very compelling for us because we equate certainty about our identities with happiness and security. To have certainty around who we are seems to provide us with inner authority. And we all know in our lives that to be deprived of inner authority, we end up essentially at the mercy of other people's authorities. If we don't have inner authority, we seem to become a casualty, at the mercy of other people's selves that are stronger than our own. We end up at the mercy of other people's expectations, standards, values, and demands. In one way it seems almost necessary to have a self in order to survive in a world of selves.

We can trace this search for self and identity really back to our earliest memories. No child is born as a kind of blank slate—I think I can say that with some certainty. From the perspective of parents, it seems that children are born with a kind of budding self. A little self. Sometimes a very loud self, but a little self that clearly and loudly expresses preferences, likes and dislikes, patterns and tendencies. From a parent's point of view, parents often feel that they really don't have much choice about the miniature self that has been introduced into their lives.

I know from a parent's point of view, to be in the face or in the company of a child who is going through some grand dramatic tantrum—parents often look at each other in bewilderment and say, "Where did it come from? It's not me. It's not mine. It didn't come from me." And yet it's there. One encounters parents who are dedicated to nonviolence, who bid farewell to their children as they enter military training camp. And one meets parents who are perhaps very ambitious and assertive in their world and cannot understand their child's fascination with Japanese tea ceremonies. There seems to be little choice about, in some ways, what happens.

Those parents, of course, are very ready to abdicate all responsibility when their junior selves depart from their standards of acceptability and desirability, just as they're equally ready to claim credit when their junior selves seem to be doing rather well.

From a child's point of view, I think they often feel just the same.

We don't seem to have much choice either. From a child's point of view, I think it is true that there is no child who is born with an unshakable sense of self. There is something there, but it is not an unshakable sense of self. From a child's point of view, I think it often feels like clay—that our childhood identities, how we feel about ourselves, are very much shaped and molded by the authorities that we meet in our lives.

Our parents, our friends, our teachers, our social standards, our peers—all have their own standards and their own values which we are exposed to, which are at times imposed upon us, which are at times thrust upon us. And all of these standards and values and expectations that we meet as children, and the feedback we receive, all play a part in forming our sense of self.

Now no matter how benevolent the authorities are that we meet in our lives when we are children, those authorities do still carry with them certain expectations and values about what is right and wrong, what is acceptable, what is unacceptable, what is worthy and what is unworthy. We meet those dualities early in our experience as human beings. Those polarizations that we meet also carry with them certain consequences and certain shadows. We learn what the path is to praise and to love and to acceptance. We learn as children what the path is to blame and to judgment and to rejection. And when we are faced with a certain inner uncertainty, when we are faced with our own craving for belonging and for acceptance, then we learn which path is essentially the smart path to follow. We learn which path seems to be the one that is going to reap the rewards that we want—the affirmation, the acceptance, the approval.

Conformity can be one of childhood's guidelines, and it can also become a habit of a lifetime. Becoming what other people would like us to be, or seeing ourselves through the eyes of others, or internalizing the standards and the values and the expectations of others and adopting them as our own—so that we have our own standards, they feel like our own, of right and wrong and good and bad and worthy and unworthy.

There is no value, of course, in blaming anyone for this whole process and this whole cycle. Even the most loving and the most benevolent of parents bequeath a legacy to their children of their own values and their own standards. I know my children probably really look forward to the day when they don't have to be around someone who asks them all the time to pay attention. I'm sure when they grow up they will never want to have another moment of attention.

To some degree our self-definition is something that we inherit. To some degree it's based upon our own experience. To some degree our sense of identity is imposed upon us.

As we grow in our lives and grow more conscious, our search for self-definition, our search for identity goes through some changes. We go through some changes. We find ourselves to some extent less vulnerable to the expectations and the feedback we receive from others. To some extent, we find ourselves perhaps less governed by the need always to find approval and avoid disapproval. To some extent we learn through our own experience what benefits us and what limits us. And in our growing awareness and growing wisdom, no longer are all of our choices and directions and aspirations linked to or dependent upon only what we think the rewards will be.

Then we enter into another cycle, I think, of the self. We begin to search for what we sometimes call the real self. Not the one we inherited, not the one that was imposed upon us, but the real self. A self that we feel in harmony with. A self that embodies in some way, in a deep way, what we value and what we honor and what we aspire to.

This field of exploration for the real self is actually pretty vast. There are a lot of opportunities around, different selves to be. Sometimes we cast our eyes around the world and we think of all these different selves that would be nice to be, or what we might like to be. We could be the executive self, or we could be the earth mother self, or we could be the fast lane swinging type self, or we could be the nature lover self and live in the wilderness. We could be the mother self or we could be the independent, autonomous self. There are a lot of different selves that offer themselves to us.

We also meet, I think, as we begin our search for the real self, the incredibly powerful expectations in our culture to be someone. This is a very important thing in our culture—to be someone, to be someone special, to make your mark upon the world, to distinguish yourself, to succeed, to have a successful self. Being someone is something that has enormous prestige. Sometimes also we call it fulfilling the potential of ourselves. Being someone in our culture is considered to be one of the most worthy goals to strive for—to look for a label, to look for a description, to look for credentials that prove or that are evidence that we are special, that we have a special self, a successful self. We have made it in the world. We have made our mark, we will be remembered. People admire us and applaud us. We try to arrive in many ways at this very hallowed destination of being someone.

In our culture it's almost a sacred pursuit, looking for acclaim, looking for prestige. We know that in our culture there's little room for no-ones. To be nobody, to be no one in this culture? This means you blew it, basically. You got lost on the way.

You faltered. You fell by the wayside. You're invisible. You wasted your life. If you are no one, if you are not someone, you've wasted your whole life—this is often the unspoken judgment. When you go out in the world and meet that inevitable question, "What do you do?"—you know, "Who are you?"—these credential questions start probing to find out what the self is. If you said, "There's no one home," the response is not going to be very rewarding. In fact, to be no one in our culture is essentially equated with being invisible. People who are no one in our culture are kind of ignored, sensed to be unworthy of attention, invisible to others.

Now searching to be someone can actually become quite a mission in our lives. And on one level we might say, well, this is psychologically very healthy and a very necessary process—to wean ourselves away from the authority of others, to wean ourselves away from the expectations of others, to wean ourselves away from the dependency upon other people to know who we are. In a way, we might say it's a healthy and necessary process of learning about autonomy, learning about inner authority, exploring our own potential. And of course, in many ways this is absolutely true. We need to go through this process of searching and questioning and looking to understand who we are apart from other people's expectations and images and needs and demands. It is a necessary and healthy process in our lives.

But we do need to be cautious also in our admiration of this process, and also to appreciate, perhaps, the endlessness of this craving to be someone, and how it can lead us into so very many detours in our lives. Because we see the nature of the self, it seems, is that it is never content really to be in a supporting role. It wants to be a star. It wants to be special. It wants to be visible. And sometimes you might even think of the self as being an appetite, as being a kind of hunger—a craving: I want. I must be someone. An appetite that may possibly never be satisfied. I've never met anyone who's satisfied that appetite.

So how do we achieve? And the reason we need to be cautious in our search for self, or even in our search for what is authentic—we need to be very careful in questioning: How do we actually achieve being someone? What are the avenues that we follow in order to find what is the real self, or in order to find a self that feels authentic?

Well, the primary ways in which our sense of self grows and is affirmed is through appearance and through performance. These two standards are the ways in which we evaluate the self, and the ways in which the self—who we are—is evaluated by others in the world: by appearance and by performance.

Now, I think we need to appreciate the tyrannical nature of these addictions to these two things of appearance and performance. They are the ways in which self seeks to find acceptance and praise. Appearance is one way of finding a credible self—looking for the appearance that tells us that we have the right body, the right mind, the right personality that we can present to the world. Appearance is the first basis of judgment by which we judge ourselves or others. Appearance also becomes the means to rewards in our world, the means to finding praise and love and acceptance.

But look what we do in servitude to this tyrant of appearance. How much that servitude or that addiction to appearance and to rightness is simply another name for self-abuse. How much restlessness, agitation, and fear in our lives feeds upon this tyrant of appearance—the fear of being unacceptable and the desire to find the right appearance. When the mirror in our lives becomes an endless authority. When the bathroom scales become a way of evaluating our sense of self-worth on a day-to-day basis. When how we judge ourselves on the basis of our bodies becomes a way of rejecting ourselves.

Now performance in our culture is the other path for discovering an acceptable self. And the addiction to performance manifests also in our obsession with perfection—being perfect in our work, in our roles, in our identities. Being the perfect partner, the perfect employee, the perfect mother, the perfect meditator. Performance is the way we win the admiration of others, and sometimes we feel the need to win the admiration of others before we can accept ourselves. This preoccupation with performance also naturally means an addiction to doing, because there are so many tasks to complete and so many improvements to make and so many things to fix. And sometimes it seems we'll never ever get to that point where we'll arrive at the right self.

Somebody else always seems to have it. We look around and everybody else must be doing it right, or better, or have the right appearance, the right way of looking, the right way of doing something. Somebody else is always a better mother, a better meditator, a better worker, a better writer, a better speaker—whatever it may be. Somebody else always seems to have the self that we would like to have.

Or else the self that we work really hard for—that we truly labor to get, all that effort we put into constructing that right self. Those hours and months and years of modifying ourselves. And then the self that we get doesn't really look like the one we wanted, or the one we even seemed to be promised. Even when the rewards come, I sometimes feel that those rewards really do very little to heal the emptiness, or that sense of fear inwardly of never being right and never being good. The obsession with perfection is always a winning of halos, a working for halos. But trying to be good always has that companion of never feeling to be good enough.

Now we come to the spiritual path, we come to meditation. I think sometimes we feel quite relieved to hear about no-self—to hear, or even to encounter through our own experience, that we are not the mind and not the body. Phew. It's good news, isn't it? To hear that we cannot be defined by appearance, that we cannot be defined by any image, that we cannot be defined by any judgment, that we cannot be defined by any description. Instead, we are even encouraged to truly turn away from this quest of looking for a special self or a real self or a unique self. The goalposts are moved in our cycle of self. Suddenly the goalposts are moved. We hear instead the message that to pursue self is actually to pursue conflict, struggle, and alienation.

But I think it's also true that when we hear about the possibility of no-self, sometimes we have mixed feelings about it. On one level, certainly it's a relief to lay down this burden of relentless seeking for self-improvement and perfection. But on another level, no-self doesn't really seem like that great an idea.

There is a valid feeling—and I think for many women too—that we put so much effort into discovering what is authentic, into reclaiming our sense of femininity, into respecting ourselves, into learning how to honor ourselves and the forms in our lives, that we may feel very reluctant to hear this encouragement to let go, to not define ourselves by anything.

It is very true that all of us live in a world of form. We have relationships, we have work, we have bodies, we have aspirations. All of these are forms in our lives, and they are vehicles for embodying and manifesting what we most deeply hold to be true, authentic, and valuable. We need to honor those forms. They are vehicles of communication. The forms in our lives are the ways in which we communicate who we are, what is possible, and what we trust to be authentic. They are important to honor.

But sometimes the reluctance around no-self comes from a different source. Because I think actually we can trust that freedom does not mean negating ourselves. It does not mean negating the forms in our lives. It does not mean negating all of those vehicles for communication.

I think our reluctance about no-self sometimes comes from other feelings, often fear. How will we define ourselves without the guidelines of appearance and performance? Sometimes this is a great anxiety. How will we know what to do in the world without a self to tell us, without a self to want or not want, or to make choices? I think sometimes we feel that no-self might mean that we're going to be glued to a zafu for the rest of our lives, staring at a wall or at our navel. This whole idea of being no one sometimes evokes our greatest fears of floundering, of being invisible and homeless.

The underlying message, I think, that at times you might interpret as hearing in spiritual teaching—and sometimes you might hear it, it's true, I have to confess—is that there's something shameful about having a self. This is not my teaching, but you might come across it. That there's something shameful about having a self. There are certainly spiritual paths which entirely, totally discourage you from discussing anything personal because it's immediately pointed out: "This is just the self. This is just the self"—as if that makes it any better.

It doesn't make it feel any better just because it's "just the self"—it feels just the same. It seems the self has feelings.

But when we hear about this kind of shamefulness about having a self, about the I—you know, the dreaded I—sometimes we are almost tempted to swear allegiance to the anti-self organization. There seems to be some kind of imperative: I must get rid of the self. If I'm going to be spiritual, I have to get rid of this self. And there's that old Zen statement where they sit you on a cushion and say, "Die on the cushion." And of course I'd be happy to die on the cushion, but how? Tell me how.

So then sometimes we undertake a new cycle. The self sometimes goes through a new phase. From being bad news in one way, it becomes bad news in another way. It seems obvious in this world—one basic message here is the self can't win. That's a basic message. So we undertake this new quest to find no self.

Now, this quest to find no self, if it is based upon denial, if it is based upon fear, or if it is based upon rejection, has some inevitable and lethal side effects. When we try to focus upon getting rid of the self or disowning the self or transcending the self or negating the self or cutting through the self—all those things it's possible to try and do—often what happens is we make a very basic sacrifice of sensitivity and compassion and interconnectedness, because we undertake the quest for no self at times in a spirit of denial. And when there is denial rather than wisdom, when there is denial rather than understanding the body, mind, and spirit dynamics, then that denial extends itself in a very wide field. It becomes a denial of form, a denial of relationship, and a denial of nature.

I think we have seen this in the spiritual life—this incredible duality where we can be inhabiting and reaching for the heavens, reaching for all these wonderful spiritual attainments, while it's possible to live with total lack of integrity and impeccability in the world. It's possible to have fantastic spiritual credentials and be reaching for a wonderfully seemingly blessed spiritual life, and yet be so absorbed in that pursuit that we can exploit or deny the world around us at the same moment.

Now even when the quest for understanding ourselves is undertaken with wisdom, we must still be cautious. We must still have this element of inquiry.

In meditation, we do discover actually, on a very profound level, the transparency of self. This is what we do here. And we discover very quickly this transparency. When you sit and you're even just a little bit still, you see this endless parade, this endless arising and passing of thoughts and feelings and sensations and sounds. What happens through the stillness and through the calmness is that the glue that previously bound all of those things together into a sense of self, into a kind of puzzle picture, begins to come unstuck. The glue begins to come unstuck, and it becomes increasingly difficult to isolate anything which is actually enduring. It becomes increasingly difficult to isolate anything within that parade and passing show and to point to it and say, "This is what I am" or "This is who I am." The moment that we begin to look for it, it is already past.

We see the arising of objects—the thoughts, the feelings, the sensations. We see the arising of all of these different notions about ourselves: I am this, I am that, I was this, I will be that. I am, I have, I know, I listen, I see, I want, I don't want. With clear attentiveness and stillness, as that glue begins to become unstuck, many of those ideas don't seem quite so solid anymore. They don't seem quite so substantial anymore. They begin to dissolve.

Actually, when we begin to look for something that we can say "I am," we are already looking at what has already gone by. It's like you look around to try and find yourself, and the only self that you can find is the one that is already gone. It is always looking behind. "I was," you know. I was that thought, and there's a new thought. I was that image, and now there is something new. It is hard to find anywhere any center to rest in, anything that is substantial.

Now this can become, of course, very interesting. It becomes incredibly interesting. But it's also interesting the way in which we can take no self so personally. We see this arising and passing of these different selves.

And we can see this kind of lack of solidity, this lack of transparency. But we can also take it very personally.

I'd like to read you a story. One day a rabbi, in a frenzy of religious passion, rushed in before the altar, fell to his knees, and started beating his breast crying, "I'm nobody, I'm nobody." The cantor of the synagogue, impressed by this example of spiritual humility, joined the rabbi on his knees shouting, "I'm nobody, I'm nobody." The caretaker was watching from the corner. He couldn't restrain himself either. He joined the other two on his knees, calling out, "I'm nobody, I'm nobody." At which point the rabbi, nudging the cantor with his elbow, pointed at the custodian and said, "Look who thinks he's nobody."

Now of course this is very humorous, but we might find ourselves also in somewhat of a similar position. We might come and say in an interview, "I saw no self." Really? "I had a wonderful experience of emptiness." Really? Where is it that we feel we can possess these insights? We feel we want to possess these insights. These are the best of the insights, the cream of the crop, the fruit that we've harvested, and we would like them to be mine.

In some way, even in the midst of that transparency and that passing show, we can still be preoccupied in a very subtle way with self—defining ourselves anew by our ability to see transparency. Have you ever had that experience when you sit and you have a moment of stillness, and this little voice comes in and says, "Ah, look, I'm quiet. Oh look, I finally let go"? We long to possess the insights. What a wonderful new self—a spiritual self we have now. An enlightened self. A very wise self.

It is true that in seeing this passing show, there is a sense of a great deal of transparency, a perception of transparency. And in some way we would like to make it into an experience that makes me look better, that makes me have a better self. In some way the self arises and wants to make a possession.

Now in thinking of no self as an experience in any way, there is some greater understanding of emptiness which may be missing—the liberating emptiness, the liberating understanding. In some subtle way at times, awareness is appropriated by the self.

Part of the responsibility for all of this that goes on around the self—whether it's trying to get a better self, or all of this that goes on around trying to have no self or trying to get rid of self—can really be laid at the feet of the bad rap that is given to the self. It's given such a bad rap, as if there's really some solid entity that we have to uproot from our consciousness. Sometimes the "I" is regarded as being so monstrous: the source of anger, the source of confusion, the source of delusion, the source of separation, the source of alienation. The self is blamed with so many things. It has a terrible reputation.

But all of this naming and blaming of the self leads to preoccupation with the self, whether it's pursuing a real self or whether it is pursuing no self. And I feel all of this naming and blaming is actually crediting the self with a level of power and substantiality which it simply doesn't have.

Trying to get a real self, trying to get rid of the self—sometimes these are two different enactments of the same dance, and both can rather miss the point. Trying to get rid of the self, we have assumed or given it an exaggerated responsibility. Sometimes then we can become preoccupied again with having the right performance and the right appearance, having the right kind of experience, the right kind of insight. It's another way of validating the self.

Now in meditation there is only one way that the self survives in substantiality, that the self manages to maintain an identity, and that is by making an object out of meditation. This is how the self survives meditation. The object becomes our experience, even when the experience is no-self. We might say, "I have good meditations" or "I have bad meditations." "I have great meditations" or "I have terrible ones." All the time we are making an object out of meditation, something to evaluate, and we evaluate ourselves on the basis of that object. Through objectifying meditation, making it into an experience—something that happens to me or something that I make happen—we actually pursue and preserve separation. We rest within those three areas of saying, "I have," "I am," and "I know."

Freedom is not the cessation. Freedom is not just the understanding of no self. Freedom is actually the cessation of ignorance. When I use the word ignorance, I'm not trying to offend you. What is ignorance?

Ignorance is believing duality and separation to be reality. Ignorance is to believe separation to be truth—to believe that there is reality in the divisions between inner and outer, I and you, us and them, black and white, high and low, inferior and superior, spiritual and worldly. Ignorance is believing that one object lives apart and separate from all other objects, just as we believe that we live apart and separate from all other selves. Ignorance is believing in those divisions and dualities to be the truth of how things are.

That ignorance then becomes expressed in the obsession with appearance and performance, with name and form.

There is no one to blame for ignorance. There is no one who can be judged for ignorance, and judgments make no difference. Where is the beginning of ignorance? Does it make any difference to trace our family trees and find which of our ancestors was the first one to start the cycle of self-hatred? It makes no difference. There is no one to blame for ignorance. But ignorance can be dissolved.

Believing duality and separation to be reality is like looking into a mirror clouded with steam and seeing ourselves all distorted, believing and mistaking what we see to be the truth of who we are. We can take steps to wipe the mirror clear. We take steps in meditation to cultivate attentiveness, to cultivate focus. We take those steps with grace and wisdom to bond, to find intimacy with this moment. But we don't want to spend our lives polishing mirrors. It would be much better to see what is true, to see what is not distorted.

We take steps in meditation to cultivate calmness and serenity and impeccability so that we know how to live our lives increasingly in a spirit of nobility, in respect of what is sacred. But we don't take these steps so that we are going to gradually find the perfect face. We take these steps so that we can learn to leave struggle, so that we can learn to leave behind us the appetite of wanting, so that we can learn that there does lie within us a place of profound peace, of profound contentment, of profound wisdom that we know how to rest within.

But if we really want to know who we are, then we have to inquire very deeply and seek that which we cannot make an object of. To seek that which we cannot make an object of. When what we cannot make an object of is discovered, then we discover what it actually means to be free.

Freedom emerges not through an experience, but through grace and stillness—through the awareness and stillness that dissolves the world of appearances. And in that dissolving, we don't necessarily see a perfect face. We might even see the face we wore before we were ever born.

There emerges out of grace and stillness a profound and unshakable understanding of what is unconditioned—a suchness that embraces all life, all form and all appearance, but that is limited to nothing. A suchness that embraces all things without limitation.

It is like looking into the sky filled with cloud formations. In one way we might be very admiring of all those formations and think how interesting they are. We might even look at the space between the cloud formations and observe the way the clouds are dissolving. We might even open our eyes to the vastness of the sky which is embracing all of those formations but is limited to none of them and dependent upon none of them. We might discover in that looking the vastness of awareness, the vastness of suchness, the vastness of being.

May all beings live with awareness. May all beings deepen in wisdom. May all beings be free.

CHAPTER 213

No Person, No Problem

Carol Wilson · 44 min

In this penetrating talk, Carol Wilson uses a striking teaching story to illuminate the relationship between samādhi and vipassanā—the cultivation of both concentrated attention and clear seeing. Drawing from the Ānāpānasati Sutta's thirteenth contemplation on impermanence, she demonstrates how deep insight into anicca naturally reveals the other two universal characteristics: dukkha and anattā.

Wilson examines how we construct a sense of self through our relationship to body, feelings, and mind states, constantly attaching to experiences as 'me' or 'mine.' She offers the Buddha's essential teaching: "Under no conditions attach to anything whatsoever as being me or mine." This attachment, she explains, is avijjā (ignorance)—the root of saṃsāric existence. The 'birth' the Buddha speaks of as suffering isn't merely physical birth, but the moment-to-moment arising of ego-identification.

Through practical examples—from the experience of 'being breathed' during meditation to observing how greed, hatred, and delusion operate across all social classes—Wilson shows how mindfulness itself weakens the grip of self-construction. She emphasizes that while samādhi provides temporary relief from self-centeredness, only vipassanā can uproot it. The talk concludes with guidance on choiceless awareness practice, where simply attending to the arising and passing of phenomena reveals their empty nature, offering freedom from self-enslavement.

I know there's still a bit of confusion about the difference between samadhi or shamatha and vipassana, especially among some of the people who are rather new. There's an old Indian teaching story which may be of some help.

Apparently, there was a king who was also a very great yogi and meditation master. Someone came to him wanting to study with him, to also master what he knew. So the king said, "All right, here's your first training. Go through the entire palace with a bucket of hot oil on your head without spilling one drop."

This candidate went through the entire palace successfully with his bucket of oil on his head, went into every room, came back, and had not spilled a drop. He was very pleased with himself and thought he had completed the exercise.

The king then asked him, "Well, what's going on in the palace? Any intrigues going on? Who's sleeping with who? Any power plays, plots to kill me?"

He said, "Well, I don't know. I was so concentrated on not spilling any of the oil that I didn't notice what was going on."

So the king said, "Okay, now go back through the palace with the same bucket of oil on your head. Don't spill a drop, but give me a full report about what's going on."

That's what we're learning. We're learning how to do both.

The retreat has moved into the choiceless awareness aspect of practice, where when the mind is more calm or concentrated, we have the option of sitting quietly and being receptive to whatever turns up, to learning about it, to seeing its nature. Sometimes the term impermanence is used. Anatta, emptiness, no self.

I read a segment of Joseph Stalin's biography written by someone. I assume everyone knows he was a mass murderer and dictator; otherwise, what I'm about to say will make no sense. At any rate, he had a high-level assistant, one of his close assistants, who one day started to complain to him about someone who was just a little bit lower, who was his assistant. He was saying, "I don't know about Ivan. He's disagreeable and seems to have a lot of ambition and gives me a hard time. He's become a problem."

Stalin got quiet, supposedly, and thought for a moment, and then he said, "Hmm. No person, no problem."

The next day, Ivan was gone.

And I realized, wow—this is good, sound Buddhist teaching. Only old Joseph was a little on the coarse side. He didn't drop down to a level where he could understand it didn't have to be so messy.

That's our challenge. You hear all these book titles and sayings: nobody home, the lights are on but there's nobody home, going nowhere, being nobody. Do you really know what that means? We buy these books, we read them. That's what it means. No person, no problem. Only we have to do it ourselves. It's bloodless and very gentle—not always pleasant.

I'm going to come at this notion of selfhood by way of impermanence. In the Anapanasati Sutta, it's dealt with in the thirteenth contemplation, where the Buddha says to be aware of impermanence with every in-breath and out-breath. Because every time you breathe in and you breathe out, you're aware that all formations are impermanent. That's a little bit closer to the quote. That means everything having to do with the mind and body is impermanent as you sit and breathe—though it's not limited to sitting, really. As you're mindful and breathe, you begin to see that all forms are in a state of flux.

When you read Buddha's texts, if you see anicca, that's impermanence. If you see it with two other terms—dukkha, suffering, and anatta, not-self—these are called the three universal characteristics that our practice is designed to probe. We're designed to probe into the mind and body and to see these principles at work, to see if they're indeed there. Are they really universal principles of human existence?

If you see anicca along with dukkha, which means unsatisfactoriness, or anatta, which means not-self, then it simply means impermanence.

But if you see it alone, as in this thirteenth contemplation where just impermanence is mentioned, it stands for all three. The reason it stands for all three is because if you deeply, profoundly see into impermanence, you'll see that the other two are really expressions of it.

When you deeply see how everything is changing constantly—and there are many levels, as we mentioned the other evening, depths of seeing this and levels of precision of seeing this—when you see this, some of what you learn, of course, is that a great deal of what we call suffering is because everything is uncertain. Everything keeps changing. The body keeps changing. Society keeps changing. Whatever level that you look at, wherever you look, you can see: when there's something unhappy, or if the body is unhealthy, or there's an earthquake, that means life has rearranged itself in some way because nothing is autonomous. Nothing has a core. Everything is dependent on other things which themselves are also impermanent.

So it's a staggering process of movement and uncertainty because it unfolds definitely. It's not asking for our permission. It's constantly unfolding. It's ungovernable. It's not concerned with what we think. It's constantly happening. And when it affects us in a certain way, we call it suffering because it's uncertain. We never know what the result will be. That grows quite naturally out of seeing impermanence. You begin to see that so much of our suffering is because of that. It's not simply the obvious—that we get old, we get sick, and we die. It's just that from moment to moment, change itself sometimes becomes burdensome.

It's also liberating, because if there were no change, for one thing, why would we bother practicing here? We'd just be hopeless, frozen into our ignorant state. But we're not. So impermanence is not all bad news. It's just news. But what we do with it, of course, we often make it into bad news.

And anatta—perhaps even more obviously to you—how could something be a solid self, an autonomous, independent self, if it's endlessly going through changes? Every representation that comes up in the mind, notions and images, characterizations of ourselves, they come and they go. They're inconsistent, they're contradictory. They change almost like fashions, the way we regard ourselves. So there's nothing that you can really point to and say, "That's really me"—although we behave as if that's so.

When you see impermanence, and if you look for it, see it in whatever realm—because it's everywhere, you can't miss it—when you see it at the level of mind, it's just a natural discovery to understand that that which we have clung to as being something solid is an illusion. As you probe more and more deeply into the mind to try to find out what's there or who you are, you'll see that it's ungraspable. Perhaps you already see that.

In the sutta, to make it a little bit more concrete, recall we've talked about the foundation of the body. Remember the four foundations of mindfulness? The foundation of feelings, the foundations of the mind itself. One way in which the practice is done classically—and you need a lot of time for it—is that you go through each contemplation, and as you practice it, at some point you begin to see from the inside that everything is changing.

So even with the breath, you start with breathing. Even if I had never mentioned this, if you've been following the breath for quite a few days now, you must know that the breath keeps changing. And it changes in all kinds of ways. It's extremely delicate. It's very sensitive. The breath can be very smooth, fine, gentle, just a joy to be breathing. And one ugly thought—it's changed. All of a sudden, it's a bumpy ride. The breath is now labored and shallow and not enjoyable. It's not enjoyable to be breathing.

And so you could just take the realm of breathing, just breathing alone, and as you get to know breathing, you can learn the law of impermanence from breath moment to breath moment.

It's all there.

As for anatta, some of you—one person definitely had an anatta experience today. I don't want to set up expectations, although the striving has already begun. There are a fair number of people who want to get these insights that you've heard about. You don't know what they are, but you know you want them. We're not sure what these insights are, but we know we want them, because it's valued here, right? It's a good thing. I don't know what it is, but I want it.

Sometimes this may happen to you. You're sitting and breathing, and the breath becomes very, very smooth. You're not forcing it. You're not controlling it. The attention is continuous. And suddenly there's a feeling as if you're being breathed. It's absolutely and totally effortless. Sometimes it feels like you're being breathed from on high somewhere.

In that moment—and you may have already had moments of it, sometimes it can last for a while—there's definitely breathing happening. In, out, in, out. That's going on. But see if you can find the breather. You won't be able to find the breather. What you'll be able to find is the mind saying, "Oh yes, I'm the breather." But that's a thought. Or the mind might even concoct an image of itself as some wonderful yogi. That's an image. You watch it, it falls away, decomposes.

So what is happening is there's definitely breathing going on, but no one could be found who's doing the breathing. That's a taste of it. That's a taste of anatta.

And not only that—it's wonderful. Because, you see, the ego can never be happy. I don't know if you're beginning to see that yet. Impossible. The ego will never be happy. No matter what you do with it, for it, because of it—nourish it, enhance it, win awards for it, become a trillionaire—it's never going to be happy. It's just in its nature. It's impossible.

Well, in that moment when you're being breathed, the ego is taking a little vacation, and you're just sitting and breathing.

So our natural koan—for those of you who've been in the Zen tradition, I know some of you have—would be: Who's breathing? That's the big question finally. It's all about that. There is breathing, but who's doing it? Who's breathing?

You can examine any aspect of the breath. By examine, I mean just be aware of it—or of expressions in the body, bodily sensations. By now you've seen that as well. It's just torture to be sitting here, and then you just love sitting here. You can't wait for the bell to ring, or the bell is ringing too soon. You're just getting started. It's just so lovely. Why did the bell have to ring?

The body itself is going through tremendous changes. As the mind calms down, awareness can become staggering if it gets very precise, almost microscopic.

You're going to see that it's just a field of energy. A number of you are seeing that already. This word body makes it sound like it's solid, but it's just a process. Turn to the mind, and the process is even more so. So it's just a mind-body process, and there's nothing outside of it. That's another meaning of what we're talking about.

As you get to see the body, as you breathe in and breathe out, it's of course a wonderful field to begin learning about impermanence and also this absence of selfhood—that there's no one who owns it or controls it or who is it.

Now here I'm trying to also tie up some of the loose ends from interviews and things that are going on in the retreat. Some people seemed a little unclear about what the nature of the body actually is. Because in that first field of mindfulness, remember the Buddha's phrase, "seeing the body in the body"—there's a lot of valuable learning that comes out of that. Of course, the most important learning is we're learning how to be free. But one of the objectives that the Buddha sets for us, in his own words, is to begin to see that there is this body. No one's denying that there's a body. But the body is not me and it's not mine.

What in the world does that mean?

As you begin to practice self-knowing, and begin to see your actual relationship with your body, and then tune into other people's relationships to their bodies—whether it's through the mass media or just the way people talk—we're showing our relationship to the body in so many ways. You can see that it's very clear that we do identify with the body. We do think the body is me and that it is mine.

One extreme is tremendous involvement with it, whether you want to call it narcissism or something not as insulting—just endlessly preoccupied with beautifying it and strengthening it and making it young and making it last, all kinds of things. Now there's nothing wrong with any of those activities except where they're done in the service of enhancing this sense of self, which remember is being suggested is just a concoction.

Or you get the other extreme of alienation from the body, either through some indifference or perhaps some spiritual sense of superiority that you're into higher things. Or you don't like your body, so you turn away from it, for whatever reason. But both of them are caught in the body. Whether you're fighting with it or glorifying it, you're caught in the body. And the body is important material from which you're building up a sense of "I am, I am this"—whatever that image is that you're constructing.

So what the Buddha offers are a number of exercises, which we don't have time to go into, all of which are designed to balance us so that finally we slip out of those extremes. And my understanding of it is that you can take very good care of the body. In fact, you should. It's sacred. And it doesn't follow that you have to be egocentrically involved in the body. Not at all.

The best image I have for all this comes from the first Dharma teacher that I had, which was J. Krishnamurti. He used this image a lot, and it's always been very helpful to me. When we would talk about things like this, he would say, "Well, yes, it's true, you're not the body, and you don't own the body, and it's not you, and so forth. But try living your life without it." What he would say is that the relationship is very much like a cavalry soldier. You're going into combat on your horse. And although you aren't your horse, you'd better take very, very good care of that horse if you want to survive. So there can be a very beautiful relationship to the body that isn't necessarily in the service of vanity or used to build up this sense of me.

Similarly with feelings. I think by now we've all had many of them—thousands, for all I know, millions of feelings since we've been here. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. They come and go, don't they? None of them are here now. Point to any feeling that you've had today. Is it here now? Any taste, any smell, any bodily sensation that's pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, sounds—they constantly change.

Moreover, if you examine them closely, they also lack self, unless you impute self to it. My feeling. This is happening to me. I am having a good feeling. I'm having a bad feeling. This painful feeling in my body is my body and I'm suffering.

I think, as you know, we've been over this: the direct perception of pain in the body discloses pain. No one's denying there's pain. But if the mind comes in and identifies with that pain and claims it, appropriates it as part of itself, then you have torment, not just pain. Because the pain is happening to me, the most important being on the whole planet, in the whole universe. And it's being attacked by this pain.

And it just shouldn't be happening, but it is.

So some of this insight work is seeing the difference between mind and body, letting go of the commentator—if you recall, the announcer who's always telling you what's going on—and just working with the sensations. The same applies to the other mind states.

When we go to the mind directly, remember we talked about three of the main modes. The mind is very often in wanting something, often called greed or craving. Or not wanting, sometimes called aversion or aggression. Or confusion, ignorance, where the mind is spinning around, not quite sure what to do or where it is, characterized by a lot of darkness.

None of those mind states remain either. We don't just grasp all the time. We don't just attack all the time. And sometimes we're not confused—we're pretty decisive and clear as to what we want. So all of that field is another rich field for seeing how life is constantly changing. Everything's changing, and it's not changing in ways that we can control.

You can take a vow: "I'm only going to have saintly mind states for this retreat." Good luck. The mind has a mind of its own. It doesn't care. It will churn up what it's going to churn up due to conditions that are beyond our grasp. It's too complex for us to understand. And it doesn't last because those conditions are based on other conditions that are impermanent. And so you can learn that.

Now, if you attach to, let's say, mind moments when there's craving—I want—then of course you have larger than life. "I want." And when we're living under the influence of self-centeredness, like under the influence of alcohol, it's the same thing. Then "I want" can do all kinds of things that are destructive, because it's got to get what it really wants. And it's I who want it. It's not just that the mind has some wanting in it—it's that I want. So when people are under the influence of that, get out of the way.

We see all of that is changing. And when you pay attention, it's very clear that there's no one who owns these states. They're just formations. They're aspects of nature. Just as clouds come and go, just as the tides come in and go out, just as the sun rises and sets, just as birds fly—anything can point to nature. And in the Buddhist teaching, the mind is considered part of nature.

So we're all naturalists here. Instead of watching birds, we're watching—well, we're watching birds, but they're in our mind. And we see them come and we see them go according to a lawfulness that is out of our control.

So what? In a number of places, the Buddha gave the most concise treatment of what his whole teaching was about. And it comes down to, slightly paraphrased: under no conditions attach to anything whatsoever as being me or mine.

That's what we've been talking about. To attach to anything whatsoever as being me or mine is what is called avijja—ignorance. When you attach to things as being me or mine, you're in a state of what is called ignorance.

And we've been brought up to do that. We've been brought up to construct a sense of me, to become a somebody. We are encouraged to do it. We're rewarded for doing it. We're constantly goaded into doing it. And if you don't, then you feel like you're nothing. So it's powerful. And we've been brought up to believe that it leads to happiness.

Now, this is what is called ignorant knowledge in the Buddhist teachings, or knowledge that is not knowledge, literally. Any knowledge that does not help us eradicate ignorance—and therefore suffering, because ignorance leads to suffering—doesn't have quite the same respect in this tradition.

Under no conditions attach to anything whatsoever as being me or mine. What we're doing all day long is attaching to things as me or mine. And if you look at it, you can see that we're constantly being born into one or another state, where we're this or we're that, getting X or getting Y.

The Buddha also said that birth is suffering. On one level, this means the physical pain of being born. But also, if you're born, then that means there's a body. If you have a body, then it must get old, it must get sick, and it must die. So just to be born is suffering.

Now, a lot of us New Agers and so forth, we don't like that one too much. But can you deny it? Here's what I'm trying to get at. There's another way of understanding it—there was also an inner teaching of it, where being born isn't referring literally to the body. When the Buddha says that birth is suffering, what he's talking about is birth of the ego, birth of me, birth of I and mine.

Because we aren't in that state all the time. If we were in the state of me and mine all the time, attached to it, we would be insane. Just everything would be taken personally. Absolutely everything would be taken personally.

What is being said is that from moment to moment, things happen to us. We see something, we think of something, something is shown to us, we smell or hear something, we eat something, and this process goes to work. There's a contact and a feeling. And if the feeling is a very pleasant feeling, then we grasp after it and then we get attached. And then almost simultaneously is the birth of me and mine.

In Buddhist circles, you hear that attachment is suffering. Attachment is virtually synonymous with me or mine. Anytime you're suffering, look and see: Why am I suffering? Am I attached to something? And if you find that you are, you'll see—well, who's attached? You'll see it's me. It's happening to me. I wanted that and I'm not getting it. Or I have it, but it's being taken away. And it's an affront to something, some psychic something in us that can actually be observed. It's very subtle and very deep and very powerful, but it can be observed.

What the Buddha is saying—you hear terms like samsara or puthujjana, which means a worldly one. Worldly doesn't necessarily mean that the only people who would not be worldly would be monks or nuns. It doesn't really mean that. It means the mode of living. When your living is always under the influence of me or mine, when the energy that drives your actions and thoughts is constantly me or mine, then that is samsara. Because we are creating suffering, and very often, much of the time, not realizing that we are doing it to each other—whether it's on an individual level, or just look around at the planet.

The identifications with ethnic groups is to the point of insanity. Here we are, supposedly highly sophisticated, decked out in modern clothing with modern cars—caveman, tilt-down man and woman. It's the worst of tribalism. I don't want to get political, but this is our subject. We're part of that. We're not out of that. We're not exempt from that. The same dynamic that produces this attachment to me and mine—whether the mine are objects, buildings, practices, religions, children—it's just writ large when it becomes a country or an ethnic group or a race or whatever.

So that dynamic should concern us because we're destroying each other. It's not a joke. It really isn't. And yet the only person who can help us is ourselves—to at least help ourselves step out of that.

What's also being suggested is that this dynamic of greed, hatred, and delusion, me and mine, cuts through all social classes. It cuts through all—whether you're educated or ignorant, whether you're a farmer or a professor, whether you're a Nobel Peace Prize winner or you're a street person, whether you're dressed up or in tattered clothes, young, old, prosperous, poor. What it's saying is if you look closely, the dynamic is the same. The wealthy person may be driving themselves crazy around money, having so much and wanting more. The poor person is doing the same thing by not having it. But it's not the money per se that is the torment. It's that we identify with it and we use it as the basis to build up a sense of me or mine.

So what the Buddha is saying is don't get caught in all the different forms, how we're dressed up, the clothing we're wearing.

Underneath it, this dynamic is constantly at work. It can be highly refined, where what your mere mind is built up out of is an idea, a theory, or anything at all. And the proof comes out in the pudding—no matter how we speak and no matter how we dress, if we've not done any work on this, it shows up. We make life difficult for ourselves and others because that dynamic is at work. It's got a lot of force.

It's a little bit like this: in Japan, they have a traditional kind of show where they dress monkeys up for a classical play, which is a little bit like our Shakespeare—a battle scene. You have one set of monkeys on one side of the stage and another set on the other side. One set of monkeys are decked out as certain soldiers in those outfits that the Japanese know all too well, with a famous general in his outfit. And on the other side, they're decked out in a different kind of outfit. Everyone's familiar with the play, and they're all having a good time because the monkeys are dressed up in these outfits and performing.

One time, apparently, someone in the middle of one of these performances threw a banana on the stage. And they all just—they were monkeys. That was the end of the show. You get my drift?

So none of us can be really cocky. Spiritual materials get used in the same way. Trungpa Rinpoche coined a very important term: spiritual materialism. All the different statuses and achievements and accomplishments and levels of this and levels of that—which is really the best method, and which brand of Tibetan Buddhism, or is it Theravada, is that the major vehicle or the tiny vehicle, or Zen, but is it Soto or Rinzai? It's not so different. So our challenge is seeing that.

Now, maybe this sounds insurmountable. But don't give up—it's not hopeless, because the truth is we're practicing weakening the sense of mere mind, whether you know it or not. Every time you're mindful, really in the moment, fully there with that attention—when you are really fully there, what's happening is, when it's really developed, it's called doerless doing. There's just the doing, and you're too involved in the doing to build a status out of it, or for the action to be driven from that place of me or mine. Rather, it's just happening.

Moreover, when me or mine turns up, if mindfulness is there alongside of it, it's not so dangerous. When we're awake, so many of these so-called negative states have come and gone, but they're really not dangerous when we're aware of them. They're just what they are. They come and they go. It's when we're unaware that we slip back, get caught in them, and then of course we're nourishing me or mine again.

All of us have tasted moments when we're free of that. As I mentioned, I don't think we would have gotten this far if we didn't get a break every day. We get a break sometimes gratuitously—just very good conditions. You're with friends that you love. It's nice weather. Everything is just working out. And everyone is relaxed and kind and not preoccupied with themselves. And we're just happy. Everyone's just happy.

Usually it doesn't last all that long because something happens to get the machinery going again. Who's got what and who's where and who's on top of who and who's underneath and who's equal—it starts in again.

Or when you get strong samadhi, you're given a respite. When the mind is very, very concentrated, it's not unusual that there isn't this sense of mere mind. There's just that concentration. So that gives you a break, and that's part of why it's so fulfilling and nourishing and refreshing when we enter into quiet, when the mind becomes still out of concentration. We've given it a rest, whether we know it or not.

Unfortunately, the concentration, as useful as it is and as helpful and as remedial as it can be, doesn't uproot this tendency to attach to things as being mere mind. Ajahn Chah used the image of putting a big stone on top of grass—it holds it down, but then when you move the stone away, the grass starts up again. And that's, of course, where insight comes in, or vipassanā, or wisdom—the uprooting of it. When we begin to see clearly with our own minds, with our own eyes, this process at work—

And in the seeing, we start to weaken it, take some of the sting out of it. We don't burn ourselves so much with ourselves. We're burning ourselves.

Do you want to be a monkey running after bananas your whole life? I don't, even if they're organic.

When we're sitting in choiceless awareness, just sitting and breathing, all of this is happening. From time to time, something happens in the body. If we attach to it and appropriate it as being me or mine, then we're caught. If we see it for what it is—bodily sensations—we're free.

When feelings come and go, if they're prominent and turn up, if we grasp onto them, hold them tightly, claim them, use them as materials to build up a sense of self, then once again, that's what we're strengthening. Ignorance, our vāsanās—we're under the influence of our vāsanās. And the same with the mind states.

And so just sitting and breathing, we're watching the show, the coming and the going. And when we're attentive and that flow happens, everything just arises and passes away, even if it's just for a few moments to begin with. There's no problem. The problem is unawareness. As soon as we take our eye off the road, we're liable to have an accident.

Mindfulness and discernment, working together as comrades. As we attend to things, we begin to see their nature. We begin to see what's happening. And we learn. We learn how to be free, how to get free of our own self-enslavement.

Trungpa Rinpoche once was giving out protective cords, these cords that you put around your neck that the Tibetans give you. Jack Kornfield told me this story: Trungpa gave him one and put it on his neck, and Jack asked him, "Well, what does this protective cord protect you from?" Trungpa looked at him a little annoyed and said, "From yourself, of course."

CHAPTER 214

Birth and Death of the Self

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses what she considers the core teaching of the Buddha: the understanding of anattā (non-self) or suññatā (emptiness). Drawing extensively from the teachings of Ajahn Buddhadāsa, the influential Thai forest monk, she reframes these often-intimidating concepts as deeply practical and accessible to all practitioners.
> Wilson explains that emptiness is simply the experience of moments when the mind is empty of the sense of 'I' or 'mine'—what Buddhadāsa playfully termed 'I-ing' and 'my-ing.' Rather than approaching anattā as an abstract philosophical concept, she invites practitioners to investigate directly: when the sense of self arises, turn wise attention onto it and examine what is actually being called 'I.' Through this investigation, we discover that the sense of self is merely a condition arising when there is grasping and clinging—nothing more than momentary experiences of sensation, thought, or mental image.
> The talk explores how identification occurs across different aspects of experience—body, vedanā (feeling tone), thoughts, emotions, intention, and consciousness itself. Wilson emphasizes recognizing not only the birth of self but also its death, noting how often we overlook the natural peace of non-grasping that exists between these moments of identification. She offers the metaphor of space and sky as practical tools for tuning into the mind of non-attachment, encouraging practitioners to notice the silence and spaciousness around arising phenomena rather than constantly fixating on objects. This, she suggests, is the doorway to freedom and the natural arising of compassion.

In one of the suttas, someone asked the Buddha to summarize in one phrase what it is that liberated ones know, or how it is that liberated beings are. The Buddha answered that what they know is that nothing whatsoever should be clung to. He went on to say that those who have heard this phrase have heard every phrase of the teaching. To have put it into practice is to have done every practice. Nothing whatsoever should be clung to.

In a way, this is one way of describing what I feel is the core, the pith teaching of the Buddha—the main, or actually only, thing we really need to know in our practice. And that's the understanding of no-self or of emptiness. I want to talk about this root teaching of no-self or emptiness, hopefully not in a theoretical way at all. I want to talk about it because it's very wonderful. It's the teaching closest to my heart.

I know that often when we mention no-self, there can be a sense of, "Oh no"—the heart kind of drops. "I never get this. It's too complicated for me. I'm not there yet. It makes me crazy to try and think about this." The mind starts spinning with all these what-ifs: "If there's no self, then..." fill in the blanks. My intention is not to engender a sense of confusion but to help point to the fact that this is actually not a complicated teaching at all. It's the most simple, the most simple expression of how things are. I actually think that we miss it because it's so simple and we get so involved in thinking about it.

What I hope to do is talk about inviting us to inquire in our practice, both into the sense of self when it arises, and also to recognize and explore the sense or feeling of emptiness, or simply non-self.

I'm going to be referring a lot to Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful Thai monk and meditation teacher. He died in 1993. He was sort of a radical in the Theravada tradition—which in the sum of all of Buddhism isn't too radical—but he synthesized different traditions and produced some wonderful writings on the understanding of emptiness or sunyata, which is mentioned in the Pali texts, believe it or not. He talks very simply about the sense of emptiness as being the experience of a moment when it's empty of self, empty of the sense of "I" or "mine."

I want to invite us both to explore the presence of the sense of self and the absence of it. We can sometimes worry that it's too complicated for us to understand. In fact, I just read something about Buddhadasa's early teaching. He was quite old when he died, so he started teaching as a young monk in the 1930s in Thailand. At that time, apparently, it was felt that the teachings on emptiness or no-self were too complicated for lay people, and so they weren't taught to them. Buddhadasa, feeling quite rightly that this was the core liberation teaching, began teaching it to lay people because freedom is what this practice is about. Any of us with wise attention can understand and experience this. He began teaching it to lay people, and now it's much more commonly taught.

The Buddha also taught sunyata, emptiness, non-self, to lay people. In fact, I read another sutta where one of his significant lay followers came to him and said, "Give us one teaching that will be to our benefit for a very long time." The Buddha gave him the teaching on emptiness. He said, "Really contemplate emptiness." And just like many of us, this layman—his name was Damodina—said, "Oh no, that's too hard for us. We're too involved with our homes and our children. We're too busy enjoying sandalwood paste and wearing perfumes. We can't be expected to understand and practice this. Give us something easier."

I guess we don't change much. But the fact remains that when the Buddha was asked for a teaching that would be of benefit for a long time, this is the one he offered. As he said in many suttas, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so." He never put out something that was beyond our abilities or understanding.

This emptiness, this freedom from the sense of self—it's not, in fact, an esoteric or abstruse or rare experience at all. It's so normal, so natural. It's simply a mind that's undistracted. As Joseph spoke of last night, the nature of mind when not distracted is simply pure awareness. Buddhadasa calls it sati-pañña, mindfulness-wisdom. There's nothing more normal and more natural.

Many times throughout a day, this is our conscious experience, if we would only notice it with awareness—simply moments when there is this natural ease of being, natural awareness with no giving rise to a sense of I or mine. The thing is, so often we don't notice this, because it's not always spectacular. We tend to get much more involved in what we call distractions.

We might think the distraction is that loud sound, or this unpleasant emotion, or these obsessive thoughts that keep coming, or this pain in my knee, or just the creak of the floor. We get involved in the distractions, the emotions, whatever arises. But what we need to recognize is that it's not the appearance or what's arising that is the distraction. The root of all distraction, the root of all the resultant suffering, the root of our fear of pain and our yearning for pleasure is simply this false clinging that we call the sense of self—this false view of a someone here who is experiencing and keeping notes on it all.

Buddhadasa described it beautifully. He translates two Pali words in a way I particularly like. The momentary experience that we call me or mine—not even a view of self, but the momentary experience—he calls it "I-ing" and "my-ing." In a moment where there's born the sense of I, that is I-ing. When there's born the sense of mine, it's my-ing. I love that; it's really nice.

Because these are born many times in a day, and we leave them unexamined, we take it for granted. It feels like, it seems like, this sense of I or mine is an ongoing, ever-present aspect of our experience. Even at moments when it's not present, it's easy to overlook and then just say in memory, "Well, I wasn't noticing it then, but of course it was there. I just wasn't thinking about it." That's right—you weren't thinking about it, but it wasn't there.

Without investigating, it seems real. One of the traps we fall into in exploring the teachings of no-self is that rather than turning the discriminating awareness of investigation onto the experience of me itself, we tend to start thinking about it—thinking about how can there not be a self, I'm sure there is a self. The more we think about it, the more solid the sense of self seems, which only goes to support our idea in the first place.

What I personally find very interesting in my practice, what cuts through over and over again this unconscious belief in the ongoing nature of self, is when you recognize the presence of the feeling of I or mine and very simply turn the attention onto it. Bring the quality of investigation—not investigation of thinking, but of satipañña, of mindfulness wisdom. Turn it onto that experience that we're calling I or mine. What do we find?

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Is the mind real? It is but a collection of states, each of them transitory. How can a succession of transitory states be considered real? Even the basic idea 'I am the body' is a mental state and does not last. It comes and goes like all other mental states. The illusion of being the body-mind is there only because it is not investigated." Only because it's not investigated.

So when we do begin to investigate quite consciously, what do we find? Well, I'm going to tell you, but don't take my word for it, please. Continue to investigate each time you notice the feeling of I or mine arising. What we find is that the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. It's that simple—merely a condition that arises and passes, admittedly rather frequently, but that's all it is. And we can experience this with awareness over and over and over.

You can see this well with any sense-door contact. This is the dependent origination that we've talked about. There's the contact of a sense door, a thought, pleasant or unpleasant, the craving that arises. When that craving strengthens to grasping, there's the sense of I or mine, and it strengthens into becoming something. So the thought arises, "Hmm, concentration could be a little better." It could just be a thought that comes and goes. If there's a little clinging, it strengthens into grasping, and immediately is born "my concentration could be better." Strengthening even further into becoming: "I'm not doing so well in my practice."

Now, we often notice the suffering effects of clinging. Had the thought just come and gone, no problem. But what we can also do is consciously begin to notice, to explore with attention, that feeling of self that arises together with grasping. It's not just the grasping, but suddenly I have become quite strong and separate. You, or a meditation, or something else has also become quite strong and separate. We can feel experien-tially, in some way, that we can direct the attention to what we're calling I. We don't have to leave it nebulous—"Well, there's I, but I don't really look at it." That's what makes it seem like a solid thing.

When you really look, what do you find? Well, there's a feeling of grasping. Maybe there's a kind of almost physical sensation internally of contraction or restriction or clutching. You might notice just a narrowed-down, restricted consciousness.

So notice it the next time that a sense object comes up and there's some clinging arising in the mind. It can be so simple as, "Hmm, I wonder what's for lunch tomorrow?" And the mind just moves right into that, and you notice the clinging, you notice the wanting and the sense of distance—but also notice how "I" have become very solid. And then see: what are you calling "I" in that moment?

Buddhadasa calls this birth—this emergence of "I." I as the hungry person. I as the bad meditator. I as the lonely person. I as whatever. And so there's birth and death. We're being born and dying hundreds and hundreds of times in any one day.

We can notice this sense of birth, and we can notice when this particular becoming dissipates, when it fades away, when I'm no longer the hungry person. That's gone. There's no more clinging in the mind.

And this, I think, is a very important point: to maintain the alertness of awareness, because at the point of the dissipation of that particular birth, whatever it might be, often that's a moment when there's just the emptiness. Joseph spoke last night of shifting our reference point of our practice to really cultivating the mind of non-attachment. When a particular self dies, often in that moment there's just that purity of awareness that is the nature of what we are—the mind of non-attachment.

Do we even notice that? Or do we tend to dull out, wait for the next birth, wait for something to happen again—even if it's unpleasant—wait for a new birth and just miss the spaciousness, the real true happiness and peace of a mind of non-attachment?

Well, we usually don't have to wait too long. And it's really interesting to watch how, out of just clear alertness and peace and awareness, the birth of self can be so sudden and so strong. It's really quite funny if we could look at it that way.

Just a story once that illustrated this for me very strongly. I was on a self-retreat in California in a very beautiful environment, and I was sitting outside on a bench up high, looking down over a very spacious natural view. With my eyes open, I was sitting and feeling just very spacious, peaceful, aware—not much thought, not much construction, no sense of me or mine. Just being.

And then, you know, noticing different animals. There was a little skunk, and it was in a place where they have herds of white deer, so you could see them way down below. It was quite lovely, just watching coming and going. And some turkey vultures were swooping down and circling—just that sense of being one with nature, which is actually something Buddhadasa really encouraged as a practice: to spend time in nature. His whole monastery, Suan Mok, in southern Thailand, is a huge forest monastery of some three hundred acres. I spent some time there when I was a nun. And his philosophy really was to just let people go live in nature, and the mind and the heart quiets until one realizes one is one with nature. The sense of clinging to self tends to dissipate.

Well, anyway, so that was my experience at that moment. But the birds started coming down from some trees near me. I thought, "Far out, they're really close. I've never seen them so close." And then they were circling. And then suddenly this thought arose in my mind: "Oh my God, I'm what they're circling."

And so fast—I mean, panic. Total panic arose in an instant. Definitely a real grasping of that thought, and that panic itself. I came very close to leaping up and screaming, "I'm still alive! I'm still alive!"

It was hugely amusing, even at the time. But it doesn't take much to come out of that peace, that spaciousness, into the grasping of self.

So let's just, for a moment, mention the various aspects of experience that clinging or grasping arises in relationship to—the various aspects of experience you could say we identify with. None of this is news to anybody. But this is not meant to make a list in your head. Rather, it's to encourage turning wise attention onto both the object or experience that is grasped and also that sense of me or mine in the feeling of the grasping itself.

Of course, one of the big areas of experience is that of our body, our physical sensations. When we're in the realm of thinking about it, the realm of view or opinion, the sense that I am my body—you might in one way be able to say, "Well, obviously I'm not, because the way I look now is very different from how I was when I was ten days old." You couldn't even say it was the same. We've got endless rationalizations about how I'm not the body. We can have various organs missing and that's gone, and we think, "Well, that doesn't seem to affect me. I guess I wasn't that."

But that's all rationalization, I would like to say, in my particular experience. Without really examining when it's present—the sense "I am the body"—that's where we can see what we're really doing, calling in our experience "I" or "mine." And when we look, the sense "I am the body" breaks down every time. All we need to do is look, not take it for granted, not think our ideas about it are enough. Because in most cases, our ideas about it are not enough.

We don't sit here and think, "I am my body." It's not quite that clear. But when there's a physical experience and that sense of I, look—bring wise attention to the experience itself and see. The idea of our body may be "my knee hurts." But when we really bring attention in a sitting, there's no knee, there's no "my," there's just bubbling or vibrations or tingling. And even those words are concepts.

Then I'll notice a mental image of knee, or a thought: "That's my knee. What's going to happen to it if I don't move?" And often, if I'm not paying attention, that image is actually where the grasping of self comes. The grasping at I becomes this image of a knee, or this person who has a knee. If I don't notice that it's not actually the sensation that's being grasped at all—it's the mental image.

I notice this really often when I'm sitting. There's just sensation, sensation, and then a flash of an image. Maybe it's of my whole body sitting, maybe it's of my face, maybe it's of the body part—doesn't really matter what. If I can just notice the image—seeing, seeing, it's just an image. But often if I don't notice it, there's a real grasping at it, and I think I'm identified with the sensation. I keep looking at the sensation and just see bubbling. Clearly, I don't feel grasping around that. But there's still a sense of self.

So that's why it's so important: when I notice the sense of self, don't just say, "Well, I'm not clinging to this bubbling." Turn around and bring wise attention to the sense of I itself. Often I'll see, ah, I'm identifying with this image or this thought of body. It's often much more subtle than we might think.

"I'm so hungry," I think. But when we really bring attention to hunger, sometimes it's hard to even find it physically. It's a funny thing. All you can find is little movements or little bubblings or something. You think, "Why is this bothering me? There's nothing even here." But again, turn—don't just say, "I guess I'm not attached, there's nothing going on." Clearly something's going on. Turn again to the sense of self and see where it's landing. Where's the grasping? Again, it might be an image or a memory or a thought of the future.

I started this by saying a sense of identification with the body, and often it is around a particular sensation, but often it's around a thought or an image. When we really bring attention to the body in meditation, all there is is sensations coming and going, coming and going. There isn't anything solid. And when we say, "Oh yes, don't tell me there's nothing solid—in my experience there's something solid," that's an idea.

That solidity is an idea. If we really experience it, there's just a moment of sensation, another moment of sensation, and the thoughts make it seem solid.

So just noticing as it comes and goes, comes and goes, and noticing the thought. Not trying to change anything. Just noticing where this grasping is arising. What's it grasping at? Where's this birth of self arising in that moment?

And again, if anything I'm saying gets you really confused, just don't even think about it. Seriously, thinking about it is only going to lead to more confusion. Just bring your attention back to that experience of who's confused? What's that feeling of confusion? Turn around and feel the sense of I in that.

So there's body. And of course there's vedanā, the feeling tone—the pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. We've talked about it a lot, so people here are getting quite subtle in noticing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. And even if you think you're not subtle in it, even noticing it is subtle. I mean, how many people on the street could you stop and say, "Now, is your experience as you put your foot down pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral?" They would look at you like you're nuts. But we're actually noticing it quite a lot.

And it's interesting to notice because this is another aspect of experience that can easily be clung to and thought of with that feeling, to give birth to that sense of I or mine. And it can be easy to miss that it's the feeling tone, especially when it's pleasant.

For example, if you have a sitting where the breath is smooth and calm and the mind stays there fairly easily—and of course we like it—you really are noticing the smoothness and the calmness. And in your mind you're saying, "I know this will change. I know I like it, but it's okay. I know it will change." And it does change. And we're distraught when it changes, even though we thought we had it all set up. We could see, "I know I'm not this breath," and that was really clear. But sometimes we miss the fact that the grasping was around the pleasant feeling. And so the sense of self, the birth of I, was happening in each moment of grasping at that pleasant feeling without quite noticing it.

This might seem a little subtle, but it's really important because that's the place where the birth of self happens quite a lot. Buddhadasa gave as one of his ways of helping us see through the illusion of self to keep investigating at this point of vedanā, especially at pleasant feeling. Apparently he was really big on exploring the illusory nature of pleasant feeling.

By illusory nature, we mean it comes and goes—that's what we mean. He talks about it like wave-like nature. There's a nice physical sensation, it's pleasant. The pleasant feeling kind of comes up like a wave and it's really nice, and then it crashes like a wave and it's gone. Just keep noticing this over and over and over.

And he says—he sounds sort of uncompromising, but I think it's often true—that in contemplating how pleasant nature arises and disintegrates, arises and disintegrates, just noticing the impermanence of all these aspects of experience, as Joseph said last night, but especially with pleasant feeling, it can begin to undercut what we've talked about so much but we still get caught in: that underlying belief that really the way to value life is by how much pleasant feeling it affords us.

As Buddhadasa says, how many of your decisions, how many of the things you do, the jobs you have, the place you live, the people you hang out with, the people you get involved with, just the choices we make—how much of those choices really, when we're not paying attention, are driven by what we think will afford us the most pleasant feeling? It's really quite interesting, I thought, when I looked at it. And of course the mind says, "Oh, that's enough. I don't want to look at that. Don't look at that one anymore. Thank you very much."

So of course we're having to look at that here. That's the whole setup. That's why, I'd just like to point out, that's why it gets so difficult sometimes. And sometimes there seem to be waves, waves in yogi land, of difficulty.

I almost think it's contagious, you know—difficulty in the form of suffering. And how much of the suffering, all the suffering, is because there's the birth of "I" in that moment. How much of it is around the simple fact that we are being united with unpleasant feelings and we can't change that. Just that simple. The arising of the birth of "I" and "mine" around wanting pleasant feeling—it's really amazing when we truly look at it. So that's a quite important one, where the self is born.

And of course, there are thoughts and emotions. This is something we've talked about quite a lot. Thoughts are in some ways more difficult because the birth of the sense of self can come so quickly with them, and thoughts and emotions are so complex and feed into each other that it can be quite difficult to catch the moment of birth of self. But we can at least notice after it's born. We can feel its presence. And rather than hating it or thinking something's wrong, just turn attention to the birth, to the sense of self.

Just an example—I remember when I was sitting a couple of years ago, how such simple, mundane little thoughts can give rise to such solid clinging of "me." I was doing my walking meditation and again, just present, nothing going on, just kind of awareness. And I sort of felt an itching and ran my finger under my turtleneck, and was aware of it, was noticing it. And in that running of the finger, there was a sort of memory, a body-visual memory of many other times of doing that same thing. It just felt so familiar. And then there were a lot of mental images that flashed through—just of my body walking, of what I was wearing. And then I thought, "Gosh, I wonder how I look. I bet I look like a real schlump, the way I schlump around here when I'm doing walking meditation."

And that was all it took. That was a flash. I mean, that was less time than it took me to say one of those pieces. There was this strong birth of self and other, uncomfortable and self-conscious, and aversion. The whole story. It doesn't take much.

I'm not saying this to be discouraging. No, I'm trying to be encouraging, because then we can realize how subtle and quick it is. Rather than thinking, "Oh, I'm never going to see through this, it's too much," it's like, no, no—there are so many opportunities. It's true. I didn't even mean that to be funny. There are just so many opportunities. And it's only moment to moment.

Sometimes I used to find myself sort of sitting back and waiting for the big flash of no-self that was just going to end all the sense of self. Of course, I was positing that there is a self—the flash of no-self would somehow uproot it and throw it away, and then I wouldn't have to deal with all the suffering anymore. I'm still waiting for that particular experience to happen. But along the way, in twenty-whatever years I've been practicing, there have been an infinity of moments of seeing through this birth of the sense of self.

It's not something to be gotten rid of. It's simply to see for what it is. And any moment that we are aware of the sense of "I" or "mine" being there is a moment when we can meet it with wise attention and see, "Oh, it's just a momentary experience." It might be a sensation, it might be that sense of clutching, it might be clutching at an image. It's something slightly different each time I turn my attention to it. And whatever it is, it's no big deal.

Because all there is to experience is the six sense doors: touching, tasting, smelling, hearing, seeing—I'm trying to think of them all—that's five, and the mind. The big one, of course. But that's all. Even what we're calling "sense of self" is nothing other than one of these sixth sense experiences, and it might be a slightly different one each time you investigate it. So really noticing that helps to break down any underlying sense of unchanging nature that it might have when not investigated. When investigated, there's nothing really there. When uninvestigated, "I" am so solid—there's no way I could not be here.

With thoughts, similarly with emotions. We've talked a lot about the impermanence of emotions, watching them come and go. Even when you feel, "I've been so sad all day," really noticing the gaps in that. All of that, of course, helps to break the sense that I am my sadness, I am my grief, I am my excitement.

But just another piece I'd like to put in is that we can tend at times—or I can tend anyway—to think that it's the presence of the emotion itself that's the problem. Of course, I only think this when I'm really somehow grasping at that emotion or grasping at wanting it to go away. But to think it's the emotion itself that's the problem... We can, again, begin to notice when sadness comes, for example.

It could be anything. There's times when it's simply sadness, full presence, awareness, feeling it fully. I don't mean noting while the sadness is over there in the corner somewhere. I mean really in the middle of it, except there's nobody there in the middle of it. It's just sadness, fully felt. And many people say, no, there's no problem with that. You couldn't even say unpleasant—it's just what it is, sadness. And then at some point, that sense of clinging arises and becomes I who am sad, or becomes my sadness. And at that point, it becomes problematic. At that point, there's some extra twist, and the suffering begins.

So in exploring or investigating what I'm calling sense of self, we can notice when we're suffering in an emotion—notice not only the emotion itself, trying to accept it. We do all our little tricks: first to get rid of it, and then to try and accept it, and try to remember, you know, all the stuff we do. But also turn attention to the feeling of I in that sadness. It's part of it. And it feels different when I am sad than when sadness is arising—just sadness. It feels different. Simply begin to notice that difference. Give it attention. We can see the birth of me, the birth of mine in the sadness or the happiness or the stillness or the peace.

Just two other areas I want to mention quickly that we very often identify with. By identify, again, I mean this clinging of self around experience. Because they're so subtle: that of intention, obviously, and that of consciousness, the knowing itself.

And again, not to think about these, but one of the reasons that we bring into the instructions noticing before big movements that intention—because when we notice the intention, we see how fleeting, how fast it is, and how subtle an experience. But we also clearly see, as it comes and goes, that it's so clear it's not me. There's no grasping at it.

That's why it's fun for me—I like it when I start having an itch in a sitting, because I can just watch the intention to lift my arm come and go, and come and go, you know, ten or twenty times. And I really like that because each time the intention comes and goes, it's just so clear that it's another arising appearance that's conditioned by not liking the itch, and that's all.

When we don't notice intention, that's when we really easily think: Who moved? I moved. Who noted? I noted. Who's eating? Who's standing up? Who came here? I. But it's just grasping around intention.

Also with citta, consciousness, the experience—you could say—of knowing itself. Last night Joseph was talking about the natural nature of mind, just simply of awareness, and how spontaneously appearances arise and are known, quite effortlessly. And my mind, of course, in its more grasping mode goes: Yes, sure, spontaneously known by whom? By me. Clearly I am knowing and recognizing these appearances when they arise.

And a lot of that is because the sense of knowing, the experience of knowing, is quite subtle and hard to notice the coming and going of it. So it's very easy to identify, to grasp at it as me, because we don't even recognize its presence in the first place, never mind that it's coming and going. It's hard to even recognize its presence in a moment. And so we easily get into a sense of grasping, a birth of self around the knowing itself.

What I find with both of these two—intention and knowing—what even complicates and strengthens the sense of self further, is that because these are very subtle and hard to notice, and to notice the grasping, we then tend to think about it. So for example, with that example of grasping at the knowing itself: Who's knowing? I'm knowing. And then hearing what I just said, my mind would start to go: What do you mean, the experience of knowing? It comes and goes? What do you mean it comes and goes? I don't notice it coming and going. How can it come and go? How can it even exist? And then the more I think about it: How can you say that's not me? It feels like it's always ongoing.

The mind just takes off. And the end result of that is the birth of self happening in that moment—around the thinker, around the analyzer. So by the time we've thought that through, I feel much more solid than I did before I started that line of thought. And this tends to reinforce the belief that this line of thought is true, because the more I think about it, the more solid I feel.

I don't know if this makes sense, but I've been noticing this in myself. If I think about intention, if I think about consciousness or awareness, I feel really solid—because there's a clinging to the thoughts themselves. That's why it's so important in this whole area to simply use wise attention, wise discernment, and come right back to the feeling of "I" itself. It's not like you have to untangle everything.

I have spent a lot of time working my mind into this feeling of crack, trying to understand what "no self" could be, or how could I not exist, or how can awareness not be me when it so obviously feels like me—that kind of thing. I would just bring my mind to the point of implosion, and I would feel really solid. I wish I could spare you all that, because it never led anywhere.

But at that moment, you don't have to backtrack. When what I feel like is going to implode, simply turn the attention onto "I." What am I calling "I"? And all I feel in that moment is, oh—tension. That's it. Or contraction. Or mental image. Or a thought. I'm not trying to simplify. It really is simple. It just takes the cutting through of mindfulness wisdom, the cutting through of wise attention and wise discernment. Simply come back to see what's happening right now.

So we don't have to get rid of some idea of self. But by coming back with wise attention each time that we're aware of a sense of self, we see its illusory nature over and over and over, or its transient, its changing nature over and over and over. And it becomes easier not to get so caught in it, in these ideas, or even in the sense of self. We don't have to fight it. It's just another arising appearance.

So often when I'm on retreat—not in my daily life, but when I'm on retreat—I think I mentioned this one morning, one of the notes I'll be making: seeing, seeing, hearing, thinking, ah—self. What I'm doing is landing with my attention at that moment on what feels like me. And sometimes it's an image and sometimes it's a sensation. It's never anything very out of the ordinary. And it's always a different experience. It really breaks up the attachment to this idea. And it becomes much easier to incline towards stillness, to incline towards the mind of non-attachment, mind of pure awareness.

This has the feeling of this stillness to me. It's called "The Desert Has Many Teachings," from a woman from thirteenth-century Germany:

In the desert, turn towards emptiness, fleeing the self.
Stand alone, ask no one's help, and your being will quiet,
Free from the bondage of things.

I don't think this woman was ever in the desert. She lived in Germany in the thirteenth century. I really like that. Turn towards emptiness. Stand alone. Ask no one's help. And your being will quiet, free from the bondage of things.

It happens quite naturally. The sense of self becomes merely another appearance, coming and going, that we don't need to fear, we don't need to hate, we don't need to get caught in. It arises due to conditions and passes when those conditions change. And as Joseph said last night, over and over: all conditions change. There are no conditions which do not change.

Buddhadasa—again, I thought this was funny. He gets so emphatic.

He went back to that phrase: nothing whatsoever should be clung to. And then he added: as I or mine. The core of the Buddha's teaching.

And then he expands on it like this. He says, "No one"—and he writes underneath it, "that means no exceptions"—"should grasp or cling, give rise to ego consciousness, to anything"—"that means no exceptions"—"as being I or mine." No exceptions. No one should cling to anything. That means anything. No exceptions.

Not because to cling to anything is bad, but because it's the root of all our suffering and confusion. And because in the not clinging to anything is this vastness, this peace of just being, of awareness—the peace of non-grasping.

It doesn't have all the intensity of our high pleasant experiences. The mind and heart need to be somewhat refined to even think that "the peace of non-grasping" sounds like a good thing. That's why we sit for three months. I actually think that now, watching the incessant arising of the grasping of self—its death and its birth and its death—the peace of non-grasping sounds pretty good. And it's wonderful. And it's not something foreign to any of us.

So that's the other side of bringing investigation—investigating what we're calling self in any moment—but also noticing the peace of non-grasping when we can recognize it.

Buddhadasa writes: "If at any moment any person has a mind empty of clinging to I and mine, even if only for one instant, that means the mind has realized emptiness." Even for one instant. True, it's not the emptiness of total liberation, nibbāna, where the sense of grasping will never arise again. But still, in that moment where there's no clinging or grasping of I and mine, the mind is pure, radiant, and at peace. And we, each of us, experience this over and over.

So the other aspect of our practice that I feel is so important is not to overlook these times—to learn to recognize them. Clearly, you can't recognize it with grasping, right? Because as soon as we're grasping, the mind of non-grasping is not accessible. So simply notice with awareness, recognize the mind of non-grasping.

We tend often to skip over it. It's as if—I notice in myself—the mind is more comfortable relating to things, relating to objects, relating to experience: liking it, disliking it, analyzing it. It's more oriented toward doing. Of course, "I" am more there then. But we can consciously begin to recognize these moments of emptiness—many times a day, nothing so exciting, no big bang—but just recognize and consciously meet with awareness these moments of non-grasping of self. So that we gradually learn to be comfortable, to trust this pure awareness, to actually be content with the peace of non-grasping.

I read somewhere a reference to "the sky yoga of non-grasping." I really like that image—the sky yoga of non-grasping. And I've found helpful, as a metaphor, a way to practice at times that helps me tune into this mind of non-attachment: the metaphor of space. I suppose that's why I liked the idea of the sky yoga of non-grasping.

Joseph talked about shifting our reference point to the mind of non-attachment, rather than being so focused on objects, on appearances. And I found that tuning into space or silence was a way that helped me loosen up the fixation on changing appearances.

So notice when a thought arises: the space around it, the space before it. When the thought ends, rather than immediately clutching back to the breath so that there's no space without things arising, just notice the space. Notice the emptiness, the silence, and let the breath arise by itself, or whatever else comes next. The space as an emotion dissipates—just notice the silence, the space. In between breaths, in between actions. We're always filling up our time. Sometimes I would consciously make space—between when I end a sitting and when I get up to walk—just a space. And just notice the space, the silence.

Not spacing out—I'm not talking about that. The space of awareness where there's a vibrancy, a wakefulness in the silence. And don't make much of it. This is just a metaphor to help tune into the mind of non-attachment.

And it's interesting. That's precisely why we've been using hearing as one of our anchors—because it can help tune us into this sense of spaciousness. We tend not to get so involved with sounds. We don't make another one happen. And we can notice the space in between, the silence.

When we can bring this sense of space to an experience, you see the difference. When we're really fixated on, say, a difficult emotion—when we're fixated on that—it's so much more difficult. There's so much more suffering than when we can just open up and have space around it. When the mind is restricted, that one thing takes up the whole field.

I remember one time, the house I'm living in, there didn't used to be a little house next to it, which there is now. And in that period—between when there wasn't another house and there began to be another house—my sense of space got completely encroached upon. I would sit at my kitchen window and look out at the woods, and that's where the house was being built, right in that view. It got to where there were only four little stakes in the woods marking where the house was going to be. And I would sit at my window and all I could see was those four stakes, nothing else. There was aversion and anger and all different feelings. I got really miserable sitting at my kitchen table, until finally I saw what was happening.

Which is interesting. As soon as I saw it, I said, "This has to stop. I can't live the rest of my life here doing this." And I just opened up the space. And it's interesting—it just stopped being a problem. The fixation makes it so much more real. The sense of space around something makes it much more workable.

We can all practice this here with things that arise. You can see some little thing drives you nuts, and when you can just expand around it, it still might be unpleasant, but there's not that fixation of self on it.

It isn't always easy to maintain this sense of spaciousness. The energy needs to be balanced—the concentration and mindfulness. When they drop, being spacious turns to spacing out. That's when we need the precision of technique—to come back and feel the breath, feel sensations, use the noting, use connecting with objects and appearances, notice beginnings and endings. It wakes us up, brings vibrancy again.

But another thing I've noticed in myself is that tuning into space sometimes gets uncomfortable. My mind gets a little restless. It wants something to focus on. I was again sitting in California, a different place, and when I noticed this I was sitting with my eyes open, a very broad vista—meadows, rolling hills—just sitting, spacious. I was consciously tuning into space, and there were four little horses. They were so tiny. They were so far away, such an insignificant part of the vista.

And I would notice, as I would open to spaciousness, I could just be vibrant in that for not very long, and then almost as if by reflex, the mind would get uncomfortable or restless, and it would zoom in on these tiny little horses and sort of fixate on them, as if looking for some kind of stability or security. I could sort of see the rest of the spaciousness, but not very well. And this happened over and over and over.

I found it really fascinating because I could correlate it to my experience in meditation—how just resting and trusting that spacious quality of awareness, the mind has a kind of knee-jerk reflex to want to fixate on things. It's hard to trust, to relax, to not need something happening, to not need to have the birth of an "I."

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, we're afraid of nothingness. And because we're afraid of it, the mind clings to a belief in a permanent self. And that's what's so strange. We're afraid of nothingness. But seeing through the sense of self isn't nothingness. It's not annihilation. It is the entryway to a peace and a happiness that all this grasping of self can never, ever give us. All that grasping gives us is confusion and suffering.

And this seeing through is not passive. It's not unfeeling. It's not uncaring or life-negating. It's the doorway to freedom and true compassion. As one Tibetan teacher said, once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything harmful. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously.

So in some ways I think this is our root practice. Just play with it. Explore the sense of self. Let the awareness, the mind, incline to space. Notice emptiness. Notice when it is empty of I-ing and my-ing. And just notice that. That's all.

There's nothing to lose except our suffering.

So let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 215

The Facts of Life

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the Buddha's fundamental teachings on dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) by examining the life of the Buddha himself after his awakening. Despite being the supremely awakened one, the Buddha experienced headaches, backaches, wars among his clansmen, quarreling within the Saṅgha, the murder of his disciple Mahāmoggallāna, and ultimately death. This reveals that liberation has nothing to do with having pleasant experiences and everything to do with our relationship to whatever arises.
> Wilson explores how we habitually react to vedanā (feeling tone)—the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral quality of each experience. She describes how, without mindfulness, we immediately grasp at pleasant feelings, resist unpleasant ones, and ignore neutral experiences entirely. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching of the two arrows, she explains how an unawakened person experiences both the physical pain of an unpleasant feeling and the mental suffering of resistance to it. The Buddha's simile of six animals—a snake, crocodile, bird, dog, hyena, and monkey—tied together and pulling in different directions vividly illustrates our unmindful condition, where whichever sense desire is strongest drags us along.
> The path to freedom, Wilson emphasizes, is through establishing sati (mindfulness)—meeting each moment with non-judging, curious, open-hearted attention. She shares the Buddha's teaching that 'liberation through non-clinging' is the supreme state of sublime peace. Through stories of her own hospitalization, a retreatant facing possible death after heart surgery, and the cellist Yo-Yo Ma's childlike wonder, she demonstrates how this quality of presence transforms our relationship with life's inevitable changes and difficulties.

It came up in some of the discussions today, and I think it's by no means an unusual discovery—being a little bemused, thinking that we're coming to this retreat, especially if it's your first retreat, to get away from the hustle and bustle and pain of our lives. And as you've discovered, guess what comes with us? That's not a mistake.

What I want to talk about tonight is really the way the Buddha described the facts of life and the potential for our freedom. I think a lot of our confusion and struggle comes from our ideas, perhaps unformed even in our own minds, of what we're actually expecting freedom or happiness, inner contentment, peace—whatever word you use—to feel like, to look like, to be like. Because if you're looking for a different reality from this one, a nice, happy, safe, secure place, you're not going to find it.

When we look at the Buddha's life after he was awakened—the supremely awakened one, free from anguish, free from confusion and suffering for the rest of his life, spending forty-five years teaching—stuff happened. He wasn't just drifting on a cloud for forty-five years. He was walking barefoot all around northern India, begging for food.

In terms of things that happened, he had physical problems. He had headaches. He had backaches. There are suttas where he says, "Ananda, you give the talk. I have to go lie down and rest my back." He didn't give him a day's warning either.

There were wars going on between his own clansmen, from his father's and his mother's clans, and they would be killing each other over water rights. How would you like it if all your in-laws were killing each other and you had to go and try to stop it? Everything wasn't groovy.

There was quarreling within the Sangha. Many suttas exist, and a lot of the monks' and nuns' rules come about from times when one of the monks or nuns would see another one doing something and run to the Buddha and tell on him, basically. "So-and-so is doing thus and so. It doesn't seem good." Often it was appropriate, but there's definitely this little element of envy and all of that.

His two main disciples, Mahamoggalana and Mahasariputta—the most awakened next to him, the wisest—Mahamoggalana, in his old age, was murdered. Both Sariputta and Moggallana died before the Buddha did. There's a lovely sutta where he's saying, "It's as if the sun and the moon had fallen out of the sky when they died." So he noticed that they were gone.

And his cousin Devadatta, who was very jealous of him, continually tried to sow seeds of discord in the Sangha and divide the Sangha, and actually tried to kill the Buddha. So seriously, the Buddha faced attempted murder. It's not as if everything pleasant was in his life. And in the end, he died. They all died. Everybody died. That's what happens.

So looking to the Buddha's life, the supremely awakened peaceful one, which he was, we have to see that inner contentment, true liberation of heart, must be about something else than having the perfect life, than having everything be the way we want it to be.

So what could that be? The way the Buddha introduces what it could be to us is by having us let our hearts and minds, our vision, open to be able to live face to face with things as they are, rather than as we might wish them to be or think they ought to be if we did things right.

When he lays out his Four Noble Truths, the basic facts of life, the first one, as most of you are very familiar with, is that there is unsatisfactoriness in this world, in our bodies, in our minds. There's birth, which is suffering, if you think about it. There's decay. Old age, sickness, death. There's separation from those we love and from things we like. There's having to be brought together with those we don't love and things we don't like. This is what happens.

It's not the only thing that happens. Luckily, there's beauty and joy and love and happiness within this realm of form.

But there is not a way of not having unpleasant experience arise. And if you stop and think about it—which obviously I have, a lot—you need to consider: okay, we all nod, sure, there's birth and death, we get sick, we have to be with things we don't like. But is that the way we really meet these experiences when they arise?

You don't have to think far. Just cast your mind back over today. That's as far as most of us need to go. If you're one of those for whom today was a good day, you can look at yesterday. We really don't have to go far to see that we're going to come face to face with difficult, painful, unliked experiences. And how did we relate to them?

I think the Buddha's not saying this in order to bring us down, in order to say life is miserable, suffer. It's really to wake us up to see: how do we relate to this? The fact that things are unreliable, that they're in constant change, that there is difficulty—we think we accept it, but do we?

The denial is so amazing. Just the denial of the fact of pain, of suffering, that things happen that we don't like. How much of the unpleasantness that has come up in your body or mind or in the surroundings today has your mind greeted as a mistake, or your fault because you're not mindful enough? If you were more mindful, this unpleasant thing wouldn't be happening.

I've got news for you. As we get more mindful, we actually begin to notice not only more joy, but also more of the unpleasant things that we've been in total denial about. Our denial mechanism is huge. Witness Michelle's story with her ice cake the other night. It's amazing.

I'll tell you another one. I really like this story because it's just so flat-out denial. Quite some years ago, maybe twelve years ago, I was in the hospital for some days and I was on an IV. I had some big infection. And you know how after a few days, the veins sort of collapse and it gets harder and harder to keep putting in the IV. So at one point, the nurse was trying repeatedly and failing. She was sweating. It hurts. It's not a pleasant experience—you wouldn't call it that. And I could tell she started, in a little way, to panic. It's hard to know you're hurting someone, especially when your intention—her intention—is to help.

She finally kind of gave up and ran out in the hall and grabbed the nearest doctor who was passing by. And I wasn't completely cogent, but I was cogent enough to know that now I was really in trouble. Because who practices and puts in the IVs? Have you ever had the doctor, the surgeon come in and put in your IV? Not too often. So I was like, okay, right, just be cool, be calm.

And the doctor had the same problem. I wasn't my most equanimous. I didn't say anything, but little tears trickled down. And he looked at me with such an expression and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

It's just so amazing. And I could understand how hard it is to let in—if you really let in that it was hurting me—the pain of knowing that with really kind intentions, you're hurting somebody. That's so hard. It's hard for us to be connected and open-hearted in the face of painful experience, physical or emotional. It is hard for us. And so a lot of the time, we don't even know that we're blocking it out.

And that's just flat-out obvious pain. I mean, that's the most obvious, and we can deny it. So not to get down on ourselves about it, but I really think that this first truth of the Buddha's that he enunciated—certainly how it works for me—is as an invitation into my own experience. Not a philosophical point of debate. I mean, we can debate that, but for me, the point is that it brings our awareness in to look and see.

When I first heard this years and years ago, when I first began to sort of understand—oh, like stuff happens, it's not my fault.

What it was, really, was a huge relief.

When I was first introduced to the Dharma at about nineteen, I had experienced up until that time what you might call the 1950s storybook picture of America—the middle-class suburban happy life. My family stayed together. My parents weren't abusive. You just didn't talk about things. Our friend's mother who committed suicide down the road, or the divorce up the street, or my friend whose father had left when she was a kid and she never met him, or the fact that my mother never even met her own father—things like that. You didn't talk about it. Everything was happy, happy.

I actually couldn't point to anything that was really bad. And I had imbibed the idea that you grow up, you do whatever you do, get a career or whatever, and you have this happily-ever-after life—like the Donna Reed show on television, or the way all the movies end, going off into this happy cloud where nothing bad ever happens again.

I don't know if this will resonate—I'm really showing my age here—but when I was very young, the sense was that everything's good, nothing's bad. We don't talk about unhappiness. And my mother took me to see this Walt Disney movie called Old Yeller. I don't know if you remember it. It traumatized me for years. It's this loving family with their golden lab, this wonderful, perfect dog. Everybody loves everybody. And in the end, the dog saves the little boy from getting attacked by a rabid squirrel. Then the father has to shoot the dog because he has rabies.

This is Walt Disney traumatizing me—because I thought everything ends happily all the time if people are nice. It just didn't fit with my worldview. So when I heard about this first noble truth—oh yes, this is part of the facts of life; there's unhappiness, there's death, things you love go away, sometimes you have to be with things you don't like, and everything is changing all the time—I felt this huge sense of relief. Oh, I'm not crazy. It's okay that I'm not happy every minute. And I don't have to keep pretending. For me, being an aversive-type personality, this was a genuine relief.

So that really, I think, is the beginning of freedom—just to see, to come face to face with the fact that things aren't always the way we want them. Then the question becomes how do we relate, rather than what's wrong with me? What's wrong with things? Am I crazy? We begin to stop our lifelong habit of running and hiding from pain or from the unpleasant, or hating ourselves when we do something—or when something happens—that we think we should have been able to avoid.

On one retreat, a man was telling me in an interview how he'd spent all day seeing aversion in his mind to experiences he was having, to feelings in his body, to thoughts—just aversion to a lot of things. And he was labeling, in a subtle way, everything he was aversive to as bad. This is bad, this is good. And suddenly he stopped and said, "Wow. So much of my experience has been bad today. So what I'm saying is that much of my life is bad." And then he said, "No, that just isn't true. It's just part of how it is. Sometimes unpleasant, sometimes pleasant." That realization took a huge burden of judgment and negativity off the way he was relating to his life. It's just part of life.

Someone told me—this may be apocryphal, I don't know if it's true, but she said it was—that Robin Williams, the comedian, has already had his tombstone engraved, and on it says: "I knew this was going to happen." He's a step ahead of us. When we know it, we can stop being afraid. We can start to actually live each moment as it presents itself, instead of holding on, planning for the next moment.

So there's this being together with what we don't like, and also the quality of unreliability, the changing nature, the fact of impermanence, which is also included in this first truth. Again, we all know everything changes. But if we really knew that, how would we live? I think we would live very differently.

Someone said during a retreat we were doing together, focused on this subject of impermanence for a week—when I asked her, "How would you live if you really understood and accepted impermanence?"—she said, "You know, I would stop being afraid." Because when we know it's going to change, we don't fear it. We can relax into here and now. Sure, there's a poignancy to change. That's okay. But we don't have to grip so blindly.

I think one of the reasons for the denial of change on a deep level is this poignancy, this sadness that maybe it's not quite okay to feel. But it's fine. Let the poignancy in.

This is my favorite part of a poem I love, because it touches for me that place of love and knowing things change and the poignancy of clinging. It's by Galway Kinnell. I'm just going to read part of it. The name is "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight."

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up, and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us. I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars, even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I've stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
Little Maud, and yet perhaps this is the reason you cry, this the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

We are forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. It's poignant. It doesn't have to be awful. When we can relax into that moment just as it is, without needing to cling or change or look back at the last moment—there can be peace in that.

But I think, at least I certainly notice in myself, one response to this constant change, this unreliability, these shifting sands, is to look quietly but frantically, moment after moment, for some steady, unchanging place to abide. Whether it's a physical experience or an emotional experience—how much do we try to manage and control our lives so we get everything just so? Ah, finally. In a small way, it's like when you finally get the house all clean. How long does it last? This used to drive me crazy. It lasts two seconds, and then it starts getting dirty again. That's a little way, but I think we're doing that all the time—always looking for some place to abide, to rest and say, "here." And it's that very looking for an abiding place that keeps us suffering, off balance, and fearful.

The Buddha said once, "He abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." This might not be what we had in mind, because our minds only know what they already know. You know Krishnamurti's famous book, Freedom from the Known. We can only imagine what we already know in some way. So to rest in peace—"he abides in peace who does not abide anywhere"—it really is the peace of letting go of that frantic searching.

But we won't and we can't let go. We can't even have a concept of it until our heart begins to understand through experience how much the searching itself is creating the suffering, the anguish, that feeling of being off balance. Because it's not the fact that things change. It's our resistance to that fact that's actually so poignant and scary and awkward.

Nyoshul Khenpo, a wonderful Tibetan teacher, said once, "Remember, whether or not you go with the flow, the flow always goes with you." We can't actually step outside of that. But we can start to just look and see: oh yes, that's what's happening. We can feel the poignancy. We don't have to fear it. As someone said, "Let's face it, I don't fear it when unpleasant experience is going away. It's only the pleasant ones that I'm holding on to." There's something important to notice about that.

So you might be thinking, who wants to look this closely? Maybe denial is ignorance, but it was working okay in a lot of situations. Often, on our journey, on our spiritual path, we hit moments where we say, "Oh God, I wish I could go back to not seeing quite so clearly." I meant it when I said—even though you laughed and I said it in a joking way—as mindfulness strengthens, as our ability to be present for whatever arises strengthens, we will be so much more at ease and happy. But we will also be much more aware of the unpleasant and the changing nature of things. That actually brings us to freedom, believe it or not. Knowing things the way they are is what releases our heart and mind from this fruitless clinging, this fruitless searching for steady state in a world that is totally unsteady state. But the way out is in, and we go in kicking and screaming most of the time.

So looking at this first truth, it's a wake-up call—really a wake-up call—not just something to be demoralized about. As Ajahn Chah said, "There's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering." The difference is in the way we relate to the difficult, the painful, the poignant experience.

And that brings us to the second truth, the second fact that the Buddha describes: What is it that's the cause of the suffering, the anguish? Not the fact that there's unpleasantness, but how our hearts and minds relate to experience—this is the place of bondage or freedom. This is the place where understanding can really begin to flower. So how is the Buddha different from us?

If he went through experiences after his awakening, and if you believe that he was a human being, then his awakening holds the same potential for us to awaken. He wasn't some kind of divine being with different factors making up his mind and body.

So how, in his awakening, in going through these difficult experiences—what would be a way of describing how he was different from us? Or different from me? I don't want to project onto all of you.

One simple way I want to talk about it is in how he related through his understanding—that it's the clinging, the aversions, the longing for things to be different, the denial, all these reactions to the bare facts of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience. And then there's our total entrancement with our reactions. Look at it. We're totally entranced with how much we don't like something, or how much we like something, how involved we get. We go from an unpleasant sound to the history of our life in two seconds. Completely involved. So entranced that we don't even know it's happening.

It's our reactions, our identification with them, and our being totally entranced and off and running with them that hides the way things are from us and obscures the potential for really living in contentment, in peace, with things as they are—for rediscovering, resting in, and trusting the radiant mind, our basic goodness, as Chögyam Trungpa calls it.

This is not a state that you can get and hold onto and rest in. There is no steady state of heart and mind. But it's an attitude that arises and can arise no matter what state is coming in our body or in our mind.

The peace, the freedom, the happiness of the Buddha has nothing to do with what's arising in your experience right now. Freedom has nothing to do with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. It really doesn't matter. And it's the hardest thing for us to really believe. When you come in and you've had one of these crummy sittings, and all this stuff is coming up, and yesterday it was so clear—and we say, "Oh, yeah, fine. Yesterday was clear. Now it's really painful. Those are both good. Just pay attention." And you think, "Yeah, right." We don't really believe that very well. But the fact is, it's true. Freedom has nothing to do with the particular experience that's happening. It has everything to do with the relationship to it.

Someone came in—I think it was this retreat—and she was really getting at how the experiencing of pleasant feeling is not the same as happiness. Pleasure is pleasure. Sure, it's nice. If we had a choice, we'd probably take pleasure over displeasure. We can tell the difference. The Buddha could tell the difference too, I think. This practice is not heading toward some dull neutrality. But it's not getting into all those reactions. And that allows us to turn away from our entrancement with our reactions and ourselves and our stories, and actually come to live in this moment with total intimacy, wakefulness, loving, awake presence that can allow us again and again and again to glimpse, with more or less depth, the true radiant nature of our mind, our heart—big mind-heart, not this little heart—the radiant nature of what we truly are.

In the process of this shift from our habitual reactive mind to opening into whatever is happening this moment with totality of presence and intimacy, yes, we are more aware of the unpleasant, and more aware of the beautiful, the joyful. As someone was saying today, so beautifully, in the midst of a very difficult day, one little experience that we normally would completely overlook—in the middle of all the difficulty, she said, "You know, this doesn't seem like much of an experience," but it was giving her so much joy.

Someone was talking about the flowers. Franz and I planted a couple of peony bushes last year, little new ones. Two days ago, Monday, one of them bloomed for the first time. Now, for some reason, that day hadn't been a particularly joyful day. I forget—it was really hot. I forget what was going on. But I wasn't dancing in joy through the day. And just seeing that flower open over the course of a couple of hours brought so much happiness and joy.

When we're more present, it doesn't take winning the lottery to feel joy. We can be really present for suffering, and something just lovely happens, and we're really present for that. There's this immediacy, this vitality of presence that makes all of life so much richer in the little things. In the little things.

When we're not afraid of impermanence, we're really here.

The fire in leaf and grass, so green it seems each summer the last summer. The wind blowing, the leaves shivering in the sun, each day the last day. A red salamander, so cold and so easy to catch, dreamily moves his delicate feet and long tail. I hold my hand open for him to go, each minute the last minute.

You get a feeling of the presence in that poem. She's not saying, "Oh my God, each minute the last minute!" in a panicked way. It's more like: if this is the last minute, let me really be here for it.

I have a story about a friend of mine, a man who's been coming to retreats on the West Coast for some years. He told us this story a couple of years ago. He must be in his mid to late sixties, very hardworking. He said he'd had open heart surgery—he had to have a valve replaced.

He's one of these people, which I'm sure many of you can relate to, who felt that his practice was never going anywhere. No incredible bliss experiences, no wonderful jhanic concentrations, just kind of slogging through the days and the nights, year after year of meditation, trying to be mindful and getting nowhere. You can relate, yes?

So he woke up in intensive care after the operation, which apparently had gone fine. Family was there telling him so. And then something went wrong. He was hooked up to machines from every orifice, and all of a sudden they all started blinking and sirens going—which must be quite scary. Nurses running. He didn't know what was wrong, but something serious was happening.

He said he noticed his mind just start to go into total panic. "Oh my God, I'm going to die. This is really it." Which it very well could have been. And he saw his mind going into panic, his breathing got tight, and he said—he doesn't know where it came from—but the thought arose: "Well, if this is going to be my last breath, I might as well be present for it."

And he just came totally into that breath. The panic went away. He said he must have gone unconscious after that, and then he woke up and things were fine.

But you never know. We can't evaluate what's going on in our practice. That's the quality of real presence. And "each moment, the last moment" isn't a scary thing. It's an invitation into being alive in this moment, because this moment is really all we have. We can plan a lot about all the next moments, but who knows what's going to happen?

We really don't know. We really don't know what's going to happen in this next moment. Like that other night when the low water alarm went off in the middle of the sitting—no one knew that a moment before. We never know.

This moving out of our reactivity into open-hearted presence does not hide life situations. It allows us to live them more fully.

How do we get so sidetracked? Why is it that we get so into this clinging, which is so poignant?

One way—we've touched on it, and Stephen talked about it, and Susan did—I just want to go into it more deeply. It's only a habitual pattern, but it's so deep we mostly don't notice it. And that's the habit of how our heart-mind relates when confronted with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience.

The way the Buddha described our experience is that there are the six senses: the five—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—and the mind. So we can have any of those six sense experiences: thoughts and emotions, or any of the five senses. And that's really all that's happening. Keep looking in your experience. As Jack Kornfield likes to say, just these six things are happening over and over. And if one of you experiences something else, please let us know.

First of all, just by beginning to reduce it to that, it takes a lot of the hoo-ha out, doesn't it? Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, thinking, emotion, thinking, emotion, seeing, hearing, smelling, touching. Oh, what's the big deal?

And then each of those—arising one after the other really quickly—we experience as being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. A sound, for example. Same with touch, emotions, thoughts.

And we don't all experience things the same way, given our past conditioning and our karma. Take the sound of a crow—someone might hear it and find it pleasant, while for me it's unpleasant, and for somebody else, completely neutral. That could even be different for the same person at different times.

Now this is a relatively subtle thing, this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality, and it happens very fast. The habit of our mind—and in the dependent origination, the place where we can explore how suffering arises, how confusion arises—is that there's the sense contact, the hearing, it's pleasant, and without awareness, immediately there's that movement: "Oh yeah, I like that, that's good," or "I want more," or "Let's keep it going." If it's unpleasant: "Oh, bad. Get away. Not good. How can we fix this?"

And if it's neutral? Well, have you noticed many neutral experiences? That's what happens with neutral—nothing registers. We get bored. Nothing seems to be happening. So let's think about a really unpleasant fantasy, because that's better than being neutral. God forbid we should just be here with neutral experience. It's actually quite interesting to see how often our mind does that—choosing to suffer rather than simply being calm and neutral.

It happens so quickly that often we don't even know there's a difference between unpleasant and aversion. But those are two different experiences. There's a difference between pleasant and clinging, between neutral and spacing out. The second is a reaction to just the bare fact of the experience. But it's so deeply habitual in most of our minds that without mindfulness, we not only often don't recognize it, but we can easily evaluate our whole experience, the entire tenor of our life, on the basis of how pleasant or unpleasant or neutral it is. And this is where we really get off into being entranced.

For example, when you're evaluating your meditation, so often the good ones are the pleasant ones, the bad ones are the unpleasant ones. When you're having pleasant meditation, not too many people come in and say, "I'm useless, I'm worthless, I can't do this." But when it's unpleasant, it jumps from unpleasant experience to "I'm the worst yogi, I can't do this, I'm filled with doubt, this is stupid"—and self-hatred, really painful stuff, arising in just a moment from an unpleasant experience. Neutral, we don't even notice.

We get so entranced that we can actually base our whole life on wanting pleasant and avoiding unpleasant, without seeing what we're doing. Ajahn Buddhadasa, the wonderful Thai teacher, talks a lot about pleasant feelings. He says it's so fast—it just comes and goes so quickly. And he says almost everything you do in your life, the choices you make without awareness, we do for the sake of pleasant sensation. And how long does it really last? It's a little scary when we look at how long it really lasts.

There's a story I love from the suttas, really about Ananda, the Buddha's attendant. Ananda is a very personable character—he's the one who's very compassionate, always saying things, and the Buddha is kind of going, "Not so, Ananda. It's really like this." You can really empathize with him. He was very kind.

In this story, Ananda was off on a mission for the Buddha, and he passed a village well. He was very thirsty, and at the well was Pakati, a young outcast woman. He asked her for water to drink—one of the few things a monk was allowed to ask for. In India at that time, the caste system was very strong. An outcast couldn't even touch something and hand it to someone of higher caste.

So Pakati said, "Oh monk, I am too humbly born to give you water to drink. Do not ask any service of me lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of low caste." She had so thoroughly bought into this system.

And Ananda replied, "I ask not for your caste, but for water."

The woman's heart leapt joyfully and she gave Ananda water. He thanked her and went away, but she followed him at a distance. She found out he was the Buddha's attendant, and she went to the Buddha and said, "Oh Lord, help me. Let me live in the place where your disciple Ananda dwells so that I may see him and minister unto him, because I love Ananda."

The Buddha understood her emotions and her heart, and he said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you don't understand your own emotions. It's not Ananda that you love, but his kindness."

Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice toward you and practice it towards others.

Sweet, isn't it? But mistaking that pleasant feeling she associated with Ananda, she was ready to follow him and take care of him for her whole life for the sake of that pleasant feeling, without being able to understand exactly what was going on. We do that from time to time, and sometimes in far more confusing and destructive ways than that.

Or with the unpleasant. Again, sometimes in the whole field of experience, the mind can get so fixated on what is unpleasant, so lost in aversion to it, that we build up an entire world based on reactivity rather than clear seeing.

Have you ever had a time when part of your tooth breaks off inside? This happened to me last year while I was traveling, and I had to go for a few weeks with it just broken. You notice how the tongue cannot stay away from that place. You're sitting perfectly happy, and the tongue just has to go over there, feel how rough it is, feel how unpleasant it is, get upset. What am I going to do? My teeth are falling apart. I'm getting old. A million times a day.

Now, all the rest of my teeth didn't hurt. That's neutral. Did I notice that? No. We have one thing that's wrong and a million things that are neutral, and we don't notice those at all when we get completely fixated on the negativity. Frustration, self-doubt, judgment. And the neutral, we just don't notice.

So often, actually, the entrée into calm—a kind of radiant, connected peace—begins by seeming neutral. And we so much don't know what to do with that, that we bounce away, fall asleep, or create a diversion.

This is from the Buddha, really describing what we do with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. Someone asks him, what's the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened person—an untaught worldling, as the Buddha puts it. And he's very straightforward. He says, okay, here's the difference. An unawakened person, when touched by a painful feeling, worries and grieves, laments, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught. He thus experiences two kinds of unpleasant feelings: a physical unpleasant feeling and a mental unpleasant feeling. It's as if, being shot with an arrow, he shoots himself with a second arrow.

Sound familiar? That's what an untaught, unawakened person does. You experience pain from two arrows whenever you have an unpleasant feeling.

Now, it actually goes deeper than that, into how this becomes an ingrained habit. The Buddha says that when touched by painful feeling, we develop an underlying tendency to resist—push it away, don't feel it, resist. Many people have talked about just seeming to come up against a wall of resistance, subtle or not so subtle, in their practice. And they're right. We've cultivated an underlying tendency to resistance toward the unpleasant for most of our lives. We've got to begin to see it. That's why it's coming up. It's wonderful that it's coming up.

So what do we do? Unpleasant—no, this is bad. We shoot ourselves with another arrow again. And the Buddha goes on to say that unawakened people do not know of any other escape from painful feelings than to pursue a pleasant sense experience. Isn't that right? And so they also cultivate the underlying tendency to crave the pleasant.

We've developed these two habits: this ongoing resistance to the unpleasant, and as soon as there's something unpleasant, leaping after something pleasant, lusting, wanting the pleasant, because that's the only way we know to bring ourselves happiness. The only trouble is it doesn't work for longer than the duration of the pleasant feeling itself.

The difference with an awakened person? When an awakened person experiences an unpleasant feeling, that's it. They don't create anything around it, to paraphrase Ajahn Sumedho. They don't get into resistance, and they don't go lusting after something pleasant to hide from it. Same with the pleasant. Experience a pleasant feeling—that's it. Experience a pleasant feeling. The mind is calm, creating nothing around it. It's not that you don't know the difference. You simply don't get into these reactions, being so entranced by them, caught in this ongoing tendency to move away from the present moment.

And that's what's so poignant. Our underlying tendency to resist the unpleasant and move toward the pleasant, totally ignoring the neutral—we're doing it without knowing we're doing it. But we do it in the service of our own real happiness and peace. None of us would continue if we really, truly knew it was keeping us confused and suffering. But we don't know. And I'm saying all this, yet I find myself doing it in subtle ways all the time. It's so ingrained when we're not paying attention, this moving toward what's pleasant.

The poignancy of it is that it's just this clinging and craving, just this pushing away, this checking out, that hides from us our true potential. It's just this looking in the other direction that obscures us from recognizing that freedom is right here. In fact, it's so right here that we're not usually right here enough to recognize it. We're always just a little bit leaning away.

The Buddha said, "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata"—meaning himself—"namely, liberation through non-clinging."

Now, that doesn't sound so exciting, does it? Liberation through non-clinging? I want bells and whistles. I want some fireworks going off. Liberation through non-clinging? But that's the way into recognizing our potential for awakening. Non-clinging allows totality, the intimacy of total presence.

Otherwise, the way we live our life is described by the Buddha as someone who does not have mindfulness established—because mindfulness is our way in to see what's really happening. In a moment of mindfulness, pure non-judging presence, there's no clinging, there's no aversion, there's no delusion, because it's connected. Just a quick moment. Sayadaw U Pandita used to call it "a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom." Not total absolute liberation where confusion never arises, but it's a moment of clarity. And that moment is what allows any experience to become a gateway into really recognizing our true potential.

Without that, a person without mindfulness established lives their life according to this simile the Buddha offers. As if a person catches six creatures from different parts of life—six, the six senses, everything always matches: eye, ear, nose, touch, taste, and mind. So, as if you took a snake, a crocodile, a bird, a dog, a hyena, and a monkey, and you tied a rope around each of them, and then you tied a knot with all those ropes together. These six animals are all tied together with a rope in the middle. And then what do they do? They all start struggling to go where they want to go. The crocodile wants to go to the water. The bird tries to fly up. The dog tries to go to the village. The snake tries to go into the garden. And they're all pulling every which way. And the strongest one pulls all the rest along after. So probably the crocodile takes them all down to the water.

You get the simile? The Buddha spells it out. He says that is just like a person whose mindfulness is undeveloped and unpracticed. Each of those animals is like one of the six senses—the eye, the ear, the nose, the mind, the body, the tongue—and they're all struggling to go after pleasant experience and all struggling to run away from unpleasant experience. Whichever one's the strongest wins, moment after moment after moment. The eyes are often really strong. That's why when you're out doing walking meditation and a chipmunk runs across your path—seeing, pleasant, boom—everything else is gone. It's like the crocodile running to the water.

That's a rather exhausting way to live, I would say.

But for one who has cultivated mindfulness and presence, when seeing a form with the eye, the mind is not attached to pleasing forms and is not repelled by unpleasing forms.

And the same with all the other senses. It knows pleasant from unpleasant, but it's just not attached to the pleasant, not repelled by the unpleasant. And so she is one who has established mindfulness of the body and dwells with an unlimited mind and heart. Unlimited mind and heart.

Mindfulness is really our tool. It's like a rattle, one of my teachers says. We're like two-year-olds just going after what we want—I want this, I want that, take me over here, I want to do this. And he says, I just shake the rattle and say, turn around, look back here. It's right here. Come home.

That's all we're doing with our mindfulness. What's happening? Knee pain? Fine. Come home. What's happening? Sadness? Great. Come home. What's happening? Bliss? Fine. Come home.

Mindfulness doesn't say this is good, this is bad. It doesn't say I think this is more important to pay attention to than that, or I've seen this before therefore I don't need to pay attention to it again. Just noticing what's arising with a quality, as we talked about, of non-judging, total, kind attention. Coming back to the bare experience, not the reaction and the story and the hoo-ha we create around it. Not all the story about why that sound is so unpleasant, but coming back to the sound itself.

Ajahn Chah says the sound doesn't disturb us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound. Just stay with the pure hearing. And bring to it this quality of no preconceptions, a kind of wonder, such curiosity, such willingness to discover something new instead of thinking we already know. Not "I already know what the breath is like, but I'll go to it," or "I've experienced these cramps before, I know all about them." This newness, open to discovery each moment.

I'll leave you with an image that really helps me get the feeling of this quality of open-hearted attention. In Germany, I saw a documentary about Yo-Yo Ma, the famous cellist. He has such a lovely attitude of openness. In this documentary, he was flying to Africa with his really fancy cello—I don't know how much that would cost—going to visit a tribe of Bushmen, to share music with them.

So here he is with these Bush people, and they bring out the old man who's kind of like the village shaman musician. The old man brings out his instrument, and Yo-Yo Ma brings out his incredible cello, and they start trading music. Now this man's instrument was literally a round kind of oil can with a stick coming out of it and one line or string. And he's playing along, and Yo-Yo Ma is saying, "Wow, this is so incredible! It's so beautiful, the sounds he gets, the music he gets out of this." And he was totally sincere.

Then he says, "Let's trade instruments." So he gives this old musician his million-dollar cello, and Yo-Yo Ma tries to play on the old man's instrument. He's saying, "I can't play this nearly as beautifully as he can."

He had such a childlike, open-hearted sense of discovery and wonder and appreciation and newness. We could have been sitting there thinking, "Oh yeah, an oil can with a string coming out of it." But he's saying, "Wow, what an instrument! What sounds he can get out of it! What beautiful music!"

It's really a different way to live with the same facts, with the same circumstances. It's just a difference in how we relate to them. That's really what we're practicing here. And it's okay that we blow it many times, because every moment we have another opportunity to meet what's happening with the simplicity of open-hearted attention and wonder.

CHAPTER 216

Five Spiritual Faculties: Mind

Carol Wilson · 48 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the five spiritual faculties (pañcindriya) that serve as controlling factors on the path of awakening: confidence (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Drawing from Abhidhamma psychology, she explains how these wholesome mental factors gradually replace the unwholesome qualities that characterize the unawakened mind—dullness, doubt, restlessness, and confusion.

Wilson carefully distinguishes the type of faith needed in Buddhist practice from blind belief, emphasizing that confidence must be grounded in direct experience. She offers practical guidance on balanced effort, sharing her own transformative experience in Burma where her teacher taught her that spiritual practice isn't about enduring long painful sittings, but about maintaining balance—like a tightrope walker. The talk explores how mindfulness develops through connecting and sustaining attention on the four foundations (satipaṭṭhāna): body, feeling tone, consciousness, and mental states.

The teaching culminates in showing how concentrated attention reveals the deeper characteristics of experience, particularly impermanence (anicca). Wilson emphasizes that intellectual understanding of change isn't sufficient for liberation—only direct experience of phenomena's constantly shifting nature allows genuine letting go. This talk offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners a clear framework for understanding how these five faculties work together cyclically, each supporting the development of the next on the journey toward freedom.

There are many ways to understand the path of awakening. There are many metaphors used to bring us to a realization of what it is that we're doing in spiritual practice. And so too in the Buddha's teachings there are many ways of understanding just what it is that we're doing here.

But in all of these metaphors, in all these ways of understanding, there is the reality behind it. What is actually happening over the course of one's walking a spiritual path is the gradual realization of our condition at this moment in time and an understanding that the mind can develop, the mind can be enhanced, the mind can be enlightened—to bring lightness into the mind.

The Abhidhamma, or Buddhist psychology, has an understanding that the unawakened mind has within it, or is composed of, a number of factors of mind—mental factors that go into and make up each moment of our experience. Many of them in the unawakened mind tend towards dullness and sleepiness and restlessness, confusion, inability to be present, doubt, disappointment, frustration, despair, hopelessness, low self-esteem—a very unbright, unawakened mind.

The way Buddhist psychology understands the path of practice is that we gradually replace those factors of mind with their opposites, or with factors of mind that oppose them, so that sleepiness or dullness of mind is opposed by energy and clarity of mind. Doubt or confusion is opposed or overcome by faith or confidence. The path of practice is seen as one of developing these positive and enhancing qualities of mind.

There are many different mental factors, many different attributes or qualities to the mind. We know them; we meet them every day. Sitting here today, we come into closer contact with them.

As I've mentioned, there are the famous five hindrances, or obstructions to a clear mind. Sleepiness or dullness. Doubt and wavering in our ability to proceed with confidence. Restlessness, an agitated state of mind that cannot come into and stay with the present experience, obstructing the mind from clearly being and seeing what's happening now. Strong aversion, dislike, or wanting to get away from experience, particularly unpleasant experience, whether mental or physical. If we react to it strongly with aversion, we no longer see that experience clearly. Our mind is obstructed, unbright, unclear.

And the same with desire. When a pleasurable experience is noticed—maybe it was the tofu pops at dinner time, maybe you really like tofu pops—as soon as you get attached and really want that, you stop seeing clearly the nature of what it is that's happening. Desire can blind us to the nature of reality.

So we gradually and persistently, with great energy, come to notice the qualities of our mind that are darkening and hindering and obstructing clarity of vision, and we gradually replace them, moment after moment. It's a very meticulous process and requires considerable persistence to, in each moment, see what's present and replace the dark qualities with light qualities.

In all of this vast exchange of energies and mental states and factors of mind, there are five which are, or gradually become, the controlling factors of mind—the factors that control the others and guide us along our spiritual journey. They're called the five spiritual faculties of mind.

Tonight I want to speak briefly about them and to talk about them in such a way that you begin to recognize them in your own practice—when they're present and when they're not present. So that if you notice you do not have these qualities in your mind, you can arouse them to enhance your clarity and understanding.

These five factors of mind have a relationship with each other where one is the cause for the arising of the second, the second is the cause for the arising of the third, the third is the cause for the arising of the fourth, and so on. They develop in our practice in a cyclical and gradual way, each feeding the other.

The first of these factors of mind is confidence. Confidence is the basis for and the arousing of energy or effort, the second spiritual faculty. Energy or effort is the causal condition for the arising of mindfulness. Mindfulness, the ability to observe and to see clearly, is the cause for the arising of concentration, or single-pointedness of mind. And when the mind is single-pointed and focused, we see into our experience more deeply, thereby gaining more knowledge or wisdom, the fifth of the spiritual faculties. Confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom.

So I'll speak about each one a little bit.

Confidence is the faith element in our practice. We who've been raised in a Christian or Judeo-Christian culture have a particular understanding of faith that sometimes does not accurately reflect the confidence needed in this type of practice. We're not talking about the blind faith of "believe in me and I'll give you what you need." It's not that type of faith that we need. What we need is confidence in ourselves, confidence in our teacher, confidence in the actual practice that we're doing.

That confidence needs to be based on our experience—not based on willy-nilly pie in the sky, but on what we have directly experienced in our own life.

We can't have great confidence at the beginning of our practice in something we haven't yet experienced. We start with just a little inkling: well, maybe this is so. Maybe I have some sense that this might be a useful practice, or this teacher might be someone who seems to know what he or she is talking about. And I feel myself that I have some confidence I can do the practice. We don't know yet, because we haven't practiced to such a degree that we feel fulfilled. But with a little bit of confidence, we can begin to practice.

When we have that little bit of confidence, it begins to settle the mind down. We live in America, where spiritual practices are as numerous as different kinds of cars. You can go shopping for a different spiritual practice each week if you like. And it's hard to know—the mind gets quite agitated when it's in shopping mode, not having really any idea which practice is going to do it for us. Maybe a little bit of Dzogchen, maybe a little bit of Vipassana, maybe even a little shamanistic studies, a little workshop here and a weekend there. The mind gets very agitated, very confused.

But when we have investigated and looked closely into what each practice technique is talking about, and we come to some understanding of it, if we can have confidence in one of them, the mind begins to settle down. Confidence or faith has that characteristic of settling the mind from some of its agitations. When we have this little bit of confidence, the mind begins to get clear just from the settledness. Clarity of mind is a direct result—initial clarity of mind is a direct result of some confidence.

Another function of confidence is that when we have confidence in our practice, in a technique, or in a teacher, it can serve as the foundation for continued interest in that practice, in that teacher, in our own development. Without that confidence, we cannot sustain our interest. We're here today, gone tomorrow, without confidence that this practice, this teacher, this path—or I myself—can make that effort.

And so this confidence is really an essential initial ingredient to walking the spiritual path. It's not something that once you've got, you've got forever. The initial confidence and understanding—or understanding that leads to confidence—overcomes some degree of doubt, some degree of confusion or hesitation in the mind. But there come times of difficulty in practice when that doubt will come up again. We'll doubt that we have the ability to sit here with such a confused mind. Or we'll doubt that the teacher really knows what they're talking about, having given an answer like that to a question. Or we'll doubt that this technique or this practice can actually get a handle on the amount of confusion and darkness in our own mind. And when that doubt comes, our confidence is gone.

So it's important to understand that in the course of our spiritual practice, there are going to be times of great confidence and determination and faith in ourselves, our teacher, and our practice. And there are going to be other times when it's very doubtful that the teacher knows anything and that I can do it. When we understand that, then we don't get so strung out and so moved and affected emotionally by the presence or absence of confidence.

Some years ago I was in Burma, and after I'd been there for about three years, one Burmese monk—an elder monk who had been to America for three months teaching—came to the monastery where I was staying in Rangoon. He heard that I was there, that there was an American monk staying in the monastery, so he sent someone and asked if I would come see him. I went to see him. He didn't speak very much English, I didn't speak very much Burmese, and we had a very poor translator, but we could communicate a little bit.

He said, "Well, how long have you been here?" I said, "Oh, I've been here about three years." He was quite surprised, because at that time in Burma, the longest visa you could get was for about three months. But I kept getting extensions, and through some good luck I was able to stay a little longer.

He said, "Oh, three years. To stay here three years, you must have a lot of confidence or a lot of faith."

I said, "Well, sometimes I feel like I have a lot of confidence and faith and I want to practice. And other times I feel like I don't have any."

And he said, "Ah, this is even better." He said, "Because when your faith or your confidence is down, not present, and you don't have any confidence in yourself, and you don't have any confidence in your teacher, and you don't have any confidence in your practice—and yet you stay in there and keep practicing—then this really strengthens your confidence."

And so it's good to go through those swings of confidence and no confidence.

It really strengthens your mind, and it develops your spiritual capabilities and your spiritual path.

But faith alone—confidence—is not enough. It's not sufficient just to be confident, just to have faith in your teacher or yourself or the teaching. You actually need to do something with that confidence. And with that confidence one can begin to make effort, to endeavor to do the practice.

Whatever practice it is—and in this case we're talking about insight—but whatever you intend to do in life, whether it's a spiritual practice or not, once you have confidence that you want to do something or that you can, then you have to make effort. Even if it's buying a house or a car, it doesn't happen just by wanting or having confidence that you can do it. You actually have to do something. The same is true with spiritual practice. We need to arouse some determination and energy in the mind.

And how do we do that? One thing that seems to be necessary, seems to be essential for most of us, is some sense of urgency. Spiritual practice is difficult—let's acknowledge that right at the beginning. We wouldn't do it unless we felt we needed to. And it's that sense of "I need to do this, I need to learn how to practice, I need to learn how to meditate, I need to get a handle on my anxiety, my frustration, my fear, my anger, my whatever it is"—that sense of urgency, that sense of "now is the time to do what's got to be done," is what arouses and propels us. It generates the energy based on our confidence.

You might ask yourself, why is it that some people never get to spiritual practice? No urgency in their life. No necessity for it. And so it doesn't happen. But for all of us here, there has been some sense—it may be weak, it may be strong, it may be very obvious, it may not be so obvious—there is some urgency to be here. Something has brought us here this weekend. And when you look within yourself, you may discover what it is. Why is it so urgent to sit here in utter agony for so many hours today? It's not because it's fun. You need it. Some part of you needs to wake up. And some part of you recognizes that. And you're here.

Energy, effort, making the endeavor—this is a really tricky subject to talk about in meditation practice, because we in America are great strivers. We decide what we want and then we go get it. Whether it's a degree, a car, material goods, knowledge of some sort, or whatever it is, we are great strivers. We have really learned how to harness our willpower to get results.

Unfortunately, it doesn't work in spiritual practice.

The effort, the energy that's actually needed is not one of striving for some result, but rather the effort or energy to be present. To just be here right now. Not to be here tomorrow or later or next week or a year from now, but right now. Only right now. It doesn't take much energy to be here right now. And that's all the energy you need. That's all the effort you need—to be here.

But we misunderstand the whole path of practice and think that somewhere stretched out between here and some point in the future is our spiritual path, and that we've got to arouse tremendous energy and effort to walk that path from here to there. It's not necessary. The spiritual practice and the spiritual path is only here, now. We only need the energy to be here, moment after moment.

So the real key to the energy or effort necessary for spiritual practice is not how much or what quantity, but rather what balance of mind is necessary to just be here. If you're feeling sleepy, it takes a little bit of energy to overcome sleepiness. If you're feeling restless, that's a little too much energy and you need to back off. So it's the balance of energy that we're really playing with, the balance of our effort.

It's the direction, it's where we apply our effort and our energy that really matters in spiritual practice.

When I was in Burma, again, at this particular monastery, they start you out on a very rigorous schedule of about twenty hours of practice a day and four hours of sleep. That's just the nature of practice there. The first few weeks they ask you, "How many hours did you sleep last night?" And if it's more than four, you're dismissed pretty quickly.

I somehow got it into my head that good spiritual practice was being able to sit on my cushion for long periods of time, through utter agony—two hours, three hours, four hours, five hours, whatever. So I started developing my ability to sit with great pain, thinking that that was the energy, that was the effort, that was the type of effort needed to wake up.

After a couple of weeks I was into good pain and long sittings, and I was reporting it to my teacher every day. I'd go and say, "Oh, I'm sitting and I had this great pain, and I watched this pain for so many hours." He let me report like this for some number of weeks. Then one day he said, "Do you know why you have so much pain?"

I said, "No, I don't."

He said, "You sit too long. It's not how long you can sit still. It's the balance of mind in sitting." He told me I needed to learn how to balance that degree of concentration and energy. "You need to walk more. You want to sit a long time? You've got to walk a long time. Balance, balance, balance."

So that's the type of effort, that's the type of energy you need in practice—a balanced effort. One of the teachers I teach with uses the story of a tightrope walker. How much energy does a tightrope walker need walking across the tightrope? Well, quite a lot, but in a very balanced way. It's not so much about the quantity of energy, but the delicacy of the balance.

With confidence in ourselves, in our teacher, in our practice technique, we become willing, with a sense of urgency, to make some effort, some attempt at waking up, at being present with this moment's experience. And what happens when we do that? As we develop the energy, as we get a sense of urgency and develop some mental power to be present, we begin to notice: what's happening?

In the sitting, we focus our attention on the breath. In the walking, we turn our attention to the movement of the legs, and we begin to see what's actually happening. We begin to focus, to connect, to try to connect our attention to the breath—the in-breath, the rising and falling of the abdomen, the in-breath and out-breath at the nostrils. The mind begins to notice; we begin to observe what's actually happening.

That ability to see, that ability of the mind to see experience, for the mind to know and observe—this is mindfulness, the third of the spiritual faculties.

In giving the instructions today, I talked about focusing or turning your attention to the primary object of the breath and connecting your attention to it. That connecting is very important, because if we don't actually connect our attention to the experience, we'll never know it. And not only do we need to connect our attention, we need to sustain our attention. Connecting and sustaining our attention to the meditation object—that movement of the belly, that sensation at the tip of the nostrils—is essential for clear seeing, for observing what's actually happening.

When we can connect and sustain our attention, steady the mind for that brief moment of a rising or an in-breath—a second or two—it's as if we come face to face with that experience. And as we develop the ability to come face to face with the breath, we also develop the ability to come face to face with emotions, memories, thoughts, plans, other physical sensations in the body—the whole vast array of what it is to be human. We develop the ability to see clearly what's happening.

How can we be free if we don't know what we're attached to? The first step is to see where we are on the path, to see what our fears are, to see where our mind goes, to see what our fantasy futures are, to see what our shameful past is, to see what is going on in this body, where we're holding, where we're tight. This is what we need to see by connecting and sustaining our attention on the experience.

It happens to all of us. As soon as we get some clarity of mind, some ability to connect with our experience and stay with it, we find great discomfort in the body. Pain. There isn't anybody here that didn't sit with really uncomfortable pain today. It's the nature of the body at times. And when we focus and look clearly, carefully, that's what we see.

Learning how to deal with pain is quite necessary, an essential thing to learn. Initially, when we come in contact with pain—you know, the knee that's just on fire, or the back that's like a board, or the neck that feels like it has a meat hook through it—at first it's just a massive, solid pain. And the mind is so reactive to it, so afraid of it, so disliking of it, that the mind won't even get close.

The mind just skitters away before you can contact it. It's like splashing water on a hot griddle—it just skitters off without really landing. Pain is really hot, and the mind simply skitters off when it comes close.

It takes some persistence, some real perseverance, some care to gently bring the mind close to that level of discomfort. It's not something you can just jam your mind into and make go away. Simply enduring it, gritting your teeth and bearing it—that is not the way to get close to pain. Rather, you gently bring the mind to it. Around the edges. Skirt around the edges. Begin to explore around the pain. Take a quick look inside and see what's right in the center of that pain, but don't expect to stay there for long. And slowly, as you get comfortable with the periphery of pain, you can open to the outer extremities of it and gradually move the mind into the center.

And what happens to this solid block of pain that stretches from hip to ankle? We begin to notice that there's some movement in there, some shifting, some change, some fluxing. Some tightness, some tension, some pulling, some stretching, some bubbling, some heat, some stabbing, some ripping, some tearing. It's a massive change. It's not so solid. With steadiness of mind, we can begin to approach the solidity of experience and see its composite and fluxing nature.

Steadiness of mind—the ability to connect and sustain our attention. It's that sustaining of attention on the experience that allows the mind to open and accept that experience.

So what is it that we learn to observe, that we are mindful of? It is said in the texts, in the Buddha's teaching, that there are four foundations for mindfulness. Four experiences that mindfulness rests on.

The first of these is what we use as the primary object: our body, our physical, material experience. The movement of the breath, the stretching and tightness and tension of the abdomen, the tingling sensations at the nostrils, pain, heat, movement of the legs in walking. The physical body, the experience of it. This is the first foundation of mindfulness.

The second foundation of mindfulness is what's called feeling. And it's not emotion in this case, but the pleasant or unpleasant quality to each and every experience that we have. If you look carefully at your experience of your mind, of your body, you will discover that there is a tone to it in each moment. A tone of pleasantness, unpleasantness, or neutrality. It's hard to see a neutral experience because when things are okay and neutral, we tend to fall asleep. When they're very unpleasant, we know it. When they're very pleasant, we know it. And sometimes that's all we can know of our experience—that it's very unpleasant, or that it's quite pleasant. This is another foundation for mindfulness, another foundation for observing what's actually happening, the basis for observing.

So we have the body, or physical material experience, and feelings. The third foundation is consciousness itself—the nature of the mind to think. And who hasn't been thinking today? Into the past remembering, into the future planning, into fantasies fantasizing. It's the nature of the mind to keep really busy. When we begin to pay attention, as we do today, we begin to discover that the mind is rarely home. It's on the go all the time. Those thoughts, those fantasies, those futures, those memories are all foundation for mindfulness. We can learn to observe them happening without buying in. We can train ourselves to know planning is happening, remembering is happening, fantasizing is happening, without getting caught in the story of that particular memory, that particular fantasy, that particular plan. Training the mind to observe what's happening rather than indulging in what's happening. So consciousness is the third foundation for mindfulness.

And the fourth is the contents of mind, or mental states. These we more commonly know as the hindrances, the factors of enlightenment, the emotions that we have.

When we feel frustrated, when we feel disappointed, when we feel joy, when we feel confident, when we feel loving, when we feel hatred, when we feel depressed—these are the contents of our mind. These are the contents of our consciousness. They too are a foundation for awakening, for observing, for developing the ability to know what's happening, for mindfulness.

So these are the four foundations of mindfulness: the body, pleasant or unpleasant feelings, consciousness of thoughts, plans, fantasies, and remembering, and mental states or emotions.

As we develop the ability to know our experience, to observe it and recognize it, to see it—as we develop the ability to extend the continuity of attention from one moment to the next to the next—rising, falling, rising, falling, thinking, planning, knee pain, back to the back, back to the abdomen, back to the breath, rising, falling—we develop continuity of attention. The mind gets collected.

The mind, in all of its fragmented pieces that is strung out across the universe of the past and the future, we pull it in. We pull in these little bits and pieces from this memory. We bring back our mind from this plan. We bring back our mind from this part of the body. We collect our mind in one place. We focus the mind. More of the mind gets collected and focused on this experience right now.

It's as if we take a magnifying glass, a magnifying lens, and focus our mind on just what it is we want to look at. And that's really what happens in the continuity of mindfulness—the mind does not have the opportunity to fragment and scatter to other experience. It stays together, comes together, collects. This is the one-pointedness of mind. It can only come about when we are mindful or observing with some continuity. The mind becomes concentrated.

When the mind is concentrated, when we look at something through a magnifying lens, we see more detail of what it is we're looking at. When the mind becomes concentrated, whatever it is we look at, we see more clearly. We see more details. We gain more knowledge.

So if I hold up my hand here and say, "Well, what do you see?" You see a hand. And if you come closer and look again, you can see four or five fingers. And if you get even closer, you can see all the knuckles. And if you get really close, you can see the prints, the fingerprints and the lines. And if you get really close, you might be able to see the pores. And if you use a magnifying lens, you can see even closer than that. More knowledge about the same experience.

Concentration is like putting on glasses to see what's already there. We've lived our life for twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty years. We've been breathing every day of our life. And have we really noticed it yet? Did you notice something about your breath today that you never noticed before? As we practice into the night and tomorrow, you may begin to discover experiences in the body, experiences in the mind that you never noticed before. It's not that they haven't been happening. They've been happening. But the mind has not been powerful enough to see them.

When the mind gets concentrated, we see more clearly. We see more deeply. We gain more knowledge, more wisdom, more understanding. And it's this understanding that frees the mind from bondage.

Because as we see and look carefully into our experience, we begin to discover that there are characteristics to all of our experience. Everything is changing. Do you know what that means? That means that everything is changing. It means that nothing is going to stay still. Your body is not going to stay the way it is now. Your mind is not going to stay the way it is now. Thank goodness.

And yet, we don't live with that knowledge. We live with the endeavor and striving to keep our body youthful and strong and healthy, like it's nineteen years old still. It's not going to stay that way. Let go of that one. Free your mind from that bondage.

Very simple example. Think of what's going on in the mind. How attached are we to ideas of who we are? Ideas about what we want that will make us happy? Ideas about our spouse, or intended spouse, or who we would like to have as a spouse that will make us happy? Our mind changes. We can know this intellectually, can't we? Everything changes. Why get attached? Why get stuck on something that's going to change anyway? We know this intellectually, but we can't let go.

We can't live with that knowledge until we experience it directly. This practice takes you to that experience—direct experience of the change of all phenomena. When you see that, it's not a struggle to let go. You see that you can't hold on anyway. Seeing into the nature of impermanence is a major step in spiritual practice, one which insight practice can take you to.

These spiritual faculties, these controlling faculties of the mind that I've been speaking about—confidence giving rise to and being the basis for our making effort, arousing energy to be aware, to observe, to look carefully at our life, to see what's actually going on here in this body, in this mind. And when we do, with some continuity, look carefully, the mind collects and focuses and sees more deeply into our experience. It sees more deeply into what it really is to be a human being, sees more deeply into the nature of our bondage to this body, to our mind, to our ideas. And it sees more deeply into the nature of freedom, of liberation, of enlightening the mind.

This practice is not insignificant. In an appreciation of the profundity of the Buddha's teaching—of guiding the mind into itself to free itself from bondage—just getting an appreciation for the profundity of that is worth your effort.

Well, I have talked enough. Let's just sit for a couple of minutes. Or if you're lying down, you can just lie like that, just for a couple of minutes, and let this whole talk settle.

CHAPTER 217

The Buddha's Prescription For Happiness: Seven Factors Of Enlightenment

Carol Wilson · 43 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson presents the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā) as the Buddha's prescription for the highest happiness—the happiness of the liberated heart. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), she explains how these factors work together: three energizing qualities (investigation/dhammavicaya, energy/vīriya, and joy/pīti), three stabilizing qualities (calm/passaddhi, concentration/samādhi, and equanimity/upekkhā), and mindfulness (sati) as the balancing factor that cultivates all the others.

Wilson offers practical insights into each factor, explaining how mindfulness serves as a purifying force—every moment of clear awareness without grasping, aversion, or identification deconditions habitual reactive patterns. She shares accessible techniques for cultivating investigation, such as approaching each breath with the wonder of it being the first or last, and describes how genuine interest transforms mundane experience into something magical. The talk addresses how effort naturally generates energy, and how joy arises from wholehearted engagement with present-moment experience.

Particularly valuable is Wilson's explanation of how practitioners can use this framework diagnostically, identifying which factors need strengthening in their own practice. Whether one needs more calm, more investigation, or more joy, these qualities can be consciously evoked through intention. The teaching offers both a map for intensive retreat practice and practical wisdom for bringing greater aliveness and ease to everyday life.

So tonight, since we've been having a series of talks on this prescription for happiness that these authors wrote—oh, that reminds me of one other thing, the happiness books. Who's reading the happiness books right now? Who's in the middle of reading them? Remember, it's kind of a lending library, so when you finish—somebody was asking if there's one of those books available—if and when you do finish, please bring them up here so other people can use them.

That book on happiness has a prescription for happiness that we've been going over extensively. We're examining in detail over the course of nine weeks these nine different choices, and I've found it very valuable. I hope you do too. Last week we started talking about suffering again and that first noble truth leading to doing this practice.

Tonight I thought I'd give another prescription list for happiness, which comes out of the Buddha's teachings. He had a few different lists for creating happiness in your life. Probably the most well-known is the list called the Eightfold Path, which is his fourth noble truth. That is a prescription for happiness in the full spectrum of one's life, which includes our interactions with others—right speech, action, and livelihood—our meditation practice—effort, mindfulness, and concentration—and also the development of wisdom, of right thought and right understanding. That's one prescription he gave. He said if you follow this path, you will find greater and greater harmony.

Another list and prescription he gave—a recipe, one could say, for happiness, the happiness of the liberated heart—is the list of the factors of enlightenment, the seven factors of enlightenment. I wanted to talk about this recipe or prescription for happiness tonight. I realize that people who've done the beginning class have heard the Eightfold Path and the Four Noble Truths and the Five Hindrances and those classical lists, but I have a feeling that there are a number of people who aren't so familiar with this list of the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, the Buddhist prescription for the highest happiness.

This list, by the way, is in the discourse on the meditation practice, the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. The last foundation is mindfulness of the Dharma, or of the dharmas, and what that means are different principles for understanding the awakening heart. One of the main aspects of that fourth foundation is understanding the seven factors of enlightenment.

There are balancing qualities among these factors. Three of them are energizing, one could say activating factors. Three are stilling or stabilizing factors, tranquilizing factors. And then there is one factor that balances both ends of the spectrum and also cultivates all of them. So that's one way to see this list.

It starts with that balancing factor, and that is—guess what?—mindfulness. This is the first of the factors of enlightenment. Mindfulness is talked about as the most wondrous way for overcoming sorrow and lamentation and grief. In some translations, it's said this is the sole way—it depends what translation you use. In any event, this quality of mindfulness is really important for complete awakening.

What mindfulness is—probably you have your own definition of it—but the basic principle of mindfulness is simply knowing what's happening right now. That is being awake for this moment's experience. But being awake in a special way that is not only aware of what's happening, but not having a reaction to what one sees, not clinging to what is pleasant, not condemning or pushing away what is unpleasant, and not taking ownership of your experience, not saying "I" or "me" or "mine"—this is my thought, this is my confusion, this is my pain, this is my fantastic meditation experience—but just seeing the whole process in an impersonal way: this is what is unfolding before us.

The awareness that recognizes that does not have to grasp at the experience and take ownership of it. This is what is called not identifying with your experience. When you identify with it, you take it to be mine. And this is where we create a lot of problems. There you are sitting, minding your own business, and all of a sudden a thought comes that triggers off some anger. There is often the tendency to say, "Oh, look what an angry person I am," or "Why am I having this thought? I have so much anger in me." That's the process of identification.

You just got caught. When you start to blame yourself for these emotions that arise, or these thoughts that arise, or these sensations in the body that arise—or start to take credit for all the good stuff. "Hey, that was a pretty neat thought. I hope everybody sees what a wonderful person I am if they only knew what a beautiful guy, because I just had this nice thought." And it just really popped into the screen. When you take ownership for it, you are setting yourself up for the condemnation when things aren't so sweet. Because as soon as you say, "Look at that," it's one step away from saying, "Oh, look at that." And it's very freeing to see this is just arising and passing away on its own.

This is what mindfulness truly is. Mindfulness has some amazing properties. One of the most powerful aspects of mindfulness is that it is a purifying force. Every moment you see things or are aware of things without grasping at the pleasant or pushing away the unpleasant or that sense of ownership for your experience, you are deconditioning those habits of grasping, aversion, and delusion. So although it might not seem very profound to feel a breath and know that you're breathing, it is a moment of purification that is undercutting that habit of identification and reaction. Very, very powerful. It is actually the most powerful purifying force of all. You cannot create unwholesome karma in the moment that you are mindful. In fact, in a moment of true mindfulness, you can only create wholesome karma.

So, sounds like a pretty good motivation, huh? One of my main motivations when I practice—and I said this in the Labor Day retreat that just happened, which was a wonderful retreat—as I'm practicing, reminding myself that every single moment of mindfulness counts. Every single moment I'm deconditioning those habits of grasping, aversion, and delusion. So don't underestimate them. And they are planting seeds that are very powerful, have very powerful ripenings.

There are a number of different ways one can be mindful. In that discourse on mindfulness, the four foundations: mindfulness of the body; of our sense experience—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch; mindfulness of the feeling tone of experience, that is the flavor of experience, if it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. So you're sitting here and all of a sudden you might hear a bird, if it's during the day, a bird from the outside whistling. Now you might be very mindful and aware that there's that sound, and even if you don't take ownership or get into a reaction of, "Oh, I love that, that's so beautiful," it has a pleasant tone to it. The sweet bird song. And the Buddha said, if you're mindful of that flavor and just acknowledge it—"Ah, this is pleasant"—there is less of a likelihood that you will grasp out of trying to hold on. Just, "Oh, this is a pleasant moment."

Just like if you're sitting and there's a screech of a truck or some loud sound. "Ah, this is unpleasant," which is very different than, "Darn it, I hate when trucks interrupt me for my meditation." Catching that unpleasantness of it without a judgment, you are a whole lot more likely to not jump on that train of rejection. Just, "Ah, this is an unpleasant moment." Or, "This is a neutral moment." So he said that's another area of mindfulness.

He also said you can be mindful of all the thoughts and feelings that come through. Mindful of whether they're pleasant or unpleasant. "Ah, this is thinking. Oh, this is feeling." Confusion or joy or whatever. And the key to being mindful of thoughts and feelings is not to get caught in the story, but simply to know that thinking is happening or knowing that this emotion is happening. And then the last area is mindfulness of the Dharma, these different principles, like the Four Noble Truths or the Seven Factors of Enlightenment.

So basically, the idea is it doesn't matter what you're mindful of. The moment of mindfulness is a moment of clear recognition without attachment or aversion or identification. It's a purifying force. It's a balancing force between these other six factors—we'll come back to that at the very end. And it is also the way to cultivate all the other qualities; all the other factors are cultivated through mindfulness.

So now we'll go to the three activating qualities. The first of these is the quality of investigation. When I say these different factors, I'm talking partly on meditation practice, partly with reference to meditation practice, but also these can be cultivated in your life.

It's not like you have to wait until you do a retreat or you meditate to cultivate them. They are gifts that we can evoke that lead to happiness, just like the ones that those authors talked about. In the same way, you can consciously cultivate all of these factors.

Investigation. What that means is a kind of curiosity, a kind of interest in life. It's one thing to be attentive and be aware, but there's a quality of interest, of discovery, that is a very enlivening attitude to bring to your awareness. If you're sitting here saying, "Breathing in, breathing out," and you're feeling your breath because you know that that's the basic instruction, but you have the attitude of "In, out, here's another breath, we just had one a moment ago, what's the big deal?"—it becomes kind of boring. It seems like a very stagnant exercise.

But let's try this for a moment. Close your eyes and imagine you've just been born. Imagine you've just come out of the womb and you're about to take your first breath. Here it is, the start of your life. Can you be here for it? It makes it a bit more interesting, doesn't it?

Now, before you open your eyes, let's try one more. Imagine you've come to the end of a full life, and you're about to take your last breath into the great mystery. How present can you be? Here it is, your last breath. You probably don't want to miss it.

Now, one last thing. Let go of first and last, and just recognize that this breath has never been here before and will never be here again. This moment of life is here for us, and we have the capacity to be present for it. Can you be here for it? This breath is sustaining you, keeping you alive.

You can open your eyes if you like. Did you notice any difference in the flavor of your presence? That's not cheating. You might think it's a gimmick, but if it gets you here, it's okay. And actually, that last one isn't a gimmick—that's the truth. It's never been here before, and it'll never be here again, this moment. If it helps you to do something like first breath or last breath, which I do from time to time, use it. If your head was being held under water, that breath would be very precious to you.

This whole quality of discovery is, for me, one of the great motivators in practice. It's like letting a little kid in you come out that has this sense of wonder. Wow! Have you ever wondered how it was that you got in this body that we call you, that everybody agrees to call Marcial or John or Miriam or James? How is it that life got here and coalesced into that body? It's all quite mysterious and miraculous. And if you let yourself have that kind of awe and wonder, that quality of investigation and interest is not very out of reach. It's just remembering the childlike wonder and not taking this moment for granted.

That is a factor of enlightenment.

In the same way, you can turn this investigation toward any experience. Suppose you have a feeling of fear or sadness, a strong emotion. The usual response is, "Oh no, I don't want to go there." For most of us, most of the time, we distract ourselves or seek some kind of entertainment or diversion. But you can't run away from it anyway. Usually the more you try to run away, the more easily it catches up.

But if instead you turn your awareness to that experience and say, "Wow, what is fear anyway? What's the experience of fear? Let's check this out." For me, another little game that I play is imagining that I'm an alien from outer space who has landed in this body, and it's my job to report back to my superiors what it's like to be in the human condition. Wow, what's fear? Look at that! Oh, what is happiness? What is joy? Not answering with an analytical answer—not "happiness is..."—but rather, what are the components of it? How does it feel?

It's bringing that kind of interest and curiosity that really helps you connect with experience and keeps it from just being another mechanical exercise. It brings a real juice to practice. This is the second factor of enlightenment.

The third factor, and the second of the activating factors, is the quality of energy or effort—these terms are often used synonymously. Viriya is the word. This practice takes some effort. It just doesn't happen on its own. If you brought somebody in off the street and said, "Okay, sit down here, feel your breath, notice what's happening, when your mind wanders come back to right now, try not to fantasize, and just be here, and do it for the next forty-five minutes"—most people would say, "Later for this. Don't sign me up."

It takes some real understanding of the value, or at least a real curiosity that tries it out. When you see for yourself that there's some value in it, then you want to put in the effort to pay attention. Because it's kind of like going against the grain, or going up-stream from the current of reacting to all the stimuli that most of us process all the time—stimuli which leads us to topple forward to the future or topple back to the past. It takes real intention to land here in the present moment. It takes effort. It takes energy.

The interesting thing about effort and energy is that as you put in the effort to be mindful, it actually brings about energy. It brings about an enlivening. When you do periods of practice, after a few days, when at first the energy seems low and the mind isn't reacting so much, it's common for there to be a lot more energy than most of us have available normally—because we're not reacting and we're not getting confused.

This is actually one of my motivations for practice, another little gimmick I use. I just get fascinated by the fact that one can go on a whole lot less sleep than one would in normal daily life. It's one of the motivations for me to be mindful as much as I can—this little game. How is it that I can go on five hours, or four hours, or even three hours, or even less sometimes, day after day? It's amazing, because an energy opens up to you. This is not all the time for everyone, but for some it's not uncommon at all. Energy picks up tremendously as you go through periods of practice, just because the mind isn't getting lost and reactive. Effort begets energy.

It's the same way in your daily life, probably, when you've got a project to do. At first there's the inertia that just says, "Oh, I don't know if I'm up to this"—which can also be, "Oh, I don't know if I'm up to getting this body out of bed in the morning." You can stay there for a long time in bed. But once you make the effort to get your body out of bed and you get going, there's a different kind of inertia—that of activity. Once you give yourself to a project and let yourself get into it, it's not that you have to keep pushing yourself: "Go ahead, go ahead." There's a point that most of us experience in activity where it just kind of gets you on a roll, and you want to put your heart into it until you get really tired. That initial effort leads to an energetic experience. So effort is a factor, and it's simply the effort to be mindful.

Investigation, effort, and then the third of the energizing factors of enlightenment is probably the most popular factor, called joy—also known as rapture. Sounds cool, huh? Pīti is the name in Pali. Pīti—not pity, but P-I-T-I—means a real joy that comes as you are more and more mindful. As that energy picks up, you become like this energy system, and sometimes it's quite exhilarating in a fantastic way.

Have you ever felt that wholehearted aliveness, where it's bubbling, the energy is bubbling through you? Sometimes it can actually be disconcerting when you feel that the energy is a bit more than you can handle. I remember one time in practice where I was paying attention and I was just filled with—not only this energy, but at first this excitement, and it felt really great, like I was getting higher and higher. I was saying, "Wow, who needs drugs?"

This is incredible. But at some point it became, "Whoa, what if I explode?" And I got really unsettled, to say the least, and went running to the teacher saying, "Hey, what's going on here?" At which point Joseph said, "You see, you thought this was a dry, brittle practice. Not much is going on." Because I wanted the juice of devotional practice. And he said, "Okay, you just do this, this, and this"—there are ways to ground yourself. And mostly it's getting used to opening up and becoming familiar with holding more and more energy.

Another way to define joy, another aspect of this rapture or piti, is a keen interest in what's going on. You just become very focused and interested. Just like in your daily life, sometimes when you've really given yourself wholeheartedly to something, there's a kind of fullness and aliveness and joy just from giving yourself fully over to it. This is very much akin to piti, to this rapture. And it comes through the development of strong mindfulness.

But it can also come in one's daily life, even not on an intensive retreat experience, just by letting your natural curiosity give rise to real interest. The more you pay attention, the more fascinating things become.

I've used this example some of you have heard. When I was younger, I would do this a lot, and even now I still do—looking at a shaft of sunlight. Have you ever looked at a shaft of sunlight coming through the window? Have you ever looked up close? What's going on there? How many people have done that? There's this whole dance going on there of dust. And if somebody said to you, "What are you doing?" and you answered, "I'm looking at some dust"—yeah, right, okay, sounds like an interesting day, I'll see you later. But actually, it's fascinating, isn't it? Wow. Look what's going on there.

For me, I used to do that a lot. It was like there was this doorway to this whole world that I was normally blind to. This intense, keen interest—you can bring it to anything. If you can bring it to dust dancing, you can bring it to anything. It's all magical.

I remember having this conversation with my son Adam when he was about four or so. He was talking about magic, and he asked, "Well, what is magic?" And I was saying how it's all magical. "Oh yeah? Well, what's magical?" I don't remember if we looked at some dust, but then I started going around the house. There was a cassette of Sesame Street on the table and a cassette player. I said, "Here, I'd like you to see this. What is this?" "Oh, it's a cassette." I said, "Bert and Ernie are ready to come alive for you. Watch." Press the button and there it comes: "Everyone makes mistakes, oh yes they do." That's my favorite Sesame Street song. How does that happen? We looked for Bert and Ernie. Where are they? I don't know.

I say, it's magic. And then we turn on the light switch. How does that happen? I don't know. How does it happen? I don't know either. It's all magic.

How does it happen that I'm having a thought and then giving rise to some words through potassium sodium chemistry in my brain, which translates into action and words that come through the vocal cords, travel through space, hit your eardrum, get translated into information in your brain—and I can say something like "beautiful" and you can have one reaction, or I can say something like "ugly" and you can have another reaction? How does that happen? I don't know. It's magic.

That's the kind of keen interest or joy that you can have just by surrendering. That's this quality of awe and wonder, which is a kind of further step of investigation—letting yourself be amazed by it all. So all of these are quite enlivening aspects that come along with mindfulness.

Then there are three factors that balance out that energetic, activating side, which are stabilizing, stilling, composing. And the three factors begin with the factor of calm. It's wonderful, isn't it? You come to sit. That's probably one of the first things that people get in touch with when they're not very restless. As you sit here for forty minutes or so and you stop the busyness and the stimulation and you just try to go within, there's a calming effect.

Even if you're spacing out, even if you're drifting off, even if you're on Pluto for all intents and purposes, you might think, well, what's the point of that? But actually, one thing that you're cultivating, which is a very rare experience in this world that most of us live in, is calm. If nothing else happened, just giving yourself a break from the action is incredibly helpful.

And there can be all different levels of calm. There can be a deep, profound calm that is experienced in the meditation that perhaps many of you know for yourselves. This is a kind of tranquilizing, a stilling, a settling of the energy. And it's a factor of enlightenment.

A second of these stilling qualities is the factor of concentration. And it's slightly different. It can be with calm, but not necessarily. Calm is a kind of settling down, a stilling that comes from settling down. Concentration or samādhi is a stilling that comes from focusing. It comes from a one-pointed connection with what's happening. You can actually be concentrated and not necessarily calm, just like you can be calm and not necessarily concentrated. You probably know that one, right? "Oh, I wasn't quite here, but it's calm." Like I say, that's okay. But if you want the full flowering of the practice, concentration is a very key component.

And what concentration? There are a few different kinds of concentration. One kind of concentration is fixing the attention on one particular point, like the breath, or like loving-kindness and repeating a phrase over and over, or like an energy center, or some kind of visualization, or staring at a candle. Just unifying the mind. I think it's in Jesus' teachings—he says, "If thine eye be single, then you will know the kingdom of heaven." That is what he's talking about: unifying the mind. The mind in samādhi, or in the deep states of concentration, what are called the jhānas—deep states of absorption.

But you don't have to have that kind of laser-like concentration in order for awakening to happen. You can have a concentration that is called moment-to-moment concentration, or khaṇika samādhi, which is a connection with this moment, and a connection with this moment, and then a connection with this moment. Even if it's changing experience, you can have an awareness of the breath, and then awareness of a sound, and then awareness of an emotion, and awareness of a sensation, and be connected from one moment to another. That is also sometimes called vipassanā concentration. That kind of connection comes from moments of mindfulness building on each other.

So the more effort you put into being mindful, the greater the moments of mindfulness, particularly in a retreat setting, and those moments of mindfulness build a momentum to develop into concentration. That is one of the reasons why retreats are so valued and so powerful—because they create a situation where there's minimal external input, external stimulation, where there's a whole support of other people having the same task or goal of being here, and you are gently reminding yourself over and over: come back.

come back. And the way you come back is the key to concentration—not with judgment, but with a sincere commitment to return. Through that kind of concentration, you start to penetrate through the veils of confusion and illusion.

So this is the second of the stilling factors. The third, which is the last of the seven factors, is the quality of equanimity, called upekkha in Pali. Equanimity is another facet of stilling. There's a stilling in the calm that comes from settling. There's a stilling of concentration that comes from focus. And the stilling of equanimity is that of non-reactiveness—a spaciousness that allows for anything, seeing all the joys and the sorrows, open to it all.

Equanimity is different from indifference. That's the near enemy of equanimity—indifference or apathy, where it seems like you're not ruffled or bothered by things, but only because you're removed or detached. "Oh well, who cares?" That's not equanimity. Equanimity still has caring in it, but there is a spaciousness and an ease. The moment that precedes the liberated heart or mind, that experience of awakening, is usually defined as high equanimity—where there's a balance, where all the factors come into balance, and there is a deep ease that lets go of any movement of trying, of making anything happen, of becoming. That opening of equanimity is the preceding moment to the liberated heart or mind.

So those are the stilling factors: calm, concentration, equanimity. The energizing factors are investigation, energy, and rapture or joy. And mindfulness is the balancing factor because it has both an alert and a receptive quality to it. That's where the balance lies. You have to have some alertness to know what's happening, but there's also a receiving of the experience—not pouncing on it, just being open to it. This curious property of mindfulness is that it balances both sides of that equation, and it also cultivates all the other factors.

So that is the prescription the Buddha gave. When all of those factors are ripe, there is the experience of waking up. The seven factors of enlightenment.

A student named John raised a question: "The way you presented that, it could easily be taken as very intimidating—that awakening is a big deal, that you have to go through all of these steps. The teaching I've loved so much is Ajahn Amaro's teaching that enlightenment is in every moment of existence."

Both are true. It's just what vantage point you want to take. Enlightenment is a big deal—it is. And it can be made to seem very distant. This is actually one of the fascinating things about a retreat blending Tibetan Dzogchen practice, which is really about letting go and not trying at all, with Theravadan practice. Although Ajahn Amaro is more of a Dzogchen style, most of the Theravadan world, and most of what the Buddha taught, emphasizes tremendous effort. "Strive on diligently," he said. It does take tremendous effort.

Now, if you get put off by that, the thing to keep in mind is this: to be in this moment requires very little effort. In fact, it's a not-doing—just receiving this moment. And that is absolutely true.

In the moment that you're mindful, all of those factors can be present. But if you're talking about the liberated heart—more than just this moment, but an actual uprooting of tendencies—this takes tremendous work. This is not something to simply kick back and wait to come.

At various times in my own practice, I've been very motivated to work my butt off because I could see the more energy and effort I put into being mindful, the more the practice would come alive. That's just how it works. And at other times, I could see I was beating myself, knocking my head against the wall because I was trying too hard. And I went a whole other direction, took a whole other approach of really just relaxing.

They're both true. It's not that one is the right way and the other is the wrong way. If you're looking at it from the perspective of surrendering to this moment, it's available in every moment. If you're looking at it as a process of purification, of cultivation, then it's more than just relaxing back—it takes tremendous intention. So they're both true, and you use whichever one inspires you for where you're at in your practice, which can change over time.

Someone shared that they had an email from a friend who said, "I have been flying out of control all summer." That's the opposite of what we've been talking about. It means whirling from event to event without any mindfulness at all—that feeling of "Wow, this past month was a blur." The point is, once you get the habit of mindfulness, you know when you're passing through your life without any mindfulness. You're not there. Everything is on the periphery. It's as if you're flying along out of control. And the benefit of practice is that you can catch yourself doing that and say, "Wow, I haven't known what I've been doing. I haven't been mindful for the past week or the past month." And it's never too late. It's just starting again right in this moment.

One thing about these factors is that as you practice, if you know the list, you can take a look and see where you're out of balance. A lot of times when people come into an interview on retreat, I'll be looking at the factors in this way and seeing, "Oh, there's a lot of energy but not much calm." So that'll be the direction. Or somebody else might be very calm but low energy, and I'll look at that. Or somebody else might have not much equanimity, and that's the place to focus on. Or somebody might be doing the practice and it seems like they're really there, but there's very little investigation or joy.

You can look in yourself and see, "Ah, maybe I need a little bit more joy"—not only in your formal meditation, but in your daily life. Probably most of us could use a little bit more joy. It's not cheating. It's bringing some uplifting and nourishment into your heart so you can then be here more for your life. That's not to pretend that everything is okay, but to nourish yourself. Or maybe you need a little bit more investigation. What really is going on? Because it takes courage to investigate.

So you can use these factors. And the amazing thing about them is that you can consciously evoke them, just by having the intention. "Let's cultivate more investigation." You can pretend to be interested, and that gets the ball rolling. "Well, what would it be like if I was interested, even though I'm not? Well, if I was interested, then I'd look more carefully." And then all of a sudden, that starts it. With all of these, you can consciously cultivate them, evoke them.

So maybe play around with them this week. If you happen to hear one in that list and say, "Oh, that's one I could really use a bit more," just take it on as a practice this week. Nobody's giving you a grade, but just see what it's like to consciously bring it more into your meditation or your attitude in your life.

Let your heart be at ease. Breathe in kindness and goodness, letting it fill your whole body, and then breathe it out.

Send some kind thoughts to yourself: May I have happiness in my life. Just getting in touch with that intention. May I have peace in my life. May I express my love well. May I be happy.

And then share that thought with everyone here and with all beings everywhere. As I want happiness for myself, may all beings be happy. As I want peace, may all beings have peace in their lives. As I want love, may all beings grow in love and kindness and express their love well.

May all beings everywhere be happy.

CHAPTER 218

The Art of Wise Effort

Carol Wilson · 53 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the crucial distinction between ordinary effort and wise effort (sammā vāyāma) in meditation practice. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching about making "an island that no flood can overwhelm," she explores how we can find an inner refuge—a true home within ourselves—that remains stable amidst changing conditions.

Wilson carefully deconstructs common misunderstandings about effort in meditation. She explains that meditative effort is not about attaining particular states, changing the contents of consciousness, or fixing ourselves as objects. Instead, wise effort is simply the effort to be present, to be mindful, moment after moment. She introduces the essential question "How am I relating to this?" as a doorway out of our habitual patterns of grasping, aversion, and identification.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with resistance, which Wilson frames as a natural part of practice rather than an obstacle. She emphasizes that we don't need to feel like practicing in order to practice, and encourages treating each sitting as a fresh experiment. Drawing on teachings from Suzuki Roshi, Milarepa, and Ajahn Chah, she articulates the paradox of balanced effort: "Be impeccable and take it easy." The essence of practice, she concludes, is not achieving anything but resting within who we already are—"that which is always and already free."

The Buddha once said, "With wise effort and earnestness, make for yourself an island that no flood can overwhelm." And of course, what the Buddha meant by this is an inner island. I'm sure some of you at various points throughout the day today might feel that getting a little dirt together in the middle of the ocean and making an island that way would be a whole lot easier than what you've tried to do throughout this day.

What is being spoken about in terms of no flood being able to overwhelm is finding a place of refuge within. This island means refuge—finding a refuge within that is untouched, unaffected by conditions, by outer and inner conditions. Another way of saying this is that we are learning how to find ourselves at home with ourselves, wherever we are.

Some years ago, I went to a funeral of a friend's mother, and it was in a church that was evangelical Christian. What it was called—some of you may be familiar with this—was a "going home service" for this person. I thought that was great, just such a wonderful way of looking at death. And I also thought, can we go home now without having to die? Is it possible to find a way to go home right now? This is what is being spoken about. This is what is being encouraged by the Buddha: to find an inner home, to find an inner refuge that is stable and steady, that arena that is at ease.

How is this refuge or home realized? Through the awareness of our life, through bringing mindfulness to whatever it is that is occurring from moment to moment, seeing into conditions and seeing beyond conditions. What mindfulness means, by definition, is not clinging to whatever it is that's occurring—not grasping, not trying to hold on to, not trying to make last. It also means not trying to get rid of, push away, or react to with aversion. And mindfulness means not identifying with what is happening inwardly as being who we are. Sometimes we get more grandiose and think it's how the world is because of what we feel like inwardly. So mindfulness also means not identifying with what is occurring.

What happens when we're able to be mindful is that even though it doesn't always feel like it, it begins a process of dissolving the unconscious patterns within the mind, the unconscious ways that we suffer. So it's not a path of instant gratification—far from it. And at the same time, we can have the confidence that this is what is happening each time we're able to be aware and awake and mindful. Each time, we're chipping away at an unconscious habit or pattern within the mind that has kept us stuck for an awfully long time.

However, it takes effort to be mindful, usually quite a lot of effort to be mindful. I'll read you something that Milarepa, a great yogi from the past, wrote. This was after a very long retreat—not seven days, but over eleven months: "Not stopping at mere intellectual knowledge of the gradual processes of profound path teachings, I practiced without regard for fatigue or strain until the signs and marks of progress appeared. In one place during a practice retreat, I meditated strenuously for eleven months, never allowing my cushion to lose its warmth." I would also comment by saying he was in a really cold area of the world. So here, it's not really such a big deal. Maybe we leave for forty-five minutes to walk and our cushion still holds some warmth. But in a cold place, the cushion would lose it immediately. So he would have had to be sitting quite a lot.

Obviously, effort is really an essential aspect of the path. We can't get around it. We can't pretend we don't need it. We can't dream about the practice and think anything's going to happen. We can fantasize, but nothing is going to happen if we do. Effort is really necessary. It is something that we have to work with, and it really is an art. It's not a science, it's not a formula—it really is an art. This is what I'd like to talk about tonight: the art of effort.

One of the questions is, what is wise effort? Notice that the Buddha didn't just say "with effort and earnestness," but "with wise effort and earnestness." So what is wise effort? In other words, what is effort in the context of meditation? The reason why this is important is because effort in the context of meditation is actually totally different than our usual definitions of effort. That's why it's so confusing. That's why we find ourselves sometimes struggling and not knowing what to do. We think, "Okay, I'll try as hard as I can," and we find ourselves completely coiled up and tense and caught and engaged in a struggle. A way to move out of this struggle is to understand more deeply what wise effort actually is in the context of what we're engaged in, which is the world of meditation.

Meditative effort is not the effort to attain or maintain a particular state of mind. Although we might like it to be—when once in a while a wonderful state of mind comes along, we might want to grasp onto it and try to make it last. We might want to think, perhaps because it makes us feel productive, that if we could only attain this particular state of mind or that particular state of mind, then everything will be over, everything will be easy.

But the problem is that when our effort is directed towards trying to attain anything in particular—a particular state of mind, a particular feeling, a particular emotion—it becomes problematic because it's our imagination, and it has everything to do with something happening in the future rather than what really works, which is mindfulness in the present moment. Being here, not in the future, not lost in our thoughts about what could happen, may happen, will happen, should happen at some future date. Every time we do that, we've lost our wise effort. So we must be aware of this tendency to aim towards a particular state of mind.

Meditative effort is also not the effort to change what is happening within, to change the contents of consciousness. The contents of consciousness do change, absolutely they change, but our efforts to change what is happening within involve non-acceptance. Instead of actually taking up what's happening, we're resisting, we're trying to push away. And pushing away brings us into struggle once again, brings us into turmoil, brings us into tension.

In our efforts to change the contents of consciousness, we think we should be having different thoughts than we're having, different feelings than we're having. We think we should be having the thoughts that we know the person next to us is having—even if they're worse than ours, at least they're not ours. We think, "If this were gone, then I could really meditate. If only I had different thoughts happening right here, if only I felt a different way, if only this, if only that, if only the conditions were different, then I could really begin to meditate. If only my breath would cooperate, if only my mind would cooperate, then I could begin to meditate."

But meditation is being present. The effort is to be present with things as they are.

Meditative effort is also not the effort to try to fix or work on oneself. So often we treat ourselves as objects that need to be fixed. We relate to ourselves not as precious beings, not as radiant hearts, not as having inherent Buddha nature, but as these objects that absolutely need repair. We're here to do some manual labor on ourselves. Every time we do this, our effort again is unwise, coiled up. We're caught in struggle, caught in tension. Our efforts to try to become someone—even if that someone is a better meditator—this is really a problem.

Our efforts to try to become someone else, to imitate someone we've heard about or admire in some way, can also lead us astray. Of course, to learn from others is enormously wholesome. But when we think we can actually be in somebody else's body, this becomes problematic. When we're meditating in order to abandon ourselves and become someone else—in our imagination, I might add—we have left ourselves, and that is not meditation. That is once again unwise effort.

Effort that is not meditative effort is effort based on attachment, holding, grasping in some way. The attachment might be the effort to try to make pleasure last, or the effort to try to make that which is impermanent permanent. Both are absolutely impossible—despite how much we might try, it's not possible. We can make pleasure last for perhaps a few moments more, certainly, but eventually it will turn into pain. Pleasure in and of itself is wonderful; it's not a problem. But if we're trying to make it last, it involves tension, and once again, there is no relaxation or meditation occurring.

This non-meditative effort based on attachment is conditioned by the culture in which we live—understandably enough, the most human of things. Because practice values different things than the culture at large values. The culture at large values success above everything: fame, gain, appearance, accumulation. Meditation values freedom; it values understanding our inherent radiance of heart. This is the priority system in meditation.

The effort we're used to, this non-meditative effort, is based on what we know. Of course we bring the effort that we're familiar with—effort we've tried in our work life, our career path, our efforts even to feed ourselves. But this is a very different effort than is required in meditation. We bring it into this environment because this is what we know, what we've been taught. The problem is that it really hasn't brought us much ease—or else why would we be here?

So there is a really big shift taking place in understanding what wise effort really is, effort that bears the fruit of freedom. We have to undergo quite a significant shift in our understanding. The first step is to notice when our efforts are misdirected and are bringing about tension and difficulty, and then try to aim in a different direction—towards meditative effort.

We must remember that some kind of effort is always happening in our life in one way or another: just to sustain ourselves, to take care of our bodies, to wash ourselves every day, to floss every day. All of these things require a huge degree of effort. The upkeep on a body, let alone a mind, requires tremendous effort. So effort is always happening—this is a fact in every moment of life. But the question is: what direction is it going in? Because this is what is important.

Are our efforts directed toward avoiding difficult feelings, difficult emotions? Because if this is the direction our effort is going, there will be huge parts of our life that are being left out. Perhaps on certain days ninety percent of our life, maybe seventy-five percent on other days, maybe ninety-nine percent on other days—left out through our habitual thinking that we can't stand certain feelings. The avoiding of difficult feelings. Is the direction of our efforts based on fear, being intimidated by the inner environment?

So one of our questions is: what is meditative effort? Meditative effort is effort that is informed by wisdom. It is actually really, really simple. And this might be the only important part of this talk. One line: it is the effort to be mindful. That is the effort we're interested in. It's the effort to be present. Over and over again, it's the effort to be aware. And that's it. No more than that. No less than that either, which is a big problem when we want to absorb into experiences. But no more than that.

Oftentimes we're overshooting the mark. We're striving. We're caught in pushing ourselves in the wrong direction. So remembering the relaxation of the effort being simply to be here, simply to be present. Not easy—I'm not saying easy—but simply to be present. That is the direction our effort needs to go in.

You could say that the untrained mind or the ordinary mind is a mind—and we might shift between the two, between ordinary mind and meditative mind, so not to label anyone as having an ordinary mind or a meditative mind—but an ordinary mind, or an untrained mind, is when we are lost in our experience, when we are caught in obeying every instinct that comes along, when we are absorbed into our experiences. Whereas a meditative mind is a mind that is aware of experiences, allowing ourselves to observe our reactions, to be aware of what is happening, enlarging our capacity to be aware. This is what meditative mind is, what meditative effort is—learning more and more how to relate skillfully.

A question we might ask ourselves is: how am I relating to this? Sometimes when we get caught in trying to figure out what's happening, which is one of our fairly big habits, trying to fix what's happening, getting caught in the what of what's happening, getting caught in the contents of what is happening—the thoughts or the emotions that are occurring—or the why of what's happening, trying to find reasons from the past about why we're feeling what we're feeling in the present moment. When we get wrapped up and caught in this, we forget that the main question in terms of the growth of wisdom leading to freedom is: how am I relating to this?

This is a question we might remember to ask ourselves from time to time, especially when we're caught. How am I relating to this? Am I relating to it by trying to push it away, thinking that's going to work? It doesn't. It only strengthens it. Am I relating to it by trying to hang on to it, by grasping, by trying to make it last? It doesn't. It's going to go away anyway. Am I relating to it by identifying with it, thinking it's who I am, defining myself by what is occurring? And if we answer yes to any of those, then what we would want to do is simply see if we can know that it's happening. Remembering our capacity to be aware in that moment.

When we do remember—when we're caught in the what and the why and we remember the how, how am I relating to this—sometimes it's as if what opens up is just a little crack under the door. You know when a door is shut and completely sealed, you can't see under it at all. And then just a little crack under the door, light emerging. Sometimes it's like that when we remember to ask this question: how am I relating to it? Because it can sometimes make a great deal of difference. It's along the lines of wisdom. It's a question that actually goes somewhere, rather than being completely caught up in the usual habits of mind—the what and the why.

Not that these questions are unimportant. They certainly help with some level of understanding, of self-understanding, and so I'm not at all saying they're not important. But a real way out is this question of how. Is it possible to relate to this by simply being present with it, by relaxing into it instead of resisting it quite so much? Is it possible to relate to it by accepting it, by making more room for it? By even embracing it—embracing the difficult? Is it possible to relate to it differently than the ways we're used to?

Meditative effort, as I said, is the effort to be present. It's the effort to turn towards the present moment over and over again whenever we find ourselves elsewhere—not judging and not assessing, not measuring how well or how badly we're doing, but just over and over again the willingness to turn towards the present moment instead of diving back in. Whether it's wonderful thoughts or terrible thoughts, we tend to dive back in. Even if they're worry thoughts, we tend to dive back in at times. So refraining from diving back in and turning towards the present moment once again. Asking ourselves: do we have a clear intention to be aware right now?

Using our efforts—the efforts we so often use to judge ourselves and our experiences and others—using all of that energy for something different. You might have noticed this a lot throughout the day: judging one's situation, judging oneself, judging one's reactions, judging how other people are practicing or not practicing, looking at me or not looking at me, whatever it might be. Judging, of course, runs rampant on retreats.

So all of that effort that we might use in that direction—can we use that very same effort for awareness instead? It's there. It's good. There's effort happening there. So it's a matter of taking that effort and transmuting it into something useful, instead of leading to greater contraction of heart. Using that very same effort to try to turn around and see if we can be aware.

Now, we can be aware of our judging. It's not as if it shouldn't be happening or it's a problem. But if we use it to be aware of our judging, it's quite different than believing and justifying and feeling terrible because judging is occurring. It's quite different.

Meditative effort is based on understanding—the understanding of knowing what we can do and what we can't do. In other words, understanding what our responsibility really is in practice and what our responsibility really is not, because we have no say about it whatsoever.

What arises is not our responsibility. In the moment of its arising, it's not our responsibility because it comes out of the past. It's out of our control, and we can't say, "Don't arise right now." We do say that a lot—"don't arise right now"—but nobody listens. There's no wonderful response of it going away or changing. It just simply gets stronger, as you might have noticed, when we say, "Don't arise like this right now."

So the arising itself is something we have to learn how to surrender to because, again, in that moment of arising, it's a past accumulation. It's the past arising in the present. And then, if we can be aware, we can allow the dissolving to take place in the only moment it can happen, which is in the here and now.

Our responsibility, though, is to meet the arisings with awareness. Now, that is where wise effort comes in. Nothing happens magically. This is all very lawful. So if we can meet the arisings with awareness, then we're doing the best we can. We're doing the best we can. And then the results are truly out of our control.

We can't do anything about how the practice evolves or how it moves for us. This is something that you could say is karma, is grace. It's not like we can say, "I want an insight right now," or, "I'd like to have twenty insights right now, actually, not just one." We can't demand anything of the world or of ourselves or of this path or of the teachings or of the Buddha. None of this makes any sense at all. It really is out of our control. The results of practice are out of our control.

And so what we need to do is break the connection that can be so tightly bound between the efforts we put out and the results of those efforts. Because if we do, our practice can be easier and without as much struggle. It will be whatever way it is anyway, but it can be a really hard path, or it can have a little less struggle to it. So seeing if we can be mindful of the ways that we connect effort and results.

And I would say practicing with as much humility and humbleness as we can possibly summon up. Because when there is this bonding between the efforts we're putting out and expecting particular results, there's a tendency to feel a little bit entitled. "Because I'm trying so hard, I should get." Well, one will, but who knows how long? No one can predict that. No one can predict anything in terms of time.

It's really the earnestness to go in a direction that makes sense to you—to go in the direction of freedom rather than the direction of contraction and misery and more suffering. It's really the direction that matters more than the expectation of results, because we can really torment ourselves a lot with the expectation of results. And every time we're expecting a particular result, we aren't practicing. So it actually slows things down quite a lot.

It slows the practice, the movement, the development of practice down quite a lot.

Michael was talking earlier about continuity of mindfulness. When we're caught up in expectations and plans about how our practice should go and what we should be receiving or getting, we've lost our continuity of mindfulness. And so we're slowing things down.

It's really important to break this connection, to see if we can put out our best, really meeting our life with awareness, being as present as we possibly can be, and at the same time letting go, not being caught in the expectation of results.

Meditative effort is actually the effort to connect. It's bringing a newness, a freshness into each moment. Someone called the bamboo forest master once said, "Everything I touch becomes new." When there is this sense of freshness, everything becomes new. Instead of everything seeming like repetition, which is sometimes the way it is on a retreat, where we think, "Oh my goodness, one more sitting, one more walking, another sitting, another walking, another emotion, another same emotion"—it just seems so incredibly repetitive.

If we are mindful, nothing is repeated, and we see that it isn't repeated. It's not something just to make us feel good. Actually, nothing is repeated because we are fresh in the here and now. We are really actually here, not lost in any belief that we can repeat anything from the past. Everything I touch becomes new when we have this kind of beginner's mind.

And as well, each moment is seen as important. Sometimes we can think, "Ah, I haven't been mindful for the last five minutes, the last hour, the last eight hours. It's not worth it to be mindful right now. I might as well not be because I've already kind of blown it."

Actually, life is only made up of moments. We always get a fresh chance in practice. You can't blow it. It's not possible. Things can take longer or shorter, certainly, but you can't blow it. So every moment holds this possibility of being awake, of being mindful.

As Saint Francis said in our practice, if the heart wanders or is distracted, bring it back to the point quite gently. If you did nothing during the whole of your hour but bring the heart back, though it went away every time you brought it back, your hour would be very well employed.

And if we don't do this, we might be caught in the position of this poor fellow who wrote to Tofu Roshi, who was channeled by a woman named Susan Moon:

"When I meditate, I am very distracted by uncomfortable physical sensations. I seem to spend the whole time fighting off feelings of hunger, sleepiness, or pain. Please help me to regain true focus, Tofu Roshi. Signed, Bill."

"Dear Bill, Let yourself be one with whatever happens in your body. Learn to notice the precise details of your sensations. A good time to practice this is when you eat. How does the feel of the broccoli in your mouth change as you chew? Become the warm green softness as it oozes around your gums and tongue. Do not make assumptions about how you feel. Do not jump to conclusions. Do not name your sensations good or bad. Wait and observe. Do not say to yourself, 'I'm hungry, I'm in pain, a scorpion is stinging my left foot.' Just be one with the sensations—heat, tingling, piercing, burning, swelling of the toes—without changing them into ideas."

So, don't be like this guy.

Working with resistance is part of the practice. It's not other than meditation. It actually has to be taken in as a huge part of our practice. You could say, one could say, that retreats are controlled containers of suffering. I don't know if that resonates with you, but probably so. We also say that about our life.

Retreats are simply unadorned. There's no fanciness. There's no extraness. There's not anything happening other than life, other than we with ourselves being able to see what is happening a little bit more clearly because of the lack of the usual responsibilities and distractions in our life. So it's unadorned. We get to see our predicament more clearly, and the good news is—because if it were just that, this would not be a very good place to be—we get to see our predicament more clearly, and as well, we get to see our way out a little bit more clearly.

Now, to see one's predicament is the very first step in any path of freedom, because if we don't see, we won't want to change anything. We won't even know there is anything to do. We won't even know that there is any such thing as meditation or wise effort or freedom being possible.

So to see our predicament, to see the human dilemma, is of absolute essence. And then we can begin to see, and we can begin to apply mindfulness.

We notice that our resistance comes in different forms. Sometimes we notice that our resistance is happening because we find ourselves irritated. Nothing really is happening. We're just sitting there. Nobody is actually torturing us. But we find ourselves really irritated or cranky. We want to take a nap. We're sitting up straight and we want to take a nap. And we find ourselves a little bit, or a lot, irritated or angry. This is a sign of resistance.

We can find ourselves passive. We can find ourselves resigned or giving up. This too is a sign of resistance.

What is so important is to acknowledge our resistance and as well to be aware of our reactions to being resistant. Sometimes our reactions to resistance take the form of shame. We're not supposed to be feeling the resistance that we are. We're supposed to be practicing in a different way or having a different experience. And so shame arises. This is a reaction to resistance. Can we simply know that shame is occurring and not get into it, not dwell on it, not embellish it, not believe it?

The other reaction that we can commonly have is that of rebelliousness. "Okay, I'm out of here. Maybe I'll make it for the next few days, but then I'm absolutely never going to practice again. I'm just telling you right now, this is it." Or we sit while everybody else is walking, we walk while everyone else is sitting, we eat when everybody else is not. Whatever it might be, this kind of sense of rebellion that we have to do everything differently. Maybe by the sixth day we attain the schedule, but it's a slow road up till then.

Obviously there are reasons for some people not to follow the schedule because of health or other circumstances. But one knows when it's because of health and really good reasons and when it's this kind of rebelliousness that is really only affecting oneself.

What is important is not to follow these reactions because they are strengthened whenever we follow them, but simply to form a new relationship to the resistance that we experience—when it's in the form of irritation or of anger or of resignation or passivity. All of us have different forms of resistance, so you can fill in the blank there. Probably a lot of what you felt today was simply resistance.

Every time we don't want to be present, every time we just don't want to be with things as they are, there is resistance occurring. If we can acknowledge this and be aware of it, this begins to allow us to form a very different relationship to it. We can see the resistance as more natural. We can take it less personally, rather than seeing it as absolutely part of our character to resist everything. It really is part of things because it's part of the path. And it will gradually change if we're willing to be mindful of it in its various forms.

There are ways to engage resistance more creatively than sometimes we have found up till now. I want to mention a few ways to creatively engage resistance.

One of these ways is to remember that we don't have to feel like practicing in order to practice. This is really such a big one, and I'm passing this on because it was a hard-earned lesson for me. I remember on a retreat many years ago, I was setting myself to get up very early in the morning and to go to sleep late at night, because sometimes this can help with focusing of attention, with concentration, with samadhi, with strength of mind and heart. So I was setting myself to do that. But every time I woke up, of course, I was really tired. Why wouldn't I be? Because I had gotten very little sleep. So I would wake up, and the first thought I would have was, "I don't feel like getting up."

It was so liberating to realize that I could just get up. I could not feel like it, and I could get up anyway. Maybe not enthusiastically, not bouncing out of bed, not with enormous cheerfulness—probably good nobody saw me and it was a silent retreat—but I didn't have to follow the bidding of my feelings.

It's really profoundly liberating to not have to follow every feeling that arises, to not be so identified with our feelings, to think that we can't practice just because we don't feel like practicing. We can move into something so rich and so deep by knowing that we can practice even though we don't feel like it. And we can use the forms of sitting and walking through the different ebbs and flows of energy. In any day in our life, energy will come and it will go according to conditions, according to our health, according to our health situation overall.

You know, if we're dealing with something really difficult in terms of our health, of course we're not going to have as much energy. If the day happens to be one in which we're just not all that healthy, we won't have a whole lot of energy. The time of day matters too—some of us are very perky early in the morning, and some of us are enormously irritated early in the morning. Some of us are really wide awake at night, while others of us can't wait to crawl into bed. I used to live with somebody who was unbelievably cheerful in the morning. It was so hard for me, I can't tell you. But we won't get into that.

The real realization here is that effort can be applied whether there is energy or not, because it's the effort to be present. We can apply the effort to be aware that there is no energy. You will find that there's never a way out. There are no excuses on this path, because one can always be aware. Even if you don't want to be aware, you can be aware of not wanting to be aware. There's always a way to practice. There's always a creative way to practice. When we get caught and stuck, when we're engaged in unwise effort and in resistance, we forget our options. We forget the enormous creativity that is available to us.

Another way to engage resistance is to take each sit and each walk on as an experiment. Sometimes we have this idea that we have to already have a great deal of faith in order to practice. And sometimes we do and sometimes we don't. Everyone here has some, just because here we are and we're not at the movies right now. All of us have some degree of faith operating. And it is really easy for it to completely disappear at times. You can have a huge amount of faith in your daily sittings and feel quite good and serene about them, and then come on a retreat and on the first day the faith just flies out the window. You think that you never had it at all. But it's just the nature of doing this over and over again—sitting and walking and being in this environment. Doubt very often opens, enters in.

So to take each sitting on with a beginner's mind, as an experiment—not planning, not expecting how things will be—saying, "I'm going to just try to be mindful for this sitting, period." Forget about past sittings, forget about the next sitting, forget about sittings to come, and certainly forget about seven days from now. Just this sitting. Is it possible for me to apply wise effort just in this sitting? And then be open to whatever the results may be. The same way with the walking—take them on as discrete entities. Just this sitting, enough. My whole entire life in this sitting. My whole entire life in this walking. And then reassess. I would prefer that you reassessed in seven days and not after each sitting or each walking.

This brings me to another way to engage resistance, which is the encouragement to be like a tea kettle. What I mean by this is to practice leaving the kettle on the stove. Suzuki Roshi talks about putting yourself in the oven until you're done, until the bread is baked. Another way is to just leave the kettle on the stove—not to keep picking it up, not to keep checking, "Is it boiling yet? Am I a Buddha yet?" Just leave the kettle on the stove and see what happens. This allows for a continuity of mindfulness as well.

What we are very interested in, in terms of this art of wise effort, is learning about balanced effort—learning what balanced effort actually is. Oftentimes we swing to either side, just because it's inevitable. This is how we learn in practice, by swinging to either side at times. I had a teacher once whose approach to wise effort was basically, "Sit until you die." That was it. I mean, he said a lot of other things, but you could really sum it up in that one phrase—or that's what I understood him to say. Sit until you die. And then another teacher's approach was, if you have any little slight discomfort or itch or difficulty or whatever, move right away.

Personally, I feel that balanced effort is what is necessary—finding a middle path for ourselves. "Sit until we die"—well, we may never want to practice again if we do that, if we really practice with that approach. And the approach of moving every time there's a little bit of discomfort means we will always be intimidated by discomfort. We will never find our inner strength and inner capacity to be with the pleasurable as well as the difficult if we move every single time. So we see if we can find the middle path, really work with the art of effort.

I had a teacher many years ago, a Tibetan teacher named Tara Tulku. I was going through some kind of difficulty at the time when I was practicing with him, a rather dramatic difficulty, and I couldn't meditate at all. I didn't know what to do. Of course, because of this "sit till you die" approach—I was really in that lineage at the time—I was trying to sit my way through it, continuing with this very striving approach and hoping that it would work. So I went to Tara Tulku and said, "Well, what do you suggest?"

I am trying my best, and yet I'm having a great deal of difficulty with this particular phenomenon.

And what he said to me was, "Go and have some cookies." Go and have some cookies. That was his teaching. That was his advice. Of course I loved it. I had no problem, no resistance at all to the cookie teaching.

But this sense of creativity, of finding the balance within ourselves rather than taking either a striving approach or a lax approach, a lazy approach—seeing if we can simply, from moment to moment, find the middle way. In a way, what we're aiming for is not being lax and not striving. Another way of putting this is the paradox of "be impeccable and take it easy." And you have to say that in the same moment, in the same breath. Be impeccable and take it easy. Not just be impeccable. Not just take it easy. But be impeccable and take it easy. This will serve us well.

What we are practicing is not feeding the fire within—not feeding the difficulties that arise, not feeding the resistance that occurs, not feeding the irritation and the angst and the doubt and the uncertainty and the confusion and the longing, the aversion and the hatred and the anger and the jealousy and the envy and the pain. What we are learning to do is to not feed the fire and to let it burn out on its own. This is the way of practice: to let the inner fires of torment burn out on their own.

We feed the fire by dwelling in the angst, by pushing away and thinking that's going to work when it doesn't, and by being identified with what's happening as who we are. In these moments, we have forgotten to be present. We have forgotten to be mindful. And so inevitably, we are feeding the fire of inner torment.

To stop feeding the fire—Ajahn Chah spoke about it as simply not feeding a cat that comes by. If you don't, then that cat will probably not come to your house any longer. Eventually, the cat will stop coming. It's the same idea: not feeding the fire.

And also, to offer a New England proverb: you can't help trouble from coming, but you don't have to give it a chair to sit down on. Not giving it a chair to sit down on is every single time we remember to be mindful—our efforts going in the direction of mindfulness, of knowing, of awareness, rather than in the direction of our habit of trying to hold on, push away, or identify.

As we all know, or know at least at this point, retreats really are full of a lot of ups and a lot of downs—maybe in the first few days more downs than ups. But life is as well. It's really not any different from being on retreat, other than the conditions. To understand our life, to be free, to find our home in the midst of our life, we have to be in contact. We have to be intimate with what is occurring.

Being with the breath in the way that we are right now, learning how to simply let go and to be with the breath over and over again—over and over again and over and over again—is a training that helps us to be able to sustain our contact with whatever is arising. This is the direction of the practice. We're basically just with the breath right now, and we will be with the breath over the next couple of days.

But eventually the practice opens up so that we are with whatever it is that arises—without being intimidated or crushed by or overwhelmed by or sucked into, seduced by. But we don't have a chance of doing this if we haven't trained our minds to some degree. And we train our minds, we are engaged in training our minds, by being with the breath.

Meditative effort is this effort to connect. It is allowing experiences to come and to go, remembering that happiness does not lie in experiences. It lies in awareness. By enlarging our capacity to be aware, by remembering to be aware—this is how we find a true refuge within. It is how we find this island that can't be overwhelmed by conditions, by floods. It is really how we find our real home.

Our essential work in practice is actually not to try to achieve anything whatsoever. It's actually not to try to get anywhere or achieve anything. Instead, it is to rest within who we already are—that which is always and already free.

Just to end with something by Suzuki Roshi:

"Even though the waves arise, the essence of your mind is pure. It is just like clear water with a few waves. Actually, water always has waves. Waves are the practice of the water."

May all beings have ease of mind. May all beings have steadiness of heart. May all beings live in love and in compassion.

CHAPTER 219

The Five Hindrances

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this comprehensive retreat talk, Carol Wilson provides an in-depth exploration of the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇā) that commonly arise in meditation practice: sensual desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). Rather than viewing these mental states as enemies to be conquered, Wilson reframes them as potential gateways to understanding our true nature—using the metaphor of clouds temporarily obscuring an ever-present sun.
> Wilson emphasizes that these hindrances are not personal failings but impersonal energies arising from conditions. Drawing on teachings from the Dalai Lama, Chinul (the Korean Zen master), Thich Nhat Hanh, and Ajahn Sumedho, she offers practical guidance for each hindrance: the importance of naming and recognizing each state, turning mindful attention to the direct physical and mental experience without suppression or indulgence, and maintaining what she calls "affectionate curiosity." She shares personal examples, including a vivid account of working with fear at night, demonstrating how mindfulness can transform distorted perception into clarity.
> The talk highlights how proper attention to these difficult states can become catalysts for awakening. Wilson encourages practitioners to explore the actual felt experience of each hindrance in the body, noting that desire feels like constriction and leaning forward, anger like burning, and sleepiness like heaviness. By learning to hold these experiences with tenderness rather than aversion, we discover that peace is not something to be achieved but is already present within us.

In the beginning of a retreat, as all students know and as new ones have surely discovered by now, there are several very strong, very familiar emotional energies that arise in our experience. Although they're impermanent, our experience doesn't always seem to indicate that, especially in these early days.

These five emotions or energies are what the Buddha called the five hindrances, and I want to talk about them tonight. I'll name them briefly and then put them in a larger context of our practice before speaking about each one specifically.

These five powerful and common energies can take over our experience, especially in the first days of a retreat. First is the energy of wanting, of craving something. The flip side of that is aversion—anger, hatred, rage, or fear. The third one, which has been mentioned a lot already here, is sleepiness. The formal English name is sloth and torpor, which is just so perfect. The fourth energy is that of restlessness—physical restlessness and mental agitation or worry. And the fifth one, which usually comes along with any of the others, is doubt.

Before I go into them specifically, I'd like to talk a little about the larger context of why we're here. What's the purpose of meditation? Basically, why do we come and sit and walk in order, it seems, to experience the most unpleasant and difficult inner circumstances possible? What's the point?

The Dalai Lama said once, at a conference I was at, that it's crucial to investigate what the true nature of happiness is, what the true source of peace is, so that we can develop a peace that will last. Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. Peace must first be discovered within ourselves and then gradually it will expand to include our family, our community, and the whole planet.

To me, that's the very real purpose of this practice of meditation: to discover the fact that peace is already here within ourselves, within our experience at the present moment. Peace is a manifestation of our true nature from which we're never separated. But somehow, somewhere, we don't know how to recognize this. We seem to have lost touch with it. We don't know how to pay attention in the correct way to recognize what is true. We keep getting distracted, confused. We look in the wrong place, identify with the wrong things.

Chinul, who was the person who brought Zen to Korea, says: "It's tragic. People do not recognize that their own minds are the true Buddhas. They do not recognize that their own natures are the true Dharma. They want to search for the Dharma, yet they still look far away for holy ones. They want to search for the Buddha, yet they will not observe their own minds. I hope that you who cultivate the path will never search outside. The nature of the mind of the heart is unstained. It is originally whole and complete in itself."

That's us he's talking about—that the original state of our mind and heart is unstained, whole and complete in itself.

There are many different ways to talk about how we lose sight of this completeness, why we don't recognize our unstained nature and instead feel like we're in an ongoing struggle with sleep or anger or desire. One simile for how this happens—it's rather simplistic but it helps me put my experience in perspective—is to think of our original, unstained nature as the sun, which all day, every day, also at night, is shining brightly.

Various clouds come over at various times. Sometimes they're really wispy and we sort of see through them; they're no problem. Sometimes they're really thick and dark and strong, and we get so affected by the clouds, so involved in reacting to them, that we completely forget the sun is still shining. Even if we don't see the sun directly, there's still evidence of it in the fact that there's light, that we can see things. But for us, it's just this struggle. We like the clouds. We don't like the clouds. We wish they were different. We're scared they'll never go away. That becomes the limit of our experience, and we get lost in that struggle.

This is how I can relate to the experience of these five hindrances—these five particular emotional, mental, and physical experiences that arise for us frequently in our life and in practice. Sogyal Rinpoche refers to them as emotional and intellectual veils that obscure the nature of mind.

In a large way, I see our practice here, our practice of meditation, as cultivating a non-distractability of mind so that we can recognize and understand these veils, these clouds, for just what they are. We don't have to hide from them. We don't have to fear them or get lost in them. And at the same time, because we see them as they are, we also don't lose sight of the fact that the sun is still shining—that our pure nature hasn't gone anywhere.

And it doesn't mean the clouds have to go away.

The other thing I really like about the way this process of investigation works—learning to see what's really true—is that quite literally for me, the actual presence of one of these torments of the mind or disturbances of the heart (I like those terms better than hindrances, actually; they don't have to be hindrances) can become our avenue into clarity, into understanding. When one of them is present and there is the interest, the curiosity, and the non-distractability of mind to really see it for what it is, the presence of that difficult state can be the catalyst for a moment of awakening, of seeing clearly what's true.

Let me give a very simple example of how this can work. It's not big lights going off—it's just very ordinary experience. The other night, as I was in bed, not yet asleep, fear just arose in my experience. And that's one of the things about these energies: they're not personal. They arise due to conditions, they last for some time, and they go away. Every single one of these goes away. It really doesn't last so long when you pay attention.

So fear arose as I was lying there, and it was a really great chance—on reflection afterwards—to observe both how we get lost in these experiences, how they cloud our perception of reality, and also how the ability to be fully present with it as it is opens up a whole other possibility.

At first there was this sensation of fear, and I got lost in it. When we're lost in these emotions, they cloud how we perceive our reality until they fill up the whole screen. I was lying there, aware of this fear, and there was a sound. I jumped and immediately thought, "My God, a gunshot! I wonder what's going on." It went into this whole spiral. I didn't stop and rationally think there wouldn't be a gunshot. It was just waves of fear. Another sound: "Oh, an explosion! What's going on?" And there would be another big wave of fear.

That's one way we get blinded and distort what we think is true—completely going with that energy, that emotion, letting it fill up the whole world. It distorts everything we perceive. It defines our reality.

The other way we get equally enmeshed is by resisting or denying. I could have lain there—which wasn't the way I went that time; we usually do one or the other—and said, "It's ridiculous to be afraid. There's nothing to be afraid of." Which is also taking it very personally. Someone of your age, at night, with all these people around—and it could go on and on about what I was doing being afraid, calling myself a big sissy, or attributing it to my conditioning, or something that happened when I was a child. Getting into a whole analysis of it, which I've done at other times. We're equally in the grip of it. It's just as much filling up the screen.

Both of these ways of reacting—really going for it or denying and pushing it away—keep us identified. And incidentally, they empower the emotion so that it really starts rolling along. This is how we usually deal with things because it's very deeply conditioned in us. It's a deep force of habit to either resist and deny, take it personally, or get really lost in it. And that's how we suffer. That's how we're blinded.

That night, it was going back and forth. After the sound—"Oh, it's a gunshot, what's going on"—I again recognized fear. And as I'll describe as we go along, what we do is take our mindful attention and simply turn it on the experience of fear itself. Without analyzing, without questioning, without judging it—simply being with fear. Feel it in the body, explore the thoughts that come, but come back and just be with the fear.

It's so interesting: just being directly with the bare experience itself, without expectation, it suddenly opens up into a really clear space. Without looking, my mind goes, "Oh, that sound was just a cabinet slamming in the next bathroom." Suddenly the mind clears up: "Oh, that was just the bath water running in the apartment behind me." In that space of directly being with the experience, clarity opens up by itself. It comes on its own. And it's so clear that it's not personal.

There's one Indian teacher who describes—and I think it's such a perfect description of how this distorts reality—"We miss the real by lack of attention, and we create the unreal by excess of imagination." It's kind of shocking how much this is what's going on.

In seeing things just as they are, in the willingness to simply be present in the midst of experience, a natural peace can emerge even though the experience might still be going on. For instance, the nature of fear is fearful.

I mean, fear is never going to feel happy. The nature of fear is fearful. But even in the midst of that, when there's a calm presence, there can be this opening into seeing that the picture is really much, much wider. Even though fears are rising, there's a huge space of emptiness and calmness around it or within it, however you might happen to experience it.

This is just a small example of how mindfulness—the power of the attitude of okayness and patience and curiosity that James spoke of last night—can transform what is a difficult or confusing experience into one that has the potential for opening us, for reconnecting us with what is true.

I want to speak a little more specifically about each of these energies, mostly to help us recognize them. Which might sound silly—I mean, we all know these states all too well. But when we're in the middle of them, perhaps the most important piece that helps with not identifying, that helps with seeing what's true, is the simple recognition of what it is that's happening.

So this first one: craving, this quality of wanting. It's not just a neutral need, like knowing that you're hungry and needing to go eat. And it's not so much a desire that's skillful, that's associated with intentions such as compassion—for instance, the desire to save a sick bird, motivated purely out of compassion. We're talking here about real craving. And we experience it in our lives pretty continually.

Whatever it is in our life—a new car, a better job, the perfect place to live, the perfect relationship—what's interesting is that when we come on retreat, the same quality of craving, the same degree of energy, can go into trying to find the perfect sitting position, the perfect chair or the perfect zafu. It can go into searching the whole desert to find the best walking place so that your walking period is really pristine and clear. And we can suffer enormously. It doesn't matter what the object is. It's this quality of obsessive craving.

Our tendency to get lost in this is so strong that usually what we do is project it out into the environment, into the object, so that we can get completely absorbed in it. "If only the weather were different, everything would be okay." Well, the weather changed today. How long was everything okay? It just isn't where peace lies. And in our continuing to project the energy outward, looking to different objects to give us that peace, we just keep on going.

Okay, now it's warm—but something else comes up. Perhaps it gets too warm, or perhaps the food wasn't right today, or perhaps you wish you'd brought some different kind of clothes. On and on and on. It's endless. This quality of craving is endless when we don't stop and look at the energy of desire itself.

And it's really a kind of suffering, because we feel so discontented, so much needing something that isn't here. It's this constant looking outside for peace that keeps us from seeing that peace is right here all the time.

I could talk endlessly about craving—it's really a key part of the Buddha's teaching, one of the linchpins of how our ignorance is perpetuated day to day. So I could go on and on about this. I'm just introducing it very lightly here.

One yogi said at a retreat, just observing the endless quality of craving—she got so fed up with seeing it arise over and over that she decided she'd try to satisfy every craving that came up and see if that wore it out. She came in sheepishly a few days later and said, "Well, it only got worse. It didn't help at all."

So when we're caught in craving here, it might take us some time to recognize it. But at some point, after we've gone through "if only I had this, if only I had that, if only this were different," suddenly: "Oh, this is desire. This is craving." This is a very key moment—this point of recognition, of being able to name what is actually happening. Craving is an actual experience in the moment. Being able to take the attention, the mindfulness, and turn it onto the craving itself—this is really the key tool of mindfulness, one of the essential things we're learning to cultivate in this practice. And it applies to anything that's going on, but we're learning how to give bare attention to the experience.

So you're lost in desire after desire, and there's something subtly pleasant about desire when we're not paying attention. Notice how you can get into, say, a food fantasy, and you go on and on and it feels really pleasant—much more pleasant than sitting here and being with the breath. But when you wake up and here you are again, what's the actual experience? Did that bring you ultimately more pleasure? Or does it make everything else more unsatisfactory?

So anyway, when you notice that desire is happening, naming is extremely helpful. Use this soft mental label—"desire, desire, desire"—and keep on labeling very softly for as long as it's there. Most of the attention then being not... now you're not taking a sledgehammer and going, "DESIRE, DESIRE!" You're simply acknowledging in a very non-judgmental way that desire is what's present right now. That's all. There's no shame, there's no judgment. It's simply an arising energy. So the label is very soft.

And then we take our attention and explore the experience itself. For instance, there's a kind of quality of desire in the mind, an emotional quality. But what I find for myself, by far the most helpful way to stay grounded in the actual experience of desire, is to turn the attention onto its physical manifestation. Explore: what does desire feel like? Sitting here, not thinking about what I want, not getting into the story, but turning around and feeling desire directly. When I feel this, I notice a kind of tightness, a constriction, a pressure, a heaviness, almost a leaning forward. You can change the note at that time from "desire" to "heaviness," "constriction," "tightness," "burning." Very simple. Very direct experience. It's not complicated. Really approach it with an air of curiosity. Well, what is desire? If it runs so much of my life, why can't I explore it and see what this thing actually is?

One thing you might discover—actually, I'm pretty sure you'll discover it—is that the actual state of desire itself is not so pleasant. This kind of yearning is physically unpleasant for me, this yearning for something else. It's rather unpleasant. And we begin to see why we get so intent on achieving the object of our desire. Because what happens when we get it? Ah, peace. Everything's okay.

When you're noticing and being mindful of desire, just staying with it, letting it do whatever it does without suppressing it but without feeding it by going and getting something—what do we find? Suddenly, at some point, without doing anything other than being with it, the desire goes away. And it might be ever so briefly, but notice the experience. When the desire is gone, it's just the same as if you'd gotten what you wanted. It's that same "ah, peace." The desire is not present.

This is a kind of clue. We begin to see that what we're really desiring isn't so much whatever it is out there, because that can keep being replaced with something else. It's somehow the sense of completeness that we yearn for. The sense of peace. The sense of unity, of oneness. And that's already here. That's already here.

Turning our attention onto the process of desire reveals something important. The process of desire is one of the things that fools us, one of the things that keeps us looking away from what's already here and always true.

Part of why we cultivate attention to the breath is simply to develop enough focus and non-distractibility of mind and heart, enough stability of attention, to be able to stay with a more complicated and difficult experience like desire and see it for just what it is. It's really fascinating, this process. And it might sound complex, but we'll all have plenty of time to explore it and to see how it works, just what the experience of desire is for you. Don't take my word for it. Really look and see for yourself.

The second torment of the heart, or hindrance, is the flip side of desire. It runs a whole range and stems from wanting to be separated from what is unpleasant, just as desire is wanting to come together with what we experience as pleasant. Aversion has a whole spectrum, from mild dislike, irritation, annoyance, to real anger, to uncontrollable rage. It also includes boredom, which is a sort of slight aversion to what's going on and an out-of-touchness with what's happening. And it includes fear, which is a kind of retreating aversion—whereas anger is going outward, fear is pulling back.

When we begin to see how aversion manifests, or how anger or fear shows up in our experience, it's pretty obvious that it's unpleasant. Anger is a kind of burning for me, especially in the heart, and it leaves an impression, a physical impression in my being, even long after it's passed on.

Again, when we're not noticing the presence of the energy of anger or fear or aversion itself, one moment of aversion tends to condition the next, so that it starts really spiraling in a way that can get out of control, seeming so huge. Or we can project it outwards onto our experience, and where what's really happening is just the arising of aversion in the mind, what we experience is that everything that comes into our awareness is disgusting and aversive.

And if we really think that's true, it leads to a lot of suffering.

I know on one retreat I was on, I saw this very clearly. I was sitting in the dining room and—this is what's so tricky—I thought I was really calm and clear. And yet somehow everyone who walked by was sloppy or unmindful or making a lot of noise, or wearing a stupid outfit, or showing off their slow walking. And these were friends of mine. I knew all these people. It took ten or fifteen minutes of this before I saw, "Oh, I guess this is aversion."

At that point, the willingness to shift attention from what was wrong with everybody who came by to the actual experience of aversion—in some ways it's a huge relief just to know what's really going on. It isn't pleasant. Again, as with desire, the experience of anger and aversion in our own mental and physical process isn't pleasant. And it's easy to see why we tend to go with the outer projections of it. This isn't to deny that things can happen that are really off, or that people do things that are genuinely harmful. But it's still important to know in ourselves what the experience of aversion, what the experience of anger or fear actually is.

So again, the ability to name is so powerful. It takes this experience of anger, fear, or aversion out of the realm of the magical, where it seems to be controlling everything—like that fear I was in the other night. It could have seemed like a magical experience that turned the most mundane into the most horrific things. The naming of it as "fear" has a huge effect of helping us not identify with it, of being in the actuality of the moment and not taking it so personally.

When you're aware—whether it's just as anger, aversion, or fear is arising, or whether it's three days into it—it doesn't matter. The moment that you can name it is very important. And continue just naming: "This is aversion, aversion, anger, anger, anger." Most likely, if you're just present with it, it's not going to go on all day. It'll pass. It might come back again, but it'll pass. And it's really important to see this discontinuity—it also takes away a sense of power that we can give to these states of mind.

As you're naming, turn the mindful attention onto the actual experience itself. It's very helpful to notice how it's manifesting in the body as well as in the mind. This is a very delicate line we're walking, a very delicate balance of not suppressing it—"I'm not angry, there's no aversion, there's no need to have aversion, everything's fine"—that doesn't help. And not getting lost in it, indulging it, as I was when I was just blaming everybody who walked by and taking that to be true.

A very delicate line of allowing the full manifestation of the fear, the aversion, the anger in the body. Tightness, burning, burning, burning. It's okay if it's burning for fifteen minutes. It's unpleasant, but that's just what's happening. That's where we bring in the patience, the okayness, the equanimity. At some point, we start to see its true nature—that it does pass, and it isn't personal.

This is from Thich Nhat Hanh on being with anger, this line of balance: "The Buddhist attitude is to take care of anger. We don't suppress it and we don't run away from it. We just breathe and hold our anger in our arms with utmost tenderness. Becoming angry at your anger only doubles it and makes you suffer more. But on the other hand, if you just leave it alone, it will become destructive and run wild. You can say and do angry things. Or if you don't say or do angry things, it will continue to destroy you inwardly. So the Buddhist practice is to recognize your anger as anger."

I like that image—we recognize it, but the recognition is a holding it in our arms with care. We don't hate it either. This is hard for us. It's not an easy thing to do, and we'll all get lost one way or the other many, many times. This is fine. This is how we learn. Please don't set up some ideal of perfection—"I notice anger the moment it comes up and then it's all clear."

It's not like that. It's a practice. But to me, just that image of recognizing anger and cradling it in your arms really helps give me a sense of the balance involved.

When we're exploring anger, fear, desire—any of these emotions—in this way, what I find is that it begins to open up a huge space around them, so that we no longer need to fear their arising. I know there are times I've been sitting under a tree, living in dread that aversion is going to come back. It's so pleasant now that it's gone. But this learning to just be with it as it is can open up a huge space where we don't have to be so controlled by these energies. We don't so much have to fear their presence. Rather, they can be a signal for us to pay attention and wake up.

Without that capacity, these energies really do tend to control our experience—even in little ways. A friend of mine was telling me the other day that he'd been in a fast food restaurant and had a little interaction with the man in front of him. Pretty mild, but the man clearly got very irritated at him. Then later, as my friend walked out—you know how sometimes you go to these places where you're putting in the ketchup and cream in your coffee—he just walked by at a distance, and this man caught sight of him. Just the sight of him got the man so upset he spilled his coffee. Just so irritated. What's really going on there? If we have the ability at that time of the first irritation to simply be with the anger, we don't have to keep letting it be re-energized in us from every sight, every sound. It might be unpleasant, but it's workable.

Now, sloth and torpor—the third hindrance. I know a lot of you are quite familiar with this by now. It's the falling asleep syndrome, whether you're on the zafu or walking. It's also a kind of dreamy, hypnagogic state that you can get into, one that's sometimes very pleasant and seductive. Often it's much easier to kind of dream your way through the sitting, or it can even feel like a sort of clear space. It's much more pleasant than coming back to the breath or the body.

One of our teachers, Sayadaw U Pandita, describes sloth and torpor as like congealed butter—the mind is like congealed butter, with no flexibility. Someone said today that the experience of trying to practice with sloth and torpor is like walking through mud.

Again, recognizing its presence is the first important step. The second one that for me has been most helpful is not taking it personally. It took me years and years not to take sloth and torpor personally—as if it was somehow a sign of a deep personal failing that sleepiness arose in the meditation and it wasn't crystal clear. Saying it, it sounds crazy, but I know I'm not the only one. From talking to people, I know of practitioners who've gone through literally weeks of deep inner torment on a three-month course because sleepiness was arising.

So it's really interesting to look at how much we're caught by our reactions to a particular energy. What is sloth and torpor? It's an imbalance of energy. The energy that we have is always going to fluctuate. We come into a retreat having been really busy, really tired. What do we expect? That we're going to sit down and be incredibly crystal clear? Everything is a result of conditions. Nothing exists on its own. And the condition of most of our lives means that in the first few days of a retreat, it's almost inevitable that at some point the body is going to be really tired or the mind is going to be really sluggish. Once in a while that doesn't happen, but it's a pretty common experience, and it's not personal.

At other times in the retreat, this sleepiness or real dullness of mind arises because there's an imbalance in our experience of concentration and energy. It's possible to be really, really concentrated, but if there's not enough energy in your system, you think you're really concentrated—and you are—and the next thing you know you're waking up and you don't know how that happened. So it's also not personal when you start to see it's just the way that different mental factors come together in our experience.

Sometimes also, a real dullness or sleepiness of mind will come about as a sort of unconscious resistance to some difficult experience that's about to surface. Well, you can't do much about that. You don't know what it is, and you can't make it hurry along. That's not helpful.

So in all of these cases, the only obvious thing to do is to go, "Oh yeah, sleepiness, dullness," and name it—with kindness, without judgment, with affection, simply noticing its presence. Then, as a skillful means, there are different ways we can bring up energy, sort of balance the system. It won't always make us more alert. And if we're using the skillful means but with the motivation of aversion—"I hate this sleepiness, so I'm going to really note it until it goes away"—once in a while that might work, because actually anger and aversion are quite energizing.

But you've just moved then from sloth and torpor to aversion, and some people like that one better. We all have our favorites.

But if you can just notice the tone with which you're labeling, you can pretty soon catch on if that's your motivation. And then, as a skillful means without aversion, you can begin to really note and label and explore the experience of sleepiness itself, or dullness itself. It can actually get quite interesting. How do you know that you're sleepy? What are the physical sensations of sleepiness? Try to be really accurate in labeling it and in noticing it, because that takes a little energy to do. And instead of using up your last vestiges of energy by doing it, what actually happens is it brings on more energy.

But again, Sayadaw U Pandita says that sloth and torpor hates effort. You know, that voice that says, "No, if I really note this it'll just make me so much more tired." It's not like that. So when you notice you're sleepy, if you really explore—what is it? Is there a kind of heaviness? Heaviness, heaviness, heaviness. You notice a kind of grittiness in the eyes maybe. Grittiness, grittiness. Dropping, nodding, nodding. And then when you can't note anymore, you know the mindfulness has slipped away again. That's okay. When you wake up, even if you're only awake for two minutes of that sitting, that's still two minutes of presence. That's better than if you were sleeping the whole time. You have to look at the positive side. You can tell I've spent a lot of time in sloth and torpor.

I'm being a bit silly, but actually this real investigation at times brings a genuine energy into the mind, and the mind kind of opens up and the energy comes back. And it's really quite amazing, because one of our problems with these states is that we think they're going to last forever. When you're in sloth and torpor, if you knew it was going to go away in fifteen minutes, you wouldn't really be so upset. But somehow if you look at what's the assumption underneath your aversion, the assumption is usually, "This is how I'm going to spend the rest of my life," or at least the rest of this retreat, or even just the rest of this sitting. How about just taking things moment to moment? In this moment, exploring the actual experience of tiredness, of sleepiness—it's not so bad. It might be a little unpleasant, but it's kind of interesting, just seeing it for what it is.

Now, I know that there are times when this is way beyond the pale, and the ability to even make a label of sleepiness isn't there because it's way too far gone. Again, without aversion to it, but simply as a way to balance the energy, all the things we've mentioned before: you can focus a little bit on your posture, just sit erect—not in a forced way, as someone else said today—more kind of subtly, feeling your spine, tuning in inside. You can open the eyes, focus them down, not looking around. I've found that light, bringing in light, somehow energizes the system. Standing up can help. Something the Buddha spoke of in one of his discourses, although it hasn't worked for me, is pinching your earlobes. But if the Buddha said it, it must work for some people. If I'm having a long wave of real dullness, I might tend to walk longer because it's often easier to be present in the walking.

And again, notice how and when this state of dullness and sloth and torpor dissipates. Because it will. There's no way it's going to last forever. And often we don't notice the endings of things, or we forget, and like six hours later remember, "Oh yeah, I was so sleepy this morning—I wonder what happened to that." So simply noticing that things end also helps us experience the fact that it's not ourselves, that it's really quite an impersonal energy.

So then the flip side of this is restlessness in the body—that you just can't sit still, you just want to jump out of your skin and run screaming out of the hall. Or the corollary in the mind of just a spinning, circling kind of thinking that's clearly not going anywhere, but the mind is just running at the speed of light. And you can't really focus on anything, you can't really settle on anything. It's the most uncomfortable experience.

And again, to recognize it for what it is. It doesn't make it go away. It doesn't make it more pleasant. But it really helps us to just be with what is. In the physical, you might notice you're changing posture, changing posture—this is wrong and that is wrong. Then suddenly you notice, "Oh, this is restlessness." What it does is really widen the frame. So instead of focusing on this particular little pain, that particular little nudge, this particular discomfort, there's a whole wide sky of consciousness, and within it is all the experience of restlessness coming and going, coming and going, coming and going.

If you really widen—it's almost as if you can imagine doing this, widening your consciousness so that it's as wide as the sky. Within that vastness, the restlessness can arise and pass, arise and pass. It's uncomfortable, but it can come and go. If you try to really focus down physically, you find it can actually increase the restlessness. Just as you find that if you move and keep moving when you're restless, what happens is you get more restless. You think, "If I don't move this leg, I'm going to die." But once you move this leg, then suddenly you have to move that toe, and suddenly you have to move your shoulder, and it just kind of escalates.

So sometimes just play with it. This is for physical restlessness—widening the scope and just letting it all come and go. As Jack likes to say, you know, die of restlessness. Be the first person to die of it and just see what happens. Chances are you won't die.

Now for mental agitation, this just spinning, spinning, spinning of mind, sometimes it's very helpful to simplify. Don't try to follow every thought and note every thought and get to the root of things. You're just exacerbating the restless energy of mind. It can be very helpful to simplify. Just go back to the breath. I know all these thoughts are running around. We know they're there. Just let them run around. Go back to the breath, sometimes even counting the breath, just from one to ten, one to ten. Get very simple. This can sort of calm us down enough to be there, at least to know that that's what's going on.

Again, restlessness is another imbalance of energy. It's way, way a lot of energy and not enough balanced with concentration and calm. This coming back to the breath and just being simple, just counting one to ten, is bringing in focus, one-pointedness of mind, and this can help to balance this out-of-balance energy.

And the last one is a very interesting quality of mind—that of doubt. Doubt can be experienced usually as thinking, and it often arises from too much thinking, and it leads to more thinking, so it just escalates itself on endlessly. Usually it's not that hard to recognize. We often get so caught up in the analyzing that we forget to recognize it. And it manifests just very simply as: "I can't do this. It's impossible. This is the stupidest thing. This is the wrong time. This is the wrong meditation. These are the wrong people. My back hurts too much. The weather's bad. It's just impossible." Just like that. So it's self-doubt, doubt in the meditation, doubt in whatever.

What's so insidious about doubt is that when it's present and we're caught in it, when we don't recognize it, it makes it impossible for us to actually wholeheartedly pay attention to what's happening right now. Because it just starts escalating. We don't believe in the efficacy of that. So we start trying to figure out, "Well, gee, maybe this is the wrong time. Maybe it would be better if I came next year, and it's the wrong time because I was sick two weeks ago and my energy's kind of low. Or maybe it's not. I don't know. How would I know that?" And you just start going on and on. Meanwhile, any sense of mindfulness or presence is out the window. It's very tricky.

Doubt, you'll also notice, tends to arise almost always when any one of the other hindrances is present in a strong way. So we get lost in aversion—we're having a lot of aversion, a lot of sleepiness—almost always, "Oh, it's too much sleepiness. I can't do this. I should go home. I should never have come."

And then we're into what we call a multiple hindrance attack. And that's usually how they come – it's rarely just one.

So with doubt, it's very important to recognize it, to name it as doubt, and to continue naming it without getting caught or sucked off into the content. And mind you, the content will be very enticing. It'll really be quite seductive.

I think one of the reasons that it can be so seductive is because noticing doubt and naming doubt and not giving into it as a hindrance is not the same thing as having to accept everything on blind faith. We are a very skeptical culture, and most of us are so taught that we're going to come to understanding through reasoning. I know for me this is very deeply engrained in an unconscious way. And so to be able to wholeheartedly say, "This is just doubt, doubt, doubt," and not somewhere get seduced into the "yeah, but" – it goes against so much of my conditioning that it's easy to get caught up.

I do want to say that recognizing doubt, continuing to note it, not getting sucked into the content is important. And it doesn't mean that you're giving up your own initiative. It doesn't mean that you have to accept everything we say, or the Buddha said, or anyone says on blind faith. One of the basic teachings of the Buddha was: don't believe anything just because I say it, or just because you hear it, but try it and see for yourself if it leads you to less suffering, if it leads you to peace.

So that's very important. But again, he said try it and see for yourself. If we're spinning in analyzing, we'll never have the chance to try it. So when I'm really hooked on a particularly seductive doubt in retreat, I'll acknowledge it and I'll say, "Okay, not now. At the end of this retreat there'll be plenty of time for reflection and for also seeing how this is affecting my life." It certainly is not putting aside our own understanding. But if every time something's difficult we get caught up in analyzing it, it's just going to be tremendous suffering, and we'll never be able to just see what's going on now.

The antidote to doubt in meditation is sustained attention. Because when doubt's going, you just can't focus. So keep on noting: doubt, doubt, doubt, doubt. And then really connect with something that's happening – your breath, a sensation in the body, another emotion, whatever else is arising next. Really notice it. Connect with it. And you might find you forgot that doubt was even going on.

So these are these five energies. I know it's a lot, talking about them all like this, but the way of working with them all – aside from a few little tricks for each one – is basically this naming, this affectionate curiosity, just exploring the actual experience of it. And they really do lead us into an opening that helps us see what's true.

Mindfulness is a huge ally in this. Thich Nhat Hanh likes to talk about how a rose becomes garbage when you throw it away, but then we use the garbage to make compost and that turns into another rose. And how can you separate any of it out? I really feel, just in this way, any of these energies can become a vehicle in that moment for our greater understanding, can become a vehicle for awakening to what is true – when we can name them, explore them, have some balance of equanimity with them, and let them come and go and open into what's really happening right now.

Often they'll be overwhelming. We'll get really lost and the mindfulness is not there. This is okay. These are strong habits of our mind. But more and more often you'll find that it's not so. You'll be in the middle of some kind of mental rampage of restlessness, and suddenly out of nowhere: "Oh, restlessness!" And there's a sense of just releasing – these physical sensations, mental reactions, emotional overtones, coming and going – and it changes.

Even within that there can be the realization that this is not who we are. That there's something much vaster and always present that is not in the least bit affected, that actually is not even separate from the restlessness. We don't have to hate it so much.

I really feel like it's not a mistake that these energies come up so strongly in the beginning of practice. Because if they didn't come up, if we just came and sat in bliss the whole time – well, if it stayed like that for the rest of our life, that would be okay. Since most likely it doesn't, or won't, then the fact that these difficult energies come up is really a gift. Because how else are we going to be able to discover what they really are, and that it's not who we are? How else can we discover how we get blinded by desire, by aversion, by restlessness or doubt or sleepiness? How do we get so caught in them that we get so busy fighting them that we forget that peace is accessible right now? That the sun is always shining in our heart, and that we can contact that, that we can recognize that more and more when we don't have to fear difficult or unpleasant experiences that are arising.

I want to close by reading my favorite quotation from Ajahn Sumedho about working with these hindrances:

"In life, wisdom arises within us when we understand the things we are experiencing here and now. You don't have to do anything special. You don't have to experience all kinds of extreme pain in order to transcend pain. The pain of your ordinary life is enough to be enlightened with."

So let's just sit for a couple of minutes. Whatever is arising right now in your experience can be the gateway to truth—if we can just trust that enough.

CHAPTER 220

Balancing Compassion With Equanimity

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this heartfelt dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most challenging aspects of spiritual practice: how to genuinely care about suffering while maintaining the equanimity needed to respond wisely rather than reactively. Drawing from the opening verses of the Dhammapada, she establishes that our happiness and sorrow originate within our own minds, setting the foundation for understanding how we can transform our relationship to pain.

Wilson shares personal stories that illuminate the difference between true compassion—described as the quivering of the heart in response to suffering—and its near enemy of pity or grief, which involves separation and aversion. She explains how compassion requires openness to unpleasantness without drowning in it, while equanimity provides the understanding that allows us to face any pain without shutting down. The three marks of existence (anicca, dukkha, anattā) serve as perspectives that help us welcome difficult experiences like waves on a seashore, neither repressing nor indulging them.

The talk also explores the brahmavihāra practice of equanimity with its powerful phrase: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and sorrow depend upon your actions, not upon my wishes for you." Wilson emphasizes that freedom exists only in the present moment when we are not identified with what's happening, and that even small acts of genuine care can have transformative effects. She concludes with reflections on humor as an essential quality for maintaining lightness in the face of suffering, and the importance of doing what we can while letting go of control over outcomes.

Balancing Compassion With Equanimity

Balancing care with detachment. Balancing compassion with equanimity.

The very first lines of the Dhammapada start like this: "Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief. They are all mind wrought. If with an impure mind a person speaks or acts, suffering follows one like the wheel that follows the foot of an ox." The next lines are: "Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief. They are all mind wrought. If with a pure mind a person speaks or acts, happiness follows one like a never-departing shadow."

The Buddha taught that our happiness and our sorrow originate within ourselves. They are all mind-wrought. All beings who take birth want to be happy. The Buddha's teachings were meant to relieve suffering at the deepest level. Learning how to balance opening to suffering, caring about suffering, and having understanding or wisdom developing detachment—this balance is actually how we learn to relieve suffering at the deepest level.

Finding some context for understanding the suffering and the pain in our lives and in this world means facing this world, facing reality just as it is, accepting it with unconditional acceptance, and then coming to understand it. The process will then happen on deeper and deeper levels of reality, and hence deeper and deeper levels of wisdom or understanding.

There's a play called The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe, written by Jane Wagner. Lily Tomlin plays the role of the person speaking these lines: "I made some studies, and reality is the leading cause of stress amongst those in touch with it. I can take it in small doses, but as a lifestyle, I found it too confining. Reality was just too needful. It expected me to be there for it all the time. And with all I have to do, I had to let something go."

Facing reality—it's not easy. That's why I read that. What we usually do is let it go. And that's why we're here at this retreat. As you can see, it's not easy.

I was sitting a retreat in Australia last year for about five weeks. We were all pretty quiet around, I think, about a month into the course, and this high school band started marching through the retreat center where we were sitting while we were all quiet doing walking meditation. The tune they were playing was "When the Saints Come Marching In." It was really loud, just going right by where I was doing walking meditation. It seemed really funny to me. I had one of those laughing fits that you can't control when you're doing Vipassana, but you hope nobody's around when you're having it.

Then I thought, well, this is a great song for a Vipassana retreat. It could be a theme song. When the saints go marching in—a saint is someone who has totally let go of control of life through complete surrender to how reality is, how life is. Life is this constant stream of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. Learning to open to life, to open to reality, to care about life, but also to be detached from it, to not have to hold on to pleasurable feelings, to not push away unpleasant feelings—this is the life of the saint. The mind becomes like water. It just flows with life, with reality as it is. This takes a tremendous balance of care, openness of heart, and detachment.

Coming to terms with the suffering within how reality appears for us in this world, opening to it, understanding it, and then responding in any way that we feel is appropriate, requires this balance I'm talking about—compassion and equanimity.

There was so much pain in my childhood. It was so overwhelming that the only refuge I had was nature, was my sanity. I learned that if I just went out in nature and waited—sometimes I had to wait a very long time—there would be this stillness and quiet, and I would have this rest and calm in which I could face another day of my family life.

I didn't learn how to open to pain in that process. What brought me to the practice was really seeing that that wasn't enough. It was a lot to learn how to be quiet and peaceful, to have the energy to face another day, but I wasn't really able to open to the suffering, to care about it, but also to be detached.

When I went to college I found a professor who was a naturalist. He was one of the first environmentalists in this country. One of the projects he gave me—he was like my first guru—was for a whole winter and spring semester to find a bush and spend at least thirty minutes to an hour every day with this bush.

That was my project for six months. Every day I would go to this bush and draw it, or meditate beside it, or simply stare at it. I read about it whether it was snowing or raining or very sunny. Through many different swings of mood—from very difficult to very happy to very neutral—I would go to this place I called my spot. And when spring came and the bush flowered, it was one of the most ecstatic moments of my life. I had become so connected to this bush, so caring about it. It was a very wonderful teaching.

This teacher hooked me because he understood my love of nature, but he also understood my total aversion to study. So he lured me into the world of studying nature by first letting me love it. That was my predilection, actually—just the loving of it. I ended up taking twenty-three credits studying birds and plants, botany, all kinds of things.

What struck me about him was that he had developed in his world this extraordinary balance of loving nature while also having this ability to keenly, very precisely study nature, to observe nature. He taught me that I could get to know anything in nature—whether it was a bird or an insect or a plant or an animal—in many different ways. I could write stories about them. I could spend time with them. I could learn their scientific names, and by learning their scientific names I could get to know their family, their habits, their conditioning, their history.

I trusted this teacher because he cared about what he was learning, what he was studying. I needed that love before I could trust him. What he was learning about wasn't a cold, detached study but a very connected and caring, intimate experience with nature. It wasn't separate, because he cared.

There's a great saying that I think exquisitely expresses this balance of care, love, and understanding. This is a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj. He said, "Love tells me I'm everything. Wisdom tells me I'm nothing. And between the two my life flows." To me, that's all we need to know.

I wanted to speak a little bit about compassion. Sharon will talk more about compassion tomorrow night. You've probably heard this already—compassion, the Buddha taught, was the quivering of the heart in response to suffering. It's an openness to the suffering, not a feeling of being separate from it.

The near enemy of compassion or caring is pity or grief, because in those moments we feel a separation from the suffering. Near enemy means that it can look like compassion. It masquerades as compassion. But we're really feeling sorry for someone or ourselves. There's an aversion to the unpleasantness of the suffering; we're not open to it. The far enemy of compassion is cruelty—the actual harming of ourselves or another. The reason it's the far enemy is because we cannot feel this care or compassion and cruelty at the same time.

Compassion isn't sorrow. It's actually a very wonderful feeling of just caring. The heart is very tender. I remember when I was doing the compassion practice this spring, there were so many times when I would fall into grief or pity. I learned slowly, by noticing when it would shift to this very pleasant feeling of care, that this is what compassion was. But you'll find when you do it that a lot of grief comes up, a lot of sadness, because you're facing the suffering, facing reality, touching the unpleasantness.

I kept thinking I wanted to be compassionate all the time right now. But you'll actually learn about the near enemy a great deal if you practice it consistently. Eventually you'll start to see the difference between that pleasant feeling of care and the grief or sorrow, which includes aversion to the unpleasantness.

This openness of heart that's required for us to touch the suffering and not feel separate needs to be balanced with equanimity, understanding, or detachment. If the heart is overly engaged and not balanced with understanding, usually it will start to want to get rid of the suffering. We want to eliminate the pain in ourselves or others from this aversion to the unpleasantness. Our hearts can so easily be overwhelmed or broken by too much suffering, too much pain, when we don't have this balance of understanding that makes the heart strong. This is when sorrow happens—when we get overwhelmed by the suffering.

If you consider how much suffering there is in this world... I don't want to go into the morbid details, but if you just look at hunger on this planet. Or any kind of violence, war, how children are treated, disease—just offhand as I'm thinking. There is so much suffering in this world. And it's actually possible to transform our awareness of suffering into compassion.

It takes practice, but we can do it. Compassion doesn't mean avoiding the pain. It means allowing it, accepting it, understanding it.

When I first came to IMS to be on staff, I was a cook here. I also had the job of taking care of the garden and all the plants in the building. I grew very attached to the plants here.

A monk named Taungpulu Sayadaw came, who was a very powerful teacher. I was having problems because the plants had a lot of bugs in them when I arrived, and I was trying very hard to keep this precept of not killing, which I was just learning about. I hadn't really been familiar with this precept before. So I was doing my best, but I was getting very frustrated.

I went to Taungpulu Sayadaw and said, "Can I kill the bugs on these plants? I can't stand it anymore." And he said, "Do the best you can to save the plants, but don't kill the bugs. Whatever you do, don't kill the bugs." It was really hard for me. It was a really hard teaching. I was very new to the practice. I had only done one retreat, and I didn't really understand.

There was a gradual process for me, and certain events helped deepen this teaching of care and wisdom. When I was on staff, I was driving to Amherst one day, and there was a huge snapping turtle in the road that had just been hit. I pulled off to the side and went out to see the turtle. It was still alive, but the whole shell had been smashed. It was obvious that it wasn't going to make it.

Again, there was this sense—that thought—"I want to put it out of its misery. I should kill it." But then there was this monk's voice saying, "Whatever you do, don't kill." So I scooped up the turtle and carried it under a pine tree. And I did metta with the turtle until it died.

But the turtle didn't ever leave me. The turtle kept coming up in my sittings from then on. At a certain point, I discovered that this was all on the surface of an experience I had as a child of watching my mother dying. As a child, I didn't understand that there could be that much pain in this world. And I think that with the amount of suffering in this world, we have very hard lessons in learning what compassion really is.

I saw a movie recently with Stephen called The Doctor. I don't know how many of you have seen it. It's a great movie about a doctor who had been trained very well technically. He was a great surgeon, but he had no idea what it was like to be suffering, what it was like to be a patient in a modern hospital, how it was to be treated there. And in the course of the movie, this doctor gets cancer. He's diagnosed with malignant cancer.

The story is this transformation of a person from being, I would call, almost nearly uncompassionate. They made it extreme in the movie—you didn't see a trace of compassion in him at the beginning. And then he slowly starts to open up, because he was treated just like he had been treating people. His heart started to open.

The movie was very hard for me to watch at times, and I wasn't quite sure what was going on for me. But when I left, I started to see—uh-oh, here's this difficulty I had as a child, because my mother was in and out of hospitals, in and out of nursing homes, and she was treated very coldly at times. So I had to, again, for what seems like the millionth time, sort out: there was the way she was treated that I didn't understand at the time, that I had a lot of aversion for. There was her actual death. There was the loss for myself. And then there was the way she died, which was so lonely.

I think that's the most painful thing for me—that she really didn't have anybody. Death isn't really so bad, really, if there's somebody supporting you. And also, what it felt like to touch her corpse. The warmth of the body to very cold. It really hit me like lightning when I touched her body and it was so cold.

I was very different from other children after that. I had a different way of seeing the world from that experience at such a young age. I was searching so deeply for understanding because of it. And so much of it was because of this thing I'm talking about—being able to open to the pain and also understand it. I was trying to understand it, but I couldn't even open to it as a child.

But it was just always pushing me to search for that understanding.

So we all have to learn over and over and over the difference between compassion and aversion. It's not like you get it once and then it's over. That's not how it is. We get these lessons over and over.

When we wish someone to be free from suffering, it doesn't mean that we're wishing them to be free from suffering out of aversion to the unpleasantness. It's very critical that compassion has this understanding with it—that we're just caring for the person, or caring for the pain in ourselves. Just caring. And we wish that it ends, but we can't control that it ends. So the wish is important, but we have to let go of control.

The way that we learn how to let go of control is through detachment and equanimity. We learn to open and care with compassion. The understanding comes through detachment, through equanimity.

There's a saying attributed to Kuan Yin, who is the bodhisattva of compassion: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?" This is a great one if you're having trouble. The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm? And this is all about learning this understanding, this detachment.

If there's sadness, we can start to see that there is no one sad. There is just sadness arising and passing away, like a cloud moving through the open, vast blue sky. There is no solid self behind the process. Sadness can be seen like emotional waves rising up on the seashore and then passing. We can learn to open to pain and not identify with it. That not identifying with it is the detachment. We can learn to be with it and let it go.

Some of our greatest teachers are the unpleasant feelings that actually arise in our life, because they teach us how to work with aversion rather than wanting to get rid of it. So if you're having knee pain or back pain, if you're having any emotional pain, or if maybe the sound of somebody snoring drives you crazy, or somebody coughing, or maybe we're having aversion to aversion itself, or aversion to fear—whatever it is, these are actually the things that help us learn how to work with aversion. They are the teacher.

So say we're having difficulty learning how to experience grief or anger. I'm talking about this in relationship to pain because that's what the talk is about—how do we open to suffering? Say we're having difficulty with experiencing aversion to pain, whether it's inside or outside ourselves. This has to do with unpleasant sensations. It's not that we want to get rid of the anger, because that keeps reinforcing the anger. But when aversion or grief arises, we can learn to accept it simply because it's happened.

And then we can start learning how to have the perspective of anicca—that it's impermanent. We can have the perspective of dukkha—that we can't control it, but it's arisen. There's this uncertainty, insecurity. And then we can have the perspective of anatta with it—that there's no solid separate self behind this process.

Wisdom, and the detachment that comes with wisdom, involves seeing with these three perspectives, or from one of these three perspectives at any given time. Dukkha is the understanding that we can't control that it has arisen. Anicca is that sense that it's just coming and going. Anatta is not taking it as me or I or mine. And if we have one of these three perspectives, or all three—which is when wisdom is really strong—we see that there's no need to repress the aversion or grief, and there's no need to indulge it. We can just let it come and go. We welcome it just like you would a wave on the seashore, and it will pass.

Equanimity is that very sweet, very deep balance of mind when we're not at war with things, when we're not fighting the unpleasantness that comes with life. It's so sweet because it's the opposite of the reacting mind. It's this deep, unconditional acceptance.

When this is strong, when we have the strength to actually let these unpleasant things in life come and go—we feel it fully and let it come and go—there's no more fear of feeling the unpleasantness, no more fear of feeling the anger, no more fear of feeling the grief, no more fear of opening to suffering. And it doesn't matter what kind of suffering it is, whether it's a sound, a smell, a taste, a touch, a thought, an emotion—whatever it is.

The true test of whether we're free is if something comes back. If the reaction is, "Oh no, I thought I got rid of you"—that's not quite freedom. That's not equanimity, not understanding. We're not seeing it clearly.

When we take birth in this human realm, on this planet, the given is that there's this great mixture of pleasant and unpleasant feelings. Freedom isn't opening up the body. Freedom isn't getting rid of emotions. Freedom isn't working anything out. Because all of that involves something in the future—we're not okay just where we are.

The transformation in this practice, this very deep transformation, occurs whenever we're fully present now, and when we're not identified with what's happening now. The only possibility for freedom is now. Freedom doesn't happen in the past, and it can't happen in the future, and it doesn't depend on what's happening. It can only happen in one moment—when we aren't identified with what's happening. This non-identification is only possible in the present moment. This is where understanding is, this is where detachment comes from, this is the real freedom. And it's the only possibility of balancing the suffering that happens in our life. It's the only possibility for freedom.

With this detachment, we're helped to face any kind of pain without drowning in it. We learn how to swim in it. We learn to live in life and grow from what's happening rather than to shut down or drown. We learn to open and let go. Understanding gives strength to our heart.

In some ways you might see being here as exercising your heart. There's so much emphasis on exercising the body in this culture, but what you're doing is really stretching the heart. Sometimes it hurts. True compassion, when we're open to suffering, means we don't turn to mush in the face of suffering. And we also don't turn to indifference. We're not shut down and we're not drowning.

The equanimity that I've been describing is the equanimity that comes with the Vipassana practice. In the Brahma-vihara practice there's also an equanimity practice that develops equanimity, but it's a different kind than what develops in the Vipassana practice. In the equanimity practice, which you'll be doing a little later after compassion and mudita, the phrases that one says are: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and your sorrow depend upon your actions and not upon my wishes for you."

I remember when I got to this part this spring, I thought it had a little punch in it. There's the most understanding in this Brahma-vihara. When you're saying it to someone, you can imagine the power of that: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and your sorrow depend upon your actions and not my wishes for you."

This is a great healing of a codependent heart. Basically, you're saying, "I'm not responsible for your pain." It's very powerful. It's amazing. And I think that the way this heals is that if the heart is very open, there's this tendency to want to control with it. There's a tendency to want results. We want the pain to go away, or we want to see results. I might be wishing some of my family members happiness for the next fifty million years, but I can wish it—I can't control with it.

With family members particularly it's very poignant. This equanimity from the Brahma-viharas is really important to balance an open heart. It's not just the understanding that there's no solid separate self behind the process; there's also the understanding that a person's actions are what will bring them happiness and sorrow, not our wishes for them. Our care will help influence somebody, but ultimately it's one's own actions that bring us happiness or sorrow.

I have a nephew that I raised for most of his young years. Then around when he was five I started drifting away. He's been a great teacher for me since he joined the Marines when he was seventeen. When he joined the Marines I felt like I'd been slapped really hard across the face, because it was sort of the opposite of where I had hoped he would go. It's been an incredible teaching for me, but also incredibly painful. He was sent to the Gulf this year when the war started, and my heart just felt like it was breaking. It was just horrendous. He was in all the action that happened. And he hasn't recovered. I don't know if he'll ever recover.

And I think that we can do and say what we say with other beings, and especially with the beings we're very connected to and very close to, but then we have to let go. And it's often the people we care about the most that we have to practice this openness of heart and still care, but also have that detachment. I have to understand that he chose that in whatever conditioning that brought that about, and that I can do what I can, but that's his karma. And if you think about all the people you care about so deeply, we need this understanding of karma. We care and we do the best we can, and then we have to let go of control.

Often we feel like there's this immensity of suffering in the world, and that we have to do so much. And it can seem overwhelming. Yet it's really the little things that we do that have a lot of power. This is a quotation from Mother Teresa. She said, "We feel that what we are doing is just a drop in the ocean. But if that drop were not in the ocean, I think the ocean would be less because of that missing drop. I don't agree with the big way of doing things. To us, what matters is an individual. To get to love a person, we must come in close contact with them. If we wait until we get the numbers, then we will be lost in the numbers, and we will never be able to show love and respect for that person. I believe in person to person."

One moment of care, one moment of genuine mindfulness and care, is so powerful. And it might be rare that we can actually have that one moment of openness and detachment and really respond with care to suffering. But in that moment, there's this great transformation that takes place.

And it's important to remember that it's okay to be closed. It's okay not to be compassionate. Sometimes we just don't have it in us to open. We have to be okay with having a closed heart. That means it's too painful. We just have to wait. We rest the mind, rest the heart. That might take five years, it might take two minutes. It doesn't matter. What matters is that we trust the process of closing when it's too much, and then opening when we can.

Often we feel like we have to know everything before we can do something, or that we have to save the world, or that we have to figure everything out. But just one moment of care balanced with detachment will really make a difference.

There's an experience I had my senior year in high school that for me touches this. I hadn't had a history of any adults taking much interest in me. And I worked at this outdoor theater my senior summer, where all kinds of groups came—Jimi Hendrix and the Supremes and Stevie Wonder. A musician named Hugh Masekela came. I'm not sure if you've heard of him. He's a musician from South Africa who lives in the United States. I used to stand where all the performers would come down to the stage, and I'd wait there and talk. Most of these people didn't take much interest in me, to say the least.

But this man, Hugh Masekela, who I didn't know from anybody, came for a week, and every night he would spend about an hour talking with me. He really just took an interest in me. And there wasn't anything weird about it. It was very natural—just sitting down and having a ginger ale, just talking. And it had such an effect on me that there was this person who was actually interested in me. I consider him a benefactor. I only had those very brief moments in time with him, but they mattered. He cared.

Later on I heard that he has a very strong interest in teenagers and actually sets up plays in New York where he trains teenagers musically and in acting. And I think, what a great being. It's not like he did a lot, or maybe he didn't study psychology for fifteen years to figure it out. It was so simple, yet had a transformative, very deep effect on me.

More and more Stephen and I are trying to encourage people to take an interest in someone. And it doesn't mean that it's a big commitment. You know, that's sort of the C word in our culture—there's the F word, well, the commitment word is similar. It's not like you have to make a heavy commitment.

It can be that on a train, you simply take an interest in somebody. Or it could mean a slightly longer commitment, maybe an hour or whatever. But these little things make a difference for people. This is how metta and compassion are going to start coming into our culture more—maybe not from elders in our culture, maybe from us.

The last aspect of balancing equanimity and compassion that I wanted to talk about is humor. It doesn't seem to be on any of the lists in Buddhism, and I don't quite get it. I keep looking for it. Maybe it's in some sutta we haven't discovered yet. But then I thought, well, maybe it's because it's understood. Maybe it's just so important that it's understood to be in all the lists in Buddhism.

It's important not to take ourselves too seriously. Humor, even a little bit of humor, brings lightness, buoyancy to us. And in the face of suffering, we need that lightness.

This is another quotation from The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe: "You can't expect insights, even the big ones, to suddenly make you understand everything. But I figure, hey, it's a step if they leave you confused in a deeper way." Now that should be on the brochure: "Insight meditation—leaves you confused in a deeper way."

Mahatma Gandhi said, "If I didn't have a sense of humor, I would have committed suicide long ago." You know, we need it. Dukkha land is hard. You know what dukkha land is like. You just wish you were in anicca land or anatta land, but dukkha land is hard. And there's a lot of it.

When we were teaching in Yucca Valley this past spring, every night a group of us would go out a side door. Most of the yogis would go out one way, but a group of us in the front would go out the side door right after the talk ended. Then one particular night toward the end of the retreat, we were all walking out the door, and some of us noticed that our sandals were missing, our shoes, our sneakers.

It was quite interesting to watch what happened. At first people were saying, "Well, where are my shoes? Where are my sandals?" And then there was this immediate search for the sandals and shoes. And then there was this sense of being upset, really upset. They were gone. It turned out later that we found out that many yogis' Birkenstocks were missing as well. Some vandals took the sandals. Actually it was something like fifteen hundred dollars worth of stuff that had gone missing. It was serious.

But what happened that night is this: people were walking out getting upset about their sandals being missing, and the last person out the door was a monk. He walked out and he just looked, very mindfully—you could just see it happening—he just saw that his sandals were missing. They were just gone. That was it. There was nothing extra, no being upset, no looking for them. They were just gone, and he just started laughing and walked off in his socks.

It was great. The practice works, you know. That's equanimity. It was so wonderful to see. And then a collection was taken up later to get him some sandals.

I began the talk by talking about this professor I had in college. I consider him one of my greatest teachers. The college was in a city that was very polluted. He had a small greenhouse and gardens on the side of a dormitory. There was a lot of alcohol being drunk by students at that particular time, and many bottles would be thrown out of the dormitory windows into the garden. Sometimes the window of the greenhouse would get smashed.

Sometimes when he was working in the garden, he would actually get hit in the head by a bottle—really severe, really hard. Very few people that he was teaching had the slightest interest in what he was trying to teach. He was way ahead of his time, so deeply caring for the planet, for anything alive. He had such profound care for the earth. He was considered very eccentric.

There was the naturalist side of him, but there was also a very deeply contemplative side. When all the Vietnam War demonstrations were going on, when the Black Panthers took over a dormitory on our campus, when ghetto riots were happening—those turbulent times—there were a lot of professors leaving or getting fired. A lot of students were getting violent.

I remember one particular day when a dorm had been taken over. There was growing violence on the campus. And he was so angry, so disturbed. I had never seen him like that. He was so upset. I had never seen him take a day off, and he just left. He went out into the woods for the day, for the whole day.

The next day he came back, and I had never seen anybody so quiet. That quiet that he brought into my life had more of an effect than anything at that point. I saw the possibility for being touched by that much pain but also having balance. I had been feeling quite violent at the time, and I really felt like it had saved me.

If you think about those years back then, how very little awareness people had of the environment, and all the things I saw him go through, it would have been very easy for him to get discouraged. But he kept going. I never saw him stop what he was trying to get across. And I've seen that he's actually had a huge effect. There's such a growing awareness of the environment now. At that time there was so little.

I think also, if you consider the state of the earth and what's happening environmentally, we could get very discouraged at times. It's not looking so good for us. From one perspective, that's true.

Yet every time we have this compassion, this equanimity, this balance, and we take an action—every time we speak, every time we save a bottle, every time we turn off a light—whatever we do has a huge effect. We don't know what will happen. We don't have any idea what's going to happen with this earth. So we do the best we can, and then we let go of control.

This ability to see very clearly what's happening, to open to the suffering, and then to respond in whatever way we can—we do the best we can, and let go of control—takes this tremendous balance of care and detachment. Which, luckily, you're working very deeply on.

There's a poem by Chief Seattle. I read recently that someone said Chief Seattle could be heard from three quarters of a mile away—his voice was so powerful. I'm really impressed by that because nobody can even hear me if I don't have a microphone on. Three quarters of a mile.

Anyway:

Teach your children what we have taught our children, that the earth is our mother. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons and daughters of the earth. If men spit upon the ground, they spit upon themselves. This we know. The earth does not belong to us. We belong to the earth. This we know. All things are connected, like the blood which unites one family. All things are connected. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons and daughters of the earth. We did not weave the web of life. We are merely a strand in it. Whatever we do to the web, we do to ourselves.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 221

Renunciation, Goodwill, and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson examines sammā saṅkappa (right intention), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, exploring how wholesome attitudes of mind naturally emerge through deepening practice. Drawing from the opening verses of the Dhammapada, she illuminates how our thoughts shape reality and how intention forms the crucial link between understanding and action.

Wilson discusses the three aspects of right intention: nekkhamma (renunciation or non-greed), mettā (goodwill or loving-kindness), and karuṇā (compassion or non-harming). Rather than presenting these as ideals to force upon ourselves, she emphasizes that they shine through naturally as wisdom develops—like the sun emerging from behind clouds. She shares personal experiences from living as a Buddhist nun in Thailand, illustrating how simplicity and contentment arise when the mind is freed from constant wanting.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with these intentions in meditation, including softening the tone of mental noting, recognizing moments of non-greed, and cultivating self-compassion as the foundation for compassion toward others. Wilson shares the story of Milarepa greeting his demons with compassion, demonstrating how meeting our difficulties with kindness transforms our relationship to suffering. She concludes by emphasizing the far-reaching effects of our intentions, noting how even one person's calm presence can influence an entire community facing difficulty.

The Buddha spoke often and quite eloquently about the power of mind to shape our reality, to shape our experience of reality. I want to read the first pair of verses in the Dhammapada, which is a group of verse sayings of the Buddha. I couldn't find a translation I was entirely satisfied with—this is what comes of knowing a very little bit of Pali. Not enough to actually do anything constructive, but just enough not to be satisfied with everything I see. Really helpful.

All mental phenomena have mind as their forerunner. They have mind as their chief. They are mind-made. If one speaks or acts with an impure mind, suffering follows one just as the wheel follows the foot of the ox that draws the cart.

And then the second verse, using a different translation: Our life is shaped by our mind. We become what we think. If one speaks or acts with a pure mind, happiness follows one like a shadow that never leaves.

Very powerful, the effect of our thoughts, the effect of the mind.

Sylvia spoke briefly the other night about the Eightfold Path, the path of practice that we're engaged on now. I want to speak about the second aspect of the path. The first one, right or skillful understanding, really speaks to how we understand life, the world, ourselves. And then the second path factor, variously translated as right or wholesome attitude, right thought, right intention—this really grows from our understanding. How we understand ourselves and the world then informs how we think about the world, what our intentions are.

This second factor, intentions or thought or attitude, is the crucial link between understanding and action. Because how we think is how we then act in the world. And in fact, the next three factors of the path deal with right speech, right action, and right livelihood.

A very simple example: there's a sense of understanding that perhaps there's more to reality, to my own life, than is apparent on the surface, in a superficial glance. That kind of understanding that there's something more tends to give rise to some thought or intention of, "Let me investigate. Let me try meditation. Let me try some spiritual path of learning more." And that intention, that thought, then gives rise to action—and here you all are, sitting here for nine days. Beginning from understanding, the understanding leading to an attitude or thought that leads to action.

And then, of course, the action that has you all sitting here leads to deepening of mindfulness, concentration, and energy, which are the last three of the Eightfold Path. And that in turn leads to deeper seeing into the nature of who and what we are—more understanding. It's a circle. We're back at the beginning of the mandala again.

So tonight I want to talk specifically about the factors of wholesome attitude. What are they? What does this refer to? These are wholesome attitudes of mind, intentions that shine through our awareness more clearly as our wisdom develops.

I use this language quite deliberately—shines through rather than manufacture or even develop—because it's not as if these wholesome attitudes of mind are something foreign to our being, something that we need to go out and manufacture and try to artificially graft onto ourselves. They're actually part of who and what we already are. They begin to arise spontaneously. The more that we bring our attention to this moment, the more that we investigate and come to see what we actually are, these wholesome attitudes of mind, intentions of mind, become more and more spontaneous expressions of our understanding.

I love to use the metaphor of the sun as being the luminous nature of mind. It's always there. And the more that we pay attention, the less we get so involved in the clouds that we think that's all there is. The more we're aware of the sun. But the sun's always there. We just become more aware of it.

Classically, right or wholesome attitudes, thoughts, and intentions includes three broad areas, and I'd like to speak a little about each of them—more as a reminder, to bring up in each of us a reminder of what we are, how we can be.

The first is the attitude of non-greed or renunciation. It balances the confusion of greed. The second is that of goodwill, or mettā—friendliness, loving-kindness—obviously balancing the inclination of mind toward aversion and ill will. And the third is the attitude of harmlessness, of compassion, balancing cruelty or harmfulness.

And a tendency to be in touch with these attitudes of mind, for these attitudes to arise in a moment as a response to a situation, is strengthened naturally, simply through our mindfulness practice. I promise. It may not feel like it. A lot of times in sitting, it seems like what we're seeing is just more greed, more ill will, more negativity. Sometimes you wonder if you were a much nicer person before you started sitting. But I promise it's really working the other way around.

A very simple example of how mindfulness is really working to strengthen these qualities. When there's no understanding, no clear understanding of the process whereby desire brings suffering, and we don't understand that, then whenever a thought comes up of "I want this" or "I want that," we naturally spring into action to try and achieve it. And that's how most of this culture spends most of its time.

This can be something really minor—from wanting seconds at lunch, wanting a better foam pad under your cushion, wanting cherry Life Savers. It can be really mundane. Or it can extend all the way up to what we see happening in the world: wanting more land, wanting more oil, wanting some sense of national safety, whatever. So from small to really large scale, when there's not this understanding that desire brings suffering, the actions that manifest from the thought of wanting something come from confusion and can breed incredible pain and suffering and conflict. Or at its least manifestation, it can simply increase unsatisfactoriness. Because the seconds at lunch don't really do it, do they? The foam pad doesn't really take care of it.

So that's kind of a normal way of being. But as we're sitting here, day in and day out, watching the process of desire and watching our continued efforts to fulfill it—the ones that are somehow in our power to fulfill here—you'll start to get it. From paying attention, you'll see there's just no peace coming from this. There's no lasting satisfaction coming from fulfilling desire. And so as this understanding comes in—that fulfilling desire is not bringing happiness—from our mindfulness of just watching this, quite naturally our thoughts change.

When the thought comes up, "I think I should get up now and have a cup of tea," another thought comes: "No need to do that." And quite naturally, our actions change. It's not some big deal, but it actually is a big deal. We find there's a natural sense of renunciation. No forcing, but growing out of our understanding that's coming from this mindfulness practice.

Not necessarily dramatic. But I feel it's very helpful and important to notice and acknowledge these little moments, these little actions of thought, of speech, or body that are coming from intentions of kindness, of non-greed, generosity, compassion. I see it as a kind of positive reinforcement, just the noticing of it. Sometimes we get so focused on seeing the greed and the ill will and the self-judgment that we let a moment of "I really don't need that" pass by unnoticed. Not that we want to hold on to it, but it's important to acknowledge: "Oh, there was a moment of non-greed arising in the mind." It's very helpful.

So these attitudes of understanding arise quite naturally as our mindfulness increases, as our understanding deepens. I just want to say now that it's very important not to set up these attitudes, or any other, as some ideal. It happens a lot in spiritual practice that we have some ideal of "I should be" or "the end of the practice is to be this loving, compassionate, generous person," and then we try to force ourselves to fit that model when it's not what's really genuinely arising.

So I'm not talking about forcing ourselves or denying what's actually arising in a moment. What's important is to be really honest. True wisdom demands absolute honesty with ourselves, with whatever's arising in the moment. And I know that we can trust that honesty, that willingness to be with whatever's arising. Through that will come the understanding from which these beautiful qualities of mind are able to manifest. But it can't come through forcing or pretense, trying to make ourselves pretend to be other than we are. So I feel that's important: to know that you don't have to pretend to be anything at all. That non-greed, friendliness, metta, compassion do arise from our understanding quite naturally. It is an innate manifestation of our being. You don't need to force it.

So having said that, I'll flip to the other side, because everything's a paradox. And what's quite interesting is that at times we actually do have a choice as to where we let the mind dwell. We might not have a choice as to what situations come up, what immediate thought arises, but we often do have a choice as to how we respond to the situation and whether or not we want to let the mind dwell there.

The Buddha said, "Whatever one reflects upon frequently, towards that the mind will naturally incline." It's fairly obvious. And if we sit and daydream for, say, an hour about something that we really want when we leave here, the longer we stay lost in that daydream, the easier it is for the mind to go back to that place. We have more choice than we think. We really don't need to feel enslaved by the habits of our mind. They're not set in concrete, though it might feel that way at times. We can't deny the arising of the habits of mind when they're arising in a moment, but we can choose very often how to respond.

A quotation from Nisargadatta: "You cannot escape from your obsessions, but you can cease nurturing them." I think that's quite lovely.

So instead of denying them, you simply cease nurturing them. I don't mean it's easy. The force of habit is really quite strong. And especially the habit of mind I'm talking about now is that towards greed, towards aversion, towards confusion.

There's a little comic I cut out once that I think illustrates this beautifully. It shows how easily the habits are ingrained. It's like six little episodes.

You wander alone down a crowded city street. Jostled in the bustle, solitary yet surrounded, you think, "These people are..." Multiple choice: A. My brothers, my sisters. B. Perverts, probably pickaxe murderers. C. Sure could go for a chili dog.

Second panel: Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse... A. I know what he feels. He feels fear. He feels hope. B. Why's that pervert looking at me? C. Maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

Further down, construction workers are tearing the street to rubble. "How symbolic," you marvel. "It reminds me of..." A. The path of life. B. The highway to hell. C. Rocky Road, my favorite flavor.

You know, these habitual inclinations just come up when you're not paying attention. But we do have a choice. And it's not like one life choice—"Okay, from now on, I'm going to stop being an aversive type." I tried that a while ago. It didn't work. But in each moment, there is a choice. In each moment there's a choice of whether to go along with the aversion that arises, or whether to just let it be. Whether to go along with the greed, or see the desire arise and recognize, "I don't need that right now."

Working with this right attitude is about a willingness to greet each moment of choice as a chance to learn, a chance to grow out of the dullness of our habits of mind—not about expectations of perfection. It's not another standard to judge ourselves against, but about opening to this moment as a learning possibility. It's quite vital, quite rich. The learning never ends.

So I'd like to speak a little about each of these three attitudes.

First, attitude or thought guided by non-greed, or renunciation. I know renunciation has kind of a bad rap in our culture, but anyway, that's a separate conversation. Renunciation here does not mean enforced asceticism. To me, I experience it much more as a sense of inner contentment. Renunciation being not so caught up in needing, in acquiring, in wanting. And when we're not caught up in searching outwards for something, there's so much more capacity for appreciating what's right here, right now. It's a sense of ease, of contentment, simplicity.

And I would imagine that most or all of you have experienced simple moments of that, perhaps on retreat. Again, not dramatic. But you know a moment where you're just sitting having a cup of tea and it's just so fulfilling. There's such a sense of appreciation. Or looking at a sunset and just feeling the wind, feeling a little giddy about that. Something not specifically dramatic.

But there's a sense of real inner contentment, appreciation of that momentary experience. It's not because that's the best cup of tea that was ever made, or the most beautiful sunset you've ever seen in your life. It's that in that moment, the mind and heart are quiet. There's no desire in the mind. There's no reaching out. And so with this sense of inner contentment, this simple being in the moment, there's great appreciation for whatever it is that we happen to be experiencing.

This sense of renunciation, of non-greed, really, at least in my experience, runs quite counter to the input, the information that comes in from our society. Just the word itself—renunciation—often brings up connotations of forced asceticism, intentional suffering, a kind of grimness. And it's not that at all. In our society, giving things up, in many people's eyes, means suffering.

Just looking at the ads—I was reading the New York Times Magazine the other day, and the advertisements are amazing. Full-page ads for two-thousand-dollar watches, perfume that costs hundreds of dollars for a little bottle, and on and on. The intention, I know from the effect, is to make you say, "God, I really need that." Or just looking at it, you feel a lack because one could never afford it. Really, most of the media input goes along in that direction, creating new needs. We're consumers, and we're conditioned to believe that we need more and more things.

Often, talking to people I meet that I don't really know, or even my family sometimes, they'll say, "Well, you don't have this, and you don't have that"—something that I'd never even thought about wanting. There's a sense of, "Oh, that must be really hard, not to have such and such." Well, it never even occurred to me. But not having, living simply, is equated with suffering in this society. And it's just not true.

Suzuki Roshi says, "Renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of this world, but in accepting that they go away." Accepting that whatever we have is going to go away, and that's okay.

I'd like to mention a couple of reflections which I find arise quite naturally as practice continues, which really help the mind incline towards non-greed, towards its natural sense of simplicity. One is an understanding that we seem to inevitably come to, on deeper and deeper levels—which I've already mentioned—and that is understanding the unsatisfactoriness which is inherent in desire itself. Not saying, "Oh, desire is bad, I should eradicate it," but really understanding how unsatisfying it is.

This retreat is a really good setup for that, because in a space of forced outer renunciation, this form takes away a lot of things you could normally do or get to satisfy desire. It's by choice, but it's also by force. Once we've got you in here, you're forced to renounce a lot of things. But it's a fantastic chance to explore the nature of desire, because most of the desires that come up here, you can't gratify—not if you want to stay. Most people say, "Well, once I'm here, I'm going to stay. I'm not going to run out just to have a pizza." So since you can't gratify it, this kind of enforced renunciation helps us, through our experience, sift through the barrage, the maze of desires and ways to pursue them that we're greeted with on a daily basis in our normal lives. We really start to experience the futility of all that. You have to try really hard not to notice that desire is suffering.

Two quotations I love about this. One is from Isaac Singer: "Hell is made up of yearnings. The wicked don't roast on beds of nails. They sit on comfortable chairs and are tortured with desire." And this is from Bashō, the Japanese poet. This one evokes the endless nature of craving: "Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto." This is so nice. This is desire for the sake of desire. Desire breeds desire, and that's what keeps us in this sense of bondage.

Sayadaw U Pandita said once that consuming sense pleasures is a form of self-oppression because it's tiring and insatiable. So the more we really notice, the more we're mindful of desire and the futility of it, quite naturally the mind begins to incline towards renunciation. By renunciation I mean a turning away from craving and its desire for gratification. Turning away from craving does not necessarily have to mean turning away from the things of the world, but turning away from craving itself. And I've found in my life that this leads quite naturally to a greater sense of simplicity—both outer, in the things of my life, and inner, just in the things that I want. Yes, I still want plenty of things, but they're less.

And it's easier to say, you know, tomorrow I won't care, and let it go.

I learned a lot about the sense of simplicity and the beauty, the real joy that can come from living in a simple way. Some years ago, for a period of several months, I was living in Thailand as a Buddhist nun. One lives quite simply, and the first few months are quite difficult, with massive aversion attacks, real kicking and fighting against wanting to be more comfortable, wanting better food, wanting not to be hot, not wanting bugs, just really wanting things to be different from how they were. And the inevitable culture shock of giving up, for me, all the comforts that we have in this culture.

But after two or three months, it really started to shift. And by the end of the time, my situation was no more comfortable. I had no more things than I had in the beginning. But there was such a sense in that simplicity, such a sense of appreciation and joy for stuff that I would normally not even have noticed in my comfortable, surrounded, normal life. And I remember—I know I'm not remembering this through a haze of memory because I was writing about it at the time—but it was really one of the happiest and simplest times of my life. Really joyful, not because anything fantastic was happening. Just get up, go get food, sit a little, walk in the woods, wash my clothes. It's very mundane on the outer level. But that sense of not wanting—I really understood in some ways what the purpose of a renunciate life in that form could be, to really get a sense of the joy that can come from a mind that isn't so engaged in getting and having.

And as I mentioned before, we all have moments like that. We've had moments like that here in practice. We have many moments like that when we're not here, still in our life practice. Acknowledge those. It's important. It's an important counterbalance to our ingrained habit of thinking more means more happy.

In a way, the whole practice is a process of deepening letting go. And actually enlightenment is the ultimate letting go. It's not about getting something. You cannot get enlightenment—contradiction in terms. It's about the ultimate letting go.

So, non-greed.

The second intention or thought or attitude that becomes more manifest is that of goodwill or friendliness, mettā, loving-kindness, thought guided by goodwill. And in a way that's infiltrating our experience here—simply an openness to whatever circumstance presents itself, which in effect is what this mindfulness practice is.

And I've often felt, actually, that the cultivation of mindfulness in a moment is, in a way, an expression of goodwill, of mettā. Because when in a moment of experience, whatever arises—a breath, a pain, a sound, whatever—when the attitude in that noting moment is one of openness, acceptance, fine, this is here, let's deal with it, whether it's to a noting moment or to a situation in life, that really is, in that moment, the intention, the attitude of goodwill, of kindness, of friendliness, openness to whatever's presenting itself in this moment.

And all the times that, instead of meeting something with friendliness, which is often, we meet it with resentment or ill will or wishing it was different, lack of self-acceptance—again, this obviously comes from aversion, the flip side. And one moment of acceptance, just one moment of acceptance of what's arising, is the attitude of goodwill. It's not like we have to do it over and over to cultivate that attitude. In that moment, that is the expression of friendliness, of goodwill. It's important to recognize this as a possibility, as a living expression that we can manifest and experience over and over, no matter how difficult our experience might be in a moment.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh speaking about our relationship to anger, though it could apply to anything: "I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with non-violence. We do not need to consider anger, hatred, as enemies we have to fight to destroy. That would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield, tearing yourself into parts. If you struggle in that way, you do violence to yourself."

So with this attitude of goodwill rather than doing violence to ourselves, we might be more open to a situation. Again, we sense that no matter how difficult a situation, we can use it as a stepping stone rather than an obstacle.

And some people would say, well, we need difficult situations because that's how we grow. There's a story I love about Gurdjieff, who had a community in France, I believe, with quite a lot of people living together under his guidance. And there was one man who was extremely difficult and drove everybody crazy, and nobody liked him or liked to be around him. And I guess people weren't very nice to him either, and he just got fed up one time and left. Everyone said, thank God, good riddance to him, now we can really get down to what community is about. And Gurdjieff went after him and tried to talk him into coming back. And the guy said, forget it. I don't want to come back there. People aren't nice to me.

Who wants to live here? So the teacher said, "I'll pay you to come back." And so the man returned. Everyone wondered, "What is he doing that for? It's so nice of him." And the teacher said, "No, you need this man. He is a very important part of the community."

My belief is that we don't need to go out and look for trouble in our lives—enough of it finds us naturally. But this story makes the point beautifully.

Another example, and this is a key one that I really love, illustrates the possibility for transformation from extraordinarily difficult and debilitating circumstances through the power of this attitude of mind—of goodwill, of friendliness. I cut this out of a newspaper a few years ago. The headline read: "In Triumphant Return, Ex-Patient Takes Post at Mental Hospital." It's about a woman who says she was seventeen and clinically depressed when she was misdiagnosed as schizophrenic and placed in a state mental hospital. She remained inside for seventeen years.

Now, fittingly for a woman whose antidotes to adversity are perseverance and forgiveness, she has returned as a full-time administrator at the same hospital. She says, "I wouldn't have grown one bit if I didn't learn to forgive. If you don't forgive your parents or your children or yourself, you don't get beyond that anger."

The article goes on about many other difficulties in her life—the death of her husband from cancer, deaths by fire of other family members—and describes her deep sense of not blaming. It's not a false forgiveness, you know, but a deep sense that to learn to forgive and not dwell in the pain of the past allows one to really reach out to a brighter future.

I find this quite inspiring because it's true, and it's not a phony sense of pretending to forgive. It's the actual experience over many, many years of the strength of the attitude of mind of goodwill. This is a woman who is not stuck. And nor are we. None of us is stuck and needs to be stuck.

I do want to emphasize, though, that this is a gradual process. Again, we shouldn't set up an ideal suggesting that no matter how badly one might have suffered and been hurt, well, one ought to forgive this tomorrow and move on. We must really respect and be honest with what's arising in our experience. And then from this truth, the attitude of goodwill, of mettā, will arise. A whole other way of being becomes a possibility.

I love the saying from the Carlos Castaneda books: "A warrior sees everything as a challenge, while an ordinary person sees everything as a blessing or a curse." A challenge. Goodwill does not equal passivity or non-action. A lot of times people ask about that. They say, "Well, if we just remain open to whatever happens, does that mean we simply accept abuse and don't act appropriately?"

That's not the case at all. Actually, in meeting a situation with openness, without anger, without blame, you can see so much more clearly what appropriate action in that situation might be. And the energy becomes much more available to then act in that appropriate way. It's not so bound up in negativity or fear or self-blame or blaming others. So the attitude of mind of mettā is not at all passive. It leads to quite appropriate action—not just for oneself, not just for the other people involved, but for everyone concerned.

The third attitude or intention, quite closely related, is that of non-harming—thought or intention guided by compassion. In many cases, the action of compassion flows naturally from the thought of kindness, from mettā, from the thought of non-harming.

We don't have to go looking for a field to begin to experience and observe both what the intention of compassion in the mind can feel like, and also the power of that intention to affect our actions. We can start right here, in this moment, in this sitting and walking and the rest of the day's practice—with compassion for oneself, with compassion for what one is experiencing.

I can't overemphasize the importance of allowing and acknowledging and developing compassion for oneself. It's not selfish. Thich Nhat Hanh again: "If you cannot be compassionate towards yourself, you will not be able to be compassionate to others." And just in my experience, this is so true.

What we're doing here is often extremely difficult. I know from talking to many people in interviews—this is really hard, you know, to go through. Stephen Levine said once that we experience many forms of hell as we watch the mind and body. And it's really true. We're meeting all our demons just sitting here quietly on this cushion. Every day: our anger, fear, loneliness, self-hatred, lust, resistance, boredom—on and on.

And how are we greeting these difficult experiences? What about compassion for this suffering? Start to notice how the intention of mind, how the thought of mind, expresses itself in just one noting moment.

Notice the tone of the note. Is it sinking? It tells you something. Notice the tone of the commentary, the running commentary. Maybe you don't have running commentary—I have endless running commentary. Notice the quality of that. Is it "What's wrong with you? You're off the breath again. David, why are you having another pain like that? Can't you learn to sit right? You were angry already half the day yesterday. You're angry again. Get over it."

Notice what's going on. So often we experience these really painful, difficult states and then blame ourselves for experiencing them.

Something I do a lot: soften the tone of the note. Instead of "thinking," try "I'm thinking." It's not real neutral, but notice the difference. And notice the commentary. Would you treat someone else that harshly? I often imagine, when I'm in a really knotted-up state, hating myself, blaming myself—"You knew how to do this right, for God's sake, after all these years this wouldn't be happening"—I think, if the person next to me was going through that and I knew it, would I think that? Is that how I would relate to that person's suffering? I wouldn't be in this job for very long. No, I would always say, "God, that's really hard. That's really painful." So turn that around to oneself.

Soften the tone of the notes. Notice the running commentary. Soften that as well. I used to have one really harsh running commentary that I started to note as "traffic cop," but actually "drill sergeant" would have been much more appropriate. It was like, "When you get back to the breath—you didn't feel that sensation closely enough—go back and do it again." And on and on. I softened that one. You start with "It's okay. It's okay." It helps a lot.

It's a little conscious, you know, but to notice the lack of compassion, the negativity and ill will toward oneself, and intentionally soften it, bring in a feeling of compassion—it changes the whole tone of practice. And after a while, it's not this sense of "Oh, I should be compassionate." But as the Buddha said, what the mind frequently thinks about, that's where it dwells. The compassion begins to arise quite naturally.

I just want to read this one kind of personification of working with our demons and compassion. It's a story about Milarepa, a great Tibetan yogi who meditated for years up in caves in Tibet. It's really about how to greet our demons with deep compassion for the suffering they engender. This is quite personified.

So Milarepa was up meditating in his cave, and his mind became blissful, and he carried some wood back up to the cave. When he arrived there, he found in the cave seven demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some were grinding tsampa, and some sat performing various magical tricks. It's kind of like what happens when you come back from lunch and sit on the pillow—seven demons spring up, and you were just blissful, minding your own business.

As soon as he saw them, he became frightened. So he meditated, he uttered a subjugating mantra, he performed the gaze, he aroused his deity's presence. Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness, but was unable to pacify them. He thought, "Well, they might be local deities of the place, and I've been here for years, but I've not praised them." So he sang a song of praise to the place. Three of the demons went away, but Milarepa was unable to make the other four go away.

Realizing that the four demons were magical obstacles, he sang a song of confidence, saying, "It's wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time we should converse."

Three of them vanished like a rainbow.

The remaining demon performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, "This one is vicious and very powerful." So he sang a song as his view, the pinnacle of his realization, ending it with: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. Demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk about our differences. I feel compassion for this spirit. Let me pray to Lord Vajradhara. Grant your blessings so that this lowly one"—meaning himself—"this lowly one may have complete compassion."

And then, with friendliness and complete compassion, without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and vanished like a rainbow.

So out of great compassion for ourselves and our demons, can we just place our heads in the mouth? We might vanish and we might not.

There's one other thing I'd like to share from my own experience of compassion—of experiencing a slight dose of compassion. As we allow compassion, non-harming, towards ourselves, towards our own pain, quite naturally it opens up our hearts and minds to compassion for others in the world, for others whom we come in contact with. When we don't need to shut off to our own pain, then we don't need to shut off to others' pain. We really can be there for it. And this is really the arising, that quivering of the heart in response to pain, that is sometimes given as a definition of compassion.

Another thing I've found so interesting: when we're working with pain and compassion—our own pain, strong physical or emotional or mental pain—when we're caught in resisting it, which is natural, it seems so separated, so isolated, like I'm really alone in my pain, really disconnected. But as compassion comes in towards myself, towards this experience, a sense of empathy and connection with my pain grows to include others. What had been a very isolating experience turns into one that dissolves the seeming sense of separation that we have.

Often in practice, many people talk about this and report it, and I've experienced it myself: what has been quite a personal pain that we're fighting, when we open to it with compassion, turns into an experience of universal pain. And a strong sense, an experience of our interconnectedness, grows out of it.

Just one last example—not a routine example. Once I was in the hospital, lying there wishing I wasn't there, lost in my pain. I was in a room with three other women, and something just opened out my attention from my own experience. I sort of softened to it and became aware of how much pain was going on in the two ladies around me. And then the awareness just kept spreading. How many rooms were there in this one hospital? How many hospitals? There were five hospitals just in the town I was in. And how many towns? On and on and on.

Rather than that seeming overwhelming, there was a sense of being able to acknowledge with kindness and compassion my pain, and opening to the others, in quite a deep sense of the universality of all of us. And that, far from being overwhelmingly painful, can actually bring quite a sense of peace and joy and acceptance.

So these three wholesome attitudes of mind: non-greed, the nature of good will; and compassion, non-harming. They develop naturally as we continue to investigate in each moment the nature of our mind and body, the nature of what's arising. More and more they become natural modes of thought, of intention, natural modes of being—not some forced idea.

And again, it's so important to realize that this reaches far beyond our individual self. How our mind is inclined, the thoughts that affect our actions—that really does affect everyone we come in contact with.

One last story, showing the power of one person's clarity of intention and action. Thich Nhat Hanh has written about the boat people, the ones who escaped from Vietnam, all crowded onto small boats. Many of them had a lot of trouble with storms—aside from the pirates—with their small, under-equipped boats in rough seas. He said that in talking with hundreds or thousands of refugees, together they came to see that the boats which had the best chance of survival, the ones that made it through the best when there was a storm or difficulty, were the ones where even one person remained calm. Even one person remaining calm had the thoughts, the intention of inner peace that could lead to appropriate action, and it infects, inspires other people.

So our actions, which are informed by our thoughts, which are formed by our understanding, have great power in the world. As one teacher of mine said to me recently, as a paraphrase: never underestimate the value of what you're doing here.

CHAPTER 222

Balancing Effort

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of meditation's central paradoxes: how to maintain vivid, alert awareness while remaining completely relaxed and receptive. She explores the Pāli concept of vīriya (effort/energy), examining how it manifests on a spectrum from heroic courage to joyous enthusiasm.
> Wilson uses the memorable metaphor of "Super Bowl mind" to illustrate how genuine interest naturally generates effortless attention—we don't struggle to focus on what captivates us. However, she distinguishes this from wise effort, noting that craving-based interest depends on payoffs. True balanced effort requires non-discriminating awareness that doesn't evaluate experiences as worthy or unworthy of attention. She draws on Thich Nhat Hanh's teachings about interconnectedness, showing how even mundane moments contain profound truth.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing when effort becomes imbalanced—either collapsing into sloth or tightening into grim, forceful striving that masquerades as diligence. Wilson shares a personal story of practicing during her mother's cancer diagnosis, revealing how split attention can create the appearance of meticulous practice while lacking genuine presence. She emphasizes that spiritual urgency (saṃvega)—not panic, but a clear recognition that "our house is on fire"—naturally awakens interest and courage. When overwhelmed, she counsels backing off skillfully, cultivating "seeds of joy" rather than pushing through grimly. Every moment, she concludes, is the crossroads between recognizing our true nature or overlooking it.

Tonight I want to begin talking about balanced effort or balanced energy. It's a topic that we will all talk about a lot in different ways. Our esteemed associate director Edwin contributed the title, which is "You Don't Pull No Punches, But You Don't Push the River." That's from Van Morrison. So that's what I want to talk about.

In our instructions, both in the hall here and in our interviews, we keep talking about how to have this quality of really relaxed, spacious, open awareness, yet at the same time very precise and alert. We say to summon up tremendous energy to meet each moment, yet at the same time don't do anything. How do we work with this seeming dichotomy, this delicate balance? How do we rest in vivid awakeness, yet at the same time remain very receptive and open, relaxed? Clearly, it's a dance of balance that involves our whole practice, moment to moment.

Tonight I want to talk about it in broad strokes—some aspects that help us to discover and cultivate this quality of balanced energy. I want to focus on two qualities of our experience that can help us over and over to access and recognize this quality of balanced energy: interest and urgency.

When the energy or sense of effort is balanced and strong, it quite naturally gives rise to mindfulness, a quality of simply recognizing, connecting with, and knowing what is present. Moment after moment of mindfulness naturally leads to a deepening of concentration. And all of this naturally leads to wisdom. It's a whole series of the way these factors of mind work together. And in a way it really happens by itself. We can't force any of it.

Looking at the quality of energy or effort—the Pali word is viriya, which is variously translated. On one end is heroic, courageous effort. Another way of talking about it is joyous effort, commitment, enthusiasm. It doesn't have to be so intense, but it needs that quality of inner joy and steadiness.

A quality factor of mind that helps us connect naturally with this sense of joyous effort and enthusiasm is that of interest. Really awake, alert, connecting with what's arising quite effortlessly and naturally, moment to moment. Sounds exhausting. Every moment, meeting every moment with this interest, with this kind of joyful alertness—it gets overwhelming even to think about it. It takes so much effort.

But that's where it's just the reverse. The interest itself gives rise to spontaneous effort, spontaneous connection that isn't tiring and isn't difficult. And we all have this capacity. It's an experience that we all have quite frequently in our lives.

If you go to a movie, that's an obvious one. The example I like to use, because I was observing it and to me it was much more intense, is watching friends—mostly male friends I have to say—watching sports events on TV. Recently, it was the World Cup this summer. A few years ago, I was in San Francisco just at the time of the Super Bowl. That's American football if you're from overseas. I was in San Francisco when the San Francisco team, the 49ers, was playing in the Super Bowl in the old days.

But what amazed me, and where I really zeroed in on this quality of interest leading to such a steadiness of energy and focus, was that everybody I knew in San Francisco—and I know a lot of people in that area—shut down their lives for that day. The whole city shut down to watch this game. Big groups would gather. So I was watching with a group of ten or fifteen people. Incredible focus on every moment of everything that happened. And no one said, "Oh, what a chore. I have to focus on this game." It was spontaneous. It was joyful. I honestly can't remember who won. That shows I wasn't really quite that focused—I was more watching the people.

But you see, it's a quality that we all possess in abundance. And when the interest is there, the energy, the effort, the steadiness of focus springs up quite naturally. It's not a problem.

Now there is one drawback to what I call Super Bowl mind. It's not mindful because it's slightly tinged with a certain quality of craving or desire. There's a payoff that holds the interest. And even when someone says, "Well, I don't care who wins, but I'm watching the artistry of the game"—that's still a payoff. Because if it was just a bunch of schlemiels bumbling around on the field, nobody would be so interested. It has to be a certain level of artistry that gives one that experience of pleasure.

So this isn't wise effort in terms of our practice. It's energy leading to effort that stays interested because it's getting a certain payoff, something we want. Things are going the way we want them to, or we're getting this certain experience of pleasure.

But how come we can't bring this same quality of spontaneous focus to our life, to what's going on here? You'd think our life would be at least as interesting as a football game. But we bring the same tendencies, the same blindnesses to our life outside of here, to our day-to-day, hour-to-hour, moment-to-moment life that we bring to sports or anything else. Some experiences, yes, there's this natural interest and the energy is balanced and we're present. And some experiences don't quite make the grade. We're bringing in our same filters.

The ones we've spoken about so much before—they're not new information. Judging pleasant as good and desirable, unpleasant as something we don't want to be with. Or maybe something is intense enough to hold our interest, but when it's just mundane or not really intense, somehow that interest tends to fall away.

Often people will say in interviews, "Oh, nothing's happening." What do you mean nothing's happening? You sit and nothing happens? "No, well, it's calm. There are sounds, there are sensations, there are emotions, there are thoughts, but nothing very interesting about it. It's not very intense." That's not nothing happening. That's a lot happening.

Somehow it's as if we think the interest is inherent in what's happening, in the appearance, in the arising object. Some things have it and some things don't. But that's not it at all. The interest comes from within our own experience. As you can see for yourself, sometimes the breath is just the most boring thing you could imagine. And three sittings later, it's just so fascinating, incredible. Do you think the breath is really that different? Probably not. But the quality of interest has led into an energy and effort that leads to mindfulness that really connects.

This tendency in all the different ways that it manifests in our experience—to evaluate what happens, to accept some experiences, to reject others, to be interested in some, to cringe away from others, to ignore others altogether—that's one of the tendencies we keep looking at over and over because it's so insidious. It is often so unconscious, and it surfaces in different and more subtle ways as we continue to explore our experience.

That's the power of the mindfulness we're practicing and this quality of interest that we can cultivate: it's non-discriminating. It's not picking and choosing which experiences to pay attention to, which experiences are worthwhile, which are worthy of our interest, and which are not.

Because when we're picking and choosing, what do we know? The basis on which we're picking and choosing comes from such limitation—from such views and opinions and limiting of our world. Everything's interconnected in ways that we can't even imagine. Sometimes the experience that we find the most mundane or the least interesting—just that one is the potential for opening to a real awakening insight. We can't know how things link together, how things interconnect.

Thich Nhat Hanh says that good and bad are only an idea of the mind. They have no ultimate reality. On this level of meeting whatever arises with interest, with mindfulness, that's true. Evaluating as good and bad is only an idea of the mind, no ultimate reality. That's not to say what Joseph was talking about last night—some experiences are wholesome, they lead to more peace and freedom; some are unwholesome, they contribute to suffering. On another level, that's also true.

As Suzuki Roshi says, there's no such thing as right and wrong. But right is right and wrong is wrong. That's how it works.

On the level of our moment-to-moment experience, however—of what's worth paying attention to—there's no distinction. Every moment of experience, every arising appearance is totally worth being interested in, paying attention to. Because in that moment, that's the expression of our life. It's the manifestation of truth. There's nowhere else we can go to discover truth but in that arising appearance at that moment.

I like the way Thich Nhat Hanh writes and talks about the sense of how we can't separate experience rationally into "this is good" and "this is bad," "this is worthwhile" and "this isn't"—because everything leads into everything else. If you've read him at all, I'm sure you've encountered the way he can take anything—an empty plate, for instance—and by looking deeply into that plate, with some reflection, he opens up vast realms of understanding. This is reflection, of course, not sense perception in the moment, unless it's a thought. But in looking at that empty plate, we can experience it as a symbol of the finishing of our meal, a moment of gratitude and appreciation for all the cooks who prepared it, for all the farmers who grew the food, for the animals that helped take care of the food, for the people who transported it.

And then also a sense of sadness arises at the fact that many people didn't get to eat anything today. A sense of connection with that. A realization of how many people in the world are dying of starvation at this very moment as we sit here. And realizing that interconnectedness, we might also notice how hard it is to open to our sense of guilt—because one moment we're recognizing our interconnectedness with starving people, and the next moment we're moaning to ourselves because there are no seconds, or wishing we had a cookie.

Just seeing all the play of the mind, and not trying—in terms of mindfulness or interest—to say this one's okay and this one shouldn't be happening. They're all happening together. We can't separate it out.

Again, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, we tend to value a rose and not pay much attention to garbage. But a rose will die and we dump it in the garbage. It becomes garbage. And then we take the garbage and put it into compost and spread it on the flower bed, and it turns into a rose.

It's the same in our meditation here. That moment you felt so guilty about—feeling like "I don't care if people are starving, I really want another Snickers"—that might be the moment that opens us up to some real understanding of ourselves, some real sense of freedom, of disidentification, of not identifying yourself with thought in that moment, of seeing that it all comes and goes. You can't reject anything.

In the space of open, non-discriminating awareness, no experience is more or less interesting, more or less worth our total presence. And if it feels like—as we begin to discover the interrelatedness—sometimes there's a lot of shadow stuff, a lot of hard things to be with, a lot of difficult experience, or even more, a lot of just really mundane, not very interesting experience at all—still, this balanced perception, this seeing of interrelatedness, can come about partly through reflection. What I was describing with Thich Nhat Hanh is really reflection. But through our interested meeting of experience moment to moment, we begin to perceive things in that way quite naturally, without reflection. It becomes the natural perception of how things are.

A poem that reflects this, by a woman named Izumi Shikibu—a Japanese poet from the imperial court, around the tenth century:

Although the wind blows terribly here,
the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks
of this ruined house.

To me, that really feels like practice. The moon also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house. That's how my mind feels a lot—like a ruined house. And somehow the moon manages to leak through when we're willing to be with the ruined house.

When there's that quality of non-discriminating interest, the energy, the effort, the willingness to be present with mindfulness becomes effortless. It's balanced.

The trick, of course, is how to sustain this quality of interest without the payoff—without somehow thinking, "Okay, I'll be interested for a certain amount of time, but then something big needs to happen to keep me interested." How do we sustain this quality without the payoff? It's not simple.

One tool—and it's only one tool among many—is this quality of spiritual urgency. I've found it tremendously useful both in times of difficulty, when the mind just wants to cringe back and turn away from what's going on, and maybe even more so in those times of seemingly endless mundane experience. The times when you're just thinking, "Why am I doing this? What possible relationship does the sensation in my big toe when I lift my foot have to anything that matters in my life? What am I doing this for?"

I hit that point around the second or third week of every retreat I do. At some point, it just eludes me—what I'm doing and why.

This quality of spiritual urgency is very profound and very strong. It comes about from really opening to the suffering aspect of our lives, of the world. Not drowning in it, but really opening our eyes, opening our heart, looking around us, inside us.

This sort of wakes us up to the point where we see the confusion, the pain, the suffering in our own experience—the unsatisfactoriness, the inevitability of death, of sickness.

So at some point, and over and over again, the urgency to understand, to be free from confusion, to be helpful to other beings—whatever form it takes for you—at some point that becomes more important than hanging out in our comfort zone, than living a life of denial. Which actually feels like a comfort zone, but it's not so comfortable at all. We're just not really looking at it.

At times this quality of spiritual urgency can be called up consciously. At other times it arises quite spontaneously, simply by opening our eyes and looking around.

When we don't have spiritual urgency, when we're just going through the motions of practice without that sense of interest which the urgency can inspire—even though your practice might seem really right on, very meticulous, even though you're not just going through the motions but really being very careful, and it feels like you're putting in a lot of effort—it's sort of meeting an outside model. Whether it's the model of how things should look or the model in your own mind, the motivation is trying to match some expectation you have, or you think someone else has, rather than arising from the inner urgency, the inner interest in your own heart. It doesn't quite work. You can practice in a meticulous way and it gets drier and tougher and you're dragging along. It can be torturous. And you can't quite figure out what's going on, what's missing, because it seems like you're doing everything just right.

I had an experience of this. A few years ago, I came here to sit a two-month retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita. I was really up for it. But the day before the retreat, I talked to my mother, and she told me she'd just found out she had cancer and was going to have an operation. She had breast cancer and uterine cancer, both, and was going to have an operation within the week. She refused to let me come home. She said, "No, no, you must do your retreat. I don't want you to come home." She got really adamant about it, which isn't like her.

So I came and did the retreat. I would call home every day, and things were going fine. It wasn't an emergency operation or anything. She was doing fine. And I was practicing extremely meticulously. I was noting every moment. I thought I was really present. But it was getting drier and deader. It just felt like sawdust. It felt like I was dragging myself through it. But I thought my effort was really right there, really present.

I didn't quite wake up to what was going on until one day, after about three weeks. I always used to walk in the same place in the hall in the Catskills. I was walking up the stairs to my walking place, and this thought arose—it was more than a thought, it was like a real conviction: "If somebody's walking there, I'm leaving the retreat. That's it." And I meant it. That's what was scary. I really hoped somebody was walking there. Of course nobody was.

That sort of woke me up. I thought, what's going on here? What's the story? Because that just wasn't a moment of aversion. That was really a kind of deep-seated response to the quality of energy and effort that was going on.

What was happening was that I wasn't really wholeheartedly present in my energy, in my effort. It looked like it. It even looked like it to me. I was meeting the form which I knew from the past, trying to meet my expectations of what it's supposed to be like. I could do it and I thought I meant it. But somehow—and this is strange, because you'd think the quality of urgency would be stronger given what was going on—basically what was happening is that my mind, my interest, was split.

I wasn't using the fact of my mother's sickness to bring up urgency and put that urgency into my practice. I was simply splitting my attention, worried about my mother and not wholeheartedly present, moment to moment. I could put on a good show for myself, but it was all directed outward. That inner spring of urgency and interest wasn't there.

We can carry it so far and really feel like it's balanced effort, but at some point that's just not going to hold. We can't keep doing it. It withers the heart.

On the other hand, when the energy, the interest is present and balanced, it becomes the payoff in itself. The times I've felt most connected and balanced and present and really joyful in practice don't have anything to do with what was actually happening—whether it was pleasant or unpleasant, incredibly intense and insightful or just everyday stuff. But this quality of real, alive connectedness had everything to do with that balanced energy and effort that was wholeheartedly present, meeting what was happening moment to moment without evaluation, without resistance. When the effort, the energy is in that balanced groove, whatever's happening isn't a problem. The interest is there, and that's enough. That carries us.

I want to read something from Krishnamurti, a way of talking about this quality of wholehearted interest and attention: "When you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment. And then there is no room for fear, no room for contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

Can we attend to whatever's arising with complete self-abandonment? Our nerves, our ears, our eyes, everything of ourselves. That's the quality of really alert, interested energy that isn't looking for something special to happen. In that space, the urgency is there. We don't need to reflect on it. We don't need to look for it. Things are in balance.

Without this wholeheartedness, the energy flags. If things are difficult, there's that tendency for the mind to fall back, cringe away, shrink down. Remember Joseph was talking last night about how we can confuse sloth with compassion. Sloth is sort of like an absence of energy. In moments when the energy, the effort is strong and balanced, you can experience what it's like: the mind is bright, clear, and interested. Energy has the quality of patience, of being willing to be with suffering or difficulty without that cringing back.

This is the tendency of the mind when there's no energy—when something difficult comes, we recoil. And if there's too much difficulty, one thing after another without energy, we just wither down, like a sopping twisted towel. "I just can't be with this anymore."

Energy, as Sayadaw U Pandita says, is a support in the mind, sort of like the support of a house. It supports the mind to stop flinching away from what is unpleasant, to open and be bright and meet it again with this quality of interest and presence.

So you can see why that first initial shrinking back, if we say, "Oh no, I must be kind to myself, this is really the way to balance"—they say when it's difficult we need to pull back, which is true sometimes, and I'll speak to that later. But this shrinking back is a sign. This is what Chögyam Trungpa called idiot compassion. Don't take the first sign of shrinking back as necessarily the sign that you need to pull back altogether, because that's just the natural response of the mind to something unpleasant. If there's interest, if there's energy, that will be a support where we can come back and meet it again.

As you see, energy isn't static—certainly not. It's a quality that comes and goes. It's also something we can easily identify with. So when it comes: "I'm doing really well now." And when it drops: "Somehow I've blown it. Big mistake. I've got to fix it somehow." This can lead to tipping out of balance either way—the cringing back and giving up, or, and this happens even more with most of the people I talk to, when the energy drops we think it's our fault. We push harder. Things still aren't the way we want them to be, so we push even harder.

And it's not actually interest or mindfulness or wise effort. It's totally trying to make things be a certain way. It's desire or expectation masquerading as wise effort.

Except the effect isn't one of bright, alert interest. It's one of frustration, self-judgment, tightness, more tightness, more heaviness, more grimness until we're just really tied in a knot.

It can be very subtle. Sometimes it's incredibly blatant, but sometimes it's very subtle—the way that we think we're meeting what's arising with interest. But if you look at the underlying intention, it's "I'll meet this in order for it to open up, in order for things to start flowing again, in order for that bright interest to come back"—a long, long list of whatever we're hoping for.

In either case, it can lead to that kind of loss of interest that just makes us say, "Who cares?" Back to that place of "I don't care what happens. I lift my foot, I put my foot down, I feel tingling, I feel pressure. So what?"

This is the time to open our hearts and minds to the quality of spiritual urgency. Now, urgency is not panic. It's not fear and desperation. But again, it's getting in touch with that motivation for why we came to this retreat, for why we're engaged in spiritual practice—the urgency of that. Getting in touch with that motivation where opening to truth is more important than anything else in our life at that moment. It encompasses everything in our life; it doesn't shut something out.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said—I'm paraphrasing—something along the lines of: if you deeply want to be free, to understand your true nature, you will be. But you must be honest with yourself and really want nothing else. That's the quality of spiritual urgency. It gives courage. It gives interest. It gives this motivation and willingness to meet and explore and investigate whatever particular experience is getting thrown up at us. It gives us the courage and the interest to come out of denial over and over and over.

And we don't really have to sit and ruminate about it. All we have to do is open up our eyes, our ears, our hearts. Just pay attention to our experience for any short period of time without that evaluating and pushing things away. And the truth of impermanence, of the unsatisfactoriness of things, of the suffering that's within and around us—we can't escape it. We might want to. That's the denial we're coming out of.

This is from Chinul, who is the father of Korean Zen. He says, "The world is blazing in torments as if it were a house on fire. How can you bear to linger here and complacently undergo such long suffering? If you wish to avoid suffering, there's no better way than to seek Buddhahood." He goes on to say, though, "Understand that the Buddha is the mind. People do not recognize that their own minds are the true Buddha. They want to search for the Buddha, yet they will not observe their own minds."

It's a strong statement, but to me it encapsulates this quality of urgency. When urgency is awakened, there's no problem paying attention. We don't have to look for interest—it comes naturally.

One of my teachers uses the same metaphor of the house on fire, and the Buddha used this one also. My teacher says if you were somewhere and someone came and told you that your house was on fire, you'd immediately start going home. And if on the way you ran into a friend you hadn't seen for a long time, you wouldn't say, "Oh, let's stop and have a cappuccino—there's this nice little place open." You don't have to stop and ponder, "Well, should I? It would be nice."

I haven't had a cappuccino for a while. No, no. You don't stop, and it doesn't even arise as a possibility. You just say, "Sorry, the house is on fire, I'm going home." That's the energy, the one-pointed interest that comes from urgency. Our house is on fire, and we are home. So it would behoove us to wake up and pay attention—discover what the fire is and how we can quench the flames. That's our practice.

And we're not going to discover it by shutting our eyes and putting on some nice music and pretending it'll just go away. It won't just go away. It doesn't mean we have to get lost in despair. As with everything, there's a balance. But we do need to wake up, and all we have to do is keep paying attention. When we have that urgency, when we're confronted face to face with the fact that our house is on fire, again, the interest, the energy, the mindfulness, the understanding comes quite without effort.

I'll give you an example because it really shows how the difference in understanding comes from that sense of awakeness, from urgency, not from the situation. I don't know if you saw a couple of years ago on Bill Moyers' special where he was exploring different kinds of things with the mind, and one segment featured Jon Kabat-Zinn's stress reduction course in Worcester. The profound effects on people who are sent to this stress reduction course at UMass Hospital, who have come to the end of what formal medicine can do for them—they're all either in extreme ongoing chronic pain, life-threatening illnesses, daily migraine headaches, whatever. And how simple mindfulness practice, coming only once a week and doing a 45-minute tape of mindfulness every day, that's all they're doing, has these profound effects.

Well, ten years ago, when I was managing here, myself, my other co-manager, and another dear friend who was cooking here—actually it was during a course with Sayadaw U Pandita, that one Joseph talked about, where the whole atmosphere was very tense. As tense as it was for the yogis, I want you to know for the staff it was ten times more tense. It was a difficult time. So we picked this time to go as interns to the stress reduction course, which means the three of us would drive in, take the course, do everything that the people in the course do. That was basically it, and talk a little bit about it after.

So we would fly in in the morning, an hour's drive, do this course, fly home, then do a staff meeting all afternoon—it was on that day. These people, in three weeks they're reporting experiences like, "I had a migraine every day for six years and now I haven't had one for two weeks." And all kinds of amazing stuff, really profound openings, understanding their life in another way. We, meanwhile, would fall asleep during the meditations. I mean, literally—I remember my friends snoring on the floor. We'd kind of be looking at our watch. We'd go flying home through traffic, would come back at least half the time with splitting headaches, move into the staff meeting and just be going, "Please, just let me out of this meeting." It was stressing us out enormously. And we definitely went in with a little cockiness: "Well, we know this mindfulness gig."

It was really interesting. We would try to do the meditations at home, just as instructed. Have you—the first couple weeks, you'd lie down and do a kind of mindful moving through your body, starting at your feet. I don't think I ever got higher than my knee without falling asleep in the whole time. And the same with both of my friends. I mean, it was really pathetic. And as the weeks went on, eight weeks, profound changes in these people. Because they had a real urgency. The truth of things was hitting them. They couldn't avoid it. And it led to a natural effort and exploration and wisdom. And we were just in your basic arrogant denial, so to speak. I actually learned more about it later as I've reflected on it.

What I'm sharing now is that I really see how easy it is to be complacent, to take things for granted, to think, "Well, we've looked at suffering. We've looked at dukkha. We're meeting it every day." Yes, we're meeting it every day, but are we actually looking at it? Are we actually opening to it? That's another question altogether. It's so easy to be complacent.

After my mother had cancer that time, after I finally woke up in my practice, it really did inspire a sense of urgency, a deep opening to all of our impermanence and death, a real kind of cellular experience of dying. And then she got better. She's been fine for five years. And complacency rises. "Oh yeah, my mom's fine. I'm fine. Everything's fine. There's no problem." It's hard to stay open to the unsatisfactory nature, to the fact that our house is on fire.

But it's worth it. Freedom, the real connectedness that comes out of it, the real aliveness—it's worth it, rather than living kind of shut off and dead and denying.

So we can use anything. Just notice what's happening. God knows. Just pay attention through the sittings and walkings in the day. You don't have to look any further. Notice how you're meeting the difficult and unpleasant. Is it a mistake? Is it something to get rid of? Or is it an inspiration to say, "Yes, this is how this life is. Do I want to just keep wandering in samsara? Or do I want to explore what's happening in order to wake up?"

We can just use nature. All the chipmunks squashed on the road—there are a lot of chipmunks this year. We've all been talking about it. It seems like we can't even drive down the driveway without six chipmunks darting out. It's really quite tricky.

Or when I go to my doctor at UMass, I really like going because it's a big teaching hospital. There are so many people I pass in so many stages—children with chronic diseases, old people seeming kind of bewildered and confused, lots of fear in people's faces. Sometimes there's a real spark of beauty and love as somebody connects or sees the fear and reaches out. It's a very alive time for me. I really use it to wake up to the fact that there's nothing to be complacent about. What am I waiting for to pay attention? Am I waiting until something really horrible happens again? Or am I waiting for something interesting enough to be worth paying attention to? The mundane is just fine. We can wake up with that as well as with anything.

The difficult experiences you go through here—it doesn't have to be life-threatening angst. It can be the frustration of pushing too hard. That can be enormous suffering when we don't see what's going on. Any kind of overwhelming suffering, that is a great time to see what's really going on and let the urgency come up.

Someone today, in an interview, expressed this really beautifully. It really touched me. She'd been going through a very difficult time, to the point that all of us reach at times where it just feels like, "I don't know if I can handle this." That does happen. She was at the lake looking at the leaves drifting here and there in the water, just thinking, "Do I want to live like that? Just tossed back and forth, back and forth?" And the answer was clearly, no, I don't. It doesn't make everything okay.

It doesn't make the suffering go away. It doesn't bring clear bliss. All the suffering is still there. But that sense of no, I don't want to live that way—it's worth coming back and being with this. Paying attention.

In fact, you don't even have to go that far. The attention, the interest, the urgency—it just arises naturally. And there's the energy again to meet what's happening for another moment. For another moment. And we only have to take it one moment at a time. We don't have to think, "Oh no, this and three more days of this—it's unbearable." That might be in your mind, but it's only this. It's only this moment. We have no idea what's going to happen in the next moment.

Sometimes the most difficult moments—when we've just thought, "I've had it. This is it. I cannot face another moment of this"—and then we face the next moment. And you never know, that can be the transformative moment where we really just open to something much greater and more profound than our fear and aversion of the difficult.

I want to read this poem about just that—sometimes the most difficult moments are the moments of our awakening. This is from one of the women who was a nun with the Buddha at the time of the Buddha. This is a book of different poems from those women.

Her name was Sama, and it's said that for twenty-five years her mind was always distracted while meditating. Two weeks isn't so hard, folks. And she was a nun, mind you, so she wasn't doing much else.

This is her poem:

It was twenty-five years since I turned away from home and I hadn't had a moment's peace. I had no peace because I didn't know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Conqueror—that's the Buddha—because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died.

That's a way they have of talking about awakening—saying, "I've finished with craving, seventh day." Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert.

So it took her twenty-five years. Maybe it won't take us so long to realize that we can be alert no matter what's going on. And again, this alertness, this energy that comes from urgency—it's a balanced quality of connection and effort. Not desperation, not fear, not panic. When we're meeting difficult or not difficult experience in this balanced way, it naturally leads to balanced perception, where the difficult opens also into the sublime. And that's why we don't despair. That's what lets us have the energy to come back and meet the next difficult experience.

But sometimes we can tip out of balance and really feel that we're drowning in despair. We feel we're really open to the fact that our house is on fire and we see no way out, and it just feels like we really can't bear it. That's when the energy is beginning to tip out of balance.

This is from Anna Akhmatova, a Russian poet, written in 1921, just at the height of all the terrors and starvation and war of the Russian Revolution:

Everything is plundered, betrayed, sold. Death's great black wing scrapes the air. Misery gnaws to the bone. Why then do we not despair? By day, from the surrounding woods, cherries blow summer into town. At night, the deep transparent skies glitter with new galaxies. And the miraculous comes so close to the ruined, dirty houses. Something not known to anyone at all, but wild in our breast for centuries.

That's why we don't despair. But sometimes we lose sight of the miraculous coming close to our dirty houses.

And we do despair. We can feel like we're falling into a great black hole or drowning in suffering—whatever the suffering, whatever the experience. Or we turn it into that kind of effort that's pushing, pushing, pushing, and then blaming ourselves because things aren't the way we think they should be, and the only way to remedy it is certainly to try harder, to make it be a certain way. Again, subtly mistaking balanced effort for wanting things to change.

At this point of despair, when we're overwhelmed perhaps by the strength and intensity and ongoing nature of suffering—whether it's terror or grief or this tight, tight pushing or fear or sadness, it doesn't matter what it is—but when it's just more than the mindfulness can meet, more than there can be a balance of perception, then our mind and heart really does wither. We really do tip off into a genuinely unbalanced quality of presence, quality of effort, where we can just get really lost.

Again, this is the place where it's not just that cringing back of sloth, but where it's really skillful means to pull back a little from what's happening. Because in our trying to meet what's happening with what we're thinking is wise effort, we're getting tighter and more forceful and grimmer and heavier. I just want to make it clear that grimness is not equivalent to wise effort. The grimmer you are doesn't mean the more mindful you are or the better you're doing. Sometimes people really ask, "Is it allowed to smile?" It is allowed to smile. It helps a lot sometimes to smile.

So if you find that you're falling into that, or even worse, that you just feel like you're drowning in a swirl of pain and confusion—that is the time when balance means back off. Instead of trying to drill a hole through that experience, instead of trying to meet it by God with openness (just listen to the tone of voice of that intention), it's skillful to back off, turn the attention elsewhere. Bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy, seeing that maybe you're not noticing the balance of perception, but you can deliberately bring it up.

For me, sometimes when I'm walking up in the castles, I'll just go stay on the fire escape on the second floor and look at the sky and the trees. Just open up to seeing, to hearing, to nature. It brings a spaciousness to the heart, to the mind, to the consciousness. See what it is for you. It might be just sitting and opening to hearing. It might mean going down and sitting by the lake. It might mean reading an inspiring passage—whatever brings up seeds of joy.

This is not cheating. It's not giving in. It's not being a wimp. And when you're in that pushing phase and judging it, you're not going to be able to trust whatever evaluation you make of your practice. So at that point the thought will come up, "Maybe I should back off, open to hearing," and immediately you think, "No way. That's just giving in. That's just being a coward. That's just sloth. That's just idiot compassion." You can't trust the evaluations when you're caught in judgment.

So just look: if there's no mindfulness, if you're withering your heart, withering your mind, turn the attention somewhere else. Bring up seeds of joy. Take a walk. Do whatever helps to bring a sense of spaciousness and happiness into your experience. Maybe it's doing loving-kindness practice—whatever it is for you. This is skillful means. This is how to balance. And again, once there's that sense of openness, of spaciousness, even just that much, then the reconnection can come again. The natural interest and sense of the urgency of things can arise, and we can come back and maybe meet that difficulty just for a moment in a more balanced, open way.

So that's just broad strokes of this balance of energy that we work with moment to moment to moment. It's an ongoing dance. It's never static. We never get to, "Okay, this is it. Now I can forget about it and coast." Sorry.

I'll end with a quotation from Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche: "Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore or overlook it are deluded. This recognition is the borderline between Buddhas and beings, and this recognition is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives."

Every moment. It doesn't have to be daunting. It's a wonderful opportunity. Every moment is the crossroads between recognizing our true nature or not.

So, let's sit for a few moments.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 223

Right Effort: Strive On With Diligence

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this inspiring talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to discover the profound potential of meditation practice—not merely to become skilled meditators, but to genuinely wake up and be happy in this very lifetime. Drawing on teachings from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita and her own experiences, she shares a transformative insight: every moment of mindfulness erases a moment of conditioning, like clearing scribbles from a blackboard.
>
> Wilson illuminates the Buddha's teaching on sammā vāyāma (right effort) from the Noble Eightfold Path, explaining its four aspects: cultivating wholesome mind states when absent, maintaining them when present, preventing unwholesome states from arising, and abandoning them when they appear. She emphasizes that this isn't about passive observation alone, but about making skillful choices in moments of clarity. The Buddha's final words—"strive on with diligence"—serve as the talk's guiding theme.
> Through candid personal stories, including a humorous account of her own grumbly mind, Wilson demonstrates how we often remain captive to habitual thought patterns even when we recognize their unwholesomeness. She offers practical wisdom about recognizing these patterns as impermanent, seeing through psychological conditioning, and exercising the freedom that comes with mindful awareness. The teaching points toward liberation not as the end of pain, but as the possibility of suffering less through wise attention and compassionate presence.

I thought I'd talk a little bit about the potential of practice. I like the sense of potential of practice even more than the goal. The goal might be the same, but when I think about potential and the possibilities as I begin to understand them for this practice, I find it so exciting and so inspiring—that we could, in this very lifetime, be happy.

In This Very Life is the name of a book by Sayadaw U Pandita. Really understanding what that means about being happy—it certainly doesn't mean being pleased all the time. If being happy depended on being pleased, it would be really difficult to be happy, because much of the time it's hard to be pleased. Life is difficult in a body, in a relationship, in a world, on a planet that's in jeopardy. There are lots of things that we're not pleased to have happen.

And how to remain a person of faith, of confidence, prepared to engage oneself for the well-being of all beings in this world—with spirit, without despair, with contentment. A great deal of spirit and contentment for what is.

I think it's important to talk about the potential of this practice because, particularly for people who are new to the practice (and for people who are old to the practice as well), when we come determined to practice well and we listen to the instructions and all the techniques and suggestions—you could do this, you could do that—it's easy to get sidetracked into thinking that we're practicing here in order to become good meditators. That we're practicing to become good breath watchers or good walking masters or good mental noters. When we come to interviews, we talk about the difficulty with remaining attentive, resting in the breath, or remaining clear in mental notes. And it's possible to begin to think that we're doing this in order to get good at those techniques, and to forget that they are techniques—techniques to help in the process of seeing clearly. What we've really come to do is to try to wake ourselves up.

I have an image that I think about sometimes: how we're all just a little bit drowsy, but we don't know it because we think that asleep is asleep and awake is awake. When we are walking around on our feet and talking to people and operating heavy machinery, we tend to think of ourselves as being awake. I wouldn't think of driving my car asleep, or operating a lawnmower asleep. And yet there's a way in which we're not really awake. We're quite confused and befuddled and captivated and frightened by all kinds of mind habits that we've gotten so used to that we don't even know they're there.

A friend of mine said a wonderful line a few weeks ago. I met him on a trip I was on, and I've been thinking about that line ever since. He said, "I don't know who it was that discovered water, but I'm sure it wasn't a fish." I've thought about that so much in terms of the ways in which we get used to what's our natural habitat of the mind. We think that's normal, or necessary, or usual, or awake.

You know when you're sleeping in the morning, sleeping, sleeping, and you think you've woken up but you start to drowse off again, and someone is talking to you? They say, "Wake up, wake up." And you say, "I'm up, I'm up. Look, I'm up. I'm really up." But you're really not. You're kind of falling back asleep. And they say, "You're not up." You say, "No, I'm up." I think that's what happens to us in the course of trying to wake ourselves up.

I'd like for you to think of all of the techniques that we do here—resting the attention consistently with the breath, bringing the attention consistently to body sensations and awarenesses as we walk, or eat, or take a shower, or make a salad, or vacuum the steps—as techniques to clear the mind so that we wake up and see clearly and understand what's true. So that in those moments of wakefulness, we will continue to make clear judgments about what's true and what's a wise response to what's true. So that in the moments that continue, we keep as much as we can a clear mind by not continually muddling it up.

I had an image one time. One of the teachers that I met along in my learning experience was a Sri Lankan monk who's been dead some years now. In the very last year of his life, in fact, he was teaching at a retreat at which I was a student in Southern California. I went in for an interview and told him my practice question at the time, which was that my habit when I sit is I like to go to sleep early at night. I like to go to bed when it's dark. My biological clock, I think, works so that when it gets dark, my energy isn't so clear. So if I go to bed early at nine or nine-thirty, I'll get up at twelve-thirty or one or two, and I'll be quite awake.

Particularly at that retreat center, the decision at one or two in the morning to go and sit in the meditation hall was more complex than here. Here you could get up, come sit in the hall, and if you found yourself asleep, you could go right back to bed. There, the meditation hall was at least a quarter of a mile from where our cabins were. It required getting up out of bed, getting dressed, going to the meditation hall. It was a decision to go. You didn't do it lightly.

So I'd get up and go to the meditation hall filled with zeal and wide awake. I would sit down, and five minutes later I'd start to become sleepy and drowsy. Then I'd wake up and sit a little bit more, then become sleepy and drowsy again. I'd wake up, walk a little bit, sit a little bit, and become sleepy. I spent the whole night sitting, walking, sitting, sleeping, sitting, sleeping, walking, sitting, sleeping. I continued because I was up and there.

I told him my story and asked, "Do you think it's a total loss? Do you think I should stay in bed and not come down at all?"

He said, "No, I don't think so. I think you should get up and come, even if you keep falling asleep." He said, "What matters is not that you fall asleep, but that from time to time you wake up, for however long." And then he said, "Keep in mind that every moment of mindfulness erases a moment of conditioning."

That was so inspiring to me. That was one of those lines that carried me through years of practice: every moment of wakefulness erases a moment of conditioning.

I had this image that somehow my mind was a giant blackboard, all scribbled up with conditioning—whatever that was—scribbled up, not clear. Every moment in which I was mindful was like erasing some of that scribble on the blackboard. Whenever my enthusiasm or energy or effort was flagging, I would remind myself that I didn't know how much scribble I had left. For all I knew, I could have very little scribble left, and maybe I just had to erase a little bit more on that blackboard and I'd be completely awake. It also contributed to my effort and zeal to think that I had to have the erasing factor happening more than the scribbling factor—that if I erased more persistently than I scribbled, I would eventually erase the conditioning.

It's amazing to think that one line U Sivali said to me a long time ago was really so effective in my practice. I love to share it with people. His legacy goes on, and he continues to teach people. You'll tell it to somebody, and they'll continue to teach people with it.

What we are doing here with all of these techniques is trying to wake up. We're trying to see clearly. We're trying to cut through the habitual fog of hindrances and difficult mind energies and confusions that keep us from seeing clearly, knowing clearly the truth of the moment.

I like to think of the definition for mindfulness as "unwavering truthfulness"—a phrase I read recently in one of the commentaries on the Zen Oxherding Pictures. I like that phrase so much: unwavering truthfulness. Being able to stay balanced and know what is the truth of this moment, the whole truth of this moment. This means knowing not only what's happening, but also what I feel about it, what my response to it is, what the impulse of the heart is in response to it—either a neutral response, or liking it and the impulse to reach out and get more of it, or not liking it and the impulse to wish it would go away.

We see the impulse to disturb the mind with wishing to have more or wishing to have less, and we develop clarity around those impulses that allows us not to waver. Unwavering awareness: this is the truth of this moment. Along with it comes seeing clearly what the potentials are, what choices I have in this moment. Given this is the truth of the moment, what are the possibilities? And given the possibilities, what is the wisest and most compassionate response?

This isn't to say that we're unwavering in our response. Sometimes a wise and compassionate response is to move toward pleasant experiences, to rest in them and enjoy them. Sometimes when experience is unpleasant, it's possible to move away from it with ease and balance and grace. And sometimes it's not possible—and to be able to say, "I would have liked more," or "I would have liked less," but it's not possible, so I'll rest.

To be able to see clearly: what's the potential of this moment? What are the possibilities? What can I do that's wise and skillful, that does not create confusion in the mind? That's really, for me, the fullest way I think about mindfulness.

When I think about that, it seems to me so much the definition of freedom—the freedom of choice—to be able to see clearly what the possibilities are, what would be wise, and to be able to choose that. In that choice, we're choosing not only this moment of freedom but also a kind of conditioning of the next moment. It's a right effort moment. We can only really act in this moment, but how we act in this moment conditions moments to come.

I want to talk more about right effort as we go along.

is the dynamics of the mind in terms of its psychological patterns. Each of us thinks in a certain predictable kind of habitual way. Each of us has our main stories that are the stories of our life that cycle through predictably. Some of which—I remember thinking of some of them as kind of "oh dear" stories that I go to a retreat and think, "I only hope that I do not think about this and this. If I don't think about this and this, I'll be quite content. But if I think about it, I won't be quite content." And that is about as effective as telling someone, "In the next two minutes, don't think anything about elephants." Because as soon as you say that, and a person has the alarm, "Uh-oh, I might think about elephants in the next two minutes," there's no way that you can possibly not think about elephants in those two minutes.

But I thought I would say something more about the terrain of waking up—ways in which we can see waking up happening as we sit here day after day, just doing these simple techniques of keeping the attention as gracefully and as steadfastly and as easily as we can on quite the simple truth of every moment.

We leave the attention resting in the breath not because the breath is magic, but because the breath is here. When we sit here quietly in a quiet room with our eyes closed, not moving, if there is not another compelling experience happening in the body or in the mind, the breath is what's most predominant. It's the most likely place for the attention to naturally rest. It's actually, I think, not so much a question of resting the attention in the breath as much as the attention rests in the breath when everything else is quiet. It is where the attention rests.

I have very much the sense—not that I bring the attention to the breath, but that the breath presents itself to me as the prominent experience of the moment. It's quite a restful way to practice, just to wait for experience to present itself, not to reach forward for it. Here's this breath, here's this breath, here's this breath.

And with the extra effort of these first few days of choosing—when there's a choice, there's some awareness of breath and awareness of thoughts and awareness of moods and awareness of other things as well—choosing that awareness when we can, because breath is for the most part plain and neutral. Resting in a plain and neutral repetitive event is a way of building a certain amount of composure in the mind. And so when we talk about the balanced recognition of the moment as being what mindfulness is, that balance depends on a certain amount of composure in the mind. We build a certain amount of balance, concentration, composure through resting the attention in the plain event of the moment.

The plain event of the moment when we sit is the breath and the rest of the body sensations that are part of it. The plain event of the moment as we walk are the sensations in the feet and the sensations in the body. People especially new to practice sometimes don't quite understand the walking practice. It seems a little contrived and sometimes a little slower than people are comfortable with. So I'd like to remind you that all of the practice—sitting and walking and eating and doing your job, and going from place to place, and showering—are all different positions in which we practice resting the attention in a composed way in the principal experience of the moment. When we walk, the main experience is sensations in the feet. When we eat, the main experience are the experiences of moving the arm and tasting the food and swallowing and smelling and looking at it and delighting in it.

And so resting, letting the attention rest in those principal experiences that are right there, just being with what's here now—itself clears the mind of all the fogs and disturbances and confusions that come and go. And there are ways that we can tell as we practice day by day here that in fact the mind is becoming clearer, waking up.

Here are the ways that you can tell. One of them is quite simple, and it has to do with enhanced sensory awareness that just happens by itself as we sit here day after day in this quiet environment with a simple life, without continuing to overstimulate our mind and body. People begin to notice that sense experience is clearer, so that colors sometimes look a little sharper and sounds are a little sharper. Shapes seem to stand out sometimes a little sharper. Smells get a little bit more intense—sometimes they're quite wonderful, smelling a meal all the way down the hall. I used to be able to tell, as the days in a retreat center went by, that in fact the mind was a little bit clearer because I could smell the lunch further and further down the hall. Could smell the oatmeal from really far away.

I was always quite delighted to find that, but when you think about it, there needs to be a more profound reason to practice than smelling the oatmeal from down at the end of the hall—although it's quite interesting to do that. And it's not always delightful either, because if you spend a long time in a retreat center, there are days when the windows have been closed in here for a long time and you come in and you smell the fact that a hundred people have been in here all day, and that smell is more prominent to you. So it doesn't make only wonderful smells more keen; it makes all the smells more keen.

So we wake up to body sensations. It can be really quite lovely, but it's really just what it is. I thought if my taste was really waked up that everything would taste wonderful. And a dry apple is a dry apple. As a matter of fact, there's a certain way in which we're probably more aware it's a dry apple when we're waked up than not. And that's really just the first level of hints that the mind has become a little more clear. Aldous Huxley used to call it cleansing the doors of perception.

Another thing that becomes clearer, just presents itself as clear—you don't need to look for it—as time goes by and as we steadfastly just do this practice of attending to the breath and attending to the walking and attending to the eating and the most simple parts of our experience,

And to know that there are stories of our lives that are painful and grievous and tangled and fretful and worrisome—and they will, if they're part of our lives, come up. To have the understanding that such stories could arise, and that the possibility exists for us not to entertain them very long, not to be trapped by them—I'd like to tell you that this is one aspect of right effort in practice.

At the same time, there is real value in seeing what these stories are. We wake up to our psychological selves and say, "Look at that, I'm still really reactive to that. Look at that, I'm still held in the sway of this story. Look at this, this is still paining me." And it's fine to learn that. There really is no part of truth that is not valuable. The truth of the dry apple, the truth of the sad story or the grievous story—those are all truths that we are well off to know.

I think we come here principally to discover, in some very deep and direct and intuitive way, what the truths of all experience are. As I was thinking about this talk, I considered speaking about the truth of the sense experience moment, and the truth of our psychological individual lives, and spiritual truths. I don't want to present them hierarchically, because truth is truth and all truth is valuable. And yet there's another part of me that feels that ultimately, seeing those truths of all experience—which we might call the spiritual truths or the truths of life—are perhaps hierarchically more important. Everything is important, and I think that the key to freedom is a direct and clear realization of fundamental truths. And everything else counts too.

As we see the truths of our stories, one of the ways it becomes possible to hold them without so much grief or pain is to know their temporal nature. Just the sense of "uh-oh, here comes my story again" is a reminder that the story isn't there all the time. So when it arises, we can acknowledge it and know it and even know the sadness or pain we feel about it.

We have emotional systems, we have nervous systems, and they vibrate. I imagine they vibrate—I can't see them—but I feel that they vibrate when I think about something about which I feel a lot of pain or grief. I feel shaken in my being.

I think one of the great rewards of this practice has been the experience, over time, that it's possible to be shaken in one's being, to hold that, and then have it pass, and then have the next experience. This has been really important for me to discover in the years of my practice, because I know I imagined, when I began, that if I practiced hard enough and meditated well enough, I would come to the end of pain. Of course, that's not true. We don't come to the end of pain in our lives. In bodies, in relational lives, alert to the truth of the world—I actually come to think that not only do we not come to the end of pain, but maybe we feel it more clearly. And maybe, in fact, that's really the cause of our deepened capacity for compassion.

What's been truly important for me to realize is that it's possible to hold pain, that it's part of the capacity of the heart to be present for pain—sometimes to be present for it without struggle, and even to be present for it with struggle.

I love to think about the notion that the end of suffering is possible, and that if we had enough clarity of vision and enough balance of heart, pain could come and joy could come and the mind would be so thoroughly deconditioned from reactivity that it wouldn't interact with them. We would have pain and we would have joy, but not suffering—which is the struggle with pain and joy. But I'm not there yet, so I don't know that for sure. I know it as an idea. It's an idea that I love. But it's been a very great source of freedom and excitement and indeed liberation to know that it's at least partly possible—that I can struggle less and suffer less.

I thought for a while that if I told people this, it would sound like sour grapes—that not being at the end of suffering, I would say, "Well, it's all right to suffer less." But it's terrific to suffer less. Wonderful to suffer less. We'll just suffer less and less and less, and that will be wonderful.

One of the things people see about their psychological patterns is the normal pattern of dynamics, the habitual pattern of dynamics of the mind. When they come to see that clearly, it begins to be possible to disidentify from it, to not take it so seriously. It's rather like the fish discovering that it swims in water. We say, "Oh, this is water." Beginning to see the dynamics of the mind, we're able to say, "Oh, this is my pattern. This is just my pattern. It's back again. That's interesting—look at that, still here. I still do that same pattern that I used to do and that I learned to do, that maybe I learned as a result of my childhood, maybe I learned from my parents, maybe I learned from my community. Maybe it's genetic, maybe it's karmic—genetic would be karmic anyway. Maybe it's all karmic: my genes and my family and my group."

But to be able to say: this is my karma in this life. I have this particular way that my mind processes experience. And that's okay. I don't really need to struggle with it too much. I can be alert to it so I don't get trapped by it and confused by it. But it can just come and go.

Someone told me a story not so long ago about something that had just happened to her. She had a tumor removed from her abdomen, and when it was removed, she received a diagnosis a day later that it was malignant. She said, "I wanted a second opinion, so I had it sent to a major metropolis near where I live." She explained that it took a number of weeks because they had to reprocess the slides and hold a tumor board meeting.

She said, "During those weeks, I had such incredible alertness. I practiced with such dedication. I was diligent. I was disciplined. In spite of the fact that I was very dismayed to find that I had been diagnosed with a malignancy, I was awake and clear, and I had a certain amount of joy in the clarity of my practice." And then she said, "Just yesterday, I got a phone call from the pathology department in this major metropolis—it's not malignant." She paused. "And I feel like I've fallen right back to sleep. All my zeal is gone."

It was wonderful. First of all, she was supremely happy, as was I, that the tumor was not malignant. What I told her was, "Give yourself a little slack. Probably you're a little tired from this three-week ordeal. Maybe you could actually take a little rest for a day." But it would be wonderful to cultivate the kind of zeal that the Buddha suggested. The Buddha suggested that we should practice as if our hair were on fire. Isn't that a great image? If your hair were on fire, we would really practice.

But in a certain sense, our hair is on fire. It's a very short life. I've gotten old incredibly quickly. We all have. I began to practice twenty years ago and it seems like yesterday. I got married more than forty years ago, and that seems like yesterday. The sense I have from this is that I'm quite likely to wake up tomorrow and find that I'm eighty. And we all will. We'll find that our whole life has collapsed, disappeared. Doesn't it seem that way to you? That the whole life has disappeared? It has disappeared. There is nothing of it left—only memory traces. And here we are with very limited time left.

So how do we practice with zeal that's not fatiguing? Some people I interviewed today said, "I feel like I'm striving too hard. Maybe I shouldn't strive." Actually, I'm going to look over and see if I see a reaction from Joseph and Sharon, because we always say to people, "Don't strive." But I said, "Strive." I think it's good to strive. I don't think it's so bad to strive. What I think is very bad is to demoralize yourself about how badly you're doing. I would like to suggest that we strive, but not demoralize ourselves.

The very last thing the Buddha said was, "Strive on with diligence." His very last words: strive on with diligence. I find it very heroic.

On top of that confident diligence, Sharon told a wonderful story last week, so some of you who were here will remember it. It's a very important story about her beginning her metta practice with Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma. U Pandita asked her, "How do you think you're going to do in this practice?" Thinking that perhaps it was hubris to say she was going to do great, she said with all humility, "Well, I'm not sure. Maybe I'll do well. Maybe I won't do well." And he in essence said, "That's no good. You have to say, 'I'm going to do great. I am entirely confident.'"

Why not? None of us is trying to do anything that is beyond possibility. We're not trying to do anything outrageous. We're not even trying to become anyone that we aren't. We're trying to remember who we are. It's as easy as that, really.

When you think about the definition of the Brahma Viharas—really the essence of who we are—balanced, friendly, generous, compassionate, responsive—as being the essence of who we are, the natural condition of the mind. Not the condition of the mind of special people, but the condition of the mind itself. And for each of us, the task is to cut through all of the confusion that keeps us from being in touch with that, from remembering that.

In addition to thinking of this practice as waking up, I like to think of it as coming home. Truly coming home to ourselves in the fullest way. Waking up to ourselves, waking up to all the hidden things, waking up our bodies so that we feel fully. And just as I was mentioning before, not to underestimate how lovely it is to have our senses be fully awake. Here we are in a body—why not have it be an awakened body? And here we are, emotional beings with psychological systems—why not be awake to the dynamics of our psychological systems? To see: these are my stories, these are my tendencies, these are my traits, these are my mind filters, these are the hidden secrets that I keep in the shadow.

But if I bring them out of the shadow, then I can address them. Not only be awake to them and know the truth of them, but if they're in the shadow because they're hard for me to see, because they're unskillful traits, after the initial dismay of seeing what's there, I can address myself to them so that I don't do them anymore. I can make those choices. What we are awake to, we are free to change. In moments of awakeness, there's tremendous freedom.

All the spiritual traditions that I know have stories about seekers who hear about a hidden treasure somewhere, a great jewel in some faraway place. And usually in these stories, regardless of tradition, the seeker travels over large distances and against all odds, finally arriving somewhere only to have someone say, "You made a terrible mistake. That very treasure is hidden under your bed at home." And then they go home, and sure enough, they dig under their bed, and there it is.

What if we discover, in fact, that the very treasure of our essence is right here at home? That it isn't a question of acquiring it, but a question of seeing through all of the delusion that prevents us from feeling it?

I remember that one of the things that was inspiring to me in the very beginning of my practice was the fact that my teachers all looked like regular people. Mostly they were younger than I was—plain people with plain lives. It was very inspiring to me because I knew that they had regular lives with regular stories and regular troubles, just like everybody else. And yet they seemed, in a way that I wasn't, happy. The notion that it was possible in this lifetime—aware of pain and dealing with pain, having a story like everyone else—to nevertheless be content in it, active in it, engaged in it, but not frantic, not trapped, was so inspiring to me. And I had tremendous confidence that I could do it, just because they looked plain. I thought, if they can do it, I can do it, whatever it is. Because at that point I was very much confused about how this all worked. I kind of understood the instructions, but I didn't understand how they worked. I got it about the technique—do this or do this or do this.

It was really important for me to learn, as time went by, how these different technical instructions—bringing the attention to the breath, for instance—actually related to cutting through the fog of confusion in the mind and allowing me to feel, for any amount of time, peaceful or happy. My zeal then increased about practice. It's very hard to do this practice if you don't really know where you're going with it. It's a tremendously odd thing to do.

I sometimes think to myself, what if a person from another planet—or even a person from this planet who never heard of this, who doesn't get it—came and looked at us? We look odd. Everybody's sitting here all day long, everybody absolutely blank of visage. You can't tell a thing about what's going on with people. It's amazing to think that this is such a passionate practice and that inside everybody's experience are enormous variations of experiences happening. I look at everybody and everybody looks the same. I have no hint of whether in that person's experience at this moment there is tremendous serenity or a tremendous explosion or absolute restlessness, or whether they're fast asleep, or what is happening.

If someone were to look at us, it's odd—to sit and to walk and to sit and to walk, and especially to walk in that slow way. It's odd to keep your eyes averted. It looks so unfriendly.

I've sat in the dining room here, depending on my mind state, at a time when my mind was one of despair or discouragement, and I look around and think, "Everybody looks like a zombie. Nobody home. This is the most dreary thing I've ever seen. We've all gone mad." And then the very next night, with a new mind state—peace or happiness or ecstasy happening within me—I look around at those very same people, the very same faces, the very same mode, and they look gorgeous.

Everybody looks like a saint. Everybody looks wonderful. I'm completely in love with everybody. And they're the same people. I've manufactured the experience entirely with my mind state.

To begin to see this, and to recognize that the phrase which enjoyed some popularity during the New Age era—"we create our own reality"—is actually true. Not in any magical way of making the sun rise in the west instead of the east. Any number of people tell me they have meditated fiercely for years, waiting for the relationship of their lifetime. They read all kinds of things that said if you wish it, it will come. And it hasn't come. That kind of reality I'm not sure we can create.

I think we create the reality of our mind states, and our experience then is a reflection of that mind state. The truth of our experience is really an internal truth, and everything else appears the way it does as a result of our internal truth. And I think we have a choice about that mind state.

So I want to talk a little about right effort. I didn't understand it for a long time because I thought right effort was simply trying hard, making as much effort as I could. A rather bland definition. But the Buddha gave a particular definition of right effort: to make the effort to be aware of the presence in the mind of wholesome mind states—mind states that lead to happiness—and, aware of their presence, to cultivate them, to keep them in the mind. Aware of their absence, to cultivate them. And to be aware of the absence in the mind of unwholesome mind states—mind states that lead to unhappiness—and make some effort to keep them out. And aware of the presence in the mind of unwholesome mind states, to make an effort to exclude them from the mind.

This sounds perhaps to people just beginning practice like a contradiction. Wait a minute, that doesn't sound like those instructions I heard about just being alert to whatever's there, trying to maintain balance in understanding and knowing and accepting that this is the truth. But that's only half of it. Obviously it requires balance in knowing this is the truth of the moment. But then, in that balanced moment of recognition, there is complete freedom, and we can choose where we bring our attention in the next moment.

My teacher Sharon used to end interviews with a particular salutation. I'd be on my way out the door, hand on the doorknob, and she'd say, "Remember, Sylvia, be happy." I thought it was just a pleasant way to end an interview. Subsequently I realized it's an instruction. An important instruction.

I realized this because I would be going about my practice, doing whatever I was doing. There's a way in which you're going along—aware, mindful, present. And then all of a sudden some drama starts in the mind. You don't notice it starting. The mind gets all tied up in the drama. It carries on, frightens, confuses, and by and by, the mind getting tenser and tenser, a certain amount of suffering is present. And by and by, there's an awareness of the presence of suffering.

Often I would become aware of the presence of suffering because the voice of my teacher would float through my mind and say, "Remember, Sylvia, be happy." And I'd think, I'm not happy. But that moment is a moment of mindfulness. It's a moment of alert clarity about my situation. It was a moment in which I felt almost like free fall—you know, when people talk about jumping out of an airplane before you open your parachute. Free fall. You can direct yourself.

That moment of alertness: Hey, I'm not happy. That's the truth. And I'm awake. In that moment I get to choose. In that moment I can take a breath. Just that breath. In that moment I say, I'm awake, I'm unhappy, here I am, and I'm putting my foot down with complete clarity. That's all I'm doing—putting my foot down. Then I'm putting the other foot down. Then this foot. Then this foot. Moments of clarity about putting the foot down are moments of clarity, just like moments of clarity about anything are moments of clarity, which are moments of presence and moments of happiness.

And in that moment of waking up, there's no custodial care that you need to do about what already happened. You used to think you had to tidy up the mess that you'd made in the mind. And it's a terrific piece of news to notice that you don't need to tidy it up. It disappears because it's nothing anyway. It just disappears. All you have to do is let it go and it's gone like bursting a balloon. It's not there anymore. In that moment is a moment of freedom, a moment of choice, a moment of moving forward.

This is going to be an end to the story for some of you. A little bit of true confessions too.

Those of you who were here last week will know that I said parenthetically, as part of the talk, that for one reason or another there had been a lot of grumbling in my mind that day. I told it in terms of what I hoped would make the point that from time to time the mind grumbles. And what's important is to know that the mind can grumble away and you can keep on anyway. I didn't stay in bed because my mind was grumbling. I think I probably was pleasant to people even with my grumbly mind. I showed up for all my interviews. I even gave a talk that night, mind grumbling away, but I did it anyway. And I probably gave that talk and mentioned it parenthetically just to make the point that we don't need to be held hostage to grumbling.

I'd like to make a further coda on that. I'd like to end the story. Because I really didn't make enough right effort, and I didn't have to spend the day grumbling. At the time I had said—though I didn't tell the complete truth, or maybe I didn't know the complete truth—I said my mind, for whatever reason, was in a grumbly mood. This is the reason it was in a grumbly mood.

I've been away from home for more than a week, a long time. And I will have been gone almost three weeks by the time I go home. I call my husband every night about ten o'clock, which is seven o'clock in California. In the beginning I said, "Why don't you fly to Barre on Saturday? Valentine's Day is a week from this Wednesday. Why don't you fly to Barre on Wednesday and then stay until Sunday, and we'll fly back to California together. You've never been to Barre. It's been my home for twenty years. It would be good for you to see it." I gave a lot of reasons why that would be a good thing to do. It's Valentine's Day.

And he said, "I'll think about it."

Every day I would say, "So are you coming to Barre?" And he'd say, "I'm thinking about it."

On the day of the grumbly mind, I said to him, "So are you coming to Barre?" And he said, "No. I thought about it, and I decided not to come." So I said, "Oh, I wish you would have come." He said, "No, I thought about not coming." I said, "Well, all right, I'll be home on Sunday." And I hung up the phone.

This was early in the day—I'd called him about something else. And I had the thought: He doesn't love me. If he loved me, he'd come to Barre.

At the time that I had that thought, I completely knew that it was nonsense. Complete nonsense. He loves me, fine. But the mind makes up a thought, and then it continues that thought. I knew it was a not-true thought, but there it was, and then it continues. It talks to itself, and it says, So, I don't have to call him tonight. I mean, he'll notice that I didn't call him, but I don't have to call him.

What's more, I don't have to call him tomorrow night either. Of course I'll call him on Friday, because I always call on Friday evening, but it would really be mean of me not to call before Friday evening, so I'll call Friday late afternoon. But I don't have to call tonight, certainly, and I don't have to call tomorrow. Let him stew a little bit.

And this whole conversation is happening while he doesn't have to come—he thought about it, he doesn't have to come—but I'm definitely not calling him tonight, so he'll get the message.

This grumbling continued. In the meantime, I had interviews with people, and some of you may have been among the people I saw that day. You probably thought, "She seemed pleasant as ever," but meanwhile, the grumbling was continuing over here. And it was taking a certain toll. I didn't feel good.

I mentioned it probably that night to Sharon. I said, "Well, I don't know if I'm going to give a good talk because my mind has been grumbling all day long." And it's debilitating to have a grumbling mind. It just grumbles along all day.

So I came and gave a talk. It was whatever it was, probably reasonably all right, but grumbly. Then I went back after the talk to the study center where I was staying, and I phoned him.

The thing is, I knew all day long I would phone. There was never a moment in which I sincerely thought that I would not phone. I knew this was just an extraneous tape loop running the whole day. What I didn't do is stop doing it.

And I could have. At any time during that day, since I absolutely knew I was going to call anyway, I could have said, "Why are you doing this to yourself? Why are you doing this? You're not happy. You're not comfortable." It was as if I had gone into a movie that was a bad movie, strapped myself into the seat, and determined to sit through several showings.

It's not necessary. Right effort would have been stopping the movie right away—saying to myself, "This is nonsense, don't do it." Every single time the tape loops, it's a habit. It's a completely ridiculous habit. I don't know why the mind does that sort of thing. It's not pleasant. It's not comfortable. But so often we do things that are not pleasant and not comfortable simply because we are not making enough effort not to do them.

It would have taken a moment of effort. I could have said to myself, "Sylvia, remember, be happy. You're not happy. Don't do it."

That same awareness—"my mind is grumbling"—which I went around with all day, it's a moment of almost-mindfulness. It's kind of in the ballpark of mindfulness. But if I had really been alert, it would have been, "My mind is grumbling, and it doesn't have to. You have a choice."

Instead I was partly grumbling and partly seduced by the grumbling and partly fatigued by the grumbling. That's not clear seeing. It's not really mindfulness.

I tell you this story because sometimes people get into a mood. Tomorrow night probably someone will talk about the different kinds of moods and difficult mind states that predictably come and go. So this is kind of an antecedent thought for working with those moods. Moods come and go. They come predictably. They come with all kinds of causes—sometimes a thought, sometimes a telephone call, sometimes "No, I'm not coming." Sometimes they just come because of the phase of the moon, who knows why.

But we don't have to act on them. We can notice them. We can really see them clearly. We can recognize: this is here. It's an unskillful mind state. It's conditioning more moments of cloudiness. It's unwholesome. I have a choice.

So I'd like to tell you: strive on with diligence. Make a lot of effort. We could be happy in this very lifetime. The Buddha taught that seven days of unwavering mindfulness—guaranteed.

So let's sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 224

Eightfold Path of Practice: Right Effort and Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 1h42

This comprehensive dharma talk examines the sixth and seventh factors of the Noble Eightfold Path: Right Effort (sammā vāyāma) and Right Mindfulness (sammā sati). Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta and the Dhammapada, the teaching explores how wise effort is fundamentally the effort to pay attention—to be present and awake to what is true in front of us.

The talk addresses the four aspects of right effort as taught by the Buddha: avoiding unskillful states that haven't arisen, overcoming those that have, developing wholesome states, and maintaining them. Using the famous parable of the lute from the Buddha's teaching to Soṇa, the importance of balance is emphasized—neither too tight nor too loose, but tuned to the perfect pitch. This balance is especially relevant in Western culture, where ambition and self-judgment can easily distort spiritual practice.

The teaching on mindfulness presents the four foundations of awareness: body in the body, feelings in the feelings, mind in the mind, and dhamma in the dhammas. Through mindfulness, we discover that the body lives its own life, feelings feel themselves, and thoughts think themselves—leading to the liberating insight that there is no fixed self residing in body and mind. The talk emphasizes that mindfulness is both practical (helping us release entanglement in daily situations) and radical (freeing us from the constructed sense of self). This awareness brings us into contact with the timeless, deathless dimension of experience available in each present moment.

So again, let yourself sit, listen. And the spirit of listening is a kind of meditative one in which what I'm saying is not necessarily true. It might be. But it's really more to test against your own experience and your own innate and fundamental wisdom, to look and see what you discover to be true that really works in your own life.

Over the course of this winter on Monday nights, since the beginning of the year, we've been working with a series of fundamental teachings called the Eightfold Path—the Buddha's instructions from the very first day of his teaching on how one can live a life of liberation or awakening, of a freedom of the heart. This Eightfold Path in some ways seems sequential, one after another, but in another way it's like a lotus flower with eight petals, or a mandala in which every part comes back to the center. And in the center is that possibility of the freedom of the heart, here and now, wherever we are. Wise understanding, wise intention, wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood—all of them are both vehicles to free the heart and expressions of our understanding in this world.

Now this week we get to the next step, the sixth of the Eightfold Path, which is called Right Effort or Wise Effort. How to make wise effort is a key to spiritual life. Wise effort, or right effort—energy—most fundamentally is the effort to pay attention, the effort to be present and awake and see what is true in front of us. Of all the kinds of efforts we can make, the most fundamental wise effort in spiritual life is to be where we are and see it clearly, to be conscious or mindful.

From the Buddha: "Master your senses, what you taste and smell, what you see and hear. In all things be a master of what you do and say and think. Be free. Are you quiet? Quiet your body. Quiet your mind. And by your own efforts, waken yourself. Know yourself and live joyfully. Follow the truth of the way. Reflect on it. Make it your own. Live it. It will always sustain you."

In a certain way, the teaching of right effort or wise effort is a reminder of our nobility. It is a reminder of the human inspiration of spirit—not just to get through our life, but to honor it, to respect it, to be present for it, to delight in it as well. Yes, we have to be present for the sorrows of life, but also, if you look at figures that we commonly admire, like the Dalai Lama or my own teacher, Ajahn Chah, they have wonderful senses of innocence and humor and joy and presence and delight like a child, as well as deep compassion and wisdom.

Don Juan, in his teachings to Carlos Castaneda, said, "There are some people who are very careful about the nature of their acts. Their happiness is to act with the full knowledge that they don't have time. Therefore, their acts have a peculiar power. Acts have power, especially when the person acting knows that those acts are their last battle. There's a strange consuming happiness in acting with the full knowledge that whatever one is doing may very well be one's last act on earth. Only as a warrior"—as a spiritual warrior, he goes on—"can one withstand the path of knowledge. A warrior sees everything as a challenge while an ordinary person sees them simply as a blessing or a curse. For a spiritual warrior, there are only challenges, and challenges cannot possibly be good or bad. Challenges are simply challenges."

So there's a quality of impeccability that is invited, reminded in this wise effort. For all of us, we know the sense of joy that comes when we live with a whole heart. And if you reflect back on how many things we've done half-heartedly—whether work or school or family, all the things that we do while sleepwalking or not so present or not giving ourselves to—reflect on those and feel the energy of that. Then continue to reflect and remember those times and things to which you have given your whole heart, which you did as fully as you could. What's remarkable is that it doesn't even matter how they turn out. What matters underneath it all is how much care and attention and love and wholeness we bring to that relationship, to that moment, to that garden, to that event that we are attending.

I just finished teaching this last weekend with Luis Rodriguez, Latino poet; Malidoma Somé, a West African medicine man; and Michael Meade, a mythologist. We were teaching and talking about what we learned from almost ten years of doing retreats for young men from Chicago and Los Angeles and Oakland—young men from the inner cities, many of whom are in trouble or in danger. They're in trouble or danger sometimes because they seek out danger due to the usual things: being abandoned, or poverty, or maybe being tested in the wrong way like standardized tests, as if we're supposed to have standardized people and standardized children. Or maybe because of the racism they encountered, or the laws like three strikes that fill our prisons.

But one thing that's come clear in working with these young men, these young people, is that if you listen to them underneath a lot of defensiveness and withdrawal, they care passionately about their life and what they do and who they are. To work with them requires meeting their passion and their fire, and even their love of danger, with something equally filled with fire. You see it in the Palestinian youth throwing rocks and Molotov cocktails, in the revolutionaries in the mountains in Mexico and San Cristóbal de las Casas, among the Kurds, and up in Seattle in the demonstrations last year. There's a certain kind of passion and fire and aliveness.

Now if you look in the monasteries that train these practices of awareness and compassion—

They also have a lot of fire in them. One monastery I practiced in, they would tell the story of how after the Buddha's enlightenment—in the myth of the Buddha, after his night of enlightenment and being under the tree, the Bodhi tree—he then stood for seven days and stared at the tree in gratitude, kind of just gazed on the tree as if to bow to it, with affection for sheltering him.

Well, standing seven days, it sounds kind of nice, you know, tree gazing. That's okay for the first hour or two. But in these monasteries, you would actually learn to sit for an hour and then for three hours and then for twelve hours and then for twenty-four hours or forty-eight hours. Or you would stand for twenty-four hours and not move. It's called mastering a posture.

My teacher Ajahn Chah said there were two kinds of friends. In Thai it's called phuon kien and phuon tai. Phuon kien are friends that you eat with—they're basically party friends. And phuon tai are the ones that are there with you until death. They're life and death friends. And he said there's the same thing in spiritual practice. There's that which is done kind of for comfort: quiet yourself down, be a little more kind or ethical—all very good things. Your life will be better, more in harmony with the Dharma or the Tao. But the second kind of practice doesn't have anything to do with comfort. And it doesn't matter what happens. It is the dedication to freedom. Or as one Zen master says, cut all your bargaining. Just do it.

Now, I worry sometimes—or I wonder, because we're in Marin County here at Spirit Rock—about it being too comfortable and kind of sugarcoating the teachings. Because in the monasteries you do a year retreat or a three-year retreat, or you go in a cave, or you sit out in the jungle in the forest where there are still tigers and a lot of wild animals and mosquitoes and malaria, or you sit all night in the charnel grounds watching the fire of the funeral pyres, or you sit with your boredom and heat in the tropical mosquitoes for weeks and weeks, and you hear the same dharma talk that's incredibly boring over and over again—the Eightfold Path for the ten millionth time. And in it somehow it awakens a steadiness and a fearlessness and a courage and a centeredness on the earth.

And certainly the two-month retreat that we teach, sitting and walking in silence for two months, begins to offer some of those practices. But I guess the question for us is: what would allow us to practice in a way that is truly wholehearted? To be reminded that we have a courage and a love of courage. O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddha, remember that no matter what circumstances you're in—sorrow and betrayal and loss and praise and blame and anger and all those things—it is possible to awaken. And right effort or wise effort is that willingness to take the circumstances of our life and bring to them the spirit of attention and compassion. This too.

And in the Tibetan tradition, you pray for suffering. May I be granted appropriate sufferings, enough sufferings, so that I can truly develop patience and love and compassion, and truly develop a wise heart. Imagine asking for it. It's not our usual prayers.

So how to do this? There is in the ground of wise effort or right effort the need for acknowledging the suffering of this human realm. And its impermanence—that circumstances are always changing and they are not in our control. The eight worldly winds: praise and blame, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, pleasure and pain, are changing all the time. This is the truth. To reflect deeply on it. And also, for wise effort, it's said to remember our own death, the brevity of life, like Don Juan suggests.

Here's a poem from Galway Kinnell. I think about it. I was talking to my daughter the other day, and something came up in the conversation. Someone had died, and so we were talking about death and the end of life. And I said, you know, I remember when you were really little. You were just two years old. And the first time I had to tell you about death. And it was actually quite scary, I said to her. Because you were in your bedroom where you had this little bed. By the window there was this great big moth that had died and it was dried at the bottom on the windowsill. And you saw it and you wanted to pick it up, and I picked it up and showed it to you, and you wanted it to fly.

And in that moment I realized that no one had ever told you that things die. And it was a real moment for me. And finally I said, well, you know what happened—this died. It had a life for a time, and everything does. And then the form that it takes and the life that it lives ends. And you looked at me and you smiled and said "oh." You weren't disturbed about it at all, I said, actually. It was all right for you. But I think that's because when you're that little, you might say that they don't understand, but actually I think it's that you live in a world that's beyond birth and death, that you're still connected to that sacred time, that timeless reality.

This is Galway Kinnell facing death with his daughter: "I've heard you tell the sun, don't go down."

I've stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.

Little Maud, I would blow the flame out of your silver cup. I would suck the dirt from your fingernail. I would brush your sprouting hair of the dying light. I would scrape the rust off your ivory bones. I would help death escape through the little ribs of your body. I would alchemize the ashes of your cradle back into wood. I would let nothing of you go ever—until washerwomen feel the clothes fall asleep in their hands, and hens scratch their spells across hatchet blades, and rats walk away from the cultures of the plague, and iron twists weapons toward the true north, and grease refuses to slide in the machinery of progress, and men feel as free on earth as fleas on the body of man, and lovers no longer whisper to the ones beside them in the dark, "Oh, you who will no longer be."

And yet perhaps this is the reason you cry. This is the nightmare you wake crying from: being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. Being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

Because death is stalking us, life is mysterious and alive.

So what does wise effort mean? It means to come into the reality of this day, which we are given once, and use it to reawaken our own nobility, our Buddha nature. Traditionally, it's said that one dimension is to disentangle ourselves and stay free wherever we get caught—wherever we're obsessed and fighting and entangled and lost and frightened. That is the place to make the effort to release, to let go.

Again the Buddha says, "I know of no other thing, my friends, that brings as much suffering as an untrained mind. My friends, I know of no other thing that brings as much happiness as a cultivated and developed mind."

Or again, another passage: "If you are filled with grasping, your sorrows swell like grass after the rain. Like a monkey in the forest, you jump from tree to tree. But if you learn to release your grasping, your sorrows will fall from you like drops of water from a lotus flower, and you will rest free."

Disentangling. We are here in the present moment, and experiences come—sights and sounds and tastes and smells—all the time touching our senses. And here we are, sitting and breathing. It's possible to meet those experiences and get lost in them, entangled, fighting and struggling and needing. It's also possible to bow to them, to see them as they are, touch them with compassion, and release them—in any moment, to be free.

I was reading the account of a Vietnam veteran who every year, in a certain month, would go out and rob a store. He was put in prison a couple of times for this. He was living on the edge anyway, sometimes homeless. And finally it dawned on the people who were trying to work with him and help him to get the story. The story was that that particular month, that day in March, was the day when he had gone out with his platoon and everybody but himself and one other man had been killed. Every year that day would come. He didn't even use a real gun—he used a play gun—but he got a gun and went out and had to reenact it, because he didn't know how to let it go, that trauma.

And yet one of the great gifts of our humanity is to learn that it is possible to let go, that it is possible to heal, that it is possible through attention and compassion to touch those patterns that we've been caught in so long and release them. That's the first strong teaching of wise effort: to disentangle ourselves and stay free.

The opposite side—well, here's a little line from Hafiz. He says, "Dear ones, it is the time to end the mental lawsuits that clog your brain." Let go, he says. "Dear ones, it is time to end the mental lawsuits that clog your brain."

The opposite side that the Buddha speaks of: one is the effort to disentangle ourselves from greed and fear and obsession and entanglement. The opposite is that of nourishment—to nourish presence, to nourish equanimity, to nourish ease and loving-kindness and beauty and joy in the heart, to do that which brings those alive in our life.

Again, from the Dhammapada: "The farmer channels water to his land. The fletcher whittles his arrows. The carpenter turns his wood. And the wise direct their minds."

There is a training, or a remembering, or a directing—to live our life and attend to each moment as if we were planting seeds in a garden. To nourish in this moment, no matter what the circumstances: clarity, kindness, freedom, respect. Sometimes we do it from the inside; we remember it. And sometimes we do it through outer circumstances, by placing ourselves where we're called upon to love, to be present for another, to be noble in ways that we may not even be sure we can do.

The Dalai Lama puts it this way: "The moment you think of the well-being of others, your mind widens." That is to say, concern for others is not just the result of freeing oneself from self-centeredness; it is also a means to do so. The moment you think of the benefit and the blessings that can come to others around you, your mind broadens and widens.

As we free ourselves from the patterns of fear and grasping and clinging that keep us from our true state, out of that experience arises a natural compassion. The small sense of self dissolves, and you see the interconnectedness of beings.

You're less preoccupied with your own problems and therefore much more connected with the blessings and the needs of all together.

To disentangle ourselves and release, to nourish and plant seeds of that which is beneficial. Certain texts emphasize this kind of effort. What is wise effort? The effort to avoid, the effort to overcome, the effort to develop, and the effort to maintain, says the Buddha.

The effort to avoid: herein the practitioner rouses their energy to avoid the arising of unskillful things that have not yet arisen. Possessed of the noble direction of the senses, they inwardly experience instead a feeling of freedom and joy into which these entanglements cannot enter or stick. The practitioner rouses their will to overcome those unskillful things that have already arisen in them. They do not remain in the energy of greed, of hatred, of clinging, of delusion, but abandon, release, dispel them.

And what is the effort to develop? Herein the practitioner cultivates and nourishes through their energy those wholesome things that have not yet arisen and makes the effort to plant the seeds, rouses their energy for that which is beautiful to grow in them. And the effort to maintain is to maintain those things that have arisen and let them blossom into full perfection and maturity.

Now sometimes the texts become a bit more fierce. The Buddha says: "Truly for a disciple who is possessed with faith on this path, who knows that awakening is possible and has penetrated the teachings, it is fit to think: though the skin and bones wither away and the flesh and blood of this body dry up, I shall not give up my efforts to attain that liberation of heart that is possible for human beings." This is called right effort. I don't usually read that passage. This doesn't seem to fit our culture here in the Bay Area so well. Ramana Maharshi said of enlightenment that those who succeed do so only with proper effort.

But there's a danger, the reason I hesitate to read it, and that is that wise effort needs to be balanced in the culture in which we live—a culture of ambition and striving and self-judgment. The danger being that we can and do easily make things worse, tie knots in ourselves, increase our struggle, reinforce our unworthiness, repeat our trauma by trying to be somebody that we're not through the misuse of effort.

So wise effort also needs to be balanced. And almost everyone knows the parable of the lute, where the Buddha is sitting in the cool forest with Sona. Sona, his disciple, is thinking, "I am filled with energy, yet my heart is not yet free," and goes to speak to the Buddha, saying, "Can you assist me?"

The Buddha said, "Tell me, Sona, were you not a player of the lute, skilled in playing music?"

"Yes, I was, sir."

"And tell me, when the strings of the lute were too taut, was the lute tuneful and easily played?"

"It was not."

"And when the strings were too loose, was it then tuneful or easily playable?"

"Again, it was not, sir."

"But when the strings of your lute were tuned neither too tight nor too loose, but to the perfect pitch, then did your lute not have a wondrous sound that was easily playable and pleasing to the ears and hearts of those around?"

"Indeed it was." And so that was the instruction he was given in meditation.

We need to be wise about wise effort. What it asks of us, in some way, is an impeccability, a courage, a willingness to take the difficulties of life and make them into the place of compassion and wakefulness. But it also requires constancy, a steadiness, and a kindness or mercy, because awakening doesn't come by wrenching the heart open. Flowers don't open by pulling on the petals.

A Japanese proverb puts it this way: one kind word can warm three winters' months. Even a moment of kindness can make all the difference. There you are struggling, whether it's in meditation or in work or in a relationship, and just the moment of bringing that tenderness can transform it all.

So there's a paradox. One way of understanding wise effort is as a development, a practice to nourish, to let go, to abandon, to purify, to cleanse, to plant seeds, to become better. We do that and it's helpful. But this places it in time.

The second dimension of wise effort is that which is timeless. A young man came to a Zen master, very avid, the way only young men can be, and said, "I'm here and I'm going to really practice. How long will it take to attain enlightenment?"

The Zen master took the measure of the fellow and said, "Ten years."

"Ten years? What if I really give myself to it, really work at it?"

The Zen master said, "In that case, twenty years."

The young man protested, "Wait a second, that's not right. Why did you double it? I mean, if I really do it..."

And the Zen master said, "Ah yes, in your case, it might take thirty."

It's not about grasping or becoming something.

It is about the end of grasping, to be with what is true.

Remember this passage from Krishnamurti: "When the mind is still, silent, open, neither seeking nor resisting, then it is possible to see what is true. And it is the truth that liberates and not your efforts to be free."

Sacred effort is the effort to open and be aware of what is true. What we seek is what we are.

There's a longing for home, a longing for approval. The universe obviously approves of you—that's why you're here.

The traditional image is of this old pot that's being used by some homeless person. It was a beggar in the old Indian story, but it's a homeless person now on the streets of San Francisco or San Rafael or Berkeley, begging with this old pot. And then someone sees it and gives the beggar a little bit of money and sells it at auction. And it's this priceless antique. It's not what's in it that matters, but the pot itself. And we are the pot. We forget who we really are.

The sage Ramana Maharshi says, "There's no greater joke than this, that being the reality ourselves, we seek to gain reality. We think that there is something binding our reality and that it must be destroyed before reality is gained. It is ridiculous. The day will dawn when you yourself will laugh at all your efforts to be free and simply let go, and that which is on the day of laughter is also now."

In a much simpler way, everybody knows the old story of the Hasidic rabbi. A man came to see him, one of his disciples, and said, "I have a great unhappiness where I live, in my house. It is too crowded. It's too busy. The people are getting on my nerves. I don't know how to live with all this. It's terrible. What should I do, Rabbi? How do I live a quiet, contented life?"

And the rabbi said, "Have you any animals that you keep?" It was a village, of course.

"We have some chickens and a pig, yes. We have two goats out in the yard. And then, of course, the donkey I use."

"Well, it's quite simple, my friend. I give you a prescription. Bring the chickens, the goat, the pig, and the donkey into your house. Bring them in and have them live with you."

And so, of course, the man did. However bad it was before, it became dirty, smelly, raucous, horrible. And the master said, "We have to do this." This is sort of like, take two aspirin and call me next week, right? "Bring them in the house and visit me in a week."

The man came back. "Oh, it's horrible. I can't sit. However bad it was, it is so much worse now. What are you having me do this for? Oh, Master, why did you make me do this? It's so terrible."

The master said, "All right, now take them out."

So the man went home. Chickens in the yard, goat in the backyard, donkey tied up where it belongs, the pig back in the pen. He came back to visit the master a day or two later. The master said, "How is it at home?"

He said, "Oh, Master, it is so quiet. It is so spacious. It is so easy."

We go around looking for something that we don't have and not wanting to be with what we have.

My teacher, Nisargadatta, used to shake his head. He said all the time, "You are wanting what you don't have and not wanting what you have. If you wish to be enlightened, it's so simple—just reverse it. Why not want what you have and not want what you don't have? You could be free."

There is a simplicity and a balance in this wise effort. Not straining, not retreating from the world, being with just this much—that was my teacher's phrase, Ajahn Chah: "Just this much." This moment as it is. The suffering of this moment—to awaken to it, to bow to it, to give it its respect. The joy of this moment, the beauty of this moment—to bow to it, to give it its respect, to honor it. To be with things as they are. So simple.

The Gettysburg Address: 226 words. The 23rd Psalm: 118 words. The Sutra of the Buddha on the nature of selflessness, which was given and a thousand people sitting around him became enlightened: 86 words. The U.S. Government Department of Agriculture pricing directives for broccoli: 16,539 words.

Wisdom is really a simple thing. Love is really a simple thing, isn't it? Either it's here or it's not. It's that simple. Either the heart is open or we're frightened.

There is a simplicity and balance in wise effort—not by strain, nor by retreating from the world, but by taking the seat in the center of all things. As the Buddha: "O nobly born, you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas, of good families, remember who you are, moment by moment."

And then from this simplicity we respond. In the spring we plant seeds, in the fall we harvest. When there are people who are hungry, we try to feed them. And when there's injustice, we do our best to help.

Notice, if you will, in your own work—with your boss or your employees or with money. Notice in your family, with your parents or your children, in your love relationship. Notice in your meditation with your own breath or body or mind. Pay attention. When is it too tight? When are you really struggling? Too ambitious, entangled, caught up, too much judgment. It's pretty clear. It doesn't take but a moment to notice that.

And notice in your work or family or love relationship or money or meditation when it's too loose, when you give up, when you're without dedication, depressed, doubtful. Just notice that. And take a breath and then come back to that center, because we know inside this ground of nobility. Unclench the heart. Steady yourself. Be present for things as they are. And then your activity becomes an expression of your awakening. It becomes a vehicle for the Tao.

And we all know this sometimes—you know it. I mean, you hear about it as the perfect game that some tennis player or basketball player describes. But you all know it, the perfect piece of music where the music just became the players and the players the music. We all know it. It's so simple.

From the Tao Te Ching: "If you open yourself to the Tao, you are at one with the Tao, you can embody it completely. If you open yourself to loss, you are at one with loss, you can accept it completely. If you open yourself to insight, you are at one with insight, you can use it completely. Open yourself to the Tao, to the way things are. Then trust your heart's response and everything will fall into place."

Or another: "Fill your bowl to the brim and it will spill. Keep sharpening your knife and it will blunt. Chase after money and security and your heart will never unclench. Care about people's approval and you will be in their power. Do your work, then step back—the true path to serenity."

When you are content to be simply yourself and don't compare or compete, everyone will respect you, and the Tao fulfills itself.

There's something mysterious about this effort or energy in spiritual practice. Yes, there's a part of dedication—purifying, abandoning things that are harmful, nourishing things that are good, changing and serving. But there's another part in which it really does it itself. All we have to do is love and be present.

"The bee gathers nectar and perfume from the flower without marring its beauty," says the Buddha. So the wise one learns to wander through this world bringing harm to none and blessing to all. And in the end, right effort is not about fixing ourselves or the human realm, but being with and seeing the world as it is—and loving it, caring for it as it is.

There's an old Apache story that Michael Meade told. The Apaches of the White Mountains tell of an old woman—the oldest woman, the grandmother, the great-grandmother—who lives far away in a cave, a mysterious cave where they haven't yet built roads into that part of the wilderness. And in fact, President Clinton signed an order saying there should not be roads built into the old woman's wilderness, I'm happy to say. She's been in that cave since the beginning of the world. Maybe she is the world.

This old great-grandmother is weaving, and on her loom she weaves a great cloak—the most luminous and radiant imaginable piece of fabric. Its radiance matches the world. She sits there and slowly weaves and spins and puts the most beautiful colors into this rainbow cloak. Then she starts to work on the edges. Into the fringes she ties eagle feathers and porcupine quills, fresh branches from the willow trees, and weaves them in.

But every once in a while she has to get up from her loom, this old woman who weaves the world, and go over to stir her big pot. You know, the great grandmothers also have the pot that cooks everything nourishing in the world. So she has to stir the pot that brings nourishment to all.

And as she's stirring, there's an old black dog lying by the fire. It gets up while she's stirring and walks over to where she's weaving, grabs the porcupine quills and the eagle feathers and the fresh willow branches, and pulls out all her weaving. Then she has to go back and start weaving it all over again.

Now the old ones, the elders who tell this story and who love the grandmother and the great-grandmother who made the world, also love the old black dog—because he's equally strange and mysterious as the woman. And the elders who tell this story say that it's possible that if this old woman ever finishes weaving the cloak of radiance, that will be the end of the world. So sometimes it is the old black dogs—troublesome, pulling things apart, making things more difficult—that are the very things keeping us alive and keeping the blessings of this world unfolding in the most amazing and creative ways.

The idea in the deepest place of this wise energy or wise effort is not to fix this world, because it's far too mysterious for that. But to see it as it is—the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows, the weaving of beauty and suffering, the unbearable sorrows and the unspeakable beauty, the mystery of it—to see it as it is and to offer your compassion. Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to bring awakening to them all.

Let's sit for a minute. As you sit, a little reflection—just the tuning of your lute. Reflect on the key places in your life where it might be time to loosen the strings a little, to let go, to not grasp so much. You can know what they are. Then let yourself reflect and remember those places where your lute is too loose and you need dedication, impeccability, more care, more alive energy. Remember that you have this capacity to tune your instrument so that beautiful music comes even in difficulty. There can be wisdom and compassion. Do you think there could be a world without trouble?

Over the past eight weeks, we have gone through the fundamental Buddhist teachings of the Eightfold Path—a path laid out in the very first teachings of the Buddha, also called the Middle Path, the path of perfect balance between detachment and attachment. Neither detached nor attached, but perfectly in the midst of things as they are. This path is an invitation for those who would follow it to discover a liberation of heart.

It begins with what's called right or wise understanding: to see suffering and its causes in the world, and to see the possibility in our own hearts of greater compassion and greater freedom—to know that this is possible in us. Then wise aspiration, which is the openness and intention to direct our lives toward this possibility of freedom and compassion. Then right speech, right action, right livelihood—living in words and deeds, in conduct that creates harmony inwardly and outwardly. And then right or wise effort, which is really the effort to pay attention, to be where we are in a full and present and wakeful way, to see when we're entangled and to release that.

Last week I spoke of the two final steps of the Eightfold Path: wise concentration and wise mindfulness. Having spoken of concentration, tonight we conclude with right mindfulness—or wise mindfulness.

Mindfulness is better understood as fullness of mind. Sati is the word in the ancient Buddhist language of Pali. "Mindfulness," said the Buddha, "I declare to be all helpful." In every situation, the quality of mindfulness—of listening, of awareness, of remembering, of what one might call a sacred attention to life—is what brings us to awakening.

The art of living, as Alan Watts said, is neither careless drifting on the one hand nor fearful clinging on the other. It consists in being completely sensitive to each moment, regarding it as utterly new and unique, having the mind and heart open and truly receptive. This is the quality of mindfulness.

Now, if we look at our lives—our daily experience with the people around us, where we live, where we work, how we move—we discover as human beings that we can be asleep while we're awake. You know the life that's on automatic pilot. We can be identified and caught up with things, entangled in them, grasping for pleasures over and over, avoiding what's unpleasant. And we can be asleep in relation to our own bodies, not attentive or aware. Asleep in relation to our feelings, to our children, or our lovers, or our parents. We can be asleep to the injustices of the world, to the war, or racism, or hunger, the needs of those around us. All of that we can just block out—or we can pay attention.

I remember some years ago being at the Menninger Foundation in Kansas, invited to an international conference on the nature of consciousness. There were all these presentations by various psychologists and psychiatrists and religious experts about the nature of mind. And finally it was time for one of the invitees to address the group. His name was Mad Bear. He was an Iroquois Indian medicine man. And he said, "I can't speak in here. Come with me."

He led the whole group outside. We were in this retreat center in the midst of the Great Plains of Kansas. He had us stand in a circle and first just stand silent for a long time. And then, after that great silence under this huge Midwestern sky, vast, surrounded by the grains that just went out to the horizon, he began to offer a prayer—a prayer of gratitude.

He thanked first the earthworms for aerating the soil so that the plants could grow. Then he thanked the grasses that cover the earth for keeping the dust from blowing, for cushioning our steps, for showing our eyes their greenness and beauty, and for nourishing the creatures that live on them. He thanked the wind for bringing rain, for cleaning the air, for giving us the life breath that connects us to all things. Then he thanked the trees for cradling the birds, for granting us shade, for filling the air that the winds carry with sweet oxygen that fills our bodies and refreshes us. He thanked the stones for the foundation they give under our feet, for the steps of our life—the stones for remembering the ancestors, for holding the memories of human beings. He thanked the birds for singing to us, for showing us that the spirit can fly, for singing when we're happy and for singing when we're sad and keeping singing anyway.

And he went on and on, probably an hour of prayers while we stood out there. The wind was blowing on our faces, the sun was beating down, the insects—it was summertime—were making all their buzzing noises, the grain was blowing. And by the end of it, the whole conference was in an entirely different place than all those scientific words about consciousness. They were kind of erased and swept away. What it was, was a practice of mindfulness—the mindfulness of sacred attention.

In the Buddhist tradition, mindfulness is said to be the gateway to liberation, the gateway to that which is eternal, to the timeless, to the deathless. When we get entangled in our thoughts, in our worries, in our imaginings, in our fears—the author and psychiatrist Robert Hallowell finds that most people call themselves moderate to severe worriers in America; I don't know who he's talking about, but you can guess—when we get entangled in all these imaginings of how it's supposed to be and could be, the feelings and fears and thoughts, mindfulness allows us to let go of that and come into the reality of the present.

As the Buddha said, do not pursue the past, and do not lose yourself in the future. Rest where you are, here and now. The past no longer exists. The future is yet to come. And in this present moment you will find the freedom that is who you really are.

So mindfulness is the practice of being here in the present wherever we are. The poem that you've heard many times, but it captures it so well it's worth another reading, from Rumi:

This being human is a guest house. Every morning a new arrival—a joy, a depression, a meanness, some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor. Welcome and entertain them all, even if they're a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture. Still, treat each guest honorably. He may be clearing you out for some new delight. The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in. Be grateful for whoever comes, because each has been sent as a guide from beyond.

When Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master, has come to teach at Spirit Rock, he usually arrives in the summer, and we've had two or three thousand people gathered out on the hillside for his presence. They'll do some chanting, some meditation, perhaps a meditation of eating an apple or an orange mindfully. He's kind of the king of mindfulness, in a way. Everyone's sitting there, happy, chattering away. It's somewhat like a Grateful Dead concert, only quieter.

And all of a sudden it's time—not for Jerry Garcia, but for Thich Nhat Hanh to come on. He's usually somewhere meditating, or whatever he does. And he comes out to these two or three thousand people sitting there, and Thich Nhat Hanh walks out, taking each step so mindfully. He looks up so mindfully, smiles so mindfully, sits down so mindfully, takes the microphone so mindfully, then closes his eyes and breathes a little bit so mindfully—and everybody changes. He doesn't even have to say a word. Just by the way he walks in, the quality of attention he gives to his steps, to his body, to the earth, transforms the whole environment of everyone else's consciousness. This is what it means to really pay attention to the body.

When we do pay attention, instead of fighting against the body and wanting it to be different, instead of being filled with desire and aversion and lost in things, the more deeply we attend, the more we can honor the body and care for it properly. And the more we also see that it is always in change.

You sit in meditation and your body hurts. There's a pain. You say, "Oh, that's pain. I want to get rid of it." You move. You go away from it.

But pain is just a word. What is pain? You pay attention. Oh, it's tingling, it's throbbing, it's vibration, it's heat, it's fire, it's twisting. And the more deeply we pay attention, pain becomes a whole world, a river of sensations.

And pleasure—oh, this is joy. But what does joy feel like in the body? Some of us are afraid of joy. Oh, I expand. There's a different kind of tingling. There's pleasure, there's light, there's ease. We have the names for things, but the more deeply we feel, we discover that what we are is a river of life, and we can enter and rest in that river.

Also, as you pay attention, when you feel the pain or the feelings or the joy, after a while you begin to realize that it's not just your pain, and it's not just your joy or happiness, and it's not just your feelings, but it's the body in the body, the feelings in the feelings. It's the feelings, it's the pain that human beings have, it's the joy that human beings share. It is the life that we have been given.

To be mindful of the body brings us freedom. Freedom to be where we are, freedom to care with compassion, and also freedom not to be afraid of this body for what it is. To be mindful of feelings is the same.

To practice mindfulness of body in the body, to practice mindfulness of feeling in the feeling, means to be aware of what we feel without reacting so much. When we're not aware and pleasant arises, we tend to say, "Oh, pleasant, I want more of it." We cling, we grasp, we want more and more and more. When unpleasant arises and we're not aware, we tend to withdraw and shrink away and move. "Oh, aversion, I don't like this. How do I get rid of it?" And so we spend our lives trying to avoid half of life and trying to grasp the other half, all the time off balance.

When we become aware of feelings—pleasant, neutral, unpleasant, the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows—then we are free. Without awareness of body, without awareness of feelings, we cannot be present, we cannot be free.

So you sit or walk in meditation, and love comes or pride comes or delight comes or worry comes or grief comes. Someone said that in some way, to really be free, spiritual life is a long process of grieving—of seeing all the ways that we wanted it to be, and then realizing that it is the way that it is.

Some years ago in New York City, there was a professional seminar given by the senior analysts of the Jung Institute, together with Marie-Louise von Franz, who made a series of wonderful movies about the nature of dreams—one of Jung's great disciples. This panel of analysts sat up there, and after the films, they were going to answer questions about dream work. The audience sent up little cards with all their dreams written out on them.

After a few questions, the main analyst picked up a card that told the story of a recurring dream in which the dreamer was tortured and put through the atrocities of the Nazi concentration camps, stripped of all their human dignity. One of the analysts read this dream out loud. This story is being told by a psychologist who attended the conference. She said, "I thought, well, I wonder how they're going to respond to that. The dream could speak about so much of this woman's own childhood, because it was a younger woman, and all that it might portend in her life."

Once the dream was read, there were no explanations given. Instead, Carl Jung's grandson stood up and said, "Would you all please rise?" And so the whole room of people rose, and he said, "We will stand for one minute in silence in response to this dream." And then everyone was invited to sit back down, and they went on to the next card and the next dream.

The psychologist in the audience was frustrated because she had all these interpretations and ideas—why didn't they do anything with this dream? Finally, someone raised their hand and said, "Doctor, why is it that none of you analysts had anything to say about the dream of this woman?" And Carl Jung's grandson stood up and said, "There is in life a vulnerability so extreme, a suffering so unspeakable, that it goes beyond words. In the face of such suffering, all we can do is stand together in witness, so no one need bear it alone."

To become truly mindful of our birth and our aging and our death, of our joys and our sorrows, means to allow the grief of human existence, the suffering that inhabits this realm—and the joy equally.

The poet Ryokan, the most beloved Zen poet of Japan:

Spring has begun.
Jewels and precious gold everywhere.
Please come visit me—
only two in the garden:
plum blossoms at their peak and an old man full of years.

How can we ever lose interest in life?
Spring has come again.
The mountains are covered with mist and blooming cherry trees.
Gaily the warm spring days pass.
The children run to greet me the first time this spring—
how they have grown.

So here is the grief and the sorrows and the joys. We become aware of the body as this human body in its true nature—birth, aging, death, the senses, the life of the body. We become aware of the feelings, feelings in the feelings. We become free when we practice mindfulness of the mind.

The mind is such an amazing thing, especially the thought mind. We have picture thoughts and word thoughts. Sometimes on a meditation retreat, I'll have people count their thoughts. See how many thoughts you can count in one sitting. Hundreds of thoughts. It's phenomenal how many thoughts come trooping through. Thought is a wonderful servant. It is a very poor master.

Lama Yeshe puts it this way: "To become your own psychologist, you don't have to learn some big philosophy or go to graduate school. All you have to do is examine your own mind. You already examine material things every day. Every morning you check out what food is found in your kitchen, but you never investigate your own mind. Checking out what's in your mind is more helpful."

What you begin to discover as you pay attention to the mind is that the mind has no pride. It will do anything. It tells phenomenal stories. It's full of ideas and plans and memories and opinions. And the reality of your experience is not the same as your thoughts of it. The invitation of mindfulness is to come into the reality. The thought of your mother is not your mother, right? They are different things. But you have this thought and then a whole huge story comes.

The Zen ancestor says, "The great way is not difficult for those who do not cling to their opinions, who can see things as they are." In our mind are so many ideas about how the world is supposed to be.

Here's a story for you. One day, the manager of a store heard his salesman say, "No, ma'am, we haven't had any for weeks now, and it doesn't look like we'll be getting any soon." Horrified, the manager rushed over, took the arm of the woman, and said, "That isn't true, ma'am. Of course we'll have some soon. We placed an order for it a couple of weeks ago." Then he grabbed the salesman, dragged him to the side, and growled, "Never, never, never say we don't have something. If we don't have it, say we've ordered it and it's on its way. Now—what was it that she wanted?"

"Rain," he answered.

The poet Hafiz talks about ending your mental lawsuits. Chögyam Trungpa talks about stepping out of the bureaucracy of ego, which is all the constructs that we make about who we are and how it's supposed to be. Instead, with the mind observing the mind, seeing all the thought constructions—which is what the mind does; it just secretes thoughts. It's an organ that secretes things. It secretes thoughts and you say, "Oh, that's very interesting. There's a happy thought or a sad thought or whatever." Don't believe it. I mean, it's very unreliable. I'm sure you've noticed that already. With the mind becoming aware of the mind, tremendous freedom comes when we're not identified with the mind.

And then, mindfulness of the dharmas. From Krishnamurti: "Dharma is the word that means the laws, the way things are, the truth. To understand truth, one must have a very sharp, precise, clear mind—not a cunning mind nor an ambitious mind, but a mind that is capable of looking without distortion, a mind that is innocent, open, vulnerable. Only such a mind can see what is true."

Learning, deep learning, is a radical openness to this moment, and this, and this. The invitation again is to see the Dharma in the dharmas, to see the laws of things in our direct experience. The Buddha goes on to describe how we notice when the mind is expanded, notice when it's contracted, notice when the mind and body and heart are entangled, notice when they are free.

To allow ourselves to rest is the invitation. To rest in the space of pure awareness. To swim in it. To relax in mindfulness.

To become aware of consciousness itself. Because as you start to see thoughts come and go, and feelings changing like the weather, and sensations of the body rising and passing, and days and nights coming and going, the body and mind doing what they do—from the place of awareness, it can feel like, okay, I'm the witness. I'm the one who sees all of this. It's a certain step to sense that.

But then, if you turn your awareness back to say, well, who is this witness? Who am I who's looking? Look for a moment. See, who is it that's listening just now? When you look really directly, you begin to discover that nobody's listening. That there's nobody there. What you find is openness, is space, is a consciousness that is knowing without a single person being there. Not me or mine—this is my sound, this is my feeling—but just a pure, open awareness.

And this freedom that is discovered by all who look comes in any moment. We realize, oh, I took it all to be mine. I took it all very seriously.

Here are the words of the Buddha: "When body and mind dissolve, they do not exist anywhere, any more than musical notes lay heaped up anywhere. When a lute is played, there is no previous store of sound, and when the music ceases, it does not go anywhere in space. It came into existence on account of the wood and the structure of the instrument and the exertions of the performer, and as it came into existence, so it passes away. In exactly the same way, all the elements of your own being—physical, feelings, perceptions, mental—come into existence having not been existent, arise due to certain causes, and then pass away. There is no self residing in body and mind. But the cooperation of all these co-formations produces what people think is me or mine. Paradoxical though it may seem, there is a path to walk on but no one there who travels it. There are deeds being done but no one who can claim them. There is the blowing of the air, but there is no wind person who blows it. The thought of who you are, of this self, is an error, an artifact. And as you pay deep attention, all existence becomes hollow as a bubble, as an echo, a rainbow, a flash of lightning in the summer cloud, a dream."

This is not a philosophy that someone is supposed to believe or not believe. It is really an invitation to look into this human experience. Where is your childhood? It is gone. What happened to the twentieth century? Went out with a bang, more or less, right? Gone. Never to happen again. I mean, it was quite a century, remember that? All that's left is just an imagination. It is gone. This moment is here, and then it is gone. Reality comes out of nothing, exists according to certain patterns, and then disappears. To know this frees us. To not know it, we are bound.

It brings us face to face with the mystery. Mindfulness could also be called, as one Zen master called it, "don't know mind." Not knowing, not claiming. And there's a real happiness in not knowing. Who are you? I don't know. I mean, yes, I know my zip code and my phone number, but who are you really? I don't know. Oh, well, how about being in that not knowing? It's wonderful to meet somebody who's open like that. And the masters that I most loved, the ones that I studied with, they were so joyful.

And it wasn't by being something—"I'm an important master." They were just present and happy. They didn't cling to being someone. They were just alive.

To train in mindfulness is to remind the heart and mind that we can be free. And it brings a wonderful balance. We stop the struggle the minute we become mindful. You know, there you are with your teenager, or with your partner, or whatever it happens to be. And you're all conflicted about something. And then in a moment, with mindful attention, you can say, "Wow, I'm really caught in this, aren't I? Really caught in that one." And in just that moment's attention, like a bubble—"Oh, I really wanted it to be that way. I hated that. I could never forgive that." Oh, I was really caught in there. And then it's gone.

You're sitting in meditation and your knee begins to ache and your back hurts and you're like, "I'm getting older and God, what's going to happen?" And then you start to worry about your money and pretty soon you're a shopping bag lady out on the streets. It's only five minutes from when your knee began to hurt and you have this whole life scenario. And then you wake up and you say, "Caught in that one, wasn't I?"

Zen Master Ryokan never preached to or reprimanded anyone. Once his brother asked Ryokan to visit his house and speak to his delinquent teenage son. This is in the 1700s in Japan, just so you know that certain things are eternal. Ryokan came but did not say a word of admonition to the boy. He stayed overnight and prepared to leave the next morning. As the wayward nephew helped Ryokan place sandals on his feet, he felt a warm drop of water. Glancing up, he saw Ryokan looking down at him, his eyes full of tears. Ryokan returned home, and the nephew changed very much for the better.

There is a tenderness in this attention, a sweetness and compassion that comes because we're not trying to get or be something. We can see this person, this plant, this car that's moving in the traffic pattern that we're in, as they are now—and not with all our ideas and judgments and ambitions. It is so freeing.

And this liberation is both practical and radical. It's practical. You know the story I like to tell of the army officer who was studying meditation for stress reduction in his army unit. It happens now, you know. It's gone beyond these weird Buddhist places. Mainstream. So there he was in line at the grocery store with all these groceries, in a hurry—always in a hurry, trying to get somewhere—and very irritable. Then a woman in line in front of him, he noticed, had just one item and she wouldn't get in the express line. She was waiting in his line. Why didn't she go in the line that was meant for people like her? You know how it is. And then she got up to the cash register. She was carrying a baby and she handed the baby to the cashier, and they were cooing over it, you know, coochie-coo, nice baby. The guy was just going ballistic. "Hurry up, I'm in a hurry, you're in the wrong line, don't you see there are all these people," and so forth.

But because he'd begun to study mindfulness, he felt how much tension he was making, and he took some breaths. He just let all that frustration and anger soften a bit. And then he looked for a moment—he saw it was actually kind of a cute baby. So he gets to the cash register. He'd released all of that tension, or some of it, and he said, "You know, that was a really cute kid that she was carrying, that woman before me." And the cashier said, "Oh, did you like him? He's my son. You see, my husband was in the air force but he was killed in a plane crash this last year. So I've had to come to work and my mother takes care of our baby, but she brings him in once or twice a day so I can see him."

We have so many stories about who's doing what and how they're supposed to be. Liberation is so immediate. There we are, and then we can let go.

It's also quite radical. A poem from Wendell Berry called "The Mad Farmer's Manifesto"—which he is:

Love the quick profit, the annual raise, the vacation with pay. Want more of everything ready-made. Be afraid to know your neighbors and to die, and you will have a window in your head. Not even your future will be a mystery anymore.

Your mind will be punched in a card and shut away in a little drawer. When they want you to buy something, they will call you. When they want you to die for profit, they will let you know.

So, my friends, every day do something that won't compute. Love the world. Work for nothing. Take all that you have and offer some to the poor. Love someone who doesn't deserve it. Ask questions that have no answers. Invest in the millennium. Plant sequoias. Say that your main crop is the forest that you will not live to harvest. Put your faith in the two inches of soil that build under the trees every thousand years.

To become mindful is to become free, to have the capacity to step out of the rat race, the speed, the complexity, and be who we are, be true to our hearts. And there comes a great balance and ease with that. In any moment, we stop the war, we stop the conflict, we come back to be as the Buddha sits, as the Buddha walks, as the Buddha speaks—where we are, just present and alive. So simple, to be with things as they are.

A silly poem for you, from Bob Munson: Once upon a time, before time was invented, there was no daytime or nighttime. And yesterday, today, and tomorrow weren't here yet. There were no watches, clocks, sundials, no hours, minutes, days, seconds, years. There was no fast or slow. And everything just was the way it was when it was that way. And things happened in no time—they just happened when they did. Flowers bloomed when they did. Morning and evening just came and went.

Once upon that time there lived a frog who lived in no time. He wasn't fast or slow. When he jumped, he jumped, and when he didn't, he didn't. He got to where he was going in no time, because in no time it took no time to get anywhere. And anywhere was everywhere, so he was really where he wanted to be all the time. And he was always on time wherever he went. He got where he was going before he left. He didn't have to rush or hurry because in no time he could never be late. Wouldn't that be fine, to live in no time and be where you are all the time?

It's really natural to us. This is not foreign. It's as near to us as our own breath, as near to us as our own body. And when we practice mindfulness, we come alive. Our bodies come alive, our senses. Our food tastes different because we actually taste it. The people around us—their eyes, their spirits—are alive for us. Our words become more alive. The clouds and the earthworms, as Mad Bear said, our silence is more alive. We're present when we come, we're present when we go. We're aware of birth and we're aware of death, of joys and sorrows. We enter that which is timeless.

What a gift. Even a few moments a day is great. Practice is not to make perfect, but to remember that freedom is possible where we are, that our heart can open in this very life, in this very moment. The body in the body, the feelings in the feeling, the thoughts in the thoughts. You discover the body lives its own life. The feelings feel themselves. The thoughts think themselves.

So we see it in meditation. It's really just a little reminder, a reminding meditation. We feel the breath and the mind quiets and the heart opens. And things start to open up—all the things that come and go.

My teacher Nisargadatta used to talk about it this way. He said, usually we only see a small distance bound by our desires for what we like, our ambitions, and our fears and dislikes of what's wrong with this world. We create a net that entangles us, confines and limits our consciousness.

This is not who we are. To free ourselves, it is necessary to look beyond the net. And yet it is simple, for the net is full of holes. Any moment we look, any moment we bring mindfulness to, there is space, there is openness. We are not entangled and identified. And there is a tremendous joy in discovering this and remembering this.

Mindfulness is something like Sabbath. Six days you work and then you get a day off. Actually, in the Old Testament as it was written, not only was there a Sabbath every seventh day where you got to rest and simply appreciate life and not have to do things, but every seventh year was a fallow year where things were not planted, and you got a whole year—a sabbatical. A year off. Doesn't that sound fine? And every seventh seventh year in the grand cycle, all property was returned to its original owners, all debts were forgiven. It was like Monopoly—we did it for forty-nine years, and now we go back to square one again. Isn't that great? Mindfulness is like that. It is the get-out-of-jail-free card. There is an ease, a graciousness when we remember this mindfulness or heartfulness, where we can bow to this life as it is with its joys and its sorrows.

And we somehow sense the small sense of self, the body of fear that we talk about, the ambitions and confusions. We remember that this is not really what it is about. It is not who we are. Like Zen Master Suzuki Roshi, when he was dying of cancer, called everyone together: "If when I die, if I suffer, that's all right, you know. That's just suffering Buddha. No confusion in it. Maybe everyone will suffer from the physical or spiritual agony. If when I die, if I suffer, that's all right, you know. That's just suffering Buddha. Moon Buddha, Sun Buddha, Happy Buddha, Sad Buddha." The way things are is what we are given to awaken to. Through mindfulness we can bow to what is and be free.

The words of the Dhammapada, the Buddha: "How can they lose the way who are beyond the way? Their eyes are open, their feet are free. Who can follow after them? For the one who is awake, attentive, mindful, the world cannot reclaim them or lead them astray, nor can the net of desires hold them. They are awake, even the gods delight in watching over them."

There is not one moment that you are far away from this freedom. O nobly born, it is said, O you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddha, remember your own true nature. Remember that you can awaken and be free. Remember the path of awakening, this Eightfold Path of wise understanding—the potential for liberation and compassion in your own being. Of wise intention—to bring your awareness and care just where you are. Of wise speech, action, and livelihood—to make the very words and deeds of your life the place of practice, the place of awakening. Of wise effort—the effort to stay awake and present. Of wise concentration—that wholeness of heart and body and mind when we come into the present. Of wise mindfulness—that ability to be present and let go into the great space of awareness that neither struggles nor resists but is free in the midst of all things.

"Just as if, my friends, one who was faring through the forest, through the great woods, should see an ancient path, an ancient road traversed by people of former days, even so have I, O monks, seen an ancient path, an ancient road traversed by the rightly enlightened ones of former times." And it is this road that I invite you to walk.

You cannot do it wrong, you know. Either you are present or you are not. Either you are awake or you have forgotten. And then a moment later—oh, here we are again. It is great. You cannot make a mistake in that way. The path is immediate. It is inviting. It is generous. You are invited to participate, to remember, to follow the path of the awakened ones, to develop the heart of compassion, to quiet the mind, open the heart, to taste your own freedom.

I end with a little chant. And this chant is an offering of gratitude and appreciation for your attention over these weeks, and for the care that so many people in this room give to their lives and to those around them.

Sabbe sattā sukhitā hontu, sabbe sattā averā hontu, sabbe sattā anīghā hontu, sukhī attānaṃ pariharantu.

Sukhitā kayena, kobhā abhivādanā, sīlena saṃyutto bhavatu, dhammaṃ carantu, āyu vaṇṇo sukhaṃ balaṃ.

This talk was given by Jack Kornfield at Spirit Rock Meditation Center in March 1992.

CHAPTER 225

Five Spiritual Faculties: Effort

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses right effort (sammā vāyāma), noting that the Buddha spoke more about this topic than any other—even more than nibbāna, jhāna, or vipassanā. This frequency points to the universal difficulty practitioners face in establishing balanced energy in practice. Wilson identifies five elements of right effort: confidence (saddhā), health, sincerity, energy (vīriya), and wisdom (paññā), exploring how each supports sustainable practice.
>
> Drawing from personal experiences—including her early overconfident enthusiasm and lessons learned attending her stepdaughter's track meet—Wilson illustrates how right effort requires patience, perseverance, and letting go of expectations. She emphasizes that balanced effort is not about pushing to extremes or comparing ourselves to stories of accomplished practitioners, but about finding our own edge and taking just one step beyond it. The talk addresses common pitfalls: biting off more than we can chew, inconsistent practice that swings between intense effort and collapse, and keeping "one eye on the goal" rather than attending to the present step.
> Wilson offers practical techniques for working with difficulty, such as asking "Can I be with this for five more seconds?" She emphasizes that mindfulness requires surprisingly little energy—what matters is the precision of attention, not its intensity. The teaching concludes with a Zen story suggesting that enlightenment may not be something we chase, but something that catches up with us when we learn to be still.

It's been said that more than any other topic in all of the Buddha's teachings, the Buddha spoke on the topic of right effort or balanced effort. More than nibbana, more than jhana, more than vipassana, he talked about right effort. And that points, to me, to the difficulty of establishing a right relationship to effort or energy in our practice.

In all my years of hearing the teachings, practicing myself, and the readings that I have done, there seem to be some conclusions that I and others are able to draw from all of this talk about right effort.

The first is that most everyone struggles to find a place of balance in right effort. However, secondly, the imbalances create the most colorful stories. And the third conclusion is that there's no consensus on what right effort is.

So we are left with having to find our own way. Having to find really what is balanced effort—what is the balance for us given our conditions right now. We can hear stories of famous Zen monks and monks or nuns at the time of the Buddha or even our own teachers, and we think, "My God, I can't do that." And sure enough, you can't. That was theirs. That was their experience of wrong effort or balanced effort. And you'll find your own. In time, I'm sure you'll be able to tell the horror stories of your wrong effort and entertain people.

I got a good lesson in right effort when I first met Kamala and came to Maui to take up residence together. Kamala's daughter was then thirteen, Therese, and she was just going into high school. She went out for the track team, and wanting to be a good parent, I said, "Well, let us know when your first track meet is, and we'll come." So she told us when the first track meet was—it started at four o'clock in the afternoon.

We went, got there early, and walked up into the cement bleachers to sit down. You know how the first meet of the season goes: it's very unorganized, pretty chaotic, and you have a hard time following just exactly what's happening. We sat there and finally located Therese on the field doing her warm-ups—running and jumping and doing things like that. We saw a few people that we knew and talked to them a little bit, and started shifting around in our seats because the cement bleachers were so hard.

An hour went by. They'd gotten started on some of the events, but nothing that Therese was in yet. So we called her over to the fence. "Hey, how's it going?" "Oh, okay." We noticed that even though she wasn't competing at the time, she would always look to us every five minutes or so to see if we were paying attention. So we had to pay attention. We were interested—we wanted to be interested—but cement bleachers are hard.

Five o'clock came and went, and five-thirty came and went, and six o'clock came. We'd been there for two hours, and Therese was still doing her warm-ups and prancing around on the field and looking at us every five minutes. And we're paying attention, being very patient and persevering.

Six-thirty came and went, and seven o'clock came and went. Now it had been three hours past our dinner time, and we had canceled everything else we thought we were going to do that evening, and we were still waiting. Seven-thirty came and went. They said, "Oh, that's the end of the meet."

We said, "Well, Therese, what's happening? When are you going to do your thing?"

She said, "Gee, I don't know." So she went and asked the coach. They had forgotten to call her event.

They said, "Oh, wait, wait, we've got to do the last event. It's the triple jump for the girls." So they got the six or eight girls that were going to do this triple jump—you get three tries. They're all warming up and doing their thing, and then it's Therese's turn. She gets ready, she lines up, and then she runs. She runs, and she does her hop, skip, and jump.

It takes about three seconds. Got that done. And then they run through the second trial, and that takes about four seconds. And then she does the third trial, and that takes another four seconds. So the grand total time of her participation or competition was a little less than a minute, and we sat on those bleachers for about three and a half hours.

It was a lesson in how to pay attention, how to be present, how to really sustain your interest, how to manifest your thought. You think you're interested, and then you meet conditions. Hello. Welcome to the real world.

Well, I learned the value of persevering, of course, because Therese was keeping a close eye on us, making sure we were paying attention. I certainly had to let go of my expectations, because I didn't expect that at all. I finally had to give up my judgment of the officials and my blaming of them. And what I found after a couple of hours was that there's actually quite a lot going on that you can enjoy. There are all kinds of other events and sideshows and people doing all sorts of things, even if what you came for isn't happening.

Practice is a lot like that. You've got to show up, you've got to be interested, you've got to pay attention, even if nothing's happening. And it's helpful to let go of your expectations. And it's really instructive to pay attention to the sideshow, because that's where everything's happening.

So tonight I want to talk about how we can try to find this place of right effort, right energy, right attitude, really, to our practice. And I want to put it in the context of the five spiritual or controlling faculties that I spoke about last week.

The five controlling faculties, as you remember, are confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. When we have some degree of confidence, when we feel some degree of assurance, trust, devotion, confidence—we are willing to make the effort. As we make the effort, we become more mindful. As we undertake dharma practices or mindfulness practices of any sort, we become more mindful. The continuity of that mindful awareness deepens concentration. It collects the mind. It calms the mind. It focuses the mind on the present moment. As the mind gets concentrated, collected, calmed, focused, we see more of what's happening. We see more details in this moment. We have an expansive vision. We have more understanding, really, of what's going on. This understanding is the development of wisdom.

The more we know about practice, the more we know about ourselves in practice, the more we know about our strengths and limitations in practice, the more confidence we can have. Understanding is the support for increased confidence, trust, faith, devotion to practice. And this development of these five qualities of mind, or these five factors of mind, gradually and incrementally supports each other and increases throughout our days and years of practice.

So I spoke about confidence, trust, faith earlier, and tonight I want to speak about energy or effort. There are five elements to right effort. Confidence is one, of course. Without it, we don't begin. But confidence alone is not enough. We also must be reasonably healthy in order to undertake practice. Health is the second factor. The sincerity of our practice is a third. Confidence, health, sincerity, energy, and understanding or wisdom. These are the five elements of right effort, and I want to speak about each of them a little bit.

The interesting thing about confidence, the first element, is that confidence is not based on, is not dependent on, what you actually know from the books. It's not based on intellectual knowledge. You can know everything in the books and have no confidence or faith to practice. Or, on the other hand, you can have no understanding of the books and have a lot of confidence, a lot of trust in yourself or the path of practice. And that was my experience.

I mentioned that after one retreat, I went to the Meditation Center of Massachusetts and joined the staff. I'd only done one two-week retreat, and one of the first days of my tenure there, I was up in the attic insulating the ceilings of the dormitory rooms with another person on staff, Rodney Smith, who is now also teaching in Seattle. We were having a discussion about the Dharma and our practice and Nibbana, of all topics, and I said to him, out of my enthusiasm and naivety, "I have absolutely no doubt that in this lifetime I will realize profoundly the Dharma." I also had no idea what I was saying. But I had that level of confidence. I had that level of enthusiasm and trust and just self-assurance—which was not yet confronted by reality.

And so when I suggested to Kamala that I give this talk tonight on right effort, she said, "Be sure to mention where you're coming from." Because sometimes it would be easy for me to give a talk on right effort wrongly—to really emphasize the striving, the playing the edge, pushing the edge, going over the edge. That kind of effort. And that's only part of the story. There are times we'll all do that. The hard part for me is talking about the soft edge, the edge of balance, the edge of recognizing when you're pushing too hard and backing up, softening, letting the wisdom unfold that tells you it's time to back up. I have had a very hard time learning that lesson.

True confidence comes, though, with self-knowledge. When we truly know for ourselves, from our own experience, the nature of pain and how to deal with it, the nature of any of the hindrances—sleepiness, restlessness—and how to deal with them, this gives us a lot of confidence. When you can be with discomfort, when you can be with your hindrances for a period of time, it gives you a lot of self-confidence. It gives you a lot of self-knowledge that you can do it, you can be with this. And that kind of knowledge you don't get in a book. No teacher can tell you that. We can inspire you, inform you, entertain you, and try to get you to see that for yourself, but only by living through that experience will you know. Once you have lived through that experience, nobody can take that knowledge away. Nobody can tell you otherwise what you already know.

Doubts about ourselves, about practice, are not resolved by thinking or speculating, but only by practice. My teacher Sayadaw U Pandita used to say, at the end of my report when I would ask if I could ask a question, "If I let you ask this question and I answer it, you will have two questions for every answer I give you." But he said, "If you continue to practice, your practice will answer all your questions—if you can just be patient with the question." A lot of our doubt or lack of confidence is manifested as questions, when if we just practice, just extended our practice a little more, the answer would come.

Confidence is the foundation, the support, the cause for the willingness to make the effort. What effort is required? Some of you have just come to the retreat at its midpoint, and the first flavor of effort is really just getting here. Getting your whole body, your whole mind here. And kind of recovering from the deficiency of sleep, of energy, of interest. It's just getting ourselves back to a reasonable normal. Many of you come from traveling, from work, from stressful lives, and it takes quite a lot of rest, actually, for the first few days to be ready to practice.

But then there is a necessary adjustment once you've recovered some rest. There's an adjustment when you actually begin practice—I was going to say seriously, I mean continuously—when you arouse the intention to move towards fulfilling your aspiration by sustaining your energy, sustaining your attention. And that's really the effort of continuity, of just being there, just following the schedule, getting up with the bells, following the schedule, going through the motions, being willing to do that, fit the schedule.

Most of you who have been interviewing with me have noticed that I ask you: How's your sleeping situation? Are you sleeping okay? And your yogi job, is that okay? Not too stressful? Is the food okay for you? And the weather? Why do I ask that? It's not just to make conversation. It's because those are the conditions that will allow you to have good health—if you can sleep well, if you can get something to eat, and if the weather's suitable. And if you're healthy, if you come with reasonably good health or whatever level of health you have, these conditions support it.

Because if we're not healthy, if we're not well physically, if we're really sick, we don't have any energy for practice, or very little.

A woman who used to practice with us several years ago wrote me a letter telling me about what happened to her one day at work. She felt like she had a touch of cold coming on, maybe the flu, and she got in her car to drive home. She got home and became violently sick. Then she related this harrowing account of what happened over the next two or three weeks—a terrific fever, the most painful body nausea, aches and pains throughout her body, swelling. It was just unbelievable. Things in all her limbs were plugged in, taking things out and putting things in. As she called them, "the blood-take people" came and jabbed her every so often. It hurt like the devil. She was in such misery that all she wanted to do was die. She was hoping she would die because it was so painful, so miserable. And her mind was really driving her crazy too.

After a couple of weeks, the fever came down and she got stabilized to some degree. Then she had her first coherent thought. And what did she think of? She thought of yogis practicing on retreat. She said that's what inspired her to really come out of it, and she realized then how valuable her practice had been up to that point. She ended her letter by saying, "Whenever you're on retreat, tell those yogis: just practice, practice, practice. That's the most important thing, because you never know when your health is going to go."

What most surprised her was that when she was sick, when she was really not well, she didn't think about practice. She didn't care about practice. She didn't know anything about practice. All she wanted to do was die. But as soon as she got a little bit well, that was the first thing she thought of—doing her practice, doing more practice, encouraging others.

I've spoken about urgency in our practice. What moves us to be here at this retreat now? What moves us to make the efforts that we do? Why is it so important that now we're here practicing? What makes it urgent in your life?

Sometimes we have lofty urges—we want to get enlightened. Maybe we have a life-threatening disease. Maybe there's been a death in our family that's really shaken us up. Maybe we've been tremendously inspired by a Dharma teacher. We just have a lot of urgency. But sometimes that which brings urgency is really quite mundane, ordinary.

Once I was practicing in Thailand in the forest, in the jungle, and at this particular monastery we went for alms round at 6:30 in the morning. We got food from one village that raised tapioca, and mostly what we got in our alms bowl was tapioca and sticky rice—that was about it. Sometimes there was ground-up meat with herbs, but that was it, every day. It wasn't really very nourishing, but it was heavy. When you would eat at eight o'clock, you'd eat quite a lot, because by 8:30, that was it until eight o'clock the next day. And when you eat a lot of sticky rice, it feels like a bowling ball in your belly. You better not sit down or lay down for several hours.

So I would stand up in the shade of my kuti, which was up on stilts. In the jungle, you put things up on stilts so that the creepy crawlies don't come to bed with you. I was standing in the shade because the sun was up and it was hot. But the flies congregate in the shade. The monk's robes come down to about your knee, a little below your knee, and there are your bare legs and feet for the flies to play with. So I would keep a little tea towel in my hand, and I'd be standing, standing, standing, and then I'd feel this itchy crawling—flies crawling on my legs and feet—and I would flick it like a horsetail. They would fly up and off for a minute. Standing, standing, flick, flick. I would stand this way for two or three hours, just until I got my meal digested and could get a little more comfortable without falling asleep.

One day I was standing there and I felt something on my foot. It didn't feel like a fly. So I opened my eyes. You know what it's like after you eat a big meal—you're kind of dull, kind of lethargic, barely staying mindful. There was this snake going across my foot, and it was a big snake. Let me watch my musāvādā here—it was three or four feet. It was big. And I didn't have any problem with my urgency to practice. I felt a great spiritual urgency to be awake.

When I moved quickly, the snake took off, and it didn't go into the jungle. It went to the nearest tree and went up the tree.

Now I realized that the posts holding up my cabin were totally ineffective. If a snake can climb a tree, it can climb the post that my sleeping platform rested on. Sometimes our spiritual urgency comes in the most mundane ways.

But staying healthy, having good health—that's a condition for making right effort.

The third quality of right effort is sincerity. And it's important to consider what sincerity means, because all of us are here. We've made a lot of effort to get here, to be here. There's a certain sincerity in our wanting to be here, in coming here. And yet I'm sure you've discovered those times in your day when your practice is more casual than sincere, more just getting by than really making determined effort.

Sincerity refers to walking your talk. We want to practice. We want to be awakened. We want to be good yogis. We want to be diligent. We want to be worthy of the teaching. We want to be worthy of the efforts that everyone's making. And yet it's difficult to sustain that sincerity.

Sincerity really involves commitment. In the first month-long retreat we had here, there was a woman who was celebrating her twentieth anniversary of being in AA, right in the middle of the retreat. Twenty years of going to AA meetings every day, often two or three a day. I said to her, "Wow, that's quite a commitment you have to AA—to taking care of yourself and really getting a handle on this condition you have." She said, "Yes." I said, "It must get easier as you go on." She said, "No. Every day it's a decision. It's a recommitment every day to that decision made twenty years before."

And that's really how commitments are made—moment by moment. We don't make a commitment once and then say, "Oh, there, that's it. I've made a commitment to this practice. I've made a commitment to this relationship. I've made a commitment to this behavior or refraining from this behavior." And then it happens automatically. It doesn't work that way. Sustaining a commitment means reconfirming that decision, reconfirming that intention, moment after moment after moment. And yet it does build up a certain momentum, a certain quality of repetition and habit, and of course that provides a lot of support.

I mention this because it's important for us in practice to notice the times when our practice is less than sincere. You know how easy it is to start a bad habit? If you can get through the first time—all of the fear and the shame and the humiliation of doing it that first time—the second time comes easy. And so too with unskillful practice habits. If we allow ourselves to really hang out with unskillful practice habits, doing casual practice, insincere practice, just kind of drifting—and we know, we feel it—then it sets up a permission and the beginnings of a habit, which the more frequently we engage, the less likely we are to see it.

And so we want to see it. We want to see those times in our practice when we are less than sincere, so that we can catch that kind of practice and put it aside.

It takes a lot of willingness to stay in this practice. And I often ask you when you come to report on difficult experiences: Are you willing to look at it? Are you willing to open to it? Are you willing to be present with it? Are you willing to acknowledge it? Are you willing to feel it?

Practice is about being willing—at least willing. It's not overcoming. It's not defeating. It's not uprooting. It's not getting rid of. It's: Are you willing to put aside your fear, your inertia, your judgments of yourself, and to feel it, to open to it, to check it out?

Sincerity is really the quality of our intention and the continuity of our action. It's the only way that sincerity gets any grounding—through actually following through with our intention.

Confidence, health, sincerity. The fourth element of right effort is energy. And it's kind of paradoxical in this practice that we come and a lot of the instruction is to not do. We practice doing nothing—mindfully, with awareness. And that takes, as somebody said, a lot of energy not to do anything other than pay attention.

So what kind of energy are we talking about when we talk about energy for right effort? I talked about the energy of just settling in, overcoming your inertia, exhaustion, tiredness. I talked about the energy of sustaining your intention and attention on your primary objects, sustaining your willingness to just follow the schedule.

Another kind—or another quality, another quantum leap really—in energy comes when we meet difficulty, when we meet dukkha. Here we have two kinds of energy that we want to acknowledge. One is the energy of persevering, being willing to play the edge of what we can tolerate—what we can tolerate for fear, for pain, for sleepiness, for any of the hindrances, for insecurity. And we play that edge. Playing the edge is the way that we expand our capacity.

Christopher Titmus, one of my early teachers and another teacher of the Dharma, said that one of his teachers used to draw a line in the sand in Thailand and say, "Practice is all about coming to your edge and taking one step over the line." It's not taking a radical leap beyond your capacity into the unknown. It's just taking a single step beyond what you believe to be your limit, your edge, as far as you can go.

One way to do that in working with pain, for example, is when you meet overwhelming pain, to ask yourself, "If this pain doesn't get any worse, can I be with it?" And often, if we can somehow believe that the pain doesn't get any worse, we can be with it. Much of our difficulty or resistance in dealing with pain is the thought or the belief that it's only going to get worse. And that defeats us before we actually meet our limit of what we can tolerate and what we're willing to open to.

Another way of dealing with pain or intense demanding emotion is to ask yourself, "Can I be with this discomfort for another five seconds?" Give yourself permission to move. Give yourself permission to open your eyes—whatever it is you've got to do—and then say, "Can I be with it for five more seconds?" And often, just that placing a limit on what we have to tolerate allows us to relax, open, and be at ease, really, with what, up until then, was unbearable.

We use these little tricks of the mind to extend ourselves into the unknown, incrementally increasing our capacity, just bit by bit. And over the course of a day, a week, a month, years of practice, we grow in capacity. We grow in our ability to tolerate, our ability to play the edge, and the edge changes, moves.

Early on in my practice, I heard about this monk from Burma that I mentioned—the one who was in the cave for thirty-three years. Not only was he in the cave, he didn't lay down for fifty years. He sat up doing his practice. At night when he wanted to sleep, he sat up. So I thought, "Hey, that's a good practice. I'll try that." Where did I get this idea?

I remember one night during a retreat at the Meditation Center in Massachusetts, I said, "I'm going to sit up tonight, all night. I'm not going to lay down when I go to bed." This was a little bit too much of a leap for me. It was so excruciatingly painful. After an hour or two, I laid down. I said, "Forget it. That's the end of my commitment. I'm out of here. I'm getting some sleep."

When we bite off more than we can chew, we choke.

Later, after years of practicing in Burma, I went to Malaysia and was practicing in a monastery there, and I decided again that it might be interesting to experiment with not laying down, just to see what happens. I'd been told it's pretty easy, actually. Once you get past the first night or two, then you learn how to sleep sitting up, and it's really no problem.

So I was more mature, both in my practice and my understanding, and my ambition, I guess. And it's actually not so difficult. When you're practicing and just being relaxed, when you get tired, you simply collapse a little bit. You fall asleep and you wake up. When you wake up, you're already practicing. You don't waste time.

There are degrees of this, you know. The Buddha talked about his teaching being the middle path between the extremes of indulgence in sensual pleasure and the extreme of mortification of the flesh. In between those two is happy comfort of mind and body. Except that the Buddha did allow some of these what are called dhutanga practices. There are, I think, eleven or thirteen practices that he would allow the monks to undertake. One of them was sitting up. One of them is eating only one meal a day, and a few other things. But one of them was sitting up. And even with that, there are degrees of sitting up. There are those who are allowed to use a back support and those who don't. So depending on where you are in practice, there's always an edge to play. There's always an edge, no matter where you are. You can come to your edge and take one step, one little bit more.

Many of you, Kamala mentioned to me today, have been reporting that you're waking up before the wake-up bell. The wake-up bell is at five o'clock, and people are waking up at four-thirty, four o'clock, three-thirty, three o'clock. And so I ask you, when you wake up and you have enough sleep, is it possible to extend yourself and start practicing? Is it possible?

We have beliefs about how much sleep we need. In our everyday life, when we work, in social life and whatnot, we may need seven hours, eight hours, nine hours, whatever it is you've seen you need in order to be efficient and effective during the day. But in practice, in intensive practice, everything is changing. How much you eat changes, how much sleep you need changes, how much energy you have changes. Be willing to explore. Enter the practice, enter this expansion of your practice with a kind of curiosity, not with a demand like my foolish attempt to sit up too early in practice. But explore the possibility. Explore the fear you have. Explore the resistance that comes, the belief you have about yourself being able or not able to do it. And then see what you can do.

Okay, so now I've been talking about effort and energy and extending yourself a little bit. Are you evaluating yourself now? Are you evaluating? Are you measuring and comparing and determining how much effort you made? Are you judging yourself?

Right effort has nothing to do with judging yourself. We do. We do. We measure ourselves, we compare ourselves, we hear these stories and we say, "Oh my God, I'm never going to make it." Right effort is about finding our own balance. I'm talking about finding your edge and taking one step beyond that. And if it's too far, if it's too big a step, you'll know. Because then you'll meet judgment and fear and exhaustion and a loss of confidence. Playing the edge can build confidence, a lot of confidence, while expanding capacity.

In the center where I was practicing in Burma, they have a general guidance for yogis. And Sayadaw U Pandita would tell us, "When you practice, act like a deaf, dumb, blind, sick person." Blind—don't look around. Deaf—don't listen around. Dumb—don't talk around. And ill—slow down.

Why do we do that? Why do we limit our engagement with the world?

To conserve energy. To preserve energy. When we look around, when we listen around, when we're moving around fast—not always, but it can be very unmindful—it becomes a dissipation of energy. That's the energy we need to conserve in order to build up the heat necessary to cook our practice, to break through, to extend ourselves beyond our current limits.

We do teach, as you know, walking practice, standing practice, sitting practice, which involves listening, seeing, and even walking fast. So it's not universally true that you can't do these things. When you do them, of course, you do them with mindfulness. But when we do them unmindfully, then it's a leak in our energy. It dissipates our energy.

Perhaps the most necessary or useful understanding for finding your own place of right effort, balance in your effort, is to talk about consistency. Finding your pace, finding your rhythm, and keeping with it. Just keeping with it. Just slowly, just incrementally expanding. Not making huge leaps and bounds, but being consistent.

There's a little trouble with the ovens here at this retreat center. When you set the oven for 350 degrees, it sometimes hovers around 350, sometimes hovers around 315. And you never know. If the recipe calls for 350 for 45 minutes, it means 350 for 45 minutes. You can't turn it up to 500 and hope to get done in half an hour. Neither can you leave it at 200 and hope to get done in two hours. It requires 350 for 45 minutes.

Practice is like that. Find your pace. Find your energy level. Work with it. Be consistent. Challenge yourself, for sure—but this approach is much more productive than huge effort followed by huge collapse. If we overextend ourselves one day, we'll be severely depleted for the next two weeks.

There's a story of a very enthusiastic novice who came to the monastery and went to the abbot and said, "I want to get enlightened."

The abbot had some wisdom. "Oh, really?"

"Yeah, I really want to get enlightened. I want to do it as fast as I can. How long is it going to take?"

The abbot said, "Oh, it's going to take you ten years."

"Ten years? Oh my God! What if I work double time, day and night, work really hard, strive harder?"

The abbot says, "Twenty years."

"Well, what if I don't stop, just day and night, stay up all the time, practice really diligently, make every effort?"

"Thirty years."

The novice says, "How come? The more effort I make like that, the longer it's going to take?"

And the abbot said, "Well, if you keep one eye on the goal, you've only got one eye to find the path."

The path is the step before you. The next step that you must take is the path. Where you're going, where you hope to get—that's the goal. Forget it. Find where you are right now. How much energy do you need to take the next step?

We've been sitting here listening to a talk for nearly an hour. I'm going to ask you to become mindfully aware of your body.

Feel your body sitting right now. Sitting on the cushion or bench or chair. You feel what that feels like? How much effort did that take? How much effort did it take to be mindful right in that moment, or right in this moment? Almost nothing. That's how much effort and energy is required in each moment of practice. Almost nothing.

But what makes that amount of energy so valuable and so extraordinary is the precision with which we apply it. You can have a lot of energy scattered all over the place and not be mindful at all. You just overshoot the mark all the time. Hypervigilant, we call it. You can be really amped up and never land in the present moment, because the energy is excessive and the application is imprecise. It's in the precision of your aiming your attention that you actually land on the present moment. And for that, very little energy is required.

My father used to work on microwave towers—you know, those towers that send radio beams across great distances and carry lots of phone messages. They've got these great big towers, these great big receiving dishes, and all kinds of heavy-duty equipment. He asked me one time, "Do you know how much energy goes between one of those stations and the other?" I could only imagine this huge nuclear reactor amount of energy zapping out from one tower to the other. And he said, "No, it's some fraction of a watt. It's almost nothing." But the precision with which they're aimed and carry the energy—or whatever it is that they're carrying—is what makes them so powerful, so unique, so valuable.

The same with our mindfulness. The quality of our attention, where we're directing our attention, the precision with which we're directing it into the present moment—this makes all the difference in the world as to how awake we are. Finding our own way, finding what is the place of balance in the middle for us. Not easy, and it's ever-changing. What worked today might not work tomorrow. It requires that precise attention in the moment to know what is appropriate for me now, and being willing to meet the need. Whatever's needed, be willing to raise that amount of energy and open to the experience.

I want to end with a short Zen story. One of the devotees in the temple was well known for his zealousness and his effort. Day and night he would sit in meditation, not stopping even to eat or sleep. As time passed, he grew thinner and more exhausted. The master of the temple advised him to slow down, to take more care of himself, but the devotee refused to heed his advice.

"Why are you rushing so? What is your hurry?" asked the master.

"I'm after enlightenment," replied the devotee. "There is no time to waste."

"And how do you know," asked the master, "that enlightenment is running on before you so that you have to rush after it? Perhaps it is behind you, and all you need to encounter it is to stand still. But you are running away from it."

So let us sit still for a minute, and maybe it will catch up with us.

CHAPTER 226

Wise Effort

Carol Wilson · 49 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson examines one of meditation's most crucial questions: what constitutes wise effort (sammā vāyāma)? Beginning with a Zen story about grace and effort, she explores how the Buddha's own years of wrong effort—through asceticism, indulgence, and control—can save us from similar dead ends.
>
> Wilson presents the Buddha's four noble efforts: fostering wholesome qualities already present, not becoming entangled in unwholesome states, encouraging skillful qualities not yet arisen, and wisely avoiding unskillful states. She emphasizes that our relationship to mental contents matters more than the contents themselves, and that clear comprehension —seeing without filters of judgment, likes, and dislikes—is essential for genuine letting go.
>
> The talk offers profound guidance on distinguishing intensity from passion in practice. While intensity involves striving, goals, and denial of the present moment, passion embodies love of clarity and brings us closer to immediate experience. Wilson challenges Western practitioners' tendency to focus on faults while dismissing wholesome qualities, inviting us to trust our capacity for openness, compassion, and awakening. She suggests that wise effort means finding spaciousness within contraction, stillness within busyness, and clarity within confusion—recognizing that path and goal are one and the same.

What I would like to talk about this evening is the question of wise effort.

I'd like to begin with a story, but first let me explain that I didn't make this story up, and therefore I don't mean to offend Catholics nor to praise Buddhists.

A Zen master was once invited to a great Catholic monastery to give instruction in Zen practice. He exhorted the monks there to meditate and to try to solve their koan, or Zen question, with great energy and zeal. He told them that if they could practice with full-hearted effort, true understanding would come to them.

One old monk raised his hand. "Master," he said, "our way of prayer is different than this. We've been meditating and praying in the simplest fashion, without effort, waiting instead to be illuminated by the grace of God. In Zen, is there anything like this illuminating grace that comes to one uninvited?"

The Zen master looked back and responded, "In Zen, we believe that God has already done his share."

The question of effort is one of the most crucial questions we encounter in meditation. It's very clear that in our lives, as well as in our meditation, some quality of effort is required if we are really going to deepen or bring to fulfillment anything that we truly honor and value. Probably the only thing in our lives that doesn't take a great deal of effort is going to sleep. Everything else, if we really value it, requires our attention—requires us to attend to it in a conscious and caring way.

In meditation, in this practice, we are initiating a movement. In many ways we're also reaching for qualities of mind and heart which we sense are possible within ourselves but which may not be fully present. We come to meditation often seeking understanding and seeking for changes to take place. And that understanding and those changes may exist somewhat apart from our actual experience in this moment.

We probably all have different objectives in meditation. But the qualities of calm, of spaciousness, of peace, the quality of open-heartedness, the possibility of awakening—these are what attract many of us to this path. I feel all of us have enough life experience by now that we really don't believe that much in fairy godmothers anymore, and we acknowledge that no one can make a gift of these changes to us. No one can wrap these qualities in a package and present them to us.

We probably also recognize, perhaps somewhat reluctantly, that fantasy, resolutions, desires, and yearning tend to do very little to bring about the changes that we truly honor and seek. And often, at this point in our lives and meditation, there's a deep acknowledgement that no one else apart from us can make changes for us. No one can substitute for us in traveling this path, in bringing about the emergence of wisdom and love. The effort that is really needed must come from within ourselves. The effort needs to be born within ourselves.

In meditation practice, effort is always talked about. It's a major part of developing this practice. It is one of the links in the Eightfold Path. It's one of the factors of enlightenment. And it's not just effort alone that is spoken of in this practice—what is spoken of is right effort, a word we sometimes have trouble with. We see that if there is such a thing praised as right effort, it clearly implies that there's such a thing as wrong effort. And if we understand that right effort essentially directs us towards the development of mindfulness, towards awakening, then it wouldn't be illogical to assume that wrong effort is going to take us in the opposite direction—that wrong effort might well lead us into greater confusion, conflict, and limitation.

I feel there are many things that we can be very grateful to the Buddha for. One of them is that he spent a whole lot of time developing wrong effort. As a matter of fact, he spent years doing it. This is not my interpretation—he quite honestly admitted this. He spent years pursuing paths and approaches to meditation which essentially led to dead ends. He spent years developing self-denial and self-punishment; this was a particular path he followed for a period of time and perfected very well. He spent years following the path of indulgence in ways much better than we've probably done. He spent a lot of time exploring the whole avenue of control and a lot of time exploring the extremes, becoming an intimate master of asceticism.

We should be grateful, because essentially this could save us a great deal of time. If we can listen and perhaps even learn from what he did, we don't need to follow the same avenues in order to learn the same lessons—that wrong effort basically consumes energy and leads to limitation and confusion.

Understandably, we have tendencies that make us at times reluctant, and sometimes wisely reluctant, to accept the experience of another. We might tell ourselves that clearly the Buddha was a different person than we are, and what didn't work for him might very well work for us. We often have a feeling that we have to experience everything through our own eyes before we can trust it. It's clear that no one here, or anywhere else, can actually stop us from engaging in wrong effort. No one even necessarily knows, unless we tell them, that we're engaging in great ascetic practices or efforts at control. No one can actually prevent us.

But we still need to look at our own quality of effort in this practice. If we find ourselves repeatedly involved in struggle, in conflict, in pain during meditation...

It is very worthwhile asking ourselves to pay attention to what is actually going on—to really pay attention to the quality of effort that we are using in our practice, to really pay attention to our very approach to meditation. If you have spent days, never mind years, going through the same things, struggling with the same issues, coming to the same blocks or obstacles, going through the same extremes, then it is time and worthwhile for all of us to ask ourselves and to really look at our very approach to the practice.

It's not difficult for us to discern and to understand what wrong effort is. And wrong, I know, is a kind of charged word, but we could use unwise or unskillful. It's not difficult to discern what unskillful effort is. If you find that there are difficult mental states that continue, that don't change, that we experience in exactly the same way again and again; if we find ourselves assaulted by or feeling invaded by a repetitive process of thinking, of thought patterns that weigh like a stone in our minds; if we find ourselves struggling and battling and warring with ourselves or filled with resistance—all of these experiences really do tell us a great deal about the quality of our attention. They don't necessarily tell us a great deal about who we are, but they can tell us a great deal about the quality of our attention, the kind of effort that we're making.

Sometimes what happens when you find something repeating itself again and again, when you find yourself up against the same walls and the same edges, is that we conclude we're experiencing this problem because of the contents of our minds—because of the problem or the issue or the memory or the image that keeps arising again and again. We conclude often that it's the kind of thoughts and feelings we're experiencing that are responsible for struggle, responsible for conflict and difficulty.

When we conclude or believe that the difficulty lies in the contents of our minds, in who we are, in what we're experiencing, what we tend to do is become very busy with strategies. We bring out our fix-it mind. How can I fix it? How can I make it different? How can I have a different kind of thought, a better one? How can I have a different kind of feeling or a different kind of memory? How can I have a different kind of fantasy even? We get involved in strategies of either trying to subdue what we're experiencing or trying to alter it, or we find ourselves responding with blame and judgment. I'm obviously a hopeless spiritual failure because I keep repeating and experiencing these same terrible thoughts.

If we're honest with ourselves, I doubt if anybody invited the contents of their minds in today. Maybe now and again. But how much of what you've experienced today in terms of content—thoughts, feelings, memories—did you actually invite? Did you get up this morning and say, "Well, this is a great day to be depressed"? Or finish your lunch and say, "You know, I haven't been angry for a while. A little anger wouldn't go amiss. Let's spend the rest of the day storming"?

How responsible do we feel for the contents of our minds? Often terribly responsible. We become so responsible for the contents of our minds, and at times so busy in trying to alter them, that what we miss or perhaps omit to do is to look at our relationship to them—to give the primary attention not to the contents but to our actual relationship to them in the moment that they arise.

As far as I understand, meditation is really not very concerned with redecorating our minds. Instead of the busyness of the strategies, instead of the blame and the judgment, sometimes it is really helpful to ask ourselves: What kind of energy are we bringing to our experience? What kind of effort do we make in relationship to our thoughts and feelings, in relationship to the pleasant and to the unpleasant?

There is surely nothing that is more guaranteed to perpetuate and reinforce mental states and thoughts and feelings and images than avoidance and holding. Resistance and clinging give a solidity to whatever arises within our bodies, feelings, and minds.

The second question I feel it's important to ask ourselves is: Do we actually need to? Do we actually have to experience this constant repetition? Do we have to experience this kind of solidity and all the struggling and the resistances that are born of it?

It may be that we don't seem to have much choice at times over the contents of our minds, but that doesn't imply that we have no choice in our relationship to them. It doesn't mean that we have no freedom in our relationship to what we actually experience. It doesn't imply that we have no choice and no freedom in the quality of energy and the quality of effort that we're able to bring to whatever we experience.

Wise effort or skillful effort—it's not difficult to define. It is simply the effort to be mindful. It is simply the effort to be awake and conscious. A quality of mindfulness, as Carol was speaking about yesterday, that brings us closer to the present moment, to our actual experience of it. And in coming closer to the present moment, we really begin to develop a sense of clear comprehension.

Clear comprehension means seeing without filters, without projection, without likes and dislikes, without prejudice, without judgments, without shoulds. It means just clear comprehension. There is very little in this world that calls upon us for our evaluation in terms of good, bad, wrong, right, negative, positive. Clear comprehension in a very real way means being able to clear ourselves of those filters, to connect with what we're actually experiencing. And that allows not only deepening in meditation, but it is what is the primary ingredient in letting go.

Unless we clearly comprehend what we're experiencing, it's quite impossible to let go of it, to let go of anything. Unless we clearly connect with what's actually going on, it becomes so difficult to let go, no matter how many times in our minds we say, "I must let go of this." As long as our experience is layered with projections, with likes and dislikes, it is almost impossible to have that freedom of simply letting it be.

If you have any acquaintance with Buddhism, one of the things you're probably aware of is that Buddhism is well known for its lists. Whoever wrote out the scriptures of the Buddha had an incredibly orderly mind, because there's list after list after list. And of course there is a list about effort. The Buddha spoke about the four noble efforts, sometimes even translated as the four heroic efforts—which might be a little extreme.

If these efforts are misunderstood, they very easily lead to striving and judgment. But it's important to know the different possibilities of effort that are helpful in this practice.

The first noble effort that the Buddha spoke of was the effort to foster and enhance skillful qualities of being that are already part of our makeup. These qualities are not strangers to us: sensitivity, openness, generosity, our capacity to allow, to give, to let go, to understand. All of these are skillful qualities of our being. To enhance and foster them means making the effort to consciously develop them.

I have to say that for many Westerners this is an extraordinarily difficult task—more difficult, I think, than for people in the East. We have a long history of learning how to focus on the negative, the imperfect, the faults, the weaknesses and failings within ourselves. If asked, most people can make lists of their own imperfections. We have extensive training in giving attention to them, in trying to do things with them. It's not always easy for us to honor and respect those parts of our being which are so rich, so wholesome, so conducive to well-being.

Many people actually find themselves feeling guilty. In meditation, something arises—a real openness, some breakthrough in sensitivity—and there's difficulty in acknowledging it. "Well, I had this moment today, but it'll probably go away. I'm sure it'll be gone by lunchtime and I'll be angry again. Or it's probably my hormones or something—I'm sure it's an accident." How difficult many people find it to actually trust and honor within themselves what is rich, opening, conducive, wholesome. We don't have that difficulty with the negative. We don't struggle to emphasize and highlight all that is wrong.

In a very real way, this retraining of energy, this redirecting of appreciation and gratitude inwardly, of sensitivity and loving attention inwardly, is one of the hardest tasks for us to develop in meditation. To foster and enhance that which is wholesome, that which is rich and truly opening, means that in every moment such qualities arise—a moment of sensitivity, compassion, generosity, or allowing—we become totally, deeply acquainted with that experience, experientially and intimately, within our minds and bodies.

Every time we experience a moment of peace, rather than dismissing it or holding our breath while we wait for it to disappear, we can explore deeply what that quality is within ourselves. It came from within. It didn't fall from the fan. It came from within ourselves. What does it feel like? What does it feel like in our bodies and in our feelings? What difference do these qualities make in the way we see ourselves? In the presence of these qualities, what difference do they make in how we hold the world around us, how we hold others? We go deeply into them, explore them.

We foster and enhance these qualities, these parts of our being, not through clinging and not through holding—not by thinking, "Here's this moment and I better grab it before it disappears"—but rather through investigation. In those moments when rich qualities of being arise within ourselves, we see clearly the factors that made them possible. They may seem like accidents, but they are not accidents. We see clearly the factors that actually allowed them to arise.

Sensitivity and openness and compassion are not a question of luck, not a question of accidental encounter or of karma. The factors that allow these qualities to emerge within ourselves are the very capacity to let go, to connect, to open. And we know how true that is when we really are able to let go, when we really are deeply able to connect, when we're deeply able to open—how out of that comes forth this blossoming, this emergence of a real taste of sensitivity, a real taste of compassion. Love is born out of our capacity to let go and to connect. These are the factors that make it possible.

And are those factors of letting go, opening, connecting accidental? Is it just a random occurrence, that maybe we'll be lucky today and have something we can let go of? Or are letting go and opening and connecting real qualities of mind that we're consciously able to cultivate?

It's so important to remind ourselves that when we speak about conscious effort, it implies the absence of passivity. It means that we don't simply sit here, waiting in hope to be struck by a bolt of enlightenment or struck by a moment of compassion.

It doesn't mean either that we strive for them and reach for them, trying to make ourselves compassionate, trying to make ourselves let go. It really means consciously directing our attention and our energy toward our own capacities of being that are already present within ourselves.

The second noble effort the Buddha spoke of was not to become entangled in unwholesome, unskillful states that arise. Wiser words are hardly ever spoken. We could probably make lists again of unwholesome and unskillful states that we have experienced in the past and in the present. Even throughout today, it's not difficult for us to define what is unskillful. It causes pain, very simply. The unskillful states, the unskillful qualities, they cause pain. It's really nothing more than that. They cause separation, division, disconnection, conflict. Anger and greed—whatever leads to disconnection—creates pain and is an unskillful state that it is wise not to become entangled in.

I would say that it does take a certain effort to sustain the unskillful. There's very little in this world that is sustained through its own momentum. It does take a certain effort to sustain the unskillful, but we are often not conscious of it. When states of mind or feelings or images or projections or judgments arise, it often does seem that they have a life of their own, that they're somehow part of us and they just intrude and continue for a while until they pass away. But the energy that sustains negativity or anger or greed or jealousy or hatred—the energy that sustains those states of mind—is the energy of dwelling, the energy of holding, the energy of feeding them. This is what sustains those unskillful states of mind that bring us pain.

And it's not a question of judging that. It's really much more a question of whether we are able to redirect that energy. Think of the energy that is in judgment. Think of the energy that is in blame and in anger. It's a fantastic energy. The way that it goes may not be too helpful, but the energy itself is fantastic. Are we able to redirect it so that we don't feed into that which brings us pain? Are we able to bring that energy to truly make us mindful of what is arising and our relationship to it? We may unconsciously dwell upon things, but dwelling upon things is not a life sentence. It is not as if we're going to be there forever. Can we, in the moment of dwelling, in the moment of experiencing states of mind that bring pain, consciously cultivate spaciousness, openness, letting go?

Meditation is not only a conscious application of effort. I feel that such a major part of meditation is vision. It is really developing a deep sense of trust and faith in our own possibilities, in our own potential. And part of that trust and faith is trusting in our own capacity to open and to let go. Sometimes letting go of things is a very organic process, a very natural process. Sometimes letting go also comes through quite conscious determination.

Now when we hear the word determination, sometimes we get kind of antsy and think, "Well, aha, determination equals suppression." But I would make a distinction. To me, suppression is the unwillingness to see something. Determination, to me, is the clear seeing of something and the unwillingness to engage in something that we intuitively know is going to bring pain and conflict. And to me this is an incredibly important distinction.

Sometimes we have the conviction—we see difficult states of mind of anger and greed or envy arising, and we feel that these memories and these feelings must be arising for a purpose, that all things have their purpose in this cosmos. Especially in meditation cycles, we conceive of the purpose of this repetition as being that we haven't yet learned what we need to learn. And that's why it keeps arising.

Sometimes this is true. I would also say that in my experience, there's not that much new that arises in terms of thoughts. How many really new thoughts have you had today? How many truly unique, brand new, fresh images have you experienced today? In my experience there aren't that many. Many of the things that keep repeating themselves—actually we've already learned what we need to learn. How many things that we repeat have we already actually learned what we need to learn? The repetition is more habitual than a process of learning.

If we appreciate this—sometimes new things arise and then it's really worth reflection and inquiry and full attention. But if we see that we're simply replaying and repeating, then there's a place for skillful, conscious determination not to become entangled. It's like if you have a toothache. It could be quite helpful to hang out with it for a few days and learn about your relationship to pain.

So very similar with many of our repetitions—there's a point actually where we're not learning anymore, where actually we're punishing ourselves. And there's a point when there is some real conscious determination to see and not to be entangled.

The third quality of effort, the third noble effort, is to encourage and foster skillful qualities of being which have not yet arisen. It's hard to figure out how to do that. It seems somewhat of a challenge. How do we encourage something which has not yet arisen without getting involved in denial of what is, or getting involved in striving? How do we encourage the skillful without bouncing back between rejection and craving?

It's not an easy balance to find, and yet it's so much of what meditation is about, isn't it? I mean, if we were all fully enlightened and fully compassionate and fully awake and loving and wise human beings, we probably wouldn't feel that much call to be here. What we actually come here for is really to seek for qualities, to move towards qualities which may not be present in our lives. What attracts us to meditation is not to experience yet more of the same, not to have a closer intimacy with a chaotic mind or with sore knees or with pain. What attracts us to meditation is the possibility of change, the sense of possibility emerging within ourselves—of qualities, of potential that may not be right now present in our lives. Whether it's freedom, whether it's equanimity, whether it's clarity, whether it's open-heartedness, it is true in meditation that we're initiating a journey and a movement. And part of that, there is a quality of reaching for what is not here.

What I feel the important distinction is, is not reaching for clarity, for compassion, for love or for wisdom as some future destination or as some personal possession. To me this is wrong effort. What is more skillful and wise effort is to clearly acknowledge that sense of possibility within ourselves, acknowledge clearly our capacity to be truly compassionate, truly awake, truly loving. Is it possible in this moment, in the midst of whatever we are experiencing, no matter how difficult, no matter how unpleasant? If it brings us back to this moment, to me it is wise effort.

It's so difficult for us at times not to think in a linear way—that the positive is going to come about as a result of getting rid of the negative, or that we're going to experience peace when we've got rid of the disturbing, or we're going to experience happiness when we've got rid of pain. We tend to think in such linear ways. And I think what meditation really suggests to us is a whole other way of thinking, a whole other way of seeing. What it suggests to us is the possibility of finding spaciousness in the moment that we're experiencing contraction, of finding a place of stillness amidst the greatest busyness, of finding a place of clarity even as the mind is going through places of confusion—the possibility of bringing clarity to this, of finding equanimity in those moments when we feel imbalanced.

Unfortunately, we grow up on a diet that suggests to us that seeking perfection or realizing perfection is what our lives are all about. Everything in our culture suggests to us the desirability of pursuing perfection, whether it's the perfect apple in the supermarket, whether it's a perfect lifestyle, whether it's a perfect body. And I feel we absorb this a great deal, and too often we are simply victims of our own delusions about perfection.

It seems to me that one of life's greatest challenges is in how we respond to the imperfect. I don't know about you, but I never expect my mind to be perfect. I never expect to have the perfect personality. I never expect that my life is going to come to a point where there is no crisis, where there is nothing to respond to. Quite frankly, to let go of our illusions about perfection is to lay down a tremendous burden. Think of the suffering that is created in the pursuit of perfection.

Now that doesn't mean a kind of passivity and resignation—that life is imperfect, too bad, and suffering is what it's all about. Just recognizing that there's very little in this world that fits in with our ideas of perfection, and there are very few times possibly when reality can conform to our images and our expectations. It is an actuality that we are actually never going to erase the past. It's also an actuality that our futures are going to remain uncertain and without guarantees. Our essential challenge as human beings is how we respond to all of this.

In the midst of anger, can we call forth love? In the midst of resentment, can we bring forth forgiveness? In the midst of pain, can we find a place of calmness within ourselves that knows no denial? In the midst of confusion, can we summon forth awareness to bring clarity? These are our resources and these are our possibilities. And the effort that we use is to make the space, to make the inner environment in which those resources and those possibilities can emerge and can transform.

There's that wonderful saying of Don Juan, that to an ordinary person, everything in life is either a blessing or a curse, whereas to a wise person, everything is a challenge. And I feel that many of life's obstacles that we meet present us with the possibility of really discovering new depths of openness and compassion and understanding.

The fourth effort the Buddha spoke about was the effort to avoid the unskillful which has not yet arisen. Now again, that seems slightly paranoid. And avoidance does carry certain associations for us too—it's a very bad spiritual word.

Avoidance is considered really totally a no-no. You're not spiritual if you avoid anything. You're not open if you avoid anything at all.

But I think before we get too carried away with our associations, it is actually helpful to reflect a little bit. Reflect on the past. Is there anything in your life you have experienced which you know intuitively, directly brought pain, conflict, suffering, alienation—that you know would actually be wiser not to get into again?

Reflect in the present. Have you experienced in the days here states of mind that bring distress and sadness? States of mind that bring contraction and limitation? Ways of reacting that breed discontent? It might be fairly wise not to become entangled in them.

Think even in terms of the future. Do we see the mind reaching with ambitiousness, with goals, with striving that again create pain? Would it not be wise not to engage? Is it not also wise at times to avoid that which we know we do not have the resources present within ourselves in that moment to be with skillfully? There are times when stepping back and stepping out can be very skillful action.

Just one last thing about effort I would like to mention, and that is to look at the difference between intensity and passion. Sometimes in meditation people become very entangled in intensity and they mistake this for wise effort. They become so focused on getting somewhere and on goals that there's a rejection and denial of the present moment. Or they become so focused on being a perfect yogi that they become very judgmental of others and righteous. Or they become so concentrated on being concentrated that they become very tense and narrow.

To me, this kind of intensity is actually a real hindrance in the practice, because it tends to deny those qualities of softness and openness which are the essence of wise effort. Wise effort is not born of intensity, but of a certain quality of passion.

I feel in this practice that what is needed is much more than a lukewarm curiosity about transformation, much more than an ambivalence about whether we might be more peaceful or not. What is much more helpful is a real passion for clarity and understanding, a real commitment to openness and to love and to freedom.

Out of that passion, there comes inspiration—a willingness to open to and embrace each moment that arises as our teacher. Intensity has goals and passion has love. This is the basic difference. Passion has a love of clarity and a love of stillness, not in the future, but a love that brings us closer to this moment that we're experiencing, to understand its possibilities and to understand our own potential. Intensity always takes us further away from this moment.

From that inspiration comes interest, comes energy, comes effort to see and to explore both who we are and who we can be. To see and explore not only what we're experiencing, but how we can experience it. To see and explore this moment and ourselves just as we are.

In that wise effort, in that skillful effort, the path and the goal are not separate. They are just one and the same.

CHAPTER 227

Trust

Carol Wilson · 45 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson investigates the quality of trust as it manifests in meditation practice and daily life. She begins by establishing that genuine trust arises from clear seeing and what she calls "radical acceptance" — the unconditional acknowledgment of truth as it presents itself moment to moment. Drawing on teachings from various sources including the Sutta Nipāta, she illuminates how the Buddha taught that dependence creates fear, while independence from grasping allows for freedom from trembling.

Wilson examines the paradox at the heart of our search for security: the very act of seeking stability in external circumstances — relationships, careers, knowledge, views, or outer authorities — actually generates the insecurity we're trying to escape. She explains how this dynamic plays out subtly in meditation, where the mind grasps at particular experiences and creates models of "how things should be," turning away from present-moment awareness into conceptual frameworks that promise safety but deliver only more grasping.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with this pattern through the lens of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination), particularly the sequence of contact, feeling, craving, and grasping. Wilson demonstrates how mindfulness at these junctures can interrupt the chain of becoming, revealing that there is simply nothing worth grasping. She concludes with a moving personal story that illustrates how accepting complete uncertainty paradoxically gave rise to profound trust — not trust in outcomes, but trust in awareness itself. The teaching points toward a radical simplicity: trust is not separate from clear seeing, and freedom lies in loving and appreciating what is present in each moment.

What I want to talk about tonight is the quality of trust—what it is in our practice, in our lives, how it manifests, and also what prevents or hides the manifestation of trust in our minds and in our practices.

Where trust really begins, of course, is with the ability to trust inwardly, to trust ourselves. And that requires the quality of soft receptivity, the quality of openness, the ability to unconditionally accept oneself as one is in each moment, as each moment changes. In order to accept, it implies that one must first see clearly what the truth is—just the truth of ourselves in each moment. Until we see it, it's pretty hard to accept it. And so this trust, this faith in ourselves, in the Dharma, in the reality of what we see in the moment, arises just out of our own clear seeing, out of nothing else.

Seeing the actuality of ourselves, of life—the trust which comes from that is the expression of real inner security. The quality of mind associated with both clear seeing and the arising of trust, trust in what is true, is the quality of total letting go. Or as one of my currently favorite authors, a man who calls himself J. John Noe, puts it, it's a quality of radical acceptance. It's a phrase I really like—radical acceptance. He defines radical acceptance as the radical acknowledgement of the presence of truth at this very moment. The only thing to do is to do nothing but accept truth in all things, as all things, at all times, in all forms, in all ways. To let go, to accept, it is necessary only to give up your concerns and your fears.

Another way of putting it, from a rather different tradition—Sayadaw U Pandita said, "Unless there is softness and receptivity of mind, unless one totally surrenders, it will be almost impossible to receive anything." Unless one totally surrenders. In this context, I'm not seeing surrender as surrender to a teacher or to an outer authority, but to the truth of the moment. And that's trust.

One way that I can often begin to familiarize myself with that experience—that sense of softness, open receptivity, clarity of mind—is the state of total listening, which I'm sure you've all experienced just during this retreat at one time or another. It's that state when you're sitting, the mind is really quiet, very clear, quite attentive, and the attention is just on the listening. There's a real sense of openness. Sounds arise, persist, pass away. They're perceived very clearly, but there's not a sense of clinging, there's not a sense of pushing away, there's not a sense of wondering what sounds are going to come next or wishing that last sound could have stayed. There's no grasping going on. There's no fear or avoidance going on and no holding. To me, that's a way of experiencing that sense of trust.

Trust isn't a sense that, "Well, now I've seen clearly, I understand how this works. I can relax, settle back, I've got it. Things will just continue on the way they are and trust is here and I can trust and it'll just be the way I like it to be. Things will be comfortable." I find I do that a lot in meditation on a real subtle level. And that's not trust at all. That's making up my own mentally created model of how things are or how they should be, and then looking to that model for security—which is a far cry from trust.

For instance, a more specific way of looking at that: say there's some particular pattern that's been going on in the meditation—a pattern of some emotion that arises, and then from that emotion tension arises, unpleasant sensation, aversion and fear. This pattern's been around a while. It's one that one's pretty familiar with. It comes up in a lot of sittings. And suddenly, in one sitting, for whatever reason, one sees it very clearly with real acceptance, real allowing. It's just a series of processes. There's no aversion. There's no clinging. In that moment, that's trust.

And perhaps in that moment of seeing clearly, the pattern goes away. After it goes away, there could be a moment of pleasantness, delight, joy. If there's not mindfulness then, it can be almost immediately followed by grasping of the mind, immediately the creation of a new model, a new structure: "Oh, so when there's something like that happening, if I look at it in just this way, it'll go away." In that moment, there's no longer trust. It's a movement away from trust, from seeing what is. It's the movement of grasping—grasping for a mind-created model of what should be, of how it will be comfortable, safe, secure.

From this we can see that trust is not a static quality. It's not something we can gain. It's not something that, once experienced or known, is then there in every situation, in every mind moment. It's really a vital quality, very energetic. It takes place, it arises, on a moment-to-moment level. It's also not passive, because it requires the energy of mindfulness, of real clear attention to what is true in each moment.

And it also requires the active, open, and total acceptance of that reality as it is—without referring back to a model, with no comparison to any other thing, just as it is.

It's not that trust in ourselves in the moment is so unknown to us. As I said, it's not something that we don't have now that has to be achieved or attained. It's not something separate from our present experience or beyond our understanding—though sometimes it may seem completely out of our present experience. We can feel so alienated from that sense of deep inner trust, so separate from our own experience in the moment, that we cannot see ourselves clearly, much less unconditionally accept what we're seeing and be able to trust in that understanding.

So what prevents this? What prevents our living with trust, our living in trust?

We spend so much of our lives, on so many levels, searching for security, for stability, for something in the world we can rely on, something we can trust. And it's this search itself which actually prevents the manifestation of trust. Because when we're looking for security, all we can ever find is insecurity.

Krishnamurti says, "To seek the truth is to deny it." When you think about it, it's a very sweeping and powerful statement. Because to seek anything is a movement away from the reality of what's happening right now. It's an avoidance, a denial of truth.

So before we can live in trust, live with deep inner security, we must first look honestly at our lives, at the movements of our minds, to see just where we are grasping for security. Right now, what am I placing my trust in, really, right now? What am I hoping will make my world safe, secure, predictable? Because it's not that we don't have trust, but that we place it in things which can never provide the security we seek, because they'll never stay the same. They're bound to change.

This is another quote, from John Noe. Here he uses the word faith, and I'm using it interchangeably with trust:

"It is not a matter of whether or not faith is present in your life. It is. It is only a question of whether you place your faith in truth and reality or in your considerations, abstractions, judgments, and thoughts about it. Do not doubt that you are currently practicing faith. Consider only where it is placed. Do you place your faith in fear, resistance, and avoidance? Or do you place it in the very form of life you try to manipulate and limit? Radical acceptance is the practice of faith."

So where are we placing our faith right now? What are some of the things that we tend to look to for the security we seek? The list is endless, and some are quite obvious—some of the ways that we try to structure our environment, structure our outer world, so that we can feel safe, so that we think we can know what to expect and trust that it won't change. Just some of the first things that come to mind are stable relationships, a good job or fulfilling job, a comfortable and secure living situation, a compatible circle of friends, this body.

It's not to say that any of these things themselves are wrong or contrary to living in trust. Obviously they're rich fields for growth and understanding when we view them with the right attitude, when we're really clear about our relationship to these things. We see them clearly as they are and know deeply—not just intellectually, "yes, sure, things change and I can't rely on it"—but really know that none of these circumstances will last, or else we won't last. And so we're not relying on them unconsciously for security. We're not using them as ways to avoid being alone with ourselves, ways to avoid looking clearly at the reality of ourselves, the reality of each moment.

Are we using any of these situations to mask the awareness of the fact that our life, that the world, is in constant flux, constant change, and that there's no security to be found in it anywhere? If we are clinging to these outer circumstances for security, that clinging, that movement of grasping, is a movement away from clear seeing. It's a movement away from truth, and it's a separation from living with inner trust.

When we begin to look to see whether and to what degree we're placing trust in externals, it can be kind of tricky to determine if we're not looking really clearly, because it can vary from moment to moment. For example, take a steady relationship. There can be a time when we're really seeing the relationship, we're seeing ourselves in it quite clearly. We appreciate it as it is, we know it's not going to last, and it's really an opportunity for growth, and we're using it that way. There's a lot of love and compassion and understanding. That can be an expression of trust. The next day we could be holding on to it for dear life and in a panic because it's going to end. In that moment we're using it to hide from the reality and to avoid being with ourselves. So it takes a lot of clarity, a lot of looking, all the time.

One clear indication of whether we're using these circumstances to try and find security where there is none to be found is whether we're beginning to develop or experience a sense of dependency on any of these circumstances—dependency on them for stability, for safety, or for happiness, for contentment. Because if we're dependent on something for security, implicit in that dependence is fear. Fear that the situation will change.

And where there's fear, there's insecurity. So the very fact of relying on something, the very fact of dependence on something for happiness, actually brings about the opposite of what we're seeking. The dependence promotes fear and insecurity. And when we're fearful, obviously we're not living in a state of trust. We're living in a state of avoidance, a state of grasping.

This is a quote from the Buddha in the Sutta Nipata, talking about dependence and fear. He says, "One insight is that there is trembling for one who is dependent. The other is that the one who is independent does not tremble. The independent person does not tremble or get confused. But a person who is dependent on something is clutching, grasping at existence in one form or another, and cannot escape from existences, from becoming. There is grave danger in being dependent. Therefore, relying on nothing, the mindful monk wanders on, free from clinging, relying on nothing."

So when I look at the quality of trust, it seems to me that at the core of the lack of trust I feel in myself, the core of my feelings of insecurity, is actually the movement of grasping itself. Because the movement of grasping is a distortion of clear seeing. It's a rejection of truth in that moment when there's grasping. It's avoidance. And when I can't see what's real, I certainly can't accept it. There's no possibility for trust to arise. If we're separated from reality, we're unconsciously denying it.

This grasping for security, the attempt to structure our environment to meet our own concepts of what will provide safety, is certainly not restricted to the obvious external examples I mentioned before. You've probably noticed that the movement of grasping tends to arise in the mind on a fairly regular basis. So I want to mention a few of the common mental constructs or patterns that we create as we sit here and then clutch at for security. The list is probably endless, so I'll just mention a few that came to my mind.

The first one was knowledge—how being able to accumulate a certain body of knowledge about anything can lead one to feel secure. It's something to fall back on, especially if we're more knowledgeable about something than everyone else. Then we can really feel safe. And when I thought about knowledge, it led right into views and opinions, which is a different area, but I saw how often my mind confuses my views and opinions with knowledge. I'm so sure they're right, although they're just views and opinions.

This comes up a lot in my mind when I'm on retreat, in relation to the actual practice itself. For example, say I have a really clear sitting, and whatever that particular experience of mindfulness was during that sitting—maybe things were just really sharp, there was a lot of clarity, a certain movement of energy, it really doesn't matter what—my mind takes up that particular experience and forms a model. "Oh yes, this is how things really are. When one sees clearly, this is the reality of things." The mind makes up that model but doesn't see the movement of grasping in it, the holding on to it. And there's a grasping and carrying of that model of "how things really are" based on one experience throughout the sitting, into the retreat. That's a view, that's an opinion, but the mind takes it as knowledge.

Then say further into the retreat, the whole show changes—everything becomes more microscopic, or the energy moves in a different way, or whatever—some experience, and it doesn't matter what it is, goes away. In that moment the mind goes, "Oh, so that other way, it wasn't really like that at all. I was just grasping. I set up a model, but now I really see how it is." In one moment, it sees the other grasping and does the same thing again. It's really amazing. Then I can see it and do it again.

So that is the way the mind makes up a view, takes it to be knowledge, and then grasps onto it for security. It's tempting to build up a storehouse of knowledge about the meditation, about reality, as a platform of security rather than experiencing the meditation, experiencing the moment as it is. Again, that's trust in the wrong thing—looking outside of the moment, outside of reality, for some experience which won't change, some experience to refer back to for security, instead of taking refuge in this moment only, instead of trusting in the awareness of the living presence.

Another construct along similar lines that the mind tends to grasp at is this whole concept of what is and isn't good meditation, real meditation, the right way to do it—which I think most of you are probably familiar with. One example of how we do that on a rather gross level is that after having a particular experience the mind has grasped onto as "the real thing"—this is really meditation—we may find ourselves structuring our whole day in order to recreate the conditions from which that particular experience arose. For example, say you happened to be walking on the walking path when that happened, at a certain speed, in a certain way. So the mind goes, "Well, okay, if I walk right after lunch when no one else is there, and I turn off the lights—or turn on the lights, depending which group you belong to—and I hold my hands in this certain way," and so on, "then I can repeat that experience," which is obviously much more desirable than what's happening right now. Is this freedom? Is this trust in awareness?

And we do it all the time.

So the last particular I want to mention—as I noted, knowledge, views and opinions, what is and what isn't right meditation—the last kind of big one that came to my mind was our tendency to look to some outer authority for security, something to rely on, to tell us what's true. That could be a teacher. It could be, in this situation, another person at the retreat that the mind has grasped onto as someone who really knows what they're doing—the model yogi—imitating everything that they do, the way they move, the way they eat. It could be something we've read. It doesn't really matter what, because often, especially in a situation like this, the authority is not being imposed from the outside. Usually we're giving the power to the outer authority by seeking refuge in something apart from our own awareness.

And so each time that we do that, each time that we reach out for security, we're accentuating insecurity. Relying on outer authority can lead to confusion because we're alienated from inner trust in that moment. We're not trusting our own ability to see clearly. We're looking for someone else to tell us what clear seeing is, or what we should be seeing if we were seeing clearly in each moment. And when we do that, we become increasingly unable to accept loss, to accept change, because we're looking for permanence. And we become increasingly unable to experience trust because the things we're trusting in keep belying it.

So, as I said before, it's the movement of grasping itself which distorts. When there's grasping in the mind, as I'm sure you've noticed, it creates a sense of imbalance in the mind, and you can even feel it in the body. When there's grasping at some object, we can't see clearly either the object that the mind is grasping at or anything else being experienced in that moment, because of the distortion created by the energy of grasping.

An easy example: say in the afternoon you smell bread cooking in the kitchen. It smells really good. The idea comes into the mind, "Oh, we're having muffins for tea." And there's grasping onto that idea that we don't really see clearly. Then tea comes and there's peanuts. No word about the bread. "Well, I guess the staff's having another party, and we're getting peanuts. Uh-huh. Okay. That's all right. That's okay. I can really accept that." But at that moment, as we're sitting eating the peanuts, how clearly are we seeing the thought that it's just a thought? "I wanted muffins. The smell was pleasant. I wanted muffins." It's just a thought. How clearly are we seeing that? And how clearly are we experiencing the reality of eating the peanuts? It's just taste, movement, sensation. The grasping distorts both the object grasped at—the thought "I wanted muffins"—and the reality of what we're actually experiencing, which is eating peanuts.

So to work with this, we need the basic willingness to directly confront our insecurities, to look directly at how fear and grasping are manufactured in our mind on a moment-to-moment basis. Because when we don't see it, we're in bondage to it. And when we're in bondage to grasping and fear, we can't know trust. We're looking for something outside of the truth of the moment. And where can trust begin except right now? There is no other time. There's only now.

The most helpful tool to look at grasping is obviously mindfulness. And one of the clearest ways to begin to observe grasping as it arises is to be aware of it through the links of dependent origination that Joseph talked about the other night—especially in this context, the links where contact gives rise to feeling, which gives rise to craving. It's at this point in the chain that we can see grasping arise clearly, and it's also at this point that we can really see how powerful mindfulness is.

Going back to the example of smelling the muffins: at that point, the contact would be the contact of the nose and the smell of the muffins and smelling consciousness. That's contact, which gives rise to the feeling of pleasantness associated with the smell, which gives rise to craving, wanting the muffins. If there's no mindfulness at that point, the craving moves on to give rise to grasping. And that grasping is like really grabbing hold, really grabbing hold of the idea. Then the whole chain of becoming proceeds on from that—all the wildness that the mind manufactures around this experience of wanting muffins, grasping at muffins.

Now the same process can occur, but when there's really clear mindfulness, we see the contact, we see the smell arise, we see the feeling arise of pleasantness, and we may see the craving arise.

Craving may not arise at all at that point; we may simply see the feeling arise. But if we're seeing clearly, craving may arise without necessarily proceeding onto grasping—without the whole becoming, the whole chain.

In that moment of mindfulness, the entire chain of becoming is broken at the point where craving does not move into grasping. And it's not that we're stopping it, not through any act of will. It's simply that in seeing clearly the contact, feeling, and craving, we recognize quite directly that there's nothing to grasp at. Mindfulness is established. It's not blinded by grasping. It's really settled in the truth of the moment, seeing this process clearly for what it is—just a conditioned, impersonal process.

The condition of contact arises. Because of the smell, the pleasant feeling arises. Because of the pleasant feeling, craving arises. And that's all that's happening. It's really very simple. When there's mindfulness present in that process, we see that the grasping is truly extra. We also see that there's nothing worth grasping onto.

This process continues—this whole cycle of dependent origination, this whole cycle of contact, feeling, craving, grasping, becoming. It continues on a moment-by-moment basis. While we certainly can't rely on having seen it clearly in the last moment, thinking we don't really need to look in this moment, that the last moment will free us from the bondage of craving now—we can't rely on that. But it's also true that each moment of mindfulness helps to condition the arising of future moments of mindfulness. Each time we clearly see and let go of the arising of grasping, we're weakening its hold on the mind.

And so trust arises on this same moment-to-moment basis. In each moment that we are seeing the reality of the moment that clearly, without the unseen movement of grasping or resistance or denial, in that moment there is trust.

As we begin to see this process of grasping more clearly, we begin to understand that even the slightest movement of grasping in the mind, just the slightest movement of it, leads to insecurity. Just the slightest movement of grasping leads us away from trust. Through this we come to see that nothing—nothing—is worth grasping onto. Not even ideas of unity, ideas of truth. Because no body, no thing, no idea, no concept can provide us with any security in this world.

This takes me back to that previous quote from the Buddha, which I just want to read the end part of again: "There is grave danger in being dependent. Therefore, relying on nothing, the mindful monk wanders on, free from clinging." I don't think the words were chosen lightly. Grave danger in being dependent. Relying on nothing.

When we are seeing clearly this reality of how things are, we begin to realize that we are really living with utter insecurity—that there's nothing in the world which can provide security. And when we really see and accept that, in that moment there's trust. In that moment there's no movement of grasping. That stillness, that utter stillness of mind, allows for the arising of trust and wisdom—the stillness of mind when there's no movement of grasping, no movement of avoidance.

Let me share an example from a couple of years ago, of how when the mind stops needing security so much, real trust can arise—needing the security of role, of location, or in my case, needing to know what was going to happen in the next moment.

I had been talked into, under great duress, going to another city to lead a weekend retreat, which I'd never done anything like before. I was totally petrified. I tried everything I could to get out of it, short of just flatly refusing. I tried to talk my way out of it to anyone who would listen, but I couldn't. I couldn't get out of it.

So I went. I had no familiarity with the location. I knew nobody there. It was a totally unfamiliar role. I had no past experience of doing the same thing. I just didn't have a clue how it would go. I didn't know if I could do it, and the thought terrified me. I was totally insecure, but I wasn't accepting the fact of the fear. I wasn't seeing that I was needing the security of knowing what would happen, that I was needing approval from other people, needing to be told, "You're great, it'll go fine, don't worry." Many people could tell me that, but I didn't believe it. I just wasn't seeing clearly how I was looking for security in the external situation. There was absolutely no trust.

Right before the thing started—it was in a room at a university and they were registering people—I went downstairs. There happened to be a chapel on the floor below, and I had nothing else to do, so I thought I might as well meditate. I was really sick of reading over the talk.

I'd really had it, so I said, well, I'll just sit. And in that moment, as soon as I quieted down, I confronted the fear and the insecurity and all that—everything just shifted. It was really interesting. None of that went away, but this incredible sense of trust arose. Not so much in the situation, not in myself, not in personality. The fear didn't go away, but trust arose in the seeing and the acceptance of the situation as it was in that moment—of the fear, and of knowing that since I had absolutely no idea of what should happen or what would be appropriate to happen, then what I wanted to happen didn't matter. And I could just trust in whatever was happening in that moment.

It was quite a powerful experience for me because it wasn't as if the fear or the insecurity went away. It was all still there, but there was this very strong sense of just being quite present with it. And the trust was like a palpable sense. It was really interesting.

From that experience is when I understood that trust is really very simple. I mean, this has been a lot of words, but it really is very simple because it's really not any different from awareness. It just comes down to the fact that there's nothing to do but see each moment's reality utterly clearly and acknowledge and accept that reality fully.

Sayadaw U Pandita uses the simile that clinging to anything for security is like trying to scoop up water in a butterfly net. I like that simile. It just shows the utter futility of it. And Krishnamurti says that reality has no continuity. No continuity. It is from moment to moment, ever new, ever fresh. I like that. Reality has no continuity.

So can we learn to live with that fact—that there's no continuity in reality? Can we live with the understanding that no security can be found anywhere in this world, that there's nowhere to take a stand outside of this moment, and that this moment has no continuity with the last moment or the next moment, because there's only this moment?

Or do we prefer, as I heard Christopher Titmuss say some time ago, to continue fooling ourselves, to continue hiding from reality by grasping at false security, by living with false trust? As long as we allow ourselves to prefer the illusion of being secure, we deny ourselves the chance to know what it means to be free. And in that we're denying ourselves the quality of trust.

As I said, all it takes is looking directly at reality right now and seeing clearly our fear and the grasping. When we are seeing clearly, each moment that we see clearly the nature of life, the nature of our existence, in that moment we have no more need to grasp at either external situations or at mind-created concepts for security. We have no need to grasp because from our own clear seeing, from the awareness of truth as it is from moment to moment, there's no more need to avoid. Because in that clear seeing there is trust, and in that trust is the end of grasping, the end of fear—because we see that there's no more need to grasp at anything. All that we need is right here in this moment.

I just want to end with a one-line quote from John Daido Loori again. He says, "We cannot love anything until we love and appreciate what is present in each moment." Until we love and appreciate what is present in each moment. It's really very simple.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 228

Working With Difficult Situations

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that arises frequently in meditation practice: what is the point of sitting with pain, restlessness, and difficulty? Drawing from both Tibetan teachings on turning adverse circumstances into a path of liberation and the Buddha's core teaching of the Four Noble Truths, she illuminates how our deeply conditioned tendency to equate pleasant with right and unpleasant with wrong creates much of our suffering.
>
> Wilson examines the first two Noble Truths—dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) and its cause in craving and aversion—showing how these ancient teachings remain immediately observable in our moment-to-moment experience. Through vivid personal examples, from traveling in India to an ordinary trip to the health club, she demonstrates how the constant movement of mind toward pleasure and away from pain distorts our perception of reality. Rather than finding this acknowledgment depressing, she suggests it brings tremendous release: "There's no more need for pretense."
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with overwhelming suffering, introducing the Buddha's concept of skillful avoidance—not the avoidance of aversion, but the wisdom to know when to widen attention and bring nourishment to the mind before returning to difficult experience. Wilson emphasizes that mindfulness is never strident or forcing; it is allowing. She closes with the Third Zen Patriarch's teaching that setting up what we like against what we dislike is "the disease of the mind," pointing to how understanding—not the manipulation of pleasant and unpleasant—is what truly liberates us.

Something that comes up quite often in interviews is, what's the point of sitting with all this pain? What's the point of bringing my attention back to restlessness, to boredom, to negativity? It can start to seem like a long, difficult struggle, and it's easy to lose sight of why it's worth paying attention to these things.

There's a Tibetan teaching that talks about turning adverse circumstances or difficult circumstances into a path of liberation. And so that's what I want to talk about tonight—working with our relationship to what is difficult and painful in our life, in our sitting here, in our life at large. How to relate to what's going on so that we come to realize that situations that seem extremely adverse, extremely like obstacles, are actually, in fact, a very intrinsic and necessary part of our path of understanding. Coming to understand that freedom, understanding, is attached to what is right here. Whatever is arising in the moment is a part of that, and there are no exceptions to this.

We get into so much conflict when we sit and in our lives because—well, this is rather simplistic, but largely because we're so conditioned to interpret anything that comes up that's unpleasant as meaning that it's wrong. Unpleasant equals wrong and pleasant equals right. And so when something unpleasant starts to happen, either it's wrong or I'm wrong. Here on retreat it means I'm doing something wrong, and I have to figure out what it is and change it so that things can get right, which usually means pleasant.

What's really vital for us to understand is that this perception, this interpretation, is completely inaccurate. What we're talking about is actually a radical shift in our relationship to life. Our relationship is what's coming up in this moment. Our retreat or even one sitting is a microcosm for the way that we relate in our whole life.

A difficult or painful experience arises here. It doesn't have to be anything super intense or deep. It can be a back pain, or maybe you get a cold, or maybe you're allergic to the food, or a lot of restlessness is coming up, or a lot of anger, negativity. Maybe it's simply that the breath isn't clear enough, and you know other times it's been a lot clearer. It's unpleasant because we don't like it.

Our tendency is, with any of these things—or anything else that you've probably experienced at least once today—to interpret it as an obstacle. If this would only go away, if I could only fix this, then I could really start meditating. Then I could really get into this retreat. It shows us that at some level there's an idea of what "good practice" means, and whatever it means, it definitely doesn't include this. So if this could go away, then maybe good practice could begin.

When we're involved in this—often it's quite conscious, but sometimes it's quite subtle and unconscious, and we don't realize we're making that comparison and assessment—we get involved in striving to change what's happening. In doing that, in trying to change what's happening and pulling away from it and denying it, we're denying what's true in this moment. We're moving out of the truth of this moment, trying to get somewhere else that matches some concept we have of what the truth is. A movement away from truth.

One of the things that's been most profound for me as my practice continues is that I keep understanding more and more that we grow in understanding, we grow in love and compassion, not in spite of all the difficulties and painful experiences that come our way, but we grow through them in a way that they're almost necessary. I don't want to get into this kind of Pollyanna attitude of "Oh, I'm so glad I'm sick, it's such a gift." But really, we do grow through the difficulties when our relationship to what is coming is one of understanding and acceptance.

In the Buddhist cosmology, there are many different planes of existence, from hell realms up to these really high god realms. It's said that being born as a human is a very fortunate and rare birth, a very fortunate opportunity—and this is what's important, not whether you want to believe in the cosmology—because in our human realm, for most of us, there is a proper balance of pain and pleasure. In other words, there's certainly plenty of difficulty in our lives, but for most of us, it's not so much that we're completely overwhelmed. There certainly are humans in this world who are completely ground down by the amount of suffering, but most of us here—I would actually say all of us—that's not the case. And there's enough pleasure that we can open and be nourished and grow in understanding.

It's said that in some of the higher deva realms there's too much pleasure. Beings just kind of get into hanging out in these pleasure gardens and lose all their motivation—no desire to practice or be motivated to investigate. One teacher says that pleasure puts you to sleep and pain wakes you up. We wish it were the other way around, but it's not.

I want to acknowledge that certainly in my own life, and in this world, there are definitely times when the amount of suffering, the amount of pain, can seem quite overwhelming. Whether it's in our own being as we're practicing and we find some deeper levels of physical pain, deeper levels of emotional pain, some strong grief in our life. Maybe sometimes, as at this period in world history with all the conflict in the Middle East—how we're all involved in that and how it impacts us—sometimes the suffering that's going on, when you really open and turn into it, can seem unbearable and overwhelming. There are times when you think, how can I possibly begin to open to this suffering? It's too much; I just want to turn away.

But how can we begin to change our relationship to the unpleasant, to the difficult?

I want to share something that has been and continues to be really vital for me in working in this area, in giving me the energy to keep investigating, to keep meeting and opening to what is difficult. And that is really finding what inspires me to want to know the truth—what arises in me as a sense of commitment, a sense of urgency to really turn my energy toward facing what's true in this moment.

It might be different for each of us. For me, something that does this is a deep appreciation of the favorableness of my situation, often through an incredibly deep gratitude for the fortunate aspects of my life. This gets triggered when I open my eyes and start looking around at what's going on in the world.

For example, just last week I came back from India. Whenever I leave this so-called third world country, it really wakes me up to the amazing possibilities and opportunities I have in my life—seeing the grinding poverty, people working from morning to night under really horrible conditions just to get enough food to eat for that day, if they're lucky. There's no way to take a day off. To take a day off means you don't eat, you don't have anywhere to live.

Two years ago when I was in India, I went to Bodh Gaya, which is the spot where the Buddha was enlightened. It's a shrine now, with the descendant of the original Bodhi tree that he sat under. It's a real pilgrimage spot for Buddhists who come from all over the world, and I found it very inspiring—there's a real energy, a real power in that place.

I was struck by how many people live right there, making their living running tea shops and selling things to the tourists. But there's really no interest—not that there should be interest indeed at this moment—but there's just really no interest in awakening. They're simply living their lives.

And so there's the good fortune to have enough health to practice, enough leisure time, enough to eat, the opportunity to practice, and also the interest, which is really rather rare in the world. When I'm in a situation like that, when it awakens my sense of gratitude, it gives me the energy to inquire of myself: All right, I have this incredibly fortunate life—what's really important? What really matters to me? What do I want to do with my energy?

When that question comes up, for me the answer is really clear: to know the truth, to know love and compassion, to share the truth, to know peace. Really acknowledging that in one's heart, I find to be a very powerful force. It arouses, quite of itself, this sense of commitment, this sense of urgency, and a real willingness to open to and face whatever arises right now, because this is the way I can come to understand what freedom is, what peace is.

Sometimes it feels to me, and in talking with friends, that some people are almost afraid to really let that acknowledgment in—of what's really important to them. Almost as if they might be disappointed. They think, "Well, I really want to come to see the truth, but that might be for the Buddha, it might be for someone sitting in a cave in the Himalayas. But I'm just an ordinary person trying to live my life. I'm not good enough for that." There's a fear of really letting it in, of really acknowledging the strength of one's purpose.

But I think it's important to realize that as human beings, we all have the potential for freedom. We all have the potential to be liberated. That's what's so inspiring to me, actually, when I reflect on the Buddha. When we took refuge the first night of the retreat, taking refuge in the Buddha to me was not refuge in the idea of him as a historical person, but in what he represents as a human being—same as me, same as you. That's our heritage as human beings. That's all of our potential.

Being at the Bodhi Tree somehow humanized it for me. I thought, "Oh, this is just a real place, a dusty little village, nothing so special." The Buddha might have been a special human being, but still he was a human being. And we're all special too.

Letting in that acknowledgment of that potential for ourselves, not holding back out of some idea we have of our limitations—this inspiration really gives me the courage, the conviction, to open to what's true right now, a willingness to face the moment, a commitment to simply bring full presence of mind, presence of being, to this moment. And that's all.

The Buddha said quite often, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so." He's very pragmatic. And it is possible. For me, being willing to open to the possibility, to really acknowledge it to myself, inspires deep energy, a sense of urgency, and the willingness to meet whatever's arising.

This is a quote from Nisargadatta, an Indian wise man: "Because nothing physical or mental can give you freedom, you are free once you understand that your bondage is of your own making and you cease forging the chains that bind you."

And so we give our hearts and minds to this exploration, not binding ourselves with thoughts that it's too hard, that we could never do it, that this suffering is too much, let's just forget it.

Stop forging the chains that keep us limited.

One can have a moment, or even an hour, maybe even a day, of this really renewed openness and commitment—a courage that lets us come back to a difficult situation and be there in a new way, with openness, with mindfulness, with spaciousness. But still, a half an hour later, a day later, a minute later, everything clamps down again. It seems so continuously difficult. Drum up the inspiration again. Why? I keep asking myself this: why?

Joseph spoke last night about desire, about the power of that tendency in the mind. That's really what I want to speak to now, because it's such a deeply conditioned habit of mind that when a pleasant experience comes, the mind, the body even, leans into it. When an unpleasant experience comes, just the reverse—aversion, which is just the flip side of desire. Away, move away, block it out, deny it, change it. And when something neutral comes, you don't even notice it. You're bored and you space out and you look for something else.

This is really what the Buddha spoke to in his first and core teaching, the Four Noble Truths. Just this tendency of mind, grasping and pushing away, which can be so subtle, but it has such a profound effect on the way that we relate to our lives, on the way that we experience our lives.

I want to talk a little bit about it again, especially the first two of these noble truths, because they're really quite observable in action, even just in a few moments of sitting or walking here.

This first truth, this first teacher—the teacher of dukkha, or unsatisfactoriness—encompasses the whole range: from obvious deep pain and grief and sadness, unbearableness, to the unsatisfactoriness, the insecurity of impermanence, the fact that nothing lasts, that everything is transient, that no matter how pleasant something is, it's always fleeting. There's no resting place. There's nothing that can give us permanent pleasure. This is actually a very deep experience of unsatisfactoriness.

And it seems really obvious. When I think about it, I wonder, well, why do we have to make this grand proclamation—the first noble truth? It's not like it's a secret. But when you look, you don't really believe it. I saw this ad in the New York Times Magazine. It was for a top that said, "Permanent Pleasure." I thought, yeah, right, this is permanent pleasure. I'll buy some clothes. Anything can give us permanent pleasure! But we keep thinking we're going to find it somewhere out there in some experience.

This movement of the mind towards pleasure and away from the unpleasant is so deeply conditioned. And our ability to deny that it's happening, and our ability to deny the truth of painful or unsatisfactory experiences, is truly amazing to me.

A couple of examples. One was shocking to me in its obviousness. One time I was in a hospital and a doctor was doing some usual but fairly painful procedure and having a hard time doing it. It was really hurting. At some point, tears started coming out of my eyes. He just stopped and looked at me and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt." You can understand—it's too hard to let in pain. It's just steadier to deny what is even happening.

Or I watch myself when I'm traveling through India. There's so much pain and suffering, all right out on the street. In five minutes walking through a village in India, I see more physical pain and suffering than I see in ten years in this country. And I watch: how long can I stay open to all the starving people, people with just skin and bones, to the beggars, to the lepers without any fingers on their hands sometimes? Maybe five minutes, maybe ten minutes—it's overwhelming. And I just watch. I want to shut down, look straight ahead, not look around, not feel it. It's really quite an amazing thing to watch. I was watching that a lot this time.

On a more mundane, much more day-to-day ordinary level, I see how, from not really noticing what's going on, we keep grasping at ordinary experiences and then wonder why it doesn't satisfy us, why life still doesn't seem quite fulfilling.

This example I've used before. I belong to a health club near here, and one time in the fall I was with a friend. It was at the end of a long day, we were really tired, we needed to refresh ourselves and get out, and we said, "Well, we'll go swim in the pool together, and that'll be really refreshing." And it should have been.

And we thought it was. But then we got together and reconstructed what actually happened. It's quite illuminating.

We drive there—first it's a half-hour drive, and the whole time it's looking forward: "Okay, we'll get there, it'll be nice." We get there, I run into the women's dressing room, which they kept quite chilly, and I'm very sensitive to cold. So I was hurrying up, getting on my bathing suit, had to take a shower before I went in, it made me even colder, so this was extremely unpleasant. And I was hurrying through it to jump in the pool, which also was quite scary.

So I got in the pool, and I had goosebumps, but well, I'll start swimming. I'm swimming, swimming, swimming. After two laps, I finally got warm, and I thought, "Oh, this is nice." I got half a lap, maybe. Then my arms started hurting, and I started getting bored. I thought, "Oh, well, I'll hurry up and finish this, then I can go get in the sauna."

So I hurried up and finished that, and I got in the sauna, which was really nice. Well, you know, two minutes, three minutes. Then the bench started to hurt my sacrum because I can't really lie on hard wood. Then I'm really sweaty, really hot. "Oh, I feel really dizzy. I've got to get out of here." Went out, stood outside for about two minutes. "Oh, it's really cold. Now I'm okay. Now I can go back in the sauna." Went back in, came back out, got dressed, went upstairs, and my friend goes, "That was great."

And this is life. Which is nothing unusual.

The question might come up: who wants to look at life this closely? It's too depressing. You know, "I thought I was having a good time. Let's keep it that way." But I actually know none of you would be here going through this if you really thought that everything went hunky-dory. And I also really want to point out that that's not my experience. I don't think that's the experience at all—that looking this closely, that really acknowledging the extent of unsatisfactoriness, is depressing or oppressive. Quite the reverse.

In our daily lives, for instance when I was going swimming at this place, because we can keep moving—as soon as something unpleasant, even slightly unpleasant, not even a lot unpleasant, just a little unpleasant comes—we can immediately move, go to the next thing. We sort of mask the fact that things are so unsatisfactory, and so we don't understand why we're not feeling fulfilled. We don't really get it. What is this nagging feeling that something's out of sync?

But when you really open up and begin to look and acknowledge what's actually going on moment to moment, far from there being a sense of "Oh no, I can't bear it"—for me, it's quite the reverse. It's a huge release. It's like there's no more need for pretense. Sharon uses a quotation a lot from Miss America from 1950 or something, where they interviewed her twenty or thirty years later, and she said, "I'm just so tired of being tomorrow." And it's like that—there's no need for pretense. It doesn't mean complaining. It's just knowing what's really going on.

And I find this over and over. You have the same insight over and over and over, and sometimes it goes deeper and deeper. Each time I find suddenly in my life I feel caught up in some kind of struggle and I realize... well, I have to get to enough suffering that I'm actually driven to investigate. You know, if I think I can actually fix it, then I keep trying to fix it. But when that stops working and I'm actually driven to investigate, invariably I see that somewhere I'm still thinking there's some payoff. Somehow I'm still thinking I can arrange my external situation and my internal situation so that everything will be all right and I'll be happy.

And as soon as I see I'm doing this—and that's right, that's absolutely impossible; there's nothing, no experience internally or externally that's going to last, that can make me lastingly happy—knowing that is incredibly liberating. It just frees up this whole struggle, and there's actually a huge sense of joy and happiness arising. And this has happened to me over and over and over.

Another quotation from Reginald Perrin—when she had grasped the truth that the world is full of suffering, You'll find the urge and the energy to go beyond it. Really seeing the calamity is the strong force of liberation. Really seeing what's going on.

This acknowledgement of suffering moves us from a relationship to our life of fear or blame or self-judgment or aversion to one of clarity, of the possibility of acceptance, of clear action instead of reaction, of joy. It allows for the clear stream that opens up into the true nature of reality. So the First Noble Truth is actually a very profound teaching. It has so much beneath its surface.

The second truth the Buddha spoke of: the cause of this unsatisfactoriness begins not in the difficult situations themselves, but in that movement of mind towards the pleasant—craving, clinging. The word actually translates as thirst, that yearning for the pleasant. And this also includes the movement of mind away from the unpleasant, that aversion.

This movement towards and away, this deeply ingrained, almost unconscious reaction to stimuli—this is what distorts our perception of reality. It's why we don't know and live in truth, because we're caught in this moving to and fro. And out of that we keep forging the chains that bind us. We keep looking for that permanent pleasant.

An example often used in the scriptures is of someone holding onto an iron ball that's red hot and burning, but somehow afraid to put it down. The very thing causing the suffering, and yet afraid to let go of it.

Mindfulness—the quality of clear, non-judging attention that we're cultivating here—is our very strong ally in waking up to and being free from this tendency of mind of clinging and aversion.

Using this example of the ball again: at first there's incredible suffering. One doesn't even know what's going on. You might not even acknowledge that pain is happening. It's assumed that we need that ball. It's just taken as a given.

With increasing attention, with mindfulness, we start to really notice the pain. And we know we could put the ball down, but we're not sure that we don't need it. We're really afraid to let go. Somehow we think it'll bring us happiness. Or maybe it's just so familiar, and we'd much rather have something familiar and painful than let go and move into the unknown. That's really scary. So we hold on.

With continuing mindfulness, we start to see that actually all that's binding us to that suffering is our desire and our fear. And at some point we really get the senselessness of it, and we can just let go.

Seeing the reality is the power that can free us from the burden. Understanding what's really going on is so powerful. We don't need someone to come from the outside and wash us all away. We really need continued presence of attention, and the truth reveals itself. We put down the burden.

That middle portion can be a hard time—the time when we know it's just because we're holding on that it hurts so much, but somehow we can't put it down. That can be really hard, and sometimes it can seem to last a really long time. We don't need to think of it in terms of time, because any moment is a moment that could be clear enough to let go. But even so, hard as it is, this is the suffering that wakes us up. Because in there is the right attitude, the willingness to be with it, open to it, and understand what's going on.

The Buddha said once that suffering either ripens as confusion or it ripens as wisdom. I really love that, because it's just so obvious—the two different ways we can relate to the same experience.

Take something really simple, not too complex seemingly: you're sitting here and there's a pain in the knee. What happens with confusion? There's a pain in the knee. We notice it. There's a lot of annoyance. "If I was only being mindful, then it wouldn't hurt so much. If I was relating to it correctly, I wouldn't be suffering. Why is this here anyway?" We get into self-judgment. We get into judgment about meditation. We get into a real struggle with ourselves. Then we say, "Okay, forget it."

I'm just going back to the breath, which seems to be impossible. And then we get into a whole other string of self-judgment. This is pain that is ripening as confusion. It's just getting into more and more of that—somehow confusing because there's a sense that the pain and the dissatisfaction have to be fixed, that it's a sign I'm doing something wrong.

The same suffering can ripen as strength. Because again, it exists in the attitude, not in the physical sensation. It's really important to remember that while mindfulness is a very penetrating awareness, a real clear knowing of what's happening in the moment, the reason we can know what's happening is because the energy of mindfulness is also totally non-violent. It's totally non-discriminating. With mindfulness, there's no imperative to be with pleasant experience and ignore unpleasant experience. When an experience or sensation arises, mindfulness doesn't say, "Well, I don't really want to look at that anymore. Let's wait until something more pleasant comes along." That's just the tendency of mind again—the craving and the aversion. Mindfulness is a very focused but totally non-violent quality, very interested but spacious.

And so when pain arises with that quality of mindfulness, we're simply noting, noticing, investigating the sensations. Simply noticing and noting the unpleasantness, and also any aversion or dislike or fear that arises in the mind—that's all fine. Just allowing it to be as it is and noticing it clearly. And whenever that whole whirl of thoughts and confusion starts, seeing that as thinking and gently coming back to the actual experience. Not to change anything. That's what's so important: to know for oneself what's really happening, because that's the truth of the moment.

We do this over and over, and we'll often find there might be just one moment when we experience quite deeply that suddenly what was so excruciating and unbearable and so aversive is suddenly—oh, it's just sensation, and that's all. It's totally okay. That's a difficult moment, but it's an incredibly illuminating moment. It's like suddenly, oh, right. It really is in the relationship that the suffering lies, not in the physical sensation. This is the movement from confusion to truth.

I think it was Ajahn Buddhadasa, a Thai meditation master, who said that there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering. And so that means that mindfulness, an opening to whatever is arising, is essential. Sometimes what's arising is suffering, but it's the suffering that leads to the end of suffering.

I do want to emphasize, though, that the end of suffering does not mean the end of unpleasant experience. The two are not equated. Again, the suffering is in the relationship, not in the pleasantness or unpleasantness of experience. In that moment when one was clearly with the sensation and suddenly it was just sensation—no aversion, no problem—that's when we really see that the suffering is in the resistance, in the denial of the situation, not in the situation itself.

This is what I call using adverse circumstances as the path, as a doorway into understanding what the truth of the moment is, into understanding that peace is beyond the presence or absence of pleasant and unpleasant.

As long as we're unaware of these tendencies of mind—of avoidance, of clinging—so long will our perception of reality continue to be distorted. An image that I like a lot, that speaks to me: it's as if, when we're unaware of these movements of mind, we're in a room and we think it's a prison. Although the door is wide open, we don't see it. Because we're so busy thinking, "Somehow if I can get the furniture all arranged right, then it'll be more pleasant." We're so busy rearranging the furniture to try and make it more livable that we never think to just stop a minute and open up. And then we see—oh, the door's wide open. There's no problem.

It's almost inconceivable, though, that the real suffering is in our need to make the situation more pleasant rather than just stop and be with what's there.

So in our practice here, know that any time there's a sense of struggle, a sense of conflict, it signals that there's something happening in that moment that's not being accepted, that somehow is not okay. It signals that in that moment there's a movement away from the truth of what's happening into some idea of what we wish was happening. We can use struggle as a signal to come home, as a signal to just come back to rest in what's happening right now. And knowing that that takes practice, that we can do that—we don't need to be afraid of this moment.

Nisargadatta again: "What the mind knows is restlessness, with all its many modes and grades. The pleasant are considered superior and the painful are discounted. What we usually call progress is merely a changeover from the unpleasant to the pleasant. Changes can't bring us to the changeless."

I feel like that's really profound. We could spend our whole lives trying to change all the unpleasant to the pleasant—because changes can't bring us to the changeless.

Let's stop rearranging the painful and just settle into being here in the truth of this moment.

I obviously don't mean to imply that this is easy, or always easy. It might be easy in one moment. But again, this movement of clinging and aversion is so strong and so often unconscious that it can be quite subtle and very hard to be aware of. I also want to say that even when we are aware of it, there are times for many of us when we don't become balanced and spacious all at once, and it doesn't just stay that way. Nothing just stays that way.

And so sometimes the suffering that we run into, as I said earlier, can seem in that moment to be stronger than the balance of mind that's there to meet it. I find for myself, and for most people I know, we all have moments or hours or days where we really feel like we're drowning—that we're overwhelmed with suffering. As I know now, with the war that's going on and just the constant influx of information and all the mists of our emotions and reactions, at least my own, it can be excruciatingly painful. There are certainly times when it seems like my clarity and the balance in my mind is not equal to the amount of suffering that seems to be coming in. That can even happen off and on in a sitting when you have that one particular pain that returns every sitting and gets worse and worse and just seems to be excruciating.

I could say that often, especially as we practice for a while, we can sometimes turn the concept of opening to pain against ourselves and use it as another way to beat ourselves up. "I should be able to face this. I should be able to stay without moving no matter how much it hurts. I should be able to stay open and loving in the face of huge conflict going on in the world. I should be able not to be drowning in grief even though someone I really love has died or gone away."

Sometimes in a sitting you can force yourself to stay in the pain, and sometimes this works—we come back to a place of balance and equanimity of mind. But sometimes we end up in a super struggle of willpower and self-judgment and forcing, and the conflict gets even stronger.

We need to remember that mindfulness is never strident. Mindfulness is not forcing. We can't force mindfulness. We can't force openness. We can't force acceptance—these are kinds of contradictions. Mindfulness is allowing.

And so from time to time, in retreat or in our life, we might find that there's a point where we're just feeling completely submerged, and opening is out of the question. We hardly even know who we are and what's going on. The Buddha spoke of what he called skillful avoidance, and it's important. Not the avoidance of aversion—this is not a concept to say, "Oh, it's skillful avoidance, I don't have to sit the rest of the day because I'm kind of tired." That's not it. But it's avoidance when you realize mindfulness isn't happening, when what's happening is we're getting overwhelmed.

And so we can move in gently, move in slowly. When there's really excruciating pain, it doesn't mean turn the attention there and stay for the hour until you feel like you're made out of concrete and you're going to crack from the tension. It's moving slowly, and when you really feel no more mindfulness is happening and you're just going to snap, open up the attention. Come back to the breath. Feel the whole body. Have a wideness of attention. This is skillful avoidance. It's not spacing out, but it's skillfully bringing some nutrients to the spirit, to the mind. And then again, gently move back in to what's happening. Never from forcing does the truth open up.

I also feel it's very important, as we begin to think about or reflect on opening to the difficult, to realize that difficult and unpleasant is part of our experience—it's not all of our experience. Sometimes people tend to get unbalanced on that side. They kind of discount or ignore or avoid anything pleasant that's happening. This is also aversion. If in the moment there is a sense of joy, that's fine—acknowledge it. Again, we don't want to cling, but we need to acknowledge that that's what's happening, not get imbalanced in the other direction.

By themselves, neither pleasure nor pain enlightens one. Only understanding enlightens us. Only understanding.

So don't undervalue a moment where you're present with whatever's happening with a clarity of attention—one of those moments where your mindfulness is non-judging, where you're seeing and feeling clearly, so you know there's no problem. Don't undervalue it, even if the next moment things seem like a total struggle. Because that one moment of real mindfulness, presence, clarity, and non-judging is very powerful.

When we know for ourselves what the true relationship is—that's the true understanding of the heart and mind. Not understanding through the intellect, but understanding from what we've seen and known for ourselves. And that's the understanding that can lead to liberation.

This is the understanding that gives us the courage, the conviction, to know that we can be with whatever arises from our past. We don't have to be afraid of facing whatever's arising in this moment. It's not like we have a choice as to what arises from our path anyway. Really, the only choice is how we meet it.

I want to close with a quotation from the Third Zen Patriarch. It's a long poem—this is just a small piece—but it's one of my favorite writings:

When love and hate are both absent, everything becomes clear and undisguised. Make the smallest distinction, however, and heaven and earth are set infinitely apart. If you wish to see the truth, then hold no opinion for or against anything. To set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind. Indeed, it is due to our choosing to accept or reject that we do not see the true nature of things.

CHAPTER 229

What Mindfulness Is

Carol Wilson · 46 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the precise nature of mindfulness (sati) and how it differs from ordinary awareness. She explains that mindfulness is not a vague general awareness but a quality of total, undivided attention—giving one's whole heart and mind to whatever is present without fragmentation or resistance.
>
> Wilson explores why our experience so often feels fragmented and conflicted despite our potential for peace. She identifies the deeply conditioned tendencies of mind: moving toward the pleasant, pushing away the unpleasant, spacing out during neutral experiences, and identifying with changing phenomena as a permanent self. Drawing on psychological research from Daniel Goleman's work, she illustrates how these tendencies create perceptual blind spots that filter our experience of reality, keeping us out of touch with what is actually happening.
> The talk illuminates how mindfulness practice works to heal this fragmentation. When we bring total, spacious, non-judgmental attention to experience—what Wilson playfully calls "Super Bowl mind"—we begin to distinguish between bare experience and our interpretations about it. This clear seeing naturally gives rise to both wisdom and compassion. Rather than struggling to change ourselves or achieve special states, we simply learn to be fully present, moment by moment, allowing the peace that is our true nature to shine forth. Wilson emphasizes that this is a gradual process of waking up again and again, building trust in our own direct experience of freedom.

Tonight I want to talk about what I call a kind of nuts and bolts talk. Basically, I want to talk about mindfulness—the quality of it—so we get a feel for what this energy of mindfulness actually is and how it works.

As Christina spoke of last night so eloquently, our path as human beings, our path of awakening, is one that leads to harmony, to a sense of stillness, to peace, to real freedom from conflict. If that's the path of our awakening, which it is, it's our potential as human beings. And it's right here in this moment, this very moment, nowhere else. Nowhere to go, nothing else to try and get. But if it's right here in this moment, how come that's not our experience? I mean, what's going on?

When we come to this practice, we come with various ideas about what we're going to get, but overall, for most of us, we come with a strong intention, a strong commitment to open, to understand, to open our heart. We have to have a strong intention or commitment, or we wouldn't get through nine days of this. And so we're coming with this belief in our potential and the commitment to investigate and open, and we sit down and what happens? The mind's all over. We're attacked by the hindrances. We're lost in restlessness and knee pain. Our thoughts are flying every which way. And for many, the experience is definitely not one of harmony. If this is a path of harmony, how come after two days you can feel in less harmony than you felt for the last six months of your life? What's going on?

And how does mindfulness work? How is it that sitting and being present with the breath, being present with a pain in the knee, being present with the sound of the buzzsaw—how does this help us see through this false idea of separation, of conflict that we seem to be living under? How does being present with the breath, for example, help to bring us out of confusion?

So what is mindfulness? Vipassana meditation, translated loosely as insight—actually, one of the translations of it means just to see things as they are. Simply that. The key tool to seeing things as they are, to knowing things as they are, is this quality of mindfulness that we're cultivating.

The practice is not to become different from how we are. We're not trying to somehow change ourselves around to become perfect beings. We're not trying to achieve a certain mental state, a certain set of experiences, or get to some plane where there will be peace and then we stay there and that's it. It's not about that at all. It's to open deeply, to know fully, to the truth that is always here, already right here, right now, nowhere else. And this is what mindfulness can help us do.

We often loosely use the synonym of awareness for mindfulness, but this quality of mindfulness is actually much more specific than a vague, general sort of awareness. We can say, "Well, I'm aware that I'm sitting here and I've been thinking for ten minutes." If you asked me where I was, I would be able to say, "Yeah, I'm here in this room." There's an awareness. But mindfulness is much more specific, much richer than this kind of vague overall awareness.

It's a quality of total attention, giving one's total heart and mind to whatever is present in our experience at this moment. It's a quality of attention that is not fragmented in any way. And it's this total commitment to being present to whatever's happening in this moment that allows for our seeing through our mind-created confusion about what's really going on.

There's a quotation from Krishnamurti that I really love, which to me expresses this quality: "When you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment. And then there is no room for fear, no room for conflict, no room for contradiction."

It's this quality of total attention. We all have moments of that—when your attention is totally with a breath, say, or it could be anything. When you're totally with the breath, in that moment there isn't a sense of conflict. There's really no problem. It doesn't matter how the breath is. The attention is completely unified; our being is completely unified around this sensation of tautness, for example. In that, there's no conflict. There's peace.

So why is it so rare in our experience? Why do we seem to struggle so? Because it's not really so esoteric, just being present for a sensation of the breath. So what's the struggle?

There are strong tendencies in our mind. It's like a deeply ingrained habit, a groove that our minds tend to run into. If there's something pleasant or pleasurable in our experience, we move toward it, either mentally—just kind of wanting it—or physically if we can. If it's unpleasant, painful, fearful, just a little uncomfortable, the tendency of mind is to back off, get away, avoid, deny. If it's kind of neutral, we tend to not even notice it, kind of space out.

And the fourth tendency, really, is the one we call the tendency to identify with any particular aspect of our experience as being me, as being some unchanging, permanent entity that's me. All of these tendencies are very strongly conditioned. When you start to look at what we're identifying with as me, in one moment it's the body, a particular pain.

"Oh, my knee, I'm really going to hurt myself." Next moment, "I'm feeling so restless. This is really unpleasant. I don't like being like this." And the next moment that's forgotten and there's a nice smell. "Well, I'm really hungry. I'm just starving. I'll never make it to lunch."

Just start to notice how many different "me's" there have been just in the course of today. And each one, when it's unexamined, we think, "Oh, this is me. This is real. This is lasting." And when it goes, we kind of don't notice it because the next one's real, it's lasting, it's going to stay. Very deeply ingrained tendency.

When these tendencies are operating and we're not aware of them—and that's the key—when we're not examining them, we don't know they're operating. They filter our whole experience. It's like we're looking through the tendency to identify, or we're looking through the way the mind pushes away from something unpleasant. We don't know that's there, and that's how we interpret reality. We think we're perceiving accurately, but we're not, because we don't know in a certain moment, if we're not paying attention, that these filters are operating on our consciousness.

They're so deeply ingrained that, for example, with difficult or unpleasant situations—when we're sitting here, just a little one, a pain in the knee or restlessness, something mild, I'm not talking about really intense suffering—it's so deeply ingrained that the mind moves away that, just without thinking about it, we will interpret something that's difficult or unpleasant as being wrong. "I'm doing something wrong because it doesn't feel good." And then this situation becomes an obstacle. "Well, if this pain in my knee goes away, then I could pay attention. Then I could be meditating. If I wasn't restless, then I could start meditating. After lunch, I won't be hungry anymore, and that's when my meditation will be good."

You know, we notice, well, after lunch you're not hungry, but you're sleepy and tired. So just before tea, maybe that hour, then it'll be okay to meditate, and now I'll just stick it out or get up and walk.

The paradox that we don't see if we're not aware of this tendency is that when we quit trying to run away from the difficulty and actually give it our total full attention, it often ceases to be a problem. If there's a slight pain in the knee and we're really fighting it, you turn your full attention to it, total attention, and suddenly you're just with it. In that moment it's not a problem. It's an unpleasant sensation in the knee. It's not a big deal. The only difference is our attitude—this willingness to be totally present without fighting or resisting what's going on.

But because we're so conditioned not to be aware that we're fighting what's happening, our perception of our experience can tend to be really skewed. In other words, we have a kind of selective presence. We're present for certain aspects of our experience and we're just totally not present for others. And this can even operate on a very unconscious level. We don't even know we're not present.

My favorite example that really helped me to see how this worked is some experiments that were detailed in a book called Vital Lies, Simple Truths by a psychologist named Daniel Goleman, who's done Vipassana for years. These experiments show ways that our mind can block out perceiving stimuli that are perceived as potentially anxiety-provoking or painful. It's not like we consciously say, "I don't want to pay attention to that"—it doesn't even make it to the point where we're aware of having a conscious choice.

He starts with a physical example, a description of a man—I think it was Livingston, of Stanley and Livingston—who at one point in his African adventures was being chewed on by a lion. And he remained conscious through this. He obviously lived through it because he wrote about it; I don't think he was writing at the time. What he noticed was that he was conscious and he was not conscious of pain. Obviously the body was being really hurt, but there was some kind of sensory blocking that kept the awareness of pain from making it through to his consciousness. This could probably be seen as a life-supporting factor of the human mind and body, because it would allow you that superhuman energy in a moment of crisis.

They went on to do experiments showing that this same function is operating in ways that are totally not helpful or especially useful. But what was perceived as threatening to life, as real pain, is now stimuli that our mind somehow sees as anxiety-provoking. So they did this minor experiment where they had a bunch of subjects and showed them several different pictures. All they had to do was look at the picture and then later remember and describe what had been in each of the drawings. And they had some kind of way—I don't know how they do this—of measuring where the eyeball looked. So they not only had what the person remembered, but actually they could measure where in the picture they had looked.

And so the pictures would be just normal—like a man sitting reading a newspaper—and then something that for certain people might provoke anxiety, like one would have a really sexually suggestive element, and then a guy sitting reading a newspaper. Two pieces that didn't go together at all.

They could measure where these subjects' eyes looked, and they found—that's the particular one I remember, but there were several different stimuli that could provoke anxiety—they found that in the people for whom, for instance, the sexually suggestive image provoked anxiety, when they went to say what the pictures were, they didn't even remember that part. They remembered a picture of a man reading a newspaper.

And even more strange, they could measure that somehow these subjects kept their eyes from even looking at the part of the picture that would provoke anxiety. It's fascinating to me.

So there's a way that we have of blocking that which is potentially unpleasant in our experience. And there are times when this is perhaps necessary for survival. Like many instances of young children who have been really mistreated, abused—if they were to remember that and have to stay in the same situation, it would be almost impossible. And so that memory is gone, really gone, until it can be retrieved decades later. But often in our experience this blocking is not necessary, and what we're doing is having a really skewed experience of reality. So that's how the mind moving away from the unpleasant filters our perception.

It's the same with the tendency of the mind to move toward the pleasant. They did another experiment. This demonstrates how when there's something you're fixated on, something you want, it gives you tunnel vision. You see what you're looking to see and nothing else.

So they had a short video of a basketball game, a real fast one, balls flying back and forth, and the subjects were instructed to count and report how many times the ball was passed. That was their job, and they did it. In the middle of this video, a woman dressed in white with a white parasol kind of ambled across the middle of the basketball court. Nobody doing the experiment mentioned this at the end. And when they were asked about it, they couldn't believe it had happened. If you went back and looked again, you'd never be able to miss it. It's like how when we're looking for something we think is lost and it's staring us in the face—because we think it's lost, we can't see it.

So our expectations skew what we perceive. They skew our experience of reality. This is what we call delusion. This is the confusion of mind.

And because we have these blind spots in our experience of reality—blind spots brought about through our not seeing the tendencies of mind to go towards the pleasant, away from the unpleasant, to space out if it's not interesting enough, to identify with things—we're not seeing. We don't know what's actually going on. If we don't pay attention, this is how we stay out of touch with reality. It's why we feel that there's this weird sense of separation and fragmentation and we can't figure it out.

I think it's one of the reasons that the Buddha said, you know, everyone wants to be happy. All people are doing is trying to find love and happiness. But we keep doing it in ways that increase our confusion and our suffering because we don't really see clearly. We can't see what's happening.

This fascinates me, just how this works—this skewed perception.

Now, as long as these filters on our experience are operating without our knowing it and without our understanding, we continue to act and feel confused, separated. So this is where the power of mindfulness comes in.

Wisdom, real understanding—just what really is—arises with our ability to be fully, totally present with just what is in any moment. That ability to be fully and totally present without conflict is what enables us to know and experience clearly, for just what it is. Because when we're with it without resistance, without expectation, nothing to protect, just there with it, open, vulnerable, we can really be with it, see what it really is.

So this quality of mindfulness, this total presence, as we cultivate it, the light of awareness begins more and more to shine equally on anything that arises in our experience. We start to be less discriminating, not so selective. More things start to come up into our awareness and we're fully with whatever it is, without this unconscious to-ing and fro-ing. And this includes beginning to be aware even of these filters, even of the movement of the mind of wanting, the movement of the mind of resisting, and aware of that energy of identification.

As experiences that have been fearful or unattended to in our life begin to be received with attention, we're not so driven to deny the painful. We're not so driven to only seek out the pleasant and suffer so much when we can't have it.

And it's this drive—this drive towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant—that is the source of our conflict. It's not the experiences themselves. It's our drive to deny and to cling that's the source of our conflict.

And with this mindfulness that begins to shine equal light on whatever arises, this to-ing and fro-ing of the mind begins to cease. There are moments when it isn't happening. There are moments when this to-ing and fro-ing of the heart and mind isn't going on, and the stillness of heart, the peace of what we really are, is able to shine forth. It's not like we're going somewhere else. It's just that this to-ing and fro-ing stops for a second, and there can be this sense of real peace, of harmony.

And that's really our true nature.

On retreats and off retreats, I think probably all of us have had moments of experience of this. I can think back to many times. It tends to happen more on retreat because I'm practicing being mindful—where there's just a moment of exquisite beauty. And if you were describing it later, well, it was the sunset, it was so exquisite. Or the way the shadow filters through the leaves in a tree, or a flower, or the way a certain person was walking. A sip of tea, a step in walking meditation. There are these moments of exquisite stillness and beauty.

It's not that suddenly this tree is the most magnificent tree that ever existed on the face of the earth, or that this step was some kind of really special step. What's going on is that those filters of wanting and pushing away and identification aren't active in that moment. And so there's this real sense of connection, of harmony, of peace. It's not that the experience itself is so different. And if we went back and tried to recreate it—let me just drink this tea in the same way and have this sip again—it doesn't do it. Because the mind's wanting like crazy. Forget it. It'll never work.

But it's nothing so esoteric. It's a moment of the mind and heart being fully connected and present without this to-ing and fro-ing.

So these tendencies of wanting, aversion, pushing away, confusion, identification—yes, they're really deep and strong. They arise really often, and that's part of what's happening when we sit. You sit down and you're lost in aversion, you're lost in restlessness, and the mind's all over the shop. You're starting to see what's going on. When we're not paying attention, we often don't see it on such a subtle level. So they're deep and they're strong—and they're also impermanent. They come and they go. It's not our intrinsic nature. If it were, we'd be wasting our time here.

Something the Buddha often said, which lately has been inspiring me a lot: when he would talk about working for freedom from suffering and purifying the mind—in other words, moving so that we're not so caught in greed and aversion and delusion—he'd say, "If it weren't possible, I wouldn't tell you to do it." And that inspires me a lot.

So when we're willing to bring our full energy, our commitment, our attention to whatever's happening now—the pain, the breath—we start to see that what we assume to be so in a particular moment isn't necessarily true at all. Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master, poet, and peace activist—I quote him a lot—says that in order to have a correct perception of reality, we need to have a direct encounter with what's happening. Pretty straightforward. That's what mindfulness is: giving us a direct encounter right now with this moment.

So what are some qualities, actually energetic qualities, of mindfulness that we can experience when we're being mindful? Even as I talk, if you have a sense of feeling it in yourself, not just taking it in intellectually, that's helpful.

Mindfulness is a real alert, total attention, and at the same time it's relaxed. It's an alert attention that doesn't come from a driving force. It comes rather from interest. And attention that springs from interest is quite natural, quite connected. We're all capable of really strong interest. Sometimes you might think, well, the breath—it's not that interesting. How can I bring interest to it? But first, to know that you're capable of really strong interest helps a lot.

This is my current favorite example—I can only use it a couple more times this year. January in San Francisco was during the Super Bowl, and I knew quite a few people there. Every single person I knew or knew of was glued to their television set during the three hours of this match. The city kind of stopped. It was quite amazing. And watching it with people, the quality of interest—especially during the first half—was remarkable. No move went undiscerned that the quarterback made, or that special wide receiver. They were all San Francisco fans, so they were really into it. It was amazing. And this was just a wide, broad spectrum of people. We're all quite capable of this really connected, total attention. No sound, nothing else would go on. When the commercial came, attention completely dropped. As soon as the commercial ended—boom.

It was fascinating. So if we can do this with a football game, we can bring the Super Bowl mind to our life process. We might think that breath is boring, but really, our life process is a lot more interesting than we give it credit for.

ultimately interesting than a football game. And if we think the breath is boring, think about what it's like when you have a really bad cold. Then suddenly you're really fascinated with the breath. Or if you have the potential of lung disease. I just had to have a pulmonary test, and these incredible contraptions they use – it just tuned me in to how much could go wrong with the lungs and what that would be like, not to be able to breathe freely. It's really quite interesting, the breath. It's worth my attention.

So we can bring this quality, the Super Bowl mind, to whatever's happening in our life process. It's worth it.

Mindfulness has other qualities. Actually, when I'm talking about the attention with the Super Bowl, that is not complete mindfulness, because it has a quality of wanting a certain result, looking for a certain thing to happen. Those people definitely wanted San Francisco to win. It wasn't like, "Oh well, whoever catches the ball, that'll be interesting." So that quality is not mindfulness. The total attention is. But mindfulness is relaxed, totally non-manipulative, non-violent, not looking for any result, no expectation.

So we bring that same quality of attention, but with no expectation of any result, simply because this is the experience of our mind and body in this moment. This is life right now. It's almost attention with a spirit of loving-kindness, of mettā, towards whatever it is that's arising – towards one's sense of oneself, towards the emotion that's arising, if it's sadness, towards a pain, towards a sound, towards feeling hot. It doesn't matter. It's an attention that's alert but with a real loving spaciousness of mind.

I'm trying to give different images. An image that helps me a lot with this sense is an evening just when the moon is rising with a star. I remember this image really clearly. There's such a sense of the space around that, really holding and cradling the moon and the star. It's that sense of complete spaciousness allowing whatever were to come into that space. There's no sense of, "Well, the star's in the way, it's not in the right relationship to the moon, they should change." But a total spacious acceptance – whatever comes in is fine, it's held, it's cradled, it goes out, that's fine. Very loving, spacious, total presence with whatever arises.

And in this, the whole range of experiences comes and goes, and we're just totally present for each one.

So, for example, here in retreat, if we think we know what good practice feels like or looks like, or we have some idea of what it is we're wanting to get or do, and we don't notice that, it makes it really hard to have this sense of openness and cradling for experiences that come along that don't match our idea, our expectation. And then again, right away, we're in conflict. Right away, we're in struggle. If there's no special thing to happen but we're just fully meeting whatever arises with kindness, with spaciousness, with attention, there's not a problem. And then we can see, more likely, what's really going on.

This spacious non-judging quality of mindfulness is what allows for the next aspect. And even though I'm saying this sequentially, you realize this is all going on at once. It's just that to talk about things we have to separate them and break them out.

But in this non-judging spacious presence and alertness, it allows us to know the actual bare experience of a moment. As opposed to all our ideas about it, our interpretations about it, our concepts about it, it lets us tell the difference between what's actually going on and what we're thinking about and constructing on top of that. This is how we see directly without the veil of interpretation.

We all know the difference. But often our interpretations and concepts are so subtly tied into the experience that we get all caught up and intertwined and can't really tell the difference.

A real simple example. If you're going on with the breathing and your breath turns out to be really tight and rigid and controlling, and you start to think, "God, this is just what I'm like. I'm such a rigid, controlled, uptight person." And each breath this just gets stronger until each breath is a torment. Each breath is further proof of what a totally horrible person you are. This is a real example of confusing our actual experience with all our interpretations.

Bring the energy of mindfulness to the experience and what is it? Well, on the in-breath it's really tight and constricted. That's the experience. Tightness.

and constriction, and then there's a thought: "Such a rigid, uptight person." That's a thought. It might or might not be true, but in the moment the experience is simply one of tightness and constriction, and then this judging thought. When we can bring this total attention to it, it's much easier to be with the actuality of tightness and constriction.

Yeah, that's tightness and constriction. That's okay. Oh, and I'm really judging that. Okay. Just simply seeing what is and not confusing our interpretations for the actual experience. It doesn't mean we chuck out all concepts or all interpretations—of course, they're often helpful. But knowing it for what it is, and knowing what we're actually experiencing for what it is.

This comes about through the power of mindful attention, through simply being present again and again and again, without judging. The more we learn to be present moment by moment—and that's why we just be with the breath, be with the lifting of the foot, be with the pain in the knee, be with the sound—what we're learning the feel of is what that feels like, how it is simply to be present. A moment of that is what begins to allow for the stillness, as I said before, to shine forth.

When we're present, when there's a presence with what's going on without all these veils of interpretation, more and more the conditions are present for deep understanding to arise. Because understanding is simply seeing what actually is, what already is. And so when there's this stillness of mind that comes from our willingness to just be present without resistance or clinging, understanding arises, clear seeing arises, of itself—because we're no longer blinded by our interpretations and assumptions.

And what's so nice actually is that with the understanding, also arises—actually it seems to be mingled—a deep expression and sense of love and compassion. Really the twin wings of the Buddha's teaching are that of wisdom or understanding and that of compassion and love. Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Without understanding we are unable to love." And so with the arising of understanding—simply this clear seeing—love and compassion also begin to spring forth quite naturally.

As we develop this energy of mindfulness, we're no longer so driven to avoid pain and seek out pleasure. We begin to get it that it's not what's happening that brings peace or absence of conflict, but it's our relationship to what's happening that makes all the difference. And so, as we no longer hide from pain, we're able to open to our own painful and difficult situations—physical pain, emotional pain, difficult situations in our life.

It's when we can be with our own pain that we're able to open to and be with the pain of others. Because it doesn't trigger off fear of pain in ourselves. We don't have to be afraid of it anymore. And so difficult situations in our life are no longer so in the way. It's no longer, "I've got to get rid of this in order for my growth to continue." Actually, it's really true that the difficult situation—a sickness, a difficult situation in life, grief—can actually serve as the source of our growth, as the catalyst for our healing, for our coming to heal our sense of isolation and separation. That's when we give mindful attention to the difficulty. Whereas when we are afraid or don't know to pay attention, the difficulty actually becomes the source of our sense of fragmentation, simply when we don't remember to look.

Here's just a little example of how a difficult situation can really turn around when we change our attitude. Well, this is not really difficult, just unpleasant. But I was a couple of years ago on an Indian overnight train, in a sleeping compartment that you share with four people. I was traveling alone, and three middle-aged Indian men were in the other three bunks. You're just lying there eye to eye. And then their whole families moved in. I was really like, "I want my privacy." And they just stare. It's not impolite to stare in India—it's just a whole different way of relating to people. Physical proximity isn't considered rude. Lying there and staring at you isn't considered rude. To me it was like, "Get back. I just want my peace."

And so I spent a lot of the night feeling kind of closed off, aversive, paranoid. It was definitely me and them, and I wanted them to leave. And at some point I kind of got it—what I was doing—and I changed it from "me and them" to "Oh, here we are all together in this compartment." You know, it's us. I just quit fighting and decided to be present, instead of present in body but in mind trying to really not be there.

And the whole—I mean, there was no problem. We suddenly got chatty. They went out and bought me little snacks at the station. We ended up just having a great time the last couple of hours.

And I really learned a lot about where separation and conflict and fragmentation comes from. Even a minor unpleasant incident can really transform into a way to heal ourselves from our sense of separation. Really, all I had to do was remember to be fully present. It didn't take anything else.

As we're more and more present, seeing more clearly what is without fighting it, the sense of connectedness, the sense of love and compassion starts to shine, to spring forth from our heart naturally. It's no longer a "should"—you know, "I should be this loving person." It's not being compassionate out of guilt because I have so much and they don't. It's just a natural expression of who we really are.

I do want to emphasize that for most of us, this is a process. It's not like we have a few moments of clear seeing and then it's all done—we're just living in love and compassion and total understanding. It's a process. It means being willing to wake up and pay attention in this moment, now. And being awake in this moment is only this moment. And now, in this moment, it means waking up and paying attention in this moment. That's all. It's quite simple. It's nothing so esoteric. The experience of total presence and mindfulness is not necessarily some big fireworks going off. It's easy to overlook. But don't overlook it, because it's really important.

We'll all meet situations in our life—here, outside of here—that are too painful, too difficult to completely open to, to be fully present with. And that's fine. That's life. That's not a cause for self-judging: "Oh God, I blew it. I can't open to this." And it's not about forcing oneself. But that too is the truth of the moment right now: "I just feel completely overwhelmed. There doesn't seem to be the ability to be present and open right now." That's okay.

But then all the moments that we are able to give direct attention—it just strengthens in us so many things. One thing it really strengthens is that deep quality in our heart of trust. Trust in our own experience. Beginning to know that our potential really is that we're much more than this kind of random bundle of sensations and flying thoughts and wacky emotions. Sometimes we wonder, "Is this it?" But these moments of real presence, of stillness, that we each experience for ourselves deepen that quality of trust, the commitment and the willingness and ability to open further, to meet the next moment of our experience.

Because what we know for ourselves, what we've experienced for ourselves—no one can come along and say, "That's not true." I mean, they can come and say it, but we know it's true. No one can take that away from us. Just as no one can give it to us. You can't come along to me and say, "Here, have a moment of total reality, free from suffering." No one can do that for someone else. And no one can take away what we know in our own hearts from our own experience.

I want to end with a short quotation from Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the Russian writer. He's writing about the day of liberation for people being liberated from the prison camps in Russia. It says: "The day of liberation—as if it were possible to liberate anyone who hasn't first become liberated in their own heart. And it's also impossible to impinge on the freedom of anyone who's been liberated in their own heart."

So that's what we're doing—watching the breath and knee pain.

CHAPTER 230

Right Effort

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this comprehensive exploration of balanced effort (viriya), Carol Wilson addresses one of meditation's central paradoxes: how to maintain alert, precise awareness while remaining relaxed and receptive. Drawing from both traditional Buddhist teachings and contemporary examples, she illuminates how genuine interest—rather than forced concentration—naturally gives rise to sustained, joyful effort.
>
> Wilson distinguishes between the focused attention we bring to absorbing activities like watching sports (which is tinged with craving for a payoff) and the non-discriminating awareness of true mindfulness practice. She examines how our habitual tendency to evaluate experiences as interesting or boring, pleasant or unpleasant, creates the very obstacles to balanced effort we struggle against. Through Thich Nhat Hanh's teachings on interconnectedness and the metaphor of roses and garbage, she shows how every moment of experience—no matter how mundane—holds equal potential for awakening.
> The talk introduces spiritual urgency (saṃvega) as a powerful ally when interest flags. Wilson shares personal stories, including her experience during a retreat while her mother was diagnosed with cancer, to illustrate how split attention masquerading as meticulous practice can leave us feeling dry and disconnected. She offers practical guidance for recognizing when effort has become grim pushing rather than wise engagement, and when backing off to cultivate 'seeds of joy' represents skillful means rather than spiritual bypassing. The teaching concludes with the recognition that every moment presents the crossroads between awakening and delusion.

Tonight I want to begin talking about balanced effort or balanced energy. It's a topic that we will all talk about a lot in different ways. Our esteemed associate director Edwin contributed the title, which is "You Don't Pull No Punches, But You Don't Push the River." That's from Van Morrison. So that's what I want to talk about.

In our instructions, both in the hall here and in our interviews, we keep talking about how to have this quality of really relaxed, spacious, open awareness, yet at the same time very precise and alert. We say to summon up tremendous energy to meet each moment, yet at the same time don't do anything. How do we work with this seeming dichotomy, this delicate balance? How do we rest in vivid awakeness, yet at the same time remain very receptive and open, relaxed? Clearly, it's a dance of balance that involves our whole practice, moment to moment. Tonight I want to paint in broad strokes some aspects that help us to discover and cultivate this quality of balanced energy.

I want to focus on two qualities of our experience that can help us over and over to access and recognize this quality of balanced energy: interest and urgency.

When the energy, the sense of effort, is balanced and strong, it quite naturally gives rise to mindfulness—a quality of simply recognizing, connecting with, and knowing what is present. Moment after moment of mindfulness naturally leads to a deepening of concentration. And all of this naturally leads to wisdom. It's a whole series of the way these factors of mind work together. And in a way it really happens by itself. We can't force any of it.

Looking at the quality of energy or effort—the Pali word is viriya, which is variously translated. On one end is heroic, courageous effort. Another way of talking about it is joyous effort, commitment, enthusiasm. It doesn't have to be so intense, but it needs that quality of inner joy and steadiness. A factor of mind that helps us connect naturally with this sense of joyous effort, this enthusiasm, is that of interest. Really awake, alert, connecting with what's arising quite effortlessly and naturally, moment to moment to moment.

Sounds exhausting. Every moment, meeting every moment with this interest, with this kind of joyful alertness—it gets overwhelming even to think about it. It takes so much effort. But that's where it's just the reverse. The interest itself gives rise to spontaneous effort, spontaneous connection that isn't tiring and isn't difficult. And we all have this capacity. It's an experience that we all have quite frequently in our lives.

If you go to a movie, that's an obvious example. But the example I like to use, because I was observing it and to me it was much more intense, is watching friends—mostly male friends, I have to say—watching sports events on TV. Recently, it was the World Cup this summer. A few years ago, I was in San Francisco just at the time of the Super Bowl. That's American football if you're from overseas. I was in San Francisco when the San Francisco team, the 49ers, was playing in the Super Bowl in the old days.

What amazed me, and where I really zeroed in on this quality of interest leading to such a steadiness of energy and focus, was everybody I knew in San Francisco—and I know a lot of people in that area. They shut down their lives for that day. The whole city shut down to watch this game. Big groups would gather. I was watching with a group of ten or fifteen people. There was incredible focus on every moment of everything that happened. And no one said, "Oh, what a chore. I have to focus on this game." It was spontaneous. It was joyful. I honestly can't remember who won. That shows I wasn't really quite that focused. I was more watching the people.

But you see, it's a quality that we all possess in abundance. And when the interest is there, the energy, the effort, the steadiness of focus springs up quite naturally. It's not a problem.

Now there is one drawback to what I call Super Bowl mind. It's not truly mindful because it's slightly tinged with a certain quality of craving or desire. There's a payoff that holds the interest. And even when someone says, "Well, I don't care who wins, but I'm watching the artistry of the game"—that's still a payoff. Because if it were just a bunch of schlemiels bumbling around on the field, nobody would be so interested. It has to be a certain level of artistry that gives one that experience of pleasure.

So this isn't wise effort in terms of our practice. It's energy leading to effort that stays interested because it's getting a certain payoff, something we want. Things are going the way we want them to, or we're getting this certain experience of pleasure.

But how come we can't bring this same quality of spontaneous focus to our life, to what's going on here? You'd think our life would be at least as interesting as a football game. But we bring in the same tendencies, the same blindnesses to our life outside of here, to our day-to-day, hour-to-hour, moment-to-moment life here that we bring to sports or anything else. Some experiences, yes, there's this natural interest and the energy's balanced and we're present. And some experiences don't quite make the grade. We're bringing in our same filters.

The ones we've spoken about so much before—they're not new information. Judging pleasant as good and desirable, unpleasant as not wanting to be with it. Or maybe just something's intense enough to hold our interest. But when it's just sort of mundane or not really intense, somehow that interest tends to fall away.

Often people will say in interviews, "Oh, nothing's happening." What do you mean nothing's happening? You sit and nothing happens? "No, well, it's calm. And nothing—well, there's sounds, there's sensations, there's emotions, there's thoughts, but nothing very interesting about it. It's not very intense." That's not nothing happening. That's a lot happening.

It's as if we think the interest is somehow inherent in what's happening, in the appearance, in the arising object. And some things have it and some things don't. But that's not it at all. The interest comes from within our own experience. As you can see for yourself, sometimes the breath is just the most boring thing you could imagine. And three sittings later, it's just so fascinating, incredible. Do you think the breath is really that different? Probably not. But the quality of interest has led into an energy and effort that leads to mindfulness that really connects.

This tendency in all the different ways that it's manifest in our experience—to evaluate what happens, to accept some experiences, to reject others, to be interested in some, to cringe away from others, to ignore others altogether—that's one of the tendencies we keep looking at over and over because it's so insidious. It is often so unconscious and it surfaces in different and more subtle ways as we continue to explore our experience.

That's the power of the mindfulness that we're practicing and this quality of interest that we can cultivate: it's non-discriminating. It's not picking and choosing which experiences to pay attention to, which experiences are worthwhile, which are worthy of our interest, and which are not. Because when we're picking and choosing, what do we know? The basis on which we're picking and choosing comes from such limitation—from such views and opinions and limiting of our world. Everything's interconnected in ways that we can't even imagine. And sometimes the experience that we find the most mundane or the least interesting, just that one is the potential for opening to a real awakening insight. We can't know how things link together, how things interconnect.

Thich Nhat Hanh says that good and bad are only an idea of the mind. They have no ultimate reality. On this level of meeting whatever arises with interest, with mindfulness, that's true. Evaluating as good and bad is only an idea of the mind, no ultimate reality. That's not to say what Joseph was talking about last night—some experiences are wholesome, they lead to more peace and freedom; some are unwholesome, they contribute to suffering. On another level, that's also true.

As Shunryu Suzuki says, there's no such thing as right and wrong. But right is right and wrong is wrong. That's how it works.

On the level of our moment-to-moment experience, though—of what's worth paying attention to—there's no distinction. Every moment of experience, every arising appearance is totally worth being interested in, paying attention to. Because in that moment, that's the expression of our life. It's the manifestation of truth. There's nowhere else we can go to discover truth but in that arising appearance at that moment.

I like the way Thich Nhat Hanh writes and talks about how we can't rationally separate experience into "this is good" and "this is bad," "this is worthwhile" and "this isn't"—because everything leads into everything else. If you've read him at all, I'm sure you've encountered the way he can take anything—an empty plate, for instance—and by looking deeply into it, with some reflection, discover whole realms of meaning. This is reflection, not direct sense perception in the moment, except if it's a thought.

But in looking at that empty plate, we can have it as a symbol of the finishing of your meal, an experience of gratitude and appreciation for all the cooks who prepared it, for all the farmers who grew the food, for the animals that helped cultivate it, for the people who transported it. And then also a sense of sadness at the fact that many people didn't get to eat anything today. A sense of connection with that. A realization of how many people in the world are dying of starvation at this moment as we sit here.

And realizing that interconnectedness, realizing also how hard it might be to open to it—our sense of guilt, because one moment we're recognizing our interconnectedness with starving people, and the next moment we're moaning to ourselves because there are no seconds, or wishing we had a cookie. Just seeing all the play of the mind, and not trying, in terms of mindfulness or interest, to say this one's okay and this one shouldn't be happening. They're all happening all together. You can't separate it out.

Again, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, we tend to value a rose and not pay much attention to garbage. But a rose will die and we dump it in the garbage. It becomes garbage. And then we take the garbage and put it into compost and spread it on the flower bed, and it turns into a rose.

It's the same in our meditation here. That moment you felt so guilty about—feeling like, "I don't care if people are starving, I really want another Snickers"—that might be the moment that opens us up to some real understanding of ourselves, some real sense of freedom, of disidentification, of not identifying yourself with thought at that moment, of seeing that it all comes and goes. You can't reject anything.

In the space of open, non-discriminating awareness, no experience is more or less interesting or more or less worth our total presence.

Sometimes, as we begin to discover this interrelatedness, it might feel like a lot of shadow stuff, a lot of hard things to be with, a lot of difficult experience—or even more, a lot of just really mundane, not very interesting experience at all. But this balance of perception, this seeing of interrelatedness, can come about partly through reflection. What I was describing with Thich Nhat Hanh is really reflection. Yet through our interested meeting of experience moment to moment, we begin to perceive things in that way quite naturally, without reflection. It's the natural perception of how things are.

A poem that reflects this, by a Japanese woman poet named Izumi Shikibu from the imperial court around the tenth century:

Although the wind blows terribly here,
the moonlight also leaks between the roof planks
of this ruined house.

To me, that really feels like practice. The moon also leaks between the roof planks of this ruined house. That's how my mind feels a lot—like a ruined house. And somehow the moon manages to leak through when we're willing to be with the ruined house.

When there's that quality of non-discriminating interest, the energy, the effort, the willingness to be present with mindfulness is effortless. It's balanced. The trick, of course, is how to sustain this quality of interest without the payoff—without thinking, "Okay, I'll be interested for a certain amount of time, but then something big needs to happen to keep me interested." How do we sustain this quality without the payoff? It's not simple.

One tool—and it's only one tool among many—is this quality of spiritual urgency. I've found it tremendously useful both in times of difficulty, when the mind just wants to cringe away from what's going on, and maybe even more so in those times of seemingly endless mundane experience. The times when you're asking yourself, "Why am I doing this? What possible relationship does the sensation in my big toe when I lift my foot have to anything that matters in my life? What am I doing this for?"

I hit that point around the second or third week of every retreat I do. At some point, it just eludes me—what I'm doing and why.

This quality of spiritual urgency is very profound and very strong. It comes about from really opening to the suffering aspect of our lives, of the world. Not drowning in it, but really opening our eyes, opening our hearts, looking around us, looking inside us.

This quality of spiritual urgency sort of wakes us up to the point where we see the confusion, the pain, the suffering in our own experience—the unsatisfactoriness, the inevitability of death and sickness. So at some point, and over and over again, the urgency to understand, to be free from confusion, to be helpful to other beings, whatever form it takes for you—at some point that becomes more important than hanging out in our comfort zone, more important than living a life of denial. Which actually feels like a comfort zone, but it's not comfortable at all. We're just not really looking at it.

At times this quality of spiritual urgency can be called up consciously. At other times it arises quite spontaneously simply by opening our eyes and looking around.

When we don't have spiritual urgency, when we're just going through the motions of practice without that sense of interest which urgency can inspire—even though your practice might seem really right on, very meticulous, meeting all the requirements, really putting in a lot of effort—it's sort of meeting an outside model. Whether it's the model of how things should look or the model in your own mind, the motivation is trying to match some expectation you have, or you think someone else has, rather than arising from inner urgency, from inner interest in your own heart. It doesn't quite work. You can practice in a meticulous way and it gets drier and tougher, and you're dragging along. It can be torturous. And you can't quite figure out what's going on, what's missing, because it seems like you're doing everything just right.

I had an experience of this. A few years ago, I came here to sit a two-month retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita. I was really up for it. But the day before the retreat, I talked to my mother, and she told me she'd just found out she had cancer—breast cancer and uterine cancer both—and was going to have an operation within the week. She refused to let me come home. "No, no, you must do your retreat. I don't want you to come home." She got really adamant about it, which isn't like her.

So I came and did the retreat. I would call home every day, and things were going fine. It wasn't an emergency operation or anything; she was doing fine. And I was practicing extremely meticulously. I was noting every moment. I thought I was really present. But it was getting drier and deader. It just felt like sawdust. It felt like I was dragging myself through it. Yet I thought my effort was really right there, really present.

I didn't quite wake up to what was going on until one day, after about three weeks. I always used to walk in the same place in the hall in the Catskills. I was walking up the stairs to my walking place, and the thought came—it was more than a thought, it was like a real conviction: "If somebody's walking there, I'm leaving the retreat. That's it." And I meant it. That's what was scary. I really hoped somebody was walking there. Of course nobody was.

That sort of woke me up. I thought, "What's going on here? What's the story?" Because that wasn't just a moment of aversion. That was a deep-seated response to the quality of energy, of effort, that was going on. What was happening was I wasn't really wholeheartedly present in my energy, in my effort. It looked like it—it even looked like it to me. I was meeting the form which I knew from the past, trying to meet my expectations of what it's supposed to be like. I could do it and I thought I meant it. But somehow—and this is strange because you'd think the quality of urgency would be stronger given what was going on—basically what was happening was that my mind, my interest, was split.

I wasn't using the fact of my mother's sickness to bring up urgency and put that urgency into my practice. I was just splitting my attention, worried about my mother and not wholeheartedly present, moment to moment. So I could put on a good show for myself, but it was all sort of directed outward. That inner spring of urgency and interest wasn't there.

We can carry it so far and really feel like it's balanced effort, but at some point that's just not going to hold. We just can't keep doing it. It withers the heart.

On the other hand, when the energy, the interest is present and balanced, it in itself —if you need a payoff—becomes the payoff in itself. Because the times that I felt most connected and balanced and present and really joyful in practice didn't have anything to do with what was actually happening, whether it was pleasant or unpleasant or incredibly intense and insightful or just everyday stuff. But this quality of real, alive connectedness had everything to do with that balanced energy and effort that was wholeheartedly present, meeting what was happening moment to moment to moment, without evaluation, without resistance.

In itself, when the effort, the energy is in that balanced groove, whatever's happening isn't a problem. The interest is there, and that's enough. That carries us.

I want to read this from Krishnamurti, a way of talking about this quality of wholehearted interest and attention:

"When you look totally, you will give your whole attention, your whole being, everything of yourself—your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment. And then there is no room for fear, no room for contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

Can we attend to whatever's arising with complete self-abandonment? Our nerves, our ears, our eyes, everything of ourselves. That's the quality of really alert, interested energy that isn't looking for something special to happen. In that space, the urgency is there. We don't need to reflect on it. We don't need to look for it. Things are in balance.

Without this wholeheartedness, the energy flags. If things are difficult, there's that tendency for the mind to fall back, cringe away, shrink down. In fact, remember Joseph was talking last night about how we can confuse sloth with compassion. And really, sloth is sort of like an absence of energy.

In moments when the energy, the effort is strong and balanced, you can experience what it's like. The mind is bright, it's clear and interested. Energy has the quality of patience, of being willing to be with suffering or difficulty without that cringing back.

Because that is the tendency of the mind when there's no energy—when something difficult comes, we're like, "Oh no, let me not feel this." And if there's too much difficulty, one after the other after the other without energy, we just wither down, like a sopping twisted towel or something. "I just can't be with this anymore."

Energy—and this is from Sayadaw U Pandita again—is a support in the mind, sort of like the support of a house. It supports the mind to stop flinching away from what is unpleasant, to open and be bright and meet it again with this quality of interest and presence.

So you can see why that first initial shrinking back, if we say, "Oh no, I must be kind to myself, this is really the way to balance, they say when it's difficult we need to pull back"—which is true sometimes, and I'll say that later—but this shrinking back is a sign. I think that's what Trungpa called idiot compassion. Don't take the first sign of shrinking back as necessarily the sign that you need to pull back altogether, because that's just the natural response of the mind to something unpleasant. If there's interest, if there's energy, that will be a support where we can come back and meet it again.

As you see, energy isn't static. Certainly not. It's a quality that comes and goes. It's also something that we can easily identify with. So when it comes, "I'm doing really well now." And when it drops, "Somehow I've blown it. Big mistake. I've got to fix it somehow." This can lead to our tipping out of balance more either way—the cringing back and giving up, or, and this I would say happens even more, at least with most of the people I talk to: the energy drops, "It's my fault, I need to therefore push and push harder," and things still aren't the way I want them to be, so I push even harder.

And it's not actually interest or mindfulness or wise effort. It's totally trying to make things be a certain way. It's desire or expectation masquerading as wise effort. Except the effect isn't one of bright, alert interest. It's one of frustration, self-judgment, tightness, more tightness, more heaviness, more grimness—until we're just really tied in a knot.

It can be very subtle. Sometimes it's incredibly blatant, and sometimes it's very subtle—the way that we think we're meeting what's arising with interest. But if you look at the underlying intention, it's "I'll meet this in order for it to open up, in order for things to start flowing again, in order for that bright interest to come back"—a long, long list of whatever we're hoping for.

In either case, it can lead to that kind of loss of interest that just makes us say, "Who cares?" Back to that place of "I don't care what happens. I lift my foot. I put my foot down. I feel tingling. I feel pressure. So what?"

This is the time to open our hearts and minds to this quality of spiritual urgency. Now, urgency is not panic. It's not fear and desperation. But again, it's getting in touch with that motivation for why we came to this retreat, for why we're engaged in a spiritual practice—the urgency of that. Getting in touch with that motivation where opening to truth is more important than anything else in our life at that moment. It encompasses everything in our life. It doesn't shut something out.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said—I'm paraphrasing—something along the lines of: if you deeply want to be free, to understand your true nature, you will be. But you must be honest with yourself and really want nothing else. That's the quality of spiritual urgency. It gives courage. It gives interest. It gives this motivation and willingness to meet and explore and investigate whatever particular experience is getting thrown up at us. It gives us the courage and the interest to come out of denial, over and over and over.

And we don't really have to sit and ruminate about it. All we have to do is open up our eyes, our ears, our hearts. Just pay attention to our experience for any short period of time without that evaluating and pushing things away. And the truth of impermanence, of the unsatisfactoriness of things, of the suffering that's within and around us—we can't escape it. We might want to. That's the denial we're coming out of.

This is from Chinul, who is kind of the father of Korean Zen. He says: "The world is blazing in torments as if it were a house on fire. How can you bear to linger here and complacently undergo such long suffering? If you wish to avoid suffering, there's no better way than to seek Buddhahood." He goes on to say, though: "Understand that the Buddha is the mind. People do not recognize that their own minds are the true Buddha. They want to search for the Buddha, yet they will not observe their own minds."

It's a strong statement, but to me it encapsulates this quality of urgency. When urgency is awakened, there's no problem paying attention. We don't have to look for interest. It comes naturally.

One of my teachers uses the same metaphor of the house on fire—the Buddha used this one also. My teacher says, if you were somewhere and someone came and told you that your house was on fire, you'd immediately start going home. And if on the way you ran into a friend you hadn't seen for a long time, you wouldn't say, "Oh, let's stop and have a cappuccino. There's this nice little place open." You don't have to stop and ponder, "Well, should I? It would be nice."

I haven't had cappuccino for a while. No. You don't stop, and it doesn't even arise as a possibility. You just say, "Sorry, the house is on fire, I'm going home." That's the energy, the one-pointed interest that comes from urgency.

Our house is on fire. And we are home. So it would behoove us to wake up and pay attention—to discover what the fire is and how we can quench the flames. That's our practice. And we're not going to discover it by shutting our eyes, putting on some nice music, and pretending it'll just go away. It won't just go away.

This doesn't mean we have to get lost in despair. As with everything, there's a balance. But we do need to wake up, and all we have to do is keep paying attention. When we have that urgency, when we're confronted face to face with the fact that our house is on fire, the interest, the energy, the mindfulness, the understanding comes quite without effort.

I'll give you an example because it really shows how the understanding comes from that sense of awakeness, from urgency—not from the situation itself. I don't know if you saw a couple of years ago on Bill Moyers's special where he was exploring different approaches to working with the mind. One segment featured Jon Kabat-Zinn's stress reduction course in Worcester—the profound effects it has on people who are sent there after coming to the end of what formal medicine can do for them. They're all either in extreme chronic pain, living with life-threatening illnesses, suffering daily migraine headaches, whatever it might be. And simple mindfulness practice—they only come once a week and do a forty-five-minute tape of mindfulness every day, that's all—has these profound effects.

Well, ten years ago, when I was managing here, myself and my co-manager and another dear friend who was cooking here—actually it was during a course with Sayadaw U Pandita, the one Joseph talked about, where the whole atmosphere was very tense. As tense as it was for the yogis, I want you to know that for the staff, it was ten times more intense. It was a difficult time. So we picked this time to go as interns to the stress reduction course, which meant the three of us would drive in and take the course, doing everything the participants do, then talk a little bit about it afterward. We would fly in in the morning—it's an hour's drive—do the course, fly home, then do a staff meeting all afternoon. It was on that day.

These people in the course, within three weeks they're reporting experiences like, "I had a migraine every day for six years and now I haven't had one for two weeks." All kinds of amazing things, really profound openings, understanding their lives in entirely new ways. We, meanwhile, would fall asleep during the meditations. Literally. I remember my friends snoring on the floor. We'd be looking at our watches. We'd go flying home through traffic and come back at least half the time with splitting headaches.

We'd move into the staff meeting just thinking, "Please, let me out of this meeting." It was stressing us out enormously. And we definitely went in with a little cockiness—well, we know this mindfulness gig, you know.

It was really interesting. We would try to do the meditations at home, just as instructed. The first couple of weeks you lie down and do a kind of mindful moving through your body, starting at your feet. I don't think I ever got higher than my knee without falling asleep the entire time. And it was the same with both of my friends. I mean, it was really pathetic. As the weeks went on—eight weeks—there were profound changes in these people, because they had a real urgency. The truth of things was hitting them. They couldn't avoid it. And it led to a natural effort, exploration, and wisdom. We were just in basic, arrogant denial. I actually learned more about it later as I've reflected on it.

What I'm sharing now comes from truly seeing how easy it is to be complacent, to take things for granted, to think, "Well, we've looked at suffering. We've looked at dukkha. We're meeting it every day." Yes, we're meeting it every day, but are we actually looking at it? Are we actually opening to it? That's another question altogether. It's so easy to be complacent.

After my mother had cancer that time, after I kind of woke up finally in my practice, it really did inspire a sense of urgency—a deep opening to all of our impermanence and death, a real kind of cellular experience of dying. And then she got better. She's been fine for five years. And complacency rises. "Oh yeah, my mom's fine. I'm fine. Everything's fine. There's no problem."

It's hard to stay open to the unsatisfactory nature, to the fact that our house is on fire. But it's worth it. The freedom, the real connectedness that comes out of it, the real aliveness—it's worth it, rather than living kind of shut off and dead and denying.

So we can use anything. Just notice what's happening. God knows, just pay attention through the sittings and walkings in the day. You don't have to look any further. Notice how you're meeting the difficult and unpleasant. Is it a mistake? Is it something to get rid of? Or is it an inspiration of saying, "Yes, this is how this life is. Do I want to just keep wandering in samsara? Or do I want to explore what's happening in order to wake up?"

We can just use nature. All the chipmunks squashed on the road—there are a lot of chipmunks this year. We've all been talking about it. It just seems like we can't even drive down the driveway without six chipmunks darting out. It's really quite tricky.

Or when I go to my doctor at UMass, I really like going because it's a big teaching hospital. There are so many people I have to pass in so many stages—children with chronic diseases, a lot of old people seeming kind of bewildered and confused, lots of fear in people's faces. Sometimes there's a real spark of beauty and love as somebody connects or sees the fear and reaches out. It's a very alive time for me. I really use it to wake up to the fact that there's nothing to be complacent about.

What am I waiting for to pay attention? Am I waiting till something really horrible happens again? Or am I waiting for something that's interesting enough to be worth paying attention to? The mundane is just fine. We can wake up with that as well as with anything.

The difficult experiences you go through here—it doesn't have to be life-threatening angst. It can be the frustration of pushing too hard. That can be enormous suffering when we don't see what's going on. Any kind of just overwhelming suffering, that is a great time to see what's really going on and let the urgency come up.

Someone today, in an interview, expressed this really beautifully. It really touched me. She'd been going through a very difficult time, to the point that all of us reach at times where it just feels like, "I don't know if I can handle this." That does happen. And she was at the lake looking at the leaves kind of drifting here and there in the water. And just thinking, "Do I want to live like that? Just tossed back and forth, back and forth?" The answer was clearly, no, I don't. It doesn't make everything okay.

It doesn't make the suffering go away. It doesn't bring clear bliss. All the suffering is still there. But that sense of "No, I don't want to live that way"—it's worth coming back and being with this. Paying attention. In fact, you don't even have to go that far. The attention, the interest, the urgency just arises naturally. And there's the energy again to meet what's happening for another moment. For another moment. And we only have to take it one moment at a time.

We don't have to think, "Oh no, this and three more days of this—it's unbearable." That might be in your mind, but it's only this. It's only this moment. We have no idea what's going to happen in the next moment. Sometimes the most difficult moments, when we've just thought, "I've had it. This is it. I cannot face another moment of this"—and then we face the next moment. And you never know, that can be the transformative moment where we really just open to something much greater and more profound than our fear and aversion of the difficult. Sometimes the most difficult moments are the moments of our awakening.

I want to read a poem from one of the women who was a nun with the Buddha at the time of the Buddha. This is from a book of different poems from those women. Her name was Sama, and it said that for twenty-five years her mind was always distracted while meditating. Two weeks isn't so hard, folks. And she was a nun, mind you, so she wasn't doing much else.

So this is her poem:

It was twenty-five years since I turned away from home and I hadn't had a moment's peace. I had no peace because I didn't know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Conqueror—that's the Buddha—Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died.

That's a way they have of talking about awakening, saying "I've finished with craving, seventh day." Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert.

So it took her twenty-five years. Maybe it won't take us so long to realize that we can be alert no matter what's going on. And again, this alertness, this energy that comes from urgency—it's a balanced quality of connection and effort. Not desperation, not fear, not panic. When we're meeting difficult or not difficult experience in this balanced way, it naturally leads to the balanced perception where the difficult opens also into the sublime. And that's why we don't despair. That's what lets us have the energy to come back and meet the next difficult experience.

But sometimes we can tip out of balance and really feel that we're drowning in despair. We feel we're really open to the fact that our house is on fire and we see no way out, and it just feels like we really can't bear it. That's when the energy is beginning to tip out of balance.

This is from Anna Akhmatova, the Russian poet, written in 1921, just at the height of all the terrors and starvation and war of the Russian Revolution:

Everything is plundered, betrayed, sold. Death's great black wing scrapes the air. Misery gnaws to the bone. Why then do we not despair? By day, from the surrounding woods, cherries blow summer into town. At night, the deep transparent skies glitter with new galaxies. And the miraculous comes so close to the ruined, dirty houses. Something not known to anyone at all, but wild in our breast for centuries.

That's why we don't despair. But sometimes we lose sight of the miraculous coming close to our dirty houses.

And we do despair. We can feel like we're falling into a great black hole or drowning in suffering—whatever the suffering, whatever the experience. Or we turn it into that kind of effort that's pushing, pushing, pushing, and then blaming ourselves because things aren't the way we think they should be, and the only remedy must certainly be to try harder, to make things be a certain way. Again, subtly mistaking balanced effort for wanting things to change.

This, at the point of despair, is being overwhelmed perhaps by the strength and intensity and ongoing nature of suffering—whether it's terror or grief or this tight, tight pushing, or fear or sadness. It doesn't matter what it is. But when it's more than mindfulness can meet, more than there can be a balance of perception, then our mind and heart really do wither. We really do tip off into a genuinely unbalanced quality of presence, quality of effort, and we can just get really lost.

Again, this is the place where it's not just that cringing back of sloth, but where it's truly skillful means to pull back a little from what's happening. Because in our trying to meet what's happening with what we think is wise effort, we're getting tighter and more forceful and grimmer and heavier. And I want to make this clear: grimness is not equivalent to wise effort. The grimmer you are doesn't mean the more mindful you are or the better you're doing. Sometimes—I swear—people really ask, "Is it allowed to smile?" It is allowed to smile. It helps a lot sometimes to smile.

So if you find yourself falling into that pushing, or even worse, feeling like you're drowning in a swirl of pain and confusion, that is the time when balance means backing off. Instead of trying to drill a hole through that experience, instead of trying to meet it by God with openness—just listen to the tone of that note—it's skillful to back off, to turn the attention elsewhere.

Bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy. Seeing that maybe you're not noticing the balance of perception, you can deliberately bring it up. For me, sometimes when I'm walking up in the castle, I'll just go stay on the fire escape on the second floor and look at the sky and the trees. Just open up to seeing, to hearing, to nature. It brings a spaciousness to the heart, to the mind, to the consciousness. See what it is for you. It might be just sitting and opening to hearing. It might mean going down and sitting by the lake. It might mean reading an inspiring passage. Whatever brings up seeds of joy.

This is not cheating. It's not giving in. It's not being a wimp. And when you're in that pushing phase and judging it, you're not going to be able to trust whatever evaluation you make of your practice. At that point the thought will come up, "Maybe I should back off, open to hearing," and immediately you'll think, "No way. That's just giving in. That's just being a coward. That's just sloth. That's just idiot compassion." You can't trust the evaluations when you're caught in judgment.

So just look: if there's no mindfulness, if you're withering your heart, withering your mind, turn the attention somewhere else. Bring up seeds of joy. Take a walk. Do whatever helps bring a sense of spaciousness and happiness into your experience. Maybe it's doing loving-kindness practice. Whatever it is for you. This is skillful means. This is how to balance. And again, once there's that sense of openness, of spaciousness—even just that much—then the reconnection can come again. The natural interest and sense of urgency can arise, and we can come back and maybe meet that difficulty just for a moment in a more balanced, open way.

So those are broad strokes of this balance of energy that we work with moment to moment to moment. It's an ongoing dance. It's never static. We never get to "Okay, this is it. Now I can forget about it and coast." Sorry.

Let me end with a quotation from Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche: "Those who recognize their true nature are enlightened. Those who ignore or overlook it are deluded. This recognition is the borderline between Buddhas and beings, and this recognition is the great crossroads at which we find ourselves every moment of our lives."

Every moment. It doesn't have to be daunting—it's a wonderful opportunity. Every moment is the crossroads between recognizing our true nature or not.

So, let's sit for a few moments.

CHAPTER 231

Adverse Circumstances Become The Path

Carol Wilson · 54 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines how we can transform adverse circumstances from obstacles into vital components of our spiritual path. Drawing inspiration from Tibetan teacher Namkhai Norbu's phrase "turning adverse circumstances into the path," she begins by reflecting on the preciousness of human birth—a teaching found across Buddhist traditions—noting how witnessing poverty in places like South Africa and India deepens appreciation for the conditions that make practice possible: basic health, access to the Dhamma, genuine interest in awakening, and sufficient leisure time.

Wilson explores the Buddha's First Noble Truth of dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) and the Second Noble Truth identifying taṇhā (craving) as its cause. She clarifies that in Pāli, there are distinct words for different types of desire—taṇhā as thirst or craving that causes suffering, neutral desire for basic needs, and dhamma-chanda, the wholesome yearning for understanding that drives practice. Through vivid personal examples, including her challenging time as a Buddhist nun in Thailand, she demonstrates how our habitual movement toward pleasant experience and away from unpleasant experience creates suffering beyond the actual circumstances.

The practical heart of this teaching lies in attitude transformation. Rather than fighting difficult experiences, Wilson invites us to bring compassionate, non-judging attention to whatever arises. She distinguishes this from passive acceptance, emphasizing that clear seeing enables appropriate action. She also validates skillful avoidance when situations are genuinely overwhelming, encouraging practitioners to find the delicate balance between opening to difficulty and knowing when to back off. Quoting both Nisargadatta Maharaj and Ajahn Chah, she illuminates how suffering can ripen either as confusion or as the search for liberation—the difference lies entirely in our willingness to be present.

Tonight what I want to talk about comes from a phrase I read in a book by a Tibetan master, Namkhai Norbu: turning adverse circumstances into the path. This phrase has stayed with me deeply, and I use it often in my practice. I'd like to share some thoughts about working with this teaching.

The first thing that comes to mind is that in working with adverse circumstances, the most helpful thing for me has been a strong sense of commitment to my path—to the possibility of our human potential for awakening. I want to share something that strengthens this commitment in me, something that makes me reflect and renew my dedication.

When I travel in third world countries, which I have occasion to do from time to time, this commitment becomes vivid. This past year I spent some time in South Africa, which presents a unique situation: the white people live very well, much as we do, while the black people live in truly poor, third world conditions in some of the Zulu villages. It's much the same as being in India. Seeing the conditions people live in—real poverty, near starvation, grinding work just to survive—brings to mind another Tibetan reflection on the preciousness of human birth. Or more particularly for me, the preciousness of the particular human birth I have this time around.

There are certain conditions essential for being able to practice, and I often take them for granted without even examining them. So part of this work is appreciating my circumstances.

Some of these conditions include, first, a certain degree of health. All of us in this room, whatever our physical condition, at least have enough health that we can give some of our energy, our time, to understanding what our life is about—not the near-starvation conditions where all one can do is struggle to survive. It's really appreciating that.

We're also alive at a time when the Dharma, the Buddha Dharma, is alive in the world. In terms of Buddhist cosmology, there are times when these teachings aren't present in the world, and we would each have to discover the path entirely for ourselves. While we each must discover our own truth, at least we have teachers, texts to read, people we can sit with, others to inspire us. This is a great gift, one easy for me to take for granted, knowing as I do so many people interested in practice, in awakening, whatever form their practice takes. But it's a rare opportunity in life.

Another condition is that we're all actually interested in waking up, in hearing the Dharma. This might seem obvious, but not everyone is blessed with interest, even when there's opportunity. I've spent considerable time in Bodh Gaya in India, a Buddhist pilgrimage site because it's the place where the Buddha was supposedly enlightened. Many pilgrims come, but also many inspiring teachers of all the different Buddhist lineages—Zen, Tibetan, Theravada—and Hindu teachers as well come to Bodh Gaya.

We go there and visit, and we meet people. There's a family that runs a particular chai shop, a tea shop where everyone hangs out. There's nothing to do in Bodh Gaya but go to the Bodhi tree and go to the chai shop—and somehow those two things fill the entire day. The family is lovely, and they live there. They work hard but have leisure time. They're healthy. They're simply not interested. It's not where their attention goes. This makes me appreciate that I have this interest, that I'm willing and able to hear.

And then there's the fact that I have enough leisure time and the willingness to put the teachings into practice—that I don't have to work so hard at a subsistence level that there's not a spare moment in my life. Literally, many people in poverty-stricken conditions live this way. If you read City of Joy about Calcutta, it describes rickshaw pullers, men who pull rickshaws carrying passengers. They literally work every moment of the day just to earn enough money to buy food for that day. There's no way someone like that could have time to investigate the meaning of life the way we can.

When I reflect on these blessings in my life—and in all of our lives to some degree, or we couldn't be here—it wakes me up to a deep sense of urgency, of commitment. I start thinking: I have all these gifts. What do I really want from my life? What is my real purpose? What do I want to commit my time and energy to? How do I not lose sight of it?

As human beings, we have the potential to wake up, to know really deep peace, to come to freedom from this to-ing and fro-ing, this restless agitation of the mind. Sometimes it's almost frightening to really connect with this possibility in oneself, to truly commit to it. It's almost as if I think, "Well, yes, the Buddha could do that, or some Tibetan lama who lives in a cave, but not an ordinary person like me"—almost as if afraid I'm not good enough. To really, honestly get in touch with my purpose, my potential, is to acknowledge that I can awaken.

If I honestly commit myself to that, then I'll just spend the rest of my life being disappointed when I find out that I can't do it.

Again, a reflection that really helps me a lot is to remember that the Buddha was a human being, not a God. You can say, well, he was a really special human being, different from us. Anyone else who awakens is different from us. It's impossible. That thought holds us back. That thought is what limits us and keeps us from actually being willing to commit—only in this moment. Can I commit to really being present in this moment?

So the reflection that the Buddha was a human being, and we as human beings all have the same potential, can help me in times when I feel constricted by my fears. When you read some of the discourses of the Buddha, he often said, "If it were not possible, I would not ask you to do this." And from what I've read of what the Buddha said, or what comes down to us that he said, he didn't say things just off the top of his head. He really said what he meant. And that's quite inspiring to me. Whenever it's something really hard: if it wasn't possible, I wouldn't ask you to do it. Again, it helps me to connect with what is my real purpose, and am I willing to commit myself to it.

Another fear that sometimes comes up in talking with people is the fear of really getting in touch with our desire, so to speak, to be free, to awaken. There's almost a fear just of that word—the fear of desire. Because the more we practice and study this meditation, and what the Buddha said in his Four Noble Truths, is that desire is the cause of suffering, right? And we can certainly experience that moment to moment. So there's this hesitation: well, what am I doing awakening another desire? There's something off about that.

Something I've found very interesting—I've been studying Pali a little bit, which is the language that the earliest Buddhist texts we still have are written in. In Pali, there are three different words that can all be loosely translated as "desire" in English. One of them is the word that more specifically we could translate as craving: tanha. And that's the one that is really referred to as the cause of suffering. It's that needing, grasping, "I've got to have"—the mind going out and clinging to something, whether it's an apple or anything. It doesn't matter what you're clinging to. This thirst, really—that's another translation of it. That's the cause of suffering.

There's another word that denotes a neutral desire, you could say. You're sitting, you know you're hungry, and there's the desire to eat. Not craving, not "I've got to have a certain food"—just to know: I need to eat now. I need to sleep now. I need to go to the bathroom. It's not a huge thirst.

And then there's another word that our rough translation would be "Dharma desire." What that really is, is this impetus, this yearning for understanding—for understanding our true self. In some way, if we didn't all have it, we wouldn't practice. It's what drives us. And this is hard. We wouldn't just be sitting here on our bottoms for two days, going through all this, if there wasn't some desire or yearning driving us. And it doesn't have to be negative. It doesn't have to lead to suffering.

This is a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj, from a whole different lineage—a Hindu Vedanta master—that speaks to this: "The desire to find the truth will be surely fulfilled, providing you want nothing else. But you must be honest with yourself and really want nothing else."

I think on a moment-to-moment basis—not that every moment of our lives we never want anything else—but that quality of wanting to understand, to be free, that level of commitment is what, as human beings, enables us to heal from our perceived sense of separation and isolation. I mean, it's not a reality anyway, but it's our perception. And this deep commitment of our hearts, of our energy, is what allows us to awaken—if we are willing to give our hearts, our minds, to this quest, this journey.

To me, that means not to be afraid to commit myself inwardly. Over and over. It doesn't mean I commit myself and then from now on, every moment, I'm incredibly present and mindful. It means I'm willing to commit myself again in two minutes when I've spaced out or blown it or done something really stupid. That's okay.

I feel that this sense of deep inner commitment—and it can deepen and deepen—this is what can really serve to inspire us, or at least sustain us and uphold us on our path when we hit difficult times. In other words, when we hit seeming obstacles. Which is all the time—a lot. As you've no doubt observed, it's our tendency.

It seems to be the inbred tendency of our human minds, at least our deep, deep conditioning, that we perceive or interpret difficult situations that arise—whether it's a pain or a really difficult situation in our life—as obstacles. This is something that's in the way. It's either in the way of my being happy, in the way of my getting what I want, or in the context of our growth in understanding, it's in the way of my awakening.

So as long as I have this sickness, which keeps me from sitting cross-legged and doing this and that, and keeps me tired—that means it's in the way. When I get rid of it, then I can really practice in the right way. There's some ideal of what right practice looks like, and this is keeping me from it. It's an obstacle to be gotten rid of. The same goes for as long as I have this tiring, boring job that takes all my energy—I can't possibly give any energy to awakening. As long as I'm in this difficult, conflictual family situation, how can I possibly work to come to peace and harmony when I'm arguing with my relatives all the time? Substitute anything. It's our natural tendency to interpret this as wrong, something to get rid of, and then I can really begin to commit myself to practice.

Flipping it around, when we have a sense of commitment to investigate, we begin to see and learn that these so-called obstacles are not just something we can put up with. They actually can become part of our path, a very intrinsic and helpful part of our growth in understanding and awakening. We grow because of these difficult situations, not in spite of them.

There's something I like in the Buddhist cosmology, which talks about all these different realms of existence. It doesn't matter whether one believes it's literally true or not, but what I appreciate is how it describes why human birth is so precious and how obstacles can be helpful. They say that in the human realm—which on a level of thirty-three is about six up from the bottom, and it gets nicer the higher you go—there's enough suffering that we can use it to wake up. It's not, for most of us, so much suffering that we're completely crushed and overwhelmed. Though for some people in this world, it is too much. And in the higher realms, it gets so pleasant that there's not enough impetus to investigate. You just kind of groove and hang out in these really nice sensual realms or formless realms, whatever. So the human realm is supposedly the perfect balance of pleasure and willingness to investigate, with enough pain to keep giving us a jolt to wake up. Take that for what it's worth.

So how does one go about working with this, turning adverse circumstances into the path? How does it work? There are many things to say about it. I'm just going to offer some thoughts.

I feel deeply from my own experience that it comes down, really very simply, to our attitude toward this difficult situation—or pleasant situation as well. The pleasant ones we don't tend to fight so much when they arise. The Buddha, in his first discourse after he was completely awakened, talked about four truths of our life in this world, truths whose deep knowing would liberate the mind. The first truth was that there is unsatisfactoriness—sometimes translated as suffering, but more accurately unsatisfactoriness. He was speaking not only of the actual and obvious difficult situations—the painful, the emotional, the grief, the outward difficulty—but also the sense of unsatisfactoriness and pain that comes from pleasant situations that are continually ending. Which is everything. Everything is continually ending. And the cause of our suffering is not just that there's pain and pleasure; the second truth tells us the cause of suffering is this thirst, this clinging of the mind toward the pleasant and away from the unpleasant.

I used to think about this first truth—that there's unsatisfactoriness—and wonder, why did he have to proclaim that as a truth? It seems fairly obvious on the surface. I don't think—I mean, there are people who will dispute it, but mostly if we really look, we don't have to look that hard. It's clear that there is suffering in this world. But as I've reflected and observed more, I'm actually continually amazed by our ability to deny, resist, and avoid this in our own lives. And I see it in others.

The most obvious example that comes to mind is when I was once in a hospital and a doctor was doing a procedure. They were trying to put in an IV and not doing a good job of it. It had been going on for some time—they'd tried it five times, and finally they called in the doctor. Then I knew I was in trouble, because nurses can usually do these things better than doctors. Anyway, he was digging around, and I was really at the end of my rope. I'd been there some time, and I started crying. He just looked at me and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

I thought, whoa. And I really could understand. Because to open to the fact of the pain I was in would mean he had to feel that in himself, and also be aware that in some way—out of good intentions, but still—he was a part of inflicting it. And that's too hard to open to sometimes. We can't feel someone else's pain because we can't open to our own. That's a kind of strong example, but in little ways we do that all the time.

And then on a more subtle level, I've been noticing that somehow acknowledging that many things just don't carry the satisfaction I like to think they do has been a huge relief in my life. It was like acknowledging my actual experience. Somehow I thought I should be happier than I was, because I have so much.

My life's so good. How come things aren't really blissful? There's something wrong with me.

Here's another example, very mundane, and I think we could all see this all the time. Once a friend of mine and I, it was during the fall, and we were working at the meditation center in Barre. It was very intense. We were very tired. We decided to go to this health club and go swimming. And we were looking forward to it all day. It'll feel great. We'll relax. We'll have a good time. We'll go in the sauna.

So we got there and split up—he was a man, so we were in different dressing rooms. It was freezing, and I'm really susceptible to cold. I was hurrying up, getting in my bathing suit, thinking, well, I'll get in the pool. It'll be great. I got in the pool. The water was really, for me, quite chilly. So I was dashing back and forth thinking, God, I can't wait till I get out of here. This is really nice, but I can't wait till I get out of here and get in the sauna. I ran into the sauna, and for a couple of minutes—oh, this is great. Then the bench got hard, then I started to sweat too much, and then I went out of the sauna and it was freezing again, and I went back in the sauna—oh, this is really great—for two minutes, then it got too hot, I was sweaty, I had a headache. I went out, took a shower, went up and met my friend, and said, "That was great."

And then, for some reason, we sat and talked about it, which is why I remember it in so much detail, and it was hysterical. There were a few really nice moments. But in being able to see that, it wasn't demoralizing, really. It was kind of, oh well, no wonder I don't feel completely blissed out. Some of it was nice, and some of it really wasn't very nice at all. So it was a relief for me, acknowledging that there's a certain degree of unsatisfactoriness in much of my experience—not all of it, but much of it—and not having to pretend that it's otherwise.

And then again, the cause of the suffering isn't that the water's cold or the sauna is hot. It's that movement of the mind, that compulsive, conditioned, often unconscious movement of the mind towards anything pleasant and away from anything unpleasant. So the water's cold, my body contracts, my mind says, I don't like this, I want to get out of here. The sauna is hot. It's pleasant. There's a total relaxing into it. As soon as it gets a little unpleasant—I don't like this, I want to get out of here. That's the cause of the suffering, not the cold, not the hot.

This is from Nisargadatta again: "Our true self is peace. It's only the mind that is restless. All it knows is restlessness with its many modes and grades. The pleasant modes are considered superior and the painful ones are discounted. What we tend to call progress is merely a changeover from the unpleasant to the pleasant. Changes can't bring us to the changeless."

Changes can't bring us to the changeless. And as long as we're unaware of this tendency of mind—we merely need to be aware of it—as long as we're unaware of it, we continue to be caught in this maze of denying, discounting anything that's remotely unpleasant, waiting out the unpleasant, trying to hold on to the pleasant so that then things will be okay.

I call it, or some of us call it, rearranging the furniture. It's like we're in prison and the door's open, and it's unpleasant, but we figure if we can somehow rearrange the furniture, everything will be okay. As long as we continue doing this, trying to find the exact right arrangement that's most pleasant, it's this movement away from the unpleasant towards the pleasant, trying to control everything, that distorts our perception, that clouds our heart. We can't know reality as long as we're caught in rearranging the furniture.

And it's not necessarily the situation itself that needs to change. It's our attitude. It's our willingness to come back and be with the furniture, no matter how it is—whether it's incredibly peaceful or really discordant. It's that attitude of being willing to be fully present, fully here with it, allowing it just as it is, and bringing our fullness of attention to be there with it. That allows us to begin to see what's really true in this moment.

It's this shift in attitude that turns obstacles from being obstacles into being a very important part of our path. Adverse circumstances aren't necessarily a curse, because sometimes that's what wakes us up from all this to-ing and fro-ing of the mind.

Ajahn Chah, the great Thai meditation teacher and abbot, once said that there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and suffering that leads to the end of suffering. So what's the difference? Again, it's the attitude.

Here's a very simple example. You're sitting here and your knee starts to tingle a little. Soon it turns into a throb. If it's suffering that leads to more suffering, the mind goes: "Oh my God, I'm never going to make it through this sitting. What am I doing here? I'm sitting wrong. Why don't they ring the bell? What's the matter with me? I should be able to sit better than this." Your mind starts spinning. You start judging yourself, judging the retreat. You're getting tenser and tenser, your mind screaming. This is suffering that leads to more suffering. It's our relationship of believing there's something wrong, that this pain shouldn't be here—and all the extra we add on when we're not aware of it. Pretty soon we're really over the edge.

The same pain in the knee. The shift in attitude is simply to give it attention just as it is. There's a throb in the knee. We notice it. If it's really mild, we just acknowledge it and go back to the breath. If it's really strong, then we move our full attention into that throbbing, simply because that's what's there. Not with any agenda, not to get rid of it, not to make it go away, not to prove we're such a great yogi—simply because that's the experience in this moment.

It's a real gentle, compassionate kind of attention—open, but really clear and firm. It's not just "Oh yeah, there's a pain," and then back to the breath. That's what's there. We bring the attention out of the whirling thoughts into the sensation, noticing the tightness in our body, noticing the resistance in our mind. That whole train of dislike can happen, but we're noticing it. Not to change it or judge it or place blame—just because it's there. To know for ourselves what's really happening in this moment.

This shift in attitude can change that pain from being the source of our future hospitalization and disability into a chance to observe how much extra suffering we're creating through resistance to experience. This is the quality of openness, of investigation, that changes our whole experience because we start to see reality.

Has it ever happened that you have a pain you think you're going to die from, and then the bell rings and suddenly it's just gone? What happened to it? It's all extra. Because we stop fighting the experience enough to simply be with it and see what that pain actually is, what's the experience of it.

Out of clear seeing, understanding can arise. Understanding, in this case, the nature of that sensation—its impermanence, its coming and going, its changeable nature. Understanding of the extra suffering that resistance and fear add on, how our fear of the whole hour is adding an immense amount of suffering onto the pain in this moment.

And because we understand, we have a choice. We can act appropriately in a situation rather than just responding out of blind reactivity. So you have, say, the choice of seeing: yes, I have a bad knee, and this pain I recognize.

It's the prelude to really hurting myself. It's appropriate to move. But it's not just a reactive "I hate this, I'm going to move." It's not coming out of aversion at all. It's coming out of really clear seeing and compassionate action. This is quite different from our usual pattern of denial and avoidance.

Because this reactivity is so strong, when something's unpleasant, we're usually unable to give attention to the actual situation. And we don't even know it. We don't even know what's happening. We just stay lost in confusion and resistance, and things get more and more painful.

The Buddha talked about unsatisfactoriness and suffering a great deal. But he said that there's suffering that ripens as confusion and suffering that ripens as search. Again, the difficult situation can serve as a signal to investigate, and a whole new understanding can come out of this.

The most powerful example I've had of this in my life was a period of time I spent in Thailand, practicing as a Buddhist nun in various temples. When I first went there, I had a hard time adjusting during those first couple of months. The conditions were very unpleasant. You just have to adjust to Asia, and I hadn't done it yet. It was very hot, with lots of poisonous snakes and insects, huts with tin roofs that baked—I mean baked, 120 degrees during the day—with holes so all the insects came in, and food that was making me sick.

I was in a really negative frame of mind, to say the least. I was committed; I didn't want to leave. But the suffering was ripening as confusion. I was just spinning in aversion. Every new thing that happened bummed me out more. I was in a kind of blaming mode: Why don't they do this? Why isn't the food better? Why couldn't they make the huts better? Why do I have to wear these seven layers of polyester in this kind of heat? On and on. I was really nursing my aversion without realizing it.

Finally, it got to the point where it was insupportable. I either had to shift my attitude or leave, which I didn't want to do—if anything, just because my friends would say "told you so."

The shift was to take back my energy from throwing blame outward, from nursing aversion, and bring attention back to the situation. Not to figure out how I could make it better, because I couldn't change the conditions, but just to start looking directly at my experience. In other words, to be in my experience rather than continually trying to get out of it so that I could practice. This was my practice—only I wasn't letting it be.

So, physically hot? Be hot. Feel the hotness. Quit fighting it and thinking about air conditioning. Just be with hotness. Be with the taste of the food, whether I like it or not. Be with insect bites. Be with my fear of ants and see how much of it is fear and how much of it is reality. Stop sending all my energy into useless complaining and just watch the aversion. Feel the aversion in my experience.

That willingness to come back over and over to my experience instead of trying to avoid it—it was amazing, really, over a period of some months. I saw pretty soon that what I had been doing was cultivating aversion, really feeding it. Just that acknowledgment of the aversion, that recognition of the movement of the mind away from the unpleasant—just seeing the power of that tendency allowed me to be much more present with the unpleasant.

And the whole experience changed. By the time I left, the conditions were no better. In some ways they had changed, but they weren't really worse or better. My sense of being there was completely different. It was one of the most joyful times I remember in my life. Really quite wonderful.

I'd spend half an hour a day brushing out the ants. That was just part of what I did each day. It wasn't a problem. And I learned so much from that experience—that in the very same conditions, there can be tremendous joy and contentment. The real suffering was my resistance, this movement away from the unpleasant, thinking I ought to be able to rearrange the furniture instead of just sinking into things the way they were. The unseen and unacknowledged resistance to the situation.

So far from being something I just learned to live with, that seeming obstacle has been a vital part of my growth in equanimity, in opening and understanding. I really learned a lot from that.

And I'm not saying it's easy for any of us, or at any time. This tendency of mind, this to-ing and fro-ing, is so subtle and so pervasive, often really unconscious, that it can be very hard to be aware of it. I sat for a couple of months with that situation, and it was pretty obvious, before I could actually recognize—oh yes, right, aversion, that's what's going on.

Also, I don't in any way mean to imply that all we have to do is see, "Oh, my mind is moving towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant," and then everything's fine and we're filled with this glowing peace. It is not so simple. Even when we're very aware of this tendency and really committed, deeply committed to our willingness to be present for both the pleasant and the unpleasant, and we truly know we can open to difficult situations—we can't open all at once to many things.

For almost all of us, certainly almost everyone I've met including myself, there are many times when, given our conditions, the state of our mindfulness, the state of our being at that moment, there will be difficulties, sufferings, pains that are simply too much for us to open to in that moment.

The Buddha also spoke of skillful avoidance as a great help on our path, knowing when to use it. He gave the example of when a mad elephant is charging at you, you step out of the way. We can all really benefit from paying attention to this. Sometimes the mad elephant can be a strong physical pain. Sometimes it's a deep emotional grief or memory or something happening in our life.

Many of us, at least here in the West, have a tendency to be really hard on ourselves. Once we enter into this path with the sense that we're opening to everything, when something comes up, no matter how overwhelming, we think, "I should be able to open to this right now. And if I can't, it means I'm doing something wrong."

Mindfulness is very attentive, it's energetic, but it's not strident. Mindfulness is not forcing ourselves to open no matter what. It doesn't work, for one thing. And it can lead us into a lot of pain and confusion and self-blame.

So for each of us, it's finding in each situation that delicate balance. Some pains, physical or emotional, arise and we can really be there with them. It doesn't feel good. We might feel lost in it, but there's some mindfulness. There's feeling the grief in the heart. There's letting ourselves cry. There's feeling the heaviness. There's seeing the memories. And then we can gently, gently be with it.

Sometimes it's so overwhelming that there's no sense of being able to be mindful and we just feel totally drowning. That might be a time to gently back off. It's not the same as repression. It's not shutting that down and pretending it's not there, going in the opposite direction from anything that reminds us of it. But it's for a time. We touch it. We open a little. We see we're getting overwhelmed and gently back off.

If you're sitting, you can move your attention to hearing. You can go back to the breath. You can go elsewhere in the body. If it's in our life and we're running up against a brick wall, you don't keep running into the brick wall. You try and move up to it, see if you can push it a little bit. It doesn't move. You back off. Come back again. Do something to nurture the heart and the mind. Take a walk.

Do something in your life that's nurturing. Be with somebody you love. Talk to a friend. We can't simply be over and over and over again with agonizing pain without some break. It's a rare person who can do that without being really overcome.

When we know in ourselves that we have the commitment to understanding and growth, we can trust ourselves enough to know that we're not just repressing, we're not just manipulating—we're using skillful avoidance. And if you find that every unpleasant situation suddenly calls for skillful avoidance, that's when you know: wait a minute, I think I need to look at this again. We learn to trust that balance and find it for ourselves.

Practice here in retreat can help a great deal because we can practice with the little situations. You can practice this with the small pain in your knee. Watch moving into it. Watch the mind wanting to run away. Feel all that fear and tension. Soften around it. Move back into the pain. Something little, but it's the same tendency of mind.

I'm sure we've all had experiences where something difficult—either in our outer life or our inner life here (I actually don't even like making that distinction, but just as a way of talking)—where there's been something we thought was nothing but difficulty to be gotten rid of. And through our willingness to just experience it as it is, through our attentive, present, non-judging being with it, it transforms, and we learn something very valuable. That kind of experience strengthens our commitment, our trust in the whole process.

I find it gives us a sense of courage. I've found that deepening in myself over the years—that whatever does arise as my path, as my karmic path, I know in this one moment I can be with it. I don't have to add, "Oh no, but what's it going to be like if this goes on for a year?" That's extra. I know in this one moment I can be with whatever is arising as my path. And as I was thinking this, I realized: ultimately, there's not much choice anyway. I don't really get to choose what's coming in the next moment. So I can simply know that I've understood—in this path I have the strength to be with only this one moment. And if that moment means backing off for a little bit, that's okay too.

It's this attitude, this willingness to be with whatever arises as our path, pleasant as well as unpleasant. We're not looking for the unpleasant in order to grow, and not denying the pleasant either. There are plenty of pleasant, joyful experiences—being fully present with that. But not this clutching: "Oh no, it's going away!" It comes, you really appreciate it, it goes, the next thing comes later. It's this willingness to be present without the to-ing and fro-ing, to see the to-ing and fro-ing, that allows understanding to arise. We're then beginning to know what's really going on instead of being lost in our distortions and confusions.

Thich Nhat Hanh—in case you haven't heard of him, he's a Vietnamese Zen master and peace activist, and I find him quite inspiring—says that without understanding, we are unable to love. When we understand what's going on in a situation, love and compassion naturally arise out of that. Because we're there with no preferences, understanding becomes possible.

Robert Aitken, a Zen master from Hawaii, says: "Practicing compassion goes hand in hand with practicing realization. On your cushions, you learn first of all to be compassionate to yourself. We vow to save all beings, but how do you save the roughnecks in your own mind? Treat them as neighbors who come to the door when you're meditating. Take a moment to acknowledge them. They're closer than neighbors, after all."

If we can take that moment to compassionately acknowledge the roughnecks that show up in our mind—the anger, the self-blame, the hatred, the wanting, the grief, the remorse, the guilt, the list goes on and on—that moment of clear mindfulness allows for clear seeing, for understanding to arise. And it is, in a way, an actual practice of loving-kindness and compassion. Because that quality of attention really is the quality of compassionate loving-kindness, acceptance of whatever roughneck appears in your mind.

It's been my limited experience that true compassion, really deep compassion, arises when we're able to be open to and present for what is difficult and fearful in our own experience. When we can open to deeper levels of pain in our own experience, we're able to be more present with the same pain in others. It's where the real sense of our interconnectedness emerges. In sitting here and practicing and opening to our own pain, we're really opening to the pain of all others, to the pain of the world.

The compassion that begins to arise when we see our own suffering—and how it's compounded by our not understanding what's going on—that compassion extends to every other being we encounter. We see that everyone is in the same predicament. And opening isn't selective. When we open to our own difficulties and compassion arises, so also does joy.

You find that in the opening, we have access to much greater depths of joy and love than when we're so busy trying to avoid anything unpleasant. We end up avoiding a lot of what's really beautiful as well, without knowing it.

Just one other thing I want to say, because it comes up a lot when we talk about opening to difficult situations. Just as mindfulness is not strident or forcing but very attentive and alert, so also it is not passive. Often, in the same way of being hard on ourselves—thinking "I've got to open to anything"—we can interpret this as meaning that anything difficult that happens, we just have to sit back and let it occur. This can really turn into a kind of victim mentality.

Mindfulness is not a passive quality at all. Mindfulness is very alert, inquiring, energetic. There can be a difficult situation where we don't close to it but meet it with real clarity of attention. Accepting the situation also allows for clear seeing. It doesn't mean we just sit around and let ourselves be abused. In the clear seeing, appropriate action becomes much more possible. We can act much sooner and more emphatically to get out of a situation that's causing us harm—one we don't need to stay in. But our motive is really one of compassion for ourselves and even for the people in the situation, rather than just blind hatred or fear.

This is not at all about "whatever happens that's unpleasant, I can't do anything about it." Compassionate action—that understanding that comes from clear seeing—can be very active. Much more appropriate action than when we don't see clearly.

The people who come to mind as embodiments of compassionate action and understanding—I think of the Dalai Lama or Mother Teresa. They've seen incredible suffering. Just sometimes to walk through a street in India brings up so much pain. Sometimes it's hard for me to be with it. And someone like the Dalai Lama, who has seen so much suffering in Tibet, or Mother Teresa, who spends her time going out picking up dying people off the streets in Calcutta—they've seen incredible suffering. Yet the Dalai Lama is one of the most inspiring people to be around. He's light and filled with humor and kindness, and they're both incredibly energetic. Definitely not passive. Mother Teresa is eighty years old and she's just traveling all around the world doing things—ten times more energy than I have.

All our energy that's going into resistance and denial gets released for compassionate action, for the actions that come from clear seeing and understanding. So we're not talking about getting heavy and lost in suffering, but in fact just the opposite.

Really, even sitting here, we have plenty of opportunity to work with this. Even the simplest pain in our back, a simple feeling of "I'm bored and I wish I could go home"—it doesn't have to be some big, dramatic form of suffering. When we can summon up our sense of commitment and meet whatever it is that's happening with mindfulness, full attention, compassionate caring attention, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant, we find that in that one moment the whole world can begin to open up for us. Our whole heart begins to open up.

CHAPTER 232

Opening Talk

Carol Wilson · 34 min

> In this opening talk for a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the natural emotions that arise when embarking on such a profound journey into the unknown—the excitement, apprehension, and even terror that both teachers and yogis experience. She emphasizes that meditation practice is not about attaining specific states of mind, but about developing a quality of clear, precise, yet loving attention regardless of what is happening. This observing power of mindfulness remains steady whether we encounter pleasant or difficult experiences.
>
> Carol explores the importance of examining our expectations and how unexamined ideas about what retreat "should" feel like can lead to frustration and disappointment. Drawing on Suzuki Roshi's teaching on constancy, she describes a quality of patience that goes beyond mere endurance—a spacious acceptance that remains undisturbed like the sky, even as clouds and lightning pass through. She offers practical guidance on slowing down, doing one thing at a time, and treating every moment—including washing dishes or doing yogi jobs—as the practice itself, not as interruptions to it.
>
> Sharon Salzberg then leads the formal taking of the Three Refuges (Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha) and the Five Precepts, explaining how these provide the essential context and foundation for intensive practice. The refuges affirm our potential for awakening as human beings, while the precepts create the conditions for harmonious community life and empower the depth of our investigation.

This is really quite a moment. We're beginning tonight, the start of three months together.

I just want you to know that all the emotions you've described—feeling joy, excitement, apprehension, terror, wondering what you've gotten yourself into—I go through the same thing, whichever side or role I'm playing in a retreat. I'm sitting here thinking, "Three months? We're all here for three months? What's it going to be like?"

I think it's really natural to feel this way, but especially when you're a yogi, because this is such a journey into the unknown. As Joseph mentioned last night, each moment is an opening into the complete unknown. Actually, our whole life is that anyway, but we usually don't confront that reality with such direct, head-on looking as we're doing here, really every moment. And it's scary. The mind doesn't really like it very much.

I think that brings up a lot of our apprehension about what's going to happen. We tend to want some kind of pattern or a map—just let me know what I'm going to go through. If I have the hindrances in three days, that's okay as long as I know it. We don't like being in this space where we don't know what's going to happen in the next moment. And so the mind throws up all kinds of obstacles.

I was reflecting on this tonight and I realized that every retreat I've ever done, no matter how long or how much I'm into it, somewhere in the first week when I start getting really bogged down in the hindrances and I'm really slogging, I hit a day—and it usually lasts about a day—where I think, "Oh my God, I can't believe I did this to myself again. I should have known better." And it passes. Don't believe it. It's just the mind throwing up resistance out of a space of difficulty and fear. And no matter how many retreats any of us have done, we never know what's going to happen in the next moment of this retreat. That's just part of what the whole journey is about.

So I want to say a few things about attitudes that can help us as we begin this journey. Then Sharon will lead us in the refuges and the precepts, and we'll formally begin this period of silence, this remarkable thing that all of us are choosing to do together here this fall.

One of the things I've found tremendously helpful—Joseph touched on it a bit last night—is to give some attention to what expectations you're bringing into this retreat. What are the ideas, the pictures in your mind? Sometimes even consciously reflecting on them can help. Not that they're bad, but to know what they are, to bring them into conscious knowing.

Ideas about, for example, what a good retreat should feel like. What I expect to happen, what should happen. Lots of emotion. No emotion. Incredible peace. A lot of intensity. Really smooth and even. But no, that's dull—something really deep has to happen. Just notice what those ideas are. Things we've read. Whatever ideas we have about what it means to be enlightened. Notice what they are without a lot of judgment, and then put them down. It's extra baggage. It's stuff we carry around with us, and when we don't see it, it keeps us held in what we already know. It's what prevents us from being fully present and opening into the truth of this moment, the unknown truth of this moment. It keeps us in comparing and judging and disappointment.

I'll probably say this next thing a hundred times, but this practice is not about getting to, reaching, attaining some specific state of mind or body, some place where we can then hang out and know, "Ah, now it's right, now I've done it." It's not about that at all. It's about developing a quality of observing power, or mindfulness—a quality of clear, precise, yet very loving attention, regardless of what is happening. And that's without exceptions: regardless of what is happening. It's this quality of connected attention that we're developing.

So when I begin a retreat, I usually consciously check for expectations. I go, "Got that one, got that one, now I know what they all are." And somewhere in the middle, or not so far from the beginning, when I hit into my first period of discouragement, disappointment, or frustration, rather than using that as a way to judge myself or evaluate—"Okay, I'm blowing it. This practice is wrong. I shouldn't have done this retreat. It's not the right time"—rather than using the frustration as a sign that there's something wrong, I see it as a signal. Okay, there's some expectation I'm not aware of.

There's some idea I have of what should be happening that I'm not aware of. So what is it? I can use the sense of discouragement as a signal to see what it is that I think should be happening that isn't. Because it's this comparison with our unseen idea that's bringing about the sense of frustration and disappointment.

Often merely the seeing—oh, right, I thought it should be pleasant all the time—can just allow us to again open to whatever it is that's happening. It's so easy to fall into the trap of thinking that if I'm having a difficult time, or even if unpleasant sensations are arising in the body, that means something's wrong. I've got to fix it. That means I'm doing something wrong, or there's something wrong with the practice. That's just not true. It just isn't true. Who in life has even a whole day of nothing but pleasant experience? It's not reality.

And hard times in our practice here are not just something that we put up with. They're actually a vital part of the practice. It's highs and it's lows and it's all the in-betweens. Developing this quality of clear observing power and open spaciousness of attention—acceptance with the hard times is just as important. Sometimes even more important. I find I've learned so much more, in a way, from the difficult times in practice. They're really vital.

Now, that's easy to say, sitting here. We can all give ourselves a little pep talk, and I would do that to myself all the time when I'm sitting. But when something really difficult comes along, that little pep talk—"Yeah, fine, right, this is vital. Uh-huh, good"—doesn't really always keep us there, get us over the hump.

Another attitude that is essential in allowing us to be present with this spaciousness—and it's something that we all are developing just through the hours of sitting and walking and sitting and walking—is what we usually call patience. By patience, I don't mean just this sense of, "Okay, I can last through this until it's over." That's not at all what I mean. That's more like aversion—a kind of silent endurance. We hate this, but I'll sit with it until it goes away.

By patience, I'm really talking about a much broader quality of being. It encompasses attention, spacious acceptance, even appreciation, full presence with what's happening. With ourselves, with our restless, desiring, angry, doubting minds. With our aching, restless bodies. With our noisy, restless neighbor. With the job we don't like, with the schedule we don't like, with our experience we don't like. With days on end of sleepiness. With days on end of restlessness. With the cold. With whatever is going on. This broad, open quality of patience.

The best description that I know comes from Suzuki Roshi, the great Zen master. He writes: "The usual translation of the Japanese word nin is patience, but perhaps constancy is a better word. You must force yourself to be patient. But in constancy, there is only the unchanging ability to accept things as they are. Constancy is the way we cultivate our own spirit. Constancy is our way of continuous practice. We should always live as if we are the dark, empty sky. The sky is always the sky. Even though clouds and lightning come, the sky is not disturbed. Even if the flashing of enlightenment comes, after it passes, our practice forgets all about it. Then it is ready for another enlightenment."

This quality of true patience, constancy—we're always present, always there, prepared with our attention for whatever flashing comes. We can appreciate it, really appreciate it, and then forget about it as it goes. It's a beautiful quality of mind. And often in the long hours when it seems like nothing much is going on—another lifting, another placing, another breath—this quality of constancy, which also implies mindfulness, is being developed very deeply in our being. It's a very important and beautiful quality.

Along with this, our specific practice here helps us develop a very clear, direct, observing power of mind—a very strong power of mindfulness—which enables us to experience, to see the nature of ourselves, of our mind and body, the nature of reality, in a radically different way. A way that we often just don't experience in our busy lives. We don't take the time to really be able to look and experience in this way.

And it's really wonderful. This technique requires the development of a concentrated, continuous, precise quality of attention. And it does require a great deal of energy and effort.

Equally important, I feel, is that this development of focused attention is also held with an attitude of mind and heart characterized by spaciousness and acceptance of whatever's happening, by genuine interest in whatever's happening. Whatever is happening is okay. Anything that comes up in a moment is okay. And I think it's the putting of these two qualities together—the sense of concentrated, continuous, energetic focus held with a spacious attitude—that really allows our practice to develop quite fully.

A couple of hints in working with developing this observing power. And we'll talk more about all of these as the course goes on.

First, and we've mentioned this briefly: as you're moving through the day, not just in the sitting and walking but really everything else that you're doing, begin to work with slowing down, with doing one thing at a time. Ostensibly that might seem easy, but as we start to focus more closely, we see how easy it actually is to do two or three things at once. So begin here, as you're moving around, to break our habitual patterns of rushing, of doing rote activities without really having our mind on them.

Slowing down—that's one thing that really helps. You go to wash your face, just slow down. Just wash your face. As you begin to move a little more slowly, you find that it's much easier in the slowness to bring your attention into the actual experience in a much less superficial way. So there's washing the face and really being with the sensations of the movement of the arm, the wetness on your hand, the coldness of the water, the impatience in your mind. Simply being there with that.

Notice also how easy it is to want to wash your face and brush your teeth and plan what you're going to do in the next half hour all at the same time. And in noticing that, okay, begin again. It's a constant beginning again, back to feeling the movements of the hand as you wash the face. It's really simple. There's always right now, what I'm doing, to come back to. It's a continual beginning again. It's not something esoteric and difficult. It's just our willingness to be here now—for washing my face, for doing the dishes.

So doing one thing at a time and being willing to slow down so that we're really there in the experience. It's one wonderful thing about these three months: there's nowhere to hurry to. It's quite a gift you've given yourselves. Three months of no need to hurry. So when you find that you're hurrying—which undoubtedly will arise from time to time—you're hurrying to wash your face in order to get to the sitting so then you can meditate. Oh, whoa, wait a minute. That moment of washing your face is the meditation. That moment is this moment of your life, and that's all there is—this moment of life. And so our practice is to wake up, be present, connect with our life in this moment, not to hurry and get this moment over with so we can be present in the next moment.

This willingness to come back over and over to just be with, very simply, our experience—whatever we're doing—is what we're talking about when we're talking about continuity of mindfulness, continuity of awareness. And it's an extremely important and powerful part of this practice. I would say for myself and my practice, it has been at least as important a part of the practice as the formal sitting and walking. At times more so, because when there's this sense of real presence with what you're doing, connection with the sensations of the movement, the movement in your mind, it doesn't matter if you miss the whole sitting because you're very present for washing your face and walking through the dining room. That's the practice. It's not that you have to be sitting on the cushion at a certain time. It's really a very powerful part of the practice.

And I'd like to mention also, just briefly, that we can bring this same care to our yogi job. Sometimes this seems to be a little bit outside our area of what's worth paying attention to. I don't mean going microscopically slowly so that it takes you seven hours to wash the lunch dishes. Obviously, we have to take a little care with the sense of the total situation. But our yogi job is just as important a time. It's a moment, several moments, an hour of our life in which we can cultivate the qualities of mindful attention, concentration, connection with our experience.

And sometimes there's a tendency to discount it and want to hurry through it, get it over. Well, it's in the way. I have to move too fast. It's a disruption, a distraction. And I myself have often felt this way. I'd rather not do a yogi job; I just want to really be slow and sit and walk and sit and walk. And because I kind of have an in when I come here to do retreats, I often don't have to do a yogi job. But the last retreat I did here, last year, I said, oh, I'll be good—I'll sign up and vacuum. And it turned out to be a wonderful part of my practice. I was really amazed.

I thought, I've been missing this all these years. It was a really powerful part of developing the continuity. It was not only not a break in the continuity—it developed it even stronger. So I didn't have to hold on to the fear that if I move faster, it's all going to go away. It doesn't necessarily happen that way.

And I found that the attitude of thinking "this job doesn't count as the practice, it's outside of the practice"—that's missing the whole idea of the practice. Because nothing is outside of the practice. Nothing in our life, here or in our life outside of here. But especially here, since that's what we're concerned with now—nothing we do here is outside of the practice. It's all a vital part of developing our awareness and understanding.

So again, in the job you're moving more quickly, perhaps, but still there's always our bare experience to come back to. The feeling of the arms moving the vacuum. The coldness of the water as you're washing the dishes. The sense of feeling disgruntled or impatient or whatever arises in your mind. Whatever's going on, there's always the present experience to come back to.

This is what we're talking about when we speak of a willingness to totally surrender to the moment. It doesn't matter what's happening in the moment. Can I surrender my being into being totally here? Feeling it, being with it very fully, with power and force of attention, and this quality of acceptance.

And that's what these three months are. It's really just this moment. A lot of these moments—I don't know how many. But it always just comes back to this moment. There's nothing else. And in this moment, our strongest friend and ally is this power of attention. It can always be present as soon as we remember that we've spaced out—and then we're awake again. We can again focus our attention on whatever's happening. There's nowhere else to go. And really, for these three months, there's nothing else worth doing.

I want to close with this quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Indian teacher: "Do not undervalue attention. It means interest and also love. To know, to do, to discover, to create—you must give your heart to it, which means attention."

It's a privilege to share this three-month journey with you.

Traditionally, we've begun retreats by undertaking the Three Refuges and the Five Precepts. The Three Refuges are taking refuge in the Buddha, in the Dhamma, and in the Sangha. The act of taking refuge is something we'll probably be talking about much more extensively throughout the retreat, but just briefly, it's holding a sense primarily of what's possible for us.

All of you have given up a lot—of one kind or another—in order to be here. You've particularly given up all that which is familiar: the things that you might touch in with every day to remind yourself of who you are, what your values are, what you're going to get done, what you're going to accomplish that day.

Coming here, very often we have to let go of a lot of that. We're not speaking to one another, so there's not a kind of social portrayal of ourselves as being a certain person. We're not upholding an image of ourselves by how we dress—God knows—and all of the various ways we might in the world take on a role and feel secure about who we are.

Coming to a place like this, we let go of many of these aspects of our being and undertake, as Carol said, a journey of investigation or exploration. We're willing to let go of the merely familiar to see freshly and completely what is true for us.

But we don't do that without a context. It's not that we do this without any sense of security or understanding about what we're undertaking. This is taking refuge. It's providing the context. It's understanding why we're doing what we're doing and how we can do it in the most skillful way possible—which means the happiest way possible, and one that feels most complete.

We take refuge in the Buddha both as a sign of respect to the historical figure who lived 2,500 years ago, who was a pathfinder, who delineated a way for us so that we're not just coming in, sitting down, and trying to sort out of the confusion of our minds how to move forward. There is a path—a very clear path—that is laid out. We don't need to struggle to try to discover it as though there were no wisdom to sustain us.

We also take refuge in the Buddha as a symbol of our own potential. In all of the stories within this tradition about the Buddha, he is always described as being a human being—not a divine being. He's described as a human being who achieved or attained everything that he came to know through the power of his own awareness. It's also taught that this degree of understanding, this degree of purification of the mind, is possible for all of us as human beings, as who we are. So we take refuge in the Buddha also as a means of affirming our own potential for enlightenment, for freedom, for purification.

It's an act of recognition, really, that this is our potential.

We take refuge in the Dhamma, which can be translated as the teachings, or the way, or the truth, or the laws of nature. It's taking refuge in seeing things as they truly are. Joseph mentioned the other day surrendering to the Dhamma—surrendering to how things are in this moment. So we're not struggling and we're not fighting and we're not trying to deny what is happening, but we're seeing the truth of it, whatever it is. And understanding that this relative truth in this moment is our vehicle to a more ultimate or absolute truth. So we learn to trust our own experience and to use it in a way that is wise and skillful. We take refuge in the Dhamma.

We take refuge in the Sangha, which also has many meanings. The Sangha traditionally has meant the order of ordained monks and nuns who have preserved the teachings throughout all of these centuries, which has been an immeasurable gift. It means those beings who have practiced and attained a degree of purification of mind. Once again, it's an affirmation of what is possible for a human being. And in a very contemporary sense, it has come to mean the widest possible community of those who walk this path. So it's like we're all taking refuge, in that sense, in one another—with an understanding that in coming together here, even though we are silent and we're practicing aloneness and we're not making eye contact, really we could never be completely alone. We are supporting one another all of the time. This is the three refuges.

We then undertake five precepts, which are the absolutely essential foundation for the community to live here harmoniously and for our own practice to be empowered. In the world as we know it, as is convenient, as is culturally ordained, we don't think particularly of happiness and power as being tied up with our own virtue, our own actions, and the kind of strength that comes from living harmoniously and living simply, being straight and being honest. Yet there's tremendous strength and power that comes from that. It is really for the sake of making the practice as intense as possible and as deep as possible that again and again we call to mind this foundation. We understand that we must make this kind of commitment for our own sake, so we're not in any way weakening the power of our mind even as we need it to do this exploration.

Right Action

Carol Wilson · 46 min

> In this comprehensive talk on sīla (ethical conduct), Carol Wilson examines why right action deserves the same depth of attention as formal meditation practice. She reflects on how Western vipassanā has been extracted from its cultural context in Southeast Asia, where ethical practice is woven into daily life and supported by community, making it challenging for Western practitioners to fully appreciate the transformative power of working with speech and action.
>
> Wilson illuminates the Buddha's teaching that concentration imbued with sīla brings great fruit, explaining how harmony between inner attitude and outer action is essential for genuine mental unification. Drawing on the understanding of kamma (action and its fruits), she emphasizes that it is intention—not the action itself—that determines whether conduct is skillful or unskillful. Skillful actions arise from non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, while unskillful actions stem from their opposites.
>
> Through detailed exploration of the first two precepts—non-harming and not taking what is not given—Wilson demonstrates the ever-deepening subtlety available in this practice. She draws on teachings from Thich Nhat Hanh, Robert Aitken, and the Tao Te Ching to show how these guidelines extend far beyond their literal meanings into questions of environmental impact, economic systems, and inner contentment. Rather than approaching precepts with self-blame, she encourages practitioners to use any breach as an opportunity to investigate the underlying understanding that gave rise to unskillful action, transforming ethical practice into a genuine path of liberation.

The end of the second full day. Right, right. That's usually what the second full day is like. No problem. You won't even remember this in December. If you're still here, please wait through it.

Tonight what I want to talk about is a huge topic, but I want to address it a little bit: sila, which is translated variously—none of which I'm crazy about—as morality or ethical conduct, the part of our path that comes under the heading of right action.

As most of you know, when the Buddha spoke of the path that leads us to liberation, he spoke of it as an eightfold path, having eight parts. And really we can't practice the meditation in isolation. I mean, we can if we want to, but it doesn't work very well. The Buddha was very pragmatic when he laid out this path of eight parts. The first two steps deal with wisdom, with understanding. The second three steps deal with our speech and action in the world, specifically right speech, right action, and right livelihood. And then the last three steps deal more formally with meditation: mindfulness, concentration, and energy. None of these are isolated—it's not just isolated to meditation—but that's more specifically it. It's a very comprehensive and integrated path.

What I've found in myself over the years, especially in the early part of my practice, is that I would tend to put more emphasis on the meditation and the understanding aspects of the path and give cursory attention to sila, to right action. I would totally agree that I want to live a life of non-harming, but when I say cursory attention, I mean somehow not taking this part of sila, this part of the path, as just as valuable and deep and profound a practice as the formal meditation practice itself.

My opinion is that in the West, the way this practice of vipassana has come down to us, it's been taken out of the context of the culture in which it's been propagated and held in Southeast Asia all these 2,500 years. There the meditation occurs in the midst of a culture—for example, I spent some time in Thailand—that really values all segments of the Eightfold Path, including a very strong reverence and respect for the power of working with sila, with actions.

In the monasteries, in most monasteries that are anywhere near people, and they almost all are, the lay people would come at least once a week to hear teachings and to take the five precepts, to renew in themselves their commitment to working with speech and action. Sometimes the people could stay on overnight to do some meditation, or longer for weeks or months. In many cases the meditation isn't taught in these isolated retreats. People come to the monasteries, they can meditate, they go to their lives. It's all of a piece. And when they come to the monastery or they go back home, it's in and out of a culture that can hold the whole picture—a culture that respects not only the meditation but also the sila part of their everyday life. It's much more integrated, and so the emphasis on our actions is much stronger.

Here I often feel we've taken the retreat form because it's a good way to practice in this way and get the information across and really investigate. But it's so separated from our culture. In many cases when we go back out of a meditation retreat, even the basic respect for non-harming behavior is often lacking. There's not a sense of support. I've been reflecting on this a lot lately and feeling that this is one of the things that has helped me take so long to come to respect deeply, as I do now, the power of practicing attention to my speech and actions as a really beautiful path and a path of liberation.

The Buddha said in the last discourse before he died—actually it's a whole story of several months before he died—he said, "Concentration, when imbued with sila, with ethical behavior, brings great fruit and profit. Wisdom, when imbued with concentration, brings great fruit and profit. The mind which is imbued with wisdom can become completely free from the corruptions or the confusions of sense desire, becoming, false views, and ignorance." And he went around saying this over and over and over.

So concentration brings fruit when it's imbued with sila. On a very simple level, we can see this quite clearly. Concentration, one description of it, is a steadiness, a calmness, a unification of mind. Sila really means harmony—harmony of our inner attitude and our actions, and so harmony with others and with the world. Concentration, this integration of mind, is not really possible without harmony. And you'll have plenty of time to see that here, or in life outside of here.

You do some unskillful action—tell a fib, or yell at somebody, or take something that isn't yours—and then go sit. It's really hard to feel in harmony. The mind spins. I feel it physically in my body. It can be filled with remorse or guilt or fear that somebody will find out. It's not harmonious. The mind is not calm. You can see from this the obvious cause and effect relationship in such a simple example.

The Buddha's teaching of our work with sila is just this pragmatic. It's based on understanding—this is incredibly simplistic the way I'm saying this—but it's based on this understanding of cause and effect: that if we act in a certain way, certain effects are going to come. Essentially, this is the teaching of kamma, or karma. I'll go into that in a minute.

So this teaching of working with an understanding and harmony of behavior, with developing harmlessness as a way of being, is not based on a coerced adherence to some set of rules. It's not something that is to be forced on us from the outside. It's very interesting to me that sila, these three parts of the path concerning our speech and action, are not the first parts of the path. The first two steps of the Eightfold Path begin with right understanding, leading to right thought or intention or attitude, depending on the translation. So it is this understanding, this attitude of mind, that then leads us into our actions, not the reverse.

The precepts are not given as compulsory commandments, because that's not the way we work with them to develop understanding and freedom of mind. It's not about blind obedience. That's not where understanding arises. It arises through our open, non-judgmental acknowledgement and investigation of what's present.

So according to this Eightfold Path, the beginning of our journey of liberation is the beginning of insight—that we have some opening, some insight that changes our mistaken understanding of the way things are, that opens us up in some new way to the nature of reality. Some of these laws that Fred spoke of last night: of impermanence, of the unsatisfactoriness of this changing world, of the sense that there is no separate, solid self.

As we first begin to awaken, as our understanding first begins to bloom, sila then begins to come into our way of acting and being as the natural expression of our understanding. Our actions are the natural expression of our attitudes of mind, of how we understand who we are and our relationship to the world.

Again, a simple example—I'm trying to keep these really simple. Say one begins to get a sense of this experience of cause and effect in one's life. Actually, when we start to see that acting in a certain way brings a certain result, it's also a beginning of understanding of anatta, of no separate self, because you start to see that everything is arising dependent on the condition that precedes it, rather than some autonomous separate individual who can just do whatever they want and nothing will happen.

So one begins to have an understanding that if I act in a certain way, it brings certain effects. That can then lead to the thought, "Oh, when I lie, people don't trust me." And not liking that feeling, one then has a willingness to change one's behavior. Without that original understanding that how I act somehow has an effect on how people relate to me, there would be no willingness to even investigate what's making people relate to me in this way. What understanding am I coming from that's feeding my behavior?

For myself, in my own practice, I experience working with this area of action more and more deeply as a practice of the heart. Not so much anymore an imposed idea of "Well, it's bad to talk about other people. I shouldn't do it because people won't like me or it'll spoil my image" or whatever. Those kinds of shoulds imposed from outside, that outward conformity—it does have a certain effect in cleaning up our act. I mean, if that's the only way I can relate to the precepts, I'd rather do it that way than go around hurting people. But really, it's induced more from fear and shame—fear that I'd be found out somehow, or blamed. And that's not an experience of harmony. It lacks the inner understanding and commitment that really gives our work with our speech and actions the compelling power and understanding that can help us become free.

So more and more I experience my relationship to my actions, and I really feel it in my heart. It's like a movement of my heart. When I do something that's really out of harmony—I don't know, I tell a little fib or I speak in a very cutting way to someone—I don't anymore usually have to even wait to get the reaction back from that person to know that I did something that's out of harmony or harmful. I feel it immediately. Like a tension, a heaviness, a clenching up. It's really quite symbiotic.

And it feeds the sense of harmony more and more, our understanding of the fact that we're all completely interdependent. In my doing something that is ostensibly harming someone else, I almost immediately experience a sense of disharmony, some level of suffering in myself. Sila is really grounded in this understanding of our oneness with all beings. It's the way Sayadaw U Pandita phrases it, which I find quite lovely: acting out of the understanding of oneness with all beings.

So when this is the basis, we can't help but begin to sense inwardly when our actions are having an effect of causing disharmony outwardly. It gets so you can't—I can't anyway—so easily separate whether I'm harming another person or harming myself. What's happening is an overall sense of suffering and disharmony. The sense of separation becomes stronger when I do something that's really out of sync.

So sila is based on and grows out of our understanding of a sense of oneness with all others. But then as we continue to investigate our actions, when we fall out of this sense of oneness, when we do something that's unskillful, that continuing to investigate again deepens and deepens our understanding of our sense of interconnectedness. It's really quite a lovely practice.

Another literal translation of sila is actually "practice." And I think that's really important to remember. It's a practice. It's not about expecting we should be these perfect beings, not harming ourselves or anyone else. It means we're continuing to grow always in harmony between our inner attitude and our outer actions. We're never perfect. Or anyway, so far I haven't met the person who is. There's always more to explore. And I don't find this discouraging. I find it inspiring and fascinating. It gives me the impetus to really investigate.

The Buddha said several times something I really like in working with this: that by protecting others through our actions of non-harming, we protect ourselves from the results of unskillful actions, from remorse, whatever. He also said that through protecting ourselves by not doing actions that will bring us unskillful fruits, we're protecting others. So it gets to a point where how can you tell the difference between self and other? There really isn't any.

This idea that we're protecting ourselves through non-harming action actually leads into the crux of understanding this practice of sila. Because it's not a practice of blame or of judgment, but it's an expression of the understanding, as I said, that certain types of action will inevitably, at some point, bring certain types of fruit or results. Very pragmatic, very simple.

This is the beginning understanding of karma, or kamma. The word kamma simply means action. Action and fruit. Cause and effect. And often it's quite observable and pretty pragmatic. If someone is a really violent, abusive person, that's the kind of reaction that they'll tend to get from people in life. They'll experience situations of anger and being used and abused quite often. Someone who is very generous and loving often will meet that same type of response in the people that they come in contact with.

Of course that's a simple and straightforward example. As we all know, it's nowhere near that simple and straightforward. And that's because while what we experience as results arises from how we act, the level that's really important for us to understand is that how we act flows from our understanding.

Sila or karma, both of these—they're a morality of intention, of volition in the mind. It's the intention that carries the importance, that carries the weight, that bears the fruit. All thought, speech, and action of we common folk who are not completely enlightened—all thought, speech, and action—each has a volitional force, an intention in the mind that brings about that thought, speech, and action. This can be very subtle, and a great deal of the time we might not be aware of it.

So the weakest intention would manifest as thought. For example, "Oh, I'd like an ice cream cone."

When the intention's a little stronger, it manifests as speech—you say that to somebody, or maybe out loud to yourself. And when the intention's at its strongest, you hop in the car and go down and get an ice cream cone. It's action. Just very straightforward.

So again, an action is seen or considered skillful or unskillful. It's not exactly bad and good. Skillful just means that's the kind of fruits it will bring. Unskillful will bring unskillful fruits based not so much on the action itself, but on the intention of mind that's driving that action.

An action is considered skillful when the intention in the mind is associated with mental states of non-greed—generosity, caring, renunciation. Skillful when it's associated with non-hatred—friendliness, metta, compassion, acceptance, the whole list. Skillful when the action is coming from a volition that's associated with non-delusion, non-confusion, not a sense of a strong ego or separate self—equanimity, insight.

And of course, the converse. An action is seen as unskillful when it's arising out of intentions in the mind of greed, of wanting, of anger, fear, hatred, of complete confusion, ignorance, delusion, a clouded mind.

So that desire for ice cream, if it's coming out of a really strong craving, it would be an unskillful action because it's driven by the volition of strong greed in the mind. But what's interesting is that the same action can be quite skillful when the intention driving it is different. If you're going to get ice cream because you want to bring it to another person as an act of generosity, the motivating force in that case is generosity. The same action becomes quite skillful.

So you see how it's very subtle—incredibly subtle, actually. The Buddha said there are four things that will drive people mad to think about them, and one of them is the workings of karma. So I don't want to go into it too much right now. I always fall back on that when I start to try and look at karma and figure it out. Oh, it doesn't make any sense—then I remember what he said.

The same action can be skillful or not, depending on what motivates it. There's a favorite story in the suttas of a blind monk who was doing walking meditation and was killing ants while he walked. The other monks all ran to the Buddha and said, "How can this guy be so enlightened? He's breaking the first precept. He's killing all these ants."

And the Buddha said, "He has absolutely no intention to kill those ants. He doesn't know it's happening. His intention is quite pure in doing his walking meditation. It's not an unskillful action."

This is where mindfulness becomes our best friend—being able to turn the mindfulness onto the sense of what's the motivation, what's driving this action. And to see that without judgment. We're not trying to blame ourselves and say what rotten people we are, but simply to see without judgment: what's the intention that's driving this speech, this action? What's the understanding that's coming from? And in this seeing, wisdom begins to arise.

I'd like to share some reflections—some mine and some other people's—on working with the five precepts themselves. Hopefully this will give some sense of what I've been experiencing, which is the increasing depth and subtlety and breadth that comes to be seen in working with each of these precepts. There are so many areas that each precept includes, until really each one covers all areas of our life, connected with everyone else's life. And I've been finding it wonderful.

First, working with the five precepts is a practice that has been in Buddhism really almost since very soon after the Buddha was enlightened. It's said that the first person he gave the five precepts to was a man whose son had just ordained. The son was the sixth person that the Buddha ordained after his enlightenment. The Buddha was enlightened and went and found his five former ascetic friends, taught them, and they ordained. Then this young man was the sixth person—a very rich young man. His father came to the Buddha, and he didn't really want to ordain, but he said, "Well, what can I do that will help me to live more like my son?" And the Buddha's answer was the five precepts.

I really see them as guidelines, as directions in which we incline the mind. For example, taking the first precept of not killing or not harming other beings—Thich Nhat Hanh, who is a wonderful Zen master, poet, and peace activist, in talking about this particular precept says it's a very difficult precept. And what is essential is not that we expect to begin by being perfect in not killing or not harming, but that we go in that direction, that we incline our mind in the direction of total non-harming.

He also suggests that we take mindfulness as the first precept. And I like this a lot, because he says, think of mindfulness as the fundamental precept. When you're mindful, you're responsible. And then the precepts are not needed to dictate our behavior. And it's really true. If I'm really paying attention, I'm not so likely to say something harsh or cutting. I definitely won't steal because you just can't do it when you're really paying attention.

So we use the precepts as guidelines, as signposts for the many times when we're not so mindful.

Not killing. It really is an incredibly complex and difficult thing—not to kill any living being, and expanding it further, to non-harming of any living being. Can anyone do it perfectly? Over the years what I've found happening is that it's been sinking deeper into my being as a way of being rather than as a way of acting.

This is from Robert Aitken: "The practice of peace and harmony is peace and harmony, not some technique designed to induce them." Like Thich Nhat Hanh says—being peace, not figuring out what we have to do to get peaceful.

Yet with all our really clear, unconfused intentions, not killing is a very complex issue. What about working in the garden? Never mind not using insecticides, but just killing the worms when you spade the earth. What do you do when a place is overrun with cockroaches? We've been debating that here for years, and seriously—it's a very difficult situation. How do you find the answer?

You know that story of the Zen Center—I'm not sure where it was, I think it was in Minnesota—that was getting overrun with cockroaches. And the students went to the master and said, "Nobody's coming to sit because cockroaches are crawling all over them. What should we do? It's against the precept to kill, but otherwise no one's going to come." And he said, "I'm not going to tell you."

But you see, that's throwing us back on the real power and value of working with our relationship to non-killing, to non-harming, in our own being. Just having someone else tell us what to do begs the whole question.

It's complicated. What about when a place is completely overrun with fleas and unlivable? That happened once to the house across the street when I was manager here. I walked in and walked out literally thirty seconds later covered with fleas all over my legs. What do you do when you're renting it to people and they need to live there? There are no easy answers. Only questions, and each of us finding our own really honest relationship to that.

And then I can feel, okay, not killing motivated by anger or aversion—that's pretty clear. And then I've started to see the levels where killing can happen in me from indifference, or laziness, or just not paying attention. For me, the classic example is when I step in a bathtub or a shower somewhere and I don't have my glasses on. Standing up, I can't tell what's on the bottom. Is it just a little speck of dirt or is it a little spider? And if I don't feel like squatting all the way down and looking, I could quite easily be killing things out of indifference. The effect isn't so immediately observable, but actually now I've reached the point where if I don't look down, I don't know whether I harmed anything—but I feel terrible. And it's getting really interesting.

And then it can expand further. How does what we take into our experience—into our mind through the sense doors—how does that affect our mind and heart? How does that affect others? Does it affect our actions?

For example, the incredible amount of violence in the culture in this country. And it is more in this country—I've just been in England, and I feel so different there, aside from London, than how I feel here. There's so much more violence here. Is it fed by the amount of violence in TV and movies? Many times I've read in newspapers of crimes, of murders that seem to be acted out from some show that was on TV a week or two ago—the exact similar motif. It's scary.

So I have to wonder, am I part of that? Am I participating in that? If I pay money to go see a movie that has that kind of violence in it, in a way I'm supporting putting that out into the culture.

If I even just flick it on on the TV, am I supporting it even by indifference? I don't know. These are just questions that come up in my mind.

Thich Nhat Hanh takes it further. He says, in his view, that because alcohol requires so much grain to produce it, when we drink alcohol we're using something that has taken grain that could have been used to feed starving people—because so much of the world's grain goes into making alcohol, which seems unnecessary. So then he questions: by drinking alcohol, am I unintentionally contributing to starvation in the world? You see, it's a very complex question. And that's without even going into the fact that every time we drive in a car, we squash bugs. Every time we boil water, we kill microbes. Things that, in a way, we really can't avoid as part of being human.

But I think you get the idea, and I could just go on and on. There's an incredible potential for deeper investigation. And as I investigate in this area more and more, it's not a sense of, "Oh, I'm so horrible—I'm walking and I'm killing unseen beings." It's much more that we become more and more finely attuned to our essential oneness in this world, oneness with all other beings. It's actually quite lovely. And as we bring our attention to this precept, this sense of oneness just gets stronger and stronger, and also more and more levels of subtlety emerge.

The second precept is taking the precept not to take what is not given. So this is already expanded quite a bit beyond simply not stealing—it encompasses much more. And again, most of us will say, "Well, not stealing is pretty straightforward and not so difficult. We don't do blatant stealing." But then, you know, what about when you go in the bathroom and someone left their shampoo and it's just the kind you've always wanted to try? They'll never care or notice. And probably they wouldn't care. But again, it's checking back: what's the intention that this action is coming from? Is it coming from an intention of "I really want to try this shampoo, I like the way it..."—so there's greed.

And again, expanding to find it not just in the passive mode of not taking what's not given, but more actively cultivating a sense of open-hearted generosity of being. On another level, I relate to this precept as having a sense of inner contentment—not being in that mode of needing, wanting something else. There's this Zen phrase: "The self and the world are just as they are." So can that be enough? The sense of inner contentment with just what is.

In looking at not taking what is not given, not getting into the mind that's needy—this is Robert Aitken's way of looking at it—it's much more than just not stealing objects. When we're in this state of inner poverty, in a gaining mentality, that's really where stealing or taking what's not given comes from. We're also, he says, in a way stealing from ourselves. We're stealing time, but much more we're stealing from ourselves peace—the possibility of being able to be with what is, with appreciation, with clear seeing. There's no chance to be at peace in the moment when we're in this space of needing, gaining, inner poverty.

This is from the Tao Te Ching: "If you realize that you have enough, you are truly rich. Be content with what you have, rejoice in the way things are. When you realize there is nothing lacking, the whole world belongs to you."

It's really true. And as this understanding becomes stronger and stronger in our heart, when we're content, when we know nothing is lacking, the whole world belongs to us. From this understanding, who could possibly steal? There's nothing to want. It's really quite beautiful.

And then I wonder sometimes: is creating needs part of our economic system? Is that what advertising does on a rampant scale? Is that stealing from people? And do I participate in it? I was looking at the New York Times Magazine the other day—I mean, how many new perfumes do we need in this world?

And there were several pages announcing this new perfume and that new perfume, all these seductive-looking women. Do we need any of this? It's certainly moving us away from a sense of inner contentment. Is it in a way stealing?

And of course, as we all know, the growing wants, the way that we live in the first world, in the industrialized countries—the corporations take so much in resources and timber from countries that are really very poor. It's hard for me not to think of this as stealing in a way. And I'm definitely participating in it in the way that I relate to using resources, in the way that I relate to just hopping in the car and driving an hour on a whim, and keeping the heat turned really up, or just not remembering to turn it down when I leave the house because there's always enough for us.

This again is almost indifference, just choosing not to pay attention to the effects that my actions are having in a wider sphere. And so I wonder, is it stealing?

This is from Mahatma Gandhi: "We are not always aware of our real needs and most of us improperly multiply our wants and thus unconsciously make thieves of ourselves. If we devote some thought to the subject, we'll find that we can get rid of quite a number of wants. One who follows the observance of non-stealing will bring about a progressive reduction of one's own wants. Much of the distressing poverty in this world has arisen out of the breaches of the principle of non-stealing."

So again, those are just thoughts that come to me in looking at this. And I really feel with this precept, as with all the others—which I'll just name briefly—that in working with all of them, I have a feeling I'll never get to the end of it in my lifetime. There's so much to learn about our interconnection, about the subtleties of my own intention and motivation and how I act, and the possibility of really moving into much greater freedom in the mind through my willingness to give this area attention. My willingness to investigate not out of self-judgment, not by blaming myself for being rotten because I broke a precept again, but simply out of a wanting to learn.

So it's the same for the other three precepts: not misusing our sexuality to bring harm to ourselves or another; not lying or using harsh or abusive speech; not taking intoxicants or drugs that cloud our mind. Basically, they throw us into a state of delusion. And as Sayadaw U Pandita says, then it's really easy to break all the other four and bring everyone else along with you. It's really true.

I find it inspiring when I notice I've done something out of harmony, breaking one of the precepts, to use that as a signal to check back into my motivation rather than thinking what a horrible person I am. I investigate what understanding I was acting out of that led to this action. When I'm aware of it and just feel awful, rather than saying, "Oh no, you're so bad, I'll never lie again, I promise, I'm really going to be good"—that doesn't really help. No understanding comes out of that, just a sense of self-blame and restriction and trying to adhere to some goal. It doesn't really lead on to liberation.

But if I take that awareness—oh, I lied—and ask, what was going on there? What was the understanding that arose out of? I look back and see, well, I wanted to look good. And wanting to look good came out of a feeling of fear that I wouldn't, or that I'd be seen for what I really was, that I did something I didn't want this person to know. And fear is a form of aversion. And going back further, that fear was arising out of some image that I'm identified with of who Carol is or who Carol should be. In bringing attention to that identification with that image, in that moment it can really dissolve. And in that moment there's a sense of freedom, a sense of just being with what is. No blame.

This is the possibility of freedom that can come to us from working with the precepts on deeper and deeper and more powerful levels. It really is part of our practice of liberation.

CHAPTER 234

Qualities of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 46 min

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of sati (mindfulness) and its distinctive qualities that make it, as the Buddha taught, our greatest protection in life. She begins by examining how the mental defilements (kilesas) of greed, hatred, and delusion act as filters that distort our perception, citing psychological research demonstrating how we unconsciously avoid threatening stimuli or develop tunnel vision when wanting something intensely.
>
> Wilson identifies four key qualities of mindfulness: its alert, energetic nature that springs from genuine interest rather than grim determination; its capacity to meet experience directly without hesitation or discrimination; its ability to know bare experience as distinct from our interpretations and concepts; and its fundamentally non-violent, spacious quality that allows all experiences to arise and pass without manipulation. She explains how mindfulness works together with effort and concentration—using the analogy of throwing a stone at a wet mud wall—and emphasizes that each moment of sati is a moment of purification where greed, hatred, and delusion cannot arise.
> The talk offers practical guidance for practitioners, encouraging recognition that continuity of mindfulness is developed moment by moment, like rubbing brass until it becomes a mirror. Wilson concludes with the profound teaching that true liberation comes from within—through knowing the truth of each moment for ourselves through direct experience, a freedom that no one can give us or take away.

Tonight I want to talk about the qualities of mindfulness. In Pali the word is sati, which I might use throughout the talk, because mindfulness is a fairly specific quality of mind. We've been talking about it a lot and we will continue to do so because it's the linchpin of our practice here.

I want to speak about it specifically because the qualities of mindfulness are something we can experience very directly when we're paying attention. My hope is to help us get more familiar with what these qualities of sati are so that we can recognize them when they're present and also understand that they can be developed. This isn't something we just hope falls from the sky by the grace of God. In my own practice, I find it helpful to explore and investigate these qualities.

The Buddha said once that sati, mindfulness, is the greatest protection we have in life—and it's the only protection we need in life. In a very obvious way, we can see that sati is a protection in our mind from being completely overwhelmed by the forces of greed, of hatred or aversion, of delusion. These disturbances of the mind and heart—kilesas, torments of the mind, defilements, all these different words.

Most of us know this, at least on a very obvious level. We know that when we're really consumed by anger or by wanting, we can't see a situation clearly. We're not protected.

I've seen this just in the last couple of days here. Several people have come to see me—and probably there are just as many others that I'm not seeing—who find themselves in some situation where they're either really angry at someone here or really wanting something very badly. They'll have this incredible string of machinations to go through to acquire something, and there's a sense of, "Is this a little out of balance? Is this really accurate? Am I getting carried away here?"

I think that's the beginning of wisdom. We know our perception of what's going on is really distorted. We can't trust it. We're being overwhelmed at that point by greed or hatred or confusion. Mindfulness can protect us from this.

We start to become aware of these distortions when we're really gripped by them. That's the first step to knowing actuality—to know that our perception is really distorted. But these disturbances work on many, many more subtle levels than this in our experience.

Joseph has spoken of this factor of perception in our experience, the recognition quality of what's happening that's present in each moment. The noting practice is in fact a function of this perception, its ability to recognize. When the qualities of greed, hatred, and delusion—in all their many ramifications, I'm not naming them all, but we all know them well enough—when they're arising in the mind, even in very subtle ways, those qualities act as filters on our perception. When perception occurs, we're actually not able to perceive correctly what the experience is. Then our responses and reactions are based on this incorrect, confused perception. It just goes from one confusion and difficulty to the next, and we wonder why things don't seem to work.

My favorite example of this comes from a book called Vital Lies, Simple Truths: The Psychology of Self-Deception by Daniel Goleman. He gives examples of scientific psychological experiments that were carried out looking at how our perception can be so biased or distorted, how things can actually be shut out of conscious perception.

Let me begin with how aversion works. Aversion is simply that movement of the mind, of the attention, away from something that's unpleasant, difficult, terrorizing, excruciatingly painful, or just very mildly unpleasant. That movement filters our perception.

There are examples of ways the mind seems to block conscious knowing or even conscious perception of stimuli that are actually or potentially threatening, painful, or fearful. The first example he gives is from last century, of someone who was being mauled by a lion. This person was conscious throughout the experience and lived through it, reporting afterwards that obviously his body was really being ripped apart, but he was not in touch with being in pain. The speculation is that somehow it's a survival mechanism of our body—if he'd been overcome with the pain and the shock of that, he probably never would have been able to maintain presence of mind to get away.

The book continues theorizing that this defense mechanism might also work with stimuli that are not actually physically painful or threatening, but that are emotionally threatening or anxiety-producing, or only possibly anxiety-producing.

The experiment I remember involved subjects looking at a series of different pictures and then having to later remember and recount what the different pictures were. At the same time, the researchers had some device that could measure very precisely where the person's eyeball looked, so they could tell if they'd looked at the whole picture or if they'd avoided certain parts.

The one I remember is a picture where part of it would be completely neutral—like some guy sitting there reading a newspaper—and then the other half would be completely out of context with that. In this case, it was something sexually suggestive and really out of context with the rest of the picture. People for whom that was threatening or anxiety-provoking, when later recounting the pictures, wouldn't remember that part at all. They would only remember the man reading the newspaper.

But even more interesting, the researchers could measure that somehow their eyes had known not to even look at that half of the picture. This is really deeply conditioned. And so, of course, our perception is skewed.

It's distorted. And sometimes this might be necessary—repressing memories of things like childhood trauma when you have to continue in the situation and it would be literally unbearable. But we do it so many times when it's not necessary, like looking at a picture that's going to bring up a little anxiety.

The same with the tendency of mind of grasping, of moving toward. It gives us a sense of tunnel vision. Expectations of what we want tend to keep the mind from perceiving stimuli or experience that is outside of that or in the way. For this experiment, they showed subjects a four-minute video of a very fast basketball game—the ball passing back and forth between people a lot. The assignment was to count very precisely how many times the ball was passed. That was all that was said. And in the middle of this, apparently a woman dressed in white with a white parasol sauntered across the middle of the basketball court. Nobody commented on it when recounting how many times the ball was passed. When they were told about it, they were shocked. They couldn't believe it had happened. And then when they showed the video, of course you couldn't miss it. "How could I have ever not seen that?"

How often has that happened in our meditation? It's like, "Oh, right—wanting. How could I not see that was wanting?" It hits you in the face.

This skewing of our perception of reality—this is what we call delusion. And things don't work. No wonder we're out of touch. We are out of touch. We don't know what's happening half the time, but we think we do. We have these huge blind spots in our perception, in our idea of what our experience really is. Selective memory, selective perception, unconscious choosing of what to notice and what not to notice.

There's aversion—avoidance, denial of anything that's potentially painful or threatening to our worldview, which we might not even be aware of. Outright denial. There's the wanting mind—how greed gives us tunnel vision. We only see what we want or need and discount or avoid other things. And then there's identification—the sense of identifying with any part or moment of our experience as me, as a solid, lasting, unchanging I. Perhaps the most insidious of these qualities.

For example, we identify with the idea, "I am stupid." And then we proceed to only acknowledge any perception that fits that idea and to completely discount any perception that doesn't. I do it myself. Ten people will come up and say, "Oh, you did such and so really well." And I think, "No, they're stupid. They don't know. They didn't listen." The eleventh person comes and says, "That stank." And I go, "Yeah, you're really right."

We do this a lot. Delusion. Filtering, skewing our perception, which then colors and skews our whole experience of reality. This is suffering.

And this is where the power of sati, the power of mindfulness, comes in. It's an amazingly powerful force for cutting through this ability we have to avoid and deceive ourselves. Through cultivating this quality of mindfulness, what happens as we work with it is the light of awareness, of acknowledgment—it begins to shine equally on whatever object, whatever experience is arising into our consciousness at any given moment. We're not discriminating: "I'll pick some, maybe I'll pay attention to that. No, no, no, I won't pay attention to that one. Ignore it." We just begin to shine the light of mindfulness equally on whatever happens to be arising, without choice.

And this then begins to include even the filters. In some ways, that's why after we've been sitting as long as we have now, sometimes things seem worse. Because what you're seeing is greed and aversion and confusion. You think, "God, I'm so much worse than when I started." But it's because the mindfulness, sati, is getting stronger.

And we're seeing what we previously didn't even know was there. Previously unattended experiences are now being received with this equal, non-discriminating quality of sati, and they begin to come into awareness. We're not so driven to deny and avoid painful things, or to desperately hold on to the pleasant. And a little bit at least, this to-ing and fro-ing of the mind and heart begins to be calmed down.

This drive, this to-ing and fro-ing, is the source of our conflict. And we all have moments—I'm sure you must have all had at least one moment in the two weeks that we've been doing intensive practice now—where this to-ing and fro-ing just for a moment ceases. And instead of having our perception colored with confusion, aversion, wanting, it's just clear. The stillness, the peace that is more our real nature is allowed to shine forth. It becomes apparent.

And thus, it's not always some spectacular moment. It's those times when you're just sitting there drinking a cup of tea, and suddenly that's all. It's just totally the lifting, or the sensation, or the taste. And later, in retrospect, you think, "That was the most wonderful cup of tea." There was nothing different about that cup of tea. It was that in that moment there was no wanting it to continue, no aversion, just total presence. Mindfulness was strong, that clarity of no delusion. Appreciating the exquisiteness of the trees today, but not wanting it to continue, just seeing it clearly.

Those moments are moments when our perception of presence is not so distorted, when mindfulness is stronger, and the sense of the stillness, the peace that is what we are, is more apparent.

These disturbances, these distortions—greed, hatred, delusion—they're really strong. They're also impermanent. Without sati, we tend to take them for granted. We don't even notice them. We think, "Well, this is the way it is." We think that's who we are. And it's not.

When we bring our fullness of attention to the experience, then we begin to find that what we assume to be true is not necessarily so. And sati is the quality of mind that does this, that lets us come face to face, as it were, with direct experience, and to know it for what it really is. Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master and poet, said once that to have a correct perception, we need to have a direct encounter. That's what mindfulness is—a direct encounter with each moment of experience.

So what are these qualities of mindfulness, this observing power? It's much more than a kind of vague, general sense of awareness that we sometimes can think of it as. There are a few qualities I want to talk about, and hopefully, as I talk about them, see if you can really feel it experientially, what the quality of energetic experience is that I'm describing. Because at different moments, we've all experienced it. Rather than filing it away in the mind as another idea—"Oh, let me remember these four qualities of mindfulness"—forget it. That won't help. But just sit and let it come in and see if you can feel or recognize any of these qualities in your experience.

So the first is that sati is a very alert, active quality of attention. It's very energetic, but the energy springs not from a driving, grim force, but from interest—a really deep interest. And we're all capable of a very precise, sustained quality of interest. When you go to the movies, there's a certain quality of interest, unless it's really a lousy movie. There's a sense of not knowing what's going to happen in the next moment, even if it's not a suspense movie, but even more if it is. And so we're really present just to be there and see what happens in the next moment. And we can all do that for a period of an hour or two hours.

And it's the same in our life. We don't know what's going to happen in the next moment. When you sit down to sit, you have no idea what's going to happen in the next moment of sitting, or the next moment of walking. I often, when I'm on retreat, sit down and go, "Okay, what's the show going to be this time?" Who knows? And so, can we bring the same quality of interest to our life process that we can bring to a movie?

I was in San Francisco during the Super Bowl last year. For those of you from out of the country, this is this big American football playoff when for some reason the whole country has to stop and watch this game for three hours. And San Francisco was where one of the teams was from.

I have a lot of friends there, and everybody I knew—and everyone I didn't know—stopped and watched this game. So I watched it too. And the quality of interest and attention was unbelievable. Every single move. It was not a pure interest; it was definitely tainted with expectation and greed. It was not undiscriminating. But it was very powerful.

And I thought later, why can't we bring Super Bowl mind to our life? Why is our life so boring while what Joe Montana throws a football around is so fascinating? We have the ability, but are we willing? Are we interested enough to use it?

When we have that interest, then this alert quality, this energetic quality of mindfulness is present without forcing. We have this alert attention that moves without discrimination or hesitation.

This might sound kind of technical, but it's actually the way one can sometimes experience noting something. It's as if an experience arises into our consciousness—a sensation, a sound, a thought, whatever—and immediately the knowing mind rises up to meet it. Immediately the knowing mind moves to that sensation, that sound, notes it, and really sinks into it, knows it for what it is. There's no hesitation, and there's no discrimination. There's a sensation, immediately the knowing mind arises, it's as if it moves to it, notes it, sinks into it, becomes it. "Oh, there's throbbing, throbbing"—and just really with it.

We don't hesitate: "Oh, should I note this? I don't know, I don't like it so much, I'll wait till a nicer sensation comes along." That doesn't really work, because that moment of hesitation, of discrimination, is of course the moment when the distortions can come flooding in. If we hesitate, it's usually because something is a little unpleasant, threatening, or we're clinging possibly—there's wanting going on, there's something more pleasant going on. "This calm is so nice. And if I notice that pain, it might get worse and then the calm will go away. So we'll just pretend it's not there and stay with the calm. Calm, calm, calm." You're noting calm in a total state of tension. It doesn't work to hesitate or discriminate.

So mindfulness has this active quality of the knowing mind springing up and coming to meet whatever it is without time to hesitate or think about it. You can see from this that this alert quality of sati needs energy. We can't just kind of settle back thinking, "Well, something will happen and then the mindfulness will come—oh yeah, that sensation." It doesn't last too long. It tends to peter out.

I've spoken before about the Eightfold Path, how it's divided into three segments: one segment dealing with wisdom, one segment dealing with morality, and the last three-part segment is called the samadhi group or the concentration group. Those are the factors of right effort or energy, right mindfulness, and right concentration. These three qualities—energy, mindfulness, concentration—work together. So I want to give an example of how the energy supports and sustains the mindfulness.

The classic example they give—you can tell this comes from Asia—is throwing a stone at a wet mud wall. To throw the stone, to aim it and really throw it hard enough to connect with the wall, takes a certain amount of effort. It takes energy. Otherwise, there's never any connection that's going to happen, or you just miss it altogether. That's the effort. That's the energy factor. Then sati, the mindfulness, is like that stone hitting the wall and really hitting it squarely, directly, and sinking into it—clearly meeting the wall, knowing it. It's not a superficial quality. It doesn't just kind of hit the wall and glance off. It really sinks in, it knows it for what it is. Then with the help of enough energy to really reach the wall and the mindfulness to meet it, sink in, know it for what it is, the stone can stay stuck in the wet mud for a long period of time—and that's the concentration.

So you see how the three all work together and need to be balanced together. They support and strengthen one another. Sati needs this active quality of energy.

But in my own practice, I've found it important not to mistake effort for sati—that sometimes when I'm not quite knowing what's happening, there's a sense of just push, push, push and the mindfulness will get stronger. You can push, but you could be pushing in the wrong direction too. The mindfulness is: we need enough energy to reach what's happening, but the mindfulness is meeting and really knowing what it is that's happening.

So that brings me to the next quality of sati, which is that it knows what's actually happening—the bare experience—as opposed to all our concepts and interpretations and ideas about what's happening. And again, we all know this. That's what we're all trying to do. It just can be quite insidious, how a concept or interpretation can get so bound up, so tied up into the experience that we keep mistaking the interpretation for the bare experience.

A very simple example: someone is following the breath, rise and fall, rise and fall, and it's tight and unpleasant. And the idea, the interpretation, starts up: "I'm such a rigid, controlling, tight person." And it's believed, identified with, and it becomes inseparable in one's mind from the sensation of the tightness of the breath. When we confuse the two like this, we're taking "I'm a rigid, controlling person" to be the actuality of the experience. When we're confusing the interpretation with the actual experience, that's where these skewed perceptions begin to arise. In this case, the whole experience is colored with identification and aversion. We're losing touch with reality again.

Each breath then strengthens the concept. "Oh, I'm so rigid and controlling. I can't do anything about it. I'm so ungenerous." That gives rise to more aversion, which, unseen, gives rise to more proliferation of thought—memories of how rigid and controlling we've been in our whole life, how we'll continue to be in the future—more resistance, more aversion. Pretty soon the whole thing is set in concrete and breathing becomes a torment. And we all do this in many ways.

It's right here, right when we're in such a place like this—even before we get there too, but once we're in it—that mindfulness is really such a powerful protection. When I was writing this earlier, I had a conceptual idea that this is true, and just before, walking outside, some things started going on in my mind—feeling nervous, thinking about something else, not noticing the trees, feeling tightness. And suddenly I realized: yes, sati is our strongest protection.

Because what one does is, in that moment of sati, coming out of all the "this means that" and "I feel like this" and "what about this," just dropping into the bare experience. Tightness. Hearing. Walking. Aversion. Thinking. In that moment of our conscious, knowing mind coming together directly with the experience—whatever it is, with the tight breath, with the sensation of tightness, with the aversion, with the unpleasantness, with the thought—mindfulness brings us face to face with that experience, just as it is.

And it's such a strong protection, the sati, because in that moment of coming into direct contact, really sinking into the sensation of tightness in the breath, in that one moment there's no room for overpowering greed or aversion or confusion to come up and overwhelm us. The attention and the arising experience are connected. They're really closely sinking into one another, and there's not room for all these disturbances to come in. This we can actually experience over and over and over. It's incredibly powerful—simply knowing and being with the bare experience.

Like just before, when I was walking over here from next door, what I just described: I was kind of knowing, "Oh, the trees are pretty, the wind is blowing, this is a lovely night, I'm feeling tension"—just all the kilesas starting to expand. And in that moment of connecting with tightness, the whole thing just drops away. There's just a sense of tightness and the knowing of it, and there's not a problem. It's unpleasant and the knowing of it, and it's not a problem. It just cuts through all that proliferation and distortion. That's why such moments—when we're just with the breath, or we've been fighting a pain the whole sitting and suddenly we're just with it and there's not a problem—are so fulfilling. Because again, that distortion, that clouding of our perception, is not there. There's no conflict.

This is what we call a moment of purification of the mind. Often we talk about this as a path of purification—a purification because in that moment, and a moment is quick, admittedly, but in that moment these disturbances of greed, hatred, and delusion are not arising in that moment of mindfulness, of close connection with what's going on. In the next moment, they may arise again. But in this moment, they're not. And that is a very powerful moment. It's breaking the momentum of the delusion, the identification, the anger. It might not seem like much, and often it's no big deal of an experience to say, "Okay, big deal."

I had a moment of mindfulness and the rest of the day I was lost in confusion. Big deal. I'm going to do this for three months.

But it is powerful. It is a very powerful moment. Don't underestimate it. It's a moment of purification. It's a moment where instead of strengthening the power of anger, the power of confusion by just feeding into it, we're cutting. That momentum is being cut right there. And what is being strengthened and conditioned is the power of mindfulness.

It's been said that a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom. Just a moment. But it's also true that each moment that is conditioned by sati is the cause for succeeding moments of mindfulness to arise. And in fact, mindfulness is the strongest cause for mindfulness to arise. So each moment is slowly building on each preceding moment. And it's a very powerful conditioning force.

It's like Sharon talked about getting wet in the fog the other morning. We don't really notice it when it's happening. It's like filling a bucket drop by drop, and it seems to take forever if what we're looking at is wanting to get to the top. But this is why we emphasize continuity so much—because each moment of mindfulness has a real power of purification, of clarity, of deconditioning the distortions. And it has a real power of bringing us into the next moment of mindfulness, the next moment of mindfulness. And so the continuity is the very important aspect of this practice.

Sayadaw U Pandita once gave the example of trying to use a piece of brass for a mirror. You look at it and it's all cloudy and you can't really see much of anything. So you start rubbing it and rubbing it and rubbing it. And each rub doesn't seem to do much at all. But eventually you can really see yourself quite clearly in it. You couldn't ever really point to where in the process it changed. But each rub is setting the conditions for the next one and the next one and the next one. And it's all a process of deepening purification and clarity.

It's also interesting to notice, in working with continuity, that in some ways I find it a huge relief. Not thinking about it—thinking about it is an incredible burden. If you think about being continuous every moment of the day, it's like, forget it. But the actual doing of it, I find in many ways to be an incredible relief. Because the doing of it doesn't mean "I'm going to be continuously mindful if it kills me for this next seventy-three minutes." The doing of it means, what's happening right now? Oh, tightness, releasing, lifting, drinking, washing. Whatever is happening, that's what we wake up and bring our attention back to.

And it's a relief because it takes away any sense of pressure that I've got to hurry and get through this and get to something more important. If eating is just as important as washing, is just as important as sitting, then all I have to do is be willing to bring my total attention and presence to this particular moment, whatever it is. It doesn't matter. And in some ways that takes away a sense of "I've got to really get there in the sitting, because the sitting is what it's all about." Turning the doorknob is just as important.

You start to see that it's the direct knowing, this quality of sati, that's important—not what the experience is that we're knowing. And for me, that took away a huge sense of striving to get some special experience so that then my meditation was okay. It takes it down to: Can I just be totally connected, bring the sati to bear to really face this experience of touching? And that's all.

I watched on a retreat once what happened—it was really kind of interesting. I guess I was in a mellow place because I didn't get into too much self-judging. I observed what happened when I had been quite continuous, and then what happened when I just kind of let it up. I remember clearly I was sitting in my room looking at a tree outside, looking at the leaves. I was very mindful. I was noting the seeing and the mind's reactions and the pleasantness and the liking. It was all very quiet. No big deal. And then, just sort of—I can't remember if I did it on purpose or not—I let up. I said, okay, I'll just take a break.

No noting, just being here. And it was a very peaceful experience because I was quite present. Within—I want to say like a minute, but I think it was more like a second—of not being particularly mindful, not in a striving way but just that willingness to be present, wanting and desire and aversion and opinions just came rushing in. It was really fascinating. A little disheartening. But just to see how when that connection isn't there, how mindfulness is such a protection. When there starts to be that space between the knowing mind and what's happening, the most conditioned things come in: "Oh, I like this, those leaves are nice, I'm kind of hungry, I think I'll go for a walk, what am I doing here? Oh, right, noting." And it was gone again. Really interesting.

The last really important quality: none of this is or can really be done through repression or forcing. Mindfulness does not function from repression or from forcing. It's energetic, yes, but it's not intense, tense striving.

If everything I've been saying sounds all very clear-cut, nice and clean—a lot of our experience isn't going to be like this. I am talking about these qualities to get us a sense of being familiar with them, as possibilities, as understanding the nature of sati, to recognize its energy, not to use it to beat ourselves up because every moment isn't this strong, face-to-face, alert, active attention and connecting. Often it won't be. And that's when this next quality is really important to bring in.

The quality that sati is totally non-violent, totally non-manipulative. It has nothing to do with trying to change experience or make it be a certain way or judge it. It's that completely allowing and accepting quality of mind—almost like a quality of mettā with whatever is arising. The quality that helps me most, and I'm just trying to use different words to invoke it, is a quality of spaciousness. This huge, wide spaciousness that directly acknowledges whatever is arising in our experience but is also totally spacious with whatever's arising.

The sense I got last night going outside with the beautiful, almost full moon, a couple of stars—that is an experience, very clear, very present. But the quality of all the space of the sky around it, acknowledging and holding that experience, almost as if cradling it. Yet there's no sense of, "Well, let's hold on. We don't want the moon to set." It doesn't make any sense. There's no sense of, "Oh, we don't like the moon, we wish it would go away and the sun would come back." In that quality of spaciousness, it can cradle and appreciate whatever comes and also let it go.

This is the other quality of sati that can balance the active, energetic quality. Yes, we really meet the experience, but with this wide, all-embracing spaciousness. The whole range of experiences can come and go, and it's not a problem. If we think we know what good practice looks like or what it should look like, and we don't notice this, then it's really hard to be spacious and allow any experience that doesn't fit that to really be met with mindfulness and spaciousness—to let it come, let it be present, let it go, and be there fully for it. With the spaciousness of the sky, there is no special experience to have. There's only the ability to be fully present, actively knowing it just for what it is, and letting it go.

So sati, our greatest protection, protects us from heedlessness—basically walking through life like we're asleep, not knowing what we're doing, performing unskillful acts, hurting ourselves or others from heedlessness, from not knowing what's going on. It protects us through purifying our mind, through moments of freedom from the distortions of greed, of aversion, of delusion. Sati weakens the power of these unwholesome mental states while it strengthens the power of seeing clearly.

Through the ability of sati to know deeply what is happening, just as it is, without discriminating in a superficial way, really deeply knowing—it lets us see and know the truth of any moment for ourselves, from our own experience, clear experience of the reality of this moment. A moment that's free from the distortions of these confusions, these disturbances of mind—that is a moment that is the condition for liberating insight and compassion to arise. Insight and compassion both arise from the direct knowing of reality in this moment.

Once we understand, once we know the truth for ourselves of who we are, what we are, what's the reality of this moment—to me that's the greatest protection of all. Because what we know for ourselves, nothing and no one can take away from us. No one can come and say, "That's not true." It doesn't matter. We know.

It's our own experience. No one else can give it to us either.

I'll close with a quotation by Alexander Solzhenitsyn, who was speaking about the day of liberation from the prison camps in Russia:

"The day of liberation—as if it were possible to liberate anyone who has not first become liberated in their own soul. Or as if it were possible to take away the freedom of anyone who is."

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 235

Balance of Perception

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental challenge in meditation practice: developing an evenness of perception that allows us to fully meet both the painful and the beautiful aspects of experience without getting lost in either. She illuminates the paradox that as we deepen our practice, we simultaneously open to greater suffering and to the sublime—and learning to hold both without denying either is essential to genuine freedom.
>
> Wilson draws on the Buddha's teaching of the Four Noble Truths, explaining how understanding dukkha requires us to meet and investigate our afflictions directly. She explores how the kilesas (defilements) of greed, hatred, and delusion color our perception like dye colors water, yet are not our intrinsic nature—they are like clouds temporarily covering the sun. Quoting the Third Zen Patriarch's teaching that "to set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind," she examines how our conditioned tendency toward duality creates unnecessary suffering.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing wholesome mental states when they arise, including the seven factors of enlightenment (mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, calm, concentration, and equanimity) and the ten pāramīs (perfections). Wilson emphasizes that moments of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion—generosity, loving-kindness, clarity—are equally valid objects of meditation as difficult experiences. She encourages practitioners to notice which experiences the mind isolates and identifies with, recognizing that no self-definition is solid. Through the non-discriminating power of sati, we can meet all experience with acceptance and gradually develop the balanced awareness that leads to liberation.

Tonight I want to talk about another aspect of balance in practice. This is the balancing of perception so that we have an evenness of perception—balancing our opening to the painful and difficult while also opening to the incredible beauty and perfection of the Dhamma.

It seems to me this is one of the great paradoxes, the great mysteries of our practice, of life on this earth, of life in this body. As we go deeper and deeper in our practice and investigation, we find that we open more and more to what is painful and difficult. At the same time, we're opening to the sublime, to the incredibly wondrous. It seems to happen together.

What is very difficult for many of us is to be able to hold both with an evenness of perception—not to get lost in the unsatisfactoriness and pain, and not to get lost in ecstasy and beauty. That might not be your problem so far, so I'll probably focus more on the former. But it's hard to hold both without denying either.

Let me offer some examples of how both aspects are present when I start looking around in almost any experience. Walking outside a week or so ago, on one of those really beautiful golden days where the trees were on fire and it was warm, just incredibly beautiful—being in the woods, my heart felt uplifted. I really felt at one with things. Very inspiring. And then the wind blows, some leaves flutter down, and there's this shift. Right, all this beauty is the prelude to the death of all these flowers and trees. It's winter coming on. It holds both at the same time.

Another example: a very good friend of mine who is HIV positive, not really sick, but there's all the possibility, the fear and the pain and the oppressive, wearing nature of that, the fear that comes with any small thing that goes wrong. It's really heart-rending. And at the same time, this person is becoming more and more radiant, more and more able to share and express love of the Dharma, just love in general, more and more glowing as a person. People just want to be around this person. How can you separate the two? They're both happening together.

Or on a bigger scale in the world, take the events in the Soviet Union, in Eastern Europe, and how there's this sense of the Cold War ending and tyrannies breaking down. Gorbachev won the Nobel Peace Prize for, they said, his part in ending the Cold War. And then you read about or hear about what's happening in Russia. Actually, there's a huge increase in crime of all sorts, violence of all sorts. They have like now a Russian mafia starting to come up. Anti-Semitism is getting really strong. We met some friends from the Soviet Union a few weeks ago. They said it's really quite scary. And this also is happening at the same time as the ending of this tyranny. How can you separate the two? And why do we need to?

So part of our practice—and you can see it in your experience here—is to learn to hold both, to acknowledge whichever aspect of experience is emerging into our awareness at the present time without needing to deny or repress. We can have compassion, metta, for the pain and suffering, our own and others, and at the same time, appreciation for the mystery, for the wonder, for the beauty.

It's true that for many of us at different times, the painful unsatisfying aspect of our practice, of our mind, of our life, or sometimes of the pain in the world, can really start to seem unbearable or overwhelming. As we go deeper in practice, we begin to open to see more deeply the nature of the kilesas, the power of greed and hatred and confusion in our mind. We open to depths of pain and difficulty that we've been so conditioned to avoid in our lives that we've just never really been able to muster the attention to look at it.

This is a necessary and vital part of our practice. We're so conditioned to move away from the difficult and unpleasant and painful and scary that we have to learn how to see it and open to it with mindfulness. That's what the Buddha talked about in his Four Noble Truths, and there's a reason for that. To know the nature of our disease—our disease being how suffering is created and how we can come to freedom from it—it's necessary to meet and investigate and thus understand the disease itself.

To do this, in some ways it seems like we plunge into seeing the kilesas, the torments in our mind, the suffering in our psyche, in our body, on a deeper and deeper level. And it's hard. I would venture to say that everyone here, in your own uniquely personal way, is meeting your own personal pains and torments—physical, emotional, spiritual, psychic, confusion. You're meeting it all, in whatever manner it's manifesting in your experience. You're meeting it, and it takes great courage. It takes a lot of honesty and humility, over and over and over, to come face to face with this. I wish that you could each acknowledge this for yourself.

This part of the practice is necessary. But what is also necessary is to meet our experience with an evenness of mindfulness. In other words, we can get so focused on the afflictions, so focused on seeing greed, hatred, delusion, pain, suffering, the whole gamut, that we start to think that's all we see.

And when this happens—and this is what I mean by not having an evenness of mindfulness—we're just focused on the painful, the scary, the negative. We can get very discouraged. When this happens, we really lose energy to be present, to meet what's happening in the moment. It gets really hard to practice.

Again, it's like the afflictions seeping in in a new way, coloring our perception of what's going on the way dye colors water. If we don't see it, it's like the plug comes out of our energy, and everything just starts on this downhill spiral.

Just for an example, look in your own mind. How many people, when I spoke of meeting your difficulties with courage and humility, said, "Yeah, right, that's everyone else but not me"? Or, "I don't really have that much pain." Or the reverse: "My pain is so much worse than everybody else's, but I don't have the courage to greet it." Just these little twists of how we relate to experience are the blinders, the filters that keep our mindfulness and perceptions skewed, that keep us out of balance.

I just want to remind us that greed, hatred, delusion, confusion—these are not our intrinsic nature. They're not intrinsic, inseparable qualities of the mind and heart. They seep in; they color our experience. They color the pure nature of our mind the way that clouds cover the sun. And we need to see and know the clouds. We need to recognize and acknowledge them, not run from them. But we need to know that they're impermanent and not mistake them for the sun. Not identify with the clouds. And we also need to learn to recognize the sun—to know when it's shining, instead of just thinking, "Oh well, there are no defilements present. Let me go look for some." Let's stop and acknowledge the sun when it comes out.

So our practice is about being clearly mindful, knowing for ourselves the unbearably painful, the exquisitely sublime, and everything in between—with evenness of mind, non-reactivity of attention. Neither avoiding the one nor clinging to the other, but just being present with a direct, unflinching openness of being, an energy of mindfulness.

So how can we work with developing this evenness? Chögyam Trungpa said something once that I like a lot—I'm paraphrasing a bit—because it's actually the experience of falling out of balance that wakes us up and enables us to come to balance. So rather than thinking when we're out of balance, "Oh God, I blew it again," that's the trigger to wake us up, to come back into balance.

When we're in a difficult, painful time, just when things are getting the most oppressive, the most unbearable, the most negative—when someone goes, "This is too much, I can't handle it anymore, and this can't be the whole show"—we realize, yeah, it's not. It's just at that point that things shift, that our mind opens into another perception, another possibility.

But we're so conditioned to view life through the veil of confusion, of negativity, of wanting, that we're used to looking at life as if it's a series of polarities. This duality. There's right and wrong. My practice is good or it's bad. I'm progressing or I'm going backwards. And we really take that to be the way things are.

Thich Nhat Hanh was talking about this once, and he said: really realize you can't have right without left. It's the same thing. It's part of the same piece. It's the same with good and evil, pleasant and unpleasant, positive and negative. It's completely interdependent. The polarity is just an idea that we have in our mind. We set these two sides of the same whole as polar opposites. We want one, we deny the other. We make one good, we want to get rid of ever hearing about the other. And then we really suffer.

Thich Nhat Hanh again: seeing how in ourselves, as in society, we only want to be with the good. So if that's so, and we've set up these polar opposites, that means we can't identify with the evil or bad. So we have to throw it out there, project it out onto the world. We need an enemy. And this is how we've been conditioned for a large part of our lives. Of course we bring that in here.

I noticed some time ago, right after I'd been thinking about this, I was reading a newspaper. Just with nothing particular in my mind, I started to notice the tenor of most of the main articles. They were about crimes, and the way that one dealt with them was courts and juries and punishment and prisons and executions.

There's a war on drugs, a war in Iraq—all this punitive, separated way of working with things.

I read something the other day that was just horrible. In Guatemala, there are more and more young teenage kids who are abandoned and living on the streets of Guatemala City. They're starving, and they sniff glue just to mask the hunger. And the army's way of dealing with this—what's considered a horrible blight on society—is to kidnap and kill them. If there's something bad, we don't want to see it. Get rid of it, annihilate it, so it doesn't exist. It's horrible, this sense of polarity taken to the extreme.

I used to work in a state hospital for severely mentally handicapped people—really severely handicapped. And it's amazing how many people live there, yet I never run into anybody like that in the course of my daily life. Again, it's this sense of getting it out there, extirpating it so I don't have to face it in myself.

We're so caught in this sense of opposites and duality that we don't know how to hold them both, to see that they're two sides of the same coin, to hold the mystery of it.

So what happens? We come here to practice, and in doing so we really begin to be more evenly aware of what's going on. Of course, the shadow side of ourselves begins to come up into consciousness—which is great. That's the practice. We begin to really experience the power of these torments of mind: greed, hatred, and delusion. We really come to know the power these have for confusing us.

But we still tend to be caught in this sense of duality, of opposites. And so we just turn it back in on ourselves. Suddenly we are seeing only the torments, only the so-called bad. "God, anyone with this much greed, hatred, and delusion doesn't deserve to live. How can I be with other people?"

My favorite example—a friend told me this last year, and he's given me permission to share it. He was on retreat, doing walking meditation, and the thought arose: "I felt I was not being respectful to the trees because I'm such an unmindful, deluded person." We're like this, you know. We just turn it in on ourselves and get really caught.

From the Third Zen Patriarch: "When love and hate are both absent, everything becomes clear and undisguised. Make the smallest distinction, however, and heaven and earth are set infinitely apart. If you wish to see the truth, then hold no opinions for or against anything. To set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind. Indeed, it is due to our choosing to accept or reject that we do not see the true nature of things."

To set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind.

So our practice is not to cling to and not to reject anything that comes up in this moment of awareness—no matter what it is, and that has no exceptions whatsoever. But to meet everything with this mindfulness, this power of acknowledgment and attention, whether it's unbearable distress and suffering, whether it's an exquisitely beautiful moment, whether it's something mundane—the whole range.

Thich Nhat Hanh speaks about how we take our garbage, throw it out into the compost, then use that compost to plant flowers. We grow roses, and the roses go back into the compost. So when you look at a rose, you can't separate it. Compost, or garbage, is rose, and the rose is garbage. They're not two separate opposing things. They are each other.

The pain in us and the beauty in us is the same as the pain outside and the beauty outside. They are each other. This is what the world is. We can't separate it, make this wall.

We're not all horrendously evil beings. And we are also experiencing a lot of greed, hatred, and delusion in our moment-to-moment experience. Both are true.

In working with balancing my perception—especially when I'm caught in a round of really recognizing the painful, afflictive aspects while not really recognizing the more uplifting aspects—one of the most powerful aids is simply learning to recognize these helpful, uplifting states of mind when they're present.

These are qualities of the luminous mind. They're classically described in Theravada in typically bland terms as non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. But really, these are not passive, bland qualities at all. They are very active, uplifting qualities of mind. I'm going to describe just a few.

Non-greed includes generosity, thoughts and actions of sharing, non-attachment, renunciation, simplicity. Non-hatred includes mettā, loving-kindness, compassion, forgiveness, patience, acceptance. Non-delusion brings real brightness of mind, clarity of perception. It can lead to equanimity, to insight, to understanding with clarity of perception.

These are all also mental states. They come and go. But pay attention, because we do experience them, all of us, in differing degrees at various times. There are times when confusion, greed, and hatred are not arising, when mindfulness is strong. And these really uplifting qualities are accessible to all of us. We don't have to be a Buddha to experience moments of these. It's very important to recognize them, note them, notice them, give them full acknowledgment and attention when they're arising in our experience.

Sometimes, even in just talking about these uplifting qualities, it can lead one to feel even more discouraged. We can really do a number on ourselves. "Okay, well, a mind of mettā, boundless equanimity—right, sure. That might be for somebody else, but I have a mind of boundless aversion and self-contempt. Don't talk about it, you know, it just makes me feel even worse." We get more caught in self-judgment, in comparison. You start looking around and go, "God, look how equanimous everybody looks, and I'm the only one fidgeting." And it just gets into more comparison. There's always someone better. I just want to say that. If you're in a judging mode, there's always going to be someone that looks better. It never ends.

But what's really more important than that is this: from this place where the mind is comparing—"compassion, equanimity, not possible for me"—the mind can't imagine at this point being brighter, being freer, because it's stuck in what it knows. The mind only knows what it's already experienced. It can't know a greater capacity than it's experienced. But that doesn't mean it's not possible. The mind doesn't know, but the heart can trust. And this experience, this opening to really positive qualities of our experience, is beyond the mind knowing. It's beyond thoughts. So it doesn't matter that the mind is filled with thoughts about, "Not for me, I'm not good enough, you have to be a bodhisattva," blah, blah, blah. That's just thoughts. It has no bearing on the reality of what is possible—except in that we choose to believe them and get caught there.

It's a lot about trust. Again, the Third Zen Patriarch: the non-dual is one with the trusting mind. It's about trust, not about figuring it out or holding on.

To help with recognizing more supportive and onward-leading experiences or mental states, I want to list some more, because I think it is helpful to begin to get familiar with them. Often we just kind of think, "Well, nothing's happening," as I mentioned the other night. And what's happening is calm, which is actually one of the seven factors of enlightenment. But we can get so focused on wanting sati, mindfulness, wanting concentration and not having it, that we completely overlook calm, which is a very important quality that needs to be developed and balanced.

In working with the seven factors of enlightenment, yes, we've talked a lot about mindfulness, which is one, and we've talked a lot about samādhi, concentration. But there are also five others that are equally important to develop and bring into balance. On the calming side, there's concentration. There's also calm. There's also equanimity, this non-reactive quality of mind. Very important qualities. On the energetic side, there's energy or effort. Again, we've talked a lot about that. There's also this quality of investigation of states—interest, really interested in investigating what's happening. Very important. Also, the quality of rapture or joy, pīti in Pali.

All of these seven factors are developing and coming into balance. At different times, different ones will be more obvious, will be stronger, and other ones will be weaker. If we just focus on a couple, we tend to ignore all the others and really downplay what's going on in our experience. So for example, you may feel no mindfulness whatsoever, but investigation is actually coming up quite strongly. Or you have no energy, but calm is being developed.

A second list, and a whole other way of working with qualities in our mind, is called the ten pāramīs, or ten perfections.

These ten qualities are described as the supreme noble qualities of character or conduct. In the Theravada tradition there are ten; in the Mahayana there are six. These ten qualities are also considered contributory conditions to enlightenment. Traditionally it was taught that the bodhisattva, before becoming a Buddha, spent eons of lifetimes, in each life working to develop to perfection these ten powerful qualities of being. Each of them is very important in our growing into the openness that leads to understanding.

There is generosity. There is virtue, or sila. You can see that we're all developing all of these in different degrees at different times. The third is renunciation—just by being here, you're renouncing a tremendous amount, even if all you're seeing is what you still want. The fourth is wisdom. The fifth is energy. The sixth is patience or perseverance. The seventh is truthfulness. The eighth is resolution or determination. The ninth is metta, loving-kindness. The tenth is equanimity.

So when we're feeling really lost in a difficult, confused space—nothing but fear, nothing but aversion, nothing but clinging or depression—it seems so solid and unending and so useless when we want to be in a different space. It can be helpful to either actually reflect on, or just tune into in yourself, that this particular experience might be the ground for really developing the power of patience, or of resolution, or of equanimity. Our willingness to just gently come back and meet it, and meet it again, could really be significant. This could be the lifetime that's devoted to the development of patience. Who knows?

It really helps me sometimes to step back and look at the bigger picture. I don't know which particular part of the path really needs to be developed in me in this lifetime. You're really looking at a big picture, I know. But maybe it is just patience. And that's not a bad use of a life, to really perfect the power of patience.

When we begin to work with this evenness of mindfulness, acknowledging what's present for just what it is, we stop discounting what we're experiencing just because it doesn't meet our idea of what good mindfulness and good concentration should look like. We think it should look like something else, not this, so this is out and I've got to change. Instead, you much more start to be able to fully meet what's happening. And in that meeting, the equanimity, the patience, all the paramis and all the seven factors of enlightenment actually get strengthened and developed from our simple meeting what's happening.

Sometimes I've noticed in myself, and in talking with other people, that when we do actually experience in our practice, in our life, some of these very powerful, uplifting qualities—like real rapture, love of the Dhamma, joy, metta, compassion—sometimes people talk about, in a subtle way, being almost afraid to really open to and acknowledge that experience. There's a slight hesitancy, a slight holding back, almost as if we're more hesitant to fully open and acknowledge joy, love of the Dhamma, real love of another person, or truly unbounded metta than we are to open to pain sometimes.

I'm not completely sure why. Some of the things that I've experienced are a sense of not trusting that it's real. "Oh, this is another false state. This is just going to lead me into more suffering, so let me pull back a little bit." It's kind of unconscious. Or, "This feels like real rapture, but it's not possible for me to be experiencing that. It's just some delusion." So we veer our attention away from that in a subtle way. Or, "I'm not pure enough. It couldn't possibly be happening to me." We don't trust it. Or it's not ecstatic enough—my idea of rapture is that it should really be this incredibly ecstatic experience, you know, it blows me out. And that's not what's happening, so it's nothing.

Or sometimes there's such a sense of the poignancy of the beauty of something. Poignancy because of its impermanent nature—there can be this subtle fear of opening to it because I'll just get attached and it's going to go away and I'll suffer. So what's the point of even opening to the beauty? It's just more suffering.

Can we learn to trust that we can fully open to what's happening without the need for fear, without the need for hesitation, that kind of bargaining? The Buddha said once that through dispassion the mind is freed. But dispassion doesn't mean grayness. It doesn't mean that we don't appreciate and fully experience these wondrous, uplifting states of mind or the beautiful in life. The Buddha also said that what is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one does not strive after it.

So we don't block it out, and everything doesn't turn into this muddle of grayness—no beauty, no pain. We really appreciate, we fully open to and appreciate the wonder, in a way even more deeply, because we know it will pass. There's no sense in clinging, and so there's no need to hold back either. It's actually a purer appreciation, a purer experience.

But I don't want to underplay the power of conditioning. Yes, I know, we have to come back to suffering. Even with deep experiences of these powerful states of mind or heart, when we really know that the kilesas—the torments of mind, the disturbances—are not our intrinsic nature, we know that they're impermanent. We know that in a moment of mindfulness they don't arise, and we might have a choice of how to act or react in our life. And then we wake up five minutes later and find we're again caught in wanting, in confusion, in aversion. It's like, "Oh, the clouds are all there is. What happened to the sun?" We forget there ever was a sun. We're just back in the clouds. How did I get here? Why does this keep happening?

We might have really gotten it. There's absolutely nothing to want—that was completely crystal clear. We've all had moments in different ways where we think, "I really know this." I don't know how many times I've really known that there's no self. I absolutely know it. And then I turn around and I'm acting as if I'm the most solid being that ever existed, going through all kinds of machinations and plans to get something that I really need that's going to make me happy.

The conditioning is strong. When there's a moment of unawareness, it's as if the old conditioning—the habit of mind to move towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant—just springs in and fills up that space. The mind rushes towards the pleasant.

We said it before, but I want to say it again: this is why mindfulness is so powerful. When we're present with mindfulness, it does counteract these habits of mind. That moment of attention where the attentive mind, the mindfulness, really meets the arising object—it connects with the pleasant thought, connects with the pleasant experience. In that moment, the greed isn't fed. This is the purification of a moment of mindfulness, and it's really powerful. Through this shining the light of mindfulness on whatever arises, our evenness of perception develops and gets stronger—shining the light of mindfulness on whatever comes up in this moment without any hesitation, without any discrimination. This is what Bhante Bodhirakkhita was talking about the other night: not waiting and thinking, "Should I go look at this object or not?" No discrimination.

So each one of these moments of pure mindfulness is a moment of purification, and the habits of the afflictions are weakened, become less strong. We begin to see these torments of mind, these habits, much more clearly. They start to move from being unseen filters on our experience that we're not even aware of to being really observable—as someone said in an interview, palpable experiences. We really feel greed when it's arising, where before we just thought that's the way things are.

This stage, this part of our practice—which is actually due to the increasing mindfulness and the stronger purification—can be a very discouraging and painful time. It's like greed is just here everywhere, or aversion is just so experienced, and it really can be quite discouraging. So often people say, "Well, now that I'm aware of self-judgment or lust or aversion or whatever, that's all I see. I'm so much more neurotic than when I came." It can seem overwhelming.

Again, this is another filter, moving out of evenness of perception. So often we can have this tendency to accent the so-called negative and discount the so-called positive. This can happen on very subtle levels, when we move away again from bare mindfulness and start to put our energy into the interpretations and the identification.

It's a simple experience. I noticed this: I was driving yesterday and passing a place where I knew in advance there's a huge stand of trees on the side of the road. I know that they always lose all their leaves really early because they're in water. So I was ready for this before I even came up, because I really don't like it when winter comes. So I have this mindset.

So I came up and there was this whole huge expanse of totally gray trees, not a leaf left, on the left. And I was noticing this—oh, it's all gray. I feel so sad. Winter's coming. Autumn's over. It's getting cold. It's kind of depressing. I was just really caught in this. And then I happened to notice that on the other side, it was beautiful. All the leaves were gold. There was still a lot of green. I hadn't even noticed that—caught in the interpretations, identified with this feeling of sadness and "oh, poor me, it's winter and I get cold."

This perception is what prevents evenness. Instead of simply noticing, "Oh, there's gray over here—winter's coming. Oh, there's beautiful gold and green over here—isn't that lovely?" I was caught in all the story.

It's helpful at these times when we notice we're doing this. Thich Nhat Hanh asks, "Most of us ask the question, what is wrong? We forget to ask what is right." The example he gives, which I really love—it's so simple—talks about how it is when we have a toothache. We're really aware of it, aware of the pain, and it's quite excruciating, very painful. When something happens and the pain stops, oh, it's so pleasant, so nice. We really appreciate it and it's so peaceful. Now, most of the time we don't have a toothache and we don't even notice it, much less appreciate the pleasantness. It's really pleasant not having a toothache.

So we begin to notice in our practice here, as we're sitting—rising and falling, in and out, lifting, moving, placing, moving through the day—there's a fairly steady flow of changing objects, of experience arising, persisting, passing away. Emotion, sensation, sound, sight, thought, sensation—coming and going. Notice how many of them come, they're here, they go. There's mindfulness, there's recognition, there's no big fuss. Then notice how some of this flow of objects arises and somehow there's this lurch in the mind. The mind isolates particular experience from the flow, identifies with it. "Oh, this one's real. This is permanent. This is me. This one isn't okay. It's got to go."

Notice the difference. Begin to notice which ones get isolated and grabbed onto or pushed away, which get really identified with. When we're not in this evenness of perception, when the mindfulness is selective, we isolate the particular experiences that fit the particular filter we're seeing through at that time. And those are the experiences we believe.

For example, we're in the filter of "I'm so greedy." Every experience, every thought, every feeling of greed that comes up—that's what we pull out, that gets identified with, that one's solid. All the objects that came that we didn't feel greed about are completely ignored. And there are probably many more times that greed wasn't felt, but that's completely ignored.

Or "my concentration's no good." Just the sight of somebody walking past slowly is pulled out, isolated. "Oh my God, they're so concentrated. My concentration—I'll never be able to do that." Every experience through the day that's pulled out and isolated is the one that fits that filter. Whatever it is. "I can never do the practice. I'm stupid. I'm the best yogi that ever lived. I'm incredibly beautiful. I'm ugly." Whatever it is. All the experiences to the contrary that don't fit—they're just discounted or ignored or not given much attention.

Just begin to become aware of this. Just reflect at some point today on how many thoughts, how many emotions, how many experiences came and went. Impossible to count in one hour.

Which ones did the mind hook onto? Which experiences are defining your perception of today's reality? Which experiences are defining your perception of yourself?

Just becoming aware of this. And when we become aware of some such self-definition of the moment, whatever it is, we can begin to look very carefully at each moment—not only at the moments when that experience is present, but at the moments when it's not. And you can't help but begin to see that no self-definition is solid. It doesn't matter what it is.

"I'm angry. I'm such an angry person." There might be several isolated angry moments. There might be really a lot of isolated angry moments. But it will not be every single arising object of experience that happens in the day. There will be many where anger just isn't there at all—there's happiness or hunger or joy or sleepiness or neutrality or calm or concentration. And we isolate those moments that fit the filter: "I'm angry."

I think of it in my mind when I'm sitting, watching this happen—it's like my thought makes a bridge between several experiences or moments that happen minutes or hours apart. My thought holds them together and creates this narrative: "Oh, I've been angry all day." Just begin to notice. No self-definition is solid.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh talking again about noticing what is right. He's speaking about the Vietnam War, when he was working with a group of people at great risk to themselves:

"During the war, we were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country, but we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage. So I would mention these herbs to the social workers and peace workers so they would be in touch with them."

Just notice what else is present.

Mindfulness—this magic power of mindfulness—really is the key to clear perception. Pleasant and neutral objects that arise in our experience are equally valid objects of meditation as the difficult and the painful. Mindfulness is a non-discriminating awareness. In a way, it's almost like meeting whatever arises in the moment with this active quality of attention and also with loving-kindness, with gentleness, with acceptance—whatever it is.

Real peace, real freedom, comes from meeting the excruciatingly painful, the sublime, and everything in between equally. No distinctions. We appreciate the beauty. We open to and understand the suffering through our own experience, and through this opening discover new depths of compassion and love. This really is possible through the power of our continuing development of mindfulness.

I want to end with a quotation that shows how even great suffering can open into great beauty of spirit. It's from Alexander Solzhenitsyn, writing in his trilogy The Gulag Archipelago—people enduring the unendurable in all the different prison camps through Stalinist Russia, really appalling suffering, unimaginable pain and cruelty. He talks about how many people—not everyone, but many—grew tremendously spiritually through this, really seeing the incredible beauty that can emerge in the human heart through being involved in such unbearable suffering. That's the only way someone could emerge from ten years in the camps as he did and then write something like this:

"Gradually it was disclosed to me that the line separating good and evil passes not through states nor between classes nor between political parties either, but right through every human heart and through all human hearts. This line shifts. Inside us it oscillates with the years. And even within hearts overwhelmed by evil, one small bridgehead of good is retained. And even in the best of all hearts, there remains a small unuprooted corner of evil. Since then, I have come to understand the truth of all the religions of the world. They struggle with the evil inside a human being, inside every human being. It may be impossible to expel evil from the world in its entirety, but it is possible to transcend it within each person."

So let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 236

Craving and Grasping: The Crisis of Dukkha

Carol Wilson · 53 min

In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Second Noble Truth—the origin of dukkha through craving (taṇhā) and grasping (upādāna). Beginning with the Buddha's initial hesitation to teach after his enlightenment, she reminds practitioners that even the Awakened One recognized how deeply beings are attached to their attachments.

Wilson systematically examines the four classical categories of grasping: sense pleasures (kāmupādāna), views (diṭṭhupādāna), rites and rituals (sīlabbatupādāna), and self-doctrine (attavādupādāna). Drawing from the Sutta Nipāta and teachings of Ajahn Chah, she illuminates how contact at the six sense doors can either lead to entanglement or, when met with mindfulness, to liberation. She uses vivid personal anecdotes and retreat observations to demonstrate how grasping distorts perception, creates separation, and generates a solid sense of self.

The talk emphasizes that the practice is not about condemning desire but understanding it deeply on a visceral level. Wilson highlights the retreat environment as a powerful laboratory for experiencing grasping without immediately satisfying it—a transformative practice that weakens the compulsive drive toward gratification. Through patient investigation and equanimity, practitioners can discover the peace of non-grasping: a completeness in this moment, exactly as it is, without needing to add or subtract anything.

Joseph talked the other night about the life of the Buddha. When he was first enlightened there under the Bodhi tree, some of the texts tell us that at first he was not so inclined to spend the rest of his life teaching. It says he looked around with his omniscient eye and thought that this truth he had discovered is so profound, so hard to see—you can't discover it just by thinking about it. And looking around, they tell us he thought people are relying so much on attachment, they're delighting in attachment, and so it will be too hard for them to see this truth. And so his mind favored inaction.

It really feels like that when we're in the middle of this process here. Often we're too lost in attachment and aversion. It's impossible to see the truth. At this point in the retreat, talking to different people and talking with the other teachers, you're really right down in the middle of your process. And I don't know if you realize it—it takes a sense of perspective. Often it can feel like it's nothing but attachment, nothing but aversion. What am I doing here? Forget it. So this is really encouraging that the Buddha thought the same thing.

The story goes that at this point, Brahma, the head of the Brahma realm, came down and begged the Buddha to teach. He asked him to look around again and said that there are people with little dust in their eyes—which is a phrase that I love—and that they can hear and see and understand and know the truth. And this is when the Buddha's heart of compassion was opened, and he spent the rest of his life teaching.

As you know, the first teaching that he gave was of the Four Noble Truths, which we've talked about briefly. Tonight I want to focus mostly on the second one.

The first truth is the truth of unsatisfactoriness—just its existence, the different forms of it, our need to open to it. The second truth is the origin of this dukkha, the origin being craving. Craving which produces renewal of being over and over again. Craving which creates suffering because we're craving what is elusive, what is insubstantial, what is always changing and can't bring satisfaction. Because craving blinds us. When it's present in our experience, it blinds us to clear perception, to being able to see and understand the truth.

The third truth, just briefly mentioning, is cessation of this very dukkha. The words, the description, are cessation of this craving without a trace left behind. The abandonment, the renunciation, the liberation from, the detachment from this craving. Not hating it, repressing it, hating ourselves—but abandonment, liberation from, detachment from the craving. And then the fourth truth, of course, is the Eightfold Path: that there is a way leading to cessation of dukkha, and that this cessation, in a nutshell, comes from wisely seeing.

Tonight I want to focus on the origin of unsatisfactoriness—this craving, tanha, like thirst—and its stronger component, which is the one that in some ways we can see more easily: grasping. The simile that's given is that craving is like groping in the dark to take something. The mind inclines towards an experience, an object. Grasping is the actual grabbing it and stealing it. It's a stronger impetus, a stronger force. And this is what gives rise in the moment to concepts of me, I, mine.

In our experience, in our life, when we really are looking closely, when we break it down, there are only six possible sense experiences to have. And they just keep occurring over and over. There's eye contact, there's sight, there's hearing, there's taste, there's smell, there's feeling in the body, there's mental objects—and that's it. They just keep happening over and over.

When there's contact—when, say, sight, an eye object, and the eye come together and there's eye consciousness—that sense impression, that contact, in any moment of any of these contacts, craving and grasping can arise in relation to that particular sense impression, that particular contact. When this contact and the possibly resultant craving is met with mindfulness, right there with it, it doesn't especially need to go any farther. That's just it. And then it's a new sense experience.

But as is so often the case, when it's not seen at this point, the moment of craving strengthens into grasping. Oh, that smells so good. I really want it. How can I get it? And we go off into a whole world of need and fantasy and desire. And that grasping blinds us.

We get really fixated on whatever it is—that pleasant smell—and how can we obtain it? How can we have more of it? It clouds our perception.

There's a passage from the Sutta Nipata: "For some people, contact, which is the point where sense plus the sense object meet—for some people this is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity. And because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does and so their craving ends. They realize the total calm."

It's one of the more poetic phrases of the Buddha.

Put in a different way by Ajahn Chah, again speaking to the power of seeing what sense contact is, sense impression: "But really, this mind of ours is already unmoving and peaceful, really peaceful, just like a leaf which is still as long as no wind blows. If a wind comes up, the leaf flutters. The fluttering is due to the wind. The fluttering is due to those sense impressions. The mind follows them. If it doesn't follow them, it doesn't flutter. If we know fully the true nature of sense impressions, we are unconcerned."

So really this is our investigation—to really know the nature of our sense impressions. How and why craving and grasping arise. And from that knowing, the mind can become still or unconcerned.

But often, most realistically, we're not aware of that process right at that point of contact. Perhaps grasping has taken quite a firm hold in our experience before we even notice what the original contact was. We wake up in a really strong fantasy, say, of food. We didn't even notice the pleasant smell, but the next thing we know we've been going for ten minutes in our mind about what's for lunch, really deciding what it is based on the smell, looking forward to eating it and all the pleasure we're going to get out of it. We're really grasping. And it blinds us.

We go to lunch. It's not at all, even remotely, what we had thought it was. And so we're disgruntled, dissatisfied with everything that's served. Grasping is blinding in this way. It distorts the object that's grasped onto and it distorts everything else. The idea of what everyone was expecting for lunch turns into this incredible, fantastic idea of a meal that was going to bring us lasting happiness. Completely distorted—nothing can do that. And then the lunch that is served is seen as a mud pile or something. There's nothing wrong with the lunch that is served. Everything's completely distorted. We can't appreciate what is present when the mind is fixated, grasping on some object.

There's a story about a pickpocket in the time of the Buddha who said he was at one of the Buddha's discourses but could only see people's pockets. Impossible to hear what's being taught when we're fixated on something.

So our practice here is not to judge it, hate it and hate ourselves, but to investigate, to see and come to understand this process. As Krishnamurti said, "Unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable."

And the Buddha also encourages us to understand how grasping works. He says, "There are many kinds of suffering in the world and all of them grow from the same source: grasping. When a person knows no better, he or she gives way to this grasping and slow and dulled goes through one misery after another. So use your knowledge to see how suffering begins and develops in attachment."

We can use our knowledge to see and feel and understand this process. And how can we do that except by investigating it very fully when it is present in our experience? Not hating it or fearing it or trying to pretend it's not really happening, but really looking. Because without an experiential understanding of the nature of desire and grasping, we can intellectually decide, "Yeah, right, it's clear how craving and grasping leads to suffering, so I'm going to stop doing it now." It doesn't work. We need to really understand this deeply on a visceral, gut level.

So what is it?

How do we experience grasping in a moment? We're sitting calmly. Experiences are coming and going. We're noting and being present. There's a sound. There's a thought. There's the breath. There's an image. There's a sensation in the body. And suddenly one particular object is grasped hold of. A smell. The smell. Not going any further—when that happens next, just notice: how does it feel? What is the experience of clinging, of grasping itself?

For me, there's actually a physical sensation of tightness, almost like an internal leaning forward. It feels really unbalanced, unpleasant. When out of this flow of changing sensations one sound is isolated and grasped onto, and that grasping is not really seen, then comes the identification. Immediately the sense of "me" gets strong, and all the constructions go along with it. Self-image is created in that process. One moment of grasping conditions the next. It gets stronger and stronger, and it gets really complicated.

Here's an example that's probably happened to almost everyone here. There's a sound. It's unpleasant. And out of all the sounds that come and go during one sitting, this particular sound is grasped onto, isolated. Immediately the sense of recognition and the sense of "I" comes up: "That's someone moving. It's not me. I'm not moving. I know better than to move and make noise during a sitting. What's the matter with that person?" Really solid. One grasping leads to the next. The sense of self gets rock hard. And the distortion again—that sound is exaggerated in our perception out of all proportion. Although some people might not believe that. But it really is exaggerated out of all proportion to what the sound actually was or will be again.

Our mind at this point is really unbalanced. It's wavering. It can't perceive clearly what's happening in this moment. And because of that, it's more difficult to perceive what's happening in the next moment—never mind appreciating what's happening in this moment or the next. Grasping sets up an immediate sense of separation, an immediate sense of me and other. There can't be a sense of interrelatedness going on when this is happening.

Another example—the classic example—the VR, the vipassana romance. There's someone that one's mind has fastened on. It could be a vipassana vendetta too; it really doesn't matter. But someone one's mind has fastened on in this way of really isolating out. You're outside walking, very present, a real sense of peace, aware of the trees, aware of the sensations of the foot. And there's a sight, which happens to be this person walking by. That particular sight, that form, that color—out of all the sights and forms and colors arising moment after moment—is grasped onto. In a moment of that grasping not being seen, thought arises: "Oh me, oh where's that person going? Maybe I should stop walking now and follow them."

I wonder if they know who I am. I wonder if we'll ever have a chance to talk to each other. And then the whole story unfolds. The sense of separation has become complete. The mind is really locked onto the object.

How aware can one be in that moment of anything else? Any sense of awareness of the sensations in movement is long gone. Maybe one still knows one's walking, but it's kind of vague. Any other person who might be in the way—if you're trying to follow—is perceived as just that: in my way, rather than as another being. Any sense of our mutual interrelatedness is gone. It's merely the object grasped and me very strongly, and everything else in the way. It's a very powerful force, and it happens over and over and over.

Contrast that with walking in the same place in those times when there's just that pure sense of nothing special—sensations of the lifting, awareness of sensation, possibly of the wind on the cheek, smell of freshness. You happen to open your eyes and see the exquisite vividness of the leaves. And there's nothing really special in that moment, but there's such an appreciation, such a sense of presence.

Often on retreat, when I have a moment like that which feels so peaceful, I've been stopping and asking, "Well, what's actually going on here?" And what's going on is the absence of grasping. The absence of that sense of me and other, of something taking me out of the moment. This is the peace of non-grasping. It's a completeness in this moment, exactly as this moment is, without needing to subtract anything or add anything.

Sometimes it can seem to be a subtler kind of happiness or peace than that which we experience from sense pleasures, for example. Often that's why I think we get seduced by more obvious seeming pleasures than the peace of non-grasping. But it is a very powerful kind of peace. And as we continue to see and understand the nature of attachment, this underlying tendency to grasp at the pleasant begins to weaken and fade.

We also begin to notice that when the mind is locked into grasping, at that moment we don't really have any clear discernment. We can't really judge what is appropriate or suitable action because we just follow the desire. It's so strong; our mind is just locked into it.

A personal story. I wasn't going to tell this again—I hadn't told it for a couple of years—but the other person involved I just saw recently. He didn't know I used it in a talk, but he brought it up. He said, "Do you ever remember that ride to the airport?" And I said, "Yeah, as a matter of fact, I use it in a talk." He said, "Well, you better put in my side of it and not just talk from your side." So I'm not sure whether I do or not. You can tell me later.

But anyway, it's a classic story of how grasping blinds us, how we can't use any kind of clear discernment in that process.

I was in England. I was in a relationship with this guy, and it was a new relationship. He lived in England, and I was living here as a resident teacher. I'd managed to squeeze a week off and go over to England to visit. He lived out in the country, and the day I was leaving to fly out, we had come back to London and were staying in a friend's flat. The friend was away, and everyone we knew in London was out of town.

The next morning, I was getting up and getting ready to take a taxi to the train that goes to the airport, which is very simple and direct. But he—this was his grasping—he got it in his mind, "Oh no, I want to drive you to the airport." So he could have some more time together, so he could do something for me. Now, two things: one, he's American and didn't know how to drive in England very well, and two, neither of us knew London at all.

I said, "Forget it. I'm really happy to take the train." And so we spent about an hour and a half bickering about this. This was our last morning together. His grasping was, "I've got to do that." We couldn't see clearly, and that ruined our whole last morning. I finally got to where I couldn't stand it and said, "Okay, you can take me to the airport."

Now then, that's when we realized we didn't know how to get there. The taxi was canceled, and it was too late to get the train.

In London they have these maps called London A to Z—very small pages with every street on them. But they don't give you the whole picture. You can know where you are and get to the end of the map, and it will tell you to go to the next map. But it doesn't tell you how to get from here to there. You can't look at the whole thing in between.

We started going crazy. And then I started really grasping: "Oh my God, I'm going to miss the plane." It was one of those instant purchase tickets, absolutely no refund. I didn't have money to buy another ticket, and I had to be back at work. I shouldn't even have left for a week.

So we finally called around, found a way to go, and got in the car. He was fine by this time because his grasping was over—he got to drive me. I was a basket case. We got in the car, and again, we were totally not enjoying our time together because I was just wanting us to be at the airport. Every moment that we weren't there was a moment that was in the way. There was no way to appreciate it.

We were doing okay. We whizzed through London, got out on the motorway. We were really cutting it close. And halfway down the motorway, it came to an absolute dead stop—complete traffic jam, not moving.

I just exploded in this frenzy of grasping: "Oh my God, I'm really going to miss it." And then I realized, yeah, I am going to miss it. Okay, so I'll miss the plane. That'll be interesting. I've never missed an international flight. I'll miss it.

And my grasping stopped. Then I was fine. I started looking around. "Oh, well, this is interesting."

He, of course, then realized, "Oh, she really might miss it." And he started grasping: "Oh my God, I've got to get her there on time." So he was going crazy. "Let me just get off at the next exit and take you a different way." I said, "But you don't even know where we are. If we get off at the next exit, we're really lost."

Anyway, we finally got to the airport. I think I had fifteen minutes before the plane. So then I thought I could make it again, and the grasping returned. Going through customs and everything, everyone in my way was a total object—someone to run over, someone to push aside, someone to get rid of.

The whole morning, never mind that the idea was to have a pleasant few hours together. And this is what grasping really does. We're totally blind to what we're doing, and in each step it seems to make sense because we're so fixated. The grasping itself is so unpleasant—that feeling of grasping—that we'll do anything to attain its object, basically to get rid of that feeling.

One thing I really think we need to appreciate is just how deep, how strongly conditioned this underlying tendency of the mind to grasp onto the pleasant is. We need to appreciate it not because that's discouraging, but because then we can understand for ourselves just how awesome this journey is that we're on. It's a possible journey. It's not impossible. But it's really an awesome journey of discovery.

And it takes a lot of commitment and a lot of courage—which everyone here has, or you wouldn't still be here, no matter what's going on. This points to the real importance of patience and equanimity.

It may not seem like much when you're sitting here and you become aware that your mind is filled with grasping—at the idea of whatever, wanting a sitting to be a certain way. And then noting, you note the grasping and it kind of fades out, and the mind is again calm. This can happen in many moments within one sitting, and it seems like no big deal because we tend to focus on how much the clinging and grasping arises again.

But that moment of seeing, of the fading out—it is a big deal. It is really important because that is a movement from distortion and blindness towards clarity and freedom. And I think it's important to acknowledge that in ourselves.

Classically in the Theravada, they talk about four different areas of grasping. I find it helpful to explore these as different ways of looking at how grasping comes up. There's grasping to sense desire, which is obvious. Grasping onto views, ideas about things. Grasping onto rites and rituals. And grasping onto the tendency to identification, the idea of self.

Sense desire—I'll just say something about it. It's nothing new to any of us. This is from Ledi Sayadaw, a definition of grasping which to me seems to apply particularly to grasping to sense pleasures: "It's laying a firm hold on. It implies the inability to shake off a thing, even after experiencing great pain due to it and perceiving its many harmful consequences."

I can really see this so clearly in the realm of sense pleasures. On some level, I know the next pleasant sight, the next pleasant sound, the next pleasant taste is not going to make me any more happy or peaceful than the last pleasant sound or the last pleasant taste. But I continue—we continue—to keep going after it, to keep trying to find the one that will do it, waiting for the sweet one.

The Buddha talked a lot, and quite graphically, about the perils of sense pleasures. Just to give you an idea of some of his similes: he compares them to a charcoal pit; to something borrowed, because the owner takes it back; to a dream, because on waking it's just gone. Those are some of the nicer ones. He uses these similes because the danger in sense pleasures is great.

What I feel is really important to understand in our own experience is not that pleasant sensation is bad. We're not striving to get rid of all pleasant sensation and only have unpleasant sensation, and then we'll be free. The danger is that when there's contact—a pleasant contact, a sense pleasure—the underlying tendency of mind to grasp is so strong. And this is what I find really interesting: in some subtle way, it's as if we delight in that. And because of that delight, we don't see the suffering. We don't see the danger.

We were talking about this in our Pali class a few weeks ago, going over this second noble truth. One way of translating it is that it's just this craving, leading from birth to birth, which is accompanied by delight and passion. The craving itself is accompanied by delight and finds pleasure and satisfaction now here, now there. As we were exploring, we're seeing that the subtle danger is that on some level we like to crave. The craving can be accompanied by delight when we don't really look, when we don't really pay attention. And so we don't recognize the danger, and we keep going through these endless rounds of craving the next thing, craving the next thing.

We can't see what's really happening. It's so easy to get lost in the cycle of grasping and becoming and suffering. The danger is not in sense objects themselves but in not seeing the clinging.

Suzuki Roshi says that renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of the world but in accepting that they go away. When we really, truly accept that this too is going to go away, there's just no reason to hold on. There's no reason to cling to it.

In our daily life—here too, but even more in our daily life outside of here, especially in this country—we're bombarded, just bombarded with sensory objects, with the possibility of pleasant sense experience. There's so much stimulation. It's like we're in a whirlwind, just moving from one sense experience to the next to the next. And because we can always move on to another object of clinging, to another pleasant sense object, it hides the fact that the search itself for the pleasant is what brings suffering.

We can feel bored or a little restless one night and decide to watch TV, and what's on starts to feel uncomfortable. So we change the channel, and then we go get ice cream, and then we try a different chair. Then we think of calling up a friend. And then we say, well, maybe I'll read the newspaper. Maybe I'll go out and get a video.

It's just endless. There's always some new object that we can move to.

One of the great things about a retreat environment is that it's so stripped away. Our sense pleasures are so much more restricted. But we can still do the same thing. You see, the mind's movement shifts from wanting to get a new Saab to hoping you can get two apples at tea time. But it's the same movement of mind. And we can often find ourselves doing the exact same thing. "Well, let me sit on this zafu. Maybe if I get a different chair from the dining room. Maybe if I eat in a different configuration. Or if I save this apple and eat it at nine o'clock, then it'll be better than if I eat two apples at five o'clock. And maybe tomorrow at breakfast I'll save the banana and have that at tea time instead of an apple. Maybe I'll have the apple for breakfast and the banana for tea." It's the same movement of mind. Go look in the back dining room there. I don't really need to say anything else. That could just be the talk—just go look in the back dining room.

But we have in a retreat environment what is actually a great opportunity. I know you've really been loving it so far, but it is a great opportunity to experience the process of grasping without being driven to satisfy it. Because sometimes in this restricted environment, you can't. It's the middle of a sitting and this intense desire comes up for that banana you've been saving for seven days. But you're not going to get up because it's the middle of a sitting, and so you just sit there and let mindfulness turn to the process of grasping. It's an incredibly powerful thing. You can experience grasping itself without the immediate gratification of it. And yes, it's unbalancing and it's unpleasant and it feels really yucky, and that's all okay.

In the ability to do this over and over, we find that we're not so driven in our life to do anything just to avoid feeling that grasping. We don't have to spend the rest of our life just going for a new sound, a new smell, a new taste in order not to feel grasping. We really come to understand what it is and not be driven by it.

And this is the seeing that leads to detachment. Detachment meaning the ability to meet the contact, to be with sense objects with even-mindedness, with equanimity—not fearing them and not lusting after them. The equanimity, dispassion. And the Buddha said, through dispassion, one is freed.

The second area of grasping is at views. This is one of my favorites, probably because I do it a lot. It's the tendency of mind that leads one to think, "This alone is true, everything else is false." A very pervasive tendency of mind. And it's binding again, because to hold to any view—any view of the world, of who we are, of anything—limits our world. It limits our possibilities of what we can experience, of what we can perceive, because we tend to accept in our experience only the facts that accord with what our view is. And it can be quite insidious. We only take in the perceptions that corroborate our views and deny anything else.

You see this very clearly in politicians' debates. When the presidential debates are on, you can see that the rhetoric of each participant already reflects what their view is. They already know what they think. And anything they say is just to support that, and nothing can come in from the other person that could in any way be contrary to what they already think. And to me this is why debate is never like two real people talking to each other, because there's no way that either of them is willing to be shaken in the view that they have. And so there can't be any kind of real communication.

It's interesting because having a fixed view of anything, of who we are, can often provide us with a real sense of security, sense of safety, sense of belonging. "Well, this is what Buddhism thinks and this is the Buddhist view of things and I'm a Buddhist so this is what I believe." And it's safe. But it can be scary when anything comes along that doesn't fit with that. It shakes us. It rocks our safe, secure little view of the world. And when we're not aware of views as views, but we're taking them to be a representation of reality, then we just block out whatever doesn't fit.

It was in a book. I didn't read it, but someone told it to me—a story that is a good example of this. It was about a man who was traveling, I think in the mountains of Spain, though I'm not certain. He ran into a little girl who was two or three years old, and she had a tennis ball, a complete tennis ball. She held it out and showed it to him, and then somehow she turned it inside out and then turned it right side out again. He looked at it carefully—it didn't have any splits in it or anything.

Now, my mind immediately dismisses that story. That's impossible, you know. But he said this really happened. And he went back again some years later, same little girl, but she couldn't do it anymore because everyone had told her it was impossible.

Whether it's true or not, just the fact that one's mind tends to go, "That's ridiculous, that's a ridiculous story—obviously the man was misperceiving the first time and the second time, that's how it was." And that's what we do. We make everything fit the views we already have. When we're doing that, we're closed to the possibility of anything other arising in our experience other than what we already know.

This goes on all the time—here in the retreat, in our daily life. How often do we form and adhere to views through the day? "Oh, this is a good sitting. This is what a good sitting is supposed to be like. This is what it means to be concentrated. This is how practice is supposed to go when it's going right."

And we get so caught up in not recognizing it as a view. If we recognize it as a view, it's fine—it's a view, we don't have to identify with it. But when we don't recognize it as a view, we end up comparing it, this view of how it should be, with our experience now. We get locked into trying to recreate that particular view we have of how things should be.

And so other things that are totally unimaginable and not previously experienced are either kept from coming up, or they're discounted, or they're not given attention. They have no chance to arise because we're forcing the mind to try to perceive or try to have experience according to what preconceived ideas we already have. We're locked in, trapped in our views.

How many ideas just of good practice have come up in the mind during retreat? And how many of them have we recognized as views, and how many have we identified with?

The Buddha said, "Because you are obsessed with preconceived notions, you are holding fast." He talked a lot about not holding on to views. In many of the suttas, people would come to the Buddha as one of many spiritual teachers in India at that time. These teachers used to argue and quarrel all the time, and many people would come to the Buddha with questions about all these various worldviews, wanting to know which was right and which was wrong.

He would always refuse to be associated with any view whatsoever, saying that holding to any opinion or belief brings conflict, brings contention. He said something to the effect that people with views just go around annoying one another. And he stayed completely clear of that.

Holding views brings you into conflict with other people. They go around annoying one another—"This is how it is," and anyone who doesn't agree, you're in a fight. We can see how many of the wars today come from exactly this.

And holding a view can also bring us into conflict with ourselves. That's what happens here so often. How often do you have a particular experience in your practice, and immediately, before the experience is even over, you've formulated an explanation of what it means, you've formulated a view about it? "Now this is good concentration. I'm doing well. I'm not having many emotions now."

I must be suppressing. I'm having too many emotions. I'm obviously not staying on top of the mindfulness. The practice isn't going well. My sensations are getting vaguer. I must be doing something wrong. The sensations are way too intense, and I've heard that they're supposed to get more subtle. I must be doing something wrong. And on and on and on.

You see, once we've formulated that view, not recognized it, and identified with it, then we're immediately in conflict with what's actually happening in our experience, which is different from this view we have of what should be happening. And sometimes, when we're locked in a view, we won't accept perceptions that arise even in our own direct experience that counteract that view. We just think, "That didn't even happen." Lock it away. It is scary sometimes.

There's sometimes a fear of not having any views, not having any explanations of the world, of practice, of what should happen, of where it's going—nothing to identify with. To just be in the moment without any constructions or explanations around it, and open into the unknown of the next moment without anything to compare it against, nothing to be reassured by—"Oh, this is how it should go." It's scary. And it's really freeing.

The Buddha again: "One who is freed does not concur and does not dispute with anyone. She or he employs the speech currently used in the world without misapprehending it"—in other words, without misunderstanding it.

So in relation to views, our practice is simply to know when a view has arisen and to see it as a view. To know when there's grasping in the mind in regard to it and when there's not. Some views are quite helpful as ways of explaining, as ways of communicating. And when we see them for what they are—as a view—and don't identify, we're not trapped by them. We're not limited by them. We can use the way of seeing, "the speech currently used in the world," without misunderstanding it to be an accurate description of the way things are. Any view is limiting when identified with. And this applies to views about enlightenment, about truth. You know that line from the Third Zen Patriarch: "Do not search for the truth. Only cease to cherish opinions."

So that's the first two forms of grasping—to sense pleasures and to views. The last two I'll just mention briefly.

The third one is grasping to rites and rituals. It's described by Ledi Sayadaw as the fixed view that a person is able to purify oneself or free oneself from suffering by means of external, outward rules and rituals. In other words, one way of describing it is having the idea that one can make oneself perfect by grasping at some kind of outer behavior to do so.

For example, thinking that just the outer behavior would free one. If you come in here and sit, and no investigation is going on, no sense of really looking and being with reality as it is in the moment, but you're just going through the outer form—you sit and you walk and there's no interest, no effort, no engagement. You're listening to a cassette of Stevie Wonder the whole time, and you think, "Well, if I just do this, if I sit and walk, then I'm going to be freed from suffering." That would be a kind of grasping at outer rules and rituals. It's different from committed investigation, in whatever form that takes, of the nature of our experience, of the nature of mind and body.

This doesn't mean that we necessarily have to discard method or technique. Obviously, these are incredibly helpful, valuable tools. We use the method to investigate the nature of our mind and body, of this moment, of our experience. But we don't mistake blind, unthinking use of method and technique for the truth. The Buddha said we need a raft to get across the river, but then once we're across the river, we don't keep carrying the raft on our back. Or in the Zen parable: don't mistake the finger pointing at the moon for the moon itself.

So that's grasping at rites and rituals—outer behavior to free us from suffering.

And the fourth, which is a biggie and we've talked about quite a bit already, is grasping at the self-idea. This is the big one underlying all of it. The self-idea. To consider the ever-changing world in the light of a permanent, unchanging essence. In other words, it's this latent, underlying tendency to identify with any experience whatsoever. Any experience. Doesn't matter what. Again, you can see how this happens over and over and over, just as we're sitting here. It's what I described before: when there's contact, it's unpleasant, it's a sound, it's unpleasant, aversion arises, and that's grasped onto.

In that moment, watch and see when that grasping happens how the sense of self arises at that same time. And so in this process of isolating and grasping onto the sound, as the grasping strengthens, so also does the identification with that experience as "me." There's aversion, it leads into anger, it becomes my anger—leading into self-condemnation or self-justification, thoughts about the person or whatever is making the sound. See how solid that self-sense becomes through the process of grasping.

And then notice other times when there's a very similar experience arising, a similar contact, and the grasping just doesn't really happen. There can be sound and unpleasantness and aversion, and it's all seen, and it just kind of fades away. There's not this strong sense of "I" that comes up with it.

So really watching through the process of grasping and identification with experience, we can see how the sense of self arises and how it dissolves. Notice times when there's not grasping and the self is not present. It's not a solid, unchanging sense of self. It's arising and passing when the conditions are there.

All identification, all grasping, blinds us. It's bondage. It blinds us to what is true, blinds us to the perfection of this moment.

And so our practice is not to condemn the process of grasping. It's merely an impersonal process. It's not to condemn ourselves because we're not free from it, but simply to come to know it clearly for what it is—how grasping arises, how it comes to be. Watch how it dissolves. Learning not to be so blinded by the delight in it.

And through this seeing, through this mindfulness of this process, the power of grasping does begin to weaken. This mindfulness of the process allows for understanding rather than just acting from blind reactivity—real understanding, clear discernment of what's appropriate. And through understanding, deeper and deeper understanding, it is possible for this seemingly endless search for gratification to come to an end.

The Buddha taught: Because they understand their sense activity, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does, and so their craving ends. They realize the total calm—through seeing and understanding.

And every moment of our experience here gives us a chance to deepen that.

CHAPTER 237

Renunciation, Goodwill, and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this dhamma talk, Carol Wilson examines sammā saṅkappa (right intention), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, exploring how wholesome attitudes of mind naturally emerge through deepening understanding and mindfulness practice. Drawing from the opening verses of the Dhammapada, she illuminates how mind shapes our reality and how our intentions form the crucial link between understanding and action.

Wilson presents the three classical aspects of right intention: nekkhamma (renunciation or non-greed), mettā (goodwill or loving-kindness), and karuṇā (compassion or non-harming). Rather than ideals to force upon ourselves, she describes these as natural expressions of our being that shine through as wisdom develops—like the sun emerging from behind clouds. She emphasizes that true renunciation is not forced asceticism but an inner contentment that allows deep appreciation of the present moment, sharing insights from her time as a Buddhist nun in Thailand.

The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing these attitudes in daily practice, from softening the tone of mental noting to meeting our inner demons with compassion rather than judgment. Wilson shares the story of Milarepa facing demons in his cave and a moving account of a woman who transformed 17 years of wrongful institutionalization through forgiveness. She concludes with Thich Nhat Hanh's observation about Vietnamese boat people—that even one person remaining calm could determine a boat's survival—illustrating how our individual practice of cultivating wholesome intentions ripples outward to benefit all beings we encounter.

The Buddha spoke often and quite eloquently about the power of mind to shape our reality, to shape our experience of reality. I want to read the first pair of verses in the Dhammapada, which is a group of verse sayings of the Buddha.

All mental phenomena have mind as their forerunner. They have mind as their chief. They are mind-made. If one speaks or acts with an impure mind, suffering follows one just as the wheel follows the foot of the ox that draws the cart.

And then the second verse, using a different translation: Our life is shaped by our mind. We become what we think. If one speaks or acts with a pure mind, happiness follows one like a shadow that never leaves.

Very powerful, the effect of our thoughts, the effect of the mind.

Sylvia spoke briefly the other night about the Eightfold Path, the path of practice that we're engaged on now. I want to speak about the second aspect of the path. The first one, right or wise understanding, really speaks to how we understand life, the world, ourselves. And then the second path factor, variously translated as right or wholesome attitude, right thought, or right intention—this really grows from our understanding. How we understand ourselves and the world then informs how we think about the world, what our intentions are.

This second factor, intentions or thought or attitude, is the crucial link between understanding and action. Because how we think is how we then act in the world. And in fact, the next three factors of the path deal with right speech, right action, and right livelihood.

A very simple example: there's a sense of understanding that perhaps there's more to reality, to my own life, than is apparent on the surface, in a superficial glance. That kind of understanding that there's something more tends to give rise to some thought or intention of, "Let me investigate. Let me try meditation. Let me try some spiritual path of learning more." And that intention, that thought, then gives rise to action—and here you all are, sitting here for nine days. Beginning from understanding, the understanding leads to an attitude or thought that leads to action.

And then, of course, the action that has you all sitting here leads to deepening of mindfulness, concentration, and energy, which are the last three of the Eightfold Path. And that in turn leads to deeper seeing into the nature of who and what we are—more understanding. It's a circle. We're back at the beginning of the mandala again.

So tonight I want to talk specifically about the factors of wholesome attitude. What are they? What does it refer to? These are attitudes, wholesome attitudes of mind, intentions that shine through our awareness more clearly as our wisdom develops.

I use this language quite deliberately—"shine through" rather than "manufacture" or even "develop"—because it's not as if these wholesome attitudes of mind are something foreign to our being, or something that we need to go out and manufacture and try to artificially graft onto ourselves. They're actually part of who or what we already are. They begin to arise spontaneously. The more that we bring our attention to this moment, the more that we investigate and come to see what we actually are, these wholesome attitudes of mind, intentions of mind, become more and more spontaneous expressions of our understanding.

Again, I love to use the metaphor of the sun as being the luminous nature of mind. It's always there. The more that we pay attention, the less we get so involved in the clouds that we think they're all there is. The more we're aware of the sun. But the sun is always there. We just become more aware of it.

Classically, speaking of right or wholesome attitudes, thoughts, and intentions includes three broad areas, and I'd like to speak a little about each of them—more as a reminder, to bring up in each of us a reminder of what we are, how we can be.

The first is the attitude of non-greed, or renunciation. It balances the confusion of greed. The second is that of goodwill, or mettā—friendliness, loving-kindness—obviously balancing the inclination of mind toward aversion and ill will. And the third is the attitude of harmlessness, of compassion, balancing cruelty or harmfulness.

And a tendency to be in touch with these attitudes of mind, for these attitudes to arise in a moment as a response to a situation, is strengthened naturally, simply through our mindfulness practice. I promise. It may not feel like it. A lot of times in sitting, it seems like what we're seeing is just more greed, more ill will, more negativity. Sometimes you discover you're a much nicer person than you thought you were before you started sitting. But I promise it's really working the other way around.

A very simple example of how mindfulness is really working to strengthen these wholesome attitudes: When there's no understanding, no clear understanding of the process whereby desire brings suffering, and we don't understand that, whenever a thought comes up of "I want this" or "I want that," we naturally spring into action to try and achieve it. And that's how most of this culture spends most of its time. This can be something really minor—from wanting seconds at lunch, wanting a better little foam pad under your cushion, wanting cherry Life Savers—it can be really mundane. Or it extends all the way up to what we see happening in the world: wanting more land, wanting more oil, wanting some sense of national safety.

So from small to really large scale, when there's not this understanding that desire brings suffering, the actions that manifest from the thought of wanting something come from confusion and can breed incredible pain and suffering and conflict. Or at its least manifestation, it can simply be increasing unsatisfactoriness. The seconds at lunch don't really do it, do they? The foamy pad really doesn't take care of it.

That's a kind of normal way of being. But as we're sitting here, day in and day out, watching the process of desire and watching our continued efforts to fulfill it—the ones that are somehow in our power to fulfill here—you'll start to get it. From paying attention, you see there's just no peace coming from this. There's no lasting satisfaction coming from fulfilling desire. And so as this understanding comes in—that fulfilling desire is not bringing happiness—from our mindfulness of just watching this, quite naturally, our thoughts change.

When the thought comes up, "I think I should get up now and have a cup of tea," another thought arises: "No need to do that." And just quite naturally, our actions change. It's not some big deal, but it actually is a big deal. We find there's a natural sense of renunciation. No forcing, but growing out of our understanding that's coming from this mindfulness practice.

Not necessarily dramatic. But I feel it's very helpful and important to notice and acknowledge these little moments, these little actions of thought, of speech, or body that are coming from intentions of kindness, of non-greed, generosity, compassion. I see it as a sort of positive reinforcement—just the noticing of it. Sometimes we get so focused on seeing the greed and the ill will and the self-judgment that we let a moment of sensing "I really don't need that" pass by. Not that we want to hold on to it, but it's important to acknowledge: "Oh, there was a moment of non-greed arising in the mind." It's very helpful.

So these attitudes arise quite naturally as our mindfulness increases, as our understanding deepens. But I want to say now that it's very important not to set up these attitudes, or any other, as some ideal. It happens a lot in spiritual practice that we have some ideal—"I should be this loving, compassionate, generous person"—and then try to force ourselves to fit that model when it's not what's really genuinely arising. I'm not talking about forcing ourselves or denying what's actually arising in a moment. What's important is to be really honest. True wisdom demands absolute honesty with ourselves, with whatever's arising in the moment. And I know that we can trust that honesty, that willingness to be with whatever's arising. Through that will come the understanding, and of itself these beautiful qualities of mind are able to manifest. But it can't come through forcing or pretense, trying to make ourselves pretend to be other than we are.

I feel that's important to understand—that you don't have to pretend to be anything at all. Non-greed, friendliness, mettā, compassion do arise from our understanding quite naturally. It is a genuine manifestation of our being. You don't need to force it.

Having said that, I'll flip to the other side, because everything's a paradox. What's quite interesting is that at times we actually do have a choice as to where we let the mind dwell. We might not have a choice as to what situations come up, what immediate thought comes up, but we often do have a choice as to how we respond to the situation and whether or not we want to let the mind dwell there.

The Buddha said that whatever one reflects upon frequently, towards that the mind will naturally incline. It's fairly obvious. If we sit and daydream for an hour about something that we really want when we leave here, the longer we stay lost in that daydream, the easier it is for the mind to go back to that place. We have a choice more than we think. We really don't need to feel enslaved by the habits of our mind. They're not set in concrete, though it might feel that way at times. We can't deny the arising of the habits of mind when they're arising in a moment, but we can choose very often how to respond.

A quotation from Nisargadatta: "You cannot escape from your obsessions, but you can cease nurturing them." I think that's quite lovely.

So instead of denying them, you simply cease nurturing them. I don't mean it's easy. The force of habit is really quite strong, especially the habits of mind I'm talking about now—the movement towards greed, towards aversion, towards confusion.

I once cut out a little comic that I think illustrates this beautifully. It shows how easily habits are ingrained through six little episodes. You wander alone down a crowded city street, jostled in the bustle, solitary yet surrounded. You think, "These people are..." Multiple choice: A) My brothers, my sisters. B) Perverts, probably pickaxe murderers. C) Sure could go for a chili dog.

Episode two: Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse... A) I know what he feels. He feels fear. He feels hope. B) Why is that pervert looking at me? C) Maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

Episode three: Down the street, construction workers are tearing the pavement to rubble. How symbolic, you marvel. It reminds me of: A) The path of life. B) The highway to hell. C) Rocky Road, my favorite flavor.

You see, these habitual inclinations just come up when you're not paying attention. But we do have a choice. And it's not like one grand life choice—"Okay, from now on, I'm going to stop being an aversive type." I tried that a while ago. It didn't work.

But in each moment, there is a choice. In each moment there's a choice of whether to go along with the aversion that arises, or whether to just let it be. Whether to go along with the greed, or to see the desire arise and recognize, "I don't need that right now."

Working with right attitude is about a willingness to greet each moment of choice as a chance to learn, a chance to grow out of the dullness of our habits of mind. It's not about expectations of perfection. It's not another standard to judge ourselves against. It's about opening to this moment as a learning possibility. And that's quite vital, quite rich. The learning never ends.

So I'd like to speak a little about each of these three attitudes. First, attitude or thought guided by non-greed, or renunciation. I know renunciation has a bit of a bad reputation in our culture, but here it doesn't mean enforced asceticism. To me, I experience it much more as a sense of inner contentment. Renunciation means not being so caught up in needing, in acquiring, in wanting. And when we're not caught up in searching outward for something, there's so much more capacity for appreciating what's right here, right now. There's a sense of ease, of contentment, of simplicity.

I would imagine that most or all of you will have experienced simple moments of that, perhaps on retreat. Nothing dramatic. Just a moment where you're sitting with a cup of tea and it feels so fulfilling. There's such a sense of appreciation. Or looking at a sunset, feeling the wind, feeling a little lift inside. Something not specifically dramatic.

But there's a sense of real inner contentment, appreciation of that momentary experience. It's not because that's the best cup of tea that was ever made, or the most beautiful sunset you've ever seen in your life. It's that in that moment, the mind and heart are quiet. There's no desire in the mind. There's no reaching out. And so with this sense of inner contentment, this simple being in the moment, there's great appreciation for whatever it is that we happen to be experiencing.

This sense of renunciation, of non-greed, really—at least in my experience—runs quite counter to the input, the information that comes in from our society. Just the word itself, renunciation, often brings up connotations of forced asceticism, intentional suffering, a kind of grimness. And it's not that at all. In our society, giving things up in many people's eyes means suffering.

Just looking at the ads—I was reading the New York Times Magazine the other day, and the ads in that are amazing. Full-page ads for two-thousand-dollar watches and perfume that costs hundreds of dollars for a little bottle, and just on and on. The intention, I know from the effect, is to make one say, "God, I really need that." Or just looking at it, you feel a lack because one could never afford it. Really, most of the media input goes along in that direction, creating new needs, making consumers feel that we need more and more.

Often, talking to people that I meet whom I don't really know, or even my family sometimes, they'll say, "Well, you don't have this and you don't have that"—something that would never have occurred to me to want. There's a sense of, "Oh, that must be really hard not to have such and such." Well, it never even occurred to me. But not having, living simply, is equated with suffering in this society. And it's just not true.

Suzuki Roshi says, "Renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of this world, but in accepting that they go away." Accepting that whatever we have is going to go away, and that's okay.

I'd like to mention a couple of reflections which I find arise quite naturally as practice continues, reflections that really help the mind incline towards non-greed, towards its natural sense of simplicity.

One is an understanding that we inevitably come to, on deeper and deeper levels—which I've already mentioned—the understanding of the unsatisfactoriness inherent in desire itself. Not saying, "Oh, desire is bad, I should eradicate it," but really understanding how unsatisfying it is.

This retreat is a really good setup for that. In a space of somewhat forced outer renunciation, this form takes away a lot of things that you could normally do or get to satisfy desire. It's by choice, but it's also by force. Once we've got you in here, you're forced to renounce a lot of things. But it's a fantastic chance to explore the nature of desire, because most of the desires that come up here, you can't gratify—not if you want to stay. Most people say, "Well, once I'm here, I'm going to stay. I'm not going to run out just to have a pizza." So since you can't gratify it, this kind of enforced renunciation helps us, through our experience, sift through this barrage, this maze of desires and ways to pursue them that we're greeted with on a daily basis in our normal life. We really start to experience the futility of all that. You have to try really hard not to notice that desire is suffering.

Two quotations I love about this. One is from Isaac Singer: "Hell is made up of yearnings. The wicked don't roast on beds of nails. They sit on comfortable chairs and are tortured with desire."

And this is from Bashō, the Japanese poet—this captures so beautifully the endless nature of craving: "Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto." This is so nice. This is desire for the sake of desire. Desire breeds desire, and that's what keeps us in this sense of bondage.

Sayadaw U Pandita said once that consuming sense pleasures is a form of self-oppression because it's tiring and insatiable.

So the more we really notice, the more we're mindful of desire and the futility of it, quite naturally the mind begins to incline towards renunciation. By renunciation I mean a turning away from craving and its demand for gratification. Turning away from craving does not necessarily have to mean turning away from the things of the world, but turning away from craving itself.

I've found in my life that this leads quite naturally to a greater sense of simplicity—both outer, in the things of my life, and inner, just in the things that I want. Yes, I still want plenty of things, but they're fewer.

And it's easier to say, you know, tomorrow I won't care, and let it go.

I learned a lot about this sense of simplicity and the beauty, the real joy that can come from living in a simple way. Some years ago, for a period of several months, I was living in Thailand as a Buddhist nun. One lives quite simply, and the first few months were quite difficult, with massive aversion attacks, real kicking and fighting against wanting to be more comfortable, wanting better food, wanting not to be hot, not wanting bugs—just really wanting things to be different from how they were. And the inevitable culture shock of giving up all the comforts that we have in this culture.

But after two or three months, it really started to shift. And by the end of the time, my situation was no more comfortable. I had no more things than I had in the beginning. But in that simplicity there was such a sense of appreciation and joy for stuff that I would normally not even have noticed in my comfort-surrounded normal life. And I remember—I know I'm not remembering this through a haze of memory because I was writing about it at the time—but it was really one of the happiest and simplest times of my life. Really joyful, not because anything fantastic was happening. Just get up, go get food, sit a little, walk in the woods, wash my clothes. Very mundane on the outer level. But in that sense of not wanting, I really understood in some ways what the purpose of a renunciate life in that form could be: to really get a sense of the joy that can come from a mind that isn't so engaged in getting and having.

And as I mentioned before, we all have moments like that. We've had moments like that here in practice. We have many moments like that when we're not here, still in our life practice. Acknowledge those. It's important. It's an important counterbalance to our ingrained habit of thinking more means more happy.

In a way, the whole practice is a process of deepening letting go. And actually, enlightenment is the ultimate letting go. It's not about getting something. You cannot get enlightenment—a contradiction in terms. It's about the ultimate letting go.

So, non-greed.

The second intention, or thought, or attitude that becomes more manifest is that of goodwill or friendliness—mettā, loving-kindness, thought guided by goodwill. And in a way, that's infiltrating our experience here, simply as an openness to whatever circumstance presents itself, which in effect is what this mindfulness practice is.

I've often felt, actually, that the cultivation of mindfulness in a moment is, in a way, an expression of goodwill, of mettā. Because when, in a moment of experience, whatever arises—a breath, a pain, a sound, whatever—when the attitude in that noting moment is one of openness, acceptance, "Fine, this is here, let's deal with it," whether it's in a noting moment or in a situation in life, that really is, in that moment, the intention, the attitude of goodwill, of kindness, of friendliness, openness to whatever's presenting itself in this moment.

And all the times that, instead of meeting something with friendliness—which is often—we meet it with resentment or ill will or wishing it was different, lack of self-acceptance: again, this obviously comes from aversion, the flip side. And one moment of acceptance, just one moment of acceptance of what's arising, is the attitude of goodwill. It's not like we have to do it over and over to cultivate that attitude. In that moment, that is the expression of friendliness, of goodwill.

It's important to recognize this as a possibility, as a living expression that we can manifest and experience over and over, no matter how difficult our experience might be in a moment.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh speaking about our relationship to anger, though it could apply to anything:

"I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with non-violence. We do not need to consider anger, hatred, as enemies we have to fight to destroy. That would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield, tearing yourself into parts. If you struggle in that way, you do violence to yourself."

So with this attitude of goodwill, rather than doing violence to ourselves, we might be more open to a situation. Again, we sense that no matter how difficult a situation, we can use it as a stepping stone rather than an obstacle. And some people would say, well, we need difficult situations because that's how we grow.

There's a story I love about Gurdjieff, who had a community in France, I believe, with quite a lot of people living together under his guidance. And there was one man who was extremely difficult and drove everybody crazy. Nobody liked him or liked to be around him. And I guess people weren't very nice to him either. He just got fed up one time and left. Everyone said, "Thank God he's gone. Now we can really get down to what community is about."

And Gurdjieff went after him and tried to talk him into coming back. And the man said, "Forget it. I don't want to come back there. People aren't nice to me."

Who wants to live here?

So the Jesuit said, "I'll pay you to come back."

And so he came back. People said, "What's he going to do that for? It's so nice without him."

And the Jesuit said, "No, you need this guy. He's a very important part of the community."

My belief is that we don't need to go out and look for trouble in our lives—enough of it comes to us—but this story kind of makes the point.

Another example, a key example that I really love, is about the possibility for transformation from extraordinarily difficult and debilitating circumstances through the power of this attitude of mind of goodwill, of friendliness. I cut this out of a paper a few years ago, about a woman whose story was titled "In Triumphant Return, Ex-Patient Takes Post at Mental Hospital."

It's about a woman who says she was seventeen and clinically depressed when she was misdiagnosed as schizophrenic and placed in a state mental hospital. She remained inside for seventeen years. Now, fittingly for a woman whose antidotes to adversity are perseverance and forgiveness, she has returned as a full-time administrator at the same hospital.

She says, "I wouldn't have grown one bit if I didn't learn to forgive. If you don't forgive your parents or your children or yourself, you don't get beyond that anger."

And then it goes on about many other difficulties in her life—the death of her husband from cancer, deaths by fire of some other people in her family—and just her deep sense of not blaming. It's not a false forgiveness, you know, but a deep sense that to learn to forgive and not dwell in the pain of the past, one can really reach out to a brighter future.

I find it quite inspiring because it's true. It's not a phony sense of pretending to forgive, but the actual experience over many, many years of the strength of this attitude of mind of goodwill. She's a woman who is not stuck. And nor are we. None of us is stuck and needs to be stuck.

I do want to emphasize, though, that it is a gradual process. Again, not to set up an ideal that no matter how badly one might have suffered and been hurt, well, one ought to forgive this tomorrow and move on. We must really respect and be honest with what's arising in our experience. And then from this truth, the attitude of goodwill, of mettā, will arise. A whole other way of being becomes a possibility.

I love the saying from the Carlos Castaneda book: "A warrior sees everything as a challenge, while an ordinary person sees everything as a blessing or a curse."

A challenge. Goodwill is not equal to passivity or non-action. A lot of times people ask about that. They say, "Well, if we just be open to whatever happens, does that mean we just accept abuse and don't act appropriately?" That's not the case at all. Actually, in meeting a situation with openness, without anger, without blame, you can see so much more clearly what appropriate action is in that situation. And the energy is actually much more available to then act in that appropriate way. It's not so bound up in negativity or fear or self-blame or outward blame. So the attitude of mind of mettā is not at all passive. It leads to quite appropriate action—not just for ourselves, but for all the other people involved.

The third attitude or intention, quite closely related, is that of non-harming—of thought or intention guided by compassion. In many cases, the action of compassion is a natural outflow of the thought of kindness, of mettā, the thought of non-harming.

We don't have to go looking for a field to begin experiencing and observing both what the intention or thought of compassion in the mind can feel like, and also the power of that to affect our actions. We can start right here in this moment, in this sitting and walking and the rest of the day's practice—with compassion for oneself, with compassion for what one is experiencing.

I can't overemphasize the importance of allowing and acknowledging and developing compassion for oneself. It's not selfish. Thich Nhat Hanh again: "If you cannot be compassionate towards yourself, you will not be able to be compassionate to others." And just in my experience, this is so true.

What we're doing here is often extremely difficult. I know from talking to many people in interviews—this is really hard, you know, to sit with oneself. Stephen Levine said once, "We experience many forms of hell as we watch the mind and body." And it's really true. We're meeting all our demons just sitting here quietly on this cushion. Every day—our anger, fear, loneliness, self-hatred, lust, resistance, boredom, on and on.

And how are we greeting these difficult experiences? What about compassion for this suffering? Start to notice how the intention of mind, how the thought of mind, expresses itself just in one noting moment.

Notice the tone of the note. Is it stinging? It tells you something. Notice the tone of the commentary, the running commentary. Maybe you don't have running commentary—I have endless running commentary. Notice the quality of that. Is it, "What's wrong with you? You're off the breath again. David, what, you're having another pain like that? Can't you learn to sit right? You were angry already half the day yesterday, and you're angry again. Get over it."

Notice what's going on. So often we experience these really painful, difficult states and then blame ourselves for experiencing them.

Something I do a lot, besides softening the tone of the note—instead of "thinking," "I'm thinking," it's more mutual: "I'm thinking"—is to notice the commentary. Would you treat someone else that harshly? I'll often imagine, when I'm in a really knotted-up state, hating myself, blaming myself—"You knew how to do this right, for God's sake, after all these years; this wouldn't be happening"—I think, if the person next to me was going through that and I knew it, would I think that? Is that how I would relate to that person's suffering? I wouldn't be in this job for very long, I'm sure. And when people share these struggles with me, I always respond, "God, that's really hard. That's really painful." So turn that around to oneself.

Soften the tone of the notes. Notice the running commentary; soften that as well. I used to have one really harsh running commentary that I started to note as "traffic cop," but actually "drill sergeant" would have been much more appropriate. It was like, "When you get back to the breath—you didn't feel that sensation closely enough, go back and do it again." On and on. I softened that one, and you start hearing, "It's okay. It's okay." It helps a lot.

It's a little conscious, you know, but to notice the lack of compassion, the negativity and ill will toward oneself, and intentionally soften it, bring in a feeling of compassion—it changes the whole tone of practice. And after a while, it's not this sense of "Oh, I should be compassionate." But as the Buddha said, what the mind frequently thinks about, that's where it dwells. The compassion begins to arise quite naturally.

I want to read this one personification of working with our demons and compassion. It's a story about Milarepa, a great Tibetan yogi who meditated for years up in caves in Tibet. It's really about how to greet our demons with deep compassion for the suffering engendered. It's quite personified.

So Milarepa was up meditating in his cave, and his mind became blissful. He carried some wood back up to the cave, and when he arrived there, he found seven demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some were grinding tsampa, and some sat performing various magical tricks. It's kind of like what happens when you come back from lunch, sit on the pillow, and seven demons spring up—and you were just blissful, you know, minding your own business.

As soon as he saw them, he became frightened. So he meditated, he uttered a subjugating mantra, he performed the gaze, he aroused his deity's presence. Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness, but was unable to pacify them. He thought, "Well, they might be local deities of the place, and I've been here for years, but I've not praised them." So he sang a song of praise to the place. Three of the demons went away, but Milarepa was unable to make the other four go away.

Realizing that the four demons were magical obstacles, he sang a song of confidence, saying: "It's wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time we should converse."

Three of them vanished like a rainbow.

The remaining demon performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, "This one is vicious and very powerful." So he sang a song as his view, the pinnacle of his realization, ending it with: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. Demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk about our differences. I feel compassion for this spirit. Let me pray to Lord Vajradhara. Grant your blessings so that this lowly one"—meaning himself—"this lowly one may have complete compassion."

And then, with friendliness and complete compassion, without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and vanished like a rainbow.

So out of great compassion for ourselves and our demons, can we just place our heads in the mouth? We might vanish and we might not.

There's one other thing I'd like to share from my own experience of compassion—of experiencing a slight dose of compassion. As we allow compassion, non-harming, towards ourselves, towards our own pain, quite naturally it opens up our hearts and minds to compassion for others in the world, for others who we come in contact with. I find that when we don't need to shut off to our own pain, then we don't need to shut off to others' pain. We really can be there for it. And this is really the arising, that quivering of the heart in response to pain, that is sometimes given as a definition of compassion.

Another thing I found so interesting: when we're working with pain and compassion, with our own strong physical or emotional pain, when we're caught in resisting it—which is natural—it seems so separated, so isolated, like we're really alone in our pain, really disconnected. But as compassion comes in towards ourselves, towards this experience, a sense of empathy and connection with our own pain grows to include others. What had been a very isolating experience turns into one that dissolves the seeming sense of separation that we have.

Often in practice, many people talk about it and I've experienced it myself: what has been quite a personal pain that we're fighting, when we open to it with compassion, turns into an experience of universal pain. And a strong sense of our interconnectedness grows out of it.

Just one last example. Once I was in the hospital, lying there, wishing I wasn't there, lost in my pain. I was in a room with three other women, and something just kind of opened out my attention from my own experience. I softened to it and became aware of how much pain was going on in the two ladies around me. And then the awareness just kept spreading. How many rooms were there in this one hospital? How many hospitals? There were five hospitals just in the town I was in. And how many towns? Just on and on.

Rather than that seeming overwhelming, being able to acknowledge with kindness and compassion my own pain allowed me to open to the others, and to the others' pain, in quite a deep sense of the universality of all of us. And that, from being overwhelmingly painful, can actually bring quite a sense of peace and joy and acceptance.

So these three wholesome attitudes of mind—non-greed or renunciation, the nature of good will, and compassion or non-harming—they develop naturally as we continue to investigate in each moment the nature of our mind and body, the nature of what's arising. More and more they become natural modes of thought, of intention, natural modes of being—not some forced idea.

And again, it's so important to realize that this reach extends far beyond our individual self. How our mind is inclined, the thoughts, affect our actions, and that really does affect everyone we come in contact with.

One last story, showing the power of one person's clarity of intention and action. Thich Nhat Hanh has written about the boat people, those who escaped from Vietnam, all crowded onto small boats. Many of them had trouble with storms—aside from the pirates, these were small, under-equipped boats facing rough storms at sea. He said that in talking with hundreds or thousands of refugees, together they've come to see that the boats with the best chance of survival, the ones that made it through the best when there was a storm or difficulty, were the ones where even one person remained calm. Even one person remaining calm had the thoughts, the intention of inner peace that could lead to appropriate action, and it infects, inspires other people.

So our actions, which are informed by our thoughts, which are formed by our understanding, have great power in the world. As one teacher of mine said to me recently, as a paraphrase: never underestimate the value of what you're doing here.

CHAPTER 238

Compassion

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this heartfelt dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines one of meditation's most essential balances: how to genuinely care about suffering while maintaining the equanimity needed to respond skillfully rather than reactively. Drawing from the opening verses of the Dhammapada, she establishes that happiness and sorrow originate within the mind itself, and that the Buddha's teachings aim to relieve suffering at its deepest level.
>
> Wilson distinguishes true compassion—the quivering of the heart in response to suffering—from its near enemy of pity or grief, which involves separation and aversion to unpleasantness. She explains how understanding the three characteristics (anicca, dukkha, anattā) provides the detachment necessary to face pain without being overwhelmed. Through personal stories, including caring for a dying turtle that connected to childhood trauma around her mother's death, she illustrates how we repeatedly learn the difference between genuine compassion and aversion disguised as caring.
>
> The talk explores both the equanimity developed through vipassanā practice and the brahmavihārā equanimity practice with its powerful phrases: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and sorrow depend upon your actions, not my wishes for you." Wilson emphasizes that freedom happens only in the present moment through non-identification with experience. She encourages practitioners to trust both the closing and opening of the heart, reminding us that even small moments of genuine care—like the musician who simply took interest in her as a teenager—can be profoundly transformative.

Compassion

Balancing care with detachment. Balancing compassion with equanimity.

The very first lines of the Dhammapada start like this: "Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief. They are all mind wrought. If with an impure mind a person speaks or acts, suffering follows one like the wheel that follows the foot of an ox." The next lines are: "Mind precedes all mental states. Mind is their chief. They are all mind wrought. If with a pure mind a person speaks or acts, happiness follows one like a never-departing shadow."

The Buddha taught that our happiness and our sorrow originate within ourselves. They are all mind-wrought. All beings who take birth want to be happy. The Buddha's teachings were meant to relieve suffering at the deepest level. Learning how to balance opening to suffering, caring about suffering, and having understanding or wisdom developing detachment—this balance is actually how we learn to relieve suffering at the deepest level.

Finding some context for understanding the suffering and the pain in our lives and in this world means facing this world, facing reality just as it is, accepting it with unconditional acceptance, and then coming to understand it. The process will then happen on deeper and deeper levels of reality, and hence deeper and deeper levels of wisdom or understanding.

There's a play called The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe, written by Jane Wagner. Lily Tomlin plays the role of the person speaking these lines: "I made some studies, and reality is the leading cause of stress amongst those in touch with it. I can take it in small doses, but as a lifestyle, I found it too confining. Reality was just too needful. It expected me to be there for it all the time. And with all I have to do, I had to let something go."

Facing reality—it's not easy. That's why I read that. What we usually do is let it go. And that's why we're here at this retreat. And as you can see, it's not easy.

I was sitting a retreat in Australia last year for about five weeks. We were all pretty quiet around, I think, about a month into the course, when a high school band started marching through the retreat center where we were sitting. We were all quiet, doing walking meditation, and the tune they were playing was "When the Saints Come Marching In." It was really loud, just going right by where I was doing walking meditation. And it seemed really funny to me. I had one of those laughing fits that you can't control when you're doing vipassanā, but you hope nobody's around when you're having it.

And then I thought, well, this is a great song for a vipassanā retreat. It could be a theme song. "When the saints go marching in"—a saint is someone who has totally let go of control of life through this complete surrender to how reality is, how life is. Life is this constant stream of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. Learning to open to life, to open to reality, to care about life, but also to be detached from it—to not have to hold on to pleasurable feelings, to not push away unpleasant feelings. This is the life of the saint. It's like the mind becomes like water. It just flows with life, with reality as it is. This takes a tremendous balance of care, openness of heart, and detachment.

Coming to terms with the suffering within how reality appears for us in this world, opening to it, understanding it, and then responding in any way that we feel is appropriate—this requires the balance I'm talking about, of compassion and equanimity.

There was so much pain in my childhood. It was so overwhelming that the only refuge I had was nature, my sanity. I learned that if I just went out in nature and waited—and sometimes I had to wait a very long time—there would be this stillness and quiet, and I would have this rest, this calm, in which I could face another day of my family life.

I didn't learn how to open to pain in that process. What brought me to the practice was really seeing that that wasn't enough. It was a lot to learn how to be quiet and peaceful, to have the energy to face another day, but I wasn't really able to open to the suffering, to care about it while also being detached.

When I went to college, I found a professor who was a naturalist. He was one of the first environmentalists in this country, and he was like my first guru. One of the projects he gave me was, for a whole winter and spring semester, to find a bush and spend at least thirty minutes to an hour every day with this bush.

That was my project for six months. Every day for six months I would go to this bush and I would draw it or meditate by it or just stare at it or read about it—whether it was snowing or raining or very sunny, and in many different swings of moods from very difficult moods to very happy moods to very neutral moods. I would just go to this place I called my spot every day. And when spring came and the bush flowered, it was one of the most ecstatic moments in my life. I had become so connected to this bush and so caring about it. It was a very wonderful teaching.

This teacher kind of hooked me because he understood my love of nature, but he also understood my total aversion to study. So he lured me into this world of studying nature by first letting me love it. That was my direct path—that was my predilection, actually—just the loving it. And I ended up taking twenty-three credits studying birds and plants, botany, all kinds of things.

What struck me about him is that he had developed in his world this extraordinary balance of loving nature but also having this ability to keenly, very precisely study nature, to observe nature. And he taught me that I could get to know anything in nature—whether it was a bird or an insect or a plant or animals—in many different ways. I could write stories about them. I could spend time with them. I could learn their scientific names, and by learning their scientific names I could get to know their family, their habits, their conditioning, their history.

I trusted this teacher because he cared about what he was learning, what he was studying, and I needed that love before I could trust him. What he was learning about wasn't a cold, detached study but a very connected and caring, intimate experience with nature. It wasn't separate, because he cared.

There's a great saying that I think exquisitely expresses this balance of care, love, and understanding. This is a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj. He said that love tells me I'm everything, wisdom tells me I'm nothing, and between the two my life flows. To me, that's all we need to know.

I wanted to speak a little bit about compassion. Sharon will talk more about compassion tomorrow night. You've probably heard this already—compassion, the Buddha taught, was the quivering of the heart in response to suffering. It's an openness to the suffering, not a feeling of being separate from the suffering.

The near enemy of compassion or caring is pity or grief, because we are feeling in those moments of pity or grief a separation from the suffering. Near enemy means that it can look like compassion. It masquerades as compassion. But we're really feeling sorry for someone or ourself. There's this aversion to the unpleasantness of the suffering. We're not open to the unpleasantness of the suffering.

The far enemy of compassion is cruelty. There's this harming, actual harming of ourselves or another. And the reason why it's the far enemy is because we can't feel this care or compassion and cruelty at the same time.

Compassion isn't sorrow. It's actually a very wonderful feeling of just caring. The heart is very tender. I remember when I was doing the compassion practice this spring, there were so many times when I would fall into grief or pity when I was doing this practice. And I learned slowly, by noticing when it would shift to this very pleasant feeling of care, that that's what compassion was.

But you'll find that when you do it, you'll have a lot of grief come up, a lot of sadness come up, because you're facing the suffering, you're facing reality, and you're touching the unpleasantness. And I kept thinking, well, I want to be compassionate all the time right now. But you'll actually learn about the near enemy a lot if you practice it a lot. And eventually you'll start to see the difference between that pleasant feeling of care and the grief or the sorrow, which includes this aversion to the unpleasantness.

This openness of heart that's required for us to be able to touch the suffering and not feel separate needs to be balanced with equanimity, understanding, or detachment. If the heart is overly engaged and not balanced with understanding, usually it will start to want to get rid of the suffering. We want to get rid of the pain in ourself or others from this aversion to the unpleasantness. Our hearts can so easily be overwhelmed or broken by too much suffering, too much pain, when we don't have this balance of understanding that makes the heart strong. And this is when sorrow happens, when we get overwhelmed by the suffering.

If you consider how much suffering there is in this world—I don't want to go into the morbid details, but if you just look at hunger on this planet, just hunger. Or if you look at any kind of violence, war, how children are treated, disease—there's so much suffering in this world. And it's actually possible to transform our awareness of suffering into compassion.

It takes practice, but we can do it. Compassion doesn't mean avoiding the pain. It means allowing it, accepting it, understanding it.

When I first came to IMS to be on staff, I was a cook here, and I also had the job of taking care of the garden and all the plants in the building. I grew very attached to the plants here. A monk named Taungpulu Sayadaw came, who was a very powerful teacher. I was having problems because the plants had a lot of bugs in them when I arrived, and I was trying very hard to keep this precept of not killing, which I was just learning about. I hadn't really been familiar with this precept before. So I was doing my best, but I was getting very frustrated. I went to Taungpulu Sayadaw and said, "Can I kill the bugs on these plants? I can't stand it anymore." And he said, "Do the best you can to save the plants, but don't kill the bugs. Whatever you do, don't kill the bugs." It was really hard for me—a really hard teaching. I was very new to the practice. I had only done one retreat. I didn't really understand.

There was a gradual process for me, with certain events helping to deepen this teaching of care and wisdom. When I was on staff, I was driving to Amherst one day, and there was a huge snapping turtle in the road that had just been hit. I pulled off to the side and went out to see the turtle. It was still alive, but the whole shell had been smashed. It was obvious that it wasn't going to make it. Again, there was this sense—that thought: I want to put it out of its misery. I should kill it. But then there was this monk's voice saying, "Whatever you do, don't kill." So I scooped up the turtle and went under a pine tree. I did metta with the turtle until it died.

But the turtle never left me. The turtle kept coming up in my sittings from then on. At a certain point, I discovered that this was all on the surface of an experience I had as a child of watching my mother dying. As a child, I didn't understand that there could be that much pain in this world. And I think that with the amount of suffering in this world, we have very hard lessons in learning what compassion really is.

I saw a movie recently with Stephen called The Doctor. It's a great movie about a doctor who had been trained very well technically. He was a great surgeon, but he had no idea what it was like to be suffering, what it was like to be a patient, what it was like to be a patient in a modern hospital, how it was to be treated in a modern hospital. In the course of the movie, this doctor gets cancer—he's diagnosed with malignant cancer. And the story is this transformation of a person from being, I would call, almost nearly uncompassionate. They kind of made it extreme in the movie, but you didn't see a trace of compassion in him at the beginning. Then he slowly starts to open up, because he was treated just like he was treating people, and his heart started to open.

The movie was very hard for me to watch at times, and I wasn't quite sure what was going on for me. But when I left the movie, I started to see: here's this difficulty I had as a child, because my mother was in and out of hospitals, in and out of nursing homes, and she was treated very coldly at times. So I had to—again, for what seems like the millionth time—sort out: there was the way she was treated that I didn't understand at the time, and I had a lot of aversion for it. There was her actual death. There was the loss for myself. And then there was the way she died, which was so lonely. I think that's the most painful thing for me, that she really didn't have anybody. Death isn't really so bad, really, if there's somebody supporting you. And also, what it felt like to touch her corpse—this warmth of the body to very cold. It really hit me like lightning when I touched her body and it was so cold.

I was very different from other children after that. I had a different way of seeing the world from that experience at a very young age. I was searching so deeply for understanding because of it. So much of it was because of this thing I'm talking about—being able to open to the pain and also understand it. I was trying to understand it, but I couldn't even open to it as a child.

But it was just always pushing me to search for that understanding.

So we all have to learn over and over the difference between compassion and aversion. It's not like you get it once and then it's over. That's not how it is. We get these lessons over and over.

When we wish someone to be free from suffering, it doesn't mean that we're wishing them to be free from suffering out of aversion to the unpleasantness. It's very critical that compassion has this understanding with it—that we're just caring for the person, or caring for the pain in ourselves. Just caring. And we wish that it ends, but we can't control that it ends. So the wish is important, but we have to let go of control. The way that we learn how to let go of control is through detachment and equanimity. We learn to open and care with compassion. The understanding comes through detachment, through equanimity.

There's a saying attributed to Kuan Yin, who is the bodhisattva of compassion: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?" This is a great one if you're having trouble. The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm? And this is all about learning this understanding, this detachment.

If there's sadness, we can start to see that there is no one sad. There is just sadness arising and passing away, like a cloud moving through the open, vast blue sky. There is no solid self behind the process. Sadness can be seen like emotional waves rising up on the seashore and then passing. We can learn to open to pain and not identify with it. That not identifying with it is the detachment. We can learn to be with it and let it go.

Some of our greatest teachers are the unpleasant feelings that actually arise in our life, because they teach us how to work with aversion rather than wanting to get rid of it. If you're having knee pain or back pain, any emotional pain—or if maybe the sound of somebody snoring drives you crazy, or somebody coughing, or perhaps we're having aversion to aversion itself, or aversion to fear—whatever it is, these are actually the things that help us learn how to work with aversion. They are the teacher.

Say we're having difficulty learning how to experience grief or anger. I'm talking about this in relationship to pain because that's what this talk is about: How do we open to suffering? Say we're having difficulty with experiencing aversion to pain, whether it's inside or outside ourselves. This has to do with unpleasant sensations. It's not that we want to get rid of the anger, because that keeps reinforcing the anger. But when aversion or grief arises, we can learn to accept it simply because it's happened.

And then we can start learning how to have the perspective of anicca—that it's impermanent. We can have the perspective of dukkha—that we can't control it, but it's arisen. There's this uncertainty, insecurity. And then we can have the perspective of anatta with it—that there's no solid separate self behind this process.

Wisdom and the detachment that comes with wisdom involves seeing with these three perspectives, or from one of these three perspectives at any given time. Dukkha is the understanding that we can't control that it has arisen. Anicca is that sense that it's just coming and going. Anatta is not taking it as me or I or mine. And if we have one of these three perspectives, or all three—which is when wisdom is really strong—we see that there's no need to repress the aversion or grief, and there's no need to indulge it. We can just let it come and go. We welcome it just like you would a wave on the seashore, and it will pass.

Equanimity is that very sweet, deep balance of mind when we're not at war with things, when we're not fighting the unpleasantness that comes with life. It's so sweet because it's the opposite of the reacting mind. It's this deep, unconditional acceptance. When this is strong, when we have the strength to actually let these unpleasant things in life come and go—to feel them fully and let them come and go—there's no more fear of feeling the unpleasantness, no more fear of feeling the anger, no more fear of feeling the grief, no more fear of opening to suffering. And it doesn't matter what kind of suffering it is, whether it's a sound, a smell, a taste, a touch, a thought, an emotion.

The true test of whether we're free is if something comes back. If our reaction is, "Oh no, I thought I got rid of you"—that's not quite freedom. That's not equanimity, it's not understanding. We're not seeing it clearly.

When we take birth in this human realm, on this planet, the given is that there's this great mixture of pleasant and unpleasant feelings. Freedom isn't opening up the body. Freedom isn't getting rid of emotions. Freedom isn't working anything out. Because all of that involves something in the future—it means we're not okay just where we are.

The transformation in this practice, this very deep transformation, occurs whenever we're fully present now and when we're not identified with what's happening now. The only possibility for freedom is now. Freedom doesn't happen in the past and it can't happen in the future, and it doesn't depend on what's happening. It can only happen in one moment—when we aren't identified with what's happening. This non-identification is only possible in the present moment. This is where understanding is, this is where detachment comes from, this is the real freedom. And it's the only possibility of balancing the suffering that happens in our life. It's the only possibility for freedom.

With this detachment, it helps us to face any kind of pain without drowning in it. We learn how to swim in it. We learn to live in life and grow from what's happening rather than to shut down or drown. We learn to open and let go. Understanding gives strength to our heart. In some ways you might see being here as exercising your heart. There's so much emphasis on exercising the body in this culture, but what you're doing is really stretching the heart. Sometimes it hurts.

True compassion, when we're open to suffering, means we don't turn to mush in the face of suffering. And we also don't turn to indifference. We're not shut down and we're not drowning.

The equanimity that I've been describing is the equanimity that comes with the Vipassana practice. In the Brahma-vihara practice there's also an equanimity practice that develops equanimity, but it's a different kind than what develops in Vipassana. In this equanimity practice, which you'll be doing a little later after compassion and mudita, the phrases that one says are: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and your sorrow depend upon your actions and not upon my wishes for you."

I remember when I got to this part this spring, I thought it had a little punch in it. There's the most understanding in this Brahma-vihara. When you're saying it to someone, you can imagine the power of that: "All beings are the owners of their actions. Your happiness and your sorrow depend upon your actions and not my wishes for you." This is a great healing of a codependent heart. Basically, you're saying: I'm not responsible for your pain. It's very powerful. It's amazing.

I think that the way this heals is that if the heart is very open, there's a tendency to want to control with it. There's a tendency to want results. We want the pain to go away, or we want to see results. I might be wishing some of my family members happiness for the next fifty million years, but I can wish it—I can't control with it. And I think that with family members particularly it's very poignant. This equanimity from the Brahma-viharas is really important to balance an open heart. It's not just the understanding that there's no solid separate self behind the process; there's also the understanding that a person's actions are what will bring them happiness and sorrow, not our wishes for them. Our care will help influence somebody, but ultimately it's one's own actions that bring us happiness or sorrow.

I have a nephew that I raised for most of his young years, and then around when he was five I started drifting away. He's been a great teacher for me since he joined the Marines when he was seventeen. When he joined the Marines, I felt like I'd been slapped really hard across the face, because it was the opposite of where I had hoped he would go. It's been an incredible teaching for me, but also incredibly painful. He was sent to the Gulf this year when the war started, and my heart just felt like it was breaking. It was just horrendous. He was in all the action that happened. And he hasn't recovered. I don't know if he'll ever recover.

And it's very hard for me. And I think that we can do and say what we say with other beings, and especially with the beings we're very connected to and very close to, but then we have to let go. And it's often the people we care about the most that we have to practice this openness of heart and still care, but also have that detachment.

I have to understand that he chose that in whatever conditioning brought that about, and that I can do what I can, but that's his karma. And if you think about all the people you care about so deeply, we need this understanding of karma. We care and we do the best we can, and then we have to let go of control.

Often we feel like there's this immensity of suffering in the world, and that we have to do so much. It can seem overwhelming. Yet it's really the little things that we do that have a lot of power.

This is a quotation from Mother Teresa. She said, "We feel that what we are doing is just a drop in the ocean. But if that drop were not in the ocean, I think the ocean would be less because of that missing drop. I don't agree with the big way of doing things. To us, what matters is an individual. To get to love a person, we must come in close contact with them. If we wait until we get the numbers, then we will be lost in the numbers, and we will never be able to show love and respect for that person. I believe in person to person."

One moment of care, one moment of genuine mindfulness and care, is so powerful. And it might be rare that we can actually have that one moment of openness and detachment and really respond with care to suffering. But in that moment, there's this great transformation that takes place.

And it's important to remember that it's okay to be closed. It's okay not to be compassionate. Sometimes we just don't have it in us to open. We have to be okay with having a closed heart. That means that it's too painful. We just have to wait. We rest the mind, rest the heart. That might take five years, it might take two minutes. It doesn't matter. What matters is that we trust the process of closing when it's too much, and then opening when we can.

Often we feel like we have to know everything before we can do something, or that we have to save the world, or that we have to figure everything out. But just one moment of care balanced with detachment will really make a difference.

There's an experience I had my senior year in high school that for me touches this. I hadn't had a history of any adults taking much interest in me. And I worked at this outdoor theater the summer of my senior year where all these groups came—Jimi Hendrix, the Supremes, Stevie Wonder, all kinds of groups. A musician named Hugh Masekela came. I'm not sure if you've heard of him. He's a musician from South Africa who lives in the United States.

I used to stand where all the performers would come down to the stage and wait there and talk. Most of these people didn't take much interest in me, to say the least. And this man Hugh Masekela, who I didn't know from anybody, came for a week, and every night he would spend about an hour talking with me. He was really interested in me, and there wasn't anything weird about it. It was very natural, just sitting down and having a ginger ale and talking.

It had such an effect on me that there was this person who was actually interested in me. I consider him a benefactor. I only had those very brief moments in time with him, but they mattered. He cared. Later on I heard that he has a very strong interest in teenagers and actually sets up productions in New York where he trains teenagers musically and in acting. And I think, what a great being. It's not like he did a lot, or studied psychology for fifteen years to figure it out. It was so simple, yet had a transformative, very deep effect on me.

More and more Stephen and I are trying to encourage people to take an interest in someone. And it doesn't mean that it's a big commitment. That's sort of the C word in our culture—there's the F word, and then there's commitment. But it's not like you have to make a heavy commitment.

It can be that on a train you simply take an interest in somebody. Or it could mean a slightly longer commitment—maybe an hour, whatever it might be. But these little things make a difference for people. This is how metta and compassion are going to start coming into our culture more. Maybe not from elders in our culture. Maybe from us.

The last aspect of balancing equanimity and compassion that I wanted to talk about is humor. It doesn't seem to be on any of the lists in Buddhism—I don't quite get it. I keep looking for it. Maybe it's in some sutta we haven't discovered yet. But then I thought, well, maybe it's because it's understood. Maybe it's just so important that it's understood to be in all the lists in Buddhism.

It's important not to take ourselves too seriously. Humor—a little bit of humor, at least—brings lightness, buoyancy to us. And in the face of suffering, we need that lightness.

This is another quotation from The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe: "You can't expect insights, even the big ones, to suddenly make you understand everything. But I figure, hey, it's a step if they leave you confused in a deeper way."

Now that should be on the brochure. Insight meditation: leaves you confused in a deeper way.

Mahatma Gandhi said, "If I didn't have a sense of humor, I would have committed suicide long ago." We need it. Dukkha land is hard. You know what dukkha land is like. You just wish you were in anicca land or anatta land, but dukkha land is hard. And there's a lot of it.

When we were teaching in Yucca Valley this past spring, every night a group of us would go out a side door. Most of the yogis would go out one way, but a group of us in the front would go out the side door right after the talk ended. One particular night toward the end of the retreat, we were all walking out the door, and some of us noticed that our sandals were missing, our shoes, our sneakers.

It was quite interesting to watch what happened. At first people were just saying, "Where are my shoes? Where are my sandals?" Then there was this immediate search for the sandals and shoes. And then there was this sense of being upset—really upset. They were gone. It turned out later that we found out many yogis' Birkenstocks were missing as well. Some vandals had taken the sandals. Actually it was something like fifteen hundred dollars worth of stuff that had gone missing. It was really serious.

But what happened that night is this: people were walking out getting upset about their sandals being missing, and the last person out the door was a monk. He walked out, and he just looked. Very mindfully—you could just see it happening—he just saw that his sandals were missing. They were just gone. That was it. There was nothing extra. No upset, no looking for them. They were just gone. And he just started laughing and walked off in his socks.

It was great. The practice works, you know. That's equanimity. It was so wonderful to see. And then a collection was taken up later to get him some sandals.

I began this talk by speaking about that professor I had in college. I consider him one of my greatest teachers. The college was in a city that was very polluted. He had a small greenhouse and gardens on the side of a dormitory. There was a lot of alcohol being drunk by students at that particular time, and many bottles would be thrown out of the dormitory windows into the garden. Sometimes the window of the greenhouse would get smashed.

Sometimes when he was working in the garden, he would actually get hit in the head by a bottle—really severe, really hard. Very few people that he was teaching had the slightest interest in what he was trying to teach. He was way ahead of his time, so deeply caring for the planet and for anything alive. He had such a deep care for the earth. He was considered very eccentric.

There was the naturalist side of him, but there was also a very deeply contemplative side. When all the Vietnam War demonstrations were going on, when the Black Panthers took over a dormitory on our campus, when there were ghetto riots and all those turbulent times—there were a lot of professors leaving or getting fired, a lot of students getting violent.

I remember one particular day when a dorm had been taken over and there was growing violence happening on the campus. He was so angry, so disturbed. I'd just never seen him like that. He was so upset. I'd never seen him take a day off, and he just left. He went out into the woods for the day, for the whole day. And the next day he came back, and I'd never seen anybody so quiet.

That quiet that he brought into my life had more of an effect than anything at that point in my life. I saw the possibility for being touched by that much pain but also having balance. I had been feeling quite violent at the time, and I really felt like it had saved me.

If you think about those years back then, how very little awareness people had of the environment—and of all the things I saw him go through—it would have been very easy for him to get discouraged at times. But he kept going. I never saw him stop what he was trying to get across. And I saw that he actually had a huge effect. There's such a growing awareness of the environment now. At that time there was so little.

I think also that if you consider the state of the earth and what's happening environmentally, we could get very discouraged at times. It's not looking so good for us. From one perspective, that's true.

Yet every time we have this compassion, this equanimity, this balance, and we take an action—every time we speak, every time we save a bottle, every time we turn off a light—whatever we do has a huge effect. We don't know what will happen. We don't have any idea what's going to happen with this earth. So we do the best we can, and then we let go of control.

This ability to see very clearly what's happening, to open to the suffering, and then to respond in whatever way we can—doing the best we can and letting go of control—takes this tremendous balance of care and detachment. Which, luckily, you're working very deeply on.

There's a poem by Chief Seattle. I read recently that someone said of Chief Seattle that he could be heard from three quarters of a mile away—his voice was so powerful. I'm really impressed by that, because nobody can even hear me if I don't have a microphone on. Three quarters of a mile.

Anyway:

Teach your children what we have taught our children—that the earth is our mother. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons and daughters of the earth. If men spit upon the ground, they spit upon themselves. This we know. The earth does not belong to us. We belong to the earth. This we know. All things are connected, like the blood which unites one family. All things are connected. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons and daughters of the earth. We did not weave the web of life. We are merely a strand in it. Whatever we do to the web, we do to ourselves.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 239

Nature and Cause of Suffering

Carol Wilson · 54 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers an intimate exploration of the First and Second Noble Truths—dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) and taṇhā (craving). She begins by recounting how the Buddha, after his awakening, initially hesitated to teach, perceiving that beings "relish attachment and delight in attachment." Yet moved by compassion upon seeing that everyone simply wants happiness while unknowingly doing the opposite, he chose to share his realization.

Wilson illuminates how we habitually deny suffering—whether a doctor dismissing a patient's pain or our own tendency to shut down when confronted with beggars in India. She explains that this denial disconnects us from truth itself, since we cannot selectively close ourselves to pain while remaining open to joy. Through personal examples, including a memorable trip to a health club and a futile search for a chocolate milkshake, she demonstrates how even pleasant experiences contain unsatisfactoriness when examined closely.

The talk clarifies the Pāli terminology around desire, distinguishing taṇhā (thirst/craving) from simple needs and wholesome aspiration. Wilson describes craving as a physical sensation of "leaning forward and tightening," noting how it distorts perception and creates separation. She emphasizes that retreat practice offers a unique opportunity to experience craving without acting on it, allowing practitioners to see that this movement of mind simply arises and passes away. Through mindful attention to this process, the chains of bondage become visible, and understanding naturally leads to freedom.

Last night Stephen spoke briefly about the Four Noble Truths—the first teaching that the Buddha ever gave, and really the core teaching.

If you recall, the first truth is that of the unsatisfactory nature of our life. Not just painful, but unsatisfactory. The second truth is that the cause of this—the word is dukkha, which we translate as unsatisfactory—the core cause of this is the movement of craving in the mind. It is the cause of suffering or unsatisfactoriness because we crave what is insubstantial, ephemeral, not lasting. We crave for happiness where it can't be found. The third truth is that there is an end, a cessation to this movement of craving—a liberation, freedom, peace. And the fourth truth is the Eightfold Noble Path, the way that the Buddha laid out for us to develop, to touch more and more deeply the truth of who we are, this truth of freedom.

Tonight I want to talk mainly about these first two noble truths.

It's said that the Buddha, after his years of practice and his full deep realization, his great wisdom, was at first not so inclined to teach. He was reflecting on this depth of truth that he had realized and thought that this truth is profound and very hard to see—that a person cannot come to it by thinking about it, but only by direct experience. The wise will understand this truth of our being through only direct experience. But he continued: this generation, where he was alive at that time 2,500 years ago, this generation relishes attachment, delights in attachment. So it's hard for them to see this truth.

I guess things haven't changed very much.

Thinking this, he thought, well, what's the use? I might as well just hang out in the bliss of Nibbāna for the rest of my life. He thought he wouldn't be understood. So the legend has it that a Brahma being from one of the high Brahma realms came down and begged the Buddha to teach out of great compassion for the world. And it's said that the Buddha used his all-seeing wisdom to survey the world. One of the things he saw, and what touched his great compassion, is that everyone just wants to be happy. All of us, deeply in our heart—what do we want? We want to be happy. Yet through our blindness, through not understanding, he saw that people were doing, in their efforts to be happy, just the opposite of what would make them happy. In pursuing happiness, they were doing it in a way that was only bringing more suffering. Out of great compassion, he decided to teach, to share what he had discovered, and so spent the next 45 years of his life doing that.

The truth is hard to see, not because it's somewhere else, not because we have to somehow be different in order to see it. It's hard to see because we look to the wrong things for happiness. Because we see in an incorrect way. Because we don't look at what's really happening now and so don't see the truth of things.

That's why I want to talk about the first two truths. I love talking about them because the understanding of these—the truth of the unsatisfactoriness and of craving—is so liberating. It is the key to understanding what happiness is, what truth is.

When we touch our true nature, in that moment, the truth of who we are beyond body, beyond mind, beyond this duality, this sense of me and you—in that moment, craving doesn't make any sense. There's nothing to crave. And so it's not a problem. But paradoxically, what blinds us to touching this truth of who we are is just this movement of craving in our minds, in our hearts.

So I feel it's very important—it's vital, actually—for us to inquire into this process of craving, to really come to understand it, to see it for what it is: this movement of mind, this cause of suffering. And in inquiring into craving, we also begin to see what leads us into craving in the first place. That is our not really deeply understanding the truth of dukkha, of the unsatisfactory nature of things.

Not understanding this truth of the unsatisfactory nature of existence, we basically keep thinking that there's some experience, some physical object, some emotional or mental or physical experience that we can have that is going to be ultimately satisfying, that's going to bring us lasting happiness. We don't put it that way so broadly in our minds, but through our not investigating, that's the way we're acting. And so we keep craving, we keep looking for this satisfaction where it can't be found, and we keep suffering. We keep being confused, we keep feeling shut out and separate from who we really are, from peace.

I think that's what the Buddha meant when he talked about how everyone wants to be happy, but we keep doing just the opposite—what will only bring us more confusion and suffering.

So let's examine these two truths, and just look a little bit at how our misunderstanding of these facets of existence continues to bring about confusion and suffering.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was an Indian wise man, said once that the obstacles to the clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain.

And that's the first two truths in reverse: fear of pain, desire for pleasure.

So this first noble truth, the truth of dukkha or unsatisfactoriness—the unsatisfactoriness of pain, the unsatisfactoriness of impermanence, that what we love, what we cherish, changes, goes away, or we change.

When I first started hearing about this, the thought that came was, "Well, suffering is no big secret. Why is this such a big truth to proclaim? All you have to do is pick up the newspaper any day and read it, talk to five people you meet on the street. It's pretty clear that there's a lot of suffering and unsatisfactoriness in the world. So what's the big secret?"

But when we really start inquiring into it in our day-to-day life, begin to look at how we're relating to our experiences just on a mundane, day-to-day level, it's quite fascinating to me to continue to see how limited—at least for me—my ability to open to the absolute truth of unsatisfactoriness or suffering is. The tendency to deny and avoid is enormous. So I see why the Buddha proclaimed it: to wake us up, to start paying attention to what's really happening. Not to develop a depressive, aversive relationship to life. In fact, it's just the reverse. He's saying, let's look at what's really going on in order to wake us up, in order to open us to the potential of living in truth at this very moment, rather than living in denial, rather than living in fear, even if we're not aware of it.

So what are some of the ways that we deny? Just a couple of examples, and you can find them in your own life. Go through a day and we're doing it all the time. But these are real obvious ones, where we deny another's pain right in front of us, or deny our own internal pain.

Once I was in the hospital and a doctor was doing a procedure on me that was relatively painful—not killer, but relatively painful. And he was having trouble doing it, trying it over and over and over. It was really hurting. I was pretty on the edge anyway, so I started crying some. He just looks at me and says, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

It's really interesting. Looking at it on another level, it's the same process exactly. I notice when I go to India—I was just in India a couple of months ago—it's a very painful place. So I pay attention to when I first get into a city, and one, especially a Westerner, is accosted by beggars. Really, not just kind of panhandlers, but truly emaciated people, lepers, people who are quite maimed, in really poor condition, obviously in great need. And it's not just one or two. If you give any amount of money to one, you can literally be mobbed by a group of them.

So I pay attention: how long can I really stay open to this suffering, to connecting with these people? And it's sad—it's not long. Maybe in ten minutes I notice I'm shutting down, I'm kind of averting my eyes, I'm walking past a little more hurriedly. Maybe the next day I start out open again.

So what's going on? Why do I shut down? Why did the doctor have to deny my obvious pain? I feel that to open to the immensity of pain in another, the immensity of pain in the world, triggers off the same immensity of pain in myself. And to the extent that it's too much for me to handle, sometimes we just don't want to acknowledge it. Sometimes it's really overwhelming; sometimes it's just more than we can open to and handle at a time. So I'm not saying we should immediately open to all the pain in the world.

But just watching that process of shutting down and why—and can I then bring my attention back and feel that pain and know that that's okay? Pain, suffering is part of life in this mind and body on this planet. I don't have to be afraid of it.

But the question might come up: why do we have to open to this pain? What's the point? I thought I was doing okay. But really, I know you all don't think you're doing okay or you wouldn't be here going through this torturous process of sitting and walking and watching everything that arises. I know I wouldn't do it if I thought everything was completely okay.

So notice—I notice when I shut down to the beggars, when I shut down to pain, my own and others' pain—what's the effect of that? I no longer make contact. There's no longer a sense of connection.

I'm actually shut down to the truth in that moment. Because the thing is, we can't shut down selectively. We tell ourselves, "I'll shut down to pain, but I'll stay open to compassion and joy and appreciation." It doesn't work that way. When I shut off to the truth of this moment, there's disconnection, separation, a sense of being out of touch.

And one learns that in shutting ourselves off, in denying—whether consciously or unconsciously—the truth of this moment when it happens to be painful, that's actually in the long run much more painful and difficult. It leads to much more isolation and confusion than actually just acknowledging that this moment is painful and allowing that experience to be as it is. Because what's so amazing is that often that also opens into great compassion and appreciation and joy. But the basic reason is this: in shutting off and denying what's happening in this moment, there's no way we can touch the truth of who we are, because we're denying it.

So we begin to notice how and when and why this denial of what's happening takes place.

We deny as well the dukkha, the unsatisfactoriness, of change. We all know intellectually that everything changes. But I just watch it in my life. For example, I recently moved into a new house that was freshly built. And within no time, I'm noticing the black marks on the wall and the little cracks appearing as the house begins to settle. There's this real sense of, "They did it wrong. They made a mistake." But they didn't do anything wrong. Everything decays. It changes. That's the nature of things. If I can't acknowledge and allow that, I'm going to suffer.

This culture—and this culture is crazy—we're in one mass denial of the fact that we're aging and dying. Just the other day, several of us fell into this conversation about facelifts, and it got quite intricate about what's involved and what goes on. At the end of it, one of us said, "We must be getting old. We've known each other for a long time, and we never had this conversation before." What's going on in our culture that we need to do this? We need to deny what's happening right in front of us. Why is that so scary?

This denial gives us a really skewed view of the world. I know I grew up with a really unconscious, skewed view of life. There was an unspoken assumption in my house that I didn't even recognize until I was about twenty-five: you're supposed to be healthy, you're supposed to be happy, you're not supposed to have a lot of emotional mood swings. And if you're unhappy? "Well, don't be sad. Come on, smile." So the unspoken assumption was that there was something really wrong with me. If, having a quite blessed life as I did, I could still feel miserable and discontent—well, maybe there's something wrong with me as a person. It led to a lot of confusion and frustration and self-blame and self-judgment.

That's why this teaching of the First Noble Truth—the fact that there is unsatisfactoriness inherent in our existence—came not as a depressing thing but as a huge relief. It was like, "Oh, right." It acknowledged my experience. I didn't feel so crazy anymore. Finally, an explanation of what's really going on. Because it's not just talking about the obvious painful or changing situations, which God knows is enough—and we still manage to hide from even that at times. But it also helped me begin to tune into the unsatisfactory nature of experiences on a more subtle level.

Let me tell you a little story. It could be almost any experience, but this was when I really woke up to it and realized why I felt so crazy, why I thought I should be happy and wasn't. One fall, a friend and I—I was teaching a three-month course in Massachusetts—belonged to a health club where we would go swimming and work out. We were really tired that day. It had been a long week, and we decided to go swimming to refresh ourselves. We got really happy at the idea.

So I'll describe blow by blow what actually happened, rather than what I thought was happening. We got in the car, drove for half an hour, arrived—it was really cold—got out and went in. The dressing room was quite chilly, and I'm very susceptible to cold. So I was freezing getting into my bathing suit.

Took a shower, walked out to the pool—I was even more freezing. Got into the water, which wasn't particularly warm, so I was quite uncomfortable and shivering. I started swimming really fast, and after about two laps, I got warm. For about one lap, I was really enjoying it. And then my arms started to hurt, and it just started to be boring. I thought, "Well, I can't wait to get in the sauna."

So I dragged myself through a couple more laps, got out—cold again—went into the sauna, relaxed, and thought, "This feels great." And it felt great for about five minutes. Then the wooden board started to really hurt my back. I got really sweaty, kind of dizzy, developed a headache. So I decided to go out. I went out—it was really cold. I sat there and cooled off. "Oh, now I'm cold. I'm going to go back in the sauna." I went in the sauna. It felt good for about two minutes. Then again I started to sweat, got dizzy, went out, took a shower—it was cold—got dressed, went upstairs, and met my friend. He's a man, so he'd been in the men's room. He said, "Boy, that was great!" A typical experience. And I would wonder, how come I don't feel really incredibly good now?

Of course, again, you might say, "Well, who wants to look this closely? It's really depressing." And I want to say again: it's not. It's not depressing at all. It's quite the reverse. It's quite liberating. It's seeing what's actually going on, and it allows for much more appreciation of what's actually happening—when I'm not trying to twist the experience to meet some idea I have of how good it ought to feel, how it ought to be, how it should make me happy for good.

The Buddha said at one point that he teaches one thing only: dukkha and the ending of dukkha. This beginning to see on a more subtle level the unsatisfactory parts of our experience serves as a way to wake us up. It's like we begin to really pay attention. We begin to come back into the present moment. And when we're paying attention and alive and present, that's when we open to the truth of who we are—not when we're trying to twist our experience to meet some idea or expectation.

A real simple example from retreat, just from talking to a few people here: you might find that you sometimes go through the day always leaning into the next experience. You come to the sitting, you sit down, and within five minutes you've got this thought: "Forget this one, but I can't wait till I get to the walking." You get out to the walking, and after ten minutes it's like, "God, this is driving me crazy, but soon it'll be lunch." You get to lunch and it's okay, but it's not really quite doing it for you, so you think about your nap. And it just goes like that—leaning into the next thing, leaning into the next thing.

What's going on? That movement in itself is quite unsatisfying. It's really quite a suffering experience to always be waiting for the next thing because this one isn't doing it. That suffering in itself can wake us up. Come back. What's going on right now?

You'll almost always see that when we bring our full attentive being into this moment, there will be something unpleasant happening right now. I don't mean every moment there's something unpleasant. I mean when you find yourself leaning into and wanting the experience to be different, and you come back, there's almost always something unpleasant. Maybe something just really mildly unpleasant.

A slight unpleasant sensation in the knee, a little bit of boredom, a little bit of restlessness going unrecognized. Somehow the sitting just isn't meeting our expectations of what we want to be happening. And our conditioning is so strong to avoid, to deny the unpleasant, that when we're not aware of tuning into that, we just immediately start leaning into wanting the experience to be different, looking forward to the next thing.

When we look at it, the suffering that comes about from this moving out of our present moment's experience is often so much stronger than if we just opened into the fact of restlessness. Okay, there's restlessness. It's unpleasant. And that's okay. It's not such a big deal.

So we see in looking at an experience, just a simple experience like this, through bringing attention and mindfulness to the unpleasantness, we see in operation the second truth: that the cause of the real suffering in that experience isn't the unpleasant twinge in the knee or the restlessness per se. It's the craving—this leaning forward, wanting the experience to be different, to be better, looking for something to always be pleasant, as if that's going to bring us happiness.

This movement of craving is the real suffering. It's the real blinding factor in our experience. It's born of denial of unsatisfactory or unpleasant experience, born of denial of the fact that things change, that everything changes. By themselves, neither pleasure nor pain enlighten. Only understanding does.

So can we bring our mindful attention to this movement of craving in order to come to understand it, to come to be free of this misperception that happiness will come about through craving?

When we talk about craving or desire, I want to clarify a language thing. In Pali, the language that these Buddhist texts are written in, there are three different words that in English tend to all be translated as desire. What I'm talking about, this movement of craving, is a word that literally translates into English more as thirst. It's like when you're really just thirsting for something—for sense experience, for an idea, for a pleasant sensation, for anything. Just this craving that pulls you out of yourself.

There's also the desire that simply knows you're hungry and you need to eat, that you're sleepy and you need to sleep—just taking care of the basic facts of our existence without this thirsting in the mind. That's not what we're talking about. And there's also a type that's translated as desire that's really the desire for freedom, for understanding—perhaps what brings us to this practice, to our spiritual path. And that can actually be quite helpful.

So in talking about craving as the cause of suffering, I'm talking about this energy, this thirsting for experience, for things to be different.

How can we explore it? How does craving arise in a moment? Because as with any experience, it's something that arises due to conditions. It lasts. It passes away. It's not permanent. It's not something always lurking in our experience. It comes and goes. And we can come to understand that.

In all of our field of experience, there are only six possible types of sense objects. Six types of things to crave. It really reduces it to a minimum when we look at it this way. There are sight objects, sounds, tastes, smells, touch or sensory experience, and mental experience. And that's it. Everything else is just ramifications of that, which we prettify and make more complex.

These different sense experiences are arising and passing as we sit, as we walk, as we move through the day—coming and going quite rapidly as we begin to notice. When there's an object, a sense object, for example a sight, that comes together with a sense organ like the eye, and there's consciousness of that called sight consciousness, that's what we call contact—that moment of those three coming together. In that moment of contact, a feeling arises. It's either pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

Say there's a smell and it's pleasant. From that pleasantness, craving can quite naturally arise—just this movement towards that pleasantness. With mindfulness, we can be quite aware of this whole process, seeing it clearly, and it doesn't really go any further. There's not a lot of proliferation about it. It's no big deal. It's not a lot of suffering. It doesn't really take us away from this moment.

But when we're not aware of it, and it happens quite quickly, the craving strengthens. Now there's a smell, it's pleasant, you start thinking about how hungry you are, you imagine pancakes, you start thinking about what you'd like to have for lunch, you start thinking about your ideal breakfast. It gets really complicated. The craving and all the thoughts and associations start proliferating, and you end up in this really solid fixation on something. Suddenly the present experience—just sitting and being with the breath, which a minute ago was very peaceful and calm—is not okay. It's really unsatisfying.

Yet what is interesting is that when we don't really inquire into this process, we tend to take it for granted,

There's something about this craving—for the pancakes, for example—that when we don't look at it, somehow there's something we kind of like about it. Have you ever noticed that?

The Buddha, in describing this truth of craving, says at one point that this craving is accompanied with delight, finding pleasure or satisfaction now here, now there. Somehow, when unexamined, we kind of like to crave. We think it's pleasant somehow, and so we don't recognize the danger of what's actually happening. And what's actually happening is that the craving is blinding us to the truth of this moment.

For example, that craving for food, the extended food fantasy—it seems kind of pleasant. I know so many times we're sitting and it's really hard to pull back from a fantasy because it feels nice. We think it's really enjoyable. But what's the effect? Pay attention to what the effect is when something finally does snap us out of it. We wake up and here we are, still sitting here. "Oh no, fifteen more minutes to go." It's unpleasant. We're much more out of touch. The breath seems really dull. Our sensations are hard to get in touch with. We're much more discontented than ever.

We go to lunch, and instead of blueberry pancakes, there's lentils and steamed vegetables—which we normally love. But because we had something else in mind, we're really disgruntled and dissatisfied with what's actually there. Much more out of touch, unable to appreciate what's actually happening in this moment.

This is what craving does. It distorts our perception—our perception of what is craved and of everything else. There's a saying that when a pickpocket meets a saint, the pickpocket only sees the saint's pockets. Craving distorts our perception. We can't appreciate what's really happening.

So our mindfulness practice is not to condemn craving or ourselves, not to judge, but to begin to see this process clearly, to begin to understand it, and through understanding to come to liberation from it. Krishnamurti said, "Unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable."

So let's investigate together for a moment. What is craving? How do we actually experience this movement of craving, of grasping?

We're sitting, for example, with the breath. Experience after experience arises. We note it, and it passes. There's the breath. There's hearing. We note it. There's a sensation. We note it. It diminishes. There's a sound. We note it. It diminishes. No big deal.

Then suddenly, one experience is sort of isolated and grasped onto. This one is it. This one is really important. For instance, the sound. What does it feel like just in that moment, this movement of craving?

I personally experience it almost as a physical sensation, as if somewhere inside there's a movement of leaning forward and tightening, grabbing onto that sound. It feels unpleasant, and I feel unbalanced. Whereas before there was a calm, clear seeing, suddenly the inner experience feels unbalanced.

And then comes a stronger identification with the wanting—all this proliferation, these constructions, explanations, stronger desires, self-image, judgment. Everything gets stronger and more complicated and much more unpleasant.

So, for example, there's a sound, a movement of craving, really grasping onto it. "Oh, that's a bird outside. That's so beautiful. I'd love to go outside and see that bird." And it just gets stronger, and pretty soon it's really hard to sit still. The whole sense of the hall is dark, it's dank in here, it's really depressing, it's so beautiful and spacious outside.

It's really strange to be in such a beautiful environment and just be sitting here inside in the dark. I should go out and appreciate the bird. Oh, what's the matter with me? I came here to meditate and I'm just using this as an excuse. And it gets into self-judgment—a really solid sense of me and other. It's a lot of suffering.

If at some point we actually leap up and run out of here, ostensibly to go see the bird, if you're paying attention, you'll see we're really leaping out so that the feeling of craving will come to an end. Because it's so unpleasant, we act on the craving basically so we don't have to feel the experience of craving itself. That's what happens when we get the object we're craving—to end that uncomfortable state.

So notice when this experience of craving comes up. It probably will come up sometime before the rest of the night is over. Our perception is distorted. Our mind is unbalanced, kind of wavering, unsteady. We can't really see what's clearly happening.

I'll give an example. The other day I was with a friend and craving got triggered. Someone mentioned the words "chocolate milkshake." I had been perfectly happy the moment before, peacefully sitting in the sun. But someone said "chocolate milkshake" and then mentioned a place to go get them. I know this isn't fair to mention to you as yogis, so I'll just say the ending now—the place was closed and we never got it. So you've got nothing to envy.

Craving got established and we sat around talking for fifteen more minutes. I was getting more and more uncomfortable. I was no longer happy sitting there. I had to get out and go get a chocolate milkshake. So that movement of unpleasantness drove me and my friend into the car.

We're driving. The place is closed. Real disappointment. We decide to go down the whole strip of Yucca Valley looking. This is how craving distorts our perception—you know how when you really want something, you twist around what you see until it fits what you're wanting, even though that's not what's there at all? So we're driving and my friend is trying to read all the signs. He goes, "Oh look, Yogurt Cup! Yogurt Cup!" I looked over. It said "Urgent Care." It was a little hospital. This is what happens.

So we distort our perceptions. We can't appreciate what's in the moment—which is, I was quite happily appreciating sitting in the sun until this craving arose. When we're with a strong craving and not mindful of it, which clearly I wasn't, we don't have clear judgment. We're driven to end the craving. Do anything to get rid of this feeling. Hop in the car and drive around all day just to not have to feel craving.

A third way that the movement of craving distorts our experience is that again, it takes us out of what is true, out of being able to be present in the moment. It becomes impossible to know and experience our basic interconnectedness, the ultimate unity, the perfection of what is in this moment. Because when one thing is isolated and grasped onto, there's an immediate separation of that from everything else—of me and what I want out there to make me happy. You become lost in the experience of duality.

Again, a simple retreat example. I know James mentioned the other morning this phenomenon of vipassana romance—someone you know nothing about, that you're just incredibly drawn to, the object of a lot of craving in the mind. So imagine you're doing walking meditation very carefully, pretty calm, very peaceful, feeling the sensations, just very present. And suddenly there's a sight. We recognize that sight as the object of our vipassana romance, and strong craving arises, leading to a whole series of thoughts. We're not mindful of it, obviously. The craving gets stronger, culminates in this really strong grasping. I need to go talk to that person. How am I ever going to make it through the rest of the retreat?

In that moment, if you were just to stop and notice what was happening—how aware are you? How connected are you with the actuality of your experience? How aware are you of others, of the surroundings, of the beauty of the desert, the wind on your face?

The mind becomes locked onto its object, and there arises a strong sense of separation—"I need that." In this state, there is no peace. There is no ability to appreciate what's actually present. And in fact, this strong separation extends to everything else, because other people simply become objects standing in the way of gratifying our craving, rather than beings with whom we share a basic unity.

Contrast this experience, which is actually quite unpleasant and deeply separating, with the same experience of walking when the mind is quiet—in touch with the sensations of lifting, moving, placing, occasionally noting hearing, the wind on your face. No big deal. Nothing special going on. But often in such moments, we notice times when we feel so exquisitely alive, when perception becomes really quite clear. Some walking meditations for me have been the happiest moments of my life. And what was happening? Nothing special, except that the mind was at peace. There was no grasping, no aversion—just the ability to be totally present with what is, with a real clarity of perception. We can only know and appreciate what's true, what's present, when the mind is not clouded by grasping.

This completeness in the moment, this taste of non-grasping, becomes less rare as we continue to practice, as we continue to wake up and bring our mindfulness, our awareness, to what's happening right now, no matter what that is. Through this power of mindfulness, this waking up, the underlying tendency of the mind to grasp at the pleasant begins to weaken, to fade.

As you sit, as you walk, it may not seem like much when a moment of craving arises—say, wanting a sitting to be a certain way—and you become really mindful of that. You note the craving, and it weakens, dissipates. Nothing really happens; it goes away. And again, you're calm and present in the moment. It doesn't feel like any big deal, because we're kind of looking for big lights to go off. But actually, this is a big deal. Because in this moment, there is a movement out of blindness and distortion into clarity and freedom. This is really what our practice is all about.

There is no lasting sense pleasure, opinion, view, no solid thing that is "I" that is going to make us lastingly happy. As long as we're looking for that, so long will we be lost in craving, cycling around and around. But the more we're able to open to and acknowledge whatever is here in this moment—pleasant, unpleasant, painful, beautiful—the more we can see the movement of craving and not need to act on it, not get lost in all the proliferation. We come back and simply open to what's true here and now, and the more our potential for living in the truth of who we really are becomes activated.

Suzuki Roshi once said that renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of this world, but in accepting that they go away. With that acceptance comes the potential for great appreciation, joy, and compassion—appreciation of what's beautiful, and the understanding that it's really okay that things go away. We know that's not the true nature of peace, the true nature of who we are.

One of the helpful qualities of retreat—and this is really exciting—is that we get to experience this process of craving and grasping without being so driven by it. In our lives, as I said, the experience is so unpleasant that we just jump to act on the craving, to get rid of feeling it. And in most cases, there are so many potential things to crave—sense objects, mind objects, views and opinions—that we can keep moving from one to the other. This kind of hides the fact that the real suffering is coming from this very process of chasing after something to make us happy.

Here on retreat, we've really limited all of that. The cravings will still come up. Maybe instead of for a spa, it's for two apples at tea time. But it's the same process. Because we've so limited activities, you're sitting here and craving comes up, and there's not really too much you can do about it except sit and come back and feel what it feels like—the experience of craving, of grasping. It's not pleasant, and that's a lot of the reason we think it's so hard to be here. We're sitting here lost in craving or aversion, wanting things to be different.

But it's a rare opportunity. When we can just sit, become mindful of the experience of craving, experience that it's unpleasant or unbalanced—and it's okay. We don't have to be driven to act every time a movement of craving arises in our experience. We don't have to keep running just to avoid the experience of craving. We sit here, we feel it, and then we see it comes up and it just kind of plops down. It's no big deal. It's not so fearful. This is really what can allow us to become free of this cycle of craving and fear. It can allow us to open to the truth of the moment.

So really, all craving, all grasping is bondage. It's bondage because it distorts our perception and because it blinds us to what is true. Craving distracts us from the true nature of who we are. We get lost in trying to fulfill the objects of craving, and we get taken away from the ability to open to the truth of who we are, which is always here and now. When we're craving, we're always looking somewhere else.

But through our mindfulness, through this power of simply bringing our full non-judging, non-violent attention to what's happening here and now, the possibility of understanding this process arises—and so understanding who we are becomes possible. Through understanding, it is possible for this seemingly endless search for gratification to come to an end. Right now, in this moment. Not ten years down the road, but right in this moment of clear seeing.

I want to end with two quotations. The first is from Nisargadatta Maharaj:

Nothing physical or mental can give you freedom. You are free once you understand that your bondage is of your own making and you cease forging the chains that bind you.

So that's what our practice is about—seeing and understanding.

The second is from Thich Nhat Hanh:

Meditation is not evasion. It is a serene encounter with reality.

That's what we're doing: serenely encountering reality with our mindfulness in order to understand who we are.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 240

Right Intention

Carol Wilson · 53 min

In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson examines right intention (sammā saṅkappa), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, exploring how it serves as the essential bridge between right view and ethical action. Building on Joseph Goldstein's teaching about the luminous nature of mind and the kilesas (defilements) as visitors, Wilson presents right intention as a powerful method for working with greed, hatred, and delusion alongside mindfulness practice.

Wilson illuminates three levels of working with right intention: the precise aiming of attention in each noting moment, understanding thoughts as manifestations of underlying intentions, and cultivating wholesome attitudes toward life situations. She explains the threefold right intention—renunciation (nekkhamma), goodwill (mettā), and harmlessness (karuṇā)—as direct antidotes to greed and aversion. Drawing from her experience as a nun in Thailand, she describes the profound joy and fearlessness that arise from simplicity and letting go.

The talk offers practical reflections for inclining the mind toward wholesomeness: contemplating the inherent unsatisfactoriness of desire, appreciating the beauty of renunciation, and remaining awake to the Dhamma teachings present in everyday experience. Wilson emphasizes that difficult experiences are not obstacles but stepping stones for growth. Through the story of Milarepa meeting his demons with compassion, she illustrates how we can greet even our deepest challenges with kindness. The teaching concludes with the Dalai Lama's reminder that inner peace, cultivated through compassion and understanding, is essential not only for personal happiness but for human survival.

Joseph spoke last night about the nature of mind, of consciousness, remembering how our pure nature is clear, luminous, and spacious, and how the kilesas—greed, hatred, and delusion—are simply visitors that come and stay a long time and maybe go away.

As we know, what our practice is doing, our mindfulness practice, is allowing us to see the true nature of our mind more clearly, as well as the true nature of the defilements. A deep understanding of reality, which is what mindfulness is helping us to develop, is what uproots these kilesas altogether. Moments of mindfulness, moment after moment, recondition the mind so that the power of these kilesas is weakened.

Tonight I want to speak about another way of working with these strong roots of defilement—greed, hatred, and delusion—in conjunction with mindfulness. It really is a part of mindfulness, but it also includes a little reflection. And that's working with the concept or idea of right intention.

Right intention is the second path factor of the Eightfold Noble Path. The first part of the path is right view, right understanding. It's first because obviously if we didn't have at least some little bit of right understanding, there would be no impetus to step onto the path at all, and none of us would be here. Right intention is second. The third, fourth, and fifth parts of the Eightfold Path are right speech, right action, and right livelihood. So you can see that this factor of right intention is the crucial link between how we understand the world—right view—and how we then act from that understanding. The intention is what informs the action.

There are various translations of this path factor of right intention, just to give you a feeling for what it is. Right intention is often called right thought, sometimes right attitude, sometimes even right aspiration. In some way, it's a directing of mind, the application of the mind that's necessary in order to act. As has been said here often before, thought is the forerunner of all action. This is right intention, right thought.

We work with this on different levels of experience, different levels of application. There's application of right intention in just one single moment of noting. There's working with it on the level of seeing our thoughts, understanding the thoughts as the manifestation of the intention that's in the mind. And there's an even broader way of understanding it as right attitude—how we apply our attitude to situations that arise in our daily life. What's our intention? What's our attitude toward daily life situations?

I want to speak mostly about the second level, but just briefly about the first: in one noting moment, this path factor of right intention is what we've been calling right aim. That quality of aiming the attention directly at whatever arises in the moment. That willingness to aim and connect precisely with whatever it is that's arising without hesitating, without choosing, without saying maybe this, maybe that, without going to the ones we like and avoiding the things that we don't like. It's this precise moving of the mind to what's happening, but with constancy, without hesitation, the same energy, no matter what's coming up.

You can see how this quality that we develop in moment after moment of noting and observing can have broad applications to how we meet situations in the rest of our life. Can we meet whatever situation comes up in our life with that same constancy, that same willingness to be open and give our full attention of mind to what's happening, simply because it's arising, without first deciding whether we like it, whether we wish it was something else? This is the broader application of right attitude. It's a willingness to greet all situations in life as practice, a willingness to learn from whatever is arising. It really changes our life when we work in this way.

Now, this middle level of working with right intention, with right thought: as I said, it's like the aim, the inclination of the mind. And this inclination, this thought, is the forerunner of all action. The intention is formed from our understanding. Obviously, a mind without understanding, or with what we would call wrong view—the thoughts that lead to that person's actions and speech are thoughts that are manifestations of greed and hatred and confusion. They lead to confused and painful actions. It leads to the state of the world that we're living in.

Just the other night, a couple of us were watching the news on TV. It was kind of scary. It was going on and on about the situation in the Middle East. There's not a war yet, but all these countries, including us, are moving hundreds of thousands of armies and tanks and airplanes and military supplies and weapons.

And there's all this rhetoric being thrown around. We were just watching it, and it's a total manifestation of insanity. You could really feel a sense of the kilesas running wild in the world. Every person they had on speaking, the different leaders—it was just amazing. But this wasn't just a movie. This is what's happening in the world.

When there's not a clear understanding to direct our intentions, the intentions arise from confusion and greed and hostility. And it's scary. In our own little way, sometimes we're in the same boat. Not all the time, because we really have developed quite a lot of understanding, but sometimes. For example, the fan wars that Joseph was talking about last night, where two people came to blows over the fan being off or on. The window wars we have here, and the light wars. This happens every year—it isn't something unusual.

In those moments, our understanding isn't clear, and the forces of greed or confusion and anger are what form our intentions and actions. As someone said to me in an interview, "This is how world wars start." And it is. It's a direct correlation.

And the reverse is also true. As our understanding deepens and changes, this is reflected in a change in our intentions. Our intentions spring much more from non-greed, from non-hatred, from clarity. And thus, again, there's a change in our speech and actions. So too here—there might be wars about the windows, but there are also so many loving and kind and generous thoughts and speech and actions going on here, in each one of you at different times. It's very important to be aware of this, to acknowledge it as well. This is a manifestation of right intention. It's a way we can see that our understanding is changing and deepening, through the way we're manifesting in action.

Full liberation, liberating understanding, is said to uproot these tendencies of greed, hatred, and delusion altogether—meaning there wouldn't even be any more upcropping in thoughts of greed or anger or confusion. It would be quite a nice way to live.

Our mindfulness practice is what works with us on this level. The Buddha, it seems to me, was an eminently practical person, and he recognized that we can work in other ways as well. Working with the intention of mind, we can work quite consciously at times to redirect it. Of course, without mindfulness, we wouldn't even be able to know what the intention is, much less redirect it, so the two are working quite together.

Greed, hatred, and delusion—those forces surface in the form of thought. Thoughts of wanting, thoughts of dislike, thoughts of anger, thoughts of confusion or boredom. The mindfulness, the simple, bare, powerful mindfulness of that thought and the underlying force, is a real purifying power. It's what really weakens that tendency. In that moment of mindfulness, that tendency is actually not present.

But sometimes—and I find especially when it's not just every single greedy thought that comes up, but when you're kind of on a roll and there's an ongoing spate of thoughts that you recognize as greedy or aversive—sometimes it's helpful to work on the level of the thoughts and intention themselves when they're persistent. This works so that when we're having persistent thoughts driven by a kilesa, we can actively cultivate the wholesome counterpart. We can cultivate right intention. We're not really just helpless victims of whatever condition happens to arise.

In working with this, there's what's spoken of as threefold right intention. This deals especially with the unskillful roots of greed and aversion. These can be weakened, really counteracted, through cultivating threefold right intention. It's said that delusion, the unskillful root of delusion, is much more counteracted through understanding, which is what we're working on overall anyway. Actually, they all work together. But working specifically with this threefold right intention counteracts greed and aversion strongly.

So the first is the right intention of non-greed or renunciation, which obviously is the counterpart to greed. The second is the intention of goodwill or mettā, which counteracts ill will, anger, and aversion. And the third is the intention of harmlessness or compassion.

Again, a form of aversion, but more specifically counteracting the intentions of cruelty, harmfulness, or harmful thoughts.

This is based on a very practical principle. It's a kind of thought substitution, based on the principle that these opposing intentions cannot coexist in a single mind moment. The Buddha often said that whatever one reflects upon frequently, whatever we let the mind dwell upon frequently, that becomes what the mind more naturally inclines towards. It's pretty basic.

As we develop subtlety in our mindfulness and self-knowledge, we discover that it's often possible to choose where the mind dwells—that we do have a choice when we work with resolution. We don't need to be enslaved by these ingrained habits of mind, simply responding with aversion if we're an aversive type, or responding with greed if we're a greedy type. If we're committed simply to look, to give our attention, and to be willing to bring up the energy to counteract, to work with right intention.

It's true that the force of habit is very strong. This is nothing new. The more we sit, the more we really get to know this on a deep level. That's what we're seeing here—that our mind might have a tendency to move with delusion, to move with aversion, to move with greed.

I read this little comic I got off a friend's refrigerator. It's called "What Is Your Philosophical Outlook?"—six little scenarios, I call it a right attitude quiz. Number one: "You wander alone down a crowded city street, jostled in the bustle, solitary yet surrounded," you think—and this is multiple choice. These people are: A, my brothers, my sisters. B, perverts, probably pickaxe murderers. C, I sure could go for a chili dog.

Two: "Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse..." A, I know what he feels. He feels hope. He feels fear. B, why is that pervert looking at me? C, maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

Then it goes on, further down: "Construction workers are tearing the street to rubble. How symbolic, you marvel. It reminds me of..." A, the path of life. B, the highway to hell. C, rocky road, my favorite flavor. Three basic types.

The habits of mind are strong. When we're not paying attention, that's what pops out. And when we don't notice that, that's how we act. But with our mindfulness, we're seeing this habitual inclination of mind, and with resolution, with a willingness to work with it, we can greet each moment as a choice, as a chance to learn, to grow, to come out of the dullness of habit.

I'm not talking about a sudden expectation of perfection—"I'm going to pay attention and from now on I'm never going to react from greed." But merely that we can have a choice in this one moment, that in this one moment there's the possibility of redirecting our intention.

So what are some ways to work with right intention, with redirecting the inclination of our mind?

First, intention or thought guided by non-greed or renunciation. Obviously this is to counteract the inclination, the intention of greed. Fred spoke quite beautifully the other night of renunciation, so I don't feel I need to describe it at length. But there is something that can help the mind incline towards non-greed.

In addition to our mindfulness practice, there are three reflections arising out of our close examination and investigation of our mind-body process—three reflections that can be very helpful in inclining the mind to non-greed, to renunciation. I don't mean that every single time you notice a thought of greed you should start this whole period of reflection, because really, just stay with noting, stay with the mindfulness. But in times when you're feeling really caught, really caught up in it or overwhelmed, this can sometimes be helpful.

The first reflection is to reflect on our growing understanding of the unsatisfactoriness inherent in desire. Nothing new. But the more we practice, the deeper this understanding comes into our bones, really, into ourselves.

which is what being on retreat really is. It's a huge form of renunciation. This outer renunciation, I find, is a tremendous help in that it lets us sift through the barrage of desirable experiences that we have in our normal life and allows us to start to really experience more directly the nature of desire. When we're closer to desire, we start to really grasp the futility of it. Being on retreat, the outer renunciation actually helps us experience in ourselves the unsatisfactoriness of desire, which in turn leads quite naturally to a stronger sense of renunciation.

Two quotations that I love about the painfulness of desire. One is from Isaac Singer. He says, "Hell is made up of yearnings. The wicked don't roast on beds of nails. They sit on comfortable chairs and are tortured with desire." And then this is from Bashō: "Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto." I love that one. Just the sense of it. Though I'm in Kyoto, when the cuckoo sings, I long for Kyoto. It's hopeless. Desire breeds more desire. It's almost like desire for the sake of desire when we're not paying attention. And it keeps us in bondage.

Sayadaw U Pandita says that pursuing sense pleasures is a form of self-oppression. It's so painful and so insatiable. The more we see this, the more we experience the suffering of it, the more we can come to know, as Nisargadatta says, "Nothing physical or mental can give you freedom. You are free once you understand that your bondage is of your own making and you cease forging the chains that bind you." Chains of desire. Simply, our practice is allowing us to see this on deeper and deeper levels.

Sometimes reflecting on this when we're feeling lost in desire can help the mind naturally incline towards renunciation. By renunciation, I don't necessarily mean forced giving up of outer things, but a turning away from the craving, a turning away from the desire for its gratification. As Suzuki Roshi said, "Renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of the world but in accepting that they go away." When we really accept that they go away, we really stop wanting them. It just naturally leads to more of a sense of simplicity, both inner and outer.

So that's the first reflection that helps with inclining the mind towards renunciation, non-greed. Another reflection is just the reverse—not on the painfulness of desire, but on the benefits or the beauty of non-greed, of renunciation. We've all had moments of that here.

My strongest experience of it was when I was a nun in Thailand, after the aversive period I talked about before. When I had worked through that and settled into the experience as it was, it was an incredibly simple life. The conditions were no better. But the simplicity, internal and external—there was really nowhere to go. You get up, you take a wash, you go get your meal, you wash your dishes, you come back, you sweep out the ants, you sit, you take a walk, you sit. There's nothing really to look forward to. There's nowhere else to go. There's nothing very upsetting going on, apart from one's mind.

Really, the last few months of that was a period of such joy and peacefulness, springing out of the simplicity, both inner and outer. One of the most beautiful times of my life. It was not intense or ecstatic. There was nothing whatever to show for it, nothing to demonstrate what a better kind of person I was. But really seeing from that experience that where desire and needing and having things and wanting to get more things—whether material things or attainments or whatever—desire breeds fear and sorrow. The simplicity of letting go of that brings a real fearlessness and a joy.

Fearlessness because what is there to fear losing? There's nothing that one needs to hold on to, so there's nothing really to fear. And the joy, it seems to me, comes from this sense of nothing to hold on to and no fear—a real openness of mind and heart simply to what's there in the moment. The mind's not reaching out. Meal's over, that's it for the day. There's nothing to reach out to. There's nothing exciting going to happen. There's no diversion to go look for. And so the mind doesn't reach for it, and is really open and fully present in whatever's going on.

And there's not even a sense of mundane or not mundane—sitting or brushing your teeth or taking a walk, whatever. Each is equally important. One is equally open to it. It was really quite a beautiful experience and a powerful lesson for me in the joy of renunciation. And again, the renunciation is that the mind had let go of wanting. Several months earlier, in the same situation, there was not the joy of renunciation because the mind was wanting like crazy. So it's not just the outer circumstances.

On retreat here, I know we all have moments—more than just moments—of the same experience of the joy and the peacefulness of just being here with what is, and not wanting or needing anything that is not present in this moment. The power and the beauty of renunciation, of simplicity.

It seems to me that practice is just a continual deepening in letting go, in renunciation. Every time I sit a long retreat, I feel like a little more of Carol gets let go of. Enlightenment is like the ultimate relinquishment. We don't get something. It doesn't make us a more spectacular person—more ordinary, more nothing, you know. It's the ultimate giving up.

A third reflection that personally has been helpful for me in strengthening both of the other two—the joy of renunciation and the pain of desire—and just in general waking me up to pay attention, is simply our willingness to be awake and present with what's going on in the world around us. In other words, it's our sense of commitment, a sense of commitment to waking up.

When we have that sense of commitment to wake up and pay attention, there are messages. Everything in the world speaks to us, can inspire us, can reawaken our understanding. As if we're being taught the Dharma constantly by whatever we come in contact with. You can see the Four Noble Truths at every turn. In the little chickadees that come and sit in your hand. And the whole story that goes on around deer hunting season—both sides of it. In the weather changing.

There's something from Thich Nhat Hanh, a little short piece saying this: anything can help you wake up. "When I'm alone and a bird calls me, I return to myself. I breathe and I smile. And sometimes it calls me once more. I smile and I say to the bird, I hear already."

Not only sounds, but sights can remind you to return to your true self. In the morning when you open your window and see the light streaming in, you can recognize it as the voice of the Dharma. That is why people who are awake see the manifestation of the Dharma in everything. A pebble, a bamboo tree, the cry of a baby—anything can be the voice of the Dharma calling. So we should be able to practice like that.

When we practice like that, anything wakes us up to seeing the truth. And then it's quite easy to work with our intentions of mind. The mind quite naturally inclines towards non-greed. It's not a struggle.

So that's the first right intention: intentions of renunciation, non-greed. The second is intentions of goodwill—really mettā—counteracting ill will or aversion. This is thought that's guided by mettā. Or in a broader context, openness to whatever circumstance presents itself. Just complete openness.

One way we have of cultivating this, which we've been doing through the whole retreat, is the practice of mettā itself. It's a very deliberate cultivation of this right intention of mind. It's a very deliberate sitting down and calling up intentions of loving-kindness to ourselves and to all other beings—really working with, transforming our intentions of anger and ill will. We've all worked with that a lot this retreat.

Another way that I find helpful is just to look at, to understand our intentions and to work with them—to look at how we relate to what is arising, back just on this moment-to-moment level of experience. Not even thinking of the thoughts, but seeing what is our attitude in one noting moment to what is arising. Realizing that this attitude is going to be our attitude to larger situations in life as well. I don't mean to imply we always have the same attitude, but: Are we open, willing to learn from whatever's coming up?

Whether it's anger or pain or boredom, or do we tend to meet it with resentment, with ill will or self-pity or blame? All of these ways that we can be with something in the moment while simultaneously pushing it away, resisting, blaming ourselves—all of this is a manifestation of the intention of aversion, the intention of ill will.

We can counteract it with metta. Not necessarily thinking thoughts of metta for all beings, but with that attitude of metta, of loving-kindness, of acceptance for just this one arising experience, whatever it is.

Thich Nhat Hanh again, taking anger as an example, though it could be anything—the experience of anger and how to generate this sense of goodwill towards anger when it's arising in our practice: "I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with nonviolence. We do not need to consider anger, hatred, or any other experience as enemies we have to fight to destroy. Because that would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield, tearing yourself into parts. If you struggle in that way, you do violence to yourself."

So can we bring metta, intentions of goodwill, to whatever experience is arising in this moment? Knowing that difficult experiences, difficult situations, are not in the way. I know we've said this a lot before. It's so hard for us to believe it. They're not in the way—they're stepping stones. They're opportunities for growth and self-understanding. We need them. Not only are they not in the way, but we need them. They're a vital part of practice.

You know the story about Gurdjieff, who had a community in France—a large group of people who lived there and paid to live there and all worked together. There was one older, crotchety man who lived there and just drove everybody crazy. He was nasty and ill-tempered and very unpleasant to be around. And people responded in kind, of course. Eventually he left. I guess it just got too unpleasant for him, the way people were treating him. Gurdjieff went after him and begged him to come back, and in the end agreed to pay him to come back. When he showed up again, everybody said, "What is he doing here? Why did you go and get him?" And Gurdjieff said, "We need him. He's a very important part of this community. We need him to grow."

We all need what's going on, much as we might wish it were otherwise. So can we bring an attitude, an inclination of mind, of metta, of goodwill to whatever it is that's arising in our experience? Can we meet our life with this openness of heart? In that way, whatever is happening becomes the vehicle for growth and self-transformation.

This is my favorite clipping of what's possible when we're working with meeting whatever arises in the moment with this attitude of openness of heart. It's about a woman who was seventeen and clinically depressed when she was misdiagnosed as schizophrenic and placed in a state mental hospital. She remained inside for another seventeen years. Now, fittingly for a woman whose antidotes to adversity are perseverance and forgiveness, she's returned as a full-time administrator at the same hospital.

She says, "I wouldn't have grown one bit if I didn't learn to forgive. If you don't forgive your parents or your children or yourself, you don't get beyond that anger." She says it wasn't deliberate—she shows not a trace of resentment or anger over her misdiagnosis and seventeen-year hospitalization. "It wasn't deliberate on the part of the doctors in the hospital. Not much was known about panic disorders back then. A person who had panic disorders was identified as a little bit crazy."

Her recovery was painful and gradual as she overcame a catatonic despair that often left her unable to eat or move. She contemplated suicide more than once and went through immense suffering even aside from the hospitalization—a ten-year bout with cancer, the death of her husband whom she married when she got out, the death of her brother. And still she spends her life trying to help other people. She says, "Everybody has problems. Life is not trouble-free. I try to help people see that. The mental health issue is only one aspect of suffering."

There are powerful possibilities for all of us when we cultivate the intention of goodwill, of openness, of forgiveness. This woman wasn't stuck. It was a long, painful, difficult process for her, and probably for us as well. We're not stuck either. It doesn't mean we're going to suddenly say, "Okay, fine," and forgive every horrible thing that's happened, suddenly be free of anger. For all of us, it's a gradual process.

But our willingness to redirect our inclination of mind, our willingness to be open to the situation and experience goodwill—it won't always be possible, but that willingness opens up to us a whole different way of being, a whole other possibility of how we can relate to our life, how we can live. So we become, as Don Juan talks about, a warrior who sees everything as a challenge, while an ordinary person sees everything as a blessing or a curse.

Cultivating intentions of goodwill, of metta, of openness—simple openness and acceptance of whatever might be arising as our path at this moment. And that really leads into the third aspect, which is closely linked: intentions of non-harming.

In fact, often our openness to the situation and our working with understanding and forgiveness will lead us into compassionate action. Intention of non-harming, counteracting thoughts and intentions of cruelty or harmful thoughts, is basically thought guided by compassion. Again, we've been working with that in a very directed and formal way when we work with compassion meditation, very actively wishing that all beings, or any one specific person, may be free of their suffering.

Really it's the contemplation of how all of us, all beings, wish to be free from suffering, and yet all of us, all beings, still suffer. Often that contemplation alone is enough to arouse these intentions of non-harming, of compassion. We don't have to go far to observe this desire to be free from suffering and the experience of suffering nevertheless.

I want to talk a little about how intentions of compassion can start right here, right where you're sitting, with compassion for yourself, with compassion for what you are experiencing in any particular moment. Thich Nhat Hanh says, "If you cannot be compassionate towards yourself, you will not be able to be compassionate to others."

What we're doing here, this practice, the work, the hard work that you've all been doing—it's incredibly difficult. As Stephen Levine writes, "We experience many forms of hell as we watch the mind and body." And we do, all of us here. We're meeting our demons over and over, whatever our particular demons might be, whether it's anger, fear, loneliness, boredom, lust, sleepiness, impatience, resistance—the whole list. It's really hard and it's really painful to meet these demons over and over, whether we judge them as petty or whether there's some grand grief of the universe. It doesn't matter.

Can we work to cultivate the intention of compassion toward this suffering, toward ourselves in this experience? We can notice how the intention of our mind expresses itself, whether it's the intention of compassion or the intention of harmfulness. Ways we can notice it before it's even a clear thought is sometimes just in the tone of the note, the tone of the noticing. Noticing anger with that real harshness: "Boredom." "Resistance." "Grief again." "Boredom." You're all quite familiar with this. Just noticing the tone of the note—it's manifesting from an intention definitely not of compassion toward the experience.

And then, as a friend was talking about in an interview, we can go on to notice the tone of the running self-commentary. Maybe you don't have running self-commentary. I have running self-commentary that goes on when I'm sitting—the self-judgment that arises when we experience a painful state. Is this self-commentary compassionate? "Oh, you're really doing a good job. That must be really hard for you." Or is it, "You stupid jerk. You're angry again"? Just noticing this. When we experience these incredibly painful physical and mental states and then we blame ourselves for it—noticing this in the mind.

If we knew someone else were suffering in the same way that we are, would we treat anyone else so harshly? Often when I realize I'm caught in this sense of self-judgment, I'll pretend that the person next to me is going through all the stuff that I know I'm going through. Do I hate them for it? Really not. A really strong sense of compassion comes up. But when it's myself, the tone is just this running sense of hatefulness.

We can work with this really consciously when we become aware of it. We can deliberately cultivate the intention of compassion toward our experience, toward ourselves. Soften the tone of the note. It really makes a difference—from "Anger!" to "Anger..." It really changes things. Soften the running commentary. It can move from—I used to have a note I called "traffic cop." That was my running commentary: "Get back to the breath. Pay attention to that sensation. Get out of that thought."

And it was quite a common note—that inner traffic cop voice.

But it can change, you know. It can soften into something gentler: "It's okay. Okay, there's thinking happening. That's okay. Oh, you haven't been with the breath for a while. That's okay."

It really changes things. This shift in inner speech is the manifestation of the intention of compassion. It transforms the whole tone of our practice. And then we can learn to greet even our deepest demons with compassion for the suffering that's being engendered.

I love this story of Milarepa, the great Tibetan yogi. It's a beautiful personification of meeting our inner demons with compassion. This is from his years of retreat up in a cave—an outer personification of an inner process.

Mila's mind became blissful and he carried some wood back up to the cave. When he arrived there, he found in the cave seven metal demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire, some were bringing water, some grinding tsampa, and some sat performing various magical tricks. As soon as he saw them, he became frightened. He meditated on his deity, uttered a subjugating mantra, performed a gaze, and aroused the deity's presence. He then meditated on compassion and friendliness, but was unable to pacify them.

He thought, "These might be the local deities of this place. Although I have been here for months and years, I have not praised them or given them any torma." So he sang a song of praise to that place. After the song, three of the demons who were performing magic went away, but Mila was unable to make the other four go away.

Realizing that the four demons were magical obstacles, he sang a song of confidence in his experience and view, ending it with: "It is wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time we should converse."

Three of the demons vanished like a rainbow. The remaining one performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, "Ooh, this one is vicious and very powerful." So he sang a song of the view, the pinnacle of realization, ending it with: "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. Demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk about our differences. I feel compassion for this spirit."

And he prays: "Lord Vajradhara, whose essence is Akshobhya, grant your blessing so that this lowly one may have complete compassion."

Thus Mila sang. And with friendliness and compassion, without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him and so vanished like a rainbow.

So can we place ourselves with great compassion in the mouths of our demons? With compassion for the demons and compassion for ourselves. No difference.

I think that's enough. I just want to end by saying that obviously working with cultivating these right intentions—intentions of renunciation, of mettā, of compassion—is an ongoing process. It's a lifetime practice. Our habits of mind are very well ingrained. But they're habits, and they can change. They're not our intrinsic nature.

And as long or as difficult a practice as it might seem, what else in our life is so worth doing? Is there anything more important to spend our life doing? Not only for ourselves, but more and more we see it's for the happiness and peace and well-being of the whole planet.

I want to close with this from the Dalai Lama:

"Through inner peace, genuine world peace can be achieved. In this, the importance of individual responsibility is quite clear. An atmosphere of peace must first be created within ourselves, then gradually expanded to include our families, our communities, and ultimately the whole planet. In order to create inner peace, what is most important is the practice of compassion and love, understanding and respect for human beings."

Developing such attitudes as love and compassion, patience and understanding between human beings is not merely a source of personal happiness, but has become a condition for human survival.

So let us sit together for a few minutes in silence.

CHAPTER 241

Four Foundations of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson presents the Buddha's teaching on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna) as outlined in the Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna Sutta. She begins with Ajahn Chah's insight that meditation is fundamentally about finding balance, explaining how cultivating awareness across all four foundations—body, feeling (vedanā), consciousness, and dhammas—creates harmony and completeness in practice.

Wilson explores each foundation with practical clarity. For the body, she discusses breath awareness, postures, and the four elements (earth, water, fire, air) as a way to directly experience materiality without identification. She emphasizes how contemplating sensations as elements—burning, twisting, throbbing—dissolves the solidity of "my pain" into impersonal, changing phenomena. The feeling foundation reveals how pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral tones arise at the point of contact, and how mindfulness at this juncture can break the cycle of craving and suffering. The consciousness foundation addresses mental states and emotions, showing how awareness prevents identification with fleeting states. The fourth foundation covers mental objects including the five hindrances and seven factors of enlightenment.

Throughout, Wilson demonstrates how these foundations are deeply interrelated in actual practice, cycling naturally from sensation to feeling to mental state to recognition. She explains how this comprehensive awareness leads to direct, visceral understanding of anicca (impermanence), dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), and anattā (not-self), culminating in the Buddha's promise that the four foundations, repeatedly practiced, perfect clear vision and deliverance.

Ajahn Chah, the great Thai meditation master, once said that to calm the mind means to find the right balance. In many ways, our whole practice is about coming to balance. Really, every talk we give is about balance in some way or another.

One way of understanding balance is that when certain factors of mind—what we call the seven factors of enlightenment, qualities of mind—are in perfect balance, it allows the mind to open to the unconditioned. But I'm not going to talk about the seven factors tonight. What I'm going to talk about is what can bring our mind into this perfect balance, what can help to bring the seven factors of enlightenment into balance. And this is the development of what the Buddha called the Four Foundations of Mindfulness.

This is really a huge topic. It's laid out by the Buddha in the main discourse called the Mahasatipatthana Sutta, which is translated as the Greater Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness. I want to give an incredibly brief overview of what is a vast subject, but I want to describe it especially in ways that relate to our practice as we're doing it here, because I find it very enlightening, very helpful. Really, it's a brilliant way that the Buddha had of laying out our whole field of practice—really the whole field of our life experience—in these four areas of mindfulness.

They're completely all-inclusive of any mind-body experience that we can have, whether we're in meditation or in our life. When we cultivate and develop a mindfulness, an awareness that covers all four of these foundations of mindfulness, our practice, our life, our understanding becomes quite harmonious, quite well balanced.

In working with Vipassana—so that we are working with all four, as opposed to Samatha where we're just focusing on one object—you find that actually these four fields are completely interrelated. When we're not arbitrarily fixing on one selected object, you find it's quite difficult not to pay attention to all four of these areas of mindfulness. And so we come to a harmony of being, a completeness of understanding, with nothing unduly emphasized, nothing left out.

So what are these four areas? The first one is called Contemplation of the Body in the Body. This repetition of "the body in the body" is repeated throughout the sutta, and I'll speak to that a little later.

Several different contemplations are offered by the Buddha for working with this foundation of mindfulness in the body. One is the breathing—paying attention to the sensations of breathing. And this is incredibly brief; each one of these things could be talks and talks. So, awareness of the breathing. Awareness of the bodily postures: walking, sitting, standing, lying down. Clear comprehension of our acts, of our movements, of our actions throughout the day. Again, we're developing all of this here—clear comprehension of what we're doing when we're eating, when we're dressing, when we're walking, when we're taking a shower, when we're falling asleep.

Then there are given nine cemetery contemplations, which I'm not going to go into here simply because it's not what we're doing here, but it's another way of giving attention to this foundation of the body.

Another aspect of giving attention to the body is contemplation on our material nature in the way of looking at it through the four elements. Now, this is a way of looking closely at our material experience, broken down into the most primary way we can experience materiality. The four elements is a way of describing the building blocks of our material experience, but it's pointing to direct experience. It's not as conceptual as it sounds.

For example, there's the element of earth, experienced as stiffness, hardness or softness, solidity—earth element. It's stiff, it's hard, or it's soft. The air element is the sense of movement, of extension. Water element is the sense of cohesion, what holds things together, always present there. Fire element is the sense of temperature, of hotness or coldness. Also, and this is interesting, the sense of maturation. For example, the examples given are that as we grow old, that sense of maturation is like burning up—the fire element.

What I find very helpful about working with our physical experience in this way is that it really brings us into the direct experience. It helps us approach the experience of sensation in a way that the sensation doesn't seem so monolithic, so solid and forbidding. And it's much harder to identify with. So, for example, there's the pain in my knee—it's killing me, this practice is impossible, I'm impossible, forget it, it's horrible. And then that switches to: "Oh, the fire element."
